New Delhi - The Centre on Tuesday clamped down on controversial Islamic preacher Zakir Naik's NGO Islamic Research Foundation (IRF) by declaring it as an outlawed organisation for five years. The Union Home Ministry issued the order under stringent Unlawful Activities Prevention Act (UAPA) for charges of terror linked activities. The move would affect the free movement of Naik, who has not returned to India after the MHA started probe in the activities of his NGO. The IRF is declared as an "unlawful association" under the Unlawful Activities Prevention Act for five years, said a Home Ministry official. Zakir Naik, who illegally broadcasts his Peace TV for the past seven years, came under scanner after his name cropped up in the recent blasts in Dhaka after some of the accused disclosed their associations with him. The Islamic orator is banned in the UK and Canada for his hate speech aimed against other religions. He is among 16 banned Islamic scholars in Malaysia.

59. Europeans urge Trump to be cautious on Putin

Washington Post, Michael Birnbaum, 2016 11 16

Brussels - European and NATO defense officials cautioned President-elect Donald Trump on Tuesday about his warming relationship with Russian President Vladimir Putin, saying that they welcome dialogue but that the United States should not abandon its allies in a bid for improved ties with Moscow. The warnings came hours after Trump and Putin spoke by telephone and vowed to work toward better relations, which have sunk to Cold War-era lows after Russia's 2014 annexation of Crimea from Ukraine. The Monday conversation between Trump and Putin did not touch on some of the thorniest issues facing Russia and the West, such as Crimea and the conflict in eastern Ukraine, a Kremlin spokesman said Tuesday. A day earlier, Moscow said the two had discussed a "settlement for the crisis in Syria" and the prospect of joint efforts in the fight against global terrorism, notably the Islamic State. Some European officials privately raised their eyebrows at Tuesday's clarification from the Kremlin, saying they feared that it meant Trump was giving a green light to the annexation of Crimea. European nations, led by Germany, have pushed hard against Trump's rhetoric on Russia, and German Defense Minister Ursula von der Leyen said Tuesday that the president-elect should be cautious in his dealings with Putin. "It is always good for us to remain in dialogue with Russia," von der Leyen told reporters ahead of a meeting of European Union defense ministers in Brussels. "But for us it's also important that we not forget our principles. That means that international laws should not be broken."

60. How Vladimir Putin won the U.S. election

Globe and Mail, 2016 11 16

Editorial: What do voters in Moldova, Bulgaria and the United States have in common? They all elected presidents this month who are sympathetic to Russia and its dictatorial leader, Vladimir Putin. Tiny Moldova has Igor Dodon, who has promised to pursue closer ties with Moscow and turn away from the European Union - a position that stands in polar opposition to that of the country's current, and very corrupt, government. In Bulgaria, Rumen Radev, an outsider voted in by people who are also tired of corruption and who believe closer economic ties with Russia can turn their prospects around, is calling for an end to EU sanctions on Moscow. And in the U.S., president-elect Donald Trump has a clear preference for Mr. Putin's policies and desires over those of the EU and the NATO alliance. He has also signalled that he is willing to accept Russia's unlawful annexation of Crimea, is indifferent to Russia's military adventurism in Eastern Ukraine and may lift U.S. sanctions related to those incursions.

61. L'étrange arrestation d'un ministre russe

Le Figaro, Pierre Avril, 2016 11 16

Moscou - Le ministre de l'Économie a été interpellé, alors qu'il recevait un pot-de-vin de 2 millions de dollars. C'est un séisme dans le monde politique russe. Pour la première fois depuis la chute de l'URSS, il y a vingt-cinq ans, un haut membre du gouvernement russe a été arrêté pour corruption. Le ministre de l'Économie, Alexeï Oulioukaïev, en personne a été interpellé par le FSB (ex-KGB) dans la nuit de lundi à mardi, alors qu'il recevait un pot-de-vin de 2 millions de dollars. Il a ensuite été conduit devant un juge qui a délivré un mandat d'arrêt à domicile. Ce pilier du gouvernement, considéré comme un libéral, est officiellement accusé d'avoir monnayé son soutien au rachat, par le géant pétrolier mondial Rosneft, de son concurrent Bashneft, entreprise publique classée au sixième rang du secteur. Détail piquant, l'entreprise accusée d'avoir corrompu le haut fonctionnaire - Rosneft - est la même qui aurait dénoncé le scandale auprès des autorités judiciaires, à travers son responsable de la sécurité, lui-même un ancien du FSB.

62. Un ancien néonazi est nommé à la tête de la police ukrainienne

Le Figaro, Stéphane Siohan, 2016 11 16

Kiev - Khatia Dekanoidze, une réformatrice géorgienne, a démissionné et a aussitôt été remplacée par Vadim Troyan, un proche du ministre de l'Intérieur. Un an après son arrivée à la tête de la police ukrainienne, Khatia Dekanoidze, 39 ans, a démissionné lundi de son poste en dénonçant la corruption et le blocage des réformes qu'elle avait engagées. En attendant la validation du cabinet des ministres, c'est son adjoint, Vadim Troyan, au profil extrême et inquiétant, qui va prendre la tête de la police, alors que cet ancien commandant du bataillon Azov a autrefois évolué dans la mouvance néonazie. Âgée de 39 ans, Khatia Dekanoidze avait débarqué à Kiev à l'automne 2015 dans le sillage de son mentor, Mikhaïl Saakachvili, et avec d'autres jeunes pousses de Tbilissi, pour donner un coup de fouet aux réformes. L'objectif affiché était de dupliquer à Kiev les recettes géorgiennes, alors que Khatia Dekanoidze avait dirigé de 2017 à 2012 l'académie de police du ministère de l'Intérieur de Géorgie, présidant avec succès à la transformation de la police géorgienne corrompue.

63. Iran Disbands Terrorist Group in Semnan Province

Fars News Agency, 2016 11 16

Tehran - The Iranian intelligence ministry announced that its forces have dismantled a Takfiri terrorist group in the city of Garmsar in Semnan province to the Southeast of the capital city of Tehran before they could carry out sabotage acts inside Iran. "Iran's intelligence ministry's forces have confiscated nearly two tons of explosives from the ISIL terrorists in Garmsar city," the intelligence ministry said. It said that the terrorists intended to use the explosives to carry out bomb attacks in at least 10 locations across the country. The intelligence ministry did not mention the exact date of confiscation of explosives, but said it was the consequence of people's cooperation with the ministry's forces. In early November, Head of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps Public Relations Department General Ramezan Sharif announced that the IRGC forces had dismantled two terrorist groups seeking to carry out sabotage acts inside Iran, adding that they were mercenaries of Saudi Arabia.

64. Iranian President Calls for Increased Anti-Terrorism Cooperation with China

Tehran - Iranian President Hassan Rouhani in a meeting with Chinese Defense Minister General Chang Wanquan on Tuesday underlined the necessity for strengthened defense and anti-terrorism cooperation between the two countries. "The two countries' cooperation should increase to confront and fight against the big danger of terrorism," President Rouhani said during the meeting in Tehran today. Noting that the Iranian and Chinese military officials' reciprocal meetings will strengthen mutual cooperation in defensive fields, he said, "The Islamic Republic of Iran is fully ready to implement all agreements with China based on the roadmap of cooperation, and the defense field is an important part of this cooperation." Chang, for his part, described Iran as the biggest and most important Muslim state in the region with most influence, and said, "Cooperation between the two countries in the fight against terrorism will be highly important."

Ankara - Turkey announced that it is resuming air strikes in support of the Free Syrian Army (FSA) as part of operation Euphrates Shield after an agreement with the "interested parties" was reached. In statements that he made after a Turkish cabinet meeting, the Deputy Prime Minister of Turkey and the Turkish government spokesman Numan Kurtulmus said that his country has resumed the provision of air support for the Free Syrian Army as part of operation Euphrates Shield. He also said that the FSA is close to the city of Al-Bab in the eastern countryside of the Aleppo province. Kurtulmus added that Turkey can once again provide the FSA with logistical support from the air after talks with the parties concerned including Russia and Turkey, and that Turkey will end operation Euphrates Shield only when it has fully achieved its objectives.

Abu Dhabi - The letter, which was organised by the UAE, was drafted in response to "a series of unfounded claims" made by an Iranian official at the annual meeting of the general assembly in September, and sent to the assembly's president in late October. Its signatories condemned Iran's "radical approach that undermines security and stability in our region and the Arab world", although reiterated their support for the nuclear deal with Tehran. "We stress that the Islamic Republic of Iran is a state sponsor of terrorism in our region, from Hizbollah in Lebanon and Syria, to Houthis in Yemen and terrorist groups and cells in the Kingdom of Bahrain, Iraq, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and elsewhere," said the letter, which was signed by the UN ambassadors of Egypt, Jordan, Sudan, Yemen, Morocco and all six GCC member states.

68. Hezbollah's U.S.-Made Arms Create Confusion, Washington Investigates

Asharq Al-Awsat, Nazeer Rida, 2016 11 16

Beirut - The appearance of American-made armored vehicles during a military parade organized by the so-called Hezbollah Sunday in the Syrian city of al-Qusayr has created confusion in Lebanon and fears that it would have a negative impact on U.S. aid to the Lebanese Army. The U.S. is now studying a probability that the Hezbollah arms have been taken from the Lebanese Army, diplomatic sources told Asharq Al-Awsat. The sources said the U.S. is investigating the matter. But on Tuesday, the Lebanese Army denied the U.S.-made armored personnel carriers were taken from the military. "The photos of vehicles circulated by media outlets were not taken from the army and do not belong to the military," it said in a statement. U.S. State Department Spokesperson Elizabeth Trudeau said the U.S. was working to find out more information about the issue. Trudeau said if proved that the U.S. arms were in the hands of the party, the issue would be a source of grave concern.

69. In Middle East, a new uncertainty after Obama

Washington Post, Liz Sly, 2016 11 16

Beirut - The Middle East is bracing for an incoming American president who seems intent on radically reordering the regional balance of power, heralding new uncertainty and perhaps new turmoil for a part of the world already engulfed in multiple wars. So vague and contradictory were many of the pronouncements made by President-elect Donald Trump on the campaign trail that governments and analysts are puzzling out which ones he meant and how he would be able to implement them all. According to the more consistent of his statements, and conversations his advisers have had with analysts and officials, however, Trump will seek to bring about a significant recalibration of the existing order in the Middle East - in favor of Russia, away from Shiite Iran and to the benefit of the Sunni gulf states and Turkey. Some of his declared goals are not so very different from Obama administration policies that were set aside or unfulfilled because they proved too difficult to accomplish - such as the failed push to cooperate with Russia against terrorist groups in Syria and the expectation that Arab states will do more, and pay more, for regional security. Others mark a major departure, notably the threats to renege on the Iran nuclear deal, President Obama's signature foreign policy achievement, and suggestions that Trump will cut support for Syrian rebels and align the United States with the government of President Bashar al-Assad.

70. Russia launches new offensive on Aleppo

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 11 16

Beirut - Russia launched new strikes in Syria Tuesday involving carrier-borne jets and long-range missiles as opposition activists on the ground reported that the first airstrikes in nearly a month struck the besieged, rebel-held parts of the northern Syrian city of Aleppo. According to activists, between four and 10 people were killed in the strikes on Aleppo, raising concerns of a return to daily deadly bombardment in Syria's largest city. The Russian blitz began hours after Russian President Vladimir Putin and U.S. President-elect Donald Trump discussed Syria over the phone and agreed on the need to join efforts in the fight what the Kremlin called their No. 1 enemy - "international terrorism and extremism." Russian Defense Minister Sergei Shoigu reported to Putin that Su-33 jets from the aircraft carrier Admiral Kuznetsov are involved in the operation, marking its combat debut. Shoigu said at a meeting with Putin, referring to the former Al- Qaeda's branch in Syria.

71. Terrorist attacks in J'lem down 40% since last year

Jerusalem Post, Daniel K. Eisenbud, 2016 11 16

Jerusalem - Increased intelligence gathering, heightened police operations in east Jerusalem, and intensive monitoring of incitement in social media posts have led to a 40% decline in terrorist activity in the capital over the past year, police said on Tuesday. The precipitous drop follows a protracted deadly terrorist wave, called the "stabbing intifada," that gripped much of the capital after the government outlawed two radical hate groups from the Northern Branch of the Islamic Movement from entering the Temple Mount. Police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld attributes the decline in violence to a comprehensive and far-reaching security strategy that canvasses the city's most volatile areas. "The decreased numbers are due to increased police operations across all the different neighborhoods in Jerusalem," said Rosenfeld. "The security level has risen and became more effective and efficient within problematic neighborhoods, in terms of community policing and preventative methods."

72. Trump 'a true friend of Israel'

Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, 2016 11 16

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu could hardly conceal his excitement last week on hearing the news that Donald Trump had been elected U.S. president. He welcomed Mr. Trump as "a true friend of Israel," a swipe at outgoing President Barack Obama, who was anything but a true friend in Mr. Netanyahu's eyes. And what, for Mr. Netanyahu, was not to like about the New York businessman about to enter the White House? During the exhaustive U.S. election campaign, Mr. Trump had asserted that Israel's controversial settlements in the occupied West Bank were "not an obstacle to peace," and that Israel required "secure borders," meaning not the 1967 boundaries that once delineated the West Bank from the original Jewish state. The Republican candidate also had vowed that the United States, under his administration, would recognize Jerusalem as Israel's "eternal capital" and would move the U.S. embassy there from Tel Aviv. Most important, as far as Mr. Netanyahu is concerned, Mr. Trump said numerous times on the campaign trail that his "No. 1 priority" on taking office would be to dismantle the nuclear pact with Iran. This deal lifts international sanctions against Iran in exchange for Tehran's agreement to curtail for the next 10 years the development of weapons grade uranium and to permit international inspection of its facilities.

73. Terrorism deaths fall despite widening impact of attacks, global study reveals

The Guardian (London), Ben Quinn, 2016 11 16

London - The number of deaths caused by terrorism fell by 10% last year, the first drop since 2010, according to a global index that tracks acts of illegal force and violence not committed by the state. The decline was attributed mainly to the effect of sustained military action in weakening Boko Haram and Isis, the Islamist militant groups respectively active in Nigeria and Iraq. However, an expansion into neighbouring states by both groups resulted in a record number of countries experiencing their highest levels of terrorism for 16 years. Despite fewer deaths, terrorist acts claimed the lives of 29,376 people in 2015, making it the second deadliest year on record, according to the global terrorism index (GTI), released on Wednesday by the Institute for Economics and Peace. The worst year on record was 2014, when there were more than 32,765 deaths. "This year's GTI report highlights the most complex set of dynamics in global terrorism in the last 16 years," said Steve Killelea, the institute's executive chairman. "While on the one hand the reduction in deaths is positive, the continued intensification of terrorism in some countries - and its spread to new ones - is a cause for serious concern, and underscores the fluid nature of modern terrorist activity. The attacks in the heartland of western democracies underscore the need for fast-paced and tailored responses to the evolution of these organisations."

Paris - Quatre hommes dans la trentaine, soupçonnés d'avoir fourni un appui logistique à l'étudiant algérien, sont actuellement entendus. Quatre complices présumés de Sid Ahmed Ghlam, l'étudiant algérien soupçonné d'avoir tenté de commettre un attentat contre une église de Villejuif (Val-de-Marne) au printemps 2015, ont été interpellés mardi matin en région parisienne, a révélé la chaîne LCI, une information confirmée par des sources proches de l'enquête à l'AFP. Ces quatre hommes, âgés de 30 à 39 ans, ont été arrêtés par la direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) à Eragny et Osny (Val-d'Oise), Les Mureaux et Sartrouville (Yvelines). Ils sont "soupçonnés d'avoir apporté à des degrés divers un soutien logistique" à Sid Ahmed Ghlam. 19 avril 2015, l'attaque avortée L'attentat piloté depuis la Syrie par le groupe djihadiste Etat islamique avait échoué, mais il avait toutefois fait une victime, une professeure de fitness, Aurélie Châtelain, retrouvée morte dans sa voiture. Les investigations ont déjà permis de mettre en examen quatre complices présumés, soupçonnés d'avoir participé à la fourniture d'armes et de gilets pare-balles. Le 19 avril 2015, Sid Ahmed Ghlam appelle le Samu après s'être tiré une balle dans la jambe. A leur arrivée, les policiers trouvent le jeune homme dans une rue de Paris. Dans sa voiture et sa chambre, ils découvrent quatre kalachnikovs, deux armes de poing et des gilets pare-balles.

75. Far-right Freital terrorist group charged

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - Eight German nationals have been formally charged with forming a far-right terrorist organization. They are also charged with carrying out five xenophobic or politically motivated attacks in Saxony. Federal prosecutors confirmed on Tuesday that the seven men and one woman - aged between 19 and 38 - have been accused of forming the "Gruppe Freital," and carrying out five attacks on refugee and leftwing centers. All eight have been in custody since April. According to the investigators, the right-wing extremist group - named after a suburb of the eastern city of Dresden that has seen several anti-refugee protests - is responsible for five xenophobic or politically motivated attacks in Saxony. In a previous reports, three attacks were mentioned. "The goal of this group was to carry out bombing attacks on asylum-seeker facilities as well as homes, offices and vehicles of those with different political thinking," prosecutors said. "By doing that, the suspects wanted to create a climate of fear and repression."

76. Fichier TES : la défense hasardeuse de Bernard Cazeneuve

L'Humanité, Aurélien Soucheyre, 2016 11 16

Paris - Après avoir oeuvré en catimini, le gouvernement se retrouve sous le feu des projecteurs sur la question de ce gigantesque fichier qui compile les informations d'identité de 60 millions de Français. Le ministre de l'Intérieur a tenté hier de minimiser les risques liés à ce projet. Sans convaincre. Bernard Cazeneuve est un bon défenseur. D'abord, le tacle glissé en douce, l'air de rien. Dimanche 30 octobre, paraissait dans le Journal officiel un décret signé de sa main prévoyant la création d'un gigantesque fichier informatique TES (titres électroniques sécurisés) rassemblant les données personnelles et biométriques de plus de 60 millions de Français (l'Humanité du 3 novembre). Le tout sans aucun débat public ou parlementaire. À quoi bon, quand c'est juridiquement dispensable ? Face à la bronca, y compris dans les rangs du gouvernement en la personne de la secrétaire d'État au numérique, Axelle Lemaire, le ministre de l'Intérieur a finalement accepté de s'exprimer devant les parlementaires. Hier matin, auditionné par la commission des Lois du Sénat, Bernard Cazeneuve a fait ce que tout bon défenseur tente invariablement après une faute - morale, au minimum, dans son cas - en plaidant une bonne foi à la limite de l'étonnement. Il s'est dit « très désireux » que le débat ait lieu, tout en justifiant le choix du décret face à l'embouteillage législatif. Il a ensuite confirmé les concessions rendues publiques la semaine dernière, rappelant que les Français pourront refuser que leurs empreintes digitales et leur photographie soient compilées sur le TES. Enfin, il a distribué des garanties à tout-va sur le fond de la mesure, et sur son contrôle.

77. German court's ruling on mass spying is a victory for the BND and NSA

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - In June 2013, media reports based on documents provided by whistleblower Edward Snowden revealed the extent of global surveillance programs conducted by the US National Security Agency (NSA). The leaks had a massive impact in Germany, especially after it was found that the NSA was spying on European leaders and heads of government, including German Chancellor Angela Merkel. The findings prompted the "Bundesnachrichtendienst" (BND), Germany's foreign spy agency, to deactivate around 40,000 of several million "selectors" - a collection of search parameters, including telephone numbers, keywords, URLs and addresses. On Tuesday, Germany's constitutional court ruled that the government was not obliged to transfer this secret list of selectors to a special parliamentary fact-finding commission on the NSA revelations. The judges justified their decision by saying that the government's need to keep certain data confidential was more important than the commission's desire for extensive details on the selectors list. Releasing the list without US approval could also endanger the functioning of intelligence agencies and jeopardize Germany's effectiveness in matters of national security, they added. One of the commission's main tasks was to look into the selectors list, which included search parameters from the NSA that the German spy agency used to track millions of surveillance targets around the world, Anna Biselli of the digital research organization "Netzpolitik" told DW. In the course of its investigation, it was found that the BND monitored sensitive targets, including European governments, institutions and corporations. But Tuesday's verdict proved to be a setback for politicians trying to get to the bottom of the BND's activities. "The ruling is a blow for any clarification on the activities of the BND and the NSA and for the entire parliamentary monitoring of secret services," Biselli told DW.

78. Les recruteurs de l'Etat islamique bâillonnés

Tribune de Genève, Schneider, 2016 11 16

Berlin - Après une vague de perquisitions, hier, Berlin a interdit le groupe islamiste « Lies », dont le chef encourageait les jeunes au djihad. Les services secrets allemands ont mené l'enquête pendant deux ans pour être sûrs de réduire les salafistes au silence. Ils ont rassemblé minutieusement des preuves « irréfutables » pour en finir avec l'organisation « Lies - La vraie religion » qui diffusait de la propagande pour le djihad. « Une interdiction tardive qui tient la route vaut mieux qu'une action rapide qui risque d'être annulée en justice », a résumé hier Thomas de Maizière, le ministre fédéral de l'Intérieur, après les 200 perquisitions menées dans la matinée dans des mosquées, des appartements et des bureaux à travers toute l'Allemagne. Thomas de Maizière accuse l'organisation fondée en 2005 de « glorifier le meurtre et la terreur ». Selon ses chiffres, elle a déjà permis de recruter 140 jeunes d'Allemagne pour le compte de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI, Daech en arabe) en Irak et en Syrie. « Nous n'acceptons pas que le terrorisme soit exporté hors d'Allemagne », a-t-il insisté.

79. Mégafichier : Cazeneuve sur le gril au Sénat

Paris - Après l'audition du ministre de l'Intérieur, la Haute Assemblée craint que Beauvau ne recule sans apporter les garanties espérées. Sécurité Bernard Cazeneuve connaîtra-t-il, avec la polémique sur le mégafichier national d'identité, la même déconvenue que Michèle Alliot-Marie avec le défunt fichier de renseignement Edwige ? Une chose est certaine : le Sénat ne veut pas être complice de ce qui se trame au ministère de l'Intérieur dans ce dossier. Rappelons que le fichier sur le point de naître doit réunir dans une seule et même base informatique les données d'identité (nom, couleur des yeux, domicile, photo, empreintes digitales...) de près de 60 millions de Français. Cela ne mérite-t-il pas un minimum de concertation ? Mardi matin, à l'issue de l'audition du ministre de toutes les polices devant la commission des lois devant la Haute Assemblée, le président Les Républicains de cette instance, Philippe Bas, a tenu à rappeler qu'il fut le premier à réclamer des éclaircissements au gouvernement sur le texte qui fait aujourd'hui scandale. Par un courrier en date du 18 octobre, le sénateur de la Manche a en effet demandé à l'hôte de Beauvau de lui communiquer « le projet de décret créant un fichier centralisé des données personnelles recueillies pour la délivrance des passeports et des cartes d'identité ». Il souhaitait, écrivait-il, « rassurer (les) collègues » qui l'avaient alerté sur les intentions du gouvernement.

80. The German preacher who heads global Islamist network

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - On Tuesday morning German police raided 200 addresses connected to a now-banned Islamist movement. Ibrahim Abou-Nagie, the movement's founder, has taken it around the world. In his video messages to followers, Abou-Nagie doesn't come across as a dangerous man. In a recent clip, shot in Malaysian capital Kuala Lumpur, Abou-Nagie appears with a manicured, greying beard and short-cropped hair, and greets his followers with the soothing words: "My dear siblings in Islam." But, if German security services are to be believed, the 52-year-old is one of the most dangerous Islamists in Germany. Interior Minister Thomas de Maiziere on Tuesday banned The True Religion (Die wahre Religion), the preaching network Abou-Nagie founded in 2005, saying it was unconstitutional.

1. Canadian journalists push for 'shield law' to protect sources

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Journalists and parliamentarians are putting pressure on the Liberal government to enhance the protection of reporters and confidential sources, calling for quick legislative changes instead of rhetorical support for the freedom of the press. The calls flow from recent cases in which police spied on journalists to obtain information on their sources, raising questions across Canada about the quality of the judicial process for obtaining warrants. At a news conference in Ottawa on Wednesday, two journalists who are in legal battles with police authorities backed a proposal for a "shield law" that allows reporters to protect the identity of their sources and confidential information. "Mine is just one of many cases of the growing erosion of press freedom in Canada," said Ben Makuch, a journalist for Vice News who is refusing to provide information from a confidential source to the RCMP. Mr. Makuch faces a possible jail sentence for refusing to comply with a court order. He said the RCMP's actions have created "irreparable damage" to journalists' ability to win the trust of sources. Patrick Lagacé, a journalist at La Presse, recently learned that the Montreal police service had obtained judicial approval to consult his phone records, tap his phone and trigger the GPS on his mobile device to track his meetings with sources. He said the Liberal government is saying all the right words in the defence of journalistic freedom, but that police officers need to face tougher requirements to go after a journalist's sources. Also present at the news conference were journalist and author Mohamed Fahmy, who was imprisoned for more than a year in Egypt because of his reporting, and Tom Henheffer, the executive-director of Canadian Journalists for Free Expression. Mr. Henheffer said he distrusts agencies such as the RCMP and CSIS that have increased means to monitor electronic communications, and that new laws are needed to curtail their powers.

2. Canadians support more investigative powers for police -- with a catch

Toronto Star and CBC News, Robert Cribb and CBC Staff, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Nearly 70 per cent of Canadians are willing to give police greater powers to investigate suspects cloaked by online anonymity - as long as their actions are monitored by a judge, a Toronto Star/CBC national poll has found. While 2,500 respondents to the poll were split down the middle on Canadians' right to complete digital privacy, most said that right should not extend to suspects in a serious crime investigation. "The vast majority of Canadians . . . are willing to accept certain conditions . . . if it means that public safety is put first and their own families or personal safety is protected because police and intelligence agencies have these tools," said David Coletto, CEO of Ottawa-based Abacus Data, which conducted the polling on behalf of the Toronto Star and CBC News. "When a judge is involved, when a warrant is needed, we find broad support. It's only when you take away that judicial oversight that you see a much more divided population." The findings are part of a Toronto Star/CBC investigation into policing in the digital age, a topic under debate in national security public consultations. Top RCMP officials warn that serious crimes are increasingly unpunished because evidence is disappearing behind sophisticated encryption or being purged from the servers of telecommunications companies. The poll has an error margin of plus or minus two percentage points, 19 times out of 20. Perhaps the most striking finding is that Canadians are open to a police proposal for a law allowing authorities to compel a suspect in a criminal investigation to hand over the password or encryption key to investigators. Initially, nearly half of respondents - 49 per cent - agreed police should have the ability to access personal devices. With the addition of a judge's authorization, support jumps to 77 per cent. The initial polling of 1,500 people was completed Oct. 20 to 22. A second phase of polling took place Nov. 7 to 9, after reports that a Federal Court judge found that Canada's intelligence agency, CSIS, had illegally gathered Canadians' private information and that Quebec police intercepted and tracked the cellphones of at least 10 journalists to discover their sources. An additional 1,000 Canadians were polled in this second phase.

3. Canadians want judicial oversight of any new digital snooping powers for police: Poll
CBC News and Toronto Star, Dave Seglins, Robert Cribb and Chelsea Gomez, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Most Canadians feel strongly about their right to privacy online, but a new poll shows the vast majority are willing to grant police new powers to track suspects in the digital realm -- so long as the courts oversee the cops. Nearly half of the respondents to an Abacus Data survey of 2,500 Canadians agreed that citizens should have a right to complete digital privacy. But many appeared to change their mind when asked if an individual suspected of committing a serious crime should have the same right to keep their identity hidden from police. "The vast majority of Canadians ... are willing to accept certain conditions ... if it means that public safety is put first and their own families or personal safety is protected because police and intelligence agencies have these tools," Abacus CEO David Coletto said. "When a judge is involved, when a warrant is needed, we find broad support. It's only when you take away that judicial oversight that you see a much more divided population." The survey, conducted on behalf of CBC News and the Toronto Star, asked Canadians about their views on three specific proposals to expand police powers, which are raised in a federal discussion paper that's part of a review of Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act. Police across the country say they need expanded powers to track crime suspects and national security threats who use encryption and other high-tech tricks to hide their digital tracks. Police used to request subscriber information hundreds of thousands of times a year, but that changed in 2014, when the Supreme Court ruled that in the absence of a specific law, police requests to phone and internet companies amount to a search and therefore require a warrant. Police compare it to looking up licence plate information, which doesn't require permission from a judge. Plus, Paulson says, Canada lags behind its allies the U.S., Australia, New Zealand and the U.K., which allow senior police officers or prosecutors to oversee the requests. But again, Coletto says, judicial oversight is clearly important to Canadians. "Even when we give both sides of the argument, we find Canadians are more likely to oppose a new law that would give police that authority or administrative authorization than those that would support it." Abacus Data surveyed 1,500 Canadians in October, before two major news stories broke about privacy and authority. The first found CSIS had violated court orders and the other revealed Montreal police got approval from a justice of the peace to track the cellphones of six journalists.

4. Des journalistes demandent à Ottawa d'agir pour protéger la liberté de la presse
Le Devoir, Hélène Buzzetti, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Le gouvernement fédéral est à son tour invité à agir pour endiguer les filatures policières visant des reporters. Quatre journalistes ont convergé vers Ottawa mercredi pour exiger de l'administration Trudeau qu'elle adopte trois mesures pour rendre plus difficile l'obtention de mandats visant un des leurs. Ils demandent aussi la tenue d'une enquête publique pour faire la lumière sur les potentiels cas passés de surveillance. Le quatuor était composé de Mohamed Fahmy, le journaliste emprisonné pendant presque deux ans en Égypte ; Ben Makuch, un journaliste de Vice Media qui fait face à la prison parce qu'il refuse de fournir à la police les textos échangés avec un Canadien parti se battre aux côtés du groupe État islamique ; le chroniqueur de La Presse Patrick Lagacé ; et Tom Henheffer, le directeur général de Canadian Journalists for Free Expression. M. Henheffer demande à Ottawa dans un premier temps d'adopter une " loi bouclier " qui empêcherait les autorités d'exiger d'un journaliste qu'il divulgue ses sources. Ensuite, il veut que soit rehaussé le niveau de preuve nécessaire pour qu'un mandat d'interception de communications -- visant un journaliste ou qui que ce soit d'autre -- soit délivré.

5. Des journalistes réclament d'Ottawa une meilleure protection de la liberté de presse
Radio-Canada avec La Presse canadienne, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Une coalition de journalistes canadiens et québécois réclame du gouvernement de Justin Trudeau des mesures et des lois plus musclées afin de protéger davantage la liberté de presse au pays. Les journalistes Patrick Lagacé, Mohamed Fahmy et Ben Makuch, ainsi que Tom Henheffer de Journalistes canadiens pour la liberté d'expression (CJFE), ont fait part de leurs demandes à cet égard mercredi en conférence de presse à Ottawa. Au début du mois, le ministre de la Sécurité publique du Canada, Ralph Goodale, avait affirmé qu'aucun journaliste n'était actuellement surveillé par les forces de l'ordre au niveau fédéral. Notamment responsable du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), M. Goodale ne s'était pas avancé à garantir qu'il n'y en avait pas eu par le passé.

6. Journalists call on Liberals to bring in press shield law to protect sources
Canadian Press, Melanie Marquis, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - The Liberal government is being urged to bring in legislation to better protect journalists and their confidential sources. That was the message from three journalists who've had those freedoms obstructed _ Patrick Lagace, Ben Makuch and Mohamed Fahmy _ as well as Tom Henheffer, executive director for Canadian Journalists for Free Expression. They offered three simple recommendations to the federal government during a news conference in Ottawa on Wednesday, including the adoption of a press shield law ensuring journalists not be made to disclose their confidential sources. Henheffer said almost all Western democracies have enacted such laws _ including the U.S., Germany, Australia and the United Kingdom _ and Canada must follow suit. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said Wednesday the government was ready to listen to suggestions from journalists, jurists and other actors. A spokesman later told The Canadian Press it was premature to come to a conclusion on a press shield law until Quebec completes a public inquiry into the protection of journalists' sources, a process that was announced on Wednesday and will run until 2018. Independent Sen. Andre Pratte, a former journalist, proposed a mixed committee of senators and MPs to look into the issue. "I think it's a way to proceed that is more conducive than simply asking the government to table a bill right away," Pratte said in a phone interview. The group in Ottawa on Wednesday called on the government to overhaul the rules for issuing warrants _ that applications for such warrants must come from the Crown instead of police. They are also asking for the repeal of surveillance provisions in Bill C-13, which lowered the threshold of proof required to obtain warrants. The group also suggested a federal public inquiry is necessary to determine if the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service have been monitoring journalists in recent years. The NDP had already called for one last May when it came to light that RCMP investigators tracked La Presse journalists Joel-Denis Bellavance and Gilles Toupin for nine days in August 2007.

7. Let the battle for control of the Commons clock commence! (Or continue)

Ottawa Citizen Online, Kady O'Malley, 2016 11 17

Blog: In what was likely a somewhat painful, if clearly necessary, reminder of the limits of majority power over the parliamentary space-time continuum, a pre-emptive procedural strike allowed the Conservatives to temporarily thwart the government's bid to cut off debate on the proposed pension revamp on Wednesday afternoon by successfully blocking the introduction of the motion to set a deadline for the remaining discussion. As a result, there's a very good chance that the bells will ring out at least once, and possibly more often, shortly after the Chamber re-opens for business this morning. Senior officials from the RCMP, the Canada Border Services Agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and Justice will provide their respective and collective perspectives on the state of Canada's security laws - and specifically, the Security of Canada Information Sharing Act - at Ethics. Meanwhile, at Public Safety, Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien outlines his thoughts on the government's proposal to set up a parliamentary oversight committee to monitor national security and intelligence policy and operations, with Amnesty International secretary-general Alex Neve and the Security Intelligence Review Committee also scheduled to testify.

8. Surveillance watchdog says C-22 not likely to be abused

Ottawa - The man in charge of overseeing Canada's electronics surveillance agency says there is no reason to believe the government would abuse controversial provisions in its national security committee legislation that give ministers the power to refuse to disclose requested information. "I don't see why they would do that unless they are in bad faith, and I assume that everybody is in good faith unless the contrary is proven to me," said Jean-Pierre Plouffe, commissioner of the Canadian Security Establishment. "The fears we have are seldom realized to the same extent we had thought. Yes, it is a restriction, but it is a reasonable one." Bill C-22, currently being studied at the House of Commons public safety committee, would create a nine-member committee of parliamentarians tasked with monitoring and scrutinizing the activities of all government departments and agencies that engage in national security activities. While it would bring Canada up to speed among the Five Eyes intelligence allies (we are currently the only one without such a committee), opposition critics have raised red flags over several key components of the bill. First, the legislation would allow the government to appoint a chair of the committee as well as all of its members rather than allowing parliamentarians to vote to confirm them or allow committee members to elect their own chair. Second, the bill contains what some national security experts have dubbed "potential Mack truck exemptions" when it comes to giving ministers the power to refuse to disclose information the committee has requested. The creation of a committee tasked with national security oversight was a key campaign promise by the Liberals and also part of their plan to reform national security in light of the controversial bill C-51, passed by the former government. That bill sparked a huge public backlash after it was perceived as going too far in allowing for expanded information sharing among government departments, enhancing the powers of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and lowering the legal threshold for who can be surveilled by law enforcement.

9. 'No reason to fear' man with terror links

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 11 17

Toronto - A part-time Toronto security guard and business student, Abdul Aziz Aldabous came to the attention of RCMP national security investigators last April over his social media links with ISIL terrorists. His online confidants included the failed Canadian suicide bomber Aaron Driver, an American killed while attempting an attack in Texas linked to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, a prominent ISIL fighter in Syria, and Britain's youngest convicted terrorist. The RCMP arrested Aldabous on a terrorism peace bond in September 2015. A search of his computer turned up materials reflecting his support for what a court document called "the radical jihadist cause." But after he was released on bail, Aldabous went to a psychologist and began counselling under the guidance of a prominent Toronto imam, Yousuf Badat. Now, 14 months later, federal prosecutors have ended their case against him. The peace bond was withdrawn at Toronto's Old City Hall courthouse Tuesday because the Crown felt that, due to the measures Aldabous had taken largely on his own initiative, there were no longer grounds to fear he would engage in terrorism. "Since his arrest Mr. Aldabous has taken several positive steps to move beyond his past troubling online behaviour," reads an agreed statement of facts filed with the Ontario Court of Justice.

10. Activist calls for Ottawa to pass Canadian Magnisky Act

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - A Crimean activist who says he survived two years of torture in Russian prisons is calling on the Canadian government to use all diplomatic means, including sanctions targeting corrupt Russian officials, to pressure the Putin government to halt its aggression against Ukraine and surrounding countries. Hennadiy Afanasyev is in Ottawa this week meeting with members of Parliament and foreign-affairs officials. He says he will urge them to adopt a law sanctioning human-rights abusers around the world. "We should use all diplomatic means in order to make Russia hear the world community, and make Russia stop its aggression against other countries and withdraw its armies from occupied territories. We should not rely only on diplomacy. If Russia continues its aggression we should be ready to show strength," Mr. Afanasyev said in an exclusive interview with The Globe and Mail. Mr. Afanasyev's call for action comes two weeks after Mark Gwozdecky, Global Affairs Canada political director, met with Russian deputy foreign minister Sergei Ryabkov for talks on Ukraine and Syria. While Foreign Minister Stéphane Dion has urged all countries to uphold sanctions against Russia, Mr. Gwozdecky's visit is raising opposition concerns that the federal government might do the opposite.

11. Canadian says China forced her to testify that she bribed former judge

Globe and Mail, Craig Offman, 2016 11 17

A Canadian citizen held in Chinese custody says authorities tortured her into confessing that she bribed a former leading official who became an outspoken critic of the regime. You Ziqi of Richmond, B.C., was detained on fraud charges by customs officials at the Beijing airport in 2014 while travelling with her son to visit family in Hubei province. In a complaint written to the Chinese authorities and obtained by The Globe and Mail, Ms. You said Chinese officials forced her to give testimony that she had bribed Xie Weidong, who was a businessman and former Supreme Court judge before he immigrated to Canada two years ago. In the meantime, the Chinese government seized almost all of Ms. You's family assets, worth around $10- million. Evidence provided by Ms. You became the basis for a Red Notice, an international arrest warrant-like demand issued by Interpol, against Mr. Xie, who lives in Toronto and has applied for permanent residence here. Both expatriates say the case against them is based on false testimony, instigated by Communist Party officials trying to cover up the theft of Ms. You's family assets. "I have come from inside the system. I know very well the extent of corruption and darkness there," Mr. Xie told The Globe.

12. Canadians engaged in fight to retake Mosul from Daesh

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Canadian special forces soldiers have engaged in a "substantial" number of engagements with Daesh fighters in recent weeks as part of the intense fighting to retake Mosul, a top general says. In three of those clashes, Canadians fired heavy anti-armour weapons to stop Daesh (also known as ISIS or ISIL) vehicles packed with explosives that were "charging at high speeds" toward Kurdish positions, said Maj.-Gen. Mike Rouleau, head of the Canadian Special Operations Forces Command. If Canadians hadn't responded, the vehicles would have breached the defensive line and caused "mayhem," he said. "The Kurds do not possess weapons like we have." He told a briefing Wednesday that the Canadians, on an advise-and-assist mission to train and mentor Peshmerga soldiers in northern Iraq, have used lethal force several dozen times in recent weeks to protect themselves, their Kurdish partners and civilians. He said Canadians have fired at Daesh with sniper rifles, mortars and the anti-armour rockets to take out vehicle-borne explosive devices. He said the "substantial" number of engagements coincides with the operation by Iraqi and Kurdish forces to reclaim Mosul, a Daesh stronghold.

13. Canadian troops, ISIL have clashed

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - Canadian troops have engaged in a substantial number of clashes with Islamic State of Iraq and Levant gunmen in the last several weeks but commanders are still insisting such actions don't rank as being part of a combat mission. Anti-tank missiles have been fired by Canadian special forces and gunfire exchanged. Iraqi security forces as well as the Canadian-backed Kurdish troops have been advancing on the ISIL stronghold of Mosul and have engaged in heavy combat. The number of such clashes involving Canadian commandos has been "substantial" and involves several dozen incidents, special forces commander Maj.-Gen. Mike Rouleau revealed Wednesday at a briefing in Ottawa. "This is the reality of modern conflict," he added. "There have been a substantial number of engagements." Canadian special forces have used anti-tank missiles on three occasions to destroy ISIL suicide vehicles, Rouleau said. "When we shoot first there are emerging threats," he added. No civilians have been killed or injured in such engagements, according to Rouleau. He did not have numbers on ISIL gunmen who have been killed by Canadian troops. "I do have the numbers but we don't do body counts," Rouleau explained. "It's difficult to be precise."

15. Driver ' s device a killer , cops say

London Free Press, Randy Richmond, 2016 11 17

London - The cab driver who unknowingly picked up a bomb-carrying terrorist in Strathroy for a trip to London says he ' s alarmed, but not completely surprised, by new reports the explosive device was deadlier than initially suspected. " I realized that (its danger) at the time. All I know it was one hell of a big bang ," former Strathroy cab driver Terry Duffield said. An RCMP bomb analysis shows that the blast from the device, on its way to downtown London and perhaps Toronto, would have caused a high risk of death to anyone within 1.5 metres of the explosion and varying risks of injury up to 7.8 metres away. Injuries could have included lung damage and ruptured ear drums. That assessment doesn't include the impact from bomb fragments or the 139 ball bearings reportedly embedded in the device. "If what they're saying is true, I wouldn't be here talking to you today (if the bomb fully detonated). They would have went right through the seat," Duffield said. The new report raises questions about how RCMP allowed a man under their watch, Aaron Driver, build such a powerful bomb that might have harmed many, Duffield's lawyer said. "It certainly underscores the threat that Terry was under. But for it not detonating the way he (Driver) planned, Terry would be just a memory," Kevin Egan said. In an effort to prove why new powers are needed to battle terrorism and crime, the RCMP provided The Toronto Star and CBC details of 10 cases, including Driver's. The 24-year-old ISIS sympathizer was living with his sister in Strathroy when RCMP got a tip from the FBI about a martyrdom video in which Driver vowed imminent revenge on Canadians. Police surrounded his sister's house Aug. 10, and watched as Duffield's taxi pulled up and Driver got in the back seat. Driver was planning to go to Citi Plaza in London, but police don't know if he intended to explode the device there or head to Toronto.

17. Les informaticiens appelés à l'aide

Ottawa - En plus des 18 000 dossiers de fonctionnaires en arriéré avant juin dernier à régler, le ministère a aussi pris du retard dans le traitement de 200 000 transactions de paye, l'équivalent de deux mois de travail, accumulés dans le système pendant la période de juillet et août dernier. Ainsi, près de 90% des 82 000 dossiers de fonctionnaires qui étaient en arriéré avant juin ont pu être réglés. Mais le ministère a, pour la première fois, révélé que le personnel doit aussi faire face à un flux de transactions qui n'ont pu être traitées depuis juillet. Environ 80 000 transactions qui découlent de revenus supplémentaires, ou autres, arrivent dans le système tous les mois, et les mesures prises permettent désormais de traiter plus de 100 000 transactions. Il faudra donc plusieurs mois avant de passer à travers le flux de 200 000 transactions qui se sont accumulées depuis juillet. Actuellement, la norme de service de traitement «dans les 20 jours» n'est atteinte que dans 20 % des transactions. La sous-ministre n'a pas voulu se risquer à dire quand tout sera réglé. «C'est clair que nous avons encore beaucoup à faire. Il ne faut pas juste attendre l'état de stabilité», a admis mercredi Marie Lemay, sous-ministre des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement, lors de sa dernière mise à jour sur le système de paye Phénix.

18. Liberals restore funding to controversial Palestinian aid agency

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - The federal Liberals are providing $25 million to a UN relief agency for Palestinian refugees that was cut off by the previous Conservative government for alleged ties to Hamas. International Development Minister Marie-Claude Bibeau made the announcement at a news conference and also during question period in the House of Commons _ news that was greeted by cries of "shame" from the opposition benches. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, also known as UNRWA, lost federal funding in 2010 amid allegations it was tied too closely to Hamas, considered a terrorist organization by Canada and others. Bibeau says $20 million will go support education, health and social services for millions of vulnerable Palestinian refugees, as well as urgent humanitarian assistance. An additional $5 million is being provided in response to the agency's appeal for help for those impacted by the crisis in Syria and its environs. "I'm horrified," said Conservative foreign affairs critic Peter Kent, who said there is ample proof that "massive amounts" of UN aid have been redirected to support Palestinian military efforts against Israel. "We have abundant evidence that UNRWA is part of the problem." The government says the money will be accompanied by "enhanced due diligence," including a "very robust oversight and reporting framework" that includes regular site visits and anti-terrorism provisions.

19. Phoenix pay queue grows by 200,000 transactions, unknown number of public servants affected

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 17

Ottawa - The senior bureaucrat overseeing the effort to fix the federal government's Phoenix pay system says another 200,000 transactions have piled up in the queue since July. Marie Lemay, Public Services' deputy minister, said these transactions are on top of the thousands of outstanding pay issues, affecting 82,000 public servants, that comprised the government's original, pre-July backlog. The department has whittled that backlog down to 18,000 people. What the government did not reveal during a briefing Wednesday is how many public servants are affected by the newly accrued 200,000 transactions that are waiting to be processed. Lemay said the rollout of the new Phoenix pay system dramatically slowed down pay processing over the summer as employees and compensation advisers became accustomed to the new system, which has been riddled with glitches and problems that are still being ironed out. "Our earlier slowdown caused the number of transactions in the system to expand so that we now have more than two months of additional work to process. This is over and above the new transactions that are entering the system," Lemay said. Lemay wouldn't set a target day for clearing the queue but said she was confident that processing time will speed up and that employees will be paid within the department's "service standards" of 20 days.

20. Protesters warn of more potential chaos

Montreal Gazette, Jason Magder, 2016 11 17

Montreal - The standoff on the tracks at Kahnawake that disrupted commuter and freight trains could be the first of several, if things don't change, protesters warned Wednesday. "If they keep doing what they're doing, I can guarantee there will be other action," said Melissa Montour, one of the protesters. "Let's hope the government sits down and thinks about its next move." Train service was interrupted for 24 hours ending Wednesday at 6 p.m. as protesters blocked the CP tracks in Kahnawake, used by freight trains and the Candiac commuter line. The protesters in Kahnawake were among several groups across Canada and the U.S. standing in support of opponents of the Dakota Access Pipeline, an oil pipeline that is scheduled to be built under a reservoir on the Missouri River in North Dakota. Anti-DAPL protesters in the U.S. are based in Standing Rock, N.D. "Standing Rock sent out a call for support and we answered the call," said protester Roxann Whitebean. While train traffic was halted as of Tuesday evening, one freight train attempted in the pre-dawn hours of Wednesday to pass through the protest, as very few people were camped out by the tracks. "We saw the light, and then we saw the barriers come down, so we stood in front of the train," said one protester who declined to give his name. "The conductor stopped and told us his boss told him he had to try to come through." The train eventually turned back, and no other attempts were made as of mid morning. A spokesperson for CP did not answer when asked who sent the train, but issued a one-sentence statement.

21. Russian move deals latest blow to Canadian efforts to save ICC

Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York, 2016 11 17

Johannesburg - Even as the International Criminal Court suffered a blow from yet another country turning against it, Canada is continuing its fight to save it with a campaign of lobbying pressure and promised solutions. Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion met critics and supporters of the controversial court on Wednesday in The Hague, trying to quell a rebellion that has led to three African countries withdrawing from the court. "We need more of the International Criminal Court, not less," Mr. Dion said in a speech to the annual assembly of the court's member states. But as he arrived at the assembly, Russia was becoming the latest country to attack the court, withdrawing its signature from the Rome treaty that created the body. Calling it "inefficient and one-sided" and noting the court has spent more than $1-billion (U.S.) for only a handful of convictions, the Russian government announced on Wednesday that it would not ratify the treaty, despite its earlier support for the court. Russia also criticized the ICC for investigating alleged war crimes in Georgia in 2008 during Russia's military intervention in its southern neighbour. Some analysts dismissed the Russian move as merely a symbolic protest with no practical consequences, since Moscow has never been a full member of the court. Russia has repeatedly vetoed any attempt to refer the Syrian war and other conflicts to the ICC for investigation.

22. Vice-presidential candidate Tim Kaine expected to attend Halifax security forum

Canadian Press, Michael Macdonald, 2016 11 17

Halifax - Less than two weeks after Republican Donald Trump's stunning electoral victory, the Democratic contender for U.S. vice-president, Tim Kaine, is scheduled to attend an international foreign affairs and defence conference in Halifax. Kaine, a U.S. senator from Virginia, is among a list of high-profile political and military leaders expected to join the weekend meeting, which will include U.K. Defence Secretary Michael Fallon, U.S. Deputy Defence Secretary Robert Work and France's defence minister, Jean-Yves Le Drian. Fallon will speak about Britain's place in the world after Brexit, and Le Drian will speak about combating terror. Hosted by Canadian Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan, the annual three-day Halifax International Security Forum bills itself as a gathering of democratic leaders committed to global security and prosperity. "This is the only international meeting in the world where top government leaders and military officials come together from democracies to enhance co-operation on global issues," said Peter Van Praagh, president of the forum. "It gives people an opportunity to understand what other countries are thinking and it is also a great opportunity to build relationships." Kaine's anticipated visit will mark the senator's fourth appearance at the forum. Over the past three years, Kaine and Sen. John McCain, a former Republican presidential nominee, have led a congressional delegation to Halifax. Kaine is expected to receive a "builders" award at a gala on Friday before leaving early Saturday.

23. Decades in prison for final 3 sentenced in Minnesota ISIL conspiracy case

Minneapolis Star-Tribune, Stephen Montemayor, Faiza Mahamud, 2016 11 17

Minneapolis - Seeking to send an emphatic message that there is "no doubt" about the depth of terrorism recruitment in the Twin Cities, a federal judge on Wednesday sentenced the final three of Minnesota's ISIL conspiracy defendants to the sternest prison sentences yet handed down in a Minnesota terrorism case. "It's clear, and I've stated it the last two days ... this community has to understand that there is a jihadist cell in this community -- its tentacles spread out," Senior U.S. District Judge Michael Davis told a packed courtroom. "Young people went to Syria and died." Davis concluded three days of hearings by sending defendant Guled Omar to prison for 35 years, and sentencing two others -- Mohamed Farah and Abdirahman Daud -- to 30 years each. The three were the only defendants to plead not guilty and go to trial, where a jury in June convicted them of charges including conspiracy to commit murder outside the United States. They were also convicted of conspiring to provide material support to the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), the same charge on which six others pleaded guilty and were sentenced this week. "I understand the seriousness of what I've been convicted of, and I understand that I will not be able to go home anytime soon," Omar said as relatives sobbed nearby. "I always had energy for justice as a young man, but I lost my way."

24. Donald Trump Can Either Continue the Shadow War With Vladimir Putin or End Sanctions

Newsweek, Owen Matthews, 2016 11 17

New York - The telegram was one of the first to arrive from a world leader. On the morning of November 9, the Kremlin announced that Russian President Vladimir Putin had sent a message to U.S. President-elect Donald Trump expressing "his hope they can work together toward the end of the crisis in Russian-American relations, as well as address the pressing issues of the international agenda and the search for effective responses to global security challenges." Just minutes before, the Russian State Duma had erupted in applause when its members learned that Trump had won the election. Putin appeared to be taking his lead from repeated comments Trump has made suggesting the two would get along: "I would treat Vladimir Putin firmly, but there's nothing I can think of that I'd rather do than have Russia friendly, as opposed to the way they are right now, so that we can go and knock out ISIS with other people," the then-candidate of the Republican Party said on July 28, referring to the Islamic State militant group. But the blossoming bromance between the two men may come to a sudden end when Trump becomes commander in chief on January 20, 2017. That's when he will, on a daily basis, have to cope with a resentful former superpower engaged in an aggressive campaign of espionage and propaganda against the United States and its allies--one more intense and menacing than at any time since the Cold War. Trump will likely face a binary choice: continue to engage in that intensifying shadow war, as his predecessor chose to do, or end sanctions against Russia--essentially allowing Putin to expand his influence in Eastern Europe and beyond. The pressure on Trump to come up with an answer will be considerable. With Trump's victory, Russia might feel that its potent mixture of hacking, propaganda and sowing distrust has worked spectacularly well. The temptation to continue spreading chaos by backing right-wingers in France, the Baltics, Germany and elsewhere is stronger than ever. "Putin has interfered in our elections and succeeded. Well done," tweeted former U.S. Ambassador to Russia Michael McFaul after Trump's victory. And Russia's elite, while careful to deny involvement in the Kremlin's alleged meddling in the U.S. presidential race, is openly jubilant about Trump's win. "First was Brexit. Now Hillary," says Russian parliamentarian Vyacheslav Nikonov, a Putin ally. "A while ago, America was saying that Russia is just a gas station, a regional power. Now, apparently, we're so influential that we are determining the outcome of their presidential election. We follow the ancient Chinese policy--we sit on the riverbank and wait for our enemy's body to float past."

25. Donald Trump Picks Classic Establishment Figure to Lead Intelligence Transition

The Intercept, Jenna McLaughlin, 2016 11 17

Washington - Just hours after Donald Trump took the stage on election night to deliver his acceptance speech, critics warned that the inexperienced new leader would inject a previously unknown level of instability into the world of U.S. intelligence and security. That remains a strong possibility, especially after Mike Rogers, the hawkish former chair of the House Intelligence oversight committee, and Matthew Freedman, who had been in charge of the planning for the National Security Council, left the transition team on Monday in what NBC described as a "Stalinesque purge." But the national security establishment has one hope left: Army Lt. Gen. Ronald Burgess, former director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, remains in charge of intelligence hiring, and his record harkens back to a GOP establishment focused on powerful espionage and influence on the world stage. He's reportedly favored to be the new director of National Intelligence, replacing James Clapper. In other words, there's still a chance the spies will be just fine. Burgess's 38-year military career has reassured some former spies and intelligence experts that the administration might not devolve into amateur-led chaos.

26. Exclusive In Private Meeting, Euro Diplomats Beseech Trump Team to Uphold Transatlantic Pacts (Canada)

Foreign Policy, Colum Lynch, Don De Luce, 2016 11 17

Washington - European governments are launching a concerted appeal to persuade President-elect Donald Trump to not abandon the Iran nuclear deal or NATO's tough stance toward Russia, warning of dire consequences that could raise the risk of war and weaken the transatlantic alliance. In a closed-door meeting this week, Foreign Policy has learned, diplomats from Europe, Canada, and other allied nations raised their concerns about the course of Trump's foreign-policy priorities with a key member of the president-elect's transition team. The European delegates told Trump advisor James Carafano that they hoped the new administration would continue to embrace shared values, including upholding human rights and a shared defense policy with NATO at its core. During the private meeting Monday, the Europeans also asked Carafano about the new administration's approach to the Iran nuclear deal, according to an official with knowledge of details of the exchange and who summarized it for FP. Foreign delegates emerged from the meeting with no idea of Trump's plans for Iran, the official said. Eastern European diplomats who were at the meeting sought to drive home the importance of ensuring that any U.S. rapprochement with Russia did not come at the expense of NATO's most vulnerable members, particularly small Baltic countries living in the shadow of a newly assertive Russia. They said they expected Washington to uphold U.S. pledges made at NATO summits in Warsaw and Wales, reaffirming commitments to defend Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland in the face of mounting Russian aggression. Carafano, the vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, had invited senior diplomats to a meeting at the think tank's Washington headquarters to hear out concerns about the incoming administration. Carafano insisted he was not hosting the event on behalf of the president-elect. But diplomats and congressional staffers said they understand he is likely to emerge as the Trump team's liaison for State Department matters. A spokesman at the Heritage Foundation said Carafano was away this week and couldn't be reached.

27. In our new Cold War, deterrence should come before detente

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 11 15

Column - The White House sent a secret "hotline"-style message to Russia on Oct. 31 to warn against any further cyber-meddling in the U.S. election process. Russia didn't escalate its tactics as Election Day approached, but U.S. officials aren't ready to say deterrence worked. The previously undisclosed message was part of the high-stakes game of cyber- brinkmanship that has been going on this year between Moscow and Washington. How to stabilize this relationship without appearing to capitulate to Russian pressure tactics is among the biggest challenges facing President- elect Donald Trump. The message was sent on a special channel created in 2013 as part of the Nuclear Risk Reduction Center, using a template designed for crisis communication. "It was a very clear statement to the Russians and asked them to stop their activity," a senior administration official said, adding: "The fact that we used this channel was part of the messaging." According to several other high-level sources, President Obama also personally contacted Russian President Vladimir Putin last month to caution him about the disruptive cyberattacks. The senior administration official wouldn't comment on these reports.

28. Presidents Have Broad Latitude to Let Relatives Into Government's Secret Circles

New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 11 17

Washington - After days of reports that President-elect Donald J. Trump had requested a top-secret security clearance for his son-in-law, Jared Kushner, people close to Mr. Kushner said that was not the case. No such request has been made, they said on Wednesday, and he will not sit in on the president's highly classified daily intelligence briefing. But should Mr. Trump change his mind, former government officials and experts on classified information said he would have wide latitude as president to bring a family member into the most secret circles of the government. "The president can authorize clearance for anyone he wants," said Steven Aftergood, director of the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists. "It's part of his commander-in-chief role. He has broad, essentially unlimited, access in this area." Like anyone else, Mr. Kushner would be subject to a background check by the F.B.I. But the president's authority is so broad, Mr. Aftergood said, that he could override red flags -- like fraud, huge personal debt or ties to foreign governments -- that would disqualify other applicants. Mr. Trump said in a Twitter post on Wednesday that he was not seeking security clearances for his children, who he has said will run his businesses while he is in the White House. But he did not address the case of Mr. Kushner, who is married to Mr. Trump's elder daughter, Ivanka.

29. The World Needs WikiLeaks

New York Times, Sarah Harrison, 2016 11 17

Op-ed from Berlin - My organization, WikiLeaks, took a lot of heat during the run-up to the recent presidential election. We have been accused of abetting the candidacy of Donald J. Trump by publishing cryptographically authenticated information about Hillary Clinton's campaign and its influence over the Democratic National Committee, the implication being that a news organization should have withheld accurate, newsworthy information from the public. The Obama Justice Department continues to pursue its six-year criminal investigation of WikiLeaks, the largest known of its kind, into the publishing of classified documents and articles about the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Guantánamo Bay and Mrs. Clinton's first year as secretary of state. According to the trial testimony of one F.B.I. agent, the investigation includes several of WikiLeaks founders, owners and managers. And last month our editor, Julian Assange, who has asylum at Ecuador's London embassy, had his internet connection severed. I can understand the frustration, however misplaced, from Clinton supporters. But the WikiLeaks staff is committed to the mandate set by Mr. Assange, and we are not going to go away, no matter how much he is abused. That's something that Democrats, along with everyone who believes in the accountability of governments, should be happy about. Despite the mounting legal and political pressure coming from Washington, we continue to publish valuable material, and submissions keep pouring in. There is a desperate need for our work: The world is connected by largely unaccountable networks of power that span industries and countries, political parties, corporations and institutions; WikiLeaks shines a light on these by revealing not just individual incidents, but information about entire structures of power. Note: Sarah Harrison is a journalist and editor for WikiLeaks.

30. TITANPOINTE

The Intercept, Ryan Gallagher, Henrik Moltke, 2016 11 16

New York - For many New Yorkers, 33 Thomas Street -- known as the "Long Lines Building" -- has been a source of mystery for years. It has been labeled one of the city's weirdest and most iconic skyscrapers, but little information has ever been published about its purpose. It is not uncommon to keep the public in the dark about a site containing vital telecommunications equipment. But 33 Thomas Street is different: An investigation by The Intercept indicates that the skyscraper is more than a mere nerve center for long-distance phone calls. It also appears to be one of the most important National Security Agency surveillance sites on U.S. soil -- a covert monitoring hub that is used to tap into phone calls, faxes, and internet data. Documents obtained by The Intercept from the NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden do not explicitly name 33 Thomas Street as a surveillance facility. However -- taken together with architectural plans, public records, and interviews with former AT&T employees conducted for this article -- they provide compelling evidence that 33 Thomas Street has served as an NSA surveillance site, code-named TITANPOINTE. Inside 33 Thomas Street there is a major international "gateway switch," according to a former AT&T engineer, which routes phone calls between the United States and countries across the world. A series of top-secret NSA memos suggest that the agency has tapped into these calls from a secure facility within the AT&T building. The Manhattan skyscraper appears to be a core location used for a controversial NSA surveillance program that has targeted the communications of the United Nations, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and at least 38 countries, including close U.S. allies such as Germany, Japan, and France. It has long been known that AT&T has cooperated with the NSA on surveillance, but few details have emerged about the role of specific facilities in carrying out the top-secret programs. The Snowden documents provide new information about how NSA equipment has been integrated as part of AT&T's network in New York City, revealing in unprecedented detail the methods and technology the agency uses to vacuum up communications from the company's systems.

31. Trump cyber security team, policy slow to take shape: officials

Reuters, Dustin Volz, Mark Hosenball, 2016 11 17

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump's transition team has not announced a point person dedicated to cyber security policy or staffing in his administration, an omission that could make the United States more vulnerable to threats and worsen a government cyber talent shortfall, current and former national security officials said. They and multiple sources involved with the Trump transition organization said they were unaware of any person in the Trump orbit who is dealing specifically with cyber security, and that there has been minimal contact with federal agencies. The apparent lack of expertise or prioritization coincides with U.S. intelligence agencies, including the CIA, having pivoted to digital warfare to address the growing national security and economic threats that nation-states and extremist groups pose in cyberspace. In response to a request for comment, a Trump spokeswoman referred to a cyber-security "vision" on Republican Trump's campaign website, which calls for an immediate review of U.S. cyber defenses and vulnerabilities and lists high-profile hacks as "key issues" without further explanation. James Norton, a former George W. Bush administration official who helped set up the Department of Homeland Security's first cyber security team, said that Trump's transition team may be waiting to move forward on the issue until after cabinet-level security posts are filled. "Cyber will be a priority," said Norton, now president of Washington-based consulting firm Play-Action Strategies LLC. "There's a little bit of fog, but I think that will clear once the names of the nominees are out."

32. US Mideast intelligence analysts fear superiors distorting findings-survey

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 17

Washington - A National Intelligence survey found officials in U.S. Central Command, which oversees combat operations in the Middle East and South Asia, had far less confidence that superiors were not distorting or suppressing their analyses than counterparts in the other eight American military commands. The December 2015 survey, conducted by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI), is expected to be one of the main topics of a House intelligence committee hearing later on Thursday. It is likely to reinforce questions in Congress and elsewhere about whether the administration is pressuring officials to make over-optimistic claims about progress against Islamic State and the Taliban so U.S. President Barack Obama can leave office in January on a high note. A Republican congressional report earlier this year found "widespread dissatisfaction" among analysts at the Tampa-based Central Command who thought their superiors were distorting their reports.

33. White House Confirms Pre-Election Warning to Russia Over Hacking

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 11 17

Washington - Over the past month, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia has received two starkly different messages about hacking into American computer networks from the current and future presidents of the United States: Don't you dare, and don't worry, we're not even sure it was you. The White House confirmed in a statement on Wednesday that eight days before the presidential election, the United States "contacted the Russian government directly regarding malicious cyberactivity" that was "targeting U.S. state election-related systems." It sent the message over a rarely used system: a hotline connecting the Nuclear Risk Reduction Centers in both countries, which they had agreed three years ago could also be employed to deal with major cyberincidents. The warnings to Russia against further hacking into polling or registration systems, or any further effort to affect the outcome of the election, are being hailed by the Obama administration as a success in deterrence. After all, they argue, a year and a half of Russian hacking activity seemed to slow, or halt, and there is no evidence that voting or counting of ballots was disrupted on Election Day. But more than a few experts in deterring cyberattacks take a more skeptical view. They say the Russians had already achieved their main goal: to demonstrate how they could disrupt the American electoral process with the leak of hacked emails, including from the Democratic National Committee and Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, John D. Podesta. James A. Lewis, a computer expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, dismissed the administration's claim that it had deterred Russia's hacking. "It seems a little bold to claim this is a success for deterrence, since the Russians weren't deterred from doing anything," he said. "Their hacking work was mostly complete. The issue now is whether they will be deterred in the future, and the guessing is they will not. Strong private warnings aren't enough to constitute deterrence."

34. Islamophobia growing as anti-extremism policy fails, says MP

The Guardian (London), Alan Travis, 2016 11 17

London - A vacuum at the heart of the government's counter- extremism policy is leading British Muslims to despair in the face of spiralling Islamophobia, a former Labour Cabinet and Home Office minister has warned. Liam Byrne says that thousands of Islamic State foreign fighters are expected to return to Europe, including Britain, after the fall of Mosul and use Donald Trump's inflammatory rhetoric to find fresh recruits in a new book. In his book, Black Flag Down: Counter-extremism, defeating Isis and winning the battle of ideas, Byrne says that any new strategy must reflect current security services' thinking - which, he says, means rejecting David Cameron's claims that there is a simple "conveyor belt" that links religious faith to extremism. The MP for Birmingham Hodge Hill, representing the largest Muslim constituency in Britain, also warns against rhetoric that wrongly claims there is an "epic clash of civilisations" underway between Islam and "the west". "In the vacuum, while Islamophobia spirals, British Muslims despair ... Many British Muslims feel surrounded by 'supremacists'. National supremacists who declare you can't be British and Muslim. And religious supremacists who say you can't be Muslim and British. One lot deny Muslims their country. The other crowd deny Muslims their faith," he says in a Guardian article.

35. Infrastructure may fall victim to cyber attack

The Australian Financial Review, Yolanda Redrup, 2016 11 17

Canberra - A former FBI special agent who oversaw the bureau's investigation of the 9/11 terrorism attacks says nation states are at risk of cyber terrorism attacks, with many foreign nations already having the capability to take down a foreign country's infrastructure assets. But Mary Galligan, who is visiting Australia as part of her role as managing director of Deloitte & Touche's Cyber Risk Services practice, said the real risk would arise if these offensive measures were to fall into the hands of terrorists or rogue nations. "Right now the way terrorists use the internet is highly concentrated on how they can radicalise individuals. They've figured out how to use the internet and click media campaigns to get individuals around the world to become radicalised and travel around the world," she said. "But we can never talk enough about what could happen. Looking at history we've been criticised for not having done this enough. But it ends up coming back to the response ... so we also need to talk about having resilience to technical issues, regardless of where it comes from or how it's caused."

37. Political infighting grips Afghanistan

Washington Post, Pamela Constable, 2016 11 17

Kabul - The scene this week in Afghanistan's majestic new parliament was one of bickering and bedlam. Legislators shouted to be heard and argued over points of procedure. They were fired up and in no mood to stop. By the end of four days, they had impeached seven cabinet ministers. The foreign minister was gone, and the finance minister barely survived a vote of confidence. Technically, the process was about under-spent budgets, but ethnic politics and opportunism were at its core. Once again, political melodrama has taken over the national conversation. The spectacle of renewed discord - in a government that underwent a wave of defections last spring - is dominating the news and shifting focus from pressing issues that include a spate of attacks by Taliban insurgents, record-high unemployment and a mass influx of returning refugees. The revolt in the parliament is only one symptom of the disarray. In recent weeks, several aides to President Ashraf Ghani have publicly criticized his administration, while opposition leaders are plotting to divide it from the outside. Long-promised elections are still far off, and public confidence is weakening.

38. Burundi Le pouvoir d'une chanson

La Presse+, Jean-Thomas Léveillé, 2016 11 17

Bujumbura, Burundi - Appeler au respect des droits de la personne n'est pas sans risque, au Burundi. Une émission de radio a été suspendue... pour avoir diffusé une chanson sur la question. Mais que dit cette oeuvre musicale que les autorités burundaises ne veulent pas que vous écoutiez ? L'accusation est à peine voilée : « Droits de l'homme bafoués par ceux qui devaient les faire respecter », chante le groupe burundais KGB, dans un passage en français d'une chanson qu'il vaut mieux ne pas diffuser, au Burundi. La pièce aux allures de rap est contraire aux « valeurs démocratiques » du pays, selon les autorités ; d'autres y voient plutôt un « prétexte » pour faire taire la contestation de la part d'un régime en pleine « dérive autoritaire ». Policiers et administrateurs de l'État y commettent des exactions, précise le chanteur en kirundi, la langue nationale de ce petit pays des Grands Lacs africains voisin du Rwanda en proie à une sanglante crise politique depuis un an et demi. L'affirmation n'est pas sans rappeler le rapport des Nations unies sur la situation au Burundi, en septembre, qui dénonçait des « violations graves, [...] systématiques et constantes » commises principalement par des agents de l'État ou qui y sont liés et qui s'alarmait du « grand danger de génocide ».

39. Des frappes aériennes à Sebha ont-elles tué un chef d'Aqmi?

All Africa, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 16

Al Qarda al-Shati, Libye - Un chef d'al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi) a-t-il été tué mardi 15 novembre près de Sebha, dans le Sud-libyen ? C'est en tout cas ce que relaie une partie de la presse libyenne qui attribue cette frappe ciblée à des drones américains. Des allégations non confirmées par les autorités libyennes et encore moins américaines, même si l'aviation américaine a été particulièrement active dans le ciel libyen ces derniers mois. D'après l'agence de presse libyenne Lana, la cible des frappes serait Abu Talha al Libi, un chef d'al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique. Six de ses hommes seraient morts à ses côtés dans la petite ville d'Al Qarda al-Shati à 70 km au nord de Sebha, capitale du Fezzan. Le chef du Conseil local confirme la mort de 7 personnes dans une série de frappes qui auraient au passage blessé une quarantaine de personnes, toujours selon le responsable local. Abu Talha al Libi est-il mort dans les sables du Fezzan ? Aucune source locale ne le confirme. Qui est responsable de ces frappes ? Les aéronefs ne sont pas identifiés. Par le passé, on se souvient que les États-Unis ont mené deux frappes d'envergure contre des cibles jihadistes, dont une reconnue par le Pentagone visant le chef d'Aqmi Mokhtar Belmokhtar et qui s'est soldée par un échec près d'Ajdabiya en juin 2015.

Khartoum, Soudan - Recherché par l'Italie, « Abou Nassim » a été interpellé à l'issue d'une traque rocambolesque. Les autorités soudanaises ont arrêté, cette semaine à Khartoum, l'un des terroristes les plus dangereux de l'État islamique (EI), après une traque rocambolesque dans une dizaine de pays d'Europe, du Moyen-Orient, en Afghanistan et en Afrique. Ce sont les services de renseignements italiens qui ont mis Interpol sur la trace de cet agent recruteur de l'EI, également recherché pour la préparation de deux attentats en Tunisie, au Musée du Bardo (24 morts le 18 mars 2015) et dans une station balnéaire près de Sousse (38 morts le 26 juin 2015). Fezzani Moez Ben Abdelkader, dit « Abou Nassim », un Tunisien de 47 ans, était arrivé en août à Khartoum, depuis la Libye qu'il avait fuie après la prise du réduit terroriste de Syrte, en passant par le Niger et le Tchad. Il se promenait dans les rues de Khartoum quand il a été interpellé en compagnie de sa seconde épouse. Les agents du contre-espionnage italien ont retrouvé sa trace en interceptant ses appels téléphoniques alors qu'il demandait de l'argent à son réseau italien situé entre Milan et Varèse, en Lombardie.

Assange, who enraged Washington by publishing a flood of secret U.S. diplomatic cables, fled to the embassy for fear that Sweden could end up sending him on to the United States where he could face prison for leaking U.S. secrets. "If we can obtain guarantees that Mr. Assange will not face extradition to the third country, I think it's fine for him to face Swedish justice - if there are charges, because are there still no charges," said Foreign Minister Guillaume Long in an interview with an Ecuadorean radio station. Photo: Xinhua One of China's most wanted fugitive officials returned to the country from the US on Wednesday, as experts hailed an example of successful international cooperation in anti-graft efforts, while warning of challenges in the future. Yang Xiuzhu, who has been on the run for 13 years, arrived at Beijing Capital International Airport to turn herself in to the authorities, according to the Communist Party of China's disciplinary watchdog, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), the Xinhua News Agency reported. Yang, 70, was former deputy director of the construction bureau in Wenzhou, East China's Zhejiang Province. She fled China in April 2003 after graft inspectors began investigating her involvement in embezzlement. Yang Xiuzhu topped a list of 100 most-wanted corrupt officials released by Chinese authorities via an Interpol "red notice," and is the 37th to return to China so far. The CCDI hailed Yang's return as "an important achievement in anti-graft law enforcement cooperation between China and the US." During over a decade on the run, Yang had hidden in Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, Singapore, France, the Netherlands, Italy and Canada, and had applied for asylum to France and the Netherlands, but failed. She entered the US from Canada in 2014 on a fake Dutch passport, and applied for asylum again.

46. China doubles down on internet control after tough new law

Associated Press, Gerry Shih, 2016 11 17

Beijing - China's leaders and official media are pushing for greater control of the internet and technology products as tensions surrounding a far-reaching Chinese cybersecurity law loom over a gathering this week of the world's leading tech firms and Chinese officials. The Communist Party's mouthpiece People's Daily warned in an editorial on Thursday that China must break monopolies over core technologies and standards and remain untethered to other countries' technology supply chains. The commentary, aimed apparently at Silicon Valley in unusually stark terms, comes one day after President Xi Jinping called for "more fair and equitable" governance of the internet at the opening of the state-run World Internet Conference. Since 2014, China has hosted executives from the likes of Microsoft, Apple, Facebook and Alibaba in eastern China to promote its vision of an internet that is more tightly controlled by national governments rather than running unchecked as a transnational network. The conference this week has highlighted U.S. and China's competing and increasingly entrenched views about the internet, trade and cybersecurity, and the potential for these issues to become an enduring irritant in bilateral relations.

47. China won't give up N.K. as it provides 'strategic buffer zone': expert

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 17

Suwon, South Korea - China will not give up North Korea as the country fits its need for a "strategic buffer zone" and its importance has increased due to the U.S. efforts to isolate Beijing, a Chinese expert on Korean affairs said Thursday. "Up until recently when ties between China and South Korea improved and the nuclear crisis on the peninsula repeatedly flared up, some even in our country mentioned giving up North Korea," Wu Peng, a politics professor at China's Southwest University, said during an international seminar held at Ajou University, south of Seoul. "Geopolitically speaking, however, you should keep in mind that the North is a safety wall and a strategic buffer zone for China," he added. "The North's strategic value has been regarded as more important at a time when the U.S. is seeking the isolation of China." Wu said that China shouldn't give up the North and that based on the ties, Beijing should expand its influence enough so as to control the pace of any developments in the reclusive country. He, however, cautioned other countries involved in North's nuclear issue against believing that Beijing can do everything.

48. Seoul, Washington gear up for bilateral panel on nuke deterrence against N. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 17

Seoul - South Korea and the United States started talks on Thursday to establish a high-level consultative body for devising extended deterrence strategies against North Korea's nuclear threat, the foreign ministry said. The allies agreed to launch the Extended Deterrence Strategy and Consultation Group (EDSCG) during a "two plus two" meeting involving their foreign and defense chiefs in Washington in October. "Our government views it very critical for the two countries to have high-level strategic consultations on extended deterrence in the face of North Korea's advancing nuclear missiles, especially following its fifth nuclear test," ministry spokesman Cho June-hyuck said in a press briefing. He said director and assistant deputy minister-level officials from the two countries' foreign and defense ministries attended the inaugural working-level meeting on the EDSCG's launch. North Korea has carried out two rounds of nuclear tests so far this year, with experts saying that the latest atomic detonations brought the country close to completing its nuclear weapons program.

49. Threats from cyberspace 'pressing and vital' in China: top State secret official

Global Times, Staff reporter, 2016 11 17

Beijing - Security threats coming from cyberspace are pressing and vital and China must increase its efforts to improve security technology to safeguard national interests, said a top official from the State secret administration. "A series of Internet leaks in China and other countries show the threats coming from cyberspace are pressing and vital, and the technology to safeguard information security needs to be reliable, self- developed and controllable," Tian Jing, director of the National Administration for the Protection of State Secrets, told the People's Daily in an interview that was published on the newspaper's website on Wednesday. Over 70 percent of leaked information classified as national secrets was passed on via the Internet, according to a 2014 report from the Internal and Judicial Affairs Committee of the National People's Congress. China's top legislator adopted a revision to the Law on Guarding State Secrets in 2010 which defines a "State secret" as "information concerning State security and interests," the Xinhua News Agency reported.

50. Xi calls for fairer web governance

South China Morning Post, Jane Cai and Kwong Man-ki, 2016 11 17

Beijing - The Communist Party leadership has repeated its call for the establishment of "cyberspace sovereignty" and for developing nations to assume a greater role in governing the internet at the global level. But the appeal came as the mainland was ranked at the bottom of an index measuring internet freedom compiled by an independent watchdog. China would "uphold cyberspace sovereignty" and make the governance of the global web "more fair and equitable", President Xi Jinping said in video remarks played at the opening of the third World Internet Conference in Wuzhen, Zhejiang province. Xi had voiced the idea of internet sovereignty at the annual summit last year, an unambiguous announcement that Beijing would intensify its censorship and control of the internet. As Xi left for Peru where the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum is holding its summit, Liu Yunshan, the No 5 in the Politburo Standing Committee who leads ideological control, addressed the audience of about 1,600 people.

51. Aleksei Navalny, Vocal Putin Critic, Is Cleared to Run for Office

New York Times, Ivan Nechepurenko, 2016 11 17

Moscow - A criminal conviction of a key opposition leader, Aleksei A. Navalny, was overturned on Wednesday by Russia's Supreme Court, formally opening the door for him to run for office. Mr. Navalny was convicted in 2013 by a court in Kirov, Russia, and sentenced to five years in prison on charges of embezzling timber worth $500,000 from a state-owned company. In a surprise move, that court suspended the sentence shortly after it was announced, but the criminal conviction remained in force, barring Mr. Navalny from being a candidate. Mr. Navalny appealed to higher courts in Russia, and also had his case heard by the European Court of Human Rights, which ruled in February that Russia had violated his right to a fair trial. The human rights court ordered the Russian government to pay damages and reimburse his legal costs, a ruling that is legally binding on Russia. Mr. Navalny said on Wednesday that he was not satisfied with the Supreme Court's decision to wipe out his conviction and order a new trial of the case.

52. Heritage Foundation: Russia Threat to U.S. 'Formidable'

Washington Free Beacon, Morgan Chalfant, 2016 11 16

Washington - Russia poses a "formidable" and "aggressive" threat to the vital interests of the United States as the American power declines, according to new analysis prepared by a conservative think tank. Moscow, through its continued presence in Ukraine, military intervention in Syria, provocations of NATO allies, and maturing military capabilities presents the most significant threat to U.S. interests globally, according to the 2017 Index of U.S. Military Strength rolled out by the Heritage Foundation Wednesday morning. Russia is one of six threats that have together soured the global environment over the past year as U.S. military strength has declined due to budget and force reductions, the analysis shows. The remaining five--namely China, North Korea, Iran, terrorism based in Afghanistan and Pakistan, and terror groups in the Middle East--are all assessed as "high" threats to U.S. interests, while Moscow is the only "formidable" one. "Russia seeks to maximize its strategic position in the world at the expense of the United States. It also seeks to undermine U.S. influence and moral standing, harasses U.S. and NATO forces, and is working to sabotage U.S. and Western policy in Syria," the report states. "Moscow's continued aggression and willingness to utilize every tool at its disposal in pursuit of its aim leads this Index to assess the overall threat from Russia as 'aggressive' and 'formidable.'"

53. Russia Cuts Ties With International Criminal Court

New York Times, Ivan Nechepurenko, Nick Cumming-Bruce, 2016 11 17

Moscow - President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia instructed his government on Wednesday to withdraw from the treaty that created the International Criminal Court, while his government assailed the tribunal as "ineffective and one-sided." The action was largely symbolic, because Russia -- like the United States -- has not ratified the treaty and is not under the court's jurisdiction. But it was another setback for the fairly young court, which handles cases of war crimes and crimes against humanity and is an emblem of the international order that is being shaken by populist revolts across the West. "Essentially, this is just a gratuitous slap in the face, not a body blow," said Kate Cronin-Furman, a human rights lawyer and political scientist at the Harvard Kennedy School, who predicted that the election of Donald J. Trump as president of the United States would lead to more harm for the court. Burundi, Gambia and South Africa moved recently to withdraw from the court, calling it biased because all the people it had convicted so far had been Africans or because, in the case of South Africa, it disagreed with the court's mandate to prosecute any individual, including a head of state.

54. 2 more Iranian terror suspects nabbed

Saudi Gazette, Staff Report, 2016 11 17

Riyadh - The security forces recently apprehended two Iranians accused of terrorism and crimes against the State, local daily Al-Watan reported on Wednesday quoting informed security sources. With the two new suspects, the number of Iranians being held has risen to six. One was already tried but has appealed the verdict. The case file of one of the Iranian suspects is currently being investigated by the Bureau of Investigation and Public Prosecution (BIP) while the other four are still under interrogation. Since the beginning of the year, the security forces arrested 30 Syrians raising the number of Syrian terror suspects in intelligence prisons to 214. As many as 15 Yemenis were recently arrested, raising the number of suspected Yemenis in Saudi prisons to 352. Ten Pakistanis accused of terrorism were also arrested, raising the number of Pakistani detainees to 62. (Full Report).

56. Iran's Leader: Iran Unaffected by US Election Results

Fars News Agency, 2016 11 17

Tehran - Supreme Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyed Ali Khamenei said Iran's decisions are not affected by elections results in the US, underlining that Washington's policies on Iran have always remained hostile irrespective of partisan affiliations. "We don't have any judgment about the (US) election since the US is the same US and during the past 37 years that the two parties held the power, they didn't do any good to Iran and they permanently did evil things to the Iranian nation," Ayatollah Khamenei said in Tehran on Wednesday, addressing a large gathering of the Iranian people from the Central province of Isfahan. "Unlike some of those in the world who have either been mourning or celebrating the results of the US elections, we are neither mourning nor celebrating, and the results make no difference to us. We have no worries and by the grace of God, we are ready to face any possible eventuality," he added.

London - Iranian MP Hussein Ali Haji Degana revealed that at least 12 top officials holding dual citizenship have been arrested in Iran over the last two years. Degana said that those detained have infiltrated into government and procured senior managerial and decision-making posts. The spy officials, according to Degana, have been arrested and put up on trial. The MP demanded that the Isfahan judiciary delivers its rulings with transparency, and that the officials' identity also be made public. Some of the officials were arrested on the premise of holding dual citizenship solely. Despite many high-ranking officials such as minister of intelligence Mahmoud Alavi denying the presence of dual-citizens among Iran's decision- making body- Abdol-Rasool Dorri Esfahani, one of the nuclear deal negotiators, was arrested based on the claims of owning dual citizenship with his family currently residing in Canada.

59. China's Game-changing Route to the Middle East

The Media Line, Albert Nachmani, 2016 11 17

Undisclosed placeline - Connecting the Chinese city of Kashgar and the deep-water Pakistani port of Gwadar, the Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif inaugurated a new trade route known as the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC). The creation of this modern day "silk road" is an indicator of China's growing desire to increase its influence in the Middle East and Pakistan's shift closer to China. "CPEC is currently touted as a game changer for Pakistan, as it has the potential to forever alter the country's economic trajectory," Zeeshan Salauddin, Senior Research Fellow at Pakistan's Center for Research and Security Studies, told The Media Line. Analysts say that Pakistan might be cozying up to China in an effort to reduce its dependence on support from the United States, especially as the India-friendly US President-Elect assumes office in January 2017. CPEC is also a way for the world's second largest economy to expand its influence in the Middle East and counter both US and Indian influence.

60. Grasp of Islam is 'basic' for foreign fighters joining Isis

The Independent (UK), Lizzie Dearden, 2016 11 17

London - Religion is not the strongest driving force behind thousands of foreign fighters joining Isis and other terrorist groups in Iraq and Syria, a report by US military researchers has found. A new study by the Combating Terrorism Center (CTC) at West Point revealed that the vast majority of almost 1,200 militants surveyed had no formal religious education and had not adhered to Islam for their entire lives. Extremist groups may prefer such recruits because they are "less capable of critically scrutinising the jihadi narrative and ideology" and instead adhere totally to their chosen organisation's violent and reductive interpretation of Islam. Analysts said many foreign fighters travelling from the West are attracted to jihadi groups through cultural and political identities rather than Islam itself, which is moved into a "secondary role". "The ability of jihadi groups to recruit foreign fighters is thus based on creating a narrative that is focused on the ongoing deprivation of Muslims, both in specific Western polities, as well as in the international arena," said the CTC's report. The analysis, carried out at the United States Military Academy, corresponded with revelations from a trove of Isis entry forms leaked earlier this year, where the majority of those joining the so-called Islamic State listed their Sharia knowledge as "basic". At the height of Isis's drive for foot soldiers in 2013 and 2014, recruits reportedly included two Britons who ordered The Koran for Dummies and Islam for Dummies from Amazon to prepare for jihad abroad.

63. Mossad, RAW cooperation deepens

The International News, 2016 11 17

Islamabad - Indian intelligence and Israeli secret service are in alliance together with extensive military cooperation as they take on extremist Muslims groups. RAW stands for Research and Analysis Wing is the intelligence gathering agency of the government of India like the CIA. This was set up in 1968 at the behest of the then Indian prime minister Indira Gandhi. Right from its inception, RAW realized the importance of cooperation with the Israeli secret service MOSSAD. Initial contacts were established through the Israeli consulate in Mumbai. Over the years the bonds between the two agencies have strengthened with a common threat of Islamic terrorism and fundamentalism. MOSSAD is one of the top spy agencies in the world and can rank as equivalent to the Soviet NKVD, German Gestapo, and the CIA. It is to its credit that the spy agency gleaned vital intelligence of extremist Muslim activities in a hostile environment.

64. Security expert: Pressure social media to block terrorist incitement

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, 2016 11 17

Jerusalem - Countries grappling with terrorists who use Facebook and Twitter to incite should unite together to formulate new international standards against such activity, INSS national security expert Col. (res.) Gabi Siboni recently told The Jerusalem Post. Even national efforts in democratic countries to restrain terrorism and incitement via social media are only at their earliest stages, making Siboni's idea an innovative and potentially game-changing solution, though the challenges in accomplishing it are probably at least as great as the positive potential. The INSS expert did emphasize that the initiative - what he calls fighting on the "cognitive warfare" plane - should be carried out in consultation with the leading social media giants. His initiative is part of a larger multifaceted plan he is proposing for addressing the challenge of terrorists' brilliant use of online propaganda to hound Israel and the West.

Moscou - Au moins 30 jihadistes du groupe Fateh al-Cham (ex-Front al-Nosra, Al-Qaïda en Syrie) ont été tués dans les bombardements aériens russes dans la province syrienne d'Idleb, a annoncé jeudi le ministère russe de la Défense dans un communiqué. Il s'agit des frappes menées mardi pour la première fois à Idleb (nord-ouest) par des chasseurs-bombardiers Su-33 embarqués sur le porte-avions russe Amiral Kouznetsov qui est arrivé la semaine dernière au large des côtes syriennes en Méditerranée, selon le porte-parole du ministère, Igor Konachenkov, cité dans le communiqué. "Selon des informations obtenues via différents canaux de renseignement, au moins 30 terroristes ont été tués" dans ces bombardements, a indiqué M. Konachenkov. Parmi eux figurent notamment des chefs jihadistes qui étaient chargés de "préparer et de mener une nouvelle offensive des combattants à Alep", a-t-il précisé. La province d'Idleb est un bastion de Jaich al-Fatah (l'Armée de la conquête), coalition regroupant des rebelles islamistes et des jihadistes de Fateh al-Cham, anciennement Front al-Nosra jusqu'à sa rupture officielle avec Al-Qaïda.

66. U.S. Sees Possible Terrorism in Jordan Killings

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 17

Jerusalem - American officials said Wednesday that they were investigating the killing of three United States soldiers at a Jordanian air base this month as a possible terrorist attack and dismissed suggestions that the three had done anything to provoke the shooting. The Nov. 4 shooting has been shrouded in secrecy as American and Jordanian officials investigate it, a sign of the sensitivity surrounding the episode. But the Americans evidently became irritated at reports that seemed to place at least some blame on the soldiers. "Investigators are considering all potential motives and reasons for why American service members came under fire, and they have not yet ruled out terrorism as a potential motive," the American Embassy in Jordan said in a statement. "Contrary to press reports, there has been absolutely no credible evidence to suggest that U.S. personnel acted contrary to orders or established procedures when accessing the base." The three soldiers, all with the Special Forces, were in Jordan on a training mission and were returning to the air base in the southern desert when a Jordanian soldier fired on them. The Jordanian soldier was wounded in what was described as an exchange of fire and is in custody.

67. Candidats au djihad pas empêchés de voyager

Tribune de Genève, Lucie Monnat, 2016 11 17

Berne, Suisse - La commission de la politique de sécurité des Etats reste modérée sur les dispositions contre le terrorisme. Mardi, le Ministère public de la Confédération (MPC) expliquait qu'il ne disposait pas des dispositions légales nécessaires pour interdire les activités de l'association « Lies! » dont plusieurs membres sont suspectés d'être en lien avec le processus de radicalisation des djihadistes. Le même jour, la commission de la politique de sécurité des Etats a refusé deux propositions visant à durcir les mesures antiterroristes. Les membres de la commission ont rejeté à l'unanimité une motion souhaitant interdire de sortie du territoire les personnes susceptibles d'être des « touristes du djihad », comme l'applique la France depuis 2014. La mesure leur a semblé peu applicable en Suisse. « Du point de vue constitutionnel, nous sommes à la limite du respect des droits de l'homme, estime Géraldine Savary (PS/VD). De plus, il faut surtout agir auprès de ceux qui rentrent. Une prise en charge immédiate de la part de MPC est nécessaire, et c'est déjà ce qui est fait. » Dernier problème de la motion selon la conseillère aux Etats, le fait que les hooligans soient inclus dans la mesure requise par la motion. « Qui trop embrasse mal étreint », conclut-elle. La commission souligne toutefois que le Conseil fédéral se penche actuellement sur des mesures qui prévoient la saisie des documents d'identité des potentiels voyageurs du djihad.

68. Fichier TES : Cazeneuve tente de rassurer sur d'éventuelles dérives

Le Monde, Morgane Tual, 2016 11 17

Paris - Au Sénat, puis à l'Assemblée nationale, le ministre de l'intérieur a dû faire face aux critiques des députés. Un simulacre de consultation du Parlement " : c'est ainsi que le député Philippe Goujon (Paris, Les Républicains) a qualifié, mardi 15 novembre, le débat organisé à l'Assemblée nationale sur le " mégafichier " de données personnelles controversé. Accusé d'avoir fait passer en catimini, durant le week-end de la Toussaint, un décret instaurant la création d'une base censée fichier 60 millions de Français, le gouvernement avait finalement dû se résoudre à la tenue, mardi, de cette discussion à l'Assemblée nationale. " Un débat sans vote ", a déploré le socialiste Luc Belot (Maine-et-Loire), " et pas tout à fait éclairé ", car, souligne-t-il, les avis de l'Agence nationale de la sécurité des systèmes d'information (Anssi) et la Direction interministérielle du numérique et du système d'information et de communication (Dinsic) " ne sont pas connus ". Or, les inquiétudes liées à ce fichier sont notamment d'ordre technique. Ce fichier, baptisé TES (pour titres électroniques sécurisés), est censé réunir les informations des détenteurs d'un passeport et d'une carte d'identité. Des données comme l'identité, la couleur des yeux, le domicile, la photo ou encore les empreintes digitales y seront stockées. Officiellement, la création de cette base doit permettre de lutter contre la fraude aux papiers d'identité, mais elle soulève, depuis la publication du décret, de nombreuses inquiétudes : rendra-t-elle possible l'identification d'une personne à partir de ses empreintes digitales ou de sa photo? Risque-t-elle d'être piratée?

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - Far-right extremists in Germany are increasingly ready to commit violent acts and are now networking with like-minded groups across Europe and in some cases even with the United States, the head of Germany's domestic intelligence agency said. "This is not just purely a German phenomenon," Hans-Georg Maassen, who heads the Verfassungsschutz, told Reuters in an interview late on Tuesday. "The right-extremist scene is networking on a European level, and in some cases, with connections in the United States." Maassen said the international connections seen among far-right extremist groups still paled compared with global networking by Islamist groups, but European authorities were cooperating well to keep a close eye on those developments. Maassen's agency in June reported a sharp rise in far-right violence in 2015, a year in which it took in nearly a million migrants and said it was taking steps to prevent the emergence of more structured "right-wing terrorist" groups. "We have seen in a series of cases that there are numerous people in the far-right extremist scene who are ready to do anything and who have joined forces to create right-wing terrorist cells," Maassen said.

70. Germany alarmed about potential Russian interference in election: spy chief

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - Germany is alarmed that Russia may seek to interfere in its national elections next year, the domestic intelligence chief said, echoing concerns raised in the United States before Donald Trump's presidential election victory. German officials have accused Moscow of trying to manipulate German media to fan popular angst over issues like the migrant crisis, weaken voter trust in moderate mainstream government under Chancellor Angela Merkel and breed divisions within the European Union so that it drops sanctions against Moscow. Intelligence officials have also pointed to Russian support for eurosceptic, anti-immigrant parties in Germany and across the EU. Last week, Merkel said she could not rule out Russia interfering in Germany's 2017 election through Internet attacks and misinformation campaigns. Hans-Georg Maassen, head of the domestic BfV intelligence agency, cited the high-profile case last year of a German- Russian girl who Russian media said was kidnapped and raped by migrants in Berlin, a claim later refuted by German authorities. "This could happen again next year and we are alarmed," Maassen told Reuters in an interview late on Tuesday. "We have the impression that this is part of a hybrid threat that seeks to influence public opinion and decision-making processes."

71. NATO Prepares for Trump Presidency

Der Spiegel, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Berlin - Consternation over the election of Donald Trump as the next US president is especially great within the Brussels alliance. "For the first time," says a German NATO officer, "a withdrawal from NATO by the United States is on the table, or at least a threat." That would mean the end of the alliance. Indeed, many inside NATO are anticipating the worst following Trump's election win. The scenario of a Trump presidency is described in detail in a secret report by the staff of Secretary General Stoltenberg. In it, strategists examine what it would mean if Trump made good on his threat to become less involved in Europe's security in the future and possibly withdraw a portion of American troops from the Continent. "As a result of the election of Donald Trump, we are experiencing a moment of extreme and unprecedented uncertainty in the trans-Atlantic relationship," says Wolfgang Ischinger, a former German ambassador in Washington and head of the influential Munich Security Conference. During the election campaign, Trump had questioned the cornerstone of NATO, the mutual defense commitment under Article 5. Washington's NATO allies could only expect support, he said, if they've "paid their bills."

72. Sécurité du mégafichier : les sénateurs très inquiets

Paris - La droite sénatoriale demande la suspension du décret visant à rassembler les données personnelles des Français. Sous l'impulsion du président les Républicains de la commission des lois du Sénat, Philippe Bas, la droite sénatoriale a réclamé, ce mercredi, la « suspension » du décret de Bernard Cazeneuve visant à instaurer un mégafichier national d'identité. Ce décret avait été publié dans la torpeur des vacances de la Toussaint, le dimanche 30 octobre, sans même un débat préalable au Parlement. Le ministre de l'Intérieur l'a maintenu malgré une vive polémique, tout en acceptant finalement d'en débattre à l'Assemblée et au Sénat. Rappelons que ce fichier TES (titres électroniques sécurisés) ajoute au fichier des demandeurs de passeports celui des cartes d'identité. Il doit rassembler à terme les données personnelles et biométriques (identité, couleurs des yeux, domicile, photo, empreintes digitales...) de 60 millions de Français. La Haute Assemblée ne met pas en cause la légalité du décret. Selon Philippe Bas, « le texte est juridiquement bordé et ne semble pas enfreindre les recommandations du Conseil constitutionnel saisi en 2012 sur un projet presque similaire, mais c'est le reste qui inquiète... »

1. Big Brother et « Five-eyes »

Le Devoir, Denis Ferland, 2016 11 23

Chronique - La consultation sur la sécurité nationale menée par le gouvernement Trudeau tire à sa fin et deux événements récents appellent les Canadiens à la plus grande vigilance pour la suite des choses. L'affaire de la surveillance des journalistes au Québec et le jugement de la Cour fédérale sur la collecte et la rétention de données personnelles par le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) montrent bien que l'équilibre entre la sécurité et la protection de la vie privée reste au centre des préoccupations devant les demandes incessantes de pouvoirs accrus des autorités. Les agences britanniques pourront se livrer à la collecte et à l'interception en vrac des communications ainsi que des métadonnées, pratique pour laquelle le Centre canadien de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST) s'est déjà fait taper sur les doigts. La réprimande de la Cour fédérale adressée au SCRS portait aussi sur la rétention de telles données.

2. Big Brother sleeps easy

National Post, Mathieu Bédard, 2016 11 23

Op-ed: The revelation that Montreal police secretly monitored several journalists' smartphones for months, ostensibly in hopes of discovering the source of internal information leaks, has brought home for many people the troubling reality of government snooping. The fact that thousands of students recently lined up to watch whistleblower Edward Snowden at a video conference at McGill University is another sign of the public's growing concern about respect for the right to privacy. Indeed, it is not just journalists who are targeted by electronic surveillance. Revelations about the National Security Agency (NSA) in the United States also touch Canadians, since in the age of the Internet and social networks, telecommunications knows no borders. It is reasonable to imagine that practically all our communications could be intercepted, filtered and recorded by governments. This is now the world in which we live. Thanks to Snowden's revelations, Canadians know our federal government is actively helping the United States with surveillance programs of its own. For example, it was revealed in April that the RCMP had decrypted about one million private messages from BlackBerry smartphones. In addition, we know that the number of communications intercepted in Canada grew by a factor of 26 in 2015, without the authorities giving any reasons. This opacity is at the heart of the problem: "Big Brother" is completely lacking in transparency. A Federal Court ruling revealed recently that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) had acted illegally by conserving personal data for 10 years. Note: Mathieu Bédard is an economist at the Montreal Economic Institute (iedm.org).

3. Senator tables bill to protect source confidentiality

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 11 23

Toronto - The relationship between a journalist and a confidential source is sacrosanct, according to a Parliamentarian who wants to enshrine that relationship in law. Amid a scandal over revelations that police in Quebec spied on several journalists, Conservative Senator Claude Carignan has introduced a private member's bill that aims to keep police from ferreting out reporters' sources. "It's a fundamental principle. It's very important to protect the journalist and also the whistleblower," Mr. Carignan, the Senate's opposition leader, told reporters in Ottawa on Tuesday. While Quebec recently announced a commission of inquiry into press- freedom issues,

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has resisted calls for a Canada-wide inquiry. But Mr. Carignan said Parliament cannot afford to wait. Bill S-231, the Journalistic Sources Protection Act, seeks to "protect the privilege of journalistic sources, and secrecy," he said. While the bill would not inoculate journalists from police powers to get search warrants, it would make those powers harder to use. For example, only high-court judges could endorse such warrants. Should such judicial permissions be granted, the fruits of any such searches against a journalist would be immediately sealed. In recent weeks, Mr. Trudeau has fended off calls for action by saying that his own security services are not now investigating any journalists. "We have actually strong safeguards and protections in place to protect the freedom of the press in the course of business conducted by CSIS and the RCMP," he told reporters. Last year, the RCMP ordered a Vice News reporter to surrender materials related to conversations with a Canadian member of the Islamic State. And the Mounties briefed Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale last year about the fact that some detectives had shadowed a Quebec reporter who obtained a leaked CSIS document.

4. Watchdog wants rules for spies sharing info

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 11 23

Other national security agencies may be taking the same broad view of the law that led CSIS to illegally keep data on innocent people for almost a decade, the federal privacy watchdog says. Privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien said he's calling on Parliament for clearer rules about how spy- and law-enforcement agencies obtain, retain and destroy information on Canadians. Therrien said information-sharing powers granted in Bill C-51, the former Conservative government's controversial spying bill, need restrictions on what agencies can share and how long they can keep the information. "Security agencies, with (Bill C-51 powers) and with the absence of rules around retention, for instance, would be able to collect and retain information that they don't really need," Therrien told the Star outside a House of Commons committee Tuesday. "I don't dispute that CSIS needs to analyze information in order to do their job ... but once the analysis has been completed and the vast majority of people about whom they're collecting information are found not to be a threat, and that's the case, then they should destroy that information." "I don't think that's the kind of country we want, where the security services of the country hangs onto information on vast amounts of people in case it might be helpful one day," Therrien added. In his testimony before the access to information, privacy and ethics committee, Therrien noted Canadian spy agencies misusing powers is not a "theoretical" issue. He noted that CSIS was recently found by a federal court to have illegally kept data on an unknown number of innocent Canadians between 2006 and 2015. The program, which stored information on "non-threat" individuals obtained through lawful intercepts, was created and operated without the court's knowledge. In a press conference with reporters earlier this month, CSIS director Michel Coulombe said the agency believed it was operating within the rules at the time, but accepted the court's ruling. Therrien also noted the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), the country's electronic spy agency, was found earlier this year to have illegally transferred Canadian metadata to close security partners. The CSE, and its independent review body, found that the transfer was not intentional and the result of a technical glitch. "I'm not saying that government officials involved in national security are in bad faith and look to do surveillance on the population, but the safeguards are insufficient," Therrien told the committee.

5. 'Hate wave' could move north, CNN contributor says at AGO

Toronto Star, Sammy Hudes, 2016 11 23

Toronto - CNN political contributor and former Obama White House adviser Van Jones warned that Canada is not immune to the offensive and divisive rhetoric that he says powered Donald Trump to victory in the U.S. presidential election. Speaking to media at the Art Gallery of Ontario before delivering the keynote address at the Broadbent Institute's Progress Gala on Tuesday evening, Jones urged Canadians to be proactive in preventing Trump's politics from seeping north of the border. "People keep saying that this hate wave that's moving across the west cannot hit Canada," he said. "And you are wrong. It is happening throughout the western democracies." Jones drew attention on election night when he referred to president-elect Trump's victory as a "whitelash" on CNN. He said those comments referred to the strain of "racist, xenophobic sentiment growing in our country" that in part drove Trump's success. "It found a home in the Trump campaign and I will tell you that it can find a home in your country too if you don't stand up to it," he said. He said the American working class, especially white members of society, have rightly felt left behind.

6. Canada should be ready to press China over Tibet, says exiled PM

Reuters, David Ljunggren, 2016 11 23

Ottawa - The Canadian government can show China how to treat a region seeking autonomy and should use its experience in dealing with Quebec to press for improved human rights in Tibet, the Himalayan region's political leader said on Tuesday. Prime Minister in exile Lobsang Sangay, like Tibetan spiritualist leader Dalai Lama, backs the so-called middle way that seeks autonomy within China. Beijing accuses the Dalai Lama of being a "splittist" seeking independence. Talks between the two sides broke down in 2010. Sangay's visit, guaranteed to upset Chinese authorities, coincides with Liberal Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's attempts to improve economic ties with China. "The Canadian government is on very high and moral ground and they can say with confidence and share the Canadian experience, and say 'This is how we treat our people, how we solve the issue,'" Sangay said in an interview. English-speaking Canada has spent years negotiating with separatists in the predominantly French-speaking province of Quebec, a quest for autonomy that began in the 1960s. Although Canadian voters turned down constitutional changes to give Quebec special recognition in a 1992, the province enjoys broad powers of self-governance, including the right to insist that French be the official language. Asked what would happen if China did not listen to such a message, Sangay replied: "Then you have to press a little bit more, as a friend, and say 'This is the right approach, we have done it at home.'"

7. Commission de la fonction publique Hausse de 12 % des activités d'embauche

Ottawa - Même si l'effectif de la fonction publique est demeuré stable à 197280 (+ 1 %), un total de 45965 nominations ont été effectuées en 2015-2016, incluant l'embauche d'étudiants et de personnel occasionnel, ce qui représente une hausse de 12 % par rapport à l'année précédente. Dans son rapport annuel 2015-2016 déposé mardi, la Commission de la fonction publique du Canada (CFP) révèle que le nombre d'embauches à des postes à durée déterminée a connu la plus forte progression, en hausse de 27,6 %. Les nominations à des postes permanents (à période indéterminée) s'élevaient à 4533 en 2015-2016, en hausse de 16,1 %. Leur nombre est d'ailleurs en augmentation constante depuis les quatre dernières années, après avoir atteint un creux de 1979 en 2012-2013, première année du programme de compressions budgétaires sous les conservateurs. En même temps, le nombre d'embauches à des postes contractuels a atteint 20187, en hausse de 8,5 %. C'est le plus grand nombre enregistré depuis 2001.

9. PM's dinner with Chinese tycoons doesn't pass 'smell test'

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles and Alex Boutilier, 2016 11 23

Ottawa - The Liberal government's "cash-for-access" woes deepened Tuesday as the Opposition hammered Prime Minister Justin Trudeau over a news report he mingled with Chinese billionaires at an exclusive Liberal party fundraiser. During question period, Conservative interim leader Rona Ambrose said: "Rubbing elbows with millionaires at these cash-for-access events does not pass the smell test and the prime minister knows it. So why does he keep doing it?" The Globe and Mail reported Tuesday on a fundraiser last May at the Toronto home of a wealthy Chinese-Canadian business executive where one of the 32 guests was a "well-heeled donor who was seeking Ottawa's final approval to begin operating a new bank aimed at Canada's Chinese community." Trudeau was the top draw at the $1,500-a-ticket Liberal party event, attended by insurance tycoon Shenglin Xian, the founder of Wealth One Bank of Canada and president of Toronto-based Shenglin Financial Group, who was seeking final approval from federal regulators to operate a domestic bank here. It had received tentative approval the year before under the Conservative government. And in July, it received final approval. Also among the donors, according to the Globe, was Zhang Bin, a wealthy Chinese businessman and political adviser to the Chinese government in Beijing.

10. Rendu malade par le pot, il menace Trudeau

Journal de Montréal, Eric Thibault, 2016 11 23

Ottawa - Favorable à la légalisation du cannabis, le premier ministre Justin Trudeau a été victime de menaces de mort d'un jeune Montréalais en proie à des troubles psychiatriques aggravés par la marijuana, cet été. «La drogue, je ne veux plus en prendre», a dit ce dernier devant un tribunal après avoir été déclaré criminellement nonresponsable de ces délits, puis enfermé dans un hôpital durant deux mois. Selon une décision récente de la Commission d'examen des troubles mentaux, le Montréalais, dont l'identité n'a pas été rendue publique, a acheminé un courriel au bureau du premier ministre, le 10 juin dernier. «Je te jure, Justin, je commence à m'entraîner pour te tuer si tu ne fais rien pour mon cas», a-t-il écrit dans un message confus. Sans réponse, il a ensuite téléphoné au bureau de M. Trudeau et réitéré ses menaces avant d'être arrêté par la GRC.

11. Senator tables private member's bill to protect sources, whistleblowers

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 11 23

Ottawa - A Quebec senator has introduced a bill he calls the first concrete legislative measure in Canada to protect journalistic sources following a spate of cases in which reporters have come under police surveillance. Conservative Sen. Claude Carignan says he was compelled to table the private member's bill after learning that Montreal police obtained warrants to monitor the iPhone of La Presse journalist Patrick Lagace. The Quebec provincial police force has also recently acknowledged tracking the communications of a handful of other journalists. "It's a fundamental principle," Carignan said Tuesday. "It's very important to protect the journalist, but also the whistleblower." The bill would amend the Canada Evidence Act to allow a journalist to refuse to disclose information that would identify _ or likely identify _ a journalistic source. The only exception would be if the document could not be obtained by any other reasonable means and the public interest in the administration of justice outweighed the interest in preserving the source's confidentiality. The one requesting disclosure of the journalist's source would have the burden of proving the case met these conditions.

12. Trudeau defends fundraiser as effort to encourage investment from China

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase and Robert Fife, 2016 11 23

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau says the presence of senior Chinese government envoys and wealthy business executives at a private Liberal Party fundraiser in May was his way of trying to attract investment dollars to Canada from China. At least three people at the May 19 event were senior apparatchiks in Chinese state-run organizations whose purpose is to build China's influence around the world and whose activities are regulated and supervised by Beijing. A Globe and Mail report on the $1,500-per-ticket fundraiser at the Toronto home of Chinese Business Chamber of Canada chair Benson Wong was the first topic at Tuesday's Question Period in the House of Commons, with the Conservatives and New Democrats demanding Mr. Trudeau stop cash-for-access events. "Chinese billionaires paid $1,500 for exclusive access to the Prime Minister at a Toronto mansion. Rubbing elbows with millionaires at these cash-for-access events does not pass the smell test," interim Conservative leader Rona Ambrose said. Mr. Trudeau defended his presence at the fundraiser, which was also attended by multimillionaire Chinese-Canadian business executives with close ties to China's regime and at least four representatives of the ruling Communist Party. "Canadians faced a period of 10 years of lower-than-needed growth under the previous government. That is why we have committed, engaging positively with the world to draw in investment," Mr. Trudeau told the Commons. "We know that drawing in global investment is a great way to grow the economy and create jobs." The only known investment that followed the May 19 fundraiser was a $1-million donation to the Pierre Elliott Trudeau Foundation and the University of Montreal's law faculty from Chinese philanthropists Zhang Bin and Niu Gensheng. Mr. Zhang attended the Trudeau fundraiser but, as a foreign national, did not make a donation.

13. Why UN Peacekeeping is worth the risks

Toronto Star, Peggy Mason, 2016 11 23

Op-ed: Pages of newspaper ink are being spilled to highlight the risks in any of the UN peacekeeping missions Canada might be considering -- from the Democratic Republic of Congo to Mali to the Central African Republic. What has been missing from all the commentary and government pronouncements, though, is a coherent argument for why UN peacekeeping is a job worth the all-too-evident dangers. This is too bad because there are solid reasons for Canada to re-engage. While UN peacekeeping is no miracle cure and there are no guarantees of success, when done right and properly mandated and resourced, UN peacekeeping offers the best chance for a society emerging from violent conflict. Peacekeeping is the front end of a complex, long-term process of helping conflicting parties create the necessary conditions -- political, socio-economic, security -- for sustainable peace. At the centre of this effort is the peace process. Complex political problems always lie at the heart of violent conflict and require political solutions that are negotiated and agreed to by the parties. A capable security force will be essential in both the peace negotiation and implementation phases, but it is a supporting element of the overall mission nonetheless. Note: Peggy Mason is President of the Rideau Institute and a former Canadian Ambassador for Disarmament to the UN, with over 20 years of experience in peacekeeping training.

14. 'Let's party like it's 1933': Inside the alt-right world of Richard Spencer

Washington Post, John Woodrow Cox, 2016 11 22

Washington - For years, Richard Spencer and his followers worked in obscure corners of the Internet to promote pride in white identity and the creation of an "ethno-state" that would banish minorities. Then came the presidential campaign of Donald Trump, whose attacks on undocumented immigrants, Muslims and political correctness deeply resonated with them. They crusaded for him on Twitter and celebrated his improbable victory as a seminal moment for their cause. And no one is more critical to the alt-right movement than Spencer, its carefully crafted public face. Last weekend, the articulate, highly educated 38-year-old hosted a conference in the nation's capital that drew nearly 300 white nationalists and at least 50 reporters. But his agenda reaches far beyond any single gathering. Spencer envisions a world in which his ideals are embraced by the mainstream, and he has vowed to keep pushing until that happens. Spencer, who splits his time between Arlington, Va., and Whitefish, Mont., has reveled in the coverage from traditional news outlets with huge audiences: NBC, NPR, CNN, The Washington Post, the New York Times. He would draw their attention again this week when a video of him at the conference shouting "Hail Trump!" -- and the Nazi salutes it elicited -- went viral. But from a distance, almost everything about him appears as innocuous as the term "alt-right" -- and that's by design. Spencer heads a pair of organizations with unremarkable names: the National Policy Institute and Radix Journal. He dresses in three-piece Brooks Brothers suits, gold-coin cuff links and $5,000 Swiss watches, and he sports a swept-over hipster haircut known as a "fashy" (as in fascist). Spencer, who has degrees from the University of Virginia and the University of Chicago, dismisses such labels as Nazi, racist and white supremacist, preferring to describe himself as an "identitarian." Even before Twitter banned him and other white nationalists last week, he seldom trolled his enemies. But to those who track hate groups, Spencer is dangerous because, when he doesn't want to, he doesn't look or sound or act dangerous. Richard Spencer, says the Southern Poverty Law Center, is "a suit-and-tie version of the white supremacists of old, a kind of professional racist in khakis."

15. Conway: Giuliani 'possibly' tapped for national intelligence director

Politic, Louis Nelson, 2016 11 22

Washington - Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani could "possibly" be the next director of national intelligence, Donald Trump's senior adviser Kellyanne Conway said Tuesday morning. Director of national intelligence is the latest addition to a list of jobs for which Giuliani's name has been floated, which also includes secretary of state and attorney general, the latter of which the former mayor has said he will not be. Conway said during an appearance on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that she last spoke to Giuliani on Sunday at Trump's Bedminster golf club in New Jersey. Emerging later Tuesday morning from a meeting with the president-elect at Trump Tower, Giuliani refused to detail his conversations with Trump about the DNI position or any other. "I'm not going to discuss what I'm interested in or what the president elect is thinking and mulling over. That's not fair. That's not the right way to do it, and this all has to be done very privately," Giuliani said.

16. For jihadists, Trump election brings a change in strategy

Christian Science Monitor, Taylor Luck, 2016 11 23

Amman, Jordan - Jihadists abroad say they will use Donald Trump's election and appointments as powerful recruitment tool, pushing their claims that the West and Islam are heading toward a clash of civilizations. This represents a pivot in strategy. For two decades, jihadists have largely used United States actions - such as wars and foreign policy - to support claims of an anti-Islam agenda. Now, they are anticipating that they will be able to use the words of administration officials themselves. A single tweet, insiders say, can be as big a recruitment boon as the Iraq war. "For years we have focused on the Palestinian occupation, America's deceitful alliance with Iran and [Syrian President] Bashar [al-Assad] in the slaughter of Sunnis in Syria and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as proof that America, and Americans, are waging a war against Islam," says Abu Omar, the nom de guerre of an Al Qaeda operative in Syria aligned with the militant group Jabhat Fatah al-Sham. "Now all we have to do is turn to Trump's Twitter account or turn on CNN." With many in the Muslim world already predisposed to assume the US is hostile to Islam, the concern is that further inflammatory statements would make a difficult situation worse. "You will see many more quotes from senior administration officials, as previously [jihadists] had a hard time bolstering their propaganda line with actual statements," says Will McCants, senior fellow at Brookings Institution and director of its Project on US Relations with the Islamic World. "It plays into the hands of jihadist propagandists who make the argument that the West is at war with the entire religion of Islam, not just against terrorist groups - as the Obama administration made pains to say."

17. Obama Warns Trump on Pyongyang Threat

Wall Street Journal, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 23

Washington - The Obama administration considers North Korea to be the top national-security priority for the incoming administration, a view it has conveyed to President-elect Donald Trump's transition team, according to people familiar with the conversations. President Barack Obama, in a policy of "strategic patience," refused to engage his administration in high-level negotiations with North Korea, waiting for leader Kim Jong Un to show he was committed to abandoning his nuclear arsenal. Current and former administration officials worry that the pace of North Korea's nuclear- weapons development, particularly its steady march toward the ability to mount a weapon on a ballistic missile, demands a more aggressive strategy. "If we just sit back and continue to let [Kim] evolve, we're going to have someone with that capability, which is unacceptable," retired Adm. Michael Mullen, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for President Obama, said on Monday.

18. Soros Fights Hate Crimes With Pledge

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, 2016 11 23

Washington - After a series of attacks against immigrants and minorities since Election Day, the financier George Soros says he will commit $10 million from his personal foundation to combat a rise in hate crimes that he linked to the "incendiary rhetoric" of President-elect Donald J. Trump's campaign. Mr. Soros, a Holocaust survivor originally from Hungary, said in a telephone interview this week that he was "deeply troubled" by hundreds of reports of possible hate crimes since the election -- including many Nazi swastikas spray-painted on cars and buildings. "We must do something to push back against what's happening here," Mr. Soros said, blaming what he termed the "dark forces that have been awakened" by the election. Groups that oppose Mr. Trump's policies have reported record donations since the election, among them the American Civil Liberties Union, the Sierra Club and Planned Parenthood.

19. Swastikas rattle New Yorkers

Los Angeles Times, Barbara Demick, 2016 11 23

New York - There have been 14 instances of swastika vandalism in New York City since the election, eight of them in the last week alone, according to news reports and the New York Police Department. No arrests have been made, police say. By way of comparison, last year there were about five to six incidents a month. Civil rights groups attribute the Nazi symbol's proliferation to the triumphal mood of white nationalists who supported President-elect Donald Trump in the Nov. 8 election. In the incident last week in Brooklyn, vandals also scrawled "Go Trump" and other graffiti near the swastikas. The incidents in New York reflect a surge in reports of hate crimes and racist graffiti around the U.S. The FBI reported a 6% increase in hate crimes in 2015 from 2014, with most of the increase attributable to harassment of Muslims. Such incidents are especially shocking to New Yorkers, who tend to take pride in the diversity of a city whose harbor is watched over by the Statue of Liberty. New York is also home to about 1.1 million Jews, more than any other city outside Israel. The Southern Poverty Law Center last week reported 701 incidents of harassment since election day, including 60 acts of vandalism involving the swastika.

20. Trump, in Interview, Moderates Views but Defies Conventions

New York - President-elect Donald J. Trump on Tuesday tempered some of his most extreme campaign promises, dropping his vow to jail Hillary Clinton, expressing doubt about the value of torturing terrorism suspects and pledging to have an open mind about climate change. But in a wide-ranging hourlong interview with reporters and editors at The New York Times -- which was scheduled, canceled and then reinstated after a dispute over the ground rules -- Mr. Trump was unapologetic about flouting some of the traditional ethical and political conventions that have long shaped the American presidency. He defended Stephen K. Bannon, his chief strategist, against charges of racism, calling him a "decent guy." And he mocked Republicans who had failed to support him in his unorthodox presidential campaign. On the issue of torture, Mr. Trump suggested he had changed his mind about the value of waterboarding after talking with James N. Mattis, a retired Marine Corps general, who headed the United States Central Command. "He said, 'I've never found it to be useful,'" Mr. Trump said. He added that Mr. Mattis found more value in building trust and rewarding cooperation with terrorism suspects: "'Give me a pack of cigarettes and a couple of beers, and I'll do better.'" "I was very impressed by that answer," Mr. Trump said. Mr. Trump spoke only in general terms about foreign policy. He said the United States should not "be a nation builder," repeated his line from the campaign that fighting the war in Iraq was "one of the great mistakes in the history of our country," and said he has some "very definitive" and "strong ideas" about how to deal with the violent civil war raging in Syria. He declined to say what those ideas are despite several requests to do so.

21. Trump's national security adviser says he's ready to fight another world war

Washington Post, Carlos Lozada, 2016 11 22

Column - Late in the presidential race, Donald Trump warned that his opponent would start a new world war. "You're going to end up in World War III over Syria if we listen to Hillary Clinton," he told Reuters. As it turns out, there was no need to worry about Clinton's hawkishness. The next world war is already here. It's a religious war. And the United States is losing. Such is the vision of Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, the retired Army three-star general who is set to become White House national security adviser after President-elect Trump takes the oath of office. Thus far, Flynn is best known for his fire-breathing speech at the Republican National Convention in Cleveland this summer. But six days before leading GOP delegates in a frenzy of "USA!" and "Lock her up!" chants, Flynn published a book detailing this new fight -- in his telling, a multi-generational and civilizational conflict against radical Islam. "We're in a world war," he writes, "but very few Americans recognize it, and fewer still have any idea how to win it." "The Field of Fight," co-authored with foreign policy writer Michael Ledeen, offers an apocalyptic vision of Islam and terrorism, rails in Trumpian tones against political correctness, and assures readers of Flynn's "maverick" credentials (even though calling yourself a maverick is pretty much the least mavericky thing possible). It also offers a tantalizing glimpse of the worldview Flynn may already be sharing with his new boss. Flynn seems quite comfortable with the prospect of a religious war. "This kind of war is not at all new. It created our world," he writes, citing the Protestant Reformation. "The world badly needs an Islamic Reformation, and we should not be surprised if violence is involved. It's normal."

22. Trump's remarks stoke concerns about independence of his Justice Dept.

Washington Post, Matt Zapotosky, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 11 23

Washington - The Justice Department has long enjoyed a measure of independence in the executive branch, even though its boss is appointed by, and answers to, the president. The president sets a broad policy agenda, which the Justice Department plays a role in implementing, but when it comes to a particular criminal investigation, the White House generally steers clear. On Tuesday, President-elect Donald Trump and a senior adviser made comments that call into question that order of things. The adviser, Kellyanne Conway, suggested that Trump had indicated that he "doesn't wish to pursue" charges against Hillary Clinton. Although Trump later said he would not take investigations off the table, he asserted that his preference would be to move on. Trump had vowed during the campaign to appoint a special prosecutor to look at Clinton's use of a private email server while she was secretary of state, and he remarked that, were he president, Clinton would "be in jail." He seemed to back down, at least somewhat, from that controversial promise on Tuesday, and legal analysts said he did so in a way that demonstrates a misunderstanding of what role he should play in Justice Department investigations. "Trump's implicit assumption that he can direct the Department of Justice to prosecute Clinton - or not - demonstrates a dangerous assumption the president can dictate the department's prosecutorial decisions," said Jennifer Daskal, an associate professor of law at American University and former senior Justice Department official. "But the Department of Justice depends on its independence as the source of its authority and power."

23. U.S. Identifies ISIS Planner in Attacks on Europe

Pro Publica, Sebastian Rotella, 2016 11 23

Washington - U.S. and European counterterror officials are zeroing in on Islamic State masterminds of a terror campaign against Europe that continues despite military setbacks for ISIS in the Middle East. On Tuesday, the U.S. State Department announced that it had put a suspected plotter of last November's attacks in Paris on a list of specially designated global terrorists. The announcement came the day after French authorities said they had arrested seven suspects and foiled a plot directed by senior ISIS figures in Syria to carry out major coordinated attacks in Paris and Marseilles during the Christmas holidays. Separately, French and Belgian counter-terror officials said this week they have identified a second ISIS figure involved in directing operations against both countries. The State Department sanction targeted a Moroccan-born suspect named Abdelilah Himich, who grew up in France and fought in the French Foreign Legion in Afghanistan before traveling to Syria and joining the Islamic State, according to court files and counterterror officials. Last month, ProPublica and the PBS program Frontline reported that U.S. intelligence officials believe Himich, 27, was part of an ISIS unit in Syria that directed the terror attacks against Paris and Brussels. Composed largely of youthful European fighters, the external operations unit oversaw a campaign in which up to 200 operatives were deployed to Europe using forged documents, encrypted communications techniques and support networks supplying arms, transport and safe houses, Western intelligence officials say.

24. Farage camp attacks ambassador as Trump backs Ukip leader

London Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 23

London - Britain's ambassador to the United States came under attack from Nigel Farage's allies yesterday after the Ukip leader was touted by Donald Trump as a future UK envoy to Washington. Arron Banks, the Ukip donor who is close to Mr Farage, accused Sir Kim Darroch of "greasing up to Hillary" [Clinton]. The comments forced Theresa May to defend Sir Kim amid fears from some ministers of a co-ordinated campaign to remove him. Mr Farage has previously described the diplomat as a "fanatical Europhile". Some government figures blamed the prime minister for not doing more to develop her relationship with the incoming US president. "There is growing frustration about what is in effect a vacuum. Farage is being allowed to occupy space which shouldn't be there. Where are the Downing Street phone calls, what is happening with the visits?" demanded one Whitehall source. In a sign of the government's efforts to forge links with the US president-elect, Downing Street said on Monday that an invitation for a state visit to Britain was under consideration. No 10 did its best to throw a protective arm around Sir Kim yesterday, revealing that he had briefed the prime minister face-to-face yesterday while on a visit to London. "He's an excellent ambassador doing a fantastic job in the States -- he has only taken up his post in January and there are no plans for him to leave his post," a No 10 spokesman said.

25. Foreign Office 'failing to help' charity worker jailed in Iran

London Times, Bel Trew, 2016 11 23

Cairo - The husband of a woman jailed in Iran said that Britain is not doing enough to get her out after Boris Johnson described her case as an "utmost priority" but failed to call for her release. Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, 37, an Iranian-British charity worker, was sentenced in September to five years in prison on charges of using a "spy network" to overthrow the Iranian regime. "Actions speak louder than words. The authorities have not bothered to visit Nazanin in prison or Gabriella [her two-year-old daughter], despite the fact other countries have managed it," Richard Ratcliffe, her husband, told The Times. "I haven't heard any public criticism of the Iranians for what they have put my wife through or any outright calls for her release." She was arrested by Iran's Revolutionary Guard in April while attempting to return home to London after a holiday with her parents. She was separated from her daughter, who remains trapped in Iran after her British passport was confiscated. Mrs Zaghari-Ratcliffe has been on a hunger strike and has threatened to commit suicide.

26. U.K. Parliament Approves Unprecedented New Hacking and Surveillance Powers

Washington - A few years ago, it would have been unthinkable for the British government to admit that it was hacking into people's computers and collecting private data on a massive scale. But now, these controversial tactics are about to be explicitly sanctioned in an unprecedented new surveillance law. Last week, the U.K.'s Parliament approved the Investigatory Powers Bill, dubbed the "Snoopers' Charter" by critics. The law, which is expected to come into force before the end of the year, was introduced in November 2015 after the fallout from revelations by National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden about extensive British mass surveillance. The Investigatory Powers Bill essentially retroactively legalizes the electronic spying programs exposed in the Snowden documents -- and also expands some of the government's surveillance powers. Perhaps the most controversial aspect of the new law is that it will give the British government the authority to serve internet service providers with a "data retention notice," forcing them to record and store for up to 12 months logs showing websites visited by all of their customers. Law enforcement agencies will then be able to obtain access to this data without any court order or warrant. In addition, the new powers will hand police and tax investigators the ability to, with the approval of a government minister, hack into targeted phones and computers. The law will also permit intelligence agencies to sift through "bulk personal datasets" that contain millions of records about people's phone calls, travel habits, internet activity, and financial transactions; and it will make it legal for British spies to carry out "foreign-focused" large-scale hacks of computers or phones in order to identify potential "targets of interest." "Every citizen will have their internet activity -- the apps they use, the communications they send, and to who -- logged for 12 months," says Eric King, a privacy expert and former director of Don't Spy On Us, a coalition of leading British human rights groups that campaigns against mass surveillance. "There is no other democracy in the world, possibly no other country in the world, doing this."

27. Aussie terror attack denial

Herald Sun, James Dowling, 2016 11 23

Melbourne - An Islamic community leader has claimed there has never been a terrorist attack in Australia and those that say otherwise are "fearmongering". Former Islamic Council of Victoria secretary Kuranda Seyit said even if a "Muslim sneezes in the wrong direction it can be made to look like an act of terror". Only weeks ago, Mr Seyit resigned from the ICV -- a key ally in both federal and state governments' battle against radicalisation. The ICV runs prison deradicalisation programs and has assisted both federal and state police forces in dealing with those being influenced by violent extremists. Mr Seyit, now executive director of Islamic think-tank the Forum on Australia's Islamic Relations, said the terrorism definition was vague and been hijacked by those with vested interests. He said it was convenient for governments and the media to describe violence involving a Muslim "terrorism because it fuels a multi- billion-dollar 'Islamophobia' industry". He admitted IS and al-Qaeda terrorist groups had "some influence" in Australia but said there were no organised cells.

28. Aust hits Islamic State in cyberspace

Australian Associated Press, Max Blenkin and Roje Adaimy, 2016 11 23

Canberra - Australia is conducting online warfare against Islamic State but Australian businesses, government organisations and individuals remain vulnerable to cyber attacks. In a revelation about Australia's growing cyber capability, Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull disclosed the Australian Signals Directorate had taken the fight against Islamic State into cyber space. It was making "a real difference", he told parliament on Wednesday. But neither Mr Turnbull nor his cyber security minister Dan Tehan would reveal any details of how that was being done. Delivering a statement on national security, Mr Turnbull said cyber security operations were subject to the same rules of engagement that apply to other military capabilities. That includes the six RAAF F/A-18 Hornets which have been bombing IS targets in Iraq and Syria whose rules are intended to minimise risk of harm to civilians. Similarly Mr Tehan declined to discuss offensive cyber capabilities - though he said publicly available literature speculated on what could be done. IS has long been adept at using the internet for its own purposes, using slick video productions to trumpet its successes and persuasive social media pitches to potential western converts. Cyber attack could take the form of denying IS use of its computer networks, or penetrating their systems to steal information or compromise command and control. One academic paper terms this type of attack as above espionage but below violence.

29. Aust report prompts Thailand IS probe

Australian Associated Press, Ron Corben, 2016 11 23

Bangkok - Thai police have launched probes into Islamic State involvement in southern Thailand following investigations and Australian reports linking "some Thais" to IS. Thai police have repeatedly denied Islamic State activities in the region, where a Muslim insurgency since 2004 has claimed more than 6000 lives. But Thai deputy national police chief Srivara Ransibrahmanakul told Thai media information provided by Australian authorities was part of a probe linking some Thais to Islamic State. The Australian investigation also linked 100,000 Facebook users from Thailand visiting IS-related online communities in the past year, and revealed Thais were providing financial support to Islamic State. Intelligence sources say the Australians avoid detection by Australian customs and immigration by initially travelling to Thailand on a six-month education or sports visa. But upon arrival they make contact with IS links, are given a counterfeit passport and travel to Syria and Iraq from neighbouring countries. After receiving training or fighting in the Middle East, they return to Thailand exchange passports and travel back to Australia without revealing they had travelled to the Middle East.

30. Close ports to Sea Shepherd or risk sharing guilt for its vigilantism

The Australian, Julia Jabour and Anthony Bergin, 2016 11 23

Oped: Sea Shepherd is again heading into dangerous territory. Last week's announcement that its new $12 million custom-built Ocean Warrior has arrived here for a Southern Ocean incursion this summer is disturbing. Ship captain Adam Meyerson is boasting the group's new vessel is a game changer because of its increased speed, long-range fuel tanks, helicopter landing pad and 20,000 litres-per-minute water cannon. Sea Shepherd is once more aiming to engage in close combat with the Japanese research fleet. That puts this group in the category of an environmental non-state combatant. It's in an international area engaged in the use of force, with actions close to vigilantism. It enjoys the reputation of piracy, but for quasi public rather than private ends. The International Court of Justice judgment in the whaling case two years ago was a hollow victory for environmental activists. The court didn't rule that what the Japanese were doing was commercial whaling. Nor did it say that issuing permits to take whales by lethal means for scientific research was illegal. This left open the option of a new Japanese scientific whaling program. Note: Julia Jabour is senior lecturer, Institute for Marine and Antarctic Studies, University of Tasmania. Anthony Bergin is senior research fellow at the Australian National University's National Security College and senior analyst, Australian Strategic Policy Institute.

31. No reason for 'severe' lifetime visitor visa ban

Sydney Morning Herald, Tom McIlroy, 2016 11 23

Sydney - The Turnbull government's proposed lifetime ban on resettled asylum seekers receiving visas to visit Australia is "severe and exceptional" and could disproportionately target people on the basis of race, a parliamentary committee has found. Scrutiny of the lifetime visa ban by the Liberal-majority Human Rights Committee found there was no reason refugees and asylum seekers held in immigration detention on Nauru and Manus Island should be banned from visiting Australia for business or tourism in the future. Chaired by Liberal MP Ian Goodenough, the committee found the ban could be unnecessary because there is no suggestion that any detainee being held presents a danger to Australia or that any future visit could have any adverse effect on national security. "As such, the ban would appear to apply a penalty on those who seek asylum and are part of the regional processing cohort," the report said. "The right to seek asylum, irrespective of the mode of transit, is protected under international law. The ban may also have a disproportionate negative effect on individuals from particular national origins; nationalities; or on the basis of race, which gives rise to concerns regarding indirect discrimination on these grounds." Released on Tuesday, the report noted the laws were designed to prevent others embarking on dangerous boat journeys to Australia, but the plan would apply "an unlawful penalty" for seeking asylum in contravention of the United Nations Refugee Convention. The committee has asked for Immigration Minister Peter Dutton to provide more information about the bill's human rights compatibility. It would make any adult sent to Manus or Nauru after July 19, 2013, ineligible to make a valid visa application in Australia.

32. Opera House hit with rising costs of guarding against terrorism threats

Sydney Morning Herald, Andrew Taylor and Peter Munro, 2016 11 23

Sydney - The threat of terrorism has increased staffing costs at the Sydney Opera House, which also reported a rise in casual workers at the expense of permanent staff. Increased security staffing to deal with a "probable" national terrorism threat level was one factor behind a $2.8 million increase in staffing costs, according to the Opera House's annual report. The landmark venue has been the subject of repeated threats, including a call from Islamic State in September for "lone wolf" followers to stab, shoot, poison and run over Australians at the Sydney Opera House and other locations including Bondi Beach and the MCG. Opera House spokeswoman Jessica Gooch said the venue worked with NSW Police and other authorities to "ensure appropriate measures are in place". The Opera House holds a range of outdoors events, including the opera The Eighth Wonder and the coming four sold-out concerts by Crowded House. However, residents of the neighbouring Bennelong Apartments are reportedly unhappy with the noise and disruption caused by the outdoor events. Gooch said the complainants were a minority of the Opera House's neighbours. "The group of residents who have complained comprises about five of the hundreds of neighbouring apartments," she said. "Other local residents understand that the Opera House is a public space to be enjoyed by all, and that the Opera House opened long before their apartments were built."

33. Terrorism tag 'hijacked anti-Islamic push'

The Australian, Pia Akerman, 2016 11 23

Sydney - Australia has never suffered a terrorist attack at the hands of Islamic extremists, says a senior Islamic community spokesman, who has dismissed slain attackers Man Haron Monis, Numan Haider and Farhad Jabar as perpetrators whose violence stemmed from "mental - instability" rather than radical ideology. Kuranda Seyit -- the former secretary of the Islamic Council of Victoria, who now heads the Forum on Australia's Islamic Relations think tank -- yesterday called for stricter use of the term "terrorism", saying it had been hijacked to feed anti-Islamic sentiment. He said it was incorrect to class the Lindt cafe siege, Haider's attack on counter-terrorism officers and Jabar's murder of police accountant Curtis Cheng as terrorism, despite evidence of their support for jihadist groups such as Islamic State. "I really don't believe we have any organisations or groups in Australia that have links with terrorist organisations," said Mr Seyit, who is also a schoolteacher in Melbourne. "In that case, it's very hard to say we've had any terrorist attacks in Australia based on a number of random incidents that have occurred in the last two years or so. "It has to have that direct political link with an organisation, or a clear aim to create terror and fear in a society to further a political aim. "That's the thing that's virtually missing in all these situations." Mr Seyit's statement was questioned by counter-terrorism expert Greg Barton, who gave evidence to the Lindt cafe inquest, saying that the 2014 siege that claimed the lives of two people was a terrorist act.

Islamabad - The Counter-Terrorism Department (CTD) Khyber Pakhtunkhwa claimed to have arrested a suspected militant with a Rs0.5 million bounty on his head in Peshawar's Hayatabad area on Wednesday. The "most wanted" suspect was allegedly involved in a 2009 deadly car bombing in Peshawar's Khyber Bazaar in which 60 people were killed, according to a CTD official. A CTD team carried out a raid on an intelligence tip-off and arrested the suspect, who has been identified as Feroz Khan, he said. The 'militant' was also allegedly involved in the murder of Superintendent of Police (Rural) Khurshid Khan. The apprehended suspect belongs to a proscribed organisation and was wanted in more than 30 cases of terrorism, ransom and murder, the official said. (Full Report).

Pajhwok Afghan News, Khwaja Basir Fitri, 2016 11 23

At least 30 people were killed and more than 60 others wounded in a suicide attack on a Shiite mosque, Baqir Al-Uloom, in Chahar Qala area of capital Kabul on Monday. The attack was claimed by Islamic State (IS) or Daesh militants. A senator from southern Ghazni province, speaking at today's session of the upper house, condemned the attack and said security officials in Kabul should be held accountable for their negligence in preventing the incident. He said the enemies of Afghanistan had carried out the attack in order to create religious divisions among different communities of the Afghans. Enemies should know they would never achieve such goals, he added.

" C'est ainsi que Sarah Leah Whitson, de l'ONG Human -Rights Watch (HRW), décrit le cauchemar judiciaire vécu par deux Français dans le royaume, dans un communiqué publié lundi 21 novembre. Le premier, Thomas Gallay, 36 ans, a été arrêté le 18 février. Habitant à Essaouira et ingénieur pour une entreprise française, l'homme a été condamné en juillet à 6 ans de prison pour " soutien financier à des personnes en vue de la commission d'actes de terrorisme ", " tenue de réunions publiques sans déclaration préalable " et " organisation d'activités au sein d'une association non déclarée ". Huit autres coaccusés marocains ont été condamnés à des peines allant de 4 à 18 ans de prison. Le procès en appel doit se tenir mercredi 23 novembre à Rabat. La famille de Thomas Gallay clame son innocence et dénonce les conditions de sa condamnation. Pendant sa garde à vue, selon ses proches et sa défense, les policiers ne lui ont pas expliqué de quoi il était accusé et l'ont interrogé en l'absence de traducteur et d'avocat, avant de lui faire signer un procès-verbal en arabe, langue qu'il ne sait pas lire.

Hours before the push, the forces published video online showing one of their fighters shouting out messages through a loud hailer urging women and children to leave the area and promising them safe passage. Backed by U.S. air strikes, brigades dominated by fighters from the city of Misrata have been edging forward against militants trapped in an area a few hundred meters wide next to Sirte's Mediterranean coast. 41. RCA: nouvelles violences à Bria entre deux factions de l'ex- Seleka

Bria - La ville diamantifère de Bria, à l'est de la République centrafricaine a été lundi 21 novembre le théâtre d'affrontements entre deux factions de l'ex-Seleka : d'un côté l'UPC composée majoritairement de Peuls, de l'autre, le FPRC composé de Goulas. Le bilan serait d'au moins 11 morts, selon les groupes armés. Les violences risquent de s'étendre à d'autres villes, notamment Bambari, où les deux factions sont implantées. Des corps jonchaient toujours mardi 22 novembre les rues de Bria, témoignant des violents combats de la veille et de la peur qui empêchait les habitants de sortir les ramasser. Selon une source humanitaire, au moins 5 000 personnes ont trouvé refuge aux abords de la base de la Minusca. Cette base a pourtant été prise pour cible la veille par le FPRC qui accuse les Casques bleus d'avoir mortellement touché l'un de leurs principaux chefs, le général Yaya Scout. Ce jour-là, plusieurs heures durant, Bria a résonné aux bruits des armes de guerre, conséquence de plusieurs jours, voire de plusieurs semaines, de tensions entre Peuls membres de l'UPC et Goulas du FPRC. Un accord qui vole en éclat La semaine dernière, les notables musulmans de Bria avaient conduit une médiation et étaient parvenus à leur faire signer un accord, au terme duquel les deux mouvements s'engageaient à retirer les renforts qu'ils avaient fait venir. Mais lundi, l'accord a volé en éclat : UPC et FPRC se rejetant la responsabilité des violences. Ce mardi, le FPRC disait tenir la ville alors que l'UPC affirmait que certains quartiers étaient sous son contrôle, chacun assurant recevoir des renforts d'autres villes, qui pourraient à leur tour être contaminées par cette violente rivalité.

Elles ont dit qu'elles étaient Libyennes mais elles étaient confuses et n'avaient pas l'accent libyen. Chaque femme était accompagnée d'un enfant, la première avait une gamine de 40 jours, et l'autre une fille de trois ans. Nous avons senti sur leur corps les ceintures explosives et nous les avons désactivées. Nous pensons qu'elles ne les ont pas actionnées à cause des enfants. Nous avons aussi confisqué les téléphones portables. Jusqu'à cet instant, les informations en notre possession disaient qu'elles étaient des simples femmes terroristes. Nous ne savions pas qu'il s'agissait de la femme de Belmokhtar. Nous l'avons appris à l'interrogatoire. » « Une des deux femmes a avoué que Belmokhtar est dans un camp d'entraînement à Aljofra (au sud de la Libye dans le désert, ndlr) avec le terroriste Ziad Balaam, un des dirigeants du groupe terroriste les Brigades de défense de Benghazi (groupe qui combat l'armée de Haftar à Ajdabya et à Benghazi, ndlr) et que Belmokhtar était toujours en vie il y a quatre mois.

43. Why so many of Tunisia's Youth Are Drawn to Extremist Groups

Asharq Al-Awsat, Kamal Ben Younes, 2016 11 23

Tunisia - Many study centers in Tunisia, including national institutions estimate that Tunisians top the list of religious extremists who joined armed organizations in the tension areas in Libya, Syria and Iraq; and in spite the difficulty of providing accurate statistics, officials in Tunisia estimate that around 13,000 Tunisians have joined fundamentalist and salafi jihadi groups. How this phenomenon can be read? What deep reasons and conditional motives stand behind it? How will it evolve amid the developments in Iraq, Libya, and Syria and the improvement of security coordination between Tunisia and Turkey; which was the main "route" to join armed factions in the Levant and Iraq? Many researchers and experts of social science in Tunisia including Sociology Professor and Former Culture Minister Mehdi Mabrouk has linked this phenomenon to the deep changes that took place in the Tunisian community and in other countries of the region.

New York Times, Staff report, 2016 11 23

Bogota - A new peace accord between Colombia's government and Marxist FARC rebels will be signed on Thursday and sent to Congress for approval, President Juan Manuel Santos said on Tuesday, bringing a formal end to the 52-year civil war ever closer. The revised document will be signed in Bogota between FARC leader Rodrigo Londono and Santos, who won the Nobel Peace Prize last month for his efforts to end the conflict with the insurgent group. "We have the unique opportunity to close this painful chapter in our history that has bereaved and afflicted millions of Colombians for half a century," the president said in a televised address. "This new accord possibly won't satisfy everybody, but that's what happens in peace accords. There are always critical voices; it is understandable and respectable," said Santos, 65, warning another plebiscite could divide the nation and put in danger the bilateral cease-fire. The expanded and highly technical 310-page document appears to make only small modifications to the original text, such as clarifying private property rights and detailing more fully how the rebels would be confined in rural areas for crimes committed during the war.

Caracas - Joshua Holt, the Utah man imprisoned in Venezuela on weapon charges for almost five months now, is included on a list of 21 political prisoners the government has agreed to release in the following weeks, according to a source familiar with the ongoing negotiation with the opposition. "He's on the list. The government is also expected to release two congressmen, journalists, Twitter users, students and protesters," the source, who asked to remain anonymous, told Fox News Latino. He said the release should happen on or before Dec. 6, the date set for Holt's court hearing - the fourth one, after the first three were suspended - and also the date set for a third round of negotiations between the two sides of the deeply divided Venezuela. Jeannette Prieto, lawyer of the Utah man, said she visited the 24-year-old, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, on Monday and found him in good condition. "He's fine. A doctor had seen him [the previous] Thursday and they will run some medical tests, but he's OK," she told FNL.

Beijing - China criticized Japan and South Korea for signing a military intelligence-sharing pact on Wednesday, saying that it will only lead to more tensions with North Korea. While accusing Japan and South Korea of having "a Cold War mentality," Foreign Ministry spokesman Geng Shuang said the signing of the agreement will "aggravate antagonism and confrontation on the Korean Peninsula." In response to a question from China's state-run broadcaster CCTV at a press briefing, he said the deal will bring about "new insecure and unstable factors in Northeast Asia, and is not in line with the trend of the times featuring peace and development." "The current situation on the Korean Peninsula is still sensitive and complex," he said. "While carrying out military cooperation, relevant countries should respect security concerns of regional countries." With the accord, Japan and South Korea are hoping to share more delicate information on regional security, especially regarding North Korea's rapid pursuit of nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles.

48. Indo-Pak tensions escalate as terrorists behead soldier

Times of India, Staff Report, 2016 11 23

New Delhi - The already volatile situation along the line of control (LoC) escalated on Tuesday after the Indian Army promised "heavy retribution" for the beheading of an Indian soldier by terrorists in the Macchil sector of Jammu and Kashmir. Two other soldiers were also killed in the action. The terrorists were actively backed by the Pakistan army. "Retribution will be heavy for this cowardly act of mutilating a soldier's body," said the Army, which had destroyed four Pakistan army posts with massive fire assaults after an Indian soldier was beheaded in a similar border action team (BAT) operation in the same sector on October 28. A BAT typically consists of terrorists working in close conjunction with Pakistan army regulars for tactical operations against Indian troops and posts along the 778km LoC. On Tuesday, the three soldiers from 57 Rashtriya Rifles were in the lead of a counter-infiltration patrol when it was ambushed by terrorists ahead of the LoC fencing.

Tokyo - China is escalating a campaign of military maritime coercion against Japan's Senkaku Islands, according to Japanese intelligence data disclosed as part of a joint Pentagon-Japan research program. Additionally, China is doubling the size of its coast guard forces over the next five years to prevent the disruption of oil supplies that travel from the Middle East through the Indian Ocean and South China Sea, according to Pentagon-sponsored reports about the joint U.S.-Japan collaboration. Two reports produced by a contractor for the Pentagon's Office of Net Assessment, a secretive research group, provide a rare glimpse of Japanese intelligence assessments of Chinese military activities in the East China Sea and South China Sea. In addition to adding large numbers of new coast guard and navy ships to its fleets in Southeast Asia, China is building military facilities on newly created islands in the South China Sea. It will eventually militarize the East China Sea using floating oil rig platforms, according to analyses provided by Japan's Cabinet Intelligence and Research Office, known as CIRO. According to CIRO, China has greatly increased unilateral oil and gas development near the line separating Chinese and Japanese waters near the Senkakus.

50. N. Korea's next nuclear test may coincide with Trump's inauguration: expert

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 23

Seoul - North Korea may conduct its sixth nuclear test early next year timed for Donald Trump's inauguration as the U.S. president, security experts said Wednesday. "North Korea may seek negotiations with the U.S. when it completes nuclear tests and reaches the stage of deploying a long-range nuclear-tipped missile," Lee Su-seok, director of the Center for Unification Strategy at the state-run Institute for National Security Strategy, said in a military forum held in Seoul. "In early 2017, it is highly likely that Pyongyang will detonate another nuclear device and launch a long-range ballistic missile to reiterate its status as a nuclear power." Citing a recent report carried by the Choson Shinbo, a Korean-language newspaper published in Japan, he said the North expressed hopes for dialogue and negotiations with the next U.S. government by favorably comparing President-elect Donald Trump to President Barack Obama. He speculated that the incoming Trump administration won't likely handle North Korean matters in a hasty and hurried manner, as it takes time for the real estate tycoon to review pending issues and appoint the right advisors.

51. Pact With Japan Riles South Korean Opposition

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 11 23

Seoul - President Park Geun-hye on Tuesday approved a military intelligence-sharing pact with Japan aimed at countering the North Korean threat, a move that angered South Korean opposition parties, which want to impeach Ms. Park over a corruption scandal. The United States, an ally of both South Korea and Japan, has pressed them to increase military cooperation so the three countries can more effectively monitor and confront threats from the North, whose development of nuclear arms and missiles has been accelerating. Currently, Japan and South Korea use Washington as an intermediary when sharing intelligence on North Korea. But South Koreans are wary of cooperating too closely with Japan, which ruled Korea as a colony for 35 years until the end of World War II. Many of the protesters who have been demanding that Ms. Park resign over the corruption scandal have also insisted that she cancel the negotiations with Japan. Ms. Park has been accused of conspiring with a friend, Choi Soon-sil, to extort millions from big businesses. Her polling numbers have reached record lows, and huge crowds have gathered in Seoul, the capital, and other major cities to demand that Ms. Park step down or face impeachment.

52. S. Korea, Japan sign intelligence deal despite China criticism

Agence France-Presse, Staff reporter, 2016 11 23

Japan and South Korea on Wednesday signed an agreement to share defence intelligence about North Korea, despite protests from opposition parties and activists in Seoul and strong criticism from China. South Korea's defence ministry said the accord was necessary in the face of growing military threats from Pyongyang, which has conducted two nuclear tests and more than 20 missile launches this year. "It is ready to conduct additional nuclear tests and missile launches at any time," the ministry said in a statement. "Since we can now utilise Japan's intelligence capability to effectively deal with North Korea's escalating nuclear and missile threats, it will enhance our security interests." Japan's foreign ministry said in a statement the military agreement would allow the two governments to "share information even more smoothly and swiftly". But China, already angry at South Korea's planned deployment of a US missile defence system, sharply criticised Seoul and Tokyo for what it termed a "cold war mentality". The agreement "will aggravate the situation in the Korean peninsula and bring new unsecure and unstable factors to Northeast Asia", said foreign ministry spokesman Geng Shuang at a regular briefing in Beijing.

53. UN orders Sri Lanka to compensate Canadian for prison, torture

The Hindustan Times, 2016 11 23

Colombo - The United Nations Human Rights Committee has ordered the Sri Lankan government to make reparations for the alleged detention and torture of a Canadian man over the course of three years. The committee says Sri Lanka must prosecute and punish those responsible for imprisoning Roy Samathanam while he was in the country for a visit in 2007 until his release in 2010. They say Samathanam was tortured and forced to sign a confession to being part of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Ealam, a rebel group. Samathanam now lives in Toronto with his wife and child and says he finally has a measure of justice. The Canadian Centre for International Justice helped Samathanam file a complaint with the committee three years ago. The centre commends the committee's decision and is calling on the Sri Lankan government to implement the measures outlined by the UN committee, Canadian Press reports. (Full Report).

54. Zakir Naik's NGO IRF gave scholarship of Rs 80,000 to IS operative Abu Anas: NIA

Times of India, Neeraj Chauhan, 2016 11 23

New Delhi - In first direct evidence of linking controversial Islamic preacher Zakir Naik and his NGO Islamic Research Foundation (IRF) with terror activities and its support to ISIS, the National Investigation Agency probe has found that ISIS operative, Abu Anas, arrested from Rajasthan in January this year, was given Rs 80,000 as scholarship by IRF around the time when he was planning to go to Syria to fight alongside the terror outfit. Sources say that Abu Anas was in regular touch with IRF officer bearers and he was given this amount in the garb of scholarship in October 2015. "This is the time when Anas was planning to travel to Syria," said a source. The money was transferred by IRF into Anas's ICICI bank account in Tonk branch, said sources. A former Information Security Analyst of TWG International at Abids at Hyderabad, Anas was arrested by NIA as part of a multi-city ISIS module in January-February this year.

55. Chechen Warlord's Cuddly Makeover, With a Nod to Trump

New York Times, Neil MacFarquhar, 2016 11 23

Moscow - Caucasian warlord, mixed martial arts enthusiast, scourge of any opposition -- Ramzan A. Kadyrov, the autocratic leader of a turbulent mountain republic, wants to convince the rest of Russia that its image of him is all wrong. Borrowing from Donald J. Trump's playbook, Mr. Kadyrov, the leader of Chechnya, is starring this fall in a reality TV competition called "The Team." In a format that echoes "The Apprentice," the show that enhanced Mr. Trump's fame, Mr. Kadyrov is winnowing a group of 16 telegenic young Russians down to one who will become his assistant. The stocky, ginger-bearded Chechen leader -- perhaps the highest-profile Russian political figure besides President Vladimir V. Putin -- starts one episode by explaining why his image needs a makeover. "People believe my image that was created by the liberals, that I am frightening, that I will kill whoever says anything about me, that I will put them in a dungeon and stab them," Mr. Kadyrov says, steering his sport utility vehicle through a breathtaking landscape of jagged peaks. "That was invented by enemies of the people, enemies of our state, who know that as long as I am in the Caucasus, the Western, European special services will not manage to change the situation here," he says, riffing on the official conviction that the West seeks to engineer regime change in Russia. "That is why they want to make the Russian people have a bad attitude toward me. They want to make an enemy of the people out of me. On the contrary, people run to me. They hug me." Mr. Kadyrov, 40, is clearly getting a hug from the Kremlin, with state-run television running what amounts to a weekly infomercial.

56. Lithuania's New Premier Vows to Bolster Military Spending

New York Times, Richard Martyn-Hemphill, 2016 11 23

Vilnius - Lawmakers in Lithuania chose as their new prime minister on Tuesday a former police chief and interior minister who supports Donald J. Trump's call for NATO members to spend more on defense. The choice of Saulius Skvernelis, 46, to lead the government came a month after an election won by the Peasants and Greens Union in a populist whirlwind. The party is hard to classify; it is an unorthodox grouping of farmers and environmentalists that leans left on economic issues but to the right on social issues. Other populist politicians in Europe, like Marine Le Pen in France, Geert Wilders in the Netherlands and Frauke Petry in Germany, oppose the European Union, but the Peasants and Greens Union favors membership in the bloc, which Lithuania joined in 2004. The party strongly supports maintaining the sanctions imposed by the European Union after Russia's 2014 military incursion in Ukraine. In some ways, Lithuania is in a comparable situation to neighboring Poland, where a right-wing government took power last year. Poland's new leaders are leery of the West, but also of Mr. Trump's overtures toward the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin. Lithuania's foreign minister, Linas Linkevicius, said last week that he was "very afraid" for the Baltic States -- Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia -- which sit along NATO's increasingly tense frontier with Russia. He expressed concern that Russia might try to test the United States before Mr. Trump takes office as president on Jan. 20.

57. Nato and Kremlin in war of words over Russian missile deployment

The Guardian (London), Shaun Walker, 2016 11 23

Moscow - Nato and the Kremlin have traded accusations over the Russian deployment of state-of-the-art missiles in its Baltic Sea exclave of Kaliningrad. Nato on Tuesday accused Russia of "aggressive military posturing", while Vladimir Putin shot back that Russia was merely responding to Nato aggression. The rhetoric comes as Europe waits with trepidation to see how a Donald Trump presidency will affect the continent's security arrangements. Trump said in an interview during his election campaign he would be willing to tell Nato allies, "Congratulations, you will be defending yourself" if he felt they were not contributing enough financially to the alliance. The UK prime minister, Theresa May, is due to meet Nato's secretary general Jens Stoltenberg at Downing Street on Wednesday and is expected to say he must persuade European countries to meet the Nato commitment to spend 2% of national income on defence. The European parliament on Tuesday voted 369 to 255 in favour of a plan to deepen defence coordination between member states, in part prompted by Trump's words.

58. At Least 1,000 Iranian Soldiers Died on Syrian Battlefields

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 11 23

London - At least 1,000 Iranian soldiers deployed to Syria have been reportedly killed, an Iranian official said, underlining Tehran's increasing presence on front lines of the Syrian conflict. Iran has been sending countless troops to back authoritarian Bashar al-Assad in the Syrian civil war. The recently pronounced death toll has taken a major hike compared to figures accounted for just four months ago- Iran had only recognized 400 of its soldiers dying on battlefields. Iran has been sending fighters to Syria since the early stages of the more than five-year-old war to support its ally, Assad, against Syrian rebels trying to topple him. The Tehran regime had viewed its activity in Syria as a step taken further towards its expansionist plans for the region. Although many of the soldiers Iran sends are its own nationals, it is casting its recruitment net wide, training and deploying from neighboring Afghanistan and Pakistan as well. Half of the death toll reported in August were Afghan citizens.

59. Coalition destroys Mosul bridge to isolate ISIL

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 11 23

Mosul - The US-led coalition bombed a key bridge in Mosul Tuesday to isolate extremists in the east of the city where stiff resistance is threatening to bog down Iraqi forces. Since the start of the offensive last month against ISIL's last stronghold in Iraq 68,000 civilians have been displaced but most of the city's population remained trapped. A coalition aircraft carried out an air raid on Mosul's "third bridge", leaving a British-era bridge in the centre as the last crossing of the Tigris River which runs through the city. Coalition spokesman Colonel John Dorrian said ISIL fighters have been using the bridges to resupply the eastern side of the city, "essentially rotating their forces". "We're not going to let that happen," he said. A member of the provincial council for Nineveh, of which Mosul is the capital, said the central bridge was the last remaining after four others over the Tigris had been destroyed.

60. Iran: Trump Unlikely to Trouble N. Deal

Fars News Agency, 2016 11 23

Tehran - Head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran (AEOI) Ali Akbar Salehi underlined that Tehran expects US President-elect Donald Trump to act upon the undertakings Washington has accepted under the last year nuclear deal. "The Islamic Republic of Iran acts upon its undertakings under the nuclear deal and we expect the other side to act upon its undertakings as well," Salehi said on Tuesday. Asked about the recent developments in the US after the election of Trump as president, he said, "I imagine when the US president practically takes the country's leadership, he will take actions on the basis of the realities as the nuclear deal is not an issue between the two countries to allow the other side to defy its undertakings, and we believe that there will be no problem." "It is an international issue and we think that we will not face so many problems," Salehi said.

61. Iran Intelligence Ministry dismantles terrorist team in eastern country

Press TV, 2016 11 23

Tehran - Iran's Intelligence Ministry has busted a terrorists team in the eastern parts of the country, an Iranian security official says. "A terrorist team was dismantled last night by the Intelligence Ministry in the country's east," deputy interior minister for security affairs, Hossein Zolfaqari, told reporters on Tuesday. He added that one of the members of the four-strong terrorist group was killed and the other three were taken into custody. Iranian forces have been engaged in clashes with terror groups, thwarting their terrorist activities on the border and within the country, arresting several of them, and confiscating large amounts of explosives and bomb-making materials. Iran's deputy intelligence minister for strategic studies on national security said on November 15 that the country's security forces confiscated nearly two tonnes of explosives from Daesh terrorists in the city of Garmsar, southeast of the capital Tehran.

Jerusalem Post, Anna Ahronheim, 2016 11 23

Jerusalem - The British Royal Navy assault ship HMS Bulwark arrived in Haifa Port on Tuesday for a short visit before she sails back to the United Kingdom. The Bulwark, whose captain is Capt. James Parkin, is deployed as part of the Royal Navy's Joint Expeditionary Force (Maritime) Task Group commanded by Commodore Andy Burns. Based in Devonport, the Bulwark is one of the Royal Navy's two amphibious assault command and control ships. It is the second largest ship in the British fleet, measuring 176 meters long, displacing some 18,000 tons and with a company of nearly 600 men and women. These include some 170 Royal Marines and 42 Commando Royal Marines, including their Viking armored all-terrain tracked vehicles, as well as numerous support vehicles. Able to deploy worldwide within five days, the Bulwark's first operational deployment was to Lebanon in 2006: evacuating civilians following the outbreak of the Second Lebanon War between Hezbollah and Israel.

65. GCC has more questions than answers over Trump's approach to region

The National (UAE), Taimur Khan, 2016 11 23

Abu Dhabi - Gulf countries, like nervous US allies across the globe, are grappling with what a Donald Trump presidency will mean for their crucial bilateral relations and the increasingly chaotic region - but one area of cautious optimism is the next administration's potential stance on Iran. During the election campaign Mr Trump repeatedly contradicted himself on foreign affairs and there was a lack of clarity around both the specifics and larger strategic framework that would guide the reality television star and businessman's foreign policy once in office. His appointments and potential nominations for key cabinet positions since his election may offer some insight, but are similarly confusing - many of the personalities mentioned so far hold opposite views to each other and to what Mr Trump has said. In the Gulf, there is consensus that ripping up the deal - which has successfully, if for a limited time frame, taken Iran's ability to build a nuclear bomb off the table - would be a mistake.

66. Hamas condemns creation of wall around south Lebanon Palestinian camp

Lebanon Daily Star, Mohammed Zaatari, 2016 11 23

Sidon - The Palestinian Hamas Movement Tuesday condemned the construction of a large wall surrounding the Ain al-Hilweh camp in south Lebanon, which the Army says is aimed at providing more security for the notorious camp. In a statement, Hamas said it rejected the "policy of collective isolation" of the Palestinian camps, calling for a comprehensive Palestinian-Lebanese dialogue to take place. "We believe that this wall is a wrong step, [considering] the time and place, because it confirms a Lebanese security perspective in dealing with the cause of the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon," Hamas said. Shehab News Agency, affiliated with Hamas, said Tuesday that construction of the wall has been suspended; however, this could not be confirmed. A source told the Daily Star that several NGOs from the camp are organizing a social media campaign to lobby against the construction of the wall.

67. Use of chlorine weapons suspected in east Aleppo

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 11 23

Beirut - Containers of a chemical suspected to be chlorine were dropped by helicopters on rebel-held east Aleppo on Tuesday, causing breathing difficulties in some people, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights and the local health authority said. The Britain-based war monitor said its network of sources had reported seeing at least four barrel bombs dropped on the al-Qaterji and Dahrat Awad neighbourhoods, with the smell of chlorine filling the area. Medical sources told the Observatory they thought the gas was chlorine. Earlier on Tuesday the Syrian army advised civilians in besieged east Aleppo to avoid going into the streets and to steer clear of militant positions, and urged rebels to stop firing into government-held western Aleppo. On Nov. 11, the executive body of the global chemical weapons watchdog OPCW condemned the alleged use of banned toxic agents by the Syrian government and by militant group ISIS.

68. Alarm in Germany and Israel as U.S. white supremacists ride Trump wave

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 22

Berlin - German Chancellor Angela Merkel's government is concerned that white supremacists in the United States are being emboldened by the election of Donald Trump and is watching developments closely, senior officials told Reuters. The Berlin government declined to give an official reaction to a video circulating on the internet which showed members of the "alt-right" movement, a grouping that includes neo-Nazis, white nationalists and anti-Semites, meeting on Saturday in Washington a few blocks from the White House. But one senior official close to Merkel described the video - which shows a speaker shouting "Hail Trump" and some audience members making the Nazi salute - as "repulsive and worrying". "I don't think this is Trump's ideology because he seems to be largely free of ideology. But these people are riding on his coattails. We are watching this very closely," the official said, requesting anonymity. Yair Lapid, a member of the foreign affairs and defense committee in the Israeli Knesset, called the video "sickening" and "intolerable".

69. Attentat "déjoué" : deux hommes ont été relâchés à Marseille

France 3 - Régions (Site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 11 23

Strasbourg - Un réseau téléguidé depuis la Syrie, soupçonné d'avoir voulu commettre un attentat en France : après le coup de filet antiterroriste le week-end dernier à Strasbourg et Marseille, cinq hommes étaient toujours en garde à vue ce mardi et les enquêteurs cherchent à identifier les cibles envisagées. Le réseau paraît plus structuré que lors des derniers attentats ou projets d'attaques visant la France. La cellule était cloisonnée : certains membres n'ont jamais été en contact, uniquement reliés entre eux par un donneur d'ordre établi en Syrie, selon une source proche de l'enquête. Quatre Français, inconnus des services de renseignement, ont été interpellés dans la nuit de samedi à dimanche à Strasbourg. Deux armes de poing, un pistolet automatique, un pistolet mitrailleur ainsi que de la propagande jihadiste ont été trouvés lors des perquisitions. Yassine B., 37 ans, fonctionnaire dans une école primaire du quartier de la Meinau, et Hicham M., 37 ans également, sont soupçonnés d'avoir gagné la Syrie en 2015 en passant par Chypre. Sami B., 36 ans, et Zakaria M., 35 ans, ont également été placés en garde à vue. Au même moment, à Marseille, la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) interpellait trois suspects. Parmi eux, Hicham E., un Marocain de 46 ans, intéresse particulièrement les enquêteurs. Résidant au Portugal, il était surveillé depuis plusieurs mois par les services du pays après de nombreux voyages suspects en Europe et avait été signalé aux autorités françaises comme radicalisé. De l'argent a été saisi lors de son interpellation et les enquêteurs le soupçonnent d'avoir eu un rôle de collecteur de fonds pour le réseau. Les deux autres hommes arrêtés à Marseille, soupçonnés d'avoir eu un rôle dans son hébergement, ont été relâchés ce mardi soir.

Boursorama avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 23

Washington - Les Etats-Unis ont inscrit mardi sur leur liste noire de "terroristes internationaux" un Franco-Marocain, ancien de la Légion étrangère, qu'ils soupçonnent d'avoir planifié les attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles même s'il n'apparaît pas dans l'enquête française sur le 13 novembre 2015. Abdelilah Himich, surnommé "Abdel le légionnaire" ou "Abu Sulayman al-Faransi" est né en novembre 1989 au Maroc, a grandi à Lunel, commune près de Montpellier dans le sud de la France, ville marquée à partir de 2013 par le départ vers la Syrie d'une vingtaine de jeunes. En le faisant figurer dans cette classification "terroriste" --ce qui déclenche une batterie de sanctions-- le département d'Etat et le Trésor américains considèrent dorénavant le jeune homme comme un "terroriste international", une "figure des opérations extérieures (...) de l'organisation terroriste étrangère Etat islamique". D'après Washington, Himich, parti en Syrie en 2014 pour rejoindre l'EI, a mis sur pied l'année suivante une "cellule de combattants étrangers européens, vivier d'auteurs d'attaques en Irak, en Syrie et à l'étranger". Son "bataillon a pu compter à un moment 300 membres", avance la diplomatie américaine. En outre, le centre français d'analyse du terrorisme (CAT) et une source proche du dossier en France rapportent que Abdelilah Himich "a fait son service militaire dans la Légion étrangère française pendant deux ans, période durant laquelle il a servi en Afghanistan".

71. Interpol: Use biometric data to find extremist fighters

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 11 22

The United Nations - Interpol urged all countries on Tuesday to obtain biometric data from fighters for the Islamic State and other extremist groups to help law enforcement track them down, especially when they return home. Interpol Secretary General Jurgen Stock said in an interview with The Associated Press that the international police organization only has biometric data -- fingerprints, DNA, iris scans and the like -- for about 10 percent of the 9,000 "foreign terrorist fighters" in its database. Stock said Interpol is helping countries to develop biometric technology not only to identify fighters from extremist groups but criminals as well. He cited the case of "a terrorist" who attacked a police station in France last year who had traveled across Europe using 20 different identities -- something that could have been thwarted with biometric data. Stock said there are an estimated 20,000 to 30,000 "foreign terrorist fighters" from almost all over the world -- and about 15,000 from over 100 countries remain mainly in Syria and Iraq.

72. ISIS Operative Suspected in Paris and Brussels Attacks Is Identified

New York Times, Rukmini Callimachi, 2016 11 23

New York - The United States government revealed the identity on Tuesday of an Islamic State operative believed to have been one of the overseers of last year's attacks in Paris, as well as of the coordinated suicide bombings that tore through the international airport and a metro station in Brussels this year. The operative -- who until recently was known only by his nom de guerre, Abu Souleymane al-Faransi -- is a 27-year-old originally from Morocco whose real name is Abdelilah Himich, according to a statement issued by the State Department, which announced his designation as a global terrorist. The listing describes Mr. Himich as a senior fighter and "external operations figure," a reference to his suspected role in planning attacks abroad for the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL. "Himich created the Tariq Ibn Ziyad Battalion in 2015, a European foreign terrorist fighter cell that has provided operatives for ISIL attacks in Iraq, Syria and abroad," the statement said. "Himich was also reportedly involved in the planning of ISIL's November 2015 Paris attacks and March 2016 Brussels attacks." The assault on multiple locations in Paris on Nov. 13, 2015, was led on the ground by Abdelhamid Abaaoud, a Belgian member of the Islamic State who traveled from Syria and maintained telephone contact with the various teams of attackers. He was killed in a police shootout days later. But evidence quickly emerged that Mr. Abaaoud and his team had been taking orders from and reporting back to higher-ups inside the terror group. Among the first clues was the testimony of one of the hostages inside the Bataclan concert hall in Paris, who said he had overheard one of the suicide bombers asking the other, "Should we call Souleymane?"

73. Le chef de l'État mis en cause par l'opposition pour « violation du secret défense »

Le Figaro, Alain Barluet, 2016 11 23

Paris - Des initiatives ont été lancées par plusieurs parlementaires mettant en cause François Hollande pour « violation du secret défense » après la publication, le 24 août dernier dans Le Monde, d'un article sur un projet de frappes françaises contre le régime syrien. L'opération sera finalement abandonnée après le refus de Barack Obama de s'y associer. Illustré par la reproduction d'un document portant le tampon rouge « confidentiel défense », l'article était signé des journalistes Fabrice Lhomme et Gérard Davet, les auteurs du livre Un président ne devrait pas dire ça ..., paru en octobre. Saisi le 7 novembre par un courrier daté du 4 novembre du député Éric Ciotti (LR, Alpes-Maritimes), le parquet de Paris a ouvert une enquête préliminaire pour « compromission de la défense nationale » , à la suite de la publication des documents classifiés obtenus par les journalistes. « Il m'apparaît que la divulgation volontaire de documents et d'informations classées « confidentiel défense » sont, dans les circonstances de l'espèce, de nature à constituer » le délit de violation du secret défense, relève Éric Ciotti dans son courrier au procureur de Paris. Dans cette lettre, le député des Alpes-Maritimes affirme avoir écrit deux fois au ministère de la Défense sans obtenir de réponse. À ce stade, le parquet n'a pas saisi de service d'enquête, selon une source judiciaire. Mardi à l'Assemblée, Manuel Valls est monté au créneau pour défendre le président de la République.

Bruxelles - Un Français soupçonné d'avoir matériellement aidé Mehdi Nemmouche, l'auteur présumé de la tuerie du Musée juif de Bruxelles en 2014, a été remis en liberté sous conditions et contre une caution de 50.000 euros, a annoncé mardi le parquet fédéral belge. avec AFP Nacer Bendrer, privé de son passeport, devra rester à son domicile en France et demeurer à la disposition des enquêteurs, a précisé l'agence Belga. Un porte-parole du parquet, interrogé par l'AFP, n'a pas souhaiter commcenter ces informations. Interpellé en décembre 2014 près de Marseille, Nacer Bendrer assure n'avoir rien à voir avec l'attaque du Musée juif, qui avait fait quatre morts le 24 mai de la même année. Il avait été remis par la France à la Belgique en février 2015 et inculpé pour "complicité d'assassinat dans un cadre terroriste". En possession de plusieurs armes Lors de son arrestation, Nacer Bendrer était en possession de diverses armes, dont un fusil d'assaut de type kalachnikov qui serait très similaire à celui avec lequel le Français Mehdi Nemmouche est soupçonné d'avoir commis la tuerie de Bruxelles. Mehdi Nemmouche, qui était allé combattre en Syrie dans les rangs des jihadistes, avait été interpellé à Marseille le 30 mai à la descente d'un car. Son arme avait été retrouvée dans ses bagages. Il reconnaît avoir "joué un rôle" dans l'attaque mais nie avoir été présent au Musée, selon son avocat, Sébastien Courtoy. Nacer Bendrer et Mehdi Nemmouche se seraient rencontrés alors qu'ils étaient détenus ensemble à Salon-de-Provence (sud), de juin 2008 à décembre 2010. Un troisième suspect français, Mounir Attalah, a été remis par la France à la Belgique le 1er juillet 2015. Il a été inculpé en tant qu'auteur, coauteur ou complice de l'attentat.

Oslo - La Cour suprême norvégienne a refusé mercredi d'examiner l'appel du mollah Krekar, prédicateur fondamentaliste kurde irakien, validant ainsi une extradition en Italie où il est soupçonné dans une affaire d'"association terroriste". Réfugié en Norvège depuis 1991, le mollah de 60 ans, de son vrai nom Najumuddin Ahmad Faraj, est suspecté par la police italienne d'avoir dirigé un réseau jihadiste kurde, Rawti Shax, présumé lié à l'organisation État islamique (EI) et qui aurait projeté des attentats en Occident. Lui affirme avoir eu pour seule intention de former un parti politique au Kurdistan irakien. Après deux décisions de la justice norvégienne autorisant son extradition vers l'Italie, Krekar avait saisi la Cour suprême, la plus haute instance judiciaire du pays scandinave, qui a refusé d'examiner son recours, ce qui équivaut à valider la procédure d'extradition. L'avocat du Kurde irakien, Brynjar Meling, a annoncé à l'AFP son intention de porter l'affaire devant la Cour européenne des droits de l'Homme.

76. Nucléaire: les services belges n'ont rien trouvé dans le "darknet"

Agence Belga, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 22

Bruxelles - Ni les services de sécurité, ni une société privée n'ont trouvé sur le "darknet" des documents relatifs aux installations nucléaires belges qui auraient mis en péril la sécurité de celles-ci, a indiqué mardi le directeur du Centre de cybersécurité, Miguel De Bruycker, devant la sous-commission "sécurité nucléaire" de la Chambre. Les journaux de SudPresse ont relaté le mois passé la façon dont ils avaient trouvé sur le "darknet" (des réseaux de partage anonymes utilisés en général par des criminels) des plans des centrales nucléaires de Tihange. Le Centre de cybersécurité en a immédiatement référé à la Sûreté de l'Etat et aux renseignements militaires (SGRS) afin de savoir si des documents mettant en jeu la sécurité des installations nucléaires se trouvaient dans le "darknet". Une société privée a également été consultée et un "pirate éthique" a proposé ses services. "Aucune de nos sources d'information n'a trouvé les plans des installations nucléaires de Tihange ou des documents d'installations nucléaires qui comportaient un risque sérieux de sécurité", a expliqué M. De Bruycker.

77. Three men arrested in Germany for links to Syrian terror group

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 22

Berlin - Three German men of Syrian descent were arrested in Germany on Tuesday on suspicion of supporting a Syrian jihadist faction fighting to overthrow Syria's president, Bashar al-Assad. The German public prosecutor in Karlsruhe, the federal court responsible for dealing with terror-related cases, said the three men were detained for providing financial, technical and logistical support to the hardline Islamist faction Ahrar al-Sham. One of the men faces seven counts of providing the group with several thousand euros worth of binoculars, radio scanners, long-range telescopes, routers and antennas. Another is accused of organizing pickup trucks and ambulance services for Ahrar al-Sham, as well as driving a pickup truck all the way to Syria himself. The men - aged 36, 36 and 39 - were arrested in Bavaria, Lower Saxony and Berlin, the prosecutor's office said. The trial is scheduled to carry on into Wednesday.

78. Un informaticien indiscret du SRC devant la justice

Tribune de Genève, Lucie Monnat, 2016 11 23

Berne - Le procès de l'homme qui a volé des données du Service de renseignement s'ouvre aujourd'hui. On avait frôlé la catastrophe Cette affaire avait fait l'effet d'un séisme au sein du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC). En mai 2012, Carlo B. , alors informaticien spécialisé dans les banques de données au sein du SRC, est arrêté pour avoir dérobé 507. 1 GByte de données dans le but de les revendre. L'équivalent, environ, d'un document de deux millions de pages. Son procès s'ouvre ce matin au Tribunal pénal fédéral (TPF) de Bellinzone. Accusé de service de renseignements politiques aggravé et tentative de violation du secret de fonction, il risque 3 ans de prison maximum.

79. Un parc d'attraction parmi les cibles du commando terroriste démantelé

L'Express, Jérémie Pham-Lê, 2016 11 23

Marseille - L'audition de l'un des cinq gardés à vue ainsi que l'exploitation des téléphones et ordinateurs des suspects ont permis de mettre au jour plusieurs cibles visées par le commando djihadiste de Strasbourg et Marseille. Leur possible passage à l'acte imminent a précipité leur arrestation ce week-end. Mais que visaient les cinq membres du commando de Strasbourg et Marseille? Les premiers éléments de l'enquête commencent à dessiner le contour de leur projet terroriste visant vraisemblablement les villes de Paris et Marseille. Parmi les cibles du réseau se trouvent un "lieu emblématique de la police" et un parc d'attraction, révèle à L'Express une source proche de l'enquête, confirmant une information d'iTélé. "C'est ce qui ressort de l'audition de l'un des suspects et du gros travail d'exploitation technique des téléphones et du matériel informatique", poursuit notre source. Armes, liste de cibles, et abondante littérature djihadiste Lors des perquisitions, une liste de cibles a ainsi été découverte aux côtés d'une abondante littérature djihadiste. Deux armes de poing, un pistolet automatique, un pistolet mitrailleur ont également été saisis.

80. Un vaste projet d'attentat déjoué grâce à des agents infiltrés

Le Monde, Elise Vincent, 2016 11 23

Strasbourg - Sept personnes soupçonnées de planifier des attaques ont été arrêtées C'est un important projet d'attentat, possiblement fait d'attaques simultanées, qui a été déjoué à la suite d'une vague d'interpellations à Strasbourg et à Marseille, dans la nuit du samedi 19 au dimanche 20 novembre. Le ministre de l'intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, l'a annoncé lui-même, lundi 21 novembre. Une série d'arrestations qui s'ajoute à d'autres et à la vingtaine d'attentats déjoués depuis le début de l'année, selon le ministère, et vient rappeler que des cellules très structurées sont toujours dormantes, en France. Alors que le dernier attentat sur le sol français, le 26 juillet, à Saint-Etienne-du-Rouvray (Seine-Maritime), a mis au jour l'existence d'un djihad " low cost ", les interpellations réalisées dans le cadre de cette vaste opération conduite par la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) prouvent l'existence parallèle d'un modèle inverse. Les cellules organisées façon tueries du 13 novembre 2015 n'ont pas périclité. Les attaques en préparation, soupçonnent les enquêteurs, étaient possiblement pensées comme des attentats coordonnés . Elles visaient Paris et peut-être Marseille, même si le rapprochement doit encore être formellement établi.

81. Vers un Google du renseignement suisse

Le Temps (Suisse), Mehdi Atmani, 2016 11 23

Berne - Surveillance Achat de logiciels d'interception, embauche de personnel, écoutes renforcées: après le plébiscite dans les urnes le 25 septembre dernier, l'heure est à la mise en oeuvre de la loi sur le renseignement. Quels sont les plans de la Confédération? Le 25 septembre, deux tiers des Suisses ont décidé de muscler les moyens d'action du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC). Les espions helvétiques pourront désormais mener des opérations de surveillance préventive dans des espaces privés: écoutes téléphoniques, intrusion dans des réseaux informatiques, surveillance des réseaux câblés, c'est-à-dire le réseau filaire par lequel transitent les communications électroniques (courriels, téléphonie, Internet). Mais tout cela est encore très théorique. En pratique, le SRC va d'abord devoir repenser son organisation en profondeur et renouveler sa boîte à outils. Après le plébiscite dans les urnes, l'heure est à la mise en oeuvre. Le SRC a publié une feuille de route précise pour la mise en oeuvre de la loi sur le renseignement. Elle entrera en principe en vigueur le 1er septembre 2017.

1. Ottawa urged to review its hostage crisis strategy

Radio Canada International, Levon Sevunts, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - The federal government is facing renewed calls to review its strategy of dealing with hostage situations involving Canadians abducted abroad following the deaths of two Canadians executed by their captors in the Philippines earlier this year. John Ridsdel and Robert Hall were executed within seven weeks of each other earlier this year by a militant Islamist group in the Philippines after Ottawa refused to pay any ransom. Security experts and former kidnap victims and their families are urging Ottawa to review how it works with the families of abducted Canadians to resolve hostage situations or provide assistance to the private efforts of the families to secure the release of their loved ones. Among the recommendations is establishing a U.S.-style "fusion cell" that would improve co-ordination between government departments in the hopes of resolving hostage situations. Lee Humphrey, a former Canadian soldier who now works as an international security consultant, told CBC News the fusion cell should be led by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and would bring together experts from the departments of National Defence, Global Affairs, Justice and Canadian Security Intelligence Service to form a single, specialized hostage recovery team that would speak with one voice. "Every Western country is moving towards a fusion cell approach," Humphrey told CBC News, which has published a two-part series on Canada's handling of overseas kidnappings.

2. The Scene: Being Safe, Anti-terrorism law

Brampton Guardian, Terry Miller, 2016 12 02

Column: All of us want to be safe against terrorist actions. There are some folks within our country -- and more often, outside of Canada -- who conspire against our way of life. They don't believe in human rights and are dominated by ideologies that pay no attention to the sanctity of life or the freedoms that are enshrined in our constitution through the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We define these acts through the criminal code and they are nothing short of felonious activity. To deal with these unlawful acts, and these people, Parliament created the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service. With all that said and done, sometimes we react to terrorist activity by pursuing laws that affect our own personal rights and freedoms; but, even though we strive for balance between laws that are meant to protect us and our Charter constitutional rights, we don't always succeed. One of the last policies enacted into law in 2015 by the Harper government was The Anti-Terrorism Act, C-51. C-51 had a tough passage in the House of Commons and an even tougher ride outside Parliament. Many Canadians lined up against it, because they saw the Anti-Terrorism Act as an intrusion into their personal rights and a threat against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In June of 2015, Harper's Anti-Terrorism Act was enacted with the support of the Liberals. During the election, the Liberals said they were not in favour of the strict guidelines of C-51, but once in office they would amend parts of it to comply with the concerns raised by a whole slew of legal experts. Although CSIS has an oversight body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, there is no body that regulates the flow of information or the necessity of gathering information about Canadians. There is no oversight committee to supervise the intelligence-gathering operations within the provisions of the Charter and the Constitution. There is no oversight committee that evaluates operations of intelligence agencies and no oversight committee that reports to Parliament on the operations of intelligence agencies. Parliament needs to create a national oversight body similar to one each of the Five Eyes Alliance (US, UK, NZ and Australia) has to ensure that the rights and freedoms of their citizens are protected.

3. Canada looking for 'positive' role with US over Russia 'challenge'

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - Canada wants to work with the United States to face the "challenge" posed by Russia, Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion said Thursday. Dion steered clear of weighing in directly on comments Donald Trump made during the U.S. election campaign in which he praised Russian President Vladimir Putin. But the minister said Canada and the U.S. have a shared interest in dealing with Russia's incursion into Ukraine. "We want to have a very positive and constructive role to play in our relationship with the United States bilaterally and also what we can do together in the world, including facing the challenge (of) Russia," Dion said in an interview. Russia's annexation of Ukraine's Crimea Peninsula in 2014 and its backing of separatist rebels in the country's east have prompted NATO to bolster its military footprint in eastern Europe. "The NATO policy is deterrence and dialogue. Canada was alone to do deterrence without dialogue and we are correcting that," said Dion. The Conservative opposition has criticized Dion and the Liberals for re-engaging with Russia, accusing it of "cosying up" to the "Putin regime." Former prime minister Stephen Harper avoided direct contact with Putin at international events during most of his last two years in office, as his government downgraded diplomatic contact. Dion said after the U.S. election that Canada would maintain sanctions on Russia. Last week, his spokesman Joseph Pickerill told The Canadian Press that Canada's diplomatic re-engagement with Russia did not mean "business as usual." John Brennan, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, was not as reluctant. He told the BBC earlier this week that Trump should be "wary" of Russia's promises and criticized it for its role in helping the Syrian government wage its costly civil war. Peter Kent, the Conservative foreign affairs critic, said it is too early to say whether Trump will temper his campaign rhetoric on Russia. "We hope that among the foreign policy experts he engages in his administration there will be cautionary voices urging great care in dealings with Russia," Kent said.

4. Canadians sympathize with hostages - if they fit the right profile

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard, 2016 12 02

Analysis: Tireless diplomats. Brave aid workers. Journalists, both staff and freelance. Travellers, some worldly, some not so much. Risk-taking Canadians, by choice, by assignment, or by terrible miscalculation. There is no one profile of those who are kidnapped - no commonality of their circumstances except that they all were abducted in regions where hostage- takings are possible, even if only remotely so. Some had kidnap insurance, training and meticulous security measures. Others had nothing but the packs on their backs. It remains a rare thing, the horror of overseas abduction. But not as rare as it used to be. Nor is it likely to remain so rare in the risk-fraught years ahead. Rarity has helped keep kidnappings off the policy radar and rarity is meaningless when it happens to someone you love. Not all hostages are created equal. And that's a problem. Sailing had long been John Ridsdel's passion, following in the steps of his British father, who perfected his skills in the daunting, traffic-jammed English Channel. "He used to love to tell the story of how his dad on a whim went out and bought a sailboat when my dad was in his early 20s," said Ridsdel's daughter in an interview. "And so my dad said 'Ah, huh, I better learn how to sail.' So he did. He went and took a sailing course for a week and showed up and said, 'All right, let's do this.' " Robert Hall's family used to tease him about being "too much" of a romantic, in love with being in love. He was never boring, that's certain. "Robert is the most interesting man in the world!" was the family joke, his sister Bonice Thomas says. "From earning money to put food on the table as a welder, to learning to fly a plane, learning to drive a race car or to sail the Pacific alone, he would just take on these huge things. And he would really do his homework, find mentorship, read everything he needed to get there - and then just do it," she said. Documents obtained first by CBC under Access to Information legislation show that while the government was publicly proclaiming the case into her death remained open in 2011, foreign affairs officials had told the RCMP to stop investigating. "It's like this bizarre phenomenon at least in the U.S. and Canada, where our citizens do not give a s-- about our citizens," says a security consultant who has worked to free hostages and was interviewed by the Star but asked for anonymity.

5. Habib was bent on going to Syria: undercover officer

Montreal Gazette, Jesse Feith, 2016 12 02

Montreal - During a three-hour conversation with an undercover officer only days before he was arrested, Ismael Habib admitted he was willing to do anything necessary to get to Syria and fight for the Islamic State. Testifying at Habib's trial on Thursday, the RCMP officer said Habib told him he believed it was his duty to do so, that he lived to die and knew of other young people in Montreal who were ready to leave with him. The conversation had been framed as a job interview by the undercover agent, who had been paying Habib for a series of small jobs as part of an investigation before his arrest. Habib, 29, is charged with attempting to travel to Syria to commit a terrorist act and giving false information to obtain a passport. In previous meetings, the officer had showed Habib that he ran an organization that was able to get people out of Canada by boats leaving from the Port of Montreal. The RCMP officer testified that Habib had previously told him he was trying to leave for Syria, but hadn't been able to because of passport troubles. Habib was on Passport Canada's watchlist and suspected of terrorist activities as early as March 2013. He had tried to have a new passport made after his was seized following a trip to Turkey that same year.

6. Hydro-Québec cherche à se prémunir contre la menace des cyberattaques

Le Devoir, Karl Rettino-Parazelli, 2016 12 02

Montréal - La société d'État s'associe à une nouvelle chaire de recherche Les systèmes informatiques d'Hydro-Québec sont souvent la cible de cyberattaques, qui sont pour l'instant demeurées sans conséquences. Face à une menace réelle et croissante, la société d'État a néanmoins senti le besoin de participer à la création d'une chaire de recherche, lancée jeudi à Montréal, pour prévenir les attaques de demain. L'Université Concordia a annoncé la mise sur pied de la Chaire de recherche industrielle sur la sécurité des réseaux électriques intelligents et les attaques cyberphysiques, qui est notamment le fruit d'un partenariat avec Hydro- Québec et l'entreprise Thales, laquelle se spécialise dans la protection des systèmes informatiques. Elle est dotée d'un budget de 2,2 millions de dollars sur cinq ans, dont 500 000 $ proviennent d'Hydro-Québec. Protéger le réseau Le titulaire de la chaire, le professeur Mourad Debbabi, mettra à contribution une équipe de 25 chercheurs pour développer des techniques permettant de détecter, de prévenir et d'atténuer des cyberattaques. L'objectif est d'améliorer la sécurité de l'ensemble du réseau électrique québécois, dit-il.

7. Iraqis finally grant permission for Canadian shipment of small arms to Peshmerga fighters

CBC.CA, Murray Brewster, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - The hold-up in arms delivery for Canada's Kurdish allies in northern Iraq, who have been impatiently waiting on the Liberal government to deliver on its promise to supply weapons, will soon be over, a House of Commons committee was told Thursday. John Forster, the deputy minister of defence, said the central government in Iraq has now granted permission for the shipment of small arms, ammunition and optical sights to Peshmerga fighters. The initial promise was made when the Liberal government revamped the mission last February, but delivery has been held up by the absence of approval from the government of Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi. Kurdish authorities in the self-governing, semi-autonomous Kurdish region told CBC News in an interview last month that the country's complicated politics were at play. The Kurds have made it clear they want their independence after ISIS is defeated and have even proposed a referendum. Maj.-Gen Aziz Weisi, a senior Peshmerga commander, told CBC News last month (in an interview arranged by the Canadian military and conducted with the aid of a translator) that they understood the delay, but were anxious to see the weapons as the battle for Mosul unfolded. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan and Canada's top military commander, Gen. Jonathan Vance, asked Kurdish officials, both political and military, last spring to draw up lists of what they required. That list was longer and more extensive than what Canadians has been prepared to deliver and include heavy systems, such as anti-tank rockets and armoured patrol vehicles.

8. Mali attacks rise as Liberals plan mission

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - An al-Qaida faction has claimed responsibility for missile strikes aimed at UN forces in Mali as the Canadian government is poised to announce details of its peacekeeping deployment to Africa. Photos posted on social media by Al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb show two Grad missiles being fired at Timbuktu airport Tuesday, targeting what it called "French forces that invaded the lands of the Muslims." At Gao airport, the UN peacekeeping office was destroyed Tuesday by an explosive-laden truck, Reuters reported. The armed group Ansar Dine claimed to have attacked a French armoured vehicle with a mine Sunday. Nobody was killed in the attacks but the intensification of the Islamist insurgency comes as the government is expected to announce it will contribute 600 soldiers and 150 police officers to a peacekeeping mission in Mali.

9. Military brass set down rules for dealing with child soldiers

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - Canada's top soldier is issuing the first guidelines for Canadian military personnel on how to deal with child soldiers in advance of deployment to Africa, the Star has learned. Gen. Jonathan Vance, the chief of defence staff, and senior military officials have consulted with the Roméo Dallaire Child Soldiers Initiative and others on how to best prepare troops for a soon-to-be decided UN "peace operations" mission. In September, Vance issued a draft version of the new guidelines, which was expected to be finalized this week. Called the CAF Child Soldiers Doctrine, it will provide overarching principles to military personnel, no matter what the mission or mandate. The Star reported last week that Mali is likely destination for up to 600 Canadian Armed Forces personnel, but the federal cabinet has not yet given its nod. According to information obtained by the Star, excerpts of the new guidelines say the "aim is to provide the interim guidance required to address and mitigate the broad challenges posed by the presence of child soldiers in areas where we may undertake missions." The United Nations in 2005 identified six categories of grave violations against children that include killing and maiming of children, the recruiting of children as soldiers, sexual violence against children, attacks against schools, denial of humanitarian access to children, and abduction of children.

10. Procès pour terrorisme S'il devait recruter, il irait à la mosquée de Charkaoui

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine, 2016 12 02

Montréal - Le meilleur endroit pour recruter de jeunes Québécois prêts à partir faire le djihad en Syrie, c'est au centre islamique Assahaba du prédicateur Adil Charkaoui, croit le suspect de terrorisme Ismaël Habib, dont le procès s'est amorcé cette semaine à Montréal. C'est du moins ce qu'il a confié en février à un agent d'infiltration de la GRC jouant le rôle du patron d'un groupe criminel de passeurs illégaux. Des jeunes « chauds » à l'idée d'aller faire le djihad La scène se déroule dans un entrepôt loué par la GRC, quelque part à Montréal. Ismaël Habib se croit en grande conversation avec le « boss » d'une organisation criminelle qu'il a déjà rencontré quelques fois dans le cadre d'autres scénarios d'infiltration mis sur pied par la police. L'agent d'infiltration a proposé il y a déjà quelques semaines au suspect de travailler pour lui. Aujourd'hui, les deux hommes évoquent la possibilité de créer un réseau de passeurs du Québec vers la Syrie. « Je lui ai demandé : "Connais-tu des jeunes qui voudraient aller là-bas ?" », a raconté le policier hier, caché derrière des paravents dans la salle de tribunal parce que son identité doit être protégée. Habib a nommé deux mosquées montréalaises : une dont le nom échappait au témoin, et « le centre Assahaba ». C'est là qu'Adil Charkaoui prêche. Il en est le président du conseil d'administration.

11. Shared services vows to improve as email project pushed out to 2018

Ottawa Citizen, James Bagnall, 2016 12 02

Ottawa - For once, Shared Services Canada met its deadline. On Thursday, as promised, the federal government's computer services agency said how it would correct certain deficiencies in its operations identified early this year by Auditor General Michael Ferguson. In a report it delivered to the House of Commons committee for public accounts, the agency promised it would do a better job providing key information-technology services to the 43 departments it deals with, and spelled out the level of service the latter could expect. For instance, government call centres, data centres, email and other telecommunications services are to be available 24 hours a day, 365 days a year - with outages to be fixed in most cases in less than four hours. But these are statements of intent about services, to be judged later as to progress. Shared Services has yet to finalize its revised plan for actually upgrading the government's electronic backbone, the more difficult part of its mandate. This part of the plan will be presented to the public accounts committee after it wins approval from the Liberal cabinet. It's not clear when that will be. The report presented Thursday by Shared Services suggests the upgrade overall isn't proceeding well. For one thing, Shared Services is now targeting March 2018 for the delivery of the $400-million government-wide email system that was supposed to have been completed by March 2015. Contractors Bell Canada and CGI Group have encountered a number of technical roadblocks owing in part to revisions in the email platform. This is one of three key jobs assigned to Shared Services. Details were few but these will be on offer in coming weeks when Shared Services issues a request for proposals for the provision of cloud services. The most likely scenario for the moment is that Shared Services will continue to build and operate its new data centres in Borden, Barrie and Buckingham, Que. Crucially, however, Shared Services would also play the role of broker, which means it would no longer be the monopoly supplier of data services. The agency would vet qualified cloud suppliers and make sure that federal departments' plans for using them are sound.

12. At one small border post, Canada tests the idea of automated entry

Washington Post, Alan Freeman, 2016 12 01

Ottawa - First there were automated drive-through carwashes. Then automated drive-through banks. Now, the Canadian government is experimenting with an automated drive-through border crossing. While the fate of the wall along the U.S.-Mexico border promised by President-elect Donald Trump remains uncertain, Canada is carrying out a pilot project with an opposite aim: to use the latest technology to ease the flow of traffic across the United States' northern frontier. If you drive into the province of Quebec via the crossing at Moses Line, Vt., after 4 p.m. on any day, no live Canadian customs agent will stop and interrogate you. Instead, a gate opens and you drive into a large, garage-like building. There, under the gaze of several TV cameras, you are invited by a customs officer to insert your passport or other border ID into a document reader and are asked the usual questions put to visitors seeking to enter Canada. The customs officer addressing you over a microphone is located at a service center operated by the Canadian Border Services Agency in Hamilton, Ontario, 435 miles away. "So far, it's going very well. We've seen an increase in the use of the border crossing," said Dominique McNeely, a spokesman for the agency. The experiment's budget is $16 million Canadian, or just under $12 million U.S., most of which has been spent on the new building and its high-tech equipment. The year-long pilot program ends in a couple of months, at which time it will be decided whether to expand it to include other small crossings.

13. A year after the terrorist attack, the FBI still looks for answers

Los Angeles Times, Richard Winton, 2016 12 02

Los Angeles - In the year since Syed Rizwan Farook and Tashfeen Malik killed 14 people in a terrorist attack in San Bernardino, authorities have conducted more than 600 interviews, gathered more than 500 pieces of evidence and served dozens of search warrants. They launched an unprecedented legal battle with Apple in an effort to unlock Farook's iPhone and deployed divers to scour a nearby lake in search of electronic equipment the couple might have dumped there. But despite piecing together a detailed picture of the couple's actions up to and including the massacre, federal officials acknowledge they still don't have answers to some of the critical questions posed in the days after the Dec. 2, 2015, attack at the Inland Regional Center. Most important, the FBI said it is still trying to determine whether anyone was aware of the couple's plot or helped them in any way. From the beginning, agents have tried to figure out whether others might have known something about Farook and Malik's plans, since the couple spent months gathering an arsenal of weapons and building bombs in the garage of their Redlands home. Officials said they don't have enough evidence to charge anyone with a crime but stressed the investigation is still open.

14. Bill to help ID threats, challenges at northern border heads to Obama's desk (Canada)

Dickinson Press (North Dakota), April Baumgarten, 2016 12 01

Washington - A bill U.S. lawmakers hope will help identify threats and challenges facing federal agents at the northern border is going to President Barack Obama's desk. The House of Representatives unanimously passed the Northern Border Security Review Act on Tuesday without objection, meaning there were no changes to the bill. Obama has 10 days from when the bill was passed by Congress to decide whether he will sign the bill into law, but Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, D-N.D., expects the president will put his signature on the document. "This bill will give us an excellent opportunity to have a strategy that we all can evaluate and review in our oversight responsibilities," she said. She added the U.S. is lucky to have Canada as a friendly, trusted ally. There are Canadian border officials at the Pembina port aiding Border Patrol agents, and there could be a bill to further facilitate relationships with border forces from Canada.

15. From Somalia to U.S.: Ohio State Attacker's Path to Violence

New York Times, Mitch Smith, Adam Goldman, 2016 12 02

Columbus - The young refugee smiled broadly as he accepted his associate degree from a local community college less than seven months ago, jumping in the air on stage as the announcer said, "Abdul Razak Artan, cum laude." Mr. Artan, who had been in the United States for just two years, seemed to be a success story in this city's large network of Somali refugees, excelling in his classes at Columbus State Community College and getting accepted as a transfer student to nearby Ohio State University. But the image of a jubilant graduate in a cap and gown conflicted sharply with Mr. Artan's actions on Monday, when the police say he rammed a car into pedestrians on a sidewalk at Ohio State before jumping out and stabbing people with a butcher knife. Mr. Artan was shot dead within about a minute by a university police officer, and the 11 people injured are expected to survive. The Islamic State claimed responsibility for the attack, and social media posts have led investigators to believe Mr. Artan may have been inspired to act by that terror group or by Anwar al-Awlaki, the American Qaeda operative who was killed in a drone strike in Yemen in 2011. While some of Mr. Artan's background remains unknown, accounts from law enforcement officials, classmates, Mr. Artan's neighbors and Somalis in Columbus portray a deeply religious young man who took college seriously and seemed to be adapting to life in America, and whose decision to act violently came as a shock.

16. James Mattis, Outspoken Ex-Marine, Is Trump's Choice as Defense Secretary

New York Times, Michael R. Gordon, Eric Schmitt, 2016 12 02

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump said on Thursday he had chosen James N. Mattis, a hard-charging retired general who led a Marine division to Baghdad during the 2003 invasion of Iraq, to serve as his secretary of defense. Mr. Trump made the announcement at a rally in Cincinnati, calling General Mattis "the closest thing we have to Gen. George Patton." General Mattis, 66, led the United States Central Command, which oversees military operations in the Middle East and Southwest Asia, from 2010 to 2013. His tour there was cut short by the Obama administration, which believed he was too hawkish on Iran. But his insistence that Iran is the greatest threat to peace in the Middle East, as well as his acerbic criticism of the Obama administration's initial efforts to combat the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria, made him an attractive choice for the incoming president. After retiring from the military, General Mattis told Congress that the administration's "policy of disengagement in the Middle East" had contributed to the rise of extremism in the region. The United States, he told lawmakers in 2015, needs to "come out from our reactive crouch and take a firm, strategic stance in defense of our values."

17. Obama again waives moving US Embassy to Jerusalem

Times of Israel, Tamar Pileggi and Raphael Ahren, 2016 12 02

Jerusalem - US President Barack Obama on Thursday renewed a presidential waiver, again delaying plans to relocate the American Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem for another six months. In keeping with every other presidential administration over the last 20 years, a White House statement cited "national security interests" in waiving Congress's 1995 decision to recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital and transfer its embassy there. Every president since Bill Clinton has cited national security in presidential waivers signed every six months that have postponed the embassy's relocation. The US has been reluctant to officially recognize Jerusalem as the capital city of Israel, and the CIA World Factbook notes that "while Israel proclaimed Jerusalem as its capital in 1950, the international community does not recognize it as such; the US, like all other countries, maintains its embassy in Tel Aviv-Yafo."

18. Senate passes Iran sanctions extension, posing veto challenge for Obama

Washington Post, Karoun Demirjian, 2016 12 02

Washington - The Senate passed on Thursday a 10-year extension of existing U.S. sanctions on Iran, sending President Obama a bill that his administration protests as unnecessary. Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said last month that the extension of the Iran Sanctions Act, which covers energy, trade and defense-sector sanctions against Tehran's nuclear and missile activities, would threaten the nuclear pact passed last year. He threatened that Iran would respond if the extension becomes law - putting veto pressure on the Obama administration. Obama might be powerless to prevent the sanctions extension from becoming law now that both chambers have voted overwhelmingly for it. Senators passed the legislation Thursday by a vote of 99 to 0; last month, House lawmakers passed the same bill by a vote of 419 to 1. The White House argued against extending the law, stressing that the president already has the power to sanction the Iranian government for actions such as a recent spate of ballistic-missile tests that U.S. officials say run counter to the spirit, if not the letter, of the nuclear deal. "We retain substantial authority to impose additional sanctions if they are warranted," White House press secretary Josh Earnest said Wednesday. He added, however, that if Obama does sign the bill, it would not be the first time that "the president has signed into law bills that Congress has passed that we're not sure are entirely necessary."

19. Trump Said to Narrow Intelligence Director Down to Three Choices

Bloomberg News, Kevin Cirilli, 2016 12 01

New York - President-elect Donald Trump has narrowed his search for Director of National Intelligence to three choices: retiring-Senator Dan Coats, former George W. Bush homeland security adviser Frances Townsend and National Security Agency Director and U.S. Navy Admiral Michael Rogers, according to a top transition source. Trump met with Coats, a Republican from Indiana, at Trump Tower on Wednesday to discuss the position, according to the source, who requested anonymity because the selection hasn't been finalized. Earlier this week, Trump met with Townsend. The meetings come as there continues to be intense speculation on who Trump will select for secretary of state. The short-list includes 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney; former-CIA director David Petraeus; and Senator Bob Corker, a Tennessee Republican.

20. U.S. to Delay NATO Center

Wall Street Journal, Julian Barnes, 2016 12 02

Brussels - The U.S. Congress is ready to approve legislation aimed at delaying the relocation of a North Atlantic Treaty Organization intelligence center, possibly providing the incoming Trump administration with leverage to prod the alliance into expanding its counterterrorism work. President-elect Donald Trump has said he wants NATO to focus more on fighting terrorism, a shift many allies oppose as either outside the alliance's remit or as a distraction from its traditional focus on countering Russia. The final version of the Defense Authorization Act, set for a vote by the House on Friday and the Senate next week, blocks any funds from being spent to move the so-called NATO Intelligence Fusion Cell from the Molesworth Royal Air Force base, in central England, to the Croughton base, about 50 miles southwest. Delaying the relocation of the intelligence center would give the new administration and the alliance time to rethink the location and the mission of the center, said Rep. Devin Nunes (R., Calif.), a member of Mr. Trump's transition team.

21. Channel ports lack information to spot terrorists

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 12 02

London - The ability of ports officers to defend Britain against terrorists is being hindered by poor information on who is travelling, a report has warned. David Anderson, QC, the independent reviewer of terrorism legislation, said there was "widespread dissatisfaction" with the quality of manifests from police at Channel and Irish Sea ports. The absence of detailed passenger lists, supplied hours in advance, contrasted with the "generally good" information available at airports, he added. "The strongly expressed refrain from ports officers on the ground was that they could do their jobs more effectively if they had better advance information about passengers arriving (and departing) by sea," Mr Anderson's annual report states. He warned that the terrorism threat remained severe after the return of about half of the 850 Britons who travelled to Syria and Iraq. Six plots were disrupted last year and two so far this year. He added: "Experienced MI5 hands descr

22. Half of British Muslims would not go to cops if they knew someone with ISIS links

The Sun (UK), Steven Hawkes, 2016 12 02

London - ALMOST half of British Muslims wouldn't go to the police if someone they knew was involved with supporters of terrorism in Syria. A staggering new survey also found that just 26 per cent of Britain's Muslims do not believe in "extremist views exist". The survey - dubbed the biggest ever of its kind - has revealed that only one in 25 British Muslims believe Osama Bin Laden and Al-Qaeda were responsible for the 9-11 attacks. A Policy Exchange poll last night claimed 31 per cent believe the US Government was behind the atrocity than the terrorists - 4 per cent. And seven per cent said the attack, which killed almost 3,000 people, was a plot by the Jewish community.

23. Most Muslims want full integration with British way of life

London Times, Kaya Burgess, 2016 12 02

London - More than half of British Muslims want to "fully integrate" with society, according to the most extensive survey of its kind. Research involving more than 3,000 Muslims shows that they broadly share the views and priorities of the wider population, rather than being shaped by supposedly "Islamic" concerns. Ninety-three per cent feel a fairly or very strong attachment to Britain and are likely to identify the NHS, unemployment and immigration as the biggest issues facing the country. British Muslims were more likely than the general population to condemn terrorism, the survey by ICM and Policy Exchange, the right-of-centre think tank, found. They were also more likely to give credence to conspiracy theories that the United States government or Jewish influences were behind the September 11 attacks. Thirty-one per cent of Muslims blamed the US for the attacks on the World Trade Center, 7 per cent blamed Jews and 4 per cent blamed al-Qaeda, while 52 per cent said that they did not know. This compared with 71 per cent of the general population who blamed al-Qaeda, with 10 per cent blaming the US, 1 per cent blaming Jews and 16 per cent unsure. Asked about threats and acts of terrorism, 90 per cent of Muslims condemned them and 2 per cent expressed sympathy. This compared with 84 per cent condemnation among the general population and 4 per cent sympathy.

24. Australia introduces new laws to keep terrorists in jail

Australian Associated Press, Claire Bickers, 2016 12 02

Canberra - New counter-terrorism laws will allow the Federal Government to keep convicted terrorists in jail once their sentence expires if they are still deemed a threat. The laws passed yesterday evening on the final sitting day of 2016. Several amendments were made to the original proposal to improve safeguards and oversight following recommendations by a parliamentary committee. "The scheme is a necessary response to the serious threat that terrorism poses to Australia and its people," Justice Minister Michael Keenan told MPs. It was the third national security Bill to pass in the final sitting fortnight of the year. Malcolm Turnbull announced the new measures in July, shortly after terror attacks in Nice. At the time, the Prime Minister said Australia could not be complacent in the wake of increasing terror attacks around the world. "ISIL continues to inspire and direct atrocities across the world even as our military efforts in the Middle East push back their territorial gains and cut off their source of revenue," he said.

26. Trump speech could doom Aust refugee plan

Australian Associated Press, Peter Mitchell, 2016 12 02

Los Angeles - Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull's resettlement plan with the US appears doomed with Donald Trump vowing to stop the flow of Middle East refugees to America "dead cold flat". At a 50- minute rally before a crowd of supporters in Cincinnati on Thursday, the US president-elect linked Monday's violent rampage by Somali immigrant Abdul Razak Ali Artan at Ohio State University to refugee programs "stupidly created by our very stupid politicians". Mr Trump, who moves into the White House in 50 days, said he will "suspend immigration from regions where it cannot be safely processed". The more than 2000 refugees in detention facilities on Nauru and Manus Island are from countries including Somalia, Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Sudan and Sri Lanka. "We will do everything in our power to keep the scourge of terrorism out of our country," Trump told the crowd during his first major address since winning the presidency three weeks ago. "Just so you understand, people are pouring in from regions of the Middle East. "We have no idea who they are, where they come from, what they're thinking and we're going to stop them dead cold flat." Mr Turnbull struck the deal with US President Barack Obama but it appears unlikely the asylum seekers will be processed and relocated to the US before Mr Trump moves into the White House on January 20.

28. 2 Iranians charged with plan to attack Israeli Embassy in Kenya

Times of Israel, Staff Report, 2016 12 02

Jerusalem - A Kenyan prosecutor has charged two Iranian men with collecting information to carry out a terrorist attack after they were allegedly found with video footage of the Israeli embassy. State Prosecutor Duncan Ondimu said in court on Thursday that Sayed Nasrollah Ebrahim and Abdolhosein Gholi Safaee were arrested Tuesday in an Iranian diplomatic car while taking the pictures of the Israeli mission using a mobile phone, including when they were intercepted. They were detained in the capital, Nairobi after they had come from visiting Kamiti Prison where they saw two other Iranians who have been jailed for 15 years on terrorism charges. The Israeli Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem had no comment on the incident. A Kenyan driver, Moses Keyah Mmboga, who was chauffeuring the vehicle belonging to the Iranian embassy has been charged along with the suspects and also faces a separate charge of "abetting terrorism," Ondimu said.

30. South Sudanese flee as country edges closer to 'genocide'

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 01

Karukwat, DRC - Charity Mandulu said the executions began soon after government soldiers - around 100 of them mostly from South Sudan President Salva Kiir's Dinka ethnic group - arrived in her home town of Tore Payam. "They started to demand things. If you didn't give to them, they killed you," she said, visibly exhausted from what she said was a week-long walk through the bush and across the southern border to relative safety in Democratic Republic of Congo. Mandulu's account and those of some of the other 64,000 people who have fled South Sudan to isolated northeastern Congo could not be independently verified. The South Sudanese government, which has fought a civil war against rebels headed by former vice president Riek Machar for three years, says it only targets the rebels, who say in turn that they only attack the military. But the refugees' accounts and a human rights report from the Equatoria region, much of which is cut off by fighting, point to both sides targeting civilians along ethnic lines, adding weight to a U.N. warning of a genocide in the making.

31. Anger persists despite peace deal

Los Angeles Times, Chris Kraul, 2016 12 02

Bogota - The victims of the longest-running conflict in the Western Hemisphere would seem to have much to gain from the government's push to make peace with the rebels. The accord approved by Congress this week -- two months after voters narrowly rejected a similar deal in a national referendum -- offers them the chance to return to their villages, reclaim their land and collect restitution for stolen belongings and slain relatives. But like many victims of the conflict, Natalia Jaramillo clings to deep resentment of the rebel group known as the FARC and registers disdain for any peace deal that offers it concessions. The bitterness is widespread among the displaced in Mocoa. In recent interviews with 20 residents who came here fleeing violence, the Times found none who expressed a spirit of reconciliation. The resentment could complicate efforts to implement the new accord, which will require multiple pieces of new legislation and billions of dollars to compensate and retrain demobilized rebels and enact land reforms, among other measures. President Juan Manuel Santos had hoped the referendum would give him a popular mandate. But he has proven unable to even win the support of the people most affected by the war.

32. Hurdles Remain for New Colombia Peace Deal

Wall Street Journal, Jose de Cordoba, 2016 12 02

Bogota - Colombia's President Juan Manuel Santos scored a victory in getting a revamped peace deal with communist guerrillas passed through Congress, but faces a tough road in implementing the pact and winning over the majority of Colombians who voted against an earlier version of it. Legislators late Wednesday overrode opposition from former President Alvaro Uribe to overwhelmingly approve an agreement ending the 52-year conflict between the 6,000-strong Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia and the government, which has claimed hundreds of thousands of lives and displaced millions of people. The vote in the 166-member house was 130 to 0, but in a sign of lingering ire over the accord, lawmakers allied with Mr. Uribe walked out before the vote. "This is a much better agreement than the last one," said Frank Pearl, a Colombian government official who helped negotiate both agreements. "It had the muscle of the whole country, including the people who were for and the people who were against the last agreement. The FARC got the message loud and clear, and they understood it." The new deal incorporates more than 50 modifications to address concerns that the pact was too lenient toward the rebels, according to Mr. Santos, who won the 2016 Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts to reach peace with the FARC.

33. China commits to implementing NK sanctions despite trade losses

Global Times, Staff reporter, 2016 12 02

Beijing - The UN Security Council voted Wednesday to impose a new round of economic sanctions on North Korea in response to its fifth and largest nuclear test. The resolution places a cap on Pyongyang's annual coal exports, cutting them by at least 62 percent at $400.9 million. It also slaps a ban on Pyongyang's exports of non-ferrous metals and puts limits on the country's foreign missions. The Security Council has imposed increasingly targeted and harsher sanctions on Pyongyang since 2006. The latest sanction takes aim at North Korea's hard currency revenues that are believed to have been used to fund the nation's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. Pyongyang generates most of its foreign revenue from trade in staple commodities with Beijing, coal in particular. Coal exports are the country's single largest source of external funds, according to media reports. By capping North Korea's coal exports and cutting down its currency revenue, the international community is attempting to prevent Pyongyang from gaining the economic capability to develop nuclear programs.

34. HK's treatment of refugees 'criminal', Snowden says (Canada)

South China Morning Post, Raquel Carvalho, 2016 12 02

Beijing - US intelligence whistle-blower Edward Snowden has condemned the treatment of asylum seekers in Hong Kong, describing it as "criminal". Snowden was sheltered by three groups of asylum seekers when he was in the city for about two weeks in 2013, after he had fled the United States. In an interview with Canadian news outlet Ricochet Media, he described the poverty, "discrimination and repression" suffered by such people in Hong Kong. The former National Security Agency contractor criticised the fact that asylum seekers were not allowed to work in the city, saying they were left "hungry and destitute" as they waited for their claims to be processed. While Snowden was on the run, after leaking classified documents that showed the extent of electronic spying by the US and other governments, he was housed by a Filipino family as well as a family and a man from Sri Lanka, who are still asylum seekers in the city. "Hong Kong is one of the richest cities in the world, yet I saw refugees struggling through days, whose poverties were punctuated by discrimination and repression," Snowden said. "It seems beyond imagination that a government could deny people the right to work for a wage while also refusing them money to eat, instead providing food provisions that were wholly insufficient to survive on and often spoiled and out of date, but that's how the system worked then." Food provisions have since been replaced by coupons. Asylum seekers in the city currently receive a monthly housing allowance of HK$1,500 per adult, supermarket coupons worth HK$1,200 for food, transport expenses averaging HK$200 per person and HK$300 for utilities.

36. N.K. leader observes artillery drill targeting S. Korea

Seoul - North Korea carried out a massive artillery drill observed by its leader that simulated striking military targets in South Korea, Pyongyang's media said Friday, as the U.N. Security Council (UNSC) adopted another sanctions resolution. On Thursday, North Korean leader Kim Jong-un guided the exercise of his front-line units, which were tasked with striking South Korea's islands south of the inter-Korean sea border in the Yellow Sea, according to the Korean Central News Agency (KCNA). The exercise, was timed with the UNSC's imposition of sanctions to punish North Korea for its September nuclear test. The UNSC decided Wednesday to slap a significant cap on Pyongyang's exports of coal and apply other restrictions on the reclusive state in a bid to cut off the main source of hard currency. Cutting the inflow of money will make it harder for Pyongyang to pursue its nuclear and ballistic missile programs. In an apparent protest against the U.N. move, the North's leader said that "nobody and nothing" could survive the North Korean military's strikes. "If a war breaks out, such a deadly strike should be inflicted upon the South Korean forces to completely break their will of counteraction at the start and make a clean sweep of them," Kim was quoted as saying by the KCNA.

Moscow - Russia said on Friday it had uncovered a plot by foreign spy agencies to sow chaos in Russia's banking system via a coordinated wave of cyber attacks and fake social media reports about banks going bust. Russia's domestic intelligence agency, the Federal Security Service (FSB), said in a statement that the servers to be used in the alleged cyber attack were located in the Netherlands, and were registered to a Ukrainian web hosting company called BlazingFast. The attack was to have started on Dec. 5, and its targets were a number of major national and provincial banks in several Russian cities, the statement said. Anton Onoprichuk, director of Kiev-based BlazingFast, said neither the FSB nor any other intelligence agency had been in touch with his company. He told Reuters he was waiting for more information so the firm could investigate. Asked if his servers could be used to mount a cyber attack he said: "Technically it is possible. Tehran - The US Senate has passed a 10-year extension of existing sanctions against Iran, sending the measure to the White House for President Barack Obama to sign into law. Senators on Thursday unanimously backed the renewal of the Iran Sanctions Act (ISA) by a vote of 99 to 0. The House of Representatives voted 419 to 1 last month to reauthorize ISA, which was first introduced in 1996 to punish investments in Iran's energy industry based on accusations that Tehran was pursuing non-civilian objectives in its nuclear energy program. The Obama administration has expressed reservations about the utility of the legislation, but congressional aides said they expected Obama would sign it when it reached his desk. The act is set to expire at the end of 2016. Alep - Des familles tentant de quitter les quartiers est ont été bombardées par des tirs d'artillerie. Ils avaient enfilé leur manteau d'hiver, en prévision des nuits qu'il faudrait peut-être passer dehors. Ils portaient à l'épaule ou tiraient derrière eux de gros bagages, remplis de tous les effets qu'ils n'avaient pu se résoudre à abandonner. Terrorisés par deux semaines de bombardements, à court de nourriture après quatre mois de siège, ces habitants des quartiers est d'Alep, contrôlés par la rébellion anti-Assad, avaient choisi de passer de l'autre côté, dans les secteurs ouest, aux mains des forces loyalistes. Un trajet à haut risque, qu'ils s'étaient décidés à emprunter sous l'effet de la peur, de la faim et peut-être aussi de la propagande gouvernementale, appelant les gens à quitter les zones aux mains des " terroristes ", le terme que Damas réserve à tous ses opposants. Mais ces familles n'ont jamais atteint leur destination. Mercredi 30 novembre au matin, alors qu'elles marchaient en direction de la ligne de démarcation, dans Jub Al-Kubbah, un quartier du vieil Alep, une pluie d'obus s'est abattue sur leurs têtes. Les images saisies quelques minutes plus tard par les militants du Aleppo Media Center, un organe acquis à l'opposition, montrent une rue en ruines, jonchée de valises, de flaques de sang et de corps en charpie. Le bombardement a fait 45 morts et des dizaines de blessés, selon les casques blancs, la défense civile de la partie est d'Alep, qui impute ce carnage à l'artillerie gouvernementale.

46. Biometric database, fingerprinting to be required for all IDs in Israel

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, 2016 12 02

Jerusalem - Interior Minister Arye Deri has decided to push to mandate the joining of the national biometric database, including taking finger prints and facial recognition pictures for all identity cards going forward, he announced on Wednesday. It is still unclear whether Deri will garner a Knesset majority to make the requirement law, but every recent interior minister has supported the initiative, even as the Movement for Digital Rights and some cyber experts have opposed it for fear of rampant hacking threats and invasion of privacy. The debate has lasted years and included multiple extensions of a pilot program which has taken in a sizable portion, though still a minority, of the country's citizens. Those objecting would still have their fingerprints and facial recognition picture taken, but it would only be connected to their smart-card, not placed in the database, and as a penalty of sorts, they would need to renew their ID cards every five years instead of every 10 years.

47. No roads to safety for terrified east Aleppo residents

The National (UAE), Josh Wood, 2016 12 02

Beirut/Aleppo - In a lightning offensive, Syrian government forces have driven the rebels from about 40 per cent of their territory in eastern Aleppo over the past week. The quarter of a million or so civilians trapped in rebel territory faced a grim choice: stay put and hope for the best, try to run across the front line or flee deeper into rebel territory. About 50,000 civilians have made it out of eastern Aleppo this week, with 30,000 arriving in the Kurdish neighbourhood of Sheikh Maqsoud and 20,000 in government-held western Aleppo, according the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, a UK-based monitoring group. But others, like Mr Al Qassem, have stayed in rebel territory. When the world thinks about Syria's displaced, images of refugees on crowded dinghies aimed at European shores and closed borders come to mind. But in Aleppo, some of the most harrowing flights of the war are measured by city blocks, metres and minutes.

48. UN envoy lands in Aden to meet Yemen president

Gulf News, Saeed Al Batati, 2016 12 02

Al Mukalla - United Nations envoy to Yemen Esmail Ould Shaikh Ahmad on Thursday arrived in Yemen's port city of Aden to convince the internationally-recognised president and his government to change their stance on his latest peace plan, local government officials said. President Abd Rabbo Mansour Hadi, who is currently based in Aden, has strongly opposed the plan that demands him and vice-president to step down and hand over their powers to a new vice-president in exchange for Al Houthis withdrawing from cities under their control and handing over arms to neutral army units. Ahead of Ould Shaikh Ahmad's visit to Aden, Yemen's government urged the UN envoy to change the plan's terms as to comply with the UN Security Council resolution 2216 that obliges Al Houthis to pull out of cities and allow the government to return to Sana'a before making any political arrangements.

49. Arrestation près de Madrid d'un Marocain pour propagande jihadiste

La Relève (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 12 01

Aranjuez, Espagne - La police nationale espagnole a procédé, mercredi à Aranjuez (près de Madrid), à l'arrestation d'un ressortissant marocain soupçonné de propagande jihadiste en faveur de l'organisation terroriste Daech, indique le ministère espagnol de l'Intérieur. Le mis en cause, considéré comme un "dangereux" terroriste du type "loup solitaire", se formait sur Internet dans l'objectif de commettre des attentats terroristes contre la population, précise la même source dans un communiqué. "Il s'était radicalisé durant les derniers mois, affichant un fanatisme intense et visualisant de manière régulière des enregistrements vidéos d'endoctrinement et d'instruction pour la mise en oeuvre d'actes terroristes individuels contre la population civile", ajoute le communiqué.

51. Europol: 'IS' likely to target EU in 'near future'

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 12 02

Berlin - The so-called "Islamic State" group is likely to carry out terror attacks in the European Union in the near future, Europol said in a report on Friday. The Sunni extremist group has "both the will and the capability" to strike both soft and hard targets in Europe, especially those countries participating in the anti-IS coalition, the EU police agency said. "EU Member States that participate in the anti-IS coalition are regarded by IS as legitimate targets," it said, pointing to particular risk in France, Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The report warns that as IS is weakened and defeated in Syria and Iraq, foreign fighters may return to Europe with their families, posing a long-term security challenge. "Estimates from some intelligence services indicate several dozen people directed by IS may be currently present in Europe with a capability to commit terrorist attacks," Europol said. Europol said IS is likely to shift tactics to attack soft targets instead of better-protected targets like police, military and infrastructure.

52. Europol alerte sur le risque d'attentat à la voiture piégée en Europe

Sud Ouest avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 02

Non identifié - L'Office européen de police alerte sur la probabilité de l'utilisation d'explosifs dans des voitures piégées par des terroristes du groupe Etat islamique en Europe C'est un mode opératoire maintes fois éprouvé par les terroristes en Irak ou en Syrie. D'après Europol, l'Office européen de police, les réseaux terroristes tels que le groupe Etat islamique pourraient avoir recours à des voitures piégées pour atteindre leurs cibles en Europe. "L'utilisation d'engins artisanaux, d'explosifs militaires ou achetés dans le commerce dans des voitures piégées n'a pas encore été employée par le groupe EI en Europe", selon un rapport publié à La Haye. Mais "étant donné que les modes opératoires utilisés au Moyen-Orient ont tendance à être copiés par les terroristes en Europe... il est tout à fait concevable que le groupe EI les utilise à un moment", selon la même source. Jusqu'à présent, aucune voiture piégée n'a été utilisée sur le continent européen, mais Europol rappelle que le groupe responsable des attaques à Paris et Bruxelles l'avait envisagé avant de changer de plans face à l'intervention de la police. 53. Europol Highlights Ongoing ISIS Threat to Europe, Says Tactics Evolving

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 12 02

The Hague - Europol said on Friday that ISIS is likely to carry out new operations in the European Union in the near future, adding that terrorist groups are evolving their tactics to attack soft targets in the EU. "Estimates from some intelligence services indicate several dozen people directed by ISIS may be currently present in Europe with a capability to commit terrorist attacks," the EU police agency said in a report, which draws on counterterrorism intelligence from around Europe and also cites media reports and previously publicized calls by jihadist leaders for attacks. But ISIS also is adept at inspiring marginalized youths, some of whom may have mental health problems, and inciting them to carry out attacks. The report, which was issued in The Hague, warned that tactics the group uses in Iraq and Syria -- such as the use of car bombs -- could also be deployed in Europe.

54. Radicalisation: c'est aussi l'affaire des patrons

La Nouvelle République des Pyrénées, Philippe Abetel, 2016 12 02

Hautes-Pyrénées - Les chefs d'entreprise du département ont été conviés à une réunion d'information, dans les locaux de la CCI, sur les façons de repérer des personnes en voie de radicalisation dans l'entreprise. « Nous sommes ici pour vous informer et vous sensibiliser, vous chefs d'entreprise, vous aider à cerner les contours et manifestations de la radicalisation éventuelle de vos employés. » Béatrice Lagarde, préfète des Hautes-Pyrénées, animait, lundi, dans les locaux de la CCI, une soirée d'information, présentant le travail effectué dans le département en la matière. « Cette lutte passe par un travail pluri-institutionnel », a-t-elle précisé, insistant sur le fait que notre département n'est pas à l'abri avec quarante signalements pour radicalisation. Deux services de police sont en charge de cette mission, le Renseignement territorial (anciennement Renseignements généraux) sur place et les services de Sécurité intérieure basés à Toulouse. 32 individus étant en charge du premier service au mois d'octobre, une dizaine pour le second.

55. Une vingtaine de mosquées radicales fermées en un an

Le Figaro, Jean-Marie Guénois, 2016 12 02

Paris - En une année le gouvernement français a fermé une vingtaine de mosquées ou salles de prière musulmanes radicalisées. Dont 17 en Île-de-France. Si le ministère de l'Intérieur estime que 150 lieux de culte sur 2 500 sont touchés par l'influence salafiste, les experts y ajoutent autant d'associations qui attirent par leur rigorisme un public jeune, susceptible d'être conduit au djihadisme. Un chiffre relatif toutefois car les professionnels du secteur savent que les réseaux les plus dangereux se caractérisent par leur discrétion, encore aiguisée par l'état d'urgence. La fermeture de lieux de culte, si elle exprime une politique publique de fermeté, n'apparaît donc pas aux yeux des connaisseurs comme la panacée pour vaincre un phénomène clandestin qui évite par nature tout lieu repérable. À commencer par les mosquées... Autre problème : sur le plan théologique, le salafisme tend à un « retour aux sources » de l'islam mais dans une approche « quiétiste » visant à couper le croyant de toute implication politique afin qu'il se consacre aux choses de Dieu. Mais cette attitude de non-engagement temporel favorise un flou profond quand il s'agit de prouver, sur le plan juridique, si un discours d'obédience salafiste contient des « propos constituant une provocation à la haine ou à la violence », comme le précise l'article 8 de la loi de 1955 sur l'état d'urgence.

56. What we know about the 'gay porn star turned Islamist spy'

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 12 01

Berlin - News this week that a member of the BfV was a suspected Islamist was already strange enough, but then both the Washington Post and Bild reported that the suspect of Spanish origin had starred in gay porn videos, found while investigators searched his home. The case has raised questions about security flaws in the intelligence service and it will perhaps take some time before all the answers are revealed, but here's what we know so far. The suspect was arrested on November 17th after chatting online with a man posing as another Islamist - who the suspect didn't realize was actually a colleague at the intelligence agency. The suspect made "Islamist remarks online under a false name", according to the BfV. He also offered internal information during the chat. According to information obtained by DPA and other news outlets, the man had also told his chat partner that he could give other like-minded people access to the headquarters of the BfV in Cologne. Specifically, he would warn other Islamists about police action and help make an attack on the BfV possible. The man also told his online friend that an attack on the BfV would be "assuredly in the interest of Allah", and that he was ready "to help [his] brothers". Security sources told DPA and the Süddeutsche Zeitung that the man had lived near Abu Walaa, one of the central figures of the German Islamist scene, who was arrested at the beginning of November, though it was not clear if they personally knew one another.

57. Wikileaks releases 2,420 documents from German government NSA inquiry

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 12 02

Berlin - The documents contained 90 gigabytes of information including many classified documents, according to the statement on the Wikileaks website on Thursday. They are the property of government agencies such as the Federal Intelligence Service (BND, pictured above) and the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BfV). The published materials had been submitted last year as part of a German parliamentary inquiry into the surveillance activities of the BND and its cooperation with the NSA. "The collection contains early agreements between the BND and the NSA and internal processes at the BND, but also more recent details on the close collaboration between the two agencies," Wikileaks announced, adding: "This substantial new collection of primary source documents provides significant new evidence (of their collaboration)." The documents, Wikileaks claimed, contain the answers to questions posed by the inquiry committee as well as administrative documents, correspondence, agreements and press reactions. Wikileaks says there are 125 documents from the BND, 33 from the BfV and 72 from the Federal Office for Information Security (BSI). Wikileaks announced the documents contained "a detailed insight, not just into the agencies themselves, but also into the mechanics of the inquiry." This included information on which private US companies were operating in Germany's security sector.

1. Canada asks citizens: How would you like us to spy on you?

The Register (UK), Shaun Nichols, 2016 12 06

London - The Canadian government is asking citizens to weigh in on its plans for digital surveillance programs. A government-hosted page called Investigative Capabilities in a Digital World seeks input from residents on matters such as intercepting communications, forcing data decryption, and requiring service providers in Canada to store and retain customer data. Last year, Canadian lawmakers passed a controversial law aimed at greatly expanding the powers of Canadian intelligence agencies to gather information on citizens. Canada, of course, is one of the "five eyes" nations named in the Edward Snowden intelligence dump. The country's spies were found to be using covert tactics such as airport hotspots and false flag operations.

2. Canadian security agencies 'consulting' with U.S. Homeland Security to vet Syrian refugees coming to Canada

The Hill Times, Abbas Rana, 2016 12 06

Canadian security agencies responsible for vetting the thousands of Syrian refugees who have been arriving in Canada since late last year have been using a "robust" and "multi-layered" security check process that includes consulting U.S. Homeland Security databases. "On the Syrian refugee decisions, we consulted with the Americans on everyone to make sure there was not somebody identified as a security risk," said Gary Doer, former Canadian ambassador to the U.S. from October 2009 to March 2016, at a panel discussion organized by The Literary Review of Canada, on its 25-year anniversary gala in Toronto on Oct. 13. "We had an agreement with Homeland Security and the United States, and a protocol of what we were going through. They would alert us too if there were any security problems that they became aware of--somebody we didn't know as part of that refugee group that was embedded as a potential terrorist in either one of our countries. There was a procedure in place before the election in Canada and after the election took place in Canada, and it remains between our two countries," said Mr. Doer.

Approved Syrian refugees who come to Canada receive the permanent resident status at first, but after three years are eligible to apply for Canadian citizenship. Asked for a comment last week, Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Minister Ralph Goodale's (Wascana, Sask.) office referred The Hill Times to a press conference Mr. Goodale held in Ottawa last year held to explain the process of bringing in the Syrian refugees. Mr. Goodale told reporters the security mechanism used by Canadians to screen Syrian refugees was designed by the Departments of Immigration and Refugees Canada, the Department of National Defence, the Canada Border Services Agency, CSIS and the RCMP. He added that the security screening system included "checking against Canadian and U.S. databases." "It includes the identification of vulnerable applicants to come to Canada soon," Mr. Goodale said on Nov. 24, 2015, at the National Press Theatre. "It includes thorough, professional, personal interviews of each and every applicant. It includes the collection of biometric data. It includes checking against Canadian and U.S. database. It includes the checking and rechecking of identification at every stage in this process." In the press conference, Mr. Goodale said the "safety and security" aspect is the top priority for Canada in this humanitarian assistance project. To achieve this objective, he said, the Canadian officials complete the security screening process overseas prior to the approval of any application. And once these refugees arrive in Canada, the CBSA also double checks that the proper procedure was followed before these refugees applications were granted Canadian immigration.

3. Enlisting Beijing to help stop fentanyl exports won't be easy

Globe and Mail, Charles Burton, 2016 12 06

Op-ed: So the RCMP and China's Ministry of Public Security have announced they will work together to combat the surge of fentanyl and other opioids flowing from China into Canada. The need for action is undoubtedly urgent. Fentanyl has been the instrument of death for hundreds of heroin and cocaine users in Canada, and CSIS intelligence suggests almost all the fentanyl comes from small synthetic chemical factories all over China. Canada is unable to suppress the demand for it, and it is impossible to stop fentanyl from relentlessly arriving by mail in small quantities. So the only measure left is to get Chinese police to put a stop to the killer chemical from leaving the factories where it is manufactured. For students of Chinese history, there's irony in Canada's demand on moral grounds that China suppress the export of a synthetic opioid. In the 19th century, opium addiction in China was rampant, and the opium was almost entirely imported into China from British India. In response, China implemented the world's earliest drug laws, making the sale, import and consumption of opium illegal. In Victorian England, however, opium eating was quite legal, and as all Chinese schoolchildren are now taught, Britain's refusal to respect Chinese law and ban the export of opium into China was a signal event in Chinese history. Note: Charles Burton is an associate professor of political science at Brock University in St. Catharines, Ont., and is a former counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Beijing.

5. Security shouldn't trump privacy, watchdogs to tell Trudeau government

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 12 06

Ottawa - Privacy commissioners from across the country will tell the Trudeau government today to make respect for personal information a cornerstone of its revamped national security policy. Federal privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien and all of his provincial and territorial counterparts are signing a joint submission to the government's security review. Therrien and privacy czars from two provinces _ Ontario's Brian Beamish and Jean Charter of Quebec _ will appear in Ottawa today to discuss the submission. Therrien's office says it will address key issues including information sharing, encryption and the collection and use of metadata by national security agencies and law enforcement. In October, Therrien told a House of Commons committee it is crucial that there be more transparency about national security so that Canadians can better understand the issues. Therrien said while there are obviously limits to transparency when national security is at stake, more can and should be done. The government has requested public feedback on issues ranging from sharing information and preventing attacks to conducting surveillance and ensuring intelligence agencies are accountable. In last year's election campaign, the Liberals promised to repeal "problematic elements" of omnibus security legislation, known as C-51, ushered in by the previous Conservative government. The bill gave the Canadian Security Intelligence Service explicit powers to disrupt terrorist threats, not just gather information about them. The legislation also created a new offence of promoting the commission of terrorist offences and broadened the government's no-fly list powers. The Trudeau government has committed to ensure all CSIS warrants respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to preserve legitimate protest and advocacy and to define terrorist propaganda more clearly. The Liberals say they say will do a better job of balancing collective security with rights and freedoms. Just last month a Federal Court judge ruled that CSIS violated the law by keeping potentially revealing electronic data over a 10-year period about people who were not targets of investigation. CSIS processed the data beginning in 2006 through its Operational Data Analysis Centre to produce intelligence that can reveal specific details about individuals. The improperly retained material was metadata _ information associated with a communication, such as a telephone number or email address, but not the message itself.

7. Everybody knows : Documents show the RCMP still won't admit they're using cellphone tracking hardware, even though we've already proven they do

Vice News, Justin Ling, 2016 12 06

In the middle of a national debate over government spying, Canada's federal police force is still refusing to provide any details regarding some of its most powerful, and controversial, surveillance powers. New documents, obtained by VICE News through the Access to Information Act, show that the RCMP is fighting to ensure that the public doesn't find out any more details about how it uses cellphone-tracking technology. It won't even admit that it owns the devices. The RCMP refers to the technology as "mobile device identifiers," but they are more commonly known as International Mobile Subscriber Identity catchers (IMSI catchers) or by the brand name, Stingray. Depending on the model, those devices can track cellphones, log phone calls, and even intercept voice and text communications. But the documents note that, even as the devices have "garnered significant media and public attention," the RCMP will not be answering any questions about them. The briefing notes encourage Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale to "highlight that we do not speak about specific tools or capabilities, regardless of what might be available in the public domain." This, despite the fact that Goodale is running a national consultation on national security that is supposed to be addressing police surveillance powers. VICE News reported last week that the RCMP was looking to open up public debate and create a "new public narrative" on the new surveillance powers they're seeking.

8. Judge in Habib terrorism case to rule on 'Mr. Big' scenario

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 12 06

Montreal - The terrorism trial of Ismaël Habib continued Monday with an undercover RCMP agent being cross-examined about what he was offering the alleged jihadist, and the information he gleaned in return. But in the background, defence lawyer Charles Montpetit made it clear that he would argue the evidence gathered from taped conversations with the accused is inadmissible - possibly leading to the charges against Habib being dismissed. Habib, 29, is accused of trying to leave the country to commit terrorist acts abroad - namely with ISIL in Syria - and giving false information to obtain a passport. Arrested in February, 2016, Habib is only the second Canadian to be tried under so-called terrorist travel legislation enacted in 2013, and the first adult. But much of the evidence against Habib was gathered in a "Mr. Big" type of scenario, in which an RCMP agent played the role of a crime boss, offering employment to Habib - and in this case help getting a passport and safe passage to Syria - as long as he comes clean about his past and his current intentions. Before he heard any new evidence Monday, Quebec Court Judge Serge Delisle announced he would rule on whether the scenario presented to Habib fit the definition of a Mr. Big scenario and, if so, whether the statements Habib made to Mr. Big are admissible. First, Delisle would hear all the evidence, however.

9. Ottawa says it's working to win release of former soldier arrested in Iraq

Canadian Press, Michael Macdonald, 2016 12 06

A former Canadian soldier being held in Iraq is in good health and Canadian Embassy officials are working to win his release, federal cabinet minister Judy Foote confirmed Monday. Foote, the senior minister responsible for Newfoundland and Labrador, spoke to Mike Kennedy's mother in Newfoundland earlier in the day, said press secretary Jessica Turner. Kay Kennedy told radio station VOXM her son was arrested in Erbil in northern Iraq while taking part in what she called a humanitarian mission. She said she was speaking with him on Tuesday evening, when she realized something was wrong. "He wasn't his upbeat self," she told VOXM. "He was very abrupt in his answers to me. Then, all of a sudden, he said, 'Mum, I gotta go.'" The woman told VOXM she hasn't heard from her son since then, but she said a friend of his later confirmed via text message from northern Iraq that her son had been arrested after returning from a mission in northern Syria. Kay Kennedy told the radio station it appeared there was a problem with some documents, suggesting some had expired. She said she was sure her son's visa was good until January. The stress of having a son in a war zone is nothing new for Kennedy. On April 8, 2007, her son Kevin was one of six Canadian soldiers killed in Afghanistan when their light armoured vehicle struck a roadside bomb. The six were all members of the 2nd Battalion, Royal Canadian Regiment based at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown in New Brunswick.

10. Pipeline activists arrested

Montreal Gazette, Christopher Curtis, 2016 12 06

Montreal - Greenpeace activists were arrested Monday morning after chaining themselves to a gate and pipes at the Valero docks in Montreal's east end. Four activists locked themselves onto equipment at the port - including a fence and pipes that load tanker ships with bitumen from Alberta's oilsands. Two others had climbed onto infrastructure at the port and unfurled a banner that read: Stop Pipelines: Protect Our Water and Climate. Police were called to the scene shortly after Greenpeace arrived at 6 a.m. It took hours to pry the activists free while tactical police worked with the fire department to retrieve the people who scaled the port's infrastructure. The group's action comes just days after the federal government approved the construction of two new pipelines linking the oilsands to the Pacific coast and the midwestern United States. "If (Prime Minister) Justin Trudeau thought the protests would be limited to downtown Vancouver, he was mistaken," said Keith Stewart, a spokesperson for the environmental group. "This is a national movement. We're determined to stop these pipelines and protect our water." The pipes at the Port of Montreal pump oil from the city's refineries into tankers from Quebec City and elsewhere.

Montréal - Les aveux du suspect de terrorisme Ismaël Habib à un agent d'infiltration de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), qu'il croyait être le chef d'une organisation criminelle, peuvent-ils être retenus contre lui ? C'est la question à laquelle devra répondre le juge Serge Delisle, qui préside le procès du Montréalais depuis la semaine dernière. Sa décision pourrait à elle seule sceller l'avenir de l'accusé, premier adulte canadien à avoir un procès en vertu de l'article 83.181 du Code criminel pour avoir quitté ou tenté de quitter le pays afin de participer aux activités d'un groupe terroriste. Une partie importante de la preuve présentée jusqu'à maintenant par la Couronne contre M. 12. Soupçonné de terrorisme Un homme accusé d'avoir menacé de faire exploser une bombe

TVA Nouvelles, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 06

Ottawa - La liste des accusations qui pèsent sur Tevis Gonyou-McLean, un homme soupçonné d'avoir voulu quitter le pays pour se joindre à l'État islamique, s'est encore allongée, a rapporté le «Ottawa Citizen». Selon le quotidien, l'homme de 25 ans a été accusé d'avoir menacé de faire sauter le quartier général de la police d'Ottawa. Il aurait proféré cette menace alors qu'il était en détention après sa seconde arrestation, pour bris de condition, le 5 novembre dernier. M. Gonyou-McLean a été libéré sous conditions le 30 novembre dernier. Il doit porter en tout temps un bracelet GPS, respecter un couvre-feu et ne pas chercher à obtenir de matériel ou d'information en lien avec l'organisation État islamique, entre autres conditions. Le suspect a été arrêté pour une première fois le 12 août dernier, deux jours après la mort d' Aaron Driver, qui a fait exploser une bombe dans un taxi alors qu'il s'apprêtait à aller commettre un attentat en Ontario. Selon la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), Tevis Gonyou-McLean aurait eu l'intention de quitter le pays pour aller rejoindre l'EI ou, encore, de commettre un acte terroriste.

13. Terror suspect accused of threat to bomb police HQ

Ottawa Citizen, Gary Dimmock, 2016 12 06

Ottawa - A suspected Ottawa terrorist arrested on Nov. 5 for breaching strict conditions of his peace bond is facing a new criminal charge after he allegedly threatened to bomb Ottawa police headquarters on Elgin Street. Tevis Gonyou-McLean, who denies any links to ISIL or its supporters, has been charged by Ottawa police with uttering death threats after a special constable in the station's cellblocks reported the alleged comments to a superior officer. The bomb-threat charge stems from his Nov. 5 arrest. Gonyou-McLean was originally arrested in August on RCMP fears that the Muslim convert would engage in terrorism. They didn't charge him with terrorism offences but were granted a terrorism peace bond to restrict his movements. In the August arrest - two days after ISIL-supporter Aaron Driver was killed in Strathroy, Ont., in a confrontation with police - Gonyou-McLean was also charged with uttering death threats to "unspecified persons." He was later arrested twice on a series of breaches of his release conditions - including allegations that he once smashed his GPS ankle monitor and another time managed to slip out of it. While awaiting a bail hearing, the 25-year-old man, who has no criminal record, was housed in the same segregation cell as a 350-pound convicted sex offender who later beat him up after accusing Gonyou-McLean of stealing his candy. Gonyou-McLean has told the Citizen he doesn't know any ISIL sympathizers and only wants to pray and make pizza.

For 266 hellish nights in the clutches of the Abu Sayyaf Group, Robert Hall held out hope that Canadian soldiers were coming to the rescue. Hall, 66, had an engineer's mind. He was a problem-solver. He understood this was a problem for the best of the best. The Canadians would sweep into the Philippine jungle after dark, Hall assured his fiancée and fellow captive Marites Flor. And when they came for one, they would come for all - Hall, Flor, fellow Canadian John Ridsdel and Norwegian hostage Kjartan Sekkingstad. They all had to be alert. Always. Tonight. Tomorrow. "Every single night, Robert told me, "Tess, stay close. Be prepared. We have to be ready for the special forces," says Flor, who was dumped from a Jeep and staggered to freedom 10 days after Hall was executed in June. Military rescues rarely work - hostages often get killed. Canadian forces cannot act independently in sovereign nations. The killing of Osama bin Laden at Zero Dark Thirty is a Hollywood rarity - and one fraught with problems. But Hall had reason to believe: his was a family of Canadian military pedigree, from an uncle on the beaches of Normandy to a son who had served in Afghanistan. Hall would never live to learn the heartbreaking truth: Joint Task Force 2, the jewel of Canada's special ops command, was in the Philippines, the Star can confirm. But not in a position to strike. A team arrived within days of the abductions, according to highly placed sources close to JTF2. They spent the next nine months on the ground without ever growing into a full-strength assault team. The Canadian soldiers were kept on a short leash, never given the green light to team up with their Philippine special forces counterparts. And a Canadian-led rescue was never in the cards.

15. An overseas tip about a plot to bomb a Red Line station prompts officials to increase security across L.A.

Los Angeles Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 06

Los Angeles - An overseas tip about an imminent bombing of the Metro Red Line's Universal City station forced federal and local law enforcement in Los Angeles to swiftly ramp up security across its sprawling transit system, authorities said Monday. An anonymous man warned of a potential attack on Tuesday and provided the information on a tip line abroad, said Deidre Fike, the assistant director in charge of the FBI's office in Los Angeles. The tip line was run by an unidentified foreign government, which relayed the information Monday morning to an FBI terrorism task force. Fike declined to specify from which country the tip originated but said it was delivered in English. At a hastily called news conference Monday night, the FBI as well as Los Angeles-area law enforcement leaders said the threat was considered specific and imminent, but investigators were still examining its credibility.

16. Appeals Court to Examine Ex-CIA Officer's Leak Conviction

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 06

Richmond, Va. - The case of former CIA officer convicted of leaking classified details of an operation to thwart Iran's nuclear program is heading to a federal appeals court. The 4th U.S.

Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments in Jeffrey Sterling's case Tuesday. Sterling was sentenced to 3 1/2 years in prison after being convicted in 2015 of leaking details of a CIA mission to New York Times journalist James Risen. The leaked mission involved giving flawed nuclear blueprints to Iran in the hopes that they would spend years trying to develop a product that would never work. Sterling maintains that he wasn't Risen's source.

17. Facebook and Other Tech Companies Seek to Curb the Flow of Terrorist Content

New York Times, Mike Isaac, 2016 12 06

San Francisco - For all the good that has come from the internet, the online world has also served as a powerful device for recruiting terrorists and spreading their propaganda. A coalition of top technology companies is now trying to change that. Facebook, Google, Twitter and Microsoft announced on Monday that they have teamed up to fight the spread of terrorist content over the web by sharing technology and information to reduce the flow of terrorist propaganda across their services. The group plans to create a kind of shared digital database, "fingerprinting" all of the terrorist content that is flagged. By collectively tracking that information, the companies said they could make sure a video posted on Twitter, for instance, did not appear later on Facebook. "Throughout this collaboration, we are committed to protecting our users' privacy and their ability to express themselves freely and safely on our platforms," the companies said in a statement. They added they were discussing other ways "to prevent the spread of terrorist content online while respecting human rights."

18. Finding Hate Crimes on the Rise, Leaders Condemn Vicious Acts

New York Times, Sarah Maslin Nir, 2016 12 06

New York - On Monday morning, a man shoved a New York City Transit worker down a staircase at Grand Central Terminal in Manhattan, screaming that she was a terrorist. Two days earlier, in Brooklyn, another man threatened an off-duty police officer with his pit bull, telling her and her son to "go back to your country." Both women were wearing hijabs. Hate crimes in New York City have risen in the weeks since Donald J. Trump won the presidential election, a noticeable spike that encompasses ethnic minorities, Jews, whites and people for their sexual orientation. In New York City, 43 episodes have been deemed possible hate crimes by the Police Department's Hate Crime Task Force since Election Day, more than double the number reported for the same period last year. To date, there has been a 35 percent increase over last year. The incidents range from vicious graffiti to physical violence.

19. Gen. John Kelly seen as leading contender for DHS

Politico, Eliana Johnson, 2016 12 06

Washington - Retired Marine General John Kelly has emerged as the top contender to lead President-elect Donald Trump's Department of Homeland Security, according to three sources close to the transition. Kelly, 66, whose military career spanned more than four decades, retired earlier this year as the chief of U.S. Southern Command. In that post, where he oversaw military operations in most of Central and South America, he publicly clashed with the Obama administration on its plans - which were never executed - to close Guantanamo Bay and dismissed as "foolishness" concerns that the military's treatment of detainees at the facility had cost the U.S. the moral high ground in the War on Terror. His addition to the Trump administration would likely have implications on candidates for remaining cabinet posts. If formally offered the position, Kelly would be the third general tapped by the president-elect, in addition to Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who will serve as Trump's national security adviser, and retired Gen. James Mattis, who Trump said Thursday he intended to nominate as his Defense Secretary. Concerns about the number of military officials in Trump's cabinet may harm the prospects of another military man, retired Gen. David Petraeus, whom Trump is considering for secretary of state.

20. Obama Has a Plan to Fix Cybersecurity, But Its Success Depends on Trump

Wired (US), Andy Greenberg, 2016 12 05

New York - The Obama White House has had to reckon with cybersecurity like no other presidential administration in history, from China's 2009 hack of Google, to the Office of Personnel Management breach, to the rise of botnets built from dangerously insecure "internet-of-things" devices. Now, in the waning days of Obama's presidency, his team has a new plan to shore up America's protections from digital threats. Whether any of it happens, though, is up to Donald Trump. Late Friday afternoon last week, the White House's Commission on Enhancing National Cybersecurity released the results of a nine-month study of America's cybersecurity problems. Its recommendations, in a hundred-page report, cover a lot of ground. It proposes fixing the shambolic security of internet-of-things consumer devices like routers and webcams, re-organizing responsibility for the cybersecurity of federal agencies, and fostering a new generation of skilled American cybersecurity experts, among other actionable steps. But as President Obama acknowledged in a statement accompanying those recommendations, actualizing them is largely out of his hands. He asked the cybersecurity commission to brief President-elect Trump's transition team on its work as soon as possible. "As the Commission's report counsels, we have the opportunity to change the balance further in our favor in cyberspace-- but only if we take additional bold action to do so," Obama writes. "Now it is time for the next Administration to take up this charge and ensure that cyberspace can continue to be the driver for prosperity, innovation, and change--both in the United States and around the world." Whether the Trump team will in fact accept the commission's advice--or even its briefing request--remains a mystery. "No one in Washington knows what he's going to do," says Alan Paller, the director of research at the security-focused SANS Institute and a former cybersecurity advisor to the Department of Homeland Security under George W. Bush. Paller says that even Trump's potential appointments for cybersecurity policy positions remain an unknown. "It's very challenging to know who will be picked, and whether this [report] will have anything to do with their priorities." The Trump transition team didn't respond to WIRED's request for comment.

21. Obama to tout counterterror legacy, even as Trump threatens changes

CNN.com, Kevin Liptak, 2016 12 06

Washington - President Barack Obama plans to provide a final summation of his national security record Tuesday, reaffirming his counterterrorism strategy even as his successor has threatened to reverse course on many of Obama's priorities. During a speech at MacDill Air Force Base, the Florida headquarters of US Central Command and Special Operations Command, Obama plans to again argue for closing the naval prison at Guantanamo Bay and maintaining a ban on torture -- both areas where President-elect Donald Trump says he'll change course. Ben Rhodes, Obama's deputy national security adviser, told reporters Monday that Obama was not attempting to send a message directly to Trump through his speech. But he said there would be important takeaways for the next commander-in-chief included in Obama's remarks. "Part of what he's going to relay that I think is relevant to the incoming team ... is the complexity at looking at all of these issues," Rhodes said.

22. Other Than ISIS: Half of U.S. Terror Suspects Support ISIS Rival Groups, New Report Details

ABC News, James Gordon Meek, 2016 12 06

New York - Almost half of the suspects charged with terrorism offenses in the U.S. since the Syrian civil war began five years ago have not associated themselves with ISIS but with the group's bitter rivals such as al-Qaeda or embraced the broader jihadist ideology, a new study by George Washington University's Program on Extremism has found. While emphasis is often placed on whether ISIS directs or inspires terrorism suspects who attack or are arrested before carrying out attacks, the new study suggests that radicalization to Islamist violence will be a problem in the West far beyond the existence of ISIS or other groups because of an extreme ideology many find alluring. The study, entitled "Not Just The Caliphate," which was provided to ABC News in advance of its release today, examined 178 individual terrorism cases since 2011 inside the United States. Researchers found that - alongside those lured to the self-declared "caliphate" created in Syria and Iraq by terror leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi more than two years ago - 79 individuals nabbed by law enforcement on terror charges supported a dozen other U.S.-designated foreign terrorist groups. Those groups including al-Qaeda and the Taliban espouse a similar Salafist-jihadi ideology, but are each locked in a bloody war with ISIS from Iraq to Afghanistan to North Africa. "Most aspiring militants at the grassroots level in the West care little about the divisions between the Islamic State and al-Qaeda, they just want to fight jihad. What attracts them is a common ideology, a blend that takes from all jihadists groups and ideologues without much distinction," said Lorenzo Vidino, director of the Program on Extremism, who oversaw the research.

23. Panel Backs Warrantless Collection of Email

New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 12 06

Washington - A federal appeals court on Monday upheld the 2013 conviction of a Somali-American man for trying to detonate a bomb at a Christmas tree lighting ceremony in Portland, Ore., rejecting his arguments that the F.B.I. had entrapped him and that the government had unconstitutionally intercepted his emails without a warrant. The ruling -- by a three-judge panel of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco -- was particularly important because it upheld the government's use of emails gathered without a warrant under the FISA Amendments Act of 2008. The law permits the government, on domestic soil, to collect phone calls and emails of noncitizens abroad, even when they are communicating with an American. The case centered on Mohamed Mohamud, who was 19 when he tried to blow up what he thought was a bomb. In fact, there was no danger: The plot had been orchestrated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of a sting operation. Mr. Mohamud was sentenced to 30 years in prison. He appealed, arguing that the conviction should be overturned in part because the government had used evidence derived from warrantless surveillance. But the panel upheld the verdict. "Many young people think and say alarming things that they later disavow, and we will never know if Mohamud -- a young man with promise -- would have carried out a mass attack absent the F.B.I.'s involvement," Judge John B. Owens wrote for the panel. But, he went on, some such people "take the next step, leading to horrific consequences."

24. Red Cross Poll: Americans Warm to Torture and Indiscriminate Bombing

The Daily Beast, Kimberly Dozier, 2016 12 05

Washington - Bombarded by President-Elect Donald Trump's election rhetoric promising to step up the campaign against the so-called Islamic State, Americans are more likely to accept torture and indiscriminate bombing of suspected terrorists than they were two decades ago, according to a poll by the International Committee of the Red Cross released Monday. The majority of those surveyed across more than a dozen countries including the United States still think bombing of populated areas and torturing detainees is wrong, according to the WINS/Gallup International poll, released by the ICRC. But rising numbers of people, especially Americans and Britons, said they are willing to accept less humane practices if it means winning the fight faster. The survey was conducted between June and September 2016 with 17,000 people in 16 countries, an update on a similar survey carried out by the ICRC in 1999. It specifically asked people what they thought of "torture," rather than using the Bush-era terms like "enhanced interrogation techniques" like water boarding, ice baths, and sleep deprivation. Overall, two-thirds of those surveyed said torture was wrong, but more were willing to agree to harsh interrogation of detainees than in 1999. The results are disturbing for a humanitarian organization that was set up to remind all on the battlefield to follow the laws of war as set out in the Geneva Conventions-- especially how citizens of leading nations like the U.S. and Britain seem more comfortable with harsh practices than ever before.

25. Security Adviser and Son Share Penchant for Spreading False Stories About Clinton

New York Times, Matthew Rosenberg, 2016 12 06

Washington - For Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, who is President-elect Donald J. Trump's choice for national security adviser, pushing conspiracy theories about Hillary Clinton is a family affair: Both he and his son, Michael G. Flynn, have used social media to spread fake news stories linking Mrs. Clinton to underage sex rings and other serious crimes, backed by no evidence. The Twitter habits of both men are attracting renewed attention after a man fired a rifle on Sunday inside Comet Ping Pong, a Washington pizza restaurant that was the subject of false stories during the campaign tying it and the Clinton campaign to a child sex trafficking ring. Well before he joined the Trump campaign, the elder Mr. Flynn, 57, a former director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, pushed unsubstantiated claims about Islamic law's spreading in the United States and about the attack on the American diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya. But in his emergence this year as the angry former general out to help Mr. Trump clean up Washington, Mr. Flynn added wild stories about Hillary Clinton to his stock of unproven tales. The views Mr. Flynn has aired on social media, including messages that many viewed as crossing the line into Islamophobia, and his willingness to spread fake news stories had already prompted questions about his fitness to be Mr. Trump's national security adviser.

26. Trump's Taiwan Call: A Gaffe or a New Start?

New York Times, Mark Landler, Jane Perlez, 2016 12 06

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump's motives for his unorthodox call with the leader of Taiwan remain mysterious, but some Republicans are hailing his improvisational diplomacy as a refreshing break with diplomatic rituals that date to the Richard M. Nixon administration. It could lay the groundwork, they say, for a healthier relationship with China. The question, as often with Mr. Trump, is whether he will have the discipline to see through these changes. In short, was the phone call the start of a calculated policy, or was it merely a one-off gesture that will alienate China and leave Taiwan even more isolated? So far the messages from the Trump camp are mixed. Vice President-elect Mike Pence insisted on Sunday that people were reading too much into the conversation with President Tsai Ing-wen, and that Mr. Trump was simply accepting congratulations from the "democratically elected leader of Taiwan." But people advising the transition say Mr. Trump knew exactly what he was doing. "He's the first president since the Shanghai Communique who provides an opportunity to look fresh at the cross-strait relationship," said Jon M. Huntsman Jr., who served as ambassador to China under President Obama. Mr. Huntsman was referring to the 1972 statement, issued after Nixon's visit to China, which sharply constrained America's dealings with Taiwan. Mr. Huntsman's name has recently surfaced as a candidate for secretary of state, along with that of John R. Bolton, a former ambassador to the United Nations under President George W. Bush. Mr. Bolton met with Mr. Trump on the day he took the phone call from Ms. Tsai. Later, he said the United States "should shake up the relationship" with China.

27. Trump Assembling Team of Fierce Iran Deal Opponents

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 12 05

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump has been assembling a national security team stacked with fierce opponents of last year's comprehensive nuclear deal with Iran, signaling what is expected to be a major departure from the Obama administration's final bid to preserve the deal before leaving office, according to multiple sources familiar with Trump's transition plans. Trump has been installing well-known opponents of the deal to key national security posts for the incoming administration, including at the White House National Security Council, the CIA, and the Department of Defense. This includes his selection of retired Marine Gen. James Mattis as secretary of defense, Rep. Mike Pompeo (R., Kan.) as CIA director, and retired Army Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn as national security adviser, picks that have won plaudits for their vocal opposition to the nuclear deal. "It's no secret that Flynn considers Iran to be the linchpin of a global alliance of hostile rivals seeking to undermine American interests," said one source familiar with the backroom talks about future national security picks. "He was in the Middle East during the Iraq war and knows first-hand how Iranian proxies killed hundreds of American troops, and he has seen the intelligence showing that they've targeted Americans around the world." "As long as Iran keeps acting like an enemy of the United States, his NSC will accurately convey that to the president, and he's building a staff that will make sure of that," the source added.

28. U.S. worries about spiraling violence in South Sudan: State Department

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 05

Washington - The United States is alarmed by the violence in South Sudan, where ethnically motivated hate speech, the targeting of civilians and sexual violence is becoming widespread and cannot be ignored, the State Department said on Monday. "The United States is alarmed by the violence in the Equatoria region of South Sudan and concerned it could quickly spiral out of control," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said in a statement. "This situation is intolerable, will worsen the already dire humanitarian crisis." The United States has confirmed that more than 1,900 houses have been destroyed in the Central Equatoria of South Sudan since September, he said in a statement. Toner said the government has also deployed at least 4,000 irregular ethnic militia soldiers to the area, "increasing the likelihood of more clashes with armed opposition groups and attacks against innocent civilians." The statement urged the international community to impose an arms embargo and targeted sanctions to help deter the violence in the world's newest state.

London Daily Telegraph, Laura Hughes, 2016 12 06

London - Britain will spend millions helping Middle East countries beef up security at their airports to help detect terrorists, Theresa May will pledge as she says, "Gulf security is our security". At a meeting of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) in Bahrain, Mrs May will announce plans for a joint taskforce to increase counter terrorism financing and training in the region. British experts will help improve traveller screening systems at airports in the Middle East, in light of growing fears of Isil plots targeted at airlines. Mrs May will today become the first British Prime Minister - and the first woman - to attend the annual gathering. She will announce a series of additional security measures, including the establishment of a new joint UKGCC Working Group on Counter-Terrorism and Border Security. Downing Street said that the UK's security relationship with Gulf states has already saved lives, including through the October 2010 discovery at East Midlands airport of a "printer bomb" on board a US-bound flight, which was a direct result of information received from the Saudi authorities. She will also announce the appointment of three UK specialist cyber experts who will be sent to the region to assist local law enforcement teams.

30. Social media giants launch joint crackdown on terrorist images after criticism by MPs

London Daily Telegraph, James Titcomb, 2016 12 06

London - Facebook, Twitter and YouTube have created a joint database of terrorist images and videos after MPs accused them of "passing the buck" in the fight against online extremism. The social media companies, which have been criticised for allowing their online platforms to become a key recruitment tool for Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (Isil), said they would be able to identify propaganda more effectively by pooling their resources. It comes after MPs warned that social media sites were unwilling to crack down on terrorism because they feared it would "damage their brands" and that they were becoming the "vehicle of choice" for extremists. Last night Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and Microsoft announced that they would create a database of "hashes" - a way of adding a digital fingerprint to photos and videos that allows them to be easily identified by social networks when posted by other users and on other websites. The database will alert the websites' staff when a version of the image or video is posted by a user, even if it has not been posted before on the site itself. For example, if a Twitter account posts an extremist picture, Twitter's moderators would report it to the database, and staff at Facebook would then be alerted if the same picture was posted on Facebook.

31. AQIS listed as terror organization under Australia's Criminal Code

Xinhua News Agency, Matt Walsh, 2016 12 06

Canberra - The Australian government Tuesday released its latest list of terrorist organizations recognized under the nation's Criminal Code, through a joint statement from Foreign Minister Julie Bishop and Attorney-General George Brandis. Al-Qa'ida in the Indian Subcontinent (AQIS), Islamic State (IS) Sinai Province and IS in Libya are the three groups listed. "The Government has re-listed al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula, which was first listed as a terrorist organization in Australia in November 2010," the joint statement said. The government said its listings follow the advice from Australia's security agencies that these organizations are either directly or indirectly engaged in "preparing, planning, assisting or fostering terrorist attacks." "We know that al-Qa'ida in the Indian Subcontinent and the Arabian Peninsula seek to advance al-Qa'ida's ideology in the South Asia region and the Middle East," the statement said.

Jerusalem - Australian Maj.-Gen. Simon Stuart will lead the multinational peacekeeping force on the Sinai Peninsula starting on March 1, 2017, taking over from Maj.-Gen. Denis Thompson from Canada. "Australia is pleased to be assuming command of MFO-Sinai [Multinational Force and Observers]," Australian Ambassador to Israel Dave Sharma told The Jerusalem Post, adding that with this role, Stuart will be leading Australia's largest command mission. "MFO-Sinai plays a critical role in underpinning the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel which is, in turn, a major contributor to regional stability," Sharma said. The 1,600-strong peacekeeping force has since 1981 been charged with maintaining a decades-old buffer zone between Israel and Egypt under the direction of the MFO, which supervises the implementation of the security provisions of the Egyptian-Israeli Treaty of Peace signed in 1979.

Sydney - A Sydney teenager has been ordered to stand trial on charges of planning a terrorist act and preparing for foreign incursions. Tamim Khaja's lawyer waived his right to a committal hearing and did not request bail in Parramatta Local Court on Tuesday. However Magistrate Garry Still ordered the matter to the District Court on December 16, where the 19-year-old is expected to appear via AVL. He is accused of committing an act in preparation for or planning a terrorist attack between about May 11 and 18 and preparing for incursions into foreign countries "for the purpose of engaging in hostile activities" between January 29 and February 27. The Macquarie Park resident was allegedly in the process of trying to obtain a firearm and had been sizing up public buildings in Sydney when he was arrested in May in a joint federal-NSW police operation.

39. Isis driven out of Libyan stronghold

London Times, Bel Trew, 2016 12 06

Cairo - Islamic State militants lost their last foothold on the Mediterranean coast yesterday after Libyan troops backed by British and American special forces captured the city of Sirte. At least 40 jihadists were killed in the fierce final battle and 34 surrendered, a spokesman for pro-government troops said. The few who had remained were being "dealt with", he added. The loss of Sirte is a significant blow for the jihadist group. As its territory in Iraq and Syria shrank, Isis eyed the Libyan city as a back-up "caliphate" on the Mediterranean and a launchpad for attacks in Europe. "We can say we took Sirte back. Today's battle will hopefully be the last," said Brigadier-General Mahmoud Zaghlal, the commander of a pro- government militia in charge of central Libya. "We're still combing the area to get rid of the last militants who escaped today.

Sirte was their stronghold in Libya. Isis falling in Sirte means their downfall in all of Libya -- it's a major loss for them."

42. ELN Leader Talks Fidel, Peace and Colombian Politics

teleSUR, Staff report, 2016 12 06

Quito - Pablo Beltran, commander in chief of the Army of National Liberation, talked Sunday to teleSUR from Quito, Ecuador, where the peace talks with the Colombian government are expected to start in January 2017. The fact that the ELN was not part of the negotiations in Havana between the FARC and the administration of President Juan Manuel Santos' was completely the Colombian president's doing. The differences between the ELN and the FARC have to do with justice, in his opinion: "We want the entire truth about what happened, what brought us to this level of violence, we want a recognition that this was the wrong way," he said, adding the ELN was ready to apologize and seek reconciliation. "We put more emphasis on truth, the whole peace process should be grounded in truth," he emphasized to teleSUR. More recently, the negotiations in Quito have been delayed over "legal issues" about the release of prisoners, according to Beltran. "On Oct. 6, we agreed to release a prisoner, in exchange for a political pardon for two prisoners, but now the Supreme Court is expected to decide soon whether the president is allowed to grant pardons in these circumstances." Negotiations are expected to start in a week, he assured.

43. 3rd US embassy bombing suspect charged

Philippine Star, Rey Galupo, 2016 12 06

Manila - The Manila Police District (MPD) yesterday charged the third suspect in the foiled bombing near the US embassy in Manila last Nov. 28. Mohammad Jumao-as, alias Modie, was charged with violation of the comprehensive firearms and ammunitions act and illegal possession of explosives at the Bulacan Provincial Prosecutor's Office in Malolos City around 3:30 p.m. Jumao-as was nabbed by elements of the MPD-special operations unit around 2 p.m. at his house in San Jose del Monte, Bulacan last Saturday, according to a source. The source told The STAR that the MPD operatives were assisted by military intelligence agents. "PNP chief Director General Ronald dela Rosa is set to present the suspect to the media within the week," he said. The source emphasized that the authorities "are keeping the case under wraps because there are still other suspects at large."

44. Canadian envoy lauds Bangladesh role in curbing terrorism

Bangladesh Sangbad Sangstha, 2016 12 06

Dhaka - Canadian High Commissioner to Bangladesh Benoit-Pierre Laramee today lauded the Bangladesh's stand on fighting terrorism and religious extremism. He made the remarks while he paid a courtesy call-on Road Transport and Bridges Minister and Awami League General Secretary Obaidul Quader at his office in the ministry. The Canadian high commissioner assured Quader that Canada will extend its cooperation to Bangladesh to curb trans-boundary terrorism. Laramee greeted the road transport minister for being elected as general secretary of Awami League. "Bangladesh's achievements in women empowerment, poverty alleviation, reducing dropout rate at educational institutions and gender equity are praiseworthy," the high commissioner said. The minister hoped Bangladesh and Canada will take steps to further strengthen the bilateral relations.

45. China systematically using torture in war on corruption: report

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe, 2016 12 06

Beijing - The interrogators work in secret, barraging members of China's Communist Party they accuse of corruption with questions, shouts and more severe measures. Suspects are kept from sleeping, deprived of adequate food and water, and exposed to extreme temperatures. They are forced to stand for hours or sit on painfully-small chairs and, in some cases, beaten with steel rebar. Often their families are threatened. Sometimes, their money is extorted. For those caught up in China's feared shuanggui system, there is no right to call a lawyer or family, no right to see evidence presented against them, and effectively no limit to how long they can be detained. Now, human rights activists are calling on China to shut down the decades-old system, after a lengthy new report accuses the country of employing torture to wage a war on corruption that has swept up hundreds of thousands of Chinese people in recent years. "We feel it's urgent that China abolish the system to try to minimize some of these horrific abuses, and what are probably pretty shaky prosecutions," said Sophie Richardson, China director at Human Rights Watch, which released the report in Hong Kong Tuesday. The report also underscores questions about the nature of evidence produced from the Chinese justice system, a particularly important question for Canada as it begins talks toward an extradition treaty with China, which is seeking the repatriation of people it calls corrupt.

46. China watching for Trump's next move

South China Morning Post, Catherine Wong, 2016 12 06

Beijing - US president-elect Donald Trump's phone conversation with Taiwanese leader Tsai Ing-wen may not signal a major shift in the US' longstanding one-China policy, but Beijing is "cautiously watching" Trump's next moves while pondering its own, say foreign affairs experts. Bonnie Glaser, a senior adviser for Asia at the Washington-based Centre for Strategic and International Studies, said she did not believe that Trump intended to indicate he would change the US foreign policy approach to the Taiwan Strait. "I expect China will engage intensely with Trump's transition team about Taiwan, both to determine Trump's intentions in making the call and to warn of the consequences should he follow up with similar actions," Glaser said. William Stanton, a former director of the American Institute in Taiwan, Washington's de facto embassy on the self-ruled island, was quoted by Central News Agency yesterday as saying the call was probably arranged ahead of time and Washington should have made such a move earlier.

47. Dhaka attack: Court asks CTTC to submit report by Jan 22 (Canada).

Bangladesh Daily Star, 2016 12 06

Dhaka - A Dhaka court today asked the Counter Terrorism and Transnational Crime (CTTC) unit of Dhaka Metropolitan Police to submit the probe report in connection with the case filed over the Gulshan café attack by January 22. Metropolitan Magistrate Sadbir Yeasir Arafat Choudhury passed the order after the CTTC failed to submit the probe report by today. On October 2, police turned in a probe report to the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate's Court in Dhaka with a prayer for relieving Tahmid Hasib Khan, a Bangladeshi student in Canada, of the accusation that he had involvement in the terror attack. Tahmid was cleared of the charges against him and walked out on bail after police said they found no evidence of his links to the Gulshan attackers or any other militants in the prayer. Former private university teacher Hasnat Karim, the only other detainee caught over the incident, stays as the key accused of the case filed over the terrorist attack.

48. India-US defence ties closest ever: US defence secretary

Press Trust of India, 2016 12 06

Washington - Days ahead of his visit to India, US defence secretary Ashton Carter on Sunday said that the defence relationship between the world's two largest democracies has never been as close it is now. "The US-India defence relationship is the closest it's ever been. Through our strategic handshake -- with America reaching west in the rebalance, and India reaching east in what Prime Minister Narendra Modi calls his Act East policy -- our two nations are exercising together by air, land, and sea like never before," Carter said. Carter, who would be in India next week, said this in his address to the Regan National Defence Forum in Simi Valley, California. The outgoing US defence secretary's last overseas trip includes Japan, India, Israel, Bahrain, Italy and the UK. As he begins his last overseas tour from the Asia Pacific region, Carter reflected on the rebalance strategy of President Barack Obama.

49. Military intranet hacked by North Korea

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 12 06

Seoul - South Korea's Defense Ministry said Tuesday the military's intranet had been hacked for the first time ever, presumably by North Korea, resulting in a number of military secrets being leaked. The military found that malicious code had been spread on its computers via its servers used to relay updates on Sept. 23. "The military formed a cyber investigative team to look into this matter and found that some military data -- including confidential information -- has been leaked. It appears to be a North Korean act," the ministry said. Code used in the attack has certain similarities with that previously used by North Korean hackers, a ministry official explained. He added that the attack originated from Shenyang, China, where many North Korean hackers are believed to be based and which was the believed origin of a 2014 attack on Korea Hydro & Nuclear Power Co. But the official refused to specify what data had been stolen. "We cannot give out details on what information was leaked, because it might give (North Korea) an advantage in the ongoing cyber warfare," he said. He also refused to confirm how many computers were hit by the cyberattack, but added that multiple servers in the intranet was infected.

50. N. Korea likely hacked S. Korea cyber command: military

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 06

Seoul - North Korea appears to have hacked South Korea's cyber command in what could be the latest cyberattack against Seoul, the military here said Tuesday, . "It seems the intranet server of the cyber command has been contaminated with malware. We found that some military documents, including confidential information, have been hacked," an official at the Ministry of National Defense told Yonhap News Agency. He said that authorities suspect North Korea is behind the latest online infiltrations. The cyber command said it isolated the affected server from the whole network to avoid the spread of viruses. But it has yet to fully determine what data were leaked. It marked the first time that the data of South Korea's cyber command has been compromised. South Korea set up the command in January 2010 as part of its efforts to counter external hacking attempts on the country's military. North Korea -- which has thousands of cyberwarfare personnel -- has a track record of waging cyberattacks on South Korea and the United States in recent years, though it has flatly denied any involvement.

51. S. Korea set for talks with U.S., China, Russia on N. Korea sanctions: top diplomat

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 06

Vienna - South Korea is scheduled to hold a series of high-level bilateral talks with the United States, China and Russia this month to discuss follow-up actions to the latest sanctions resolution by the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) against North Korea, Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se said. "We are planning policy consultation meetings to tune the ways to deal with North Korea's fifth nuclear test and comprehensively discuss how to implement UNSC resolutions and how to assess North Korea's attitude and the possibility of the country's (additional) military provocations," Yun told Yonhap News Agency on Monday in Vienna, Austria, where he attended an International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) conference. The separate meetings, which will each be held in the U.S., China and Russia, come as the countries start to implement Resolution 2321 adopted last week in response to North Korea's fifth atomic test on Sept. 9. The resolution focused on drying up North Korea's foreign currency earnings, mainly from its coal exports, in a bid to thwart the country's nuclear and missile programs. Separately, the top nuclear negotiators of South Korea and the U.S. are to hold talks in Seoul to coordinate their policy on the issue on Dec. 13.

52. Tarek Fatah thrashed by Indian students (Canada).

The Express Tribune, 2016 12 06

Undisclosed placeline - The Pakistani-born Canadian writer Tarek Fatah was heckled and beaten by university students over his 'Khalistani' 'terrorist' name calling. According to the Indian Express, Fatah had been invited by the Panjab University for a talk over Balochistan where he informally interacted with the students. The writer's statements during the conversation hurt the sentiments of the students, spiralling the situation out of control. A PhD scholar in geography

Gagandeep Singh Dhillon was quoted by the newspaper as saying that Fatah mocked the librarian which sparked an argument. He then allegedly called names to other students during the argument. Fatah allegedly also told Dhillon that he was a 'Khalistani'. While he called another student from Kargil 'Pakistani terrorist' and 'anti-national'. Fatah, on the other hand, blamed the Congress Party's youth wing for the 'planned attack'. (Full Report).

53. Moscow court extends arrest for Ukrainian national accused of plotting attacks in Crimea

ITAR-TASS World Service, Staff report, 2016 12 05

Moscow - Moscow's Lefortovo court on Monday extended until March 7 the term of arrest for another Ukrainian national accused of plotting acts of sabotage and terrorist attacks in Crimea, thus sustaining a motion of the FSB Federal Security Service, Tass reports. "The court ruled to sustain the motion and extend pre-trial restrictions for (Yevgeny) Panov as detention in custody until March 7 2017," judge Margarita Kotova voiced the court ruling. Also on Monday, the district court has extended the term of arrest for Ukrainian national Andrei Zakhtey accused of plotting acts of sabotage and terrorist attacks in Crimea. Thus, the Moscow Lefortovo district court sustained the motion of Russia's Federal Security Service (FSB). "The court ruled to uphold the investigators' motion and extend the arrest term for Andrei Zakhtey till March 7, 2017," Judge Margarita Kotova said. The court session was held behind closed doors.

54. Trump's Russia ties unnerve Kiev

The Guardian (London), Shaun Walker, 2016 12 06

Kiev - Kiev was far from the only capital city in which the ruling elite reacted with alarm to the election of Donald Trump, but the Ukrainian government has more reason than most to fear the new US administration. The US president-elect made a number of positive comments about the Russian president, Vladimir Putin, during the campaign, and even suggested he might consider recognising Crimea, the territory annexed by Russia from Ukraine two years ago, as part of Russia. There has been talk of a "big deal" between Trump and Putin over Syria, which some have suggested could see Ukraine thrown under the bus. "Everybody was tearing their hair and running around like crazies," said Ukraine's deputy foreign minister, Vadym Prystaiko, of the first days after Trump's election victory. While the current US administration has stopped short of supplying Ukraine with lethal weapons to fight Russian intervention in the east of the country, it has been a strong supporter of Ukraine with financial aid, and has slapped sanctions on Russia in protest at its actions. With Trump in the White House, amid suggestions that Russian hacking may have been employed to help his cause during the campaign, many in Kiev fear they could be abandoned. "It's what everyone is talking about," said a European diplomat based in Kiev. "It's a pretty disturbing time for Ukraine." Michael McFaul, formerly the US ambassador to Russia, declared when Trump was confirmed the winner of the election that Ukraine was "the biggest loser in the world tonight".

Tehran - China has warned that no party to the 2015 nuclear agreement between Iran and world countries should allow its domestic upheavals to adversely affect its commitment to the accord. Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi made the remarks in Beijing on Monday at a joint press conference with visiting Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif. Dubbed the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), the nuclear accord came about in July 2015 between Iran on the one side, and the US, Britain, Russia, France and China plus Germany on the other. "Of course, implementation of the JCPOA is a long process and it is natural for problems and differences to occur along the course," Wang noted. 57. Mosul Areas Shelled as Iraq Steps up Fight against ISIS

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 12 06

Baghdad - Internationally-backed Iraqi forces have begun shelling parts of west Mosul. The offensive has been reported by local residents. Preparative attacks are carried out for opening up a new front against hardline militant group ISIS, seven weeks into a difficult campaign to drive the militants from the city. Federal police forces, stationed a few miles south of Mosul, on the west bank of the Tigris River that divides the city, have long said they aim to advance towards the airport on the southwestern edge, reported Reuters. Military commanders hope that by opening a second front within the city they can increase pressure on the few thousand extremists who have deployed suicide bombers, snipers and militant cells against elite Iraqi troops in eastern districts. An audio statement from ISIS' new spokesman on Monday urged the militants in Tal Afar to stand their ground.

58. New Islamic State spokesman seeks to rally Sunnis against Iran, West

Long War Journal, Thomas Joscelyn, 2016 12 06

Washington - The Islamic State's Furqan Media Foundation has released an audio message from the group's new spokesman, Abu al Hassan al Muhajir. Abu Muhammad al Adnani served as the organization's top propagandist for years until he was killed in an American airstrike in August. The Islamic State had not named a successor since then, meaning no jihadist had served in quite the same role as Adnani for more than three months. However, Muhajir picks up where Adnani left off, defiantly calling upon the Islamic State's members and supporters to fight on. He argues that the so-called caliphate's struggles are merely part of a divine test, which will separate the true believers from all others. Muhajir also threatens Turkey and Iran, while encouraging more terrorist attacks around the globe. Muhajir claims that all of his organization's many enemies are united in their desire to destroy the jihadists' caliphate. "Here are Crusader America and Europe, Communist Russia, and Magian Iran, with secular Turkey, atheist Kurds, Rawafidh [Shiites], Nusayris [a reference to Bashar al Assad's regime], Awakenings, militias, and the tyrants of the Arabs and their soldiers," Muhajir says, according to SITE's translation.

59. Riyadh court sentences 15 Iran 'spies' to death

Arab News, Staff Report, 2016 12 06

Jeddah - Fifteen people who have been accused of spying for Iran were sentenced to death by the Specialized Criminal Court in Riyadh, local media reported on Tuesday. Fifteen other suspects were slapped prison terms ranging from six months to 25 years, while two of the accused were acquitted, Al-Riyadh newspaper said. The sentencing capped 10 months of trial, which started in February, Al-Arabiya network said, adding that 160 hearings were held. The convicts were among 32 people, including 30 Saudis, an Iranian and an Afghan, who were arrested in 2013 on spying charges, the network said. The rulings are subject to appeal, and death sentences have to be ratified by the king. During the hearings, prosecutors presented evidence showing that the suspects organized a spy ring, liaised and collaborated with Iranian intelligence agent and were also accused of meeting Iran's Supreme leader Ali Khamenei.

60. After five frosty years, Israeli ambassador returns to Turkey

Times of Israel, Raphael Ahren, 2016 12 06

Jerusalem - Israel's new ambassador to Turkey on Monday handed his letter of credence to President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, hailing a "new phase" in bilateral ties. Eitan Na'eh is Israel's first ambassador in Ankara in half a decade. Taking to Twitter moments after the ceremony concluded, Na'eh said, in English and Turkish, that he was "very pleased" to present his credentials to Erdogan and "to start a new phase in our relationship in between two countries." Na'eh, who had been stationed in Ankara in the 1990s, arrived in Turkey on Thursday. "I am very happy to be back in Turkey as ambassador. We have a lot of work to do," he told reporters at the airport. Turkey was among the several states that sent planes and other equipment to help Israel extinguish over 1,000 wildfires across the country. Na'eh's appointment marks the end of a six-year standoff between the countries that started with the Israeli army's raid on the 2010 Gaza-bound Mavi Marmara.

62. Government departments to use facial recognition and iris scans in two years

The National (UAE), Caline Malek, 2016 12 06

Dubai - There is only one you - and if fingerprints don't prove it, facial-recognition and iris scans will. Those two methods will be used by government departments to identify customers within two years, the Emirates Identity Authority says. "Iris scans and facial recognition are very important add-ons to our system," said Shukri Al Braiki, a director at the authority. "You use biometrics to ensure that you avoid duplicating a record, which means issuing more than one ID number to the same person. "We avoid that through fingerprints but when you depend on one factor in biometrics, there is always room for error. So the accuracy is 99.5 to 99.8 per cent but that could increase to 99.95 per cent if you have several biometric technologies." Iris scans and fingerprints are already in use for travellers at airports. The authority started using fingerprints in 2005. "But the challenge for any new system is enrolling new customers," Mr Al Braiki said.

63. Ransomed: The Race to Free 226 Christian Hostages in Syria (Canada)

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 06

Saarlouis, Germany - Deep inside Syria, a bishop worked secretly to save the lives of 226 members of his flock from the Islamic State group - - by amassing millions of dollars from his community around the world to buy their freedom. The Assyrian Christians were seized from the Khabur River valley in northern Syria, among the last holdouts of a minority that had been chased across the Mideast for generations. On Feb. 23, 2015, IS fighters attacked 35 Christian towns simultaneously, sweeping up scores of people. It took more than a year, and videotaped killings of three captives, before all the rest were freed. Paying ransoms is illegal in the United States and most of the West, and the idea of giving money to the Islamic State group is morally fraught, even for those who saw no alternative. "You look at it from the moral side and I get it. If we give them money we're just feeding into it, and they're going to kill using that money," said Aneki Nissan, who helped raise funds in Canada. But "to us, we're such a small minority that we have to help each other."

65. Terrorists on motorcycles: IDF simulates cross-border attacks in Gaza Division drill

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 12 06

Jerusalem - Hundreds of IDF troops conducted a large-scale exercise on the Gaza border Tuesday, testing the army's preparedness against terror attacks emanating from the coastal enclave, including the possibility of gunmen on motorcycles, a military official said. The drill, led by the IDF's Gaza Division, included the evacuation of a school in the Eshkol region, as well as a test of how the army would respond to infiltrations into Israeli communities and to attacks on troops and military outposts near Gaza. "It simulates a number of scenarios where the division would have to go from 'routine' to 'emergency,'" the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. One such scenario was derived from a real-life incident from the 2014 Gaza war, known in Israel as Operative Protective Edge, in which motorbikes were discovered in a cross-border attack tunnel.

Amber Rudd told MPs that the government would introduce the documents in a "phased approach". The Liberal Democrats said that registering and issuing documents to more than three million Europeans in the UK could cost the taxpayer up to £100 million and require an extra 3,000 officials. Hilary Benn, chairman of the Brexit select committee, said the documents would be needed so that employers and landlords could distinguish between those EU citizens who had the right to be here and those who did not. 69. Government finalizes draft work for restructuring of Turkish intelligence

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 12 06

Ankara - As part of the constitutional change to switch from a parliamentary system to a presidential one, the government has finalized its draft work on the restructuring of Turkey's intelligence unit. In that respect, once the system of governance has shifted to a presidential system, the head and coordinator of the intelligence unit will be the Presidency, with the unit referred to as the "National Security Directorate." The restructuring of the intelligence unit was brought to attention by Prime Minister Binali Yildirim shortly after the Gülenist Terror Group's (FETÖ) July 15 coup attempt. Prime Minister Yildirim had initially said that the National Intelligence Organization (MIT) would be restructured and domestic intelligence would be handled by a separate unit, putting foreign intelligence under the MIT umbrella. Explaining that MIT monitors intelligence sharing between the police, gendarmerie and other institutions, Yildirim said, "Today's need is the compilation of domestic intelligence under one entity. Foreign intelligence will continue to be compiled under the MIT." Furthermore, the National Security Directorate will have similar features to the U.S. national intelligence unit, with the directorate under the Presidency and the national security director appointed by the Presidency as well. The intelligence unit, in that respect, will not only serve as the overseer of the aforementioned gendarmerie, local police and intelligence units but also function as coordinator among them. However, if the system is not changed to a presidential one, the directorate will operate under the Prime Ministry. It is almost definite that domestic and foreign intelligence are going to be separated into two different units while the MIT will be in charge of foreign intelligence, like the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in the U.S. The Signal Intelligence Division which was formerly under the control of the General Staff of Electronic Systems' Command and is currently operating under the MIT. That will change with a presidential system, in which the division would be operated under the National Security Directorate.

70. Les géants du Web s'associent contre le terrorisme en ligne

Le Figaro, Lucie Ronfaut, 2016 12 06

Non identifié - Facebook, YouTube et d'autres ont créé une base de données commune pour faciliter les signalements. Internet Il est rare que les géants du Web s'associent sur un projet. Lundi soir, Facebook, Microsoft, Twitter et YouTube (propriété de Google) ont annoncé le lancement d'un nouvel outil commun pour supprimer plus rapidement les images ou les vidéos encourageant à des actes de terrorisme. Les quatre entreprises vont alimenter une base de données qui recensera les contenus de ce genre, afin de faciliter leur modération. Le sujet de la lutte contre la propagande terroriste empoisonne les relations entre les États et les géants du Web. Ces derniers sont régulièrement accusés de ne pas en faire assez pour lutter contre la propagande terroriste. Les grandes plateformes en ligne interdisent déjà pourtant ce genre d'images et de vidéos violentes. Néanmoins, l'application de ces règles est complexe. La plupart des réseaux sociaux appliquent une modération a posteriori : il faut qu'un utilisateur leur signale un contenu problématique pour qu'il soit contrôlé et éventuellement supprimé.

71. TES, un mégafichier controversé?

La Croix, Frédérique Schneider, 2016 12 06

Paris - La création d'un fichier regroupant les données personnelles des Français, défendue par le gouvernement au nom de la lutte contre les fraudes, est contestée en raison des risques pour les libertés publiques. TES, pour « Titres électroniques sécurisés ». Derrière cet acronyme, c'est le projet d'un immense fichier, qui doit rassembler les données biométriques - identité, couleur des yeux, domicile, photo, empreinte digitale - de près de 60 millions de Français. Du jamais-vu! L'objectif est de réunir les détenteurs d'un passeport et d'une carte d'identité en un seul fichier. Mais ses détracteurs - la Commission nationale informatique et libertés (Cnil) en tête - ont affiché leur crainte pour les libertés publiques. Au ministère de l'intérieur, on assure qu'en aucun cas le fichier ne pourra servir à l'identification des personnes. TES, explique le gouvernement, doit élargir le fichier qui existe déjà pour les passeports biométriques aux cartes d'identité, et est donc un moyen de lutte contre la fraude documentaire.

72. Un suivi à la fois sécuritaire et social

Tribune de Genève, S.R., 2016 12 06

Genève - Conscient des risques liés à la radicalisation, Genève maintient ses efforts en matière de sécurité et de prévention (lire ci-dessus). Des mesures d'accompagnement de personnes radicalisées ont notamment été annoncées hier, lors de la troisième conférence de presse du genre organisée en un an, suite aux attentats de Paris. « La Suisse n'est pas un îlot et la menace reste élevée ici aussi », rappelle Paul Zinniker, vice-directeur du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC), devant les médias. « Nous prenons très au sérieux les menaces, sans céder à la terreur, livre Pierre Maudet, chef du Département de la sécurité et de l'économie (DSE).

Nous avons plus un coup d'avance qu'un coup de retard désormais. En un an, nous avons développé une prise en charge globale des phénomènes de radicalisation. »

1. Canada's surveillance state rolls along

Toronto Star, Brian Alexander, 2016 12 07

Letter to editor: Step up on press freedom, Editorial Dec. 3 I hope the Federal Court of Canada invites the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) to further explain the spying on journalists it may have conducted in the past. While the court may indeed have provided a warrant for such actions - a troubling development by itself - CSIS also has a record of misleading the court about its intentions, breaching its duty of candour. The most decisive court in the land, which should support Sen. Claude Carignan's private member's bill establishing stronger protections for journalists and their sources, is the conviction of Canadians. Unfortunately, too many of us have acquiesced to the emergence of a surveillance state in our nation. Many feel they have nothing to fear from expansive surveillance because they have nothing to hide. In the eyes of the surveillance state, your opinions about your innocence count for nothing. You won't know whether you have been spied on or what conclusions have been drawn. You won't know you are a target for "disruptive" actions, permitted by the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2015. Consider now whether you would say the same things to the same people if you knew CSIS might be listening. Would you tell a journalist about government corruption you found at your workplace? If you paused to think about your answer, you have discovered the value of privacy and her twin sister, freedom. The two are never found apart. Brian Alexander, Mississauga

2. Kellie Leitch has a plan to crack down on and surveil protesters who disrupt pipeline projects

Vice News, Rachel Browne, 2016 12 07

Conservative party leadership contender Kellie Leitch wants to crack down on and surveil those who interfere with natural resource development projects in Canada. "There is a place for legitimate protest, but we will lock up the agitators and activists who resort to vandalism and violence when they do not get their way," Leitch wrote Tuesday morning on Facebook, the medium she uses for most of her campaign communications. In that post, she pledged her support for the Energy East pipeline -- which would carry more than one million barrels of crude per day from Alberta to New Brunswick -- and insists that she'll use Canada's national policing and spying agencies to make sure it goes off without a hitch. "We will build this pipeline and we will build Canada," she wrote. Leitch outlined a five-point plan to quash "violence and/or vandalism" against Energy East and other natural resource projects. Perhaps most striking is her plan to create a "new task force" made up of "specialized components" of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP), the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), Canada's main spy agency, the Canadian Revenue Agency, and Global Affairs Canada. Government surveillance of Indigenous and environmentalist protesters is not new, but is always controversial. CSIS and the RCMP have been chastised for infiltrating, tracking, and surveilling peaceful activists. The spy agency came under fire for preparing national security plans in case peaceful Indigenous protests "escalated." And last month it was revealed that the RCMP was conducting surveillance on 89 Indigenous activists for their involvement in environmental efforts. Leitch's proposals would clearly turn up the dial on that sort of surveillance.

3. Lesson 1: Make the passport a shield

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard and Mitch Potter, 2016 12 07

First you are taken hostage. Then you are taken swimming. And fed well. And given very good cigars. And sent home a few weeks later none the worse for wear. Improbable as it sounds in the age of beheadings, that is precisely how the modern era of international kidnapping began in the summer of 1958 when Cuban revolutionaries Fidel and Raul Castro snatched 41 American and Canadian hostages. The late Harold Kristianson of Geraldton, Ont., was among them. His family filled the Toronto Star in on this little-known chapter of Canadian kidnapping history, describing how "Uncle Harold came out smiling." It was front-page news: an audacious act of propaganda to put the brewing Castro revolution on everyone's map. The hostages ultimately were set free, describing it as more vacation than abduction. Similar tales would pop up in the decades leading to the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. In Yemen, a culture of hospitality dictated that kidnapers treat hostages as guests - even if they were unwilling ones. Captives were mere bargaining chips traded between tribes, and stories abound of hostages told they were free and not wanting to leave just quite yet. There is, of course, nothing even remotely as benign today. As this Star series has shown, 21st-century kidnappings of Canadians abroad bring a world of hurt for the families back home. And Ottawa's broken response all too often adds to the pain. Ellis at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, says any employer that demands that staff travel to dangerous areas has a duty to prep them for the possibility of kidnappings. "Occupational safety regulations should hold employers to account. If a worker goes in a mine, it is inspected for safety. If Canadians travel abroad to locations where they could face risk, they should be provided with training and awareness to increase their preparedness and thus safety." Ellis now works as a security consultant and has helped families of Canadians detained abroad on a pro bono basis. He suggests insurance companies must also be held to better account if a hostage has what's known as K&R insurance (kidnap and ransom). "Payments need to be made available to victims' families quickly and completely," he says.

4. Privacy commissioners urge Ottawa to be careful on defeating encryption

It World Canada, Howard Solomon, 2016 12 07

Parliament should be cautious before passing laws forcing organizations and people to open encryption systems, say Canada's privacy commissioners. In a unanimous submission Tuesday to the federal government's public consultation on Canada's national security framework, the federal, provincial and territorial commissioners urged Ottawa to look for "technical solutions which might support discrete, lawfully authorized access to specific encrypted devices, as opposed to imposing general legislative requirements. At the same time, an open dialogue with the technical community, industry, civil society and privacy experts including the OPC (office of the privacy commissioner) could provide valuable input. "However, if the government feels that a legislative solution is required, we believe that amendments should reflect and articulate the principles of necessity and proportionality, so as to narrow how much information is decrypted, and that such extraordinary measures should be used as a last resort." Organizations and residents have until Dec. 15 to file submissions to the government. Because metadata can reveal personal information Parliament might direct the collection of metadata should be a last resort, the report suggests, or limited to serious crimes where public safety interests may outweigh potential risks to privacy. Ottawa should reconsider provisions under Bill C-51 that allow federal departments to share personal information deemed merely "relevant" to the detection of new security threats. "Setting such a low standard is a key reason the risks to law abiding citizens are excessive," federal privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien said in a statement. "If 'strictly necessary' is adequate for CSIS (the Canadian Security Intelligence Service) to collect, analyze and retain information, it is unclear to us why this cannot be adopted for all departments and agencies involved in national security.

5. Security shouldn't trump privacy, watchdogs say

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - Privacy watchdogs from across the country have come together to challenge proposals to expand police and intelligence agencies' powers. Federal privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien told a press conference Tuesday that state spying and investigative powers have "already been significantly increased" in recent years. The RCMP have recently undertaken a public push for more powers to investigate online crime, arguing privacy-protecting software and laws are preventing them from catching criminals. But Therrien suggested the balance is actually tipped in police agencies' favour, and argued for greater legal safeguards to protect Canadians' privacy. "In my view, this is not the time to further expand state powers and reduce individual rights," Therrien said in a statement. "Rather, it is time to enhance both legal standards and oversight to ensure we do not repeat past mistakes and that we ultimately achieve real balance between security and respect for basic individual rights." The commissioner's comments come as the Liberals wrap up a months-long consultation on Canada's national security apparatus. The Liberals have pledged to repeal "problematic" elements of the previous Conservative government's controversial terrorism law, Bill C-51, and have promised to put in place meaningful oversight for the country's 17 national security agencies. Therrien, along with his provincial and territorial counterparts, released a 20-page proposal Tuesday arguing for greater legal safeguards for Canadians' private information, concrete rules around information sharing between government agencies and greater powers for his office to review the activities of law enforcement and intelligence agencies. Therrien said very recent history has shown intelligence agencies, despite good intentions, need to be held in check. He pointed to a recent Federal Court ruling that found CSIS illegally kept information on innocent Canadians for almost a decade, in the hope it may shed light on national security investigations at some point.

6. Spies should not be allowed to keep innocent people's data, privacy czars say

Ottawa - Canada's spy agencies should destroy the data trails of innocent people they incidentally collect during terrorism investigations once the actual targets have been cleared of suspicion, say Canada's privacy watchdogs. The declaration Tuesday from privacy commissioners across the country came after a judge recently ruled the Canadian Security Intelligence Service violated the law by keeping potentially revealing electronic data about people who were not under investigation. The message was part of a joint submission signed by federal, provincial and territorial privacy czars that urged the Trudeau government to strengthen protection of personal information as it revamps the national security regime. Rather than expand state powers and reduce individual rights, it is time to beef up legal standards and oversight to prevent repetition of mistakes, said federal privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien, flanked at a news conference by counterparts Brian Beamish from Ontario and Jean Chartier of Quebec. They urged the government to learn lessons from the information-sharing blunders that led to the overseas torture of Maher Arar following 9/11 and the current uproar over surveillance of journalists in Quebec. "National security agencies have an important and difficult mandate in protecting all Canadians from terrorist threats and we believe they generally strive to do their work in a way that respects human rights," says the submission. "But history has shown us that serious human rights abuses can occur, not only abroad but in Canada, in the name of national security." Just last month a Federal Court judge said CSIS broke the law by holding on to electronic data, over a 10-year period, about people who were not considered a danger to national security. CSIS processed the data beginning in 2006 through its Operational Data Analysis Centre to produce intelligence that can disclose intimate details about individuals.

7. Surveillance: les commissaires à la vie privée demandent un meilleur encadrement de la police

La Presse (site web), Vincent Brousseau-Pouliot, 2016 12 06

Ottawa - Citant les révélations d'Edward Snowden et les cas de journalistes surveillés au Québec, les commissaires à la protection de la vie privée du pays mettent le gouvernement Trudeau en garde: au lieu de donner de nouveaux pouvoirs aux corps policiers, Ottawa doit plutôt mieux encadrer les pouvoirs policiers existants en matière de surveillance. «Sans vouloir faire comparaison» avec les services de renseignement des ex- républiques de l'Europe de l'est, le commissaire Daniel Therrien rappelle toutefois une décision récente de la Cour fédérale dénonçant le fait que le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) a conservé de façon illégale pendant plusieurs années des métadonnées de citoyens canadiens (le SCRS interprétait la loi différemment et s'est plié à la décision de la Cour fédérale). «Nous parlons ici de retenir des données de citoyens ordinaires. Je ne crois pas que c'est le type de société dans laquelle [les Canadiens] veulent vivre», dit le commissaire Daniel Therrien.

8. Vie privée - Plaidoyer pour une surveillance surveillée

Le Devoir, Hélène Buzzetti, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - Après une décennie d'élargissement des outils policiers de lutte contre le terrorisme, l'heure est à la consolidation des garde-fous citoyens. Les 13 commissaires à la protection de la vie privée du Canada adressent à Ottawa un mémoire commun dans lequel ils l'invitent à " tirer des leçons " des révélations d'Edward Snowden et de la surveillance récente de journalistes québécois. Le gouvernement est en voie de mettre sur pied un comité de parlementaires qui auraient le mandat de surveiller les agences de surveillance du Canada. Le commissaire Therrien applaudit l'idée, mais l'estime insuffisante. Il existe 17 organismes autorisés à recueillir des informations de sécurité sur les citoyens canadiens, mais seulement 3 sont encadrés par un chien de garde leur étant propre (par exemple le CSARS qui surveille le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité, le SCRS).

9. 'He's been freed, thank God'

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 12 07

Toronto - A Canadian military veteran who had been detained by Iraqi authorities after spending six months fighting ISIL has been released, his mother said Tuesday. "He's been freed, thank God," Kay Kennedy said shortly after her son, Michael Kennedy, phoned home from Erbil to say he was no longer being held. "I am so happy you couldn't imagine." She said he told her he had been detained with three Americans and two Germans over travel visa problems. While Kennedy had a valid Iraqi visa, his travelling companions did not. When Iraqi authorities arrested the Americans and Germans, Kennedy insisted they take him as well. "He did not want to let his group end up in prison without him," she said, adding the others remained in their cell but expected to be released soon and that all would be home by Christmas. A Royal Canadian Navy veteran, Kennedy, 32, is one of hundreds of international volunteers fighting alongside Kurdish militias on the front lines against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant.

10. 1907: A Canadian MP and Russian Spy Is Born

Haaretz, David B. Green, 2016 12 07

Jerusalem - December 7, 1907, is the birthdate of Fred Rose, the Canadian labor organizer and politician who was the first and only member of that country's parliament to be convicted of foreign espionage. As a communist, the first to be elected to the national legislature, there doesn't seem much doubt that Rose was indeed involved in passing information on to the Soviet Union, during World War II, when it and Canada were allies. At age 18, Fred, as he now called himself, joined the Young Communist League, and soon after that, the Communist Party of Canada itself. By 1928, he was under surveillance by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, not as a potential spy, but out of concern for revolutionary activity, especially among Jews. Files from the time show that the RCMP was even looking into the question of how he might be stripped of his citizenship. But with the end of WWII and start of the Cold War, solidarity with the USSR had turned into suspicion.

11. Carr dials back military response, says Liberals 'embrace' pipeline dissent

Canadian Press, Bruce Cheadle, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - The Liberal government is going out of its way to downplay the prospect of violent confrontations at oil pipeline protests. Natural Resources Minister Jim Carr, who set off days of consternation by suggesting "defence forces" might respond to non-peaceful protests, didn't have to be asked Tuesday before once again announcing that the government "embraces" dissent. "The point I wanted to make was that one of those characteristics of Canada that makes us such a special country is that we have not only tolerance for dissent but we embrace dissent, because it is an essential characteristic of who we are to be Canadian," Carr told reporters gathered outside a Liberal cabinet meeting. "And I also wanted to make the point that civil disobedience and peaceful protest is very much a part of our history and I should have left it at that." His comments came as Justin Trudeau was attending an Assembly of First Nations meeting, where some chiefs had threatened to walk out of the prime minister's speech over an ill-advised Carr comment about "defence forces" and pipeline protests. Some First Nations and environmental groups have promised major demonstrations over the Liberal government's controversial decision last week to approve the expansion of Kinder Morgan's Trans Mountain oil pipeline from Alberta into suburban Vancouver.

12. Former Newfoundland soldier released from Iraqi prison, mother says

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 07

A Newfoundland military veteran arrested in northern Iraq last week has been released from prison, his mother says. Kay Kennedy told VOXM radio that her son, Michael, was released Tuesday. Her son had been arrested in Erbil in northern Iraq while taking part in what his mother called a humanitarian mission. A friend of his confirmed via text message he had been arrested after returning from northern Syria. Kennedy said her son would not leave others he was travelling with when they were arrested for visa infractions, even though his visa had not expired. He will be back in Newfoundland for Christmas, she said. Federal cabinet minister Judy Foote confirmed Monday that Kennedy was in good health as Canadian Embassy officials worked to win his release. The stress of having a son in a war zone is nothing new for Kennedy. On April 8, 2007, her son Kevin was one of six Canadian soldiers killed in Afghanistan when their light armoured vehicle struck a roadside bomb. The six were all members of the 2nd Battalion, Royal Canadian Regiment based at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown in New Brunswick.

13. Habib had combat manuals on computers, trial hears

Montreal Gazette, Staff reporter, 2016 12 07

Montreal - The trial of Ismael Habib, a 29-yearold man accused of trying to leave Canada to commit terrorist acts abroad heard Tuesday what RCMP investigators recovered from the computers seized in the wake of their investigation. Maxime Embury-Larocque, a member of the RCMP's Integrated National Security Enforcement Team, told the court that two tablet computers seized from a residence in Gatineau last February contained several pictures of the accused, one showing him what appeared to be military fatigues and carrying a knife on his hip while the other depicted him wearing a black T-shirt that Embury-Larocque believed bore the inscription of the Muslim shahada - the acknowledgement of the oneness of God and of Muhammed as his prophet - in Arabic script. A check of the computers also revealed the name Alexandre Fortin, Embury-Larocque said, the same name on a driver's licence in Habib's possession when he was arrested, although the licence bore Habib's photo. The court also heard that searches of Habib's computers also yielded PDF files of combat training manuals as well as covers from Inspire, an online magazine perceived as a propaganda and recruitment tool used by al Qaeda terror network. Embury-Larocque noted that most of the online links found on the computer no longer existed, although investigators were able to extract an apparent record of an online conversation between two persons, one of whom identified himself as "Stéphane Leclair," a false name the correspondent said he used for security reasons.

14. Kurdish authorities defend detention of Canadian Michael Kennedy

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 12 07

Michael Kennedy's decision to travel to Syria with Kurdish forces ultimately got him into trouble with authorities in Iraq and contributed to his extended detention, says a senior official in the Kurdish regional government. The former Canadian soldier has now been released after almost a week in custody, but his story is a dramatic illustration of how severe both the Iraqis and Kurdish officials have become about border security. According to his mother, Kennedy was arrested along with five other foreign fighters, who had expired visas. Kay Kennedy says her son's visa was still valid and he voluntarily entered custody in order to stay with the group. "Michael would not let them go to prison without him," she told CBC News. "He said there was no way he was letting them end up in prison and he abandon them. He was given the option not to be taken into custody, but he refused it." But Kurdish authorities, while not disputing the account, say Kennedy's side-trip into Syria was a serious violation that warranted his detention.

15. Military pondering future of Iraq mission as ISIL appears set to go underground

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - Canada's mission in Iraq is set to undergo another transformation after the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant is driven from the city of Mosul, which is expected to see the extremist group turn into a more traditional insurgency. Senior military commanders have been weighing possible options amid warnings that ISIL will resort to suicide attacks and other terror tactics in Iraq after it loses control of its last population centre in the country. There is also the question, however unlikely, of whether Canadian troops will end up in Syria, where U.S.-backed rebels have been advancing on ISIL's de facto capital of Raqqa. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan said last week that the Liberal government currently has no plans to deploy forces into Syria, but he left the door open to Canada joining other allies if such a course of action is decided upon. "Our efforts right now are in Iraq," Sajjan told the House of Commons committee last week. "If the situation in Syria does change, we will always assess a situation based on consultations with our allies. However, right now we do not have, or intend to have, any involvement in Syria." Canadian troops have spent the past seven weeks working with Kurdish forces as they and Iraqi government troops have moved to liberate Mosul from ISIL, which seized Iraq's second-largest city in June 2014.

16. Privacy watchdogs oppose access to encryption-bypassing investigation tools

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - Canada's 14 privacy commissioners have formed a united front to argue that an ongoing review of the country's national-security regime should not lead to increased powers to break through encryption devices or to gather more personal information on law-abiding citizens. Led by federal Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien, the group is arguing that police and security agencies have yet to make a clear case for new tools to investigate terrorists and criminals. According to the watchdogs, ordinary Canadians stand to be the main victims of any new powers awarded to law-enforcement authorities. "This is not the time to further expand state powers and reduce individual rights," Mr. Therrien said at a news conference in Ottawa on Tuesday, flanked by his Ontario and Quebec counterparts. "This is the time to enhance both legal standards and oversight to ensure we do not repeat past mistakes and achieve real balance between security and respect for basic individual rights." Mr. Therrien and all provincial and territorial privacy commissioners have signed on to a joint submission to the federal government's ongoing public consultation on Canada's national-security framework. The submission states that many mistakes were made by countries around the world after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, leading to a new regime of "mass surveillance." "We have seen too many cases of inappropriate and sometimes illegal conduct by state officials that have impacted on the rights of ordinary citizens not suspected of criminal or terrorist activities," Mr. Therrien said.

17. Privacy watchdogs urge caution with encryption laws

CBC News, Matthew Braga, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - Privacy watchdogs from across Canada warned the government on Tuesday to "proceed cautiously" before passing encryption legislation -- a move that would have the potential to undermine the security of everything from financial transactions to online communication. The warning comes at a time when government and law enforcement agencies have been seeking the ability to access encrypted information, the lack of which they see as a growing investigative problem. However, both privacy and cryptography experts have long warned that efforts to weaken or defeat encryption for police puts the security of all users at risk. The government is currently soliciting feedback and holding public consultations on this and other national security issues, as part of its pledge to repeal the "problematic elements" of Bill C-51. In a submission to Public Safety Canada, Canada's Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien and his colleagues warned against introducing any legislation aimed squarely at encryption, as well as other proposed powers that police do not currently have. "The government should only propose and Parliament should only approve new state powers if they are demonstrated to be necessary and proportionate -- not merely convenient," Therrien said in a prepared statement to reporters Tuesday morning in Ottawa. The statement was also posted to the commissioner's website.

18. Trudeau cabinet expected to debate renewed Ukraine mission

CBC News, Murray Brewster, 2016 12 07

Ottawa - The Liberal government signalled to its allies that it is prepared to extend Canada's military training mission in Ukraine, CBC News has learned. A series of senior Ukrainian government officials visited Ottawa over the last few weeks, warning of the dangers of warming frosty relations with Russia. But they have also lobbied for renewed Canadian assistance beyond March 2017, when the current deployment is set to expire. Several sources, with knowledge of the file who could not speak publicly, said there is a clear intention for Canada to remain, but the size, scope and composition of the force is yet to be determined and the federal cabinet has yet to give its blessing. Last summer, President Petro Poroshenko made a personal pitch to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau in Kyiv to extend the deployment of 200 Canadian troops, who have been providing advanced combat course to ordinary Ukrainian soldiers. Trudeau was, at the time, non-committal. He would only say Canada, in concert with allies, was prepared "to continue to be steadfast in support of Ukraine." Ukraine Interior Minister Arsen Avakov met on Monday with Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, where the two discussed Canada's commitment to police training and judicial reform, among other things.

19. American and British Spy Agencies Targeted In-Flight Mobile Phone Use

The Intercept/Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 07

Paris - In the trove of documents provided by former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden is a treasure. It begins with a riddle: "What do the President of Pakistan, a cigar smuggler, an arms dealer, a counterterrorism target, and a combatting proliferation target have in common? They all used their everyday GSM phone during a flight." This riddle appeared in 2010 in SIDtoday, the internal newsletter of the NSA's Signals Intelligence Directorate, or SID, and it was classified "top secret." It announced the emergence of a new field of espionage that had not yet been explored: the interception of data from phone calls made on board civil aircraft. In a separate internal document from a year earlier, the NSA reported that 50,000 people had already used their mobile phones in flight as of December 2008, a figure that rose to 100,000 by February 2009. The NSA attributed the increase to "more planes equipped with in-flight GSM capability, less fear that a plane will crash due to making/receiving a call, not as expensive as people thought." The sky seemed to belong to the agency. In a 2012 presentation, Government Communications Headquarters, or GCHQ, the British equivalent of the NSA, in turn disclosed a program called "Southwinds," which was used to gather all the cellular activity, voice communication, data, metadata, and content of calls on board commercial aircraft. The document, designated "top secret strap," one of the highest British classification levels, said the program was still restricted to the regions covered by satellites from British telecommunications provider Inmarsat: Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. GCHQ responded to Le Monde with a statement that it does not comment on intelligence matters and that its activities are "authorized, necessary and proportionate" and "entirely compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights." NSA declined to comment.

The former CIA and FBI official also contrasted the Trump transition with that of former GOP presidents. "We have a history of remarkable servants in the Oval Office and in the Situation Room under Republican presidents," Mudd told CNN's Wolf Blitzer on "The Situation Room." "We transition now to a national security adviser in a political realm who argues that opponent on the stump should be locked up in prison and who argues that a billion-plus Muslims should be grouped together."

The prized car, driven by the villain of the 2002 James Bond movie Die Another Day, looked as striking as it did in the film, but it had a new role now: building curiosity about the dark world of espionage. As the greeting on the lobby wall announced: For your eyes only. Entry beyond this point is on a need-to-know basis. Who needs to know? All who would understand the world, all who would glimpse the unseen hands that touch our lives." 22. Les services américains et britanniques ont espionné les appels passés à bord des vols Air France

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 07

Non identifié - La NSA et son homologue anglais peuvent capter toutes les données, y compris les codes secrets, des communications des passagers de la plupart des grandes compagnies aériennes. Dont Air France. Dans l'immense stock d'archives extraites par Edward Snowden, l'ancien consultant de l'Agence nationale de sécurité américaine (NSA), c'est une pépite. Elle débute par une devinette: «Quel est le point commun entre le président du Pakistan, un trafiquant de cigares ou d'armes, une cible du contre-terrorisme ou le membre d'un réseau de prolifération nucléaire? Ils utilisent tous leur téléphone portable lorsqu'ils sont dans un avion.» Posée en 2010 dans une des lettres d'information interne de l'une des principales directions de la NSA, «SIDtoday», et classée top secret , elle annonce l'émergence d'un nouveau terrain d'espionnage, qui n'avait pas encore été exploré: l'interception des données de communications à bord des avions de ligne. En2009, la NSA souligne dans un document interne que, en décembre2008, 50000personnes ont déjà utilisé leur téléphone portable en vol, un chiffre qui atteint 100000 en février2009. Pour expliquer cet engouement, la NSA énumère: «De plus en plus d'avions équipés, la crainte recule de voir l'avion s'écraser. Pas aussi cher qu'on le croyait. (...) Le ciel pourrait appartenir à la NSA.» Fin 2012, le Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), l'homologue britannique de la NSA, livre, à son tour, dans une présentation «top secret strap», un des plus hauts niveaux de classification, les dessous du programme Southwinds («vents du sud») , mis en place pour collecter tout le trafic, voix et data, métadonnées et contenu des connexions à bord des avions. La zone est encore limitée aux régions Europe, Moyen-Orient et Afrique, couvertes par les satellites Inmarsat.

23. No evidence is found to verify subway bomb plot

Los Angeles Times, Richard Winton, James Queally, 2016 12 07

Los Angeles - Investigators have found no evidence to corroborate a warning of a terrorist plot to bomb the Universal City Metro station, defusing fears of an imminent attack in the heart of Los Angeles' sprawling public transit system, authorities said late Tuesday. Federal investigators determined that the warning of a bombing called in on a tip line in Australia was not a credible threat. Law enforcement officials suspect the anonymous caller may have previously made threats that did not materialize, according to the FBI. Investigators were working to identify the anonymous caller and FBI officials noted that those who provide false threats to police face prosecution.

24. Obama, Defending Legacy, Warns Against 'Elevating' Terrorists

New York Times, Gardiner Harris, Charlie Savage, 2016 12 07

Tampa - In his final planned address on national security as commander in chief, President Obama said on Tuesday that for eight years, his administration protected the nation against major terrorist attacks from abroad while adhering to American values and the rule of law. "No foreign terrorist organization has successfully planned and executed an attack on our homeland," Mr. Obama said to loud applause in a large military hangar here. "And it's not because they didn't try. Plots have been disrupted. Terrorists have been taken off the battlefield. And we've done this even as we've drawn down nearly 180,000 troops in Iraq and Afghanistan." He defended an approach to fighting wars that did not bankrupt the Treasury or cause thousands of deaths. He noted, for instance, that he has spent $10 billion over the last two years fighting the Islamic State -- the same amount of money President George W. Bush spent in just one month fighting the Iraq War. And he laid out a series of principles: keep the terrorist threat in perspective, avoid military overreach, adhere to the rule of law, use restraint when carrying out strikes to minimize repercussions, be open with the public, use diplomacy and protect civil liberties.

25. The CIA's Torture Architect Says Harsh Interrogations Needed More Than Ever
BuzzFeed News, Ali Watkins, 2016 12 06

Washington - The architect of the CIA's torture program unequivocally defended on Tuesday the use of interrogation techniques like waterboarding and said America needs to consider a return to coercive interrogations, a position favored by many of Trump's hardline defense advisors. James Mitchell, one of the two government psychologists that devised the CIA's torture program, made a rare public appearance Tuesday at the American Enterprise Institute, where he continued fueling controversy around the now defunct program and one of the darkest chapters in the agency's history. "I'm not advocating that we torture people. I'm advocating that we have a civil debate," Mitchell said. "Somewhere between waterboarding and worse, and what's in the Army Field Manual, I think there needs to be some kind of legal coercion," he said, referring to the congressionally-mandated handbook on humane interrogations.

26. Trump's and Obama's national security advisers to meet amid controversy
Washington Post, Josh Rogin, 2016 12 07

Column - Incoming national security adviser retired Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn will meet with national security adviser Susan E. Rice for the first time Wednesday at the White House, as congressional criticism of Flynn increases regarding his penchant for spreading conspiracy theories and his comments on Islam. Although Trump transition team members have been working inside the White House for weeks, Flynn has had only sporadic contact with Rice since the election, two sources close to the transition confirmed. Meanwhile, Flynn has kept up a steady schedule of meetings with foreign officials as he prepares to be the president's top national security aide. The Flynn-Rice meeting could be an awkward one, considering that Flynn has repeatedly trashed President Obama's foreign policy -- as implemented by officials including Rice. Moreover, although Flynn has a security clearance and participates in the presidential daily briefings, he has not signed the necessary paperwork for receiving detailed transition briefings that contain secret information. His Wednesday visit to the White House could be an opportunity to do so. Meanwhile, Democrats in Congress are ramping up their criticism of Flynn and his recent behavior, especially his use of social media. Flynn has pushed fabricated or dubious stories on Twitter at least 16 times since August, according to a tally by Politico. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.), asked Tuesday if he had any concerns about Flynn, said, "None at all." Several transition sources said Flynn is heavily involved in selecting a range of potential national security officials for Trump's incoming administration.

27. Trump Fires Security Pick's Son for Promoting a Fake Story

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 07

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump on Tuesday fired one of his transition team's staff members, Michael G. Flynn, the son of Mr. Trump's choice for national security adviser, for using Twitter to spread a fake news story about Hillary Clinton that led to an armed confrontation in a pizza restaurant in Washington. The uproar over Mr. Flynn's Twitter post cast a harsh spotlight on the views that he and his father, Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, aired on social media throughout the presidential campaign. Both men have shared fake news stories alleging that Mrs. Clinton committed felonies, and have posted their own Twitter messages that at times have crossed into Islamophobia. But their social media musings apparently attracted little attention from Mr. Trump or his transition team before a North Carolina man fired a rifle on Sunday inside Comet Ping Pong, which was the subject of false stories tying it and the Clinton campaign to a child sex trafficking ring. Hours after the episode, the younger Mr. Flynn, 33, went on Twitter to say that until "Pizzagate" was proved false, it remained a story. On Tuesday morning, after the post had attracted national attention and it was reported that Mr. Flynn had a transition team email address, Vice President-elect Mike Pence denied that Mr. Flynn had ever worked for the team, saying on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that he had "no involvement in the transition whatsoever." But later in the morning, Jason Miller, a transition spokesman, tacitly acknowledged that Mr. Flynn had worked for the transition, saying in a conference call that Mr. Flynn was now no longer involved.

28. Trump flunks his first foreign policy test

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 12 07

Column - Whatever else future historians say about Donald Trump's early foreign policy moves, they're likely to note the erratic and, in many ways, self-defeating nature of the president-elect's initial dealings with China, the country many analysts view as the United States' most important long-term rival. Devising a wise strategy for challenging China's ascendancy in Asia is arguably the top foreign policy task for a new president. But if Trump planned to take a tougher stance, this was a haphazard way to do it. The president-elect instead stumbled into a pre-inaugural foreign flap, insulting Beijing and causing it to lose face, without having a clear, well-articulated plan for what he seeks to accomplish. Worse, Trump's fulminations about China come just as his plan to withdraw from the Trans-Pacific Partnership is undermining the United States' standing with allies in Asia. Trump, in effect, is ceding economic ground to China at the very moment he claims to be taking a harder line. Is this a cool, calculating strategy from the dealmaker? It looks to me more like a hot mess.

29. Trump needs strong foreign policy team, former NSA boss says

Baltimore Sun, Ian Duncan, 2016 12 07

College Park, Md. - A former head of the National Security Agency said Tuesday that President-elect Donald Trump ought to assemble a strong team around himself to help tackle the difficult foreign policy questions he will face after taking office. "He needs people around him who can give him good advice on these issues," retired Gen. Keith Alexander said at an event at the University of Maryland, College Park. An early test case Trump may face is how to respond, if at all, to a hacking campaign designed to interfere with the presidential election that the intelligence community has concluded was carried out by Russia. Alexander, who led the NSA until 2014, said the government needs to find a way to "push back." Congressional Democrats, including Reps. Steny Hoyer and Elijah Cummings, sent a letter Tuesday urging the outgoing administration of President Barack Obama to provide briefings on the hacking campaign. "Foreign interference presents a win-win for Russia -- which we must counter," the representatives wrote. "By eroding Americans' and foreigners' trust in U.S. institutions, Russia both weakens our country and sows global instability and uncertainty." Alexander said some of the people Trump has named to senior positions leave him optimistic. He praised James Mattis, a retired Marine general who is Trump's pick to run the Defense Department, and Mike Pompeo, a Kansas congressman tapped to lead the CIA. Mattis in particular would offer Trump an unvarnished take on the world, Alexander said.

30. Vast spying powers at Trump's disposal

Los Angeles Times, Elizabeth Goitein, 2016 12 07

Op-ed - President-elect Donald Trump is about to inherit the most powerful surveillance apparatus in history. Combining unprecedented technological capabilities with a lax legal regime, his spying powers dwarf anything the notorious FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover could have fathomed. Many privacy and civil rights advocates worry Trump will seek to expand these powers further in order to spy on Muslim Americans, activists and political opponents. The truth is, he won't have to. Because of our country's rush to strip civil liberty protections from surveillance laws after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Trump will already have all the powers he needs and more. Trump has specifically called for more surveillance of American Muslim communities. His pick for national security advisor, Michael Flynn, has described Islam as a "cancer," while his nominee for attorney general, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), has called the NAACP "un-American." As a possible secretary of Homeland Security, Trump has floated Milwaukee Sheriff David Clarke, who compared Black Lives Matter to the Islamic State group and described peaceful protests against Trump as "temper tantrums" that should be "quelled." Trump's tendency to hold grudges is legendary: Referring to Republicans who did not support his candidacy, a Trump surrogate stated, "Trump has a long memory and we're keeping a list." In short, there is every reason to fear that Trump and his administration will target people for surveillance based on religion, political activism and personal vendettas. Having gutted legal protections against such abuses, are we powerless to stop them? No, but it will require vigilance and action from many quarters. Independent oversight entities, including inspectors general and congressional committees, must aggressively investigate how Trump uses his powers. The federal courts must shed their historical reluctance to hear lawsuits challenging government surveillance. All of us must fiercely defend journalists and whistle-blowers who expose surveillance overreach. Note: Elizabeth Goitein is co-director of the Liberty and National Security Program at the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law.

31. Cable: new hacking scandal is likely without proper regulation

The Guardian (London), Jasper Jackson, 2016 12 07

London - Vince Cable is to call on the government to get on with creating a system of press regulation that matches the recommendations of the Leveson inquiry, or risk a repeat of the scandals that led to it. Speaking at an event organised by campaign group Hacked Off, the former business secretary will say that a new ministerial consultation on press regulation is delaying the implementation of Leveson's recommendations, which were made following the phone-hacking scandal. "The government decision to consult again on the framework for self-regulation has the political effect of stopping progress towards a solution based on the royal charter model," he will tell an audience at the University of Westminster on Tuesday evening. "Suffice to say that the type of scandals which prompted Leveson will happen again in the absence of effective checks and balances."

32. Isis courier slipped through MI5's net

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, John Simpson, 2016 12 07

London - A Birmingham man was under MI5 surveillance and on police bail when he passed cash to a Belgian terrorist linked to the Paris and Brussels atrocities, it can be disclosed today. Mohammed Ali Ahmed, 27, had been arrested over a terrorism offence related to Syria and was subject to a curfew when he gave £3,000 in benefits to Mohamed Abrini, later dubbed the "Man in the Hat" after the deadly explosion at Brussels airport. Abrini, who took the cash back to Brussels where it was used to fund terrorism, was almost immediately detained by the Belgian authorities over an earlier trip to Islamic State-occupied territory in Syria. The decision to let him go, along with the operation in Britain, will be seen as missed opportunities to stop the Paris and Brussels attacks in which 162 people died. In 2015 Ahmed was already on the MI5 and police radar because of concerns that he might travel to Syria. Two of his associates, including Anouar Haddouchi, the recipient of the housing and child benefit that was passed to Abrini, had already travelled to fight for Islamic State. Ahmed's status, however, did not merit 24-hour surveillance and the operation was not running in July when he and Zakaria Boufassil met Abrini in Small Heath Park, Birmingham, to hand him a bag of cash. West Midlands police confirmed last night that Ahmed was subject to bail restrictions at the time over the offence linked to Syria but he was later told that he would face no further action. He and Boufassil slipped through the surveillance net just months before suicide bombers and gunmen struck in Paris. Security sources said, however, that the level of the operation was appropriate given Ahmed's status at the time.

34. GCSB wants to give ISPs more power to block cyber threats

Scoop.co.nz, Sophie Boot, 2016 12 07

Wellington - The Government Communications Security Bureau wants to give internet service providers more information and power to block cyber threats which are increasing, its director told the intelligence and security select committee yesterday. The communications-focussed spy agency has recorded 338 cyber security incidents in the last year, from 109 a year earlier, which director Andrew Hampton said was due to both the number of threats increasing and the improved system picking up more threats. Cyber threats to New Zealand are "becoming more complex and their sources more diverse" with a "growing range of international threat actors targeting New Zealand organisations for financial gain," Hampton said. Public and private organisations are targeted for their intellectual property for new technology, customer data, business and pricing strategies, and government positions on sensitive topics, Hampton said. The agency is also looking to increase the information it gives to ISPs from Cortex, the system which aims to disrupt advanced cyber threats to organisations of national significance in both the public and the private sector. "We've increased cyber security services to organisations of national significance through Cortex, with the consent of the organisations involved," Hampton said, adding the agency had responded to 69 notifications of network changes within areas of security interest in the year. "More broadly Cortex is a big focus, but our regulatory role under the TICSA Act (the Telecommunications Interception Capability and Security Act 2013) is important because that helps us with telcos to ensure they're not inadvertently introducing vulnerabilities into the system.

35. Teen jailed for seven years for plotting Melbourne terrorist attack

ABC (Australia), Gloria Kalache, 2016 12 07

Melbourne - A teenager convicted of planning a terrorist attack in Melbourne's CBD, on a train or at a police station in 2015 has been sentenced to seven years in jail. The 18-year-old, who cannot be named, when he was arrested in May last year. In sentencing, Supreme Court Judge Lex Lasry took into account the man's youth and his prospects for rehabilitation, but said the sentence must be a deterrent to him and others. He said if the teenager had not been arrested he could have killed a number of people. "You were part way through the construction of several pipe bombs," Justice Lasry said. "Your plan, until it was interrupted by police, was to build a bomb and detonate it. "Had you not been arrested you would have killed and injured innocent people." The accused pleaded guilty in December 2015 to one charge of preparing an act of terrorism. The court previously heard a number of items were seized from his family home, including a pressure cooker, matches and pipes, along with a document on his computer titled, Make a Bomb in Your Mom's Kitchen. Dreadful potential consequences The court was told the teenager developed a strong interest in what was happening in Syria, where his family is originally from, and he had come to support the Islamic State terrorist group.

36. NATO committed to security, financial support of Afghan forces: Stoltenberg

Pajhwok Afghan News, Danish Karokhel, 2016 12 07

Kabul - NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg Said on Wednesday the alliance was committed to honour its pledges with Afghanistan made during Warsaw Summit back in July. "We will discuss our continued engagement to help Afghanistan build a better future. At the Warsaw Summit, we agreed to sustain our Resolute Support beyond 2016, to train, advise and assist the Afghan security forces, he said in his initial remarks at the second day of NATO foreign ministers meeting in Brussels. Stoltenberg said NATO decided to continue national contributions to financial sustainment of Afghan security forces through 2020, with around $4 billion a year and we restated our political and practical support to Afghanistan for the long term. The alliance secretary general said NATO continued support from Afghanistan was a clear signal of commitment of the international community.

37. Saudis Bankroll Taliban, Even as King Officially Supports Afghan Government

New York Times, Carlotta Gall, 2016 12 06

Kabul - Fifteen years, half a trillion dollars and 150,000 lives since going to war, the United States is trying to extricate itself from Afghanistan. Afghans are being left to fight their own fight. A surging Taliban insurgency, meanwhile, is flush with a new inflow of money. With their nation's future at stake, Afghan leaders have renewed a plea to one power that may hold the key to whether their country can cling to democracy or succumbs to the Taliban. But that power is not the United States. It is Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia is critical because of its unique position in the Afghan conflict: It is on both sides. A longtime ally of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia has backed Islamabad's promotion of the Taliban. Over the years, wealthy Saudi sheikhs and rich philanthropists have also stoked the war by privately financing the insurgents. All the while, Saudi Arabia has officially, if coolly, supported the American mission and the Afghan government and even secretly sued for peace in clandestine negotiations on their behalf. In interviews with The New York Times, a former Taliban finance minister described how he traveled to Saudi Arabia for years raising money while ostensibly on pilgrimage.

38. US can't eliminate Taliban, admits Obama

Pajhwok Afghan News, Lalit J Kha, 2016 12 07

Washington - US President Barack Obama Tuesday acknowledged the situation in Afghanistan was still tough, asserting his administration had been instrumental in dismantling the Al Qaeda terrorist network. "I don't wanna paint too rosy a picture. The situation in Afghanistan is still tough. War has been a part of life in Afghanistan for over 30 years and the US cannot eliminate the Taliban in that country," Obama said. In a speech on his administration's counter-terrorism approach, he said: "But what we can do is support Afghans who want a better future." With that in mind, Obama said, his government had worked with the Afghan military and the unity government. The US helped Afghan girls go to school, supported investments in health care, electricity and education. Obama recalled when he took office some eight years ago Al Qaeda had regrouped in the border region of Afghanistan and Pakistan and was actively planning attacks against the US.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 06

Bamako - Suspected Islamist militants freed 93 prisoners during an attack on a jail in the central Mali town of Niono early on Tuesday, officials said. The prison break was the second of its kind in recent weeks in Mali, where militant groups based in the desert north have extended their campaign into central and southern regions, complicating international efforts at peace. Five armed men attacked the jail at around 0115 GMT, injuring two guards, the Ministry of Security said. Ninety prisoners remained at large on Tuesday afternoon; three were re-captured. The army was deployed in pursuit. It was not immediately clear who was behind the attack, but a number of Islamist groups, some linked to al Qaeda, have stepped up their insurgency in Mali this year.

41. Colombian peace process hits another bump

EFE News Agency, Staff report, 2016 12 07

Bogota - The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) announced Tuesday that its members will not start heading for the areas where they must gather before laying down their arms due to the lack of infrastructure in those areas and "legal obstructions." Their concentration in 23 rural areas is part the peace accord signed Nov. 24, but according to what the head of the negotiating team Ivan Marquez said Tuesday, that won't be possible until the government complies with its obligation to quash arrest warrants for individual guerrillas. "The country's high court in the political sphere has ordered a quicker preparation of normalization areas where guerrilla units must go once the legal obstructions are cleared away and individual arrest warrants are annulled," Marquez told the press in Bogota. The FARC repeated its commitment to demobilize and lay down its arms, and said the guerrillas have offered to help build the infrastructure required for their shelter at the places they must gather.

42. Hearing Delayed Again for Jailed Utah Man in Venezuela

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 07

Caracas - A Utah man jailed in Venezuela since June had his hopes for being reunited with his family for Christmas all but dashed Tuesday by the fourth postponement of a preliminary hearing. Judge Elena Cassiani did not appear for the scheduled hearing at which she was supposed to rule on whether to dismiss the weapons charges against Joshua Holt. A new date was set for January. Holt, a 24-year-old former Mormon missionary, said he travelled to Venezuela to marry a woman he met online while looking for Spanish-speaking Mormons to help him improve his Spanish. Venezuelan officials allege he was using his wife's apartment to stockpile weapons and have suggested his case is linked to other unspecified attempts by the U.S. government to undermine President Nicolas Maduro's socialist rule amid deep economic and political turbulence. The U.S. House passed a resolution in September calling for the release of Holt and other political prisoners in Venezuela. Secretary of State John Kerry raised Holt's jailing during a meeting with Maduro in September, and a senior State Department official traveled to Caracas twice in recent weeks in part to push for his release. The pressure has so far yielded no tangible results.

44. Intel-sharing deal intended to counter threats from China, N.K.

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 07

Tokyo - A recent intelligence-sharing deal that Japan reached with South Korea is a "necessary" step to guarantee its national security in the face of threats from China and North Korea, a former Japanese envoy to Seoul has said. Last month, South Korea and Japan signed the General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA) aimed at expanding intelligence sharing between the two neighbors and better countering the threat, in particular, from North Korea. The deal, however, sparked strong opposition from some politicians and civic groups in South Korea as they argued that Japan is working to expand its military power and overseas role without sincerely apologizing for its wartime atrocities decades ago. During a recent interview with the foreign ministry's press corps in Tokyo, Masatoshi Muto, who served as Japan's ambassador to South Korea from 2010 to 2012, said that the argument is "wrong" and that the deal is only intended to strengthen its national security from outside threats. "It is necessary to guarantee (our) national security against China and North Korea," he said. "What benefit can we have from increasing our military power and being at odds with South Korea? "As North Korea declared its possession of nuclear weapons, while conducting missile tests repeatedly, Japan has no choice but to be proactive in strengthening its national defense. This is not intended to target South Korea."

45. IS setting up base in Philippines

Jakarta Post, Safrin La Batu, 2016 12 07

Jakarta - The Islamic State (IS) group's attempt to create a fully pledged wilayat or province in the southern Philippines poses a serious security threat to Indonesia, the Indonesian Military (TNI) has warned. The group, which is currently falling back in Iraq and Syria against internationally backed anti-IS forces, is building its base in Mindanao, a restive area that borders with Kalimantan and Sulawesi, TNI commander Gen. Gatot Nurmantyo said on Tuesday. The number of abductions carried out by terrorist groups from commercial vessels passing through southern Philippines' waters indicated that IS militants in the area are raising money to build the base, Gatot said. "I have raised concerns about this issue for six months. IS can enter Indonesia from there," he said on the sidelines of a seminar on terrorism in Central Jakarta. Armed militants believed to be linked to terrorist group Abu Sayyaf have kidnapped dozens of Indonesian and Malaysian sailors and demanded millions of dollars in ransom.

46. Suspected N.K. attackers hack into S.K. cyber command through main server

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 07

Seoul - Military investigators looking into the first hacking of South Korea's cyber command intranet said Wednesday the suspected North Korean attackers accessed the network through a server at the armed forces' main information center. The findings raised concerns that confidential information may have been compromised as the affected server is connected with the information systems of the Army, Navy and the Air Force. But the ministry said information saved on the server system was not stolen. A total of 3,200 computers, including 700 linked with the intranet, were contaminated with malware in the latest cyber attack, which occurred on Aug. 4, the Ministry of National Defense said. It said some military documents were hacked while refusing to provide details. The computer used by Defense Minister Han Min-koo was also affected, the official said. On Tuesday, the ministry said the IP addresses linked to the attack were traced to a location in China that has been used by North Korean hackers. "As one of the military's two integration servers was jointly linked to the internet and the intranet, it allowed the hackers to gain access to the intranet," a ministry official said.

47. Trump's call with Taiwan president sends message to China to work harder on N.K.: transition official

Yonhap News Agency, Chang Jae-soon, 2016 12 07

Washington - U.S. President-elect Donald Trump's phone call with Taiwan's president shows the incoming administration believes China should work hard on North Korea as much as it cares about the cross-strait issue, a transition team official was quoted as saying Tuesday. The official made the remark during a meeting with a group of South Korean lawmakers, pointing out that China has been unwilling to use its influence over Pyongyang even though Beijing provides most of the North's energy and food supplies, according to the participating lawmakers. They declined to identify the official. On Friday, Trump spoke by phone with Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen, breaking the decadeslong diplomatic tradition that the U.S. has kept under its "One China" policy since severing ties with Taiwan and normalizing relations with Beijing. China considers Taiwan a renegade province that must be unified with the mainland and rails against any support for Taiwan's independence or the notion that the island is not part of the country. Despite the absence of formal diplomatic ties, the U.S. has maintained friendly relations with Taiwan. The call sparked concern that U.S. relations with China could worsen seriously. On the surface, transition team officials, including Vice President-elect Mike Pence, downplayed the call as nothing more than the acceptance of a congratulatory, courtesy call. But The Washington Post reported Monday that it was an intentionally provocative move that establishes the incoming president as a break with the past, and the product of months of quiet preparations and deliberations among Trump's advisers about a new strategy for engagement with Taiwan.

48. Kremlin Updates Its Plan to Counter Cyber Threats

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 12 07

Moscow - The Kremlin published a new plan on Tuesday to defend Russia against what it described as stepped-up cyberattacks and "information-psychological" methods by foreign intelligence agencies bent on influencing its population with online information. The plan updates a similar information security doctrine put in place by President Vladimir V. Putin in 2000, early in his first term, that staked out a renewed role for post-Soviet government in monitoring information. The latest iteration of the doctrine comes as American officials have mulled retaliating against Russia for what the Department of Homeland Security said was government-orchestrated hacking before the presidential election, including stealing emails from the Democratic National Committee. The plan, signed by Mr. Putin on Monday but published on Tuesday, described a threat to Russia of technological malfeasance similar to what the United States has accused the Russians of committing. It did not mention, however, any specific online strikes against Russia indicating that American retaliation could be underway.

49. Russia Expects a Taste of Its Own Cyber Medicine

Bloomberg View, Leonid Bershidsky, 2016 12 06

Column - Russia, demonized as the biggest cyber-villain in the world in the wake of the U.S. election campaign, must now take special care of its own information security. Its adversaries don't just possess powerful cyber spying and offensive capabilities -- they suspect Russian involvement in every incident, and that makes Russia vulnerable to all kinds of retaliation. Putin clearly understands that and feels the need to shift the narrative or at least signal his preparedness. On Monday, he approved a new Russian information security doctrine which mentions "a number of foreign countries increasing their technological capacity to impact" Russian infrastructure "to attain military goals." It also talks about foreign intelligence services attempting to "exert psychological influence by information means in order to destabilize the domestic political situation in various regions of the world and undermine the sovereignty and territorial integrity of states." According to the document, the Russian stance against such practices is defensive. But it is more likely an attempt to justify cyberattacks and the spreading of propaganda in the Kremlin's favorite way -- by saying everybody else does it too. The new doctrine was published on the day the FSB, Russia's domestic intelligence service, said it expected the start of a major cyberattack by "foreign special services" against the Russian banking sector. On Dec. 2, the FSB said in a brief statement that Russian banks would be attacked from servers in the Netherlands owned by the Ukraine-based hosting company BlazingFast. At the same time, the FSB said, social networks would fill with panic-inducing messages about the collapse of certain banks and the central bank's plans to strip them of licenses. The threat apparently was taken seriously.

50. En Irak et en Syrie, l'État islamique a perdu de nombreuses villes

Le Figaro, Georges Malbrunot, 2016 12 07

Tikrit - Irak : en un an et demi, Daech a dû céder le contrôle de plusieurs villes, ainsi que quasiment la moitié des territoires qu'il contrôlait. Tikrit : l'ancien fief du dictateur Saddam Hussein a été repris en mars 2015 par les forces irakiennes, avec l'implication des milices chiites et de la coalition internationale anti-Daech. De nombreux djihadistes avaient alors préféré fuir les combats. Sinjar : la reprise de cette ville du nord en novembre 2015 par les forces kurdes appuyées par la coalition internationale a permis de couper une route stratégique de communication entre l'Irak et la Syrie. Daech s'y était livré à des exactions contre la minorité yazidie. Ramadi : le chef-lieu de la province d'al-Anbar, à une centaine de kilomètres à l'ouest de Bagdad, a été reconquis en février 2016. Mais cette victoire a été arrachée au terme de très longs combats dans une ville que les djihadistes avaient massivement minée. Ce qui pose d'inextricables problèmes de reconstruction.

51. Iran's Leader Says Trump Can't Scrap Nuclear Pact

New York Times, Thomas Erdbrink, 2016 12 07

Tehran - Iran's president said on Tuesday that he simply would not allow President-elect Donald J. Trump to tear up last year's nuclear agreement and warned of unspecified consequences if he did. "He wants to do many things," Iran's president, Hassan Rouhani, said of Mr. Trump in a speech. During the campaign, Mr. Trump called the nuclear agreement "a bad deal" that he promised to "tear up." "He wants to undermine the J.C.P.O.A.," Mr. Rouhani said, referring to the agreement, the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action. "He wants to tear up the J.C.P.O.A. Will we or our nation allow this?" As Mr. Rouhani posed the question, the audience began chanting, "Death to America."

52. 15 Iranian spies sentenced to death

Saudi Gazette, Mishal Al-Otaibi, 2016 12 07

Riyadh - The Specialized Criminal Court in Riyadh has issued a preliminary verdict sentencing to death 15 out of 32 people accused of spying for Iran. The court sentenced 15 others to prison terms ranging from six months to 25 years, and acquitted two. The suspects, comprising 30 Saudis, one Iranian and an Afghan, were detained in late 2014 and early 2015 on charges of spying for Iran. The sentencing came after a 10-month trial and 160 hearings. They were accused of forming a cell to spy for Iran and to liaise with Iranian intelligence forces to undermine the Kingdom's security and stability. Other charges include attempts to carry out acts of sabotage against economic interests and vital installations in Saudi Arabia, to undermine social peace and public order, to spread chaos, to incite sectarian strife, and to carry out hostile acts against the Kingdom. The suspects are also accused of meeting Iran's supreme leader Ali Khamenei.

53. Bahrain Court of Appeal Issues Verdict on Terror Group

Asharq Al-Awsat, Obaid Al-Suhaymi, 2016 12 07

Manama - Bahraini Court of Appeal approved the verdict on members of a terror group, the court sentenced five defendants to prison between 5 and 15 years, and revoked their Bahraini citizenship. Terror Crime Chief Prosecutor Hamad Shahin said the High Court of Appeal issued its verdict today on Tuesday in the case of joining a terror group, funding its members and possessing fire weapons for a terror purpose. The court accepted the appeal of three defendants in form and upheld the challenged sentence. The High Criminal Court had sentenced the first and second defendants to 15 years in jail and a BD100,000 fine for each. It also handed down five years in prison to three other convicts. The court also revoked the Bahraini citizenship of all the defendants and the confiscated items found in their possession. In depth, the first convict is a leading figure in "February 14" terror organization who received training on making explosives and using weapons.

54. Conference tackles role of education in confronting extremist thought (Canada).

Arab News, Staff Report, 2016 12 07

Abha - Deputizing for Education Minister Ahmad Al-Isa, King Khalid University rector Dr. Faleh bin Ra'allah Al-Sulami opened the Second International Conference on Media and Terrorism, Methods and Strategies, in Abha. Al-Sulami said King Khalid University was honored to organize the conference which is part of its contribution to serving national issues through academic work. It is time for these specialized departments to prepare experts who are capable of bearing the responsibility, especially since terrorism has become an international phenomenon with terrorists surfing many sites on the internet. We received more than 1,200 applications to participate in the conference, and were forced to reduce them gradually until we accepted 80 research papers. Today we have more than 100 individuals, ranging from speakers and participants from inside and outside the Kingdom. We are happy with the external participation which includes more than 30 nationalities from Europe, Canada, the United States, Africa and the Arab world."

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 12 07

Beirut - The Directorate of General Security arrested a Syrian national suspected of having links to a terror group, the directorate said in a statement on Tuesday. "In line with efforts to track the activities of terror groups and sleeper cells, the General Security detained Syrian national Aa.M. against the backdrop of having links to terror groups," said a General Security statement. Upon investigations with him the suspect admitted his links and his accomplice in the suicidal dual explosion that hit Bourj al-Barajneh on November 12, 2015, and another explosion in Dimas Yaafour in Syria on December 18 of the same year. The detainee was referred to the competent judiciary and investigations are still underway to pursue other involved individuals. (Full Report).

Saudi Gazette, Issa Al-Shamani, 2016 12 07

Riyadh - Saudi Arabia suffered more than 128 terrorist operations in the last 15 years that killed or injured as many as 1,147 Saudis and expatriates, according to spokesman of Interior Ministry Maj. Gen. Mansour Al-Turki. "Since 2001 the Kingdom has been a target for terrorists who also planned to attack housing complexes and vital security establishments," he said. Turki was speaking on Monday at a symposium on "The role of social service and intellectual security" organized by Princess Nourah University. He said that terrorists also targeted mosques, foreign embassies and the security men. "Even the Grand Mosque in Makkah was targeted and the Prophet's Mosque was attacked last Ramadan," he said. The spokesman said the propagators of devious thought found fertile soil and a safe haven in countries witnessing armed conflicts.

57. Russian and Chinese Vetoes End Hopes For Ceasefire in Aleppo

Asharq Al-Awsat, Jordan Dakamseh, 2016 12 07

London - Russia and China vetoed a UN Security Council resolution on Monday evening. The resolution was submitted by Egypt, Spain and New Zealand and called for an initial ceasefire period of seven days in Aleppo that aims to enable the delivery of humanitarian aid to residents who are besieged in the eastern neighbourhoods because of the battles taking place. The resolution received 11 votes in favour and was opposed by three states, two of which have the "power of veto", and one state abstained from voting on it. The draft resolution stipulated that "all parties to the Syrian conflict stop attacks in the city of Aleppo" during an initial period of seven days and stated that this ceasefire would be renewable for periods of 24 hours. It also stated that this temporary truce would be a prelude to a ceasefire in all parts of Syria according to UN resolution 2268.

58. US Trying to Rescue Intelligence Officers from Eastern Aleppo City

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 07

Tehran - Washington has urged for negotiations with Moscow over a deal that would envisage providing a safe passage to the US intelligence officers and terrorists in Eastern Aleppo to Turkey via the Castillo corridor in lieu of handing over the remaining districts to the Syrian army, media reports said Tuesday. The Arabic-language al-Hadas news website quoted unnamed informed sources as saying on Tuesday that the negotiations are meant to help the US intelligence officers, including Balal Abdel Karim and another one who administered the battles of Aleppo, leave the Aleppo city. Earlier on Tuesday, media sources disclosed that a large number of militants have been negotiating secretly with government officials in Aleppo to surrender themselves and leave the city. The Arabic language al-Watan newspaper reported that continued defeats of Jeish al-Fatah and devastating advances of the Syrian army troops in the Eastern districts of Aleppo city have widen rifts amongst militant groups.

59. Attentats: le terrorisme en tête des préoccupations des Français

Agence France-Presse, Rémy Bellon, 2016 12 07

Paris - La vague d'attentats de 2015 a changé le regard des Français en matière d'insécurité: le terrorisme est désormais leur première source de préoccupation, selon une vaste enquête annuelle publiée mercredi. L'Observatoire national de la délinquance et des réponses pénales (ONDRP) et l'Institut national de la statistique (Insee) ont rendu publique leur dixième enquête annuelle, consistant à sonder plus de 15.000 personnes de 14 ans et plus sur leur ressenti de l'insécurité et sur les faits de délinquance dont ils se disent victimes mais pour lesquels ils ne portent pas automatiquement plainte. Les résultats, qui tranchent souvent avec les statistiques officielles, portent sur l'année 2015, marquée par les attentats jihadistes de janvier contre Charlie Hebdo et l'Hyper Cacher et ceux du 13 novembre. Quand on les interroge plus généralement sur le "problème le plus préoccupant" à leurs yeux, le terrorisme bondit, à 30,4%, pour se retrouver quasiment au même niveau que le chômage (30,9%). Il y a un an, le terrorisme n'était cité en tête que par 17,7% des Français (et seulement 5% auparavant), loin derrière le chômage (38,3%).

60. Europe Presses U.S. Tech Giants to Curb Online Hate Speech

New York Times, Mark Scott, 2016 12 07

New York - European officials pushed on Tuesday for American technology giants to do more to tackle online hate speech across the region, adding to the chorus of policy makers worldwide demanding greater action from the likes of Facebook, Google and Twitter. The rebuke came a day after many of those companies announced that they were joining forces to fight the spread of terrorist content on the internet, agreeing to share technology and information to prevent propaganda and other dangerous materials from being disseminated on their services. Amid growing security tensions in much of the Western world, governments, intelligence agencies and advocacy groups want Google, Microsoft and other technology companies to take further steps to curb hate speech on digital platforms, as well as to clamp down on how terrorists circulate information online. But freedom of expression campaigners have warned that such demands may limit people's ability to communicate across the internet, and they have cautioned that the line between hate speech and legitimate political discussion can be blurry. In a report published on Tuesday, however, the European authorities signaled that only 40 percent of material flagged as possible hate speech online (albeit in a relatively small sample of 600 posts, videos and other online material) had been reviewed by the Silicon Valley companies within 24 hours. Of those 600 postings, just over a quarter was eventually taken down, the report said.

61. How police let Man in the Hat Belgian terror suspect walk free

London Daily Telegraph, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 06

London - A suspected terrorist who used British benefit money to help carry out the Paris and Brussels outrages was detained by police months earlier but then allowed to go free, it can be revealed. Mohamed Abrini - who was dubbed The Man in the Hat - travelled from Syria to Birmingham last July in order to collect £3,000 from Isil sympathisers. Upon his return to Belgium he was arrested and questioned by detectives who also seized his mobile phone containing photographs of British landmarks including Old Trafford and Birmingham's Bullring Shopping Centre. But despite establishing that he had just returned from war-torn Syria, where his younger brother had been killed, the Belgian police did not detain him. They placed him under surveillance, using a static camera outside his home, but footage was only periodically monitored because of a lack of manpower. Just months later he is suspected of taking part in the deadly attacks on Paris and Brussels which left 160 people dead. The police blunder was revealed during the trial of Zakaria Boufassil, a Belgian national living in Birmingham, who has been found guilty of supplying thousands of pounds to Abrini during his secret mission to the UK. It can now also be revealed that MI5 carried out a "low level" investigation into Abrini after being informed about his trip to the UK, but concluded that he did not pose a significant threat to the UK.

En janvier 2010, après sept ans et demi d'enfermement à Guantánamo, A. H. , un Ouzbek alors âgé de 36 ans, arrivait à Genève. C'est en toute discrétion que les autorités genevoises l'ont installé en vue de sa réinsertion. On a dit de lui qu'il serait pâtissier de formation, tandis que les documents officiels de Guantánamo en faisaient en 2005 un membre du Mouvement islamique d'Ouzbékistan et un individu ayant suivi des camps d'entraînement d'Al-Qaida en Afghanistan. Le document mentionne à son sujet, dans une mise à jour, « un transfert possible dans un autre pays sous condition ». En 2010 également, deux frères ouïgours, minorité musulmane réprimée en Chine, ont été accueillis dans le Jura. Les mêmes documents américains les avaient classifiés en 2005 comme membres du Mouvement islamique du Turkestan oriental.

63. Magnanville: trois gardes à vue dans l'entourage du tueur

Paris - Trois hommes dans l'entourage du jihadiste Larossi Abballa, qui a tué en juin un policier et sa compagne à Magnanville (Yvelines), ont été placés lundi en garde à vue, a-t-on appris mercredi de source proche de l'enquête, confirmant une information de BFMTV. Les trois gardés à vue, âgés de 22, 25 et 39 ans, ont été arrêtés lundi lors d'une opération de la sous-direction antiterroriste (Sdat) de la police judiciaire. Ils gravitaient dans l'entourage de Larossi Abballa, a indiqué la source, sans plus de précision sur leur profil. Larossi Abballa, 25 ans, a assassiné le 13 juin Jean-Baptiste Salvaing, 42 ans, commandant de police, adjoint du commissariat des Mureaux, et Jessica Schneider, 36 ans, agent administratif du commissariat voisin de Mantes-la-Jolie, à leur domicile de Magnanville, avant d'être abattu par les policiers du Raid. L'attaque a été perpétrée au nom du groupe jihadiste État islamique (EI).

64. Mineur radicalisé jugé: le désespoir d'une mère

Le Temps (Suisse), Nathalie Versieux, 2016 12 07

Essen, Allemagne - Le procès de trois jeunes islamistes, accusés d'avoir commis en avril un attentat à la bombe contre un temple sikh, s'ouvre ce mercredi à Essen De nouveau, Neriman Yaman n'aura pas dormi de la nuit lorsqu'elle se rendra ce mercredi au tribunal d'Essen, en Rhénanie-du- Nord-Westphalie. Cette Turque de 37 ans, née à Duisburg, en Allemagne, dans une famille de petits commerçants, est la mère de Yussuf. Le 16 avril dernier, son fils commettait en compagnie de deux comparses rencontrés sur Internet un attentat à la bombe contre le temple sikh d'Essen. Les enquêteurs retrouvent sur place les restes d'un extincteur, rempli de produits chimiques. Une cérémonie de mariage vient de s'achever, et par chance le bâtiment est presque vide. Trois personnes sont tout de même blessées, dont l'une - le prêtre - grièvement. La porte du bâtiment est soufflée par la force de l'explosion. L'attentat est considéré comme le premier en Allemagne attribué à la mouvance de l'Etat islamique (ou Daech). Le procès se tiendra à huis clos, eu égard au jeune âge des accusés. Le procureur est convaincu que les trois garçons (Yussuf T., 17 ans, Mohamad B., 16 ans et Tolga I., 17 ans) ont agi par conviction religieuse et s'étaient rapprochés de Daech. Les trois garçons, nés eux aussi en Allemagne, faisaient partie d'un groupe de jeunes salafistes de la région qui avaient décidé de tuer des « mécréants » .

66. Pour éviter les départs vers la Syrie, 11 cartes d'identité retirées

La Libre Belgique, Jacques Laruelle, 2016 12 07

Bruxelles - Cette mesure, drastique, a été prise pour empêcher des jeunes de partir en Syrie. C'était une des mesures, parmi d'autres, annoncées par le Premier ministre à la Chambre le 19 novembre 2015, dans la foulée des attentats terroristes à Paris. Afin d'éviter les départs vers la Syrie, il avait été décidé qu'il était possible de retirer les documents de voyage. Sur base d'une appréciation du dossier individuel, la carte d'identité pouvait ainsi être annulée ou rendue invalide pour une période limitée de trois mois, prolongeable une fois. Il va de soit que cette mesure allait de pair avec l'annulation du passeport. Pas question toutefois de simplement retirer le document : des mesures complémentaires, notamment socio-préventives, appuient un suivi individuel de la personne dont la carte d'identité était retirée. Près d'un an plus tard, l'Organe de coordination pour l'analyse de la menace (Ocam) a soumis dix-sept demandes d'annulation d'une carte d'identité.

1. Garratts recount dark odyssey through China's security apparatus

Globe and Mail, Eric Andrew-Gee, 2016 12 08

Back in Canada, Kevin Garratt and his wife, who had made China their home running a café and pursuing aid projects in North Korea, are still trying to make sense of their surprise arrest in 2014. The Garratts didn't realize they were being set up until it was too late. It was August, 2014, and the Christian aid workers were at a restaurant in the remote northern Chinese city of Dandong, on the North Korean border, where they had lived and run a café for years. An acquaintance had asked them for advice on sending his daughter to study in Canada - so there they were, prepared to offer assistance, as they had been doing in China since falling in love with the country 30 years before. Shortly after arriving amid what looked like a wedding party, Kevin and Julia Garratt were grabbed by strange men and driven away in separate cars. The surprise arrest launched a dark odyssey through the Chinese state security apparatus: Mr. Garratt was imprisoned for two years on espionage charges, Ms. Garratt was detained, then placed under surveillance, and the family was traumatized, immiserated and finally reunited, with troubling questions to spare. The episode would also become a flashpoint in SinoCanadian relations as the countries negotiated the launch of talks on an extradition treaty. Three months after returning to Canada, the Garratts sat down with The Globe and Mail to give their most detailed account yet of the harrowing journey. At the invitation of the country's regime, the couple had built bathrooms for orphanages, helped with flood relief and rebuilt facilities at a school for the disabled. All the while, they ran a coffee shop in the Chinese border city that was frequented by students and foreign journalists. The shop also attracted local diplomats hoping to learn about North Korea through two Canadians who had been given rare levels of access to the country. The couple would later learn through their Chinese interrogators that a U.S. military attaché had visited the café. Former foreign affairs minister John Baird requested a meeting during his tenure. And in 2009, the Garratts were contacted by Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the Canadian spy agency, to ensure the couple hadn't violated sanctions through their aid work. (They hadn't.) Ms. Garratt now believes all of the attention from foreign diplomats and security agencies put a bull's eye on their backs.

2. Trump's torture view may change secrets sharing with Canada: spy watchdog executive

Toronto - The civil servant in charge of the government's spy- watchdog agency says Canada may have to reconsider how it shares intelligence with the United States if president-elect Donald Trump makes good on his promise to torture terrorists to gather intelligence. The federal official also remarked that had former U.S. intelligence analyst Edward Snowden worked for Canadian intelligence and leaked secrets, "he should be shot," but quickly backed off the opinion. Michael Doucet, the executive director of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, made the off-the-cuff remarks to a small audience in Toronto last week. An audio recording of his talk was provided to The Globe and Mail by a student journalist from the Eyeopener, a campus newspaper at Ryerson University, which was the venue for the talk. For 1 1/2 hours, the former intelligence analyst held forth on intelligence issues. Members of SIRC rarely make unscripted or unguarded remarks publicly because they are sworn to secrecy about their work reviewing the highly classified spying operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. When contacted on Wednesday, Mr. Doucet acknowledged he made the comments, but said he was not expecting them to be recorded. In recent weeks, the Liberal government has tried not to make remarks that could irritate or prejudice the incoming Trump administration. On the campaign trail, Mr. Trump unequivocally promised a return to brass-knuckles techniques for U.S. intelligence agencies, which may no longer want to use them. "Don't tell me it doesn't work

- torture works," Mr. Trump once said, adding that he would personally authorize it. His nominee for Central Intelligence Agency director has defended the so-called "extraordinary interrogation techniques" U.S. spies used under past administrations. "These men and women are not torturers, they are patriots," Representative Mike Pompeo has said. Should the CIA revert to practices such as simulated drowning techniques known as "waterboarding," it could cause problems for CSIS and other Canadian agencies. Harking back to his years when he worked for Canada's signals-intelligence agency - the Communications Security Establishment - Mr. Doucet told the audience intelligence-sharing is vast, and alliances are important. He pointed out that in the mid-2000s, he was CSE's embedded liaison officer at the U.S. National Security Agency. "For every dollar we invest in intelligence, the Americans are investing hundreds," he said. An audience member asked Mr. Doucet what he thought of Mr. Snowden, the fugitive former intelligence contractor who leaked vast amounts of NSA documents, and what his fate would be had he been Canadian. "Do you want my opinion on that? Do you really want it? I'll give it to you. If Edward Snowden had worked for CSIS, and did what he did, he should be shot." Mr. Doucet clarified that he was being provocative, and would like to see Mr. Snowden put on trial. But he said he does not accept arguments that Mr. Snowden had to leak the NSA documents because he believed they contained evidence of illegality and had no other way of bringing that to light.

3. 'Visa lift' gives Mexican cartels chance to expand in Canada

Vancouver Sun, Kim Bolan, 2016 12 08

Vancouver - Violent drug cartels are expected to expand their reach in Canada now that a visa requirement for Mexicans has been lifted, according to government documents obtained by Postmedia News. The Canada Border Services Agency report says "the visa lift will make travel to Canada easier in order to establish or strengthen existing cartel smuggling chains." "In the next three years, Mexican drug cartels are expected to expand their presence in Canada by sending operatives and recruiting local airport or marine port workers with ties to Mexico," says the document, obtained from a source. The Sun obtained only a section of the document titled: Implications for the Canada Border Services Agency and Canada. Postmedia earlier reported on the increasing presence of Mexican cartels in Canada, as well as the fact that gangsters and organized criminals were working at the Port of Vancouver. As of Dec. 1, Mexicans are no longer required to obtain a visa to come to Canada. The previous visa program had existed for seven years. The CBSA document said the cartels generally don't use tourists to smuggle drugs for them. "While Mexican drug cartels do employ drug mules, they prefer shipments with high profitability and high likelihood of successful delivery," the documents says.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) has paid its members more than $1 billion of overtime since 2009, according to documents obtained by CBC News. Recent retirees from the force say the costs confirm anecdotes that many officers are stressed, overworked and depressed. "The rank and file -- especially the patrol guys and girls -- are burnt out," said Derek Snow, a recently retired RCMP member with 29 years of policing experience. "You want to do a good job and you want to do extra," Snow said, who lives in Shediac, N.B. "But there's only so much anybody can take." 'Unlimited overtime' Between April 2009 and June 2015, the RCMP paid $1.01 billion in overtime, according to documents obtained via access to information requests.

5. Abuses warrant tossing case against suspected Egyptian terrorist, court urged Canadian Press, Colin Perkel, 2016 12 08

Toronto - The case against an Egyptian man long branded a terrorist threat has been riddled with so many problems over the years that a judge should have ended the proceedings, Federal Court of Appeal heard Wednesday. Instead, his lawyer argued, Judge Edmond Blanchard upheld the national security certificate imposed on Mohamed Mahjoub despite finding the government had violated his rights. "The remedies provided in relation to the violations found by Justice Blanchard were inadequate," Mahjoub's lawyer Paul Slansky said. "He found there was an unfair trial. Once you find an unfair trial, it's game over." Mahjoub, 56, of Toronto, has been in prison or under severe restrictions since the government first decided in 2000 _ based in part on secret evidence supplied by foreign agencies linked to torture _ that he posed a threat to Canada's national security. Among other things, Canada's spy agency alleged Mahjoub was a leading member of the Egyptian terror group Vanguard of Conquest, and a trusted associate of former terrorist mastermind, Osama bin Laden _ accusations Mahjoub has always denied. The current two-day hearing consolidates three separate appeals to his security certificate, which allows for detention or restrictions of foreign nationals without charge or trial. The government argues Blanchard's judgments were correct and the security certificate should stand.

6. A citizen's ordeal at the border (Canada) Los Angeles Times, Khaled Abou El Fadl, 2016 12 08

Op-ed - At the end of November, I was detained at the American- Canadian border, and I find myself struggling with feelings of resentment, anger and shame. I had traveled from Los Angeles to Edmonton, Canada, where I delivered an academic lecture at the University of Alberta. Getting off a plane and gaining entry into Alberta, I was treated with respect and dignity, and was sent on my way with a lilt, "Welcome to Canada, professor." Returning home to the United States was a different experience. To set the scene, I should mention that I was traveling with my wife and 11- year-old son. I am in my 50s, wrestling with a number of health challenges, and I use a wheelchair. The first indication that something was amiss came when my wife tried to complete online check-in for us all. It wouldn't work for me. Later, as we passed through the airport security line in Edmonton, I was asked to separate my belongings from that of my family, something that I obligingly did. After going through a security detector, I was meticulously patted down, and I, as well as my belongings, were swabbed more than once, I assume for explosives residue. The U.S. Department of Homeland Security stations Customs and Border Protection agents in Canada, so travelers in effect cross the border before they even arrive in the U.S. At the Edmonton airport, travelers to America insert their passports into a scanning machine, fill in basic information on a touchscreen, and get their photos taken. Then the machine ejects a form that must be presented to the Homeland Security officers. I was rather surprised and somewhat amused when the form in my case came out of the machine with a large and jarring X all over it. When I handed it over, my American passport was placed in a red folder and I was asked to follow the officer to a side area. After about 40 minutes, we were set free with nothing more than a "you can go." We ran to make our flight as my wife pushed my wheelchair and our son wrangled our two wheeled carry-ons. We had been welcomed with dignity as we entered Canada, only to be dehumanized when we came home. Note: Khaled Abou El Fadl is a professor at UCLA's School of Law and former chair of the university's Islamic Studies Interdepartmental Program.

7. Belleville woman played role in delivering 'Pizzagate' conspiracy

Toronto Star, The Washington Post and Star staff, 2016 12 08

Toronto - Following the spread of fake news and "Pizzagate" - which inspired a violent incident in a Washington, D.C., eatery and may even have affected the course of the U.S. election - leads to at least one surprising destination: the home of a writer in Belleville, Ont. Stefanie MacWilliams, a stay-at-home mother and contributor to the website Planet Free Will, wrote an article last month that took off on social media. In it she recounted a man's claims about a politically connected pedophile ring housed at the Comet Ping Pong pizza parlour in the U.S. capital. On Sunday, less than three weeks after MacWilliams' article was published, Edgar Welch was arrested after a rifle was discharged in the restaurant. He later said he wanted only to investigate the claims. "I kind of wanted to put out the information that was there with the statement I'm not accusing anyone of anything, there's no concrete evidence of anything," MacWilliams said Wednesday, adding that her readers were very interested in the story. Among the claims are allegations that aides to Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton were involved in a child prostitution ring hidden in mysterious tunnels beneath the pizzeria. Planet Free Will was among the websites recently called out by the New York Times for sharing fake news. "I was personally a little bit insulted," said MacWilliams of the label, adding, "Fake news has become used as this ridiculous term ... it's the new 'conspiracy theorist.'"

8. DND delays move to new HQ

Ottawa - The first major move of Defence Department employees to the former Nortel campus in west-end Ottawa will be delayed until early next year so as not to cause workers too much stress over the holidays as well as to allow them to sort out their transportation arrangements to the site. The delay will also ensure that amenities such as a gym and doughnut shop will be ready for workers when they arrive, according to a message sent Tuesday to all employees by Vice-Admiral Mark Norman, vice-chief of the defence staff. The first major wave of Canadian Forces and Department of National Defence staff was supposed to move into the former Nortel campus starting in the fall. But in his message Norman says that move would not start until Jan. 9. Norman said that since the move to the Carling Avenue location is a large undertaking, it is causing changes to the work and personal schedules of employees. Because the DND and Canadian Forces want to minimize such disruptions, the decision was made to delay the move. "Even though the first building is just about ready for occupancy, I have directed that the move of Military Personnel Command not start before 9 January 2017," Norman wrote to employees. "This means that when we do move in, there will be more services and amenities available, things like the gym, Canex and Tim Hortons," he said.

9. Opposition wary of Biden's Ottawa visit

Globe and Mail, Laura Stone, 2016 12 08

U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Ottawa this week is intended to reassure the public that the bond between the two countries is strong, but Canada's Conservative Opposition warns the trip could sabotage the country's relationship with the incoming Trump administration. Mr. Biden will be celebrated at an official dinner in Ottawa on Thursday, and on Friday will meet with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and the country's premiers already in town to discuss climate change at a first ministers' meeting. Kate Purchase, Mr. Trudeau's director of communications, said the dinner will reflect the depth of Canada-U.S. ties and "making sure that there is continuity in the relationship." But some opposition MPs are concerned Mr. Biden's visit could jeopardize future relations with president-elect Donald Trump. "The only thing I would be worried about is that no steps are taken to somehow sabotage the Canada-U.S. relationship. That would be a huge mistake. I would hope that's not the purpose of Mr. Biden's meeting," said Conservative MP Ed Fast, the former trade minister, told The Globe and Mail. "We just want to make sure that whatever meetings Mr. Biden holds here in Canada are focused on building the Canada-U.S. relationship, and the relationship with the future administration - the Donald Trump administration."

10. RCMP fabricated response to access-to-info request 'unacceptable:' Goodale

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 08

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says it's "unacceptable" that an RCMP employee fabricated a response to an access-to-information request. Goodale says the individual involved was "at a very junior level" and has been disciplined. The fabrication was revealed last week in a letter from RCMP Supt. David Vautour to Bruce Cheadle, a reporter for The Canadian Press who in May 2015 had requested information regarding the now-defunct long-gun registry. Cheadle did not receive a response to his access request until March 1, 2016, but that letter was backdated almost five months. Vautour said a note included with the tardy response claimed that the letter had originally been sent to Cheadle in October 2015, but was returned to the RCMP by Canada

Post due to an incorrect postal code. He said the Mounties have since determined that the backdated letter and the explanatory note were fabricated to avoid a possible complaint about the delay in responding to the request. "Our office does not condone actions that are contrary to the RCMP core values of honesty, integrity and professionalism," Vautour wrote Cheadle.

11. When online, put individual rights first

Globe and Mail, 2016 12 08

Editorial: The stakes are considerable, which is why the folks who run the national security apparatus have quietly and not-so-quietly been laying down markers as Ottawa reviews their powers. The argument goes they need more tools, and more leeway, to do their important work. Maybe. Maybe not. Canada's federal Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien and his provincial and territorial counterparts are sounding a muchneeded note of caution in a joint brief submitted as part of the ongoing security review. "It is important that we not forget the lessons of history. One of these lessons is that once conferred, new state powers are rarely relinquished," the document reads. That's true, as is the fact that the expansion of state powers of surveillance over the past 15 years has resulted in "too many cases of inappropriate and sometimes illegal conduct by state officials," including violations of privacy and other civil rights. If Bill C-51, the former Conservative government's anti-terrorism legislation, was an overreach, the attempt to fix it ought not to make things worse.

12. 2016 Person of the Year: Donald Trump

Time Magazine, Michael Scherer, 2016 12 08

New York - A year from now, when Donald Trump travels to the U.N. to address the world's leaders, he is likely to find far more sympathy for...hard-edged populism than any thought possible in 2008. Trump is all but rooting for it. "People are proud of their countries, and I think you will see nationalism," he says, before describing the growing backlash against Muslim migration in France, Belgium and Germany. "A lot of people reject some of the ideas that are being forced on them. And that's certainly one of the reasons you had this vote, having to do not with the European Union but the same thing." In this view, Trump will find common cause with Vladimir Putin, the authoritarian President of Russia who, like Trump, seeks to challenge diplomatic and democratic norms. For reasons that remain unclear, Trump still refuses to acknowledge the U.S. intelligence community's conclusion that Putin's agencies were responsible for stealing the Democratic National Committee and Clinton campaign emails released on WikiLeaks. "I don't believe it. I don't believe they interfered," Trump says. Asked if he thought the conclusion of America's spies was politically driven, Trump says, "I think so." Since the election, Trump has chosen not to consistently make himself available for intelligence briefings, say aides. He has also so far refused to acknowledge established diplomatic boundaries. When the Pakistani government gave a long, apparently verbatim readout of its President's call with Trump, India's leaders reacted with strained nerves. Then Trump accepted a phone call from Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen, intentionally discarding a policy enforced since Jimmy Carter, which prompted an official complaint from China. In response, he sent out a tweet suggesting that such formalities, a bow to Chinese sensibilities, were ridiculous. "Interesting how the U.S. sells Taiwan billions of dollars of military equipment but I should not accept a congratulatory call," it read.

13. CIA director visits Albania for counterterrorism talks

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 08

Tirana, Albania - The United States embassy in Tirana says Central Intelligence Agency Director John Brennan visited Albania to discuss terrorism along with a variety of other bilateral and international issues. An embassy statement said Brennan met with Prime Minister Edi Rama, President Bujar Nishani, Defense Minister Mimi Kodheli and intelligence officials on Wednesday to discuss "regional security, counterterrorism cooperation, intelligence sharing, and other bilateral affairs." The U.S. and Albania have intensified their ties recently in the fight against violent extremism and to stop foreign fighters from joining Islamic rebel groups in Syria and Iraq. Albania claims none of its citizens have extremist groups during the last year, although scores are thought to be active in the Middle East.

14. Drowning in Information: NSA Revelations From 262 Spy Documents

The Intercept, Micah Lee, Margot Williams, 2016 12 08

Washington - By the first half of 2004, the National Security Agency was drowning in information. It had amassed 85 billion phone and online records and cut the ribbon on a new hacking center in Hawaii -- but it was woefully short on linguists who could make sense of captured communications and lacked enough network analysts to effectively monitor all the systems it had hacked. The signals intelligence collected by the agency was being used for critically important decisions even as NSA struggled to understand it. Some bombs in Iraq were being targeted based entirely on signals intelligence, a senior NSA official told staff at the time -- with decisions being made in a matter of "minutes" with "less and less review." Information overload is just one of several themes running through 262 articles from the NSA's internal news site, SIDtoday, which The Intercept is now releasing after careful review. The documents also detailed an incident in which the Reagan administration appears to have leaked classified intelligence to the press for political purposes, described in an accompanying article by reporter Jon Schwarz. SIDtoday articles published today also describe how the NSA trained FBI agents, enabled U.S. intervention in Latin America, and, with the help of a gifted analyst at the Defense Intelligence Agency, learned the value of simply reading information that was already public. One document even suggests that NSA personnel routinely got dangerously chatty at restaurants near headquarters. These stories and more are described in the highlights reel below. The NSA declined to comment.

15. Everyone's a Target to the NSA. Here's How the Courts Can Stop It.

The Daily Beast, Ashley Gorski, 2016 12 08

Comment - Next month, President-elect Donald Trump will be handed the keys to the NSA's vast spying apparatus. As a candidate, he supported mass surveillance of Americans' phone calls, called for expanded spying on American Muslims, and even invited Russia to hack the emails of his political opponent. With these threats to privacy and liberty on the horizon, our courts will likely be more important than ever as a bulwark against unlawful spying. One of the courtroom battles that will shape Trump's spying powers is already under way. On Thursday, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals will hear oral arguments in Wikimedia v. NSA, our case challenging "Upstream" surveillance. First revealed by whistleblower Edward Snowden in June 2013, Upstream surveillance involves the NSA's bulk searching of Americans' international internet communications with the assistance of companies like AT&T and Verizon. If you email friends abroad, chat with family members overseas, or browse websites hosted outside the United States, the NSA almost certainly has searched through the contents of your communications--and it has done so without a warrant. Upstream surveillance takes place in the internet "backbone"--the network of high- capacity cables, switches, and routers that carries Americans' domestic and international internet communications. The NSA has installed surveillance equipment at dozens of points along the internet backbone, allowing the government to copy and then search the contents of vast quantities of internet traffic as it flows past. The government claims that Upstream surveillance is authorized by Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law allows the NSA to engage in warrantless surveillance of Americans when they are communicating with so-called targets abroad. But these targets can be virtually any foreigner overseas--including people who are not accused of any wrongdoing whatsoever, like journalists, lawyers, and human rights researchers. No judge signs off on the government's individual targets. Instead, the NSA secretly vacuums up millions of communications under a single court order each year. Ashley Gorski is a staff attorney in the ACLU's National Security Project.

16. For Homeland Security, a Man Accustomed to Patrolling Borders

New York Times, Mark Landler, Maggie Haberman, 2016 12 08

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump has settled on Gen. John F. Kelly, a retired four-star Marine general whose son was killed in combat in Afghanistan, as his choice for secretary of Homeland Security, putting a seasoned commander with personal experience of the costs of war in charge of protecting the nation's borders. Blunt-spoken and popular with military personnel, General Kelly, 66, rose to run the United States Southern Command, which put him in charge of the military jail at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and exposed him to immigration, drug trafficking and other cross-border problems over a sprawling area that encompasses 32 countries in the Caribbean, Central America and South America. In that job, General Kelly often took a tough tone on border security, warning Congress last year about the risks of smuggling rings in Mexico and Central America that spirited "tens of thousands of people," including unaccompanied children, "to our nation's doorstep." "Terrorist organizations could seek to leverage those same smuggling routes to move operatives with intent to cause grave harm to our citizens or even bring weapons of mass destruction into the United States," General Kelly said in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee. Mr. Trump, according to a person briefed on the decision, has not yet formally offered the job to General Kelly, who is out of the country. The president-elect plans to roll out the appointment next week, along with his remaining national security choices, including secretary of state.

17. Iowa Governor, Considered Friend of Beijing, Is Pick as Ambassador to China

New York Times, Binyamin Appelbaum, 2016 12 08

Washington - Terry Branstad, the Iowa governor who has long embraced China as a market for his state's pork and soybeans, was tapped Wednesday by President-elect Donald J. Trump to represent the United States in one of its most complex and increasingly contentious foreign relationships, as his ambassador to China. In choosing Mr. Branstad, 70, an amiable politician who likes to describe President Xi Jinping of China as an "old friend," Mr. Trump sounded a softer note alongside his unrelenting criticism of China's economic relationship with the United States. At an event on Wednesday morning at Cipriani restaurant in Manhattan to raise money for his inauguration, Mr. Trump told the audience that Mr. Branstad was a great choice. "He knows them all," Mr. Trump said three separate times, according to an attendee. The selection was first reported by Bloomberg News. China was quick to embrace the choice, even before Mr. Trump's announcement. At a regular news briefing in Beijing on Wednesday, Lu Kang, a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, described Mr. Branstad as "an old friend of the Chinese people," a phrase used to describe politicians trusted by Beijing. "We would welcome him playing a bigger role in promoting Sino-American relations," Mr. Lu said of Mr. Branstad.

18. Lawmakers: Probe Russian Meddling

Washington - Republican and Democratic lawmakers say they plan to investigate Russian meddling in the 2016 presidential election, including the hacking of emails from Democratic political organizations and Hillary Clinton's campaign staff. But their efforts face a strong headwind from President-elect Donald Trump, who has continued to deny that there is proof of Russia's involvement. U.S. intelligence and homeland-security officials said in a rare public statement in October that the computer intrusions were directed by "Russia's senior-most officials" in an unprecedented effort to interfere with the election. For some lawmakers, significant questions remain about how the Russian government transferred stolen emails to WikiLeaks, where they were published in the homestretch of the campaign, as well as Moscow's role in the production of fabricated news stories that have littered the internet and appear intended to mislead voters. On Wednesday, Democratic Reps. Eric Swalwell (D., Calif.) and Elijah Cummings (D., Md.) unveiled legislation to create a bipartisan, independent commission to investigate the Russian meddling. Analogous to the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, it would be composed of outside experts in computer security, elections law and foreign policy and would have the power to interview witnesses and issue subpoenas as well as obtain documents and hear public testimony.

19. Long-awaited Canada border bill moves ahead in U.S. Congress

Canadian Press, Alexander Panetta, 2016 12 08

Washington - A bill to simplify crossing the Canadian-U.S. border moved ahead in the American Congress on Wednesday, with little time left to get it passed before lawmakers break to form a post-election legislature in the New Year. It's a long-awaited development. The Harper and Trudeau governments both signed so-called preclearance deals with the Obama administration, but the arrangement required implementing legislation and U.S. lawmakers have not made it a priority. The bill finally got some attention Wednesday evening. It sailed through the House of Representatives without objection. Lawmakers there urged the Senate to adopt it quickly, and make it law before breaking next week for the holidays. Lawmakers from different parties and different parts of the U.S. spoke in favour of the bill, before moving it forward. "(This) is great news for U.S.-Canadian relations," said New York Republican Elise Stefanik. "Canada is more than just a bordering nation. They are our neighbours, our friends and our largest trading partner. Plattsburgh, a city in my district, has even branded itself as Montreal's U.S. suburb." The plan stems from the oft-stated goal of policy-makers to achieve two goals: Simplify movement to avoid the border snarls that have frustrated commerce and travellers since the 9/11 terrorist attacks, while also maintaining security.

20. Treasury sanctions two Yemeni nationals tied to al Qaeda

The Hill, Sylvan Lane, 2016 12 08

Washington - The Treasury Department on Wednesday targeted two Yemeni nationals for funding and supporting al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), freezing their United States-based assets and barring American persons and firms from doing business with them. Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) sanctioned Al-Hasan Ali Abkar and Abdallah Faysal Sadiq al-Ahdal for supporting the terrorist group's operations in Yemen. Abkar has been supporting al Qaeda's Yemen activities since at least 2014, according to the Treasury Department, financing and running weapons to the terrorist group's leaders to carry out attacks. Al-Ahdal, a Yemeni tribal leader, has assisted al Qaeda in Yemen since at least 2009 in a variety of financing, leadership and gun-running roles, according to the Treasury Department. He also used his Rahman Charitable Organization as a front for al Qaeda.

21. Trump's pick for defense secretary called worrisome

China Daily, Zhang Zhihao, 2016 12 08

Beijing - US president-elect Donald Trump's choice of James Mattis, a retired general with a reputation as a hard-liner, as secretary of defense might lead to more uncertainty and confrontation in China-US military ties, Chinese experts said. Trump has officially nominated the former four-star Marine Corps general as head of the Pentagon, making him the first general to run the Pentagon since George Marshall in 1950. Mattis adds another staunch conservative to Trump's list of Cabinet nominees and high-level advisers, including Jeff Sessions as attorney general, Michael Flynn as national security adviser and Mike Pompeo as CIA director. Mattis has been critical of the Obama administration's security policies toward China, according to his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee in 2015. "While our efforts in the Pacific to keep positive relations with China are well and good, these efforts must be paralleled by a policy to build the counterbalance if China continues to expand its bullying role in the South China Sea and elsewhere," Mattis said, adding that the US should build more naval power and warships.

22. Trump hires a third general, raising concerns about heavy military influence

Washington Post, Phillip Rucker, Mike DeBonis, 2016 12 08

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump has selected retired Marine Gen. John F. Kelly as secretary of homeland security, officials familiar with the decision said Wednesday, recruiting a third former member of the military's brass to serve at the highest levels of his administration. Trump's choice of Kelly -- and his continued deliberations about tapping as many as two more military figures for other posts -- has intensified worries among some members of Congress and national security experts that the new administration's policies may be shaped disproportionately by military commanders. "I'm concerned," said Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.), a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. "Each of these individuals may have great merit in their own right, but what we've learned over the past 15 years is that when we view problems in the world through a military lens, we make big mistakes." If confirmed, Kelly and defense secretary nominee James Mattis, a retired Marine general with the nickname "Mad Dog," would join retired Army Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, Trump's pick for White House national security adviser. Meanwhile, retired Army Gen. David H. Petraeus is under consideration for secretary of state, and Navy Adm. Michael S. Rogers is a contender for director of national intelligence. Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), the former chairman of the Homeland Security panel, said Kelly has "genuine compassion" for immigrants and understands the root causes of the nation's immigration challenges in such Central American countries as Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador. "I will reserve judgment on many of the president-elect's other nominees," Carper said, "but with General Kelly, he's hit a home run with runners on base."

Irish Times, Barry Roche, 2016 12 08

Cork - A postmortem is to be carried out on Thursday on the remains of a senior dissident republican who was shot and fatally wounded in Cork on Wednesday evening. Gardaí hope the test will shed light on the weapon used and possible suspects for the killing Aidan O'Driscoll (37) - who was nicknamed "the Beast". He was shot four times as he walked along the Old Commons Road near Blackpool Church of the Assumption on Cork's Northside at 5pm. It is understood that Mr O'Driscoll, who was previously the victim of a punishment shooting by dissident republicans in 2013, was shot four times by at least one or possibly two gunmen. The two men fled on foot towards Great William O'Brien Street where they got into a Nissan Almeira which was later found burnt out on Seminary Road near the North on on Cork's northside.

24. Hostage issues new warning from front line

London Times, Gareth Browne, 2016 12 08

London - The British photographer John Cantlie, who has been held captive by Islamic State for four years, has appeared in a new video in the besieged city of Mosul less than one kilometre from the Iraqi army's front line. The footage shows Mr Cantlie documenting the water shortages caused by coalition airstrikes. The photographer was kidnapped in November 2012 with the American journalist James Foley, who was murdered in Syria in 2014. He has appeared in several videos released by Isis. Most recently, in July, he appeared on camera to talk about the coalition's bombing of Mosul University. In the latest video a bearded and gaunt-looking Mr Cantlie proclaims that "winter is now upon Mosul" as he examines the damage caused to bridges and water pipes in the city. He asks: "If this is the coalition's war against the mujahidin then why are they waging it against Muslims?" It is unclear when the video was filmed but the cold weather would suggest that it was shot in the past few days because northern Iraq has been experiencing a cold spell.

29. Cops use gang tactics on extremists

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 12 08

Sydney - Police are using aggressive disruption tactics normally used on organised crime gangs to thwart a suspected Sydney terror cell they fear is intent on carrying out a terrorist attack. State and federal detectives from the NSW Joint Counter Terrorism Team have been targeting a cell of about 10 young suspected extremists operating in the southwest of Sydney. The operation, which stemmed from the arrest last month of Mehmet Biber, who police allege fought with an Islamist group in Syria in 2013, has been under way for several months. It is understood Junaid Thorne, a young preacher well known to authorities thanks to his radical sermonising, is thought to be the spiritual head of the group. In 2015 Thorne was imprisoned for four months - some of which was spent in Australia's toughest jail, the Supermax - for booking flights under a false name. A spokesman for the NSW Police Force declined to discuss the specifics of the operation, but acknowledged that police employed "a variety of powers" to thwart would-be radicals. "In any investigation, while the threshold for charges may not have been reached, community safety remains the highest priority," he said. "Disruptive tactics can prevent a potential attack and further enable police to gather evidence to successfully convict individuals who have engaged in some form of attack planning." Police are increasingly resorting to organised crime-type policing strategies to neutralise suspected Islamists while their plans are vague and embryonic.

Australia's first simulated cyber security "game" was set in 2022 and explored two equally unpalatable cyber attack scenarios in the hopes to prepare governments and businesses for the inevitable. The game was co-hosted by the National Security College at the Australian National University and the RAND Corporation, bringing together 90 participants from government, business and academia. Michelle Price, senior adviser in cyber security at the National Security College who helped to co-ordinate the game, said Australians "human behaviour" in cyber space needed to improve. "It's in large part why we're such a significant target for malicious activity," she said. Australia is currently losing up to $17 billion each year through malicious cyber activity. And the attacks on this year's Census website remain an equally stark reminder of what can happen when organisations are unprepared.

31. Seven years for terror teen's city bomb plot

The Australian, Chip Le Grand, 2016 12 08

Sydney - The arrest of a teenage bomb maker intent on carrying out the murderous instructions of a charismatic Islamic State recruiter averted what would otherwise have been Australia's worst terror attack. The Melbourne teenager, who was 17 at the time of his arrest, was yesterday jailed for seven years. His sentencing hearing revealed how close Islamic State came to exporting the Syrian conflict to the heart of Melbourne with devastating impact. Victorian Supreme Court judge Lex Lasry told the teenager, referred to as MHK, that he believed he would have carried out his plan to kill and seriously injure innocent people with crude home-made bombs if not for the intervention of police acting on a tip-off. When police raided the teenager's comfortable family home in May last year, they discovered terror preparations in an advanced stage: a boxed pressure cooker in the garage and elbow joint pipes under his bed, bulk matches to make phosphorus and sugar detonators, screws to use as shrapnel and detailed instructions on how to make the kind of device used at the Boston Marathon. The teenager's intentions were clear from hate-filled communications he exchanged on Facebook and Surespot, an encrypted messaging service, with Junaid Hussain, a British-born Islamic State recruiter and comrade of Australia's Neil Prakash since killed in Syria by a US drone strike. He expressed a violent loathing of non-believers and likened Shia Muslims to cockroaches. Unable to obtain a passport and travel to Syria without parental consent, he followed Hussain's incessant urgings to wage war at home.

32. We must be relentless against terror: PM

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 08

Melbourne - Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has declared terrorists should face the "full severity of the law" a day after a Melbourne teenager was sentenced to seven years in jail for preparing a bomb attack. A Victorian Supreme Court judge on Wednesday said the 18-year-old, who cannot be named, had "every intention" of using the partially constructed pipe bombs found in his home and the only reason he didn't go through with his plot was that he was arrested. Mr Turnbull on Thursday was asked if he thought the sentence was too lenient. The prime minister replied that sentencing was a matter for the courts and he wouldn't comment on any particular case. "(But) terrorist offences should be dealt with with the full severity of the law," he told 3AW. "We need to be relentless in stating our absolute condemnation of terrorism and terrorist activities and people who support terrorist activities." Mr Turnbull said it was up to prosecutors to appeal if they thought any sentence was too light.

33. Evidence being collected regarding Indian spy Kulbushan Jadhav

Pakistan Dawn, Inamullah Khattak, 2016 12 08

Islamabad - Adviser to Prime Minister on Foreign Affairs Sartaj Aziz on Wednesday informed the Senate that evidence was being collected regarding the role of Indian spy Kulbushan Jadhav in Pakistan. Aziz was briefing the Senate about Pak-India relations and skirmishes along the Line of Control (LoC). "So far, we have just statements about the involvement of the Indian spy in terror activities in Pakistan," said Aziz. The adviser added that further evidence needs to be gathered. Aziz also told the Senate that the United Nations has been provided a dossier regarding the involvement of Indian intelligence agency RAW in Pakistan. Law enforcement agencies had announced the arrest of Jadhav during an intelligence-based raid in Balochistan's Chaman last month. After Jadhav's arrest, Pakistan summoned Indian High Commissioner Gautam Bambawale to lodge a strong protest over 'India's spying activities' in Pakistan, besides apprising the international community about the arrest.

34. Foreigner ISIS recruiter killed in East of Afghanistan

Khaama Press, 2016 12 08

Kabul - A foreigner militant recruiting for the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) terrorist group was killed during an operation of the Afghan security forces in eastern Nangarhar province. According to the local security officials, the ISIS commander, identified as Aziz, was killed during an operation of the counter-terrorism forces in Khogyani district. The officials further added that Aziz was in charge of a group of at least 10 ISIS loyalist and was actively recruiting for the terror group in Afghanistan. The Afghan security forces seized some weapons, ammunition and other military kits during the operation, the officials added. This comes as the Ministry of Defense (MoD) said Tuesday that a commander of the terror group was killed during an operation in the restive Achin district.

35. No conclusive proof against 'Indian spy' Jadhav

Times of India, Omer Farooq Khan, 2016 12 08

New Delhi - Pakistan PM Nawaz Sharif's foreign affairs adviser Sartaj Aziz said on Wednesday that the country's intelligence agencies have presented its government with "insufficient evidence" against alleged Indian spy Kulbhushan Jadhav, currently in jail. "The dossier on Jadhav contained mere statements. It did not have any conclusive evidence," Aziz told Pakistan's Senate, or upper house. India reacted cautiously, with government sources saying Aziz's statement was in-camera. "We need time to verify the Aziz statement before forming a response," an Indian government source said. Aziz is also learnt to have said: "What the dossier contained was not enough. Now it's up to the concerned authorities (the army and ISI) how long they take to give us more matter on the agent." Jadhav was arrested during a raid in March. In a video released by the military later, he allegedly admitted to directing various "subversive activities" in Karachi and Balochistan at the behest of India's RAW since 2013.

36. Situation in Afghanistan to remain tough: Stoltenberg

Pajhwok Afghan News, Danish Karokhel, 2016 12 08

Kabul - NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg on Wednesday said the situation in Afghanistan "is and will remain difficult and tough" but "our commitment to Afghanistan's security is strong and steadfast. "At our Warsaw Summit, we agreed to sustain Resolute Support beyond 2016, to continue national funding of the Afghan Security Forces through 2020, and to work on our long-term political partnership and practical cooperation with Afghanistan," Stoltenberg told reporters in Brussels after a two-day foreign ministerial meeting of NATO countries. Foreign ministers from NATO member states and allies and Afghan Foreign Minister Salahuddin Rabbani attended the conference that reviewed the security situation in Afghanistan and solidified pledges made at the Warsaw Summit in Poland in July.

37. Belgique - Des échanges "denses et intenses sur des sujets importants"

All Africa, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 07

Alger - Le Premier ministre belge, Charles Michel, a indiqué mercredi à Alger, avoir eu avec le Premier ministre, Abdelmalek Sellal des échanges "denses et intenses sur des sujets important" dans l'intérêt du partenariat algéro-belge. "Nous avons eu des échanges denses et intenses sur des sujets importants pour l'intérêt de l'Algérie et de la Belgique pour nouer un partenariat intelligent", a déclaré le Premier ministre belge lors du point de presse qu'il a conjointement animé avec son homologue algérien. Il a souligné qu'il "était utile de travailler ensemble pour identifier les différents domaines où nous pourrions renforcer nos partenariats et donner un élan plus dynamique à la coopération bilatérale". Mettant en exergue les "divers défis auxquels sont confrontés les deux pays", M. Michel a plaidé pour "davantage d'activités" afin de pouvoir répondre aux préoccupations sociales des citoyens "grâce au dynamisme économique". Le Premier ministre belge, qui a insisté sur l'objectif du développement économique, a évoqué "la possibilité d'élargir les initiatives", citant les domaines abordés lors de son entretien avec M. Sellal comme "les infrastructures, l'énergie, le transport, la pétrochimie, l'industrie pharmaceutique...". Sur un autre registre, le responsable belge estime, que "pour réaliser tout développement économique, il faut de la stabilité et de la sécurité", relevant que l'Algérie "connait très bien c'est quoi la lutte contre le terrorisme pour avoir payé un lourd tribut" lors des années de tragédie traversée par l'Algérie. Pour le responsable belge, il "y a nécessité d'avoir une coopération sincère en matière de lutte contre le terrorisme", se réjouissant d'avoir "constaté auprès des dirigeants algériens une volonté de travailler ensemble" sur ce terrain.

38. Les armées africaines impuissantes face au terrorisme

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 12 08

Dakar - Alors que la situation au Mali s'enlise, l'Europe pourrait fournir des armes aux forces du continent pour les aider à combattre. Afrique La situation au Mali a hanté le 3e forum sur la sécurité de Dakar, organisé lundi 5 et mardi 6 décembre. Ce n'est pas étonnant, tant ce sommet monté par la France et le Sénégal dans la foulée de l'opération anti- djihadiste « Serval » est lié à ce pays. Mais tandis que lors des deux premières éditions régnait un certain optimisme quant à l'avenir, l'inquiétude se fait maintenant jour. « Le processus politique est ensablé et la situation sécuritaire se dégrade », résume un diplomate. Jean-Yves Le Drian, le ministre de la Défense, se montre certes moins brusque, mais ne peut que regretter le peu d'avancées en appelant à l'application rapide des accords de paix d'Alger. Conclu en juin 2015, ce texte prévoit notamment un redéploiement de l'État malien au nord du pays et le désarmement (DDR) des divers groupes armés. « Je constate que ça met du temps. Je sens bien que le processus de DDR traîne encore. Il est nécessaire que l'ensemble des acteurs fassent pression (...) pour que ces accords soient respectés », a-t-il affirmé.

39. Lori-Anne Thérroux-Bénoni : Pour les djihadistes maliens

Le Point, Claire Meynial, 2016 12 08

Dakar - Lori-Anne Thérroux-Bénoni : "Pour les djihadistes maliens, le fait religieux n'occupe pas une dimension centrale" Surprise. Selon une étude présentée au Forum de Dakar, les combattants sont surtout guidés par des logiques économiques et de protection. Rien de très surprenant que, pour la troisième édition du Forum de Dakar sur la paix et la sécurité en Afrique, le terrorisme ait encore été au centre des préoccupations. Et, comme les autres fois, le président sénégalais Macky Sall a martelé la nécessité de lutter contre l'islam radical. « Il faut une réponse doctrinale et intellectuelle de l'islam au discours extrémiste. Il n'y a pas de doute que l'extrémisme n'a aucune place sans l'islam. C'est la religion du juste milieu, qui fait corps avec la raison, elle ne peut s'accommoder d'une pensée intellectuelle qui installe l'obscurantisme », a-t-il répété dès la séance d'ouverture. Et de citer les versets du Coran qui exaltent la « faculté cognitive » de l'homme, avant d'évoquer la responsabilité de la communauté et des parents dans l'édification morale des jeunes : « Il vaut mieux éduquer un enfant que d'entreprendre la tâche plus incertaine de le déradicaliser quand le mal est déjà fait. » Cette année, le programme comprenait donc une conférence d'exégètes, dont l'un issu de l'université al-Azhar du Caire, en Égypte. Pourtant, une question évidente semble avoir été escamotée : qu'est-ce que la radicalisation en Afrique de l'Ouest ? Une équipe de chercheurs s'est penchée dessus.

42. China, US to do more on cyber crime

China Daily, Chen Weihua, 2016 12 08

Washington - Chinese and US officials meeting in Washington on Wednesday for a bilateral cybersecurity dialogue have agreed to expand cooperation, according to Chinese officials. Chinese State Councilor and Minister of Public Security Guo Shengkun joined US Attorney General Loretta Lynch and Secretary of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson in co-chairing the third China-US High-Level Joint Dialogue on Cybercrime and Related Issues. The two sides reached a new consensus in deepening cooperation in cybersecurity. Achievements made in the meeting cover areas such as cracking down on cybercrimes, cooperation in cybersecurity, improving the hotline mechanism, cyber counterterrorism cooperation and information sharing, according to a press release from the Chinese delegation. The two sides recalled the achievements made since the first dialogue and spoke positively of the importance and necessity of the mechanism, the press release said. Guo was quoted as saying in the meeting that China and the US established the high-level dialogue mechanism based on the important consensus reached between President Xi Jinping and US President Barack Obama in September 2015. He said the two leaders gave important input to the dialogue when they met in Lima, Peru, last month on the sidelines of the APEC Leaders Summit.

Beijing - A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman pushed back on Wednesday against assertions by Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, who is President-elect Donald J. Trump's choice for national security adviser, that China was allied with "radical Islamists." The spokesman, Lu Kang, was asked at a regularly scheduled news conference in Beijing about Mr. Flynn's accusations, which were made in a book released in July that he wrote with a co-author, "The Field of Fight: How We Can Win the Global War Against Radical Islam and Its Allies." "I hope everyone who takes a responsible attitude and is devoted to safeguarding China-U.S. relations and boosting China-U.S. cooperation can base their opinions on facts when taking a position," Mr. Lu said. "Only in this way can mutual trust be enhanced." In his book, Mr. Flynn mentions China and North Korea a half-dozen times. In one passage, he wrote, "The war is on. We face a working coalition that extends from North Korea and China to Russia, Iran, Syria, Cuba, Bolivia, Venezuela and Nicaragua. We are under attack, not only from nation-states directly, but also from Al Qaeda, Hezbollah, ISIS and countless other terrorist groups."

Dacca - En trois ans, dans ce pays situé à l'est de l'Inde, une quarantaine de personnalités ont été exécutées par des groupes islamistes. Une violence qui ne cesse d'augmenter malgré la forte répression menée par le gouvernement, qui en profite pour régler ses comptes avec les partis d'opposition. La démocratie est ainsi prise en étau. Bracelets argentés autour des poignets, ses menottes s'entrechoquent parfois dans un léger cliquetis. Khalil* est assis les mains croisées sur ses genoux. 46. Raids net 22 money laundering suspects (Canada)

South China Morning Post, Clifford Lo, 2016 12 08

Beijing - A series of police raids across the city yesterday rounded up 22 Hongkongers suspected of laundering up to HK$13 million in funds through their bank accounts. The money was suspected to be linked to 18 deception cases in Canada, Singapore, Taiwan, South Korea and Africa over the past two years. Senior inspector Sophia Lau Pak-wing of the commercial crime bureau said the cases included investment frauds and email scams. She said suspects deceived victims into remitting money to designated bank accounts in Hong Kong. "Even though the cases did not happen in Hong Kong, the suspects could be in breach of money laundering laws since their bank accounts were used to collect crime proceeds," Lau said. Money laundering carries a maximum penalty of 14 years' imprisonment and a HK$5 million fine. Investigations into such activities began after local police received referrals from overseas law enforcement agencies. Following detailed probes and analyses, police identified the suspected holders of the bank - accounts. Officers raided more than 20 locations across the city and arrested 13 men and nine women. As of last night, the suspects were still being questioned and none had been charged.

Seoul - South Korea's defense chief called on the military Thursday to remain vigilant as North Korea might carry out a provocation amid the ongoing political crisis involving President Park Geun-hye. On Friday, 300 lawmakers from the ruling and opposition parties are set to vote on an impeachment bill against Park. The country has been engulfed by a massive corruption scandal involving Park and her close confidante since late October. Defense Minister Han Min-koo made the comments during his visit to the 3rd Army headquarters, one of the country's three field armies in charge of protecting Gyeonggi Province that surrounds Seoul from any military threats by North Korea. He also instructed the front line troops to take immediate action in case of any provocations without waiting for orders. He said the response should be made before the incident is reported to higher military headquarters, the statement said.

Manila - Members of the terror cell who planned the foiled bomb attack in Manila near the US Embassy last month were found to have been communicating through Facebook and other social media platforms. Senior Supt. Joel Napoleon Coronel, director of the Manila Police District (MPD), said they found out such a scheme when they arrested the third suspect in the foiled bomb attack, identified as Mohammad Jumao-as who uses the alias Modie. "We found out that at least two of the five suspects involved have Facebook accounts. They have been communicating through Facebook but we are still conducting investigation as to their messages there," Coronel told the Manila Bulletin in an interview at Camp Crame after the presentation of the suspect to the media. "We are still verifying if the other people involved are just using aliases in Facebook," he added. Le Figaro, Isabelle Lasserre, 2016 12 08

Damas - Pour Damas, le succès des armes paraît désormais tellement certain que le ministre de la « Réconciliation », Ali Haidar, n'hésite pas à parler de « victoire stratégique » pour l'armée syrienne. La chute annoncée d'Alep, dont la vieille ville était entièrement reconquise par l'armée gouvernementale mercredi, sera sans nul doute un « game changer », un événement qui modifiera profondément la donne en Syrie. Le premier gagnant est Bachar el-Assad, l'allié de Moscou et de Téhéran, celui qui au début de la guerre a vidé les prisons de ses djihadistes afin qu'ils distillent leur poison dans l'opposition syrienne. En septembre 2015, le régime de Damas a été sauvé par l'intervention militaire de la Russie. La conquête d'Alep, la deuxième ville du pays, qui fut sa capitale commerciale avant la guerre et qui était jusque-là l'un des rares centres urbains tenus par les rebelles, rend possible et crédible la formation d'un État alaouite sur les ruines de la Syrie. Elle devrait aussi remettre en selle politiquement Bachar el-Assad, dont la chute avait été imprudemment annoncée ou fermement exigée par l'Europe et les États-Unis. Anticipant la chute de la ville, l'un pour la regretter, l'autre pour s'en féliciter, les chefs de la diplomatie américaine et russe soufflent à nouveau sur les braises quasi éteintes de la diplomatie.

La Croix, François d'Alañon, 2016 12 08

Bruxelles - Lors d'une réunion des ministres des affaires étrangères de l'Otan à Bruxelles, le secrétaire d'État américain John Kerry s'est efforcé, mardi, de rassurer ses partenaires sur l'engagement américain envers l'Alliance atlantique. Les ministres des affaires étrangères de l'Otan, réunis à Bruxelles, ont approuvé une série de mesures pour renforcer la coopération entre l'Alliance et l'Union européenne. À six semaines de l'arrivée de Donald Trump à la Maison-Blanche, le secrétaire d'État américain John Kerry a profité de sa dernière rencontre avec ses homologues pour les rassurer sur l'engagement américain envers l'Otan. En quoi consiste la coopération entre l'Otan et l'Union européenne? En présence de la chef de la diplomatie de l'UE Federica Mogherini et des représentants de la Finlande et de la Suède - deux pays membres de l'UE mais non de l'Otan -, les 28 pays de l'Otan ont approuvé 42 mesures de renforcement de la coopération et de la coordination entre les deux institutions, en application d'une décision de principe prise au sommet de l'Otan à Varsovie, en juillet. Le champ couvert va de la « guerre hybride » à la cyberdéfense, en passant par les exercices, la recherche, le partenariat avec des pays tiers et un partage des moyens logistiques et de renseignement pour les opérations navales de l'Otan et de l'UE en Méditerranée. Le Centre européen de lutte contre les « menaces hybrides », qui doit être créé en 2017 à Helsinki, s'appuiera sur un réseau européen d'experts pour informer les pays membres - de l'UE comme de l'Otan - de nouvelles attaques ou menaces, comme la désinformation russe ou les tactiques de propagande de Daech.

61. Bruxelles décidé à muscler l'arsenal antiterroriste de l'Europe

Bruxelles - L'Union européenne s'attache à finaliser les réformes lancées depuis deux ans. Un accord émerge sur le contrôle aux frontières de l'espace Schengen. Plus d'un an après les attentats du 13 novembre à Paris, la réponse peut sembler tardive. Elle est pourtant assez rapide au vu des canons traditionnels de la grande machine bruxelloise. L'Europe est en passe de muscler son arsenal de lutte contre le terrorisme, avec une volonté affichée, tant par le Parlement que par la Commission et les Etats, de désormais boucler au plus vite les nombreuses initiatives lancées ces deux dernières années. Une volonté affirmée lors du sommet de Bratislava en septembre et préalablement symbolisée par la création en août d'un poste, inédit jusque-là, de commissaire à la Sécurité, confié au Britannique Julian King. La diversité des réformes que l'Europe s'attache à « délivrer », selon un anglicisme en vogue à Bruxelles, témoigne à la fois de l'ampleur et de la complexité de la tâche.

Le Monde, Sandrine Morel, 2016 12 08

Alsasua - Le 15 octobre, deux gardes civils et leurs compagnes ont été insultés et frappés par une vingtaine de personnes à Alsasua, commune de Navarre. Fait divers ou résurgence des violences autrefois menés par l'ETA ? Où se trouve la frontière entre la violence et la terreur ? Entre une agression contre des gendarmes et un lynchage prémédité visant à imposer la peur ? La polémique fait rage en Espagne depuis l'agression, le 15 octobre, de deux gardes civils qui n'étaient pas en service et de leurs compagnes, dans un bar d'Alsasua, petite commune de 8000 habitants de Navarre. Insultés et frappés par plus d'une vingtaine de personnes, certaines ayant le visage dissimulé, les gardes civils ont été forcés à quitter le bar. Une fois dans la rue, ont-ils raconté au juge, ils ont de nouveau été cernés et agressés par une quinzaine de personnes qui leur ont crié de quitter la Navarre. L'un des deux gardes a dû être opéré d'une fracture à la cheville, les autres victimes ont souffert de blessures légères. Sept adultes, âgées de 19 à 24 ans, et deux mineurs ont été arrêtés. Leurs actes ont été condamnés par tous les partis, à l'exception des indépendantistes radicaux de la gauche abertzale (patriote) EH Bildu pour laquelle il ne s'agit que d'une simple « bagarre de bar » après une « provocation » de la part des gardes civils.

63. La NSA et le GCHQ, poids lourds du renseignement mondial (Canada)

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 08

Non identifié - Au sein du club très fermé des " Five Eyes " qui réunit, depuis la seconde guerre mondiale, les services secrets techniques américains, britanniques, australiens, canadiens et néo-zélandais, le Royaume-Uni et les Etats-Unis tiennent les deux principaux rôles. L'Agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) américaine compte 60 000 personnes, son homologue française. Chargée d'une mission offensive et défensive, la NSA s'efforce d'avoir accès à tous les réseaux informatiques et de communication afin de collecter et de traiter en masse les données de connexions. Elle dispose d'un budget annuel de plus de 10 milliards de dollars (9,3 milliards d'euros), supérieur à celui de la CIA. Créée en 1952 par un décret secret du président Harry Truman soucieux de réorganiser l'ensemble des moyens d'interception américains, l'existence de la NSA n'a été officiellement reconnue qu'en 1957.

64. Le renseignement financier, outil-clé de la traque aux « signaux faibles » de l'antiterrorisme

Le Monde, Elise Vincent, 2016 12 08

Paris - Pour le directeur de Tracfin, Bruno Dalles, dont le rapport annuel était dévoilé ce 8 décembre, l'agence a notamment un rôle important pour « confirmer un environnement, une appartenance à une mouvance ». Depuis les attentats de Charlie et de l'Hyper Cacher, en janvier 2015, le renseignement financier est devenu un outil essentiel de la lutte contre le terrorisme. Un des moyens de repérer ce qui est devenu un des enjeux-clés de l'endiguement de la menace : les « signaux faibles » de radicalisation. Tels sont, en substance, les points mis en avant dans le rapport d'analyse annuel de Tracfin, la cellule antiblanchiment française, qu'a rendu public le ministre de l'économie et des finances, Michel Sapin, jeudi 8 décembre, à Bercy. D'après ce rapport intitulé « Tendances et analyse des risques » de l'année 2015, le renseignement financier a, depuis l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo, pris une place qu'il n'avait pas dans ce type de dossiers. « L'intérêt du renseignement financier c'est que même si on parle de " signaux faibles ", il recueille des signaux fiables », estime ainsi le directeur de Tracfin, Bruno Dalles, interrogé par Le Monde. Cela permet de confirmer un environnement, une appartenance. » Des éléments essentiels pour la justice, afin de caractériser par exemple « l'association de malfaiteur en vue d'une entreprise terroriste », le chef de mise en examen le plus souvent utilisé actuellement.

Atlantico (site web), Franck Decloquement, 2016 12 08

Non identifié - Les dernières révélations Snowden atomisent la théorie d'une mondialisation heureuse (et ça, c'est nettement plus gênant que les arguments des populistes sur le libre-échange) Les guerres économiques que se livrent les pays du monde entier représentent une menace bien plus sérieuse pour le libre-échange que les théories économiques de Donald Trump. Atlantico : Les révélations d'Edward Snowden mettent chaque jour en avant de nouvelles informations sur les pratiques de la NSA. Parmi ces révélations, certaines soulignent le risque que font courir les agences de renseignement au libre-échange et à la libre-concurrence. Quel est-il exactement ? Les missions poursuivies par les organes de renseignements vont-elles à l'encontre des principes du libre-échange ? Franck Decloquement : Selon de très nombreux observateurs ayant pu enquêter en profondeur sur le sujet, la NSA est une « arme d'espionnage économique massive », et un « fer de lance sous l'égide de Washington », évidemment prête à tout - dans le cadre de ses prérogatives propres - pour défendre les intérêts commerciaux américains. A l'image du dernier livre de Claude Delesse « NSA - National Security Agency », édité chez Tallandier, qui est une très bonne introduction en la matière, à destination d'un lectorat grand public.

66. Un jeune radicalisé a été libéré mais reste surveillé

Tribune de Genève, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 08

Genève - Le jeune homme va être le premier à bénéficier du projet pilote de suivi social présenté lundi par les autorités genevoises C'est le premier cas du genre pour Genève. Un jeune Suisse radicalisé, A. , parti il y a un an sur le chemin du djihad, arrêté six mois plus tard à son retour puis placé en détention provisoire, est sorti de prison hier, ont appris la Tribune de Genève et le Tages-Anzeiger. Sa remise en liberté est assortie de mesures judiciaires spéciales. Il revient au Canton de veiller à les mettre en oeuvre. Autant dire que le Genevois de 21 ans va mettre les institutions à rude épreuve. Le Ministère public de la Confédération (MPC) a confirmé hier ces éléments: « Le prévenu arrêté le 8 juin 2016 à l'aéroport de Zurich à son retour de Turquie a été remis en liberté. Des mesures de substitution ont été ordonnées par le Tribunal des mesures de contrainte (TMC) compétent sur demande du MPC.

67. Vols au-dessus d'un nid d'espions

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 08

Non identifié - La NSA américaine et son homologue britannique peuvent capter toutes les données, y compris les codes secrets, des communications des passagers de la plupart des compagnies aériennes. Dont Air France. Dans l'immense stock d'archives extraites par Edward Snowden, l'ancien contractuel de l'Agence nationale de sécurité américaine (NSA), c'est une pépite. Elle débute par une devinette : " Quel est le point commun entre le président du Pakistan, un trafiquant de cigares ou d'armes, une cible du contre-terrorisme ou le membre d'un réseau de prolifération nucléaire? Ils utilisent tous leur téléphone portable lorsqu'ils sont dans un avion. " Posée en 2010 dans une des lettres d'information interne de l'une des principales directions de la NSA, " SIDtoday ", et classée top secret, elle annonce l'émergence d'un nouveau terrain d'espionnage, qui n'avait pas encore été exploré : l'interception des données de communications à bord des avions de ligne. En 2009, la NSA souligne dans un document interne que, en décembre 2008, 50 000 personnes ont déjà utilisé leur téléphone portable en vol, un chiffre qui atteint 100 000 en février 2009.

68. WikiLeaks accuse le régime de collusion avec Daech

L'Humanité, S.A., 2016 12 08

Ankara - Le site a publié 57 934 mails de Berat Albayrak montrant des relations troubles entre l'« État islamique » et la compagnie pétrolière Powertrans. Le ministre turc de l'Énergie, Berat Albayrak, pourrait bien se faire tirer les oreilles par son beau-père pour manque de prudence. Lundi et mardi, le site d'information WikiLeaks a publié 57 934 mails du gendre de Recep Tayyip Erdogan qui prouveraient les liens troubles entretenus par la Turquie et l'organisation de l'« État islamique » (EI). La compagnie pétrolière turque Powertrans aurait en effet bénéficié d'une dérogation à l'embargo imposé par le gouvernement sur les importations et exportations de pétrole en provenance ou en direction des régions sous contrôle de Daech. Ankara aurait donc sciemment acheté du pétrole syrien à l'EI, finançant indirectement le groupe djihadiste en hommes et en matériel militaire.

1. Garratts recount dark odyssey through China's security apparatus

Back in Canada, Kevin Garratt and his wife, who had made China their home running a café and pursuing aid projects in North Korea, are still trying to make sense of their surprise arrest in 2014. The Garratts didn't realize they were being set up until it was too late. It was August, 2014, and the Christian aid workers were at a restaurant in the remote northern Chinese city of Dandong, on the North Korean border, where they had lived and run a café for years. An acquaintance had asked them for advice on sending his daughter to study in Canada - so there they were, prepared to offer assistance, as they had been doing in China since falling in love with the country 30 years before. Shortly after arriving amid what looked like a wedding party, Kevin and Julia Garratt were grabbed by strange men and driven away in separate cars. The surprise arrest launched a dark odyssey through the Chinese state security apparatus: Mr. Garratt was imprisoned for two years on espionage charges, Ms. Garratt was detained, then placed under surveillance, and the family was traumatized, immiserated and finally reunited, with troubling questions to spare. The episode would also become a flashpoint in SinoCanadian relations as the countries negotiated the launch of talks on an extradition treaty. Three months after returning to Canada, the Garratts sat down with The Globe and Mail to give their most detailed account yet of the harrowing journey. At the invitation of the country's regime, the couple had built bathrooms for orphanages, helped with flood relief and rebuilt facilities at a school for the disabled. All the while, they ran a coffee shop in the Chinese border city that was frequented by students and foreign journalists. The shop also attracted local diplomats hoping to learn about North Korea through two Canadians who had been given rare levels of access to the country. The couple would later learn through their Chinese interrogators that a U.S. military attaché had visited the café. Former foreign affairs minister John Baird requested a meeting during his tenure. And in 2009, the Garratts were contacted by Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the Canadian spy agency, to ensure the couple hadn't violated sanctions through their aid work. (They hadn't.) Ms. Garratt now believes all of the attention from foreign diplomats and security agencies put a bull's eye on their backs.

2. Trump's torture view may change secrets sharing with Canada: spy watchdog executive

Toronto - The civil servant in charge of the government's spy- watchdog agency says Canada may have to reconsider how it shares intelligence with the United States if president-elect Donald Trump makes good on his promise to torture terrorists to gather intelligence. The federal official also remarked that had former U.S. intelligence analyst Edward Snowden worked for Canadian intelligence and leaked secrets, "he should be shot," but quickly backed off the opinion. Michael Doucet, the executive director of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, made the off-the-cuff remarks to a small audience in Toronto last week. An audio recording of his talk was provided to The Globe and Mail by a student journalist from the Eyeopener, a campus newspaper at Ryerson University, which was the venue for the talk. For 1 1/2 hours, the former intelligence analyst held forth on intelligence issues. Members of SIRC rarely make unscripted or unguarded remarks publicly because they are sworn to secrecy about their work reviewing the highly classified spying operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. When contacted on Wednesday, Mr. Doucet acknowledged he made the comments, but said he was not expecting them to be recorded. In recent weeks, the Liberal government has tried not to make remarks that could irritate or prejudice the incoming Trump administration. On the campaign trail, Mr. Trump unequivocally promised a return to brass-knuckles techniques for U.S. intelligence agencies, which may no longer want to use them. "Don't tell me it doesn't work

- torture works," Mr. Trump once said, adding that he would personally authorize it. His nominee for Central Intelligence Agency director has defended the so-called "extraordinary interrogation techniques" U.S. spies used under past administrations. "These men and women are not torturers, they are patriots," Representative Mike Pompeo has said. Should the CIA revert to practices such as simulated drowning techniques known as "waterboarding," it could cause problems for CSIS and other Canadian agencies. Harking back to his years when he worked for Canada's signals-intelligence agency - the Communications Security Establishment - Mr. Doucet told the audience intelligence-sharing is vast, and alliances are important. He pointed out that in the mid-2000s, he was CSE's embedded liaison officer at the U.S. National Security Agency. "For every dollar we invest in intelligence, the Americans are investing hundreds," he said. An audience member asked Mr. Doucet what he thought of Mr. Snowden, the fugitive former intelligence contractor who leaked vast amounts of NSA documents, and what his fate would be had he been Canadian. "Do you want my opinion on that? Do you really want it? I'll give it to you. If Edward Snowden had worked for CSIS, and did what he did, he should be shot." Mr. Doucet clarified that he was being provocative, and would like to see Mr. Snowden put on trial. But he said he does not accept arguments that Mr. Snowden had to leak the NSA documents because he believed they contained evidence of illegality and had no other way of bringing that to light.

3. 'Visa lift' gives Mexican cartels chance to expand in Canada

Vancouver Sun, Kim Bolan, 2016 12 08

Vancouver - Violent drug cartels are expected to expand their reach in Canada now that a visa requirement for Mexicans has been lifted, according to government documents obtained by Postmedia News. The Canada Border Services Agency report says "the visa lift will make travel to Canada easier in order to establish or strengthen existing cartel smuggling chains." "In the next three years, Mexican drug cartels are expected to expand their presence in Canada by sending operatives and recruiting local airport or marine port workers with ties to Mexico," says the document, obtained from a source. The Sun obtained only a section of the document titled: Implications for the Canada Border Services Agency and Canada. Postmedia earlier reported on the increasing presence of Mexican cartels in Canada, as well as the fact that gangsters and organized criminals were working at the Port of Vancouver. As of Dec. 1, Mexicans are no longer required to obtain a visa to come to Canada. The previous visa program had existed for seven years. The CBSA document said the cartels generally don't use tourists to smuggle drugs for them. "While Mexican drug cartels do employ drug mules, they prefer shipments with high profitability and high likelihood of successful delivery," the documents says.

4. $1B RCMP overtime bill proof of 'exhausted and depressed' members, retirees say

CBC News, Brett Ruskin, 2016 12 08

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) has paid its members more than $1 billion of overtime since 2009, according to documents obtained by CBC News. Recent retirees from the force say the costs confirm anecdotes that many officers are stressed, overworked and depressed. "The rank and file -- especially the patrol guys and girls -- are burnt out," said Derek Snow, a recently retired RCMP member with 29 years of policing experience. "You want to do a good job and you want to do extra," Snow said, who lives in Shediac, N.B. "But there's only so much anybody can take." 'Unlimited overtime' Between April 2009 and June 2015, the RCMP paid $1.01 billion in overtime, according to documents obtained via access to information requests.

5. Abuses warrant tossing case against suspected Egyptian terrorist, court urged Canadian Press, Colin Perkel, 2016 12 08

Toronto - The case against an Egyptian man long branded a terrorist threat has been riddled with so many problems over the years that a judge should have ended the proceedings, Federal Court of Appeal heard Wednesday. Instead, his lawyer argued, Judge Edmond Blanchard upheld the national security certificate imposed on Mohamed Mahjoub despite finding the government had violated his rights. "The remedies provided in relation to the violations found by Justice Blanchard were inadequate," Mahjoub's lawyer Paul Slansky said. "He found there was an unfair trial. Once you find an unfair trial, it's game over." Mahjoub, 56, of Toronto, has been in prison or under severe restrictions since the government first decided in 2000 _ based in part on secret evidence supplied by foreign agencies linked to torture _ that he posed a threat to Canada's national security. Among other things, Canada's spy agency alleged Mahjoub was a leading member of the Egyptian terror group Vanguard of Conquest, and a trusted associate of former terrorist mastermind, Osama bin Laden _ accusations Mahjoub has always denied. The current two-day hearing consolidates three separate appeals to his security certificate, which allows for detention or restrictions of foreign nationals without charge or trial. The government argues Blanchard's judgments were correct and the security certificate should stand.

Op-ed - At the end of November, I was detained at the American- Canadian border, and I find myself struggling with feelings of resentment, anger and shame. I had traveled from Los Angeles to Edmonton, Canada, where I delivered an academic lecture at the University of Alberta. Getting off a plane and gaining entry into Alberta, I was treated with respect and dignity, and was sent on my way with a lilt, "Welcome to Canada, professor." Returning home to the United States was a different experience. To set the scene, I should mention that I was traveling with my wife and 11- year-old son. I am in my 50s, wrestling with a number of health challenges, and I use a wheelchair. The first indication that something was amiss came when my wife tried to complete online check-in for us all. It wouldn't work for me. Later, as we passed through the airport security line in Edmonton, I was asked to separate my belongings from that of my family, something that I obligingly did. After going through a security detector, I was meticulously patted down, and I, as well as my belongings, were swabbed more than once, I assume for explosives residue. The U.S. Department of Homeland Security stations Customs and Border Protection agents in Canada, so travelers in effect cross the border before they even arrive in the U.S. At the Edmonton airport, travelers to America insert their passports into a scanning machine, fill in basic information on a touchscreen, and get their photos taken. Then the machine ejects a form that must be presented to the Homeland Security officers. I was rather surprised and somewhat amused when the form in my case came out of the machine with a large and jarring X all over it. When I handed it over, my American passport was placed in a red folder and I was asked to follow the officer to a side area. After about 40 minutes, we were set free with nothing more than a "you can go." We ran to make our flight as my wife pushed my wheelchair and our son wrangled our two wheeled carry-ons. We had been welcomed with dignity as we entered Canada, only to be dehumanized when we came home. Note: Khaled Abou El Fadl is a professor at UCLA's School of Law and former chair of the university's Islamic Studies Interdepartmental Program.

7. Belleville woman played role in delivering 'Pizzagate' conspiracy

Toronto Star, The Washington Post and Star staff, 2016 12 08

Toronto - Following the spread of fake news and "Pizzagate" - which inspired a violent incident in a Washington, D.C., eatery and may even have affected the course of the U.S. election - leads to at least one surprising destination: the home of a writer in Belleville, Ont. Stefanie MacWilliams, a stay-at-home mother and contributor to the website Planet Free Will, wrote an article last month that took off on social media. In it she recounted a man's claims about a politically connected pedophile ring housed at the Comet Ping Pong pizza parlour in the U.S. capital. On Sunday, less than three weeks after MacWilliams' article was published, Edgar Welch was arrested after a rifle was discharged in the restaurant. He later said he wanted only to investigate the claims. "I kind of wanted to put out the information that was there with the statement I'm not accusing anyone of anything, there's no concrete evidence of anything," MacWilliams said Wednesday, adding that her readers were very interested in the story. Among the claims are allegations that aides to Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton were involved in a child prostitution ring hidden in mysterious tunnels beneath the pizzeria. Planet Free Will was among the websites recently called out by the New York Times for sharing fake news. "I was personally a little bit insulted," said MacWilliams of the label, adding, "Fake news has become used as this ridiculous term ... it's the new 'conspiracy theorist.'"

8. DND delays move to new HQ

Ottawa - The first major move of Defence Department employees to the former Nortel campus in west-end Ottawa will be delayed until early next year so as not to cause workers too much stress over the holidays as well as to allow them to sort out their transportation arrangements to the site. The delay will also ensure that amenities such as a gym and doughnut shop will be ready for workers when they arrive, according to a message sent Tuesday to all employees by Vice-Admiral Mark Norman, vice-chief of the defence staff. The first major wave of Canadian Forces and Department of National Defence staff was supposed to move into the former Nortel campus starting in the fall. But in his message Norman says that move would not start until Jan. 9. Norman said that since the move to the Carling Avenue location is a large undertaking, it is causing changes to the work and personal schedules of employees. Because the DND and Canadian Forces want to minimize such disruptions, the decision was made to delay the move. "Even though the first building is just about ready for occupancy, I have directed that the move of Military Personnel Command not start before 9 January 2017," Norman wrote to employees. "This means that when we do move in, there will be more services and amenities available, things like the gym, Canex and Tim Hortons," he said.

9. Opposition wary of Biden's Ottawa visit

Globe and Mail, Laura Stone, 2016 12 08

U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Ottawa this week is intended to reassure the public that the bond between the two countries is strong, but Canada's Conservative Opposition warns the trip could sabotage the country's relationship with the incoming Trump administration. Mr. Biden will be celebrated at an official dinner in Ottawa on Thursday, and on Friday will meet with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and the country's premiers already in town to discuss climate change at a first ministers' meeting. Kate Purchase, Mr. Trudeau's director of communications, said the dinner will reflect the depth of Canada-U.S. ties and "making sure that there is continuity in the relationship." But some opposition MPs are concerned Mr. Biden's visit could jeopardize future relations with president-elect Donald Trump. "The only thing I would be worried about is that no steps are taken to somehow sabotage the Canada-U.S. relationship. That would be a huge mistake. I would hope that's not the purpose of Mr. Biden's meeting," said Conservative MP Ed Fast, the former trade minister, told The Globe and Mail. "We just want to make sure that whatever meetings Mr. Biden holds here in Canada are focused on building the Canada-U.S. relationship, and the relationship with the future administration - the Donald Trump administration."

10. RCMP fabricated response to access-to-info request 'unacceptable:' Goodale

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 08

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says it's "unacceptable" that an RCMP employee fabricated a response to an access-to-information request. Goodale says the individual involved was "at a very junior level" and has been disciplined. The fabrication was revealed last week in a letter from RCMP Supt. David Vautour to Bruce Cheadle, a reporter for The Canadian Press who in May 2015 had requested information regarding the now-defunct long-gun registry. Cheadle did not receive a response to his access request until March 1, 2016, but that letter was backdated almost five months. Vautour said a note included with the tardy response claimed that the letter had originally been sent to Cheadle in October 2015, but was returned to the RCMP by Canada

Post due to an incorrect postal code. He said the Mounties have since determined that the backdated letter and the explanatory note were fabricated to avoid a possible complaint about the delay in responding to the request. "Our office does not condone actions that are contrary to the RCMP core values of honesty, integrity and professionalism," Vautour wrote Cheadle.

11. When online, put individual rights first

Globe and Mail, 2016 12 08

Editorial: The stakes are considerable, which is why the folks who run the national security apparatus have quietly and not-so-quietly been laying down markers as Ottawa reviews their powers. The argument goes they need more tools, and more leeway, to do their important work. Maybe. Maybe not. Canada's federal Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien and his provincial and territorial counterparts are sounding a muchneeded note of caution in a joint brief submitted as part of the ongoing security review. "It is important that we not forget the lessons of history. One of these lessons is that once conferred, new state powers are rarely relinquished," the document reads. That's true, as is the fact that the expansion of state powers of surveillance over the past 15 years has resulted in "too many cases of inappropriate and sometimes illegal conduct by state officials," including violations of privacy and other civil rights. If Bill C-51, the former Conservative government's anti-terrorism legislation, was an overreach, the attempt to fix it ought not to make things worse.

12. 2016 Person of the Year: Donald Trump

New York - A year from now, when Donald Trump travels to the U.N. to address the world's leaders, he is likely to find far more sympathy for...hard-edged populism than any thought possible in 2008. Trump is all but rooting for it. "People are proud of their countries, and I think you will see nationalism," he says, before describing the growing backlash against Muslim migration in France, Belgium and Germany. "A lot of people reject some of the ideas that are being forced on them. And that's certainly one of the reasons you had this vote, having to do not with the European Union but the same thing." In this view, Trump will find common cause with Vladimir Putin, the authoritarian President of Russia who, like Trump, seeks to challenge diplomatic and democratic norms. For reasons that remain unclear, Trump still refuses to acknowledge the U.S. intelligence community's conclusion that Putin's agencies were responsible for stealing the Democratic National Committee and Clinton campaign emails released on WikiLeaks. "I don't believe it. I don't believe they interfered," Trump says. Asked if he thought the conclusion of America's spies was politically driven, Trump says, "I think so." Since the election, Trump has chosen not to consistently make himself available for intelligence briefings, say aides. He has also so far refused to acknowledge established diplomatic boundaries. When the Pakistani government gave a long, apparently verbatim readout of its

President's call with Trump, India's leaders reacted with strained nerves. Then Trump accepted a phone call from Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen, intentionally discarding a policy enforced since Jimmy Carter, which prompted an official complaint from China. In response, he sent out a tweet suggesting that such formalities, a bow to Chinese sensibilities, were ridiculous. "Interesting how the U.S. sells Taiwan billions of dollars of military equipment but I should not accept a congratulatory call," it read.

13. CIA director visits Albania for counterterrorism talks

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 08

Tirana, Albania - The United States embassy in Tirana says Central Intelligence Agency Director John Brennan visited Albania to discuss terrorism along with a variety of other bilateral and international issues. An embassy statement said Brennan met with Prime Minister Edi Rama, President Bujar Nishani, Defense Minister Mimi Kodheli and intelligence officials on Wednesday to discuss "regional security, counterterrorism cooperation, intelligence sharing, and other bilateral affairs." The U.S. and Albania have intensified their ties recently in the fight against violent extremism and to stop foreign fighters from joining Islamic rebel groups in Syria and Iraq. Albania claims none of its citizens have extremist groups during the last year, although scores are thought to be active in the Middle East.

14. Drowning in Information: NSA Revelations From 262 Spy Documents

The Intercept, Micah Lee, Margot Williams, 2016 12 08

Washington - By the first half of 2004, the National Security Agency was drowning in information. It had amassed 85 billion phone and online records and cut the ribbon on a new hacking center in Hawaii -- but it was woefully short on linguists who could make sense of captured communications and lacked enough network analysts to effectively monitor all the systems it had hacked. The signals intelligence collected by the agency was being used for critically important decisions even as NSA struggled to understand it. Some bombs in Iraq were being targeted based entirely on signals intelligence, a senior NSA official told staff at the time -- with decisions being made in a matter of "minutes" with "less and less review." Information overload is just one of several themes running through 262 articles from the NSA's internal news site, SIDtoday, which The Intercept is now releasing after careful review. The documents also detailed an incident in which the Reagan administration appears to have leaked classified intelligence to the press for political purposes, described in an accompanying article by reporter Jon Schwarz. SIDtoday articles published today also describe how the NSA trained FBI agents, enabled U.S. intervention in Latin America, and, with the help of a gifted analyst at the Defense Intelligence Agency, learned the value of simply reading information that was already public. One document even suggests that NSA personnel routinely got dangerously chatty at restaurants near headquarters. These stories and more are described in the highlights reel below. The NSA declined to comment.

15. Everyone's a Target to the NSA. Here's How the Courts Can Stop It.

Comment - Next month, President-elect Donald Trump will be handed the keys to the NSA's vast spying apparatus. As a candidate, he supported mass surveillance of Americans' phone calls, called for expanded spying on American Muslims, and even invited Russia to hack the emails of his political opponent. With these threats to privacy and liberty on the horizon, our courts will likely be more important than ever as a bulwark against unlawful spying. One of the courtroom battles that will shape Trump's spying powers is already under way. On Thursday, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals will hear oral arguments in Wikimedia v. NSA, our case challenging "Upstream" surveillance. First revealed by whistleblower Edward Snowden in June 2013, Upstream surveillance involves the NSA's bulk searching of Americans' international internet communications with the assistance of companies like AT&T and Verizon. If you email friends abroad, chat with family members overseas, or browse websites hosted outside the United States, the NSA almost certainly has searched through the contents of your communications--and it has done so without a warrant. Upstream surveillance takes place in the internet "backbone"--the network of high- capacity cables, switches, and routers that carries Americans' domestic and international internet communications. The NSA has installed surveillance equipment at dozens of points along the internet backbone, allowing the government to copy and then search the contents of vast quantities of internet traffic as it flows past. The government claims that Upstream surveillance is authorized by Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law allows the NSA to engage in warrantless surveillance of Americans when they are communicating with so-called targets abroad. But these targets can be virtually any foreigner overseas--including people who are not accused of any wrongdoing whatsoever, like journalists, lawyers, and human rights researchers. No judge signs off on the government's individual targets. Instead, the NSA secretly vacuums up millions of communications under a single court order each year. Ashley Gorski is a staff attorney in the ACLU's National Security Project.

16. For Homeland Security, a Man Accustomed to Patrolling Borders

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump has settled on Gen. John F. Kelly, a retired four-star Marine general whose son was killed in combat in Afghanistan, as his choice for secretary of Homeland Security, putting a seasoned commander with personal experience of the costs of war in charge of protecting the nation's borders. Blunt-spoken and popular with military personnel, General Kelly, 66, rose to run the United States Southern Command, which put him in charge of the military jail at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and exposed him to immigration, drug trafficking and other cross-border problems over a sprawling area that encompasses 32 countries in the Caribbean, Central America and South America. In that job, General Kelly often took a tough tone on border security, warning Congress last year about the risks of smuggling rings in Mexico and Central America that spirited "tens of thousands of people," including unaccompanied children, "to our nation's doorstep." "Terrorist organizations could seek to leverage those same smuggling routes to move operatives with intent to cause grave harm to our citizens or even bring weapons of mass destruction into the United States," General Kelly said in testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee. Mr. Trump, according to a person briefed on the decision, has not yet formally offered the job to General Kelly, who is out of the country. The president-elect plans to roll out the appointment next week, along with his remaining national security choices, including secretary of state.

17. Iowa Governor, Considered Friend of Beijing, Is Pick as Ambassador to China

New York Times, Binyamin Appelbaum, 2016 12 08

Washington - Terry Branstad, the Iowa governor who has long embraced China as a market for his state's pork and soybeans, was tapped Wednesday by President-elect Donald J. Trump to represent the United States in one of its most complex and increasingly contentious foreign relationships, as his ambassador to China. In choosing Mr. Branstad, 70, an amiable politician who likes to describe President Xi Jinping of China as an "old friend," Mr. Trump sounded a softer note alongside his unrelenting criticism of China's economic relationship with the United States. At an event on Wednesday morning at Cipriani restaurant in Manhattan to raise money for his inauguration, Mr. Trump told the audience that Mr. Branstad was a great choice. "He knows them all," Mr. Trump said three separate times, according to an attendee. The selection was first reported by Bloomberg News. China was quick to embrace the choice, even before Mr. Trump's announcement. At a regular news briefing in Beijing on Wednesday, Lu Kang, a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, described Mr. Branstad as "an old friend of the Chinese people," a phrase used to describe politicians trusted by Beijing. "We would welcome him playing a bigger role in promoting Sino-American relations," Mr. Lu said of Mr. Branstad.

Washington - Republican and Democratic lawmakers say they plan to investigate Russian meddling in the 2016 presidential election, including the hacking of emails from Democratic political organizations and Hillary Clinton's campaign staff. But their efforts face a strong headwind from President-elect Donald Trump, who has continued to deny that there is proof of Russia's involvement. U.S. intelligence and homeland-security officials said in a rare public statement in October that the computer intrusions were directed by "Russia's senior-most officials" in an unprecedented effort to interfere with the election. For some lawmakers, significant questions remain about how the Russian government transferred stolen emails to WikiLeaks, where they were published in the homestretch of the campaign, as well as Moscow's role in the production of fabricated news stories that have littered the internet and appear intended to mislead voters. On Wednesday, Democratic Reps. Eric Swalwell (D., Calif.) and Elijah Cummings (D., Md.) unveiled legislation to create a bipartisan, independent commission to investigate the Russian meddling. Analogous to the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, it would be composed of outside experts in computer security, elections law and foreign policy and would have the power to interview witnesses and issue subpoenas as well as obtain documents and hear public testimony.

Canadian Press, Alexander Panetta, 2016 12 08

Washington - A bill to simplify crossing the Canadian-U.S. border moved ahead in the American Congress on Wednesday, with little time left to get it passed before lawmakers break to form a post-election legislature in the New Year. It's a long-awaited development. The Harper and Trudeau governments both signed so-called preclearance deals with the Obama administration, but the arrangement required implementing legislation and U.S. lawmakers have not made it a priority. The bill finally got some attention Wednesday evening. It sailed through the House of Representatives without objection. Lawmakers there urged the Senate to adopt it quickly, and make it law before breaking next week for the holidays. Lawmakers from different parties and different parts of the U.S. spoke in favour of the bill, before moving it forward. "(This) is great news for U.S.-Canadian relations," said New York Republican Elise Stefanik. "Canada is more than just a bordering nation. They are our neighbours, our friends and our largest trading partner. Plattsburgh, a city in my district, has even branded itself as Montreal's U.S. suburb." The plan stems from the oft-stated goal of policy-makers to achieve two goals: Simplify movement to avoid the border snarls that have frustrated commerce and travellers since the 9/11 terrorist attacks, while also maintaining security.

20. Treasury sanctions two Yemeni nationals tied to al Qaeda

The Hill, Sylvan Lane, 2016 12 08

Washington - The Treasury Department on Wednesday targeted two Yemeni nationals for funding and supporting al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), freezing their United States-based assets and barring American persons and firms from doing business with them. Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) sanctioned Al-Hasan Ali Abkar and Abdallah Faysal Sadiq al-Ahdal for supporting the terrorist group's operations in Yemen. Abkar has been supporting al Qaeda's Yemen activities since at least 2014, according to the Treasury Department, financing and running weapons to the terrorist group's leaders to carry out attacks. Al-Ahdal, a Yemeni tribal leader, has assisted al Qaeda in Yemen since at least 2009 in a variety of financing, leadership and gun-running roles, according to the Treasury Department. He also used his Rahman Charitable Organization as a front for al Qaeda.

21. Trump's pick for defense secretary called worrisome

China Daily, Zhang Zhihao, 2016 12 08

Beijing - US president-elect Donald Trump's choice of James Mattis, a retired general with a reputation as a hard-liner, as secretary of defense might lead to more uncertainty and confrontation in China-US military ties, Chinese experts said. Trump has officially nominated the former four-star Marine Corps general as head of the Pentagon, making him the first general to run the Pentagon since George Marshall in 1950. Mattis adds another staunch conservative to Trump's list of Cabinet nominees and high-level advisers, including Jeff Sessions as attorney general, Michael Flynn as national security adviser and Mike Pompeo as CIA director. Mattis has been critical of the Obama administration's security policies toward China, according to his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee in 2015. "While our efforts in the Pacific to keep positive relations with China are well and good, these efforts must be paralleled by a policy to build the counterbalance if China continues to expand its bullying role in the South China Sea and elsewhere," Mattis said, adding that the US should build more naval power and warships.

22. Trump hires a third general, raising concerns about heavy military influence

Washington Post, Phillip Rucker, Mike DeBonis, 2016 12 08

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump has selected retired Marine Gen. John F. Kelly as secretary of homeland security, officials familiar with the decision said Wednesday, recruiting a third former member of the military's brass to serve at the highest levels of his administration. Trump's choice of Kelly -- and his continued deliberations about tapping as many as two more military figures for other posts -- has intensified worries among some members of Congress and national security experts that the new administration's policies may be shaped disproportionately by military commanders. "I'm concerned," said Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.), a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. "Each of these individuals may have great merit in their own right, but what we've learned over the past 15 years is that when we view problems in the world through a military lens, we make big mistakes." If confirmed, Kelly and defense secretary nominee James Mattis, a retired Marine general with the nickname "Mad Dog," would join retired Army Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, Trump's pick for White House national security adviser. Meanwhile, retired Army Gen. David H. Petraeus is under consideration for secretary of state, and Navy Adm. Michael S. Rogers is a contender for director of national intelligence. Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), the former chairman of the Homeland Security panel, said Kelly has "genuine compassion" for immigrants and understands the root causes of the nation's immigration challenges in such Central American countries as Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador. "I will reserve judgment on many of the president-elect's other nominees," Carper said, "but with General Kelly, he's hit a home run with runners on base."

23. Gardai attempt to trace killers of Real IRA man in Cork

Cork - A postmortem is to be carried out on Thursday on the remains of a senior dissident republican who was shot and fatally wounded in Cork on Wednesday evening. Gardaí hope the test will shed light on the weapon used and possible suspects for the killing Aidan O'Driscoll (37) - who was nicknamed "the Beast". He was shot four times as he walked along the Old Commons Road near Blackpool Church of the Assumption on Cork's Northside at 5pm. It is understood that Mr O'Driscoll, who was previously the victim of a punishment shooting by dissident republicans in 2013, was shot four times by at least one or possibly two gunmen. The two men fled on foot towards Great William O'Brien Street where they got into a Nissan Almeira which was later found burnt out on Seminary Road near the North on on Cork's northside.

24. Hostage issues new warning from front line

London Times, Gareth Browne, 2016 12 08

London - The British photographer John Cantlie, who has been held captive by Islamic State for four years, has appeared in a new video in the besieged city of Mosul less than one kilometre from the Iraqi army's front line. The footage shows Mr Cantlie documenting the water shortages caused by coalition airstrikes. The photographer was kidnapped in November 2012 with the American journalist James Foley, who was murdered in Syria in 2014. He has appeared in several videos released by Isis. Most recently, in July, he appeared on camera to talk about the coalition's bombing of Mosul University. In the latest video a bearded and gaunt-looking Mr Cantlie proclaims that "winter is now upon Mosul" as he examines the damage caused to bridges and water pipes in the city. He asks: "If this is the coalition's war against the mujahidin then why are they waging it against Muslims?" It is unclear when the video was filmed but the cold weather would suggest that it was shot in the past few days because northern Iraq has been experiencing a cold spell.

29. Cops use gang tactics on extremists

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 12 08

Sydney - Police are using aggressive disruption tactics normally used on organised crime gangs to thwart a suspected Sydney terror cell they fear is intent on carrying out a terrorist attack. State and federal detectives from the NSW Joint Counter Terrorism Team have been targeting a cell of about 10 young suspected extremists operating in the southwest of Sydney. The operation, which stemmed from the arrest last month of Mehmet Biber, who police allege fought with an Islamist group in Syria in 2013, has been under way for several months. It is understood Junaid Thorne, a young preacher well known to authorities thanks to his radical sermonising, is thought to be the spiritual head of the group. In 2015 Thorne was imprisoned for four months - some of which was spent in Australia's toughest jail, the Supermax - for booking flights under a false name. A spokesman for the NSW Police Force declined to discuss the specifics of the operation, but acknowledged that police employed "a variety of powers" to thwart would-be radicals. "In any investigation, while the threshold for charges may not have been reached, community safety remains the highest priority," he said. "Disruptive tactics can prevent a potential attack and further enable police to gather evidence to successfully convict individuals who have engaged in some form of attack planning." Police are increasingly resorting to organised crime-type policing strategies to neutralise suspected Islamists while their plans are vague and embryonic.

Australia's first simulated cyber security "game" was set in 2022 and explored two equally unpalatable cyber attack scenarios in the hopes to prepare governments and businesses for the inevitable. The game was co-hosted by the National Security College at the Australian National University and the RAND Corporation, bringing together 90 participants from government, business and academia. Michelle Price, senior adviser in cyber security at the National Security College who helped to co-ordinate the game, said Australians "human behaviour" in cyber space needed to improve. "It's in large part why we're such a significant target for malicious activity," she said. Australia is currently losing up to $17 billion each year through malicious cyber activity. And the attacks on this year's Census website remain an equally stark reminder of what can happen when organisations are unprepared.

31. Seven years for terror teen's city bomb plot

The Australian, Chip Le Grand, 2016 12 08

Sydney - The arrest of a teenage bomb maker intent on carrying out the murderous instructions of a charismatic Islamic State recruiter averted what would otherwise have been Australia's worst terror attack. The Melbourne teenager, who was 17 at the time of his arrest, was yesterday jailed for seven years. His sentencing hearing revealed how close Islamic State came to exporting the Syrian conflict to the heart of Melbourne with devastating impact. Victorian Supreme Court judge Lex Lasry told the teenager, referred to as MHK, that he believed he would have carried out his plan to kill and seriously injure innocent people with crude home-made bombs if not for the intervention of police acting on a tip-off. When police raided the teenager's comfortable family home in May last year, they discovered terror preparations in an advanced stage: a boxed pressure cooker in the garage and elbow joint pipes under his bed, bulk matches to make phosphorus and sugar detonators, screws to use as shrapnel and detailed instructions on how to make the kind of device used at the Boston Marathon. The teenager's intentions were clear from hate-filled communications he exchanged on Facebook and Surespot, an encrypted messaging service, with Junaid Hussain, a British-born Islamic State recruiter and comrade of Australia's Neil Prakash since killed in Syria by a US drone strike. He expressed a violent loathing of non-believers and likened Shia Muslims to cockroaches. Unable to obtain a passport and travel to Syria without parental consent, he followed Hussain's incessant urgings to wage war at home.

32. We must be relentless against terror: PM

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 08

Melbourne - Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has declared terrorists should face the "full severity of the law" a day after a Melbourne teenager was sentenced to seven years in jail for preparing a bomb attack. A Victorian Supreme Court judge on Wednesday said the 18-year-old, who cannot be named, had "every intention" of using the partially constructed pipe bombs found in his home and the only reason he didn't go through with his plot was that he was arrested. Mr Turnbull on Thursday was asked if he thought the sentence was too lenient. The prime minister replied that sentencing was a matter for the courts and he wouldn't comment on any particular case. "(But) terrorist offences should be dealt with with the full severity of the law," he told 3AW. "We need to be relentless in stating our absolute condemnation of terrorism and terrorist activities and people who support terrorist activities." Mr Turnbull said it was up to prosecutors to appeal if they thought any sentence was too light.

New Delhi - Pakistan PM Nawaz Sharif's foreign affairs adviser Sartaj Aziz said on Wednesday that the country's intelligence agencies have presented its government with "insufficient evidence" against alleged Indian spy Kulbhushan Jadhav, currently in jail. "The dossier on Jadhav contained mere statements. It did not have any conclusive evidence," Aziz told Pakistan's Senate, or upper house. India reacted cautiously, with government sources saying Aziz's statement was in-camera. "We need time to verify the Aziz statement before forming a response," an Indian government source said. Aziz is also learnt to have said: "What the dossier contained was not enough. Now it's up to the concerned authorities (the army and ISI) how long they take to give us more matter on the agent." Jadhav was arrested during a raid in March. In a video released by the military later, he allegedly admitted to directing various "subversive activities" in Karachi and Balochistan at the behest of India's RAW since 2013.

Dakar - Alors que la situation au Mali s'enlise, l'Europe pourrait fournir des armes aux forces du continent pour les aider à combattre. Afrique La situation au Mali a hanté le 3e forum sur la sécurité de Dakar, organisé lundi 5 et mardi 6 décembre. Ce n'est pas étonnant, tant ce sommet monté par la France et le Sénégal dans la foulée de l'opération anti- djihadiste « Serval » est lié à ce pays. Mais tandis que lors des deux premières éditions régnait un certain optimisme quant à l'avenir, l'inquiétude se fait maintenant jour. « Le processus politique est ensablé et la situation sécuritaire se dégrade », résume un diplomate. Jean-Yves Le Drian, le ministre de la Défense, se montre certes moins brusque, mais ne peut que regretter le peu d'avancées en appelant à l'application rapide des accords de paix d'Alger. Conclu en juin 2015, ce texte prévoit notamment un redéploiement de l'État malien au nord du pays et le désarmement (DDR) des divers groupes armés. « Je constate que ça met du temps. Je sens bien que le processus de DDR traîne encore. Il est nécessaire que l'ensemble des acteurs fassent pression (...) pour que ces accords soient respectés », a-t-il affirmé.

39. Lori-Anne Thérroux-Bénoni : Pour les djihadistes maliens

Le Point, Claire Meynial, 2016 12 08

Dakar - Lori-Anne Thérroux-Bénoni : "Pour les djihadistes maliens, le fait religieux n'occupe pas une dimension centrale" Surprise. Selon une étude présentée au Forum de Dakar, les combattants sont surtout guidés par des logiques économiques et de protection. Rien de très surprenant que, pour la troisième édition du Forum de Dakar sur la paix et la sécurité en Afrique, le terrorisme ait encore été au centre des préoccupations. Et, comme les autres fois, le président sénégalais Macky Sall a martelé la nécessité de lutter contre l'islam radical. « Il faut une réponse doctrinale et intellectuelle de l'islam au discours extrémiste. Il n'y a pas de doute que l'extrémisme n'a aucune place sans l'islam. C'est la religion du juste milieu, qui fait corps avec la raison, elle ne peut s'accommoder d'une pensée intellectuelle qui installe l'obscurantisme », a-t-il répété dès la séance d'ouverture. Et de citer les versets du Coran qui exaltent la « faculté cognitive » de l'homme, avant d'évoquer la responsabilité de la communauté et des parents dans l'édification morale des jeunes : « Il vaut mieux éduquer un enfant que d'entreprendre la tâche plus incertaine de le déradicaliser quand le mal est déjà fait. » Cette année, le programme comprenait donc une conférence d'exégètes, dont l'un issu de l'université al-Azhar du Caire, en Égypte. Pourtant, une question évidente semble avoir été escamotée : qu'est-ce que la radicalisation en Afrique de l'Ouest ? Une équipe de chercheurs s'est penchée dessus.

42. China, US to do more on cyber crime

Washington - Chinese and US officials meeting in Washington on Wednesday for a bilateral cybersecurity dialogue have agreed to expand cooperation, according to Chinese officials. Chinese State Councilor and Minister of Public Security Guo Shengkun joined US Attorney General Loretta Lynch and Secretary of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson in co-chairing the third China-US High-Level Joint Dialogue on Cybercrime and Related Issues. The two sides reached a new consensus in deepening cooperation in cybersecurity. Achievements made in the meeting cover areas such as cracking down on cybercrimes, cooperation in cybersecurity, improving the hotline mechanism, cyber counterterrorism cooperation and information sharing, according to a press release from the Chinese delegation. The two sides recalled the achievements made since the first dialogue and spoke positively of the importance and necessity of the mechanism, the press release said. Guo was quoted as saying in the meeting that China and the US established the high-level dialogue mechanism based on the important consensus reached between President Xi Jinping and US President Barack Obama in September 2015. He said the two leaders gave important input to the dialogue when they met in Lima, Peru, last month on the sidelines of the APEC Leaders Summit.

43. China Delivers Riposte to 'Radical Islam' Claim

New York Times, Edward Wong, 2016 12 08

Beijing - A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman pushed back on Wednesday against assertions by Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, who is President-elect Donald J. Trump's choice for national security adviser, that China was allied with "radical Islamists." The spokesman, Lu Kang, was asked at a regularly scheduled news conference in Beijing about Mr. Flynn's accusations, which were made in a book released in July that he wrote with a co-author, "The Field of Fight: How We Can Win the Global War Against Radical Islam and Its Allies." "I hope everyone who takes a responsible attitude and is devoted to safeguarding China-U.S. relations and boosting China-U.S. cooperation can base their opinions on facts when taking a position," Mr. Lu said. "Only in this way can mutual trust be enhanced." In his book, Mr. Flynn mentions China and North Korea a half-dozen times. In one passage, he wrote, "The war is on. We face a working coalition that extends from North Korea and China to Russia, Iran, Syria, Cuba, Bolivia, Venezuela and Nicaragua. We are under attack, not only from nation-states directly, but also from Al Qaeda, Hezbollah, ISIS and countless other terrorist groups."

44. Du fond de sa prison au Bangladesh, Khalil raconte le terrorisme islamiste (Canada)

L'Hebdo (Suisse), Dougnac Dacca, 2016 12 08

Dacca - En trois ans, dans ce pays situé à l'est de l'Inde, une quarantaine de personnalités ont été exécutées par des groupes islamistes. Une violence qui ne cesse d'augmenter malgré la forte répression menée par le gouvernement, qui en profite pour régler ses comptes avec les partis d'opposition. La démocratie est ainsi prise en étau. Bracelets argentés autour des poignets, ses menottes s'entrechoquent parfois dans un léger cliquetis. Khalil* est assis les mains croisées sur ses genoux. L'entretien est secret, improvisé dans un petit bureau en préfabriqué au coeur de Dacca, la gigantesque métropole bangladaise. Pour Monirul Islam, la bête noire est incarnée par le JMB, le groupe qui a recruté Khalil. «Nous l'appelons le «néo-JMB» car ce groupe est né dans les années 2000 et s'est évanoui jusqu'en 2013. C'est lui qui a perpétré l'attaque du quartier de Gulshan. Les assaillants ont été entraînés par un ex-militaire radicalisé qui revenait du Canada.»

45. Hackers operated Twitter handles of Rahul, Congress from 5 countries (Canada).

Times of India, Somreet Bhattacharya, 2016 12 08

New Delhi - The Twitter handles of Rahul Gandhi and the Congress which were recently hacked were operated from five countries including the US, Delhi Police on Wednesday said. The Economic Offences Wing (EOW), which is probing the matter, received a reply around three-four days ago from Twitter headquarters on the Internet Protocol (IP) addresses used by the hackers to send derogatory tweets from these accounts, a senior police officer said. "We have got to know that the IP addresses from where the accounts were accessed don't fall under our jurisdiction. The Twitter handle logs show both the accounts were operated from five countries - Sweden, Romania, the US, Canada and Thailand. We will write to the Internet service providers of these countries to share details of users with us and that is how the investigation will proceed," the officer said.

46. Raids net 22 money laundering suspects (Canada)

South China Morning Post, Clifford Lo, 2016 12 08

Beijing - A series of police raids across the city yesterday rounded up 22 Hongkongers suspected of laundering up to HK$13 million in funds through their bank accounts. The money was suspected to be linked to 18 deception cases in Canada, Singapore, Taiwan, South Korea and Africa over the past two years. Senior inspector Sophia Lau Pak-wing of the commercial crime bureau said the cases included investment frauds and email scams. She said suspects deceived victims into remitting money to designated bank accounts in Hong Kong. "Even though the cases did not happen in Hong Kong, the suspects could be in breach of money laundering laws since their bank accounts were used to collect crime proceeds," Lau said. Money laundering carries a maximum penalty of 14 years' imprisonment and a HK$5 million fine. Investigations into such activities began after local police received referrals from overseas law enforcement agencies. Following detailed probes and analyses, police identified the suspected holders of the bank - accounts. Officers raided more than 20 locations across the city and arrested 13 men and nine women. As of last night, the suspects were still being questioned and none had been charged.

47. S. Korea's defense chief calls for vigilance over N.K. threats

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 08

Seoul - South Korea's defense chief called on the military Thursday to remain vigilant as North Korea might carry out a provocation amid the ongoing political crisis involving President Park Geun-hye. On Friday, 300 lawmakers from the ruling and opposition parties are set to vote on an impeachment bill against Park. The country has been engulfed by a massive corruption scandal involving Park and her close confidante since late October. Defense Minister Han Min-koo made the comments during his visit to the 3rd Army headquarters, one of the country's three field armies in charge of protecting Gyeonggi Province that surrounds Seoul from any military threats by North Korea. He also instructed the front line troops to take immediate action in case of any provocations without waiting for orders. He said the response should be made before the incident is reported to higher military headquarters, the statement said.

48. Terrorist cell who planned Manila bomb attack used social media to communicate

Manila Bulletin, Aaron Recuenco, 2016 12 08

Manila - Members of the terror cell who planned the foiled bomb attack in Manila near the US Embassy last month were found to have been communicating through Facebook and other social media platforms. Senior Supt. Joel Napoleon Coronel, director of the Manila Police District (MPD), said they found out such a scheme when they arrested the third suspect in the foiled bomb attack, identified as Mohammad Jumao-as who uses the alias Modie. "We found out that at least two of the five suspects involved have Facebook accounts. They have been communicating through Facebook but we are still conducting investigation as to their messages there," Coronel told the Manila Bulletin in an interview at Camp Crame after the presentation of the suspect to the media. "We are still verifying if the other people involved are just using aliases in Facebook," he added. But Coronel said it was also through Facebook that led them to Jumao-as in a hospital in Bulacan where he has been working as an X-Ray technician.

Moscow - Russia's security agencies have arrested 12 people accused of involvement in a terror organization. Moscow's branch of the Russian Interior Ministry said the suspects were searching for recruits for an unspecified organization. Wednesday's bust in Moscow was conducted jointly by the Interior Ministry and the Federal Security Service, the main KGB successor agency known under its acronym FSB. Russian state television showed the handcuffed suspects lying face down on the floor as security officers were searching the apartment. The raid follows last month's arrest of 10 suspects allegedly linked to the Islamic State group who were accused of plotting terror attacks in Moscow and St. Petersburg. (Full report).

Tehran - Iranian Deputy Interior Minister for Security and Law Enforcement Affairs Hossein Zolfaqari announced that the country's security forces have dismantled a terrorist cell which planned to carry out sabotage acts inside Iran. "Recently, a 3-member terrorist team which sought to enter the country via the Western borders was identified," Zolfaqari told reporters in Tehran on Wednesday. After identifying and tracking the terrorist cell, it was dismantled by the Iranian security and intelligence forces, he added. Unofficial sources said that the terrorists were affiliated to the ISIL. In relevant remarks last month, Zolfaqari announced that a terrorist cell was dismantled in the Eastern parts of Iran. "Last night, a terrorist team was disbanded by the intelligence ministry in Eastern Iran," Zolfaqari said on November 22. "The team had 4 members, one of whom was killed and three others were arrested," he added.

Police reconnaissance unit, weapons and vehicles allegedly used by the suspects during the attacks were seized. The cell, which consisted of three minors, carried out four shooting attacks between October and November 2016, using locally made weapons, the Shin Bet said. Relatives of the cell members were also detained, on suspicion that they were involved in hiding the weapons used to carry out attacks. "The activity of the cell demonstrates the high threat level of a terrorist cell with access to weapons and the ability to manufacture weapons," the agency said, adding that the suspects have been transferred to the military prosecution where charges will be filed in the coming days.

New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 12 08

Beirut - Syrian government forces pushed deeper into Aleppo on Wednesday, seizing areas around the medieval citadel whose narrow streets had long given rebels cover, pro-government websites and conflict monitors reported. Rebel leaders disputed the claims, but antigovernment activists in the area sent increasingly desperate messages saying they believed they would soon be killed or arrested, while civilians said they were squeezing into a smaller and smaller area, with some calling for safe passage out. A rebel fighter with the Nour al-Din al-Zenki group, reached in a hiding place near the Old City, said that several neighborhoods had fallen and that defeat appeared inevitable. "Aleppo has fallen," he said. "If there are no U.N. initiatives, I expect the regime will exterminate us all." In a joint statement, the leaders of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Britain and the United States warned that "a humanitarian disaster is taking place before our very eyes." "I am sure this cooperation (between Seoul and Jerusalem) is still very far from being exhausted and I hope so much this potential will be used in the future ... particularly in defense area. We may suggest some solutions to counter North Korean threats here." 59. Une « victoire stratégique » qui favorise le retour de Bachar sur la scène politique

Le Figaro, Isabelle Lasserre, 2016 12 08

Damas - Pour Damas, le succès des armes paraît désormais tellement certain que le ministre de la « Réconciliation », Ali Haidar, n'hésite pas à parler de « victoire stratégique » pour l'armée syrienne. La chute annoncée d'Alep, dont la vieille ville était entièrement reconquise par l'armée gouvernementale mercredi, sera sans nul doute un « game changer », un événement qui modifiera profondément la donne en Syrie. Le premier gagnant est Bachar el-Assad, l'allié de Moscou et de Téhéran, celui qui au début de la guerre a vidé les prisons de ses djihadistes afin qu'ils distillent leur poison dans l'opposition syrienne. En septembre 2015, le régime de Damas a été sauvé par l'intervention militaire de la Russie. La conquête d'Alep, la deuxième ville du pays, qui fut sa capitale commerciale avant la guerre et qui était jusque-là l'un des rares centres urbains tenus par les rebelles, rend possible et crédible la formation d'un État alaouite sur les ruines de la Syrie. Elle devrait aussi remettre en selle politiquement Bachar el-Assad, dont la chute avait été imprudemment annoncée ou fermement exigée par l'Europe et les États-Unis. Anticipant la chute de la ville, l'un pour la regretter, l'autre pour s'en féliciter, les chefs de la diplomatie américaine et russe soufflent à nouveau sur les braises quasi éteintes de la diplomatie.

La Croix, François d'Alañon, 2016 12 08

Bruxelles - Lors d'une réunion des ministres des affaires étrangères de l'Otan à Bruxelles, le secrétaire d'État américain John Kerry s'est efforcé, mardi, de rassurer ses partenaires sur l'engagement américain envers l'Alliance atlantique. Les ministres des affaires étrangères de l'Otan, réunis à Bruxelles, ont approuvé une série de mesures pour renforcer la coopération entre l'Alliance et l'Union européenne. À six semaines de l'arrivée de Donald Trump à la Maison-Blanche, le secrétaire d'État américain John Kerry a profité de sa dernière rencontre avec ses homologues pour les rassurer sur l'engagement américain envers l'Otan. En quoi consiste la coopération entre l'Otan et l'Union européenne? En présence de la chef de la diplomatie de l'UE Federica Mogherini et des représentants de la Finlande et de la Suède - deux pays membres de l'UE mais non de l'Otan -, les 28 pays de l'Otan ont approuvé 42 mesures de renforcement de la coopération et de la coordination entre les deux institutions, en application d'une décision de principe prise au sommet de l'Otan à Varsovie, en juillet. Le champ couvert va de la « guerre hybride » à la cybersécurité, en passant par les exercices, la recherche, le partenariat avec des pays tiers et un partage des moyens logistiques et de renseignement pour les opérations navales de l'Otan et de l'UE en Méditerranée. Le Centre européen de lutte contre les « menaces hybrides », qui doit être créé en 2017 à Helsinki, s'appuiera sur un réseau européen d'experts pour informer les pays membres - de l'UE comme de l'Otan - de nouvelles attaques ou menaces, comme la désinformation russe ou les tactiques de propagande de Daech.

Bruxelles - L'Union européenne s'attache à finaliser les réformes lancées depuis deux ans. Un accord émerge sur le contrôle aux frontières de l'espace Schengen. Plus d'un an après les attentats du 13 novembre à Paris, la réponse peut sembler tardive. Elle est pourtant assez rapide au vu des canons traditionnels de la grande machine bruxelloise. L'Europe est en passe de muscler son arsenal de lutte contre le terrorisme, avec une volonté affichée, tant par le Parlement que par la Commission et les Etats, de désormais boucler au plus vite les nombreuses initiatives lancées ces deux dernières années. Une volonté affirmée lors du sommet de Bratislava en septembre et préalablement symbolisée par la création en août d'un poste, inédit jusque-là, de commissaire à la Sécurité, confié au Britannique Julian King. La diversité des réformes que l'Europe s'attache à « délivrer », selon un anglicisme en vogue à Bruxelles, témoigne à la fois de l'ampleur et de la complexité de la tâche.

Alsasua - Le 15 octobre, deux gardes civils et leurs compagnes ont été insultés et frappés par une vingtaine de personnes à Alsasua, commune de Navarre. Fait divers ou résurgence des violences autrefois menés par l'ETA ? Où se trouve la frontière entre la violence et la terreur ? Entre une agression contre des gendarmes et un lynchage prémédité visant à imposer la peur ? La polémique fait rage en Espagne depuis l'agression, le 15 octobre, de deux gardes civils qui n'étaient pas en service et de leurs compagnes, dans un bar d'Alsasua, petite commune de 8000 habitants de Navarre. Insultés et frappés par plus d'une vingtaine de personnes, certaines ayant le visage dissimulé, les gardes civils ont été forcés à quitter le bar. Une fois dans la rue, ont-ils raconté au juge, ils ont de nouveau été cernés et agressés par une quinzaine de personnes qui leur ont crié de quitter la Navarre. L'un des deux gardes a dû être opéré d'une fracture à la cheville, les autres victimes ont souffert de blessures légères. Sept adultes, âgées de 19 à 24 ans, et deux mineurs ont été arrêtés. Leurs actes ont été condamnés par tous les partis, à l'exception des indépendantistes radicaux de la gauche abertzale (patriote) EH Bildu pour laquelle il ne s'agit que d'une simple « bagarre de bar » après une « provocation » de la part des gardes civils.

Non identifié - Au sein du club très fermé des " Five Eyes " qui réunit, depuis la seconde guerre mondiale, les services secrets techniques américains, britanniques, australiens, canadiens et néo-zélandais, le Royaume-Uni et les Etats-Unis tiennent les deux principaux rôles. L'Agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) américaine compte 60 000 personnes, son homologue française. Chargée d'une mission offensive et défensive, la NSA s'efforce d'avoir accès à tous les réseaux informatiques et de communication afin de collecter et de traiter en masse les données de connexions. Elle dispose d'un budget annuel de plus de 10 milliards de dollars (9,3 milliards d'euros), supérieur à celui de la CIA. Créée en 1952 par un décret secret du président Harry Truman soucieux de réorganiser l'ensemble des moyens d'interception américains, l'existence de la NSA n'a été officiellement reconnue qu'en 1957.

64. Le renseignement financier, outil-clé de la traque aux « signaux faibles » de l'antiterrorisme

Le Monde, Elise Vincent, 2016 12 08

Paris - Pour le directeur de Tracfin, Bruno Dalles, dont le rapport annuel était dévoilé ce 8 décembre, l'agence a notamment un rôle important pour « confirmer un environnement, une appartenance à une mouvance ». Depuis les attentats de Charlie et de l'Hyper Cacher, en janvier 2015, le renseignement financier est devenu un outil essentiel de la lutte contre le terrorisme. Un des moyens de repérer ce qui est devenu un des enjeux-clés de l'endiguement de la menace : les « signaux faibles » de radicalisation. Tels sont, en substance, les points mis en avant dans le rapport d'analyse annuel de Tracfin, la cellule antiblanchiment française, qu'a rendu public le ministre de l'économie et des finances, Michel Sapin, jeudi 8 décembre, à Bercy. D'après ce rapport intitulé « Tendances et analyse des risques » de l'année 2015, le renseignement financier a, depuis l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo, pris une place qu'il n'avait pas dans ce type de dossiers. « L'intérêt du renseignement financier c'est que même si on parle de " signaux faibles ", il recueille des signaux fiables », estime ainsi le directeur de Tracfin, Bruno Dalles, interrogé par Le Monde. Cela permet de confirmer un environnement, une appartenance. » Des éléments essentiels pour la justice, afin de caractériser par exemple « l'association de malfaiteur en vue d'une entreprise terroriste », le chef de mise en examen le plus souvent utilisé actuellement.

Atlantico (site web), Franck Decloquement, 2016 12 08

Non identifié - Les dernières révélations Snowden atomisent la théorie d'une mondialisation heureuse (et ça, c'est nettement plus gênant que les arguments des populistes sur le libre-échange) Les guerres économiques que se livrent les pays du monde entier représentent une menace bien plus sérieuse pour le libre-échange que les théories économiques de Donald Trump. Atlantico : Les révélations d'Edward Snowden mettent chaque jour en avant de nouvelles informations sur les pratiques de la NSA. Parmi ces révélations, certaines soulignent le risque que font courir les agences de renseignement au libre-échange et à la libre-concurrence. Quel est-il exactement ? Les missions poursuivies par les organes de renseignements vont-elles à l'encontre des principes du libre-échange ? Franck Decloquement : Selon de très nombreux observateurs ayant pu enquêter en profondeur sur le sujet, la NSA est une « arme d'espionnage économique massive », et un « fer de lance sous l'égide de Washington », évidemment prête à tout - dans le cadre de ses prérogatives propres - pour défendre les intérêts commerciaux américains. A l'image du dernier livre de Claude Delesse « NSA - National Security Agency », édité chez Tallandier, qui est une très bonne introduction en la matière, à destination d'un lectorat grand public.

66. Un jeune radicalisé a été libéré mais reste surveillé

Genève - Le jeune homme va être le premier à bénéficier du projet pilote de suivi social présenté lundi par les autorités genevoises C'est le premier cas du genre pour Genève. Un jeune Suisse radicalisé, A. , parti il y a un an sur le chemin du djihad, arrêté six mois plus tard à son retour puis placé en détention provisoire, est sorti de prison hier, ont appris la Tribune de Genève et le Tages-Anzeiger. Sa remise en liberté est assortie de mesures judiciaires spéciales. Il revient au Canton de veiller à les mettre en oeuvre. Autant dire que le Genevois de 21 ans va mettre les institutions à rude épreuve. Le Ministère public de la Confédération (MPC) a confirmé hier ces éléments: « Le prévenu arrêté le 8 juin 2016 à l'aéroport de Zurich à son retour de Turquie a été remis en liberté. Des mesures de substitution ont été ordonnées par le Tribunal des mesures de contrainte (TMC) compétent sur demande du MPC.

67. Vols au-dessus d'un nid d'espions

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 08

Non identifié - La NSA américaine et son homologue britannique peuvent capter toutes les données, y compris les codes secrets, des communications des passagers de la plupart des compagnies aériennes. Dont Air France. Dans l'immense stock d'archives extraites par Edward Snowden, l'ancien contractuel de l'Agence nationale de sécurité américaine (NSA), c'est une pépite. Elle débute par une devinette : " Quel est le point commun entre le président du Pakistan, un trafiquant de cigares ou d'armes, une cible du contre-terrorisme ou le membre d'un réseau de prolifération nucléaire? Ils utilisent tous leur téléphone portable lorsqu'ils sont dans un avion. " Posée en 2010 dans une des lettres d'information interne de l'une des principales directions de la NSA, " SIDtoday ", et classée top secret, elle annonce l'émergence d'un nouveau terrain d'espionnage, qui n'avait pas encore été exploré : l'interception des données de communications à bord des avions de ligne. En 2009, la NSA souligne dans un document interne que, en décembre 2008, 50 000 personnes ont déjà utilisé leur téléphone portable en vol, un chiffre qui atteint 100 000 en février 2009.

68. WikiLeaks accuse le régime de collusion avec Daech

Ankara - Le site a publié 57 934 mails de Berat Albayrak montrant des relations troubles entre l'« État islamique » et la compagnie pétrolière Powertrans. Le ministre turc de l'Énergie, Berat Albayrak, pourrait bien se faire tirer les oreilles par son beau-père pour manque de prudence. Lundi et mardi, le site d'information WikiLeaks a publié 57 934 mails du gendre de Recep Tayyip Erdogan qui prouveraient les liens troubles entretenus par la Turquie et l'organisation de l'« État islamique » (EI). La compagnie pétrolière turque Powertrans aurait en effet bénéficié d'une dérogation à l'embargo imposé par le gouvernement sur les importations et exportations de pétrole en provenance ou en direction des régions sous contrôle de Daech. Ankara aurait donc sciemment acheté du pétrole syrien à l'EI, finançant indirectement le groupe djihadiste en hommes et en matériel militaire.

1. Canada spy official doubts intelligence-sharing under Trump - report

Reuters, David Ljunggren, 2016 12 09

Ottawa - The Canadian official who oversees the country's spies says Ottawa may have to rethink how it provides intelligence to the United States, given incoming President Donald Trump's views on torture, a newspaper reported on Thursday. Canada is a member of the so-called Five Eyes intelligence-sharing network, including the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Michael Doucet, executive director of the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), said Canada did not want information derived from torture. "They may have a new administration that thinks torture is a good thing," he told a private Toronto audience last week, according to The Globe and Mail, which cited a recording of the remarks. "It's going to be an interesting and challenging time, and we've got to think about what defines us as Canadians." SIRC is a watchdog agency that reviews the activities of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, or CSIS. During the election campaign, Trump said the United States should use waterboarding and other harsh interrogation techniques when questioning terror suspects. Neither SIRC nor CSIS was immediately available to comment. Snowden revealed a vast amount of metadata by the U.S. National Security Agency in 2013 and now lives in Russia.

2. Canadians accused of spying in China angry they can't help orphans, elderly

CTVNews.ca, Jeff Lagerquist, 2016 12 09

Ottawa - Kevin and Julia Garratt were completely blindsided when plain-clothed Chinese authorities snatched them from inside a restaurant in the northern city of Dandong in August 2014. The Canadian couple was tossed into separate cars that sped out of town to a remote compound where they were interrogated as foreign spies. The ordeal saw Kevin jailed for over two years on espionage charges. Julia was detained in isolation for six months before being placed on house arrest in China. Now, three months after Kevin was deported back to Canada and re-united with his family, the couple is speaking out about their harrowing ordeal at the hands of China's state security apparatus. "All of a sudden these people just kind of grabbed us. There were people with video cameras. We assumed (they were) local police," Kevin told CTV News Channel. "I think someone flashed a badge, but I couldn't tell." "Then when they said they were the FBI and started driving me out into the middle of nowhere to a compound, I was incredulous and terrified. I thought, 'Am I going to get out of this alive?'" said Julia. The Garratts had spent the past three decades living in China as Christian aid workers, helping orphans and the elderly, and running a popular café in a politically sensitive region near the North Korean border -- which they crossed on occasion to pursue aid projects. The Chinese Communist Party is officially atheist and religion is a sensitive topic. The Garratts' coffee shop was a hot spot for students and foreign journalists, as well as locals who were eager to hear about the Canadian couple's travels to the hermit kingdom next door. Visiting dignitaries, like then-Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, were a small portion of those that frequented the café, but Kevin says it was enough to raise eyebrows in China and at home in Canada. "We had some talks with CSIS. They contacted me once while I was in Canada. (It was) kind of a routine visit (since) I had been to North Korea. They said 'What are you doing there?' Just kind of a follow up, and making sure we were following sanctions and not doing anything illegal," he said. "It put us on a higher radar for the Chinese."

3. Canadian Spy Official Raises Intelligence-Sharing Concerns Under Trump

Washington Free Beacon, Natalie Johnson, 2016 12 09

Washington - The Canadian official who oversees the nation's spy agencies said Ottawa may have to rethink intelligence sharing with the U.S. if President-elect Donald Trump moves forward with his campaign promise to reinstate torture methods to gather information. Michael Doucet, executive director of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, told a private audience in Toronto last week the Canadian government does not want intelligence acquired by torture, the Globe and Mail reported on Thursday. The U.S. and Canada are both members of the Five Eyes intelligence sharing alliance along with the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand. Doucet's comments may have implications for the network's future under President-elect Trump, who has expressed support for waterboarding and sleep deprivation when questioning terrorist suspects. Trump pledged on the campaign trail to bring back the Bush-era interrogation methods that were barred by Congress in 2005 in order to defeat the Islamic State. He seemed to reconsider his stance after meeting earlier this month with retired Marine Corps Gen. James Mattis, who told the president-elect he has "never found it to be useful." Mattis was tapped to head the Defense Department under Trump's incoming administration.

4. Canadian spywatcher's Snowden remark 'highly inappropriate,' Goodale says

Globe and Mail Online, Colin Freeze and Daniel Leblanc, 2016 12 09

Toronto and Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale has rebuked a Canadian spywatcher for publicly suggesting Edward Snowden "should be shot." "That remark strikes me as highly inappropriate," the minister told reporters in Ottawa on Thursday. He was not the only person offended. From Russia, the famous fugitive American at the centre of the comment also found it disturbing. "Canadian spy, charged with keeping spies from breaking the law, wants man dead for showing spies broke law," read a Tweet from Mr. Snowden on his verified account. He then added wryly, "Bonus: he's mad he was recorded." On Wednesday, The Globe that Michael Doucet, a former Canadian intelligence analyst, gave a 90-minute talk to a small audience at Toronto's Ryerson University in which he made several off-the-cuff remarks. He later said he did not think his talk was being recorded. When a member of the audience asked Mr. Doucet what Mr. Snowden's fate would have been had he been Canadian and leaked intelligence secrets, he replied: "Do you want my opinion on that? Do you really want it? I'll give it to you. If Edward Snowden had worked for CSIS and did what he did, he should be shot." This comment was surprising because Mr. Doucet is executive director of a government watchdog agency, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. SIRC reviews the highly classified operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and its officials rarely make unscripted remarks in public. Mr. Doucet quickly added that he was merely being provocative, and would like Mr. Snowden to face trial. In 2013, Mr. Snowden was a security-cleared contractor who fled the United States with volumes of U.S. government documents. He leaked them to select journalists who wrote articles about their contents, including secret spy programs of questionable legality. The Snowden leaks have woken the world up to the fact that the U.S. National Security Agency and its allies in a partnership known as the Five Eyes - Canada, Britain, Australia and New Zealand - have been collecting, pooling and analyzing global telecommunications traffic on a massive, constant and indiscriminate basis.

5. Door open to CSIS use of metadata from innocent people

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 12 09

Ottawa -The federal public safety minister is keeping the door open to the idea of Canada's spy agency crunching potentially sensitive data about innocent people. Ralph Goodale told MPs at a House of Commons committee Thursday he is weighing views on whether the Canadian Security Intelligence Service should be allowed to retain and use such information. Last month Federal Court Justice Simon Noel said CSIS violated the law by keeping electronic data about people who were not actually under investigation. CSIS processed the metadata beginning in 2006 through its Operational Data Analysis Centre to produce intelligence that can disclose intimate details about individuals. Metadata is information associated with a communication, such as a telephone number or email address, but not the message itself. The court ruling means metadata can be kept and used by CSIS only if it relates to a specific threat to Canadian security or if it is of use to an investigation, prosecution, national defence or foreign affairs. Privacy watchdogs from across the country said this week that Canada's spy agencies should destroy the data trails of innocent people they collect incidentally during terrorism investigations, once the actual targets have been cleared of suspicion. The office of federal privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien says metadata must be handled with care because it can reveal medical conditions, religious beliefs and sexual orientation, among other personal traits. CSIS director Michel Coulombe told the committee he hoped the spy service would be in a position within about six months to decide what to do with the associated metadata collected over the 10-year period. Conservative public safety critic Tony Clement wondered why CSIS was keeping the data in question at all. Coulombe said the law dictates that CSIS must hang on to any data used in criminal or administrative proceedings. As a result, the agency is going through the material to see what it needs to keep. "So before we rush and destroy that information, we have to make sure that by destroying it we're not going to be contravening another court decision," Coulombe said.

6. Real Oversight Needed for Law-breaking National Security Agencies

TheTye.ca, Micheal Vonn, 2016 12 09

Comment: National security accountability -- everyone says they want it. But not everyone means the same thing when they use the language of "accountability." The dangers of "faux accountability" are always serious, but especially so on national security matters where secrecy can mask abuses and law breaking. There is a growing concern that what the government might mean by "accountability" is primarily the creation of a Parliamentary oversight committee for national security matters. Bill C-22, which would create such a committee, is working its way through Parliament right now. An oversight committee is long overdue, but it is entirely inadequate as a means of achieving accountability. There is a crisis of public confidence in national security agencies that appear to break the law with no consequences. Law-breaking by national security agencies is regularly rewarded with changes to laws that expand their powers even further. While Bill C-22 would create a Parliamentary oversight committee, there are serious concerns about the legislation. The committee would lack independence, and could be -- and will certainly be seen to be -- a mere extension of the executive branch of government. It would not have the ability to ensure it receives relevant information or to initiate independent investigations. And the committee will not be able to ensure complete and robust reporting to the public. The crisis is one that has seen Canada fail to implement the recommendations of three major inquiries on national security matters: one on the Air India tragedy and two on Canadians sent to other countries where they were tortured. The crisis is one in which the public has learned CSIS has breached its duty of candour to the federal courts for 10 years and has been illegally collecting Canadians' telecommunications metadata in violation of the CSIS Act. That particular crisis was like Act II of the slightly earlier crisis in which the public discovered that it is possible that every piece of Canadians' personal information currently held in the CSIS bulk data holdings has been illegally acquired, as the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), in its first ever audit of these data holdings, found a complete failure to abide by the legislation.

7. 'He was always a strong voice for fairness'

Montreal Gazette, 2016 12 09

Montreal - Warren Allmand, the longtime Liberal MP and cabinet minister who oversaw the abolition of Canada's death penalty, died Wednesday at the age of 84. In March he had been diagnosed with an inoperable brain tumour. A native Montrealer, Allmand retired from federal politics after three decades before returning to public life as a councillor at Montreal city hall. Allmand grew up during the Great Depression, an experience that saw him develop a sense of social justice early in life, a sense that would more than once compel him to buck the party line in Ottawa and at city hall. "He was always a strong voice for fairness," recalled veteran Montreal city councillor Marvin Rotrand. "As a city councillor, I found a kindred soul. ... Often we were the only ones in the council who voted against stuff." Allmand first sought to be MP for the riding of Notre Dame de Grace in 1965 and would go on to serve the riding for nine consecutive terms, retiring before the 1997 federal election. In the 1970s, Allmand would serve as solicitor-general, Indian affairs minister and consumer affairs minister in governments led by Pierre Trudeau.

Montréal - La GRC A élaboré une vingtaine de scénarios pour gagner sa confiance la gendarmerie royale du canada n'a pas lésiné sur les moyens pour coincer un gatinois soupçonné de terrorisme, en créant une organisation criminelle fictive impliquant au moins six agents d'infiltration. Ismaël Habib avait affirmé à un agent d'infiltration qu'il souhaitait rejoindre le groupe État islamique en Syrie pour faire le djihad. En tout, les policiers fédéraux ont mis au point une vingtaine de scénarios pour gagner la confiance d'Ismaël Habib, a-t-on appris hier au neuvième jour du procès de l'homme de 29ans. Le Gatinois est accusé d'avoir tenté de quitter le pays pour rejoindre un groupe terroriste en Syrie. Les policiers se sont toutefois heurtés à quelques problèmes durant l'opération. À un moment, Habib logeait dans un appartement fourni à son insu par la GRC. Le hic, c'est que l'accusé y avait fait emménager une famille algérienne.

9. Ismael Habib thwarted RCMP's best-laid plans in terrorism investigation, court hears
CBC.CA, Kate McKenna, 2016 12 09

Ottawa - RCMP officers had to scramble to produce new, creative undercover operations after Ismael Habib kept unwittingly thwarting their plans, a Quebec court has heard. The RCMP officer who orchestrated nearly two dozen undercover operations, James Parent, testified for a second day at Habib's trial at the Montreal courthouse. Parent explained that the RCMP tried to keep Habib living in one apartment and out of trouble but succeeded in doing neither. Habib, 29, is accused of trying to go overseas to commit terrorist acts and of providing false information to obtain a passport. He was arrested in Gatineau, Que., in February 2016 on unrelated charges. He was denied bail on those charges and was subsequently charged for the terrorism-related allegations. Parent became involved in Habib's investigation in July 2015. He testified that he devised and helped to implement 22 covert operations, culminating in a Mr. Big-style sting which happened in February 2016. The sting produced a confession from Habib, who said he wanted to go overseas to fight with ISIS. Whether that confession should be admitted as evidence will be ruled on by Judge Serge Déglise later in the trial. After monitoring Habib, police knew he didn't have a fixed address. One of the objectives of the undercover operations was to find him some place to live. He said the RCMP rented an apartment on Basile Patenaude Place, in the Montreal borough of Rosemont--La Petite-Patrie, and made up a cover story so that Habib's friend Lyes -- an agent -- could give him the apartment. But Habib was only there for a couple of weeks when he decided to move to Gatineau to move in with his new girlfriend. It's unclear if the RCMP investigation was over at that time, however Habib had been meeting with undercover officers just hours before his arrest.

10. More people apply to become Mounties under new rules
CBC.CA, Alison Crawford, 2016 12 09

Ottawa -There are early signs that changes to the RCMP's application process are leading to a big bump in recruits. The police force changed its application requirements six months ago with the aim of simplifying the process and making more people eligible to apply. Now, recruits don't have to be Canadian citizens, they can put off taking the physical fitness test until they've been accepted at the RCMP's training division and university graduates no longer have to take the national police force's entrance exam. According to a memo sent to staff in British Columbia from Deputy Commissioner Craig Callens and obtained by CBC News, applications have increased 270 per cent since changes were introduced in May. "Since the recent changes, that have allowed the pre-posting of cadets at time of application to Western divisions of their choice, applications have increased to 1,100 per month from 300," Callens wrote. One of the changes made in May was to allow applicants from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and B.C. to request to be posted back to their home province once they'd graduated from the training centre.

11. Ottawa denies using data from vote reform website

National Post, Marie-Danielle Smith, 2016 12 09

Ottawa - The government says information collected by an online electoral reform consultation isn't accessible to the Liberal Party, after an Ontario man alleged he started getting fundraising emails soon after completing the survey. Sean Fullerton, a database analyst in Kitchener, Ont., told the National Post he unsubscribed from Liberal emails more than a year ago, but started receiving them again almost immediately after entering his email address on MyDemocracy.ca, a website being used to gather opinion on democratic values. But both the government and Vox Pop Labs, the company that designed the site, deny email addresses are even being collected. "Protecting personal information is something we take very seriously. Political parties have no access whatsoever to any information shared with MyDemocracy.ca. That is just not happening," said John O'Leary, the director of communications for Democratic Institutions Minister Maryam Monsef. "Emails are not retained in the system when results are emailed to users. They are not stored and cannot be retrieved by anyone, Vox Pop Labs included," said Clifton van der Linden, the CEO and founder of the public opinion company, in an email. "The implication that these email addresses are stored or shared with third parties is utterly baseless." Fullerton, who works at an insurance company, explained Thursday he found it "really, really odd" when Liberal fundraising emails started pouring into his email account within a few hours of completing the electoral reform consultation Monday. He said he rescinded his party membership in May 2015 - in protest after the Liberals voted in favour of a controversial anti-terror law, Bill C-51 - and stopped receiving fundraising asks after unsubscribing from email lists. "They just stopped," he said. "As soon as I did that survey, I started getting them again."

12. Russia threatens retaliation over latest round of Canadian sanctions

CBC.CA, Murray Brewster, 2016 12 09

Ottawa - Canada has quietly imposed additional sanctions on Russian nationals over the annexation of Crimea and Moscow's ongoing support for separatists in eastern Ukraine. The new measures, including asset-freezing and a prohibition on business dealings, were passed by the Liberal cabinet on Nov. 28 and released, without much fanfare compared with the former Conservative government, on the Global Affairs Canada website the same day. There are 15 individuals named in the regulation, which was to be formally posted Thursday in the Canada Gazette, the government's official publication of record. Six of the people are members of Russia's national assembly -- known as the Duma -- who were elected from Crimea in September in the first vote since the takeover. It is the second time the Liberal government has tightened sanctions in relation to the eastern European crisis which erupted in the spring of 2014. The last round of measures were imposed in August of this year. It is significant because the Liberals have made diplomatic re-engagement with Russia a cornerstone of their foreign policy since being elected last year, much to the private -- and sometimes public -- dismay of the Ukrainian government. Arsen Avakov, Ukraine's interior minister, was the latest to warn the Trudeau government about Moscow in closed-door meetings with two senior Liberal ministers. "We rely on civilized countries to support Ukraine in this situation and, of course, we rely on Canada," Avakov told CBC News in an interview this week. "I have heard that Canada should start talking with Russia and have friendship with Russia," he said. "The issue is not about being kind to [Russian President Vladimir] Putin and giving him cookies, it is about demonstrating a firm position." The latest sanctions are "a very a positive step," Avakov said.

13. Standing up for rights

Toronto Star, Staff Reporter, 2016 12 09

Editorial: Canada's privacy commissioners did a big service for all of us this week when they stood up to resist the pressure to erode traditional freedoms in the name of ever-greater security. The federal commissioner, Daniel Therrien, was supported by all his provincial and territorial colleagues in a powerful appeal for caution as law enforcement agencies and national security officials push for more powers. It's clear, Therrien said, that security forces need the right tools to do their job of protecting society. And it's equally obvious that those tools must be updated and adapted to meet the challenges of the digital world - such as carrying out cyber-surveillance of illicit activities online. However, there's an awfully big "but" that must follow these statements, and Therrien provided it in an emphatic manner that deserves to be noted by anyone concerned about striking the right balance between security and freedom. "But," he said, "state powers have already been significantly expanded" to counter different types of threats. "At the same time, we have seen too many cases of inappropriate and sometimes illegal conduct by state officials that have impacted on the rights of ordinary citizens not suspected of criminal or terrorist activities." The commissioners made their concerns known in a brief for a review of security laws being carried out by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. That includes a review of Bill C-51, the Harper-era law that tilted the balance too far toward security over privacy. The Liberal government has promised to fix it, and Therrien's words should serve as a strong caution to correct the balance. They are also speaking out at a time when police forces are making a public case that concerns about privacy are hobbling them in the fight against new types of cybercrime. It's normal for security forces to push for more tools to do their job. But the fact is that police now have access to more data than ever, and the recent trend has been to strengthen police and security powers, not weaken them.

14. Video surveillance in businesses can violate B.C.'s privacy laws

Vancouver Sun, Rob Shaw, 2016 12 09

Vancouver - B.C.'s acting privacy commissioner is warning private businesses they might be breaking the law if they install video-surveillance cameras without thinking through the privacy implications. Drew McArthur said a recent audit of an unnamed Lower Mainland medical clinic, which had eight video cameras in operation, is an example of the growing trend of cheap and easy-to-install surveillance systems that likely violate B.C.'s privacy laws. McArthur rejected the clinic's argument that it had installed the cameras in common areas to prevent crime, improve security and monitor employee behaviour. "The fundamental premise of our private-sector privacy legislation is you require the purpose for collection has to be reasonable for the circumstances," he said in an interview. "In this case, there's no crime issue or threat-to-security issue, it's just a medical clinic in a stand-alone location and they have not had a rash of crime or security issues. And so they don't meet the threshold for reasonableness in terms of the collection of personal information. So where they are, they are over- collecting personal information." It would be more acceptable for a bank, with a lot of assets, or a convenience store, where employees might be working through the night, to justify surveillance, said McArthur. And it's not acceptable to record all your employees and customers as a deterrent against possible future crimes, because that doesn't satisfy the legal requirements either, he said. McArthur's report on the medical clinic was the first of its kind involving a private business. The clinic has been given three months to remove its cameras and delete its video footage or face an order from the commissioner's office that could be backed up in court.

15. FBI fights an uphill battle against conspiracy theories

Washington Post, Matt Zapposky, 2016 12 09

Washington - The North Carolina man who took an assault rifle to a popular D.C. pizza joint to investigate a fictitious online rumor demonstrates a problem that has long vexed the FBI. The Internet - a breeding ground for radical ideologies and bizarre conspiracy theories - can quickly move troubled souls to violence. And in an age when fake news is magnified by those with political and financial interests, the problem is getting harder to stop. The bureau has in recent years made a priority of preventing Islamic State-inspired attacks, developing informants who can tip agents to plots before they happen and connecting the often Internet-radicalized plotters with people actually working for the FBI. But the bizarre conspiracy theory that a child sex ring was operating underneath D.C.'s Comet Ping Pong restaurant - which spurred 28-year-old Edgar Maddison Welch to drive from North Carolina to launch his own violent investigation - would probably have registered as "barely a blip" on the bureau's radar, said Ron Hosko, a former FBI assistant director. "There is so much to do that is tangible and real and fitting squarely within the bureau's jurisdiction and priorities," Hosko said. "There's not a lot of bandwidth for sort of these one-offs."

16. Georgia Says Someone in U.S. Government Tried to Hack State's Computers Housing Voter Data

Wall Street Journal, Brian Tau, 2016 12 09

New York - The secretary of state of Georgia is asking the Department of Homeland Security to explain what appears to be an attempted breach of the state's computer systems that house its voter registration database by someone in the federal government. In a letter to Department of Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson dated Thursday, Georgia's Secretary of State Brian Kemp said the state had discovered an unsuccessful attempt to breach the firewall of state computer systems. The attempt occurred on Nov. 15 and was linked to an IP address associated with DHS, he said. "We are looking into the matter. DHS takes the trust of our public and private sector partners seriously, and we will respond to Secretary Kemp directly," a spokeswoman for DHS said. "At no time has my office agreed to or permitted DHS to conduct penetration testing or security scans of our network," wrote Mr. Kemp, a Republican. "Moreover, your department has not contacted my office since this unsuccessful incident to alert us of any security event that would require testing or scanning of our network."

17. How Trump Could Finally Win the War on Terror

Bloomberg View, Eli Lake, 2016 12 09

Column - "The whole objective of these terrorists is to scare us into changing the nature of who we are and our democracy," President Obama said this week. This is the president's version of George W. Bush's "they hate us for our freedoms." On this point, Trump has an opening. The truth is that the Islamic State, al-Qaeda and other jihadists do not hate us just because of our freedom. Their objective is not to provoke an over-reaction where America ceases to be a democracy. It's much more straightforward. These groups want to force the non-Muslim world -- what they call the Dar al-Harb, or the house of war -- to submit to Islamic rule. Jihadists seek conquest. Trump doesn't know a lot about foreign policy. But he does understand this. Obama and Bush do as well. But they also deliberately tried to define the enemy in the long war as un-Islamic, as murderous charlatans who defame a great religion. Trump...has an opportunity. He can, for example, make it clear that America will be a safe haven for anyone in the Muslim world facing persecution from radicals, whether they are marked as blasphemers or from minority faiths such as Coptic Christians. Trump can also align more closely with leaders like Abu Dhabi's Crown Prince Mohammed bin Zayed al-Nahyan to build a quiet and professional counter-terrorism capability for the region. Trump could also use America's influence in Iraq and Afghanistan to encourage secular and reformist politicians, instead of embracing, as both Bush and Obama did, any confessional parties that also gave lip service to opposing terrorism. He could use the bully pulpit to encourage Western civil societies to adopt newspaper editors, lawyers, human rights activists and others under threat from radicals in their own faith. Meanwhile, Trump could wind down what remains of Obama's first term agenda to build bridges to Muslim Brotherhood parties that have shown no real interest, with the exception of Tunisia, of accepting pluralism. There are risks in embracing an ideological war against radical Islam, as opposed to a long war against terrorists. But it has the advantage of defining conditions for victory. The long war will end when Islamic fascism is defeated and discredited. What's more, Trump can set America on this path without engaging in the cycle of regime change and nation-building he has explicitly rejected. Not a bad plan for a guy who keeps asking why America doesn't win anymore.

18. Is the Department of Homeland Security So Busted Even a General Can't Fix it?

The Daily Beast, Kimberly Dozier, 2016 12 08

Washington - Senior Department of Homeland Security officials, current and former, are reacting with optimism to word that retired Marine Corps Gen. John Kelly is President-elect Donald Trump's choice to lead their agency, including some of Trump's fiercest critics. "When you have 4-stars who have been combatant commanders, they are generally the most broadly experienced people in government," said Michael Chertoff, who served as the department's second-ever secretary in the Bush administration. "You're kind of a warrior-diplomat, not just a warrior." Chertoff was one of more than 70 national security veterans of the Bush administration who called Trump unfit to lead, in an open letter in March, but has taken heart over the nominations of retired Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn to be National Security Adviser, Marine Corps Gen. James Mattis to lead the Pentagon, and the reported choice of Kelly to DHS. "I have to say these national security appointments are positive and give me a much bigger feeling of encouragement about the direction of the administration," he said in an interview.

19. Obama's tenure ends with a turf war over killing terrorists

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 12 09

Column - Given the turf wars and interagency rivalries that have long surrounded U.S. Special Operations forces, President Obama probably didn't do the commandos any favors when he delivered his last big military speech at the base in Tampa where they're headquartered. Obama's visit Tuesday to MacDill Air Force Base, home of U.S. Special Operations Command, or SOCOM, was in many ways an endorsement of its mission to combat terrorism. For all Obama's wariness about using conventional military power, he has embraced the role of "covert commander in chief," most notably in the 2011 raid that killed Osama bin Laden. Obama's Tampa trip came as the Pentagon and CIA were buzzing about what critics claimed was a power grab by the Joint Special Operations Command, the super-secret group that manages most military counterterrorism strikes. The flap centered on a Nov. 25 Post article that said JSOC had received "expanded power to track, plan and potentially launch attacks on terrorist cells around the globe." Military officials deny that there's any formal expansion of authority for JSOC or its parent organization, SOCOM. But the clandestine military unit has indeed become Obama's preferred instrument for killing terrorists, filling a role once played mainly by the CIA's Counterterrorism Center. The Trump administration will doubtless make its own judgments about the respective missions.

20. Obama blames U.S. intelligence for missing rise of the Islamic State

Washington Times, Dave Boyer, 2016 12 09

Washington - As President Obama prepares to leave office without having destroyed the Islamic State, he's selling the notion that U.S. intelligence agencies failed to warn him promptly about the rise of the terrorist group more than two years ago, an assertion raising howls of incredulity in some quarters. The White House pushed that version of events Thursday, pointing to an assessment by Director of National Intelligence James R. Clapper in September 2014 that U.S. intelligence agencies "underestimated" the Islamic State, also known by the acronyms ISIL and ISIS. "Those are the facts," said White House press secretary Josh Earnest. Mr. Obama told CNN in an interview that aired late Wednesday, "The ability of ISIL to not just mass inside of Syria, but then to initiate major land offensives that took Mosul [in Iraq], for example, that was not on my intelligence radar screen." But some critics are pointing to claims that the administration ignored warning signs from intelligence sources and allies such as Kurdish leaders about the Islamic State's growing strength after 2011, when Mr. Obama withdrew all U.S. troops from Iraq.

21. Senators prepare probe of Russia

Washington Post, Karoun Demirjian, 2016 12 09

Washington - Leading Senate Republicans are preparing to launch a coordinated and wide-ranging probe into Russia's alleged meddling in the U.S. elections and its potential cyberthreats to the military, digging deep into what they view as corrosive interference in the nation's institutions. Such an aggressive approach puts them on a direct collision course with President-elect Donald Trump, who plays down the possibility that Russia had any role in the November elections - arguing that a hack of Democratic National Committee emails may have been perpetrated by "some guy in his home in New Jersey." The fracture could become more pronounced after Trump is inaugurated and begins setting foreign policy. He already has indicated the country should "get along" with Russia since the two nations have many common strategic goals. But some of Trump's would-be Republican allies on Capitol Hill disagree. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, is readying a probe of possible Russian cyber-incursions into U.S. weapons systems. McCain said he has been discussing the issue with Select Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Burr (R-N.C.), with whom he will be "working closely" to investigate Russia's suspected interference in the U.S. elections and its alleged cyberthreats to the military and other institutions. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has been apprised of the discussions. Burr did not respond to requests for comment. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) also said he intends to hold hearings next year into alleged Russian hacking. Corker is on Trump's short list for secretary of state, according to the Trump transition team.

22. Sorry, Mad Dog, Waterboarding Works

Wall Street Journal, James E. Mitchell, 2016 12 09

Op-ed - While meeting with the New York Times last month, President-elect Donald Trump was asked about waterboarding. He explained that Gen. James Mattis, his choice for Defense secretary, said he "never found it to be useful." The general reportedly advised, "Give me a pack of cigarettes and a couple of beers and I do better with that." At the risk of making a man nicknamed Mad Dog mad, I have to respectfully disagree. Gen. Mattis, a retired Marine four-star, is by all accounts a gentleman, a scholar, and a hell of a warfighter. I have the greatest respect for him, and the full nuance of his views might have been lost in the retelling. But on the subject of questioning terrorists, I have some practical experience. In 2002 I was contracted by the Central Intelligence Agency to help put together what became its enhanced-interrogation program. I spent much of the following six years at "black sites" around the world, trying to extract lifesaving information from some of the worst people on the planet. It is understandable that Gen. Mattis would say he never found waterboarding useful, because no one in the military has been authorized to waterboard a detainee. Thousands of U.S. military personnel have been waterboarded as part of their training, though the services eventually abandoned the practice after finding it too effective in getting even the most hardened warrior to reveal critical information. During the war on terror, the CIA alone had been authorized to use the technique. I personally waterboarded the only three terrorists subjected to the tactic by the CIA. I also waterboarded two U.S. government lawyers, at their request, when they were trying to decide for themselves whether the practice was "torture." They determined it was not. I am not advocating that Mr. Trump "bring back a hell of a lot worse than waterboarding," as he suggested during the campaign. But the president-elect needs to think through what to do when the U.S. captures a major terrorist who likely has information about an impending nuclear, chemical or biological attack. Is he prepared to say that if intelligence cannot be elicited using only the tactics contained in the Army Field Manual -- as President Obama has directed -- we will simply have to live with the consequences? Note: Mr. Mitchell, a retired Air Force officer and former CIA contractor, is the author of "Enhanced Interrogation: Inside the Minds and Motives of the Islamic Terrorists Trying to Destroy America," out last month from Crown Forum.

23. The CIA, Post-Obama

Weekly Standard, Reuel Marc Gerecht, 2016 12 09

Column - When the new casts out the old, an incoming administration has the opportunity to review its predecessor's approach to the Central Intelligence Agency. When this is done, the focus is usually on the ethics of Langley and politically disturbing covert action. The Obama administration was prototypical in this regard: In conjunction with Democrats on the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, the president went after the most controversial parts of his predecessor's war on al Qaeda. He accused George W. Bush of condoning torture and the CIA of devising the means required. The Senate committee staff released a scathing review of Langley's post-9/11 detention and enhanced interrogation program (while largely ignoring the question of whether senior Democrats in Congress had known of and approved the unconventional methods). Democrats also went after the Bush administration's use of rendition. Its application under Bill Clinton, who started transferring real or suspected Islamic terrorists into harsh allied hands, and Barack Obama received much less attention. News stories about the unpleasant practice under Democrats were inevitably thin, revealing the political preferences of the leakers. Some Democratic officials even suggested that the CIA under Clinton and Obama had exercised a virtuous version of rendition: Agency operatives overseas ensured that air-lifted radicals weren't abused in countries where street thieves, let alone jihadists, are routinely beaten. Obama and like-minded Democrats wanted to shame the CIA publicly, to ensure its personnel would never again use severe methods. They will undoubtedly prove successful--unless another Islamic terrorist attack inside the United States results in the slaughter of thousands. If this were to occur, anger, patriotism, and a bipartisan desire to protect one's own could well see CIA officers again on the cutting edge, doing things that most of Washington today would prefer take place, with deniability, out of sight in Egypt or Jordan. Unless Donald Trump is serious about pushing the CIA back into enhanced interrogation--and the odds are high that the incoming director, Republican congressman Mike Pompeo, will just do what his predecessor and the Pentagon did when confronted with the interrogation/incarceration/trial conundrum as regards Islamic terrorists (kill them with drones or put them into foreign prisons)--Pompeo will not have to deal with the agonizing morality play that Obama's CIA director John Brennan has faced since he moved into Langley in 2013.

24. Trump gets one presidential intelligence briefing a week -sources

Reuters, Mark Hosenball, 2016 12 09

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump is receiving an average of one presidential intelligence briefing a week, according to U.S. officials familiar with the matter, far fewer than most of his recent predecessors. Although they are not required to, presidents-elect have in the past generally welcomed the opportunity to receive the President's Daily Brief (PDB), the most highly classified and closely held document in the government, on a regular basis. It was not immediately clear why Trump has decided not to receive the intelligence briefings available to President Barack Obama more frequently, or whether that has made any difference in his presidential preparations. Trump's spokespeople did not immediately respond to requests for comment. Trump has asked for at least one briefing, and possibly more, from intelligence agencies on specific subjects, one of the officials said. The source declined to identify what subjects interested the president-elect, but said that so far they have not included Russia or Iran. Indiana Governor Mike Pence, Trump's vice president-elect, has been receiving his own PDB at least six days a week, the sources familiar with the matter said.

25. U.S.: ISIS fighters killed in Iraq, Syria reaches 50,000

CBS News, Staff report, 2016 12 09

Washington - A senior U.S. military official for the first time says the U.S.-led coalition has killed 50,000 militants with the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, or ISIS, in the last two years in Iraq and Syria. The official said it was a conservative estimate, but it's a bit more than what others have stated before. U.S. leaders have expressed reluctance to disclose specific numbers, and note that ISIS has been able to replace fighters rapidly, particularly early on. In August, Lt. Gen. Sean MacFarland said about 45,000 combatants have been taken off the battlefields. The official said the U.S. was concerned about ISIS fighters going into hiding, CBS Radio News correspondent Cami McCormick reports.

26. What Obama doesn't get about terror

Los Angeles Times, Bryan Dean Wright, 2016 12 09

Op-ed - President Obama on Tuesday delivered his final defense of the nation's counter-terrorism strategy. He rightfully claimed progress on a number of fronts, including the death of Osama bin Laden, an end to waterboarding and the effective use of drones to kill terrorists. Just one week after the Islamic State-inspired attack in Columbus, Ohio, he also reiterated that there is no "war between the United States and Islam." Islamic State and Al Qaeda, he said, do not speak for Muslims everywhere. To me and many of my former colleagues at the Central Intelligence Agency, such pronouncements reflect Obama's greatest blind spot in his fight against terrorism: he has been unwilling to acknowledge that Islamic ideology plays a role in what motivates terrorists to strike. Meanwhile, men like Imam Bujar Hysa, a jailed cleric in Albania, frame the war on terrorism quite succinctly: "Islam can coexist with other religions, but with democracy? No!" Hysa isn't an anomaly. He is a Salafist Muslim -- a sect also called Wahhabi -- who follows an ultraconservative set of beliefs propagated by Saudi Arabia and other Sunni Arab nations. Wahhabis do not believe in a separation of church (mosque) and state. For them, government should be made up of religious clerics -- and only clerics -- that use the Koran to justify their decisions. President-elect Donald Trump's chosen national security advisor, Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, has tried explaining this -- albeit in impolite terms -- by saying that "Islam is a political ideology based on a religion." Flynn's poorly worded warning stems from experience, and he knows what happens when religious leaders take over governments. Women face widespread discrimination. Gay people are imprisoned or killed. Dancing, music and other forms of art are banned. And those who criticize Islam or convert to Christianity face prison or death. However, what causes the most alarm to national security experts is the Wahhabi objective of global conquest. Note: Bryan Dean Wright is a former CIA ops officer and member of the Democratic Party.

27. Allies defend Boris Johnson after No 10 disowns Saudi remarks

The Guardian (London), Multiple reporters, 2016 12 09

London - Boris Johnson's allies have spoken up to defend the under-pressure foreign secretary, saying he was right to accuse Saudi Arabia of waging "proxy wars" in the Middle East, despite Downing Street disowning the remarks. Several Conservative MPs defended Johnson as he prepares to visit Saudi Arabia and Bahrain this weekend, saying Theresa May should not have been so quick to slap down the gaffe-prone minister. Andrew Mitchell, the former international development secretary, said: "The reality is that Britain has a complicated relationship with Saudi Arabia and our economic and political interests do not always coincide. In many ways, Saudi is an important ally but we have a duty as their candid friend to warn them about areas of difficulty." May's spokeswoman said the foreign secretary was setting out his own views on Saudi Arabia and Iran, but would be sticking to the government's line when he visited Saudi ministers this weekend.

28. Extensive British Spying Throughout Africa Revealed in Le Monde

Washington - Top-secret British surveillance operations targeted the director of the World Trade Organization, several multinational corporations, a top French businessman, and heads of state across Africa, according to a new series of reports by Le Monde. On Tuesday, the French newspaper began publishing the revelations, which include a wide range of previously undisclosed details about British covert activities across the world. The reports were produced in partnership with The Intercept and are based on documents provided by the National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden. The series of stories focuses largely on the controversial work of the U.K.'s electronic surveillance agency Government Communications Headquarters, or GCHQ. According to Le Monde, in March 2009, the British agency spied on Pascal Lamy, then the head of the World Trade Organization and member of the French socialist party. Between 2008 and 2009, it also targeted Octave Klaba, the founder of the French company OVH, one of Europe's largest internet hosting companies; Emmanuel Glimet, a French trade and economy official; phone lines at the French ministry of foreign affairs; and several multinational French corporations, including the energy company Areva, oil giant Total, and the defense conglomerate Thalès. Beyond France, the disclosures highlight the U.K.'s extensive spying operations across Africa. In 20 countries across the continent, GCHQ monitored current and former heads of state, prime ministers, diplomats, military and intelligence chiefs, as well as leading figures in the business and finance industry, Le Monde reports. Among those who were subject to the surveillance, which involved intercepting communications as they were being beamed between satellites, was a close British ally -- Kenyan President Mwai Kibaki and his strategic advisers. Other targets included Nigeria's President Umaru Yar'Adua and his private secretary; Ghana's President John Kufuor; Sierra Leone's leader Ernest Koroma; and the presidential palace in Luanda, Angola. Prominent business figures were also monitored, such as Nigerian billionaire Tony Elumelu, regarded as one of Africa's richest and most influential men, and Chris Kirubi, a wealthy Kenyan businessman and radio-station owner who was described by Forbes in 2011 as the country's "most flamboyant tycoon."

29. Hostile states pose 'fundamental threat' to Europe, says MI6 chief

The Guardian (London), Ewen MacAskill, 2016 12 08

London - The head of the British intelligence agency MI6, Alex Younger, has said cyber-attacks, propaganda and subversion from hostile states pose a "fundamental threat" to European democracies, including the UK. In a rare speech by an MI6 chief while in office, Younger did not specifically name Russia but left no doubt that this was the target of his remarks. Russia has been accused of interfering in the US presidential election and there are concerns it could do the same in French and German elections next year. He described the internet as having turned the work of the intelligence services on its head and said it represented "an existential threat" as well as an opportunity. He said hybrid warfare - which Russia has employed in Ukraine, though he again did not mention Russia - was a dangerous phenomenon. "The connectivity that is at the heart of globalisation can be exploited by states with hostile intent to further their aims deniably," he said. Younger declined to provide details of how Britain was responding to such threats, citing operational reasons, but it is known the UK government does not see a need to respond to Russia in a symmetrical way, such as launching a counter-cyber-attack. Instead it could launch a series of counter-measures such as sanctions. He played down the impact of Brexit and the Trump election win. "I'm often asked what effect the big political changes of 2016, Brexit and the US election result, will have on these relationships. My answer is that I will aim for, and expect, continuity."

30. Islamic State is planning attacks on Britain, MI6 chief warns

London Times, Deborah Haynes, 2016 12 08

London - A highly organised Islamic State cell in Syria is actively planning attacks against Britain and its allies, the head of MI6 warned today. Alex Younger, in an unprecedented speech within MI6 headquarters in London, indicated that his agency has infiltrated the terrorist group. These MI6 agents, who risk death if caught, have helped MI5 and the police to identify and stop threats to the UK and elsewhere, he said. A total of 12 terrorist plots in the UK alone have been disrupted since June 2013. The spy chief said that the scale of the threat from terrorism is unprecedented but he also warned about the "increasingly dangerous phenomenon" of hybrid warfare, such as cyber attacks and propaganda operations by hostile countries such as Russia. "The risks at stake are profound and represent a fundamental threat to our sovereignty," Mr Younger said. "They should be a concern to all those who share democratic values."

32. Les millions de clés de chiffrement volées de Gemalto

Le Monde, Damien Leloup, 2016 12 09

Londres - Ce ciblage massif et systématique de techniciens et d'employés figurant à des échelons intermédiaires de la hiérarchie d'opérateurs techniques a déjà prouvé son utilité, par le passé, pour le GCHQ. En février 2015, The Intercept révélait, sur la base de documents Snowden, que c'est par ce biais que les services britanniques étaient parvenus à voler des millions de clés de chiffrement de cartes SIM à l'entreprise franco-néerlandaise Gemalto. Peu connue du grand public, Gemalto est l'un des principaux fabricants mondiaux de puces sécurisées : ses produits équipent passeports électroniques, cartes de paiement, ou encore téléphones portables. C'est notamment ce dernier point qui intéressait le GCHQ: une fois les clés de chiffrement des cartes SIM en sa possession, l'agence pouvait aisément mettre sur écoute des lignes téléphoniques dans un certain nombre de pays. L'agence s'est donc penchée sur toute une série de salariés de l'entreprise, dont les noms ou adresses mail ont été ajoutés à sa base de données de cibles potentielles. Plusieurs responsables techniques ou commerciaux ont ainsi été surveillés électroniquement - un document interne du GCHQ évoque ainsi comme cible prioritaire un employé de l'entreprise qui communique occasionnellement par courriels chiffrés : «Nous avons vu qu'il envoyait des fichiers chiffrés grâce à XKey score [le principal outil de surveillance de la NSA et du GCHQ]. Si nous nous intéressons de nouveau à ce dossier, c'est probablement un très bon endroit par où commencer. »

33. Les techniciens télécoms, cibles de choix

Le Monde, Damien Leloup, et Martin Untersinger, 2016 12 09

Londres - La surveillance des employés permet d'accéder au réseau interne des opérateurs téléphoniques Parmi les cibles du -Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), l'agence de -renseignement technique britannique, ils côtoient trafiquants d'armes, leaders politiques du Moyen- Orient et chefs de groupuscules terroristes. Leur tort? Travailler pour un opérateur de téléphonie. Plusieurs documents extraits par Le Monde, en collaboration avec le site The Intercept, des archives de l'ex-consultant de l'Agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) américaine, Edward Snowden, confiées à Glenn Greenwald et Laura Poitras, prouvent en effet que les employés des télécoms constituent une part significative des cibles du GCHQ. Ils permettent aussi d'éclairer d'un jour nouveau les -piratages de Belgacom et de -Gemalto, deux opérations d'ampleur menées notamment par les services britanniques et révélées ces trois dernières années. Le Monde a pu éplucher des -dizaines de documents internes de l'agence britannique de renseignement, des comptes rendus de tests sur des liaisons par satellite acheminant trafic Internet et téléphonique. Les employés d'opérateurs téléphoniques, à tous les niveaux de la hiérarchie, apparaissent très fréquemment dans les cibles du GCHQ. Deux pièces, datées du printemps 2009, relatent même les efforts de l'agence pour intercepter les communications internes de deux opérateurs très présents au Moyen-Orient et en Afrique. Un document du 10 juin 2009, intitulé " Réseau intranet Zain ", décrit les tests menés par le GCHQ sur un flux satellitaire -faisant transiter des communications internes à l'opérateur -téléphonique Zain. Basé au Koweït, il est présent dans huit pays, essentiellement au Moyen-Orient. En 2010, Zain a vendu ses activités dans ces pays à l'indien Bharti Airtel, troisième opérateur mobile mondial. Mais, à l'époque des documents, il est très présent en Afrique et opère encore dans quinze pays, du Burkina Faso au Niger en passant par l'Ouganda et le Tchad.

Londres - Une vingtaine de pays africains ont été espionnés par les satellites du GCHQ, les services secrets britanniques, au moins entre 2008 et 2011. L'identité des cibles figure parmi des listes de milliers d'interceptions, au premier rang desquelles apparaissent les chefs d'Etats et les premiers ministres. Le GCHQ intercepte les échanges du président kényan Mwai Kibaki et de ses conseillers les plus stratégiques, mais aussi de son premier ministre, Raila Odinga, en mars 2009. Il en va de même de l'Angola, premier producteur de pétrole d'Afrique, dirigé depuis 1979 par le président José Eduardo Dos Santos - le palais présidentiel a été ciblé. Les autorités de Kinshasa sont également étroitement surveillées. Joseph Kabila, à la tête de la République démocratique du Congo, intrigue les Britanniques, qui visent toutes ses communications et celles de ses conseillers. Le GCHQ a aussi mené des interceptions massives au Nigeria, où il suit les conversations du président Umaru Yar'Adua et de ses proches. Le chef d'Etat nigérian est mort en mai 2010 - son successeur, Goodluck Jonathan, figure aussi parmi les lignes à intercepter.

ABC News, Jessica Kidd, 2016 12 09

Canberra - A Sydney man accused of arranging to have thousands of dollars sent overseas to help Islamic State (IS) fighters travel to Syria has been found guilty. It took the jury just over a day to find Ali Al- Talebi, 27, guilty of two counts of supplying funds to IS and one charge of knowingly making those funds available to them. It is the first time charges of providing material support for a terrorist group have been tested and successfully prosecuted in an Australian court, since terrorism legislation was introduced in 2003. Al-Talebi and his co-accused, who cannot be named, were both charged with making $6,000 available to IS. The pair used a third man, who also cannot be identified, to send two separate transfers of $3,000 overseas in 2014. The money was going to be sent to Pakistan where police said it would be used to help at least three people travel to Syria.

37. Terrorists wear jail time like 'badges of honour'

The Australian, 2016 12 09

Canberra - Terrorists are wearing their jail sentences like "a badge of honour" and are not being deterred by long sentences, according to former NSW Supreme Court justice Anthony Whealy. Mr Whealy QC yesterday said he did not think imprisonment worked as deterrent for the sort of "religious fixation and idealism" the courts were seeing such as the teenager who was sentenced in Melbourne on Wednesday for a planned homemade bomb attack. "Fellows who have been sentenced to jail both here in NSW and Victoria, they wear their imprisonment like a badge of honour," he told radio 3AW. "They're doing it for Allah so you're not going to deter them by putting them in jail at all." He also said sentences in Victoria for terrorism offences were generally lighter than in NSW. "It's just a prevailing attitude reached by different views in our Court of Appeal and the Court of Appeal in Victoria," he said. "You need to have standard sentencing for federal offences -- it shouldn't matter which state you're caught in." The head of the Australian Graduate School of Policing and Security Terrorism, Nick O'Brien, agreed that some terrorists were not deterred by imprisonment.

Sydney - Deux jeunes gens qui avaient projeté au nom de l'organisation Etat islamique un attentat à la bombe contre un lieu de prière chiite à Sydney et de "trancher des têtes" au hasard ont été condamnés vendredi à des peines de 20 ans de réclusion criminelle. Omar Al-Kutobi, 25 ans et Mohammed Kiad, 27 ans, avaient été arrêtés en 2015 dans un appartement qu'ils partageaient à Sydney. La police avait retrouvé une machette, des explosifs artisanaux, un couteau de chasse, une vidéo et un drapeau noir de l'EI. La vidéo montrait Al-Kutobi, né en Irak et naturalisé australien en 2013, en train de brandir un couteau et de proférer des menaces. La police avait également retrouvé deux mots, a expliqué le juge Peter Garling devant la Cour suprême: "nous sommes les soldats de l'EI, nous sommes là pour vous trancher la tête", pouvait-on lire sur l'un d'eux. Peu avant leur arrestation, les deux condamnés, des sunnites, s'étaient rendus dans un lieu de prière chiite dans l'intention de faire exploser une bombe. Mais ils avaient été surpris par un homme et mis en fuite, et avaient décidé de s'en prendre aux gens au hasard. Un informateur avait mis la police sur la piste des deux hommes, qui étaient surveillés depuis des semaines.

"We have consistently expressed our concerns to the highest levels of Government of Pakistan about their continued tolerance for Afghan Taliban groups such as the Haqqani Network operating from Pakistan soil," State Department Deputy spokesperson Mark Toner said about the meeting. "We continue to encourage the Government of Pakistan and Afghanistan, rather -- both governments to cooperate in their counter-terrorism operations and efforts because that's only going to contribute to regional stability." The talks came days after India and Afghanistan slammed Islamabad for its support to extremist outfits at the Heart of Asia Conference in India's northern city of Amritsar.

40. Pak-Afghan region has highest concentration of terrorists: US

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 12 09

Washington - The Pak-Afghan region has the highest concentration of terrorist groups in the world, warns Gen John W. Nicholson, the commander of US and Nato forces in Afghanistan. In an annual assessment of US military operations in Afghanistan this year, the general also took credit for rescuing former prime minister Yousuf Raza Gilani's son from a militant hideout in Afghanistan earlier this year and for killing the perpetrator of the Dec 16, 2014 terrorist attack on the Army Public School in Peshawar. At a recent news briefing at the Pentagon, Gen Nicholson said that there were 98 US-designated terrorist groups around the world and 20 of them were in the Pak-Afghan region. "This represents the highest concentration of terrorist groups anywhere in the world," he added. Thirteen of these 20 groups were based in Afghanistan and seven in Pakistan. Gen Nicholson said that the groups operating in this region often "mix and converge", which made them even more dangerous.

41. Taliban would never succeed: Gen. Nicholson

Pajhwok Afghan News, Danish Karokhel, 2016 12 09

Brussels - US and NATO forces' top commander in Afghanistan Gen. John Nicholson on Thursday said the western military alliance's commitments sent a clear message to the enemies that they would never succeed in the war-torn country. Speaking at a press conference after a two-day foreign ministerial meeting of NATO countries in Brussels, the Belgian capital, Gen. Nicholson said the Taliban were destroying Afghanistan while the Afghan forces and government were rebuilding the country. Foreign ministers from NATO member states and allies and Afghan Foreign Minister Salahuddin Rabbani attended the conference on Tuesday and Wednesday and reviewed the security situation in Afghanistan and solidified pledges made at the Warsaw Summit in Poland in July. The US general NATO and its allies pledged long-term military, political and financial support to Afghanistan in the Brussels Conference.

42. Brahim Ghali : l'homme le plus recherché d'Espagne et bientôt à l'échelle internationale

La Relève (Maroc), Farid Mnebhi, 2016 12 08

Madrid - Brahim Ghali : l'homme le plus recherché d'Espagne et bientôt à l'échelle internationale, Algérie exceptée Un mandat d'arrêt international devrait être bientôt émis à l'encontre de Brahim Ghali par la justice espagnole, l'obligeant à se terrer chez sa marraine, l'Algérie. Un sinistre individu vient d'être rattrapé par ses activités sanguinaires passées, à savoir terrorisme, génocide, crimes, séquestrations, enlèvements et tortures. Cet homme n'est autre que Brahim Ghali, président de la pseudo RASD sur lequel pèsent toutes ces lourdes charges et qui vient d'être convoqué par le juge José de la Mata, président de la 5ème Cour Centrale d'Instruction de Madrid pour répondre de ses horribles actes devant la justice espagnole. Cette convocation fait suite à une plainte déposée par l'Association Sahraouie pour la Défense des Droits de l'Homme (ASADEH) à son encontre ainsi que 28 autres dont des officiers algériens pour des faits perpétrés entre 1974 et 1988 dans les camps des sahraouis marocains séquestrés de Tindouf.

43. ISIS Remains Threat in Libya Despite Defeat in Surt, U.S. Officials Say

New York Times, Eric Schmitt, 2016 12 09

Washington - The Islamic State, though driven from its coastal stronghold in Surt this week, still has several hundred fighters who have dispersed across Libya and pose a threat to the country, its neighbors and, potentially, Europe, according to American officials and the Pentagon's Africa Command. The government's top counterterrorism official, Nicholas J. Rasmussen, said the Islamic State's defeat in Surt had dealt a major setback to the militancy's ambitions to expand its caliphate in North Africa. But he said he remained "very concerned" about the ability of surviving fighters to exploit the country's economic and political vacuum. "The concern we have about external attacks from Syria and Iraq extends to Libya if ISIL is able to maintain a stable foothold there," Mr. Rasmussen, the director of the National Counterterrorism Center, told a security conference here on Wednesday. The Islamic State is also known as ISIL or ISIS. That assessment, which echoed other recent warnings from senior American officials, underscores the resilience of what had been considered a potent Islamic State affiliate outside the group's main territory in Syria and Iraq.

44. Six police officers killed by Cairo bomb blast

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 09

Cairo - Six policemen were killed and three injured on Friday when a bomb exploded at a security checkpoint in Cairo, security sources said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack in Al Haram street leading to the Pyramids, in which four civilians were also hurt. The policemen were either in or close to their car when the device went off in or near a garbage can, the sources said. The attack, close to a government building in a middle class neighborhood of Cairo, was the latest in a series of security incidents in Egypt often claimed by radical Islamists.

45. Año tells men to focus efforts on threat groups

Philippine Star, Jaime Laude, 2016 12 09

Manila - Newly installed Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) chief Lt. Gen. Eduardo Año yesterday directed all field military commanders to remain focused on their respective operations against known threat groups operating in the country. "We will do our best. But I will not set a deadline," Año said in a command guidance issued yesterday. Going along with Año's directive was his promise of all-out support of the top military leadership to field units for them to be able to accomplish their assigned missions against the homegrown extremist Maute group, the Bangsamoro Islamic Freedom Fighters (BIFF) and the Abu Sayyaf. Año's predecessor, retired general Ricardo Visaya, had set a deadline to crush the Abu Sayyaf and the BIFF during his term as AFP chief. The military has been running after the Abu Sayyaf in Sulu and Basilan provinces and the BIFF in Central Mindanao.

46. Anti-graft net recovers assets, too (Canada)

China Daily, Zhang Yan and Cao Yin, 2016 12 09

Beijing - While China is seeing an increasing number of fugitives suspected of corruption being returned from overseas, thanks to international cooperation, the country is also beefing up efforts to recover their ill-gotten assets. Between January 2014 and November this year, 2,442 Chinese fugitives suspected of economic crimes, including 397 officials, were brought back from more than 70 countries and regions, according to the Communist Party of China's Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, the country's top anti-graft watchdog. In the same period, 8.54 billion yuan ($1.24 billion) in illegal assets was recovered, according to the CCDI. "Getting these illicit assets is just as important as bringing the fugitives back," Liu Jianchao, director of the CCDI's

International Cooperation Bureau, said in an interview ahead of this year's International Anti-Corruption Day, which falls on Friday. "Hunting the fugitives is to make them face judicial punishment. Recovering the money is to stop them from enjoying the dividend of escape and to minimize the loss to the country and the people," Liu said. He acknowledged that China faces some challenges in recovering the illicit assets, such as the lack of a clear understanding of outflow channels and insufficient international agreements for such recovery. He said that China will enhance intelligence sharing with other countries and try to offer them as much evidence as possible, including the channels of outflow for and whereabouts of the assets, in requesting judicial assistance and to help investigators. So far, China has signed bilateral agreements with financial institutions in 42 countries and regions, including the United States, Australia and New Zealand, on the exchange of financial information, according to People's Bank of China, the central bank. China also intends to begin negotiations with more Western countries, such as the US and France, for bilateral treaties on sharing the assets that corrupt Chinese fugitives have sent overseas, according to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In October, China signed the first such treaty with Canada.

47. Beijing puts out peace feeler to US on cybersecurity

South China Morning Post, Nectar Gan, 2016 12 09

Beijing - The nation's top security official told Washington yesterday that Beijing was ready to work with the administration of president-elect Donald Trump on cybersecurity, a thorny issue in Sino-US ties, state media reported. The olive branch was extended in Washington by Public Security Minister Guo Shengkun as he met US officials for a third round of cybercrime talks, a dialogue set up by Xi Jinping and US President Barack Obama in September of last year. Beijing and Washington have been squabbling over cybersecurity for years, with each side accusing the other of hacking and stealing trade secrets. Beijing suspended the two nations' only cybersecurity working group in 2014 after Washington indicted five PLA officers on theft of trade secrets. It is still unclear whether Trump will raise concerns over cybersecurity with China once he assumes office. Trump wrote on Twitter four years ago that "the Chinese are now hacking White House computers. Why not? They already own the place". In a debate with Hillary Clinton on the campaign trail, Trump dismissed her claims of Russian hacking, saying: "She's saying Russia, Russia, Russia. Maybe it was. It could be Russia but it could be China ... it could be somebody that sits on their bed that weighs 400 pounds." Guo said cybersecurity cooperation had become "a new highlight in bilateral relations" between the US and China since Xi and Obama created a mechanism for the two nations to discuss cybercrimes.

48. China captures 2,442 fugitives from abroad since 2014 (Canada)

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 09

Beijing - China's anti-corruption watchdog revealed that since 2014, 2,442 people have been captured in the country's campaign to return fugitives who have fled overseas. According to an article posted Friday by the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) on its website, 2,442 people, including 397 state officials, were captured or returned from over 70 countries or regions and more than 8.5 billion yuan (1.2 billion U.S. dollars) of illegal assets have been recovered. The article said that in the first 11 months this year, the "Sky Net" campaign alone has accounted for 908 returnees and recovered 2.3 billion yuan in illegal assets. A total of 19 people named as China's top 100 fugitives released in an Interpol "red notice" have returned this year, bringing the total number of the people on the list who have returned so far to 37. Last month, China's most wanted graft fugitive Yang Xiuzhu, who has been on the run for 13 years, finally returned to China and turned herself in to authorities. Friday is the 13th International Anti-Corruption Day, which was designated by the United Nations General Assembly. Liu Jianchao, CCDI international cooperation bureau director, was quoted in the article as saying that China is making waves in international anti-corruption cooperation. He went on to say that China's ideas, measures and practices in fighting corruption are gradually being understood and accepted by the international community. According to the article, anti-corruption and law enforcement cooperations with other countries such as the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand have also yielded positive results.

49. Chinese 'spy ship' deserts MH370

The Age, Ean Higgins, 2016 12 09

Canberra - The Chinese ship assigned to search for Malaysia Airlines Flight MH370 has sailed for home, months before completing the hunt and soon after being exposed by security experts as probably spying on the side. The Australian Transport Safety Bureau yesterday said the Dong Hai Jiu 101 had this week stopped looking for MH370 in the southern Indian Ocean and would return to Shanghai after dropping off an underwater search robot in Fremantle. "The search vessel ... departed the search area on 3 December ... and has completed its missions in the search for MH370," the ATSB said in a weekly bulletin. The announcement leaves only one ship, operated by the Dutch Fugro group on contract to the ATSB, still scouring the seabed for the Boeing 777 that disappeared with 239 people on board on March 8, 2014, on a scheduled flight from Kuala Lumpur to Beijing. The search in the target 120,000sqkm zone has had lengthy delays because of bad weather, and is not due to end until next month or February.

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 09

Washington - Chinese State Councilor and Minister of Public Security Guo Shengkun on Thursday met separately with U.S. National Security Advisor Susan Rice and FBI Director James Comey. During his meeting with Rice, Guo said Sino-U.S. relations are at a crucial juncture and that it is in the interests of both countries for bilateral ties to transit steadily and continue to develop. Guo said the China-U.S. high-level dialogue on cybercrime and related issues, which was held Wednesday in Washington for the third time, has played an important role in promoting mutual trust, dissolving difference and accomplishing win-win cooperation between the two countries. Guo said the Chinese government is willing to work with the U.S.

government to push forward cooperation in cybersecurity. For her part, Rice said U.S.-China relations are the most important relationship in the world. She expressed the hope that the two sides could work together to deepen pragmatic cooperation and carry forward bilateral ties. During his meeting with Comey, Guo said that terrorism and cybercrime pose a threat to both countries. He expressed the hope that the two countries could build on cooperation in specific cases and work for cooperation in investigation, intelligence sharing and capacity building while bearing in mind each other's interests, so as to protect the common interests of the two countries and peoples.

51. N. Korea denies involvement in cyberattack on S.Korean military

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 09

Seoul - North Korea on Friday denied its involvement in a hacking attack against South Korea's military, saying Seoul is pulling off "a childish plot" to divert public attention from its political crisis. South Korea accused North Korea this week of being behind the first infiltration of the intranet of its cyberwarfare command in August, noting that the Internet Protocol address linked to the attack was traced to a location in China that was previously used by North Korean hackers. North Korea's main propaganda website, Uriminzokkiri, rebuffed the claim, saying hackers never make the mistake of exposing their IP addresses or methods, which could risk revealing their identities. "If we are behind the hacking, why do we use the IP address that the South takes issue with," Uriminzokkiri said in a report. "This a total nonsense." It claimed South Korea is trying to provoke a confrontation with the North in a desperate attempt to survive the current political conundrum. The National Assembly is set to vote on an impeachment motion against President Park Geun-hye over a corruption scandal on Friday afternoon. North Korea is known to have thousands of cyberwarfare personnel. It has a track record of waging cyberattacks on South Korea and the U.S. in recent years, though it has denied involvement.

52. Park says will accept impeachment vote 'with heavy heart'

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 12 09

Seoul - President Park Geun-hye said Friday she would accept parliamentary impeachment with a "heavy heart," but snubbed the opposition parties' request to resign immediately. She called a Cabinet meeting at around 5 p.m., less than an hour after the National Assembly voted 234-52 in favor of her impeachment. "I'm truly sorry that I have sparked such nationwide confusion, particularly when the country's national security and economy are in trouble. ... From now on, I will calmly response to the Constitutional Court's impeachment trial and the independent counsel's investigation (into the Choi Soon-sil scandal) in accordance to the procedures outlined by the law," she said. All of Park's authorities as a president were suspended at 7:03 p.m. Friday, upon the Constitutional Court accepting the Assembly's motion to dismiss the president. The court will now deliberate the case to determine where Park's alleged actions constitute impeachable offenses, a process that can take up to 180 days. "I hope that each minister -- with the prime minister and acting president (Hwang Kyo-ahn) playing the central role -- will do their best to minimize any government vacuum, including in the economic and security fields," Park said at the Cabinet meeting.

53. South Korean president is impeached in stunning fall

Associated Press, Staff reporters, 2016 12 09

Seoul - South Korean lawmakers on Friday impeached President Park Geun-hye, a stunning and swift fall for the country's first female leader amid protests that drew millions into the streets in united fury. After the vote, parliamentary officials hand-delivered formal documents to the presidential Blue House that stripped Park of her power and allowed her No. 2, Prime Minister Hwang Kyo-ahn, to assume leadership until the country's Constitutional Court rules on whether Park must permanently step down. The court has up to six months to decide. "I'd like to say that I'm deeply sorry to the people because the nation has to experience this turmoil because of my negligence and lack of virtue at a time when our security and economy both face difficulties," Park said at a Cabinet meeting after the vote. Once called the "Queen of Elections" for her ability to pull off wins for her party, Park has been surrounded in the Blue House in recent weeks by millions of South Koreans who have taken to the streets in protest. They are furious over what prosecutors say was collusion by Park with a longtime friend to extort money from companies and to give that confidante extraordinary sway over government decisions. Organizers said about 10,000 people gathered in front of the National Assembly to demand that lawmakers pass the impeachment motion. Some had spent the night on the streets after traveling from other cities. Scuffles broke out between angry anti-Park farmers, some of whom had driven tractors to the assembly from their farms, and police. When impeachment happened, many of those gathered raised their hands in the air and leapt about, cheering and laughing.

54. Third China-U.S. cybersecurity ministerial dialogue yields positive outcomes

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 09

Washington - The third China-U.S. ministerial dialogue on fighting cyber crimes and other related affairs issued Thursday a list of positive fruits as the two sides worked hard to strengthen cooperation in cybersecurity. The dialogue was co-chaired by China's State Councilor and Minister of Public Security Guo Shengkun with U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch and Secretary of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson. During this round of dialogue, both sides endorsed the establishment of the dialogue mechanism as beneficial to bilateral communication and enhanced cooperation, and both regarded further solidifying, developing, and maintaining the dialogue mechanism as beneficial to mutual interests. Both sides recommitted to cooperate on investigating cyber crimes and related matters emanating from China or the United States and to refrain from cyber-enabled theft of intellectual property with the intent of offering competitive advantages to companies or commercial sectors, said the document. China and the United States identified a number of areas for future cooperation on enhancing cybersecurity, including enhancing network hygiene by cleaning and patching malware infections in respective networks, engaging in regular reciprocal sharing of malicious IP addresses, malware samples and other network protection information. The two countries pledged to continue discussion on future cooperation in cybersecurity of critical infrastructure, and to hold as early as possible in 2017 a China-U.S. government and technology company roundtable to discuss cybersecurity issues of mutual concern.

56. Working with Putin's Russia is a dangerous folly - the West should listen to MI6 and the CIA

London Daily Telegraph, Con Coughlin, 2016 12 08

Column - The stark warning issued by Alex Younger, the head of Britain's Secret Intelligence Service (MI6), about the threat states like Russia pose to national security through the use of hostile propaganda and cyber attacks provides an alarming insight into the rapidly changing nature of modern warfare. During the Cold War, defending Europe from the threat posed by the Soviet Union meant maintaining divisions of tanks on the German plain, as well as developing an effective round-the-clock nuclear deterrent that kept the Kremlin on its guard. The one country, moreover, that has proved most adept at using this new form of what is known as hybrid warfare is Vladimir Putin's Russia. For all Moscow's efforts to conceal its meddling, no one in the intelligence community is in any doubt about their mischief-making. With President Elect Donald Trump preparing to become America's 45th president next month, there are growing concerns that he might seek to reach a rapprochement with Mr Putin, whom he praised on several occasions during the presidential campaign. Mr Younger's speech should be seen...as a warning to those, both here and in America, who believe a rapprochement with Mr Putin is possible, when all the evidence strongly suggests to do so would be an act of extreme folly.

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 09

Tehran - Iranian Defense Minister Brigadier General Hossein Dehqan underlined that the recent demand raised by the terrorists and their foreign supporting states for truce in Aleppo is just aimed at reinvigorating the militants and should be rejected. "Terrorists are using people as human shields and the demand for ceasefire is a war trick to reorganize, arm and strengthen the terrorists and not meant for a humanitarian measure," General Dehqan said in a meeting with President of the International Committee of the Red Cross Peter Maurer in Tehran on Wednesday. He said the US describes terrorism in a way that would fit its interests. "Therefore, the real terrorists are not seen as terrorists and they are even supported, while those who defend themselves and fight against the terrorists are called terrorists, and they (the US and its allies) seek to disarm people instead of the terrorists."

Le Figaro, Georges Malbrunot, 2016 12 09

Mossoul - Malgré une forte résistance des djihadistes, les forces irakiennes se sont rapprochées du Tigre, le fleuve qui sépare Mossoul en deux. Les unités d'élite de l'armée irakienne ont repris le quartier d'Ilam dans la partie Est de la « capitale » autoproclamée de Daech. Mais les djihadistes opposent toujours une résistance opiniâtre. C'est le cas notamment autour d'un hôpital transformé en centre de commandement de l'État islamique (EI) que l'armée a brièvement repris, avant de devoir se replier à un kilomètre de l'établissement. Des tireurs embusqués de l'EI s'étaient cachés dans les étages supérieurs et sur le toit du bâtiment de cinq étages surplombant le quartier d'al-Salam. La progression de l'armée irakienne en direction du Tigre est la plus profonde jamais enregistrée dans la partie orientale de Mossoul, depuis le début, le 17 octobre dernier, de la vaste offensive menée par l'armée et la coalition internationale pour reprendre Mossoul, contrôlée par Daech depuis juin 2014.

59. Ankara is More Interested in Counteracting Terrorism Rather Than Assad's Departure

Asharq Al-Awsat, Saeed Abdelrazek, 2016 12 09

Ankara - Ankara reiterated the order of its priorities in Syria, and the Turkish Prime Minister Binali Yildirim said that overthrowing the head of the Syrian regime Bashar Al-Assad is not a priority for it. He added that operation Euphrates Shield in which Turkey supports Free Syrian Army fighters in northern Syria targets "terrorist organisations" and has nothing to do with what is happening in Aleppo. He added that the "nature of the crisis in Syria imposes priorities, the most important of which is to rescue the Syrian people. However, the overthrow of Assad is not a priority". The Turkish Prime Minister, who made an official visit to the Russian capital Moscow, made these comments in an interview with the Russian news agency Sputnik on Wednesday. Turkey considers both of these parties as extensions of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) which it has classified as a terrorist organisation. Turkey also said that both of these parties are carrying out operations against Turkey from Syrian territory.

62. Hezbollah denies it promised Russia no attacks on Israel

Jerusalem Post, Zack Pyzer, 2016 12 09

Jerusalem - Hezbollah said on Friday that there is no truth to reports it assured Russia there would be no military response to the alleged Israeli strikes on its forces in Syria on Wednesday, according to a Hezbollah statement read out on its Al-Manar TV station. The terror organization said the reports were an "invention." "These reports are a total lie and fabrication," the statement read. Despite the strong denials, Hezbollah did not explicitly promise an attack, leaving doubt as to whether one will be forthcoming. The Syrian regime accused Israel of firing surface- to- surface missiles targeting the Mezzeh Air Base near Damascus on Wednesday, causing damage but no casualties. Hezbollah's Al-Maydeen television channel said the group "was almost certain" that the Israel Air Force carried out the strikes from Lebanese airspace. If Hezbollah does strike at Israel, it would not be for the first time since the end of the 2006 Second Lebanon War.

64. Lebanon cannot disassociate itself, Al Assad warns

Gulf News, Joseph A. Kechichian, 2016 12 09

Beirut - Syrian President Bashar Al Assad has lashed out at Lebanon over its disassociation policy approved in 2012, which ensured that Lebanon's political factions did not take sides in Syria's civil war. The policy miraculously managed to save Lebanon from being dragged into the brutal war next door, despite the fact that Hezbollah ignored the policy as it openly fought alongside Al Assad forces in Syria. In an interview with the Damascus daily Al Watan, the Syrian president said, "Lebanon cannot be dissociated from the fires flaring up [in the region] and [cannot] adopt the policy of no politics or what is called the disassociation policy." Observers believe it was a direct warning to recently elected president Michel Aoun not to forget that he has to answer to Damascus. "As long as the [president] is a patriot and works in favour of the Lebanese, Lebanon will become stronger. And when Lebanon is strong, Syria will be at ease and stronger," Al Assad said.

65. Ministers welcome social media sites tackling terrorism

Jerusalem Post, Gil Hoffman, 2016 12 09

Jerusalem - Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked and Strategic Affairs Minister Gilad Erdan welcomed on Thursday a move by social media giants Facebook, Twitter and YouTube aimed at curbing the spread of terrorist content online. According to the companies, they will create a shared industry database of "hashes," unique digital "fingerprints," for violent terrorist imagery, terrorist recruitment videos or images that have been removed from their services that they will then share with one another. The database will be open to all of the companies. Each individual company will then be able to review a "hash" according to their own content policies and decide whether or not to remove something that another company has already removed. The move came after Israel and other countries complained that social media companies had not been doing enough to reduce the amount of terrorist-related content. Erdan and Shaked met in September with top executives from Facebook who visited Israel.

Jerusalem - A terror cell made up of East Jerusalem teenagers planning to carry out a shooting attack on an IDF base in the capital was arrested in recent days, the Shin Bet security service announced Friday. The group, which allegedly included members of the Hamas terrorist organization, was made up of eight Arab Israeli residents of the Tsur Baher and Sheikh Jarrah neighborhoods of East Jerusalem, the Shin Bet said. The security agency would not specify when exactly the arrests were made, but said they happened in the month of November. The eight members of the cell, most of them minors, began planning their attacks while in prison. They had been picked up throughout 2015 for taking part in riots, the Shin Bet said. While locked up, the group decided to carry out a shooting attack on an army base next to the Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus. Upon their release, some of the cell members began staking out the base and finding the best ways to carry out the attack, the Shin Bet said.

67. Washington-Led Coalition Commits New Massacre in Northern Raqqa Area

Syria Times, Hamda Mustafa, 2016 12 09

Raqa - The so-called US-led coalition's warplanes have renewed airstrikes against residential areas in the Syrian city of Raqa and its countryside. The airstrikes killed 20 people and wounded tens of others all of them are civilians. Local and media sources said that "the coalition's warplanes launched violent airstrikes on residential buildings in the north of Raqa. The attack claimed the lives of 20 people, wounded many others and caused huge damage in the site." According to the source, the number of martyrs may rise due to serious injuries. Since August 2014, the United States has been leading an international coalition allegedly to fight "Daesh" terrorist organization in Iraq and Syria. It has carried out thousands of raids, but failed to stop the expansion of the extremist organization or achieve any achievement on ground because of the lack of seriousness about fighting terrorism and because the coalition didn't coordinate its strikes with the governments of the two countries.

70. 71 % des Français craignent un attentat durant les fêtes

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 12 09

Paris - Alors que l'état d'urgence devrait être une nouvelle fois prorogé, le baromètre Fiducial de la Sécurité révèle que les sondés redoutent d'abord la fréquentation des rassemblements festifs, mais aussi celle des centres commerciaux et des lieux de culte. Jamais les fêtes de fin d'années n'ont été sources d'autant de craintes. Alors que les autorités martèlent que la menace terroriste est à un niveau jamais atteint et que les «vétérans» de Syrie reviennent sur le sol français, un sondage Odoxa pour le baromètre Fiducial de la sécurité révèle que 71% des Français craignent un attentat durant la période des fêtes. Les lieux de rassemblements festifs sont considérés par 67% des sondés comme ceux où le risque sera le plus important. À ce titre, «78% sont favorables à la mise en place de zones sécurisées telles les fan-zones de l'Euro» note l'étude qui précise par ailleurs que «pour près de 6 Français sur 10 (57%), les grands magasins et centres commerciaux sont également concernés, tout comme les lieux de culte pour plus d'un Français sur deux (54%)». Vigiles devant les lieux de culte Interrogés sur leur «quotidien sécuritaire», les Français se disent très majoritairement favorables à la présence d'agents de sécurité à l'entrée des grands magasins (91%) mais aussi aux portes des lieux de culte (79%). Alors que les chrétiens s'apprêtent à célébrer Noël, l'assassinat au nom de Daech du père Jacques Hamel en pleine messe, le 26 juillet dernier à Saint-Étienne-du-Rouvray hante encore tous les esprits.

72. Encore un proche de Blancho sur liste noire

Le Temps (Suisse), Lise Bailat, 2016 12 09

Berne - Islamisme Le président de l'Association des savants musulmans, basée à Berne, est accusé par le Trésor américain de financer le terrorisme. Le secrétaire de l'organisation, Nicolas Blancho, également président du Conseil central islamique suisse, conteste. Un nouveau nom s'ajoute à la liste des fréquentations de Nicolas Blancho accusées de soutien au terrorisme par les Etats-Unis. Abdulmuhsen Zabin Mutib Naif Al- Mutairi, président de l'Association des savants musulmans, vient d'être placé sur liste noire par le Trésor américain, a appris Le Temps. L'association qu'il préside est abritée à Berne, au siège du Conseil central islamique suisse (CCIS) sous la société boîte aux lettres SIB Swiss. Son but, selon le Registre du commerce, est de « contribuer à assurer la promotion des sciences islamiques, de mener des recherches sur le droit et la jurisprudence islamiques ». Le secrétaire de cette association n'est autre que Nicolas Blancho, président du Conseil central islamique suisse. Soutien financier et matériel à Al-Nosra Que reproche Washington à Al- Mutairi, l'ami de Nicolas Blancho? L'homme basé au Koweït est accusé de fournir un soutien financier, matériel ou technologique ainsi que d'autres services au Front Al-Nosra ou à des entités soutenant cette organisation. Le Front Al-Nosra, actif en Syrie et au Liban, avait prêté allégeance à Al- Qaïda jusqu'à l'été dernier, où il s'est renommé Front Fatah al-Sham, en annonçant sa rupture avec toute organisation extérieure.

La Libre Belgique, Christophe Lamfalussy, 2016 12 09

Bruxelles - Des policiers d'origine maghrébine avaient de bons tuyaux sur les frères Abdeslam. Mais ils n'ont pas été écoutés. Certains pensent que la communauté belgo-marocaine, par peur ou protection, n'a jamais dénoncé les frères Abdeslam. Qu'il y aurait eu une sorte de loi du silence à Molenbeek. Ce n'est pas tout à fait exact : les informations de terrain qui ont évoqué en premier lieu la radicalisation des deux frères et une planque possible au 79 de la rue des Quatre-Vents viennent de cette communauté ou de policiers issus de celle-ci. Lundi dernier, à huis clos devant la Commission d'enquête parlementaire sur les attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles, le chef de corps de la zone de police de Malines-Willebroek, Yves Bogaerts, a bien dû admettre qu'il avait été averti dès la fin 2015 par l'un de ses anciens inspecteurs.

76. La mystérieuse disparition d'un Français en Iran

Le Figaro, Georges Malbrunot, 2016 12 09

Téhéran - Le quinquagénaire, qui faisait de la moto dans le désert, a disparu depuis quatre mois. Après deux rallyes Paris-Dakar et plusieurs expéditions dans les sables marocains, un Français, passionné de moto, s'était mis en tête de sillonner le désert iranien. Le 23 juillet, le voilà une nouvelle fois parti à l'aventure, pour la Turquie d'abord, sa Honda 400 CC démontée dans sa voiture. Quatre jours plus tard, ce quinquagénaire sportif, dont nous tairons le nom pour des questions de sécurité, traverse la frontière iranienne après avoir laissé sa Citroën C8 sur le parking d'un hôtel. Puis, il file vers Téhéran, avant d'arriver le 3 août aux portes du désert dans le village de Robat-Khan, à 400 km à l'est de la capitale iranienne. C'est la dernière fois où le Français a été vu par un chamelier. Depuis, rien, aucune trace de cet ingénieur, issu d'une famille d'illustres militaires. Après avoir soigneusement respecté la consigne de silence donnée par le Quai d'Orsay, ses proches ont décidé de parler. « Il y a trop de zones d'ombre et de non-réponses à nos questions », confie son épouse au Figaro, tout en souhaitant garder l'anonymat. Elle et ses proches ont eu plusieurs rendez-vous à l'Élysée.

77. Le paiement par mobile, la nouvelle arme des terroristes?

La Tribune, Fabien Piliu, 2016 12 09

Bercy, France - Dévoilé ce jeudi, le rapport annuel sur les "Tendances et analyse des risques de blanchiment de capitaux et de financement du terrorisme" de Tracfin, la cellule anti-blanchiment de Bercy, pointe les vulnérabilités du paiement par mobile. Avec la montée du risque terroriste et les bouleversements technologiques, l'activité de la cellule de "Traitement du renseignement et action contre les circuits financiers clandestins", plus connue sous le nom de Tracfin grimpe en flèche. En 2015, suivant les mêmes tendances qu'en 2014, la cellule anti-blanchiment de Bercy a reçu 45.266 informations contre 38.419 un an plus tôt, ce qui représente une hausse de 18 % selon le rapport annuel sur les "Tendances et analyse des risques de blanchiment de capitaux et de financement du terrorisme" dévoilé ce jeudi. A noter, parmi ces informations, 43.231 sont des déclarations de soupçon émanant des déclarants du secteur privé. Les autres proviennent des administrations partenaires de Tracfin, des autorités de contrôle des professionnels soumis au dispositif et des cellules de renseignement financier étrangères.

78. Le renseignement financier sert l'antiterrorisme

Le Monde, Elise Vincent, 2016 12 09

Paris - Tracfin, la cellule antiblanchiment française, se veut un outil de détection de " signaux faibles " de radicalisation Depuis les attentats de Charlie et de l'Hyper Cacher, en janvier 2015, le renseignement financier est devenu un outil essentiel de la lutte contre le terrorisme. Un des moyens de repérer ce qui est devenu un des enjeux-clés de l'endiguement de la menace : les " signaux faibles " de radicalisation. Tels sont, en substance, les points mis en avant dans le rapport d'analyse annuel de Tracfin, la cellule antiblanchiment française, qu'a rendu public le ministre de l'économie et des finances, Michel Sapin, jeudi 8 décembre, à Bercy. D'après ce rapport intitulé " Tendances et analyse des risques " de l'année 2015, le renseignement financier a, depuis l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo, pris une place qu'il n'avait pas dans ce type de dossiers. " L'intérêt du renseignement financier c'est que même si on parle de " signaux faibles ", il recueille des signaux fiables, estime ainsi le directeur de Tracfin, Bruno Dalles, interrogé par Le Monde. Cela permet de confirmer un environnement, une appartenance. " Des éléments essentiels pour la justice, afin de caractériser par exemple " l'association de malfaiteur en vue d'une entreprise terroriste " , le chef de mise en examen le plus souvent utilisé actuellement. Rôle de détecteur Pour répondre à cette urgence, Tracfin s'est réorganisé. Le terrorisme ne représente qu'une partie de son activité, mais, sur 40 enquêteurs, Tracfin est passé de trois à dix agents spécialisés.

79. PKK will 'face destruction' after April 2017: Interior Minister Soylu

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 12 09

Van, Turkey - The outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) will "face destruction" after April 2017, Interior Minister Süleyman Soylu has predicted . "Let me be clear, these days are their [PKK] good days. They will face such massive destruction that they can't even imagine," Soylu said in a ruling Justice and Development (AKP) meeting in the eastern province of Van on Dec. 9. "We are steadfastly carrying out our struggle in the winter. Our security forces, who say 'Trust us, we will beat them,' and who oversee many operations from [the southeastern provinces] Diyarbakir to Hakkari, are putting up a great struggle. We have made all our plans. We won't let them form bases in the winter. We won't leave any hiding spot, caves or shelters," he added, noting that some 53 shelters in the eastern province of Bingöl had recently been destroyed. "[PKK militants] come to towns and threaten people and shopkeepers, forcing municipalities to give them money and sending that money to the mountains. And then they talk about democracy," Soylu said.

1. Spies and lies

Telegram (St.John's), 2016 12 13

Editorial: This goes from the sublime to the bizarre - and beyond. Back in November, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service found itself in the hottest of hot water: a Federal Court judge ruled that the spy agency had broken the law by collecting and storing information it was not legally entitled to gather - in particular, metadata on innocent Canadians unconnected in any way with legal investigations. The judge ruled, in fact, that CSIS deliberately misled the court when the agency had applied for special warrants to collect documents. It was a huge embarrassment for the spies, especially when the federal government announced it would not appeal the ruling. The information was collected starting in 2006, and processed through the secretive Operational Data Analysis Centre. But things are twistier than just a decade's worth of private information unlawfully held by the agency. Last week, a federal committee was told that the spy agency hasn't gotten rid of the material it was never supposed to have, even though it was illegally collected in the first place. CSIS director Michel Coulombe told the committee that it should know, within six months or so, what it will do with the data. And federal Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale told MPs on the committee that he's still deciding whether the spy agency should be allowed to retain and process such information. In other words, having been found to have illegally taken something, the government is pondering keeping it anyway. In fact, CSIS has even claimed that now that it has possession of the information, the agency is legally mandated to ensure that it doesn't dispose of anything that might be needed for a future investigation. Here's Coulombe's explanation to the committee: "So before we rush and destroy that information, we have to make sure that by destroying it we're not going to be contravening another court decision. ... We have to take the time to do that analysis." Now, maybe this is not the proper way to look at it, but it sure seems like CSIS is arguing that the law somehow requires it to use unlawfully acquired information. Imagine how that would play out in court: the moment you tried to use illegally obtained information as evidence, the whole shooting match would be tossed out. So what's the point of looking for potentially illegal needles in that massive legal haystack?

2. Trudeau briefed weekly on security threats, says adviser

iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 12 13

One day after U.S. President-Elect Donald Trump insisted he's too "smart" for traditional daily intelligence briefings, the national security advisor to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau said he and the PM meet several times a week to discuss issues at the top of the security agenda. "I probably see the prime minister once or twice a week," Daniel Jean told members of the Senate national security committee Monday in his first briefing to the senators. "Whenever there's a threat we make sure the prime minister is informed." In an interview with Fox News Sunday host Chris Wallace that aired Sunday, Trump said the daily briefings are repetitive and that, being a "smart person," he doesn't need to be told the same thing again and again. Since being elected in November, the president-elect -- who has been highly critical of American intelligence agencies - - has reportedly received only a handful of such briefings. In August American media reported he asked a foreign policy advisor multiple times during a one-hour briefing why the U.S. could not use its nuclear weapons. While Jean did not speak to the potential impacts on Canadian privacy and intelligence practices of the looming Trump presidency, he did stress that the access and powers he has now allow him to work with intelligence and security partners in Canada to coordinate their responses to threats. He also expressed skepticism when asked whether efforts by the government to enshrine the role of the National Security Advisor in legislation should be duplicated for his office. "In terms of enshrining my role in legislation, I don't know what that would do," Jean said. "I have all the roles, all of the responsibilities that are required." While the former Conservative government shut down the National Science Advisor's office in 2008, the same thing didn't happen to the office of the National Security Advisor. The role was consistently filled under the former government, most recently with former CSIS head Richard Fadden. Jean said that he holds regular conferences and briefings with the heads of Canada's national security bodies and that he has not had any problems getting access to the officials or information he needs during his six months on the job so far.

3. Bill C-51 damages Canada's economy. It must be scrapped

Toronto Star Online, 2016 12 13

An open letter on Bill C-51 to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale from leading innovators and entrepreneurs: Canada's future depends on its ability to compete on the world stage. As business leaders and tech entrepreneurs, we hope to play an important role in that future. We were buoyed by your government's promise to introduce much-needed parliamentary oversight of security services, but are deeply troubled that the initial concerns with Bill C-51 from the business community remain largely unaddressed. We appreciate the opportunity for stakeholders to weigh in regarding your public consultation on Bill C-51 but the process to date has raised additional concerns. Many of us were among the more than 150 business leaders who wrote to the previous government to articulate our concerns about Bill C-51. The diverse signatories were affiliated with companies worth billions of dollars, including several start-ups that are planning IPOs, Canada's largest software company, and one of Canada's largest institutional investors.

4. Canada asks U.S. court to toss case alleging it wrongly named woman a terrorist

Canadian Press, Geordon Omand, 2016 12 13

Vancouver - The Canadian government wants a U.S. court to toss out a lawsuit that accuses it of ruining the life of a British Columbia woman, who alleges it knowingly gave false information to the FBI and American border services that branded her a terrorist and an arms dealer. A document filed in U.S. district court in Seattle by the Canadian government says the legal dispute has no place being heard outside of Canada because it was filed by a Canadian against Canadian defendants. Perienne de Jaray is the former executive vice-president and co-owner of Apex USA, previously a multimillion-dollar subsidiary of electronics maker Apex Canada, which her father launched. De Jaray contends in a legal submission that the Canadian government's actions were motivated by a desire to appease the U.S. administration by proving it could robustly enforce U.S. arms export restrictions, which she argues could help Canada's defence companies gain trade exemptions and secure access to lucrative American defence contracts. None of the allegations have been proven in court. The lawsuit names the federal attorney general, Canada Border Services Agency and Global Affairs, as well as several bureaucrats. The federal government declined comment on behalf of all the agencies and the named individuals in the lawsuit, saying it does not comment on matters before a court.

5. Federal government's Canada.ca project 'off the rails'

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 12 13

The federal government's bid to merge 1,500 departmental and agency websites into a single site, Canada.ca, is a year behind schedule and almost 10 times over budget. And experts warn it is on track to be another failed government IT project, like the Phoenix pay system. "It's gone off the rails. It's a disaster," said one government source with knowledge of the project who spoke on condition of anonymity. CBC spoke with a number of government workers who are also familiar with the project in different departments and they all expressed similar evaluations. The Canada.ca initiative was launched in 2013 with the goal of making it easier for people to find and use government information online. A $1.54-million contract for a new content management system, where all government websites would be moved, was awarded to Adobe in 2015. The original deadline to have all active web content moved to the single portal was this month. But in June, it was pushed back to December 2017, which was the initial deadline for the migration of all archived content. The contract with Adobe is now above $9.4 million, according to government figures. The actual migration of the websites is up to the departments themselves and is to be done within existing budgets and staffing. Since 2015, eight of the largest departments have budgeted or spent more than $28 million on this project.

6. Parliament's budget watchdog, National Defence battling over warship data

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 12 13

Ottawa - National Defence and Parliament's budget watchdog have been quietly battling over access to key information about the government's multi-billion-dollar plan to buy the navy new warships. The department says it remains committed to openness and transparency, but the information requested by parliamentary budget officer Jean-Denis Frechette is "very sensitive" and outside his mandate. Frechette, however, alleges there is a culture of secrecy within National Defence, and that the department remains among the worst when it comes to transparency. "National Defence is a problematic case," Frechette told the Senate defence committee on Monday. "There is a certain culture whereby this information suddenly becomes confidential or cabinet confidence." The dispute is reminiscent of similar disagreements between National Defence and Frechette's predecessor, Kevin Page, particularly when it came to the F-35 stealth fighter.

7. PIPSC 'not that confident' members will receive back pay because of Phoenix

CBC News Ottawa, Staff reporter, 2016 12 13

Ottawa - After reaching a tentative contract deal with the federal government over the weekend, the head of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada has doubts about whether members will receive money owed to them in a timely manner because of the government's ongoing Phoenix payroll problems. The federal union, which represents scientists, auditors, information technology experts and other public service professionals, reached a tentative deal with the federal government to replace expired contracts for 18,000 of its members. If accepted, thousands of members will receive a five per cent pay hike over four years, or 1.25 per cent each year. The deal is retroactive to 2014, when the previous contract expired. But given the trouble-plagued Phoenix pay system, it is unclear how long processing those payments might take. Since the federal government rolled out the Phoenix system in the spring, tens of thousands of federal workers have reported issues with their paycheques. Many of those problems have had to do with supplementary pay, such as for extra duties, overtime or pay adjustments. Union president Debi Daviau is concerned the retroactive pay negotiated will also present problems. Daviau said the contract states employees should get back pay within four months, but added she's "not that confident" the government will meet that deadline. Daviau said the Treasury Board of Canada asked the union for a nine-month extension to process the retroactive payments, but the union rejected that request. "We did not agree. [We] unanimously did not agree to that extend that period," she said. "The necessity to keep the pressure on to fix the system and not simply avoid needing to use the system was appropriate."

8. PM 'missing the point' on kidnapping

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard and Mitch Potter, 2016 12 13

Critics of Ottawa's lacklustre kidnap response protocols were disappointed Monday when the prime minister answered a question none of them asked. Rather than addressing a litany of shortcomings detailed in a recent investigation by the Toronto Star into the government's handling of overseas kidnaps, Justin Trudeau fell back on a boilerplate talking point about the importance of not paying ransom. He was asked during a year-end news conference if he had any regrets in how Ottawa handled the cases of John Ridsdel and Robert Hall. The two Canadians were murdered by the militant Abu Sayyaf Group earlier this year in the Philippines when the group's ransom demands were not met. A review is underway. "I think people understand, and the Canadians I've spoken with across the country in the months following certainly understand, that any other position would not just provide source of significant funds to violent terrorists intent on causing more harm and taking more lives, but it would also endanger further the lives of any Canadian citizen who works, travels or lives outside of our borders," Trudeau said. And yet neither the Ridsdel nor Hall families - nor any of the more than 50 relatives of other Canadian hostages, witnesses, government, military, intelligence officials and private security consultants that were interviewed by the Star for the eight-part Held Hostage series - ever once suggested Ottawa should pay ransoms to terrorist groups holding Canadians. Instead, many complained about a leaderless government response - one bogged down by turf wars, bureaucratic bungling and political inertia - that left them in the dark, traumatized anew by Canada's handling of their cases.

9. As U.S. spy chief, Fiorina would support backdoors

USA Today, Jim Swartz, 2016 12 13

Washington - Carly Fiorina, U.S. spy chief? The evolution from tech CEO to presidential hopeful to possible director of national intelligence -- an appointment floated Monday by The New York Times, which quoted an unnamed Donald Trump transition team member saying she's under consideration for the role -- reflects Fiorina's dogged pursuit of political superlatives. Fiorina and Trump had a "positive and productive meeting" on "issues ranging from America's strategic interests and national security challenges abroad to the geopolitical climate across the world and in China," Fiorina spokesman Frank Sadler said in an email to USA TODAY. If she gets the job, she would bring a view of cybersecurity that's at odds with tech's biggest companies, which have declaimed U.S. government efforts to override their encryption as dangerous and a threat to personal privacy. During the Republican primary season, Fiorina urged Apple, Google and others to "tear down cyberwalls" to help track down criminals online, a stance that ran in cross currents to Silicon Valley, which publicly supported Apple in its fight with the FBI over hacking into a terrorist's iPhone, and has been building stronger device encryption in the months since.

10. Chief of Exxon Is Trump's Pick for State Dept.

New York Times, Michael D. Shear, Maggie Haberman, 2016 12 13

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump settled Monday on Rex W. Tillerson, the chief executive of Exxon Mobil, to be his secretary of state, transition officials said. In naming him, the president-elect is dismissing bipartisan concerns that Mr. Tillerson, the globe-trotting leader of an energy giant, has a too-cozy relationship with Vladimir V. Putin, the president of Russia. Mr. Trump planned to announce the selection on Tuesday morning, bringing to an end his public and chaotic deliberations over the nation's top diplomat -- a process that at times veered from rewarding Rudolph W. Giuliani, one of his most loyal supporters, to musing about whether Mitt Romney, one of his most vicious critics, might be forgiven. Instead, Mr. Trump has decided to risk what looks to be a bruising confirmation fight in the Senate. In the past several days, Republican and Democratic lawmakers had warned that Mr. Tillerson would face intense scrutiny over his two-decade relationship with Russia, which awarded him its Order of Friendship in 2013, and with Mr. Putin. The hearings will also put a focus on Exxon Mobil's business dealings with Moscow. The company has billions of dollars in oil contracts that can go forward only if the United States lifts sanctions against Russia, and Mr. Tillerson's stake in Russia's energy industry could create a very blurry line between his interests as an oilman and his role as America's leading diplomat. Mr. Tillerson has been publicly skeptical about the sanctions, which have halted some of Exxon Mobil's biggest projects in Russia, including an agreement with the state oil company to explore and pump in Siberia that could be worth tens of billions of dollars.

11. CIA has high confidence Russians tried to influence election in Trump's favor

CBS News, Staff report, 2016 12 12

Washington - Intelligence sources confirm that the CIA has high confidence that the Russians tried to influence the presidential election and that they favored Donald Trump, CBS News' Jeff Pegues reports. Sources say elements of the Republican National Committee (RNC) apparatus were hacked, but the damage was not as widespread as the cyber hacks that affected the Democratic National Committee (DNC). There is disagreement between the FBI and CIA over the evidence in the case, however. Furthermore, some intelligence officials are puzzled about leaks from the FBI casting doubts on the intelligence community's assessment, given that typically, the intelligence community and the FBI try to come to a consensus before going public with big investigations like this. The CIA's "high-confidence judgment" that Russian hacking favored Mr. Trump caught the attention of former acting CIA Director Michael Morell. "[T]he C.I.A. doesn't come to a high-confidence judgment just based on circumstantial evidence." So I think they've got more here," Morell said in an interview Monday on "CBS This Morning." "I think they've got sources who are actually telling them what the intent was."

12. Hayden: CIA Reception of Pompeo Has Been 'Warm'

Washington Free Beacon, Nick Bolger, 2016 12 12

Washington - Former CIA Director Michael Hayden confirmed Monday on MSNBC's Morning Joe that the CIA has reacted positively to President-elect Donald Trump's choice of Rep. Mike Pompeo (R., Kan.) to head the intelligence agency. Jeremy Peters of the New York Times asked Hayden, who is also a retired four-star general and former NSA chief, what he had heard about the CIA's reception of Pompeo. "Tell me about what you are hearing from inside the CIA right now as to how they are responding to Pompeo?" Peters asked. "I think my colleague David Sanger alluded to this earlier, so far it has been a pretty warm reception. Is that what you're hearing as well?" "That's exactly what I'm hearing," Hayden responded.

13. Is Trump's Twitter account a national security threat?

Politico, Nahal Toosi, 2016 12 13

Washington - Donald Trump has years of experience launching Twitter wars. But now, as he prepares to take the highest office in the country, there are growing fears that his tweets could spur a genuine national security crisis. Intelligence and defense specialists believe the president-elect's use of the popular and powerful social media network is already being used by foreign agencies to analyze his personality, track his habits and detect clues about what to expect from a Trump-led American government. And that's just based on what Trump writes on Twitter. It's not even counting the vulnerabilities that could arise if overseas hackers invade his phone and digital accounts. "We've never had a president that's shared so much of themselves, not just what they're saying, but their psychological ticks in such an overt manner, and you can be sure that foreign actors are studying that, too," said P.W. Singer, a defense expert and co-author of "Cybersecurity and Cyberwar." "We're beginning to see what excites him, what angers him, what sets him off. We've never had this ability to read so much on what a president is thinking."

14. Obama to preserve his copy of CIA 'Torture Report'

Miami Herald, Carol Rosenberg, 2016 12 13

Guantanamo Bay - President Barack Obama is archiving his copy of the entire so-called Senate Torture Report, it was disclosed Monday, suggesting the study of CIA interrogations used in secret overseas prisons would be made public in 2028. Obama provided notice of his plan to make the 6,700-page report part of the presidential record to some in Congress in a letter from his counsel W. Neil Eggleston dated Friday -- two days after lawyers for the alleged Sept. 11 plotters urged the case's military judge to order preservation of a copy of it. At issue is a bid by Senate Republicans to recover all existing copies of the graphic Senate Intelligence Committee's report on the CIA's 2002-06 Rendition, Detention and Interrogation program, and fears by lawyers in the 9/11 case that lurid descriptions of what agents did to the men accused of conspiring in the attack might vanish. A declassified summary of the report suggests there are entire chapters on the waterboarding, rectal and other abuse of the men who were brought to Guantánamo and charged as the alleged plotters of the hijackings that killed nearly 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11, 2001.

15. Suspected Russian cyberattack waged on Clinton campaign just days before vote

Yahoo News, Michael Isikoff, 2016 12 12

Washington - In the closing days of the 2016 election campaign, hackers believed to be working for Russian intelligence launched a new wave of attacks on Hillary Clinton's campaign and the Democratic National Committee -- a previously unreported cyberoffensive that heightened concerns, now endorsed by the CIA, that the Russian government was seeking to influence the outcome of the election in favor of Donald Trump, according to sources familiar with the investigations into the attempted intrusions. The attacks came in the form of so-called "phishing" emails sent to nearly a dozen campaign and committee staffers in a renewed effort at penetrating their networks, said Dmitri Alperovitch, the co-founder and chief technology officer of CrowdStrike, the cybersecurity firm hired by the DNC to repel attacks on its network. Staffers at that point were alert enough to reject entreaties to click on the unsolicited email messages that would have allowed the hackers into their computers, he said. But at least one top Clinton campaign staffer, communications director Jennifer Palmieri, told Yahoo News on Sunday that she received an alert from Google in mid-October informing her that her personal Gmail account had been targeted by a "foreign state" actor and that her password needed to be changed. "They were targeting us throughout the election," said another former senior Clinton campaign staffer, who asked not to be identified. "They never stopped trying to get back in."

16. Sworn In, U.N.'s Next Leader Must Factor Trump Into Approach to Global Crises

New York Times, Somini Sengupta, 2016 12 13

The United Nations - António Guterres took the oath of office on Monday to become the next secretary general of the United Nations amid a rise in nationalist movements around the world and what he called a loss of confidence in institutions, including the one he will take over in January. The next United Nations leader would already have faced tough challenges: war, climate change, widening income inequality, record levels of global displacement. But the election of Donald J. Trump as president of the United States has changed the incoming secretary general's approach to virtually every major crisis, a wide array of United Nations diplomats said in recent weeks, outlining three particularly vexing conundrums. The first is that even as he needs commitment from the United States, the single largest funder of the United Nations, Mr. Guterres will be under pressure to call out American leaders if they flout the basic values of the United Nations Charter, including "respect, human rights, tolerance and solidarity," as he described them to the packed General Assembly hall on Monday. "The threats to these values are most often based on fear," he said. "Our duty to the people we serve is to work together to move from fear of each other to trust in each other. Trust in the values that bind us, and trust in the institutions that serve and protect us." Second, he has to ensure that Mr. Trump does not severely cut United States funding for the United Nations or dismiss the institution altogether as a platform for solving global problems.

17. The Kremlin Gloats Over Trump's CIA Tantrum

The Daily Beast, Anna Nemtsova, 2016 12 13

Moscow - The news that U.S. President-elect Donald Trump called CIA claims about Russia's involvement in the election process "ridiculous" was cause for celebration in Russia. "Finally, the U.S. president does not trust CIA!" exclaimed one of Trump's many Russian fans. Authorities, who just a few weeks ago were busy training people to hide in bunkers in case the Americans dropped nuclear bombs, now applauded the U.S. president-elect and welcomed his incoming administration's "dream team." To Moscow officials every step Trump takes, including his harsh criticism of the Central Intelligence Agency, sounds like a victory for President Vladimir Putin.

18. The President's Daily Intelligence Briefing, Explained

New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 12 13

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump has indicated that he does not intend to receive daily intelligence briefings about global affairs and national security threats after his inauguration, breaking with a tradition that commanders in chief from both parties have followed since the Cold War. Mr. Trump has received only a few briefings since his election victory, largely declining the intelligence community's offer to give him the same "President's Daily Brief," or P.D.B., that President Obama receives each morning. Defending his practice in a Fox

News interview broadcast on Sunday, Mr. Trump noted that Vice President-elect Mike Pence and "my generals" were receiving the daily briefings, and said he saw no need to do so, too. Is it dangerous not to receive it each day? Several former senior intelligence officials said that getting the briefing every day is not strictly necessary, especially if Mr. Trump delegates substantial amounts of authority to his subordinates. But they stress that regular briefings are still important because it is helpful in a fast-moving crisis if a president already has a baseline of knowledge about topics, such as a foreign leader's thinking and military abilities. Also, briefings permit a president to quiz briefers on inconsistencies and questions of fact or interpretation that form the basis for the most important national security decisions -- those only the president can make. Matt Olsen, the former director of the National Counterterrorism Center, said that "it's critical for the president to get an intelligence briefing, if not every day, almost every day" rather than just checking in periodically.

19. Top U.S. spy agency has not embraced CIA assessment on Russia hacking - sources
Reuters, Jonathan Landy, Mark Hosenball, 2016 12 13

Washington - The overseers of the U.S. intelligence community have not embraced a CIA assessment that Russian cyber attacks were aimed at helping Republican President-elect Donald Trump win the 2016 election, three American officials said on Monday. While the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) does not dispute the CIA's analysis of Russian hacking operations, it has not endorsed their assessment because of a lack of conclusive evidence that Moscow intended to boost Trump over Democratic opponent Hillary Clinton, said the officials, who declined to be named. An ODNI spokesman declined to comment on the issue. "ODNI is not arguing that the agency (CIA) is wrong, only that they can't prove intent," said one of the three U.S. officials. "Of course they can't, absent agents in on the decision-making in Moscow." The Federal Bureau of Investigation, whose evidentiary standards require it to make cases that can stand up in court, declined to accept the CIA's analysis - a deductive assessment of the available intelligence - for the same reason, the three officials said. The CIA conclusion was a "judgment based on the fact that Russian entities hacked both Democrats and Republicans and only the Democratic information was leaked," one of the three officials said on Monday. "(It was) a thin reed upon which to base an analytical judgment," the official added.

20. Trump Adviser Is Harsh Judge of C.I.A.'s Role
New York Times, Matthew Rosenberg, 2016 12 13

Washington - Long before Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn became Donald J. Trump's choice for national security adviser, he believed that the Central Intelligence Agency had become a political tool of the Obama administration -- a view now echoed by the president-elect in his mocking dismissals of C.I.A. assessments that Russia sought to tip the election in Mr. Trump's favor. "They've lost sight of who they actually work for," Mr. Flynn said in an interview with The New York Times in October 2015. "They work for the American people. They don't work for the president of the United States." He added, speaking of the agency's leadership: "Frankly, it's become a very political organization." Mr. Flynn's assessment that the C.I.A. is a political arm of the Obama administration is not widely shared by Republicans or Democrats in Washington. But it has appeared to have been internalized by the one person who matters most right now: Mr. Trump. In the past few days, Mr. Trump has sought to portray reports of the agency's assessments that Russia actively tried to interfere in the election as a desperate attempt by sore losers to taint his presidency before it begins. His denigration of C.I.A. officials as "the same people that said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction" has opened up an extraordinary rift between the president-elect and the nation's intelligence community that is unlikely to be bridged anytime soon.

21. Trump Ignoring US Intelligence Creates Risks Beyond Russian Hacking

Wired, Andy Greenberg, 2016 12 12

New York - Observers and alumni of America's intelligence community have already fretted over Donald Trump's impending control of the world's most powerful spy agencies. They've worried that he could abuse their heady surveillance capabilities, turn them on his personal enemies, revamp the NSA's mass surveillance programs, and strip away domestic privacy protections once in charge. But before Trump has even taken office, he's already found a less expected way to abuse the US intelligence community: Ignore, contradict, and insult it. Trump's relationship--or lack thereof-- with US intelligence agencies isn't just a cause for political spectacle. According to national security experts and former intelligence agency staffers, it could have serious consequences that go well beyond the current dispute over Russian hacking. That abrupt dismissal of the intelligence community's findings follows months of Trump's assertions that no one can know the source of the last year's long series of political hacks--despite a publicly released report from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence and the Department of Homeland Security stating that Vladimir Putin's state-sponsored hackers were behind those breaches. "It could be some guy in his home in New Jersey," Trump maintained in a Time interview earlier last week. Disregard of the intelligence agencies' fact-finding represents a disturbing potential preview of the next four years, say former members of the US intelligence community who spoke with WIRED. They worry that it threatens to politicize the intelligence community's work, pushing it toward conclusions that will please the president rather than inform him. They say the growing rift demoralizes staffers, leading to a loss of valuable talent, and that it could leave the commander-in-chief himself dangerously ignorant of crucial world events. Susan Hennessey, a former NSA lawyer who is now with the Brookings Institution, says that since Trump was elected, she's spoken with former colleagues who are still in the intelligence community who have been "stunned" to hear Trump's repeated rejections of their findings. "It's not outrage, although that might be under the surface," she says of her former colleagues' response. "It's real uncertainty and a sense of fear...shock, bewilderment, wondering what's going to happen next."

22. Trump is already antagonizing the intelligence community, and that's a problem

Washington Post, Michael Hayden, 2016 12 13

Op-ed - A month ago I wrote here about the importance and challenge of the intelligence community establishing a relationship with President-elect Donald Trump. That has just gotten more important and more challenging. The Post reported that CIA analysts now believe the Russian aim was to help Trump win. Team Trump immediately went into attack mode, employing the bureaucratic equivalent of the ad hominems the president-elect used during the campaign ("Crooked Hillary," "Lyin' Ted," "Little Marco"). "These are the same people that said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction," its first salvo described the U.S. intelligence community. An administration-in-waiting more confident in itself, in its own legitimacy, in U.S. institutions and in the people it will soon govern might have said, "These are serious issues. We intend to hear them out. Nothing is more precious than our democratic process. We have asked the Obama administration for details." The fact that that didn't happen should invite tons of commentary. But not from me. My narrow concerns as an intelligence officer are the questions raised above. How will this affect the new president's relationship with the intelligence community? A lot. And not well.

London Daily Telegraph, Martin Evans, 2016 12 12

London - An extremist who handed money to the "Man in the Hat" Brussels terror suspect claims he was a paid MI5 informant, it can be revealed. Belgian national Zakaria Boufassil, who gave £3,000 to suspected Isil plotter Mohamed Abrini during a meeting in Birmingham in July 2015, claims agents paid him in cash, cigarettes and clothing for information. Boufassil, 26, who was last week found guilty of funding terrorism, alleged that MI5 agents assured him he would not be prosecuted if he cooperated. His claims can now be revealed after an order banning mention of his alleged links to the Security Service was lifted at Kingston Crown Court where he was jailed. Boufassil was given a three year sentence, while his associate, Mohamed Ali Ahmed, 27, who pleaded guilty to the same offence, was jailed for eight years. Both men will serve an extra year on licence.

London - A Birmingham man who gave cash to the "man in the hat" Brussels bombing suspect claims he was recruited by MI5 and then "thrown to the wolves", it can now be disclosed. Zakaria Boufassil, 26, said he held several meetings with the British intelligence agency's personnel, who paid him £3,000 for information and bought him gifts, including Camel cigarettes, a Samsung mobile phone and clothes. Boufassil and Mohammed Ali Ahmed, 27, also of Birmingham were jailed on Monday for handing over £3,000 to Mohamed Abrini at a meeting in Small Heath Park, Birmingham, on 11 July 2015. Abrini earned his nickname "man in the hat" after being spotted on CCTV at Brussels airport just before the bombings in March. Boufassil was sentenced to three years in prison, while Ahmed was sentenced to eight years in prison. Boufassil claimed the MI5 officers approached him after Abrini was arrested in April. Six weeks after sharing what he knew with MI5 about his meeting with Abrini, Boufassil was arrested by West Midlands police on his return from a holiday in Morocco which he claims to have paid for with the money from MI5.

26. Spies can't always tell whole story

London Times, Michael Evans, 2016 12 13

Analysis - Intelligence is often based on circumstantial pointers and hints. It's the job of the analysts to put all the bits and pieces together and come up with a conclusion that looks right. So how strong is the CIA's evidence that Russia was behind a cyberplot to influence the election in favour of Donald Trump? Pinpointing cyberattacks is a complex art. Hackers use sophisticated methods, such as proxy servers, to evade detection. Sometimes agencies such as the CIA hold back all the evidence they have for fear of giving away their techniques. This may be the case here because the CIA has not produced irrefutable evidence that the Kremlin is the culprit. If there is such evidence, should an agency make it public if, by doing so, it has damaging consequences for the national interest? In this case, the CIA appears to have judged that the risk was worth taking, even though it has withheld proof. However, Trump's suspicion of intelligence bodes ill. Sometimes intelligence is spot on but cannot be made public.

27. Terror arrests made after 'significant plot to attack UK is disrupted'

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 12 13

London - Counter-terrorism investigators have made six arrests after disrupting what they believe was a "significant plot" to attack the UK that was influenced by Islamic State. Material recovered from an address raided in Derby has been initially assessed as being consistent with that needed to make homemade explosives, the Guardian understands. The arrests were intelligence led but past cases have shown that initial assumptions among investigators are sometimes incorrect because materials for making homemade explosives can also have innocent uses. It followed an operation by the domestic security service MI5 and counter-terrorism police. Counter-terrorism officials believe they have disrupted three attacks this year. The arrests on Monday morning were made at four addresses in Derby, east Midlands, where those detained were aged 22, 27, 35 and 36. A 27-year-old man was also arrested in Burton on Trent, Staffordshire, as was a 32-year-old woman in London.

29. Lone wolves and data dumps a problem (Canada)

The Australian Financial Review, Jonathan Porter, 2016 12 13

Sydney - Constant reconnaissance probes by nation states, attacks by computer network robber barons and lone wolves and data dumps from disgruntled workers - that is digital Australia's bleak picture painted for a cyber security forum in Sydney recently. And without constant vigilance and fine-tuning of our cyber defences, the problem will only get worse. "A lot of nation states and militaries are investing in capabilities that can be used to target utilities; power, water resource and energy providers," Major-General Stephen Day, former head of cyber at the Department of Defence who was the inaugural head of the Australian Cyber Security Centre, told the Australian Computer Society Cyber Forum in Sydney. "There is no question reconnaissance is going on right now." The glimpse behind the curtain at Australia's cyber defenders came during the question and answer period at the end of the forum, attended by some of the world's leading experts in the field. An attendee put to the panel that an emerging risk was not lone wolf attackers "but of a state-sponsored cyber-attack sometimes from friendly countries we consider allies" and asked what was being done to mitigate the risk. Victorian minister for Small Business, Innovation and Trade Philip Dalidakis said that while Day's statements were "sexy" and would generate headlines "the one thing everyone in the room has to be extremely cognisant of is that the overwhelming majority of attacks occur from within". "Yes, we need to be able to stop attacks from the outside of the firewall but the fact of the matter is the two greatest attacks we have seen of data theft from inside were from Bradley Manning and (Edward) Snowden," he told the forum. On the intelligence side, he said he could speak more freely than other panel members because he was not a representative of the federal government. Dalidakis said the nation was well served by the Five Eyes agreement on signals intelligence sharing with the US, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. Fellow panel member Sandra Ragg, assistant secretary for cyber policy in the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, said the nation did need to improve its cyber defences. "The first thing we can do is improve our cyber defences. "People focus on state-sponsored threats but cybercrime is a huge piece of the threat to our economy."

30. Terror propaganda videos played in court

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 13

Sydney - Videos have been played in a Sydney court showing a group of people holding guns high in the air, a man waving an Islamic State flag and blood dripping from fingertips. The proscribed YouTube videos were accessed by Ahmad Saiyer Naizmand, 21, who has pleaded guilty to five counts of contravening a control order in January and February. Naizmand "was part of a close-knit group of men in Sydney who strongly supported the ideology and activities of Islamic State," crown prosecutor Michelle England said in sentencing submissions at the Downing Centre District Court on Tuesday. Court orders banning him from watching terrorist propaganda and accessing material about explosives, weapons and ammunition were made in 2015 "to protect the public from a terrorist attack", she said. Naizmand accessed two videos that were played in court and a third that was not shown because of its graphic content including images of slain soldiers. The videos depict "extremist jihadi material that advocated violence and killings in support of Islamic State ideology," the Crown said, submitting that a custodial sentence would be appropriate for deliberately breaching the terrorism control orders.

32. Attack Has Egypt Alarmed and Its Leader Scrambling

New York Times, Declan Walsh, 2016 12 13

Cairo - President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi on Monday made dramatic efforts to reassure Egypt's Coptic Christians -- a pillar of his government's support -- as they buried victims of a bombing on Sunday at their cathedral in Cairo, an act that has stirred fears of resurgent Islamist violence. Standing alongside Pope Tawadros II, the leader of the Coptic Church, Mr. Sisi identified a 22-year-old man who he said detonated a suicide vest in a chapel on the grounds of St. Mark's Coptic Orthodox Cathedral, the seat of Egypt's Orthodox Christian Church, during Mass. At least 25 people, most of them women, died in the attack, the deadliest in years against Egyptian Christians. Mr. Sisi said the authorities had arrested four of the bomber's accomplices and were looking for two others. The speed of the official response reflected a broader sense of alarm in Egypt after three bombings in three days that shattered a monthslong period of calm outside the Sinai Peninsula, where a violent insurgency has long flared. An explosion at a security checkpoint in Cairo on Friday killed six police officers, and a smaller blast in the northern town of Kafr el-Sheikh later that day, aimed at the police, killed a passing motorcyclist. As well as battling insurgents, Mr. Sisi has been scrambling to shore up his support. His popularity has been battered this year by a gnawing economic crisis that has caused widespread discontent, with soaring inflation and shortages of staple food products like sugar. Threatened street protests, however, have not materialized.

"The terrorism attack killed 23 people, mainly women, and injured 49 others, five of them in critical conditions," spokesperson for the Health Ministry Mohammed Al-Tuni told Asharq Al-Awsat. Following the terrorist attack, Egypt announced three days of mourning. A security official and eyewitnesses said the explosion took place around 10a.m. on Sunday at St Mark's Coptic Christian cathedral and the seat of Coptic Pope Tawadros II. The country's President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi condemned the attack and called on Egyptians, Muslims and Christians, to unite facing terrorism.

35. 10 Abu Sayyaf killed in Saturday Patikul clash

Manila Bulletin, Francis Wakefield, 2016 12 13

Manila - The military has confirmed that 10 Abu Sayyaf members died and six were wounded in the clash with troops on Saturday, December 10 in Patikul, Sulu. "Based on the information as confirmed by [intelligence] units on the ground and validated by civilians on the ground, a total of 10 Abu Sayyaf fighters were killed while six others were hurt as a result of the clash," said Army Maj. Filemon Tan Jr., spokesman of the AFP Western Mindanao Command (Westmincom). The military earlier said that three government troops were killed while 21 others were wounded in the encounter. Tan said the firefight with about 150 Abu Sayyaf members occurred at around 10:00 a.m. while troops of the Army's 35th Infantry Battalion under the Joint Task Force Sulu were conducting focused military operations in in Bud Taming at Barangay Kabbon Takas. The armed confrontation lasted for an hour and 45 minutes before the Abu Sayyaf withdrew.

36. China takes off gloves over Taiwan talk

Beijing - China has abandoned its conciliatory tone toward Donald Trump, warning it is prepared to retaliate if the president-elect supports Taiwan independence as a bargaining chip to extract trade concessions. China considers Taiwan part of its indivisible territory. If Mr. Trump will not respect that, "bilateral co-operation in major fields would be out of the question," foreign ministry spokesman Geng Shuang said Monday, and "there would not be sound, steady growth" of the U.S.-China relationship. Mr. Geng urged Mr. Trump to "deal with the Taiwan question in a prudent manner so as not to disrupt or damage" the interests of the two countries, or risk the "peace and stability of the Asia Pacific and beyond." It was China's strongest warning to date of its extraordinary sensitivity on the Taiwan issue, which observers say Mr. Trump is escalating in ways that risk new tensions between the world's top two economic powers. Taiwan is "not something tradable," said Chu Shulong, director of the Institute of International Strategic and Development Studies at Tsinghua University in Beijing. If Mr. Trump persists, "China will act firmly. China can do a lot in bilateral relations, in regional and global affairs. I don't think the U.S. will like it." We have reached "the very important start of a new game between China and the U.S.," said François Godement, director of the Asia and China program at the European Council on Foreign Relations. "This is serious." China initially sought to quietly persuade Mr. Trump to reconsider after a call with Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen on Dec. 2, dispatching with nearly four decades of diplomatic non-contact between leaders of the United States and Taiwan.

37. China warns Trump about insults' cost

China Daily, An Baijie and Chen Weihua, 2016 12 13

Beijing/Washington - The Foreign Ministry urged US president-elect Donald Trump on Monday to act prudently on the Taiwan question to avoid "serious damage to the Sino-US relationship", after Trump once again publicly provoked China. Beijing could react with countermeasures in trade and regional issues, if Trump keeps challenging the time-tested one-China policy, which is the diplomatic cornerstone of relations between the world's two biggest economies, Chinese experts said. In a Fox News broadcast on Sunday, Trump said the United States does not necessarily have to stick to its long-standing position that Taiwan is part of "one China", challenging the consensus that the two countries have upheld for nearly four decades. Foreign Ministry spokesman Geng Shuang said on Monday that the one-China policy is the political foundation of the Sino-US relationship, and if this foundation is broken, Sino-US cooperation in key areas would have no basis. "We urge the new US administration and its leader to fully understand the high sensitivity of the Taiwan question," Geng said at a regularly scheduled news conference. Geng said the Taiwan question must be handled in a prudent and proper manner to avoid serious damage to Sino-US ties.

38. Experts against US review of China investment deals (Canada)

Washington - US experts said they are against the idea of having every foreign direct investment in the United States made by China's state-owned enterprises (SOEs) scrutinized by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS). The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission has called for such a scrutiny several times, including in its annual report to Congress last month, alleging that the SOEs are used by the Chinese government to advance its national security objectives. Andrew Hunter, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), said the working group of relevant experts it convened in the past year discussed the issue. He described the suggestion as moving away from CFIUS' voluntary filing approach. "And the participants in the process, both private sector and government, basically agreed that that would likely be a bad idea," he said last Wednesday in a press briefing about a new report about CFIUS, an interagency committee of the US government that reviews national security implications of foreign direct investment (FDI) in the US. Hunter, a former Pentagon official, explained that the suggestion could quickly overwhelm the system with an excessive number of cases. "The quality of the reviews would go down very quickly," he said, adding that it would make the system less effective than it is today. In October 2012, a report by the US House Intelligence Committee accused two Chinese telecom equipment manufacturers, Huawei Technologies and ZTE, of posing a national security threat to the US. Investments made by the two companies are well received in other parts of the world. A Rhodium Group report early this month shows that some 80 percent of Chinese FDI in the US in recent years was made by private investors. The report found that the UK, Canada, China, France and Japan were the five countries with the most CFIUS reviews from 2008 to 2014. China leads the number of cases since 2012. "When four of the five are close treaty allies of the United States, that tells me that this is a robust process for all foreign countries," Schaus said. The report indicated that in the case of Wanda's acquisition of AMC, concerns were raised about AMC theaters in US military bases. But Hunter said that the deal was given the green light means the CFIUS process is working and foreign investment from China is welcomed. Schaus does not believe that a Bilateral Investment Treaty (BIT) being negotiated between China and the US will change the situation, citing that Canada is one of the most scrutinized not in terms of frequency.

39. NATO's top decision-making body to discuss N.K. nukes, missiles

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 13

Seoul - The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) is expected to issue a strong warning against North Korea during a meeting of its top decision-making body this week, Seoul's foreign ministry said Tuesday. The North Atlantic Council plans to hold its first-ever special session solely devoted to discussion on Pyongyang's nuclear and missile programs Thursday, according to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "We expect that NATO will send a strong message condemning North Korea's nuclear and missile aspirations," Cho June-hyuck, ministry spokesman, told a regular press briefing. Vice Foreign Minister Ahn Chong-ghae will join the meeting to seek cooperation with NATO members in faithfully implementing the latest United Nations sanctions against North Korea and in applying pressure against Pyongyang, the ministry added. The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) decided last month to slap tougher sanctions against North Korea for its September nuclear test. The UNSC imposed a set of sanctions in March over Pyongyang's fourth nuclear test and long-range rocket launch early this year.

40. Police name terrorist suspects in Jakarta bombing plot

Jakarta Post, Arya Dipa, 2016 12 13

Bandung, West Java - National Police spokesperson Insp. Gen. Boy Rafli Amar said the police had named seven suspects during their investigation into a recent discovery of active explosive bombs in Bekasi, West Java, on Saturday. "As of today, seven people have been named suspects, including the alleged bomb assembler who was arrested in Ngawi, East Java," he said in Bandung on Monday. Boy further said the police had also arrested another bomb assembler and a woman. She was suspected to have been prepared for a suicide bombing mission. Boy said all of those suspects were part of a terrorist network led by Bahrin Naim, who was suspected by the police to have orchestrated terror attacks on Jl. M. H. Thamrin in Jakarta in January. They were also suspected to be part of a terror network behind a suicide bomb attack at the Surakarta Police headquarters in July, he further said.

41. US, S. Korea, Japan vow cooperation over N. Korea sanctions

Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 13

Seoul - Top nuclear envoys from South Korea, the United States and Japan pledged Tuesday to implement new sanctions against North Korea, including capping the country's coal exports to choke off cash flowing into its nuclear weapons program. After meeting in Seoul, the envoys said the countries agreed to maintain an around-the-clock information sharing system to monitor how sanctions are working. Responding to North Korea's nuclear and missile tests this year, the United Nations Security Council recently voted to tighten sanctions by limiting the country's coal exports, one of its major sources of foreign currency. The effectiveness of the sanctions is dependent on the commitment of China, North Korea's most important ally and its biggest buyer of coal. Joseph Yun, U.S. special representative for North Korea policy, said China's announcement over the weekend that it would freeze imports of North Korean coal until the end of the year was an encouraging sign.

42. Cyberattacks On Finance Ministry, Treasury

Radio Free Europe, Christopher Miller, 2016 12 12

Kyiv - Ukrainian authorities are still looking for the culprits nearly a week after troublesome cyberattacks against official financial institutions that appeared to be designed to inflict maximum chaos on end-of-the-year payments. But the head of staff of the Ukrainian Security Service (SBU) identified the so-called malware used in the December 6 attack as the same disruptive software employed in an unprecedented incident a year earlier, blamed on Russia, that cut off power to hundreds of thousands of homes in Ukraine. Hundreds of thousands of hryvnyas' worth of remittances were delayed or stopped completely over the course of two days after hackers knocked the websites and payment systems of the Ministry of Finance, State Treasury, and pension fund offline, according to statements posted to those sites and local reports. The National Police are leading the investigation and have discussed the case with the SBU, Oleksandr Tkachuk, chief of staff of the SBU, told RFE/RL on December 12. The Finance Ministry, which described the incident as a "coordinated professional hacking attack," also claimed the attack had damaged its network equipment.

43. Exxon, Run by Top Diplomatic Nominee, Has Billions at Stake in Russia Sanctions

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, Clifford Krauss, 2016 12 13

Moscow - Now that President-elect Donald J. Trump has chosen Rex W. Tillerson, the chief executive of Exxon Mobil, to be the next secretary of state, the giant oil company stands to make some major gains as well: It has billions of dollars in deals that can go forward only if the United States lifts sanctions against Russia. As head of America's largest oil company, Mr. Tillerson has earned a friendship award from Russia and voiced skepticism about American sanctions that have halted some of Exxon Mobil's biggest projects in the country. But Mr. Tillerson's stake in Russia's energy industry could create a very blurry line between his interests as an oilman and his role as America's leading diplomat. "The chances that he will view Russia with Exxon Mobil DNA are close to 100 percent," said Robert Weissman, the president of Public Citizen, a public interest group based in Washington.

44. Putin's game is to neuter and divide the West - and he is succeeding

London Daily Telegraph, William Hague, 2016 12 13

Column - The Russians know how to make you feel welcome. On my first visit to Moscow as foreign secretary in 2010, whole motorways seemed to have been closed, vodka flowed freely, and the then President Medvedev hosted me at his villa in the woods. They were determined to improve on their terrible relations with the previous Labour government, and so was I. Yet within two years we were at furious loggerheads over Syria, and the year after that we were falling out over the direction of Ukraine. Faced with Putin's invasion and annexation of Crimea, part of another European country, we British were rightly on the side of sanctions, and penalising aggression. The lashings of vodka might as well have been poured down the drain. This is the sad cycle of two decades of Western relations with Russia: optimism from each incoming US president or British government, then disillusionment brought on by behaviour that cannot be accepted. From killing untold numbers of civilians in the bombing of Aleppo to murdering dissidents in London with radioactive polonium, Russia takes actions we find beyond the pale. Now a new US president is about to take office with a fresh determination to do business with the Kremlin, this time unencumbered by the disputes of the past, or indeed any particular knowledge of them. If reports are to be believed, Donald Trump will appoint as his secretary of state an oilman who has done many a deal with Moscow and knows Vladimir Putin personally. While better relations with Russia are a laudable goal, this could be Russia's best chance since the Second World War to weaken and divide the West. Mr Trump has already disavowed the CIA's findings that Russian hacking was designed to promote his victory. That the president-elect of the USA refuses to believe well-founded research by his own agencies is an unmitigated triumph for Moscow. Such tactics can now be used to promote the election of pliable candidates across Europe, with the scope to fund them as well.

45. Putin Says Ready to Meet With Trump at Any Point

Sputnik, Staff report, 2016 12 13

Moscow - Russian President Vladimir Putin said he was ready to meet with US President-elect Donald Trump at any point, but considered it feasible to give him a chance to form administration and take office first. "As far as meetings are concerned, I think it is necessary to give the president-elect time to at least form his administration, take office, and then speak of meetings. We are ready at any point, there are no issues from our side," Putin told the Nippon TV channel and the Yomiuri newspaper. The Russian president said that Russia was yet to understand what Trump meant with his "Make America Great Again" thesis, but hoped there would be no issues for development of bilateral relations.

46. Shelf Life: Russia's Arctic Claims Pose No Danger (Canada)

Sputnik, Staff report, 2016 12 13

Moscow - Climate change has intensified the rivalry over the North Pole and the surrounding swaths of resource-rich territory. With five Arctic states vying for control over the promising northernmost domains, it is Russia that is being categorically portrayed as a security hazard with an insatiable appetite for oil-bearing shelf territories. However, Russia is hardly a threat to its fellow Arctic states, because it is already the dominant power in the Arctic Ocean by virtue of its long coastline and its vast economic activity there, Ingemar Oldberg, an associate researcher at the Swedish Institute for International Affairs (UI) claimed in her opinion piece in Utrikesmagasinet magazine. According to Oldberg, Russia's presence in the Arctic is already strongest in terms of defense. The Russian Northern Fleet, based on the Kola Peninsula, is being enhanced with top-end strategic nuclear-powered submarines and new units specifically adapted to the harsh Arctic climate. Additionally, new permanent bases are being built, and Soviet-era bases are being re-established along the country's entire 4,300 thousand-mile-long Arctic coast, including Franz Josef Land and the New Siberian islands. Despite increased tension, Russia has continued to cooperate with the West in Arctic organizations, which do not deal with military matters. Of...importance is the cooperation within the Arctic Council, which in addition to the Nordic countries and a host of observers also includes the US and Canada. In 2011, a binding milestone agreement on search and rescue cooperation, as well as the joint elimination of oil spills was signed. Despite different views on Crimea's re-unification with Russia, cooperation continued when Canada and the US held the organization's presidency; it placed special focus on the environment and research, and Russia contributed with project money.

47. Some 26,000 Extremist Online Sources Discovered in Russia in 2016 - FSB Head

Sputnik, Staff report, 2016 12 13

Moscow - Russian intelligence services along with law enforcement agencies revealed about 26,000 extremist and terrorist internet-based sources in 2016, which is twice as more than in the previous year, Russia's Federal Security Service (FSB) Director Alexander Bortnikov said Tuesday. "By taking additional measures on protecting the information space, we discovered about 26,000 extremist and terror sources, which is twice as more than in 2015, and counter criminal propaganda of a number of organizations and groups in Internet," Bortnikov said at a session of the National Antiterrorism Committee (NAC). He said that police and FSB managed to liquidate Russian cells of an international Internet community, which had been disseminating radical ideas, recruiting militants for international terror organizations and raising money for terrorist groups such as the Daesh, outlawed in Russia. Russian special services have killed 129 terrorists and have thwarted at least 42 terrorist attacks since the beginning of 2016 Alexander Bortnikov said. "129 militants, including 22 leaders of the criminal underworld, have been neutralized and 898 gangsters and their supporters have been detained [in 2016]," Bortnikov said. He added that terrorist activity has been on decline in Russia.

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 13

Tehran - The Iranian Ground Force unveiled a new drone named 'Farpad' during the massive wargames codenamed 'Mohammad Rasoulallah (PBUH) 4' in the Southeastern parts of the country on Monday morning. The hand-launched drone is run by autopilot and can fly maximum 45 minutes to the range of 20km. Also during the second day of the three-day drills, the Iranian Ground Force unveiled a jamming system which is capable of confronting Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) in a range of 3km and can force it to land after taking its control. The system is also portable by individuals. In another development in the wargames, the home-made Toufan missiles whose range and destruction and precision-striking power have been improved were fired by helicopters and hit simulated enemy's targets precisely.

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 12 13

London - Iran's Defense Minister Hossein Dehghan on Sunday expressed deep concerns striking Tehran on the United States' President-elect Donald Trump rolling back from the internationally-brokered Iran nuclear deal. Dehghan made a loud warning that the caused unease brings about direct threats to peace in the region. Iran's defense minister threatened that a war would destroy Israel and the small Gulf Arab states. He added that a war sparked off in the Middle East might escalate to a world war. Delivering a speech at the 5th Moscow Conference on International Security (MCIS), on Sunday, Dehghan said that "Even though a businessman, the assistants that ... (Trump) has chosen may map a different path for him, and this has led to unease," "Considering Trump's character and that he measures the cost of everything in dollars, it does not seem likely that he would take strong action against our country," he said according to the Mehr News Agency, an Iranian news agency headquartered in Tehran.

50. Alep : John Kerry en appelle à la " compassion " du Kremlin (Canada)

Le Monde, Marc Semo, 2016 12 13

Paris - Résignés sur l'imminente reconquête par le régime et ses alliés russes des quartiers rebelles de l'est d'Alep, les Occidentaux espèrent encore limiter l'ampleur de la catastrophe humanitaire et soulager les souffrances des civils. Mais même sur ce point, ils semblent impuissants. Que pèsent les dénonciations des bombardements massifs et sans discrimination, présentés par le secrétaire d'Etat américain John Kerry comme des " crimes de guerre et des crimes contre l'humanité " ? La résolution adoptée vendredi 9 décembre par l'assemblée générale de l'ONU à l'initiative du Canada et appelant à une trêve immédiate (122 voix pour, 13 contre, 37 abstentions), n'a aucune valeur contraignante. " Il peut y avoir une solution, mais cela dépend des choix importants et magnanimes de la Russie ", a reconnu le chef de la diplomatie américaine en en appelant à la " compassion " du Kremlin lors d'une conférence de presse, samedi 10 décembre à Paris, à l'issue d'une matinée de réunions des ministres des affaires étrangères, une dizaine de pays (Etats-Unis, Grande-Bretagne, la France, Allemagne, pays du Golfe et Turquie) qui, depuis le début du soulèvement syrien, soutiennent la rébellion.

Asharq Al-Awsat, Paula Astih, 2016 12 13

Beirut, Riyadh - The mood prevailing in Aleppo Monday hinted about the fall of the opposition after losing additional areas to Syrian regime forces. Practically, opposition factions now witness a fate similar to thousands of civilians trapped in about 10 kilometer square, seeking to find a safe corridor to withdraw from a city where regime forces have military succeeded. Activist Baha' al-Halabi, who is still present in an opposition- controlled area in Aleppo, said the city now witnesses a "historic massacre." Al-Halabi told Asharq Al-Awsat: "Until now, Moscow refuses to secure a safe exit for opposition fighters and tens of thousands of civilians now sleeping in the streets and the entrances of buildings." The activist added: "People here wish to die every minute... to die quickly and avoid seeing death under the rubble. People mostly fear that regime forces and their allies enter the area."

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 12 13

Taiz - Fierce clashes erupted between pro-government forces and insurgency militias in Yemen's Hajjah governorate, located just off the western front of Sanaa. Fighting extended to Taiz as well, spreading across border territory shared with Saudi Arabia. Insurgency militias have recorded losses in both personnel and artillery. Army intelligence based in the fifth military region, Midi district, reported the death of top militia commander Hussain Rashed Al Husowi along with 18 other militants. The militia ring was neutralized by an air raid staged by the Saudi-led Arab coalition forces. Husowi was believed to have been responsible for the armament of insurgency gunmen across several battlefronts, especially those taking place in the Harad district. At least 27 other militiamen were injured by the strike. The coalition's command room also reported the destruction of a Tochka missile launch pad, along with a military wagon positioned west of the Harad district.

On Monday, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights reported that ISIS troops have "almost completely surrounded" the T4 military airport, one of the largest and most important in the war-torn country. The monitoring NGO added that ISIS was "attempting to advance and storm the airport" amid heavy regime artillery fire and airstrikes, without going into further details on the fighting. Meanwhile, the A3maq news agency affiliated with ISIS touted gains outside the airbase, claiming that the extremist group seized the village of Marhatan outside T4, mountains north of the facility as well as the Jihar junction to the east.

54. Spy cell gave vital military data to Iran

Saudi Gazette, Mansour Al-Shihri, 2016 12 13

Riyadh - The cell of 32 spies for Iran supplied to Tehran 124 intelligence reports containing detailed information about vital military installations in the Kingdom and other security data. The Criminal Court in Riyadh has sentenced 15 of them to death, jailed 15 others to prison terms ranging from six months to 25 years and acquitted two (a Saudi and an Afghan national). The cell, which was busted late 2014 and early 2015, consisted of 30 Saudis, an Iranian and an Afghan national who was a cook at a National Guard camp. Court sources said the cell delivered their reports to Iranian intelligence elements mostly through personal meetings with Iranian undercover diplomats in the Iranian embassy in Riyadh, its consulate in Jeddah and its permanent mission to the Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC) in Jeddah. The methods also included sending through emails coded messages on which they were trained by Iranian intelligence elements.

Beirut - Witness PRH395 testified Monday at the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, answering questions from defense counsel on records of Salim Jamil Ayyash's alleged hajj pilgrimage in the month before the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Ayyash, one of the five individuals accused of orchestrating the assassination of Hariri in February 2005, allegedly made plans to travel to Saudi Arabia for the annual pilgrimage between Jan. 16 and 25, 2005. However according to the prosecution, he later canceled or falsified his visit in order to conceal his movements. Toward the end of the second session of Monday's proceedings, Prosecutor Alison De Bruir noted that, "The person who entered [Saudi Arabia on the discussed hajj passport] was not Ayyash." The bombing in Beirut on Feb. 14, 2005, killed Hariri and 21 others, wounding around 200 more.

56. 20.282 personnes espionnées en un an sur le territoire français

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 12 13

Paris - Dans son premier rapport d'activité dévoilé mardi matin, la Commission nationale de contrôle des techniques de renseignement (CNCTR) évalue que 47% des personnes surveillées l'ont été dans des dossiers terroristes et 29% au titre de la «lutte contre la criminalité organisée» ainsi que de la «prévention des violences collectives». Entre le 3 octobre 2015 et le 2 octobre dernier, quelque 20.282 personnes ont été espionnées par les services français. En dévoilant mardi matin son premier rapport d'activité, la Commission nationale de contrôle des techniques de renseignement (CNCTR) a évalué le nombre d'hommes et de femmes qui ont fait l'objet d'une surveillance. Celle-ci passe par l'emploi de la technique la moins intrusive, à savoir l'obtention des «fadettes» (facturations détaillées) de la personne ciblée jusqu'à des moyens plus lourds, telles que la sonorisation ou l'installation de moyens vidéo dans les domiciles en passant par les interceptions de sécurité, la géolocalisation, l'accès en temps réel aux données de connexion» ou encore l'emploi - encore parcimonieux - des «Imsi catchers» permettant de siphonner à distance les données de connexion des téléphones mobiles.

58. Cybersécurité : la France muscle son arsenal

Paris - Le combat numérique va devenir une arme à part entière des armées françaises, aussi bien offensive que défensive, face à une cybermenace qui vise de plus en plus les intérêts vitaux des États. «L'émergence d'un nouveau milieu, d'un champ de bataille cyber, doit nous amener à repenser profondément notre manière d'aborder l'art de la guerre», a déclaré hier le ministre de la Défense Jean-Yves Le Drian, en dévoilant la doctrine des armées françaises en matière de cybersécurité. Dans un monde de plus en plus interconnecté, les cyberattaques venant d'États, hackers, groupes terroristes ou criminels se multiplient, a relevé le ministre. Elles peuvent paralyser des infrastructures vitales (réseaux téléphoniques, centrales électriques, transport..) tout comme des cibles militaires en tentant de pénétrer les systèmes embarqués d'aéronefs, bâtiments de guerre ou blindés. «L'arme cyber peut avoir des effets tout à fait comparables à l'armement plus conventionnel», a averti Jean-Yves Le Drian en inaugurant les nouveaux locaux de DGA Maîtrise de l'information, qui réunit les cyberexperts de la Défense à Bruz (Ile-et-Vilaine) près de Rennes.

Paris - Confronté au spectre omniprésent d'une nouvelle frappe terroriste treize mois après les attentats kamikazes qui ont endeuillé Paris et Saint-Denis, Bernard Cazeneuve va faire de la sécurité et de la « protection des Français » un axe important de son discours de politique générale. Le nouveau locataire de Matignon, qui vient de la Place Beauvau à l'instar de son prédécesseur Manuel Valls, n'ignore rien de la vague qui monte. Quasiment à chacune de ses allocutions, alors qu'il était encore le premier flic de France, Cazeneuve a brandi l'épouvantail bien réel d'une « menace terroriste d'une ampleur inédite » présentant « des caractéristiques très hétérogènes » et demeurant « complexe à détecter et à prévenir ». Le tableau de la situation est ô combien sépulcral. Le 21 novembre dernier, il rappelait ainsi que le coup de filet mené à Marseille et Strasbourg contre des islamistes sur le point de perpétrer des « attaques coordonnées » portait à pas moins de 418 « le nombre des interpellations d'individus en lien avec des réseaux terroristes réalisées depuis le début de l'année 2016 » .

60. Le Conseil national du numérique hausse le ton face au fichier TES

Le Figaro, Elisa Braun, 2016 12 13

Paris - Le fichage des Français au sein d'une base de données unique inquiète l'organe indépendant Non, c'est non. Le Conseil national du numérique (CNNum) reste intransigeant sur le fichier TES, qui permet au gouvernement de regrouper les données personnelles (sexe, couleur des yeux, taille, photo, empreintes digitales, filiation, nationalité...) de près de 60 millions de Français. Le CNNum en avait déjà demandé la suspension le 7 novembre dernier dans une lettre ouverte au gouvernement, où il déplorait les risques de dérives créées par un tel dispositif. La nouvelle prise de position du CNNum publiée lundi et qui résulte des contributions recueillies par sa plateforme de consultation et d'auditions d'experts, est encore moins tendre avec le gouvernement. Outre la demande réitérée de suspension du fichier, le Conseil préconise dans son rapport l'instauration d'un débat public sur les sujets de l'identité administrative et l'identité en ligne. Il insiste également sur l'«urgence à instaurer une nouvelle gouvernance des choix technologiques au sein de l'État».

61. Surveillance spatiale : la France reste dans la cour des Etats- Unis et de la Russie

La Tribune (France), Michel Cabirol, 2016 12 13

Paris - La direction générale de l'armement a notifié le contrat de modernisation du système de surveillance de l'espace Graves à l'ONERA et à la PME Degreane Horizon. Un enjeu crucial pour la France qui peut ainsi suivre dans l'espace les satellites espions. Le ministère de la Défense lance la modernisation du système de surveillance de l'espace Graves comme l'avait annoncé La Tribune (lien : <http://www.latribune.fr/entreprises-finance/industrie/aeronautique-defense/surveillance-spatiale-la-france-modernise-le-systeme-graves-a-minima-602219.html>). La direction générale de l'armement (DGA) a notifié un contrat pouvant s'élever jusqu'à 40 millions d'euros, qui comprend une tranche ferme et des tranches optionnelles, à deux cocontractants : le centre français de la recherche aéronautique spatiale et de défense l'ONERA et la PME électronique Degreane Horizon, spécialisée dans l'acquisition et l'émission de données sensibles. Cette filiale du groupe Vinci était depuis 2003 un des fournisseurs du centre de recherche français sur ce programme. La DGA a toutefois confié à l'ONERA la responsabilité du maintien des performances du système puis de son amélioration.

62. Un an après sa création, la commission chargée du contrôle du renseignement

Paris - Un an après sa création, la commission chargée du contrôle du renseignement affirme son indépendance L'avis de la Commission nationale de contrôle des techniques de renseignement, née en octobre 2015 pour faire contrepoids aux puissants moyens de surveillance accordés aux services secrets, n'est que consultatif mais le premier ministre l'a suivi dans la plupart des cas.

Pour son premier rapport annuel, présenté mardi 13 décembre, la Commission nationale de contrôle des techniques de renseignement (CNCTR), née, le 3 octobre 2015, pour faire contrepoids aux puissants moyens de surveillance accordés aux services secrets français dans la loi du 24 juillet 2015 sur le renseignement, jouait une part de sa crédibilité. Nommé président de cette nouvelle instance indépendante, Francis Delon, ex- secrétaire général de la défense nationale et l'un des pères fondateurs de la plateforme nationale du renseignement technique qui alimente depuis 2008 la communauté française du renseignement, devait prouver que les premiers soupçons de grande proximité avec l'Etat étaient infondés.

63. Un ex-membre des GAL arrêté en Espagne pour des liens avec l'EI

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 13

Madrid - Un ex-membre des milices parapolicières des GAL a été arrêté mardi à Ségovie en Espagne pour des actions de propagande en faveur du groupe Etat islamique (EI), a annoncé le ministère espagnol de l'Intérieur en assurant qu'il était déterminé à commettre un attentat. L'homme dont l'identité n'a pas été précisée a par le passé "été condamné pour l'assassinat du cheminot français Jean-Pierre Leiba à Hendaye", dans le sud-ouest de la France, le 1er mars 1984, précise le ministère. Jean-Pierre Leiba avait été tué par erreur alors qu'il était en compagnie de trois Basques, un attentat alors attribué aux GAL, des milices qui luttèrent contre l'organisation séparatiste armée ETA, faisant 28 morts dans les années 1980. "Il est considéré comme très dangereux et (les forces de l'ordre) n'excluent pas qu'il puisse avoir accès à des armes à feu", ajoute le communiqué en expliquant que l'arrestation mardi matin à Ségovie, à une centaine de kilomètres au nord de Madrid, avait de ce fait été menée par une unité spéciale d'intervention de la garde civile. Selon le ministère, l'homme né à Irun, ville frontalière du Pays basque espagnol, avait adopté des idées relevant "de l'extrémisme religieux de nature jihadiste et faisait de la propagande pour le compte de Daech", acronyme arabe de l'Etat islamique (EI). Il était "déterminé à commettre un attentat terroriste".

1. CSIS now says it will not report media surveillance

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 12 14

Ottawa - Canada's spy agency has backtracked on its promise to reveal to a Senate committee how many Canadian journalists it spied on in the past, citing operational security. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service said while it "appreciates the importance of the question" to Canadians and the Senate committee on national security and defence, "we regret that we cannot confirm whether journalists have been the subject of any CSIS investigation." Conservative Sen. Claude Carignan called it a "bizarre response" and a "serious" breach of an undertaking to a parliamentary committee. He suggested it implies that surveillance of journalists is either still ongoing or has been recently suspended. "How can it harm operations if you don't have any operations ongoing?" he said in an interview. Carignan, who has tabled a private member's bill to protect journalists' sources, wondered if there had been surveillance operations of media that are currently suspended, especially after the controversial practice surfaced in Quebec where provincial and Montreal police were revealed to have spied on several top investigative reporters and columnists, apparently in search of police leaks. The statement to the committee said CSIS recognizes it "has a duty to fulfil its mandate in a manner that upholds Canadian law and values. "However, we also have a duty to identify and advise government of threats to our national security, and exercise our authorities set out in law to fulfil this mandate. Any individual engaged in threat-related activities may be subject to this kind of lawful investigation, irrespective of their profession. "While CSIS can discuss elements of its relevant policy framework, we cannot provide information regarding whether anyone may or may not have been the subject of investigation. To do so would compromise the integrity of our operations and jeopardize our ability to fulfil the mandate given CSIS by Parliament." Last month, Brian Rumig, assistant director of CSIS operations, conceded it was possible CSIS had in the past spied on reporters, although it has publicly said no reporters are currently under surveillance.

2. Ontario names former intelligence officer to be its first security advisor

It World Canada, Howard Solomon, 2016 12 14

As a sign it is taking cyber security more seriously Ontario has hired a former Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) assistant director of intelligence to be its first provincial security advisor. Ray Boisvert, who has headed a security consulting company iSECIS for four years since leaving CSIS, was named to the post -- which will make him an associate deputy minister in the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services -- by the government this morning. He begins his duties Jan.2 In his role he will provide advice and intelligence on areas of public safety and national security that fall within provincial responsibility, the government said in a statement. "He will support efforts to protect provincial assets from events that could affect services, networks and facilities that are critical to Ontario's economy, public safety and security." He will also engage with key partners on security-related matters. Boisvert will report to the deputy minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services. As a former intelligence operative Boisvert has been a popular interview for news media who doesn't pull his punches. At a conference last year on the state of Canada's critical infrastructure he warned that governments, utilities and financial institutions aren't doing enough to defend critical infrastructure for online attacks. However, he did add that Ontario, New Brunswick and Alberta are ahead of the other provinces and territories.

3. Ray Boisvert named new Ontario provincial security advisor

iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 12 14

Ottawa - The former assistant director of intelligence at CSIS has been named to a newly-created post -- Ontario's provincial security advisor. Ray Boisvert will start in the new role on January 2, 2017, and will be tasked with providing advice and intelligence on national security matters that fall under provincial responsibility, including efforts to build critical provincial infrastructure resilience and engaging with provincial security partners. The position is a new associate deputy minister position within the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. Boisvert will report to the deputy minister of the portfolio while also supporting the cabinet secretary and other senior leaders across the department. Boisvert has more than 30 years of experience in the national security field, including as assistant director of intelligence and director general of the counter-terrorism program at CSIS. Prior to joining CSIS he worked with the RCMP. Most recently he has been president of I-Sec Integrated Strategies, a risk mitigation consulting firm, since his retirement from CSIS in 2012. While the company will remain incorporated during Boisvert's two-year tenure, he will not be doing any contracting or consulting and the other consultants who work with the company will take their work elsewhere for the time being. Boisvert said that while he enjoyed working in the private sector for the last several years, it was time to return to public service "It was time for another new challenge, to build something from scratch in a program that I think everybody seems to recognize is long overdue," he told iPolitics.

4. Surveillance de journaliste Le SCRS renie son engagement... et maintient le flou

La Presse+, Joël-Denis Bellavance, 2016 12 14

Ottawa - Les dirigeants du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) font volte-face : après s'être engagés devant un comité du Sénat le mois dernier à préciser si des journalistes avaient fait l'objet d'une enquête de leur part dans le passé, ils reviennent sur leur parole dans une réponse écrite qui a été envoyée au sénateur conservateur Claude Carignan. Dans leur réponse écrite, les dirigeants du SCRS justifient cette volte-face en affirmant qu'ils pourraient « compromettre l'intégrité des opérations » de l'organisation et « nuire à sa capacité d'exercer le mandat que le Parlement lui a confié » s'ils confirmaient que le SCRS avait déjà eu un journaliste dans sa ligne de mire dans le passé. « Ainsi, le SCRS est au regret de ne pas pouvoir confirmer si des journalistes ont fait l'objet d'une de ses enquêtes, et ce, même si son représentant s'était engagé à donner une réponse spécifique », affirme le SCRS dans sa réponse écrite, obtenue par La Presse.

5. Trudeau must honour promise to protect privacy and amend Anti- terrorism Act

Toronto Star Online, Ann Cavoukian and Michael Vonn, 2016 12 14

Op-ed: In the run up to the passing of the Anti-terrorism Act, 2015 (still branded as "Bill C-51"), huge rallies in protest were held across the country. A leading issue in the public protests was the unprecedented surveillance powers that would be created by Bill C-51 under a stand-alone statute called the Security of Canada Information Sharing Act (SCISA). SCISA allows for personal information in any quantities, including entire databases, to be "shared" among a vast number of federal government entities for "detection, identification, analysis, prevention, investigation or disruption" of "activities that undermine the security of Canada." The "undermining" of security (as opposed to "threatening" security) is a new concept in Canadian law. While we aren't sure just how far the concept extends, SCISA spells out that it includes activities far beyond those relating to public safety. It stretches to public life in general, including "the administration of justice," "the economic or financial stability of Canada" and even extends to activities that "undermine the security of another state." The personal information of Canadians that is subject to this widespread and relatively unfettered disclosure includes information as sensitive as health information and tax information (Health Canada, Veterans Affairs and the Canada Revenue Agency, all being among the entities in the sharing scheme). We join every privacy commissioner in the country in saying that no compelling explanation has ever been provided as to why our previous laws were inadequate for national security purposes, let alone why a "blowing-open-the-barn-door" approach is the appropriate remedy. SCISA has compounded a crisis in public confidence about surveillance in Canada. Against a backdrop of already existing surveillance concerns, this fall's public consultation on the National Security Framework for Canada has been regularly punctuated by bombshell revelations of fresh surveillance scandals: A decade's worth of CSIS violating its duty of candour to the courts when seeking secret warrants; a decade's worth of CSIS illegally collecting metadata; unspecified years of having literally everything ingested into the CSIS bulk data holdings, potentially illegally ("no evidence to indicate that CSIS had appropriately considered the threshold as required in the CSIS Act"). Note: Ann Cavoukian, Ph.D., is the executive director of the Privacy and Big Data Institute at Ryerson University. Michael Vonn is policy director of the B.C. Civil Liberties Association.

6. Author cleared of slandering Muslim school

National Post, Graeme Hamilton, 2016 12 14

Montréal - The criticism Djemila Benhabib levelled against a private Muslim school during a 2012 radio interview was harsh. The school was providing small children indoctrination worthy of a military camp in Afghanistan, she said. It was grooming "fundamental activists." It offered as a model a society "where men are probably going to commit honour crimes against their sisters." But in what her lawyer called a victory for free speech, a judge cleared Benhabib of slander Tuesday, ruling her comments were neither erroneous nor made in bad faith. "Certainly, these remarks are severe and could have been hurtful," Superior Court Justice Carole Hallée wrote. "However they have a place in a democratic society like ours." Benhabib, an author and outspoken critic of Islamist fundamentalism, had begun looking into the Muslim School of Montreal after seeing a brochure in which the female students all wore hijabs. She learned on the school's website that children were memorizing Qur'anic passages that spoke of beautiful virgins awaiting male believers in the afterlife, while non-believers endured the fires of hell. She told radio 98.5FM that the school was instituting a "sexual apartheid" and that it was "very far from the values of our society." The school sued for defamation, seeking $95,000 in damages from Benhabib. It claimed the interview had led students to fear for their safety, necessitating additional security and provoking a drop in enrolment.

7. Canada won't follow U.S. in limiting arms sales to Saudis

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 12 14

Ottawa - Canada will not follow the United States in restricting arms sales to Saudi Arabia - such as a $15-billion Canadian combat-vehicle deal - even though Barack Obama's administration has just curbed some weapons exports to the Mideast kingdom because of the number of civilians the Saudis are killing during strikes in Yemen. Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion said Canada has asked the Saudis to be careful how they use some of their more controversial weapons in Yemen, where Saudi Arabia is leading a coalition of Arab states trying to beat back Houthi rebels backed by Iran. He did not elaborate on these conversations. When asked if Canada would follow the United States, Mr. Dion would say only that he is confident Ottawa can monitor its arms exports for misuse. On Tuesday, Reuters reported that the United States has decided to block some military exports to Saudi Arabia's intervention in Yemen because of concerns over widespread civilian casualties, and will halt a planned arms sale to Riyadh. U.S. officials declined to offer details. But one case put on hold appeared to involve the sale of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of guidance systems manufactured by Raytheon Co. that convert bombs into precision-guided munitions that can more accurately hit their targets. The decision reflects deep frustration within Mr. Obama's government over Saudi Arabia's practices in Yemen's 20-month-old war, which has killed more than 10,000 people and sparked humanitarian crises, including chronic food shortages, in the poorest country in the Middle East. The Saudi-led coalition has been accused of violating international humanitarian law in its strikes on Yemeni targets.

8. Canadian government asked to probe whether Toronto-area man involved in Pakistan mosque siege

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 12 14

Toronto - An attack on a mosque in Chakwal, Pakistan, has led to calls for an investigation in Canada over allegations a Toronto-area man was part of a group that vowed "extreme measures" against the place of worship. A mob of about 1,000 surrounded the mosque belonging to minority Ahmadiyya Muslims, according to Pakistani newspapers The Nation and Dawn, as well as social media posts, some showing video of the damage. The incident Monday reportedly came after locals filed a petition with police claiming "infidels" were illegally occupying the building and unless action was taken "we will be forced to take extreme measures to liberate this mosque." One of the names near the top of the petition was Haji Malik Rashid Ahmed, whom Ahmadiyyas say is a Canadian. A news website run by the Ahmadiyya community reported he had spoken about the issue at mosques in the Chakwal area. The Ahmadiyya Muslim Jama'at

Canada, which represents Canadian Ahmadiyya Muslims, raised the issue at a meeting with Global Affairs Canada, said Asif Khan, the organization's director of public relations. Khan said he informed federal officials that a Canadian was possibly involved and sent them the relevant documentation. He also asked whether Global Affairs would inform the RCMP, or if his organization should do it. "We don't want stuff like that here," Khan said Tuesday. While violence against religious minorities is commonplace in Pakistan, he called the conduct "un-Canadian" and said he hoped whatever laws applied would be enforced.

Au procès, Djemila Benhabib a soutenu qu'elle n'avait pas diffamé l'École musulmane de Montréal. La juge lui a donné raison, hier. «Nous avons gagné, a réagi Mme Benhabib sur Twitter depuis la France, où elle est présentement. Justice a été rendue. Au bout du compte, si nous ne pouvons convenir des modifications à apporter à la table des négociations, le régime actuel demeurera en place », a souligné Mme Daviau à la suite des ententes de principe intervenues depuis la semaine dernière pour le renouvellement du contrat de travail de quatre groupes d'employés fédéraux.

11. U.S. acts on border pre-clearance bill

Vancouver Sun, Jeff Lee, 2016 12 14

Vancouver - Bus, train and cruise ship travel between Canada and the U.S. is set to speed up now that a pre-clearance bill has been adopted by the U.S. Senate, matched by impending Canadian legislation. One of the first beneficiaries of the new law will be Vancouver-based tourist train operator Rocky Mountaineer, which was part of a pilot project approved earlier this year. Once matching Canadian legislation is approved next year, the company expects passengers travelling to the U.S. will be precleared at Rocky Mountaineer's facilities, meaning they no longer have to stop at the border. Another pilot project is at Montreal's main train station. The new bill, called the Promoting Travel, Commerce and National Security Act, is expected to be signed by Barack Obama in one of his last acts as U.S. president. It builds on an established preclearance program now in place at eight Canadian airports, including Vancouver. In signing the bill, the Obama government would pre-empt concerns that the new Donald Trump presidency would tighten border access. Companion Canadian legislation, Bill C-23, received second reading in Parliament in June and is set to receive final reading. In 2015, more than 12 million passengers travelling to the U.S. were cleared at U.S. Customs facilities inside Canadian airports. The new bill adds two more airports, Toronto's Billy Bishop and Quebec City's Jean Lesage.

12. As Exxon Head, Tillerson Put Company's Needs Over U.S. Interests

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 14

Beirut - Struggling to keep Iraq from splintering, American diplomats pushed for a law in 2011 to share the country's oil wealth among its fractious regions. Then Exxon Mobil showed up. Under its chief executive, Rex W. Tillerson, the giant oil company sidestepped Baghdad and Washington, signing a deal directly with the Kurdish administration in the country's north. The move undermined Iraq's central government, strengthened Kurdish independence ambitions and contravened the stated goals of the United States. Mr. Tillerson's willingness to cut a deal regardless of the political consequences speaks volumes about Exxon Mobil's influence. In the Iraq case, Mr. Tillerson and his company outmaneuvered the State Department, which he has now been nominated by President-elect Donald J. Trump to lead. "They are very powerful in the region, and they couldn't care less about what the State Department wants to do," Jean-François Seznec, a senior fellow at the Atlantic Council, a research group in Washington, said of Exxon Mobil's pursuits in the Middle East. Under Mr. Tillerson, Exxon Mobil has struck lucrative deals with repressive governments in Africa, clashed with China and befriended Vietnam over disputed territory in the South China Sea, learned from hard experience in Venezuela, and built a close rapport with Russia at a time of deepening mistrust between the Kremlin and the West.

13. Congress split on how to probe charges against Russia

Washington Post, Karoun Demirjian, 2016 12 14

Washington - Congressional leaders are vowing to vigorously probe allegations that Russia interfered in the elections to benefit President-elect Donald Trump, but they are already arguing over who should do so and how any examination should be conducted. Senior Republicans want to channel any investigation through the House and Senate intelligence committees, over which they have greater control. But some Democrats, fearing that the results of such an investigation would never be released to the public, are pushing the formation of an independent body of outsiders modeled on the Sept. 11 commission. Still other Republicans would like to see a bipartisan investigation in Congress - or better yet, form entirely new congressional committees and subcommittees to dig into the matter. A different group of Democrats would like to see a very unusual bicameral probe into whether Russia allegedly hacked the Democratic National Committee emails and leaked them to WikiLeaks in a concerted effort to damage Hillary Clinton. The cacophony of competing voices on Capitol Hill could hamstring the rare, near-universal commitment to dig into allegations Russia interfered with the 2016 election. It may also allow Trump to discredit lawmakers' efforts as overly partisan - the president-elect has called charges that Russia interfered in the election to benefit his candidacy "ridiculous."

14. Cybersecurity experts see grounds for worry in Trump's Cabinet picks

CNBC, Harriet Taylor, 2016 12 13

New York - President-elect Donald Trump's Cabinet picks and his campaign rhetoric have industry experts worried that his administration will increase surveillance on Americans and gut the regulatory bodies that oversee cybersecurity. "The president-elect, his advisors and future Cabinet members appear to see more enemies lurking in the homeland than in Russia or other cyber superpowers," said David Cowan, an investor in cybersecurity start-ups with Bessemer Venture Partners. "I fear that for the first time, the federal government really does pose a 'Big Brother' threat in cyberspace." In addition to privacy concerns, the U.S. faces enormous threats to critical infrastructure from nation states, criminals and activists, and experts say it's unclear whether Trump will get the right advice on how to protect the country, or whether agencies will be adequately funded to do their jobs. It's not clear how Trump's administration will treat issues like mass surveillance -- an area which was controversial for the Obama administration -- but his Cabinet picks raise concern, said Corynne McSherry, legal director at the Electronic Frontier Foundation. McSherry said Pompeo poses a particularly worrying risk to American citizens' privacy, as he has advocated for things like the routine mass collection and use of "social data" from third parties, like Facebook and Alphabet's Google. Pompeo has also called for Edward Snowden to be put to death, said Chris Calabrese, vice president for policy at the Center for Democracy and Technology.

15. Democratic House Candidates Were Also Targets of Russian Hacking

New York Times, Eric Lipton, Scott Shane, 2016 12 14

Washington - South Florida has long been a laboratory for some of the nation's roughest politics, with techniques like phantom candidates created by political rivals to siphon off votes from their opponents, or so-called boleteras hired to illegally fill out stacks of absentee ballots on behalf of elderly or disabled voters. But there was never anything quite like the 2016 election campaign, when a handful of Democratic House candidates became targets of a Russian influence operation that made thousands of pages of documents stolen by hackers from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in Washington available to Florida reporters and bloggers. "It was like I was standing out there naked," said Annette Taddeo, a Democrat who lost her primary race after secret campaign documents were made public. "I just can't describe it any other way. Our entire internal strategy plan was made public, and suddenly all this material was out there and could be used against me." The impact of the information released by the hackers on candidates like Ms. Taddeo in Florida and others in nearly a dozen House races around the country was largely lost in the focus on the hacking attacks against the Democratic National Committee and Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. But this untold story underscores the effect the Russian operation had on the American electoral system. "This is not a traditional tit-for-tat on a partisan political campaign, where one side hits the other and then you respond," said Kelly Ward, executive director of the D.C.C.C. "This is an attack by a foreign actor that had the intent to disrupt our election, and we were the victims of it."

16. Harry Reid Says Electors Should Have Intelligence Briefing

BuzzFeed News, Ben Smith, 2016 12 14

Washington - Sen. Harry Reid told BuzzFeed News Tuesday that members of the Electoral College should receive an intelligence briefing on Russian interference in the US election before they vote on Dec. 19. The Senate's minority leader was interviewed at a BuzzFeed Brews event, where the retiring Nevada lawmaker also reflected on the state of the US Senate. "I think this is as big a deal as Watergate, as 9/11. I think they should have a 9/11-type commission. I know that [US Sens.] Dianne Feinstein and Ben Cardin and others are calling for that. I think it's a step in the right direction," Reid said. "This is a scandal that has been uncovered." In addition to calling for the commission, Reid said he placed much of the blame on FBI Director James Comey. "I think Comey has done as much to denigrate the FBI in just the short three years he's been here as J. Edgar Hoover did during his time," Reid said.

17. Team Split on Foreign Policy

Wall Street Journal, Carol E. Lee, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 12 14

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump has selected a national- security team whose members hold conflicting positions on some major foreign-policy issues, leaving open the question of how he will exert U.S. power on the world stage. Mr. Trump's core advisers differ on topics including climate change, trade, and the international nuclear deal with Iran. But there is an overarching similarity in their worldviews: that the time has come for a shift from the current U.S. approach to global affairs. Mr. Trump already has demonstrated his intent to upend President Barack Obama's approach to Russia and China by pursuing warmer ties with Moscow and a more confrontational posture toward Beijing. Mr. Obama has sought a closer relationship with China, while aggressively taking on Russian President Vladimir Putin over his interventions in Ukraine and Syria. A transition official advising Mr. Trump said that while there are treaties and alliances the president-elect sees as central to the U.S., much is up for debate as his foreign-policy approach is rooted in having "the ability to look at situations with fresh eyes, but also not be held captive to an ideology or a narrative." "The common thread is you're talking about people who have a vast experience in world affairs," the official said. "They're not coming at it from an ideological perspective or a political perspective, but a perspective of real-world experience."

18. The Perfect Weapon: How Russian Cyberpower Invaded the U.S.

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 13

Washington - When Special Agent Adrian Hawkins of the Federal Bureau of Investigation called the Democratic National Committee in September 2015 to pass along some troubling news about its computer network, he was transferred, naturally, to the help desk. His message was brief, if alarming. At least one computer system belonging to the D.N.C. had been compromised by hackers federal investigators had named "the Dukes," a cyberespionage team linked to the Russian government. It was the cryptic first sign of a cyberespionage and information-warfare campaign devised to disrupt the 2016 presidential election, the first such attempt by a foreign power in American history. What started as an information-gathering operation, intelligence officials believe, ultimately morphed into an effort to harm one candidate, Hillary Clinton, and tip the election to her opponent, Donald J. Trump. Like another famous American election scandal, it started with a break-in at the D.N.C. The first time, 44 years ago at the committee's old offices in the Watergate complex, the burglars planted listening devices and jimmed a filing cabinet. This time, the burglary was conducted from afar, directed by the Kremlin, with spear-phishing emails and zeros and ones. An examination by The Times of the Russian operation -- based on interviews with dozens of players targeted in the attack, intelligence officials who investigated it and Obama administration officials who deliberated over the best response -- reveals a series of missed signals, slow responses and a continuing underestimation of the seriousness of the cyberattack. The D.N.C.'s fumbling encounter with the F.B.I. meant the best chance to halt the Russian intrusion was lost. The failure to grasp the scope of the attacks undercut efforts to minimize their impact. And the White House's reluctance to respond forcefully meant the Russians have not paid a heavy price for their actions, a decision that could prove critical in deterring future cyberattacks.

19. Trump's hostility to intelligence community enters the spotlight

The Hill, Katie Bo Williams, Julian Hattem, 2016 12 14

Washington - Donald Trump's hostile approach to the critically important relationship between the White House and the U.S. intelligence community is unnerving officials and national security scholars. The president-elect has signaled that he intends to treat intelligence with little attention to precedent. Former officials are concerned that the agencies on which Trump will rely to give him a decisionmaking advantage simply won't trust the president-elect -- with dire consequences. "Intelligence officials are always worried about whether the president will have their back, particularly when the world they operate in is dangerous," said Amy Zegart, a co-director of the Center for International Security and Cooperation at Stanford University who studies the intelligence community. "This president is now knifing them from the front."

20. Trump Feud Over Russia Intel Raises Deeper Concerns, Experts Say

NBC News, Benjy Sarlin, 2016 12 14

New York - President-elect Donald Trump's ongoing feud with U.S. intelligence agencies over alleged hacking by Russia is unnerving outside national security experts, some of whom fear the frosty relationship could impact Trump's ability to govern. Of course Trump -- who said in August the intelligence community's performance has been "catastrophic" -- wouldn't be the first president to have a strained relationship with his own agencies. But what separates Trump, some experts say, is his unusually harsh public criticism of the intelligence community's basic worth and a lack of clarity on how he plans to gather facts if he refuses their counsel. "No presidents have been perfectly happy with intelligence assessments because intelligence assessments often bring bad news," David Priess, author of "The President's Book of Secrets" and a former CIA officer and daily briefer to President George W. Bush, told NBC News. "Intelligence has enormous implications for keeping the military safe, preventing threats against the homeland, and foreign diplomacy," Susan Hennessey, a Brookings fellow and former attorney at the NSA, said. "What happens when it goes away, I don't know. We could have a president who is governing based on instinct instead of evidence... There are a number of people in the intelligence community who risk their lives to do this out of a deep sense of patriotism. If those men and women start to hear from the president that he doesn't care so much about their info, he won't read it, he won't believe it, I think really talented people are going to start to think 'Why am I doing this?'"

21. Trump is playing a risky spy game

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 12 14

Column - Intelligence officers like to distinguish between knowable secrets that spies can steal and fuzzier mysteries that have to be assessed without final, definitive proof. The intent of Russia's covert meddling in the 2016 U.S. presidential election is probably somewhere between the two. But after conversations with a half-dozen knowledgeable sources, here are two simple judgments: Russia's secret hacking against Democratic Party officials threatened the integrity of the U.S. political system. And President-elect Donald Trump shouldn't have criticized the CIA after its analysts told Congress about the Kremlin's efforts. Trump, unbelievably, seemed to be taking a potential adversary's side against his own nation's intelligence professionals. The evidence that led CIA analysts to conclude that Moscow's aim in 2016 was to help Trump -- rather than simply spread confusion -- was based on a variety of sources. One indication was that the Russians didn't disseminate information from their snooping into Republican files, as they had with the product of hacking against Democrats; the Russians also didn't disseminate material after Trump's victory. The CIA had other, more sensitive evidence that officials won't discuss.

An administration official wouldn't comment on whether Obama had shared with Trump the intelligence assessment and plan for wider review. But it's unlikely such an important decision wouldn't have been conveyed to his transition team, which makes Trump's Twitter blasts at the CIA last weekend all the more puzzling and disturbing. Perhaps the trickiest task will fall to Rep. Mike Pompeo (R-Kan.), Trump's nominee to head the CIA. He must reassure a battered agency workforce that the next administration values its own intelligence officers and is vigilant against machinations by foreign spies.

22. Security analyst slams Irish backpackers who visited Iraq war zone as 'foolhardy and naive' (Canada)

Irish Independent, Ryan Nugent, 2016 12 13

Dublin - Irish backpackers who visited the front line of a war zone in Iraq have been described as "foolhardy and naive" for associating themselves with Kurdish forces. William Meara (26) and his pal Craig Reynolds (24), who travelled to a notorious front line of war in northern Iraq as part of a backpacking trip around the world, said they were "terrified" when brought to the notorious Daquq last week. After hitch-hiking from the Iranian border to Sulaymaniyah in northern Iraq they made acquaintances with Kurdish freedom fighters, the Peshmerga military force - some of which were fighting from different parts of the world. Mr Meara told the Irish Independent that a Canadian freedom fighter was their link as they visited Daquq the day after a late night drinking session with locals. "He introduced us to his friend. The next morning he decided he'd invite us out and try to get us out on to the front line," Mr Meara said.

23. Twitter fails to deal with far-right abuse, anti-hate crime group tells MPs

The Guardian (London), Jamie Grierson, 2016 12 13

London - The founder of a hate-crime monitoring group has told MPs that Twitter is failing to tackle far-right extremists in the wake of Jo Cox's murder. Fiyaz Mughal, founder of Tell MAMA, which records anti-Muslim abuse, said the group's attempts to report far-right extremism, including voices that call for the eradication of Muslims, had been ignored by the social networking site. Mughal said the state was picking up the bill for dealing with far-right extremism and called for representatives of Twitter to be hauled before the government. "We're talking about individuals who open up websites, name and shame members of the Muslim community, who will give addresses where they're going to speak, who will put them at risk in terms of their social activities," he told the Commons home affairs select committee.

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 14

Melbourne - Lawyers for six Australian men accused of plotting to join an Islamic State faction by boat are worried they may run out of public funding to defend the men. Musa Cerantonio, Paul Dacre, Shayden Thorne, Kadir Kaya, Murat Kaya and Antonio Granata have been charged over an alleged plan to sail from Cape York to the Philippines to join Islamic State sympathisers. The men's defence is being funded by Victoria Legal Aid, and on Wednesday their lawyers requested the Melbourne Magistrates' Court direct the organisation to appear in court and address funding concerns. 25. NZ says government will be money-laundering watchdog for lawyers, estate agents

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 12 14

Wellington - The New Zealand government rejected on Tuesday a proposal for industries to police new money-laundering rules themselves, and will instead leave one government department in charge of supervising thousands more businesses. The Department of Internal Affairs (DIA) would scrutinise the new professions covered by the rules, including lawyers, real estate agents, accountants and car dealers, according to a proposal released by the Ministry of Justice on Tuesday. The new rules will be introduced next year. The government has come under pressure to tackle money laundering since the release in April of the Panama Papers, which showed how offshore companies often use New Zealand trusts as a way to create a secretive untaxed vehicle in the South Pacific nation. The Ministry of Justice said "self-regulating bodies" had no experience in tackling money-laundering and the financing of terrorism. "Having multiple agency supervision by self-regulatory bodies isn't considered appropriate in New Zealand," the ministry said. Money-laundering experts had called for a dedicated supervisory body similar to Australia's Austrac to streamline operations for New Zealand's limited number of compliance experts and ensure consistency in applying the rules.

Pajhwok Afghan News, Pajhwok Report, 2016 12 14

Lashkargah - At least 25 Taliban insurgents have been killed during security forces searching operations in four districts of southern Helmand province, an official said on Tuesday. Provincial police chief, Brig. Gen. Aqa Noor Kintouz, told a press conference on Tuesday that the operations were launched in Marja, Garam Sir, Nawa and Nadali districts of the province. He said that only Nawa district was still with the Taliban but the centers and parts of other districts operated were with Afghan forces. Kintouz said 25 militants were killed during an operation of Afghan ground and air forces in Bashran locality of Lashkargah, the provincial capital on Monday night. The militants supported by Pakistan intelligence agency planned to capture Lashkargah city, but the group failed to achieve such goals, he added.

27. Afghan Taliban release profile of chief Maulvi Haibtullah Akhunzada

The Express Tribune, Tahir Khan, 2016 12 14

Islamabad - The Afghan Taliban on Wednesday released a profile of Maulvi Haibtullah Akhunzada months after he was named the group's chief. The profile detailed Haibtullah's role during Afghanistan's invasion in 2001 and after the deaths of Mullah Omar and Mullah Mansour. The new chief is a strong advocate of Islamic unity, disavowing differences of ideology between Shias and Sunnis, the profile added. Haibtullah was named chief by members of the group's leading council following Mullah Akhtar Mansoor's death in a US drone strike on May 21. Sirajuddin Haqqani alias Khalifa and Maulvi Yaqoob Mujahid, late Mullah Omar's son, were appointed his deputies on the occasion. "It was the courage and strong determination of brave leaders like Sheikh Haibtullah Akhunzada and his faithful colleagues that encouraged and inspired mujahideen of the Islamic Emirate and the Muslim masses of our country," the profile read.

Kabul - The national unity government is investigating the detention of Ahmad Eshchi, a noted tribal elder from northern Jawzjan province, the Presidential Palace said on Tuesday. Whatever its outcome, the investigations would be independently conducted by the judiciary, a statement from President Ashraf Ghani's office said. The government said it considered the protection of people, human dignity and Islamic values in compliance with the country's constitution and international law as its core responsibility. The Presidential Palace assured the Afghans that the case of Eshchi would be investigated and action taken against the culprits. EU members, Australia, Canada and Norway released a statement on Tuesday, asking the Ashraf Ghani administration to formally investigate reports of human rights violations and misuse of authority by Dostum.

31. Church Blast in Egypt Was Prelude, ISIS Warns

New York Times, Nour Youseff, Declan Walsh, 2016 12 14

Cairo - Egypt faced the prospect of a surge in sectarian bloodshed on Tuesday after the Islamic State claimed responsibility for the bombing of a Coptic cathedral in Cairo that killed 25 people on Sunday. The group warned of more attacks to come. As Christians gathered in churches to pay their respects to the victims, most of them women, the Islamic State said it had sent a suicide bomber to the chapel on the grounds of St. Mark's Coptic Orthodox Cathedral, the seat of the Egyptian Orthodox Church. The Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, identified the bomber by his nom de guerre, Abu Abdallah al-Masri. The Egyptian authorities on Monday identified the attacker as Mahmoud Shafik Mohamed Mostafa, but said he had used a different alias. There was no immediate explanation for the discrepancy. A surveillance video made public by the Egyptian authorities showed a figure, said to be Mr. Mostafa, as he entered the church, followed moments later by a blast. It was the deadliest militant attack on Egyptian civilians in years, and the country's worst act of sectarian violence since another Islamist group bombed a Coptic church in Alexandria in 2011. The Islamic State vowed to escalate its "war on polytheism" -- a phrase that, in the Egyptian context, is a thinly veiled reference to Christianity. The threat suggested that the group, which has been battling the Egyptian military in the Sinai Peninsula for years, planned to intensify its operations in Egypt's biggest cities.

32. Egypt: ISIS Claims Responsibility for Coptic Church Attack

Asharq Al-Awsat, Mohammed Shaaban, 2016 12 14

Cairo - ISIS group claimed responsibility for the bombing of a Coptic cathedral in Cairo that killed 24 people on Sunday, following reports issued by Egyptian Security services stating that a terrorist cell with Takfiri ideologies was behind the attack. The security sources said that the terrorist group was inspired by the teachings of Islamist Ideologue Sayyid Qutb, who was executed in Cairo in the mid-1960s, to spread a wave of terror in the Egyptian capital. In a statement issued on Tuesday, ISIS identified the bomber as Abu Abdallah al-Masri. The group warned of more attacks against Christians to come. The Interior Ministry identified the bomber on Monday as 22-year-old student Mahmoud Shafik Mohammed Mostafa, and said he was a supporter of the banned Muslim Brotherhood political movement who had joined a militant cell while on the run from police.

Le Cameroun et le Nigeria font face depuis deux ans à la menace terroriste orchestrée par la secte terroriste Boko Haram dont les exactions ont mis à mal le développement économique des zones frontalières entre les deux pays. Si aujourd'hui les capacités opérationnelles de la secte sont substantiellement réduites, c'est grâce à la pertinente politique de mutualisation des forces, non seulement entre le Cameroun et le Nigeria mais aussi entre les Etats membres de la Commission du Bassin du Lac Tchad à travers la Force mixte multilatérale. Damas, Syrie - Le régime d'Al-Assad a procédé, la semaine dernière, à l'exécution de 300 terroristes étrangers, dont 100 Tunisiens arrêtés depuis 2014. Selon les informations publiées par le quotidien « Al- Chourouk » dans sa livraison d'aujourd'hui, ces terroristes étaient impliqués dans des assassinats de civils syriens et dans des attentats à la bombe ayant visé l'armée syrienne. La journal ajoute, en citant Nouredine Ben Ticha, conseiller à la présidence de la république, que le nombre de terroristes tunisiens se trouvant dans les zones de conflits s'élèverait à 3.600. Plusieurs d'entre eux, ajoute la même source, souhaitent rentrer, mais tous les revenants devraient faire face à la législation en vigueur, précise la même source, faisant allusion aux récentes déclarations du président de la république Béji Caïd Essebsi à ce sujet, qui ont soulevé un tollé général en Tunisie. 35. 22 of Guantánamo's 59 prisoners are now cleared to go

Guantanamo Bay - With the clock ticking toward a possible halt in detainee transfers, the Pentagon disclosed Tuesday that the Obama administration parole panel has cleared another Yemeni "forever prisoner" -- raising to 22 the number of captives who could be gone by the time President-elect Donald Trump takes office. Yassin Qasim Muhammad Ismail Qasim, 37, got to Guantánamo in May 2002 and, though never charged with a crime, was classified for years as a "forever prisoner." Now he's among 22 of the prison's 59 captives who could leave to third country resettlement with security assurances that satisfy Secretary of Defense Ash Carter after 30 days notice to Congress. The inter-agency Periodic Review Board recommended the Yemeni be resettled in an Arab country in the Persian Gulf that has a strong rehabilitation and resettlement program and access to mental health resources. It noted that since it rejected his earlier bid for release in March, Qasim had taken Camp 6 classes, including art, and met with mental health counselors to better himself. Qasim "no longer appears to be driven by extremist ideology," the decision dated Dec. 8 said. Of the 59 captives today, 10 men are charged in the military commissions and 27 are indefinite detainees in the war on terror, "forever prisoners."

Bogota - Colombia's peace deal with leftist FARC rebels cleared a critical hurdle Tuesday, as the country's highest court ruled in favor of a "fast-track" plan to implement the deal as quickly as possible. The 8 to 1 decision by Colombia's Constitutional Court means that congress can seek expedited approval for the laws and constitutional changes needed for the peace accord with the rebels to take effect. The government's deal with the guerrillas to end their 52-year-war, the longest-running conflict in the Americas, was passed by the congress on Nov. 30. The FARC has some 6,000 heavily armed fighters deployed in Colombia's jungles and mountains, and Tuesday's ruling clears the way for them to begin to demobilize and disarm in the coming weeks.

37. After Beijing's Hubris, It's Trump's Turn

Wall Street Journal, Andrew Browne, 2016 12 14

Analysis from Beijing - China's belligerence during the Obama era began with hubris -- a conviction that post-financial-crisis America was in irreversible decline and its own rise was unstoppable. That triumphant sense of destiny abruptly ended decades of foreign-policy caution. Chinese dredgers ripped up South China Sea reefs to build militarized islands. Paramilitary fleets swarmed around islets disputed with Japan in the East China Sea. And China served notice that it not only intended to contest the U.S.-led regional security order, but also reshape the global financial architecture. Nothing symbolized that ambition more than Beijing's successful effort to persuade the International Monetary Fund to ordain the yuan a global reserve currency. Today, as Beijing tries to figure out how to play Donald Trump, the economic fortunes are reversing. The U.S. economy has new wind in its sails. Meanwhile, the Chinese economy is struggling. It isn't a crisis yet. But one is brewing.

38. China confirms official met with Trump adviser in New York

Global Times, Zhao Yusha, 2016 12 14

Beijing - The Chinese foreign ministry said on Monday a Chinese State Councilor met a senior adviser of US President-elect Donald Trump as part of China's efforts to establish connections with Trump. State Councilor Yang Jiechi met Michael Flynn, Trump's choice for national security adviser, during a recent stopover in New York on his way to Latin America, Geng Shuang, a spokesperson for Chinese foreign ministry, told a daily briefing on Monday. The two sides exchanged views on China-US relations and major issues of common interest, said Geng, without mentioning when exactly they met. Flynn is a retired US Army Lieutenant General, who until 2014 was head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, CNN reported. This is China's attempt to build connections with Trump's team, and paves the way for the next meeting, Wu Xinbo, director of the Center for American Studies at Fudan University told the Global Times on Tuesday, who declined to say whether the next meeting will involve other top officials from both sides. The meeting is the first time China has publicly confirmed talks between China and Trump's team, according to Reuters. Wu pointed out that the meeting between Yang and Flynn must have been arranged long before Trump questioned the one-China policy on Sunday, adding that the meeting was unlikely to have been hastily arranged.

39. China should seize opportunity to reshape South China Sea order

Global Times, Liu Zhun, 2016 12 14

Editorial: After a series of visits by leaders of ASEAN states to China, China and ASEAN have found common agreement to prioritize economic cooperation and move forward. A golden opportunity has emerged: It is high time for China and its rival claimants in ASEAN to make major progress in the South China Sea disputes. It's reported that officials and scholars from countries related to the South China Sea issue have met recently to discuss trust-building mechanisms, including nailing down the Code of Conduct, reshaping South China Sea order and the feasibility of joint cooperation on areas including anti-terror, climate change and protecting biodiversity. US President-elect Trump's aggressive posturing against China has generated a lot of uncertainties in many respects, South China Sea disputes included, which have just quieted down after the tricky and stormy international arbitration process in July. Joint efforts from China and the Philippines have brought the derailed Sino-Philippine relationship back on track, which has foiled other claimants' attempt to complicate the situation and prompted them to shelve disagreements with China. Stability and cooperation in the South China Sea can be achieved without interference from external countries. This job had better be done before Trump could make choppy waves in the region.

40. S. Korea to develop long-range air-to-surface missile

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 14

Seoul - South Korea will push to develop its own indigenous long-range air-to-ground missile to cope with the growing military threat from North Korea, the state arms procurement agency said Wednesday. The Defense Acquisition Program Administration (DAPA) plans to start its research on relevant missile technologies from 2018 with a plan to produce some 200 air-to-surface Taurus-class missiles until 2031. The missile will be mounted on the KF-X fighter jets to be developed by mid-2020s. The military will spend an estimated 810 billion won (US$695.2 million) on the project. The missile will be modeled after the Taurus which has a 500-kilometer range and can be fired from the country's F-15K. It is known to be capable of hitting the capital city of Pyongyang when fired from a plane flying over Daejeon, 164 kilometers south of Seoul. The military is currently deploying the German long-range air-to-ground missile within this year.

41. Trump's foreign policy lineup mounts challenges for Seoul

Korea Herald, Shin Hyon-hee, 2016 12 14

Seoul - With an atypical pick for secretary of state, US President-elect Donald Trump is forecast to abate his predecessor's refocus toward Asia while toughening the stance against North Korea over its nuclear program. The billionaire real estate magnate picked ExxonMobil Chief Executive Rex Tillerson to be his secretary of state Tuesday. The announcement effectively completed his foreign policy team, which includes Secretary of Defense-designate retired Marine Gen. James Mattis and Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs-nominee retired Army Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who ran the Defense Intelligence Agency until 2014. The lineup is in stark contrast to that of President Barack Obama, who's choices were a politician with ample experience in a congressional foreign policy committee, a science and international affairs professor and a senior research fellow at prominent foreign policy think tanks. While Trump has yet to present any of his diplomatic and security visions, the nominations are further magnifying uncertainties over Washington's policy on the Korean Peninsula and the region in general.

42. 'Assange' Doc Suggests Russia Knew In Advance Ed Snowden Would Spy on NSA
Heat Street website, Louise Mensch, 2016 12 14

New York - Senior Russian intelligence officers from Cuba visited the head of Ecuadorean intelligence in Quito, days before Edward Snowden stole a tranche of top-secret files from the National Security Agency in the United States. A classified document held by SENAIN, Ecuador's spy agency, in its embassy in London, reveals that Colonel Alexander Kazalupov of the FSB, and his deputy, one Igor Lebedev, were given a letter of credentials by the then Russian Ambassador to Ecuador, Yan Burliay, introducing them to the head of SENAIN in Ecuador's capital. The short letter is dated April 4th, 2013, and confirms a meeting on the same day at ten o'clock in the morning. Diplomatic language is used in the short note, and the Ambassador states the meeting is "in order to address issues of bilateral cooperation". The note is a record of a meeting between Russian and Ecuadorean spies in Quito, Ecuador. Ostensibly, it appears to have no relevance to Julian Assange or to Wikileaks. However, it was held by SENAIN at the Ecuadorean embassy in London, where Julian Assange has asylum, among files relating to him. The document strongly suggests that both Ecuador and Russia knew in advance that Edward Snowden would steal highly classified files from the NSA, using his position as a contractor with Booz Allen Hamilton, before Snowden took them.

46. Poutine, grand vainqueur de la bataille

Le Monde, Marc Semo, 2016 12 14

Moscou - Les dérobades répétées des Américains et des Européens ont permis à la Russie d'être le maître du jeu tournant majeur dans le conflit syrien, la reconquête par le régime de l'ex-capitale économique du pays est aussi une défaite pour les Occidentaux. Elle pourrait avoir de très lourdes conséquences, en premier lieu pour les Européens, avec dans les semaines à venir un nouvel afflux de réfugiés vers la Turquie et une radicalisation croissante des groupes combattant en Syrie. Mais c'est avant tout la crédibilité stratégique de Washington comme des grandes capitales occidentales - à commencer par Paris -, engagées depuis près de cinq ans dans le soutien à l'insurrection démocratique, qui s'en trouve sérieusement ébranlée. Jamais, depuis la fin de la guerre froide, Américains et Européens ne se sont montrés aussi impuissants face à Moscou. Au-delà des mots, parfois très forts, comme ceux lancés par l'ambassadrice américaine à l'ONU, Samantha Power, - " Ce n'est pas du contre-terrorisme, mais de la barbarie " -, ils se sont vite résignés à l'inéluctable, comme si la logique des blocs était toujours en place. New York Times, Rukmini Callimachi, 2016 12 14

Erbil, Iraq - The Pentagon announced on Tuesday that a United States airstrike had killed three Islamic State operatives who were involved in mounting terrorist attacks in Europe, including the deadly assault in Paris in November 2015. The three men were killed on Dec. 4 in an airstrike in Raqqa, Syria, the Islamic State's declared capital, said Peter Cook, the Pentagon press secretary. He described the men as "leaders, directly involved in facilitating external terror operations and recruiting foreign fighters." Until his reported death by drone strike in August, Abu Muhammad al-Adnani, the Islamic State's spokesman, led its external operations branch, and he in turn relied on two lieutenants. Those men have been identified by other members of the group by their noms de guerre, Abu Souleymane and Abu Ahmad, and their real identities remain debated. Salah Gourmat and Sammy Djedou, two of the three operatives the Pentagon said had been killed this month, were described as "close associates" of Mr. Adnani, helping him carry out the Nov. 13, 2015, Paris attacks, which killed 130 people. Killed along with them was Walid Hamman, described as "a suicide attack planner," who was convicted in absentia in Belgium for a plot that was thwarted in 2015. The presence of those names together evokes a fourth: All three were part of a network led by Boubaker al-Hakim, a senior French jihadist and "one of the most dangerous terrorists in the world," according to Jean-Pierre Filiu, a specialist at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris. The United States announced that Mr. Hakim had been killed in an airstrike in Raqqa on Nov. 26. Mr. Hakim, 33, a French citizen of Tunisian descent, was accused of acting as the mentor to the brothers who carried out the attack on the offices of the satirical newspaper Charlie Hebdo in Paris, killing 12 people on Jan. 7, 2015. He is also suspected of having inspired the Islamic State-led attack on the National Bardo Museum in Tunisia two months later, killing 22 people.

49. Iranian Ground Force Unveils 2 New Drones in Last Day of Drills

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 14

Tehran - The Iranian Ground Force unveiled two new home-made drones during the last day of the massive 'Mohammad Rasoulallah (PBUH) 4' wargames underway in the Southeastern parts of the country on Tuesday morning. The two drones are capable of carrying out combat and reconnaissance missions. The combat drone can carry new home-made air-to-ground missiles. The reconnaissance, 'Oqab (Eagle)', enjoys 24 hours of flight durability. Also, during the third and last day of the massive drills, two Phantom and Mirage fighter jets flew over the drills zone in the Southeastern parts of the country. The Phantom fighter jet was equipped with two 500-ton bombs fired at simulated enemy's targets. The Iranian Ground Force had also on Monday unveiled a new drone named 'Farpad' during the 'Mohammad Rasoulallah (PBUH) 4' wargames.

50. Iran to work on nuclear-powered boats after US 'violation' of deal

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 12 14

Beirut - Iran's President Hassan Rouhani ordered scientists on Tuesday to start developing systems for nuclear-powered boats, in reaction to what he called the United States' violation of a global atomic deal. The announcement marked Iran's first concrete response to a US Congress decision last month to extend legislation making it easier for Washington to reimpose sanctions on Tehran. Mr Rouhani described the technology as a "nuclear propeller to be used in marine transportation," but did not say whether that meant just ships or also submarines. Iran said in 2012 it was working on its first nuclear-powered sub. His words will stoke tensions with Washington, already heightened by comments from US president elect Donald Trump who has vowed to scrap the deal, under which Iran agreed to curb its nuclear activities in exchange for lifted sanctions.

51. Will Liberated Areas in Iraq Become Incubators for ISIS?

Asharq Al-Awsat, Waleed Abdul Rahman, 2016 12 14

Cairo - Egyptian experts on Islamic movements have warned from a real tragedy in the regions liberated from ISIS especially in Iraq, where people suffer from severe neglect and lack of services. According to experts, extremism shown by Shi'ite militias creates extremism in other parties. This warning answered a question raised by Asharq Al-Awsat on whether Iraqi liberated areas would become a new incubator for ISIS. In the same context, a research study conducted in Cairo said that some Shi'ite and Kurdish armed factions have controlled the regions liberated from ISIS, redrew their maps, and evacuated them from their majority of Sunni residents, foreshadowing a close sectarian discord among different components of the Iraqi people. ISIS has witnessed daily losses in Iraq -the land of its so-called Caliphate- caused by the strikes of the international coalition and the Iraqi army. These losses devastated its dream of establishing a state and pushed many of its militants to escape war fires.

52. After Aleppo, Russia and Syria to undo Palmyra humiliation

Gulf News, Sami Moubayed, 2016 12 14

Beirut - When the Russian and Syrian armies captured the ancient city of Palmyra from the so-called Daesh nine months ago, they promised that this would set the blueprint for future victories in different Syrian towns and cities. Much of the high optimism was built on the fact that ever since the Russian Air Force joined the Syrian battlefield in September 2015, the armed opposition had failed to occupy a single city and were on the defensive, very much unlike their battle stamina during 2012-2015. Thanks to Russia, government troops have retaken most of the hills surrounding the port city of Latakia, overlooking rebel-held Idlib, and entire stretches of land in the countryside of Homs. Russia's battlefield performance was often contrasted with that of the Iranians, who famously failed to protect major Syrian cities like Deir Al Zor, Raqqa, Al Bu Kamal, Idlib, and Aleppo, from a domino effect of military collapse into the hands of the armed opposition.

53. Aleppo's fall will transform the war

Globe and Mail, Rolf Holmboe, 2016 12 14

Op-ed: Aleppo has fallen. Rebel officials said late Tuesday that fighting in East Aleppo had ended, and that a ceasefire would allow the remaining insurgents and civilians trapped in the city to flee to the countryside of western Syria. Why is Aleppo so important? Conquering Aleppo does not mean that the war will end, but it will transform it. In any case, it is Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's bid to end the war on his terms in the following phase. With a successful offensive, Mr. al-Assad will, first, have straightened his front line toward a defensible one. He will be in possession of the viable western part of Syria with all the main cities and economic infrastructure. And most importantly, the rebels will not possess a contiguous and economically viable part of Syria based on the economic centre of Syria, Aleppo. This will, in their thinking, allow Russian President Vladimir Putin to present a fait accompli: the West will have to make a deal with Mr. al-Assad because a strategy of support to isolated rebel pockets would no longer be viable and would just be prolonging the suffering. Second, Mr. al-Assad is positioned to directly benefit from the international coalition's offensive on the Islamic State. Note: Rolf Holmboe is a research fellow at the Canadian Global Affairs Institute and a former Danish ambassador to Syria, Lebanon and Jordan from 2012-15

54. Aleppo battle ends, but war far from over

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 12 14

Beirut - Rebel resistance in the Syrian city of Aleppo ended Tuesday after years of fighting and months of bitter siege and bombardment that culminated in a bloody retreat, as rebels agreed to withdraw in a cease-fire. The battle of Aleppo, one of the worst of a civil war that has drawn in global and regional powers, has ended with victory for Syrian President Bashar Assad and his military coalition of Russia, Iran and regional Shiite fighters. For rebels, their expected departure with light weapons starting Wednesday morning for opposition-held regions west of the city is a crushing blow to their hopes of ousting Assad after revolting against him during the 2011 Arab uprisings. However, the war will still be far from over, with rebels retaining major strongholds elsewhere in Syria, and Daesh (ISIS) holding swaths of the east and recapturing the ancient city of Palmyra this week.

55. Clashes erupt as Aleppo evacuation delayed

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Aleppo - The planned evacuation of rebel districts of Aleppo stalled on Wednesday as air strikes and heavy shelling hit the city and Iran was said to have imposed new conditions on the deal. Iran, one of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's main backers in the battle for Aleppo, wanted a simultaneous evacuation of wounded from the villages of Foua and Kefraya that are besieged by rebels, according to rebel and U.N. sources. Rebel groups said that was just an excuse to hold up the evacuation, which a pro-opposition TV station said could now be delayed until Thursday. A ceasefire brokered on Tuesday by Russia, Assad's most powerful ally, and Turkey was intended to end years of fighting in the city, giving the Syrian leader his biggest victory in more than five years of war. But air strikes, shelling and gunfire erupted on Wednesday morning and a monitoring group said the truce appeared to have collapsed. Syrian state television said rebel shelling of the Bustan al-Qasr district, recently recaptured by the army, had killed six people.

56. Fierce fighting halts Aleppo evacuation

BBC News, Staff report, 2016 12 14

London - A deal to evacuate rebel fighters and civilians from eastern Aleppo appears to have stalled, with heavy shelling reported in the Syrian city. A ceasefire was declared in Aleppo on Tuesday and buses brought in to ferry people out of the devastated enclave. But fighting resumed on Wednesday. Syrian activists also say air strikes over rebel-held territory have resumed. The breakdown of the deal, brokered by Russia and Turkey, is being attributed to demands from the Syrian government. It is said to be seeking the evacuation of its own injured fighters and civilians from nearby towns encircled by opposition forces.

58. Syrian Regime, Iraqi Militia Reportedly Killing Aleppo Civilians

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 12 14

London - The U.N. human rights office said on Tuesday it has received reports of Syria's pro-regime forces and allied Iraqi militias killing at least 82 civilians in eastern Aleppo in four different neighborhoods in the last few days. Rupert Colville, spokesman for the U.N. human rights office, says the reports recount pro-regime forces entering homes and killing some civilians "on the spot" in the former rebel enclave. He said he feared retribution against thousands of civilians believed to be holed up in a "hellish corner" of less than a square kilometer of opposition-held areas. Its capture was imminent, he said. "In all, as of yesterday (Monday) evening we have received reports of pro-government forces killing least 82 civilians, including 11 women and 13 children, in 4 different neighborhoods - Bustan al-Qasr, al-Fardous, Al-Kalrasah and al- Saliheen," Colville told a news briefing, naming the Iraqi armed group Harakat al-Nujaba as reportedly involved in the killings.

59. Une étape nouvelle dans une guerre, loin d'être finie

Le Figaro, Isabelle Lasserre, 2016 12 14

Alep - Elle a beau avoir été anticipée depuis longtemps, la chute d'Alep est un tournant décisif dans la guerre de Syrie. Elle réduit presque à néant la capacité de l'opposition à poser un défi militaire au régime et balaye son espoir de se poser en alternative politique. Elle remet solidement en selle Bachar el-Assad, auquel les soutiens russe et iranien assurent une nouvelle jeunesse politique, au moins à moyen terme. Mais la chute d'Alep ne signe pas la fin de la guerre, seulement son entrée dans une nouvelle phase. Cette dernière passera sans doute, pour le pouvoir, par la nécessaire sécurisation des gains territoriaux mais aussi par la prise de contrôle, par la force, des régions de la « Syrie utile » qui lui échappent encore. Au passage, le processus de paix de Genève pourrait bien être emporté. « Je crois qu'il est très tard pour une solution politique » à laquelle n'adhèrent ni la Russie ni le régime de Damas, commente David Petraeus au Dialogue de Manama organisé à Bahreïn par l'IISS (International Institute for Strategic Studies). Le général américain, qui fut chargé de pacifier le nord de l'Irak après l'invasion américaine de 2003, considère qu'une partition de la Syrie « est une solution possible ». Mais la fragmentation du pays, qui se prépare depuis de longs mois, ne ramènera pas forcément la paix et la stabilité. La reprise, dimanche, de Palmyre par l'État islamique vient opportunément le rappeler. Elle est un revers pour le régime et pour la Russie, qui avaient chassé Daech de cette ville du centre du pays en mars. Malgré les déconvenues qu'ils subissent sous les coups de la coalition, les djihadistes ont toujours du ressort. C'est une loi de la guerre : il est souvent plus difficile de tenir une ville que de la faire tomber.

60. Au coeur des services secrets de Daech

L'Express, Boris Thiolay, 2016 12 14

Raqqa - L'organisation djihadiste possède ses propres unités de renseignement. Ce sont elles qui ont planifié les attentats menés en France et Belgique en 2015 et en 2016. Enquête sur un corps d'élite toujours menaçant. L'homme, encagoulé et revêtu d'un uniforme camouflé, parle un français sans accent. Derrière lui, dans un décor de ruines, un prisonnier bâillonné est attaché, les bras en croix. La vidéo, diffusée sur Internet le 26 novembre dernier, est censée avoir été tournée à Raqqa, la capitale « régionale » de l'organisation Etat islamique (Daech) en Syrie. Le djihadiste, surnommé Abou Souleymane al-Firansi (« le Français »), donne une abjecte leçon de meurtre au couteau, désignant les zones vitales sur le corps du prisonnier. Il tend l'arme blanche à un comparse. Ce dernier tranche les poignets et la gorge du supplicié. Puis, Abou Souleymane, dont l'identité est encore inconnue, montre, avec l'agilité d'un combattant d'élite, les techniques pour attaquer un « mécréant ». Ce vademecum du terrorisme individuel peut être vu comme une réplique à un événement survenu en France, cinq jours plus tôt. Le 21 novembre, les policiers de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) ont démantelé une cellule djihadiste qui prévoyait de commettre des tueries dans Paris et en Ile-de-France, le 1er décembre. Ce petit groupe était « téléguidé » depuis la Syrie par un membre francophone de Daech.

61. Berlin craint des cyberattaques russes

Tribune de Genève, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 14

Berlin - Les renseignements soupçonnent Moscou de préparer des opérations de propagande pour influencer la campagne de 2017. Après les cyberattaques qui ont émaillé la campagne électorale américaine, les Allemands redoutent à leur tour d'être victimes d'une opération de déstabilisation de la part des services secrets russes. Selon les services allemands de renseignements (Verfassungsschutz), chargés du contre-espionnage, les responsables politiques risquent fortement d'être visés par des cyberattaques et des opérations de propagande pendant la campagne électorale. « Selon nos informations, il est clair qu'on cherche à influencer les élections de l'année prochaine en discréditant des responsables politiques », a affirmé Hans-Georg Maassen. Le patron du renseignement allemand estime que les campagnes de désinformation russes ont pris beaucoup d'ampleur depuis la crise ukrainienne en 2014. Moscou aurait engagé « d'énormes moyens » pour financer les médias d'Etat, les instituts politiques proches du Kremlin et surtout les réseaux sociaux afin de brouiller les cartes du discours politique allemand et de créer ainsi un climat de peur au sein de la population.

62. Du « Rainbow-Warrior » aux macaques du Japon, les deux vies d'un ex-espion

Le Monde, Philippe Bernard, 2016 12 14

Non identifié - La sélection pour un concours de photographie d'une image prise par l'ex-agent secret Alain Mafart fait polémique. James Bond avait prévenu: on ne vit que deux fois. Alain Mafart, ancien agent secret français condamné pour sa participation au sabotage du Rainbow-Warrior en 1985, a refait sa vie. Personne n'y prêterait attention si sa nouvelle existence ne venait soudain de percuter douloureusement la première. Alain Mafart, 65 ans, s'est reconverti en photographe animalier. D'un reportage au parc aux singes de Jigokudani, au Japon, il a rapporté une photo attendrissante, du genre de celles que l'on s'attend à voir sur un calendrier mural d'une association d'amis des animaux. On y voit la tête d'un bébé macaque endormi, caressée par la main de sa mère dans un geste protecteur. L'image fait partie de la sélection du Musée d'histoire naturelle de Londres pour son concours annuel de photographie de nature. Or, dans sa première vie, Alain Mafart a participé au meurtre d'un photographe militant pour la défense de l'environnement et contre le nucléaire. En novembre 1985, quatre mois après avoir contribué à la destruction du chalutier de Greenpeace dans le port d'Auckland (Nouvelle-Zélande) pour l'empêcher de protester contre les essais nucléaires français dans le Pacifique, Alain Mafart, agent de la DGSE, a été condamné à dix ans de prison pour «homicide involontaire» par la justice néo-zélandaise.

63. Germany needs to respond to state-sponsored Salafism, experts say

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Berlin - Berlin's relations with some of its main partners in the Middle East were under critical scrutiny on Tuesday after a leaked intelligence report linked the governments of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Qatar with Salafist movements in Germany. It has long been suspected that states in the Middle East support the missionary efforts of Islamic fundamentalists. This report, carried out by Germany's domestic and foreign spy agencies on behalf of the German government, is noteworthy in that it names three Salafist organizations it says are "closely connected with government offices in their home countries." The report added that "global proselytizing" remains part of Saudi Arabia's "reason of state" and an integral part of Saudi foreign policy. The report predicts that Salafist organizations will "continue to expand their activities in Europe and Germany." Germany's foreign intelligence agency, the BND, declined to confirm the accuracy of the leaked excerpts or give any further details from the report, saying that it only provided information to the government. But experts say that the warning about state-sponsored Salafism should be taken seriously. "I think these reports are credible," Sebastian Sons from the think tank German Council on Foreign Relations told Deutsche Welle. "It's well known that for decades Saudi Arabia has been launching missionary initiatives throughout the world, both by using private foundations and by sending clergymen abroad. Saudi Arabia wants to present itself as the leader of the Sunni Islamic world."

64. La France s'engage sur le terrain de la cyberguerre

La Croix, Raphaël Baldos, 2016 12 14

Rennes - Le ministre de la défense, Jean-Yves Le Drian, a dévoilé lundi près de Rennes la mise sur pied d'une cyber-armée placée sous l'autorité d'un commandement spécifique. La France a officiellement admis qu'elle aura une capacité offensive dans le domaine très nouveau de la guerre électronique. Elle va se doter d'une force de 3200 personnes, dont 2600 cyber-soldats, d'ici à 2019. Ils seront sous les ordres d'un commandement distinct. Et l'État va consacrer un milliard d'euros à la cyber-défense sur l'ensemble de la durée de la loi de programmation militaire, soit de 2014 à 2019. La moitié devra financer des activités de recherche et d'équipement. Un dispositif détaillé lundi par le ministre de la défense à Bruz (Ille-et-Vilaine), près de Rennes, où il inaugurerait les nouveaux locaux de la DGA Maîtrise de l'information, qui réunit les cyber-experts de la défense. Quelles seront les missions de cette « quatrième armée »? La nouvelle cyber-force aura trois missions: le renseignement, la protection des réseaux et la lutte informatique offensive: « Nos capacités cyber-offensives doivent nous permettre de nous introduire dans les systèmes ou les réseaux de nos ennemis afin d'y causer des dommages, des interruptions de service ou des neutralisations temporaires ou définitives, justifiées par l'ouverture d'hostilités à notre rencontre. »

65. Police identify two militants in twin Istanbul bombings

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Istanbul - Anti-terror police in Istanbul have reportedly identified two militants who carried out the Dec. 10 twin bomb attacks in the heart of the city, which claimed 44 lives and injured hundreds. After investigating city surveillance cameras, police revealed that two militants scouted police stations around the city before eventually heading toward the Besiktas neighborhood. One of the militants got out of the car near Maçka Park, the site of the second bombing. Police have also revealed that the car used in the attack was bought online and delivered to the militants through a third person. According to investigations at the scene, a C-4 plastic explosive strengthened with metal pieces was placed inside the car and the suicide vest of the second bomber also included the plastic explosive.

66. Turkey urges EU to take concrete steps against PKK activities across Europe

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Istanbul - Ankara has reiterated its concerns over the activities of the PKK terror group across European cities, urging EU authorities to go beyond rhetoric in supporting Turkey's fight against the terror organization. Speaking on the issue, Foreign Minister Mevlüt Çavusoglu criticized yesterday the EU's stance against terror for not achieving any substantial results. "The EU is reaching a realistic base on its Turkey policies, however, we now expect results. We are always ready for dialogue with the EU. Europe is a continent that also includes us. A common effort should be put forward for the solution to problems," the foreign minister said during a press conference with his Czech counterpart Lubomir Zaoralek in Ankara. Ankara has long criticized the European Parliament's (EP) attitude towards the PKK terror group, as the EP has shown tolerance towards the terror group.

67. Un djihadiste belge tué à Raqqa par la coalition

Le Soir, L. Co. et L.Po., 2016 12 14

Raqqa, Syrie - Une frappe aérienne de la coalition luttant contre l'État islamique a tué trois responsables du groupe djihadiste « directement impliqués dans des attentats extérieurs (à la Syrie) et dans le recrutement de combattants étrangers », lors d'une frappe aérienne le 4 décembre à Raqqa, en Syrie. Deux de ces trois hommes, le Français Salah Gourmat et le Belge Sammy Djedou, auraient selon le Pentagone, « aidé à la préparation des attentats du 13 novembre 2015, à Paris ». Converti à l'islam à 15 ans, Sammy Djedou s'était radicalisé, selon les dires de ses proches, alors qu'il fréquentait une mosquée de Laeken. Le jeune homme avait fini par profiter de l'absence de sa mère, en visite chez une amie en Allemagne, pour quitter la Belgique et rejoindre dès 2012 les rangs de Daesh en Syrie. Là, il avait pris pour nom de guerre Abu Musab al-Belgiki. Néanmoins, son nom n'avait jamais été cité auparavant dans le dossier parisien. Ni même en tant que haut responsable du groupe djihadiste. Mardi, Véronique Loute, la maman de Sammy Djedou qui avait fondé l'ASBL « Parents concernés », a confirmé à la RTBF la mort de son fils. Walid Hamman, le troisième tué, était également connu des autorités judiciaires belges. Il a été condamné par contumace à cinq ans de prison dans le cadre du procès de la cellule terroriste de Verviers.

1. Operation Picnic was secret phone-tapping feast for RCMP, historian discovers

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - The federal government secretly gave RCMP security officials the authority to tap telephone calls without court oversight during the Cold War, newly unearthed archival documents show. The surveillance program, codenamed "Picnic," began as an emergency effort during the Korean War, but federal agencies collaborated with telephone companies in 1954 to continue the wiretaps, says Dennis Molinaro, who teaches history at Ontario's Trent University. Molinaro's research indicates the RCMP security branch was listening in on the embassies of East Bloc countries, "certain unfriendly organizations" and individuals suspected of disloyalty. It has long been known the Mounties kept an eye on a wide array of people and organizations - from church and gay rights groups to Quebec separatists and Communists - in the name of national security, amassing hundreds of thousands of dossiers. Mountie scandals in the 1970s led to a royal commission, the demise of the RCMP security service and creation in 1984 of the civilian Canadian Security Intelligence Service. Molinaro believes the documentation he has uncovered with the help of tenacious staff at Library and Archives Canada helps flesh out how the RCMP surveillance of Canadians took place and implicates federal politicians and bureaucrats in making it happen. The issue of when - and how easily - police and intelligence services should be allowed to intercept personal communications continues to play out today, fuelled by former U.S. spy contractor Edward Snowden's revelations of widespread surveillance. "We can't evaluate where we're going next - or even where we are in the present, accurately or effectively - if we don't know where we've been," Molinaro said in an interview.

2. B.C. man arrested on terror peace bond

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 12 15

Toronto - A British Columbia man has been arrested on a terrorism peace bond, officials said Wednesday, marking the 19th time since last year police have used the legal tool against suspected extremists. Khalid Ahmed Ibrahim was to appear in provincial court in New Westminster, B.C. on Dec. 20. Police told the court on Dec. 8 there were reasonable grounds Ibrahim "may" commit a terrorism offence. He has also been charged with uttering threats, court staff said. The threatening charge dates to July 19 and was to return to court Dec. 21. No further details about Ibrahim or the allegations were available. The arrest was made by RCMP in B.C., according to the Public Prosecution Service of Canada. "We're not commenting on it," said Sgt. Annie Linteau, spokeswoman for the RCMP in the B.C. Lower Mainland. She did not explain why the RCMP was keeping quiet. Peace bonds are not a criminal charge but rather impose conditions on the conduct of those subjected to them. Frequently suspects cannot travel, use the Internet or associate with other known extremists for one year. Police have been increasingly using peace bonds in terrorism cases in an attempt to cut suspected extremists off from ISIL and al-Qaida online propaganda and prevent them from leaving Canada to join terror groups. Since last year, when changes to Canada's anti-terrorism laws made it easier to obtain terrorism peace bonds, police have sought them from the courts in 19 cases, mostly in Ontario and Quebec.

3. Battle for Mosul will shape Canada's ground commitment in Iraq

CBC News, Murray Brewster, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Canada will continue to have a military mission in Iraq through 2017, but the size and scope of it have yet to be determined, the country's defence minister said in advance of an international meeting with allies battling ISIS. Defence planners have been spinning various scenarios for months, but the Liberal government committed -- when it overhauled the mission against ISIS last February -- to reviewing the deployment of special forces, helicopters, surveillance planes, an air-to-air refueling jet and a military field hospital. The assessment is due by March of next year, but the last budget numbers put before Parliament have set aside only $41 million for the operation, less than one-third of what's being spent in the current budget year. Earlier in the fall, the country's operations commander, Lt.-Gen. Steve Bowes, said the military had been given orders, but its "posture is not oriented towards" an extended mission. Asked on Wednesday whether the military commitment would continue, Sajjan told CBC News: "Absolutely." Iraqi security forces are still involved in the battle to retake Mosul, the country's second-largest city, from deeply entrenched ISIS fighters. Iraqi forces are being aided by Canadian and allied special forces soldiers, who are providing not only advice, but covering fire.

4. Canadian officials meet detained Canadian in North Korea

Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 15

Seoul - Canadian officials visited North Korea and met with Canadian detainee Hyeon Soo Lim, who was sentenced to life in prison last year over what Pyongyang described as anti-state activities, the North's state media said Thursday. A Canadian government delegation led by Sarah Taylor, director general for North Asia and Oceania for Global Affairs Canada, arrived in North Korea on Tuesday for a three-day visit to discuss Lim's case and other issues, Pyongyang's Korean Central News Agency said. The agency said the Canadian officials met Lim, but provided no further details. Lim, a Christian pastor, was convicted by Pyongyang's Supreme Court for trying to use religion to destroy the North Korean system and helping U.S. and South Korean authorities lure and abduct North Korean citizens. North Korea is often accused of using foreign detainees as a way to win concessions from other countries. The country is locked in a standoff with the international community over its expanding nuclear weapons and missiles program. North Korea is also holding at least two Americans for alleged espionage, subversion and other charges. Korean-American Kim Tong Chol is serving a 10-year prison term with hard labor, while University of Virginia undergraduate Otto Warmbier has received 15 years. In July, North Korea announced that it would handle all issues with the United States in line with a wartime law in response to U.S. sanctions that target leader Kim Jong Un. It has not elaborated on what wartime law means, although analysts say that suggests North Korea could deal with U.S. detainees in a harsher manner.

5. Code name Picnic: Historian uncovers details of RCMP's secret Cold War wiretapping program

CBC News, Dave Seglins, 2016 12 15

A Canadian historian has found top secret documents from the dawn of the Cold War that show the federal government secretly approved an RCMP surveillance program to wiretap suspected spies, communist sympathizers and others deemed "disloyal" or "subversive." Dennis Molinaro of Trent University says he was stunned to discover documents that show the cabinet of Prime Minister Louis St-Laurent passed a "secret order" in 1951 to authorize the RCMP surveillance, code-named Picnic. But the actual cabinet edict, which formed the cornerstone of decades of future wiretapping, was never revealed to Parliament and never transferred to Canada's archives. "Ultimately we don't know how big it gets, how far it goes, how long people are wiretapped," Molinaro told CBC News. "There are indications that this wiretapping goes on until at least the second term of Pierre Elliott Trudeau's government." He says officials in the Privy Council Office refuse to release the 65-year-old secret order -- or even confirm it exists. 'No end date' to wiretapping Canada was gripped by Cold War fears of communist infiltrators in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Igor Gouzenko, a cipher clerk working at the Soviet Union's Embassy in Ottawa defected in 1945 along with a trove of documents revealing a network of Soviet spies working in Canada, the U.S. and U.K. By 1950, Canada had passed an Emergency Powers Act and sent troops to fight in the Korean War, a Cold War showdown between the U.S. and USSR. Top secret cabinet documents Molinaro found at Library and Archives Canada show the federal government authorized operation Picnic in 1951, and that it included the "monitoring of subversive telephone conversations." But by 1954, the fighting was over in Korea and the emergency powers legislation was set to expire. Molinaro discovered the government and RCMP opted to secretly keep the wiretapping program going during peacetime using Canada's Official Secrets Act.

6. Grits to seek public input on trade deal with China

Ottawa Citizen, Marie-Danielle Smith, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Canada is committing to public consultations on a potential free-trade deal with China, and government officials from both countries are set to hold a first meeting early in 2017. According to Trade Minister Chrystia Freeland's office, consultations - including online submissions from the public - will be "integral" to assessing whether "sufficient economic interest" exists to pursue a negotiation with China. "We will take a step-bystep approach, and we look forward to hearing directly from Canadians on this issue," said Freeland's press secretary Alex Lawrence. He said in an email the government will welcome views "in any form," including in writing, online and in person. A response to an order paper question tabled in parliament Monday confirms the government expects a "first face-to-face meeting" in "early 2017." Lawrence didn't confirm a date but said officials would meet "as the need arises." Canada and China announced they were pursuing exploratory trade talks - a more-preliminary step than formal negotiations - Sept. 22, when Chinese Premier Li Keqiang visited Ottawa mere weeks after Prime Minister Justin Trudeau had visited Beijing. Although Canadian attitudes toward an agreement with China are shifting, there is still considerable skepticism. An Asia Pacific Foundation poll conducted by EKOS Research Associates during the summer found 46 per cent of Canadians surveyed were in favour of a deal with China, but 46 per cent were not.

7. Phénix 10 000 fonctionnaires encore touchés

Agence QMI, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Plus de 10 000 fonctionnaires sont toujours victimes du fiasco du nouveau système de paye du gouvernement fédéral. «Nous progressons lentement en raison de la complexité de ces cas», a admis la sous-ministre du ministère des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement, Marie Lemay, hier. Ottawa avait promis de régler les ratés de son système de paye Phénix avant le 1er novembre. Depuis cet échec, le ministère n'ose plus s'enfermer dans un nouvel échéancier. Mme Lemay a concédé que «l'année qui se termine a été très éprouvante» pour un bon nombre de fonctionnaires qui n'ont pas reçu leur dû.

8. Phoenix pay system plays role in donation shortfall in workplace campaign

Canadian Press, Jordan Press, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - One of the biggest workplace fundraising campaigns in Canada will fall short of its $19-million goal this holiday season _ and the Grinch in the works is the federal pay system that handles most of the donations. It's a snafu that the country's top bureaucrats predicted over the summer, weeks before the annual United Way campaign kicked off, documents show. It's also just one more consequence of a problem-plagued payroll system that has been causing migraines for public servants and senior officials since the calendar first turned to 2016. Approximately 70 per cent of the funds that are raised for the United Way through the federal workplace campaign come from payroll deductions. The deputy minister in charge of the campaign warned his colleagues at a July 27 breakfast meeting of a "serious impact on our ability to raise funds" if the Phoenix payroll issues weren't resolved. The details are contained in speaking notes provided to the clerk of the Privy Council, the country's top bureaucrat, and obtained by The Canadian Press under the Access to Information Act. On Wednesday, the top civil servant at Public Services and Procurement Canada, which is in charge of the Phoenix system, confirmed that the fundraising campaign will fall short of its $19-million target.

9. Problèmes avec Phénix Ottawa minimisera l'impact sur les T-4

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Avec la saison des impôts qui approche, le gouvernement fédéral tente de minimiser les impacts des ratés du système de paye Phénix sur les formulaires T-4 que recevront ses employés. Les montants que les 14 000 employés fédéraux ont reçus en trop en raison des erreurs de Phénix n'apparaîtront pas sur leur T-4 de 2016, ce qui devrait donner le temps de corriger les erreurs de paye en prévision des impôts de 2017, a expliqué Marie Lemay, la sous-ministre des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement (SPAC). Un représentant de l'Agence du revenu du Canada, Randy Hewlett, a souligné que les fonctionnaires inquiets peuvent obtenir de l'information sur le site de l'Agence du revenu du Canada, et que diverses mesures sont prises, notamment avec Revenu Québec, pour leur éviter de subir les conséquences fiscales en raison de Phénix.

10. Public servants urged to donate to United Way

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Savory And Kathryn May, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Ottawa community groups are urging federal public servants to donate to a massive United Way workplace campaign that's "at risk" of falling short of its $19-million fundraising goal - something the groups say could have a "devastating impact on our city's most vulnerable people." The plea is contained in an open letter to public servants coauthored by Susan Ingram of Big Brothers Big Sisters of Ottawa and Kathryn Hill of Family Services Ottawa. The letter was penned on behalf of the 25 agencies supported by the United Way charity organization that distributes the proceeds of the annual campaign. The current total of donations sits at $14.6 million, Ingram told the Citizen. The deadline for donating is March 31, 2017. "We are able to provide vital programs and services because of your generous donations to United Way Ottawa through your annual workplace campaign," the letter reads. "This year, our ability to support those who need it most is at risk." Marie Lemay, a campaign cochair and deputy minister of Public Services and Procurement Canada, confirmed the campaign will fall short of its goal but said "below target is still a big amount of money." "It's still a very positive contribution that federal public servants are making to the community." She said the campaign total will be announced at the end of the month.

11. Syrie « Il faut agir », dit Stéphane Dion

La Presse canadienne, Mélanie Marquis, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - Le ministre des Affaires étrangères Stéphane Dion a lancé mercredi un cri du coeur face à l'insupportable drame qui se joue à Alep, dans le nord de la Syrie. Le diplomate en chef du Canada a plaidé qu'il « faut agir », insistant sur la nécessité de continuer à « interpeller ceux qui peuvent faire la différence, c'est-à-dire le régime Assad et ceux qui l'appuient ». Il a assuré que c'est précisément ce qu'Ottawa fait, étant actuellement « en conversation avec ceux avec qui il faut que ça bouge », notamment avec les Russes. Car « il y a encore des vies à sauver, des enfants qui sont séparés de leurs parents » dans la ville syrienne assiégée, a insisté le ministre Dion. Lorsqu'on lui a demandé pourquoi les choses ne bougeaient pas, le ministre a laissé tomber que « le monde est souvent horrible », et que « le monde dans lequel nous vivons est dur ». « Il y a des pays qui ne respectent pas le droit international, et il faut toujours intervenir pour essayer d'injecter un peu d'humanité dans ce qui n'en a pas », a regretté M. Dion.

12. Warrants to tell tale of 'scandalous' probe

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 12 15

Ottawa - She is a TV reporter who exposed the rot in Quebec's construction industry; he is a print journalist known as much for his hard- news scoops as his opinion columns. Marie-Maude Denis and Patrick Lagacé are among at least eight journalists who were recently spied upon by either the provincial Sûreté du Québec or the Montreal Police Service. The first clear sense of what happened is set to come out soon in Montreal, where a court will release the first of dozens of warrants that targeted some of Quebec's best-known journalists. The disclosure could come as early as Thursday, or in ensuing days, depending on the ruling. The search warrants gave police unprecedented access to journalists' cellphones to track their movements and calls. They raise troubling questions about the relationships among officers, politicians and the judges who are supposed to keep the authorities in check. The Quebec government has launched a public inquiry into the surveillance, and the ramifications will go on for years. They could have an impact across the country if the federal government feels the need to enact legislation to protect journalists and their sources. What is clear is that in Quebec's unique cultural universe, the police could hardly have picked better-known journalists to spy upon and unleash a furor over their tactics. Ms. Denis co-hosts a show on Radio-Canada called Enquête (the French-language equivalent of The Fifth Estate), for which she did stories in recent years that exposed widespread corruption and collusion on large construction projects in Quebec. Her reporting angered Michel Arsenault, who was head of the Quebec Federation of Labour at the time. In a letter to the province's public safety minister in 2013, he complained about alleged leaks from police to journalists - and the file was passed to the head of the SQ, which launched an investigation.

13. Weapon in one hand, camera in the other

Toronto Star, Allan Woods, 2016 12 15

St-Raymond, Que. - There was a moment last year along a dusty path on the way to a village in northern Iraq that Olivier Lavigne-Ortiz said he was literally leading the international coalition against the Islamic terror group Daesh. As a volunteer fighter attached to a company of Kurdish soldiers, the 34-year-old former Canadian soldier was walking ahead of his brothers-in-arms toward the next front line and the next fight against the enemy. "I remember that I was in front of everyone and I thought: 'This is the coalition - a bulldozer, a tank without bullets and 20 ill-equipped soldiers,'" he recalled in a recent interview in this town on the outskirts of Quebec City. The former sniper with the legendary Royal 22nd Regiment, the Vandoos, had been to Afghanistan twice. He had had access to the best equipment and training in the world. Now, he was battling with a band of valiant fighters against the terror group in its self-proclaimed caliphate. But what makes Lavigne-Ortiz's 3 1/2-month mission remarkable is that he was simultaneously shooting footage for what is now a feature-length documentary. "I really had two missions at the same time: that of a soldier and a filmmaker," he said. "A weapon in one hand and a camera in the other - that really captures it." The 98-minute film, which was shot using a handheld digital camera and a GoPro camera attached to his rifle, is as much an homage to the Kurds as it is about the experience of foreign fighters who are acting as the boots on the ground despite the reluctance of western governments to dispatch their ground forces. Its title, Beside Heroes, also gives away Lavigne-Ortiz's goal: to produce a sort of counterpunch to the glut of slick and gruesome propaganda produced by Daesh, which is also known as ISIS or the Islamic State.

14. Yes to a debate

Toronto Star, 2016 12 15

Editorial: The Trudeau government is delaying an announcement on exactly where Canadian soldiers will be deployed on "peace operations" overseas. It says it wants to take all the time needed to "get this right." Nothing wrong with that. But one thing the government should not delay is making clear that Parliament will get a chance to debate what could be a risky and controversial mission. An announcement was expected by Christmas, but Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan now says it will take a few weeks longer because it will be a "whole-of-government effort," involving not just defence but foreign affairs and development as well. The government also has to co-ordinate with "international partners." Up to 600 soldiers and about 150 police officers are expected to be involved, and as the Star has reported they will likely be dispatched to the West African nation of Mali. They would work with French forces and a United Nations mission to fend off Islamist insurgents in the north and stabilize the country. It could be deadly; rebels have already targeted UN peacekeepers.

15. Afraid to Politicize Intelligence, Obama Delayed Blaming Russia for Hack

New York Times, Gardiner Harris, 2016 12 15

Washington - The Obama administration spent months deliberating whether to blame Russia for a cyberattack on the Democratic National Committee, with action delayed in part because President Obama did not want to be blamed for politicizing intelligence, the White House said on Wednesday. Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary, said that "it would've been inappropriate for White House figures -- including the president of the United States -- to be rushing the intelligence community to expedite their analysis of the situation." In particular, he described White House concerns that any statement by Mr. Obama would be viewed as using intelligence to meddle in the election on behalf of the president's preferred candidate, Hillary Clinton. Part of the reason for the delay, Mr. Earnest said, was bureaucratic. "First, they had to confirm across 17 different government agencies that they had high confidence that this is exactly what had transpired," Mr. Earnest said. But the administration's delayed response also resulted because Donald J. Trump, the Republican nominee, had been making repeated claims about how the election was being rigged, and Mr. Obama did not want to do anything that would feed those charges, Mr. Earnest said.

16. Chinese Media Says Trump Can't Cure 'American Disease'

New York Times, Chris Buckley, 2016 12 15

Beijing - Donald J. Trump isn't Mr. Popular in Beijing lately. But China's ruling elite seems to be consoling itself with the idea that the American president-elect will take charge of a country staggering into decline and disunion. A flow of articles in Communist Party publications in recent weeks has argued that the United States' tumultuous past year showed it to be dysfunctional and dissolute, and blighted by corruption, social and political polarization, reckless debt and an enfeebled news media. "Can an American Dream sick with the American Disease last for long?" read a headline in the latest issue of Red Flag Papers, a party journal that has enjoyed renewed prominence in recent years. "America's political problems have long been the instigator of its other problems," said the accompanying essay, by a researcher from the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, one of the government's main think tanks. "The clear and unequivocal slide in the public's belief in the 'American dream' directly reflects their lack of optimism in the country's future and their own prospects," wrote the researcher, Liu Weidong. "The American political system that once was their greatest pride has constantly proven powerless to restrain the despicable conduct of incompetent politicians."

17. Comey to Trump: The Russians Didn't Influence the Election

Town Hall, Ed Klein, 2016 12 15

Washington - In telephone conversations with Donald Trump, FBI Director James Comey assured the president-elect there was no credible evidence that Russia influenced the outcome of the recent U.S. presidential election by hacking the Democratic National Committee and the e-mails of John Podesta, the chairman of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. What's more, Comey told Trump that James Clapper, the director of National Intelligence, agreed with this FBI assessment. The only member of the U.S. intelligence community who was ready to assert that the Russians sanctioned the hacking was John Brennan, the director of the CIA, according to sources who were briefed on Comey's conversations with Trump. "And Brennan takes his marching orders from President Obama," the sources quoted Comey as saying.

18. Cyberaggression is the 'new normal' Trump can't ignore

Globe and Mail, Wesley Wark, 2016 12 15

Op-ed: The furor over allegations of Russian meddling in the U.S. election continues to grow and poses one of the first big tests for the incoming Trump administration. The story has a long trail, leading back to the summer of 2016, when FBI investigations into Russian hacking targeted at the presidential election began in earnest. Media reporting suggests the growing body of intelligence on Russian involvement in U.S. domestic politics even made its way into President Barack Obama's top level intelligence report - the President's Daily Brief - during the campaign. Very recently, the CIA reached a judgment, according to intelligence sources tapped by The Washington Post, that Russian hacking had a very specific aim - not just to undermine confidence in the U.S. electoral system, but to help Donald Trump win the election. This is an explosive charge, but one not limited to the U.S. arena. Concerns about Russian cyberaggression caused the head of Britain's Secret Intelligence Service, Alex Younger, to make a rare public speech, delivered from SIS headquarters on the Thames, charging that cyberattacks and information warfare represent "a fundamental threat to our sovereignty; they should be a concern to all those who share democratic values." These fears have been echoed by the directors of German intelligence, looking ahead to their own federal election. Questions about the role of false news, propagated by Russian outlets, in the outcome of the recent Italian referendum on electoral reform have also been raised. 19. How to Win Putin's Information War

New York Times, Mark Galeotti, 2016 12 15

Op-ed from Prague - Welcome to 21st-century conflict, more Machiavellian than military, where hacks, leaks and fake news are taking the place of planes, bombs and missiles. The Russian interference in the United States presidential election is just a taste of more to come. How can countries protect themselves from such methods? As with nuclear weapons, deterrence is better than confrontation. The United States and its allies in the West need to find a way to discourage Russia, the leading practitioner of this kind of political warfare, from striking first. With nuclear weapons, deterrence relies on demonstrating the possession of similar capabilities -- and the will to use them. This won't work with political warfare. It is not as though the United States hasn't dabbled in destabilization and disinformation campaigns. But these tactics are less likely to work in Russia, where the news media is mostly state-controlled, the security apparatus quickly stamps out political threats, and citizens have few illusions about their leaders. (For example, when the Panama Papers revealed that President Vladimir V. Putin's cronies had secret bank accounts, most Russians simply shrugged, unsurprised.) All that such efforts would do is show Russians that Mr. Putin is right to say the West is no better than him. What Russia's president fears is failure. His macho political persona relies on the conceit that he never gets things wrong, and that he can, with the help of hackers, special forces or brutal allies, outmaneuver the West and consequently regain Russia's status as a global power. This is why the United States and its allies should pursue a strategy of deterrence by denial. Mr. Putin shouldn't fear retaliation for his information warfare -- he should fear that he will fail. Note: Mark Galeotti is a senior researcher at the Institute of International Relations Prague.

20. Intel agencies reject request for House committee briefing, citing larger probe

The Hill, Katie Bo Williams, 2016 12 15

Washington - The Intelligence Community (IC) is refusing to provide the House Intelligence Committee with a requested Thursday briefing on Russian interference with the U.S. election, citing an ongoing review of the matter requested by President Obama. According to a statement, the IC will not be offering comment to Congress until it completes that review, which will cover foreign interference in the electoral process since 2008. "Once the review is complete in the coming weeks, the Intelligence Community stands ready to brief Congress -- and will make those findings available to the public consistent with protecting intelligence sources and methods," the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) said in a statement. The Obama review is scheduled to be completed by the time Donald Trump takes office on Jan. 20. Chairman Devin Nunes (R-Calif.) had asked the FBI, NSA, Office of the Director of National Intelligence and CIA to meet with committee members on Thursday, and called their refusal "unacceptable." The briefing was not requested to be at the director level, meaning that National Intelligence Director James Clapper, CIA Director John Brennan and their counterparts were not expected to attend.

21. James Clapper Has a Classified Blog. It's Called "Intercept."

The Intercept, Jeremy Scahill, 2016 12 15

Washington - During his tenure as the Director of National Intelligence, James Clapper has maintained a classified blog. It's called "Intercept," and is only accessible to people within the intelligence community with clearance to access the government intelink site. It even offers a secret RSS feed so analysts will never miss a post. Clapper's Intercept blog has no relationship to The Intercept, except that he hates pretty much everything we stand for. In one of his posts, written in May 2013 and obtained by The Intercept, Clapper posted a handwritten letter he says he received from "a constituent in Nevada." It's unclear what makes this person a constituent since Clapper was not elected to any office. In any case, this constituent "discusses supporting the IC's [Intelligence Community's] position on civil liberties" in the aftermath of the Boston Marathon bombing. "If the american [sic] people are not willing to release some freedoms, they cannot blame the IC when they can't stop" domestic terror attacks because of the intelligence agencies "having their hands tied by Law [sic] & policy," the "constituent" wrote. He adds that Americans "cannot have your cake and eat it too," and then offers what has become a dangerous cliché in the post-Snowden mentality of the intelligence community: "So if one has nothing to hide why would a little government watching for mass protection be such a big question." The letter ends: "WE SUPPORT YOU." That someone in the U.S. would write such a letter to Clapper is not controversial. A lot of people have made this same ridiculous argument over and over. But Clapper's response to the letter, which he also shared on his Intercept blog, is not surprising, but nonetheless disturbing. "I can't tell you how much I appreciate your letter," Clapper wrote. "I say this on behalf of all the women and men of the Intelligence Community. In my view you have very accurately described THE issue that the Boston Bombings represent: Just how small do the American people want the holes in the security fish net to be?" But soon after Clapper's post, it became clear he did not actually speak for "all of the women and men" in the intelligence community.

22. Newly Uncovered Site Suggests NSA Exploits for Direct Sale

Motherboard (Vice), Joseph Cox, 2016 12 14

New York - The Shadow Brokers--a hacker or group of hackers that stole computer exploits from the National Security Agency--has been quiet for some time. After their auction and crowd-funded approach for selling the exploits met a lukewarm reception, the group seemingly stopped posting new messages in October. But a newly uncovered website, which includes a file apparently signed with The Shadow Brokers' cryptographic key, suggests the group is trying to sell hacking tools directly to buyers one by one, and a cache of files appears to include more information on specific exploits. On Wednesday, someone calling themselves Boceffus Cleetus published a Medium post called "Are the Shadow Brokers selling NSA tools on ZeroNet?" Cleetus, who has an American flag with swastikas as their profile picture, also tweeted the post from a Twitter account created this month. "Well howdy partners! I don't wanna be getting arrested for passing on fake news and all. I reckon [sic] I ain't no security professional but I am whutcha might call a ZeroNet enthusiast," Cleetus writes. ZeroNet is a platform for hosting websites using blockchain and BitTorrent technology. "Those dastardly ole shadow brokers have themselves a zite on ZeroNet. 24. Stolen Yahoo Data Includes Government Employee Information

Bloomberg News, Jordan Robertson, 2016 12 15

New York - More than 150,000 U.S. government and military employees are among the victims of Yahoo! Inc.'s newly disclosed data breach, and their names, passwords, telephone numbers, security questions, birth dates, and backup e-mail addresses are now in the hands of cybercriminals. It's a leak that could allow foreign intelligence services to identify employees and hack their personal and work accounts, posing a threat to national security. These employees had given their official government accounts to Yahoo in case they were ever locked out of their e-mail. The government accounts belong to current and former White House staff, U.S. congressmen and their aides, FBI agents, officials at the National Security Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, and each branch of the U.S. military. The list includes an FBI division chief and multiple special agents working around the U.S.; current and former diplomats in Pakistan, Syria and South Africa; a network administrator at NSA's Fort Meade headquarters; the chief of an Air Force intelligence group; and a human resources manager for the CIA. On Wednesday, Yahoo revealed the second major breach of its systems, following the September disclosure of a widespread hack. The newly announced intrusion, which occurred in 2013, affected more than 1 billion users, and the government employee data is likely part of that cache. The other hack was disclosed earlier but took place later, in 2014, and Yahoo has said it threatened 500 million accounts. "Yahoo has taken steps to secure user accounts and is working closely with law enforcement," the company said in a statement issued Wednesday. The information about the government employees comes from a cyber-security researcher, Andrew Komarov, who discovered a stolen database of Yahoo user information involving hundreds of millions of accounts and turned it over to the government, which in turn alerted Yahoo. Bloomberg News reviewed the database and confirmed a sample of the accounts for accuracy. Yahoo declined to comment on the stolen government employee information.

25. Trump's national security adviser shared secrets without permission, files show

Washington Post, Craig Whitlock, Greg Miller, 2016 12 14

Washington - A secret U.S. military investigation in 2010 determined that Michael T. Flynn, the retired Army general tapped to serve as national security adviser in the Trump White House, "inappropriately shared" classified information with foreign military officers in Afghanistan, newly released documents show. Although Flynn lacked authorization to share the classified material, he was not disciplined or reprimanded after the investigation concluded that he did not act "knowingly" and that "there was no actual or potential damage to national security as a result," according to Army records obtained by The Washington Post under the Freedom of Information Act. Flynn has previously acknowledged that he was investigated while serving as the U.S. military intelligence chief in Afghanistan for sharing secrets with British and Australian allies there. But he has dismissed the case as insignificant and has given few details. The Army documents provide the first official account of the case, but they are limited in scope because the investigation itself remains classified. Former U.S. officials familiar with the matter said that Flynn was accused of telling allies about the activities of other agencies in Afghanistan, including the CIA. Flynn did not respond to requests for comment. The documents do not reveal the nature of the information. But former U.S. officials familiar with the case said it centered on slides and other materials containing classified information about CIA operations in Afghanistan.

26. U.S. Officials: Putin Personally Involved in U.S. Election Hack

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 15

New York - U.S. intelligence officials now believe with "a high level of confidence" that Russian President Vladimir Putin became personally involved in the covert Russian campaign to interfere in the U.S. presidential election, senior U.S. intelligence officials told NBC News. Two senior officials with direct access to the information say new intelligence shows that Putin personally directed how hacked material from Democrats was leaked and otherwise used. The intelligence came from diplomatic sources and spies working for U.S. allies, the officials said. Putin's objectives were multifaceted, a high-level intelligence source told NBC News. What began as a "vendetta" against Hillary Clinton morphed into an effort to show corruption in American politics and to "split off key American allies by creating the image that [other countries] couldn't depend on the U.S. to be a credible global leader anymore," the official said. Ultimately, the CIA has assessed, the Russian government wanted to elect Donald Trump. The FBI and other agencies don't fully endorse that view, but few officials would dispute that the Russian operation was intended to harm Clinton's candidacy by leaking embarrassing emails about Democrats.

27. White supremacist fliers reported at U-Md.

Washington Post, Justin Wm. Moyer, 2016 12 15

Washington - Fliers linked to a white supremacist group were found this week on the campus of the University of Maryland in College Park, authorities said, part of what appears to be an effort targeting colleges in several states. The fliers featured the logo of American Vanguard, a group associated with white supremacy. One read, "We have a right to exist," and another read, "Defending your people is a social duty not an anti-social crime." "We hear it every day: 'Whiteness' is evil, and must be destroyed," the group said in a statement on its website. "Our religion, our traditions, and our identity are dragged through the mud by the globalist establishment while millions of nonwhites flood our nation every year. If current trends continue, White Americans will be a minority by 2044. It's time to take a stand." American Vanguard, based in California, has posted fliers on other U.S. campuses, according to the Anti-Defamation League. Its posters were found recently at Purdue University in Indiana, the University of Central Florida, Florida Gulf Coast University, the University of Arkansas at Fort Smith and Emerson College in Massachusetts, the ADL said.

28. Yahoo Says 1 Billion User Accounts Were Hacked

New York Times, Vindu Goel, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 12 15

San Francisco - Yahoo, already reeling from its September disclosure that 500 million user accounts had been hacked in 2014, disclosed Wednesday that a different attack in 2013 compromised more than 1 billion accounts. The two attacks are the largest known security breaches of one company's computer network. The newly disclosed 2013 attack involved sensitive user information, including names, telephone numbers, dates of birth, encrypted passwords and unencrypted security questions that could be used to reset a password. Yahoo said it is forcing all of the affected users to change their passwords and it is invalidating unencrypted security questions -- steps that it declined to take in September. Yahoo said it discovered the larger hacking after analyzing data files, provided by law enforcement, that an unnamed third party had claimed contained Yahoo information. "What's most troubling is that this occurred so long ago, in August 2013, and no one saw any indication of a breach occurring until law enforcement came forward," said Jay Kaplan, the chief executive of Synack, a security company. "Yahoo has a long way to go to catch up to these threats."

29. Islamic State terrorists 'hiding in plain sight among migrants'

Sky News, Staff report, 2016 12 15

London - Islamic State terrorists are "moving in migrant flows, hiding in plain sight", the head of the Armed Forces has warned. In comments that could reignite the debate around ID cards, Sir Stuart Peach said Britain should think about how it "manages identity" due to the global reach of IS militants who deliberately destroy their identity documents to travel illegally into other countries. Speaking at the Royal United Services Institute, he said: "I worry about the global reach of Daesh as an idea - copycat, using the internet - more than the internet - using social media, popping up all over the world. "The Chinese state has accepted they have a problem. This is not now a localised phenomenon, it is now a wider phenomenon. "And of course we face...a potential network of combat- experienced terrorists". He added: "They are moving in migrant flows, hiding in plain sight".

30. Australian 'low mark' on Iraq transparency (Canada)

Australian Associated Press, Max Blenkin, 2016 12 15

Canberra - A report by a group monitoring coalition air strikes in Iraq and Syria has given Australia low marks for transparency and accountability. The UK-based Airwars organisation says Australia remains one of the least transparent members of the international military coalition, consistently refusing to disclose almost any information about air strikes by RAAF aircraft or acknowledge any incidents that may have produced civilian casualties. "Canberra has consistently refused to disclose almost any information relating to an estimated 405 air strikes to October 2016 - with one notable exception," Airwars said. The exception was an airstrike in September that hit Syrian government forces, with the Australian Defence Force admitting two F/A-18 Hornets released weapons during the attack. Airwars said Australia has also consistently refused to disclose how many alleged civilian casualty events its aircraft may have been involved in. There was no detailed investigation of two incidents, one near Ramadi and one near Fallujah, in which civilians entered the target area after weapons were fired. "The poor quality of the Fallujah investigation did little to instil confidence in Australia's assertion it had killed no civilians in hundreds of air strikes in Iraq and Syria," it said in the report. Airwars collates data on air strikes from official reporting and on civilian casualties from media and other reports. It said the US-led coalition, comprising aircraft from 13 countries, had conducted about 14,200 strikes in the first two years of the campaign against the Islamic State group. US aircraft conducted the majority of strikes in Syria and Iraq. Airwars said civilian casualties remained inevitable in a modern air war, even when precision munitions were widely used. It estimates at least 1500 non-combatants died from coalition air strikes. The coalition acknowledges 152 civilian deaths, though it has recently taken steps to improve monitoring. Airwars ranked Canada the most transparent of coalition members, followed by the UK, US and France.

31. New risks to NZ with Trump Presidency (Canada)

Dominion Post, Kathleen M. Kuehn, 2016 12 15

Op-ed: New Zealand privacy advocates and civil libertarians have been curiously subdued on the future of surveillance, privacy and internet freedom under the forthcoming Donald Trump presidency. But if Trump's campaign trail and recent staffing decisions are any indication of what's to come, a wait-and-see approach may not be in NZ's best interest. Although pending formal election, Trump is building an administration that clearly prioritises opaque 'national security' concerns over democratic rights and freedoms. At the top of his policy goals is the elimination of "intrusive regulation", which he intends to repeal by lining his Cabinet with officials who hold similar views. Top intelligence roles have already been handed to vocal supporters of the National Security Agency's controversial mass surveillance programmes exposed by Edward Snowden. Mike Pompeo, the next CIA director, staunchly opposes restrictions on data collection and is expected to overturn the few limits placed on digital surveillance since the 2013 Snowden leaks. Trump unapologetically supports the discriminatory surveillance of people of colour, activists, immigrants and certain religious groups. He has advocated for watch lists, a registry system for Muslims and the targeted surveillance of "certain mosques". In Trump's own words, "I want surveillance of these people, I want surveillance if we have to." If Trump starts pushing the boundaries on surveillance, what does this mean for NZ? We already actively support America's surveillance agenda as a partner in the 'Five Eyes' security alliance with the US, UK, Canada and Australia. Under US directives, we contribute foreign intelligence in exchange for access to its global surveillance infrastructure. Note: Kathleen M. Kuehn is a lecturer in media studies at Victoria University of Wellington and author of The Post-Snowden Era: Mass Surveillance and Privacy in New Zealand.

32. SA man charged with advocating terrorism after allegedly posting anti-Jewish videos
ABC (Australia), Candice Prosser, 2016 12 15

Canberra - A South Australian man who police allege posted videos to social media encouraging people in overseas conflict zones to commit terrorist acts has been charged with advocating terrorism. An Australia Federal Police spokesman said it was the first time anyone in Australia had been charged with advocating terrorism. The Flinders Park man, 50, was arrested at a facility in Northfield today and was charged with four counts of advocating terrorism. Each offence carries a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment. Police said he was arrested as a result of information received via the National Security Hotline. There are no current or impending threats to the Australian community as a result of these activities, police have said. The man has since faced a hearing in the Adelaide Magistrates Court via a telephone link from the Yatala prison infirmary. His name and image were suppressed. His lawyer, Stacey Carter, told the court her client had mental health issues and asked Magistrate Jayanthi McGrath to order a report into his mental fitness to stand trial and provide instructions.

33. The statistics of fear: Should we be most concerned about cars, planes or terrorists?
(Canada)
ABC (Australia), Patrick Wood, 2016 12 15

Canberra - Are you more likely to die in a car crash or a terrorist attack? And what is safer: driving across the country for your family Christmas or getting on a plane? Everyone has their fears and safety concerns, but chances are that -- statistically speaking -- we are worrying about the wrong things, according to a visiting statistician who specialises in probability. Professor Jeffrey Rosenthal works in the Department of Statistics at the University of Toronto and is currently doing a series of public lectures in Australia. "People do worry about a lot of things which are extremely unlikely and we shouldn't," he told ABC News Breakfast. Terrorism is a particularly emotive topic in Australia, with finding 45 per cent of Australians are either "very" or "somewhat" concerned about either themselves or a family member being the victim of a terrorist attack in Australia. "Terrorism, in a way it's a tricky thing because you don't know what the future will bring and situations can change," Professor Rosenthal said. "But one example I give is if you look at the 9/11 terrorism attacks ... in the month of September 2001 more people in the United States were killed in ordinary car crashes than were killed in the 9/11 attacks." Professor Rosenthal said sales of anxiety medication rose in the US after the attacks and he knew one couple who made the decision to get married because they feared the threat of terrorism.

34. Maj Gen Asif Ghafoor appointed DG ISPR

Pakistan Dawn, Dawn Report, 2016 12 15

Islamabad - Major General Asif Ghafoor has been appointed as the new director general (DG) for Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR). He is presently commanding a division in Swat and will replace Lt Gen Asim Bajwa as DG ISPR. Lt Gen Bajwa was posted as Inspector General Arms at GHQ. Maj Gen Ghafoor was a part of the artillery regiment and also served in the military operations directorate, military sources said. The new postings come shortly after the appointment of Gen Qamar Javed Bajwa as army chief. As with each change in command of the country's powerful army, the obvious question being asked is how and whether the new chief's appointment and his radically different looking team will translate into policy changes in different areas. The posting of officers with a track record in internal security and counterterrorism as the CGS and the ISI DG respectively also reinforces this impression.

35. Working for peace harder than fighting: CEO

Pajhwok Afghan News, Navid Ahmad Barakzai, 2016 12 15

Kabul - Chief Executive Officer (CEO) Abdullah Abdullah on Wednesday said working for peace in Afghanistan 'is harder than fighting' but the government would pursue the path of peace and stability. Abdullah was expressing a conference 'Common approaches to future and preparation for peace in Afghanistan' organized by the European Union mission in Kabul. The CEO said working for peace had become harder with the passage of time and the continuation of such a situation would create more problems for people. Abdullah also said they all had neglected their responsibilities about people's rights. He urged the Afghans to avoid fueling ethnic difference and make efforts for durable peace. "We should prove that we have the aptitude for peace." Addressing militants, he said the government was not ready for talks with those hell bent on fighting and killing innocent people.

36. 'Algerian al-Qaeda boss seriously injured but alive'

Middle East Eye, 2016 12 15

Undisclosed placeline - He has been reported killed on many occasions, only to resurface battered but alive to fight another day. Now evidence from a nurse suggests the latest US reports of the "likely" demise of Mokhtar Belmokhtar, the Algerian boss of an al-Qaeda affiliate, are wide of the mark. American military sources on 27 November told the Wall Street Journal that a French air strike in southwest Libya was "likely successful" in its aim of killing the leader of al-Mourabitoun, which has links to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Not so, according to evidence from a Nigerien nurse who treated him after the attack. Algerian intelligence services, working in collaboration with counterparts in Niger, are now convinced that Belmokhtar is not dead. "He, along with other terrorists, was targeted by an air strike last November but he got away," an Algerian security source told Middle East Eye.

Les services de renseignements algériens, qui travaillent en collaboration avec leurs homologues nigériens, en sont maintenant persuadés : Belmokhtar n'est pas mort. « Il a bien été visé, avec d'autres terroristes, par une frappe aérienne en novembre dernier mais il a réchappé à ce raid », explique une source sécuritaire algérienne à MEE.

39. Egypt executes prominent Islamist militant Habara amid threats of retaliation

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 15

Cairo - Egypt executed prominent Islamist fighter Adel Habara on Thursday, state media said, days after a top court rejected his final appeal and in defiance of militant threats to ignite "a volcano of jihad" across the country. Habara, 40, was sentenced to death in 2014 for killing 25 army conscripts in Northern Sinai in August 2013. He was hanged early on Thursday after President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi signed off on the death sentence, state news agency MENA said. Sisi has launched a fierce crackdown on Islamists since as Egypt's then-military chief he overthrew the country's democratically elected president, Mohamed Mursi of the Muslim Brotherhood, in July 2013.

40. Mali : dans la région de Mopti, « l'État ne contrôle plus rien »

Jeune Afrique, Rémi Carayol, 2016 12 14

Bamako, Mali - Le Yaaral n'a pas eu lieu cette année. Initialement prévue pour le 26 novembre, cette fête ancestrale qui célèbre la traversée du Niger par les troupeaux et leurs bergers et leur retour sur la rive droite du fleuve, une fois que la saison des pluies est passée, a été annulée au dernier moment. Trop risqué. « Des bergers avaient reçu des menaces. Les jihadistes les avaient appelés sur leur propre téléphone pour leur dire de ne pas y participer. La plupart ont donc décidé de traverser plus tôt, sans dire quand, afin d'éviter les attaques », explique le sociologue Bréma Ely Dicko, spécialiste de la zone. Proclamé « chef d'oeuvre du patrimoine culturel immatériel de l'humanité » par l'Unesco en 2005, classé au patrimoine culturel national depuis huit ans, ce rendez-vous, très prisé par les Peuls du Macina, a tout pour déplaire aux extrémistes religieux : on y danse, on y chante et les femmes s'y font belles... Aujourd'hui, dans le delta intérieur du Niger, une zone difficile d'accès et inondée une partie de l'année, investie depuis deux ans par les groupes jihadistes, tout cela est synonyme de danger. « L'État, dans cette zone, ne contrôle plus rien », constate un élu local ayant requis l'anonymat, exilé comme tant d'autres à Bamako pour sa propre sécurité.

The National (UAE), Colin Freeman, 2016 12 15

Banjul - Gambia's president Yahya Jammeh has been warned he faces "strong sanctions" and even military intervention if he continues to insist on remaining in power despite losing the election. The United Nations and fellow African leaders have all voiced dismay at Mr Jammeh's refusal to accept the result of December 1 election, which he lost to rival Adama Barrow. "For Mr Jammeh, the end is here and under no circumstances can he continue to be president," said Mohammed Ibn Chambas, the UN's special representative for West Africa, after a meeting with other West African leaders failed to come up with a transition plan. When asked whether military intervention was an option following the failed mediation mission, he said: "It may not be necessary. Let's cross that bridge when we get there." On Tuesday, Gambian security forces blockaded the offices of the country's electoral commission, a move denounced by UN chief Ban Ki-moon as an "outrageous act of disrespect".

Mogadishu - A suicide car bomb exploded on Thursday at a checkpoint near Somalia's national theatre in the capital Mogadishu, killing the bomber, police said. There was no immediate word on whether anybody else was killed or injured in the blast, which witnesses said had been followed by gunfire. The national theatre stands about 500 meters (yards) away from the presidential palace. "The bomber blew up the car after police ordered him to stop at gun point. We are investigating," Abdikadir Hussein, a police officer, told Reuters. The explosion also destroyed the front wall of a nearby restaurant, he added. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack but al Shabaab militants have been trying to disrupt Somalia's protracted parliamentary elections - part of efforts to rebuild the fractured nation after decades of war. The three-month vote is due to end on Dec. 29.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Bogota - Colombia's FARC rebels have expelled five commanders for refusing to demobilize and join a peace process with the government aimed at ending more than five decades of war, guerrilla leadership said. The five commanders, all from units in the country's southeast jungle, include one former participant in four-year-long peace talks in Cuba. "This decision is motivated by their recent conduct, which contradicts our political-military line," leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) said in statement late on Tuesday. "We call on all combatants who have been tricked into this futureless path to distance themselves from this mistaken decision taken by their commanders," the statement said. The expelled commanders are the second group of rebels to declare their opposition to the peace deal under which the FARC convert into an unarmed political party. In July a First Front unit leader and some of his fighters left the group in protest of the deal.

44. Beijing, Paris agree to more efficient pursuit of corrupt fugitives (Canada)

China Daily, Zhang Yan, 2016 12 15

Beijing - Beijing and Paris will strengthen joint investigations of corrupt officials who have fled China, and also improve systems for the return of ill-gotten assets illegally transferred to France, a senior anti-graft official from the Ministry of Justice said. Chinese judicial officers and their French counterparts will expand intelligence-sharing and evidence-collecting in major cases, said Zhang Xiaoming, deputy director-general of the Judicial Assistance and Foreign Affairs Department at the Ministry of Justice. They will set up a work team and work closely on investigating, freezing and confiscating the illicit money. They also will establish a quick-response procedure to combat cross-border economic crimes such as telecom fraud, he said. Zhang said that during a recent meeting in Beijing, law enforcement officers from both countries exchanged views on tracking down fugitives and returning their ill-gotten funds. "It's more than necessary to share information with our Chinese counterparts in a timely manner and, after obtaining intelligence, such as indications of money laundering or other economic fraud, access our system to continue the investigation," said Robert Gelli, head of the Directorate for Criminal Matters and Pardons of the Ministry of Justice of France. In recent years, Western countries, including the United States, Canada and some European countries, have become popular destinations for corrupt officials because an absence of bilateral extradition treaties and differences in legal systems make it harder to secure their return, according to the Ministry of Public Security.

45. Canadian delegation visits N. Korea over detained Korean-Canadian pastor: KCNA

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 15

Seoul - A Canadian government delegation visited North Korea this week to discuss the issue of a Korean-Canadian pastor detained in the communist state, the North's state media reported Thursday. The North's official Korean Central News Agency (KCNA) said that the delegation, led by Sarah Taylor, the director general in charge of North Asia and Oceania at Global Affairs Canada, visited Pyongyang from Tuesday through Thursday for talks over "issues of mutual concern," including one involving the pastor Lim Hyeon-soo. The delegation met with Choi Son-hee, which the KCNA referred to as the director general in charge of North American affairs at Pyongyang's foreign ministry. It also visited the incarcerated pastor and paid a courtesy call to Han Song-ryol, the North's deputy foreign minister. Lim has been detained in the North since he entered the country on a humanitarian mission in January last year. In December, the North's supreme court sentenced him to life in prison with hard labor, citing his "subversive plots and activities" against the North's regime under the guise of humanitarian aid and free donations. He has visited the reclusive state more than 100 times for humanitarian activities since 1997. (Full report)

46. Foreign NGOs on back foot as new Chinese law looms

Reuters, Christian Shepherd, 2016 12 15

Beijing - Foreign organisations including social and environmental advocacy groups fear they could inadvertently break broadly defined new rules that take effect in China next month, with some even shutting up shop to avoid such pitfalls. Chinese President Xi Jinping's administration has made sweeping changes to Chinese law in the name of boosting national security, including a controversial cybersecurity law passed last month and another targeting foreign non-governmental organisations (NGO), slated for Jan. 1. China says the NGO law, which grants broad powers to police to question NGO workers, monitor their finances and regulate their work, is necessary to regulate an unruly sector and that only those operating illegally have anything to fear. Western governments say the law, which was passed in April, treats groups as criminals and would severely limit their ability to operate in China. Foreign NGO employees in China have told Reuters that many groups still do not know whether they will be able to register with the authorities in time as key information about the process has not been published. "There are many NGOs that wish to comply but feel unable to comply due to a lack of information," says Lester Ross, a partner at WilmerHale Lawfirm in Beijing who advises such groups. Faced with the prospect of inadvertently operating illegally, a number of groups are temporarily or permanently suspending their China operations, according to people in direct contact with the NGOs.

Manila - China appears to have constructed point-defense capabilities at each of its outposts in seven of the Manila-claimed islands on the Spratly (Kalayaan) Islands in the South China Sea. Washington-based CSIS Asia Maritime Transparency Initiative (AMTI) reported that China has built large anti-aircraft guns and probable close-in weapons systems (CIWS) in the Spratly Islands. The think tank started tracking China's construction of hexagon-shaped structures on Fiery Cross (Kagitingan), Mischief (Panganiban) and Subi (Zamora) Reefs earlier this year. Smaller facilities were also seen on Gaven (Burgos), Hughes, Johnson (Mabini) and Cuarteron (Calderon) Reefs based on satellite images. "These gun and probable CIWS emplacements show that Beijing is serious about defense of its artificial islands in case of an armed contingency in the South China Sea," the report read.

48. Seoul denies allegation Choi behind Kaesong shutdown

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 15

Seoul - Seoul's unification ministry on Thursday dismissed allegations that President Park Geun-hye's long-time confidante influenced Seoul's decision to shut down an inter-Korean industrial complex in February. The decision was made out of security concerns in response to North Korea's nuclear and missile provocations early this year, Seoul's unification ministry said. A group of local companies on Thursday asked the independent counsel looking into the corruption scandal to investigate the alleged interference by Choi Soon-sil. "We've made a political decision to completely stop the operation of the complex in a bid to apply pressure on North Korea and make it choose the path toward denuclearization," Jeong Joon-hee, ministry spokesman, said at a regular press briefing. On Feb. 10, South Korea shut down the Kaesong Industrial Complex following North Korea's fourth nuclear test and long-range rocket launch early this year. The complex, once a symbol of inter-Korean reconciliation, housed 124 South Korean companies. The park, which opened in 2004, had served as a major revenue source for the cash-strapped North.

50. Moscow has the world's attention. For Putin, that's a win.

Washington Post, David Filipov, 2016 12 15

Moscow - President Vladimir Putin is winning. For now. The Russian leader is winning because the post-Cold War order he has railed against has been thrown into chaos, and the Kremlin's fingerprints are widely seen to be all over it. A year ago, Russia faced a united Europe, an expanded NATO alliance, a paucity of geopolitical allies and the possibility of four more years of poor relations with the United States under a Hillary Clinton presidency. Today, Putin's military contingent in Syria just helped the government essentially retake Aleppo. The CIA has concluded that his hackers worked to help elect Donald Trump, who has dismissed commitments to Europe and touted better ties with Russia. In Washington, London, Berlin and Paris, Soviet-style propaganda is back. It's been thoroughly updated, though, and comes packaged as fake news, cyberattacks and WikiLeaks. Whether or not the Kremlin is guilty of doing all the things Western accusers say it is, Russia is now considered a master purveyor of geopolitical disorder. And that, for Putin, is a win. "Of course the Kremlin likes the fact of such an atmosphere of chaos," Gleb Pavlovsky, a former Putin adviser, said in a recent interview. "Because we are traders of chaos. We sell it, and the more chaos there is in the world, the better it is for the Kremlin."

51. Russian spies adopt new tactics to battle old enemy

Financial Times, David J. Lynch, 2016 12 14

Washington - Russia's hacking during the US presidential campaign marks a significant escalation of a cold war-style espionage offensive aimed at recruiting spies, acquiring financial secrets and siphoning off advanced technologies, according to court records and interviews. The resurgent espionage operation -- a reminder of Russian President Vladimir Putin's lineage as a former KGB officer -- is testing short-handed Federal Bureau of Investigation counter-intelligence units and challenging traditional spying norms. More than 100 agents of Russia's SVR foreign intelligence service are believed to be operating in the US, according to a former FBI counter-intelligence official. Joel Brenner, US national counter-intelligence executive from 2006 to 2009, says the "ramping up" of Russian spying is continuing as Moscow seeks to undermine US strength through information warfare and cyber attacks. "Russian efforts in the US are intense now," he said. "The Russians know they have to play jiu jitsu with the US instead of taking us on directly." Moscow's standard espionage operations in the US have long concentrated on ferreting out secrets and cultivating well-placed contacts. But this summer's hack of the Democratic National Committee, and subsequent release of private emails, went well beyond those limits. "There's a difference between espionage, collecting information and active measures, which is actively interfering with processes in the United States," said Senator Angus King, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee. "Collecting information about our electric grid is espionage. Bringing the grid down would be active measures. That's what makes this case so disturbing. They hacked the DNC computers and then released the material to interfere in the election."

55. Aleppo assault likely war crime: U.N.

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 12 15

Beirut - Plans to evacuate besieged rebel districts of Aleppo were under threat Wednesday as renewed airstrikes and shelling rocked the Syrian city in a bombardment the United Nations said "most likely constitutes war crimes." Iran, one of President Bashar Assad's main backers, imposed new conditions on a cease-fire deal, saying it wanted the simultaneous evacuation of wounded from two villages besieged by rebel fighters, according to rebel and U.N. sources.

There was no sign of that happening. Instead airstrikes, shelling and gunfire erupted in Aleppo and Turkey accused government forces of breaking the truce agreed less than a day before. Syrian state television said rebel shelling killed six people. There were clashes on the ground later in the day, with rebels saying they launched an attack against regime forces using suicide car bombs.

Pendant ce temps, à Damas, Hafez el-Assad, officier d'aviation issu de la communauté religieuse minoritaire des alaouites, une branche du chiisme, instaure la dictature. Son objectif : une grande Syrie, dont le Liban ne serait qu'une province. Comme autrefois, au temps de l'Empire ottoman. Le décor est planté pour une tragédie que les services secrets d'une dizaine de pays vont rendre indéchiffrable. Dès les années 1980, Beyrouth remplace Berlin comme centre mondial de la guerre secrète. Une guerre dans laquelle le SDECE puis son héritière, la DGSE, vont se trouver impliqués.

57. Caretaker FM urges direct flights with US (Canada).

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 12 15

Beirut - Caretaker Foreign Minister Gebran Bassil Wednesday urged the United State to operate direct flights between the two countries during a meeting with a visiting high-ranking U.S. diplomat. The U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs, Anne Patterson, left the Bustros Palace without making any statement. A statement issued by Bassil's office said the meeting tackled various matters of interests. The statement highlighted the battle against terrorism, Syrian refugee crisis and the U.S. policy in the region. Bassil also called on the U.S. to establish direct flights between the U.S. and Lebanon. The caretaker minister tackled a similar request with Canadian Foreign Minister Stephane Dion, who visited Lebanon last week. The U.S. Embassy said in several tweets that Patterson's meetings touched on the latest "developments on a range of political, security, economic and humanitarian issues."

58. East Aleppo under heavy attack again despite ceasefire

Al Jazeera, Patrick Strickland, 2016 12 15

Aleppo - Syrian government forces renewed shelling on the last holdouts of rebel-held eastern Aleppo, raising fears that a deal to evacuate civilians and fighters from the devastated city may not be honoured. "There is artillery [being fired] now ... as I speak," Zouhir Al Shimale, a journalist in east Aleppo, told Al Jazeera in a WhatsApp message on Wednesday. "There aren't any clashes," he said, explaining rebel groups were not fighting at the moment. "There are injuries, but we don't know how many. We can't go outside because the shelling is indiscriminate." The UK-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights also said shelling could be heard, but its origin was not clear. Speaking to Reuters news agency, rebel commanders said government forces had renewed shelling and violated a ceasefire reached a day earlier. Medical sources told Al Jazeera cluster munitions were used in al-Zubdiyeh neighbourhood and elsewhere in the remaining rebel-held areas.

59. King: Terror peddlers won't be allowed to exploit youth

Arab News, Mohammed Al-Sulami, 2016 12 15

Riyadh - In his annual speech at the opening ceremony of the Shoura Council, Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques King Salman said the government would not allow terrorist organizations, or supporters of such groups, "to take advantage of our people and achieve dubious objectives in our country or in the Arab and Islamic worlds." The king stressed that Saudi Arabia would continue to cooperate with the international community to achieve global peace, and enhance interaction with other countries to strengthen tolerance and coexistence. He also stressed that political solutions to international crises are the best option if governments wish to meet the aspirations of the people to have peace and achieve development.

60. Mossad Chief Investigated for Receipt of Mariah Carey Tickets

Haaretz, 2016 12 15

Jerusalem - The Civil Service Commission has launched an investigation into suspicions that Mossad head Yossi Cohen received free tickets to a Mariah Carey concert worth thousands of shekels from Australian billionaire James Packer, Channel 10 reported on Wednesday. Channel 10 also reported on Wednesday that Cohen had spent time at Packer's luxury Tel Aviv hotel suite, or had free use of the premises, when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's son, Yair Netanyahu, was there as well. The commission is investigating whether Packer's gift amounted to receipt of an illegal benefit or favor, the report said. Cohen headed the National Security Council at the time but is now director of the Mossad. The commission is already checking Cohen's explanations. The findings are expected to be published soon. The television report said it had not received any response from Cohen to the allegations.

61. Riyadh will not allow Yemen to become base for any country -- King Salman

Gulf News, Habib Toumi, 2016 12 15

Manama - Saudi Arabia's King Salman Bin Abdul Aziz has vowed to prevent other nations from intervening in neighbouring Yemen, where it has been at war with Iranian-backed rebels since March 2015. The king said the security of neighbouring Yemen was the security of Saudi Arabia. "We will not allow anyone to interfere in its domestic affairs or to seek to influence on the legitimacy there or to turn it into a base or corridor for any country or party that targets the security or stability of Saudi Arabia or the region. We do look forward to the success of the United Nations endeavours to reach a political solution based on Security resolution 2216," King Salman said. He added that the kingdom would confront anyone who promoted religious extremism or fanaticism and stressed that the country has devoted all its potential to consolidate security, protect the society and serve the two holy mosques.

62. Spy Sarah Aaronsohn's suicide rewrote Israeli history

Times of Israel, JP O' Malley, 2016 12 15

Jerusalem - On December 11, 1917, the British imperial governor, General Sir Edmund Allenby, entered Jerusalem, placing the city under military administration. It would be another 10 months before the Turks finally surrendered near Megiddo, giving up Palestine and four centuries of Ottoman rule in the region. The turning point that ultimately sealed Allenby's victory was his third and final battle for Gaza, in which the British cavalry thundered across the desert, sweeping into Beersheba to cut off the reinforced Turkish garrison. Outside of Israel, most historical accounts celebrate Allenby's skills as a cavalryman in the desert. Much less is known about the group of dedicated Jewish spies who worked behind the scenes for almost two years, guiding him to victory with information about Beersheba and the Negev desert in preparation for the surprise British attack inland.

63. UK envoy meets Lebanese security chiefs to discuss police program

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 12 15

Beirut - Britain's ambassador to Lebanon held his first meeting with the country's security heads to discuss improving the Lebanese police force, following last week's announcement of a $16.5 million fund for the Internal Security Forces. "The U.K. is committed to Lebanon's stability, security and prosperity," Ambassador Hugo Shorter said in a statement after the meeting. "At the heart of this must be a state capable of providing the ultimate guarantee of security." The meeting followed the signing of an agreement in June between the U.K and Ministry of Interior ISF Director General to create the British Police Support Project (BPSP). The collaborative project was initially announced in honor of Human Rights Day on Dec. 10. Funded by the U.K. government, the $16.5 million, three-year program is designed to build what the U.K. Embassy called a "modern, compassionate, accountable and trusted police force that reflects people's needs."

64. Droit de la guerre contre les djihadistes

Le Figaro, Paule Gonzalès, 2016 12 15

Paris - C'est une idée qui tourne dans les milieux politiques de droite et d'extrême droite depuis plusieurs mois et que le candidat François Fillon a faite sienne. La proposition de loi de François-Noël Buffet invite à élargir « la notion d'intelligence avec une puissance étrangère pour y inclure l'intelligence avec une organisation terroriste » et propose de créer « un délit d'allégeance à une organisation prônant la commission d'actes portant atteinte à des ressortissants français ou aux intérêts fondamentaux de la nation française ». La première permet de doper le quantum des peines en matière d'infraction terroriste pour le porter à trente ans. Une telle disposition pourrait être plus efficace dans la lutte contre le terrorisme que « l'association de malfaiteur ». De plus, elle peut faciliter le travail des magistrats instructeurs qui, pour les retours de Syrie notamment, doivent faire face à la difficulté de recueillir les preuves afin de démontrer la préparation imminente d'un acte terroriste ou la commission de faits barbares. Simplification des procédures La seconde proposition permet « une incrimination plus large que celle des actuels délits de participation ou d'entente ». Dans les deux cas, l'idée est une simplification des procédures et un renforcement de l'arsenal judiciaire.

Alain Mafart, ancien agent secret français condamné pour sa participation au sabotage du Rainbow-Warrior en 1985, a refait sa vie. Personne n'y prêterait attention si sa nouvelle existence ne venait soudain de percuter douloureusement la première. Alain Mafart, 65 ans, s'est reconverti en photographe animalier. D'un reportage au parc aux singes de Jigokudani, au Japon, il a rapporté une photo attendrissante, de la tête d'un bébé macaque endormi, caressée par la main de sa mère dans un geste protecteur. L'image fait partie de la sélection du Musée d'histoire naturelle de Londres pour son concours annuel de photographie de nature.

66. Espionne, lève-toi !

Le Point, Patrick Besson, 2016 12 15

Paris - « Rainbow Warrior ». Dominique Prieur fut la victime collatérale de l'opération de sabotage visant le navire amiral de Greenpeace. L'écrivain raconte le destin détonant de la première femme officier de la DGSE. Le fort de Noisy, à Romainville, est invisible, à moins d'entrer dans l'espionnage : c'est le siège du service Action de la DGSE. On ne voit que de hauts murs blancs surmontés de barbelés et quelques longues portes bleues. Impossible de négocier une visite auprès d'un soldat en faction : il n'y en a pas. Il y a des caméras, qui m'ont sans doute filmé. Le début du XXI^e siècle : on passe tous à la télévision de surveillance. J'imagine la fouille au corps avant d'entrer dans le fort : déshabillage complet et toucher rectal. En mars 1985, Dominique Prieur est convoquée à Noisy pour une nouvelle mission. Elle est la première femme officier de la DGSE. Elle a 36 ans, un mari pompier et pas d'enfant. C'est une blonde à lunettes, qui se tient bien droite. Elle aime le parachutisme, l'équitation et la lecture. Elle a une maîtrise de lettres modernes. Elle a quitté l'enseignement, où il n'y avait pas assez de séances de tir à son goût. Comme la plupart des femmes, elle tire bien : c'est une activité qui demande calme et concentration, et il en faut pour être une femme.

Le Point, Jean Guisnel, 2016 12 15

Non identifié - Transparence. En prouvant que les Etats-Unis surveillent la planète entière, le lanceur d'alerte a interpellé les citoyens sur leurs libertés. La fusion annoncée des fichiers de la carte nationale d'identité et des passeports, nourris d'informations biométriques, le démontre une fois de plus : par nature, les services de renseignement veulent tout savoir. Pas tout le temps, pas sur tout le monde, pas sur n'importe quel sujet, pas n'importe où. Dès la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les Etats-Unis et leurs quatre « cousins » (Canada, Royaume-Uni, Australie et Nouvelle-Zélande) ont mis en place un énorme réseau d'interception des communications, rapidement tourné vers l'URSS et ses alliés.

68. Jean Heinrich : « Nous agissons dans l'illégalité poussée à l'extrême »

Le Point, Jean Guisnel, 2016 12 15

Paris - Décryptage. Ancien chef du service Action de la DGSE, le général décode le renseignement de l'après-guerre froide. Le Point : Quels ont été les effets de la fin de la guerre froide, pour le renseignement français ? Jean Heinrich : Durant la guerre froide, l'Otan se trouvait face à une menace cohérente et rationnelle : l'URSS et ses alliés. Les membres de l'Otan s'étaient réparti les zones de responsabilités. A la France revenaient la Tchécoslovaquie et une partie de la Russie. Nous formions de jeunes sous-officiers chargés des écoutes en langues tchèque et russe. Nous partagions les résultats avec nos alliés, ce qui permettait de multiplier nos informations par un facteur quinze ou vingt ! Nous avions des renseignements de grande valeur et quand un pilote tchèque décollait, nous connaissions son nom, son grade, ses heures de vol, ses capacités opérationnelles. Du point de vue du renseignement militaire, on savait tout, d'autant que nous avions de bons contacts en face. Nous nous sommes laissés aller vers une certaine facilité. J'étais patron des opérations à la DGSE au premier jour de la guerre du Golfe. L'état-major des armées m'a demandé ce dont nous disposions sur les armées de l'Irak et du Koweït. Je me suis entendu répondre « rien ! », car, à l'époque, cette région ne faisait pas partie de nos préoccupations. Quant aux armées, elles se contentaient des rapports des attachés de défense dans les ambassades. On en apprenait plus en lisant la presse...

69. Le mythe du 2e Bureau

Le Point, Rémi Kauffer, 2016 12 15

Paris - Mise au point La légende de l'officier du 2e Bureau séducteur, familier des missions périlleuses, des espionnes au regard de mystère et des vols de documents au nez et à la (fausse) barbe de l'ennemi, est tenace. Née à la Belle Epoque, elle est ensuite véhiculée dans l'entre-deux-guerres par une pléiade de romanciers et de cinéastes. Or le 2e Bureau n'est pas un organe d'espionnage comme le BCRA et ses modernes successeurs, le SDECE puis la DGSE, mais un service d'analyse des éléments divers collectés de sources soit humaines, soit technologiques, par les structures de renseignement. Tout état-major d'une grande unité de l'armée française compte plusieurs bureaux spécialisés, le deuxième étant traditionnellement l'apanage d'officiers chargés d'éplucher les informations recueillies et d'en tirer des conclusions pratiques sur l'ordre de bataille de l'armée adverse, ses moyens, son moral, ses plans d'attaque ou de repli. A cette confusion entre renseignement et analyse, la légende ajoute une dimension physique. Ainsi l'homme-fiction du 2e Bureau préfigure-t-il l'espion « james-bondissant » des séries télé ou des films anglo-saxons d'aujourd'hui. Rien de plus faux dans la période de paix armée des années 1920-1930. L'espionnage constituait alors le domaine réservé de professionnels qui savaient ne pas aller trop loin, évitant le recours aux armes. C'est lors de la Seconde Guerre mondiale que l'espionnage devient une activité à très haut risque : l'agent de renseignement, parfois issu de la société civile et engagé dans les réseaux de résistance, encourt désormais la torture et la mort.

70. Le pionnier de l'antiterrorisme

Le Point, Roger Faligot*, 2016 12 15

Paris - Avant-garde. Joseph Fourier prend la tête de la première cellule spécialisée à la DGSE. Alors que l'informatique balbutie dans les années 1970, le colonel Joseph Fourier utilise fiches en carton et cartes perforées. Une gageure pour cet ancien saint-cyrien blessé en Algérie en 1956, spécialiste de la division contre-espionnage (K) que de donner naissance à la petite section K-Terro. Forte d'une dizaine de membres, cette cellule se développe en 1972. Une année charnière : en RFA s'illustre la Fraction armée rouge; en Italie, les Brigades rouges et l'Orchestre noir; en Irlande, l'Armée républicaine irlandaise (Ira) intensifie sa campagne militaire. La France se trouve aussi au centre des règlements de comptes entre Septembre noir et le Mossad, à la suite du massacre des athlètes israéliens par les Palestiniens lors des JO de Munich. Au Moyen-Orient survient un attentat sanglant à l'aéroport de Lod, à Tel-Aviv-Jaffa, organisé par l'Armée rouge japonaise (Nippon Sekigun) avec le Front populaire de libération de la Palestine. On a retrouvé sur un rescapé japonais de cette mission-suicide un message indiquant qu'un universitaire japonais, Takemoto Takashi (alias Tak-Tak), anime une cellule de Sekigun à Paris. Celui-ci est « logé » par la DST et arrêté ainsi qu'un agent de liaison, Yukuta Furuya, en 1974.

71. Le plus secret des services

Le Point, Jean Guisnel, 2016 12 15

Paris - DGSE. Six mille agents servent la Sécurité extérieure. Leurs missions sont multiples, de l'information à l'action. On les imagine galopant pistolet dans une main et poignard dans l'autre, parcourant la planète pour trucider les ennemis de la France. Cela arrive, mais c'est rare ! Ou alors on se les figure convoyant des sacs de billets de la Banque de France pour verser des rançons d'otages. Ça se produit aussi ! L'un de ces agents désabusés de l'armée des ombres se souvient que la somme (« énorme ! ») transportée pour payer la rançon d'un reporter enlevé au Moyen-Orient voilà quelques années aurait suffi à remettre à flot son journal en fâcheuse posture. La DGSE, ce n'est pas que cela... C'est aussi, par exemple, le soutien apporté clandestinement, par tous les moyens illégaux imaginables, aux industries françaises dites « de souveraineté », celles qui contribuent à l'indépendance nationale. Quand il s'agit de gagner un gros contrat, la DGSE ne ménage pas ses efforts. Et quand les instances politiques refusent d'autoriser une interception électronique qui permettrait de connaître le détail des offres concurrentes dans quelque pays lointain, cela s'est vu, nos agents secrets fulminent !

72. Les espions recrutent

Le Point, Marc Le plongeon, 2016 12 15

Paris - Profil. Intéressé par la carrière ? Voici le mode d'emploi. Pour les générations biberonnées aux James Bond et aux romans de John le Carré, le métier d'espion fait fantasmer, mais ne correspond pas tout à fait à la réalité. Ajoutez à cela des aspects plus pragmatiques comme les aléas de la carrière, les sacrifices inhérents à la fonction (vie personnelle), le fait de devoir mentir même à ses proches... Au-delà des clichés, la « communauté du Renseignement » accueille des profils de plus en plus variés et aussi pointus que dans le privé : analystes, ingénieurs, agents de terrain, traducteurs (surtout en langues rares). Sur son site Internet, la Direction du renseignement militaire (DRM) recrute sur CV des interprètes images, des ingénieurs en big data ou encore des spécialistes du renseignement géospatial. S'il est possible de rejoindre la DGSE à l'issue d'une scolarité à l'Ena, des centaines d'étudiants - qui disposent au minimum d'une licence - tentent chaque année leur chance aux concours de la fonction publique. Pour les postes spécifiques comme des langues étrangères, hors administratif, la DGSE peut également embaucher sur contrat.

73. Machiavel au pays des grandes oreilles

Le Point, Rémi Kauffer, 2016 12 15

Paris - Paradoxe. Le président Mitterrand faisait écouter le Tout-Paris, mais snobait le monde du Renseignement. Pour les socialistes, ce 14 juillet 1981 est jour de triomphe. Bienheureuse France de gauche, qui vient de passer de l'ombre à la lumière et se presse à la première garden-party élyséenne de l'ère Mitterrand. Le ton change dans la soirée, quand Pierre Bérégovoy, secrétaire général de la présidence, introduit dans le bureau de François Mitterrand le ministre de l'Intérieur, Gaston Defferre, et Marcel Chalet, le patron de la Direction de la surveillance du territoire (DST), la police de contre-espionnage de la rue des Saussaies. Tout à sa volonté de convaincre, Chalet exhibe quelques pièces qui démontrent la valeur de la source dont sa direction dispose au sein des services secrets soviétiques depuis mai 1981. Cet agent, il en donne le nom de code, Farewell, mais pas le véritable patronyme : Vladimir Ippolitovitch Vetrov, lieutenant-colonel à la ligne T (espionnage scientifique et technologique) de la première direction principale du KGB, chargée du Renseignement soviétique dans le monde. Vetrov est une taupe occidentale au sein du dispositif communiste dont les documents donnent une idée précise de l'ampleur du pillage technologique des pays capitalistes par les Russes. Chalet est digne de confiance, estime Mitterrand.

74. NSA contre DGSE, petites écoutes entre amis

Le Point, Jean Guisnel, 2016 12 15

Paris - Siphonnage. L'espionnage informatique est l'arme fatale du renseignement, et les Français ne sont pas en reste. Nous sommes en juin 2012. Edward Snowden est pour une année encore l'un de ces bons petits soldats de l'ombre, tapi dans une base secrète de la NSA à Hawaii. A Paris, Nicolas Sarkozy termine son mandat, quand le chef des services informatiques de l'Elysée, un homme de la DGSE, s'inquiète. Sur les réseaux de la présidence, il a découvert des mouvements préoccupants et en avertit son ancien service, qui enquête. L'affaire sera révélée dès le mois de juillet 2012 par le quotidien Le Télégramme. Mais il a fallu attendre juin 2016 pour que l'ingénieur centralien Bernard Barbier, à cette époque patron des « grandes oreilles » de la DGSE, choisisse d'en parler devant les élèves de son ancienne école. L'ex-directeur technique de Mortier confirme alors que l'attaque a été conduite par la NSA avec sa méthode de piratage la plus puissante, dont Edward Snowden avait révélé l'existence : le Quantum Attack. Les espions américains ont lancé leur opération en faisant croire à l'ordinateur d'un collaborateur de l'Elysée qu'il se connectait sur Facebook. En réalité, la page d'accueil vers laquelle la machine élyséenne était orientée n'était autre qu'une copie conçue par la NSA. Une fois le lien entre les machines établi, la puissante agence américaine de renseignement technique injectait un logiciel malveillant lui ouvrant un accès complet au réseau élyséen.

76. President Erdogan calls for 'national mobilization' against terrorist organizations

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 12 14

Ankara - Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan called for a "national mobilization against all terrorist organizations" on Dec. 14 during a speech to neighborhood heads at the Presidential Palace in Ankara. "As the leader of the Republic of Turkey, according to Article 104 of our constitution, I declare a national mobilization against the PKK [the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party], DEASH [an Arabic abbreviation of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant], FETÖ [the Fethullahist Terrorist Organization], DHKP-C [the outlawed Revolutionary People's Liberation Party- Front] and all other terrorist organizations, whatever their names, arguments or methods," Erdogan said. "We cannot leave our security solely in the hands of the security forces. I am calling on all my citizens to help our security forces," he added. Erdogan also again claimed that dark external forces were acting against Turkey's interests. "As we are facing the greatest attacks in our history through the acts of these terrorist organizations, it is our right to retaliate," he said.

77. Que valent nos agents secrets ?

Le Point, Rémi Kauffer, 2016 12 15

Paris - Contraste. Excellents en opérations spéciales, très bons en technologie, nos services ont souffert de leurs luttes intestines et de l'attitude de nos présidents. Que valent-ils, en effet ? Difficile de répondre à la question sans se pencher sur leur passé. Une trajectoire qui commence le 4 janvier 1946, quand un décret non publié au JO crée le Service de documentation extérieure et de contre-espionnage (SDECE), où fusionnent les fidèles de Charles de Gaulle et ceux de son rival vaincu, le général Giraud. Gaulliste de 1940, le premier patron du SDECE, André Dewavrin, dit le colonel Passy, voulait que son service soit rattaché aux Affaires étrangères, à l'instar du MI6 britannique. De Gaulle a tranché : le nouveau- né dépendra du chef du gouvernement. Même si le Général quitte le pouvoir par surprise le 20 janvier, le SDECE, lui, reste sous la tutelle de Matignon. Il prend ses quartiers dans la caserne parisienne du boulevard Mortier, en face du bassin nautique des Tourelles. D'où son surnom de la « Piscine ». Se succèdent à sa tête jusqu'en février 1962 trois directeurs qui vont engager à fond le service dans les guerres d'Indochine puis d'Algérie, à telle enseigne que ces conflits de décolonisation absorberont la majeure partie de ses moyens. Une exception française, car, dans le même temps, les autres communautés occidentales du Renseignement se réorganisent pour une lutte souterraine contre le bloc de l'Est. La militarisation du renseignement est longtemps restée en vigueur à Paris, tandis qu'à l'étranger les civils prenaient la main. Autant dire que le savoir-faire que les Français gagnent dans l'action paramilitaire - coups de commando, sabotages, assassinats ciblés, y compris en Europe, implantation de contre- maquis (voir p. 194) -, ils le perdent dans le domaine du Renseignement contre le KGB et ses satellites. Quant au contre-espionnage judiciaire, il est depuis novembre 1944 l'apanage d'une police rattachée au ministère de l'Intérieur, la Direction de la surveillance du territoire (DST), matrice de l'actuelle DGSI.

Compans Cafarelli, France - L'Agence de Développement Économique et Culturel Nord Sud, présidé par Monsieur Gilbert Salinas et son équipe ont reçu jeudi 8 décembre dernier, l'ancien Magistrat Jean-Louis Bruguière, acteur essentiel dans la lutte contre le terrorisme en France depuis trois décennies. Lors de la conférence, organisée à l'Hôtel Mercure Astria situé à Compans Cafarelli, Monsieur Bruguière a détaillé les attentats de l'année 2015 et 2016 ainsi que les menaces auquel la France est confrontée. En tant que premier vice-président de la Section d'Instruction Anti Terroriste, Monsieur Bruguière a développé son travail acharné ces dernières années afin de déjouer entre 1 et 2 attentats par an depuis les années 90. Il a également expliqué que la France, n'ayant qu'une stratégie répressive sur le court terme face à ces terroristes, était dans une impasse. Les djihadistes eux, ont une vision sur le long terme. C'est pourquoi nous sommes pénalisés face à eux. Selon lui, les groupes islamistes qui se sont succédé ces 30 dernières années ne sont qu'une suite idéologique entre le GIA, GSPC, Al- Qaïda ou Daech.

79. Sous Sarkozy, les grandes manoeuvres

Le Point, Jean Guisnel et Olivia Recasens, 2016 12 15

Paris - Dérive. Les ressorts cachés de la réforme du renseignement voulue par le président. Devenu président en 2007, Nicolas Sarkozy n'a pas manqué d'agir rapidement en matière de renseignement extérieur. Il faut dire qu'il a trouvé en arrivant un plan mis au point de longue date pour réformer ce secteur. Celui d'une équipe d'experts, réunis en 1995 au Secrétariat général de la défense nationale (SGDN) par le préfet et ancien directeur de la DST, Rémy Pautrat. Autour de lui, Jean-Louis Gergorin (Groupe Lagardère), Philippe Marland (préfet), Bernard Norlain (général), Michel Foucher (géographe), Bernard Esambert (ingénieur des Mines), Xavier de Lussy (contre-amiral). Quatre lacunes sévères du renseignement français ont été identifiées : une « excessive auto-orientation des services », une « coordination limitée aux temps de crise et incapable d'anticipation », une « insuffisante prise en compte du renseignement ouvert », et la « faiblesse relative des moyens techniques de recueil », qui conduit à une « activité trop réduite d'intrusion dans les systèmes de traitement de l'information ». C'est l'ossature de la réforme du renseignement que le candidat Edouard Balladur souhaite mettre en place après son entrée à l'Élysée. Mais le vainqueur, Jacques Chirac, n'en voudra pas.

80. Terrorism Suspects Led Mainstream Lives, and That Leaves France Uneasy

New York Times, Adam Nossiter, 2016 12 15

Strasbourg - One was a well-liked elementary school assistant. Another was a hard-working cargo handler. The third was a friendly grocer. They were longtime friends in their quiet suburban neighborhood, and they joked with teenagers and greeted children with a smile. Yet in the early hours of Nov. 20 agents from France's internal security agency swooped down, plucking the three and one other from their apartments, charging them with plotting a terrorist attack, and locking them up in a prison outside Paris. Here was a new type of terrorism arrest: decently paid men in their 30s giving no warning signs of radicalization -- no beards, no robes, no proselytizing. And unlike many troubled youths in Paris and Brussels who have latched onto the Islamic State, they did not live on the margins. They had stable jobs and no previous brushes with drugs or crime. It is their sheer normalcy that has had a thoroughly unsettling effect on the authorities and residents alike. "Nobody saw anything," said Olivier Bitz, Strasbourg's deputy mayor in charge of counter-radicalization. "And that is profoundly disconcerting. It is profoundly destabilizing for society. Now, the threat can come from anywhere."

81. Trois Toulousains candidats au jihad en garde à vue

La Dépêche du Midi, C. Lagadic, 2016 12 15

Toulouse, France - Ils étaient sur le point de partir ensemble faire le Jihad. Trois Toulousains ont été interpellés, mardi matin, dans des quartiers populaires de la ville Rose (notre édition d'hier). Étroitement surveillés depuis plusieurs semaines par les services de renseignements, les trois hommes, déjà connus de la justice pour des faits de droits communs, ont été cueillis par un groupe spécialisé de la DGSI (direction générale de la sécurité intérieure) avec l'aide des policiers du Raid. Leurs interpellations se sont déroulées dans le calme. Les enquêteurs ont agi dans le cadre d'une commission rogatoire délivrée par un juge antiterroriste parisien. Des perquisitions ont été menées aux domiciles des suspects. Elles n'auraient pas permis de mettre la main sur des armes ou des explosifs. Hier, les gardes à vue se poursuivaient à Toulouse. Dans les affaires terroristes, elles peuvent durer jusqu'à quatre-vingt-seize heures. Les trois hommes pourraient être transférés dès aujourd'hui à Paris où leurs auditions se poursuivront. Nombreux départs Les enquêteurs cherchent notamment à savoir s'ils projetaient de mener, sur le sol français, des actions terroristes.

1. Crossed wires hampered terrorism investigation

Ottawa Citizen, Gary Dimmock, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - In 2013, while the RCMP were still investigating how a suspected terrorist had quietly left Canada to join ISIL the previous year, Canada's spy agency informed the Mounties they had in fact already known the intimate details of the terrorism suspect's final hours before he boarded a plane for Syria, new court records reveal. John Maguire left Canada in December 2012 to join ISIL in Syria, where he was featured in a propaganda video declaring religious war on his home country. The Islamic State reported Maguire died fighting in 2015, though his death has never been confirmed. Before he left for Syria, Maguire was the alleged star terrorism recruit of Ottawa's Awso Peshdary, 26. Peshdary was charged in February 2015 with recruiting, financing and facilitating terrorism. And the RCMP's case against Peshdary is where new details have emerged about the Mounties' investigation into an alleged Ottawa terror network. The RCMP's case that yielded charges against Peshdary, 26, was built on a foundation so shaky that investigators were twice turned down when they went to get search warrants against Maguire. Ontario Court Justice Peter Wright refused to sign off on the RCMP warrants on Aug. 12, 2013, saying the Mounties had fallen "very far short of the requisite standards expected at law." The judge also said the RCMP had "failed to establish that its sources of this investigation are reliable or trustworthy as is required." This was the second time a judge had refused an RCMP warrant. The details of the first refusal were not contained in the court records. Six months after Maguire joined ISIS in Syria, the Mounties were still investigating how he left the country. The Mounties then asked CSIS for help and it turned out Maguire didn't just slip out of the country unnoticed. CSIS knew all about Maguire's final hours before boarding a flight to Istanbul back in December 2012. In an Aug. 26, 2013 letter to an RCMP chief superintendent, a CSIS acting director general revealed all the details of Maguire's exit, from who drove him to the Pierre Elliott Trudeau airport in Montreal on Dec. 6 (an Ottawa man, accompanied by suspected accomplice Peshdary) right down to where he exchanged currency before checking in at a Royal Air Morocco counter. CSIS also forwarded to the Mounties several audio recordings of intercepted conversations between Peshdary and Maguire to help them finally firm up that they were friends. It wasn't until the RCMP got the CSIS information that they were able to secure search warrants on their third try against Maguire and later Peshdary, and without access to the affidavits and source documents used to win the warrants, Friedman says he is unable to properly challenge the judicial authorizations. The records application also reveal there were parallel investigations of Peshdary by the RCMP and CSIS, but it's clear the agencies weren't sharing information at that point. According to March 17, 2014, notes of an RCMP inspector, counter-terrorism investigators said Milton (the CSIS asset) may have surreptitiously videotaped the inside of its undercover operator's apartment. It couldn't have been too undercover, as the RCMP inspector also told CSIS that three others - including Peshdary - appeared to be searching the undercover operator's apartment for listening devices. The RCMP agent was paid at least $550,000 to wear a wire against the Ottawa targets, and was later paid an additional $250,000 in advance to testify at preliminary hearings that never happened.

2. Get tough on dual national terrorists, senator urges

Postmedia News, Anthony Furey, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - A Conservative senator is embarking on a campaign to see that the government still has the power to revoke the citizenship of dual-national terrorists. On Thursday Sen. Daniel Lang, representing Yukon, urged his fellow senators to amend the controversial Liberal bill Bill C-6. "I am not alone when I state that these dual-national Canadian terrorists are not like every other Canadian - and they don't deserve the same rights and privileges as every other citizen," Lang said in the Upper Chamber. The previous Conservative government passed a bill that came into effect only last year allowing citizenship to be taken away from people convicted of terrorism and high treason who also hold citizenship in another country. The Liberal bill - which passed the House of Commons and is now making its way through the Senate - will repeal this provision, among other measures. The senator says the provision currently only applies to seven people holding Canadian citizenship, four of whom were convicting in the 2006 Toronto 18 terror plot to attack the Parliament buildings, CSIS and CBC headquarters and behead the prime minister. "What I maintain is that when someone has committed the worst crime you could against your country, your fellow Canadians and your neighbour, one of the consequences should be that you lose your citizenship," Lang told the Sun in a phone interview.

3. A tragedy but not our fight: Sajjan

The Associated Press with files from the National Post, David Pugliese, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Weeping, hobbling on crutches or dragging suitcases, hundreds of survivors of a devastating government bombardment left the last sliver of opposition-held Aleppo on Thursday, as a smiling President Bashar Assad called it a historic event comparable to the birth of Christ, and Canadian Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan said Canada will not be getting involved militarily. The evacuation sealed the end of Syrian rebels' most important stronghold and was a watershed moment in the country's five-year-old civil war. Speaking to journalists in a conference call from London, Canada's defence minister said, "What is happening in Aleppo is tragic and it needs to change." But when asked whether Canada would join other nations in training moderate Syrian forces, who are fighting both the Syrian government as well as troops from the extremist Islamic State, Sajjan said the Liberal government has no plans to get involved. "Our focus has always been in Iraq and that is our focus now. Right now we have no plans to be militarily involved in Syria." Sajjan was in London to attend a meeting of defence ministers from nations contributing to the war against the Islamic State. Canada is contributing surveillance aircraft and a refuelling plane to the coalition fighting ISIL in Iraq.

4. Canadian military teams aid overseas efforts to topple ISIS in Mosul

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Two Canadian military teams are in Lebanon and Jordan as the international community searches for ways to keep the so-called Islamic State group from spreading once the city of Mosul falls. Senior military commanders have warned that victory in Iraq's second-largest city will not mark the end of ISIS as a threat, but that the group will instead go underground and resort to suicide attacks and similar tactics. There are also growing fears that defeat in Iraq and Syria will see ISIS attempt to spread into the surrounding region, where it will try to foment fresh havoc and instability. British Defence Secretary Michael Fallon said Thursday that preventing that spread will be a key focus for those countries involved in the fight against ISIS -- also known as Daesh -- in the coming months. "We need momentum across the Middle East to defeat Daesh wherever it now disperses to," Fallon said at the start of an anti-ISIS meeting in London. "As they are pushed out of Iraq, they will disperse and move to different theatres and redefine their success not by territory, but by insurgency." Speaking by phone after the meeting, Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan said Canadian troops will remain in Iraq for the foreseeable future to ensure local forces can maintain peace and security. Military officials have previously said Iraqi and Kurdish forces will need to be retrained to deal with the type of terror tactics that ISIS is expected to adopt after Mosul.

5. Globe reporter wins Amnesty award

Globe and Mail, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - The Globe and Mail's Steven Chase has been awarded this year's Amnesty International Canada Media Award in the national print category for a series of stories on Canadian arms sales to Saudi Arabia. The annual award is given for excellence in journalism on human-rights issues. Mr. Chase's investigation focused on the sale of Canadian light-armoured vehicles to the Saudi government and the sale's approval by a Liberal government avowedly dedicated to promoting human rights. "These articles demonstrate the tenacious effort to get the facts and establish the human rights context for a massive sale of Light Armoured Vehicles to Saudi Arabia that Canadians seemed initially inclined to ignore," John Tackaberry, one of three judges, said in a statement. "While the government was suggesting they are little more than 'jeeps,' Steven Chase exposed the truth about these armoured vehicles that in some cases are to be armed and are being sold to a government implicated in war crimes in Yemen and serious human rights violations within Saudi Arabia." Globe editor-in-chief David Walmsley hailed Mr. Chase, a reporter in the Ottawa bureau, for leading the way on the Saudi arms story. "This award highlights the importance of covering stories that otherwise don't come up in daily discourse," Mr. Walmsley said. "Steve Chase uncovered links that cabinet ministers would prefer we not address.

6. Harjit Sajjan says he 'faced a lot of racism' while in Canadian military

Global News, Amy Minsky and Vassy Kapelos, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan, the first Sikh-Canadian to command a Canadian army regiment, said he never experienced racism before joining the military. "I finally found out what racism was when I joined the military," Sajjan told Global News in a one-on-one interview. The military, embroiled in ongoing allegations of pervasive sexual assault and misconduct, is reviewing how to address assault and violence among his ranks. But there are other behaviours, such as racism, the Armed Forces needs to eliminate, said Sajjan, who joined in 1989. "I witnessed a lot of things we wish we could have stomped out," he said. "This is one thing we need to root out, whether it's racial discrimination or whether it's sexual assault and how women are treated." When Chief of Defence Staff Gen. Jonathan Vance took over as the country's top soldier, the military was already awash in allegations of sexual assault and discrimination. He has made it a priority of his to get a scope of the problem and put an end to the behaviour. "I'm very proud of the work that Gen. Vance has done," Sajjan said. "A lot of work has been done, but [there's] a lot of work that we still need to do as well. We will not relent." Canadian troops have played a part in the ongoing fight for Mosul - the so-called Islamic State's last major bastion in Iraq - that started two months ago.

7. Miss Canada speaks out on China human rights

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 16

Washington - Poised but defiant, Miss Canada will be vying for more than the winner's tiara when she competes in the annual Miss World pageant in Washington this weekend. Anastasia Lin wants to tell the world about the evil of organ-harvesting. Lin was due to compete at Miss World last year when it was hosted by China but was barred from entering the country due to her activism against persecution of Falun Gong, a meditation practice that she follows and that China's government has outlawed. U.K.-based Miss World is allowing her to compete again this year in the U.S. Some U.S. media organizations say Miss World, which has Chinese corporate sponsorship, has prevented them from speaking to Lin. But she was allowed to speak to The Associated Press in an interview Wednesday in which she spoke forthrightly about her cause, although she sidestepped questions about whether she had faced restrictions. "Everybody is tied economically with China. China's soft power is so huge that no one really dares to speak up," said Lin, 26, at a hotel just outside Washington at the National Harbor in Oxon Hill, Maryland.

8. Ottawa called for release of Mississauga Presbyterian pastor Hyeon Soo Lim

Toronto Star, Mary Orms, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Canada is calling the case of imprisoned Toronto-area pastor Hyeon Soo Lim "absolutely a priority" after Ottawa officials travelled to North Korea this week to visit him for the first time and to discuss his release. Lim, 62, has been detained for nearly two years for what North Koreans say was an attempt to overthrow the government. Global Affairs Canada spokesperson Kristine Racicot confirmed Thursday that a ministry delegation "recently visited Pyongyang and was able to undertake a consular visit to Mr. Lim." "The Government of Canada is very concerned about the health, well-being and continued detention of Mr. Lim," Racicot said. The visit was arranged with the aid of the Swedish embassy acting as a "protecting power" for Canada, which does not maintain a diplomatic presence in North Korea. Until now, Global Affairs Canada has shared little with the public about the fate of the imprisoned Christian minister. However, on Thursday, the Canadian government disclosed it has been working closely with Lim's family. "Minister (Stéphane) Dion and Parliamentary Secretary Omar Alghabra have met with Pastor Lim's son, and consular officials are working actively to secure the release of Mr. Lim."

9. Smoother military exit system for soldiers still years away, documents show

CBC.CA, Murray Brewster, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Building a smoother, less confusing exit path for soldiers departing the Canadian military will take another two or three years to implement and will likely not include significant recommendations from the Canadian Forces ombudsman, CBC News has learned. A draft copy of the strategy shows that many key elements of the Liberal government's overhaul of the system -- namely the harmonization of financial benefits -- will not take place until the 2018-19 budget year. That is likely to be frustrating for ex-military members who have been routinely caught up in a system that makes them wait weeks, sometimes months, for Canadian Forces pensions or separate veterans' benefits and entitlements. A copy of the May 2016 draft plan was obtained by CBC News. It was prepared by a joint working group of National Defence and Veterans Affairs, and says building a bridge between the two departments is a priority. The 12-page document lays out a complex, multi-year program with the stated intent of making it easier for members of the military to transition from uniform to civilian life through more employment, financial certainty and, in some cases, medical certainty. Both Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan and Veterans Affairs Minister Kent Hehr have been tasked with -- and often talk about -- "closing the seam" between their organizations. The government and outside experts have come to the realization that ex-soldiers, whose transition out of uniform has been messed up, face higher probability of being in crisis.

10. Terror peace bond for Windsor man

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - Ten days after flying out of Toronto's Pearson airport on Nov. 3, 2013, Mohammed El Shaer was photographed outside an ISIL-controlled police station in a Syrian border town called Atmeh, raising his index finger in the jihadists' salute. Standing beside him was Ahmad Waseem, whom El Shaer had accompanied from their hometown, Windsor, Ont. Two years later, Waseem is dead, killed fighting with ISIL, and on Thursday a judge imposed a terrorism peace bond on El Shaer. Following a day-long hearing, Justice Lloyd Dean placed 17 restrictions on El Shaer, including that he not communicate with ISIL supporters. He must surrender his passport and wear a GPS electronic ankle bracelet for six months. The Crown had wanted a one-year term with the GPS but the judge said El Shaer had already been wearing one for the six months since his arrest and he now had the chance to show he could be trusted without one. "I'll give you that opportunity, Mr. El Shaer." He also cannot leave Windsor, go to any airport or possess weapons, objects with terrorist logos or devices that can access the Internet. An 11 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew was imposed. The conditions are for one year, except the GPS. Police have been using terrorism peace bonds to prevent suspected extremists from leaving Canada to join ISIL and other terror groups. The court-approved orders are controversial because they can severely restrict the freedoms of those who have not been charged with any crimes. An RCMP officer testified that the investigation had started in February 2013 when a Windsor hospital contacted police about Waseem, who had arrived for treatment of a gunshot wound in the groin he got while in Syria. Police soon zeroed in on El Shaer after discovering he had signed Waseem's passport application. Then on Nov. 3, Waseem's mother called police to say her son was missing. He and El Shaer had boarded the same flight in Toronto.

11. Toronto filmmaker's doc on Afghan marathon highlights hurdles faced by participants

Toronto Star, Jackie Hong, 2016 12 16

Toronto - One woman was forbidden to run in the marathon by her father. Another trained at her university before it was bombed by the Taliban, leaving her with nowhere to practice. And a third pushed aside national tension and came from abroad to support her fellow runners. These are the stories of three women who ran in the second Marathon of Afghanistan in November, the subject of a documentary by a Toronto-based filmmaker about the challenges facing women who want to run in a country long shaken by conflict and where women's activities can be heavily restricted. "Essentially, for the average woman in Afghanistan, it's not safe for them to run outside in the streets like we can here," The Secret Marathon's director, Kate McKenzie, said. McKenzie is a digital media master's student at Ryerson University. "When a woman goes to run, people might throw stones at her or insult her or feel like, because she's running, that means she is a woman who doesn't have good morals or things like that . . . and so, as a result, they've had to train in their backyards." McKenzie, also a runner, said she learned about the marathon through her coach, Martin Parnell, who was planning on running and asked if she would edit the photos and videos he was going to take on his phone. "And I was like, 'Martin, this story is way too incredible. I want to come with you,'" she recalled. McKenzie flew to the central Afghan province of Bamyan with a small crew to document the sold-out marathon, where 14 out of 100 runners were women - up from only three last year. And this year, nine of the female participants were Afghan, a ninefold increase from last year's solo female Afghan runner. McKenzie, who had never run a marathon before, was one of the international participants.

12. Trump bump? American refugee claims in Canada increased last month

Canadian Press, Alexander Panetta, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - The number of Americans seeking refugee status in Canada has experienced a significant bump this year, increasing more than five times in November 2016 from the same period a year earlier. The overall numbers, however, remain tiny. Few people seek to flee the world's largest economy, and one of its oldest democracies, on humanitarian grounds: A mere 170 Americans claimed asylum at Canada's land borders through the first 11 months of this year. Yet that was more than twice the total from 2015 -- and it was led by a noticeable five-fold increase in the month of November, with 28 people claiming refugee status last month compared with merely five in November 2015. Was any of this driven by politics -- and Donald Trump's Nov. 8 election? The Canadian government won't touch that question. "Refugee claims are protected under the Privacy Act," said Nicholas Dorion, a spokesman for the Canada Border Services Agency, which supplied the figures to The Canadian Press. "Therefore the CBSA will not discuss specifics of asylum cases." On the whole, Americans represented less than three per cent of the 5,939 people who claimed refugee status upon arriving at Canada's land borders, in the first 11 months of 2016. Yet the claims from 170 U.S. citizens was more than twice the 73 who did over the same period in 2015. Mario Bellissimo, a Toronto immigration lawyer, said he's not surprised. Such bumps are often driven by political changes, said Bellissimo: "Saw some of this when Bush assumed office (in 2000)."

13. For Sale on the Dark Web: Yahoo Users' Stolen Records

New York Times, Vindu Goel, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 12 16

San Francisco - Some time around August 2013, hackers penetrated the email system of Yahoo, one of the world's largest and oldest providers of free email services. The attackers quietly scooped up the records of more than 1 billion users, including names, birth dates, phone numbers and passwords that were encrypted with an easily broken form of security. The intruders also obtained the security questions and backup email addresses used to reset lost passwords -- valuable information for someone trying to break into other accounts owned by the same user, and particularly useful to a hacker seeking to break into government computers around the world: Several million of the backup addresses belonged to military and civilian government employees from dozens of nations, including more than 150,000 Americans. No one knows what happened to the data during the next three years. But last August, a geographically dispersed hacking collective based in Eastern Europe quietly began offering the whole database for sale, according to Andrew Komarov, chief intelligence officer at InfoArmor, an Arizona cybersecurity firm, who monitors the dark corners of the internet inhabited by criminals, spies and spammers. Three buyers -- two known spammers and an entity that appeared more interested in espionage -- paid about $300,000 each for a complete copy of the database, he said. The attack, which Yahoo disclosed on Wednesday, is the largest known data breach of a company. And neither Yahoo nor the public had any idea it had occurred until a month ago, when law enforcement authorities came to the company with samples of the hacked data from an undisclosed source.

14. Kremlin Calls NBC Report Putin Directed Hack 'Laughable Nonsense'

NBC News, Ken Dilanian, 2016 12 15

New York - The Kremlin on Thursday disputed an exclusive NBC News report that U.S. intelligence has documented Vladimir Putin's personal involvement in a Russian intelligence operation to interfere in the U.S. presidential election. Putin spokesman Dmitry Peskov told the AP the report was "laughable nonsense." Maria Zakharova, a spokeswoman for the Russian Foreign Ministry, accused "Western media" of being a "shill" and a "mouthpiece of various power groups." NBC News reported Wednesday that the U.S. has information that Putin personally directed how material hacked by Russian intelligence agencies was used during the campaign. Anthony Scaramucci, a senior Trump transition team official, did not dispute Russia's involvement in an interview Thursday night with MSNBC's Brian Williams. "I don't think anybody thinks that you're wrong," he said of the NBC News report. "Our position right now is that we're waiting for more information...we reject the notion that people would cyberattack our institutions...We are very upset about it."

15. Obama On Russian Hacking: 'We Need To Take Action. And We Will'

NPR Morning Edition, Scott Detrow, 2016 12 16

Washington - President Obama says the United States will respond to Russian cyberattacks that the intelligence community has concluded were part of an effort to influence the 2016 presidential election. In an interview with NPR's Steve Inskeep that will air Friday on Morning Edition, Obama said, "I think there is no doubt that when any foreign government tries to impact the integrity of our elections ... we need to take action. And we will -- at a time and place of our own choosing. Some of it may be explicit and publicized; some of it may not be." With the question of Russia's ultimate motivation for the hack becoming increasingly divisive, Obama was careful to not endorse a CIA assessment, reported by NPR and other news outlets, that asserts that Russia's goal was to elect Trump. "There are still a whole range of assessments taking place among the agencies," Obama told NPR, referring to an order he has given the U.S. intelligence community to conduct a full review of the cyberattacks before Inauguration Day. "And so when I receive a final report, you know, we'll be able to, I think, give us a comprehensive and best guess as to those motivations. But that does not in any way, I think, detract from the basic point that everyone during the election perceived accurately -- that in fact what the Russian hack had done was create more problems for the Clinton campaign than it had for the Trump campaign." "There's no doubt that it contributed to an atmosphere in which the only focus for weeks at a time, months at a time were Hillary's emails, the Clinton Foundation, political gossip surrounding the DNC," Obama said.

16. Obama signs off on bill to firm US border with Canada

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 16

Fort Kent, Maine - President Barack Obama has signed off on a proposal to assess and strengthen security at the country's northern border. Republican New Hampshire Sen. Kelly Ayotte, a bill sponsor, said Thursday the country is facing unprecedented national security challenges that demand a full understanding of the northern border's needs, strengths, and vulnerabilities. The bill requires the federal Department of Homeland Security to evaluate security threats at the northern border. Maine Sens. Angus King, an independent, and Susan Collins, a Republican, bill co-sponsors, say the agency must conduct a comprehensive review of resources and personnel levels. The senators also say it will require the federal government to consider what tools border security officials need to stop drug and human trafficking.

17. Obama Vows U.S. Reprisal for Moscow's Meddling

New York Times, Julie Hirschfeld Davis, David E. Sanger, 2016 12 16

Washington - President Obama said on Thursday that the United States would retaliate for Russia's efforts to influence the presidential election, asserting that "we need to take action," and "we will." The comments, in an interview with NPR, indicate that Mr. Obama, in his remaining weeks in office, will pursue either economic sanctions against Russia or perhaps some kind of response in cyberspace. Mr. Obama spoke as President-elect Donald J. Trump on Thursday again refused to accept Moscow's culpability, asking on Twitter why the administration had waited "so long to act" if Russia "or some other entity" had carried out cyberattacks. The president discussed the potential for American retaliation with Steve Inskeep of NPR for an interview to air on Friday morning. "I think there is no doubt that when any foreign government tries to impact the integrity of our election," Mr. Obama said, "we need to take action. And we will -- at the time and place of our choosing." Mr. Trump has said privately in recent days that he believes there are people in the C.I.A. who are out to get him and are working to delegitimize his presidency, according to people briefed on the conversations who described them on the condition of anonymity.

18. Putin turned Russia election hacks in Trump's favor: U.S. officials

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 16

Washington - Russian President Vladimir Putin supervised his intelligence agencies' hacking of the U.S. presidential election and turned it from a general attempt to discredit American democracy to an effort to help Donald Trump, three U.S. officials said on Thursday. U.S. intelligence agencies' conclusion that Russia tried to influence the election by hacking people and institutions, including Democratic Party bodies, has angered President-elect Trump, who says he won the Nov. 8 vote fairly. Russian officials have denied accusations of interference in the U.S. election. Separately, a senior White House official said on Thursday that Putin was likely to have been aware of the cyber attacks but he fell short of accusing the Russian president. "I don't think things happen in the Russian government of this consequence without Vladimir Putin knowing about it," Ben Rhodes, the White House's deputy national security adviser, told MSNBC. "When you're talking about a significant cyber intrusion like this, we're talking about the highest levels of government."

19. RNC Security Foiled Russian Hackers

Wall Street Journal, Julian E. Barnes, Devlin Barrett, 2016 12 16

New York - Russian hackers tried to penetrate the computer networks of the Republican National Committee, using the same techniques that allowed them to infiltrate its Democratic counterpart, according to U.S. officials who have been briefed on the attempted intrusion. But the intruders failed to get past security defenses on the RNC's computer networks, the officials said. And people close to the investigation said it indicated a less aggressive and much less persistent effort by Russian intelligence to hack the Republican group than the Democratic National Committee. Only a single email account linked to a long-departed RNC staffer was targeted. The disclosures came as a political furor grows over suspected Russian hacking of U.S. political organizations.

The Central Intelligence Agency has concluded that Russian hackers, whom analysts say work for that country's military and intelligence apparatus, stole emails from the DNC, as well as another Democratic organization and the chairman of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, to harm her candidacy and boost Republican Donald Trump's chances of winning. Russia has denied the allegations. The possibility that Russians tried and failed to infiltrate the RNC doesn't necessarily conflict with the CIA's conclusion. A senior U.S. official said analysts now believe what started as an information-gathering campaign aimed at both parties later took on a focus of leaked emails about Mrs. Clinton and Democrats.

20. Russian hack almost brought the U.S. military to its knees

CBS News, David Martin, 2016 12 16

Washington - Russian hackers struck at the heart of the U.S. military in August 2015 by seizing the e-mail system used by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, CBS News has learned. Then-Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Martin Dempsey was alerted to the attack by an early-morning phone call from the Director of the National Security Agency, Admiral Mike Rogers. Now retired, Dempsey told CBS News in an exclusive interview that the attack was proceeding at an alarming speed. Within an hour, hackers had seized control of the unclassified e-mail system used by the Pentagon's Joint Staff, the organization of some 3,500 military officers and civilians who work for the Chairman. The attack, which officials now blame on Russia, began with 30,000 e-mails sent to a West Coast university. Of those 30,000, four were forwarded to members of the Joint Staff and one was opened -- allowing the hackers in. Since it was an unclassified network, the attack had no real intelligence value. It was not spying, but a full-on assault whose only apparent purpose was to cause damage and force the Pentagon to replace both hardware and software, which took about two weeks to accomplish. The motive for the attack was believed to be Russian anger at economic sanctions orchestrated by the Obama administration in response to Vladimir Putin's annexation of Crimea and interference in Ukraine.

21. Something is broken at the FBI

Washington Post, John Podesta, 2016 12 16

Op-ed - The more we learn about the Russian plot to sabotage Hillary Clinton's campaign and elect Donald Trump, and the failure of the FBI to adequately respond, the more shocking it gets. The former acting director of the CIA has called the Russian cyberattack "the political equivalent of 9/11." Just as after the real 9/11, we need a robust, independent investigation into what went wrong inside the government and how to better protect our country in the future. As the former chair of the Clinton campaign and a direct target of Russian hacking, I understand just how serious this is. So I was surprised to read in the New York Times that when the FBI discovered the Russian attack in September 2015, it failed to send even a single agent to warn senior Democratic National Committee officials. Instead, messages were left with the DNC IT "help desk." As a former head of the FBI cyber division told the Times, this is a baffling decision: "We are not talking about an office that is in the middle of the woods of Montana." What takes this from baffling to downright infuriating is that at nearly the exact same time that no one at the FBI could be bothered to drive 10 minutes to raise the alarm at DNC headquarters, two agents accompanied by attorneys from the Justice Department were in Denver visiting a tech firm that had helped maintain Clinton's email server. This trip was part of what FBI Director James B. Comey described as a "painstaking" investigation of Clinton's emails, "requiring thousands of hours of effort" from dozens of agents who conducted at least 80 interviews and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. Of course, as Comey himself concluded, in the end, there was no case; it was not even a close call. Comparing the FBI's massive response to the overblown email scandal with the seemingly lackadaisical response to the very real Russian plot to subvert a national election shows that something is deeply broken at the FBI. Note: John Podesta served as chair of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

22. Trump's Dispute With CIA Puts Pompeo in a Bind

Roll Call, Ryan Lucas, 2016 12 16

Washington - In the extraordinary public dispute between Donald Trump and the CIA, one man finds himself in a particularly tricky position: the president-elect's nominee to lead the agency, Rep. Mike Pompeo. The tea party Republican from Kansas, who is expected to win Senate confirmation, will have to repair a relationship between Trump and the CIA that has been battered by the president-elect's repeated disparagement of the agency's capabilities and competence. "I think that we've never quite seen a moment like this in agency history where an incoming president was so openly critical and questioning of the agency's integrity," said Dennis Wilder, a former senior CIA official who retired this year. "I think Pompeo's on a bit of a hot seat going into this job because he's going to have to bridge both sides of this, and he's going to have to convince President Trump that agency reporting and analysis is both valuable and has integrity to it." John McLaughlin, a former deputy director and acting director of the CIA, said Pompeo should focus on the basics to win the agency's trust and confidence. "All a CIA director needs to do to succeed is to approach the issues dispassionately, make sure all the evidence is taken into account, lay out what is actually known, what is less certain, and what conclusions logically come out of that," McLaughlin said in an email.

23. Trump in Denial as Evidence Grows Spymaster Putin Behind Election Hacks

ABC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 16

New York - With intelligence officials convinced that Russian spook-turned-president Vladimir Putin personally directed cyber-attacks aimed at interfering with the U.S. election, President-elect Donald Trump continues to downplay and dismiss growing hacking concerns as politically motivated. The hacks saw the systems and accounts of political organizations and figures like the Democratic National Committee breached, and private data - in the most notable cases, emails - spilled out into public view. "The primary goal of this attack on our election system was to sow chaos and apparently to help the candidate Donald Trump," Matt Olsen, an ABC News consultant and the former director of the National Counterterrorism Center, said. But Trump is having none of it. "If Russia, or some other entity, was hacking, why did the White House wait so long to act?" Trump tweeted on Thursday. "Why did they only complain after Hillary lost?" "They (intelligence) know with a near certainty that Putin was involved - that's not something they say lightly," Richard Clarke, an ABC News consultant who served in the administrations of Presidents Reagan, Clinton and both Bushes. "That's something they say when they do have a smoking gun."

24. U.S. Faces Tall Hurdles in Detaining or Deterring Russian Hackers

New York Times, Adam Goldman, Matt Apuzzo, 2016 12 16

Washington - When a suspected Russian cybercriminal named Dmitry Ukrainisky was arrested in a Thai resort town last summer, the American authorities hoped they could whisk him back to New York for trial and put at least a temporary dent in Russia's arsenal of computer hackers. But the Russian authorities moved quickly to persuade Thailand not to extradite him, saying that he should be prosecuted at home. American officials knew what that meant. If Mr. Ukrainisky got on a plane to Moscow, they concluded, he would soon be back at work in front of a computer. "The American authorities continue the unacceptable practice of 'hunting' for Russians all over the world, ignoring the norms of international laws and twisting other states' arms," the Russian Foreign Ministry said. The dispute over Mr. Ukrainisky, whose case remains in limbo, highlights the difficulties -- and at times impossibilities -- that the United States faces in combating Russian hackers, including those behind the recent attacks on the Democratic National Committee. That hack influenced the course, if not the outcome, of a presidential campaign and was the culmination of years of increasingly brazen digital assaults on American infrastructure. The United States has few options for responding to such hacks. Russia does not extradite its citizens and has shown that it will not easily be deterred through public shaming. At times, the American authorities have enlisted local police officials to arrest suspects when they leave Russia -- for vacation in the Maldives, for example. But more often than not, the F.B.I. and Justice Department investigate and compile accusations and evidence against people who will almost certainly never stand trial. "You can indict 400 people. They don't care," said Robert E. Anderson Jr., who until last year served as the F.B.I.'s most senior executive overseeing computer investigations.

25. Where is Trump getting his cybersecurity advice?

Christian Science Monitor, Aliya Sternstein, 2016 12 15

Washington - Amid the growing controversy over intelligence reports that Russian hackers meddled in US elections to aid Donald Trump's campaign, it's unclear who the president-elect is listening to on matters of cybersecurity right now. Michael Flynn may have the most sway over the president-elect on issues of cybersecurity. He's a member of Trump's transition team and the president-elect's incoming national security adviser. Among the people around Trump, the retired Army lieutenant general and former Defense Intelligence Agency head may be the most knowledgeable when it comes to the current state of digital espionage and how a country such as Russia operates in cyberspace. "It appears that Gen. Flynn, his advice to the president, specifically about cybersecurity will probably be taken very seriously," says Dale Meyerrose, a retired Air Force major general, who knows Flynn and served in the Bush administration as the first- ever intelligence community chief information officer. Flynn's expertise and association with cybersecurity issues stretches back more than a decade, back to when he was in uniform, says Mr. Meyerrose. "I'm equally positive that Gen. Flynn couldn't fix a server to save his soul, but that's not his job. His job entails an understanding, cause and effects and factors that go into decision making." During the campaign, Flynn publicly differed with his boss on attributing the DNC hack to Russia. In an interview with Passcode, he said, "We should not be surprised that a communist state run by a totalitarian dictator wants to expose the weaknesses of capitalism and, frankly, show the level of corruption that exists in our political process."

26. Why Didn't Obama Do More About Russian Election Hack?

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 16

New York - The Obama administration didn't respond more forcefully to Russian hacking before the presidential election because they didn't want to appear to be interfering in the election and they thought that Hillary Clinton was going to win and a potential cyber war with Russia wasn't worth it, multiple high-level government officials told NBC News. "They thought she was going to win, so they were willing to kick the can down the road," said one U.S official familiar with the level of Russian hacking. The administration did take action in response to the hack prior to the election. In September, President Obama privately confronted Vladimir Putin about the hacks at the G-20 summit in China. He warned the Russian President of unspecified consequences if the hacks continued. On October 7, the Department of Homeland Security and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence issued an unprecedented joint statement pointing the finger at Russia, saying hacks of U.S. political groups and individual politicians could only have been done with the authorization of "Russia's senior most" officials and that its intent was to undermine the integrity of the election.

27. Yahoo hack shows data's use for information warfare

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 12 16

Washington - The 2013 hack affecting a billion Yahoo users shows how seemingly innocuous bits of data gleaned from cyber attacks can be exploited for espionage and information warfare, as well as for profit. The breach, disclosed Wednesday, is the largest on record and comes just months after Yahoo disclosed a separate attack in 2014 affecting data from 500 million users. On the surface, the trove of data is "a bunch of junk," said John Dickson of the security consultancy Denim Group. But the ability to create a searchable database with data tidbits such as birth dates and phone numbers makes it enormously valuable to hackers seeking to make a profit or engage in industrial or state espionage, he said. "If you're trying to research and get information about a target, you're going to use everything you can find," said Dickson, a former officer in the Air Force Information Warfare Center.

28. German spies 'can't be trusted': Relations between the UK and Berlin intelligence chiefs hit after comments by London

Daily Mail (UK), Allan Hall, Ian Drury, 2016 12 16

Berlin - Relations between British and German spy chiefs have hit rock bottom because London says its counterparts in Berlin cannot be trusted to keep secrets. At a time of escalating Islamic terror threats across Europe, Germany's spy agency BND is being frozen out by GCHQ and the National Security Agency in the US. Both London and Washington believe insecure German data servers have contributed to the leaking of tens of thousands of classified documents to Wikileaks. And they have infuriated Berlin by refusing to hand over secret intelligence data demanded by left wing and Green politicians which they fear will be aired in the German parliament. It is understood that in November 2014 there was a meeting in Berlin between Sir Simon McDonald, the then British ambassador to Germany, together with Patrick McGuinness, Deputy National Security Adviser for Intelligence, Security, and Resilience at the Cabinet Office, and high security officials in Angela Merkel's government. The British made it plain at the meeting that co-operation between Britain and Germany was becoming increasingly problematic because of leaks. A source familiar with the meeting said: 'They stressed that a secret service is just that and that its workings and operations must remain secret and they felt that Germany was leaking them like a sieve.' Britain fears a 'big debate' in the German parliament which would lay open secret sources and intelligence gathering techniques. A BND insider said: 'Never has a friendly nation been asked to divulge its secrets in this way. It is outrageous and we completely understand the fury that this has unleashed in Whitehall. But it has left us vulnerable.'

29. Most Brits believe hate crime has got worse since EU referendum, poll finds

The Independent (UK), Jon Stone, 2016 12 16

London - Most British people believe hate crime has worsened following the European Union referendum, a new survey shows. Pollsters ICM found 58 per cent felt that such crimes had increased since the referendum in June, while 76 per cent believed hate crime was a problem in the UK today. There was no sign of a serious partisan divide on the issue, with those that voted for Brexit only slightly less likely to believe that hate crime had increased since the referendum. 45 per cent of Leave voters agreed the situation had deteriorated. However, the poll found that a small minority of people in society apparently refuse to acknowledge obvious hate crimes as such. A hold-out 10 per cent of the population - one in 10 people - says it believes that physically attacking someone because of their race is not a hate crime. Somewhat more, 28 per cent, believe that calling someone a racial slur because of their race is not a hate crime. Exactly the same proportion believes that hate crime legislation is an infringement on freedom of speech. Both these examples are racially aggravated offences under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

30. Most terrorism arrests lead to no charge or conviction, figures show

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 12 16

London - The overwhelming majority of people arrested for alleged terrorism offences over the past 15 years have been freed without charge or conviction, official figures show. Fewer than two in 10 people detained by police since September 2001 were convicted directly of terrorism or a terrorism-related offence. The figures released by the Home Office showed that 3,349 people in England and Wales were arrested under terrorism laws since the 9/11 attacks on the US. Of those arrested for terrorism and related offences, 17.8% were convicted in relation to involvement in violent jihad, for instance plotting attacks, funding or facilitating. Another 10% arrested on suspicion of terrorism were convicted of offences unrelated to the terrorism charges they were originally arrested for, taking the total to 27.6%. The majority of those arrested were from British Muslim communities.

31. US role in Isis fight will continue under Trump, says UK minister

Press Association, Staff report, 2016 12 16

London - The defence secretary, Michael Fallon, has said he has no doubt that the incoming administration of Donald Trump will maintain the US's "global leadership" in the fight against Islamic State. Fallon was speaking alongside his US counterpart, Ash Carter, at the conclusion of a one-day meeting in London of the international coalition against Isis, which the government refers to as Daesh. Carter said it would be logical for Trump to stick to the outgoing Obama government's approach to fighting terrorism. Fallon, when asked whether he expected the 68-nation coalition to survive the change of occupants in the White House, said it would be important to focus on the actions of the new administration rather than Trump's campaign rhetoric. "We are dealing here with a global threat from Daesh, a threat that isn't just present in Iraq and Syria but is present in western Europe, has hit Paris and Brussels, spread to the far east and hit California," he said.

32. 300 more boys in blue now SA is back in black

The Advertiser, Daniel Wills, 2016 12 16

Canberra - A plan to boost the police force by 300-plus officers will be backed with $51.5 million of new spending as part of a State Budget update to be handed down today. Treasurer Tom Koutsantonis will deliver the Mid Year Budget Review to update the state's financial position and reveal key economic indicators including jobs growth forecasts. It comes 24-hours after SA again anchored the nation's worst unemployment rate. The Advertiser can reveal the MYBR will be highlighted by the $51.5 million to accelerate the so-called recruit 313 program, delivering additional officers to the frontline by 2018. The program has been a political football for years, as the Government has faced accusations of failing to meet self-announced deadlines and delaying the addition of new police jobs. The SA Police "see yourself in uniform and achieve more" campaign has recently attracted a significant increase in applications to the organisation, especially from women. Applications also are being encouraged from indigenous and Muslim communities under police diversity policies. Police Minister Peter Malinauskas said the program would build the biggest force in SA history. "We want more police on the frontline, protecting South Australians," he said. "We want our police force to be diverse, to be modern, and to be capable of responding to emerging crimes such as domestic violence, cyber crime and counter terrorism." It has already been revealed the Government will spend more than $400 million extra on fixing the state's fractured child protection system, and automatically increase by inflation concessions that help people meet power, water and other cost of living pressures.

33. Aussie's link to terror drones

The Advertiser, Charles Miranda, 2016 12 16

Canberra - Australian terrorist Neil Prakash was the head of an Islamic State sub-cell plotting to use explosive-laden drones to carry out remote attacks, interrogators have discovered. The 25-year-old Melbourne man, arrested in October on the Turkish border after he had been declared dead in an American drone strike, has been maintaining his silence in solitary confinement in a jail in Turkey's south. But News Corp Australia has learned he has given up some information involuntarily, including on "digital equipment" he was carrying at the time he was picked up by Turkish paramilitary police, close to the Turkish-Syrian border post of Kilis. It is understood Turkish authorities, in close consultation with Australian Federal Police, have raided several properties in Istanbul directly related to his arrest and formal charging with terrorism. Turkish-Australian counter-terror investigators have discovered that Prakash, also known as al- Cambodi, led an English-speaking cell of engineers who had been developing multiple drone plots. Prakash's right-hand man, who he was planning to meet in Istanbul, was Indian-born engineer Syed Muhammed. The gunpoint arrest and raid on this ISIS suspect found a drone in development in his apartment, able to be remotely guided by software to a target and to carry an explosive payload up to 30km away. But sources said the group of Prakash, Syed and at least two others detained in Turkey had been plotting to develop a "missile project" with a drone to travel up to 100km. ISIS had sent Prakash to rejoin the cell of English-speaking terrorists as a last-ditch effort to fight for the self-declared caliphate from the safety of across the border.

34. Trump adviser's Aussie dealings questioned

Australian Associated Press, 2016 12 16

Los Angeles - US senators are calling for Donald Trump's pick for national security adviser, Lieutenant General Michael Flynn, be investigated for "leaking highly classified information" to Australia and other dealings including dining with Russian President Vladimir Putin. Democrat senators Richard Blumenthal and Jeanne Shaheen, in a letter to the FBI, the Director of National Intelligence and US Office of Personnel Management, request General Flynn's security clearance be reviewed. "Based on public reports, his conduct in positions that require access to national defence information, and his subsequent private practice, appears inconsistent with the professionalism such access requires," the senators wrote. "General Flynn reportedly has a record of mishandling classified intelligence and reportedly violated rules for protecting sensitive information." US president-elect Trump announced last month he had chosen General Flynn for the key security post. Gen Flynn, who spent more than 33 years in US army intelligence and worked alongside Australian forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, told the Washington Post he was proud of sharing highly-classified intelligence with Australian and British forces.

Kabul - Several key figures of the loyalists of Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) terrorist group involved in plotting and executing a number of deadly attacks in Kabul city, were arrested by the Afghan intelligence operatives. The National Directorate of Security (NDS) said at a group of at least 10 people were arrested in connection to the previous attacks and a number of other attack plots in the capital. A statement by NDS said the militants were involved in plotting and executing the deadly attack on Sakhi shrine in Kabul and another deadly attack on the VIP protection unit in Kabul city. The statement further added that the group was looking to carry out more attacks on Shi'ite sites in Kabul city, including an attack on Karte Se mosque and a number of televisions, including Tolo tv, Shamshad, and Arian television network.

Ouagadougou - Un détachement de l'armée burkinabè basé à Nassoubou, à 70 km de la frontière malienne, a été attaqué tôt vendredi par des "individus non encore identifiés", a-t-on appris de sources concordantes à Ouagadougou. "Des individus non encore identifiés ont lancé une attaque à 5h00 (locales et GMT) contre notre détachement militaire basé à Nassoubou, à 45 km de Djibo, (chef-lieu de la province de l'Oudalan, frontalière du Mali et du Niger). Pour l'instant la riposte se poursuit, des renforts ont été rapidement envoyés", a déclaré à l'AFP le haut commissaire de la province de l'Oudalan, Mohamed Dah joint au téléphone. L'état-major a confirmé l'information indiquant qu'"aucun détail ne peut être fourni pendant que l'opération est en cours". Un détachement du Groupement des forces armées anti-terroristes (GFAT) se trouve dans cette petite bourgade située dans le Sahel burkinabè frontalier du Mali et du Niger. C'est la deuxième attaque directe à laquelle l'armée burkinabè est confrontée depuis le début des attaques jihadistes au premier trimestre 2015 au Burkina. En octobre, la première attaque contre les militaires burkinabè avait fait six morts quatre militaires et deux civils, tués probablement par des "tirs amis". Cette attaque revendiquée par le groupe terroriste Al-Mourabitoune du chef jihadiste algérien Mokhtar Belmokhtar avait eu lieu à Intangom, poste frontalier situé à 5 km de la frontière malienne.

38. Egypt Likely to See More ISIS Attacks, Needs to Change How it Fights Terror, Analysts Say

ABC News, Randa Ali, 2016 12 15

Cairo - In the wake of a bombing that killed 24 people at a Cairo church, some analysts warn the largest country in the Arab world may face more attacks by ISIS. Sunday's assault on civilians in the Egyptian capital signals that ISIS, which on Tuesday claimed responsibility for the attack, is escalating its offensive in the country and shows the need for the country to change how it fights terrorism. Egypt's leadership downplayed the significance of the attack. In a speech Monday, Egyptian President Abdel- Fattah el-Sissi called it a "desperate blow" by terrorists. El-Sissi has dismissed claims that security flaws allowed the attack to occur and has called for stricter laws to fight terrorism. But some analysts told ABC News that Egypt needs to end mass arrests and instead focus on individual perpetrators of violence if it wants to effectively prevent more attacks. "Targeting the perpetrators and avoiding mass arrests and collective punishment is key to ensuring the state achieves justice and prevents violence, while also maintaining legitimacy and respecting the rights of citizens," said Allison McManus, research director at Tahrir Institute for Middle East Policy.

Alger - Terrorisme, crime organisé, cybercriminalité et traite humaine Interpol: la feuille de route de 2022 abordée à Alger La feuille de route de l'Organisation internationale de police criminelle (Interpol) a été débattue, hier, à Alger par les bureaux centraux des pays du Moyen-Orient et de l'Afrique du Nord (Mena). Ainsi, plusieurs volets ont été abordés, à commencer par l'expérience des pays membres dans la lutte antiterroriste, le crime organisé, la cybercriminalité et l'immigration clandestine. Le directeur général de la Sûreté nationale (DGSN), le général-major Abdelghani Hamel, a déclaré, à l'issue d'une audience qu'il a accordée au secrétaire général d'Interpol, Jürgen Stock, que "cette feuille de route constitue le thème principal de la réunion d'Alger et avoir abordé avec le secrétaire général d'Interpol la coopération entre l'Algérie et Interpol et les possibilités de consolider cette coopération (...) Nous avons évoqué également les dangers ainsi que les défis que l'Algérie et Interpol doivent relever". De son côté, M. Stock a affirmé que "la rencontre d'Alger va permettre de renforcer notre coopération avec l'Algérie en identifiant les crimes émergents et les méthodes d'y faire face à travers une stratégie de lutte dans la région et même au-delà". Bien plus, le responsable d'Interpol a révélé que "la réunion d'Alger est une opportunité pour parler des expériences en matière de menaces et des bonnes pratiques de lutte contre le crime organisé, la cybercriminalité, le terrorisme et la traite des personnes". Aux yeux de M. Stock, l'Algérie a enregistré des avancées importantes au plan des pratiques de lutte contre le crime sous toutes ses formes.

41. Bodies of Tamim, two other militants killed in N'ganj raid handed over for burial (Canada).

BDNews24, Staff Correspondent, 2016 12 16

Dhaka - The dead bodies of three militants killed in a police raid at Narayanganj have been handed over for burial in Dhaka's Jurain Graveyard. Those include the body of Tamim Chowdhury, who police said was a top leader of the newly revived Jama'atul Islam Mujahideen or JBM. It was said that Tamim, the alleged cafe attack mastermind, was killed along with Fazle Rabbi, a college student from Jessore. The identity of the other person with them could not be confirmed. A Canadian passport holder, he was among 10 individuals on the first list of 'missing' persons released by the authorities in the wake of the cafe attack. Tamim is grandson of the late Abdul Mojid Chowdhury, of Beanibazar in Sylhet, who is said to have been a member of the Peace Committee, an outfit that collaborated with the Pakistani military forces during the 1971 Liberation War. His father worked on ships. The family moved to Canada after the Liberation War.

"It would mean that the Chinese are militarizing the area which is not good," said Lorenzana. The Defense chief was reacting to a report that claimed the Chinese had installed weapons systems on all seven artificial islands it had built in the contested waters as indicated by photographs released by the Asia Maritime Transparency Initiative (AMTI), a Washington-based think tank. The Philippines' claims to the area were upheld in July by the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague, which invalidated the "nine-dash line" used by China to claim 90 percent of the South China Sea including the Spratly Islands and fishing areas within Philippine territory.

Hong Kong - Like many four year olds, Sethumdi says she dreams of meeting Father Christmas. But her future is uncertain as her refugee parents fight for a new life abroad after they sheltered fugitive whistleblower Edward Snowden in Hong Kong. The story of how impoverished refugees helped Snowden evade authorities in 2013 only emerged in September, propelling them into the media spotlight. Former National Security Agency contractor Snowden hid out in Hong Kong where he initiated one of the largest data leaks in US history, fuelling a firestorm over mass surveillance. After leaving his initial hotel bolthole, he went underground, fed and looked after by some of the city's 11,000 marginalised refugees. Snowden now lives in exile in Russia where he has sought asylum. The refugees remain in Hong Kong, desperately hoping for resettlement elsewhere. Sethumdi is Sri Lankan and lives in a flat measuring just 14 square metres (150 square feet) with her father Supun Thilina Kellapatha, mother Nadeeka and baby brother Danath. They hope the awareness raised by the Snowden story might lead to a better life. The family wants to go to Canada, which has a track record of taking in refugees.

45. India hopeful of UN designating Masood Azhar a global terrorist

Press Trust of India, 2016 12 16

New Delhi - Ahead of expiry of the Chinese "hold" against designating Pakistan-based JeM chief Masood Azhar a global terrorist by the UN, India on Thursday said the "ball is in the court" of Sanctions Committee and expressed hope that it will eventually see the "logic". External affairs ministry Spokesperson Vikas Swarup also said that India's application seeking sanctions against Azhar was submitted in March and was before the UN's Sanctions Committee which has 15 members, who are also in security council. "Ball is in their (Committee's) court. We remain hopeful that eventually logic of Masood Azhar (not) remaining outside the ambit of the committee when the organisation which he represents has been proscribed for many years would be seen," he said. The current extension will expire on December 31 and if China does not raise further objection, the resolution designating Azhar a terrorist could stand passed automatically.

46. N. Korea resumes encrypted numbers broadcast after 4-day break

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 16

Seoul - North Korea's state radio station resumed broadcasting mysterious numbers Friday after a four-day break that could be some kind of coded message to its agents operating in South Korea. Radio Pyongyang, the Korea's state-run radio station, started broadcasting messages at 1:15 a.m.

(Seoul time), calling out a series of pages and numbers before repeating them one more time. The radio announcer "gave review work in metal engineering to No. 27 expedition agents." The content was different from what has been transmitted this year. Since June 24, 18 of such encrypted numbers broadcasts have been discovered, with the latest one broadcast Sunday. Broadcasts of mysterious numbers are considered a kind of book cipher that was often used by North Korea to give missions to spies operating in South Korea during the Cold War era. Spies could decode numbers to get orders by using a reference book, although many intelligence officials believe this form of sending orders to be totally outdated. Many have said the broadcast may be some sort of psychological strategy aimed at sparking internal confusion within South Korea.

47. S. Korea, Japan militaries directly exchange intelligence on N.K. for first time

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 16

Seoul - South Korea and Japan on Friday directly exchanged classified information on North Korea's nuclear and missile programs for the first time in line with their intelligence-sharing pact which came into force last month, the defense ministry said. Defense ministry spokesman Moon Sang-gyun told reporters that the exchange was made during a meeting between the two countries' senior defense officials held in Seoul in conjunction with a three-way security dialogue which also includes the United States. "Under the recently-signed General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA), Seoul and Tokyo have shared intelligence on Pyongyang's nuclear and missile programs for the first time since the pact's signing last month," he said. Under the pact, the two countries are obliged to share information regarding North Korea's nuclear programs, missile development and other military activities, the ministry said. It is the first military pact signed between the two nations since Korea gained independence from Japan's colonial rule from 1910-45. During the Defense Trilateral Talks (DTT) later in the day, South Korea, the U.S. and Japan discussed measures to effectively counter North Korea's military threat.

48. Spy agency produced documents detailing alleged surveillance of justices: sources

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 12 16

Seoul - A media executive's bombshell allegation about the state surveillance of senior judicial officials was based on documents written by South Korea's top spy agency, government sources said Friday. Cho Han-gyu, former president of the local daily Segye Ilbo, claimed during a parliamentary panel on Thursday that the Park Geun-hye administration carried out illegal surveillance of senior judicial officials including Supreme Court chief justice Yang Seung-tae. On Friday, the presidential office denied the allegations as groundless. The sources, however, said the documents revealed by Cho carried watermarks used at only a limited number of state organizations, including the National Intelligence Service. The testimony came during the parliamentary hearing on corruption involving President Park Geun-hye and her confidante Choi Soon-sil. In 2014, the newspaper first reported on the allegations of the president's once-powerful former aide Chung Yun-hoi meddling in state affairs based on a set of presidential documents it had secured during its news coverage. Cho cited some of the unreported documents to back his claim about the illicit surveillance.

49. Comment Vladimir Poutine pousse ses pions sur le Vieux Continent et en France

Le Figaro, Laure Mandeville, 2016 12 16

Moscou - Les intrusions de Moscou dans la politique intérieure française et européenne ne datent pas d'hier. Envoyé à Saint Pétersbourg en 1905 par le journal Le Matin pour y couvrir la première grande crise révolutionnaire du régime tsariste, le journaliste Gaston Leroux se retrouve en porte à faux avec les milieux diplomatiques russes et français, qui décident de se plaindre auprès de sa rédaction parce qu'ils le trouvent trop véhément dans sa description de la répression. « Il en rajoute, disent les uns, c'est un mystificateur, assurent les autres », raconte Pierre Assouline dans son livre sur Albert Londres en 1989. À l'époque, « dans les milieux politiques et les milieux d'affaires », écrit-il, on ne comprend pas que Le Matin n'ait pas été acheté comme la plupart de ses confrères par Arthur Raffalovitch », un représentant du ministère des Finances du tsar, qui « s'illustrera » en achetant des journalistes français pour qu'ils vantent les emprunts russes. « Le grand argentier russe, corrupteur patenté du journalisme parisien et futur auteur d'un livre à scandale au titre univoque - L'abominable vénalité de la presse française - a simplement négligé Le Matin, lequel demandait trop d'argent », poursuit sans fard Assouline. Sommé de nuancer ses reportages, Gaston Leroux finira par quitter la profession en 1907 pour écrire des romans ! Ces pratiques vieilles comme les relations internationales se poursuivront tout au long des années soviétiques, l'URSS ne se privant pas d'acheter et d'espionner les sociétés occidentales. Dans Les Mystères du Kremlin, un livre publié en 1928, Maurice Laporte, ancien fondateur des Jeunesses communistes, racontent ses entretiens avec des agents russes, qui « distribuaient les chèques de Moscou » à l'hôtel de Nice, près de la gare Montparnasse.

50. Czechoslovakia spied on Donald and Ivana Trump, communist-era files show (Canada)

The Guardian (London), Kate Connolly, 2016 12 15

Berlin - The secret service of communist-era Czechoslovakia spied extensively on Donald Trump, it has emerged, with one informant alleging in 1977 that the future US president-elect "is completely tax-exempt for the next 30 years". The Státní bezpečnost or StB - the then communist state's intelligence agency which dealt with any activity considered dangerous to the state or of western influence - spied on Trump and his Czechoslovak-born wife, Ivana, in the 1970s and 80s when she made regular trips back to visit her father, Milos Zelníček. Stamped "top secret" and bearing the code names "Slusovice", "America" and "Capital", the files detail the obsession Czech spies had in gathering as much information about the US property tycoon as possible. Uncovered by Czech television and the German tabloid Bild, the dossiers include one that concentrates solely on the pre-nuptial agreement made between the Trumps. In the case of a marriage breakdown, he agreed to pay her $1m, according to the StB file. An informant with the cover name "Lubos" reported to his superiors in 1977 how Ivana had begun work at a petrol station in Austria, where she had met her first husband in 1968. She had then emigrated to Canada, where she married Trump.

51. Kremlin: Putin gives clear answer to allegations of Russia's interference in US election

Tokyo - At a meeting with US President Barack Obama on the sidelines of the G20 summit in China, Russian President Vladimir Putin gave a clear answer to the allegations of Russia's interference in the US presidential election, Russian Presidential Aide Yuri Ushakov told reporters. When commenting on media reports saying that during a private meeting Obama had warned Putin of serious consequences if Russia attempted to influence the election campaign, Ushakov said that "there was a private meeting during which this issue was touched upon." "Russia gave a clear answer which was probably not consistent with what Obama tried to explain to us," Ushakov said.

52. Les ressorts de la nouvelle cyber-guerre froide

Le Figaro, Pierre Avril, 2016 12 16

Moscou - GUCCIFER 2.0, Fancy Bear, ATP 28, Cozy Bear Strontium... tels sont les nouveaux visages de la menace russe pesant sur l'Occident, selon les services de renseignement. Derrière ces noms de code, se cachent des hackers russes menant des attaques contre des chaînes de télévision, contre des opérateurs téléphoniques, des fournisseurs de système de sécurité informatique et des partis politiques occidentaux. Selon le New York Times , ces spécialistes auraient attaqué les serveurs du Parti démocrate américain, avant de faire fuiter des informations confidentielles dans le but de favoriser Donald Trump face à Hillary Clinton. Fancy Bear ou APT 28 (« Advance Persistent Threat ») seraient liés aux services de renseignement militaires russes, le GRU. Selon des sources judiciaires françaises, ce groupe, connu sous ces deux noms d'emprunt, serait à l'origine de l'attaque dont a été victime la chaîne d'information française TV5 en avril 2015. À un an des élections législatives allemandes, scrutées de près par Moscou, les services de renseignement intérieurs (BND) ont annoncé une « hausse spectaculaire » des tentatives d'hameçonnage de la part de Fancy Bear, une technique consistant à infiltrer un réseau après l'envoi de mails servant d'accroche. Le même groupe serait impliqué dans le piratage du Parlement allemand en 2015.

53. Iran's President Lauds Aleppo Liberation, Urges Support for Anti- Terror Campaign
Fars News Agency, 2016 12 16

Tehran - Iranian President Hassan Rouhani congratulated his Syrian counterpart Bashar al-Assad on the liberation of Aleppo, saying it is the Islamic Republic's duty to support the "flag-bearers" of the fight against terrorism. In a telephone conversation with Assad, President Rouhani affirmed that the victory is an important step on the way of combating terrorism and the returning of peace and security to the whole homeland, hailing the Syrian people's struggle against terrorism. Syrian forces have almost completed the liberation of Aleppo, with militants having surrendered most of their remaining territory. Hundreds of foreign-backed militants have laid down arms in Aleppo in the past 24 hours. Almost 6,000 civilians have also left militant-held districts of the northwestern Syrian city over the past day. Rouhani reaffirmed Iran's support for Syria's anti-terror battle.

54. Tehran hosts Taliban chiefs at Islamic unity summit

London Times, Hugh Tomlinson, Aoun Sahi, 2016 12 16

Tehran - Senior Taliban officials attended an Islamic Unity Conference in Iran yesterday, a visit that lays bare the longdenied alliance between Tehran and the Islamist movement and sent a message to rivals of their joint influence in the conflict in Afghanistan. Iranian sources reported that Tayyab Agha, former head of the Taliban's political office in Qatar, was among the delegation, but this was not confirmed. The conference comes after Mullah Akhtar Mansour, the group's leader, was killed in a US drone strike soon after crossing over the Iranian border into Pakistan in May. An internal Taliban investigation failed to establish if his location was leaked by agents in Iran, Pakistan or both. Tehran and the Taliban have always denied any links, though western and Afghan intelligence believe that Iran has supplied the Islamists with weapons and funds for years. Sources close to the Taliban confirmed that Iran was "back in the game" in Afghanistan after months of suspicion following Mansour's death.

55. Assad's Choice: Fight Rebels but Cede to Islamic State

Wall Street Journal, Yaroslav Trofimov, 2016 12 16

Abu Dhabi - In recent days, the Syrian regime and its foreign allies scored a major victory and suffered a humiliating defeat. The starkly different outcomes of two pivotal battles -- for Aleppo and Palmyra -- showcased the priorities of the regime and its Russian and Iranian sponsors: to fight moderate Sunni rebels rather than the Sunni extremists of Islamic State. After all, there was no Islamic State in Aleppo, where Syrian forces this week seized most of the rebel-held areas to cap a brutal six-month siege. At the same time, Syrian forces surrendered the historic city of Palmyra to an Islamic State offensive without much of a fight. The rapid loss of Palmyra also highlighted another key feature of the conflict: the continuing vulnerability of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and his backers. With their resources overstretched after more than five years of war, the fate of Palmyra showed again that the regime's victories can prove hard to sustain and can unravel overnight. All of this means that, despite the regime's celebrations of victory in Aleppo -- where civilians and rebels were awaiting evacuation Thursday from the last opposition-held pocket -- Mr. Assad still isn't anywhere close to restoring his writ over Syria. An outright military triumph for the regime in the war that has already displaced more than half of the country's population and killed about 400,000 people remains just as impossible as before, Arab officials warn. "It is not the endgame at all. He won't come out victorious. His regime will have to compromise," Ahmed Aboul-Gheit, the secretary-general of the Arab League and a former Egyptian foreign minister, said in an interview in Abu Dhabi.

57. Ex-IDF Intel chief: Keep eye on Iran to prevent nuclear cheating

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, 2016 12 16

Jerusalem - The intelligence needed to keep Iran from getting nuclear weapons is "a puzzle" that constantly needs to be assembled to prevent the Islamic Republic from cheating on the nuclear deal, former IDF Military Intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. (res.) Amos Yadlin told The Jerusalem Post. Yadlin, currently director of the Institute for National Security Studies (INSS) in Tel Aviv, said that obtaining the right intelligence is one of the prerequisites to catching any Iranian attempt to walk across the nuclear threshold during the life of the deal it signed in 2015 or when the agreement's 2023, 2025 and 2030 deadlines expire. Despite Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's threat to Iran on Wednesday and announcement on CBS's 60 Minutes that he will ask the Trump administration to undo the Iran nuclear pact, most critics assume the real endgame will be catching Iranian attempts to cheat and attempt to obtain nuclear power.

Jerusalem - A person who has filled many senior positions in Israel's defense establishment and who is very familiar with Russia's leadership assessed, on the day after last month's election, that Vladimir Putin had handed Trump his victory. This person, who had no definitive information, said that Putin's personal revulsion towards Hillary Clinton (who as Secretary of State had assailed electoral fraud in Russia), Russia's massive cyber-offensive capabilities and the way in which the results were decided by small margins in several swing states could attest to the depth of Russian involvement. Now, almost a month later, American media are presenting similar claims, coming from senior intelligence officials still in active service. In a recent unofficial meeting held recently in the U.S. between American and Israeli researchers, some hosts described the incoming administration as "terra incognita."

Gulf News, Saeed Al Batati, 2016 12 16

Al Mukalla - The internationally recognised government of Yemen, currently based in the southern port city of Aden, has begun paying thousands of army and security forces three months' salaries in arrears under tightened security measures, local army officers said on Wednesday. Military and public servants have not been paid since September when the president of Yemen Abd Rabbo Mansour Hadi ordered relocating the headquarters of the central bank to the city of Aden to put an end to Al Houthis misusing the country's reserves. Shortly after the relocation of the monetary authority, the government pledged to pay all government employees who had been added to the payroll before 2014 including those who reside in Al Houthis-controlled territories. Hundreds of soldiers from the army and public security were seen queuing up on Wednesday inside their military camps to receive three months' worth of salaries as the government stepped up security to prevent suicide bombers from sneaking into the gatherings.

1. 100,000 workers contacted federal government about pay since July

CBC News, Ashley Burke, 2016 12 23

Ottawa - After providing a clear number to sum up the scope of the Phoenix pay problems in July, the federal government is now offering up a jigsaw puzzle of numbers, making it difficult to piece together how many people are still facing issues. Nearly 100,000 public servants have contacted the federal government over the past six months with questions about their pay in the wake of the troubled Phoenix system, CBC News has learned. But that number doesn't reveal how many employees are still being paid incorrectly. Phoenix, a new computerized pay system, rolled out in February, leading to complaints by thousands of federal government employees. Some were underpaid, others were overpaid and some were not paid at all. The government confirmed that 82,000 public servants were affected in some way between February and the end of June. Since July, federal unions have said even more workers have come forward with pay problems, but the government has yet to release that figure, saying it can't be calculated. After months of requests, the department in charge of Phoenix told CBC News that more than 13,000 people have come forward since July 1 to report they were not getting paid or were paid incorrectly because they went on leave or left the public service. But the government did not provide a number for current employees who are receiving the wrong amount of pay -- those who represented the bulk of the initial 82,000 people with pay problems.

Ottawa - Des documents obtenus par Radio-Canada révèlent que des dizaines d'agents de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) se sont servis de bases de données policières pour chercher des informations sur la vie privée de Canadiens sans autorisation. Selon des documents obtenus grâce à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information, de 2010 à 2015, 62 agents de la GRC se seraient servis sans permission de bases de données policières pour fouiller dans la vie privée de proches ou de citoyens. Selon notre analyse des plaintes portées contre ces agents, 33 d'entre eux ont été blâmés pour avoir utilisé des renseignements confidentiels à des fins personnelles. Notons par exemple le cas d'un agent du Manitoba reconnu responsable d'avoir cherché sans autorisation le numéro d'une plaque d'immatriculation dans la base de données du Centre d'information de la police canadienne (CIPC).

4. Extract, decode, analyze

Vice News, Justin Ling, 2016 12 23

As the RCMP tries to convince the public that phone encryption is hobbling its investigations, new documents obtained by VICE News show that the federal police agency already has the ability crack encrypted and locked cellphones without help from the owner or the manufacturer. The records, obtained via access to information request, show that the RCMP's British Columbia branch just renewed its license for the Cellebrite Touch Ultimate. That device, according to the documents, "enables the most technically advanced extraction, decoding, analysis, and reporting of mobile data. It performs physical, logical, file system, and password extraction of all data (even if deleted) from the widest range of devices including legacy and feature phones, smartphones, portable GPS devices, tablets, and phones manufactured with Chinese chipsets." The cost of the renewal, dated February, 2016, was redacted from the documents. The records show that they were sent out to both the B.C. division of the RCMP, and the local RCMP detachment in Nanaimo. Other contract documents suggest that, for the Cellebrite device and an enclosure in which police can hack the phone -- one that blocks all outside cell, Wi-Fi, and other signals -- the total cost was just above $90,000. The police went through TEEL Technologies Canada, the Canadian distributor for Israel-based Cellebrite, to buy the technology. Cellebrite has become a handy tool for investigators worldwide. And there's good reason. The company recently reported that their devices can even extract user data from Pokemon Go. In San Bernardino, California, the FBI reportedly went to Cellebrite after Apple refused to help them crack the iPhone of two terror suspects. While it's not exactly a secret that the RCMP uses Cellebrite -- the only public admission from the force is a testimonial posted to the Cellebrite website by an RCMP officer, lauding the technology and saying his team uses it "every day" -- the federal police have otherwise been publicly silent about the phone-hacking technology.

5. Fearing loss of business, Bombardier pressed Ottawa on sanctions

Globe and Mail, Rachelle Younqlai, 2016 12 23

Bombardier Inc. says it lobbied the federal government over Russian sanctions in 2014 because it feared that its rail equipment business would be put at a disadvantage. The Montreal-based company said in a letter to The Globe and Mail that it was worried it would lose business to Asian and European manufacturers, as Ottawa moved to punish Russian President Vladimir Putin and his allies for Russia's invasion and annexation of the Crimean Peninsula from Ukraine. The United States placed sanctions on individuals close to the Kremlin in March, 2014, including Vladimir Yakunin, then the head of state-controlled Russian Railways, a major customer and partner of Bombardier in the country. Ottawa quickly followed and imposed economic sanctions on 32 individuals. The sanctions prevented them from travelling to Canada and froze their Canadian assets. But Mr. Yakunin was not included, even though he was considered to be a confidant of Mr. Putin and was prominent on the U.S. sanctions list. "Like many other companies, we informed the Canadian government of Bombardier's investments and interests in Russia when Canada was considering imposing sanctions. Our main concern was ensuring that our rail business would not be placed at a competitive disadvantage against our global competitors," said the letter by Mike Nadolski, the company's vicepresident of communications and public affairs. He cited competition from countries such as China and Japan. "Our rail competitors are not from the U.S., but rather from Europe, Japan, China and Korea.

7. CIA, NSA Missed Warning Signs of Snowden Betrayal

Washington Free Beacon, Bill Gertz, 2016 12 23

Washington - Both the CIA and National Security Agency missed warning signs that renegade contractor Edward Snowden was a disgruntled worker who would eventually steal 1.5 million secret documents, according to a congressional study made public Thursday. Snowden, who fled to Moscow after publicizing some of the documents through left-wing journalists, also "has had, and continues to have contact with Russian intelligence services" and voiced admiration for China during his brief career at the CIA and then NSA. A declassified and redacted report by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence concluded that Snowden's actions resulted in the Obama's administration's most damaging intelligence failure. "The American people can now get a fuller account of Edward Snowden's crimes and the reckless disregard he has shown for U.S. national security, including the safety of American servicemen and women," said Rep. Devin Nunes (R., Calif.), the intelligence committee chairman. "It will take a long time to mitigate the damage he caused, and I look forward to the day when he returns to the United States to face justice." Rep. Adam Schiff (D., Calif), the committee's ranking member, added that "Snowden and his defenders claim that he is a whistleblower, but he isn't, as the committee's review shows. Most of the material he stole had nothing to do with Americans' privacy, and its compromise has been of great value to America's adversaries and those who mean to do America harm."

I think we need to remember what we're fighting for. We're fighting for our country, our democracy, our way of life, and to engage. And the skullduggery that some of our opponents and adversaries engage in, I think is beneath this country's greatness." The usually outspoken congressman from Wichita, Kansas, hasn't commented publicly on national security, politics or whether Russian hacking influenced the election. Nor has he responded to reporters' phone calls or text messages or answered questions emailed to his staffers. One exception to this silent treatment? Twitter. As recently as last week, Pompeo was tweeting about the Wichita State basketball team and Kirstie Alley's Christmas decorations. His office did not respond to written questions from McClatchy about Pompeo's use of Twitter and whether his social media habits might change in his new job. But for now, anyone looking for clues about Pompeo's plans for the CIA or his thoughts on Russian hacking or waterboarding won't learn much from following the congressman's Twitter feed. Since accepting the CIA nomination on Nov. 18, he's been publishing rah-rah posts about sports events or canned statements on noncontroversial topics, such as the commemoration of Pearl Harbor Day or his support for a bipartisan bill that boosts medical research funding. A spokesman for the CIA wouldn't say whether the agency has any official regulations about its directors' use of Twitter.

10. Robert Gates: There's value in Trump's 'disruptive approach'

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 12 23

Column - Bob Gates has worked in senior national security positions for the past five presidents, Republican and Democratic. So it's noteworthy -- and to me, encouraging -- that he is advising President-elect Donald Trump, too. Gates, a former defense secretary, CIA director and deputy national security adviser, spoke with me by telephone Wednesday about the advice he's giving Trump and his team -- and the opportunities and pitfalls ahead. At the top of Gates's to-do list is striking the right balance between improving relations with Russia and appearing too cooperative with a belligerent President Vladimir Putin. "I think the challenge for any new administration would have been how to thread the needle -- between stopping the downward spiral in U.S.-Russian relations, which had real dangers, and pushing back on Putin's aggressiveness and general thuggery," Gates said. "If you only want to stop the downward spiral, you empower Putin to feel that he can do whatever he wants. I worry that if you don't have pushback -- let him know there are limits, and that the U.S. will react, militarily, if necessary -- then the chance of being taken advantage of is larger." Trump's insurgent, populist style has worried many foreign governments. But Gates argues that "there is some value in a disruptive approach -- in the U.S. not being so reliably passive" in responding to events as it seemed during the Obama administration.

11. Snowden is still in contact with Russian intelligence, House report charges

Yahoo News, Michael Isikoff, 2016 12 22

Washington - Newly declassified passages from a highly critical House Intelligence Committee report on Edward Snowden assert that since arriving in Moscow the former NSA contractor "has had, and continues to have, contact with Russian intelligence services." Minutes after the report was released Thursday, Snowden's chief lawyer, Ben Wizner, tweeted that the report was "petulant nonsense." Snowden has adamantly denied such contacts, most recently this month in an interview with Yahoo Global Anchor Katie Couric. Snowden told Couric he gave Russian officials "the stiff-arm" when they first approached him in 2013, and that since then, while living with President Vladimir Putin's approval as a fugitive in Moscow, "they have left me alone, for the most part." The panel's newly declassified 33-page report, which is being released this morning, cites classified U.S. intelligence reporting to support its assertion of continuous contacts with Russian intelligence -- an especially explosive charge in light of the current uproar in Washington over Russian interference in the U.S. election. But all details of that intelligence reporting are still classified and blacked out in the report, making it difficult, if not impossible, for the public to assess. The charge comes at a time when Snowden's defenders -- who portray him as a courageous whistleblower who exposed U.S. surveillance abuses -- are making their final, uphill pitch for a pardon before President Obama leaves office.

12. The CIA is delaying our books' publication, and that hurts our democracy

Washington Post, Nada Bakos, John Nixon, 2016 12 23

Op-ed - We are former senior CIA analysts who, in our combined 23 years of service, have been privy to secrets that would amaze you. You will never hear them from us. We also have learned other critical, but unclassified, information about dealing with terrorists and dictators that we want to share -- but the government has thrown needless roadblocks in our path. CIA employees pledge that for the rest of their lives they will submit their writings to the agency in advance of publication to ensure that nothing appropriately classified is inadvertently revealed. We fully support this. But we are both paying a price well beyond the spirit of our agreement. Each of us has written a nonfiction book that has been ensnared in red tape by the CIA -- for 11 months (for John Nixon) and 14 months and counting (for Nada Bakos). The courts have held that this signed agreement is a lifetime enforceable contract, provided that the review is limited to the deletion of classified information and that a response is given to the author within 30 days of submission. (The 30-day time constraint was set forth by the 1972 circuit court decision in U.S. v Marchetti.) Books such as ours can help foster a climate of accountability that is an essential element in any democracy. But the system of review is broken. Our experience is sadly typical. Even agency alumni who write novels and short stories are told to expect a year or more to pass before they hear back. When authors do hear back, too often ridiculous edits are demanded. After a lengthy wait, one CIA veteran was forced to make major alterations to his novel about vampires. Vampires! Another was directed not to reveal the gender of an unidentified officer who led a successful operation. Correctly calling him "he" would have narrowed a search for the officer to half the people on the planet. Note: Nada Bakos is a former CIA analyst whose book "The Targeter: My Life in the CIA on the Hunt for the Godfather of ISIS" is scheduled for publication in June. John Nixon is a former CIA analyst whose book "Debriefing the President: The Interrogation of Saddam Hussein" is scheduled for publication this month. This column was reviewed by the CIA's Publications Review Board.

13. Trump signals a U.S. security shift

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 12 23

Washington - Before lunchtime Thursday, President-elect Donald Trump said he would expand the U.S. nuclear arsenal, upending a reduction course set by presidents of both parties over the past four decades, and called for the United States to veto a pending U.N. resolution that criticized Israel's settlements policy. The policy prescriptions, communicated in morning tweets, followed calls since last month's election to reconsider the arms-length U.S. relationship with Taiwan and to let China keep an underwater U.S. vessel seized by its navy. Trump declared within hours of this week's Berlin terrorist attack that it was part of a global Islamic State campaign to "slaughter Christians" and later said it reaffirmed the wisdom of his plans to bar Muslim immigrants. Late Thursday, Trump suggested in another tweet that the U.S. military's years-in-the-making plans for a new stealth fighter, Lockheed Martin's F-35, might be reconsidered, saying he had "asked Boeing to price-out a comparable F-18 Super Hornet!" With weeks to go before he becomes president, Trump has not hesitated to voice his opinions on national security issues of the day and to publicly advise the current president on what to do about them. Ultimately, the nuclear statement was tempered by a Trump spokesman. And the likely fallout from a tentative decision by the Obama administration to break years of precedent and abstain on the Israel resolution was avoided when Egypt, its sponsor, abruptly postponed it just hours before a scheduled Security Council vote.

14. U.S. government begins asking foreign travelers about social media

Politico, Tony Romm, 2016 12 23

Washington - The U.S. government quietly began requesting that select foreign visitors provide their Facebook, Twitter and other social media accounts upon arriving in the country, a move designed to spot potential terrorist threats that drew months of opposition from tech giants and privacy hawks alike. Since Tuesday, foreign travelers arriving in the United States on the visa waiver program have been presented with an "optional" request to "enter information associated with your online presence," a government official confirmed Thursday. The prompt includes a drop-down menu that lists platforms including Facebook, Google+, Instagram, LinkedIn and YouTube, as well as a space for users to input their account names on those sites. The new policy comes as Washington tries to improve its ability to spot and deny entry to individuals who have ties to terrorist groups like the Islamic State. But the government has faced a barrage of criticism since it first floated the idea last summer. The Internet Association, which represents companies including Facebook, Google and Twitter, at the time joined with consumer advocates to argue the draft policy threatened free expression and posed new privacy and security risks to foreigners.

15. Suspected Isis cell 'planned to bomb Christmas crowds at UK shopping centres'

The Independent (UK), Kim Sengupta, 2016 12 23

London - A series of attempts to carry out lethal attacks on Christmas markets and shopping centres across Europe, including Britain, were foiled before the Berlin murders. The security operations, according to senior sources, were carried out in direct response to information about terrorist threats linked to Isis. In Britain, counter-terrorism officers stated that a "significant plot" inspired by Isis had been halted. The alleged targets, say security sources, were one or more shopping centres crowded in the run-up to Christmas. Four men in Derby, another one at Burton-on-Trent in Staffordshire and a woman in London, aged between 22 and 36, were arrested ten days ago in connection with the alleged plot, with the recovery of material which could be used for making bombs. Yesterday, two of the men, aged 22 and 27 and from the Derby area were released without charge. The other four people remain in custody. The strong possibility of terrorist acts during the Christmas period has been mentioned publicly by government bodies and repeatedly in exchange of intelligence between allied security agencies. Isis has also been publicly exhorting its followers to carry out attacks.

16. Australia makes arrests over 'imminent threat' of Christmas Day attacks

Reuters, Tom Westbrook, 2016 12 23

Sydney - Australian police said on Friday they had foiled a plot to attack prominent sites in the city of Melbourne with a series of bombs on Christmas Day that authorities described as "an imminent terrorist event" inspired by Islamic State. Police laid terrorism charges against three men, with a fourth in detention who could face charges, after authorities conducted overnight raids on homes in the suburbs of Australia's second-largest city. The three have been charged with planning a terrorist attack and have been remanded to appear in court on April 28, the Australian Federal Police said in a statement. Six men and a woman, all Australian citizens in their 20s, were arrested during the security operation, code-named Kastelholm, conducted by about 400 police and members of the domestic spy agency. "This is a significant disruption of what we would describe as an imminent terrorist event in Melbourne," Federal Police Commissioner Andrew Colin told reporters in Sydney. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull told reporters the planned attack was an "Islamist terrorist plot" and "one of the most substantial terrorist plots that have been disrupted over the last several years". The plot targeted high-profile locations in Melbourne, including Federation Square, Flinders Street Station and St Paul's Cathedral "possibly on Christmas Day", acting Victorian police commissioner Graham Ashton said.

17. Melbourne Christmas bomb attack foiled

Australian Associated Press, Angus Livingston and Melissa Iaria, 2016 12 23

Melbourne - Four alleged would-be terrorists are behind bars after police foiled a "horrendous" Christmas Day plot in Melbourne, with authorities now confident Victorians can safely celebrate the festive season. Police allege an Islamic State-inspired "cell" planned to use explosives and weapons to attack Flinders Street Station, Federation Square and St Paul's Cathedral on Christmas Day. Victoria Police Chief commissioner Graham Ashton warned a "substantial number" of people could have been killed or injured in the attack, while Australian Federal Police commissioner Andrew Colvin revealed the plot concerned him "more than any other event that I've seen". Three men arrested in raids by heavily armed police across the northern suburbs overnight faced court on Friday afternoon. A fourth man has been charged, remanded and is expected to face Melbourne Magistrates Court on Saturday morning. Two other men and a woman were arrested but released without charge. Hamza Abbas, 21, of Flemington, Ahmed Mohamed, 24, of Meadow Heights and Abdullah Chaarani, 26, were each charged with one count of preparing or planning a terror attack. They did not apply for bail during brief court appearances and were remanded in custody until April.

18. Terror won't mar Australia's diversity: PM

Australian Associated Press, Melissa Iaria, 2016 12 23

Sydney - The prime minister and Victorian premier have defended Australia's multicultural society in the wake of an alleged Christmas Day terror plot targeting Melbourne landmarks. Malcolm Turnbull insists Australia is "the most successful multicultural society in the world" based on a culture of mutual respect. "There's a very small number of people - very small - that seek to disrupt that and do us harm," he said on Friday. Five young men are in custody accused of planning the attack on Melbourne's Flinders Street Station, Federation Square and St Paul's Cathedral using explosives and weapons. Mr Turnbull praised police for foiling the Islamic State-inspired plot and urged Australians to go about their daily lives. The prime minister pointed to his own ability to catch a public ferry across Sydney Harbour to work. He did so on Friday and recounted a chat with a fellow passenger who told him: "It's amazing that we live in a country where the prime minister can get the ferry into the city just like everyone else." "I said 'Well, that's Australia.' And that is Australia. "That's what we're standing up for. "We are not going to let these criminals disrupt our way of life." Premier Daniel Andrews described the planned attack as "an act of evil" before also standing up for multiculturalism.

19. Three charged, one in custody over alleged Christmas Day attack plan

ABC (Australia), Staff reporter, 2016 12 23

Melbourne - Police say they have disrupted a terrorist plot targeting Melbourne's CBD, allegedly involving improvised explosive devices and other weapons, with three of the accused facing court. Police have disrupted a terrorist plot to detonate improvised explosive devices at locations in central Melbourne, possibly on Christmas Day, Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull says. Seven people were arrested overnight at properties in Flemington, Meadow Heights and Dallas in Melbourne over the alleged plot, which police said was inspired by the Islamic State (IS) group. Abdullah Chaarani 26 of Dallas, 21-year-old Hamza Abbas of Flemington and 24-year-old Ahmed Mohamad of Meadow Heights have been charged with planning a terrorist attack. The trio appeared in the Melbourne Magistrates Court and were taken into custody and will return in April. A 22-year-old man remains in custody and is expected to appear in an out of sessions court. A 20-year-old woman and a 26-year-old man, both from Meadow Heights, and 21-year-old man from Gladstone Park, were released without charge. The raids were part of a counter-terrorism operation involving Victoria Police, the Australian Federal Police and ASIO. Federation Square, Flinders Street Station possible targets Commissioner Ashton said it was believed a number of people were intending to carry out an attack involving explosives and other weapons.

20. New ISI chief, PM Nawaz hold first meeting

Pakistan Dawn, Sanaullah Khan, 2016 12 23

Islamabad - Lt Gen Naveed Mukhtar on Friday called on Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif, in the first such visit since his appointment as chief of Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) earlier this month, a statement from the Prime Minister's Office said. During the meeting, the DG ISI and the prime minister discussed policy guidelines and internal security, sources in the PM House told DawnNews. The premier appreciated the role ISI has played in the anti-terrorism war. Gen Mukhtar replaced Lt Gen Rizwan Akhtar as head of ISI earlier in December. The position of the ISI's director general fell vacant after Lt Gen Rizwan Akhtar was transferred to National Defence University Islamabad as its president. Till Dec 7, Gen Mukhtar had been serving as corps commander of Karachi. He was promoted to the rank of lieutenant general and posted to the army's Corps V in Sept 2014.

21. 'I shared squalid jail cell with British mother sentenced for spying in Iran' (Canada)

London Times, Bel Trew, 2016 12 23

Cairo - A former cellmate of a British mother jailed in Iran has spoken out about the squalid windowless cells they shared as guards tried to "break" inmates with psychological torture. Homa Hoodfar, 65, an anthropology professor at Concordia University, Montreal, said that inmates were held without sleep, sunlight, medicine or proper food. Mrs Hoodfar was detained in June after three months of interrogations by the Iranian intelligence service for being "hostile to the state". The dual national briefly shared a cell at Evin prison with Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, 37, a British-Iranian charity worker who was arrested while on holiday in Tehran in April and sentenced to five years in prison on spy charges. Mrs Hoodfar, who was freed in the same month on humanitarian grounds, joined rallies in London this week urging Boris Johnson, the foreign secretary, to help to free her ex-cellmate. Mrs Zaghari-Ratcliffe has been separated from her daughter Gabriella, two, and is in solitary confinement. MPs used a parliamentary debate this week to criticise Tobias Ellwood, the foreign office minister, for failing to secure the charity worker's release, as well as other Britons in trouble abroad. Mrs Hoodfar said that the infamous Iranian Revolutionary Guards used psychological torture to "break" inmates, who are locked up in windowless cells no bigger than a double bed.

22. Centre de renseignement : Chahed est allé trop vite en besogne, selon Mohamed Meddeb

Tunis - A propos du Centre national de renseignements, que le chef du gouvernement, Youssef Chahed, projette de mettre sur pied, Mohamed Meddeb, général à la retraite et ancien directeur de la direction générale de la sécurité militaire, a déclaré, sur Mosaïque FM, ce jeudi, que les ministères de la Défense, de l'Intérieur et des Affaires étrangères avaient des services de renseignement. Il a par ailleurs déclaré, concernant l'assassinat de Mohamed Zouari, que les autorités tunisiennes ne disposaient pas des informations sur ses activités. «Cela a empêché aux services de sécurité de concentrer leurs efforts sur sa protection. Veiller sur tous les citoyens est impossible» matériellement, a-t-il indiqué. «La décision du chef du gouvernement est nécessaire, mais c'est une réaction à chaud. Certes la mise en place d'une telle structure est indispensable, on le sait depuis des années, mais le fait de réagir ainsi face aux affaires de défense et de sécurité n'est pas une bonne chose. En plus la création d'un service de renseignement requiert des années de travail. Il ne faut pas se jeter sur ce type de projet simplement parce qu'il y a eu un meurtre de ce genre». L'ancien général a ajouté que la Tunisie est confrontée à des menaces régionales, notamment avec les événements en Libye.

23. Création du centre national de renseignements - Quand Youssef Chahed prend les choses en main

All Africa, A. Dermech, 2016 12 22

Tunis - Mardi, le chef du gouvernement a annoncé la création d'un centre national de renseignements qui exercera sous son autorité directe et imposera la circulation et la fluidité de l'information sécuritaire à temps. Comme il l'a déjà fait pour la brigade anticontrebande Comment éviter à temps les éventuelles défaillances en matière d'échange d'informations sécuritaires, faute de coordination entre les différents centres de collecte des informations opérant déjà sur le terrain et relevant des ministères de la Défense, de l'Intérieur, des Affaires étrangères, de la Justice et des Finances ? En d'autres termes, que faut-il faire pour qu'une information d'ordre sécuritaire ayant un rapport direct avec le ministère de l'Intérieur par exemple qui est recueillie par un agent de la douane parvienne à temps au ministère de l'Intérieur et faire en sorte qu'elle ne dorme pas dans les tiroirs du chef du poste douanier où elle a été détectée? Et les exemples concernant également les autres ministères appelés à faire parvenir les informations glanées par leurs agents immédiatement aux départements en charge de telle ou telle affaire. Et pour plus de clarté et de transparence, quelle est la meilleure solution à trouver pour que les négligences ou les oublis constatés dans l'affaire de l'assassinat de l'ingénieur Mohamed Zouari et celle du journaliste-agent du Mossad qui s'est comporté en terre conquise au vu et au su de tout le monde, ne se répètent pas à l'avenir ? La création du Centre national de renseignements annoncée mardi soir par Youssef Chahed, chef du gouvernement, est bien la réponse à toutes ces questions que tous les Tunisiens se posent depuis l'éclatement de l'affaire Mohamed Zouari.

Jeune Afrique, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 22

Washington - Le jihadiste mauritanien Cheikh Ould Saleck ajouté à la liste noire des « terroristes internationaux » par les États-Unis Les États-Unis ont ajouté mercredi Cheikh Ould Saleck, un Mauritanien membre d'Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi) sur leur liste noire des "terroristes internationaux". Incarcéré depuis 2011 pour une tentative d'assassinat contre le président Aziz, Cheikh Ould Saleck est également accusé par les autorités américaines d'avoir orchestré une attaque qui avait coûté la vie de quatre touristes français en 2007. Le Mauritanien, âgé de 32 ans, est aussi connu pour avoir été impliqué dans l'attaque aux voitures piégées qui avait échoué en 2011 contre le ministère mauritanien de la Défense et l'ambassade de France à Nouakchott. Il avait reconnu à la télévision d'État avoir planifié cette attaque - dans laquelle le président mauritanien était aussi visé - et avait été condamné à mort.

27. Authority touts prioritizing safety to prevent accidents, terrorist attacks

China Daily, Luo Wangshu, 2016 12 23

Beijing - The civil aviation authority is considering long-term measures to guarantee aviation safety, a senior aviation official said on Thursday. "The major target of aviation safety in 2017 is to prevent major aviation accidents, prevent hijacking, bombing and other terrorist attacks, prevent air force safety accidents and avoid aviation ground and maintenance accidents," said Feng Zhenglin, head of the Civil Aviation Administration of China, adding that all practitioners must be alert to potential safety risks and eliminate them. "A safety campaign to eliminate potential hazards will be launched. Evaluations will cover all perspectives, and safety issues will be a priority in evaluating airliners," he said. Feng made the remarks on the sidelines of the annual civil aviation industry conference in Beijing. China's aviation industry has boomed in recent years. It is the second- largest country in the world in terms of total volume of passengers and cargo carried by air transportation behind the United States. The CAAC estimated that passengers made 480 million trips in 2016, up 11 percent year-on-year.

28. China says it will cooperate with Trump but warns on Taiwan

Associated Press, Gerry Shih, 2016 12 23

Beijing -- China has warned that ties with the U.S. will likely see new complications and the only way to maintain a stable relationship is by respecting each other's "core interests." Foreign Minister Wang Yi's remarks Thursday appeared to underscore that China's position on Taiwan is non-negotiable, weeks after President-elect Donald Trump suggested he could re-evaluate U.S. policy on Taiwan. It also mirrored Beijing's relatively measured posture toward the incoming U.S. administration despite signs of growing wariness. Wang told the Communist Party mouthpiece, the People's Daily, that China will strive to boost cooperation with the U.S. but he foresaw "new, complicated and uncertain factors affecting bilateral relations" under the Trump administration. China complained this month after Trump questioned a U.S. policy that since 1979 has recognized Beijing as China's government and maintains only unofficial relations with Taiwan. Beijing regards the self-governing island as part of China and has long used the "core interest" formulation to signal that any move by Taiwan toward formal independence could be met with military force. Trump's comments on Taiwan, combined with his accusations that China is manipulating its currency and threats of imposing hefty tariffs against Chinese imports, have rattled relations between the world's two largest economies.

29. Chinese state newspaper accuses Navarro of anti-China bias

Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 12 23

Beijing -- A Chinese state newspaper on Friday accused a trade adviser picked by President-elect Donald Trump of "anti-China alarmism" and warned both sides would suffer if commerce is disrupted. The China Daily editorial was more forceful and openly critical of economist Peter Navarro than China's foreign ministry, which appealed Thursday for cooperation. Navarro, picked by Trump to run a new National Trade Council at the White House, has accused China of effectively waging economic war against the United States. The University of California-Irvine professor also will be director of trade and industrial policy. "There is real cause for concern as the president-elect has named economist Peter Navarro, known for his anti- China alarmism, as his trade adviser," said the China Daily, which is aimed at foreign readers. A statement by Trump's transition team said the creation of the trade council "demonstrates the president-elect's determination to make American manufacturing great again." "That individuals such as Navarro who have a bias against China are being picked to work in leading positions in the next administration is no laughing matter," said China Daily. "Any move to damage the win-win relationship will only result in a loss for both sides." Trump has blamed China for the decline in American factory employment. U.S. manufacturers have cut 5 million jobs since 2000.

30. Chinese Video Warns of West's 'Devilish Claws'

New York Times, Chris Buckley, 2016 12 23

Beijing - The ominous images in the video pile up, set to darkly urgent music. Refugees fleeing failed uprisings in the Middle East. Western diplomats and politicians cast as puppet masters of subversion in China. Chinese lawyers abjectly confessing to subversion in show trials. Protests erupting in Hong Kong. " 'Color revolution' has already succeeded in pushing many countries into the flames of war and schism, and its devilish claws are reaching into China," one of the subtitles in the video reads. It goes on to say: "Embassies in China are at the forward command, combining forces to promote 'street politics.' " The video, which spread on the internet this week, has been widely promoted online by public security offices that oversee the police, including an office of the central Ministry of Public Security. But who ordered its production is unclear. An earlier version surfaced online in August but disappeared from the internet, only to resurface in its current version. Attempts to contact the makers, whose working name, Gewuzhijian, appears at the end of the video and also on Weibo, a Chinese social media service, went unanswered.

31. Foiled plot: Indonesia militants had targeted police post on busy street

Straits Times, Wahyudi Soeriaatmadja, 2016 12 23

Jakarta - Militants killed in a raid outside Jakarta on Wednesday had planned to attack a police post in Serpong, South Tangerang, located at a busy intersection. The police post is across the road from a Giant hypermarket and near the Aeon Mall BSD City, Metro TV reported yesterday. Police spokesman Martinus Sitompul confirmed this location with The Straits Times in a text message. Police seized six packets, each containing about two bombs, from a house they raided in South Tangerang - 25km outside Central Jakarta - where three terrorists were shot dead and a fourth arrested, Colonel Martinus told a media briefing yesterday. An officer with the police Detachment 88 anti-terror squad told The Straits Times that the bombs had been assembled in a different fashion from the ones police usually dealt with, requiring bomb squad personnel to spend more time to safely detonate them.

32. Hard-liner on China picked for trade post (Canada)

China Daily, Zhong Nan, 2016 12 23

Beijing - US president-elect Donald Trump named Peter Navarro, an economist who has urged a hard line on trade with China, to head the newly formed White House National Trade Council, the transition team said on Wednesday. Navarro, 67, is a professor at University of California, Irvine, who advised Trump during the campaign. His book Death by China: How America Lost Its Manufacturing Base was made into a documentary film. In response to reports of Navarro's appointment, the Foreign Ministry said Beijing is paying close attention to Trump's transition team and the possible direction of policy. "China and the US have broad common interests. It is the only correct choice for the two countries to cooperate," ministry spokeswoman Hua Chunying told a daily news briefing. "We hope the US works with China to maintain the healthy, stable development of ties, including business and trade ties." The choice is seen as a prelude to a potential slowdown in US investment in China, according to several Chinese experts, who also cautioned that a trade war could ensue. Chai Yongzhi, a researcher at the Beijing-based China Council for the Promotion of International Trade, said Navarro might persuade US companies to slow their investment in China by offering them more attractive terms for investing domestically.

33. HK proposes tougher laws to deal with terrorist threat

South China Morning Post, Cannix Yau and Christy Leung, 2016 12 23

Beijing - Hong Kong is seeking to catch up with tougher international anti-terrorism rules with the government proposing legislative amendments to fast track the freezing of terror suspects' assets by avoiding lengthy notification procedures. However, veteran Democratic Party lawmaker and security monitor James To Kun-sun warned yesterday of "the devil in the details" as he argued that without clearly defined terms there could be hidden grey areas leading to unrelated parties being incriminated. Under the proposed changes to the United Nations (Anti-Terrorism Measures) Ordinance, any person or entity would be prohibited from dealing with assets owned by a terrorist or terrorist's associate once they are gazetted under the law, unless they are under the authority of a licence granted by the security minister. A Security Bureau spokesman said at present the secretary for security would need to issue a written notice about freezing a suspect's property if he wanted to ban anyone from dealing with the assets. "Under the amendment, no notice is required and the terrorist's property will be automatically frozen once the terrorist, the associate and the property are named in the gazette," he said. The gazetted name list will follow the one designated by the Committee of the UN Security Council. Hong Kong's chief executive also has the right to apply to the court to identify people as terrorists under reasonable grounds, although no such request has been made or notice issued since the law came into effect.

34. Pékin prive Taïwan d'un allié diplomatique (Canada)

Le Monde, Brice Pedroletti, 2016 12 23

Pékin - L'Etat de Sao Tomé-et-Principe a reconnu, mercredi, la République populaire de Chine. Trois semaines après l'échange téléphonique entre la présidente de Taïwan, Tsai Ing-wen, et le président américain élu Donald Trump, la Chine populaire a puni Taïwan en lui ravissant, mercredi 21 décembre, l'un de ses rares alliés diplomatiques, le petit Etat de Sao Tomé- et-Principe, au large de l'Afrique de l'Ouest. Relations " parasites " Pour l'expert canadien de Taïwan, Michael Cole, le dernier revers diplomatique pour Taipei est à relativiser : " Ces relations officielles et parfois parasites avec ses petits alliés diplomatiques sont en fait bien moins importantes que les liens informels mais constructifs qu'il maintient avec les grands pays ", réagit-il, interrogé au sujet des relations diplomatiques entretenues de facto par Taïwan avec les Etats-Unis, le Japon et les pays européens.

35. Police counter-terror unit arrests 7 Biman officials over PM flight 'glitch'

BDNews24, Staff Correspondent, 2016 12 23

Dhaka - Police have arrested seven officials of the Bangladesh Biman two days after a case was started over the glitch that forced a flight carrying Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to make an emergency landing. The counter-terrorism unit of the Dhaka Metropolitan Police made the arrests, Deputy Commissioner Masudur Rahman told bdnews24.com on Thursday. The suspects were apprehended on Wednesday night from different areas of the capital, said Masudur Rahman. A Boeing-777 aircraft carrying the prime minister to Hungary on Nov 27 made emergency landing at Turkmenistan's Ashgabat airport after a drop in fuel pressure was detected in one of the engines. According to the FIR, proof has been found that the nine suspects "would collude in schemes that involved negligence towards machinery... to take part in sabotage".

36. Lithuania said found Russian spyware on its government computers

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 23

Vilnius - The Baltic state of Lithuania, on the frontline of growing tensions between the West and Russia, says the Kremlin is responsible for cyber attacks that have hit government computers over the last two years. The head of cyber security told Reuters three cases of Russian spyware on its government computers had been discovered since 2015, and there had been 20 attempts to infect them this year. "The spyware we found was operating for at least half a year before it was detected - similar to how it was in the USA," Rimtautas Cerniauskas, head of the Lithuanian Cyber Security Centre said. When presented with the allegations, President Vladimir Putin's spokesman Dmitry Peskov told Reuters they were "laughable" and unsubstantiated. "Did it (the spyware) have 'Made in Russia' written on it?" quipped Peskov. "We absolutely refute this nonsense." He said Russia itself was targeted in cyber attacks "round the clock," but said it would be stupid to accuse foreign governments.

37. Report, Evidence Redacted, Ties Snowden to Russian Agencies

New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 12 23

Washington - The House Intelligence Committee on Thursday released a 33-page report portraying the former intelligence contractor Edward J. Snowden, who in 2013 disclosed classified files about American surveillance operations, as a habitually disgruntled worker who damaged national security and has been in contact with Russian intelligence services in Moscow. "Although Snowden's objective may have been to inform the public, the information he released is also available to Russian, Chinese, Iranian and North Korean intelligence services; any terrorist with internet access; and many others who wish to do harm to the United States," the report said. Mr. Snowden, who has been living as a fugitive in Russia since disclosing archives of National Security Agency files to journalists in Hong Kong in June 2013, responded with a series of posts on Twitter that ridiculed the report as riddled with "obvious falsehoods" and said that his critics "can present no evidence of harmful intent, foreign influence, or harm." "Bottom line: this report's core claims are made without evidence, and are often contrary to both common sense and the public record," he added.

38. Autour de Mossoul, l'heure de la vengeance a sonné

Le Monde, Louis Imbert, 2016 12 23

Mossoul - Les milices et tribus sunnites irakiennes règlent leurs comptes après le départ de l'organisation Etat islamique Quatre fois, Ahmad Atallah a donné son fils. La première, c'était aux djihadistes de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI), en mai. Le jeune homme, Alaa, 26 ans, avait voulu rejoindre leurs rangs avec une quarantaine de copains de son village, Al-Jaraf, situé au sud de l'antique cité assyrienne de Nimroud, dans les campagnes de Mossoul. " Ces imbéciles se poussaient du coude . Ils pensaient que c'était quelque chose, de porter une arme ", explique le père. Après un mois de formation idéologique à Mossoul, Alaa, écoeuré, était revenu au village, prétend-il. " La hisba - la police de l'EI - est venue chez nous. Je leur ai donné Alaa. Je le donnerais à quiconque me le demande! Je ne vais pas mettre toute ma famille en danger pour ses bêtises ", dit Ahmad, ancien policier et père de sept enfants. Quand l'armée a libéré Al- Jaraf, le 6 novembre, le père n'a pas attendu qu'on le lui demande : il a mené son fils au premier militaire venu.

39. British Intelligence Agency behind White Helmets' Lies in Syria

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 23

Tehran - A Russian newspaper said in a report that the White Helmets Organization is behind the fake reports about Russia's airstrikes in Syria, adding that the organization is run by British agents. Vzglyad daily said in a report that there is reason to believe that the organization is supervised by the British intelligence service and the Soros Fund. "The Government of the United Kingdom had allocated around 32 million pounds for the needs of the White Helmets in 2013 while another 12.5 million pounds has been paid to the organization only in the year 2016," a source close to the organization told Tass news agency. According to the source, the whole budget of the organization is about 50 million dollars a year. The source also said that one of the leaders of the White Helmets, Mosab Obeidat, has already been identified to have contributed a major role in the financing of the terrorist groups.

40. Cohen's Mossad: One Year On

Times of Israel, 2016 12 23

Jerusalem - The reports that started coming in from Tunisia last Friday were reminiscent of past stories: once again, a mysterious assassination of a key enemy figure, a nimble finger pulling the trigger of a silenced handgun and then promptly disappears. This time, the Tunisian media reported the assassination of a UAV engineer, Mohammad al-Zawahri, shot from point-blank range in his car in the town of Sfax in central Tunisia. It was alleged that the Mossad had kept him under surveillance owing to his connections with Hamas. Truth or fiction? Israel normally ignores such reports, but sometimes admission comes as a result of failure (as in the case of the attempted assassination of Khaled Mashal in Amman in 1997) or owing to the long time that has elapsed since the actual incident (as in the case of the assassination of Abu-Jihad, also in Tunisia, in 1988). In any case, the incident in Tunisia has shed some light on the activity of the current head of the Mossad, who happens to conclude his first year in office these days.

41. Israel busts Hamas cell planning suicide bombings in Jerusalem, Haifa

Times of Israel, Ilan Ben Zion, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 12 23

Jerusalem - Israeli security agents busted a 20-member Hamas cell that was plotting suicide bombings and shootings against Israeli citizens in major Israeli cities, including Jerusalem and Haifa, the Shin Bet disclosed on Thursday. The internal security agency didn't specify when the sting took place, only saying it occurred in recent months, incorporated various IDF units, and that the Hamas cell was in a state of "high readiness to carry out deadly suicide attacks." The Shin Bet said it arrested over 20 Hamas operatives from across the West Bank, many of whom had previously spent time in Israeli prisons for terrorism charges. The cell was "hierarchical and organized," the Shin Bet said, with various members involved in different aspects of planning the attacks. The suspects told investigators that between May and August 2016 they set up a lab in Nablus and produced nearly 15 pounds of TATP explosives intended for suicide bombings in Jerusalem, Haifa and bus stations across the country.

42. Yemen in broad counter-terrorism sweep

Gulf News, Saeed Al Batati, 2016 12 23

Al Mukalla - Yemen anti-terror squads have stepped up raids on suspected Al Qaida and Daesh hideouts in the port city of Aden as similar forces announced foiling terror plots against government facilities in the province of Hadramout. Aden police said in a statement that highly trained forces stormed several houses in the city, leading to uncovering a small factory for making explosive materials and car bombs. At a house belonging to a fugitive Al Qaida operative, government forces founded explosive vests, IEDs and remote detonators. Police said investigations with Al Qaida prisoners led to locating the house while its owner fled before the arrival of security services. Aden, the second largest city in Yemen and the base of the internationally-recognised government, has been recently hit by two deadly suicide attacks that killed nearly 100 security forces. A shadowy branch of Daesh claimed responsibility for the two attacks and a number of drive-by shootings against intelligence officers.

43. Allemagne : arrestation de deux frères soupçonnés de préparer un autre attentat

France 3 - Régions (site web), Philippe Dezempte, 2016 12 23

Oberhausen, Allemagne - La police allemande a arrêté deux frères soupçonnés de préparer un attentat contre un des plus grands centres commerciaux d'Allemagne, quatre jours après une attaque jihadiste au camion- bélier qui a tué 12 personnes sur un marché de Noël à Berlin. Alertée par les services de renseignements, la police avait déployé des hommes autour du centre commercial d'Oberhausen (ouest) tard jeudi soir, ainsi que dans le marché de Noël voisin, puis annoncé l'arrestation des deux suspects dans la nuit de jeudi à vendredi. Il s'agit de deux frères de 28 et 31 ans originaires du Kosovo. Les enquêteurs tentent de déterminer quel était le stade de préparation de leur attaque contre le CentrO, un des plus grands centres commerciaux d'Allemagne et si d'autres personnes étaient impliquées dans le projet. Aucun lien avec l'attentat de Berlin n'a été à ce stade évoqué par les enquêteurs. Concernant cette tuerie, les enquêteurs n'ont annoncé aucune nouvelle piste pour appréhender le Tunisien Anis Amri, 24 ans, probablement armé et responsable présumé de la mort de 12 personnes. Selon le quotidien Tagesspiegel, ils estiment qu'il se trouverait toujours à Berlin.

44. A Mossoul Avec les forces spéciales françaises

Le Figaro Magazine, Didier François, 2016 12 23

Mossoul - Depuis plus de deux ans, ces troupes d'élite sont déployées en Irak et mènent, en toute discrétion, des opérations contre l'Etat islamique. Elles ont joué un rôle majeur auprès des combattants kurdes dans la bataille de Mossoul. Nous avons pu les suivre durant une semaine. L'ennemi se terre en contrebas, retranché à la hâte sur les lisières d'une friche industrielle. Sur le recul et sous pression. Des abris rudimentaires, simples trous d'homme ou amas de gravats adossés à un entrepôt éventré, avec quelques parpaings de récupération alignés en guise de créneaux de fortune. La forteresse de l'Etat islamique a singulièrement perdu de sa superbe. Pendant deux ans, les djihadistes avaient érigé, autour de Mossoul, un colossal système défensif rêvé inexpugnable. Champs de mines, entrelacs de tranchées et réseau tentaculaire de tunnels, censés protéger un califat proclamé éternel. Et pourtant. En seulement cinq jours, les milices kurdes en ont bousculé les premières lignes, faisant sauter tous ses verrous d'une seule poussée. Dans l'élan, les unités antiterroristes de l'armée irakiennes se sont engouffrées dans la brèche, forçant les islamistes à se retirer, sans espoir de rétablissement, jusqu'au centre de leur fief aujourd'hui assiégé.

45. Attack Exposes Gaps In Security

Wall Street Journal, Matthew Dalton, 2016 12 23

Paris - The rise of Islamic State and Germany's decision to throw open the door to refugees last year has left security services overwhelmed as they try to track jihadist threats among the new arrivals. The attacks in Paris in 2015 and Brussels in March confirmed fears that Islamist groups had exploited refugee flows to smuggle operatives into the heart of Europe. Investigators have determined most of the assailants in those cases traveled from Syria through the Balkans and then Central Europe along with a river of refugees in the summer and fall of 2015. "We are very late, and we're in the process of catching up," said Georges Fenech, chairman of the French parliamentary committee that investigated the Paris attacks. "Because today, these terrorists move freely in the Schengen area. From the moment they enter with the migrants, they pass borders without much difficulty." Europe's stretched security officials are set to face another test. Authorities expect the looming fall of Islamic State's strongholds of Raqqa, Syria, and Mosul, Iraq, will prompt many jihadists to flee and attempt to enter Europe. Yet the bloc's control of the Schengen borders remains patchy. The EU has set up "hot spots" where officials from Europol, the body's police-coordinating agency, conduct security checks of migrants. But the hot spots still don't have necessary infrastructure, according to a note by the EU's counterterrorism coordinator for national governments.

Rome - L'auteur présumé de l'attentat au camion-bélier de Berlin, le Tunisien Anis Amri, a été abattu lors d'un contrôle de la police italienne dans la nuit de vendredi à Milan (nord), ont annoncé les autorités italiennes. Lors d'une conférence de presse, le ministre de l'Intérieur, Marco Minniti, a affirmé que l'homme abattu était "sans l'ombre d'un doute" le suspect de 24 ans, en fuite depuis l'attentat qui a fait 12 morts et 50 blessés sur un marché de Noël à Berlin. L'homme a été abattu lors d'un contrôle de police de routine et a sorti "sans hésiter" une arme, a indiqué le ministre. Des empreintes digitales du Tunisien avaient été retrouvées sur le poids lourd qui s'est précipité dans la foule lundi soir à Berlin. Il faisait l'objet d'un avis de recherche européen et d'un mandat d'arrêt. Il avait pris la fuite, probablement armé, après l'attentat revendiqué par le groupe Etat islamique (EI). Des images d'une caméra de surveillance l'avaient montré devant une mosquée de Berlin, présentée comme un lieu de rassemblement islamiste, quelques heures après le carnage, selon la chaîne publique allemande Rbb.

47. Berlin Suspect Killed in Italy

Der Spiegel, Staff report, 2016 12 23

Berlin - Italian Interior Minister Marco Minniti confirmed in a press conference Friday that police shot and killed Anis Amri in Milan, Italy. Amri had been the prime suspect in Monday's terrorist attack on a Christmas market at Berlin's Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Church. The interior minister said police had intercepted Amri during a routine check in the Sesto San Giovanni neighborhood in northern Milan. Officers had ordered him to present his ID. Minniti said that he then pulled a 22-caliber pistol and fired at two police officers. Italian media are reporting that he shouted "Allahu Akbar." The police returned the fire and killed the suspect. One of the police officers was wounded in the shoot-out. The Italian newspaper La Stampa is reporting that a 29-year-old officer still completing his trial period fired the deadly shot at Amri. Minniti said the man killed at the site had been Amri. "There is not a shadow of doubt about his identity," the Italian interior minister said. On Wednesday, a Europe-wide manhunt had been launched to find Amri. He said the injured police officer is currently receiving treatment in Monza.

48. Kremlin Says Karlov's Assassination Is "Stab in the Back"

Asharq Al-Awsat, Taha Abed alWahed, 2016 12 23

That is why, this attack was a stab in the back for Turkey too," Peskov said in an interview with the Mir TV Channel. The spokesman said the murder was a provocation to Russia, and aimed to disrupt the peace process in Syria. He noted that Russian President Vladimir Putin considered the killing as a terrorist attack and a blow to Turkey's prestige. Peskov said the timing of the incident was not a "coincidence", describing it as "a unique case in the history of Turkish-Russian relations". He added that Putin condemned the attack and called it as a terror act, which aimed at normalization process between the two countries. He also noted that the assassination was "emotionally very difficult" news for Putin.

50. Violence Bolsters Erdogan's Power Play

Wall Street Journal, Yaroslav Trofimov, 2016 12 23

Ankara - Turkey is moving toward a referendum that if approved would give President Recep Tayyip Erdogan near absolute power -- and every new terrorist attack is likely to increase his chances of winning the vote. This nation of nearly 80 million people, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, is targeted by Kurdish separatists and radical Islamists alike. Over just the past two weeks, it witnessed two major bombings, in Istanbul and the central city of Kayseri, and the assassination of the Russian ambassador in the capital, Ankara. Mr. Erdogan, whose party has governed Turkey since 2002, has repeatedly argued that a strong executive presidency is needed to navigate these dangerous times. If he wins the referendum that is tentatively planned for June, he could stay in office until as late as 2029, with virtually all checks and balances on his authority removed. "If he wins, he will become a dictator," warned Kemal Kilicdaroglu, the head of Turkey's biggest opposition party, CHP. "Erdogan didn't come to power because he wants to rule the state. He came to power because he wants to be the state."

1. Trudeau more troubled by 'Princess Leia's' death than Berlin terror victims: Blaney iPolitics, BJ Siekierski, 2016 12 30

Ottawa--Conservative leadership candidate Steven Blaney took a shot at Prime Minister Justin Trudeau Wednesday for responding faster to the death of actress Carrie Fisher, who played Princess Leia in the Star Wars movie franchise, than to the deaths resulting from the December 19 Berlin Christmas market terrorist attack. "When Princess Leia passed away, the prime minister only took four hours to react, whereas for a terrorist attack where a truck caused 12 deaths in a Berlin Christmas market, it took him three days to have a decent response," he said in French at a press conference in Quebec City, according to Le Soleil. Trudeau put out a statement on December 19 about the terrorist attack in the city of Karak, Jordan that killed a Canadian citizen, and retweeted, the same day, Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion's condolences following the murder of the Russian ambassador to Turkey. The former Harper government public safety minister and current MP for Bellechasse-Les Etchemins-Lévis made his Trudeau remark Wednesday as he rolled out his anti-terrorism strategy, which reportedly includes the establishment of an RCMP-CSIS joint task force to prevent lone wolf terrorist attacks, a new Canadian centre for the prevention of radicalization, and expanded powers for the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

2. 'Brand Trudeau' mulled to help pitch world on Canadian return to peacekeeping

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 12 30

Ottawa--Canadian bureaucrats pondered using the personal ``brand" of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to sell the world on the merits of the country's return to peacekeeping, The Canadian Press has learned. Using the prime minister's personal appeal was seen by senior foreign ministry officials as one of the possible ``framing" techniques for explaining Canada's decision to devote more military resources to United Nations peacekeeping operations. Documents obtained through Access to Information detail the early government planning to reboot Canada's return to peacekeeping. Once a traditional role for the Canadian Forces, it was all but abandoned in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States when the military focused on counter-terrorism and war-fighting in Afghanistan. Trudeau promised during the 2015 federal election that Canada would focus more on UN peace operations, and the government has since committed 600 troops and $450 million to an as yet unspecified mission or a combination of deployments.

Both groups were designated as terrorist entities under Canada's Criminal Code. The announcement was made by public safety and emergency preparedness minister Ralph Goodale on Wednesday. 4. Controversial list includes U of T, McGill

National Post, Douglas Quan, 2016 12 30

Toronto--Four Canadian post-secondary schools, including the University of Toronto and McGill University, have landed on a provocative list of North America's 40 "worst" campuses for Jewish students. Algemeiner, a New York-based Jewish weekly publication, said it compiled the list to draw attention to the "rising" problem of anti-Semitic and anti-Israel hostility faced by Jewish students. However, some Canadian Jewish organizations and students this week questioned the publication's methodology. While they did not dispute the existence of such hostility, they said the list offers a distorted view of Jewish-student life. "I'm not really sure where some of their information came from. Certainly they didn't ask anybody here in Canada what was going on currently - that I can tell you," said Judy Zelikovitz, vice-president of university and local partner services with the Centre for Israel Jewish Affairs. "They have a certain audience. And their audience is interested in reading certain things. What they wrote will appeal to their market." The Algemeiner's editors say their North American rankings, in which New York's Columbia University placed No. 1 and U of T No. 3 followed by McGill, were based on several factors, including the number of anti-Semitic incidents on campus, the number of anti-Israel groups, the number of Jewish or pro-Israel groups, and the success of Israel boycott efforts. The controversial rankings come at the end of a year that has seen anti-Muslim posters on the University of Calgary campus and posters targeting the Sikh community on the University of Alberta campus. At University of Western Ontario, administrators condemned a group of students who created a banner with the slogan Western Lives Matter, saying the co-opting of the Black Lives Matter slogan was racist and demeaning.

5. No donation rules broken in China corruption case

Vancouver Sun, Sam Cooper, 2016 12 30

Vancouver--The Liberal Party of Canada has rejected allegations that party leaders continued to accept political support from a man China considers to be a fugitive after they were warned in 2013 that the prominent Vancouver developer and party donor was using his cash to make "inroads" in Canada's political system while being pursued by China on political corruption charges. Postmedia News has reported extensively on the case of Liberal donor Michael Ching, who is wanted in Beijing as Muyang Cheng, the Mandarin version of his name, for alleged political corruption. A new story from the South China Morning Post, citing an email leaked by a party insider, alleges the Liberals were warned in 2013 that Ching was an alleged fugitive from China but the party continued to accept official donations from Ching and the Liberal party also benefited from major fundraising events attended by Justin Trudeau and organized by a politically active youth group called Tru-Youths. Michael Ching has refuted those charges as recently as April 2015.

6. Tax headaches expected from payroll fiasco

CBC News, Julie Ireton, 2016 12 30

Ottawa--With the new year on the way, many federal public servants who are still caught in the midst of the Phoenix payroll fiasco are worried and confused about filing their taxes. Global Affairs policy analyst Jonathan Chambers said his pay problems started in January -- and he's now owed more than $16,000. And he's not alone. Tens of thousands of bureaucrats have been overpaid and underpaid since the federal government launched the Phoenix pay system earlier this year. "My first problem was that I didn't get paid at all for the work that I was doing from January to mid-February," said Chambers, who said he's still only getting paid about half of what he should be making. Chambers is worried that if he's not paid what he's owed by December 31, then gets the lump sum reimbursed, there will be an impact on his 2017 taxes. He said he hasn't been able to get straight, easy answers when he's called Public Services and Procurement Canada or the Canada Revenue Agency. CRA director general Randy Hewlett said he wants to reassure public servants that these types of situations are not complicated. "The CRA is prepared for issues specifically related to Phoenix," Hewlett said.

7. Toronto sisters apologize for website allegedly used to cyberbully Nigeria's elite

Toronto Star, Azzura Lalani, 2016 12 30

Toronto--The Toronto sisters accused of trying to extort and cyberbully a Nigerian billionaire through a sex-scandal website have apologized and taken responsibility for the site in a video posted on YouTube Thursday. Sisters Jyoti and Kiran Matharoo, who have a substantial Instagram following, were accused, according to the news site Politics Nigeria, of trying to blackmail Femi Otedola, a Nigerian man named in Forbes magazine's list of 2016 billionaires. The sisters allegedly tried to blackmail Otedola by claiming they had evidence of him cheating on his wife that they would post to the sex-scandal website NaijaGistLive, according to Politics Nigeria. In the video apology, posted to YouTube on Thursday by Linda Ikeji TV, Jyoti and Kiran Matharoo say that most of their site's stories were sent to them by close friends or associates of the people they wrote about. "We apologize to Femi Otedola and his family, especially his wife and children and all the other petitioners," read one sister, who appears to be Jyoti, in the video. Otedola made his money in the energy sector, according to Forbes, which at one point estimated his net worth at $1.8 billion. "The intention was not to hurt anyone or to be malicious. The intention was not to extort anyone," read Matharoo. "We haven't received any money from the website." Her next words are barely intelligible, but she says that that "the money went to Babatunde Oyebode of Huzzle Inc." In Nigerian court documents, the Matharoos list their address as 1080 The Queensway in Toronto.

8. Trudeaus Liberals were told donor was China graft suspect, but kept taking his money and help

South China Morning Post, Ian Young, 2016 12 30

Vancouver--The Liberal Party of Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau was tipped off in 2013 that a wealthy party benefactor was wanted by China for corruption, long before the news became public, in an email that has been leaked to the South China Morning Post by a former party executive. The former executive said they were assured at the time that the anonymous email and its startling claims about Vancouver developer Michael Ching Mo Yeung had been "dealt with". But the party kept quiet and continued to accept donations and support from Ching and a pro-Trudeau political organisation, Tru-Youths United Association, set up in his office. It would accept thousands of dollars from Ching in 2014 and 2015, while Tru-Youths helped stage massive Liberal fundraisers, including a 1,300-seat event in Toronto in June 2014.

West Palm Beach - President-elect Donald J. Trump edged away on Thursday from his dismissive stance on American assessments of Russian hacking, saying he would meet with intelligence officials next week "to be updated on the facts" after the Obama administration announced sanctions against Moscow. In a brief written statement, Mr. Trump's first response to President Obama's sweeping action against Russia, the president-elect reiterated his call for "our country to move on to bigger and better things." But he said that, "in the interest of our country and its great people," he would get the briefing "nevertheless." The statement to some extent echoed his remarks late Wednesday, when he was asked at his Mar-a-Lago estate about Mr. Obama's plan to take action against Russia. In otherwise opaque comments, Mr. Trump appeared to concede the need to make computers more secure. "I think we ought to get on with our lives," he said. "I think that computers have complicated lives very greatly. The whole age of computer has made it where nobody knows exactly what is going on. We have speed, we have a lot of other things, but I'm not sure we have the kind, the security we need."

10. Les cyberattaques russes, grande menace pour les États-Unis et l'Europe

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Jacob Etienne, 2016 12 30

Washington - Les États-Unis accusent la Russie d'avoir influencé le résultat de l'élection américaine de novembre dernier par le biais de cyberattaques. La crainte de piratages a gagné l'Europe, où des élections auront lieu en France et en Allemagne en 2017. La Russie peut-elle influencer une élection en Europe? Les agences américaines du renseignement accusent depuis plusieurs mois Moscou d'avoir piraté des ordinateurs puis fait fuiter des documents. L'objectif aurait été de nuire à la campagne présidentielle d'Hillary Clinton aux États-Unis pour favoriser la victoire de Donald Trump. Ces soupçons font craindre que des piratages surviennent en Europe, où la France et l'Allemagne doivent voter en 2017. Aux États-Unis. Le 7 octobre, un mois avant le scrutin, le ministère de la Sécurité intérieure (DHS) et la direction du renseignement (DNI) ont affirmé que le gouvernement russe avait dirigé un piratage de comptes de personnalités et d'organisations politiques dans le but «d'interférer dans le processus électoral américain».

11. Obama administration announces measures to punish Russia for 2016 election interference

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 12 30

Washington - The Obama administration announced sweeping new measures against Russia on Thursday in retaliation for what U.S. officials have characterized as interference in this fall's presidential election, ordering the expulsion of Russian "intelligence operatives" and slapping new sanctions on state agencies and individuals suspected in the hacks of U.S. computer systems. The response, unveiled just weeks before President Obama leaves office, culminates months of internal debate over how to react to Russia's election-year provocations. In recent months, the FBI and CIA have concluded that Russia intervened repeatedly in the 2016 election, leaking damaging information in an attempt to undermine the electoral process and help Donald Trump take the White House. Because Thursday's announcement is an executive action, it can be undone by the next administration. But Obama's last-minute measures put pressure on Trump, who has largely waved off the allegations against Russia, to make a decision about whether to keep the punitive measures in place. Moscow, which has denied involvement in attacks related to the election, vowed to respond in kind. "I cannot say now what the response will be, although, as we know, there is no alternative here to the principle of reciprocity," Russian presidential spokesman Dmitri Peskov said in a statement late Thursday evening carried by the Interfax news service. In a call with reporters, U.S. officials said they chose to announce the new measures before the end of Obama's term in an attempt to educate Americans about Russian activities and to deter future intrusions. "There's every reason to believe Russia will interfere with future U.S. elections and future elections around the world," said one senior official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

12. Obama hits back for Russia hack, but leaves top spy off the hook

Yahoo News, Michael Isikoff, 2016 12 30

Washington - In what White House officials portrayed as tough retaliation for Russia's cyberattack on the U.S. election, President Obama on Thursday evicted 35 suspected Russian spies from the country and imposed economic sanctions on four top officials of the country's military intelligence service. But the administration's newly imposed sanctions list contains a striking omission: Aleksander Bortnikov, Russia's top spy. As chief of the Russian Federal Security Service, or FSB (Russia's successor to the Soviet KGB), Bortnikov heads the spy agency that launched his country's cyberattack on the members of the Democratic National Committee and other U.S. political figures nearly a year and a half ago, according to a newly released joint FBI-Department of Homeland Security report. Yet while the FSB itself and Russia's military intelligence agency, the GRU (as well as three of its private contractors), were subject to sanctions, the list of individuals facing potential economic reprisals if they come to the United States was selective: Igor Korobov, current chief of the GRU and three of his top deputies were targeted (even though there is little evidence they actually come to the U.S.) Yet Bortnikov -- a more significant player who last year attended a White House summit on countering the threat of violent extremism -- and other high-ranking FSB officials were untouched by the new Treasury Department sanctions, underscoring what some critics say are the limits of the administration's response. "This was a good step, but there is one person who should have been named, and that's Bortnikov," said David Kramer, a former senior State Department official who is now the senior director for Human Rights and Democracy at the McCain Institute for International Leadership, a global security and human rights think tank that is overseen by some of Sen. John McCain's longtime political allies and aides. Although consideration was given to including Bortnikov on the sanctions list, it was resisted by U.S. intelligence agencies that have, at times and to a limited degree, received cooperation from the FSB, especially on terrorism issues, said sources familiar with the debate. U.S. intelligence agencies "never wanted to go after [Bortnikov] directly," said one official involved in the administration's deliberations.

13. Obama Sanctions Russia, Expels 35

Wall Street Journal, Carol E. Lee, Paul Sonne, 2016 12 30

Washington - President Barack Obama on Thursday issued a dramatic response to Russia's alleged use of cyberattacks to interfere with the 2016 presidential election, including imposing sanctions on Russian agencies and companies and expelling dozens of suspected intelligence operatives from the U.S., in one of the biggest diplomatic confrontations between Washington and Moscow since the end of the Cold War. Russia threatened to retaliate, while U.S. lawmakers called for even stiffer measures and a deeper investigation into Moscow's hacks, suggesting a further escalation of hostilities looms just weeks before a new U.S. administration takes office. "The principle of reciprocity applies here," Russian government spokesman Dmitry Peskov said according to the Interfax news agency. He said Russian President Vladimir Putin would formulate a response that would create "considerable discomfort in the same areas" for the U.S.

Mr. Obama, in a statement on what he called a partial response to Russia's alleged hacks, said the cyberattacks "could only have been directed by the highest levels of the Russian government." He said his actions Thursday weren't the sum total of the U.S. response. "We will continue to take a variety of actions at a time and place of our choosing, some of which will not be publicized," he said. The Department of Homeland Security and the FBI released a joint analysis report, titled "Grizzly Steppe," giving additional technical details about the election hacking, including implicated IP addresses, virus signatures and file hashes. The report confirmed that the hacking group known as Cozy Bear, or APT 29, penetrated the network of a U.S. political party in the summer of 2015, while a second group known as Fancy Bear, or APT 28, penetrated the network last spring. Russian Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Maria Zakharova said on her Facebook page that the Russian Foreign Ministry would make an official announcement regarding countermeasures against the U.S. on Friday.

14. Obama Sanctions Russia over Unproven Hacking Claims

Breitbart, Lee Stranahan, 2016 12 30

Washington - President Obama issued an executive order on Thursday sanctioning Russian intelligence officials, individuals, and organizations based on as-yet unproven accusations that Russia interfered in the 2016 election by hacking the emails of Democratic Party officials. This action comes as the Obama administration is heightening tensions between the United States and Russia on several fronts. The new executive order signed by Obama offers no new proof that the Russian government was involved in what it calls "tampering with, altering, or causing a misappropriation of information with the purpose or effect of interfering with or undermining election processes or institutions." In place of proof of these serious claims, the Obama White House said it will "be providing a report to Congress in the coming days about Russia's efforts to interfere in our election, as well as malicious cyber activity related to our election cycle in previous elections." The new executive order comes in the face of other anti-Russian moves by the Obama administration just prior to Donald Trump taking the Presidential oath of office in the next few weeks.

15. Obama Strikes Back at Russia for Election Hacking

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 12 30

Washington - President Obama struck back at Russia on Thursday for its efforts to influence the 2016 election, ejecting 35 suspected Russian intelligence operatives from the United States and imposing sanctions on Russia's two leading intelligence services. The administration also penalized four top officers of one of those services, the powerful military intelligence unit known as the G.R.U. Intelligence agencies have concluded that the G.R.U. ordered the attacks on the Democratic National Committee and other political organizations, with the approval of the Kremlin, and ultimately enabled the publication of the emails it harvested to benefit Donald J. Trump's campaign. The expulsion of the 35 Russians, whom the administration said were spies posing as diplomats and other officials, and their families was in response to the harassment of American diplomats in Russia, State Department officials said. It was unclear if they were involved in the hacking. In addition, the State Department announced the closing of two waterfront estates -- one in Glen Cove, N.Y., and another on Maryland's Eastern Shore -- that it said were used for Russian intelligence activities, although officials declined to say whether they were specifically used in the election-related hacks. Mr. Trump responded to the Russian sanctions late Thursday by reiterating a call to "move on." But he pledged to meet with intelligence officials, who have concluded that the Russian hacking was an attempt to tip the election to Mr. Trump. Russia criticized the sanctions and vowed retaliation. "Such steps of the U.S. administration that has three weeks left to work are aimed at two things: to further harm Russian-American ties, which are at a low point as it is, as well as, obviously, deal a blow on the foreign policy plans of the incoming administration of the president-elect," Dmitri S. Peskov, the spokesman for President Vladimir V. Putin, told reporters. Konstantin Kosachyov, the head of the foreign affairs committee in the upper house of the Russian Parliament, told Interfax that "this is the agony not even of 'lame ducks,' but of 'political corpses.'"

The Intercept, Sam Biddle, 2016 12 29

Washington - To date, the only public evidence that the Russian government was responsible for hacks of the DNC and key Democratic figures has been circumstantial and far short of conclusive, courtesy of private research firms with a financial stake in such claims. Multiple federal agencies now claim certainty about the Kremlin connection, but they have yet to make public the basis for their beliefs. Now, a never-before-published top-secret document provided by whistleblower Edward Snowden suggests the NSA has a way of collecting evidence of Russian hacks, because the agency tracked a similar hack before in the case of a prominent Russian journalist, who was also a U.S. citizen. In 2006, longtime Kremlin critic Anna Politkovskaya was gunned down in her apartment, the victim of an apparent contract killing. Although five individuals, including the gunman, were convicted for the crime, whoever ordered the murder remains unknown. Information about Politkovskaya's journalism career, murder, and the investigation of that crime was compiled by the NSA in the form of an internal wiki entry. Most of the wiki's information is biographical, public, and unclassified, save for a brief passage marked top secret: 'Russian Federal Intelligence Services (probably FSB) are known to have targeted the webmail account of the murdered Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya. On 5 December 2005, RFIS initiated an attack against the account annapolitkovskaia@US Provider1, deploying malicious software which is not available in the public domain. It is not known whether this attack is in any way associated with the death of the journalist.' Although the NSA document does not specify the account, Anna Politkovskaya was known to use the email address annapolitkovskaia@yahoo.com.

17. Tweeting in Government Is Hard If You're Not Donald Trump --- Departments have endless rules to muffle initiative; 29 pages at the EPA

Wall Street Journal, Aruna Viswanatha, Natalie Andrews, 2016 12 29

New York - In 2010, a top Justice Department official told the agency's divisions they could set up Twitter accounts and he convened a "working group" to provide guidance on what, when, and how the agency could tweet. They're still working on it. President-elect Donald Trump is poised to become the first tweeter-in-chief, an executive comfortable making pronouncements on policy or companies with 140 characters. He will assume control of a federal bureaucracy that tries very hard to do the exact opposite, one that muffles its social-media presence under pages of rules to avoid making waves. At the Justice Department, officials from the deputy attorney general's office, the public affairs office, privacy lawyers, records management staffers and others are still trying to answer questions such as: When can staffers publicly distribute links to media articles? (Likely answer: rarely.) What if a U.S. attorney wrote the article? (Then it could be OK.) How about when the staffer herself is quoted in a story? (Never; it might look like she's endorsing that publication.) The Environmental Protection Agency has four documents, totaling 29 pages, that outline its procedures for using social media. "There are no waivers from this policy," the first document says.

Sputnik, Staff report, 2016 12 30

Washington - Donald Trump ran his presidential campaign on the promise to keep Americans safe at home and abroad, and build US foreign policy on a platform of peace through strength. Moreover, Trump has pledged to advance US core interests and rebuild the country's military, while simultaneously trying to ease tensions in the world. THE GUANTANAMO CONTROVERSY AND TORTURE During the 2016 presidential campaign, Trump's casual remarks about the legitimacy of extreme interrogation techniques, described by many analysts as torture, sparked a much debated controversy. Last week, Canada's intelligence chief Michael Doucet reportedly said Ottawa may have to rethink how it provides intelligence to the United States if Trump makes good on his vow to torture captive extremists. CIA intelligence officer Philip Giraldi told Sputnik that Trump is likely to back down on his campaign comments favoring the restoration of waterboarding and other "enhanced interrogation" techniques.

19. Cameron is lined up to be the UK's candidate as head of Nato after Britain pledged to play a greater role following the Brexit vote

Daily Mail (UK), John Stevens, 2016 12 29

London - David Cameron is being lined up as a contender to be the next secretary general of Nato. Officials believe the former prime minister is the most likely candidate to be successful if Theresa May wants to get a Briton appointed to Europe's top defence job. It comes with a tax-free salary of 260,624 euros (£222,019), although Mr Cameron is thought to be earning up to £2,000 a minute on the lucrative speaking tour circuit after stepping down as an MP after 15 years in September. Following the Brexit vote Britain has pledged to play a greater role in the US-led military alliance. The current Nato boss, former Norwegian prime minister Jens Stoltenberg, will finish his term in either 2018 or 2019. Government allies of Mr Cameron said he is open to taking a top job on the world stage - and believe Britain would benefit from his return to frontline politics. One senior member of Mrs May's Cabinet said: 'We've got to find a role for him - he has so much to offer. We have got to get him batting for Britain again.' Sources close to Mr Cameron last night talked up his suitability for the role, but questioned whether he would want to take the post. A spokesman for the former prime minister declined to comment.

Sydney Morning Herald, Rachel Olding and Kim Arlington, 2016 12 30

Sydney--Premier Mike Baird encouraged revellers to celebrate New Year's Eve as they normally would after a 40-year-old man was charged by counter-terrorism police with making online threats relating to Sydney's New Year's Eve celebrations. Police and the Premier have ruled out any current threats over New Year's Eve and stressed there was no reason why the public should stay at home and not celebrate New Year's Eve. Damien James O'Neil was arrested as he got off a flight from London on Thursday. Police allege Mr O'Neil, from Chippendale in inner Sydney, uploaded a document to the online blog hosting site Live Journal in which he threatened to kill or maim random members of the public on New Year's Eve. Police attached to the Terrorism Investigation Squad were investigating posts allegedly made by Mr O'Neil after a tip-off from a member of the public. They raided his home in Regent Street, Chippendale, and an inner-west storage facility where items including documents and hard drives were seized. He has been charged with "documents containing threats contrary to Section 31 Crimes Act 1900 concerning online blogs".

Two days earlier, senior officials from Russia, China and Pakistan met in Moscow to discuss Afghanistan's security situation and peace in the country. However, Afghanistan was not invited to the meeting. It was a third round of talks among the three countries on the "deteriorating situation in Afghanistan", particularly at the rise of the Islamic State (IS) group -- also known by its Arabic acronym Daesh. The previous two rounds had taken place behind closed doors. The announcement of the latest talks irked Kabul, which questioned the effectiveness of a process on Afghanistan without its representation.

Jakarta - In the wake of sporadic terrorist attacks in the country, the government is set to map regions that are prone to terrorism, as well as radical groups that settle in the areas. The National Counterterrorism Agency (BNPT) has signed an agreement with the Central Statistics Agency (BPS) to generate a terrorism-risk index that will map out regions susceptible to growing radicalism. BNPT head Comr. Gen. Suhardi Alius said the new data approach is aimed at mitigating the spread of radicalism that usually nurtures terrorist groups, so that it can be prevented and foiled. The index would put together potential factors in society that would foster radicalism, ranging from economic injustice and poverty to a lack of education, which are often used by some radical groups to fuel sentiment against the government, he said.

Seoul-- North Korea's state radio station resumed broadcasting mysterious numbers Friday in what could be some kind of coded message to its agents operating in South Korea. Radio Pyongyang, the North's state-run radio station, started broadcasting messages at 1:15 a.m. (Seoul time), calling out a series of pages and numbers, such as No. 69 on Page 894, before repeating them one more time. The radio announcer said, "(I'm giving) review works in math lessons of the remote education university for No. 27 expedition agents." The content was the same as those transmitted in the early hours of Dec. 16. Since June 24, 20 of such encrypted numbers broadcasts have been discovered, with the latest one broadcast Sunday. Dhaka Tribune, Kamrul Hasan, 2016 12 30

Dhaka - Investigators have said that the grenades they found from the raid in a terrorist den in city's Ashkona area earlier this week were all handmade, as were the suicide vests. Militants at this New JMB den were using the same sort of materials and techniques used by JMB for making the bombs, but they were connecting several bombs together in suicide vests to make them deadlier. Dhaka Metropolitan Police's (DMP) Counter Terrorism and Transnational (CTTC) Unit recovered and defused 19 grenades from that den, 10 of them tied inside two suicide vests and two unexploded grenades from the body of the female militant Shakira. A CTTC bomb disposal unit official told the Dhaka Tribune that the grenades recovered from the den were similar to the ones found in Mirpur last year. The bombs were made using old JMB techniques using local materials. However, unlike the old group, New JMB bomb makers put the grenades in vests.

Washington - The Czech Republic is setting up a new counter-terrorism unit aimed at the threat posed by "foreign disinformation campaigns" -- or fake news. The Center Against Terrorism and Hybrid Threats is due to start operating on Sunday, according to an interior ministry statement. The new center is intended to monitor internal security threats, including attacks on soft targets and extremism, as well as "disinformation campaigns related to internal security." Its establishment follows the publication in September of a Czech intelligence service report that identified Russian disinformation and cyber-espionage activities as a potential threat to the Czech Republic, European Union and NATO.

37. How Russia Recruited Elite Hackers for Its Cyberwar

New York Times, Andrew Kramer, 2016 12 29

Moscow - While much about Russia's cyberwarfare program is shrouded in secrecy, details of the government's effort to recruit programmers in recent years -- whether professionals like (computer programmer Aleksandr) Vyarya, college students, or even potential criminals -- are shedding some light on the Kremlin's plan to create elite teams of computer hackers. For more than three years, rather than rely on military officers working out of isolated bunkers, Russian government recruiters have scouted a wide range of programmers, placing prominent ads on social media sites, offering jobs to college students and professional coders, and even speaking openly about scouting Russia's criminal underworld for potential talent. These recruits were intended to cycle through military contracting companies and newly formed units called "science squadrons," established on military bases around the country. As early as 2013, Sergei K. Shoigu, the defense minister, told university rectors at a meeting in Moscow that he was on a "head hunt in the positive meaning of the word" for coders.

38. Russia announces 35 US diplomats persona non grata

ITAR-TASS World Service, Staff report, 2016 12 30

Moscow - Russia announces the U.S. 35 diplomats persona non grata - those are 31 personnel of the embassy in Moscow and four of the consulate general in St. Petersburg, Russia's Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said on Friday. "We, of course, cannot leave unanswered the insults of the kind, reciprocity is the law of diplomacy and foreign relations," he said. "Thus, the Russian Foreign Ministry and officials of other authorities have presented to the Russian president suggestions regarding announcing persona non grata 31 personnel of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow and four diplomats from the Consulate General in St. Petersburg." Lavrov has called US accusations against Russia of interference in elections groundless. (Full report).

39. Russia Set to Expel 35 U.S. Diplomats in Response to Move by Obama

New York Times, Neil MacFarquhar, 2016 12 30

Moscow - Russia moved on Friday to expel 35 United States diplomats and ban American diplomatic staff from using properties in Moscow, a day after President Obama ordered the expulsion of 35 suspected Russian intelligence operatives from the United States and the imposition of sanctions. The moves, recommended by the Foreign Ministry, must be approved by President Vladimir V. Putin, but given the way they were presented, with Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov proposing them in remarks broadcast nationally on television, they seemed sure to be adopted. The foreign minister recommended that 31 American diplomats be expelled from Moscow and four more from St. Petersburg. He also said that a recreational compound and a warehouse in Moscow used by diplomats should be closed. Mr. Lavrov, in making his recommendations, said such actions by the United States could not go unanswered. "Of course we cannot leave such mischievous tricks without a response," he said. "Reciprocity is the law of diplomacy and of international relations."

40. Ukraine hit by 6,500 hack attacks, sees Russian 'cyberwar'

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 12 29

Kiev - Hackers have targeted Ukrainian state institutions about 6,500 times in the past two months, including incidents that showed Russian security services were waging a cyberwar against the country, President Petro Poroshenko said on Thursday. In December, Ukraine suffered attacks on its finance and defense ministries and the State Treasury that allocates cash to government institutions. A suspected hack also wiped out part of Kiev's power grid, causing a blackout in part of the capital. "Acts of terrorism and sabotage on critical infrastructure facilities remain possible today," Poroshenko said during a meeting of the National Security and Defence Council, according to a statement released by Poroshenko's office. The statement said the president stressed that "the investigation of a number of incidents indicated the complicity directly or indirectly of Russian security services waging a cyberwar against our country". Russia has repeatedly denied hacking accusations.

41. US Hands Tied with Iran's Air Defense Force

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 30

Tehran - The joint air defense and anti-aircraft war games by the Iranian Army and the Aerospace Division of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps are still underway nationwide. Codenamed Modafean Aseman Velayat 7 (The Defenders of Velayat Skies 7), the seasonal drills kicked off Monday in the southern parts of the country, taking place over an area measuring 496,000 square kilometers. According to the military commanders, the armed forces are performing Air Defense Identification Zones over land and water in the interest of national security. They extend to skies beyond the country's territory to give the defence forces more time to respond to possibly hostile aircraft. They are designed to test Iran's air warfare capabilities and military response time following training missions, to act as an opposing force to test the air defense capabilities of the armed forces, to increase flight duration and range, and to conduct intercept training.

42. Ceasefire backed by Russia, Turkey takes effect

Al Jazeera, 2016 12 30

Gaziantep/Moscow - A ceasefire across Syria has gone into effect after the government and some armed opposition groups accepted a truce agreement brokered by Russia and Turkey. Thursday's ceasefire began at 12am local time (22:00 GMT), and, if it holds, will be followed by peace negotiations in Kazakhstan's capital Astana within one month. Turkey and Russia have pledged to act as guarantors to the cessation of hostilities. Previous UN-backed attempts to end the Syrian civil war, which started as a largely unarmed uprising against President Bashar al-Assad in March 2011, have failed and often led to fierce fighting. The Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) group and Jabhat Fateh al-Sham group [formerly al-Nusra Front] have been excluded from the ceasefire, according to reports. Al Jazeera's Charles Stratford, reporting from Gaziantep on the Turkish border with Syria, said "there are high hopes that this [truce] might work, but there are huge potential problems with it.

43. Ceasefire deal: Will the guns fall silent in Syria at midnight?

The National (UAE), Josh Wood, 2016 12 30

Beirut - A nationwide ceasefire between Syrian rebel and government forces was expected to begin at midnight on Thursday in a deal backed by Russia, Iran and Turkey. The deal, supported by the main foreign powers involved in Syria's civil war and coming just over a week after a rebel withdrawal from Aleppo, will exclude Jabhat Fatah Al Sham and so-called "affiliates", as well as ISIL, according to the Syrian government. Until July, Jabhat Fatah Al Sham was Al Qaeda's Syria branch and remains a leading force among rebel ranks. "The parties, with this understanding, committed to cease all armed, including aerial, attacks and refrain from expanding the territories under their control at the expense of one another," said Turkey's foreign ministry. The agreement on the apparently open-ended ceasefire comes ahead of planned peace talks between the Syrian opposition and government in the Kazakh capital, Astana.

44. Hariri pledges to support Army and security apparatus

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 12 30

Beirut - Prime Minister Saad Hariri said Thursday that his government would ramp up support the Lebanese Army and the security services in their mission to maintain stability and combat terrorism. "The government will spare no effort to provide all possible support to the Army and the security forces so they would be able to continue their mission of preserving the security of the nation and the citizens," Hariri said in a statement from his Downtown residence following a series of meeting with senior security officials. His round of talks included meetings with the defense minister, the Army commander and the interior minister in addition to the heads of General Security, the Internal Security Forces and State Security. Meanwhile the Army continued raiding towns along the northeastern Syrian-Lebanese border in search of wanted suspects, the state-run national news agency.

45. Oman to join Islamic antiterrorism coalition

The National (UAE), Saleh al Shaibany, 2016 12 30

Muscat - Oman on Thursday said it was joining the Islamic Military Coalition to Fight Terrorism launched by Saudi Arabia last year. The decision was conveyed to the Saudi defence minister, deputy crown prince Mohammed bin Salman, in a message from his Omani counterpart, Badr bin Saud Al Busaidi. The antiterrorism coalition, of which the UAE is a member, was announced by the Saudi defence minister last December. Oman would be the 41st nation to join. The Omani foreign ministry said the decision "comes within the common understanding of the Islamic countries and in particular the role and leadership of the sisterly Kingdom of Saudi Arabia" and "within the context of the importance to achieve peace, security and stability in the regions dominated by armed terrorist violence". A ministry official told The National Oman would share intelligence to counter terrorism, but would not abandon its policy of neutrality.

46. Terror suspect killed in raid, another man arrested (Canada).

Jordan Times, Laila Azzeh, 2016 12 30

Amman - A terror suspect was killed on Wednesday and another man apprehended during a security sweep in Shobak, around 200km south of Amman, authorities said. A joint statement by the Public Security Department (PSD) and the Gendarmerie Department, which jointly carried out the operation, said that the killed man was suspected of affiliation with a terrorist group. Elaborating, the statement said that the joint force responded to intelligence locating a suspect, who holds an Arab nationality and is wanted for his links to a terrorist group, in a farm in Shobak. Upon seeing the security men, the suspect opened heavy fire. This is the third security operation in the southern region this month. The first two were carried out in Karak, ending with the death of 11 security officers, two citizens and a Canadian national, and the injury of dozens of others in the two terror- related incidents. Five terrorists were killed in the two operations in the village of Qreifelleh and at Karak Castle.

47. Attentat de Berlin : l'étonnante négligence allemande

Le Figaro, Luc Andre, 2016 12 30

Berlin - Les services antiterroristes qui connaissaient le profil et le parcours d'Anis Amri savaient qu'il était candidat pour un attentat. État islamique Une fiche met les autorités allemandes en fâcheuse posture. Le 14 décembre dernier, les services de sécurité ont rédigé une synthèse sur Anis Amri. Soit cinq jours avant que le jeune Tunisien ne tue douze personnes avec un camion-bélier sur un marché de Noël à Berlin. Ce document, révélé par le quotidien Süddeutsche Zeitung et la télévision publique, suggère que l'antiterrorisme en savait long sur celui qui se faisait passer pour un demandeur d'asile. Le rapport livre une description précise du parcours de délinquance du futur auteur de l'attentat, liste le nombre de ses alias et de ses multiples résidences, étayé par de nombreuses photos. Il est présenté comme un individu ayant un goût inhabituel pour la conspiration au fait des techniques de surveillance policière.

48. Italy's PM: Berlin market attacker radicalized in prison

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 12 30

Milan - Italian Premier Paolo Gentiloni said Thursday that there are no indications the Tunisian fugitive from the Berlin Christmas market attack, who was shot dead near Milan, had any significant contacts in Italy. Italian investigators have been trying to determine whether Anis Amri tapped a jihadi network in Italy, his European port of entry when he left Tunisia in early 2011 and the end of his nearly four-day flight following the Berlin truck attack that left 12 dead. "No particular networks have emerged in Italy," Gentiloni told reporters in Rome ahead of a security meeting in Milan headed by his interior minister. But the prime minister said there still is a need to enhance anti-terror measures, including making it easier to deport migrants living in the country illegally. Existing measures already permit Italy to expel foreign nationals with suspected terror ties, with 66 carried out so far this year and 152 since the beginning of 2015.

49. Man wrongly arrested over Berlin attack says he fears for his life

The Guardian (London), Kate Connolly, 2016 12 29

Berlin - Naveed Baloch was crossing a road in central Berlin on the evening of 19 December, having just left a friend's house. He was halfway over it when, seeing a car heading towards him, he increased his speed. "I then realised it was a police car. I stopped when they beckoned to me, and showed them all the ID I had on me." They let him go but within seconds had called him back. Before he knew it he was in the back of the car, its lights flashing as it sped through Berlin. His hands were bound behind his back. Later that night, he said, he was blindfolded and taken from "one police station to another place" about 10 minutes away. He recalls two police officers "digging the heels of their shoes into my feet", and one of the men "putting great pressure on my neck with his hand". They undressed him and took photographs. "When I resisted, they started slapping me." They took three samples of his blood. A 24-year-old Pakistani identified only as Naveed B was named by German police and the interior minister, Thomas de Maizière, just hours after the deadly attack on a Christmas market on Berlin's Breitscheidplatz, as their prime suspect. Speaking exclusively to the Guardian just over a week after being wrongly arrested for the attack which killed 12 and injured 48 others, Baloch is now in hiding, fearful for his life and no longer feeling safe in the country in which he sought refuge as a member of a secular separatist movement in Balochistan, a province that is a frequent target of religious extremists in Pakistan. Members of his family in Pakistan have been contacted by the security services and have been receiving threatening phone calls following the widespread distribution of his photograph and name. "My family and I agree we would be safer if we speak out, and the sooner the better," he said.

50. Tunisian man released in Berlin Christmas attack case

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 12 29

Berlin - German police have released a man who had been detained over alleged ties to Berlin attack suspect Anis Amri. Authorities have said they will continue the search for accomplices in the deadly attack. The 40-year-old was allowed to walk free on Thursday, after German authorities determined that he was not a "possible contact person for Anis Amri," spokesman Frauke Köhler told reporters on Thursday. The man was detained a day before, after the authorities found his phone number stored in Amri's cell phone, which had been found at the scene of the Berlin attack.

51. Un contact d'Anis Amri arrêté en Allemagne

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 12 30

Berlin - Un Tunisien de 40 ans, soupçonné d'avoir été en contact avec le terroriste de Berlin Anis Amri, a été arrêté mercredi 28 décembre dans la capitale allemande. " Le défunt Anis Amri avait sauvegardé dans son téléphone mobile le numéro de ce ressortissant tunisien. Les investigations laissent penser qu'il pourrait être lié à l'attentat ", a indiqué le parquet fédéral, compétent en matière de terrorisme, dans un court communiqué. Les enquêteurs allemands cherchent à établir si M. Amri, qui était classé depuis des mois comme individu dangereux, a pu bénéficier de complicités.

1. Liberals back CSIS in torture lawsuit

The Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - The Liberal government has taken up the former Conservative government's legal fight against an apology and compensation for three Canadians tortured in the Middle East, despite voting in favour of the former detainees' cause while they sat in opposition. As well, in aggressively defending the actions of CSIS and trying to prevent the release of thousands of unredacted documents that a judge is now poring over, the Liberals are going further than their Conservative predecessors did to protect CSIS sources. Lawyers for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's Liberal government are seeking retroactive blanket anonymity for spies and their sources and have filed an appeal in a civil lawsuit launched by the three men with that goal in mind. A Conservative bill last year, C-44, which enacted source protection, was not made retroactive. Put together, the two moves have stunned a team of lawyers at Toronto's Stockwoods firm that took up the cause of Abdullah Almalki, Muayyed Nureddin and Ahmad El Maati, as well as others who closely follow developments in security law.

2. Most Canadians disagree with Trudeau's plan to withdraw CF-18s, poll suggests

CBC News, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - A new poll suggests that majority of Canadians disagree with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's pledge to withdraw Canada's CF-18 fighter jets by the end of March from the U.S.-led bombing mission against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. When asked what Canada's role should be in the fight against ISIS, only 27 per cent told the Angus Reid Institute that they were on the same page as Trudeau in wanting to stop Canada's bombing mission and focus only on training local troops in Iraq and Syria. Meanwhile, 11 per cent of respondents wanted to stop Canada's involvement in the fight against ISIS altogether. The majority of Canadians disagreed with the prime minister, with 37 per cent saying the Liberal government should continue the current level of bombing and training provided by Canada, while 26 per cent wanted the levels increased. Even though the withdrawal of CF-18s was a key issue during Trudeau's election campaign last year, slightly more past Liberal voters were in support of maintaining the current level of Canada's involvement than were in support of withdrawing Canada's fighter jets, at 37 per cent and 34 per cent respectively.

3. Pakistan's forgotten war in Balochistan

The Toronto Sun, Tarek Fatah, 2016 02 07

Column: Last Saturday, I woke up to a phone call from a refugee who recently escaped death in Pakistan and now lives in Toronto. Skipping the usual pleasantries, his voice quivering with anger, lateef Johar told me: "They've killed Dr. Manan and his son." "They", being the Pakistan army that has occupied Balochistan since it invaded the independent state of kalat in March, 1948. Dr. Manan Baloch was a physician politician who was the secretary general of the outlawed Baloch National Movement (BNM), a political party that calls for a free homeland for the Baloch people and the end of the Pakistani occupation. He was widely known for his work in helping war refugees in Balochistan. Pakistan's government, however, described Baloch and his associates as terrorists, called their deaths a "major breakthrough" in its war against terrorism in Balochistan and said all five men were killed in a gunfight with security forces.

4. Des centaines de citoyens manifestent leur solidarité

Le Soleil, David Rémillard, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - Leurs morts ont été soudaines. Les blessures, elles, prendront encore du temps à guérir. Les familles des six victimes québécoises de l'attentat terroriste survenu le 15 janvier au Burkina Faso ont poursuivi le long processus de deuil, samedi, portant leurs proches à leur dernier repos. Tel que l'avaient souhaité les familles, les funérailles d'Yves Carrier, de son fils Charlelie et de sa fille Maude, de sa conjointe Gladys Chamberland et de leur ami Louis Chabot ont été célébrées dans la même église, celle du Très-Saint-Sacrement, samedi après-midi. Les obsèques de Suzanne Bernier ont été tenues en matinée, en privé, à l'église Saint-Thomas-d'Aquin, également à Québec. Honorant la mémoire du patriarche, qui l'aurait sans doute voulu ainsi, les Carrier ont laissé le public assister aux hommages. «La porte de mon père [Yves Carrier] était toujours ouverte», a souvent répété son fils, Frédéric Carrier. Des centaines de citoyens ont répondu à l'appel, si bien que l'église était pleine à craquer avant même le début de la cérémonie, prévu à 14h30. Au total, plus de 1000 personnes se sont présentées, dont certaines ont dû rebrousser chemin, faute d'espace. À l'intérieur, dans l'attente du début des funérailles, des images des disparus défilaient sur les écrans. Devant l'autel, quatre urnes et un cercueil, des lampions ainsi qu'une photo de chaque coopérant décédé le 15 janvier.

5. How Canada can step up

Toronto Star, 2016 02 07

Editorial: The crisis in Syria worsens by the day. The civil war rages on, peace talks are faltering, Islamic State jihadists terrorize much of the country, cities lie in ruins, millions of Syrians have fled into exile, and aid is in short supply. As United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon put it, it's "as close to hell as we are likely to find on this Earth." Faced with a tragedy on this scale, there's only so much the world can do to help. Even so, it's good to see Prime Minister Justin Trudeau drawing up a more ambitious, better-integrated plan to address this calamity as the UN chief prepares to visit Ottawa next week to discuss Syria and Iraq, refugees and other issues. As Trudeau says, "Canada can play a positive role in pushing for peace and stability" that goes well beyond bombing jihadists. More than anything, the war needs to be brought to a close. Peace talks and ceasefires are critical. Until then, millions will need food, shelter, medical care and schooling. Airstrikes against the jihadists, however necessary, are just part of the mix. Forceful diplomacy, robust aid and building up local forces complete the bigger picture. To Syrians who bear the agony of this conflict, Canada's most useful contribution to date has been our generous aid and resettlement policy. Largely on Stephen Harper's watch we've provided nearly $1 billion in humanitarian, development and security assistance since the start of the conflict five years ago, $650 million of it in aid alone. Moreover, the Trudeau government is now resettling 25,000 or more Syrian refugees here. We've already taken in almost as many Iraqis.

6. Des vidéos arabophobes

Journal De Montreal, Dominique Scali, 2016 02 07

Montréal - Craignant pour la sécurité des enfants, une école primaire de Montréal a fait appel à la police après la diffusion de vidéos arabophobes la visant sur les réseaux sociaux, a appris Le Journal. «Ils sont obligés d'apprendre l'arabe à l'école.» Voilà le genre d'affirmations farfelues dont regorge une vidéo «coup de gueule» qui, mise en ligne le 26 janvier dernier, a été visionnée plus de 180 000 fois en moins de 24 heures. Son auteur, François Chaput, y apparaît en gros plan en train de critiquer l'école publique Victor-Lavigne de Saint-Léonard. «Dans la cour d'école, la gardienne porte une burqa, [...] À tous les breaks, ce n'est que de l'arabe et aucun [...] mot en français», dénonce avec véhémence M. Chaput, un membre du groupe anti-islam Pegida Québec. «C'est à la limite du crime haineux. Rien n'est vrai dans cette vidéo», estime Herman Deparice-Okomba, le directeur du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation. Quelques heures plus tard, M. Chaput a publié une seconde vidéo. «Si vous n'êtes pas contents, appelez à l'école», encourage-t-il.

7. Lying legacy of terrorist Inderjit Singh Reyat Postmedia News, Mark Bonokoski, 2016 02 07

Opinion: It was another February day, this time back in 1988, and I was the only journalist at London's historic Bow Street Magistrates Court as a bearded man in a dark turban was led into the prisoners' dock. The British media cared not a whit then about the arrest of Inderjit Singh Reyat, and was more interested in what was happening in another courtroom where a Scandinavian ex-pat was being arraigned on spy charges. Little did they know that Sikh in the puffy ski jacket in the courtroom next door would end up being the only person ever convicted in relation to the bombing of Air India Flight 182 over the coast of Ireland three years earlier, and the murder of all 329 souls aboard. Even today it seems unbelievable that a crime so heinous would be so easy to escape. It remains, for those too young to remember, as Canada's worst-ever mass murder and, until the catastrophic events of 9/11, it was the deadliest terrorist attack the world had seen. To think that Reyat is today spending his second week in a Vancouver halfway house on his way to permanent release from custody is still difficult to fathom. He, after all, was the bomb maker. And he has never exhibited a speck of remorse.

8. No-fly list hurts innocent bystanders Victoria Times Colonist, Marc And Craig Kielburger, 2016 02 07

Opinion: Don't ask Syed Adam Ahmed about the airport. Normally shy but amiable, the six-year-old growls in frustration while his face clouds over like an oncoming hurricane. The little hockey fan from Markham, Ont., is still extremely upset that he almost missed out on attending an NHL game in the U.S. because his name is the same of a person on Canada's so-called no-fly list, which prevents individuals with suspected ties to terror from boarding planes. This case of mistaken identity has plagued the family since Adam was a toddler, according to his mother, Khadija Cajee. "We don't want him to grow up feeling like he's under suspicion for the rest of his life," says Cajee. "We feel like second-class citizens because of this." Since the Ahmed family went public with their story, 21 others have spoken up to say that they, too, have children wrongly identified by the no-fly list. Cajee knows of at least 20 more families who remain silent for fear of government, or public, reprisal. All have experienced security hassles and delays at Canadian airports, and some have even missed flights. The problem is beyond the control of airlines, our sources tell us. Once a name is flagged, airport counter staff are locked out of the system until they call a government agency to have the block lifted. However, Minister of Public Safety Ralph Goodale recently told CBC Radio he can't even say whether the no-fly list has ever actually prevented a real terror suspect from travelling.

8. Canada lifts some Iran sanctions Jewish Telegraphic Agency, 2016 02 07

Toronto - Canada's new Liberal government announced it is lifting some economic sanctions against Iran. Stephane Dion, Canada's minister of foreign affairs, announced Friday that Ottawa will be ending a number of sanctions against Iran, including a ban on financial services and imports and exports. In a statement, the government said all applications for export permits would be considered on a case-by-case basis. "We'll engage with Iran step-by-step, (with) open eyes, because we still have a lot of concerns about the role of Iran in the region," Dion said in Ottawa. Dion added that Canada is considering restoring diplomatic contacts with Iran, which were severed by the previous Conservative government in 2012. Dion said Canada was wrong to cut ties with Iran. "We should have been part of it, to engage Iran, with sanctions, but with diplomacy at the same time," he told reporters.

9. The Liberals all-new ISIS mission: More troops, more risk?

iPolitics.ca, L. Ian MacDonald, 2016 01 07

Opinion: If a government is looking for a full suite of policy options, there's no better place to shop in Ottawa than the Department of National Defence. The Trudeau government's imminent reconfiguring of the mission against ISIS is a case in point. The Liberals are poised to do both more and less at the same time. Only DND could offer such a diversified menu of policy choices. The re-profiled mission is expected to be announced Monday or Tuesday ahead of a NATO defence ministers' meeting in Brussels. Justin Trudeau will not (to use his own words) "whip out our CF-18s" and "wave them around". Instead, he is expected to recall the squadron of six fighter jets from the Middle East, probably when parliamentary approval for the current mission expires at the end of March. So this is one thing that President Barack Obama won't be asking Trudeau about during his working visit and state dinner at the White House next month, since Trudeau is taking an extended CF-18 deployment off the table. If ever there was a campaign promise made to be broken, it's Trudeau's pledge to recall the CF-18s from the ISIS mission. It's not as if there's any great groundswell of voices across the land demanding their return. (Note: L. Ian MacDonald is editor of Policy, the bi-monthly magazine of Canadian politics and public policy.)

10. Released From Guantánamo, but in Legal Limbo in Morocco

The New York Times, Charlie Savage & Aida Alami, 2016 02 07

Washington - Younis Shokuri, a Moroccan detainee at the Guantánamo Bay prison, said he feared being repatriated to his native country. But the Moroccan government told the United States that it would probably release him without charges 72 hours after any transfer. So last September, Mr. Shokuri went home -- reluctantly, but voluntarily. But despite its assurances, Morocco has kept Mr. Shokuri in custody and is weighing criminal charges, apparently focused on allegations that he was involved with a Moroccan terrorist group before his capture in Afghanistan in late 2001. Mr. Shokuri's lawyers have demanded that the Obama administration press Morocco to live up to what they thought was a deal. Both governments have said little to explain the discrepancy. Several officials familiar with behind-the-scenes legal and diplomatic discussions are now shedding light on the murky episode. Beyond its importance for Mr. Shokuri, his situation illustrates how difficult -- and messy -- it can be to winnow down the ranks of detainees viewed as posing a lower-level security risk at the Guantánamo prison, which the Obama administration still wants to close in its final year in office. Of the 91 remaining detainees, 34 are recommended for transfer, and a parole-like review group has been adding names to the list. Each man presents a problem: The government has to find a place that is willing to take him and that can be trusted to keep an eye on him without abusing him.

11. British Spies May Soon Be Able To Get Data Straight From American Companies

Motherboard Blog, Joshua Kopstein, 2016 02 07

Analysis: British police and intelligence agencies might soon be able to get private data by going straight to the doorsteps of American companies like Google and Facebook, if a new bilateral deal between the two countries goes through. The US and UK already have extensive intelligence-sharing arrangements as members of the globe-spanning Five Eyes spying alliance. But this new surveillance pact, which is being negotiated in secret, would give British spies an unprecedented level of access to American companies, allowing them to set up wiretaps and serve "production orders" directly on corporate servers located on American soil. "Last time they did this, we assembled the Minutemen," NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden tweeted, referring to the specialized militias that fought for the colonies in the Revolutionary War. The wiretaps and search orders would need to be accompanied by a warrant, but, unlike in the US judicial system, they wouldn't require a judge's signature or finding of probable cause. British spies also wouldn't be allowed to access communications and data belonging to American citizens—although that claim is always questionable considering the various loopholes that allow the NSA and GCHQ to retain “incidentally” collected information.

12. Congress Starts to Get Serious About Online Privacy

The New York Times, 2016 02 07

Editorial: Congress could soon vote on a bill that would require law enforcement agencies to get a search warrant from a judge to obtain emails, photographs and other documents Americans have stored online. This important legislation would update the law to reflect how people use the Internet today. Under the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986, government agents need a warrant if they want access to email stored on the servers of companies like Google and Yahoo, but only if the messages are less than 180 days old. For older messages and other digital files, law enforcement officials can issue subpoenas to technology companies without going to a judge. A bill introduced in the House by Kevin Yoder, Republican of Kansas, would require a warrant for all information stored online, regardless of how old it is and what kind of file it is. The legislation includes a sensible exception that would allow civil enforcement agencies like the Securities and Exchange Commission to subpoena messages sent by employees on a corporate computer system. The bill has more than 300 co-sponsors, a good sign that it would pass easily in the House. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Bob Goodlatte, Republican of Virginia, said last week that his committee would consider the bill in March. In the Senate, Mike Lee, Republican of Utah, and Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, have introduced a similar bill that has bipartisan support from 24 other senators.

13. I'm a Muslim, not a terrorist. So why did the NYPD spy on me for years?

The Washington Post, Mohammad Elshinawy, 2016 02 07

Comment: A couple of weeks after I began lecturing on Islam at New York City mosques, something strange happened. Acquaintances and congregants told me they'd been approached by law enforcement officers who asked about me and my talks. Soon after, I began to notice suspicious people in the audiences. One gentleman stood out - he was the most frequent attendee, but he regularly fell asleep while I spoke. It was 2003. I was enrolled at Brooklyn College, studying English literature. I'd grown up in New York and loved the city. But I'd also seen the way Muslims were discriminated against, particularly after Sept. 11, 2001. In the year after the attacks, hate crimes spiked tenfold. I wanted to encourage Muslims to stay strong in their faith in spite of these assaults. I wasn't doing anything wrong. I consistently rejected violence and terrorism in my lectures. Still, for a decade, I felt like I was under surveillance, pursued by shadowy law enforcement officials seeking out a crime that didn't exist. In 2013, my fears were confirmed. I found out from an Associated Press investigation that I was a victim of the New York Police Department's aggressive surveillance of Muslims. After 9/11, the NYPD began to track large swaths of us. Officers secretly labeled entire mosques as terrorist organizations, then spied on imams and recorded sermons. The department conducted at least a dozen of these "terrorism enterprise investigations" between 2001 and 2013, often without specific evidence of criminal wrongdoing and minimal oversight from judges. No charges were ever brought in these cases. (Note: This author lectures regularly on Islam and contributes to MuslimMatters.org. He is one of the plaintiffs in Raza v. City of New York)

14. Marco Rubio downplays Muslim discrimination, as do many Republicans

Washington Post.com, Philip Bump, 2016 02 07

Washington - Following President Obama's visit to a Baltimore mosque this week, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) criticized the move. "Look at today — he gave a speech at a mosque," Rubio said Wednesday. "Oh, you know, basically implying that America is discriminating against Muslims. Of course, there's going to be discrimination in America of every kind. But the bigger issue is radical Islam. And by the way, radical Islam poses a threat to Muslims themselves." That reply became a question at the Republican debate on Saturday. "You said of President Obama, quote, 'He's always pitting people against each other,' " ABC moderator David Muir asked, noting that President George W. Bush had similarly visited a mosque. "So I'm curious," Muir continued, "how are the two visits different, and would you visit a mosque as president?" "I would," Rubio replied. "But that's not — my problem with what he did is he continues to put out this fiction that there's widespread systematic discrimination against Muslim Americans."

15. Guantanamo detainees are still dangerous

The Washington Post, Gordon England, 2016 02 07

Comment: Defense Secretary Ashton Carter faces a profound dilemma. He leads the department that has jurisdiction over the facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, that detains Islamic militants. At the same time, his boss, President Obama, is determined to close Guantanamo to fulfill a campaign promise he made eight years ago. In fact, the president's single-minded focus on closing Guantanamo in the waning months of his administration - as illustrated by the recent release of 10 dangerous detainees, with the promise of more releases to come - is endangering American lives as well as those of our friends and allies. This I believe - and know firsthand - based on my experience during my last five years with the George W. Bush administration while serving as the senior government official responsible for the decision to transfer or release enemy combatants from Guantanamo. Contrary to what some may believe, Bush had no desire to hold any person at Guantanamo who did not absolutely need to be there. The guidance I received was to first determine through careful vetting which detainees posed less risk and then decide whether transfer or even release was appropriate - the opposite of the Obama White House's approach. The process involved input from many federal agencies and defense organizations, military and civilian. I personally read the dossiers and each organization's recommendation - many of which were in conflict - before making a final decision. Obviously, a recidivism rate of zero is unattainable. Seeking the right balance was an agonizing task that often had to be conducted on the basis of incomplete information. (Note: The writer was deputy U.S. secretary of defense from 2006 to 2009.)

16. Pegida's 'costly hate rallies' have no place in Birmingham, says MP

The Guardian.co.uk, 2016 02 07

London - "Costly hate rallies" have no place in Birmingham, MP Jess Phillips has said, after the founder of the anti-Islam group Pegida UK pledged to stage a protest in the city on the first Saturday of every month. Approximately 200 demonstrators gathered for the inaugural Pegida rally at Birmingham International rail station on Saturday - half as many as police expected. Dozens of riot police kept the Pegida supporters away from 60 anti-fascist activists who turned up to oppose the group's message. West Midlands police said they made one arrest for a public order offence at the counter demonstration. Tommy Robinson, former spokesman and leader of the English Defence League and founder of Pegida UK, announced that the group would stage further demonstrations in Birmingham on the first Saturday of every month starting in April.

17. Ex-MI5 officer to reveal torture at Guantanamo

The Sunday Times, Sean Rayment, 2016 02 07

London - The security service MI5 has agreed to allow a former intelligence officer to give evidence to a parliamentary committee and to reveal that the agency knew detainees were being tortured at Guantanamo Bay. The former spy will tell members of the Commons intelligence and security committee (ISC) that MI5 officers witnessed inmates being abused at the US military facility in Cuba on at least two occasions in 2002. The former high-ranking officer will provide MPs with precise dates and will name those who saw inmates, including Britons, being abused at Camp X-Ray and Camp Delta — two of the Guantanamo prisons. Britain's top security officers gave the go ahead last week after deliberating over a decision for more than 10 days. One intelligence source said MI5 was forced to grant permission to the former spy after details of his request to give evidence to the committee were revealed by The Sunday Times.

18. Terror suspects challenge control orders

The Sunday Telegraph, Robert Verkaik, 2016 02 07

London – The Government's power to control the movements of terrorists living in the UK is to be challenged in a secret court case brought by two men who have served jail terms for terrorist offences. The two are the only terror suspects subject to Terrorist Prevention and Investigation Measures (TPIMs), a key weapon used by the security services against individuals who pose a threat to national security. If they win their case, which is being funded by the taxpayer, it will mean that for first time since the controversial measures were introduced 10 years ago, no terrorist is subject to the control regime. TPIMs, which replaced control orders, permit strict curfews and prohibit meeting named individuals and using mobile phones and the internet. Suspects usually must wear electronic tags and report regularly to police stations. The legal measures are used by the security services to control the threat posed by dangerous extremists, and each order must be signed off by the Home Secretary.

19. Another Islamic State jailer who held Western hostages identified as Londoner

Washington Post, Adam Goldman & Souad Mekhennet, 2016 02 07

Washington - A member of a British cohort within the Islamic State that oversaw the brutal detention and beheading of Western hostages in Syria has been identified as Alexanda Kotey, a 32-year-old convert to Islam who grew up in West London. Kotey is the second militant among the group of Islamic State jailers to be named following the unmasking last year by The Washington Post of "Jihadi John" as Mohammed Emwazi — the infamous masked man, also a West Londoner, who beheaded American, British and Japanese hostages on video as he taunted Western leaders. Emwazi, 27, was killed in a drone strike in November in Raqqa, the Islamic State's de facto capital in Syria, along with another unidentified man. It is unclear whether that second man was also one of the four guards who watched over and tortured Western hostages and were nicknamed the "Beatles" by their prisoners because of their English accents.

20. UK ghost ships with enough nuclear fuel for 80 missiles

Mail on Sunday, Mark Nicol, 2016 02 07

London - Two top secret British 'ghost ships' carrying enough plutonium for a huge nuclear arsenal wend their way through the world's oceans -guarded against terrorists by 50 commandos. It may sound like a tantalising target for a villain in a James Bond film, but what is potentially the most dangerous secret mission in history is deadly reality. Two vast container ships - the Pacific Heron and the Pacific Egret - left Barrow-in-Furness, Cumbria, last month on the first leg of their incredible journey. Their mission is to sail to Japan to collect 331kg of plutonium - enough to make 80 nuclear warheads - which was leased by the UK to a Japanese research facility. The ships are almost certainly shadowed by a Royal Navy submarine and surface vessels and are heavily armed with 20mm cannon. They are sailing across the Atlantic before passing through the Panama Canal and into the Pacific on their way to Japan.

21. Islamic State support, recruitment on the wane

Canberra Times, Rachel Olding and Natalie O'Brien, 2016 02 07

Canberra - The death of IS recruiters like Neil Prakash has contributed to the fall in numbers of foreign fighters heading to the Middle East. The number of suspected would-be jihadis pulled off flights leaving Australia has doubled in the past year, as Islamic State recruiters direct foreign fighters away from Syria to other battlefronts, including Libya. At the same time experts believe there has been a decline in the numbers of foreign fighters reaching foreign soil to join IS. Department of Immigration figures obtained exclusively by Fairfax Media show that 312 people had been pulled off planes in the past seven months to February - almost matching the 336 passengers pulled off flights in the previous 12 months. The data does not reflect how many people were found to be suspected foreign fighters or those who were not. A spokeswoman for the department said that in some cases, the person may be allowed to continue their travel plans if they're no longer considered a risk after "intervention activity". The federal government has also cancelled 145 passports of suspected jihadists attempting to travel to conflict zones, suspended 26 passports and refused applications for a further 22 in the past financial year.

22. 'Terror' pair held

The New Zealand Herald, 2016 02 07

Australia - A Sydney teenager who allegedly boasted of wanting to do "an Islamic Bonnie and Clyde" has been refused bail. Alo-Bridget Namoa, 18, appeared at Parramatta Local Court via video link yesterday facing 31 charges of refusing to answer questions at a Crime Commission hearing. The court heard Namoa had refused to answer several questions about her alleged support for Isis and suspected plans to commit terrorist acts alongside her husband. Prosecutors said Namoa, from Sydney's west, was allegedly earlier caught with a knife wrapped in an Islamic flag and had graphic images of beheadings, explosions and executions stored on her mobile phone. The court heard she was hauled before the Crime Commission on Friday but failed to answer dozens of questions such as "Why were you and your husband downloading Isis propaganda?" and "Did your husband discuss plans to conduct an attack?" Other questions included, "What do you mean by 'I want to do an Islamic Bonnie and Clyde on the kaffir'?" and "Were you planning to sacrifice your life alongside your husband?"

23. No of jihadis pulled off planes 'doubles'

Australian Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Sydney - The number of suspected jihadis pulled off flights from Australia has reportedly doubled in the past seven months. Department of Immigration figures show that 312 passengers suspected of going to join jihadist groups like Islamic State were pulled off planes in the seven months to February, compared to 336 in the previous 12 months, according to Fairfax Media. The data does not take into account those who were later deemed not to be a risk and allowed to continue on their journeys.

24. Qld ready, able to help asylum seekers

Australian Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Brisbane - Queensland Premier Anastacia Palaszczuk has joined calls urging the prime minister not to send Australian-born asylum-seeker children back to offshore detention centres. It comes after Victorian Premier Daniel Andrews wrote to Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull offering to settle Australian-born asylum-seeker children and their families in the state. "Queensland stands willing and able to help those families that are currently here," Ms Palaszczuk said on Sunday. The premier said she had met people who had spent time in offshore detention as children who carried their experiences with them for life. "I don't think Queenslanders want to see children in that situation," she said. "Where is the humanity? Where is the compassion from the federal government?" She pledged to call the prime minister to talk to him about the effects of offshore detention on children, adding: "It's about time we put politics to one side."

25. Asian terror: The new front line

The Australian, Stephen Brook, 2016 02 07

Analysis: In the war on terror, sometimes you get a break. One month ago, on an otherwise normal Thursday morning in Jakarta, Indonesian authorities benefited from one such stroke of good fortune. Asian terror: The new front line. At 10.40am a team of jihadists claiming allegiance to Islamic State stormed a police traffic post at the intersection of Jalan Kyai Haji Wahid Hasyim and Jalan MH Thamrin, one of Jakarta's busiest. Armed with guns, explosives and suicide vests, the attackers set about massacring as many people as they could. They aimed to replicate last November's Paris attacks, which killed 130 people, transforming the western conversation on terror, refugees and the war in Syria. The terrorists laid siege to a neighbouring Starbucks cafe, gutting it with at least six bomb blasts. Ferocious gunbattles raged for hours. But at the end of the day just eight people lay dead. And four of those slain were attackers. In subsequent weeks, police arrested other alleged conspirators as they rolled up the network they say is responsible for Islamic State's first strike in Indonesia. That such a large-scale attack in a city as thronged and shambolic as Jakarta resulted in so few -casualties was down to the monumental incompetence of the -attackers. If there is an upside to this new era of DIY terrorism, it is that amateur terrorists often deliver amateur results. In Canberra, the attack surprised no one. Australian authorities had no forewarning Jakarta was about to be hit. But for months Australia's intelligence community had watched with growing -unease as the temperature across the region started rising.

26. Taliban's intelligence chief, deputy kidnapped in Quetta

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 02 07

Quetta - Taliban intelligence chief and his deputy have been separately kidnapped by unknown gunmen in Pakistan's Balochistan province, sources in the insurgency said on Sunday. A source close to the Taliban told Pajhwok Afghan News that Taliban intelligence chief Mullah Mohammadzai and his deputy Mullah Mohammad Eisa had been kidnapped from surrounding areas of Quetta last week. He said first Mohammadzai was kidnapped by masked gunmen in Kachlak area from his car and moved to an unknown location. The source believed the intelligence chief might have been kidnapped by security forces. Two days after Mohammadzai's abduction, his deputy Mullah Mohammad Eisa Akhund was kidnapped from Quetta's Ghausabad area. Sources close to Taliban in Quetta said Mullah Mohammadzai had recently returned from Afghanistan where he had been overseeing clashes between Taliban, Islamic State fighters and supporters of slain former Taliban commander Mullah Dadullah Mansoor.

27. Taliban urged to join peace talks by end of February

Pajhwok Afghan News, Javed Hamim Kakar, 2016 02 07

Kabul - The third round of four-nation talks on Afghanistan reconciliation in Islamabad concluded with a call for direct negotiations between the Kabul administration and the Taliban by the end of February. Without providing further details, a joint statement at the end of the meeting said a roadmap for peace had been agreed upon. Though not present at the meeting, the Taliban were urged to join the peace process. The four-nation group agreed to hold a fourth meeting in Kabul on Feb. 23. Pakistan Foreign Secretary

Aizaz Ahmad Chaudhry hosted the meeting. Other delegations were led by Afghan Deputy Foreign Minister Hekmat Khalil Karzai, US Special Representative for Afghanistan and Pakistan Ambassador Richard G. Olson and China's Special Envoy for Afghanistan Ambassador Deng Xijun.

28. Judges among 8 injured in Logar bomb attack

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 02 07

Pul-i-alam - Four judges and as many civilians were injured in a remote-controlled bomb attack on their vehicle in Pul-i-Alam, the capital of central Logar province on Sunday morning. The bombing, killing a policeman, took place at around 9am when the bomb attached to a cycle went off near the judges' vehicle in the Pul-i-Alam, Governor Haleem Fidaee told Pajhwok Afghan News. Appellant court chief Haqiq-ur-Rahman Haqmal, urban court head Abdul Basit, appellant court's criminal branch head Mohammad Omar Haidari and another judicial official sustained injuries in the blast. Four civilians were also wounded and a policeman killed in the attack, according to the governor, who saw land-grabbers behind the attack. The injured were rushed to the Kabul Emergency Hospital for treatment.

29. Army seeks funds from finance ministry to raise new security division

The Pakistan Dawn, Mateen Haider, 2016 02 07

Islamabad - Pakistan Army has sought additional funds from the finance ministry to raise a new security division and an additional 28 security battalions, it emerged on Sunday. A statement released by the ministry of finance said senior officials from the army had a meeting with Finance Minister Ishaq Dar at his ministry in Islamabad, where the demand for "financing and the release of funds" was made by military officials. The statement quoted Dar as saying that the "government attaches the highest importance to security matters" and assured the "provision of funds for the new security division and additional battalions." Pakistan Army is currently spearheading a war against terrorism in Pakistan's northern tribal areas bordering Afghanistan, where terrorists from militant organisations are believed to have taken refuge. In June 2014, the army launched a comprehensive military operation – Zarb-i-Azb – against Taliban militants threatening the writ of the state by launching brazen attacks on government and military installations.

30. Kunduz Residents Live in Fear of Taliban's Return

The New York Times, Najim Rahim, 2016 02 07

Kunduz, Afghanistan -- Farhad Azyanfar, a student of Dari literature at the university in Kunduz, watched in fear as a few hundred Taliban fighters overran and defeated a larger but demoralized government force to capture this northern city in September. He was relieved several weeks later when the insurgents left the city after a combined American and Afghan counterattack, but the feeling was short-lived: He and many other residents fear the Taliban will be back soon. "You can see the white flags of the Taliban along the road as soon as you step out of Kunduz City," said Mr. Azyanfar, 20, who travels back to his district outside the provincial capital several times a week. The area controlled by the government extends "only to the buildings in which they are based," he said. "As soon as you step outside, it is totally a different picture: The Taliban's presence and influence are much larger than the government's." It has been more than four months since the Afghan forces crumbled as Taliban fighters overran Kunduz. But there has been no improvement in the conditions that made the two-week Taliban takeover of the city possible. Disillusionment with the government has only gotten worse; the Afghan forces are still overstretched and demoralized; and the Taliban still control much of the outlying areas and roads.

31. Pakistan's Hand in the Rise of International Jihad

The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, 2016 02 07

Tunis – President Ashraf Ghani of Afghanistan has warned in several recent interviews that unless peace talks with Pakistan and the Taliban produce results in the next few months, his country may not survive 2016. Afghanistan is barely standing, he says, after the Taliban onslaught last year, which led to the highest casualties among civilians and security forces since 2001. "How much worse will it get?" Mr. Ghani asked in a recent television interview. "It depends on how much regional cooperation we can secure, and how much international mediation and pressure can be exerted to create rules of the game between states." What he means is it depends on how much international pressure can be brought to bear on Pakistan to cease its aggression. Critics of the Afghan leadership say it's not Pakistan's fault that its neighbor is falling apart. They point to the many internal failings of the Afghan government: political divisions, weak institutions, warlords and corruption. But experts have found a lot of evidence that Pakistan facilitated the Taliban offensive. The United States and China have been asking Pakistan to persuade the Taliban to make peace, but Afghanistan argues that Islamabad has done nothing to rein in the Taliban, and if anything has encouraged it to raise the stakes in hopes of gaining influence in any power-sharing agreement.

32. China expresses regret over N. Korea's rocket launch

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Beijing - China on Sunday expressed "regret" over North Korea's launch of a long-range rocket, after Pyongyang claimed it successfully put a satellite into orbit. In a statement, China's foreign ministry said North Korea's launch of a long-range rocket "ignored universal opposition of the international community." "China believes that North Korea should have the right to the peaceful use of space, but this right is limited by the United Nations Security Council resolutions," the statement said. However, the Chinese ministry urged "all relevant parties" to be calm, take cautious actions and refrain from taking actions that may lead to tensions.

33. China voices 'deep concern' about possible deployment of U.S. missile system

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Beijing - China's foreign ministry expressed "deep concern" on Sunday as Seoul and Washington agreed to begin talks on the deployment of an advanced American missile defense system to South Korea following the North's long-range rocket launch. Hours after North Korea claimed it had successfully put a satellite into orbit, South Korea and the U.S. announced that they would begin talks on the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) battery to South Korea. The launch is widely viewed as a covert ballistic missile test to advance the development of delivery vehicles capable of carrying nuclear warheads. The Chinese foreign ministry said that "China's position on the issue of anti-missile is consistent and clear" in a faxed statement to Yonhap News Agency. "Countries, when pursuing their own security, should take into account others' security interests as well as regional peace and stability," the statement said. If the THAAD battery is deployed to South Korea, it would further raise tension on the Korean Peninsula, the statement said, adding that, "It is hoped that relevant countries would approach the issue with caution."

34. N. Korea launches long-range rocket

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - North Korea launched a long-range rocket Sunday, apparently sending a satellite into orbit, as South Korea and the U.S. denounced it as a ballistic missile test that challenges U.N. resolutions banning such. "It's presumed that the projectile has entered into orbit," a military official said, indicating that the North successfully launched the long-range rocket. The official, however, qualified the assessment by saying that additional analysis is needed to confirm whether the satellite is operating normally in its orbit. Earlier in the day, South Korea's Aegis destroyer's radar detected the rocket lifting off at 9:30 a.m. from North Korea's northwest Dongchang-ri launch site and concluded that it was a long-range rocket after studying the trajectory. Upon the launch on the west coast, the rocket flew southward, dropping its first stage into the Yellow Sea off the Korean Peninsula at 9:32 a.m. The first stage exploded in midair and splashed down in some 270 pieces, according to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

35. S. Korea's spy agency says N. Korea's satellite is worthless

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - North Korea's long-range rocket should be viewed as a ballistic missile as the satellite it put into orbit is worthless, lawmakers said Sunday, citing South Korea's spy agency. The satellite is presumed to weigh 200 kilograms, two times heavier than a satellite launched in 2012, the lawmakers said after being briefed in a close-door session by the National Intelligence Service. A satellite weighing about 200 kilograms "is worthless as a satellite," Lee Cheol-woo of the ruling Saenuri Party said, noting a proper satellite usually weighs at least 800 to 1,500 kilograms. Lee said South Korea presumed that North Korea has introduced key parts of a long-range missile from Russia, though he provided no further details. The North's missile launch came a month after it carried out its fourth nuclear test. The U.N. Security Council has been working on a resolution for sanctions on the communist country.

36. North Korea Launches Rocket Seen as Cover for a Missile Test

The New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 02 07

Seoul - Defying warnings of tougher sanctions from Washington, North Korea launched a rocket on Sunday that Western experts believe is part of a program to develop intercontinental ballistic missile technologies. The rocket blasted off from Tongchang-ri, the North's main satellite launch site near its northwestern border with China, a spokesman for the South Korean Defense Ministry said. President Park Geun-hye of South Korea called an emergency meeting of top national security advisers on Sunday to address the launch, her office said. South Korea, the United States and Japan also requested an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council. In Washington, Secretary of State John Kerry called the launch a "major provocation, threatening not only the security of the Korean Peninsula, but that of the region and the United States as well." Susan E. Rice, the national security adviser, said it was "a flagrant violation of multiple United Nations Security Council resolutions."

38. MILF allays tension fears

Manila Bulletin, 2016 02 07

Bangsamoro - Amid fears of war in Mindanao after Congress failed to pass the proposed Bangsamoro law, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) yesterday assured the United Nations (UN) of its continuing engagement on peace. Mohagher Iqbal, chief negotiator of the MILF, met yesterday with UN Undersecretary General Adama Dieng in Manila and conveyed the Moro front's assurances that peace will be pursued in Mindanao even without the Bangsamoro Basic Law (BBL) being passed into law. Iqbal, also the chairman of the Bangsamoro Transition Commission (BTC), drafted the original BBL. In a statement received by the Manila Bulletin, he said the MILF "gave its assurance... that it would continue its engagement with all stakeholders including the international community in spite" of the BBL being denied passage by legislators of the 16th Congress. It can be recalled that President Aquino had committed to push the enactment of the BBL crafted to establish a Bangsamoro government to replace the inadequacies of the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM).

39. S. Korea, U.S. to start talks on advanced missile defense system deployment

Kyodo News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - South Korea and the United States reacted to North Korea's "provocative" long-range rocket launch Sunday by jointly announcing their agreement to begin formal talks on deploying an advanced U.S. antimissile defense system south of the inter-Korean border, prompting China to voice "deep concern." The two countries, in a statement, said they will begin "formal consultations...to bilaterally explore the feasibility of THAAD deploying to and operating on the Korean Peninsula at the earliest possible date." The reference was to the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense system, which is designed to intercept ballistic missiles flying at high altitudes in or outside the atmosphere. The statement said the move is "in response to the evolving threat posed by North Korea," including Sunday's rocket launch that utilized ballistic missile technology in violation of U.N. Security Council resolutions, as well as a nuclear test conducted on Jan. 6. Earlier Sunday, President Park Geun Hye condemned North Korea for going through with the launch, which she called an "unacceptable provocation." Presiding over an emergency session of the National Security Council, Park also called for adopting "strong sanctions" against the North at the U.N. Security Council, which has already been discussing tougher sanctions against Pyongyang over its latest nuclear test.

40. PM flags sea-borne terror, piracy as threat to maritime

Press Trust of India, 2016 02 07

Visakhapatnam - (PTI) Prime Minister Narendra Modi today flagged the threat of sea-borne terror and piracy as two key challenges to maritime security even as he pitched for respecting freedom of navigation against the backdrop of South China sea dispute. In an apparent reference to the audacious 26/11 Mumbai terror attack, Modi said, the threat of sea-borne terror, of which India has been a direct victim, continues to endanger regional and global peace and stability. He said piracy, too, remains a strong challenge against the backdrop of Somali pirates targeting merchant vessels, including those of India.

41. Security forces intensify counter-terror ops, neutralize 10 terrorists in two weeks

Asian News International, 2016 02 07

New Delhi - Undeterred by the inhospitable weather conditions, the Indian Army and the Jammu and Kashmir Police have upped the ante in their counter terrorist operations, neutralizing ten terrorists in two weeks. The result of the operations are clearly manifested in the clinical, intelligence based operations over the past two weeks that have resulted in the elimination of ten terrorists in all parts of Kashmir. Conscious efforts are being made to ensure no collateral damage during these encounters and it can be gauged from the fact that there has been no civilian casualty in any of these operations. The Army personnel have been careful in evacuating the occupants of the affected house and from other adjacent areas from the scene of action to ensure safety of the people.

42. Russian MoD Strikes Back at NATO's Accusations of Fueling Tensions in Syria

Sputnik News Service, 2016 02 07

Moscow - Defense Ministry spokesman Igor Konashenkov dismissed as 'stupid' a recent statement by NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg who said that Russia's air strikes in Syria targeting rebel forces were "undermining" efforts to find a non-military solution to the war, RIA Novosti news agency reported. "What we have seen is that the intense Russian air strikes mainly targeting opposition groups in Syria are undermining the efforts to find a political solution to the conflict," Stoltenberg said as he arrived for talks in Amsterdam with EU defense ministers. Maj. Gen. Igor Konashenkov said that it was the "NATO countries' reckless action, which plunged the Middle Eastern region into chaos," not the Russian military operation, that actually brought about the current crisis in Syria.

43. U.S. missile defense in South Korea to threaten Russia - Komoyedov

Interfax: Russia & CIS General Newswire, 2016 02 07

Moscow - The possible deployment of U.S. Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) in South Korea may threaten the security of Russia, State Duma Defense Committee Chairman Vladimir Komoyedov has said. "The U.S. promises to deploy a missile defense system in Korea are not a move in our favor. This is a threat to us, in particular, to our nuclear forces. It will not build our security," Komoyedov told Interfax on Sunday. The deployment of missile defense systems "is certainly different from building garden beds, this cannot be done by morning," he said. "This will not happen by morning, but they may build such systems as a matter of plan," the committee chairman said.

44. Fanning the Flames: US Think Tank Presents 'Russian Invasion' Scenario

Sputnik News Service, 2016 02 07

Moscow - Polish soldiers watch as US troops from the 5th Battalion of the 7th Air Defense Regiment emplace a launching station of the Patriot air and missile defence system at a test range in Sochaczew, Poland. American war planners continue to get themselves worked up with Russia's imaginary "threat," using the phantom menace to convince Washington and NATO to increase their already bloated defense budget. A Cold War-style RAND Corporation report suggests that Russian military forces could reach the outskirts of the Baltic capital cities of Tallinn and Riga in 60 hours. "Across multiple games using a wide range of expert participants playing both sides, the longest it has taken Russian forces to reach the outskirts of Tallinn and Riga is 60 hours," the study says.

45. La Libye, nouveau terrain de jeu du terrorisme

El Watan, Zine Cherfaoui, 2016 02 07

Tripoli - La Libye devient progressivement mais sûrement le nouvel épice de terrorisme mondial. Solidement implanté dans le pays, le groupe terroriste autoproclamé Etat islamique dicte sa loi moyenâgeuse dans plusieurs localités de l'ex-Jamahiriya et a pour projet d'élargir le califat d'Al Baghdadi à l'Afrique du Nord. Pour réaliser son entreprise funeste, Daech (acronyme en arabe d'Etat islamique) recrute actuellement des sanguinaires à tour de bras. Abou Ali Al Anbari, le nouveau chef de

Daech en Libye, privilégie néanmoins les vétérans des guerres d'Irak et de Syrie. Chassés par les Russes et les Occidentaux de leur «califat» en feu, ces derniers ont déjà accepté par centaines l'«hospitalité» de l'ancien major-général de l'armée irakienne. Cette «hijra» forcée a déjà permis à la filiale de Daech en Libye de multiplier, en l'espace de quelques mois, par deux le nombre de ses effectifs. Les services de renseignement américains évaluent à 5000 le nombre des éléments dont disposerait aujourd'hui ce groupe terroriste ultra-violent. Les précédentes estimations de la CIA tablaient jusque-là sur environ 2000 à 3000 terroristes. Et encore, il ne s'agit que des effectifs de Daech. Il ne faut pas oublier que dans d'autres régions de la Libye sont établis Aqmi et Ançar Al Charia, deux autres groupes terroristes disposant de plusieurs centaines d'hommes.

46. Le nombre de jeunes radicalisés a doublé en un an

El Watan, Yacine Farah, 2016 02 07

Alger - En plein débat sur la déchéance de la nationalité pour des binationaux ayant commis des actes terroristes, le ministère de l'Intérieur français a enfoncé le clou en publiant un rapport sur le nombre de personnes radicalisées en France et susceptibles de passer à l'action terroriste à tout moment. Ainsi, selon le décompte des services de sécurité français (police et gendarmerie), plus de 8000 personnes, dont la majorité de confession musulmane, ont été signalées comme radicalisées en France depuis début 2016. De son côté, le ministère français de l'Intérieur a indiqué que ce nombre a doublé en neuf mois. En mars 2015, le nombre de radicalisés était de 4000 personnes. Parmi les 8000 personnes radicalisées, plus de 1600 (soit 20%) sont des mineurs qui ont quitté leurs foyers familiaux en cachette et avec l'aide de recruteurs terroristes travaillant pour le compte du groupe Etat islamique (EI). Le nombre d'adolescents a dépassé les 700. Mais ce que le rapport a montré de nouveau, c'est le nombre de filles victimes du discours islamiste, voire terroriste. 860 filles sont recensées comme étant radicalisées et prêtes à se rendre en Syrie pour rejoindre le groupe Daech.

48. 1994: le chef de l'opération française au Rwanda entendu par un juge

Radio France Internationale, 2016 02 07

Paris - L'Agence France-Presse a révélé ce dimanche 7 février que le général Lafourcade, chef de l'opération militaire française Turquoise, déployée au Rwanda durant le génocide de 1994, a été entendu par un juge français au cours du mois de janvier 2016. Depuis 2005, suite à une plainte déposée par des rescapés et des associations, la justice enquête sur l'attitude de la France lors de ce génocide. De longue date, les militaires français sont accusés d'avoir laissé se dérouler, en toute connaissance de cause, des massacres de Tutsis pendant le génocide rwandais de 1994. Les soldats de l'opération Turquoise, eux, ont toujours nié. C'est en tant que témoin assisté que le général Lafourcade a répondu aux juges en janvier. Un statut intermédiaire entre celui de simple témoin et celui de mis en examen. Selon l'AFP, l'interrogatoire s'est déroulé en deux temps, entre le 12 et le 14 janvier, et a porté notamment sur le massacre de Bisesero, quatre journées au cours desquelles près de 3 000 Tutsis ont été méthodiquement massacrés dans l'est du Rwanda. L'armée française n'était pas intervenue. Or, depuis des années, plusieurs sources affirment que les militaires français étaient pourtant informés de ce qu'il se passait. Mais ils auraient sciemment laissé faire, alors que leur mission était précisément de mettre fin aux tueries.

49. Explosion dans un avion somalien: il s'agissait bien d'une bombe

Radio France Internationale, 2016 02 07

Mogadiscio - Le gouvernement somalien reconnaît que l'explosion, survenue mardi dernier dans un avion de ligne de la compagnie Daallo Airlines, était due à une bombe. L'appareil avait été contraint de faire un atterrissage d'urgence à Mogadiscio peu après son décollage. Quelque 74 passagers se trouvaient à bord. L'un d'eux avait été tué, et deux autres légèrement blessés. Dans un premier temps, les autorités avaient parlé d'un problème technique. Mardi, l'avion avait atterri en catastrophe à l'aéroport de Mogadiscio avec un trou béant d'un mètre de diamètre environ dans le fuselage, au-dessus des réacteurs de l'aile droite. Le pilote serbe de cet A321 avait rapidement parlé d'une déflagration due à une bombe. L'explosion n'avait pas endommagé le système de navigation, précisait-il, ce qui lui avait permis de ramener l'appareil. L'enquête confirme dorénavant qu'une bombe est bien la cause de l'explosion survenue mardi. Une bombe destinée à détruire l'appareil et tuer tous les passagers. C'est ce qu'a indiqué le ministre des Transports Ali Ahmed Jama, sur la base de l'enquête conduite par des experts somaliens et des enquêteurs de la police fédérale américaine (FBI). « Les forces de sécurité ont arrêté des personnes suspectées d'avoir été impliquées », ajoute-t-il.

50. Tunisia builds anti-terror barrier along Libya border

BBC News, 2016 02 07

Tunis - Tunisia says it has completed the first part of a 200km (125-mile) barrier along its border with Libya, designed to deter terrorism. The barrier is made of sand banks and water trenches. It was announced last summer after 38 people were killed on a beach by a gunman said to have trained in Libya. Tunisia's defence minister said the second phase of the project would involve installing electronic equipment with the help of Germany and the US. Security forces said the defences - which aim to make the border impassable by vehicles - had already helped to reduce smuggling. "Today we finished closing it off, and this will help us protect our border, and stop the threat," said Defence Minister Farhat Horchani on Saturday.

51. Iran Panel Reverses Disqualification of Election Candidates

The New York Times, Thomas Erdbrink, 2016 02 07

Tehran - An Iranian vetting committee on Saturday reversed a decision to disqualify more than 1,500 candidates who had registered to run in parliamentary elections scheduled for Feb. 26. It is unclear how many of the newly approved candidates are considered to be reformists, who are opposed by Iranian hard-liners. An election official told the state news media that the decisions were reversed after a new review of the candidates' qualifications and backgrounds. In Iran, all candidates must prove they fully support the Islamic republic and are devout Muslims. Iran's beleaguered reformist faction has tried to flood the vetting committee, known as the Guardian Council, with candidates, hoping that enough would slip through for their faction to win a majority in Parliament. But that remains a stiff challenge, even if many reformists were reinstated on Saturday. During a first round of vetting in December, reformist leaders said that out of the 3,000 candidates they put forth, the Guardian Council, which is made up of Shiite Muslim clerics and jurists, approved only 30.

52. General Staff of Armed Forces: Iran Superior, Influential Power in Region, World

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 07

Tehran - The General Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces in a statement underlined that the country has established superiority in the region and plays an influential role in global equations. "Despite hostile attempts in the past 37 years, the Islamic Republic of Iran has managed to put an end to the US hegemony and exceptionalism in the region. It has now turned itself into a superior regional power and an influential trans-regional player," the statement said on Sunday. The statement went on to add that Iran has made huge progress in different fields by sticking to its lofty principles and causes. As a consequence, the arrogant powers cannot stand the idea of a rising Iran. In relevant remarks in 2014, Iranian Parliament Speaker Ali Larijani had underlined the country's regional power and clout, and said even senior White House officials have been forced to acknowledge this reality. "The Islamic Republic of Iran enjoys such a high degree of power that it has now gained a geopolitical and geostrategic position," Larijani said.

53. Iran Confiscates ISIL-Bound Cargo of Guillotines

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 07

Tehran - The Iranian customs authorities have discovered and seized a cargo bound for the ISIL terrorist group, an official disclosed on Sunday. "Few days ago, we seized a cargo containing guillotines (an apparatus designed for efficiently carrying out executions by beheading) that was headed to the ISIL," Director-General of Iran's Customs Office for Transit Affairs Vahid Dashtbani told the Iranian Seday-e Eqtesad daily on Sunday. The Iranian security forces have in the past foiled many ISIL plots to create insecurity and tension within the country. Head of Iran's Cyber Police (FATA) Brigadier General Seyed Kamal Hadianfar had announced in December that 53 supporters of the ISIL terrorist group were identified and arrested in Iran in almost two years. "The FATA (Cyber) Police has identified 285 websites affiliated to those who supported the ISIL or promoted ISIL's thoughts in Iran in the past 20 months," Hadianfar told reporters in a press conference in Tehran. He said that 108 websites which supported the ISIL were run from outside Iran, adding that all these sites have been filtered and closed with the help of the Interpol.

54. Cross-border Yemeni shelling kills two in Saudi

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 07

Riyadh - A Saudi soldier and a civilian have been killed in cross-border shelling from rebel-controlled northern Yemen, authorities said late Saturday. A Saudi patrol was hit on Saturday morning in the southwestern region of Assir, killing the soldier, the interior ministry said in a statement carried by state news agency SPA. Later in the day, the southwestern city of Najran was struck, leaving dead a foreign resident, a civil defense spokesman said in a statement on SPA. About 90 civilians and soldiers have died from shelling and skirmishes along the border since March, when a Saudi-led military coalition began air and ground action in Yemen.

55. Red Cross in Gaza closes office due to violent protests

The Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Gaza - The International Committee of the Red Cross said Sunday it is temporarily closing its Gaza office after protesters repeatedly tried to storm it. Spokeswoman Suhair Zakkout said the office will operate remotely until "local authorities in Gaza provide assurances that our premises, work and staff are respected." Gaza is ruled by Hamas, an Islamic militant group that seized power there in 2007. Dozens of Gazans have protested daily at the office in recent weeks in solidarity with a Palestinian hunger striker detained by Israel, demanding that the Red Cross help bring about his release. They tried to enter the building forcefully on Sunday, smashing garage windows and causing other damage. Mohammed al-Qeq, a 33-year old journalist, has been on a hunger strike for 75 days.

56. Iraqi Kurds protest against Turkey, 3 police wounded

The Canadian Press, 2016 02 07

Irbil, Iraq - Protests against Turkey in Iraq's northern Kurdish region have turned violent, with three police officers wounded. Hundreds of protesters gathered Sunday outside the United Nations compound in the northern city of Irbil calling for an end to Turkish airstrikes against Kurdish militants. Local media reported that three police were wounded. Turkey began launching airstrikes in Iraq and Syria in July 2015 as part of the U.S.-led coalition's fight against the Islamic State group.

57. Turkey: Reaching limits but will keep taking in refugees

The Associated Press, Mehmet Guzel And Suzan Fraser, 2016 02 07

Kilis, Turkey - Turkey has reached the end of its "capacity to absorb" refugees but will continue to take them in, the deputy premier said Sunday, as his country faced mounting pressure to open its border to tens of thousands of Syrians who have fled a government onslaught. The United Arab Emirates meanwhile joined Saudi Arabia in saying that it was open to the idea of sending ground troops to Syria to battle the Islamic State group, raising the possibility of even greater foreign involvement in the five-year-old civil war. Turkish authorities say up to 35,000 Syrians have massed along the border, which remained closed for a third day on Sunday. The governor of the Turkish border province of Kilis said Saturday that Turkey would provide aid to the displaced within Syria, but would only open the gates in the event of an "extraordinary crisis." Deputy Prime Minister Numan Kurtulmus told CNN-Turk television that Turkey is now hosting a total of 3 million refugees, including 2.5 million Syrians.

58. Rassemblement anti-migrants à Calais: 5 comparutions immédiates lundi, dont un general

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 07

Lille - Cinq personnes, dont un général ancien patron de la légion étrangère, passeront en comparution immédiate lundi au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer, après leur interpellation samedi à Calais lors d'un rassemblement hostile aux migrants, a-t-on appris de source judiciaire dimanche. Le général Christian Piquemal, 75 ans, désigné comme ayant eu "le rôle principal" dans cette manifestation interdite, sera poursuivi pour "participation à un attroupement qui ne s'est pas dissout après sommation" et les quatre autres personnes pour "port illégal d'armes". Toujours en garde à vue, ils risquent une peine allant jusqu'à un an de prison ferme. Organisée à Calais à l'appel du mouvement islamophobe Pegida, la manifestation de samedi avait été interdite par les autorités et a été marquée par des échauffourées entre forces de l'ordre et manifestants, qui ont scandé des slogans tels que "on est chez nous!", "Etat dictateur" ou "migrants dehors".

59. Un général au tribunal après la manifestation islamophobe de Calais

Le Monde.fr, 2016 02 07

Paris - Cinq personnes, dont le général Christian Piquemal, 75 ans, comparaîtront lundi au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer après le rassemblement interdit de Pegida samedi. Cinq personnes, dont le général Christian Piquemal, ancien patron de la Légion étrangère, passeront en comparution immédiate lundi 8 février au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer, à la suite de leur interpellation samedi à Calais lors d'un rassemblement hostile aux migrants. Le général Christian Piquemal désigné comme ayant eu «le rôle principal» dans cette manifestation interdite, sera poursuivi pour «participation à un attroupement qui ne s'est pas dissout après sommation». «On sait bien que la manifestation a été interdite et que l'autorité de l'Etat a été défiée. Le général n'est pas venu à Calais pour faire de la figuration», a affirmé le procureur de Boulogne-sur-Mer, Jean-Pierre Valensi.

60. 20 arrests as tensions rise at Amsterdam Pegida rally

Dutch News, 2016 02 07

Amsterdam - Battalions of riot police kept a protest organised by anti-Islam organisation Pegida at a standstill in Amsterdam on Saturday afternoon, as tension mounted between Pegida supporters and anti-fascist groups. In total, some 20 people were arrested, all of whom were released by Sunday morning. The gathering coincided with similar protests organised by Pegida in several European cities on Saturday, including Dublin, London, and Prague. The rally, originally planned to occur on a square in front of the city hall at Waterlooplein, was moved after police found a suspected explosive device at the original location. Fireworks According to a police press release, the device turned out to be a packet of fireworks. Police believe the 'device' was planted by counter-protestors to draw police attention and disrupt the protest. The 100 or so Pegida supporters who turned up were corralled by police onto a nearby bridge and remained there until buses chartered from the local transport authority showed up to move them out of the city centre.

61. Spanish police arrest terror suspects with alleged jihadist links

Deutsche Welle, 2016 02 07

Madrid - Spanish police on Sunday arrested at least six suspects that they say are linked to al Qaeda and "Islamic State" jihadists. The investigation is ongoing, but Sunday's raids were the culmination of a probe that began in 2014. Police say they have evidence that those arrested provided "logistical support that was essential for the maintenance of terror activities" in Syria and Iraq. "Four of those arrested are Spanish nationals of Syrian, Jordanian and Moroccan origin," according to a police statement. One Syrian and one Moroccan suspect were also taken into custody. There were reports of a seventh arrest, but details of the suspect's background were not immediately clear.

1. Liberals back CSIS in torture lawsuit

The Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - The Liberal government has taken up the former Conservative government's legal fight against an apology and compensation for three Canadians tortured in the Middle East, despite voting in favour of the former detainees' cause while they sat in opposition. As well, in aggressively defending the actions of CSIS and trying to prevent the release of thousands of unredacted documents that a judge is now poring over, the Liberals are going further than their Conservative predecessors did to protect CSIS sources. Lawyers for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's Liberal government are seeking retroactive blanket anonymity for spies and their sources and have filed an appeal in a civil lawsuit launched by the three men with that goal in mind. A Conservative bill last year, C-44, which enacted source protection, was not made retroactive. Put together, the two moves have stunned a team of lawyers at Toronto's Stockwoods firm that took up the cause of Abdullah Almalki, Muayyed Nureddin and Ahmad El Maati, as well as others who closely follow developments in security law.

2. Most Canadians disagree with Trudeau's plan to withdraw CF-18s, poll suggests

CBC News, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - A new poll suggests that majority of Canadians disagree with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's pledge to withdraw Canada's CF-18 fighter jets by the end of March from the U.S.-led bombing mission against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. When asked what Canada's role should be in the fight against ISIS, only 27 per cent told the Angus Reid Institute that they were on the same page as Trudeau in wanting to stop Canada's bombing mission and focus only on training local troops in Iraq and Syria. Meanwhile, 11 per cent of respondents wanted to stop Canada's involvement in the fight against ISIS altogether. The majority of Canadians disagreed with the prime minister, with 37 per cent saying the Liberal government should continue the current level of bombing and training provided by Canada, while 26 per cent wanted the levels increased. Even though the withdrawal of CF-18s was a key issue during Trudeau's election campaign last year, slightly more past Liberal voters were in support of maintaining the current level of Canada's involvement than were in support of withdrawing Canada's fighter jets, at 37 per cent and 34 per cent respectively.

3. Pakistan's forgotten war in Balochistan

The Toronto Sun, Tarek Fatah, 2016 02 07

Column: Last Saturday, I woke up to a phone call from a refugee who recently escaped death in Pakistan and now lives in Toronto. Skipping the usual pleasantries, his voice quivering with anger, lateef Johar told me: "They've killed Dr. Manan and his son." "They", being the Pakistan army that has occupied Balochistan since it invaded the independent state of kalat in March, 1948. Dr. Manan Baloch was a physician politician who was the secretary general of the outlawed Baloch National Movement (BNM), a political party that calls for a free homeland for the Baloch people and the end of the Pakistani occupation. He was widely known for his work in helping war refugees in Balochistan. Pakistan's government, however, described Baloch and his associates as terrorists, called their deaths a "major breakthrough" in its war against terrorism in Balochistan and said all five men were killed in a gunfight with security forces.

4. Des centaines de citoyens manifestent leur solidarité

Le Soleil, David Rémillard, 2016 02 07

Ottawa - Leurs morts ont été soudaines. Les blessures, elles, prendront encore du temps à guérir. Les familles des six victimes québécoises de l'attentat terroriste survenu le 15 janvier au Burkina Faso ont poursuivi le long processus de deuil, samedi, portant leurs proches à leur dernier repos. Tel que l'avaient souhaité les familles, les funérailles d'Yves Carrier, de son fils Charlelie et de sa fille Maude, de sa conjointe Gladys Chamberland et de leur ami Louis Chabot ont été célébrées dans la même église, celle du Très-Saint-Sacrement, samedi après-midi. Les obsèques de Suzanne Bernier ont été tenues en matinée, en privé, à l'église Saint-Thomas-d'Aquin, également à Québec. Honorant la mémoire du patriarche, qui l'aurait sans doute voulu ainsi, les Carrier ont laissé le public assister aux hommages. «La porte de mon père [Yves Carrier] était toujours ouverte», a souvent répété son fils, Frédéric Carrier. Des centaines de citoyens ont répondu à l'appel, si bien que l'église était pleine à craquer avant même le début de la cérémonie, prévu à 14h30. Au total, plus de 1000 personnes se sont présentées, dont certaines ont dû rebrousser chemin, faute d'espace. À l'intérieur, dans l'attente du début des funérailles, des images des disparus défilaient sur les écrans. Devant l'autel, quatre urnes et un cercueil, des lampions ainsi qu'une photo de chaque coopérant décédé le 15 janvier.

5. How Canada can step up

Toronto Star, 2016 02 07

Editorial: The crisis in Syria worsens by the day. The civil war rages on, peace talks are faltering, Islamic State jihadists terrorize much of the country, cities lie in ruins, millions of Syrians have fled into exile, and aid is in short supply. As United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon put it, it's "as close to hell as we are likely to find on this Earth." Faced with a tragedy on this scale, there's only so much the world can do to help. Even so, it's good to see Prime Minister Justin Trudeau drawing up a more ambitious, better-integrated plan to address this calamity as the UN chief prepares to visit Ottawa next week to discuss Syria and Iraq, refugees and other issues. As Trudeau says, "Canada can play a positive role in pushing for peace and stability" that goes well beyond bombing jihadists. More than anything, the war needs to be brought to a close. Peace talks and ceasefires are critical. Until then, millions will need food, shelter, medical care and schooling. Airstrikes against the jihadists, however necessary, are just part of the mix. Forceful diplomacy, robust aid and building up local forces complete the bigger picture. To Syrians who bear the agony of this conflict, Canada's most useful contribution to date has been our generous aid and resettlement policy. Largely on Stephen Harper's watch we've provided nearly $1 billion in humanitarian, development and security assistance since the start of the conflict five years ago, $650 million of it in aid alone. Moreover, the Trudeau government is now resettling 25,000 or more Syrian refugees here. We've already taken in almost as many Iraqis.

6. Des vidéos arabophobes

Journal De Montreal, Dominique Scali, 2016 02 07

Montréal - Craignant pour la sécurité des enfants, une école primaire de Montréal a fait appel à la police après la diffusion de vidéos arabophobes la visant sur les réseaux sociaux, a appris Le Journal. «Ils sont obligés d'apprendre l'arabe à l'école.» Voilà le genre d'affirmations farfelues dont regorge une vidéo «coup de gueule» qui, mise en ligne le 26 janvier dernier, a été visionnée plus de 180 000 fois en moins de 24 heures. Son auteur, François Chapat, y apparaît en gros plan en train de critiquer l'école publique Victor-Lavigne de Saint-Léonard. «Dans la cour d'école, la gardienne porte une burqa, [...] À tous les breaks, ce n'est que de l'arabe et aucun [...] mot en français», dénonce avec véhémence M. Chapat, un membre du groupe anti-islam Pegida Québec. «C'est à la limite du crime haineux. Rien n'est vrai dans cette vidéo», estime Herman Deparice-Okomba, le directeur du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation. Quelques heures plus tard, M. Chaput a publié une seconde vidéo. «Si vous n'êtes pas contents, appelez à l'école», encourage-t-il.

7. Lying legacy of terrorist Inderjit Singh Reyat Postmedia News, Mark Bonokoski, 2016 02 07

Opinion: It was another February day, this time back in 1988, and I was the only journalist at London's historic Bow Street Magistrates Court as a bearded man in a dark turban was led into the prisoners' dock. The British media cared not a whit then about the arrest of Inderjit Singh Reyat, and was more interested in what was happening in another courtroom where a Scandinavian ex-pat was being arraigned on spy charges. Little did they know that Sikh in the puffy ski jacket in the courtroom next door would end up being the only person ever convicted in relation to the bombing of Air India Flight 182 over the coast of Ireland three years earlier, and the murder of all 329 souls aboard. Even today it seems unbelievable that a crime so heinous would be so easy to escape. It remains, for those too young to remember, as Canada's worst-ever mass murder and, until the catastrophic events of 9/11, it was the deadliest terrorist attack the world had seen. To think that Reyat is today spending his second week in a Vancouver halfway house on his way to permanent release from custody is still difficult to fathom. He, after all, was the bomb maker. And he has never exhibited a speck of remorse.

8. No-fly list hurts innocent bystanders Victoria Times Colonist, Marc And Craig Kielburger, 2016 02 07

Opinion: Don't ask Syed Adam Ahmed about the airport. Normally shy but amiable, the six-year-old growls in frustration while his face clouds over like an oncoming hurricane. The little hockey fan from Markham, Ont., is still extremely upset that he almost missed out on attending an NHL game in the U.S. because his name is the same of a person on Canada's so-called no-fly list, which prevents individuals with suspected ties to terror from boarding planes. This case of mistaken identity has plagued the family since Adam was a toddler, according to his mother, Khadija Cajee. "We don't want him to grow up feeling like he's under suspicion for the rest of his life," says Cajee. "We feel like second-class citizens because of this." Since the Ahmed family went public with their story, 21 others have spoken up to say that they, too, have children wrongly identified by the no-fly list. Cajee knows of at least 20 more families who remain silent for fear of government, or public, reprisal. All have experienced security hassles and delays at Canadian airports, and some have even missed flights. The problem is beyond the control of airlines, our sources tell us. Once a name is flagged, airport counter staff are locked out of the system until they call a government agency to have the block lifted. However, Minister of Public Safety Ralph Goodale recently told CBC Radio he can't even say whether the no-fly list has ever actually prevented a real terror suspect from travelling.

8. Canada lifts some Iran sanctions Jewish Telegraphic Agency, 2016 02 07

Toronto - Canada's new Liberal government announced it is lifting some economic sanctions against Iran. Stephane Dion, Canada's minister of foreign affairs, announced Friday that Ottawa will be ending a number of sanctions against Iran, including a ban on financial services and imports and exports. In a statement, the government said all applications for export permits would be considered on a case-by-case basis. "We'll engage with Iran step-by-step, (with) open eyes, because we still have a lot of concerns about the role of Iran in the region," Dion said in Ottawa. Dion added that Canada is considering restoring diplomatic contacts with Iran, which were severed by the previous Conservative government in 2012. Dion said Canada was wrong to cut ties with Iran. "We should have been part of it, to engage Iran, with sanctions, but with diplomacy at the same time," he told reporters.

9. The Liberals all-new ISIS mission: More troops, more risk?

iPolitics.ca, L. Ian MacDonald, 2016 01 07

Opinion: If a government is looking for a full suite of policy options, there's no better place to shop in Ottawa than the Department of National Defence. The Trudeau government's imminent reconfiguring of the mission against ISIS is a case in point. The Liberals are poised to do both more and less at the same time. Only DND could offer such a diversified menu of policy choices. The re-profiled mission is expected to be announced Monday or Tuesday ahead of a NATO defence ministers' meeting in Brussels. Justin Trudeau will not (to use his own words) "whip out our CF-18s" and "wave them around". Instead, he is expected to recall the squadron of six fighter jets from the Middle East, probably when parliamentary approval for the current mission expires at the end of March. So this is one thing that President Barack Obama won't be asking Trudeau about during his working visit and state dinner at the White House next month, since Trudeau is taking an extended CF-18 deployment off the table. If ever there was a campaign promise made to be broken, it's Trudeau's pledge to recall the CF-18s from the ISIS mission. It's not as if there's any great groundswell of voices across the land demanding their return. (Note: L. 10. Released From Guantánamo, but in Legal Limbo in Morocco

The New York Times, Charlie Savage & Aida Alami, 2016 02 07

Washington - Younis Shokuri, a Moroccan detainee at the Guantánamo Bay prison, said he feared being repatriated to his native country. But the Moroccan government told the United States that it would probably release him without charges 72 hours after any transfer. So last September, Mr. Shokuri went home -- reluctantly, but voluntarily. But despite its assurances, Morocco has kept Mr. Shokuri in custody and is weighing criminal charges, apparently focused on allegations that he was involved with a Moroccan terrorist group before his capture in Afghanistan in late 2001. Mr. Shokuri's lawyers have demanded that the Obama administration press Morocco to live up to what they thought was a deal. Both governments have said little to explain the discrepancy. Several officials familiar with behind-the-scenes legal and diplomatic discussions are now shedding light on the murky episode. Beyond its importance for Mr. Shokuri, his situation illustrates how difficult -- and messy -- it can be to winnow down the ranks of detainees viewed as posing a lower-level security risk at the Guantánamo prison, which the Obama administration still wants to close in its final year in office. Of the 91 remaining detainees, 34 are recommended for transfer, and a parole-like review group has been adding names to the list. Each man presents a problem: The government has to find a place that is willing to take him and that can be trusted to keep an eye on him without abusing him.

11. British Spies May Soon Be Able To Get Data Straight From American Companies

Motherboard Blog, Joshua Kopstein, 2016 02 07

Analysis: British police and intelligence agencies might soon be able to get private data by going straight to the doorsteps of American companies like Google and Facebook, if a new bilateral deal between the two countries goes through. The US and UK already have extensive intelligence-sharing arrangements as members of the globe-spanning Five Eyes spying alliance. But this new surveillance pact, which is being negotiated in secret, would give British spies an unprecedented level of access to American companies, allowing them to set up wiretaps and serve "production orders" directly on corporate servers located on American soil. "Last time they did this, we assembled the Minutemen," NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden tweeted, referring to the specialized militias that fought for the colonies in the Revolutionary War. The wiretaps and search orders would need to be accompanied by a warrant, but, unlike in the US judicial system, they wouldn't require a judge's signature or finding of probable cause. British spies also wouldn't be allowed to access communications and data belonging to American citizens—although that claim is always questionable considering the various loopholes that allow the NSA and GCHQ to retain “incidentally” collected information.

12. Congress Starts to Get Serious About Online Privacy

The New York Times, 2016 02 07

Editorial: Congress could soon vote on a bill that would require law enforcement agencies to get a search warrant from a judge to obtain emails, photographs and other documents Americans have stored online. This important legislation would update the law to reflect how people use the Internet today. Under the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986, government agents need a warrant if they want access to email stored on the servers of companies like Google and Yahoo, but only if the messages are less than 180 days old. For older messages and other digital files, law enforcement officials can issue subpoenas to technology companies without going to a judge. A bill introduced in the House by Kevin Yoder, Republican of Kansas, would require a warrant for all information stored online, regardless of how old it is and what kind of file it is. The legislation includes a sensible exception that would allow civil enforcement agencies like the Securities and Exchange Commission to subpoena messages sent by employees on a corporate computer system. The bill has more than 300 co-sponsors, a good sign that it would pass easily in the House. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Bob Goodlatte, Republican of Virginia, said last week that his committee would consider the bill in March. In the Senate, Mike Lee, Republican of Utah, and Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, have introduced a similar bill that has bipartisan support from 24 other senators.

13. I'm a Muslim, not a terrorist. So why did the NYPD spy on me for years?

The Washington Post, Mohammad Elshinawy, 2016 02 07

Comment: A couple of weeks after I began lecturing on Islam at New York City mosques, something strange happened. Acquaintances and congregants told me they'd been approached by law enforcement officers who asked about me and my talks. Soon after, I began to notice suspicious people in the audiences. One gentleman stood out - he was the most frequent attendee, but he regularly fell asleep while I spoke. It was 2003. I was enrolled at Brooklyn College, studying English literature. I'd grown up in New York and loved the city. But I'd also seen the way Muslims were discriminated against, particularly after Sept. 11, 2001. In the year after the attacks, hate crimes spiked tenfold. I wanted to encourage Muslims to stay strong in their faith in spite of these assaults. I wasn't doing anything wrong. I consistently rejected violence and terrorism in my lectures. Still, for a decade, I felt like I was under surveillance, pursued by shadowy law enforcement officials seeking out a crime that didn't exist. In 2013, my fears were confirmed. I found out from an Associated Press investigation that I was a victim of the New York Police Department's aggressive surveillance of Muslims. After 9/11, the NYPD began to track large swaths of us. Officers secretly labeled entire mosques as terrorist organizations, then spied on imams and recorded sermons. The department conducted at least a dozen of these "terrorism enterprise investigations" between 2001 and 2013, often without specific evidence of criminal wrongdoing and minimal oversight from judges. No charges were ever brought in these cases. (Note: This author lectures regularly on Islam and contributes to MuslimMatters.org. He is one of the plaintiffs in Raza v. City of New York)

14. Marco Rubio downplays Muslim discrimination, as do many Republicans

Washington Post.com, Philip Bump, 2016 02 07

Washington - Following President Obama's visit to a Baltimore mosque this week, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) criticized the move. "Look at today — he gave a speech at a mosque," Rubio said Wednesday. "Oh, you know, basically implying that America is discriminating against Muslims. Of course, there's going to be discrimination in America of every kind. But the bigger issue is radical Islam. And by the way, radical Islam poses a threat to Muslims themselves." That reply became a question at the Republican debate on Saturday. "You said of President Obama, quote, 'He's always pitting people against each other,' " ABC moderator David Muir asked, noting that President George W. Bush had similarly visited a mosque. "So I'm curious," Muir continued, "how are the two visits different, and would you visit a mosque as president?" "I would," Rubio replied. "But that's not — my problem with what he did is he continues to put out this fiction that there's widespread systematic discrimination against Muslim Americans."

15. Guantanamo detainees are still dangerous

The Washington Post, Gordon England, 2016 02 07

Comment: Defense Secretary Ashton Carter faces a profound dilemma. He leads the department that has jurisdiction over the facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, that detains Islamic militants. At the same time, his boss, President Obama, is determined to close Guantanamo to fulfill a campaign promise he made eight years ago. In fact, the president's single-minded focus on closing Guantanamo in the waning months of his administration - as illustrated by the recent release of 10 dangerous detainees, with the promise of more releases to come - is endangering American lives as well as those of our friends and allies. This I believe - and know firsthand - based on my experience during my last five years with the George W. Bush administration while serving as the senior government official responsible for the decision to transfer or release enemy combatants from Guantanamo. Contrary to what some may believe, Bush had no desire to hold any person at Guantanamo who did not absolutely need to be there. The guidance I received was to first determine through careful vetting which detainees posed less risk and then decide whether transfer or even release was appropriate - the opposite of the Obama White House's approach. The process involved input from many federal agencies and defense organizations, military and civilian. I personally read the dossiers and each organization's recommendation - many of which were in conflict - before making a final decision. Obviously, a recidivism rate of zero is unattainable. Seeking the right balance was an agonizing task that often had to be conducted on the basis of incomplete information. (Note: The writer was deputy U.S. secretary of defense from 2006 to 2009.)

16. Pegida's 'costly hate rallies' have no place in Birmingham, says MP

The Guardian.co.uk, 2016 02 07

London - "Costly hate rallies" have no place in Birmingham, MP Jess Phillips has said, after the founder of the anti-Islam group Pegida UK pledged to stage a protest in the city on the first Saturday of every month. Approximately 200 demonstrators gathered for the inaugural Pegida rally at Birmingham International rail station on Saturday - half as many as police expected. Dozens of riot police kept the Pegida supporters away from 60 anti-fascist activists who turned up to oppose the group's message. West Midlands police said they made one arrest for a public order offence at the counter demonstration. Tommy Robinson, former spokesman and leader of the English Defence League and founder of Pegida UK, announced that the group would stage further demonstrations in Birmingham on the first Saturday of every month starting in April.

17. Ex-MI5 officer to reveal torture at Guantanamo

The Sunday Times, Sean Rayment, 2016 02 07

London - The security service MI5 has agreed to allow a former intelligence officer to give evidence to a parliamentary committee and to reveal that the agency knew detainees were being tortured at Guantanamo Bay. The former spy will tell members of the Commons intelligence and security committee (ISC) that MI5 officers witnessed inmates being abused at the US military facility in Cuba on at least two occasions in 2002. The former high-ranking officer will provide MPs with precise dates and will name those who saw inmates, including Britons, being abused at Camp X-Ray and Camp Delta — two of the Guantanamo prisons. Britain's top security officers gave the go ahead last week after deliberating over a decision for more than 10 days. One intelligence source said MI5 was forced to grant permission to the former spy after details of his request to give evidence to the committee were revealed by The Sunday Times.

18. Terror suspects challenge control orders

The Sunday Telegraph, Robert Verkaik, 2016 02 07

London – The Government's power to control the movements of terrorists living in the UK is to be challenged in a secret court case brought by two men who have served jail terms for terrorist offences. The two are the only terror suspects subject to Terrorist Prevention and Investigation Measures (TPIMs), a key weapon used by the security services against individuals who pose a threat to national security. If they win their case, which is being funded by the taxpayer, it will mean that for first time since the controversial measures were introduced 10 years ago, no terrorist is subject to the control regime. TPIMs, which replaced control orders, permit strict curfews and prohibit meeting named individuals and using mobile phones and the internet. Suspects usually must wear electronic tags and report regularly to police stations. The legal measures are used by the security services to control the threat posed by dangerous extremists, and each order must be signed off by the Home Secretary.

19. Another Islamic State jailer who held Western hostages identified as Londoner

Washington Post, Adam Goldman & Souad Mekhennet, 2016 02 07

Washington - A member of a British cohort within the Islamic State that oversaw the brutal detention and beheading of Western hostages in Syria has been identified as Alexanda Kotey, a 32-year-old convert to Islam who grew up in West London. Kotey is the second militant among the group of Islamic State jailers to be named following the unmasking last year by The Washington Post of "Jihadi John" as Mohammed Emwazi — the infamous masked man, also a West Londoner, who beheaded American, British and Japanese hostages on video as he taunted Western leaders. Emwazi, 27, was killed in a drone strike in November in Raqqa, the Islamic State's de facto capital in Syria, along with another unidentified man. It is unclear whether that second man was also one of the four guards who watched over and tortured Western hostages and were nicknamed the "Beatles" by their prisoners because of their English accents.

20. UK ghost ships with enough nuclear fuel for 80 missiles

Mail on Sunday, Mark Nicol, 2016 02 07

London - Two top secret British 'ghost ships' carrying enough plutonium for a huge nuclear arsenal wend their way through the world's oceans -guarded against terrorists by 50 commandos. It may sound like a tantalising target for a villain in a James Bond film, but what is potentially the most dangerous secret mission in history is deadly reality. Two vast container ships - the Pacific Heron and the Pacific Egret - left Barrow-in-Furness, Cumbria, last month on the first leg of their incredible journey. Their mission is to sail to Japan to collect 331kg of plutonium - enough to make 80 nuclear warheads - which was leased by the UK to a Japanese research facility. The ships are almost certainly shadowed by a Royal Navy submarine and surface vessels and are heavily armed with 20mm cannon. They are sailing across the Atlantic before passing through the Panama Canal and into the Pacific on their way to Japan.

21. Islamic State support, recruitment on the wane

Canberra Times, Rachel Olding and Natalie O'Brien, 2016 02 07

Canberra - The death of IS recruiters like Neil Prakash has contributed to the fall in numbers of foreign fighters heading to the Middle East. The number of suspected would-be jihadis pulled off flights leaving Australia has doubled in the past year, as Islamic State recruiters direct foreign fighters away from Syria to other battlefronts, including Libya. At the same time experts believe there has been a decline in the numbers of foreign fighters reaching foreign soil to join IS. Department of Immigration figures obtained exclusively by Fairfax Media show that 312 people had been pulled off planes in the past seven months to February - almost matching the 336 passengers pulled off flights in the previous 12 months. The data does not reflect how many people were found to be suspected foreign fighters or those who were not. A spokeswoman for the department said that in some cases, the person may be allowed to continue their travel plans if they're no longer considered a risk after "intervention activity". The federal government has also cancelled 145 passports of suspected jihadists attempting to travel to conflict zones, suspended 26 passports and refused applications for a further 22 in the past financial year.

22. 'Terror' pair held

The New Zealand Herald, 2016 02 07

Australia - A Sydney teenager who allegedly boasted of wanting to do "an Islamic Bonnie and Clyde" has been refused bail. Alo-Bridget Namoa, 18, appeared at Parramatta Local Court via video link yesterday facing 31 charges of refusing to answer questions at a Crime Commission hearing. The court heard Namoa had refused to answer several questions about her alleged support for Isis and suspected plans to commit terrorist acts alongside her husband. Prosecutors said Namoa, from Sydney's west, was allegedly earlier caught with a knife wrapped in an Islamic flag and had graphic images of beheadings, explosions and executions stored on her mobile phone. The court heard she was hauled before the Crime Commission on Friday but failed to answer dozens of questions such as "Why were you and your husband downloading Isis propaganda?" and "Did your husband discuss plans to conduct an attack?" Other questions included, "What do you mean by 'I want to do an Islamic Bonnie and Clyde on the kaffir'?" and "Were you planning to sacrifice your life alongside your husband?"

23. No of jihadis pulled off planes 'doubles'

Australian Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Sydney - The number of suspected jihadis pulled off flights from Australia has reportedly doubled in the past seven months. Department of Immigration figures show that 312 passengers suspected of going to join jihadist groups like Islamic State were pulled off planes in the seven months to February, compared to 336 in the previous 12 months, according to Fairfax Media. The data does not take into account those who were later deemed not to be a risk and allowed to continue on their journeys.

24. Qld ready, able to help asylum seekers

Australian Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Brisbane - Queensland Premier Annastacia Palaszczuk has joined calls urging the prime minister not to send Australian-born asylum-seeker children back to offshore detention centres. It comes after Victorian Premier Daniel Andrews wrote to Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull offering to settle Australian-born asylum-seeker children and their families in the state. "Queensland stands willing and able to help those families that are currently here," Ms Palaszczuk said on Sunday. The premier said she had met people who had spent time in offshore detention as children who carried their experiences with them for life. "I don't think Queenslanders want to see children in that situation," she said. "Where is the humanity? Where is the compassion from the federal government?" She pledged to call the prime minister to talk to him about the effects of offshore detention on children, adding: "It's about time we put politics to one side."

25. Asian terror: The new front line

The Australian, Stephen Brook, 2016 02 07

Analysis: In the war on terror, sometimes you get a break. One month ago, on an otherwise normal Thursday morning in Jakarta, Indonesian authorities benefited from one such stroke of good fortune. Asian terror: The new front line. At 10.40am a team of jihadists claiming allegiance to Islamic State stormed a police traffic post at the intersection of Jalan Kyai Haji Wahid Hasyim and Jalan MH Thamrin, one of Jakarta's busiest. Armed with guns, explosives and suicide vests, the attackers set about massacring as many people as they could. They aimed to replicate last November's Paris attacks, which killed 130 people, transforming the western conversation on terror, refugees and the war in Syria. The terrorists laid siege to a neighbouring Starbucks cafe, gutting it with at least six bomb blasts. Ferocious gunbattles raged for hours. But at the end of the day just eight people lay dead. And four of those slain were attackers. In subsequent weeks, police arrested other alleged conspirators as they rolled up the network they say is responsible for Islamic State's first strike in Indonesia. That such a large-scale attack in a city as thronged and shambolic as Jakarta resulted in so few -casualties was down to the monumental incompetence of the -attackers. If there is an upside to this new era of DIY terrorism, it is that amateur terrorists often deliver amateur results. In Canberra, the attack surprised no one. Australian authorities had no forewarning Jakarta was about to be hit. But for months Australia's intelligence community had watched with growing -unease as the temperature across the region started rising.

26. Taliban's intelligence chief, deputy kidnapped in Quetta

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 02 07

Quetta - Taliban intelligence chief and his deputy have been separately kidnapped by unknown gunmen in Pakistan's Balochistan province, sources in the insurgency said on Sunday. A source close to the Taliban told Pajhwok Afghan News that Taliban intelligence chief Mullah Mohammadzai and his deputy Mullah Mohammad Eisa had been kidnapped from surrounding areas of Quetta last week. He said first Mohammadzai was kidnapped by masked gunmen in Kachlak area from his car and moved to an unknown location. The source believed the intelligence chief might have been kidnapped by security forces. Two days after Mohammadzai's abduction, his deputy Mullah Mohammad Eisa Akhund was kidnapped from Quetta's Ghausabad area. Sources close to Taliban in Quetta said Mullah Mohammadzai had recently returned from Afghanistan where he had been overseeing clashes between Taliban, Islamic State fighters and supporters of slain former Taliban commander Mullah Dadullah Mansoor.

27. Taliban urged to join peace talks by end of February

Pajhwok Afghan News, Javed Hamim Kakar, 2016 02 07

Kabul - The third round of four-nation talks on Afghanistan reconciliation in Islamabad concluded with a call for direct negotiations between the Kabul administration and the Taliban by the end of February. Without providing further details, a joint statement at the end of the meeting said a roadmap for peace had been agreed upon. Though not present at the meeting, the Taliban were urged to join the peace process. The four-nation group agreed to hold a fourth meeting in Kabul on Feb. 23. Pakistan Foreign Secretary

Aizaz Ahmad Chaudhry hosted the meeting. Other delegations were led by Afghan Deputy Foreign Minister Hekmat Khalil Karzai, US Special Representative for Afghanistan and Pakistan Ambassador Richard G. Olson and China's Special Envoy for Afghanistan Ambassador Deng Xijun.

28. Judges among 8 injured in Logar bomb attack

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 02 07

Pul-i-alam - Four judges and as many civilians were injured in a remote-controlled bomb attack on their vehicle in Pul-i-Alam, the capital of central Logar province on Sunday morning. The bombing, killing a policeman, took place at around 9am when the bomb attached to a cycle went off near the judges' vehicle in the Pul-i-Alam, Governor Haleem Fidaee told Pajhwok Afghan News. Appellant court chief Haqiq-ur-Rahman Haqmal, urban court head Abdul Basit, appellant court's criminal branch head Mohammad Omar Haidari and another judicial official sustained injuries in the blast. Four civilians were also wounded and a policeman killed in the attack, according to the governor, who saw land-grabbers behind the attack. The injured were rushed to the Kabul Emergency Hospital for treatment.

29. Army seeks funds from finance ministry to raise new security division

The Pakistan Dawn, Mateen Haider, 2016 02 07

Islamabad - Pakistan Army has sought additional funds from the finance ministry to raise a new security division and an additional 28 security battalions, it emerged on Sunday. A statement released by the ministry of finance said senior officials from the army had a meeting with Finance Minister Ishaq Dar at his ministry in Islamabad, where the demand for "financing and the release of funds" was made by military officials. The statement quoted Dar as saying that the "government attaches the highest importance to security matters" and assured the "provision of funds for the new security division and additional battalions." Pakistan Army is currently spearheading a war against terrorism in Pakistan's northern tribal areas bordering Afghanistan, where terrorists from militant organisations are believed to have taken refuge. In June 2014, the army launched a comprehensive military operation – Zarb-i-Azb – against Taliban militants threatening the writ of the state by launching brazen attacks on government and military installations.

30. Kunduz Residents Live in Fear of Taliban's Return

The New York Times, Najim Rahim, 2016 02 07

Kunduz, Afghanistan -- Farhad Azyanfar, a student of Dari literature at the university in Kunduz, watched in fear as a few hundred Taliban fighters overran and defeated a larger but demoralized government force to capture this northern city in September. He was relieved several weeks later when the insurgents left the city after a combined American and Afghan counterattack, but the feeling was short-lived: He and many other residents fear the Taliban will be back soon. "You can see the white flags of the Taliban along the road as soon as you step out of Kunduz City," said Mr. Azyanfar, 20, who travels back to his district outside the provincial capital several times a week. The area controlled by the government extends "only to the buildings in which they are based," he said. "As soon as you step outside, it is totally a different picture: The Taliban's presence and influence are much larger than the government's." It has been more than four months since the Afghan forces crumbled as Taliban fighters overran Kunduz. But there has been no improvement in the conditions that made the two-week Taliban takeover of the city possible. Disillusionment with the government has only gotten worse; the Afghan forces are still overstretched and demoralized; and the Taliban still control much of the outlying areas and roads.

31. Pakistan's Hand in the Rise of International Jihad

The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, 2016 02 07

Tunis – President Ashraf Ghani of Afghanistan has warned in several recent interviews that unless peace talks with Pakistan and the Taliban produce results in the next few months, his country may not survive 2016. Afghanistan is barely standing, he says, after the Taliban onslaught last year, which led to the highest casualties among civilians and security forces since 2001. "How much worse will it get?" Mr. Ghani asked in a recent television interview. "It depends on how much regional cooperation we can secure, and how much international mediation and pressure can be exerted to create rules of the game between states." What he means is it depends on how much international pressure can be brought to bear on Pakistan to cease its aggression. Critics of the Afghan leadership say it's not Pakistan's fault that its neighbor is falling apart. They point to the many internal failings of the Afghan government: political divisions, weak institutions, warlords and corruption. But experts have found a lot of evidence that Pakistan facilitated the Taliban offensive. The United States and China have been asking Pakistan to persuade the Taliban to make peace, but Afghanistan argues that Islamabad has done nothing to rein in the Taliban, and if anything has encouraged it to raise the stakes in hopes of gaining influence in any power-sharing agreement.

32. China expresses regret over N. Korea's rocket launch

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Beijing - China on Sunday expressed "regret" over North Korea's launch of a long-range rocket, after Pyongyang claimed it successfully put a satellite into orbit. In a statement, China's foreign ministry said North Korea's launch of a long-range rocket "ignored universal opposition of the international community." "China believes that North Korea should have the right to the peaceful use of space, but this right is limited by the United Nations Security Council resolutions," the statement said. However, the Chinese ministry urged "all relevant parties" to be calm, take cautious actions and refrain from taking actions that may lead to tensions.

33. China voices 'deep concern' about possible deployment of U.S. missile system

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Beijing - China's foreign ministry expressed "deep concern" on Sunday as Seoul and Washington agreed to begin talks on the deployment of an advanced American missile defense system to South Korea following the North's long-range rocket launch. Hours after North Korea claimed it had successfully put a satellite into orbit, South Korea and the U.S. announced that they would begin talks on the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) battery to South Korea. The launch is widely viewed as a covert ballistic missile test to advance the development of delivery vehicles capable of carrying nuclear warheads. The Chinese foreign ministry said that "China's position on the issue of anti-missile is consistent and clear" in a faxed statement to Yonhap News Agency. "Countries, when pursuing their own security, should take into account others' security interests as well as regional peace and stability," the statement said. If the THAAD battery is deployed to South Korea, it would further raise tension on the Korean Peninsula, the statement said, adding that, "It is hoped that relevant countries would approach the issue with caution."

34. N. Korea launches long-range rocket

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - North Korea launched a long-range rocket Sunday, apparently sending a satellite into orbit, as South Korea and the U.S. denounced it as a ballistic missile test that challenges U.N. resolutions banning such. "It's presumed that the projectile has entered into orbit," a military official said, indicating that the North successfully launched the long-range rocket. The official, however, qualified the assessment by saying that additional analysis is needed to confirm whether the satellite is operating normally in its orbit. Earlier in the day, South Korea's Aegis destroyer's radar detected the rocket lifting off at 9:30 a.m. from North Korea's northwest Dongchang-ri launch site and concluded that it was a long-range rocket after studying the trajectory. Upon the launch on the west coast, the rocket flew southward, dropping its first stage into the Yellow Sea off the Korean Peninsula at 9:32 a.m. The first stage exploded in midair and splashed down in some 270 pieces, according to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

35. S. Korea's spy agency says N. Korea's satellite is worthless

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - North Korea's long-range rocket should be viewed as a ballistic missile as the satellite it put into orbit is worthless, lawmakers said Sunday, citing South Korea's spy agency. The satellite is presumed to weigh 200 kilograms, two times heavier than a satellite launched in 2012, the lawmakers said after being briefed in a close-door session by the National Intelligence Service. A satellite weighing about 200 kilograms "is worthless as a satellite," Lee Cheol-woo of the ruling Saenuri Party said, noting a proper satellite usually weighs at least 800 to 1,500 kilograms. Lee said South Korea presumed that North Korea has introduced key parts of a long-range missile from Russia, though he provided no further details. The North's missile launch came a month after it carried out its fourth nuclear test. The U.N. Security Council has been working on a resolution for sanctions on the communist country.

36. North Korea Launches Rocket Seen as Cover for a Missile Test

The New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 02 07

Seoul - Defying warnings of tougher sanctions from Washington, North Korea launched a rocket on Sunday that Western experts believe is part of a program to develop intercontinental ballistic missile technologies. The rocket blasted off from Tongchang-ri, the North's main satellite launch site near its northwestern border with China, a spokesman for the South Korean Defense Ministry said. President Park Geun-hye of South Korea called an emergency meeting of top national security advisers on Sunday to address the launch, her office said. South Korea, the United States and Japan also requested an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council. In Washington, Secretary of State John Kerry called the launch a "major provocation, threatening not only the security of the Korean Peninsula, but that of the region and the United States as well." Susan E. Rice, the national security adviser, said it was "a flagrant violation of multiple United Nations Security Council resolutions."

38. MILF allays tension fears

Manila Bulletin, 2016 02 07

Bangsamoro - Amid fears of war in Mindanao after Congress failed to pass the proposed Bangsamoro law, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) yesterday assured the United Nations (UN) of its continuing engagement on peace. Mohagher Iqbal, chief negotiator of the MILF, met yesterday with UN Undersecretary General Adama Dieng in Manila and conveyed the Moro front's assurances that peace will be pursued in Mindanao even without the Bangsamoro Basic Law (BBL) being passed into law. Iqbal, also the chairman of the Bangsamoro Transition Commission (BTC), drafted the original BBL. In a statement received by the Manila Bulletin, he said the MILF "gave its assurance... that it would continue its engagement with all stakeholders including the international community in spite" of the BBL being denied passage by legislators of the 16th Congress. It can be recalled that President Aquino had committed to push the enactment of the BBL crafted to establish a Bangsamoro government to replace the inadequacies of the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM).

39. S. Korea, U.S. to start talks on advanced missile defense system deployment

Kyodo News, 2016 02 07

Seoul - South Korea and the United States reacted to North Korea's "provocative" long-range rocket launch Sunday by jointly announcing their agreement to begin formal talks on deploying an advanced U.S. antimissile defense system south of the inter-Korean border, prompting China to voice "deep concern." The two countries, in a statement, said they will begin "formal consultations...to bilaterally explore the feasibility of THAAD deploying to and operating on the Korean Peninsula at the earliest possible date." The reference was to the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense system, which is designed to intercept ballistic missiles flying at high altitudes in or outside the atmosphere. The statement said the move is "in response to the evolving threat posed by North Korea," including Sunday's rocket launch that utilized ballistic missile technology in violation of U.N. Security Council resolutions, as well as a nuclear test conducted on Jan. 6. Earlier Sunday, President Park Geun Hye condemned North Korea for going through with the launch, which she called an "unacceptable provocation." Presiding over an emergency session of the National Security Council, Park also called for adopting "strong sanctions" against the North at the U.N. Security Council, which has already been discussing tougher sanctions against Pyongyang over its latest nuclear test.

40. PM flags sea-borne terror, piracy as threat to maritime

Press Trust of India, 2016 02 07

Visakhapatnam - (PTI) Prime Minister Narendra Modi today flagged the threat of sea-borne terror and piracy as two key challenges to maritime security even as he pitched for respecting freedom of navigation against the backdrop of South China sea dispute. In an apparent reference to the audacious 26/11 Mumbai terror attack, Modi said, the threat of sea-borne terror, of which India has been a direct victim, continues to endanger regional and global peace and stability. He said piracy, too, remains a strong challenge against the backdrop of Somali pirates targeting merchant vessels, including those of India.

41. Security forces intensify counter-terror ops, neutralize 10 terrorists in two weeks

Asian News International, 2016 02 07

New Delhi - Undeterred by the inhospitable weather conditions, the Indian Army and the Jammu and Kashmir Police have upped the ante in their counter terrorist operations, neutralizing ten terrorists in two weeks. The result of the operations are clearly manifested in the clinical, intelligence based operations over the past two weeks that have resulted in the elimination of ten terrorists in all parts of Kashmir. Conscious efforts are being made to ensure no collateral damage during these encounters and it can be gauged from the fact that there has been no civilian casualty in any of these operations. The Army personnel have been careful in evacuating the occupants of the affected house and from other adjacent areas from the scene of action to ensure safety of the people.

42. Russian MoD Strikes Back at NATO's Accusations of Fueling Tensions in Syria

Sputnik News Service, 2016 02 07

Moscow - Defense Ministry spokesman Igor Konashenkov dismissed as 'stupid' a recent statement by NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg who said that Russia's air strikes in Syria targeting rebel forces were "undermining" efforts to find a non-military solution to the war, RIA Novosti news agency reported. "What we have seen is that the intense Russian air strikes mainly targeting opposition groups in Syria are undermining the efforts to find a political solution to the conflict," Stoltenberg said as he arrived for talks in Amsterdam with EU defense ministers. Maj. Gen. Igor Konashenkov said that it was the "NATO countries' reckless action, which plunged the Middle Eastern region into chaos," not the Russian military operation, that actually brought about the current crisis in Syria.

43. U.S. missile defense in South Korea to threaten Russia - Komoyedov

Interfax: Russia & CIS General Newswire, 2016 02 07

Moscow - The possible deployment of U.S. Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) in South Korea may threaten the security of Russia, State Duma Defense Committee Chairman Vladimir Komoyedov has said. "The U.S. promises to deploy a missile defense system in Korea are not a move in our favor. This is a threat to us, in particular, to our nuclear forces. It will not build our security," Komoyedov told Interfax on Sunday. The deployment of missile defense systems "is certainly different from building garden beds, this cannot be done by morning," he said. "This will not happen by morning, but they may build such systems as a matter of plan," the committee chairman said.

44. Fanning the Flames: US Think Tank Presents 'Russian Invasion' Scenario

Sputnik News Service, 2016 02 07

Moscow - Polish soldiers watch as US troops from the 5th Battalion of the 7th Air Defense Regiment emplace a launching station of the Patriot air and missile defence system at a test range in Sochaczew, Poland. American war planners continue to get themselves worked up with Russia's imaginary "threat," using the phantom menace to convince Washington and NATO to increase their already bloated defense budget. A Cold War-style RAND Corporation report suggests that Russian military forces could reach the outskirts of the Baltic capital cities of Tallinn and Riga in 60 hours. "Across multiple games using a wide range of expert participants playing both sides, the longest it has taken Russian forces to reach the outskirts of Tallinn and Riga is 60 hours," the study says.

45. La Libye, nouveau terrain de jeu du terrorisme

El Watan, Zine Cherfaoui, 2016 02 07

Tripoli - La Libye devient progressivement mais sûrement le nouvel épice de terrorisme mondial. Solidement implanté dans le pays, le groupe terroriste autoproclamé Etat islamique dicte sa loi moyenâgeuse dans plusieurs localités de l'ex-Jamahiriya et a pour projet d'élargir le califat d'Al Baghdadi à l'Afrique du Nord. Pour réaliser son entreprise funeste, Daech (acronyme en arabe d'Etat islamique) recrute actuellement des sanguinaires à tour de bras. Abou Ali Al Anbari, le nouveau chef de

Daech en Libye, privilégie néanmoins les vétérans des guerres d'Irak et de Syrie. Chassés par les Russes et les Occidentaux de leur «califat» en feu, ces derniers ont déjà accepté par centaines l'«hospitalité» de l'ancien major-général de l'armée irakienne. Cette «hijra» forcée a déjà permis à la filiale de Daech en Libye de multiplier, en l'espace de quelques mois, par deux le nombre de ses effectifs. Les services de renseignement américains évaluent à 5000 le nombre des éléments dont disposerait aujourd'hui ce groupe terroriste ultra-violent. Les précédentes estimations de la CIA tablaient jusque-là sur environ 2000 à 3000 terroristes. Et encore, il ne s'agit que des effectifs de Daech. Il ne faut pas oublier que dans d'autres régions de la Libye sont établis Aqmi et Ançar Al Charia, deux autres groupes terroristes disposant de plusieurs centaines d'hommes.

46. Le nombre de jeunes radicalisés a doublé en un an

El Watan, Yacine Farah, 2016 02 07

Alger - En plein débat sur la déchéance de la nationalité pour des binationaux ayant commis des actes terroristes, le ministère de l'Intérieur français a enfoncé le clou en publiant un rapport sur le nombre de personnes radicalisées en France et susceptibles de passer à l'action terroriste à tout moment. Ainsi, selon le décompte des services de sécurité français (police et gendarmerie), plus de 8000 personnes, dont la majorité de confession musulmane, ont été signalées comme radicalisées en France depuis début 2016. De son côté, le ministère français de l'Intérieur a indiqué que ce nombre a doublé en neuf mois. En mars 2015, le nombre de radicalisés était de 4000 personnes. Parmi les 8000 personnes radicalisées, plus de 1600 (soit 20%) sont des mineurs qui ont quitté leurs foyers familiaux en cachette et avec l'aide de recruteurs terroristes travaillant pour le compte du groupe Etat islamique (EI). Le nombre d'adolescents a dépassé les 700. Mais ce que le rapport a montré de nouveau, c'est le nombre de filles victimes du discours islamiste, voire terroriste. 860 filles sont recensées comme étant radicalisées et prêtes à se rendre en Syrie pour rejoindre le groupe Daech.

48. 1994: le chef de l'opération française au Rwanda entendu par un juge

Radio France Internationale, 2016 02 07

Paris - L'Agence France-Presse a révélé ce dimanche 7 février que le général Lafourcade, chef de l'opération militaire française Turquoise, déployée au Rwanda durant le génocide de 1994, a été entendu par un juge français au cours du mois de janvier 2016. Depuis 2005, suite à une plainte déposée par des rescapés et des associations, la justice enquête sur l'attitude de la France lors de ce génocide. De longue date, les militaires français sont accusés d'avoir laissé se dérouler, en toute connaissance de cause, des massacres de Tutsis pendant le génocide rwandais de 1994. Les soldats de l'opération Turquoise, eux, ont toujours nié. C'est en tant que témoin assisté que le général Lafourcade a répondu aux juges en janvier. Un statut intermédiaire entre celui de simple témoin et celui de mis en examen. Selon l'AFP, l'interrogatoire s'est déroulé en deux temps, entre le 12 et le 14 janvier, et a porté notamment sur le massacre de Bisesero, quatre journées au cours desquelles près de 3 000 Tutsis ont été méthodiquement massacrés dans l'est du Rwanda. L'armée française n'était pas intervenue. Or, depuis des années, plusieurs sources affirment que les militaires français étaient pourtant informés de ce qu'il se passait. Mais ils auraient sciemment laissé faire, alors que leur mission était précisément de mettre fin aux tueries.

49. Explosion dans un avion somalien: il s'agissait bien d'une bombe

Radio France Internationale, 2016 02 07

Mogadiscio - Le gouvernement somalien reconnaît que l'explosion, survenue mardi dernier dans un avion de ligne de la compagnie Daallo Airlines, était due à une bombe. L'appareil avait été contraint de faire un atterrissage d'urgence à Mogadiscio peu après son décollage. Quelque 74 passagers se trouvaient à bord. L'un d'eux avait été tué, et deux autres légèrement blessés. Dans un premier temps, les autorités avaient parlé d'un problème technique. Mardi, l'avion avait atterri en catastrophe à l'aéroport de Mogadiscio avec un trou béant d'un mètre de diamètre environ dans le fuselage, au-dessus des réacteurs de l'aile droite. Le pilote serbe de cet A321 avait rapidement parlé d'une déflagration due à une bombe. L'explosion n'avait pas endommagé le système de navigation, précisait-il, ce qui lui avait permis de ramener l'appareil. L'enquête confirme dorénavant qu'une bombe est bien la cause de l'explosion survenue mardi. Une bombe destinée à détruire l'appareil et tuer tous les passagers. C'est ce qu'a indiqué le ministre des Transports Ali Ahmed Jama, sur la base de l'enquête conduite par des experts somaliens et des enquêteurs de la police fédérale américaine (FBI). « Les forces de sécurité ont arrêté des personnes suspectées d'avoir été impliquées », ajoute-t-il.

50. Tunisia builds anti-terror barrier along Libya border

BBC News, 2016 02 07

Tunis - Tunisia says it has completed the first part of a 200km (125-mile) barrier along its border with Libya, designed to deter terrorism. The barrier is made of sand banks and water trenches. It was announced last summer after 38 people were killed on a beach by a gunman said to have trained in Libya. Tunisia's defence minister said the second phase of the project would involve installing electronic equipment with the help of Germany and the US. Security forces said the defences - which aim to make the border impassable by vehicles - had already helped to reduce smuggling. "Today we finished closing it off, and this will help us protect our border, and stop the threat," said Defence Minister Farhat Horchani on Saturday.

51. Iran Panel Reverses Disqualification of Election Candidates

The New York Times, Thomas Erdbrink, 2016 02 07

Tehran - An Iranian vetting committee on Saturday reversed a decision to disqualify more than 1,500 candidates who had registered to run in parliamentary elections scheduled for Feb. 26. It is unclear how many of the newly approved candidates are considered to be reformists, who are opposed by Iranian hard-liners. An election official told the state news media that the decisions were reversed after a new review of the candidates' qualifications and backgrounds. In Iran, all candidates must prove they fully support the Islamic republic and are devout Muslims. Iran's beleaguered reformist faction has tried to flood the vetting committee, known as the Guardian Council, with candidates, hoping that enough would slip through for their faction to win a majority in Parliament. But that remains a stiff challenge, even if many reformists were reinstated on Saturday. During a first round of vetting in December, reformist leaders said that out of the 3,000 candidates they put forth, the Guardian Council, which is made up of Shiite Muslim clerics and jurists, approved only 30.

52. General Staff of Armed Forces: Iran Superior, Influential Power in Region, World

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 07

Tehran - The General Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces in a statement underlined that the country has established superiority in the region and plays an influential role in global equations. "Despite hostile attempts in the past 37 years, the Islamic Republic of Iran has managed to put an end to the US hegemony and exceptionalism in the region. It has now turned itself into a superior regional power and an influential trans-regional player," the statement said on Sunday. The statement went on to add that Iran has made huge progress in different fields by sticking to its lofty principles and causes. As a consequence, the arrogant powers cannot stand the idea of a rising Iran. In relevant remarks in 2014, Iranian Parliament Speaker Ali Larijani had underlined the country's regional power and clout, and said even senior White House officials have been forced to acknowledge this reality. "The Islamic Republic of Iran enjoys such a high degree of power that it has now gained a geopolitical and geostrategic position," Larijani said.

53. Iran Confiscates ISIL-Bound Cargo of Guillotines

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 07

Tehran - The Iranian customs authorities have discovered and seized a cargo bound for the ISIL terrorist group, an official disclosed on Sunday. "Few days ago, we seized a cargo containing guillotines (an apparatus designed for efficiently carrying out executions by beheading) that was headed to the ISIL," Director-General of Iran's Customs Office for Transit Affairs Vahid Dashtbani told the Iranian Seday-e Eqtesad daily on Sunday. The Iranian security forces have in the past foiled many ISIL plots to create insecurity and tension within the country. Head of Iran's Cyber Police (FATA) Brigadier General Seyed Kamal Hadianfar had announced in December that 53 supporters of the ISIL terrorist group were identified and arrested in Iran in almost two years. "The FATA (Cyber) Police has identified 285 websites affiliated to those who supported the ISIL or promoted ISIL's thoughts in Iran in the past 20 months," Hadianfar told reporters in a press conference in Tehran. He said that 108 websites which supported the ISIL were run from outside Iran, adding that all these sites have been filtered and closed with the help of the Interpol.

54. Cross-border Yemeni shelling kills two in Saudi

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 07

Riyadh - A Saudi soldier and a civilian have been killed in cross-border shelling from rebel-controlled northern Yemen, authorities said late Saturday. A Saudi patrol was hit on Saturday morning in the southwestern region of Assir, killing the soldier, the interior ministry said in a statement carried by state news agency SPA. Later in the day, the southwestern city of Najran was struck, leaving dead a foreign resident, a civil defense spokesman said in a statement on SPA. About 90 civilians and soldiers have died from shelling and skirmishes along the border since March, when a Saudi-led military coalition began air and ground action in Yemen.

55. Red Cross in Gaza closes office due to violent protests

The Associated Press, 2016 02 07

Gaza - The International Committee of the Red Cross said Sunday it is temporarily closing its Gaza office after protesters repeatedly tried to storm it. Spokeswoman Suhair Zakkout said the office will operate remotely until "local authorities in Gaza provide assurances that our premises, work and staff are respected." Gaza is ruled by Hamas, an Islamic militant group that seized power there in 2007. Dozens of Gazans have protested daily at the office in recent weeks in solidarity with a Palestinian hunger striker detained by Israel, demanding that the Red Cross help bring about his release. They tried to enter the building forcefully on Sunday, smashing garage windows and causing other damage. Mohammed al-Qeq, a 33-year old journalist, has been on a hunger strike for 75 days.

56. Iraqi Kurds protest against Turkey, 3 police wounded

The Canadian Press, 2016 02 07

Irbil, Iraq - Protests against Turkey in Iraq's northern Kurdish region have turned violent, with three police officers wounded. Hundreds of protesters gathered Sunday outside the United Nations compound in the northern city of Irbil calling for an end to Turkish airstrikes against Kurdish militants. Local media reported that three police were wounded. Turkey began launching airstrikes in Iraq and Syria in July 2015 as part of the U.S.-led coalition's fight against the Islamic State group.

57. Turkey: Reaching limits but will keep taking in refugees

The Associated Press, Mehmet Guzel And Suzan Fraser, 2016 02 07

Kilis, Turkey - Turkey has reached the end of its "capacity to absorb" refugees but will continue to take them in, the deputy premier said Sunday, as his country faced mounting pressure to open its border to tens of thousands of Syrians who have fled a government onslaught. The United Arab Emirates meanwhile joined Saudi Arabia in saying that it was open to the idea of sending ground troops to Syria to battle the Islamic State group, raising the possibility of even greater foreign involvement in the five-year-old civil war. Turkish authorities say up to 35,000 Syrians have massed along the border, which remained closed for a third day on Sunday. The governor of the Turkish border province of Kilis said Saturday that Turkey would provide aid to the displaced within Syria, but would only open the gates in the event of an "extraordinary crisis." Deputy Prime Minister Numan Kurtulmus told CNN-Turk television that Turkey is now hosting a total of 3 million refugees, including 2.5 million Syrians.

58. Rassemblement anti-migrants à Calais: 5 comparutions immédiates lundi, dont un general

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 07

Lille - Cinq personnes, dont un général ancien patron de la légion étrangère, passeront en comparution immédiate lundi au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer, après leur interpellation samedi à Calais lors d'un rassemblement hostile aux migrants, a-t-on appris de source judiciaire dimanche. Le général Christian Piquemal, 75 ans, désigné comme ayant eu "le rôle principal" dans cette manifestation interdite, sera poursuivi pour "participation à un attroupement qui ne s'est pas dissout après sommation" et les quatre autres personnes pour "port illégal d'armes". Toujours en garde à vue, ils risquent une peine allant jusqu'à un an de prison ferme. Organisée à Calais à l'appel du mouvement islamophobe Pegida, la manifestation de samedi avait été interdite par les autorités et a été marquée par des échauffourées entre forces de l'ordre et manifestants, qui ont scandé des slogans tels que "on est chez nous!", "Etat dictateur" ou "migrants dehors".

59. Un général au tribunal après la manifestation islamophobe de Calais

Le Monde.fr, 2016 02 07

Paris - Cinq personnes, dont le général Christian Piquemal, 75 ans, comparaîtront lundi au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer après le rassemblement interdit de Pegida samedi. Cinq personnes, dont le général Christian Piquemal, ancien patron de la Légion étrangère, passeront en comparution immédiate lundi 8 février au tribunal de Boulogne-sur-Mer, à la suite de leur interpellation samedi à Calais lors d'un rassemblement hostile aux migrants. Le général Christian Piquemal désigné comme ayant eu «le rôle principal» dans cette manifestation interdite, sera poursuivi pour «participation à un attroupement qui ne s'est pas dissous après sommation». «On sait bien que la manifestation a été interdite et que l'autorité de l'Etat a été défiée. Le général n'est pas venu à Calais pour faire de la figuration», a affirmé le procureur de Boulogne-sur-Mer, Jean-Pierre Valensi.

60. 20 arrests as tensions rise at Amsterdam Pegida rally

Dutch News, 2016 02 07

Amsterdam - Battalions of riot police kept a protest organised by anti-Islam organisation Pegida at a standstill in Amsterdam on Saturday afternoon, as tension mounted between Pegida supporters and anti-fascist groups. In total, some 20 people were arrested, all of whom were released by Sunday morning. The gathering coincided with similar protests organised by Pegida in several European cities on Saturday, including Dublin, London, and Prague. The rally, originally planned to occur on a square in front of the city hall at Waterlooplein, was moved after police found a suspected explosive device at the original location. Fireworks According to a police press release, the device turned out to be a packet of fireworks. Police believe the 'device' was planted by counter-protestors to draw police attention and disrupt the protest. The 100 or so Pegida supporters who turned up were corralled by police onto a nearby bridge and remained there until buses chartered from the local transport authority showed up to move them out of the city centre.

61. Spanish police arrest terror suspects with alleged jihadist links

Deutsche Welle, 2016 02 07

Madrid - Spanish police on Sunday arrested at least six suspects that they say are linked to al Qaeda and "Islamic State" jihadists. The investigation is ongoing, but Sunday's raids were the culmination of a probe that began in 2014. Police say they have evidence that those arrested provided "logistical support that was essential for the maintenance of terror activities" in Syria and Iraq. "Four of those arrested are Spanish nationals of Syrian, Jordanian and Moroccan origin," according to a police statement. One Syrian and one Moroccan suspect were also taken into custody. There were reports of a seventh arrest, but details of the suspect's background were not immediately clear.

1. Police investigating after Calgary school hit again with hateful graffiti aimed at Syrians, Trudeau Calgary Herald, Clara Ho, 2016 02 21

Calgary - City police are investigating after the walls of a southeast junior high were once again sprayed with hateful messages directed at Syrians and Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Officers were called just before 9:30 a.m. Saturday to Wilma Hansen junior high school in the community of Queensland after someone in the neighbourhood reported the vandalism to police. "We are still doing neighbourhood inquiries," said Sgt. Kelly Todd, adding the incident could potentially be investigated as a hate crime. On the walls of the school, in black spray-paint, someone wrote messages including "Syrians are animals" and "real Canadians hate Syrians" as well as "burn all mosques." Some of the messages also targeted Trudeau including "Syrians go home and take Trudeau" and "While Syrians feast in hotels, Canadians starve on the street, kill the traitor Trudeau." The windows of the school were also smashed. The incident comes a week after the same school was vandalized with similar anti-Syrian and anti-Trudeau sayings.

1A). GOP senator 'a little concerned' about refugees in Canada The Hill.com Bradford Richardson, 2016 02 21

Washington - Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wisc.) on Sunday said he is "a little concerned" about radical Islamic terrorists posing as refugees entering Canada. The Wisconsin lawmaker said Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau expedited the process of approving asylum seekers in the wake of the Syrian refugee crisis. "Of course, with Prime Minister Trudeau's announced plan of basically tripling the number of refugees to bring in - we held a hearing about this, actually," Johnson told radio show host John Catsimatidis on AM 970 New York. "And on average, prior to this program, it would take about 62 months for Canada to properly vet a refugee," he added. "Now they're going to triple the number they're going to let in, and they're going to do it in less than 12 months." "So, yeah, I'm a little concerned that maybe Islamic terrorists could infiltrate that flow of refugees and then come across that very porous northern border."

2. RCMP investigate threat at Paul Kane High School Global News, Jennifer Ivanov, 2016 02 21

Edmonton - Members of the RCMP will be present Monday morning at Paul Kane High School in St. Albert to investigate a possible threat against the school. In a letter to parents Friday, the principal of Paul Kane High School said a threat was made targeting a staff member. The letter states the threat is set to occur on Monday, Feb. 22 but the details regarding who is targeted and why are not being released. The letter went on to say RCMP are investigating and that students would arrive to an RCMP presence in the building on Monday morning. Students are being told to use only the front doors of the school to enter and exit the building. Classes will progress as usual.

3. From military to mainstream: experts say drones taking off in many industries The Canadian Press, Gemma Karstens-Smith, 2016 02 21

Burnaby, B.C - A vast smile breaks out across Wyatt Travis' face as the machine he's operating tilts slightly and whirrs upwards, an omnipresent buzz echoing from the four dizzying propellers. It's Travis' first time flying a drone and he couldn't be happier. "It was incredible," he says after safely landing the 1.28 kg machine. "It was a lot easier than I thought. And a lot of fun." Once thought of as the stuff sci-fi movies, pilot-less flying machines are booming both recreationally and commercially as tech-enthusiasts and different industries explore their capabilities. And experts say this is just the beginning. "You have to have your head on a swivel these days because it's advancing so fast and the technology is changing so quickly," says Declan Sweeney, co-founder of Metro Vancouver's first-ever Drone Fair, held in Burnaby, B.C., this weekend. Sweeney has been working with drones for nearly 15 years, and says when he started, most other people flying unmanned aerial vehicles wore military uniforms.

4. Stop detaining migrants without cause

The Toronto Star, Michaela Beder and Rachel Kronick, 2016 02 21

OpEd: When 16-year-old Mohammed's parents helped their son flee to Canada, they surely could not have imagined that their child would be held in immigration detention and much less that he would be put in isolation for three weeks. But indeed, this is how the Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) treated the arrival of this unaccompanied and vulnerable youth. Mohammed's family had fled Syria for Egypt and when Mohammed's permit expired, rather than risk deportation to Syria, his parents did what any parent would do: try to protect their child. Mohammed flew to the U.S. and then presented to the Canadian border to make a claim for refugee protection. Unaccompanied minors may claim asylum in Canada, even if they have travelled through the United States, but due to a technicality, the CBSA officer who greeted Mohammed deemed him "ineligible" to claim refugee status and promptly sent him to immigration detention. If only Mohammed (to protect his privacy, we're not using his real name) were an exceptional case. In truth, hundreds of innocent migrant and refugee children find themselves in immigration detention centres each year in Canada, as do thousands of adults. Babies, children and adolescents are held in Montreal and Toronto in what are essentially medium security prisons, surrounded by high razor-wire fences, staffed by guards, where children are denied regular schooling, held to rigid schedules, pervasively understimulated and live with a sense of uncertainty and fear. (Note: Dr. Michaela Beder is a psychiatrist in Toronto, and the mental-health lead with Inner City Health Associates. Dr. Rachel Kronick is a psychiatrist working with children and youth at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health in Toronto.)

5. Escaping tribalism and tradition in Middle East

The Ottawa Sun, Farzana Hassan, 2016 02 21

Column: Queens University's United Nations model offers an exciting opportunity for young adults to exchange ideas about the world's political, economic and social problems. It is the type of forum other universities would benefit from. I recently spoke at the UN model as one of a four-member panel discussing how volatility hampers development in the Middle East. The panel discussed strategies for peacebuilding, which is an obvious prerequisite for any progress. As the discussion unfolded, the five-year anniversary of the Arab Spring naturally came up. Several questions were asked about why the movement had failed so dismally when there was a sincere and pressing desire among the revolutionaries for real democratic change. The failed revolts produced a far more unstable Middle East: parts of Libya ripped apart by warring Islamist factions, Egypt in the hands of a far more sinister dictatorship than Hosni Mubarak's, and Syria of course consumed by a catastrophic civil war so complex that even the talks about talks make no progress. Many valid reasons can be offered for the failed Arab revolts: sectarian divisions, economic instability, vested interests by those in control, lack of developed institutions, poor infrastructure and lack of educational and professional opportunity. However, the one cause which underpins all of these is a misconception about the humane values needed to provide enlightened governance.

7. Protests planned across United States to back Apple in battle with FBI

The Associated Press, 2016 02 21

San Francisco - Protesters are preparing to assemble in more than 30 cities to lash out at the FBI for obtaining a court order that requires Apple to make it easier to unlock an encrypted iPhone used by a gunman in December's mass shootings in Southern California. The protests organized by the Internet rights group Fight for the Future are scheduled to occur Tuesday outside Apple stores in the U.S., the U.K., Hong Kong and Germany. The U.S. protests will be in cities scattered across more than 20 states, including in New York, Chicago, San Francisco and Washington, where protesters plan to express their discontent outside the FBI's headquarters. The gatherings will come a week after the FBI went to court to force Apple to weaken the security built into most iPhones to help a terrorism investigation in San Bernardino, California. The FBI wants Apple to remove a feature that erases the information stored on an iPhone after 10 unsuccessful attempts to enter a password, preventing unauthorized users from accessing the device. The iPhone that the FBI is trying to examine was used by Syed Farook, who along with his wife killed 14 people in December. Apple is fighting the court order issued in the case, arguing that the special software sought by the FBI could be used to break into millions of other iPhones. The FBI contends Apple is exaggerating the security risks of complying with the court order in a marketing ploy aimed at selling more iPhones.

8. Snowden: Would return to US with guarantee of fair trial

The Associated Press, 2016 02 21

Manchester, N.H - Speaking via Skype from Russia, Edward Snowden told an audience of supporters in New Hampshire on Saturday that he is willing to be extradited to the United States if the federal government would guarantee he would get a fair trial. The former National Security Agency contractor in 2013 leaked details of a secret government eavesdropping program and left the country. He faces U.S. charges that could land him in prison for up to 30 years. Snowden spoke Saturday at the New Hampshire Liberty Forum, heavily attended by libertarians. WMUR (<http://bit.ly/1KzViUd>) reported that forum organizers did not allow the media to video record his remarks. "I've told the government I would return if they would guarantee a fair trial where I can make a public interest defence of why this was done and allow a jury to decide," Snowden told his audience. Snowden has previously spoken of making offers to the government to return home and his willingness to discuss a plea deal and even go to jail. Last year, former U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder said a plea deal with Snowden was a possibility, but Snowden told the BBC in an interview in October that he and his lawyers were still waiting to hear from the government.

9. Apple Sees Its Privacy Stance as Crucial to Its Global Brand

The New York Times, Katie Benner & Paul Mozur, 2016 02 21

San Francisco - It took six years for Apple to persuade China's largest wireless carrier, China Mobile, to sell the iPhone. Apple's chief executive, Timothy D. Cook, made repeated trips to China to meet with top government officials and executives to woo them personally. The persistence paid off. In 2013, China Mobile relented, a moment Mr. Cook later described as "a watershed day" for Apple. Today, China is Apple's second-largest market after the United States -- Chinese consumers spent $59 billion on Apple products in the last fiscal year -- and the iPhone, the company's top seller, has become both a status symbol and a form of personal security, given how difficult the device is to break into in a country where people increasingly worry about hacking and cybercrime. Apple's success in China helps explain why it is now in a standoff with the United States government over whether to help officials gain access to the encrypted iPhone of one of the attackers in the San Bernardino, Calif., mass shooting last December. The company is playing the long game with its business. Privacy and security have become part of its brand, especially internationally, where it reaps almost two-thirds of its almost $234 billion a year in sales. And if it cooperates with one government, the thinking goes, it will have to cooperate with all of them. "Tim Cook is leveraging his personal brand and Apple's to stand on the side of consumer privacy in this environment," said Mark Bartholomew, a law professor at the University at Buffalo who studies encryption and cyberlaw. "He is taking the long view."

10. San Bernardino County Calls the FBI Liars Over Terrorist's iCloud Account

Gizmodo, Matt Novak, 2016 02 21

Washington - Late last night a Twitter account associated with San Bernardino County said that it worked under the direction of the FBI to reset Syed Farook's iCloud password. Why does that matter? Because it would make the FBI liars. As you probably know by now, the FBI has demanded that Apple break into the San Bernardino terrorist's iPhone. Apple has refused, insisting that doing so would set a terrible precedent. But both the FBI and Apple are currently waging a fierce PR battle over one of the possible ways that information from the phone could've been retrieved in the early stages of the investigation: Hacking Farook's iCloud password and causing his phone to push information to the cloud remotely. In a filing yesterday the FBI claimed that the owner of the phone, San Bernardino County, had been the one who bungled the auto-backup of the phone to iCloud. San Bernardino County was Farook's employer because he worked for the local Department of Health. The County technically owned the phone (emphasis mine): [...] to attempt an auto-backup of the SUBJECT DEVICE with the related iCloud account (which would not work in this case because neither the owner nor the government knew the password to the iCloud account, and the owner, in an attempt to gain access to some information in the hours after the attack, was able to reset the password remotely, but that had the effect of eliminating the possibility of an auto-backup) [...] But San Bernardino County's Twitter account (which remains unverified but appears authentic) now claims that it was working under the FBI's orders. Specifically the tweet said, "The County was working cooperatively with the FBI when it reset the iCloud password at the FBI's request."

11. Kerry in Jordan to discuss Syrian conflict, struggling peace effort

The Washington Post, Carol Morello

Washington - Secretary of State John F. Kerry arrived in Jordan on Saturday to discuss the worsening situation on the ground in Syria with King Abdullah II, as attempts to halt the fighting foundered and the United States expanded its military effort against Islamic State militants to Libya. Syria also was the focus of Kerry's conversations Saturday morning with British Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond, as they met over breakfast in Kerry's only official encounter during his one-night stay in London before heading to Jordan. While in Jordan, Kerry also plans to meet on Sunday with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas. State Department spokesman John Kirby said Kerry and Hammond talked about the brutal civil war, and discussed efforts to broker a partial cease-fire and get humanitarian aid delivered to trapped residents facing starvation as their towns and villages are under siege. Britain is one of 17 countries trying to get peace talks between the Syrian government and opposition groups underway in Geneva. The talks were supposed to start in January, but the opposition refused to take part while its forces and civilians were bombarded by Syrian troops backed by Russian airstrikes. A meeting a week ago in Munich established a Friday deadline for what was called a "cessation of hostilities," one legal step short of a full cease-fire. But the deadline elapsed while U.S. and Russian diplomats dickered over the terms.

12. My Friend, the Former Muslim Extremist

The New York Times, Nicholas Kristof, 2016 02 21

Column: Whenever a Muslim carries out a terror attack in the West, the question arises: Why do they hate us? Provocative answers come from my friend Rafiullah Kakar, who has lived a more astonishing life than almost anyone I know. Rafi is a young Pakistani who used to hate the United States and support the Taliban. His brother joined the Taliban for a time, but now I worry that the Taliban might try to kill Rafi - ah, but I'm getting ahead of myself. One of 13 children, Rafi is a Pashtun who grew up in a mud home close to the Afghan border, in an area notorious for tribal feuds and violent clashes. His parents are illiterate farmers, and it looked as if Rafi's education would end in the fifth grade, when he was sent to a madrasa. His mom wanted him to become a hafiz, someone who has memorized the entire Quran. "One reason people send kids to madrasa is that a hafiz can get to paradise and take 10 other people along," Rafi notes, explaining a local belief about getting to heaven. "My mother wanted me to be a hafiz, so I could be her ticket to paradise." Ultimately, Rafi's life was transformed because his eldest brother, Akhtar, pinched pennies and sent Rafi to the best public school in the family's home province, Balochistan. Rafi had an outstanding mind and rocketed to the top of his class. But he also fell under the spell of political Islam. A charismatic Islamic studies teacher turned Rafi into a Taliban sympathizer who despised the West.

13. EU police chief warns that 5,000 jihadists returned from Middle East — and new attack is likely

The Telegraph, Justin Huggler, 2016 02 21

London - Up to 5,000 jihadists trained in the Middle East could be at large in Europe, the EU's police chief has warned. "Europe is currently facing the highest terror threat in more than 10 years," said Rob Wainwright, the British head of Europol, the EU's police agency. Thousands of EU citizens have returned to their home countries after being trained by Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), Wainwright said. "We can expect ISIL or other religious terror groups to stage an attack somewhere in Europe with the aim of achieving mass casualties among the civilian population," he told Germany's Neue Osnabrucker Zeitung newspaper. Before becoming head of Europol in 2009, Wainwright served in senior roles at the UK's National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) and Serious Organized Crime Agency (SOCA). Europol estimates the number of EU citizens who have slipped back after terror training in the Middle East as between 3,000 and 5,000, he said. The growing number "presents EU member states with completely new challenges."

14. Cameras 'spy' on prayers at Jihadi John's university

The Sunday Times, Josh Boswell, 2016 02 21

London - A university once attended by "Jihadi John" has installed CCTV cameras in its prayer rooms, prompting protests from students who say they are being "spied on". The University of Westminster has tightened security since the Isis killer was last year revealed to be Mohammed Emwazi, a former student, and an internal report said its Islamic society had become a "breeding ground for very ultraconservative views". The university's student union has complained about the cameras and claims that key cards used to enter the rooms are being monitored. Jim Hirschmann, the union's president, said: "The lack of understanding leads to a lack of trust, some anger and frankly a degree of fear." Salsabil Sila, one of the union's Muslim officers, said some students now prayed off campus. "It's limited us from being able to perform our prayers in an environment where we can feel completely at ease," she said. "What would normally be a safe space where we could take off our scarves has now been taken away from us." Father Stephen Wang, chaplain at the University of London, said: "It is certainly not the norm to have CCTV cameras in prayer rooms and chapels. I would want to know what the reasons were and whether it had been agreed with the chaplains, the interfaith team and the students concerned."

15. Australia warns citizens of possible terror attack in KL

MalaysiaKini News, 2016 02 21

Kuala Lumpur - The Australian government today warned its citizens of a possible terrorist attack in "locations frequented by Westerners" in Kuala Lumpur. "Terrorists may be planning attacks in and around Kuala Lumpur. Attacks could be indiscriminate and may target Western interests or locations frequented by Westerners. "You should be particularly vigilant at this time," it said in a travel advisory published today Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade website, smartraveller.gov.au. It maintains that Australians should reconsider travel to the east coast of Sabah, where several tourists have been kidnapped by militants group Abu Sayyaf. Australia's warning comes after the British government raised the terror threat level for East Malaysian resorts last week. The British Foreign and Commonwealth Office advised against all travel to the Sabah eastern islands, raising threat level from "general" to "high". When contacted a police spokesperson said the inspector general maintains police are on "high alert". Inspector-General of Police Khalid Abu Bakar last month said police will increase surveillance in public areas, but denied there is a list of likely terror hotspots in the city.

16. Asylum seeker pair leaves Nauru 'black hole' to be reunited with family in Canada

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Jessica Longbottom, 2016 02 21

Canberra - After spending three years on Nauru, a father and son are resettled in Canada. They are believed to be the first refugees from Nauru or Manus Island to be given permanent protection by a Western country. Two asylum seekers who spent three years living on Nauru have been resettled in Canada, in what is believed to be a first for boat arrivals sent to the Pacific. Syrian man Ali Kharsa, 18, and his father Ahmed, 47, are understood to be the only refugees on either Nauru or Manus Island to be given permanent protection by a Western country. They left the Pacific country in November after a year of legal wrangling. Their relocation was made possible under a family reunification visa after Ali's mother, Doha, was accepted as a refugee by Canada. "When I stepped off the plane, I saw my Mum and I saw some Canadian people," Ali told the ABC. "I didn't even know them but they were crying and they hugged me and they said 'You know what? You are welcome here. You are welcome to Canada'." "I don't believe I'm here in [Canada]. Nauru is a black hole. You never get out.

17. U.S., China narrow gap on U.N. resolution against N. Korea

Yonhap English News, 2016 02 21

Seoul - The United States and China are in a critical phase in their drawn-out talks on the level of U.N. punishment against North Korea for its nuclear and missile provocations, government sources here said Sunday. "The two sides have made considerable progress in core contents" of the envisioned U.N. resolution, a source said, requesting anonymity. South Korean officials expect a draft resolution to be circulated to the other members of the U.N. Security Council within this week. But they remain cautious about when a resolution will be adopted. "Nothing is agreed until everything is agreed," an official pointed out. The international community has reached a consensus on the need for a strong resolution to punish Pyongyang for its Jan. 6 nuclear test and a long-range rocket launch a month later, both are in clear violation of existing U.N. resolutions on the North.

18. 2 dead in ASG, MNLF clash in Sulu

Manila Bulletin, 2016 02 21

Zamboanga City - Two people, including an Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG) member, were killed while another was wounded in an encounter between the bandit group and Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) faction in a remote barangay in Sulu, a top military official said Saturday. Brig. Gen. Alan Arrojado, Joint Task Group Sulu commander, said the clash took place around 5:30 p.m. Friday in Sitio Santol, Barangay Buanza, Indanan town. Arrojado said the clash broke out when the group of Abu Sayyaf sub-leader Sibih Pisih attacked the residence of Gaber Majang, a member of the MNLF. Arrojado said the firefight lasted for about five minutes that resulted to the death of Majang and a follower of Pisih.

19. Umar Khalid not a terrorist but has poor judgement: Bhaskar

Press Trust of India, 2016 02 21

New Delhi - Bollywood actress Swara Bhaskar, a JNU alumnus, has written an open letter to varsity's student Umar Khalid, who is being searched in connection with a sedition case. Khalid is among the students, who are being looked out by police in connection with an event at JNU against hanging of Parliament attack convict Afzal Guru during which anti-national slogans were allegedly raised. The varsity's students' union president Kanhaiya is in judicial custody in a sedition case over the incident. In an open letter to Khalid, Swara who studied Sociology at JNU, has also questioned him for hiding from police saying, that is being taken as the most incriminating evidence of his guilt of being a terror sympathiser. "No, you are not a terrorist Umar Khaled, you are a radical and an idiot with poor judgement of what to say where, but you do NOT deserve to be jailed, tortured or killed for that," she said in the letter.

20. 5 dead in Kashmir standoff between Indian forces and rebels

The Associated Press, Aijaz Hussain, 2016 02 21

Srinagar - A handful of rebels holed up in a building in the Indian portion of Kashmir exchanged fire with government forces for the second straight day Sunday, raising the number of dead to four soldiers and one civilian. Another 13 paramilitary troops have been wounded in the standoff. The rebels, numbering two to three, fired guns and grenades early Sunday as Indian commandos tried to storm the government building where they have been hiding since Saturday, said paramilitary spokesman Bhavesh Chaudhary. The latest firing killed an army captain and a soldier belonging to the army's special forces and injured four paramilitary soldiers, said army spokesman Col. Nitin N. Joshi. Two paramilitary soldiers and one civilian were killed Saturday and nine paramilitary troops were hospitalized. As an intense gunbattle raged between security forces and the insurgents, a portion of the five-story government building caught fire. The standoff started Saturday when the militants fired automatic rifles as they ambushed a convoy of Indian paramilitary soldiers before taking refuge in the nearby government building. They allowed more than 100 civilian government employees to leave the building without any harm.

21. «L'Algérie est dans une région explosive»

El Watan, Kamel B, 2016 02 21

Mila - Ahmed Ouyahia est sorti sur le terrain ce week-end, rencontrant des militants à Mila et animant un meeting à Skikda. Le secrétaire général par intérim du RND a parlé stabilité et sécurité à Mila. Ahmed Ouyahia qualifie ainsi les pays du voisinage de «région explosive». Lors de son passage vendredi soir à Mila, Ahmed Ouyahia a lancé un appel à la vigilance, expliquant que l'Algérie se trouve dans une région du monde où les conflits armés font rage, allusion faite aux tensions et problèmes d'instabilité sécuritaire que connaissent des pays du Maghreb et du Sahel. Ouyahia a, par ailleurs, qualifié la chute des prix du pétrole de défi qu'il faut relever : «Les recettes en devises de l'Algérie ont chuté de 80% en moins de deux ans. Nous sommes appelés à développer des économies de substitution pour déjouer cette épineuse situation.» S'exprimant sur le congrès extraordinaire du RND prévu cette année, l'orateur souligne : «Le congrès extraordinaire, qui élira une nouvelle direction du parti, sera une occasion pour la mise en route de la politique de rajeunissement des instances locales de notre formation politique et une opportunité pour consolider nos rangs.» A Skikda, le discours d'Ahmed Ouyahia ne restera pas dans les annales. Venu célébrer le 19e anniversaire de la création du parti, il donnait l'impression d'accomplir une formalité, sans plus.

22. Niger's security minded president vies for 2nd term in vote

The Associated Press, Dalatou Mamane, 2016 02 21

Niamey, Niger - Niger President Mahamadou Issoufou stood for re-election in the West African nation on Sunday, touting his record of defending the country from Islamic extremists as he vied against 14 other candidates for a second five-year term. Materials arrived late to some polling stations in the capital Niamey, delaying the 8 a.m. start time. Polling stations were to stay open until 7 p.m., though they were due to close one hour earlier in the southeast region of Diffa, a frequent target of attacks by the Nigeria-based militant group Boko Haram. Niger, one of the world's poorest countries, hosts French forces and American drones to combat the regional extremist threat. Issoufou's supporters say he deserves a second term because of his success in preventing militants from setting up a base in the country, as they have in neighbouring Mali. But Boko Haram has hit Niger's southeast region for more than a year and recent high-profile attacks by al-Qaida's North Africa branch in the capitals of Mali and Burkina Faso have raised fears that Niamey could soon be targeted. After voting in Niamey, Issoufou said Niger ``needs peace to build on its development."

23. Maroc : les autorités ont déjoué un attentat de l'Etat islamique à l'arme chimique

Le Jdd (Maroc), Michaël Bloch, 2016 02 21

Les autorités marocaines ont démantelé jeudi une "cellule terroriste" de dix membres, dont un Français, liés au groupe État islamique (EI) et qui s'apprêtaient à commettre des attentats dans le royaume. Les forces de l'ordre ont trouvé des armes mais aussi des substances biologiques et chimiques. C'est un véritable carnage qui a été évité au Maroc vendredi 19 février, jour où un commando de dix terroristes avait prévu de passer à l'acte. "Nous avons découvert des produits chimiques et biologiques qui entrent dans la confection des bombes sales. Les suspects disposaient aussi d'armes à feu et même de fusil à lunettes pour atteindre facilement leur cible", a indiqué vendredi le chef du Bureau central d'investigation judiciaire (BCIJ, équivalent de la DGSI française), Abdelhak Khiame, dans une interview au site marocain Medias 24. "Ils étaient bien équipés pour commettre un attentat de grande envergure. Ils voulaient semer la psychose parmi la population puis se retirer dans une base de repli à vingt kilomètres de Tan Tan (Sud du pays)", a-t-il également ajouté. Parmi les dix assaillants, se trouvait également un Français. Selon Medias 24, il est "originaire d'une trentaine d'années, technicien en électronique, séjournait pour la première fois au Maroc depuis près d'une année et "n'était pas fiché par les autorités françaises". "Ce ressortissant français qui n'a aucune relation avec les pays du Maghreb, est de père et de mère français. Il s'est converti à l'Islam à El Jadida où il a résidé pendant une année avant de faire la connaissance du cerveau du commando, L.

24. Nigerians accused of being Boko Haram disappearing

The Washington Post, Michelle Faul & Ibrahim Abdulaziz, 2016 02 21

Yola, Nigeria - First come the whispers, then accusations loud enough to raise alarms throughout Nigeria's northeastern villages ravaged by extremist violence. Next, people accused of being Boko Haram are rounded up, sometimes by the military, sometimes by a civilian self-defense force. Many are never seen again. The murmurs exploded into a rare open-throated protest recently when an elementary school teacher and two middle-aged farmers were taken away in Duhu village. Women who knew the men insisted they did not belong to the Islamist extremist group, and they marched to a nearby military base to demand their release. Instead, the men were shot, and their bodies were dumped outside of town. Nigeria's military denied detaining the teacher, Habu Bello, and Idrisa Dele and Umaru Hammankadi last month. But several villagers told the Associated Press that they watched as the men were led away by uniformed soldiers who accused them of being Boko Haram fighters. Threats to civilians come from all sides and extrajudicial killings have not abated despite President Muhammadu Buhari's declaration of victory over Boko Haram. The insurgents have shown no mercy, but many people are equally afraid of the soldiers and the self-defense Vigilante Group of Nigeria.

25. Mauritania vows no abuse by soldiers in C. African Republic

The Canadian Press, 2016 02 21

Nouakchott, Mauritania - Mauritania's defence minister vowed that his country's peacekeepers will never be implicated in the type of sex abuse allegations that rocked Central African Republic's U.N. mission in recent months. Diallo Mamadou Bathia made his remarks during a ceremony Sunday before the deployment of 225 Mauritanian soldiers to Central African Republic, where thousands have been killed in sectarian fighting since 2013. Diallo said an additional 300 soldiers will be sent in three weeks. The arrival of the latest Mauritanian battalion comes less than a week before a Congolese battalion deployed to Central African Republic is scheduled to begin heading home after being accused of sexual abuse and exploitation.

26. Iraqi forces seek to retake city of Hit

The Washington Post, Loveday Morris, 2016 02 21

Baghdad - After clearing the last neighborhoods of the battered city of Ramadi recently, Iraqi special forces packed up to leave but expected to move on quickly to their next offensive: the walled market town of Hit. Located 30 miles northwest of Ramadi, also in Anbar province, Hit has been occupied by the Islamic State since the fall of 2014. About 12,000 civilians are estimated to remain, local officials say. While a buildup of Iraqi army forces has begun farther north in preparation for a Mosul offensive, special forces known as Iraq's "Golden Division" have a more immediate target. Bolstered by a win in Ramadi, commanders say they plan to take full advantage of a state of disarray among the militants in the area - prioritizing Hit, while debate continues on whether to move farther west to Fallujah. "We will start from western Anbar, from Hit," said Lt. Gen. Abdul Ghani al-Asadi, a special forces commander. "I have a report on my desk with all the boring details. It's going to be an easy mission." An operation for Hit will begin "very soon," said Maj. Gen. Ismail Mahlawi, head of Anbar Operations Command. "Maybe even days." "Right now, they know they are the next target, but there's nothing new they can use against us," he said.

27. Iranian President Lauds Oman's Pragmatic Policies

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 21

Tehran - Iranian President Hassan Rouhani lauded Oman for its pragmatic and independent policies which have greatly helped regional peace and stability. "The exemplary relations between Iran and Oman are built on mutual respect, trust and brotherhood. Tehran welcomes greater economic cooperation with Masqat," Rouhani said in a meeting with Omani Foreign Minister Yusuf bin Alawi bin Abdullah in Tehran on Sunday. He hailed Oman for its stabilizing and peaceful policies vis-a-vis the region as well as its role in helping Iran settle its nuclear dispute with the West. Rouhani said Iran is ready to facilitate Oman's direct investments, adding that private sectors could join development projects and investment portfolios in ports, aviation, railway and banking sectors." Bin Alawi, for his part, stressed Masqat's policy to enhance cooperation with Tehran, and said, "Oman welcomes and is ready to offer special incentives to Iranian traders to enter its market." He underscored the importance of cooperation in energy, and added, "The two sides complete each other's economies."

28. Top Commander: IRGC to Test New Military Hardware in Massive Drills

Fars New Agency, 2016 02 21

Tehran - Chief of Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces Major General Hassan Firouzabadi said the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) plans to test its recently developed weapons and military equipment in the upcoming wargames. "The large-scale drills will be staged within the framework of the Armed Forces' stated goals: training, testing and using new products," Firouzabadi told reporters in Tehran on Sunday. He said that the defense ministry tests its weapons and equipment in advance as part of a routine training cycle designed to improve defense. Elaborating on the IRGC drills, Firouzabadi said the exercises are meant to improve cooperation and coordination, prepare the Armed Forces for any possible attack, and contribute to their qualitative military edge. Earlier this month, Firouzabadi announced plans by the IRGC to hold missile drills in the final days of February. "The IRGC missile wargames have been communicated to be staged in the first half of (the Iranian month of) Esfand (February 11-March 5)," Firouzabadi said.

29. Saudi prince: Muslim nations must lead in counterterrorism (ML-Saudi-Arabia)

The Associated Press, Aya Batrawy, 2016 02 21

Abu Dhabi - A prominent Saudi prince said Sunday that Muslim countries need to take the lead in fighting terrorism and that a recently announced Islamic counterterrorism alliance of 34 nations should have been created sooner. Prince Turki al-Faisal's comments come as the kingdom hosts an 18-day military exercise with 20 members of the new alliance, which includes Pakistan, Sudan, Jordan and neighbouring Gulf states. Defence Ministers from the coalition of Muslim-majority countries are scheduled to hold their first meeting in Saudi Arabia sometime in March. "I consider this a leading and commendable step that should have happened sooner and thank God it has taken place," he told reporters in Abu Dhabi. "It's no secret, unfortunately, that in our world today the majority of terrorism-related acts, its victims are Muslim," he said. "Therefore, it is our responsibility as Muslim countries to play the primary role in fighting this disease that has impacted us all." Notably absent from the coalition is the kingdom's regional rival Iran, as well as Syria and Iraq, which are battling to win back swaths of territory controlled by the Islamic State group. The prince, who does not hold an official position in the government, is an influential and outspoken member of the Saudi royal family. He headed Saudi Arabia's

General Intelligence Directorate for more than two decades until Sept. 1, 2001, and held ambassador posts to the U.S., the U.K. and Ireland.

30. Saudi prince says offer of troops reflects unease over Syria

The Associated Press, Aya Batrawy, 2016 02 21

Abu Dhabi - A prominent Saudi prince said Sunday that the kingdom's offer to send troops to Syria to fight extremist groups reflects growing unease over the ability of U.S.-led airstrikes alone to defeat the Islamic State group and end the Syrian civil war. Prince Turki al-Faisal, speaking at a luncheon in Abu Dhabi attended by a handful of journalists, said the kingdom does not expect the U.S.-led coalition battling the IS group, of which Saudi Arabia is a member, will succeed unless there is a ground intervention. Saudi Arabia has made clear that its willingness to send special forces to Syria is contingent on the U.S. leading the ground effort. "The world community has the capability, economic, political, military and otherwise, to put a stop to the killing," he said. "I think it is high time that people said enough is enough, but simply saying it is not going to do it. There has to be concrete action on the ground to put a stop to the killing." He added that he has not seen any indication from Saudi leaders that if Saudi troops were deployed to Syria, they would also fight Syrian President Bashar Assad's forces.

31. Israeli military says it shot dead Palestinian attacker

The Associated Press, 2016 02 21

Jerusalem - The Israeli military said it shot dead a Palestinian who tried to stab a soldier at a West Bank checkpoint on Sunday, after security forces managed to disarm and apprehend two separate potential attackers in a non-lethal manner. The incidents came amid a domestic debate over how to best to counter a five-month bout of near-daily Palestinian attacks. Israel's military chief last week angered right-wing nationalists by urging soldiers to use only "necessary force" in subduing attacks. He was quickly backed by Defence Minister Moshe Yaalon who said Israel can't be "trigger happy" in such a volatile climate. Hawkish lawmakers said the military chief's comments weakened Israel. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday called it "a pointless debate" driven either by misunderstanding or political calculus. "What the Chief-of-Staff said is self-evident, and in any case the IDF and the security forces operate in this manner," Netanyahu said at his weekly Cabinet meeting. Palestinians and others have accused Israel of using excessive force, a claim it strongly denies.

32. Kerry: 'Provisional agreement' reached on Syria ceasefire

The Associated Press, Deb Riechmann, 2016 02 21

Amman, Jordan - Secretary of State John Kerry said Sunday that a "provisional agreement" has been reached on a cease-fire that could begin in the next few days in Syria's five-year civil war. Kerry said he spoke in the morning with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to discuss terms of a cease-fire and the two now must reach out to the parties in the conflict. He declined to go into the details of the agreement, saying it "is not yet done." But he said he hoped President Barack Obama and Russian President Vladimir Putin would talk soon and that after that, implementation could begin. "The modalities for a cessation of hostilities are now being completed," Kerry said. "In fact, we are closer to a cease-fire today than we have been. A cessation of hostilities ... is possible over the course of these next hours." The Russian Foreign Ministry seemed to stop short of Kerry's announcement. The ministry said Lavrov and Kerry spoke on the phone Sunday for a second day in a row and discussed "the modality and conditions" for a cease-fire in Syria that would exclude groups that the U.N. Security Council considers terrorist organizations.

33. Palestinian tries to stab Israeli soldier, shot dead

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 21

Nablus Palestinian - A Palestinian tried to stab an Israeli soldier in the occupied West Bank on Sunday and was shot dead, Israel's army said, the latest incident in a nearly five-month wave of violence. The attack occurred at the Bitot Junction south of Nablus in the northern West Bank. "A Palestinian attacker attempted to stab an (Israeli) soldier at the Bitot Junction," the army said. "The force responded to the imminent danger, thwarting the attack and firing towards the assailant, resulting in his death." Palestinian security sources spoke of gunfire targeting a Palestinian in the area. Since Oct. 1, Palestinian knife, gun and car-ramming attacks have killed 27 Israelis, an American and an Eritrean, according to an AFP count. At the same time, 176 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli forces. Many of the Palestinians killed were carrying out attacks, while others were shot dead during protests and clashes.

34. Merkel fears Putin plot to weaken her by exploiting migration crisis

The Sunday Times, Bojan Pancevski, 2016 02 21

Berlin – Germany is investigating what it claims are covert operations by Russia to exploit the migration crisis to weaken Angela Merkel's government and destabilise the EU. Merkel herself is understood to have told her secret services to investigate suggestions the Kremlin is using "hybrid warfare" — a mixture of media manipulation, espionage and political and military pressure — against her country. Officials in Berlin are convinced that Putin, who served as a KGB officer in Dresden in the last years of the Soviet Union, wants to damage or even topple Merkel, who is seen as key to keeping a common European front against Russia after its annexation of Crimea and military intervention in eastern Ukraine. Sources close to the German leader said the decision to deploy the Verfassungsschutz — Germany's equivalent of MI5 — and the Bundesnachrichtendienst — its MI6 — was taken after erroneous reports last month in Russian state media about a 13-year-old Russian girl, named only as Lisa, said to have been gang-raped by Arab refugees in Berlin for 30 hours. Sergei Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, used his annual news conference to attack Germany for "covering up reality in a politically correct manner for the sake of domestic politics". The reports were later exposed as fabrication. "Lavrov's interference was the last straw: even though there was not a shred of evidence he launched an extraordinary attack on German authorities with the sole aim of spreading disinformation and creating panic about migrants," a German government source said.

35. After Paris Terror Attacks, France Struggles With Faith on the Job

The New York Times, Nicola Clark, 2016 02 21

Paris - A week after the terrorist attacks in France last November, Bachir B., a passenger screener at Orly airport south of Paris, was called into his manager's office. Bachir, a devout Muslim who wears a thick beard in keeping with his faith, was ordered to trim his facial hair. His boss even offered to buy him a beard clipper as a birthday gift. While supervisors had sometimes reminded him of a company dress code requiring whiskers to be kept "tidy" and "short," Bachir said that the rule had been enforced only sporadically over his six years working for Securitas, a private security company. This time, the manager made clear that the new crackdown was "because of what was happening in the news," said Bachir, who asked that his last name not be used to protect his family's privacy. Bachir trimmed his beard that weekend. But he said his boss sent him home about 10 days later, again citing his failure to comply with the dress code. Soon after, Bachir received a registered letter from Securitas, saying that he was fired.

Reconciling the religious precepts of observant Muslims with the secular norms in the European workplace has long been a sensitive subject. France's strict legal separation of religious and civic life — a legacy of the French Revolution known as laïcité — formally discourages, and in some situations expressly bans, public religious expression. It is a brand of secularism that coexists uneasily with Islamic traditions, making workplace negotiations about religious practice particularly difficult and prone to misunderstandings.

36. For Turkey, high stakes as troubles intensify

The Washington Post, Liz Sly, 2016 02 21

Istanbul - Turkey is confronting what amounts to a strategic nightmare as bombs explode in its cities, its enemies encroach on its borders and its allies seemingly snub its demands. As recently as four years ago, Turkey appeared poised to become one of the biggest winners of the Arab Spring, an ascendant power hailed by the West as a model and embraced by a region seeking new patrons and new forms of governance. All that has evaporated since the failure of the Arab revolts, shifts in the geopolitical landscape and the trajectory of the Syrian war. Russia, Turkey's oldest and nearest rival, is expanding its presence around Turkey's borders - in Syria to the south, in Crimea and Ukraine to the north, and in Armenia to the east. On Saturday, Russia's Defense Ministry announced the deployment of a new batch of fighter jets and combat helicopters to an air base outside the Armenian capital, Yerevan, 25 miles from the Turkish border. Blowback from the Syrian war in the form of a string of suicide bombings in Istanbul and Ankara, most recently on Wednesday, has brought fear to Turkish streets and dampened the vital tourist industry. The collapse of a peace process with Turkey's Kurds has plunged the southeast of the country into war between Kurds and the Turkish military just as Syrian Kurds carve out their own proto-state in territories adjacent to Turkey's border.

37. Turkey says strikes on Syrian Kurd fighters 'legitimate defense'

Agence France Presse, 2016 02 21

Ankara - Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has defended his country's fight against Kurdish fighters in Syria as "legitimate defence", after international powers urged Ankara to rein in its cross-border bombardments. Turkey has been shelling targets in northern Syria for the past week in a bid to stem the advances of a Kurdish-led coalition that has seized territory in the area. Ankara blames Syrian Kurdish fighters for this week's suicide car bomb attack in the Turkish capital that killed 28 people and fears the creation of a Kurdish stronghold along its southern border. "The situation we are currently facing is one of legitimate defence. No-one can deny or limit Turkey's legitimate right to defence in the face of terrorist attacks," Erdogan said in a speech in Istanbul late on Saturday, according to the Dogan news agency. Erdogan's remarks come after the United States, France and Russia all urged Turkey to scale back or halt its military action in Syria.

38. PKK frees three abducted Anadolu Agency reporters

Hurriyet News, 2016 02 21

Ankara - The outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) has released three reporters working for Turkey's state-run Anadolu Agency after abducting them in the Nusaybin district of the southeastern province of Mardin. The reporters, identified as war correspondent Rauf Maltaş, photojournalist Onur Çoban and cameraman Kenan Yeşilyurt, were released to Peoples' Democratic Party (HDP) Mardin deputy Ali Atalan and unidentified local journalists, Dogan News Agency reported. Atalan then accompanied the reporters to the district governorate of Nusaybin. According to Anadolu Agency, the reporters were sent to Mardin's Nusaybin district a week ago and were captured in the Yenişehir neighborhood on Feb. 19 for "recording inside the district without prior permission from the PKK." Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan and Prime Minister Ahmet Davutoğlu spoke with the journalists on the phone and extended their good wishes.

1. Nombreux vols de passeports malgré la puce électronique

La Presse +, Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 03 06

Ottawa - Depuis l'instauration du passeport à puce électronique, il y a trois ans, environ 13 000 passeports canadiens ont été volés chaque année, malgré sa sécurité renforcée, révèlent des documents obtenus grâce à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information. Alors que le groupe État islamique sème la terreur partout sur la planète, le précieux document bleu demeure « prisé par les groupes terroristes », estime un expert en sécurité nationale. Le nombre de passeports canadiens volés n'a pratiquement pas fluctué depuis 2010. L'an dernier, au moins 13 031 vols ont été rapportés aux autorités canadiennes. Le total pourrait même être plus élevé, puisque les données reposent sur une période indéterminée de l'année. En 2012, avant l'implantation du passeport électronique, 13 232 passeports avaient été volés. Seul point positif : moins de passeports canadiens ont été perdus depuis 2013, alors que 53 222 avaient été égarés, contre 46 860 l'an dernier. Au total, c'est environ 60 000 passeports qui sont perdus ou volés année après année au Canada, malgré les efforts du gouvernement pour enrayer le fléau. Cela représente toutefois « moins de 0,3 % du nombre total de passeports en circulation », soit 23 millions, se défend Immigration, Réfugiés et Citoyenneté Canada. « Nous ne pouvons pas émettre d'hypothèses quant aux raisons pour lesquelles les statistiques des passeports perdus ou volés demeurent stables », a indiqué par courriel Nancy Caron, porte-parole du ministère de l'Immigration, des Réfugiés et de la Citoyenneté du Canada. Il n'a pas été possible d'obtenir une entrevue avec un dirigeant du Ministère pour en savoir plus sur les conséquences de ces vols et sur les moyens déployés pour s'attaquer au problème. Malgré la montée en puissance du groupe djihadiste État islamique, le trafic de passeports canadiens sur le marché noir reste d'abord et avant tout « l'apanage de réseaux criminels organisés », soutient Dave Charland, un ex-agent du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS). Néanmoins, le passeport canadien demeure « prisé par les groupes terroristes, puisque ça leur donne accès facilement à tout le monde occidental », estime-t-il. « C'est sûr qu'il faut se préoccuper de ça, parce que le risque existe que certains vols soient commandités [par des groupes terroristes] ou que certains passeports finissent dans les mains d'extrémistes. » « [...] Ces passeports se retrouvent sur le marché, donc c'est possible pour [les terroristes] qu'ils puissent l'acquérir et s'en servir par la suite », explique Dave Charland. Selon l'ex-agent du SCRS, les groupes terroristes modernes, comme l'État islamique, n'ont plus besoin de se procurer de faux passeports pour semer la terreur, contrairement à Al-Qaïda. « Ces groupes disent même à leurs membres : ne venez pas chez nous, faites des choses chez vous. Leur stratégie de recrutement est de demander aux gens au Canada de commettre des actes, plutôt que d'essayer d'infiltrer le pays en tant que tel », analyse Dave Charland. Certains terroristes pourraient toutefois vouloir se procurer un faux passeport pour se « sauver des autorités ». « Mais ils n'ont pas la mentalité de se sauver, ils ont la mentalité de se sacrifier pour leur cause », évoque-t-il.

2. Les Forces canadiennes soulignent la fin des frappes contre l'EI

Agence France-Presse, 2016 03 06

Ottawa - Les Forces armées canadiennes ont organisé un rassemblement au Koweït, samedi, pour souligner la transition de la force opérationnelle aérienne qui lutte contre le groupe armé État islamique en Irak et en Syrie. L'événement, présidé par le commandant de l'Aviation royale canadienne, le lieutenant-général Michael Hood, visait à souligner officiellement la contribution des militaires canadiens à la coalition internationale. Les CF-18 Hornet canadiens ont cessé de mener des frappes aériennes le 15 février, conformément à l'engagement pris par le gouvernement de Justin Trudeau. Les avions de combat quitteront graduellement la région au cours des prochaines semaines. Selon les nouveaux termes de la contribution canadienne à la mission, le Canada maintiendra en activité un avion de ravitaillement et deux appareils de surveillance pour aider la coalition dirigée par les États-Unis à poursuivre les bombardements contre le groupe extrémiste.

3. How a U.S. cleric became top Al Qaeda recruiter

Toronto Star, Olivia Ward, 2016 03 06

Interview: In life and death, Anwar al-Awlaki was one of the most notorious recruiters of Al Qaeda terrorism since Osama bin Laden. But the Yemeni-American cleric and warlord wasn't always a bloodthirsty foe of the U.S. Scott Shane, a New York Times national security reporter, takes a deep dive into the dramatic and tortuous life of Awlaki - and the missteps and consequences of U.S. President Barack Obama's drone program that killed him - in Objective Troy: A Terrorist, a President, and the Rise of the Drone. It was the 2016 winner of the $15,000 Lionel Gelber Prize for non-fiction books on foreign policy, awarded by the Lionel Gelber Foundation, Munk School of Global Affairs and Foreign Policy magazine. Shane will appear at a public lecture and award ceremony at the University of Toronto on March 29. Here, he talks about the man who has become a terrorist legend, and the controversial assassination program that gave him immortality as a martyr. Of all the high-profile terrorists, why choose to write a book on Awlaki? I always found his story very compelling. The two big questions I set out to answer were, first, how does someone become a terrorist and reach the point where they're ready to kill hundreds or thousands of strangers? He was an American, had spent half his life in the U.S. and began his career condemning 9/11 and staking out a position as a bridge builder (for Muslims). The other is about the drone program's contribution to national security. It made the country safer from a big attack like 9/11 in some cases. But almost always there was a reverse effect. Experts say the drone strikes, Guantanamo, interrogation and torture, black sites have grown the number of people worldwide who believe the U.S. is at war with Islam and violence is a justified response. Was it surprising that this terrorist firebrand started out as a rather privileged young man in a family of moderate Muslims? Not really. Osama bin Laden was the son of a billionaire. What was more surprising was understanding his family as fairly secular-minded in the Yemeni context. They were almost fanatically fond of America - yet Anwar Awlaki would spend his last years calling for attacks on America and killings of Americans. His turning point from popular cleric and public personality in Virginia to Al Qaeda warlord was quite startling: fear of exposure of a deeply secret sex life. Generally, people had focused on the sermon he gave not long before leaving the U.S. He was very angry and said that America was not waging a war on terror but a war on Muslims. However, in the space of a week, he went from saying he was happy with his career and had no intention of leaving the country to saying he was leaving and probably not coming back.

4. New Film Delves Into FBI Arrests of Youths For Terrorism Crimes They Might Commit (Canada)

The Intercept, Murtaza Hussain, 2016 03 06

Analyse: In an early scene from the HBO documentary Homegrown, an FBI agent describes his angst while tracking a teenager's engagement in the online jihadi world. "You almost want to pick up the phone and say, 'Son, don't do this,'" the agent reflects. The teenager in question was Shifa Sadequee, a 19-year-old who was arrested on terrorism charges in 2006. Following a 2009 trial in which Sadequee represented himself, he was sentenced to 17 years in prison plus an additional 30 years of supervision. The ethical issues involved in preventive counterterrorism cases like Sadequee's are the theme behind much of Homegrown. Following 9/11, law enforcement agencies were given a mandate to halt terrorist acts before they occurred, rather than investigate crimes after the fact. This directive inevitably gave rise to some disturbing ethical questions. When is it acceptable to arrest someone for a crime they haven't actually committed, but you think they might commit in the future? At what point do a teenager's online postings turn into a terrorism offense? Shifa-Sadequee Shifa Sadequee Born in Virginia to parents from Bangladesh, Sadequee was raised largely in suburban Georgia. In the years leading up to his arrest, during his early and mid-teens, he was the subject of intense online surveillance by law enforcement. Around the age of 16, Sadequee became involved online with a group of young men who had been translating jihadi material into English. The men were generally not in direct contact, and were scattered in different countries around the English-speaking world. Online, some of them expressed support for terrorist groups and made threats of future violence. In real life, Sadequee was a socially awkward teenager growing up in a broken home. But in the virtual world, he used his language skills and scholarly demeanor to become something of a respected figure, making friends and contacts throughout North America and Europe. As time went on, Sadequee began immersing himself more deeply in this new community. In 2005, he and another young man, Syed Haris Ahmed, made a trip to Toronto to meet with a group of men they had befriended online, several of whom were later arrested in a separate terrorism sting. Roughly a month after that visit, Sadequee and Ahmed traveled to Washington, D.C., where they made a "casing video" of major landmarks in the city.

5. Spy vs. Spy

The New York Times. Alex French, 2016 03 06

Washington - Kent Clizbe, a 55-year-old former C.I.A. officer and intelligence contractor, has cultivated a diverse set of interests in his later years. He loves bird watching and participates in his local Christmas Bird Count, an informal census organized by the Audubon Society. He has a patent on a device, the TimeOff, that prevents unattended-stove fires. But Clizbe's true motivating force -- a holdover, perhaps, from his decade with the agency -- is an unrelenting compulsion to get to the bottom of things. He vets every person he meets, interrogating every fact presented to him. This perpetual need to turn everything inside out is the defining trait of Clizbe's personality, and he remains faithful to it, even when it incurs him great personal expense. Clizbe grew up poor in Halifax County, North Carolina, raised by a single mother. In 1980, after failing out of East Carolina University, he joined the Air Force. Aptitude tests revealed a gift for languages, so Clizbe enrolled in intensive Vietnamese courses and then was shipped to the Philippines, where he spent three years monitoring Vietnamese radio communications. When his tour ended, he went back to school at Southern Illinois University. On campus, he fell in love with a Malaysian girl, who told him that if he wanted to marry her, he would have to convert to Islam. He converted, married her and followed her back to Southeast Asia, where he found work at a refugee camp in the Philippines. Clizbe made frequent trips to her hometown outside Kuala Lumpur, where he immersed himself in the local customs. He and his wife lived in Asia for a year before finding jobs at the business college at King Saud University in Qassim Province in Saudi Arabia. He taught English as a second language and made the pilgrimage to Mecca. It was 1988, and the war in Afghanistan was dragging on. At the mosque on Fridays, Clizbe would hear calls for young men to travel east and wage jihad against the communists. After returning to the United States in 1990, Clizbe earned a master's degree in linguistics and studied business and instructional design. While he searched for a job, he sometimes paid the bills by working the phones at a venereal-disease hotline. He was eventually hired by the C.I.A. as an operations officer.

5b). US using false intelligence to plan military attack on Isil in Libya, warn experts

The Sunday Telegraph, Ruth Sherlock, 2016 03 06

Washington - America military planning for a possible intervention against Isil in Libya is based on faulty intelligence about the group's strength, according to Western officials and country experts. The US intelligence agencies assess that the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (Isil) has doubled in size in Libya, with between 5,000 and 6,500 fighters in the country. Privately, however, some US officials say they believe these estimates to be overblown. Independent experts have come to the same conclusion. "The estimate of the number of jihadists is grossly exaggerated," said Karim Mezran, a Libya expert with the Atlantic Council in Washington. While Mr Mezran and other analysts decline to offer an alternative number for Isil's strength, they believe the real figure to be only 20 to 40 per cent of the US estimate. Isil's presence on Libya's coast - just 300 miles from Italy - has caused deep concern among Western governments. As The Sunday Telegraph has reported, Britain, America, Italy and France have all deployed special forces in the country to re-establish links with militia groups who are fighting Isil already or could do so in the future. Barack Obama's administration is now considering sustained military action in Libya. Bob Corker, the chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, said during a hearing this week that US forces were "contemplating a pretty massive air assault". But some US officials said they feared the Pentagon was pushing for military action based on a miscalculation in the size and nature of the threat.

6. Family, friends of ex-FBI agent demand his release from Iran

Associated Press, 2016 03 06

Washington - The family and colleagues of a former FBI agent who disappeared in Iran nine years ago while on a CIA mission expressed anger and disappointment at a rally on Saturday that he wasn't part of a January prisoner exchange with Tehran. Several hundred people attended the rally for Robert Levinson, 67, who disappeared from Iran's Kish Island in March 2007. A 2013 Associated Press investigation revealed that the married father of seven was working for the CIA on an unauthorized intelligence-gathering mission to glean information about Iran's nuclear program. If Levinson remains alive, he has been held captive longer than any American - longer than then-AP journalist Terry Anderson, who was held more than six years in Beirut in the 1980s. Unlike Anderson, Levinson's whereabouts and captors remain a mystery. US officials believe the Iranian government was behind his disappearance. It has denied that. The case drew renewed attention in January when Levinson was not part of a prisoner swap between the U.S. and Iranian governments that freed four other Americans who had been in Iran's custody. Levinson's family insists he is still alive, even with health issues including diabetes, gout and high blood pressure. They last received video and photos of him about five years ago. Stephanie Levinson Curry, his second-oldest child, said her autistic 9-year-old son Ryan cried for days when the other American captives were released, but not his grandfather.

7. Competing Interests on Encryption Divide Top Obama Officials

The New York Times, David Sanger, 2016 03 06

Washington - The intensifying legal battle over encryption between Apple and the Justice Department has all but obscured another more subtle division, the one inside the Obama administration itself. Driven by competing and sometimes clashing interests about privacy, national security and the economy, some of the president's most senior aides are staking out a variety of positions on the issue. The White House denies there is disagreement over the effort to force Apple to break into the phone used by one of the terrorists in the San Bernardino, Calif., shootings, but the differences on how to deal with the broader questions raised by encryption have become increasingly apparent. The Federal Bureau of Investigation wants the ability to break into smartphones and computers for investigations. The Pentagon and intelligence officials worry that the same techniques could be used by foreign powers or hackers to drain data from phones used by the United States government, and that countries like China will demand the same access provided to American law enforcement officials. The conflicting positions were on display last week. On Tuesday, James B. Comey Jr., the director of the F.B.I., testified in Congress about the need for some kind of government action — he avoided the word “legislation” because the White House has specifically said it is not seeking that now — that would guarantee access to law enforcement, no matter how encryption technology evolves.

8. When the Tide of Islamophobia Reached My Hometown Mosque

The New York Times, Mustafa Haseed, 2016 03 06

OpEd: The Islamic Society of North America’s headquarters sit atop a grassy hill overlooking Plainfield, Ind. The complex includes a prayer hall, a space for community events and a field house with a basketball court and playground. It is surrounded by cornfields. As the largest mosque in the Indianapolis area, it draws hundreds of families, especially during Ramadan and on holidays. My own family was one of those. When I was growing up in the Indianapolis suburbs, we’d visit the mosque for Eid holiday prayers. After services, we’d say awkward hellos to my parents’ friends, stand in line for stale doughnuts and tea and I’d try to find people my age to shoot a basketball around. In short, it is a fairly typical American house of worship. And last weekend, it became a target of vandalism. Slurs spray-painted on its brick exterior — most of them too crude to quote — suggested all Muslims are suicide bombers or members of the Islamic State. Anti-Muslim hatred in the United States has grown in recent years. The “Ground Zero Mosque” episode in 2010 and successive anti-mosque protests across the country signaled a simmering Islamophobia. In 2015, the simmer came to a boil. That January, after a pair of terrorist attacks in Paris, pundits and conservative officials propagated a discredited myth about Shariah-run zones in European cities off limits to non-Muslims. Hashtags like #KillAllMuslims trended on Twitter. A month later, three Muslim youths were shot dead in their North Carolina apartment in what many people said was a hate crime. An examination of anti-Muslim hatred in the last few years can easily devolve into a laundry list: armed demonstrators picketing at a mosque in Phoenix, arson at a mosque in the Coachella Valley in Southern California, a severed pig’s head placed in front of a mosque in Philadelphia. But the most alarming signs accompanied the Republican presidential race, as each candidate seemed gleefully willing to one-up the others in vilifying Muslims. (Note: Mustafa Hameed is a journalist living in New York.)

9. Clinton authored sensitive emails

The Washington Post, Rosalind S. Helderman & Tom Hamburger, 2016 03 06

Washington - Hillary Clinton wrote 104 emails that she sent using her private server while secretary of state that the government has since said contain classified information, according to a new Washington Post analysis of Clinton's publicly released correspondence. The finding is the first accounting of the Democratic presidential front-runner's personal role in placing information now considered sensitive into insecure email during her State Department tenure. Clinton's authorship of dozens of emails now considered classified could complicate her efforts to argue that she never put government secrets at risk. In roughly three-quarters of those cases, officials have determined that material Clinton herself wrote in the body of email messages is classified. Clinton sometimes initiated the conversations but more often replied to aides or other officials with brief reactions to ongoing discussions. The analysis also showed that the practice of using non-secure email systems to send sensitive information was widespread at the department and elsewhere in government. Clinton's publicly released correspondence also includes classified emails written by about 300 other people inside and outside the government, the analysis by The Post found. The senders included longtime diplomats, top administration officials and foreigners who held no U.S. security clearance.

10. Northern Ireland police find bomb parts in rural park

The Associated Press, 2016 03 06

London - Police in Northern Ireland say they have found "a significant terrorist hide," including explosives and bomb parts, buried in a rural park. The Police Service of Northern Ireland said Sunday that detectives uncovered the stash at Carnfunnock Country Park, about 20 miles (32 kilometres) northeast of Belfast, after a passer-by reported a suspicious object. Police say officers found several buried plastic barrels containing "a significant amount of bomb making components including partially constructed devices and a small quantity of explosives." Detective Chief Inspector Gillian Kearney said "it is too early to link these items to any particular grouping" among Northern Ireland's Catholic or Protestant militants.

11. Terrorist hide uncovered at Northern Ireland park

Xinhua News Agency, Xia Xiao, 2016 03 06

London - A terrorist hide was found at a park in Northern Ireland, local police said Sunday. Police Service of Northern Ireland said a resident on Saturday reported a suspicious object to police, later the police discovered a terrorist hide containing bomb making components and explosives at Carnfunnock Country Park, near Larne. Police said small plastic barrels had been buried in a wooded area. Inside the barrels was a significant amount of bomb making components including partially constructed devices and a small quantity of explosives. "All of these items will be subjected to a detailed forensic examination. Until this has been completed, it is too early to link these items to any particular grouping, but we are following a number of lines of enquiry," said Gillian Kearney, detective chief inspector from Serious Crime Branch. For safety reasons, the park is currently closed, and a clearance operation is under way.

12. Reformed UK Jihadi Arrested Over 1.2M Fraud to Raise Cash For Terror

Mail on Sunday, Omar Wahid, 2016 03 06

London - A notorious Islamic extremist who went on to advise Labour Ministers as a 'reformed jihadi' has been arrested on suspicion of funding terrorism after allegedly running a £1.2?million scam on eBay. Hassan Butt, who once boasted of recruiting hundreds of Britons for the Taliban, is accused of conning thousands of customers out of money, after advertising and taking money for iPhones and iPads via the online auction site but never delivering the products. The former extremist advertised the products through his company, Mi Genie, which had its own web pages on eBay. The alleged scam is believed to be one of the biggest frauds eBay has faced in the UK. Butt, 35, was reported to police after eBay's own investigation teams detected suspicious activity within Mi Genie's pages. He was arrested at his home in Manchester by anti-terrorist detectives from Scotland Yard. More than 30 officers also searched his property. A business partner of Butt was also arrested and his property was raided in nearby Bury, Lancashire, last September. Both men were bailed last week until a date later this month.

13. Key documents on rendition suppressed by UK government

Independent On Sunday, James Hanning, 2016 03 06

London - Key documents that could shed light on allegations of UK collusion in torture and rendition are being suppressed by the British government. The newly uncovered files include confidential exchanges between former PM Tony Blair and former president George Bush about treatment of detainees at Guantanamo. Possibly most significant are five other documents, communications between the former UK foreign secretary, Jack Straw, and former US secretary of state, Colin Powell, expressing interest and concern about the welfare and legal status of UK detainees at Guantanamo. While the documents may relate to casual expressions of care for the welfare of UK citizens, former detainees have alleged that British officials have either been present at, or submitted questions for, "extreme" interrogation by US officials. The US government has been required to make public a large number of files which relate to British involvement in the treatment of prisoners in the years following the 9/11 bombings. Litigation continues across multiple US departments over the possible release of mainly intelligence-derived documentation. But 12 documents found in the US State Department's search, not derived from intelligence, were also withheld. These relate to interventions by British politicians and officials over the treatment of detainees and interrogation techniques. In court papers, the State Department reported: "After reviewing the documents, the UK Government's Foreign and Commonwealth Office requested that all 12 documents be withheld in full from public disclosure."

14. SAS test their skills at Lord's in secret 'dirty bomb' terror exercise

The Sunday Times, Mark Hookham, 2016 03 06

London - British and American special forces held a secret training exercise last month to prepare for terrorist "dirty bomb" attacks on London landmarks, The Sunday Times can reveal. Bomb disposal experts from the SAS and Special Boat Service (SBS) worked with elite operators from the American military's Delta Force and Navy Seals and the FBI. The aim was to test how security forces would cope if faced with a new generation of complex improvised explosive devices (IEDs). During the exercise up to 10 four-strong teams raced to defuse bombs packed with "notional" high explosives, chemicals and radioactive material that, if real, had the potential to cause hundreds of casualties. At least four venues in central London were used during the drill. The teams wore plain clothes and used civilian cars or public transport. A range of devices, which looked like bombs but contained no dangerous material, were placed at targets including Lord's cricket ground, a disused building near Lambeth Palace and buildings next to the MI6 headquarters overlooking the Thames.

15. Jihadi John link to freed Briton

The Sunday Times, Dipesh Gadher, 2016 03 06

London – A former British inmate at Guantanamo Bay who shared a £20m compensation payout from taxpayers has been linked to the Isis killer known as Jihadi John. The Sunday Times has established that Tarek Dergoul travelled by road to Portugal with Mohammed Emwazi in 2011 where they met a Syrian terror suspect. A year later Emwazi went to Syria to join jihadists. Dergoul, 38, admitted yesterday that MI5 was aware of his relationship with Emwazi but condemned the former London student's subsequent spree of beheadings for Isis. The link to Emwazi follows the discovery by this newspaper that Jamal al-Harith, another previous Guantanamo inmate from the UK who received £1m in compensation for his incarceration, is now fighting with Isis in Syria. At least 800 British Muslims have travelled to the region to join terrorist groups. Emwazi has been the most notorious having carried out the murders of seven western hostages, including two British aid workers, before he was killed by a drone strike last November.

16. Isis 'studied Nazi methods' to create own version of Hitler Youth and train child killers from birth

The Independent, May Bulman, 2016 03 06

London - Isis is indoctrinating children from birth through an extremism-based education similar to that taught by the Nazi regime in a bid to create a generation "more lethal than themselves", a study has revealed. The report, Children of Islamic State, outlines how indoctrination by Isis through schools and training camps - which sees children encouraged to watch public executions, hold up decapitated heads and carry out killings - has been influenced by elements from Nazi Germany. "Islamic State's approach to education reflects elements of Nazi Germany in the way that children and pedagogy are perceived," states the report. "Elements from Nazi Germany can be glimpsed in the systematic indoctrination of children through schools and training camps in IS. The concepts used by the Nazis are perfectly applicable to the Islamic State. According to Quilliam, the London counter-extremism thinktank that produced the report, Isis has been quick to seize control of the education system in Syria and Iraq in a bid to prepare a new, stronger second-generation mujahedeen who are conditioned to extreme values from birth. In extracts seen by the Guardian, the authors state: "The organisation focuses a large number of its efforts on indoctrinating children through an extremism-based education curriculum, and fostering them to become future terrorists. "The current generation of fighters sees these children as better and more lethal fighters than themselves, because rather than being converted into radical ideologies they have been indoctrinated into these extreme values from birth, or a very young age."

17. Hate preacher makes violent threat against MI5 agent named James saying he 'hopes the spy dies in a car crash'

The Mail On Sunday, Omar Wahid, 2016 03 06

London - A hate preacher linked to British jihadis in Syria has made a chilling threat against an MI5 agent, wishing he would die in a car crash. Abu Waleed, 37 – who led banned extremist group Al-Muhajiroun – posted the message on encrypted social media site Telegram. He referred to the officer by his first name, suggesting he knows him or has been interviewed by him. The Telegram app is becoming the platform of choice for British jihadis in both the UK and Syria. Last Tuesday, Waleed wrote: 'A warm good evening to intelligence officer James at MI5 (British Security Services). 'Hope you are in a Ford Galaxy 7 seater and it ends up hitting a wall, burning and leaving your face hanging like an egg on hot toast.' Waleed signed off, saying: 'Enjoy your dinner, Kind regards, Your Curse. Keep biting your fingers.' The message has been viewed almost 500 times by Waleed's 1,055 followers, many of them notorious jihadis. It is believed that analysts at MI5's Thames House headquarters will study the message and assess the threat.

18. Revealed: MI6 are compiling a secret dossier of Putin's 'war crimes' in Syria

Sunday Mail, Mark Nicol, 2016 03 06

London - MI6 and British police are investigating alleged attacks on civilians by Russian war planes in Syria – with a view to prosecuting President Vladimir Putin for war crimes, The Mail on Sunday can reveal. Scotland Yard detectives have flown to Lebanon to monitor air strikes in neighbouring Syria – amid claims that Russian bombers have caused hundreds of casualties by targeting hospitals and schools. Medical charities and human rights groups have already condemned the bombing of civilians in areas controlled by Syrian rebels who oppose the regime of President Bashar al-Assad, Putin's ally. Now the MoS can reveal that intelligence services are compiling a secret dossier of specific assaults, which could lead to the Russian President facing allegations of crimes against humanity at an international tribunal.' The revelation comes after Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond warned Moscow last month that strikes on hospitals 'could amount to war crimes'. Last night, Foreign Office sources confirmed that the UK is 'closely monitoring the situation' in Syria. The MoS understands that British investigators, including detectives from the Metropolitan Police Service's war crimes unit, are at the British Embassy in Beirut. According to Amnesty International, Russia is targeting hospitals in areas held by rebel groups in an attempt to terrorise local people into supporting President Assad.

19. Spy agency overhaul needs political buy-in to restore public confidence

Stuff News New Zealand, Tracy Watkins, 2016 03 06

Opinion: When John Key and Andrew Little eyeball each other across the table during a closed door session of Parliament's intelligence and security committee this week, the prime minister will be ready to turn the tables on his opponents. Key is asking Labour to back him on legislation overhauling the country's spy agencies, the Government Communications Security Bureau and Security Intelligence Service. It might have sounded like Key was making the plea for bipartisanship from a position of weakness. Spies and the surveillance agencies have been Key's Achilles heel after all. But the Labour leader will probably see Key's plea for unity for what it is, a game of political brinkmanship. Because refusing to back any law changes lets Key paint Labour into a corner as weak on national security. Given Little's previous call to back the Government on extending the powers of the SIS to detect Isis supporters, he seems unlikely to fall into that trap. A lot has changed since the 2014 election campaign, when Key was wrong footed by allegations swirling around a bungling GCSB. Back then, Labour under David Cunliffe abandoned the usual bipartisanship on national security issues to rub the Government's nose in those failures by opposing law changes governing the agency. Key was besieged on every front - even NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden joined the party.

20. Pyongyang ramps up criticism against human rights bill, anti-terrorism legislation

Yonhap English News, 2016 03 06

Seoul - North Korea on Sunday continued to denounce the bill on human rights in the communist country by South Korea's parliament claiming that the bill along with Seoul's anti-terrorism legislation can further aggravate inter-Korean relations. In a commentary carried out by the North's official news outlet, the Korean Central News Agency, the Minju Joeson, an organ of the Cabinet, said, "It is sparking off the towering resentment of all Koreans as it is an unpardonable grave challenge to the DPRK and a hideous act of treachery pushing the north-south relations to a war." The DPRK refers to the acronym for the North's official name -- the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. For the past few days, the North has hit back against the bills approved by South Korea's National Assembly warning that they are a 'grave provocation' and constitute a huge crime against it. On Wednesday, South Korea's National Assembly approved the bill on North Korean human rights, hours before the U.N. Security Council unanimously okayed its toughest-ever sanctions against Pyongyang in response to the communist country's recent nuclear test and rocket launch. Since the first draft was filed with the National Assembly in 2005, no major progress has been made for the North Korean human rights bill. Similar bills were scrapped during previous parliaments, as liberal lawmakers have shied away from the issue of the North's human rights out of concern that it could strain inter-Korean relations.

21. Defamation Laws Give South Korea an Anti-Dissent Tool, Critics Say

The New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 03 06

Seoul - In late 2014, months after 304 people died in the sinking of a South Korean ferry, a leaflet began circulating with a scurrilous rumor about President Park Geun-hye: that she had failed to respond swiftly to the disaster that day because she was having a romantic encounter with a former aide. Was Ms. Park, the flier asked, now cracking down on her critics in an attempt to keep that scandal from coming to light? For Park Sung-su, an antigovernment campaigner who had distributed the leaflet -- and who is not related to the president (Park is a common surname here) -- the consequences soon followed. He was arrested and later sentenced to a year in prison, on charges of defaming the president and staging illegal protests against his prosecutors. He was freed in December after eight months, when a court suspended his sentence. No evidence supporting the rumor has been produced, and prosecutors said they had investigated and found it groundless. But however dubious the leaflet might have been, opponents of the government say Mr. Park became another victim of the very thing he was denouncing: the government's use of defamation and other laws to silence its critics, which rights advocates say is on the rise. Last year, the United Nations Human Rights Committee warned against South Korea's "increasing use of criminal defamation laws to prosecute persons who criticize government action." Freedom House, a rights group based in Washington, criticized "the increased intimidation of political opponents" under Ms. Park, who took office in 2013.

22. Bangladesh arrests three suspected militants

Reuters, 2016 03 06

Dhaka - Bangladesh's elite anti-terrorism unit detained on Sunday three suspected members of a militant group believed to be behind a spate of recent attacks in the south Asian country. Muslim-majority Bangladesh has seen a rise in Islamist violence in which liberal activists, members of minority Muslim sects and other religious groups have been targeted. The detainees were members of the banned Jamaat-ul-Mujahideen Bangladesh and were arrested in a raid conducted in the northwestern district of Rajshahi, said Rumman Mahmud, a deputy director of the Rapid Action Battalion. Sixteen crude bombs, seven petrol bombs and extremist books were also found in their possession, he added. The group is believed to be behind attacks such as the bombings of a Shi'ite shrine and the killing of two foreigners.

23. Philippines: OIC urges Muslim-Filipino solidarity amidst non-passage of BBL

Palestine News Agency (WAFA), 2016 03 06

Manila - Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC) Secretary General Iyad Ameen Madani has called on the Bangsamoro people to unite and remain committed to the peace process after Congress failure to enact the proposed Bangsamoro Basic Law (BBL) which would have been vital in ending the Mindanao armed conflict. The Secretary General of the OIC urged the Bangsamoro people to unify, consolidate and converge together towards the advancement of the peace process and the final resolution of the conflict in Mindanao, the OIC Secretary General said in a press statement issued after his meeting with Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) Chairman Al Haj Murad Ebrahim. While Madani expressed his deep disappointment over the non-passage of the BBL which is a major step towards the final resolution of the Bangsamoro question, he urged the leaders of the Bangsamoro people in particular, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) and the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) to utilize the existing mechanism, the Bangsamoro Coordinating Forum (BCF) to achieve a more unified position and a more coherent consolidated and sustainable cooperation for the benefit of the Bangsamoro people. Madani underscored that the firm commitment of the MILF to the peace process was important in preserving the gains of the peace negotiations and sustaining the ceasefire mechanisms to prevent future violent encounters between forces of the government and the Moro group. In spite of the great disappointment, the MILF would continue to uphold the peace process, and would continue to call on the Bangsamoro people to remain patient and to rally behind the full implementation of the Comprehensive Agreement on the Bangsamoro (CAB).

24. NSG teams reach Gujarat following terror alert (Canada)

DeshGujarat News Online, 2016 03 06

Jalalabad -Four National Security Guard (NSG) squads have reached Gujarat following the input by Pakistan National Security Adviser (NSA) Nasir Khan Janjua to his Indian counterpart Ajit Doval that 10 terrorists had entered the state to carry out strikes. The Pakistan's NSA informed that these are fidayeen from the Lashkar-E-Taiba and Jaish-e Muhammed cadres. As many as 5 abandoned Pakistani boats in creek area close to Indo-Pak border in Kutch have been found in last 3 months. The last boat was found yesterday. A joint meeting of Army, Navy, Coast Guard, Air Force, BSF and Gujarat Police was held late in the evening yesterday in Gandhinagar to discuss alertness. District police chiefs from border and coastal districts were involved in this meeting through video conferencing. DGP PC Thakur told ANI that 3 NSG teams will be kept on stand by mode in Ahmedabad while 1 will be sent to Somnath mandir where Shivratri festivities are going on. Thakur said, entire Gujarat police with pro-active assistance of Centre are on the job, would request people to not panic. – Security has been escalated at Somnath Mandir; – Ahmedabad Crime Branch has formed teams following terror alert and Shivratri festival; Two persons are held by Special Operation Group(SOG) with suspected air boat off Porbandar coast. At least one is believed Canadian citizen. Terror links are not likely.

25. Delhi, Guj, J-K, on high alert after terror threat

Press Trust of India, 2016 03 06

Ahmedabad - Delhi was today put on high alert after Police received inputs that 10 suspected LeT and JeM terrorists believed to have entered India from Pakistan through Gujarat may have sneaked into the national capital for an attack even as four elite NSG teams were rushed to the western state. On the eve of 'Maha Shivratri' festival, Gujarat as well as other metros and Jammu and Kashmir were also on high alert with raids conducted at Kutch and other places, security being beefed up at vital installations, sensitive areas and at all main temples including the famous Somnath temple where a NSG team has been deployed. The Gir-Somnath district authorities have postponed tomorrow's cultural event at Somnath temple owing to the terror threat. In Kolkata, security has been stepped up at NSC Bose International Airport after an e-mail threat that it would be blown up within 24 hours, airport officials said. The e-mail came in the airport manager's ID early today and it was claimed to have been sent from Germany, they said.

26. West India state on alert amid reports of militants entering

The Associated Press, 2016 03 06

Ahmadabad, India - The western Indian state of Gujarat was placed on high alert Sunday after officials said they received intelligence reports that around 10 suspected militants from Pakistan had entered the state. Policemen were checking cars and buses on highways and at the entrance of major cities and towns, said Gujarat's home minister, Rajnikant Patel. Security was also stepped up in the Indian capital, New Delhi, with more police and paramilitary troops assigned to shopping malls, railway stations and other crowded places. All vacations of policemen in the state have been cancelled and they have been asked to report back to work. Around 25 members of India's elite National Security Guards have reached Gujarat to beef up security, Patel told reporters. Some fishing boats have been found abandoned near the coast over the past few days, raising suspicions that militants from Pakistan had entered Gujarat by sea, Patel said, adding that security patrols have been increased along Gujarat's coastline in fears of an attack emanating from neighbouring Pakistan.

27. Capital on high alert as militants said to infiltrate into Gujarat

United News of India, 2016 03 06

New Delhi - Intelligence Bureau has received inputs about ten militants of terrorist organisations Lakshar-e-Taiba and Jaish-e-Mohammad having sneaked into India with Gujarat police expressing apprehension that some of these ultras may have entered Delhi from Gujarat. In a tip-off sent to Delhi police today, Gujarat police has advised the force to step up security in crowded markets and pilgrimage spots among others. It said the terrorists might especially target temples tomorrow on the occasion of Mahashivratri.

28 La Bulgarie annonce le déploiement de militaires à la frontière grecque

Radio France Internationale, 2016 03 06

Sofia - Vue générale du camp de fortune de migrants, près du village d'Idomeni en Grèce, le 5 mars 2016. Quelque 13.000 migrants s'entassaient samedi à la frontière entre la Grèce et la Macédoine dans des conditions d'hygiène déplorable. Avec l'annonce, samedi 5 mars, du déploiement de militaires à la frontière entre la Bulgarie et la Grèce, une partie de l'Europe a décidé de se confiner pour tenter de résister à la pression migratoire. L'Allemagne et la France dénoncent cette situation, qui à terme pourrait créer une véritable fracture : d'un côté les premiers pays exposés à cette vague migratoire, et de l'autre les pays du nord et l'ouest de l'Europe. L'annonce a été faite par le Premier ministre bulgare : son pays va déployer plus de 400 hommes à sa frontière avec la Grèce. Armée, gendarmerie et police équipée de véhicules blindés et d'hélicoptères devraient rester dans cette zone proche de la Macédoine de manière permanente. Ces derniers mois, la Croatie a approuvé des changements dans sa législation afin de pouvoir déployer son armée aux frontières, la Slovénie a fait de même en février dernier et la Hongrie avait lancé le mouvement. Au final, toute une partie de l'Europe a décidé de se protéger face à une pression migratoire qu'elle estime de moins en moins gérable. Cette militarisation des frontières fait suite notamment à la mise en place de quotas d'entrées par l'Autriche. En conséquence, les Slovènes craignent que leur pays ne devienne le point de passage privilégié sur la route des Balkans. De leurs côtés, l'Allemagne et la France plaident pour une amélioration des conditions d'accueil et la mise en place d'une politique de consensus au niveau européen.

29. Russian Embassy Protests 'Well-Organized' Attack on Property in Kiev

Sputnik News Service, 2016 03 06

Kiev - The Russian Embassy in Ukraine has issued a note of protest to the Ukrainian Foreign Ministry in relation to an attack on Russian diplomatic staff vehicles parked near the embassy building, the embassy's spokesman said Sunday. Oleg Grishin told RIA Novosti that a group of unidentified persons clad in balaclavas and armed with baseball bats attacked parked cars near the Russian embassy in Kiev on the night of March 6. Another Attack against the Russian Embassy in #Kiev! Not a single Policeman to be seen.

30. Ukrainian military fire on Donetsk Republic territory - defense ministry

ITAR-TASS World Service, 2016 03 06

Moscow - Ukraine's Armed Forces opened fire 69 times on territory of the self-proclaimed Donetsk People's Republic (DPR) over the past 24 hours, the republic's defense ministry told the Donetsk News Agency on Sunday. The military opened fire on the settlements Zaitsevo, Zhabunki, area of the Donetsk airport and Volvo Center, on the Petrov district of the city, on settlements Nikolayevka, Belaya Kamenka and Yasinovataya. The Ukrainian forces 29 times used 82-mm caliber mortars, as well as they used grenade launchers, an anti-aircraft gun and small arms. At the meeting of the Contact Group on January 13 the sides supported the initiative of Russia's envoy Boris Gryzlov on ensuring complete ceasefire on the territory of Donbass. This is the seventh attempt to fully observe the ceasefire regime in Ukraine's south-east. Ukrainian troops have been engaged in fighting with local militias during Kiev's punitive operation, underway since mid-April 2014, against the breakaway territories - the Donetsk and Lugansk people's republics constituting parts of the Donetsk and Lugansk regions of Ukraine.

31. Visite mouvementée de Ban Ki-moon aux camps de réfugiés sahraouis

El Watan, 2016 03 06

Alger - Le secrétaire général des Nations unies, qui s'est dit «touché» par l'accueil populaire – et militaire – qui lui a été réservé par des centaines de citoyens sahraouis massés sur les deux côtés de la route qui mène d'un hélicoptère improvisé sur une colline vers le centre administratif de Smara, a dû chambouler son programme à la dernière minute. Son staff, présent en force lors de cette visite, a annulé une rencontre avec des écoliers dans un groupement scolaire et une autre avec des jeunes Sahraouis, prévue au sein du bloc administratif qui gère le camp. Des proches d'un jeune homme tué en février dernier par des militaires marocains, soutenus par des jeunes, ont bloqué l'accès au véhicule onusien. Pis, d'autres membres de la délégation, dont l'envoyé spécial des Nations unies, Christopher Ross, ont dû marcher quelques dizaines de mètres avant de pouvoir s'engouffrer dans la cours de l'école 17 Juin. Des jeunes Sahraouis se sont même attaqués à la voiture de Ban Ki-moon à coups de pierres. Plus de peur que de mal, puisque ces actes n'ont provoqué aucun dégât. Ni humain ni matériel. Dehors, des dizaines de femmes crient «autodétermination» ou encore «Sahara libre». Une manière de faire pression sur les responsables onusiens afin de mener le projet de règlement de ce conflit à son terme.

32. G5 Sahel: Boko Haram est comme «des poissons qu'on aurait sortis de l'eau»

Radio France Internationale, 2016 03 06

Ndjamena - Deux importantes réunions du G5 Sahel se sont tenues, cette semaine, à Ndjamena. Le G5 regroupe la Mauritanie, le Mali, le Burkina Faso, le Niger et le Tchad. L'Organisation est née en 2014, d'une volonté commune de lutter contre le terrorisme en alliant sécurité et développement. Au micro de RFI, le major général nigérian Lamidi Adeosun évoque les progrès enregistrés dans la lutte contre le groupe terroriste Boko Haram, plus récemment connu sous le nom de Groupe Etat islamique en Afrique de l'Ouest. Alors que les groupes terroristes opèrent en passant d'un pays à l'autre pour mener des attaques, se ravitailler ou encore pour rejoindre des zones refuges, le G5 se dote d'outils régionaux et planifie régulièrement des opérations conjointes avec le soutien de l'opération Barkhane. Le major général nigérian Lamidi Adeosun était à Ndjamena, au Tchad, pour ces réunions du G5 Sahel. Commandant de la force multinationale conjointe chargée de la lutte contre le terrorisme dans la région et particulièrement contre le mouvement Boko Haram, il fait état d'avancées très importantes dans la bataille contre le groupe terroriste nigérian.

33. Egypt says Hamas, Muslim Brotherhood killed chief prosecutor

The Associated Press, 2016 03 06

Cairo - Egypt said Sunday that the bombing which killed the country's chief prosecutor last year was carried out by members of the now-outlawed Muslim Brotherhood who had been trained in the Gaza Strip by the Palestinian militant group Hamas. Egyptian Interior Minister Magdy Abdel-Ghaffar said dozens of people have been detained in connection to the killing of 65-year-old Hisham Barakat last June, the first assassination of a senior Egyptian official in 25 years. "Hamas trained, prepared, and oversaw the implementation" of the attack, he said in an address broadcast by state and private media, which also aired confessions by some of the alleged perpetrators. There have been no credible claims of responsibility for the attack. The Brotherhood denied any involvement. Hamas could not immediately be reached for comment. Egypt has seen a wave of attacks mainly targeting security forces since the 2013 military overthrow of President Mohammed Morsi, who hailed from the Brotherhood. The government has blamed most of the violence on the Brotherhood -- including attacks claimed by more extreme groups -- and has branded it a terrorist group.

34. Death toll soars in Baghdad suicide bomb attack

The Associated Press, 2016 03 06

Baghdad - A suicide bomber on Sunday rammed his explosives-laden fuel truck into a security checkpoint south of Baghdad, killing at least 47 people and wounding dozens, officials said, the latest episode in an uptick in violence in the war-ravaged country. No one immediately claimed responsibility for the attack, which bore the hallmarks of ISIS. ISIS and other Sunni militants frequently use car bombs and suicide attacks to target public areas and government buildings in their bid to undermine confidence in the Shiite-led government in Baghdad. Among the dead were 39 civilians, while the rest were members of the security forces. The attacker struck shortly after noon when the checkpoint at one of the entrances to the city of Hillah was crowded with dozens of cars, a police officer said. He added that up to 65 other people were wounded and nearly 50 cars were damaged. Hillah is located about 95 kilometers (60 miles) south of Baghdad. A medical official confirmed the causality figures. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity as they were not authorized to release information.

35. Declaring Hezbollah Terror Group Won't Affect Resistance's Position

Fars News Agency, 2016 03 06

Tehran - Chief of Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces Major General Hassan Firouzabadi lashed out at the Persian Gulf Cooperation Council (PGCC) and the Arab League for declaring Lebanon's Hezbollah as a "terrorist group", saying the move will have minimal impact on the resistance movement's regional clout. "No doubt the move was made upon an order by the Zionists and the sworn enemies of Islam and Great Prophet Mohammad (PBUH)," Firouzabadi said on Sunday. He noted that the "hasty and ill-advised" move was made on behalf of the United States and Israel to help materialize their objectives in the region, adding, "Despite efforts by the House of Saud and its regional and trans-regional allies, Hezbollah's deep-seated position will remain intact. It will not shift the balance of power in the region. It will not help the Zionists extend their grip on the occupied Palestinian territories." In relevant remarks on Thursday, Iran's Foreign Ministry Spokesman Hossein Jaber Ansari lashed out at the PGCC for designating Hezbollah resistance movement a "terrorist group". Speaking to reporters, Jaber Ansari said Hezbollah represents Muslim efforts for independence, freedom, justice, and integrity, adding that those who are against the resistance group are in fact siding with the policies of the occupiers of Palestine.

36. Iran, Turkey Discuss Bilateral Ties, Regional Developments

Fars News Agency, 2016 03 06

Tehran -Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif and Turkish Deputy Prime Minister Numan Kurtulmus in a meeting in Jakarta conferred on the latest regional developments as well as ways to bolster bilateral relations between the two countries. During the meeting held on the sidelines of the Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC)'s emergency conference on Palestine and the situation in the holy city of Qods, Zarif and Kurtulmus also held talks on the current visit by Turkish Prime Minister Ahmet Davutoglu to Tehran. Davutoglu heading a high-ranking delegation arrived in Tehran Saturday morning to mark the first official visit by a Turkish premier in the wake of the nuclear Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action. He is accompanied by ministers of economy, customs and trade, energy, transport, communications and development, government officials and representatives of major Turkish media. The visit follows consultations between the two countries' foreign ministries with the objective of expansion and strengthening of political, cultural, and economic relations. Considering the combination of the Turkish prime minister's entourage, economic and trade issues will top the agenda of his meetings in Tehran, including achieving the 30-billion-dollar outlook in Iran-Turkey commercial ties.

37. Indian priest kidnapped in Yemen retirement home attack

Reuters, 2016 03 06

Aden - Gunmen have kidnapped an Indian priest from an old people's home they attacked last week in southern Yemen killing at least 15 people, local government and security officials said on Sunday. The Indian Foreign Minister announced on her twitter account an Indian national identified as Father Tom Uzhunnalil had been "abducted by terrorists in Yemen." The minister, Sushma Swaraj, added that officials in neighboring Djibouti were trying to ascertain the whereabouts of Father Uzhunnalil "so that we can secure his release." Officials in the local government of Aden confirmed that the priest had been kidnapped and said authorities were investigating the attack.

38. Hamas-linked operative 'who recruited terrorists in Egypt' nabbed

The Jerusalem Post, 2016 03 06

Jerusalem - Security forces on Sunday announced the arrest of a suspected terror operative who allegedly belonged to a Hamas-linked group and was active in terror financing and recruitment of West Bank Palestinians in Egypt. The Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) intelligence agency, together with the Israel Police, arrested 33-year-old Muhammad Nazal, from Kabatiya in the West Bank, as he crossed from Jordan to Israel via the Allenby land crossing at the end of January. In 2007, security force said, Nazal moved to Cairo, Egypt, to study. In Egypt, he joined the Holy Warriors Battalion (Khatib Al-Mujahadin) terror group, the Shin Bet said, a Fatah Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade splinter organization that adopted radical Islamic tendencies. The group's members have in recent years plotted a number of attacks against Israeli targets, including rocket fire, and attempts to set up attacks within Israel, the Shin Bet added. This group "is in touch with Hamas in the Gaza Strip, and receives funding and instructions from it," the agency stated.

39. Forces spéciales. Qui sont-elles ?

Le Télégramme, Jean Guisnel, 2016 03 06

Analyse: Les récentes révélations sur la présence de forces spéciales françaises en Libye et l'enquête lancée, dans la foulée, par Jean-Yves Le Drian, pour « compromission du secret défense », a braqué une nouvelle fois les projecteurs sur ces unités d'élite de l'armée déployées partout dans le monde. Qui sont ces soldats ? En quoi consistent leurs missions en terre hostile ? Comment vivent-ils leur engagement ? C'est l'objet de notre enquête. Dans la grande, l'immense base militaire de Gao, au Mali, une enceinte fermée abrite quelques dizaines des militaires les plus discrets de l'armée française : les forces spéciales. Si on les voit, c'est qu'ils ne se sont pas cachés, mais il est inutile de les aborder : ils ne répondent pas et cultivent avec soin une attitude lointaine, ne seyant qu'à ceux qui vivent dans le secret des dieux. Forts de cette étonnante coquetterie qui les conduit à ne pas porter le même uniforme que les autres soldats, ils composent le leur avec une science consommée du détail : la parka, les chaussures, les gants et les indispensables lunettes de soleil se doivent de venir des meilleures marques, qu'ils payent sur leurs propres deniers. Folklore ? Bien sûr... Ils seraient bien les seuls militaires à ne pas y céder. Qui leur jetterait la pierre ? Car l'important n'est pas là. Mais dans le fait que ces 3.000 soldats sont le fer de lance de l'armée française. Ils appartiennent aux trois armées - ceux de la marine sont essentiellement basés à Lorient - et sont considérés comme leurs meilleurs éléments. François Hollande les a déployés récemment en Libye. Commandos invisibles. Leurs spécificités sont très particulières. Peu nombreux, ils sont très souples d'emploi. Ces hommes sont souvent très expérimentés, du fait qu'ils combattent actuellement d'un bout à l'autre de l'année sous tous les cieux, du Moyen-Orient à l'Afrique. Extrêmement bien équipés avec tous les matériels les plus modernes, ils sont également très autonomes et très « légers ». S'ils ont à leur disposition des hélicoptères de combat Tigre et Caracal, ils n'ont pas d'avions de chasse mais seulement des avions de transport. Forces spéciales. Unités spécialement formées, instruites et entraînées pour mener un éventail de missions particulières, dans le cadre d'un conflit classique ou bien relevant de la guerre non conventionnelle. Cela va des actions d'infiltration, de contre-terrorisme et de maintien de la paix, aux actions de guérilla et de neutralisation d'objectifs vitaux pour l'ennemi, en passant par la libération d'otages et l'exfiltration de ressortissants nationaux menacés à l'étranger. Qu'elles durent quelques heures ou plusieurs semaines, les opérations menées par les forces spéciales ne sont pas clandestines, contrairement à celles confiées au service Action de la Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE) dont les hommes agissent, eux, sans uniforme.

40. France: disparition de deux jeunes filles suspectées de radicalisation

Radio France Internationale, 2016 03 06

Paris - En France, deux mineures ont disparu dans le département de Haute-Savoie. Les deux jeunes filles avaient été signalées comme « radicalisées » et elles ont apparemment fugué vendredi soir. La gendarmerie nationale a diffusé samedi 5 mars un appel à témoin. Personne ne semble les avoir vues depuis vendredi, en début d'après-midi. Pour le Parquet, les deux jeunes filles, âgées de 15 et 16 ans, souhaitent se rendre ou sont déjà parties en Syrie. « C'est ce qui ressort de leurs déclarations », assure un communiqué des magistrats qui précise que l'une des deux adolescentes avait été soupçonnée de radicalisation et qu'elle était suivie. Placée en foyer, la jeune fille faisait l'objet d'une interdiction de sortie du territoire. L'autre adolescente est visée depuis samedi matin par la même mesure. Une mesure rendue possible par la loi anti-terroriste votée par les députés français en septembre 2014. Ce texte développait les moyens de lutte contre le cyberterrorisme et instaurait l'interdiction administrative de sortie du territoire contre tout individu soupçonné de vouloir rejoindre les groupes jihadistes à l'étranger. L'identité des deux lycéennes a été transmise à la police des frontières et à tous les pays de la zone Schengen. Les compagnies de transport ont interdiction de les prendre en charge. Les adolescentes auraient quitté leur région de la gare de Chambéry.

41. Six convicted PKK militants break out of Diyarbakır prison

Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 03 06

Ankara - Six convicted militants of the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) have broken out of a D-Type prison in the southeastern province of Diyarbakır amid ongoing counterterror operations in the province. The sextet were reported missing from the Diyarbakır D-Type prison in the Kayapınar district following a roll call on the morning of March 6. While the identities of the convicts remain unclear, reports indicate they were PKK militants who were sentenced to jail terms for "membership in a terror organization" and "guilt by association." According to state-run Anadolu Agency, an unspecified number of the convicts were among those who escaped from an M-Type prison in the eastern province of Bingöl on Sep. 25, 2013.

1- Spy agencies eye more wide-ranging partnership

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 04 02

Ottawa— Canada's two main spy agencies are looking to "maximize" opportunities to work together despite continued concerns about watchdogs' ability to keep tabs on joint operations. Documents obtained by the Star show the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) are looking for new and expanded ways to align their operations. But as Canada's intelligence agencies co-operate more and more, those charged with reviewing the spies' actions may have a harder time seeing the big picture. The heavily censored documents were sent by CSE chief Greta Bossenmaier and CSIS director Michel Coulombe to Richard Fadden, the national security adviser to the prime minister, in August 2015. Fadden was both a former director of CSIS and the former top bureaucrat at National Defence, which is responsible for CSE. Fadden announced his retirement on Thursday. Bossenmaier and Coulombe suggest the two agencies are trying to "leverage (CSE's) Mandate C authorities," and set up a working group to "maximize opportunities for operational collaboration." That could spell trouble for the small group of independent watchdogs reviewing the spy agencies' activities. Both Security Intelligence Review Committee and the CSE Commissioner's office can review their respective agencies but can't conduct joint investigations.

2- We should arm the Saudis while protecting Canada against their influence

Financial Post Online, Lawrence Solomon, 2016 04 02

Column: Saudi Arabia is a moral leader in the Sunni world, a rare source of stability in the Middle East, Canada's biggest trading partner in the MENA (Middle-East North Africa) region and currently a military ally of Canada's and the West's. More pertinently, in today's world of Muslim Brotherhoods and ISILs that want not only to take over the Middle East but also to export their mayhem to our shores, the Saudis should be seen as de facto protectors of the West: By helping to overthrow Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood regime and taking on ISIL in Syria, the Saudis have thwarted the expansionist dreams of these terrorist organizations. Yet many Canadians wag their finger at the Liberal government's decision to complete a $15 billion arms sale to Saudi Arabia on the single-minded view that the Saudis don't share our values when it comes to human rights. The human rights activists who are so intent on protecting the rights of Saudi women and Saudi gays from the strictures of Sharia law might start with protecting Canadians who frequent the Saudi-funded radical mosques and other Islamic institutions in Canada that preach like beliefs. Toronto's Salaheddin Islamic Centre, one of whose founders was linked to al-Qaeda and which was funded by Saudi Arabia's King Fahd himself with a US$5 million capital grant and US$1.5 million per year for operations, would be but one institution deserving of the activists' attention. This rapidly expanding, multi-million-dollar operation, a target of RCMP and CSIS investigations, is especially known for its anti-gay preaching.

3- Bill C-51 anti-terror arrests without a crime concern legal experts

CBC News, Solomon Israel, 2016 04 02

Toronto— Some Canadian legal experts are concerned about police use of an anti-terrorism provision in Bill C-51 that makes it easier for them to arrest people who haven't committed any crime. The use of the new provision, Section 810.011 of the Criminal Code, in recent cases such as that of Ontario man Kevin Omar Mohamed is drawing criticism that the law is both redundant and over-powerful. "The Criminal Code already had provisions in place whereby the police could detain individuals for a number of inchoate offences," says Sukanya Pillay, executive director of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. "In particular, we're concerned that by doing this, we're normalizing these exceptional powers, and the case hasn't been made that they're needed," says Pillay. Peace bonds have been used against terrorism suspects since before Bill C-51, although it's difficult to pin down the exact number of times. Craig Forcese, a legal scholar at the University of Ottawa who has studied Bill C-51 extensively, estimates they have been used in terrorism cases 16 times since 2001. Forcese says peace bonds under Section 810.011 suffer from a "Goldilocks"-style dilemma, describing them as potentially too powerful and yet not powerful enough. He says peace bonds "won't necessarily stop a determined, dangerous person" who is truly intent on doing harm.

4- Mother denies claims her son sympathizes with terror group

Toronto Star, Dan Taekema and Alex Ballingall, 2016 04 02

Toronto— Kevin Omar Mohamed is in jail because police allege he went to Turkey to join a terrorist group. His mother says it was an innocent family vacation; she and Mohamed's brother were along for the trip. So if the RCMP wants to throw her son behind bars, she says they should lock her up, too. "If they want to arrest Kevin for going there (Turkey), then they should be arresting all three of us," said Mohamed's mother, Debbie. "He has done nothing wrong." The 23-year-old former University of Waterloo student was arrested last week and later charged with "participating in the activity of a terrorist group." The RCMP alleges he went to Turkey in April 2014 to join Jahbat al-Nusra, an Al Qaeda branch fighting in Syria that the Canadian government considers a terrorist organization. Speaking to media for the first time, his mother told the Star she and her sons had been planning the trip for a long time before they visited the country in 2014. According to Debbie, Mohamed went ahead a week early but was later joined by her and her eldest son, who had stayed back to write an exam.

5- PM: Canada will offer $42M to help protect nuclear material from terrorists

Canadian Press, Alex Panetta, 2016 04 01

Washington— Canada is contributing $42 million to global efforts to protect nuclear materials and keep them away from terrorists. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau was among several world leaders making similar commitments Friday at a nuclear safety summit in Washington, an event aimed at sustaining nuclear safety as a long-term international priority. The summit is the last of four organized during the presidency of Barack Obama, who made the issue a priority amid signs that al-Qaida and other terrorist groups were actively seeking nuclear weapons. It's now incumbent on the international community to make sure those efforts continue after Obama leaves office, Trudeau suggested Friday. "Risks associated with terrorist groups getting their hands on nuclear material are not restricted to any one country," he said.

6- Sikh man viciously attacked in Quebec City

CTV News, 2016 04 02

Toronto— A Toronto-area Sikh man says he was verbally abused and beaten while vacationing in Quebec City by a group of men who targeted him because of his brown skin and turban. Supninder Singh Khehra is still recovering after he was punched in the face and kicked last Saturday by seemingly drunk strangers, whose attack was recorded on video. Khehra said he was out with friends after dark and trying to hail a cab when a car full of men approached and started shouting at him in French, swearing and pointing at his turban. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau told reporters in Washington, D.C., that such “hateful acts” have “no place in Canada.” “We stand clearly against the kind of discrimination and intolerance that that represents,” the prime minister said. Khehra also said he is heartened by an outpouring of support on social media, since CTV News first reported the story.

7- FBI Offers Help to Agencies On Phones

Wall Street Journal, Devlin Barrett, 2016 05 02

Washington— The Federal Bureau of Investigation told law enforcement agencies around the country Friday it would try to help them open locked phones or other devices as much as “legal and policy constraints” allow. The unusual guidance from the nation's premier law-enforcement agency is in response to a surge of interest from state and local authorities in how the agency was able to open a locked iPhone seized in the probe of a terror attack in San Bernardino, Calif., in December. The FBI advisory seems to be aimed at reassuring police and prosecutors that while they don't have much to tell them now, they hope to provide more information and possibly help in the near future.

8- FBI ponders sharing tool to help unlock iPhone with local law agencies

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima and Adam Goldman, 2016 04 02

Washington— The FBI and Justice Department are debating whether the hacking tool that helped the bureau unlock the iPhone of one of the San Bernardino, Calif., terrorists can be used to help state and local law enforcement, officials said Friday. That will be a challenge because the bureau has classified the tool, making it difficult to use in state and local criminal prosecutions requiring disclosure of evidence to defendants, officials said. “There’s a desire to be forward-leaning to help state and local law enforcement,” said a senior law enforcement official, who, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss an ongoing investigation. “But no one knows quite what the answer is.” Moreover, the tool itself likely will have a shelf life of only a few months, as tech companies may find and fix the vulnerabilities that the tool exploits, and they periodically update the underlying software. The firm that helped the bureau — not the Israeli company Cellebrite, as had been widely rumored — charged a one-time flat fee, officials said.

9- A C.I.A. Officer's Tale of the Fog of Secret War and a Mission's Futility

New York Times, Mark Mazzetti, 2016 04 02

Washington— In Douglas Laux's final days as a C.I.A. officer, the futility of his mission prompted him to quote George Orwell to his boss. Mr. Laux had spent months in 2012 working with various Middle Eastern nations that were trying to ship arms to Syria to help disparate rebel groups there. But it had become clear to him that the C.I.A. had little ability to control the squabbling and backstabbing among the Saudis, Qataris and other Arabs. He told a senior C.I.A. officer he felt like Winston Smith, the character in “1984” known for his fatalism, because he was carrying out his work without comprehending the politics and competing agendas thwarting progress in aiding the rebellion. “I understand the how,” Mr. Laux said, paraphrasing one of Smith's famous lines. “I do not understand the why.” It is a sentiment that might sum up much of Mr. Laux's career at the C.I.A., an organization he served for eight years as an undercover case officer and soldier in the agency's shadowy conflicts overseas. His career at the agency began with a tour at a remote firebase in southern Afghanistan and ended with a spot on the agency's Syria Task Force -- a life in war zones that is emblematic of the lives of a large cadre of American spies who joined the C.I.A. after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He left the agency three years ago, but is speaking publicly about his experiences there for the first time in conjunction with the release of a memoir. The collective weight of all C.I.A. memoirs written since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks could collapse a bookshelf, but Mr. Laux brings a raw perspective to the canon. His memoir is not filled with recollections of White House meetings or lengthy defenses of waterboarding. Mr. Laux was thousands of miles from Washington, a grunt in a secret war.

10- Obama Chides Trump's Take on Weapons

Washington Post, Mark Landler, 2016 04 02

Washington— President Obama on Friday questioned Donald J. Trump's fitness for office after statements from the Republican front-runner that the United States and its allies should move away from decades of constraints on the use of nuclear weapons. "We don't want somebody in the Oval Office who doesn't recognize how important that is," Mr. Obama said. Speaking to reporters at the end of a summit meeting devoted to nuclear security, the president said the comments by Mr. Trump reflected a person who "doesn't know much about foreign policy or nuclear policy or the Korean Peninsula or the world generally." Mr. Obama has not hesitated to criticize Mr. Trump for contributing to a coarse tone and circuslike atmosphere on the campaign trail. But his criticism of the candidate's comments on nuclear proliferation was not about public language or personal style, but about one of the gravest responsibilities of an American president. It carried an extra edge because it involved an issue that Mr. Obama has made a central goal of his presidency. He said world leaders and other participants at the conference had expressed concerns about Mr. Trump's comments during private conversations with him at the summit meeting, which gathered more than 50 world leaders to discuss ways to reduce the threat of a nuclear attack, whether from the leakage of nuclear fuel or the theft of a bomb by a terrorist group.

11- Obama calls on world leaders to confront ISIS

Washington Post, David Nakarama, 2016 04 02

Washington— President Obama rallied world leaders Friday to confront the growing threat of the Islamic State and defended his administration's aggressive use of airstrikes against terrorist groups outside of declared war zones. Obama said that in recent weeks the U.S. military has stepped up attacks on terrorist training camps that have killed scores of suspected fighters aligned with al-Qaeda or the Islamic State in Libya, Yemen and Somalia. Typically, such strikes outside of war zones like Iraq, Syria and Afghanistan have been directed at suspected terrorist leaders or other "high-value targets," Obama said. The chaos in ungoverned areas of places such as Libya and Yemen have given terrorist groups more latitude to set up training facilities.

12- Obama details nuclear terrorism's threat

Globe and Mail, Robert Fife and Paul Koring, 2016 04 02

Washington— U.S. President Barack Obama called for global action Friday to safeguard nuclear facilities and prevent Islamic terrorist "madmen" from getting their hands on nuclear weapons or a highly radioactive dirty bomb. Speaking at the Nuclear Security Summit in Washington, Mr. Obama said nuclear terrorism was a persistent threat to the world, despite significant progress to protect and dispose of nuclear material. "There is no doubt if these madmen ever got their hands on a nuclear bomb or a nuclear material, they would certainly use it to kill as many innocent people as possible," he said. "It would change the world." Mr. Obama singled out the Islamic State group, which has used chemical weapons, including mustard gas, in Syria and Iraq, and al-Qaeda, which has long sought to obtain nuclear material. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau took an active part in the discussions and announced that Canada will spend $42-million to help secure nuclear stockpiles and to dispose of highly radioactive material around the world. Canada will also provide $51-million to help fund counterterrorism measures in the Middle East and North Africa. "The risks associated with terrorist groups getting their hands on nuclear material are not restricted to any one country," Mr. Trudeau said. "We need to make sure we are continuing our effort that we can work in solid partnership across borders to ensure nuclear security remains a high priority." Mr. Trudeau joined Mr. Obama and British Prime Minister David Cameron in stressing the importance of countering radical extremism, which has led hundreds of young people to join the Islamic State.

13- La surveillance de masse menacerait la diversité d'opinions

La Presse, Marc Thibodeau, 2016 04 02

Endroit non identifié— La surveillance de masse des communications en ligne pousse nombre d'internautes à s'autocensurer, y compris ceux qui affirment « n'avoir rien à cacher », et limite la diversité d'opinions à un degré préoccupant. Le constat figure dans une nouvelle étude parue dans la revue Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly qui sonne l'alarme quant à l'impact potentiellement néfaste sur la liberté d'expression de pratiques mises en lumière aux États-Unis par Edward Snowden. L'ancien consultant de la National Security Agency (NSA) avait notamment affirmé en 2013, documents à l'appui, que l'influent service de renseignements était en mesure d'accéder au contenu des serveurs de géants de la Silicon Valley comme Google, Facebook et Yahoo!. Les firmes désignées ont démenti toute collaboration sans pour autant convaincre la population américaine, qui demeure très partagée quant à l'utilisation de programmes de surveillance à grande échelle par le gouvernement pour lutter contre le terrorisme

14- State Dept. suspends review into 'top secret' Clinton emails

Associated Press, 2016 04 01

Washington— The State Department has suspended its internal review into whether former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton or her top aides mishandled emails containing information now deemed "top secret." Spokeswoman Elizabeth Trudeau said Friday the department had paused the review to avoid interfering with an ongoing FBI investigation into Clinton's use of a private server while she was America's top diplomat. She said the decision was made after the department sought the FBI's advice on how to proceed with the review and received word that it should follow its standard practice. Trudeau said the department's standard practice is to place internal reviews "on hold while there is an ongoing law enforcement investigation under way." An FBI spokeswoman declined to comment.

15- Why the CIA placed an explosive on a school bus

Washington Post, staff reporters, 2016 04 02

Washington— Briar Woods High School, a half-hour drive from the CIA's headquarters in Northern Virginia, might have provided an ideal training ground for the agency's bomb-sniffing dogs. Its labyrinthine hallways and voluminous classrooms are home to something that can wreak havoc for the canines: polished floors, which cause dogs to slip and lose their focus as they hunt for explosives. That was one reason the school, which educates nearly 1,700 students in Ashburn, played host to a CIA dog team for a training exercise while students were on spring break last week, according to the Loudoun County school system. But the choice to go to a public school for the quiet exercise has led to an only-in-Washington embarrassment for the elite spy agency, which left explosive material behind in the engine compartment of a school bus that then shuttled special-needs children for two days this week. A mechanic discovered and removed the explosive putty — which county Supervisor Koran Saines (D-Sterling) said was the demolition explosive C-4 — during a routine bus maintenance check Wednesday. Until then, no one noticed that it was missing. That the CIA was using live explosives and lost track of them in a place where children and teachers spend their days has raised concerns among parents about the use of a school facility for such training. It also illuminates the fact that local authorities and school systems feel obliged to prepare for scenarios that once seemed unthinkable, such as gunmen firing at schoolchildren and bombs hidden on buses.

16- Navy moves for new intelligence chief

Washington Post, Craig Whitlock, 2016 04 02

Washington— The Navy is finally moving to end a long spell during which its intelligence chief hasn't been able to see, hear or read any military secrets. Navy officials say Vice Adm. Jan Tighe, now the commander of the U.S. Fleet Cyber Command, will soon be nominated to become the chief of naval intelligence. If confirmed by the Senate, she would replace Vice Adm. Ted "Twig" Branch, whose access to classified information was suspended in November 2013 when he was swept up in a still-unfolding Justice Department corruption investigation. Branch has been under scrutiny for his ties to Leonard Glenn Francis, an Asia-based defense contractor commonly known in Navy circles as Fat Leonard. Francis has pleaded guilty in federal court to bribing scores of Navy personnel with cash, prostitutes and luxury hotel rooms in exchange for classified or sensitive information about ship movements and competitors' secrets.

17- Van driver is convicted in jihadist plot to kill airman

UK Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 04 02

London— Islamic State offered hacked addresses of British army personnel to UK-based jihadists plotting a beheading attack, it can be revealed after two extremists were told they faced jail yesterday. A delivery driver from Luton was in contact with the head of the Isis hacking operation in Syria before being caught with plans to murder a US serviceman at a base in East Anglia. Junead Ahmed Khan, 25, obtained plans for a pipe bomb and had ordered a hunting knife before counterterrorist police intervened. At the Old Bailey yesterday he was convicted of preparing an act of terrorism and preparing to go to Syria to join Isis with his uncle, Shazib Khan, 23. The revelation that Isis offered private details of members of the British armed forces to the delivery driver, who chose instead to target an American serviceman, put security services on high alert amid fears of a similar killing to the murder of Fusilier Lee Rigby in Woolwich in 2013.

18- Plot to behead British troops

Daily Mail, Arthur Martin and James Slack, 2016 04 02

London— Details of a chilling Islamic State plot to behead soldiers on the streets of Britain were revealed last night. The terror group offered what it claimed were the addresses of Army personnel to UK-based extremists planning a Lee Rigby-style attack. The existence of the plot emerged after a British jihadi was convicted yesterday of planning a terror attack at RAF bases in East Anglia. Junead Khan, 25, used his job as a van driver to carry out hostile reconnaissance of RAF Lakenheath and RAF Mildenhall in Suffolk and Norfolk's RAF Feltwell. He planned to stage a road accident before killing a US airman outside.

19- Nuclear terrorist threats 'terrifying'

Australian Associated Press, 2016 04 02

Canberra— There are "terrifying possibilities" that terrorists could get access to nuclear material to make dirty bombs, Foreign Minister Julie Bishop warns. Speaking on the sidelines of a global nuclear summit in Washington on Saturday, Ms Bishop said Australia was committed to the global effort to secure nuclear material amid fears of the potential for a nuclear terrorist attack. The summit is dealing with hypotheticals of what could occur and how to prevent it. "There is a high level of concern that nuclear material could fall into the hands of terrorists or terrorist groups or that they would get sufficient material to make what is called a dirty bomb," Ms Bishop told reporters. "It was so heartening to see so many countries represented here, exchanging ideas, exchanging experiences and working collaboratively to ensure that the nuclear material for civilian purposes is held as tightly and securely as possible with a commitment to reducing the risk that terrorists could gain control."

20- 'Pakistan needs to get to bottom of India's interference in Balochistan'

Indo Asian News Service, 2016 04 02

Islamabad— Pakistan needs to "get to the bottom of India's interference in Balochistan", but in doing so Islamabad needs to "tread carefully" and diplomatically engage with Iran, a friend of India, in the effort to "expose" the "RAW network based in Chabahar", a Pakistani daily has said. In an editorial, titled "Shaky Ground", The News International said that the "capture of the Indian spy Kulbhushan Yadav may affect not only our relationship with India but with Iran too". The arrest of Yadav coincided with the visit of Iranian President Hassan Rouhani to Pakistan, and army chief Raheel Sharif brought up the "RAW issue" (Research and Analysis Wing - India's external intelligence agency) with Rouhani, "only for the Iranian President to deny it", writes the daily. It went on to say: "Now we have found that the spy had a valid Iranian visa and we believe there is an entire RAW network based in Chabahar. We have asked for Iranian help in dismantling it. Interior Minister Nisar Ali Khan met the Iranian ambassador in Islamabad to discuss these issues on Friday."

21- Somali Militant Leader Believed Killed in Strike

New York Times, Helene Cooper, 2016 04 02

Washington— An American drone strike in Somalia is believed to have killed a key leader of the Shabab militant group, a United States government official said Friday, as the Obama administration continued its intensified air campaign against the group. First word of the strike came when the Pentagon press secretary, Peter Cook, said in a statement emailed to reporters that the American military, in cooperation with the government of Somalia, was still assessing whether Thursday's attack had succeeded in killing Hassan Ali Dhoore, described as an important member of the Shabab security and intelligence wing. Defense Department officials said he was involved in two high-profile attacks in Mogadishu more than a year ago in which Americans were killed. But one United States official, speaking on condition of anonymity to describe initial assessments of the attack, said the military believed that Mr. Dhoore and two others had been killed in the strike, which occurred near Jilib, south of Mogadishu.

22- Atelier sur le rôle de la justice pénale dans la lutte contre le terrorisme - Fin des travaux sur une note positive (Canada)

All Africa, 2016 04 02

Alger— Les travaux de l'atelier d'experts sur "le rôle de la justice pénale dans la lutte contre le terrorisme" tenu à Alger, ont pris fin jeudi dans la soirée sur une note "positive" ont jugé les participants, et ce dans l'élaboration d'un système juridique complémentaire dans les pays concernés. Les travaux de cet atelier organisé par les groupes de travail du Forum mondial de lutte contre le terrorisme (FGCT), sur le renforcement des capacités des pays de la région du Sahel co-présidé par l'Algérie et le Canada, ont été "riches" et "positifs" ont indiqué à l'APS des sources diplomatiques au terme de deux jours de travaux. Les lacunes dans les capacités des institutions à établir des cadres juridiques efficaces de lutte contre le terrorisme ont fait l'objet de plusieurs discussions et ateliers de formation avec les pays du Sahel, sous l'égide du FGCT.

23- President emphasizes Argentine contributions to nuclear security (Canada)

Buenos Aires Herald, 2016 04 02

Washington— President Mauricio Macri has confirmed that his administration remains committed to the peaceful use of nuclear energy and the prevention of the illicit trafficking of nuclear materials. The president took advantage of the Nuclear Security Summit in Washington DC to portray Argentina as a country that can forge ahead with research and the production of energy while ensuring that all of its reactors use low-enriched uranium. Highly-enriched uranium, which is used in some nuclear reactors, is necessary for nuclear weapons. Addressing most of the world's nuclear powers in Washington yesterday, Macri said, "Argentina is consolidating a process of reconversion, in which all of our reactors use low-enriched uranium. Even if it has been argued that this reduction could obstruct nuclear activities, the Argentine case shows that it can be done." Further to the bilateral meetings that he held with Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and New Zealand Prime Minister John Key on Thursday, Macri met with the President of the European Council Donald Tusk yesterday.

24- Obama, Xi reaffirm commitment to full implementation of U.N. sanctions on N. Korea: White House

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 04 02

U.S. President Barack Obama and Chinese President Xi Jinping reaffirmed their commitment to fully implement the new package of U.N. Security Council sanctions on North Korea, the White House said Friday. Obama and Xi held one-on-one talks on Thursday on the sidelines of the Nuclear Security Summit. North Korea was among the key topics of discussion, along with other thorny issues such as cybersecurity, maritime disputes and human rights. "Both leaders committed to ... strengthen coordination in addressing the shared threat presented by North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons and ballistic missile systems," the White House said in a readout. "Both leaders affirmed their commitment to achieving the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula and the full implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 2270."

25- N. Korea denounces UNSC for rejecting call for sanctions against U.S.

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 04 02

Seoul— North Korea strongly denounced the U.N. Security Council on Saturday for rejecting its recent demand to punish the United States for staging what it claims to be war exercises aimed at toppling its communist regime. An unidentified spokesperson from the North's foreign ministry said the country had recently demanded the U.N. Security Council hold an emergency meeting and review joint military exercises between South Korea and the U.S. "The reason we filed such a complaint was because the U.S.-South Korea joint military exercises, in terms of their scope and aim, are threatening world peace and security while violently violating our right to self-defense stated in the U.N. Charter," the spokesperson said in a report carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency (KCNA). "The U.N. Security Council's rejection of our call to bring the U.S.-South Korea joint military exercises before the council laid bare for the whole world to see its true identity as nothing but a faithful political tool of the U.S.," the North Korean official was quoted as saying.

26- Putin calls for end to Nagorno-Karabakh clashes

BBC News, 2016 04 02

Moscow— Russian President Vladimir Putin has called for an end to fighting after clashes broke out in the disputed Caucasus region of Nagorno-Karabakh. Azerbaijan said 12 of its soldiers had been killed and a helicopter shot down. TV pictures showed a burned out vehicle and craters after gunfire and shelling. Azerbaijan and Armenia accused each other of starting the fighting. Nagorno-Karabakh has been in the hands of ethnic Armenian separatists since a war that ended in 1994.

27- Iran stresses friendly ties with Pakistan after spy allegations

Trend News Agency, 2016 04 01

Tehran— The Iranian Embassy in Pakistan has stressed friendly ties with Pakistan, stressing that media controversy over the alleged origins of an arrested spy would disturb the existing atmosphere between the two neighbor countries. “The Embassy of the Islamic Republic of Iran believes spreading of such news items is the product of thinking which does not like further expansion of ties between the two countries,” IRNA news agency quoted the Embassy as saying April 1. On Thursday, Islamabad asked Tehran to hand over details of the arrested former Indian Navy officer Kulbhushan Jadhav, accused of sabotage and terrorism by Pakistan. Pakistan claimed the arrested person was affiliated to Indian intelligence services, but India dismissed the claim.

28- Ex-Mossad chief: I broke the law ‘doing what I was doing’

Times of Israel, 2016 04 02

Jerusalem— Former Mossad chief Efraim Halevy recently told Jewish students in London that he had broken the law doing the things I was doing,” but declined to give specifics. There is no such thing, I believe, as absolute justice. Sometimes justice for you is injustice for somebody else. We have to recognize it,” the London-born ex-spymaster told Jewish students during a talk at King’s College, London. A video of the comments was aired Thursday by Israel’s Channel 2 television. The talk was part of a program by the Israel-based Gesharim” (bridges) organization, which works to bring together young Jews from around the world. I studied law... I finished law with distinction, which helped me learn how to break the law when I needed to so every so often,” Halevy said dryly, earning a round of laughter. Did I break the law when doing the things I was doing? Yes. I won’t tell you how many times I broke the law because I don’t want to spend the rest of my life in jail,” he said.

29- ‘Restoration of Yemen govt a must to defeat Al-Qaeda’

Arab News, 2016 04 02

Paris— Brig. Gen. Ahmad Al-Assiri, spokesman of the Arab coalition forces in Operation Decisive Storm and adviser to Deputy Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman, said during his visit to France that the cease-fire in Yemen will take effect on April 10. He said Europe has downgraded the problem in Yemen to one about Al-Qaeda, which is “not right.” He said the organization fled Saudi Arabia to take shelter in Yemen, where there is no authority to oppose it. Any intention to defeat the terrorists requires strengthening Yemen’s legitimate government. He said terrorist groups grow where there is no stability or state, noting that Daesh controls places in Syria and Iraq because the two countries are currently weak, as is the case in Yemen. He said working on stabilizing Yemen will take time and will not succeed if imposed from outside. The Yemenis themselves should do this job through a capable state.

30- Syria cease-fire unravelling as fighting erupts near Aleppo

Associated Press, 2016 04 02

Beirut— Syria’s partial cease-fire is unravelling, as fierce fighting between government forces and opposition fighters, including members of the al-Qaida affiliated Nusra Front, erupted Saturday outside the country’s second largest city of Aleppo. At least 25 pro-government fighters died in clashes south of Aleppo, where the Nusra Front and rebel militias captured a hill overlooking a major highway, a Britain-based monitoring group told The Associated Press. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said fighting continued throughout the day Saturday close to the village of Tel al-Ais, which overlooks the main road connecting Aleppo with the capital, Damascus.

31- Dossier attentats: un homme soupçonné d'être un complice de Reda Kriket placé sous mandat d'arrêt

RTBF, 2016 04 02

Bruxelles— Un troisième homme a été interpellé ce vendredi dans le centre de Bruxelles dans le cadre de l'enquête sur Rida Kriket, le présumé terroriste arrêté à Argenteuil en France. Yassine Alami est soupçonné d'être un complice de Reda Kriket. Il a été inculpé pour participation à un groupe terroriste et placé sous mandat d'arrêt le 1er avril. Le parquet n'a pas souhaité communiquer davantage de renseignements "dans l'intérêt de l'enquête". Le djihadiste présumé Reda Kriket a été arrêté en banlieue parisienne dans le cadre d'une enquête menée par une Équipe Commune d'Enquête (J.I.T.) de policiers belges et français. Dans l'appartement occupé par Kriket à Argenteuil, les policiers avaient découvert fusils d'assaut, armes de poing et explosifs, dont du TATP, l'explosif artisanal prisé par les djihadistes de l'EI.

32- Belgian Authorities Charge Third Suspect in French Terror Plot

Wall Street Journal, Viktoria Dendrinou, 2016 04 02

Brussels— Belgian national has been charged with participating in the activities of a terrorist group, the country's federal prosecutor said Saturday. The suspect, which the authorities identified as Y.A., born in 1982, has been placed in custody in connection with the investigation that led to the arrest of Reda Kriket in a Paris suburb on March 24. French police said they had found explosives and weapons in Mr. Kriket's Paris apartment and authorities said he was on the verge of committing an attack. The suspect is the third person to be charged in connection with a foiled French terror plot. Mr. Kriket was arrested on March 31 and the judge decided on his charges Friday, said Thierry Werts, a spokesperson for Belgium's federal prosecutor. The other two other suspects, Rabah M. and Abderrahmane A., were arrested last week.

33- A Molenbeek, le difficile combat contre les recruteurs de l'EI

Agence France-Presse, 2016 04 02

Bruxelles— Ils se fondent dans la masse, accostent des jeunes dans la rue en jouant sur leurs "frustrations": des recruteurs du groupe jihadiste Etat islamique continuent d'embrigader des jeunes à Molenbeek, même s'ils ont perdu du terrain depuis deux ans. La Belgique, 11 millions d'habitants, compte en proportion le plus grand nombre de jeunes partis se battre en Syrie d'Europe (plus de 500 depuis 2011) et Molenbeek, commune d'où sont originaires certains des kamikazes et organisateurs des attentats de Paris, a été rapidement pointée du doigt comme un vivier de jihadistes. A 18 ans, Sofian, qui cherche un emploi comme agent de sécurité, n'a jamais été approché lui-même, mais plusieurs de ses amis ont été abordés en pleine rue, dans un parc ou un hall d'immeuble de Molenbeek. "Au début, on se dit +ce sont des mecs comme des autres qui peuvent être sympa+, mais au final on voit qu'ils ont des idées assez extrêmes. On les capte assez vite, ils disent +viens avec moi en Syrie, ici tu as une vie de merde+", raconte-t-il à l'AFP. "Et sur internet, c'est la même chose, ils ne s'en cachent pas, que ce soit sur Facebook avec les photos ou avec les messages qu'ils laissent ou même avec les vidéos qu'ils partagent". "Il y a une sociologie particulière qui fait que les recruteurs peuvent être plus facilement à l'oeuvre sans être dérangés à Molenbeek que dans d'autres communes", explique Olivier Vanderhaeghen, fonctionnaire chargé de la prévention.

34- Foreign fighters are evading Europe's security net

Associated Press, 2016 04 02

Brussels— When Ibrahim El Bakraoui blew himself up in the Brussels Airport check-in area, killing and maiming scores of travelers, it was at least the third time he had passed unimpeded through an airport terminal in recent months. Suspected by Turkey of being a "foreign terrorist fighter" and known at home in Belgium as an ex-con wanted for parole violations, Bakraoui was still allowed to board a commercial airliner unaccompanied last summer, flying freely from Istanbul to the Netherlands and disappearing without a trace. The ease with which he did so raises questions about how much governments know about the movements of returnees among the 5,000 home-grown jihadis who have trained and fought in places like Syria or Iraq. Many now pose a "serious threat," according to the police agency Europol. Some, like Bakraoui, have already used their deadly skills in cities like Brussels or Paris. Testimony from government ministers, extracts of documents and conversations with police, border and aviation officials reveal a series of security gaps, misunderstandings and procedural red-tape that surrounded the deportation last July of this future suicide bomber.

35- Bruxelles: la police interpelle des manifestants antiracistes place de la Bourse

Le Soir, 2016 06 02

Bruxelles—La police bruxelloise a interpellé différentes personnes qui souhaitaient participer à un rassemblement antiracisme samedi midi à la Bourse. Au moins dix personnes ont été menottées dont le président de la Ligue des Droits de l'Homme, a appris Le Soir. Ce alors que quelques hooligans ont été aperçus à proximité du piétonnier. Rudi Vervoort a interdit tout rassemblement ce week-end dans la Région bruxelloise. La police entend bien faire respecter l'arrêté du ministre-président bruxellois.

36- Des mères sans frontières dans la lutte contre le jihadisme

Agence France-Presse, 2016 04 01

Vienne— La traque des jihadistes mobilise les forces de sécurité et les services du renseignement du monde entier mais aussi celles qui les connaissent plus intimement: leurs mamans. C'est une "compétition directe" qui se joue entre les mères de famille et les "recruteurs qui dispensent leur influence toxique dans les mosquées lorsque les enfants deviennent adolescents", analyse Edit Schlaffer, fondatrice en 2002 de l'ONG Women without Borders (Femmes sans frontières, WWB), basée à Vienne. Forte de ce constat, cette sexagénaire autrichienne a souhaité que les mères deviennent des vigies dans la détection de signes de radicalisation chez leurs enfants et adolescents, qu'ils soient originaires de Belgique, d'Indonésie, du Cachemire ou du Nigeria. Les "écoles des mères" ouvertes depuis 2012 par l'ONG dans divers pays visent à donner des clefs pour prévenir un basculement des jeunes dans le jihadisme ou pour tenter de les en sortir. Après avoir côtoyé d'autres femmes dans la même situation, lors d'un atelier récemment organisé à Vienne, Fatima Ezzarhouni, dont le fils est en Syrie depuis juin 2013, dit "ne plus se sentir seule". Même si cette Belge de 44 ans est habitée par le sentiment qu'elle ne "le reverra plus jamais". L'événement de Vienne mêlait "diplômées" ayant suivi les dix modules de cette formation antiradicalisation, et futures participantes, comme Mme Ezzarhouni.

1. The price we won't pay

The Toronto Sun, Michele Mandel, 2016 05 01

Column: Kidnapped Canadian journalist Amanda Lindhout had just been threatened with a knife to her throat. And then her Somali captors dialed her mother in Alberta and gave her the phone. “Mom, listen to me, OK?” Lindhout wept during the call taped by the RCMP in December, 2008. “If you guys don’t pay $1 million dollars for me, by one week, they will kill me, OK? Tonight they have brought me out to kill me and but, but they have, they’ve given me one more chance to call you guys.” Lorinda Stewart begged her daughter to stay strong during the harrowing call. “Is there any way that you guys will be able to pay them in one week?” Lindhout sobbed. “Amanda,” her mother said, “we are trying to do everything we can to get money together for you ‘cause the government won’t pay.” As heartbreaking, as cold as that may be, that’s our official policy — the Canadian government will not pay, or so the mantra goes. Like the United States, like Britain, we have pledged not to give in to extortion. “I want to make one thing perfectly crystal clear,” Prime Minister Justin Trudeau reiterated Tuesday after Canadian hostage John Ridsdel was executed by an Islamist terror group in the Philippines. “Canada does not and will not pay ransom to terrorists, directly or indirectly.” It’s a compelling, defiant declaration. It’s the right moral call. But as a nation, do we have the stomach to watch another Canadian killed while we adhere to our high moral principles? For terrorist organizations, kidnapping Westerners has become a growth industry fuelled by states willing to pay for the safe return of their countrymen. In 2013, the G8 nations pledged to stop paying ransom to terrorists. The UN has the same directive. And yet many European countries — France and Germany are cited most often — have found ways of channelling suitcases filled with money to militant groups in exchange for their citizens. A 2014 New York Times investigation found Al Qaeda and its affiliates had earned at least $125 million US from kidnappings since 2008, about half of that cash collected in 2013 alone. As we debate what Ottawa should do as another Canadian life hangs in the balance, the discussion should also consider what we can realistically expect from our government, especially when we ignore warnings and venture into areas known to be dangerous. “Let’s be frank. Any Westerner going abroad right now in certain parts of the world is a prime target with a dollar sign attached,” says the former Ottawa official. “The ability of the Canadian government to save your ass if something goes wrong is extremely limited.” Those who think otherwise have been watching too many movies. “There is no Hollywood scenario of sending in the JTF2 with guns blazing to save the hostages,” scoffs Michel Juneau-Katsuya, a former senior intelligence officer with CSIS. “I think Ottawa is stuck here. The sad reality is that Canada has both of its hands tied behind its back.”

2. Canada’s spies in spat over privacy breach reporting

The Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 05 01

Ottawa - Canada’s electronic spies are concerned reporting too many details about serious privacy breaches could reveal too much about the agency’s highly secretive surveillance and cyber-defence activities, the Star has learned. The Communications Security Establishment has been in a yearlong spat with privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien’s office over reporting “material” privacy breaches. The spy agency’s reluctance comes despite government-wide regulations requiring all serious privacy breaches — those that potentially could cause serious harm to an individual, or involving a large number of Canadians — to be disclosed to the independent watchdog. “As with all (government) departments and agencies, CSE is required to report material privacy breaches to the Office of the Privacy Commissioner,” CSE spokesman Ryan Foreman wrote in a statement. “However, we do continue to discuss the most effective manner to report material privacy breaches when they occur in the operational space, in a matter that safeguards the sensitive nature of information related to CSE's mandated activities." Documents obtained by the Star show that "discussion" has been going on since at least January of last year. In a letter sent to a senior Treasury Board employee, released under access to information law, Therrien took aim at a proposal to provide only limited information to his office about privacy violations at CSE. "A report that does not state the number of breaches does not give the Office of the Privacy Commissioner enough information to have a clear discussion with the institution in question," Therrien wrote. "The expertise of the Office of the Privacy Commissioner can not, therefore, be put to use." A change in Treasury Board policy under the previous Conservative government requires all federal departments and agencies to report "material" privacy breaches to the commissioner and the Treasury Board. As the single largest repository of Canada's top secret information, CSE certainly handles sensitive information. The agency is a member of the Five Eyes alliance, a group of closely aligned security and intelligence agencies in the U.K., U.S., Australia and New Zealand. The alliance was shaken by revelations from whistleblower Edward Snowden in 2013, who pulled back the curtain on those countries' mass surveillance capabilities and tools. In the wake of those disclosures, the normally press-adverse CSE has been more open about its mandate and the steps it takes to protect Canadians' privacy.

3. Non-violent responses to terrorism often ignored

Winnipeg Free Press, John Longhurst, 2016 05 01

Comment: Is the war on terror working? Not according to Scott Taylor, editor and publisher of Esprit de Corps magazine. "Bombing Syrian villages does not make Canadian streets safe, and it is impossible to wage war against a tactic," the former Canadian soldier and war correspondent says. Attacking the Islamic State (also known as Daesh) forces in Syria and Iraq "will in no way impact the actions of the Daesh fanatics who are launching attacks in Europe," he adds. Taylor is not alone. Many say it is impossible to defeat terrorism with war. So what's the alternative? For George Lakey, it is non-violence. In a year-old blog post making the rounds on Facebook recently, the Quaker activist and academic proposes eight non-violent techniques to address terror. The first is economic development. "Poverty and terrorism are indirectly linked," he says. "Economic development can reduce recruits and gain allies." Second is reducing cultural marginalization. "As France, Britain and other countries have learned, marginalizing a group within your population is not safe or sensible; terrorists grow under those conditions." Third is non-violent protest and unarmed civilian peacekeeping. Lakey points to the success of the civil rights movement in the U.S., which overcame terror by the Ku Klux Klan and other groups through non-violence, and also to contemporary examples such as Peace Brigades International, which puts unarmed civilians between warring groups in places such as Central America, Africa, and Asia.

4. Deradicalization is about much more than just religious scripture

CBC News, Steven Zhou, 2016 05 01

Comment: An emphasis on counterterrorism and deradicalization by successive administrations in Canada has put the country's Muslim minority under consistent scrutiny. The rise of Daesh in the Middle East and high-profile terrorist attacks in Ottawa, Paris and Brussels have shifted public opinion in a way that puts the onus on western Muslims to prevent "their own people" from committing such acts. This unfair logic has prompted an array of responses from Canadian Muslims; including that of some Muslim religious leaders, who've tried to solve the problem of youth radicalization by promoting deradicalization clinics or ideological detox programs. Canada's most recent iteration of this idea comes from the Council of Canadian Imams (CCI), an influential organization that represents a significant number of Canadian Muslim religious leaders. In 2016, the group announced that it wants to set up three deradicalization clinics in Toronto and nearby communities by fall. They've yet to disclose how such a clinic will operate but have announced that their method will be a "holistic" one that incorporates mental health practitioners and sound theology. The idea of Muslim-led deradicalization clinics has a history in Canada that goes at least as far back as the Toronto-18 case of 2006, when over a dozen Muslim Canadian men were arrested for planning to hatch a bomb plot. Some have since been convicted and the fear of homegrown radicalization has never left the Canadian public. An undercover mole in the Toronto-18 case, Mubin Shaikh, emerged as a popular Canadian expert on deradicalization. He promoted a method of ideological detox that mirrors the 12-step program used by Alcoholics Anonymous. (Note: Steven Zhou is a Toronto writer who has experience in human rights advocacy. He has worked for Human Rights Watch, Oxfam Canada and other NGOs.)

5. Liberals pledge to implement all access-to-information promises 'as quickly as possible'

Global News, Anna Mehler Paperny, 2016 05 01

Toronto - The federal Liberals say they'll bring in all the access-to-information promises in their election campaign as soon as possible — some as early as this winter. That includes giving Information Commissioner Suzanne Legault the power to order information. A spokesperson for Treasury Board President Scott Brison says that's always been the plan for a "two-phase" approach, with the first phase making good on campaign promises, including significant changes to the Access to Information Act, and the second phase being a full review of the Act. Last month, when Brison said the government wouldn't review the Act until 2018, the understanding was that this would push back the Liberals' promised reforms. That was a misunderstanding, Brison's office says. "As quickly as possible, and as early as this year, we will introduce legislation to implement our platform commitments and other significant improvements identified through our collaboration with parliamentarians and our consultations with the Canadian public," Brison's press secretary Jean-Luc Ferland wrote in an email.

6. Forced to leave her girls behind

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 05 01

Analysis: It has been just 10 days since Hanif found freedom from Daesh. Freedom from a long ordeal of sexual abuse, beatings and forced labour at the hands of Islamist extremists as she was "sold" 14 times, traded from one man to another like a common commodity. But despite a joyous reunion with her husband, Homdi, her daring escape has not ended the family nightmare. The couple's four daughters - ages 12, 15, 17 and 19 - remain under the control of Daesh, also known as ISIS and ISIL, "married" to the group's fighters. Even their youngest girl. "They tortured us and assaulted us on every level," she says, speaking through an interpreter. Hanif is among almost 16,000 people, mostly Yazidis, who have taken refuge at the Rwanga Community Camp, just outside the northern Iraqi city of Duhok. Hanif related her story this week to journalists from the Toronto Star and CTV News. She is weary and appears burdened by emotion that is too much to bear. She avoids the worst details of the humiliating treatment and abuse. But even this account is horrifying, as Hanif describes the abuse she endured in the grim knowledge that her daughters continue to suffer. Like many in the camp, Hanif's horrors began almost two years ago as Islamic extremists began murderous advances that had Yazidis, followers of an ancient religion mostly based in Kurdish Iraq, in the crosshairs. Once taken captive, the women were forced to convert to Islam or be killed.

7. How to Beat ISIS: Blow Up the Money

NBC News, Robert Windem & William Arkin, 2016 05 01

Washington - The U.S. has quietly turned to a new strategy in fighting ISIS — follow the money, then blow it up, U.S. officials tell NBC News. At least four times in the past four months, U.S. military jets have targeted [major] ISIS financial centers, destroying them in strikes that have turned millions of U.S.

dollars into confetti. The U.S. has also killed ISIS financial leaders — its "oil minister" in 2015 and its "finance minister" in March. The strikes are the fruit of a secret cyber war in which the U.S. is tracking, manipulating and even stealing or destroying the financial assets of terrorists. Five years after the SEAL raid that killed Osama bin Laden on May 1, 2011, it's a subtle shift from the U.S. strategy against al Qaeda in which degrading the operational leadership was the priority. Just as unraveling the courier network was critical to tracking bin Laden, the cyber efforts against the ISIS financial network are critical to upending ISIS, say U.S. officials. Unlike al Qaeda, ISIS is trying to run a government and control a big chunk of land, and it has a constant need for hard currency to pay its fighters and bureaucrats and feed its population. The war is not just about tracing the movement of money but the movement of individuals linked to the cash. It's part of what CIA Director John Brennan calls a broader cyber effort against ISIS. "They are murderers and we need to be able to change this narrative — including in the cyber environment, the digital domain, in social media," said Brennan. "It is a question of what type of activities might take place in that cyber environment that we would be able to carry out destructive actions against." Financial transactions, one senior intelligence official tells NBC News, have become one of the most lucrative forms of intelligence on personal relations, foreign fighter movements, and sources of supply. The intelligence community tracks ISIS financial transactions through data collection programs with such secret code names as "Kaching" (CIA), "TRACKFIN" (NSA) and FINO (the National Clandestine Service). Newly created electronic portals for the processing of what is now called financial intelligence (or FININT) — Swordfish, QLIX/HYDRA and Sentry, among others — fuse together conventional banking, transaction and intercepted data.

8. North Korea sends another US citizen to prison

Associated Press, 2016 05 01

Pyongyang - North Korea on Friday sentenced a U.S. citizen of Korean heritage to 10 years in prison with hard labor after convicting him of espionage and subversion, the second American it has put behind bars this year. Kim Dong Chul was sentenced after a brief trial in Pyongyang by North Korea's Supreme Court, which found him guilty of espionage and subversion under Articles 60 and 64 of the North's criminal code. North Korea regularly accuses Washington and Seoul of sending spies in an attempt to overthrow its government. Outsiders say North Korea seeks to use its U.S. detainees to wring concessions from Washington. Further details were not immediately available. When Kim was paraded before the media in Pyongyang last month, he said he had collaborated with and spied for South Korean intelligence authorities in a plot to bring down the North's leadership and had tried to spread religion among North Koreans before his arrest in the city of Rason last October.

9. US once again forced to turn to Russia for help on Syria

The Associated Press, Matthew Lee, 2016 05 01

Washington - Scrambling to resuscitate a nearly dead truce in Syria, the Obama administration has again been forced to turn to Russia for help, with little hope for the desired U.S. outcome. At stake are thousands of lives and the fate of a feeble peace process essential to the fight against the Islamic State group, and Secretary of State John Kerry has appealed once more to his Russian counterpart for assistance in containing and reducing the violence, particularly around city of Aleppo. Kerry spoke at length on Friday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to that end, and had been hoping to meet with Lavrov soon, according to U.S. officials. Kerry was scheduled to arrive in Switzerland late Sunday for talks with U.N. envoy Staffan de Mistura, Saudi Foreign Minister Adel al-Jubeir and Jordanian Foreign Minister Nasser Judeh, and planned to return to Washington on Monday. But Lavrov was not expected to be in Geneva, complicating Kerry's efforts to make the case directly to the Russians for more pressure on their Syrian government allies to stop or at least limit attacks in Aleppo. The State Department said Kerry, in his meetings, would review ongoing efforts to reaffirm the cessation of hostilities nationwide in Syria, obtain the full humanitarian access to which the Syrian government committed and support a political transition." Specific, viable options to achieve those broad goals are limited, and Friday's announcement of a new, partial cease-fire that does not include Aleppo underscored the difficulty Kerry faced.

10. Cain on Chaotic Anti-Trump Protests: 'These Are Violent Riots, Pure and Simple'

Fox News, 2016 05 01

Washington - Today on Fox and Friends Weekend, Herman Cain reacted to the chaotic protests against Donald Trump in California in advance of a speech the GOP frontrunner gave there yesterday. "These are violent riots, pure and simple," Cain said. "And they are intended to strike fear into the hearts of Trump supporters and smear his campaign. That's all it is." Cain noted that some protesters had booked hotel rooms in advance of the event and putting up banners, saying it showed the protest was "well-organized" and "somebody had to pay for it."

11. Hackers' $81 Million Sneak Attack on World Banking

The New York Times. Michael Corkery, 2016 05 01

Washington - Tens of millions of dollars siphoned from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. A shadowy set of casinos in the Philippines. A large bank in Bangladesh with creaky technology. An unknown — and perhaps uncatchable — group of anonymous thieves with sophisticated hacking skills. What unites this curious cast of characters and enabled one of the most brazen digital bank heists ever is a ubiquitous and highly trusted international bank messaging system called Swift. Swift — the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication — is billed as a supersecure system that banks use to authorize payments from one account to another. "The Rolls-Royce of payments networks," one financial analyst said. But last week, for the first time since hackers captured $81 million from Bangladesh's central bank in February, Swift acknowledged that the thieves have tried to carry out similar heists at other banks on its network by sneaking into the beating heart of the global banking system. "There are many banks out there right now saying, 'There but for the grace of God go us,'" said Gareth Lodge, a payments analyst at Celent, a financial consulting firm. The admission that the attack was not a one-time event in a developing country but perhaps part of a broader threat has thrust Swift into a spotlight, raising questions about how securely money is being moved around the world. Some financial security experts point out the Swift system is only as safe as its weakest link. The attack also reflects a growing sophistication among digital criminals, who for years have been breaching personal bank accounts and stealing credit card credentials. The thieves in Bangladesh may have spent months lurking inside the central bank's computers, studying how to steal the necessary credentials to gain access to Swift.

12. I Was the Voice-Over for Bin Laden

The New York Times, Nihar Patel, 2016 05 01

Comment: It's rare when we find ourselves as the right person in the right place at the right time. More often, it's an unsatisfying mix of those and other variables: The place is right, the timing is spot on — only you were off. I was 22 years old, and one day into an internship at the ABC program "Nightline," when the Sept. 11 attacks happened. They woke this country up from the slumber of the 1990s, and in my case, from a jet-lagged coma in a corporate housing unit down the street from the Pentagon. In a week, I went from a sheltered college existence to having ash on the balcony from the smoldering crash site nearby. My fellow interns and I soon realized we weren't ready for the real world to introduce itself so cataclysmically. A White House intern friend, exhausted by the unending hours of TV coverage, marched to the video store one night, bought a VHS copy of the movie "Notting Hill" and proceeded to wear it out with almost nightly viewings. I went in the other direction and consumed hours of news coverage, studying what occurred from every angle, as if I were still cramming for a final exam I needed to ace. It will forever be a dark time for this country. It was also a terrible time in American history to look or appear even remotely Muslim. A Pakistani-American colleague stopped wearing a prayer ring — given to her by her grandmother — that had Arabic script on it because she got suspicious looks on the subway. My friend and roommate, who like me is Indian-American, waited up for me that first week after I'd stumble out of the office at 3 a.m. He did this partly to get the latest news, but also to make sure I was safe from the kind of random retaliation Muslims and even non-Muslims like myself were enduring. We had a villain back then: Osama bin Laden, the man who caused all that pain, anger and anxiety. Monday is the fifth anniversary of his death. News outlets will most likely focus on what has replaced him, the fragmented, nihilistic terrorism of groups like the Islamic State. But I've been thinking back to the months after Sept. 11, when Bin Laden spoke to us through video and audio messages — and I voiced them on screen. Five years after his death, Bin Laden seems buried in our collective consciousness, as deep as his body is in the ocean. What remains are those tapes, and our memories of that time. It was a moment in my life when the best advice I could've received was simply "knock it off."

13. If Abadi fails to survive chaos, U.S. must decide what's next

The Washington Post, Greg Jaffe, 2016 05 01

Washington - President Obama's plan for fighting the Islamic State is predicated on having a credible and effective Iraqi ally on the ground in Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi. And in recent days, the administration had been optimistic, despite the growing political unrest in Baghdad, about that critical partnership. But that optimism - along with the administration's strategy for battling the Islamic State in Iraq - was thrown into severe doubt after protesters stormed Iraq's parliament on Saturday and a state of emergency was declared in Baghdad. The big question for White House officials is what happens if Abadi - a critical linchpin in the fight against the Islamic State - does not survive the turmoil that has swept over the Iraqi capital. The chaos in Baghdad comes just after a visit by Vice President Biden that was intended to help calm the political unrest and keep the battle against the Islamic State on track. As Biden's plane was approaching Baghdad on Thursday, a senior administration official described the vice president's visit - which was shrouded in secrecy prior to his arrival - as a "symbol of how much faith we have in Prime Minister Abadi." After 10 hours on the ground in Baghdad and Irbil, Biden was hurtling toward his next stop in Rome. The feeling among the vice president and his advisers was that Iraqi politics were on a trajectory to greater calm and that the battle against the Islamic State would continue to accelerate. Some hopeful advisers on Biden's plane even suggested that Abadi might emerge from the political crisis stronger for having survived it.

14. How the CIA failed a spy who went missing in Iran

The Washington Post, Valerie Plame, 2016 05 01

Book Review: In a world of seemingly random massacres in Paris, Brussels and San Bernardino, Calif.; Islamic State beheadings; and an erratic potentate in a nuclear-armed North Korea, we like to think that the CIA, the FBI and the other 14 agencies charged with gathering intelligence are doing their damndest to keep us safe. And, for the most part, they are. But embedded within the vast U.S. intelligence complex is a bloated bureaucracy that creates turf battles and inefficiencies that can lead to dire and even deadly consequences. The tale of Robert Levinson - a retired Drug Enforcement Administration and FBI agent turned CIA contractor who disappeared in 2007 from a resort island in the Persian Gulf - underscores the dangers of the multi-headed bureaucratic monster called the CIA. In January of this year, after the United States and Iran reached a deal to curb the Islamic republic's nuclear program, the two countries swapped prisoners. Levinson was not part of the agreement. Proof that he was alive has come only twice - in a 2010 video, during which he pleaded for help from his government, and in 2011 photos of Levinson wearing an orange prison jumpsuit and looking ill and disheveled. Barry Meier's new book, "Missing Man," catalogues how Iranian and U.S. officials knew far more about Levinson's disappearance than previously acknowledged. Through the contacts and machinations of Doug Coe, head of a powerful and secretive Christian organization called the Fellowship, the U.S. government learned from the Iranian ambassador to France in late 2011 that Iran was holding Levinson. But the ambassador would not say where he was being held or by what faction. He said Levinson would be released on one condition: An upcoming report by the International Atomic Energy Agency on Iran's nuclear program had to conclude that its activities were peaceful. When the report was released, though, it did no such thing. It held that Iran was indeed working on components of a nuclear weapon. Levinson never materialized.

15. ISIS hackers threaten to leak 'British secret intelligence' obtained from Ministry of Defence The Mirror UK, Jonathan Sharman, 2016 05 01

London - Islamic State hackers have threatened to leak "secret intelligence" they claim to have obtained from a mole at the Ministry of Defence, and say they are slowly "infiltrating" the UK and America. A group calling itself the Islamic State Hacking Division made the claim in an anti-drone warfare document that purported to make public the identities, addresses and other details of US Predator and Reaper drone operators. The terrorists used the hit-list document to suborn the murder of drone teams it dubbed "cowards". But the details of US military personnel appeared to have been scraped from publicly-accessible sources like Facebook, rather than obtained through a hack or leak, the Sunday Times reported. Several British ISIS terrorists, including the murderer Mohammed Emwazi, known as Jihadi John, have been killed in drone strikes.

16. Guantanamo Bay 'terror' lag nominated for diversity award at posh bash sponsored by British spooks The Sun News, Katie Hodge, 2016 05 01

London- A former Guantanamo Bay prisoner was nominated for an award at a bash sponsored by MI5 and MI6. Moazzam Begg, 47, is a director of pressure group Cage, which called ISIS killer Jihadi John a "beautiful man". Begg was put forward for a "positive role model" honour at the National Diversity Awards in the Race, Religion and Faith category. Sponsors listed on the site include GCHQ, MI5 and MI6. Former terror suspect Begg was arrested in Pakistan in 2002 and held by the US until 2005, when he was freed without charge. He trumpeted his nomination to his 17,000 Twitter followers, writing: "I've been nominated for National Diversity Award. "Haters will boil, tabloids will rage & MI5 will scratch heads." Begg was also held in the UK in 2014 suspected of terror offences but charges were dropped.

17. SBS squad in Libya is ambushed by suicide bombers Mail on Sunday, Ian Gallagher, 2016 05 01

London - Britia Special Forces have been ambushed by Islamic State suicide bombers in Libya, according to a well-informed Israeli website. The attack is said to have happened last Wednesday and reportedly killed or wounded Italian troops travelling in a convoy with the Special Boat Service (SBS) personnel, who apparently escaped uninjured. Vehicles packed with explosives drew up alongside the convoy transporting the Italian and British troops and blew themselves up, said the Debka news website. Its report was based on unnamed military and intelligence sources and comes amid speculation that the SBS and Special Forces Support Group, alongside their allies, are planning an assault on the terror groups stronghold city of Sirte. According to Debka, the ambush happened after the elite troops "accompanied by Libyan military" set off from the coastal city of Misrata, heading in the direction of Sirte, 150 miles to the south-east. Other ISIS fighters shelled the convoy with mortars and strafed it with heavy machine gun fire, the website reported. The Western force was only able to escape after Italian and French warplanes and attack helicopters intervened.

18. Isis hackers publish hitlist of drone pilots

The Sunday Times, Dipesh Gadher, 2016 05 01

London - ISIS hackers with links to Britain have published a "hitlist" of dozens of American military personnel purportedly involved in drone strikes against terrorists in Syria and Iraq. A group calling itself the "Islamic State Hacking Division" yesterday circulated online the names, home addresses and photographs of more than 70 US staff, including women. It urged supporters: "Kill them wherever they are, knock on their doors and behead them, stab them, shoot them in the face or bomb them." The group also claimed that it might have a mole in Britain's Ministry of Defence and threatened to publish "secret intelligence" in the future that could identify RAF drone operators. The claim could not be verified. The Isis hacking division was previously led by Junaid Hussain, a former computer hacker from Birmingham who was killed by a US drone strike in Syria last August after he was discovered to be orchestrating attacks against the West. His wife, Sally Jones, a Muslim convert from Kent, is still believed to be involved in the organisation, which in the past has urged "lone wolf" attacks against RAF bases in the UK. Inquiries made by The Sunday Times yesterday suggested that the names on the American hitlist are genuine. However, the information published by Isis does not appear to be the result of a leak or genuine hack. Instead, the group seems to have painstakingly gleaned the names of Reaper and Predator drone operators from news articles and military newsletters, before matching them to addresses, photos and other personal details from publicly available sources on the internet.

19. Money cards come under terror law scrutiny

Australian Associated Press, 2016 05 01

Canberra - The federal government plans to assess the risk of stored-value cards, which are believed to have been used in the Paris terror attacks, as it strengthens Australia's anti-money-laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws. A review of the nation's AML/CTF laws tabled in parliament on Friday includes 84 recommendations to bolster the regime. One of the recommendations Justice Minister Michael Keenan says the government has identified for action is a risk assessment of the stored-value cards. The review, carried out by the Attorney-General's Department, says evidence is increasing that pre-paid SVCs and other financial products providing anonymity for individuals are being used to finance terrorism. "For example, in the November 2015 terrorist attacks in Paris, there are indications that the terrorists had anonymous prepaid SVCs delivered to them in nearby countries to book hotel rooms," the report says. The report says anti-money laundering regulator AUSTRAC should assess the risks of these cards, to see whether the AML/CTF regulatory thresholds for these cards - at $1000 or more, if cash can be withdrawn, or $5000 or more, if cash cannot be withdrawn - should be maintained.

20. Nuclear-powered subs a 'no-brainer'

The Advertiser, Daniel Wills, 2016 05 01

Canberra - Australia's future submarine fleet could be transitioned to include a potent mix of both intelligence gathering diesel boats and rapid, fast-moving nuclear-powered vessels once the state develops a sophisticated atomic industry based around storage, Business SA says. The Federal Government is facing calls from across the strategic policy and business communities, as well as from an outspoken SA Senator, to strongly consider the nuclear option. SA rejoiced this week in the expectation of thousands of new jobs as the Federal Government selected French naval giant DCNS to build 12 new conventional diesel-powered subs in Port Adelaide, which are charged with defending the nation's waters for a generation. Premier Jay Weatherill visited DCNS's Cherbourg shipyard on Friday Adelaide time, just hours after SA was chosen as the likely site of a low-level nuclear waste dump, and as former governor Kevin Scare puts the finishing touches on a Royal Commission due for release within days. Business SA chief executive Nigel McBride, who joined the Cherbourg tour to observe the construction of a nuclear Barracuda sub that will become the template for Australia's diesel fleet, said there was strong national defence reasons for having a mix of the two. Diesel subs are prized for their ability to become completely silent when powered down, while nuclear vessels are much faster and do not need to resurface for fuel and battery charging.

21. Turnbull splashes $8m on security ad campaign

Canberra Times, Adam Gartrell, 2016 05 01

Canberra - The Turnbull government is spending $8 million on a new national security advertising blitz that will run throughout the election campaign. The new ad campaign - "If it doesn't add up, speak up" - has just kicked off and will run until June 30, two days before polling day. The ads will run across television, radio, print and online, as well as outdoors. Government tender documents show the campaign will cost taxpayers at least $8.2 million. The Attorney-General's Department has contracted Sydney-based advertising firm Mitchell & Partners to run the campaign. The department has also spent at least $150,000 on the "market research" that underpins the new ads. The research found there were low levels of community awareness about the national security hotline. The campaign is reminiscent of the US Department of Homeland Security's "If you see something, say something" campaign. Australian authorities ran a similar campaign with the same slogan. The main TV ad opens on a busy city scene as the voice-over says: "In our fast-paced world it's easy to miss anything unusual. But with the ongoing threat of terrorism we all need to play a part by reporting anything suspicious." The ad cuts to a taxi rank near a shopping mall and we see a man carrying some shopping and a sports bag. The man drops the bag to wave down a cab and an older man behind him looks down to see passports, a few old mobile phones, some mobile phone batteries and large rolls of money. "Even if you think it's probably nothing, the smallest piece of information can be valuable," the voice-over says.

22. 'Warthogs' make statement over South China Sea

The Washington Post, Dan Lamothe, 2016 05 01

Analysis: The situation in the South China Sea has grown even more complex during the past week, with A-10 attack planes flying maritime patrols over a coral reef chain known as Scarborough Shoal. It's less than 150 miles to the west of the Philippines and is considered a site where Beijing may carry out "land reclamation" and continue its military expansion in the region this year, prompting concern from the United States and its partners in the region. The A-10 might seem like an unlikely plane for the mission, though. The heavily armored twin-engine "Warthog" has been in service since the 1970s and was designed for close-air support, in which combat aircraft assist ground troops by attacking enemy tanks, vehicles and positions. None of that is around Scarborough Shoal, and the plane is considered more vulnerable than other U.S. military planes against surface-to-air missiles. The A-10 also is slower than numerous rival aircraft, including the Chinese J-11B fighter used to intercept a Navy P-8 Poseidon surveillance plane in August 2014 in a move the Pentagon criticized as aggressive and dangerous.

23. Abu Sayyaf frees 10 Indonesian captives (Canada)

Philippine Star, Roel Pareño, 2016 05 01

Zamboanga City - The Abu Sayyaf group freed 10 Indonesian sailors on Sunday after holding them captive for 37 days in the jungle of Sulu, a police official said. The source told The STAR that a ransom was allegedly paid to free the hostages, who had been taken at gunpoint from a tugboat sailing from Malaysia. The military, whom President Benigno Aquino III has directed to launch an all-out offensive against the bandit group, refused to provide information on the release. Jolo Police chief Police Superintendent Junpikar Sitin said the victims were escorted by emissaries to the house of Sulu Gov. Totoh Tan in Barangay Asturias, Jolo town around noon. A civilian source said the delivery of the released captives was made amid a downpour. The victims were provided meals and had a brief conversation with Gov. Tan inside his residence. According to Sitin, the 10 freed captives were later brought to the trauma hospital inside Camp Teodulfo Bautista in Barangay Busbus for medical checkups. The police official could not confirm the reports that ransom was paid to the Abu Sayyaf but a source on the ground, who asked not to be named for lack of authority to give statements, said a huge ransom was paid. It will be recalled that the Abu Sayyaf group demanded a P50-million ransom for the 10 hostages, whom they took from the tugboat MB Brama while it was in Malaysian waters on March 26. The Abu Sayyaf still holds four Indonesian crew members of another tugboat seized on April 1 in the waters off Sempornah, Sabah and brought to Sulu. The group, which the Philippines and the US have categorized as a terrorist group, is also holding three remaining Samal tourists -- a Canadian, Norwegian, a Filipino woman -- a Dutch national, four Malaysians, a Chinese national and six other Filipinos. The release of the 10 Indonesian captives came almost a week since the Abu Sayyaf beheaded Canadian captive John Ridsdel after the deadline to pay a P300-million ransom lapsed.

24. Militants free 10 Indonesian hostages in south Philippines (Canada)

Associated Press, Jim Gomez, 2016 05 01

Manila - Abu Sayyaf militants have freed 10 Indonesian crewmen who were seized at sea in March in the first of three attacks on tugboats that have sparked a regional maritime security alarm, officials said Sunday. The Indonesians appeared to be in good health when they were dropped off Sunday afternoon in front of the house of Sulu province's governor in the town of Jolo, said the town's police chief, Junpikar Sitin. The 10 men were then brought to a Philippine military camp and arrangements were underway to turn them over to Indonesian officials. A photo seen by The Associated Press shows the sunburned men in fresh shirts eating rice and chicken with Sulu's governor on a veranda beside a Japanese-style garden in his house. In another photo, some of the men are puffing cigarettes and enjoying coffee while resting on chairs. Jolo's mayor, Hussin Amin, welcomed the release of the Indonesians, but said he did not know whether a ransom had been paid. "If this big release came in exchange for money, those who paid are supporting the Abu Sayyaf," he said. "This money will be used to buy more firearms and will be utilized as mobilization funds by these criminals." Indonesian President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo thanked the Philippines and the "many parties" in Indonesia who cooperated to secure the release of the hostages. Abu Sayyaf gunmen beheaded a Canadian hostage in Sulu last Monday after they failed to receive a huge ransom by a deadline they had set. Philippine troops launched an offensive against the Abu Sayyaf after the beheading, and Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has vowed to help the Philippines bring the killers to justice. More than a dozen foreign and local hostages remain in the hands of the Abu Sayyaf, including another Canadian and a Norwegian who were kidnapped last September, and a Dutch bird watcher who was kidnapped more than three years ago.

25. Guns, speedboat found but no sign of Abus (Canada)

Philippine Daily Inquirer, 2016 05 01

Mindanao - Security forces scoured islands in Mindanao for suspected Abu Sayyaf extremists who beheaded a Canadian tourist last week but have so far stumbled only on a small cache of firearms and a speedboat in Tawi-Tawi province, the military reported over the weekend. Operations are proceeding amid rising fears the extremely violent Islamic State (IS), to which the Abu Sayyaf is now believed linked, may be looking to southern Philippines and other parts of Southeast Asia to set up another rebel caliphate—possibly this year. In a statement to media via SMS on Friday, the Armed Forces of the Philippines Western Mindanao Command (AFP Wesmincom) reported the recovery of 11 firearms, ammunition and a speedboat on Saluag Island, known locally as Mardanas Island, and Mamanuk Island. The cache included four M16A1 rifles, one M79 grenade launcher, one US Carbine rifle, a .38-cal. revolver, a .357 revolver, an M16A1 outfitted with an M203 under-barrel grenade launcher, a .60-cal. machine gun and a .50-cal. machine gun. Tan said the speedboat was believed “used for illegal activities.” But so far, the heavily armed kidnapers have eluded capture. They are believed to be holding over 20 captives, among them, 10 Indonesians, eight Malaysians, a Norwegian and a Canadian, and some Filipinos. On Thursday, troops backed by helicopter gunners recovered the torso of Canadian John Ridsdel, 68, near Patikul, Sulu. His severed head had been earlier left near the Jolo City Hall. Wesmincom spokesperson Maj. Filemon Tan said the operations were being conducted by composite units under Joint Task Force Tawi-Tawi led by Rear Adm. Jorge Amba.

26. Intelligence Bureau team visits Hazaribagh

The Pioneer, 2016 05 01

Hazaribagh - A three member team of Intelligence Bureau (IB) led by an SP rank officer was in Hazaribagh on Saturday. The team members visited the bomb blast site of Habibnagar and the sites where dead were buried. It also inspected the well near the blast site and collected some evidences which were thought to be thrown in the well to destroy the evidences. According to sources this team will submit its report to the Union Home Ministry. The IB team took photographs of the sites and also took videos from the sites. To analyse the damaging capacity of the blasted bomb it collected evidences from the walls and other places. Pieces of fleshes of the bodies of persons who were at the time of blast at that place are still adhered on the roof of the house and spots of blood are also visible on the walls of that house and adjoining houses. According to sources IB team has prepared its report which they will submit to the Home Ministry. In this report it has been included that the exercise of making bombs was going on there in a pre-planned way. Special branch had also reported this fact and has said that the planning was going on since last Dusshera.

27. Hindu Tailor, Once Jailed for Slurring Prophet, Is Hacked to Death

The New York Times, Geeta Anand, 2016 05 01

Dhaka, Bangladesh - A Hindu tailor who had been briefly jailed several years ago over accusations that he made an unfavorable comment about the Prophet Muhammad was hacked to death on Saturday near his shop in central Bangladesh, the police said. Mohammad Abdul Jalil, the officer in charge of the Gopalpur police station in the Tangail district, a central region where the attack occurred, said in a telephone interview that it was too early to determine the motivation of the assailants or whether they were Islamist militants. Similar attacks claimed by the militants seem to have accelerated recently, with five people hacked to death in the past nine days. The latest victim, Nikhil Chandra Joarder, 52, was jailed in 2012 after being accused of making a negative comment about the prophet. He was also involved in disputes with members of his family and some local Muslims over land, Mr. Jalil said. Mr. Joarder, who lived in the Dubail Bazar area in the jurisdiction of the Gopalpur police station, owned a tailoring shop nearby, Mr. Jalil said. He had stepped outside his shop, and around noon two or three men arrived on motorcycles and cut him on his head, his neck, his face and a hand, said Mohammad Aslam Khan, a police official in the Tangail district. Mr. Joarder died on the spot, Mr. Jalil said, and Mr. Khan said the assailants had left behind a bag containing two machetes and four bombs.

28. Hindu tailor killed by ISIS in Bangladesh

The Asian Age, 2016 05 01

Dhaka - A Hindu tailor was hacked to death by machete-wielding ISIS militants in his shop on Saturday in central Bangladesh, the latest in a series of brutal attacks on intellectuals, activists and minorities by the dreaded terror group in the Muslim-majority country. Nikhil Chandra Joarder (50), a resident of the Dubail village under Gopalpur upazila of the Tangail district, was hacked to death on Saturday afternoon. "Three assailants entered Nikhil's house-cum shop and slit his throat," Gopalpur police station officer-in-charge Mohammad Abdul Jalil told reporters. He said the assailants used a motorbike and fled the scene immediately after the murder. They left a black bag at the spot, which contained three to four bomb-like objects. Asked about the possible motive behind the attack, Mr Jalil told reporters that a case was filed against Nikhil in 2012 for making a "derogatory" comment about the Prophet. He had been arrested for allegedly making the comments and then released. "It can be the reason for the murder," the Daily Star quoted Mr Jalil as saying. Meanwhile, US-based private SITE intelligence group said ISIS has claimed the killing. ISIS' Amaq Agency reported the group's responsibility for killing the Hindu tailor for blasphemy in Tangail district in Bangladesh, it said in a tweet.

29. In Congo, Wars Are Small and Chaos Is Endless

The New York Times. Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 05 01

Nyunzu, Democratic Republic of Congo — Deep in the forest, miles from any major city, lies an abandoned cotton factory full of the dispossessed. There is no police force guarding it. No electricity or running water inside. No sense of urgency or deep concern by the national authorities to do much about it. Instead, as the days pass, hundreds of displaced people make cooking fires or sit quietly on the concrete factory floor. Dressed in rags, they stare into space, next to huge rusted iron machinery that has not turned for decades. They are members of the Bambote, a marginalized group of forest dwellers who are victims of one of the obscure little wars that this country seems to have a talent for producing. "It's like we don't exist," said Kalunga Etienne, a Bambote elder. This is what the Democratic Republic of Congo, the biggest country in sub-Saharan Africa and one that has stymied just about all efforts to right it, has become: a tangle of miniwars. More than 60 armed groups are operating in North Kivu and South Kivu Provinces, including a growing Islamist insurgency, whose fighters have hacked hundreds of people to death. Beyond that, there are remnants in the Uele area of the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group that specializes in abducting children and turning them into killers; predatory rebels in Ituri; Bakata separatists in Katanga; armed factions in Maniema; fighters in the Nyunzu area; and youth militias in the capital, Kinshasa. Few nations in Africa, if not the world, are home to as many armed groups. Even after billions of dollars in aid, one of the largest peacekeeping missions in United Nations history and substantial international attention over two decades, Congo's government is incapable of providing the most elemental service: security.

30. Violence, insecurity forces flight from one war-torn African nation to another

The Washington Post, Kevin Sieff, 2016 05 01

Juba - Since January, 43,000 South Sudanese refugees have fled to eastern Darfur. That's right - Darfur, home to one of the 21st century's worst ongoing humanitarian crises. That number, announced by the United Nations last week, is a window into a tragic and bewildering refugee crisis in Africa that is often overshadowed by migration flows to Europe. In many parts of sub-Saharan Africa, violence and insecurity have become so bad that families are seeking shelter in other war-torn countries. In 2015, for example, nearly 100,000 Ethiopians and Somalis traveled by boat to Yemen, one of the world's most dangerous countries. Last year, nearly 5,000 citizens of Congo, which is fighting powerful rebel groups, were seeking refuge in the Central African Republic, itself torn apart by civil war. And yet 10,000 Burundians have fled their country's own growing civil unrest for Congo. Thousands of Nigerians escaping the extremist Islamist group Boko Haram have gone to Chad, where different strains of that same insurgency are behind frequent deadly attacks.

31. Soudan : reprise des combats entre l'armée et des rebelles au Kordofan

Jeune Afrique, 2016 05 01

Juba - L'armée du président Omar el-Béchir combat la branche nord du Mouvement de libération du Soudan (SPLM-N) dans les Etats du Nil-Bleu et du Kordofan-Sud depuis 2011, même si les combats ont baissé d'intensité ces derniers mois en comparaison avec les années précédentes. Le SPLM-N affirme que les affrontements ont commencé mercredi près de la ville d'Oum Sediba et se sont poursuivis jusqu'à vendredi. « Nous avons perdu six camarades et 18 ont été blessés », a indiqué tard vendredi dans un communiqué le porte-parole des rebelles Arnu Lodi. Selon lui, les rebelles ont infligé de « lourdes pertes » aux troupes soudanaises. Le porte-parole militaire gouvernemental n'était pas joignable dans l'immédiat. Khartoum limite l'accès des régions en guerre à la presse, rendant impossible la vérification des informations souvent contradictoires de l'armée et des rebelles. Fin mars, quand des combats ont éclaté dans la même région, l'armée avait annoncé avoir tué 55 rebelles, mais les insurgés ont nié compter des victimes dans leurs rangs.

32. Japan's Abe to Hold Strong Stance In Territorial Dispute with Russia

Sputnik News Service, 2016 05 01

Moscow - Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe delivers a speech at the Lower House's plenary session following a North Korean nuclear test, at the National Diet in Tokyo on January 6, 2016. TOKYO (Sputnik) - Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Saturday he intended to "persevere" in continuing negotiations with Russia on signing a peace treaty and resolving the territorial dispute. On Sunday, Abe left for a visit to Russia and G7 states prior to the group's summit in Japan in late May. He is expected to meet Russian President Vladimir Putin on May 6.

33. Japan PM ready for dialogue with Russia to solve territorial dispute

TASS World Service, 2016 05 01

Tokyo - Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is ready to continue negotiations with Russia to resolve a territorial dispute and conclude peace treaty sought by both sides, he told Japanese reporters on Sunday before the start of his European tour, during which he will visit Russia. "According to the basic policy - desire to solve the problem of the Southern Kuril Islands and the conclusion of a peace treaty, I want to continue negotiations and solve the problem," news agency Kyodo quoted Prime Minister as saying. Russian President Vladimir Putin and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet in Sochi on May 6 "to discuss the state and prospects of the development of bilateral cooperation in the trade-economic and humanitarian fields," the Kremlin press service said in a statement on April 30.

34. Rouhani Backers Gain Iran Parliamentary Seats, but Not Majority

The New York Times, Thomas Erdbrink, 2016 05 01

Tehran - Supporters of President Hassan Rouhani of Iran have won more seats in parliamentary runoff elections, the Iranian state news media reported Saturday, but they failed to win enough of the 68 contested seats to secure a majority, limiting their ability to carry out significant political and social changes. The gains made by the moderates and reformists were not enough to decisively alter the balance of power in Iran, the president's supporters acknowledged. They added that political clashes between their lawmakers and conservative hard-liners were bound to increase. "Expect a Parliament with a slightly friendlier tone, but also many political crises," said Farshad Ghorbanpour, a political analyst close to the government. After Friday's runoff elections for races that were not decided in the first round of voting in February, the reformists and moderate supporters of Mr. Rouhani hold 122 seats in the 290-member Parliament, and the conservative hard-liners have 84, the state media reported.

35. S. Korean President Arrives in Tehran

Fars News Agency, 2016 05 01

Tehran - South Korean President Park Geun-hye arrived in Tehran on Sunday afternoon to hold talks and sign nearly a dozen cooperation agreements with high-ranking Iranian officials. President Park, heading a large delegation of Korean ministers and businesspersons, was welcomed by Iranian Minister of Industry, Mine and Trade Mohammad Reza Nematzadeh at Mehrabad International Airport. During the South Korean president's trip, Tehran and Seoul will ink several Memoranda of Understanding (MoUs) in different fields, including energy. The Korean president is accompanied by 236 state and private sector officials and traders as well as 90 reporters and journalists. This is the largest foreign delegation to visit Iran after the Vienna nuclear deal between Iran and the world powers last Summer. Iranian Energy Minister Hamid Chitchian said on Saturday that the two countries will ink 9 MoUs in water and 6 MoUs in the power sectors. Three other agreements are also due to be signed in other fields.

36. Protesters storm Iraqi parliament in Baghdad

The Washington Post, Loveday Morris & Mustafa Salim, 2016 05 01

Baghdad - Protesters stormed Iraq's parliament Saturday in a dramatic culmination of months of demonstrations, casting uncertainty over the tenure of the country's prime minister and the foundations of the political system laid in place after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Security forces declared a state of emergency in the Iraqi capital after demonstrators climbed over blast walls and broke through cordons to enter Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, also home to ministries and the U.S. embassy. Many were followers of Iraq's powerful Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who has been urging his supporters onto the streets. Lawmakers fled the building in panic, with some berated and struck as they left. Others were trapped in the basement for hours, too afraid to face the crowds who complain that the country's political class is racked by corruption. It was a day of high drama for a country that is no stranger to revolution and that has seen all of its leaders overthrown from the time the state was established in 1921 until the U.S. invasion toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003. At issue now is the quota system introduced when the U.S.-led coalition put together Iraq's first post-invasion government, which determines Iraq's political positions according to sect and ethnicity. The turmoil threatened to unseat the already embattled prime minister, Haider al-Abadi, with whom the United States has partnered in the fight against Islamic State militants in Iraq but whose efforts at reform have stumbled. U.S. officials have expressed concern that the unrest could affect the battlefield as Iraq also struggles with an extreme budget crisis caused by a plunge in oil prices.

37. Iraq Protesters Storm Parliament, Demanding End to Corruption

The New York Times, Tim Arango, 2016 05 01

Baghdad - Hundreds of protesters stormed Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone on Saturday and entered the Parliament building, waving Iraqi flags, snapping photographs, breaking furniture and demanding an end to corruption. The episode deepened a political crisis that has paralyzed Iraq's government for weeks. As the chaos unfolded in the afternoon — one lawmaker was attacked, and protesters damaged several vehicles near Parliament — the Baghdad Operations Command announced a state of emergency, deploying additional forces around the capital city. Checkpoints at city entrances were closed, even as the protests remained largely nonviolent. The scenes of protest, circulated in photos and videos on social media sites, were potent illustrations of the anger that has grown during months of protests by Iraqis demanding that Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi carry out measures to end sectarian quotas in politics and fight corruption. The protesters were mostly supporters of the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr. Rather than pushing for the ouster of Mr. Abadi, they have largely supported the prime minister as he has sought to make good on promises, still unfulfilled, to improve how the government works. The ease with which they penetrated the rim of the Green Zone suggested that security forces — and perhaps Mr. Abadi himself, as some hinted — were supportive of the protesters. There were no reports of shots fired, and Mr. Sadr's own militiamen were said to have taken charge of security near Parliament.

38. Al Qaeda after bin Laden, still 'a dangerous threat'

Agence France Presse, 2016 05 01

Dubai - The militant group Al Qaeda has survived the death of its founder Osama bin Laden on May 2, 2011 and bolstered its notoriety with attacks in Africa, Europe and Yemen despite suffering a series of setbacks. Al Qaeda has been replaced as a pre-eminent global militant power by the militant Islamic State (IS) group but remains a potent force and dangerous threat, experts say. By the time US special forces killed bin Laden in Abbottabad, the group he founded in the late 1980s had been badly damaged, with many of its militants and leaders killed or captured in the US "War on Terror". Dissension grew in the militant ranks as new Qaeda chief Ayman al-Zawahiri struggled in bin Laden's place, until one of its branches, originally Al Qaeda in Iraq, broke away to form the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL). After seizing large parts of Iraq and Syria in 2014, the group declared a caliphate' in areas under its control, calling itself simply the IS. IS has since eclipsed its former partner, drawing thousands of militants to its cause and claiming responsibility for attacks that have left hundreds dead in Brussels, Paris, Tunisia, Turkey, Lebanon, Yemen, Saudi Arabia and on a Russian airliner over Egypt.

39. Estranged Bedfellows

The Washington Post, Sudarsan Raghavan & William Booth, 2016 05 01

Cairo - The Islamic State's affiliate in Egypt is staging increasingly sophisticated and daring attacks, officials and analysts say, prompting Israel, Egypt and the Palestinian militant group Hamas to form an unlikely alliance against the terrorist group. Hamas deployed several hundred fighters last week to Gaza's border with Egypt's lawless northern Sinai as part of a deal with Egypt to keep militants of the Islamic State - also known as ISIS or ISIL - from entering the coastal enclave. That came days after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised his country's decision to build a new barrier along the Israel-Egypt border, warning that "we would have been overflowed by thousands of ISIS fighters from Sinai." The growing concerns have given birth to the greatest cooperation between the militaries of Egypt and Israel since their 1979 peace deal, according to officials from both countries. The question is whether the militants' ambitions can be stopped or, at least, contained. The well-armed affiliate - known as Wilayat Sinai - has grown bolder since it asserted responsibility for the October bombing of a Russian charter flight over the Sinai Peninsula, killing all 224 aboard. The group has mounted a steady stream of attacks on Egyptian soldiers, overrunning military posts and targeting them with roadside bombs. In the April issue of an Islamic State newsletter, al-Naba, the terrorist group boasts about the attacks.

40. Syrian City Torn by War Shows Jarring Resolve to Try to Live Normally

The New York Times, Declan Walsh, 2016 05 01

Aleppo, Syria - On the edge of Aleppo's ancient citadel, Zahra and her family squatted in a once-grand apartment, now facing rebel lines. Plastic sheets covered its tall windows to shield the space from a sniper's view; shelling boomed in the distance. Zahra, 25, who gave just one name, flicked between two photos on her phone. The first showed her husband, a Syrian Army soldier and the father of her unborn child. "Seven months," she said, touching her belly. In the second, her husband was splayed on the ground, blood trickling from his nose. Two other fallen soldiers lay beside him. He died two weeks ago. "May the men who did this also die," she said with quiet determination. Four years of war has hardened hearts in Aleppo, a divided city and, for the past week, the scene of merciless fighting. Over the past week, a fragile truce, brokered by the United States and Russia, has crumbled in Syria, leading to the worst violence in months. Russian fighter jets roar through the sky, pounding targets in rebel-held areas. The rebels send barrages of mortars and homemade missiles that land in crowded neighborhoods. The war has stoked sectarian tensions and become a proxy battle for regional and global interests. Most casualties are civilians — at least 202 in the past week, about two-thirds in rebel-controlled eastern areas and the remainder in the government-held west side, according to groups that monitor casualties. The violence shows a "monstrous disregard for civilian lives," the United Nations' human rights chief, Zeid Ra'ad al-Hussein, said on Friday.

41. Nationalist party declares Islam doesn't belong to Germany

The Associated Press, 2016 05 01

Berlin - Members of the nationalist Alternative for Germany party have backed a political program that says Islam doesn't belong to Germany and supports a ban against minarets, muezzin calls and headscarves for women and girls in school. The party, also known by its acronyms AfD, has been growing in popularity and political influence as it campaigns on an anti-Islam platform. It was holding a conference on Sunday. German Chancellor Angela Merkel has repeatedly said Islam does belong to Germany and religious freedom is also part of the country's constitution.

42. Britain would be more vulnerable to terrorism outside EU, warns German interior minister

The Telegraph (UK), Justin Huggler & Melanie Hall, 2016 05 01

Berlin - One of Germany's most senior ministers has intervened in Britain's Europe debate, delivering a stark warning that Brexit would make the UK more vulnerable to terrorism. Thomas de Maiziere, the interior minister, stressed the value of the crime-fighting information shared by EU members, including fingerprints and DNA. "The argument of terrorism is not an argument for the UK to leave the EU. On the contrary it's an argument for the UK to stay in the EU," he told the Telegraph. "Since we are all targets of Daesh (Isil) and al-Qaeda, we have to combat the threat of terrorism together, because this is much more effective.” At present, Britain is plugged into the EU’s system for transferring data that can be vital to foiling terrorist plots. “If we share information on offenders within the EU this means the UK also receives more data on potential threats,” said Mr de Maiziere, referring to the Prum Convention which allows member states to share fingerprints, DNA and even car license plates numbers. “This means the UK receives much more data on potential terrorists and potential perpetrators than it would if it were to collect such data alone,” he added. Asked whether the Schengen Agreement made it easy for terrorists to move around Europe undetected, Mr de Maiziere replied: “The UK is not a member of the Schengen regime, and so as a matter of course, the Schengen regime in itself may, per se, create no disadvantages for the UK. On the contrary, the UK gets a lot of information from the Schengen Information System and this is a huge benefit for the UK. You can’t have your cake and eat it.”

43. More cross-border ISIL rockets hit Turkish city Kilis

Daily News, 2016 05 01

Istanbul - Three rockets fired from territory held by the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) in Syria injured seven people in Turkey’s southern border province of Kilis early on May 1, according to local security sources. One rocket landed in a yard in the Beşevler neighborhood and the other one hit a parking area near Cumhuriyet Street. The seven injured people were taken to Kilis State Hospital. Police have increased security measures in the region. The Turkish army responded by firing howitzers at ISIL positions in Syria and nine militants were killed as a result, Anadolu Agency reported. A bomb production factory belonging to ISIL was also hit and destroyed by drones belonging to the U.S-led coalition in the Azaz district of Syria’s Aleppo. The MQ-1 modelled drone took off from the İncirlik Airbase in the southern province of Adana. Two ISIL militants were killed as a result of the airstrike and many others were trapped in the building that was hit, according to Anadolu Agency.

44. Congrès de l'AfD à Stuttgart: la ville en état de siege

Radio France Internationale, 2016 05 01

Stuttgart - L’Allemagne, depuis le début de la crise les réfugiés a accueilli sur son sol un million de migrants. Une situation récupérée dans le discours xénophobe de l’AFD, l’Alternative pour l’Allemagne, parti de la droite populiste qui a ouvert son congrès ce samedi matin à Stuttgart, pour deux jours. Plusieurs centaines de manifestants dénonçant le discours de l’AFD ont tenté de bloquer l’accès au congrès. La police, présente en nombre, a procédé à 400 interpellations. Quelque 2 000 participants assistent au congrès et 1 000 policiers assurent le bon déroulement des débats alors que des centaines d’opposants à l’AfD se sont donné rendez-vous devant le Palais des congrès de Stuttgart. Plus 900 membres des black blocs, vêtus de noir et encagoulés, prêts à en découdre avec la police, ont tenté ce matin de perturber l’ouverture du congrès du Parti populiste AfD, obligeant la manifestation à démarrer avec une heure de retard. Feux de Bengale et engins incendiaires lancés en direction des forces de l’ordre, c’est sous escorte policière et sous les sifflets et les cris « Nazis dehors ! Adieu AFD ! », scandés par les opposants, que les participants au congrès de l’AfD ont pénétré dans le Palais des congrès de Stuttgart. Quatre cents personnes, parmi les manifestants, ont été arrêtés pour avoir fait usage de la violence. C’est donc presque dans un climat d’état de siège que se déroule ce congrès du Parti populiste L’autoroute A8 qui dessert l’aéroport de la ville a même dû être coupée pendant vingt minutes ce matin.

45. Trial of German 'bomb plotters' stokes fear of anti-migrant terror

The Sunday Times, Bojan Pancevski, 2016 05 01

Berlin – A trial of German neo-Nazis accused of plotting deadly attacks on refugees is prompting fears that a backlash against migration has fuelled an upsurge in far-right terrorism. Four members of a group that calls itself the Oldschool Society appeared in a Munich court last week. Prosecutors claimed they were planning to attack refugee shelters with fire and nail bombs. The group is one of a number of such organisations mushrooming in Germany and across Europe. Their appearance coincides with a surge of support for far-right political parties as a result of the migration crisis, which saw more than 1m people entering Germany last year. The accused — who ranged from a grey-haired 57-year-old man to a 23-year-old woman with multiple face piercings — came from different parts of Germany. They met on the internet and communicated via social networks and messaging services such as WhatsApp. Their full names were not released. Andreas H, the suspected leader, is a painter and former member of the neo-Nazi National Democratic party. The group was allegedly planning terrorist attacks on mosques as well as politicians and activists perceived to be pro-migration. "We will then blow up one mosque after the other and we will hang the pigs where we find them," read a message by one of the suspects intercepted by police. The group was arrested after an elaborate investigation involving electronic surveillance by the Bundesamt für Verfassungsschutz (BfV), the German equivalent of MI5.

1. The developer, the fugitive and the feud

The Globe and Mail, Laurent Bastien, 2016 07 09

Toronto - Five years ago, Sam Mizrahi, one of Toronto's most ambitious real estate developers, found himself in a basement in the city's Bridle Path neighbourhood. It was there, he says, he began to fear for his safety. In a span of just a few hours, one of the main financial backers of two of his luxury condominium projects, Mahmoud Khavari, had become one of Iran's most wanted men, having left his position as the chairman of the country's largest bank and fled to Canada amid a corruption scandal. With Iran demanding Mr. Khavari's immediate return, Mr. Mizrahi feared being caught in the crossfire of a potentially violent international dispute as they debated the future of their business partnership inside the former banker's Toronto home. The agreement worked out in that basement in the hours that followed the frantic flight to Canada has become the subject of a multimilliondollar lawsuit before the Ontario Superior Court, and led to a feud between Mr. Mizrahi and the Khavari family of near-Shakespearian proportion, involving alleged death threats, international intrigue and some of the city's hottest real estate. The Khavaris, who dispute the threats of violence, are seeking at least $35-million in damages from their former business partner, arguing that they were denied a stake in two Yorkville properties in which they invested money, along with three others that include the massive, 80-storey One Bloor tower, the crown jewel of Mr. Mizrahi's condominium empire. Mr. Mizrahi, in his sworn statement, says the Khavari family and CSIS officials informed him in 2011 that the Iranian government was sending a "special force" to Toronto with the aim of spirited the former banker back to Tehran. Iranian officials have also reportedly raised his name in discussions related to Saren Azer, an Iranian-Canadian doctor who is accused of abducting his four children and fleeing to Iran. In May, two former federal officials working on the file told the Globe that Mr. Khavari had been mentioned in back channels with Iranian officials, suggesting there's a deal to be made.

2. Government downplays terrorism threat

Kingston Whig-Standard, Larry Comeau, 2016 07 09

Letter To The Editor: Re: "Terrorism: Is Canada ready?" July 2. This is a very thought-provoking column by Geoffrey Johnston, and anyone who thinks Canada is prepared to handle a major radical Islamist attack on a soft target like one of our airports is dreaming. We have to give full marks to the RCMP and CSIS for their having thwarted numerous planned attacks on Canadian soil. Let's not forget that even though the Trudeau government has decreed we are not at war with ISIS, even withdrawing our CF-18s from the fight, there is little doubt the killings of Cpl. Nathan Cirillo and Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent was carried out by individuals inspired by that terrorist organization. After all, ISIS has declared Canada a legitimate target, particularly our military. I hope this current study will make the Liberal government get over its naivete when it comes to the ISIS threat and that from other radical Islamist groups, and that it will do more to protect us, including contingency planning in the event of a major attack here. Canada should have never have pulled our planes that were fighting above their weight to help eradicate ISIS, thereby relegating our protection to our allies.

3. Government documents suggest Snowden 'altered' the cyberspace discussion

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - It's not a matter of if there will be another Edward Snowden, it's a matter of when, according to internal government documents obtained by the Star. Global Affairs officials warned minister Stéphane Dion in November an event on the scale of Snowden's disclosures about Internet surveillance is inevitable. "Incidents similar to the Snowden disclosures and the Sony hack will happen again and we can expect that sudden events will affect international debates on cyberspace," the document reads. The briefing note, prepared for Dion in November and obtained under access to information law, suggests that Snowden's disclosures about western mass surveillance "altered the tone" of the international discussion on cyberspace. In 2013 Snowden, a former employee of the U.S. National Security Agency (NSA), pulled back the curtain on mass surveillance online, detailing the capabilities of the "Five Eyes" countries - Canada, the United States, the U.K., Australia and New Zealand - to monitor activity online. His release of classified NSA documents triggered outrage among those who said he put lives at risk, and praise from others who argued he shed light on questionable practices. He was forced to flee the U.S. and was granted asylum in Russia. Then in 2014, hackers broke into Sony company computers and released thousands of emails, documents and sensitive personal information. U.S. federal investigators blamed North Korea. While Canada has long advocated for an open and free Internet, suggestions that the nation's spy agency the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) has engaged in mass online surveillance have complicated that narrative. But the documents state Ottawa remains committed to a free Internet - not only from a democratic point of view, but for the potential for Canadian businesses and consumers to access broadening online markets. The Star reported in 2015 that CSE has stepped up their efforts to guard against "insider threats" since Snowden shared an unprecedented trove of intelligence documents with journalist Glenn Greenwald in 2013. The move was also prompted by a Halifax-based Royal Canadian Navy officer, Jeffrey Delisle, who sold secrets to Russia in 2012. "Following the unauthorized disclosures of Canadian Navy Sub-Lieutenant Jeffrey Delisle and NSA contractor Edward Snowden, CSE has intensified its efforts to tighten already stringent security," read CSE's 2013-14 report to the minister of national defence.

4. Jonquière standoff: man barricaded inside home with possible explosive device

Global News, Annabelle Olivier, 2016 07 09

Jonquiere, Que. -Quebec provincial police officers are on the scene of a tense standoff in Jonquière where a 27-year-old man, believed to be in possession of a homemade explosive device, is barricaded inside his home. The situation began to unfold Friday evening following a robbery at around 8 p.m. in a pharmacy on St-Hubert Street in Jonquière, roughly 200 kilometres north of Quebec City. The suspect, whom police say was possibly armed, fled the scene but witnesses were able to give local police a description of the man and his vehicle. Officers were then able to locate the man at his home on St-Germain Street. After failed attempts at contacting the man, Saguenay police tried to force their way into the home.

5. Une universitaire canado-iranienne détenue à Téhéran

Le Monde.fr, Anne Pelouas, 2016 07 09

Montreal - Les proches d'Homa Hoodfar, anthropologue canado-iranienne, sont sans nouvelles d'elle depuis son incarcération le 6 juin à la prison d'Evin, à Téhéran, et craignent pour sa vie. La communauté scientifique s'est mobilisée, Amnesty International aussi et le gouvernement canadien affirme faire de son cas «une priorité». Dans cette prison, connue pour ses difficiles conditions de détention et où la torture est monnaie courante, Homa Hoodfar n'a reçu aucune visite, même de son avocat. Victime l'an passé d'un AVC, elle est aussi atteinte d'une maladie neurologique rare, affectant nerfs et muscles. «Elle a de fréquents maux de tête et doit prendre des médicaments», souligne sa nièce, Amanda Ghahremani, qui vit au Canada. Après plusieurs jours de détention, la famille a finalement obtenu l'autorisation de lui en apporter mais sans assurance qu'ils lui soient parvenus. Homa Hoodfar, 65 ans, professeur à l'Université Concordia de Montréal, était arrivée à Téhéran le 11 février, avec l'intention de voir sa famille et de poursuivre des recherches historiques sur la participation des femmes iraniennes aux élections. Arrêtée en mars, elle s'était vu interdire de quitter le pays et confisquer ses passeports, son portable, ses documents de recherche et son ordinateur. Interrogée ensuite à deux reprises, elle a été emprisonnée le 6 juin. Ce n'est que le 24 juin qu'un procureur de Téhéran a dit qu'elle était soupçonnée de compromettre la sécurité du pays. Plusieurs médias proches des Gardiens de la révolution avaient révélé auparavant qu'elle était accusée de vouloir fomenter une «révolution en douceur», féministe, contre la République islamique, a indiqué la famille de Mme Hoodfar. Le gouvernement canadien assure pour sa part «travailler en étroite collaboration avec ses alliés» pour aider Mme Hoodfar, qui vit au Canada depuis trente ans. L'Italie transmettrait les messages diplomatiques. Les conservateurs canadiens avaient coupé les ponts avec l'Iran en 2012, invoquant les violations des droits de la personne, son programme nucléaire, son soutien au régime syrien et ses menaces contre Israël. Le Canada avait fermé son ambassade et expulsé les diplomates iraniens en poste à Ottawa.

6. Harjit Sajjan says NATO spending doesn't measure Canada's true contribution

CBC News, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan isn't expecting a giant cheque from Finance Minister Bill Morneau any time soon, even though Canada falls short of NATO's spending commitment — that each country should spend two per cent of GDP on defence. In an interview with CBC Radio's The House, Sajjan said Canada's actions speak louder than its spending percentages. "We're stepping up in many regards," he told host Chris Hall. "But when it comes to the actual spending, we have a defence review going on. A defence review, and our spending, will be based on the needs for our nation." New figures released by NATO ahead of this weekend's leaders' summit in Warsaw, Poland, show Canada occupies the lower third of NATO membership in terms of defence funding — even though the government is planning to spend an additional .01 per cent of GDP on defence. To put that in perspective, NATO members have agreed that each nation should spend two per cent of GDP on defence as its annual benchmark. Canada is ranked 23 out of 28 member countries in the alliance by that measure, positioned between Hungary and Slovenia, which has been a source of frustration for some other members of NATO. When U.S. President Barack Obama spoke to Parliament last month, he called on the Liberal government to meet the NATO measure because, he said, "the world needs more Canada."

7. Canada recommits funding for Afghan security, development

CBC News, Murray Brewster, 2016 09 07

Ottawa - Canada will spend $465 million to help cover the bill for Afghan security forces and to pay for development assistance over three years, the Liberal government announced Saturday at the conclusion of the NATO leaders' summit. The cash represents a renewal of funding programs that are set to expire next year. The former Conservative government committed a total of $557 million toward an international fund to support security forces, including the fledgling Afghan army, and for Canadian-directed humanitarian and development projects. A statement by the Prime Minister's Office didn't breakdown how much would be spent on security and how much will go toward development, but noted the aid would "support women's and girls' rights and empowerment, and to help meet the basic needs of Afghans." Prime Minister Justin Trudeau met late Friday with Afghanistan's two top political figures on the margins of the Warsaw summit. He held talks with Afghan President Ashraf Ghani and chief executive officer Abdullah Abdullah. NATO foreign ministers embarked on a process last fall to convince allies to continue to pay the bills for Afghan troops and police officers. The ministers, including Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, approved a plan to raise $4 billion per year from the international community.

8. Unity is the operative word in Europe

The Globe and Mail, Mark MacKinnon, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - When NATO issues its communique on Saturday at the conclusion of its two-day summit in Warsaw, look for the word "unity" and its synonyms to appear early and often. Unity is what the alliance wants to project in its showdowns with Russia to the east, and its even messier fight to the south, where Western-backed proxies battle both Islamic State and the regime of Bashar al-Assad in Syria. The refugee crisis - which has seen NATO members build fences along borders shared with other members of the alliance - is another challenge. Unity is something that's suddenly in question as the alliance grapples with the meaning of Britain's shocking vote in favour of a Brexit from the European Union. The summit that began Friday - which was supposed to be a meeting devoted to countering the perceived threat from Russia (and symbolically held in the city where NATO's Cold War rival, the Warsaw Pact, was formed) - has become a "Brexit summit" devoted to figuring out how the alliance might be affected by the United Kingdom's looming departure from the EU. "All the political leaders in Warsaw will be carefully following the messages from the British delegation, from Prime Minister [David] Cameron, because we'd like to know what kind of consequences NATO should take into account in its own policies from a possible Brexit," said Slawomir Debski, director of the Polish Institute of International Affairs, which is funded by the Polish government.

9. It's 2003 again - and we're still fighting over Saddam

The Globe and Mail, Doug Saunders, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - The world has suddenly returned to 2003. Once again, the politics of much of the English-speaking world are dominated by the question of how to deal with Saddam Hussein. In 2003, it was a question that furiously divided opinion on both the right and the left. And the answer, delivered that March, was a military invasion that led in turn to occupation, hasty trial, botched hanging and imposition of a sectarian government. It was so wrongly conceived, inappropriately timed and executed that it obliterated the original question. Starved of meaning, it has now returned to haunt us. Britain's Chilcot Inquiry has made it abundantly clear, in its 12-volume report this week, that the problem of Saddam Hussein could not have been dealt with in a worse possible way. There was no imminent threat, no reason to go into Iraq so hastily, with so little support from neighbouring countries and without United Nations backing, and without a viable post-invasion plan for a transition to a new government. The civilian death toll in Iraq probably exceeded the worst Saddam would have done to his people, rendering the whole thing pointless. The imposition of a Shia government created a de facto civil war and the cast-out remnants of the old Iraqi army were the prime movers behind the creation of the terrorist army Islamic State.

10. Canada will lead NATO force in Latvia

National Post, Matthew Fisher, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - Bowing to intense political pressure from NATO to do more for the alliance in the region, Canada confirmed Friday that it will lead one of four combat battalions in the Baltic states and Poland. The open-ended NATO mission near the Russian border, to begin early next year, is designed to deter Russian President Vladimir Putin from trying to repeat his annexation of Crimea in northeastern Europe. Canada is to provide the commanding colonel and his headquarters, a mechanized rifle company, intelligence assets and other enablers for what some officers have described as a battalion-plus-plus of about 1,000 troops. The Russian Embassy in Canada has already decried the move as "sabre-rattling" while the foreign and defence ministries in Moscow have vowed that there will be repercussions. "They can say that, but they absolutely know that it isn't" sabre-rattling, said Canada's top soldier, Gen. Jon Vance. "It represents solidarity and cohesion in the alliance and a great opportunity. "It raises the threshold of risk. It may be slight but it is definitely there. Terms like tripwire can be used as descriptors, but what it really does is raise that calculus of risks.

11. NATO's challenge

The Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - The alliance faces a showdown with Russia in the shadow of Brexit The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, whose national leaders are meeting in Warsaw Friday and Saturday, is facing its most serious challenge since the Cold War when the United States and Soviet Union actively confronted each other around the globe. The alliance appears set to deploy four well-armed military battalions – one led by Canada – to the Baltics. They are being dispatched at the request of NATO members Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Poland, with the express purpose of deterring what is perceived as Russian aggression. For its part, Russia says it is only reacting to what it perceives as Western aggression – the continental spread of alliances such as NATO and the European Union that has come to threaten core Russian interests “While Westerners may believe that NATO’s eastward expansion has been peaceful and voluntary,” says Dimitri Simes, president of the Center for the National Interest in Washington, “Russians see it as inseparable from NATO’s European and global military exploits.” NATO and Russia, he says, are “on a collision course.”

12. NATO leaders meeting in Warsaw will tackle how to pay for Afghan security

CBC News, Murray Brewster, 2016 07 09

Kabul - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau met with Afghanistan's two top political figures on the margins of the NATO Summit in Warsaw Friday as Canadian officials prepare for the renewal of funding for the war-torn country's security forces. NATO foreign ministers embarked on a process last fall to convince allies to continue to pay the bills for Afghanistan's fledgling army and police force. The ministers, including Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, approved a plan to raise $4 billion per year from the international community. Donor countries began paying the bills for Afghanistan's security sector following the 2012 NATO leaders' summit in Chicago. At the time, the former Conservative government committed to spending $330 million, but the program ends next year. Trudeau met on Friday with Afghan President Ashraf Ghani, and Abdullah Abdullah, the country's chief executive officer. Officials speaking on background after the meeting made no reference to the funding issue and would only say that the prime minister emphasized "Canada's longstanding and ongoing commitments to help Afghanistan build a sustainable future, a safe and secure and peaceful environment for its citizens, and a country that is well governed and in control of its own destiny." However, the government signalled that a fund decision is pending.

13. Canada commits $465M to Afghanistan for humanitarian aid, security forces

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 07 09

Warsaw - Canada is promising more cash to Afghanistan – while some of its allies plan to keep troops in the country to help it deal with an escalating insurgency. The Liberal government is renewing more than $150 million per year for aid projects in Afghanistan and to help the country’s security forces, working out to about $465 million over three years. The new money will kick in once Canada’s existing commitment, pledged by the previous Conservative government in 2012, ends next year. It will continue to 2020. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau announced the commitment during a special session on Afghanistan at the NATO leaders’ summit in Poland on Saturday, after having met with Afghan President Ashraf Ghani in Warsaw on Friday. The new funding extends Canada’s involvement in Afghanistan to nearly two decades. Canada first got involved in the country’s affairs following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, before sending combat troops to the southern province of Kandahar in 2006. It also contributed billions in aid. By the time the combat mission ended in 2011, 158 Canadian soldiers, one diplomat and one journalist had been killed. Canada continued to train Afghan security forces in the capital Kabul for the next three years, until the last troops left in December 2014.

14. West should push for Iran regime change

Ottawa Sun, Candice Malcom, 2016 07 09

Column: The only way to make peace with Iran, according to the Obama administration, is to appease its cruel and authoritarian government. The alternative, according to the White House, would be increased hostility and perhaps even war. Under this dichotomy, U.S. President Barack Obama has extended an olive branch to America's longtime adversary. Last summer, the U.S. struck an historic nuclear deal with the Islamic Republic of Iran. Obama teamed up with members of the UN Security Council and Germany to lift economic sanctions against Iran in exchange for Iran halting its uranium enrichment program. The Trudeau government has followed suit, saying it will work towards reinstating diplomatic relations with Iran. Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion insists Canadian companies should be able to do business in Iran. These self-styled "progressive" politicians are striking a deal with the devil. By engaging with Iran, Western nations are giving legitimacy and power to a deeply regressive regime. Iran is in the grip of one of the world's most tyrannical and fundamentalist governments. The mullahs that run Iran impose strict sharia law — cutting off limbs, lashing dissidents and stoning women — in a manner comparable to the brutal campaign of violence brought by the Islamic State (ISIS). The major difference is that ISIS proudly broadcasts its atrocities while Iran conducts its behind closed doors.

15. Canada's return to NATO's front line has air of familiarity to it

Toronto Star, Paul Wells, 2016 07 09

Commentary: And so Canadian soldiers are heading back to Europe. Times change and the world, despite a steady drumbeat of appalling headlines, is safer for us than for our parents. So the deployment of 450 Canadian Forces troops to Latvia won't be nearly as formidable as the deployment to West Germany - often more than 10 times larger - that was Canada's defining military commitment for 42 years through the Cold War. But the purpose is wearily similar. To deter military adventures dictated from Moscow. To safeguard NATO's integrity, both as a territory on a map and as the muscle of western democracy. To fight and die, in the almost inconceivable event that worse comes to worst, and by their deaths to draw other western troops into a battle the likes of which Europe hasn't seen in most of a century. And, in the meantime, to show Canada's most important allies that Canada stands up when asked. At least, often enough. It's fashionable to decry the long decline in Canadian military spending that began a few years into the Afghanistan conflict. But whenever I've asked NATO leaders, including the alliance's secretary general Jens Stoltenberg, they are quick to draw a distinction. They do wish Canada would double its defence spending to 2 per cent of GDP, NATO's preferred benchmark. But at the same time, they recognize that Canada almost always uses its military in meaningful ways within the alliance, whereas other allies sometimes leave their burgeoning armies and glistening kit parked.

16. Canada and NATO: Details on Eastern Europe military commitments

Global News, 2016 07 09

Warsaw, Poland – Prime Minister Justin Trudeau committed Canada on Friday to helping NATO in its standoff with Russia. Here are the details: Troop deployment to Latvia: Canada will contribute around 450 troops as well as light armoured vehicles and other equipment to a multinational force in the former Soviet republic of Latvia. Defence chief Gen. Jonathan Vance says the Canadian contingent will form the "nucleus" of what will eventually be a 1,000-strong battle group that will act as a deterrent against Russian aggression in the region. Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States are making similar contributions in Lithuania, Estonia and Poland, respectively. NATO officials insist the force is purely defensive, though Russia has condemned it as an encroachment. The mission has been described as "open-ended," meaning there is no time frame for when it will end. Canada will deploy up to six CF-18 fighter jets to Europe where they will patrol allied airspace against foreign threats. Canadian CF-18s were previously deployed to Lithuania in 2014 after Russia annexed Crimea and started supporting separatist forces in eastern Ukraine. Officials said they have not determined exactly when the fighters will be deployed or where, though they did say NATO has air policing missions not just in Eastern Europe, but also Iceland and other parts of Europe.

17. Review: Is Big Brother Your Facebook Friend?

The Vancouver Sun Online, Tom Sandborn, 2016 07 09

Column: It's not just for funny cat videos, porn and online diary entries anymore. The Internet and its ungainly stepchildren, the ragged mob of social media sites ranging from Facebook to Twitter to Instagram to YouTube and so on, represent a new and significant feature of modern life. The net is a place where the lonely can find company, the unemployed can look for work, students can either do original research or plagiarize term papers and where you can be "friends" with people you have never met. Last year, more than 28 million Canadians had wireless phone subscriptions, most of which would allow the user Internet access from their handheld devices. Little wonder, then, that social media has implications for law enforcement. (Like the Pope, many Canadian police forces now have their own Twitter accounts. Some also use Facebook pages in their attempts to manage public perceptions of crime and policing.) University of Manitoba sociology prof Christopher J. Schneider's important new book, Policing and Social Media, tries to tease out some of those implications. He focuses in the book's most lively and interesting chapters on the post-hockey-defeat violence in Vancouver in 2011 and the police shooting of a disturbed young man of colour, Sammy Yatin, on an empty Toronto streetcar in July of 2013. Police regularly monitor social media posting by suspects and "persons of interest" these days, and, according to the B.C. Civil Liberties Association, security bodies like CSEC (Communications Security Establishment Canada) listen in on email and phone communications in a search for suspicious content, a "big net" search that provides the federal government with a huge body of data on many innocent Canadians. (Full disclosure. I serve as a board member of the BC Civil Liberties Association, which is currently challenging CSEC practices in court.) A fuller treatment of this reality, which some have characterized as the "end of privacy," would have made this a stronger book. Nevertheless, Schneider has done a fine job with this study, and anyone in Canada who cares about policing, privacy, civil liberties and personal freedom should read it. 18. Freeland takes slow approach to China

The Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - China wants a free-trade deal with Canada. It's no longer clear Canada wants the same, even as Ottawa and Beijing prepare for joint leaders' meetings that might otherwise provide an ideal stage for a major announcement. On Friday, Canadian International Trade Minister Chrystia Freeland sat down with Chinese Commerce Minister Gao Hucheng in Shanghai, during Ms. Freeland's first ministerial trip to China. But in a subsequent 15-minute interview with The Globe and Mail in which she was repeatedly asked about the topic, Ms. Freeland never once used the words "free trade." She instead signalled Canada will move slowly when it comes to China - the world's secondlargest economy, but a country ruled by an authoritarian regime that jails critics, heavily censors speech and continues to detain a Canadian missionary on spying charges. "This is a long-term relationship, and we are going to act in a careful and consequential, step-by-step way," Ms. Freeland said. Rather than discuss formal trade measures, Ms. Freeland emphasized her conversation with Mr. Gao. "We're building a real foundation of positive human relations, and that is really important - that sort of level of human knowledge and contact and trust," she said. "That is an essential foundation for building a closer commercial relationship."

19. Digital privacy in an era of big data

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman, 2016 07 08

Montreal - All it takes is 300 "likes" while you're scrolling through your newsfeed - that's the point at which Facebook knows you better than your own spouse or your best friend. So if you're averaging 10 "likes" a day, it will take just a month for the social network behemoth to have you figured out more accurately than the people you consider your soulmates. And if you're a compulsive clicker of the “thumbs up” icon, Facebook may have insight into your innermost thoughts and feelings in a mere week-and-a-half. If that alarms you, then you may want to take note of a conference coming up at Concordia University next week in which academics will meet to tackle the tricky issue of digital privacy and to ask the question: Are Google, Facebook, Apple, Amazon and Microsoft controlling our lives? Organizer Bipin Desai believes they are - that’s why he never uses Google to search for anything, nor Google maps to navigate. Shocking? Perhaps. But while he says he might hit the occasional detour, he also has the satisfaction of knowing that Google can’t trace his every step or his interests. Instead, he opts to use duckduckgo.com, a search engine that doesn’t track you. “These companies control our lives by channelling the kinds of news and products they think we’re interested in,” said Desai, a professor in Concordia’s department of computer science and software engineering. “We’re not their puppets but they try to steer us and brainwash us.”

20. Coderre accusé de censure par un commentateur de droite

La Presse, Pierre-André Normandin, 2016 07 09

Ottawa - Le commentateur de droite Ezra Levant crie à la censure. Il affirme que sa plus récente publicité dans sa campagne contre la décision du maire Denis Coderre de s'opposer au projet Énergie Est a été interdite sous la pression de l'hôtel de ville et pour éviter de choquer la communauté musulmane. Dans une vidéo de 14 minutes mise en ligne jeudi, M. Levant dit avoir tenté de mettre en place un troisième panneau-réclame en face de l'hôtel de ville de Montréal pour dénoncer l'opposition du maire au projet d'oléoduc piloté par Énergie Est. « Lorsque Denis Coderre dit non au projet d'Énergie Est, il dit oui au pétrole de la charia exporté par l'OPEP », clame la publicité. L'affiche présente une photo du roi de l'Arabie saoudite, Salmane ben Abdelaziz Al Saoud. Mais alors que les deux autres publicités ont été affichées sans problème, la société Outfront Media a cette fois refusé la plus récente mouture de cette campagne lancée depuis le début de l'année. « Quand nous leur avons demandé pourquoi, ils nous ont dit avoir peur de choquer les activistes musulmans et même le dictateur saoudien lui-même. » Le commentateur est toutefois allé plus loin en affirmant que le cabinet du maire Coderre était intervenu auprès d'Outfront pour qu'elle cesse de diffuser ces publicités. « La société d'affichage nous a aussi dit que l'hôtel de ville de Montréal lui mettait de la pression pour arrêter de diffuser nos publicités et que si elle continuait, elle pourrait avoir des difficultés. Les politiciens libéraux ne lui donneraient peut-être plus de permis », poursuit Levant. Pour appuyer son dire, le commentateur a diffusé deux courriels envoyés par un employé de la société d'affichage ainsi que l'enregistrement d'une conversation avec une dirigeante canadienne d'Outfront. Dans ceux-ci, l'entreprise dit ne pas être à l'aise avec la mention du mot « charia ». « Ceci est religieux et politique et nous voulons éviter cela », peut-on lire dans un message.

21. Suspect in Dallas Attack Had Interest in Black Power Groups

The New York Times, Julie Turkewitz, 2016 07 09

Dallas - The man who the Dallas police say killed five officers in a barrage of bullets on Thursday was a troubled Army reservist who left Afghanistan under a cloud of sexual harassment charges made by a fellow soldier who sought an order of protection against him and said he needed mental health counseling. Micah Johnson, 25, left the service in 2015, moving back to the Dallas area, where he had grown up. There, he gravitated toward black power groups, displaying his affinity for them on Facebook. His profile page, which has since been taken down, paid homage to black pride, featuring images of a raised fist and pictures of the red, black and green Pan-African flag. Both have been symbols of nonviolent black empowerment for decades, but have also been co-opted by extremist groups with racist views. And when the authorities searched Mr. Johnson’s home on Friday, after he had been killed by the police, they said they found “bomb-making materials, ballistic vests, rifles, ammunition and a personal journal of combat tactics." Mr. Johnson, who the police said acted alone, served in the Army Reserve from 2009 to 2015, leaving as a private first class, according to Army records. He was deployed to Afghanistan in November 2013 with the 420th Engineer Brigade, based in Seagoville, Tex. His job specialty was as a mason and carpenter. Nothing in his records suggests that he saw combat or was injured.

22. 'Bomb Robot' Takes Down Gunman, but Raises Enforcement Questions

The New York Times, Michael S. Schmidt & Henry Fountain, 2016 07 09

Washington - The Dallas police ended a standoff with the gunman suspected of killing five officers with a tactic that by all accounts appears to be unprecedented: It blew him up using a robot. In doing so, it sought to protect police who had negotiated with the man for several hours and had exchanged gunfire with him. But the decision ignited a debate about the increasing militarization of police and the remote-controlled use of force, and raised the specter of a new era of policing. The Dallas police chief, David O. Brown, said officers had used one of the department's "bomb robots," attaching an explosive device to its arm that was detonated early Friday when the robot was near the gunman. "Other options would have exposed the officers to grave danger," he said. But the decision to deliver a bomb by robot stunned some current and former law enforcement officials, who said they believed the new tactic blurred the line between policing and warfare. They said that it might have been an excessive use of force and that it set a precedent, adding that they were concerned that other departments across the country could begin using the same tactic. "The further we remove the officer from the use of force and the consequences that come with it, the easier it becomes to use that tactic," said Rick Nelson, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and a former counterterrorism official on the National Security Council. "It's what we have done with drones in warfare."

23. Alliance-Linked Websites Fail at Auspicious Moment

The Wall Street Journal, Julian E. Barnes, 2016 07 09

Washington - Officials are trying to determine whether a cyberattack was behind outages at websites affiliated with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and whether hackers were attempting to counter a Warsaw summit that is addressing both cyberspace dangers and Russian aggression. Officials said there is no concrete evidence the websites were knocked out by hacking. But some officials suspect that Russian-backed hackers could be responsible for the website outage that took down a pair of websites affiliated with NATO's Allied Transformation Command based in Norfolk, Va. The Russian Defense Ministry was not available for comment. Other Russian officials did not immediately respond to a request for comment. The website outages were originally reported to NATO officials as a technical error. But NATO is currently holding a summit of alliance leaders aimed at beefing up its deterrent against Russian aggression, raising suspicions among senior officials. "This is a suspicious timing for a technical failure," said a senior alliance official. "If this is a cyberattack, it would be no surprise."

24. Iraq War veteran will be next to lead Islamic State fight

The Washington Post., Missy Ryan, 2016 07 09

Washington - The Pentagon has tapped a veteran of its counterinsurgency wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to replace Lt. Gen. Sean MacFarland as commander of U.S. and allied military operations against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria, military officials said. Lt. Gen. Stephen J. Townsend, who now serves as commander of the XVIII Airborne Corps, based in Fort Bragg, N.C., will take command of Operation Inherent Resolve in August or September, officials said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss an appointment that has not yet been made public. That makes Townsend the man who is likely to oversee the bulk of the fighting for the Iraqi city of Mosul, in what promises to be a pivotal battle against the militant group. U.S. and Iraqi officials have not said when Iraqi forces will begin their assault in earnest on the northern city, which has been under Islamic State control since 2014. But it's expected to begin as early as later this summer or fall. A decisive win by Iraqi forces in Mosul would deprive the Islamic State of its last major city in Iraq and would deal a major blow to the group's claim of a flesh-and-blood caliphate stretching across Iraq and Syria. But if the operation stumbled, it would hand the militants a giant propaganda victory and would worsen the already significant political problems facing Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi. Iraqi forces are conducting operations in Nineveh province, where Mosul is located, but they have yet to launch an offensive on the city itself.

25. Two Russian diplomats are expelled after U.S. official is jumped in Moscow

The Washington Post, Carol Morello, 2016 07 09

Washington - The United States last month expelled two Russian diplomats as a response to a Russian police guard tackling a U.S. diplomat outside the American Embassy in Moscow, the State Department said Friday. The diplomats were declared persona non grata on June 17, spokesman John Kirby said. That was less than two weeks after the incident that sparked the diplomatic row. The June 6 scuffle between the police officer and the diplomat was captured on security footage and broadcast on Russian television last week. It shows a man emerging from a taxi and walking briskly up the embassy steps. He is just outside the door when a guard jumps out of a gatehouse and wrestles him to the ground. Even with the patrolman on top of him, the diplomat pushes with his feet and, while on his back, manages to get inside the door to the embassy, which is U.S. territory and inviolate. The tape briefly stops and freezes when the man exits the taxi at the bottom of the steps, and it picks up again from a slightly different angle. The United States said the diplomat, who was thought to be an intelligence officer under diplomatic cover and suffered a broken shoulder in the scrap, flashed an identification badge before he was assaulted.

26. Facebook Launches Messenger Encryption

The Wall Street Journal, Robert McMillan and Anne Steele, 2016 07 09

Washington - Facebook Inc. said Friday that it has begun offering some users of its Messenger texting app the option to encrypt their messages. The social-network giant is offering a "small percentage" of its 900 million Messenger users a way to have secret conversations with other users, using end-to-end encryption technology that makes messages unreadable except by the sender and intended recipient, said Tony Leach, product manager for Facebook Messenger. It will offer the feature to more users in coming months. "We want people to be able to use Messenger for every conversation that they want to have," Mr. Leach said. "In some cases, these are really fun and casual things like sending emojis to one another. In other cases, these are really serious conversations where you need an extra layer of security." Facebook introduced end-to-end encryption to the one billion users of its WhatsApp messaging app in April. With WhatsApp, end-to-end encryption is turned on by default, but with Messenger users will have to turn on the feature. That decision stirred some controversy Friday. "Opt-in encryption favors educated users who have the time to learn about obscure security settings. Not cool Facebook," wrote Christopher Soghoian, a principal technologist with the American Civil Liberties Union, in a Twitter post. In a separate message, Mr. Soghoian said Facebook may have been seeking to avoid the ire of federal officials who have expressed concerns over the uses of encryption.

27. Seoul, U.S. To Deploy Antimissile System

The Wall Street Journal, Kwanwoo Jun, 2016 07 09

Washington - Washington and Seoul agreed to deploy an advanced U.S. missile-defense system in South Korea—over strong opposition from China—to counter the threat from North Korea. The agreement on a deployment by late next year was announced jointly Friday by Seoul's defense ministry and a U.S. military command stationed in South Korea. "North Korea's continued development of ballistic missiles and weapons of mass destruction require the Alliance to take this prudent, protective measure to bolster our layered and effective missile defense," Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, who commands combined U.S.-

South Korean forces, said in a statement. Last month North Korea test-fired a series of midrange ballistic missiles capable of hitting targets as distant as the U.S. territory of Guam and U.S. military facilities in Okinawa, Japan. That followed a nuclear test in January and a launch the next month of a missile with enough range to threaten the continental U.S. The planned deployment of the Thaad system—for Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense—underscores the U.S. "ironclad commitment" to defend South Korea, the U.S. statement said. The two Koreas technically remain at war, the 1950-53 Korean War having ended with an armistice rather than a peace treaty. The U.S., which led the fight in that war after the North invaded, still stations 28,500 troops in the South.

28. Clinton Pushes Back Over Email Criticism

The Wall Street Journal, Colleen McCain Nelson, 2016 07 09

Washington - Hillary Clinton said Friday she was relieved that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had wrapped up its probe into her private email server, but she pushed back against assertions that she was careless in handling classified information. In her first comments about the FBI's decision not to pursue charges against her, the likely Democratic presidential nominee praised investigators' professionalism and reiterated that she had erred by using a private email account for government business during her tenure as secretary of state. "I have said many times, and I repeat clearly today: It was a mistake for me to use personal email, and I regret that," Mrs. Clinton told CNN. On Tuesday, FBI Director James Comey recommended against charging Mrs. Clinton for mishandling classified information. But while he concluded that the former secretary of state hadn't intended to violate the law, Mr. Comey delivered a scathing assessment of her actions, criticizing her for being "extremely careless" with the country's secrets. The FBI found that 113 of the emails Mrs. Clinton sent or received contained information considered classified at the time. Mr. Comey has said that Mrs. Clinton may have believed that some of the emails in question were unclassified because they weren't properly marked.

29. Is This American Spy Dead? Or Was He Ever Real? (Canada)

Daily Beast, Michael Weiss, 2016 07 09

Washington - The Russian media this week trumpeted the death of Colonel Aleksandr Poteyev, the spy found guilty for being an American mole. But it's unclear he's dead, or that he was even a mole in the first place. Images of J. Edgar Hoover and encased spy paraphernalia are scattered throughout. At centre stage, when you walk in, is a scale-model replica of the JFK hangar where the 1978 Lufthansa heist—the one Martin Scorsese dramatized in GoodFellas—took place. Off to the left is a roped-off and perfectly intact commercial airliner wheel, which was recovered from wreckage of the former World Trade Center. As you move along the far-left wall of the room, you notice that there hangs an object somewhat out of place in such recognizable memorabilia of criminal notoriety. The designer handbag, the casual visitor to the G-men's shrine is reliably informed in a written plaque and accompanying photograph of its former red-head owner trotting along the streets of Manhattan with it slung over her shoulder, once belonged to Anna Chapman. The most famous of the Russian "illegals," or undeclared agents of a foreign government, busted by the FBI in 2010 as part of a long-running, 10-person ring operating in the United States under the supervision of the SVR, Russia's foreign intelligence service, Chapman has since become a different kind of fashion icon in her native Moscow, a sex kittenish runway model and advert pinup celebrated for her Bond girl activities in the world's financial capital. She was also arguably the least dangerous spy of a network collared in June 2010 and subsequently traded for three agents who'd been working for either the CIA or MI6, plus one Russian nuclear specialist who, while not privy to classified intelligence, had nonetheless been imprisoned in Russia for 11 years on espionage charges. "Cynthia Murphy," or Lidiya Guryeva, of Montclair, New Jersey, for instance, worked at a lower Manhattan-based accounting firm, not far from the FBI field office, that offered tax services and had a venture capitalist client with close ties to Bill and Hillary Clinton. "Donald Heathfield," or Andrei Berzukov, sold strategic planning software to U.S. corporations, putting him in a position to conduct industrial espionage. (The family life of Heathfield and his spy-wife "Tracey Foley," or Yelena Vavilova, which allegedly included a plan to recruit their Canadian-born sons to work for the SVR, inspired the hit Reagan-era Cold War series The Americans.)

30. Russia warns of 'spiral of confrontation', as UK and US up troops in Baltics (Canada)

The Independent, Will Worley, 2016 07 09

London - A senior Russian official has warned of a "spiral of confrontation" with Nato, as the military alliance met in Warsaw for a landmark summit. President Obama announced at the meeting that 1,000 more troops will be sent to Poland, while David Cameron said UK troops will also be deployed to Poland and Estonia, which borders Russia. It will be the first time the UK military will be permanently stationed in the Baltic region. Tensions between the two power blocs have mounted steadily since the Russian annexation of Crimea in 2014, which unnerved Baltic state governments. Large scale military exercises, such as Anaconda-2016 in June, have been a frequent expression of the re-emerging power struggle between East and West. Nato's Secretary General, Jens Stoltenberg, has insisted the organisation "does not want confrontation with Russia". But the Kremlin has reacted angrily to the mounting presence of Nato troops in eastern Europe, which it perceives as hostile Western encirclement. "What Nato is doing on the eastern front is against Russia," Alexander Grushko, Russian ambassador to Nato, told the BBC. Referencing the increased troop numbers and large Nato military exercises, he continued: "We have to reflect this new military reality ... we see that Nato is trying ... to build this new Iron Curtain on the borders with the Russian Federation. And this is very dangerous because we know ... when you have this mix of policy, military planning, it's very easy to be involved in a spiral of confrontation and arms race." Also in attendance was David Cameron, who flew to his last Nato summit on his new Cam Force One prime ministerial jet. The RAF Voyager refuelling aircraft was converted to carry passengers at a cost of £10m. The Prime Minister said: This summit is a chance for us to reiterate our strong support for Ukraine and our other eastern allies to deter Russian aggression. Actions speak louder than words and the UK is proud to be taking the lead role, deploying troops across Eastern Europe. It is yet another example of the UK leading in Nato. Canada and Germany have also committed to furnishing core units for Latvia, which also borders on Russia.

31. UK to increase troops in Afghanistan from 450 to 500

The Guardian, Rowena Mason, 2016 07 09

London - David Cameron has increased the number of troops serving in Afghanistan for the first time since the UK's withdrawal began. At a Nato summit in Poland, the prime minister's deputy official spokesman said the UK would be increasing the size of its mission from 450 to 500 and delaying the departure of the last remaining forces in the country into 2017. The UK withdrew all combat troops from Afghanistan in 2014 after 13 years of fighting the Taliban, but a support mission of 450 stayed on to train domestic forces. They were expected to return at the end of 2015 but Michael Fallon, the defence secretary, last year confirmed the troops would remain throughout this year. Their presence has now been extended into next year and the size of the mission enhanced, in a move suggesting the Afghan army is still not ready to withstand the Taliban without support from international military allies such as the US and the UK. "The aim is to build the capacity of the Afghan national defence and security forces," Cameron's spokesman said.

32. Spies keen to please No 10 were fooled by lying sources

The Times of London, Sean O'Neill, 2016 07 09

London - On the first anniversary of the September 11 attacks, MI6 produced a dramatic intelligence report on the threat from Saddam Hussein. The information, from a new source, showed that Iraq was making and planning to use chemical and biological weapons. For Tony Blair, in his search to justify Britain's participation in an invasion of Iraq, this was as close as it would get to the silver bullet. The next day, September 12, 2002, Sir Richard Dearlove, head of MI6, was in Downing Street to brief the prime minister on the source and his information. These were heady times for Sir Richard and his agency. The Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), commonly known as MI6, had been in the Whitehall wilderness since the end of the Cold War, but that had changed when Osama bin Laden struck in New York and Washington. As Britain scrambled to understand al-Qaeda and then to confront it in Afghanistan, Mr Blair turned to his spies and particularly to MI6, the agency responsible for gathering intelligence overseas. Lord Wilson of Dinton, who was cabinet secretary until September 2002, told the Chilcot inquiry that Sir Richard routinely travelled with Mr Blair as the Afghanistan coalition was built. The MI6 chief "seized his chance, quite understandably, and got to know the prime minister and the prime minister got to know him".

33. Iraq war: after Blair and Bush met, the tempo changed

The Guardian., Nick Hopkins, 2016 07 09

London - Tuesday 2 April 2002 was a warm spring day, the first after the Easter weekend. The country was coming to terms with the death of the Queen Mother, a young singer called Gareth Gates had shot to No 1 and Admiral Lord Boyce, chief of the defence staff, was heading to Buckinghamshire for a meeting with the prime minister at Chequers. A submariner in his early career, colleagues thought Boyce rather prickly, a trait cabinet minister Clare Short attributed to the long periods he had spent underwater. Certainly, his summons to see Tony Blair seemed to have left him a little nonplussed. British forces were already deployed in Afghanistan, which was his priority. And though he had heard talk in the press and around Whitehall about a shift in interest towards Iraq, he wasn't one for gossip or small talk. Blair, however, wanted to chat about Saddam Hussein. "I guess my presence at Chequers on that particular occasion was simply ... if there were questions coming up about what could be done militarily; what was our capability should we be asked to do something," Boyce explained to the Chilcot inquiry. If there had been a significant hardening of thinking in Downing Street, Boyce appeared to have left Chequers none the wiser. As far as he was concerned, attacking Iraq just wasn't on the cards. "There was no discussion on the detail of military action or military options," he said. "Of course, Iraq wasn't off our plot entirely. It was something which the MoD was keeping a watching eye on, if you like. "At the meeting ... no particular preparations were made. It was a scoping opportunity ... we were certainly not doing any thinking about any sort of military adventure." The meeting was rather casual – and very Blairish. Others in the room included Sir Richard Dearlove, the head of MI6, and Sir John Scarlett, head of the joint intelligence committee (JIC).

34. British suicide bomber kills five police officers in Iraq

The Times of London, Ammar Shamary, John Simpson & Tom Coghlan, 2016 07 09

London - A British jihadist handed back to Islamic State by Turkey in a mass prisoner swap murdered five Iraqi police officers in a suicide bombing. Hisham Folkard, 28, is understood to have driven a car packed with explosives into an Iraqi security service convoy under cover of a sandstorm during the holy month of Ramadan, killing himself and five soldiers and injuring fifteen. Folkard, known as Abu Hurairah al-Britani, was one of two Britons in a prisoner swap exposed by The Times that provoked international outrage. At least 20 EU citizens were among an estimated 180 Isis prisoners traded for 46 Turkish diplomats taken hostage when Isis occupied Mosul in northern Iraq. Iraqi army sources said that two suicide bombers targeted the troops of Major General Juma Enad, the police chief for Salaheddine province, northern Iraq, near the town of Baiji on Monday. One bomber was intercepted but the second killed four elite counterterrorism officers and one Iraqi army soldier. A statement released by Isis praised Folkard for the attack, claiming it as a "martyrdom operation". After Turkey released him to the selfproclaimed caliphate, Folkard gained notoriety when he mocked CNN by posing for a photograph with a jar of Nutella. The US news network had published an investigation claiming that the militia was using the chocolate spread and images of kittens to lure young girls to Syria.

35. Teen's tracking device removed

The Age, Tammy Mills, 2016 07 09

Canberra - A tracking device placed on a Melbourne teenager once accused of plotting an Anzac Day terrorist attack will be removed after variations to a highly restrictive control order. Harun Causevic, 19, was one of three young men charged with planning a terrorist attack at the Shrine of Remembrance or Dandenong RSL last year. The terrorism charges were dropped, but the Hampton Park teenager was placed on a control order in Sep-tember on the basis it may prevent a terrorist act. On Friday, Federal Court Judge Norah Hartnett confirmed the control order would be in place until September 11 this year, but varied the order so Causevic would no longer have to wear an electronic tracking device around his ankle. Causevic's lawyer, David Neal, QC, argued it would prevent his client from gaining employment. Judge Hartnett also removed the condition that prevented the teenager from attending the Al-Furqan mosque in Noble Park, which openly supported Islamic State, because it closed in April last year. The conditions that prevented him from being within 100 metres of the Shire of Remembrance and the Dandenong RSL were also lifted.

36. Police bungle terror watch

Courier Mail, James Dowling, 2016 07 09

Canberra - The Australian Federal Police mistakenly tracked one of their own members believing him to be a terror suspect, it can be revealed. The federal police submitted the tracking evidence in its application for a control order on Harun Causevic, claiming the 19-year-old had carried out reconnaissance for a terrorist attack at the Dandenong RSL. But the device was not attached to C sevic's car but that of a surveillance member who had reconstructed Causevic's trip from his own recall. The error was noticed during a confirmation hearing, and evidence on the Dandenong trip was withdrawn. Causevic was arrested in the Anzac Day terrorism raids in April last year, but criminal charges against him were dropped in August. His former co-accused, Sevdet Besim, pleaded guilty to a terrorist plot that police allege was to happen on Anzac Day, with Besim running over a police officer and using his gun to go on a rampage. Besim discussed carrying out his attacks at the Shrine of Remembrance or the Dandenong RSL.

37. U.S. remains in contact with China, Russia at 'highest levels' amid THAAD tension: Pentagon

Yonhap English News, 2016 07 09

Washington - The United States remains in contact with Chinese and Russian leaders "at the highest levels," the Pentagon said Friday, as Beijing and Moscow protest strongly the planned deployment of the U.S. THAAD missile defense system to South Korea. South Korea and the U.S. announced earlier that they have officially decided to deploy a Terminal High Altitude Area Defense battery to South Korea to cope with ever-growing nuclear and missile threats from North Korea. China, which has long voiced opposition to THAAD in the South, strongly protested the decision, saying the deployment does not help achieve the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula and hurts peace and stability in the region. Russia also expressed similar protests. "As we have long said, THAAD is a purely defensive system designed to counter short- and medium-range regional ballistic missiles. It would not undermine China's or Russia's strategic deterrent," Cmdr. Gary Ross, a Pentagon spokesman, told Yonhap News Agency. "A THAAD system in the ROK (South Korea) would be focused solely on North Korea and contribute to a layered missile defense that would enhance the alliance's existing missile defense capabilities against potential North Korean missile threats," he said.

38. 4-North Korea fires missile from submarine but it appears to have failed -S.Korea

Reuters News, Ju-min Park, 2016 07 09

Seoul - North Korea fired a ballistic missile from a submarine on Saturday but it appears to have failed soon after launch, South Korea's military said. The launch comes at the end of a week of sharply rising tensions on the peninsula. It is only a day after the U.S. and South Korea pledged to deploy an advanced anti-missile system to counter threats from Pyongyang, and two days after North Korea warned it was planning its toughest response to what it deemed a "declaration of war" by the United States. That followed Washington's blacklisting of the isolated state's leader Kim Jong Un for alleged human rights abuses. The South's Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said in a statement that the missile was launched at about 11:30 a.m. Seoul time (0230 GMT) in waters east of the Korean peninsula. The missile was likely fired from a submarine as planned but appears to have failed in the early stage of flight, the Joint Chiefs said. Neighbouring Japan, the United States, and South Korea's military condemned the missile launch as a flagrant violation of U.N. sanctions. South Korea's Yonhap news agency said the missile's engine successfully ignited but the projectile soon exploded in mid-air at a height of about 10 km (6 miles), and covered not more than a few kilometers across the water.

39. Taiwan Train Explosion Wasn't Organized Terrorism, Government Says

The New York Times, Patrick Boehler, 2016 07 09

Hong Kong - The authorities in Taiwan said on Friday that they had ruled out organized terrorism in a bombing on a commuter train that left at least 25 people wounded. The blast occurred on Thursday night in one of the train's cars as it was approaching Taipei, the capital. The official Central News Agency cited witnesses describing an explosion followed by flames that spread in the car. Most of the injuries were minor, but one person was in critical condition, the local news media reported on Friday morning, citing an official at a Taipei hospital. Two other people were reported to be in serious condition. Central News Agency reported later Friday that one of the wounded, a 55-year-old man, had been identified as a suspect in the bombing. It said that his fingerprints had been found on the bomb, which the authorities had described as an 18-inch metal tube filled with an explosive substance. The report made no mention of a possible motive.

40. N. Korea fails in testing sub-launched ballistic missile: S. Korea

Kyodo News, 2016 07 09

Seoul - North Korea fired what appeared to be a ballistic missile launched from a submarine off its east coast Saturday but the projectile failed in flight, South Korea's military said, amid renewed tensions in the region. The launch took place around 11:30 a.m. South Korea time from waters southeast of the coastal port city of Sinpo, South Hamgyong Province, the South's Joint Chiefs of Staff said. According to the South Korean military, the missile appears to have been successfully ejected out of the sea but failed to fly normally in the air. South Korea's Yonhap News Agency reported that the missile was fired from a 2,000-ton Sinpo-class sub and seems to have flown several kilometers before exploding at an altitude of about 10 km. Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe told reporters in Tokyo that North Korea's latest act is "a clear challenge to U.N. Security Council resolutions. We must firmly condemn it."

41. For Two Bangladeshis, Paths Split --- Divergent paths taken by victim and attacker reflect country's deep divide over religion

The Wall Street Journal, Syed Zain Al-Mahmood and Gordon Fairclough, 2016 07 09

Dhaka - Growing up, Faraaz Hossain and Rohan Imtiaz lived a few miles apart in affluent neighborhoods that were havens from the poverty and chaos prevalent here. Both attended elite high schools and were studying business at private universities. But about six months ago, their lives went in radically different directions, only to intersect again, tragically, last week. The 22-year-old Mr. Imtiaz was one of five Islamic State-linked militants who stormed a Dhaka cafe and Mr. Hossain, 20, was among more than 20 people killed. The divergent paths of the two scions of the establishment offer a vivid example of the deep split in Bangladesh, one of the world's largest Muslim-majority countries, between proponents of a greater role for religion and those who favor a more liberal order. It is a polarizing struggle that goes to the heart of national identity. Nearly 45 years after Bangladesh won its independence from Pakistan, people remain torn over whether to define themselves by their Muslim heritage first, or by their Bengali language and culture. The July 1 assault on the Holey Artisan Bakery restaurant represented a major escalation in campaign by Islamic State and local extremists to take advantage of these divisions to sow violence.

42. Philippine president blames US for Middle East violence

The Financial Express (Bangladesh), 2016 07 09

Bangladesh - The new Philippine president blamed U.S. intervention for the bloody conflicts in Iraq and other Middle Eastern countries in his latest criticism of Manila's closest security ally. President Rodrigo Duterte suggested in a speech Friday that intrusive policy was to blame for attacks on U.S. soil, saying, "It is not that the Middle East is exporting terrorism to America, America imported terrorism." "They forced their way to Iraq ... look at Iraq now, look what happened to Libya, look what happened to Syria," he told the Muslim community in southern Davao city in a ceremony marking the end of the Muslim fasting month of Ramadan. "People are being annihilated there including children." The former Davao mayor has said he would be a leftist president who would chart a foreign policy not dependent on the United States. He has pointed out the benefits of nurturing friendly relations with Beijing, including a Chinese offer of financing railway projects in the Philippines. The country has had frosty ties with China under Duterte's predecessor, Benigno Aquino III, who bolstered security ties with the U.S. to deter China's assertiveness in the disputed South China Sea.

43. Zambo police arrest Abu Sayyaf Group supporter

Philippines News Agency, 2016 07 09

Zamboanga - The police have arrested in a raid early Saturday a suspected supported of the Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG) in an east coast barangay this city. Chief Inspector Edilberto Alvarez, Intelligence chief of the Zamboanga City Police Office (ZCPO), identified the arrested suspect as Hasbi Ahaddin, a resident of Sitio Marangan, Barangay Muti, 58.80 kilometers east of City Hall. Alvarez said Ahaddin was arrested around 4:30 a.m. Saturday in his residence in Barangay Muti, which is a coastal village. Alvarez said Ahaddin was arrested when they served search warrants on two houses in Barangay Muti on orders of the court in relation to the June 29 twin roadside bombings in the area. A motorcyclist, who was on the way to attend a funeral in Barangay Vitali, was injured during the incident. Alvarez said Ahaddin is allegedly a member of a locally-based kidnap-for-ransom-group (KFRG) headed by a certain Marzan Ajilul.

44. Man Survives Terrorist Attack in Bangladesh , but Is in Custody as a Suspect

The New York Times, Geeta Anand, 2016 07 09

Dhaka, Bangladesh — When he was released with seven other hostages after a harrowing night of terrorist violence last Saturday, Tahmid Hasib Khan expected to be greeted with welcoming arms. Instead, Mr. Khan, a 22-year-old University of Toronto student, was grabbed by the Bangladeshi police, beaten and taken into custody. He has not been seen since. Mr. Khan has been held largely incommunicado by law enforcement in Bangladesh's capital city of Dhaka for the past week, suspected by the police of being involved in the attack in which gunmen carrying explosives stormed a Dhaka restaurant and the Islamic State took credit. Mr. Khan's family and friends say it is a case of mistaken identity, but as the days have passed, they have grown increasingly desperate to make contact with him, fearing for his life in a country where brutal interrogation practices are commonplace. "We don't want anything bad to happen to him," said a cousin of Mr. Khan's, Ali Faiyaz Shoumo. "We just want to know that he's alive and want him to get proper medical attention and legal representation." They said Mr. Khan has epilepsy, a condition that is aggravated by stress. Human rights experts share their concerns. "The Bangladesh security forces have a long record of using beatings and other forms of torture to try to extract confessions from suspects," said Phil Robertson, deputy Asia director of Human Rights Watch. "Bangladesh has been playing a desperate game of catch-up to try to figure out who is behind this attack, and the worry is that this will encourage use of extreme methods like torture against these suspects."

45. For China, a Missile Defense System in South Korea Spells a Failed Courtship

The New York Times, Jane Perlez, 2016 07 09

Beijing - However isolated North Korea may be, it has long had one major ally: China. But for two years, China's leader, President Xi Jinping, seemed to be favoring Pyongyang's neighbor and nemesis to the south. He spent much political capital wooing South Korea's president, Park Geun-hye, in hopes of drawing the country away from its longtime ally, the United States. He made an elaborate state visit to Seoul while shunning North Korea and its young leader, Kim Jong-un, whom he has yet to meet. Ms. Park returned the favor last year, coming to Beijing for a major military parade at Tiananmen Square, the only leader of an American ally to attend. But on Friday, it became clear that Mr. Xi's efforts had fallen short. In announcing plans to deploy an advanced American missile defense system in South Korea, Ms. Park's government showed that it was embracing its alliance with Washington more than ever, and that it would rely less on China to keep North Korea and its nuclear arsenal at bay. In Beijing, the decision was seen as a major setback, one that went beyond its interests on the Korean Peninsula to the larger strategic question of an arms race in Northeast Asia that could impel China — and Russia — to develop more sophisticated weapons.

46. Government will stand firm: Madhav on Kashmir situation

Press Trust of India, 2016 07 09

New Delhi - BJP leader Ram Madhav today asserted that an "uncompromising" fight against terrorism is important for Jammu and Kashmir's development and government will stand firm "eruption or no eruption", as violence broke out in the Valley after the killing of militant Burhan Wani. "Government WILL stand firm, eruption or no eruption (sic)," he said in a tweet. "We will always try, be it the state government or the central government, to work for peace and security of the common man of the Valley and also to create atmosphere for development of the state. An uncompromising fight against terrorism is part of it and important," he later said. Madhav, a party general secretary, is the organisation's pointsman for the state. Union Minister Jitendra Singh, who is MP from Udhampur, praised the security forces and appealed for peace saying all sections of society must come together in the fight against terrorism, regardless of their political ideology. "We are proud of our security forces. They have achieved a major success on the counter terrorism front", Singh told reporters in Jammu.

47. Indian troops, Kashmir protesters clash as top rebel killed

The Associated Press, Aijaiz Hussain, 2016 07 09

Srinagar - Indian troops fired on protesters in Kashmir on Saturday, killing at least seven as tens of thousands of people defied a curfew and participated in the funeral of a top rebel commander a day after he was killed by Indian forces in the disputed Himalayan region, officials said. Burhan Wani, chief of operations of Hizbul Mujahideen, Indian-controlled Kashmir's largest rebel group, was killed in fighting Friday after Indian troops, acting on a tip, cordoned a forested village in southern Kashmir's Kokernag area, said Police Director-General K. Rajendra. As news of the killing spread on Saturday, widespread clashes erupted in several neighbourhoods in southern Kashmir as thousands of residents hurled rocks at Indian troops, who responded by using live ammunition, pellet guns and tear gas, two police officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with department policy. They said at least 60 civilians were wounded in the clashes. Local police intelligence chief Shiv M. Sahai said that seven men were killed in "retaliatory action" by government troops. Another man drowned as he tried to flee government troops.

48. Nigerian president appoints new intelligence chief

Xinhua News Agency, Bosun Awoniyi, 2016 07 09

Lagos - Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari has approved the appointment of Air Vice Marshal Mohammed Saliu Usman as the new Chief of Defense Intelligence (CDI). Usman, who took over the headship of the Intelligence Agency Friday, said he has been mandated to focus on intelligence gathering as the only solution confronting the country's security challenges.

49. Le Soudan du Sud au bord du cataclysme

Le Monde, journaliste maison, 2016 07 09

Juba - Trois hommes, enfermés dans une salle de réunion du palais présidentiel à Juba, au Soudan du Sud, ont tenté, pendant une longue soirée, d'éviter le suicide de leur pays. Le président, Salva Kiir, ses deux vice-présidents, Riek Machar et James Wani Igga, étaient en réunion à «J1», surnom du bureau présidentiel, le bâtiment le plus protégé de la capitale, lorsque les premiers coups de feu ont éclaté, à environ deux cents mètres, selon des témoins. Ce n'étaient pas des tirs isolés de soldats indisciplinés ou querelleurs. Des chars ont été déployés, les tirs se sont étendus à d'autres parties de la capitale. A la veille de la date anniversaire de l'indépendance, est-ce que l'étincelle capable de tout embraser venait de se produire? A vrai dire, les trois hommes qui sont supposés, à la tête d'un gouvernement d'union nationale de transition, ramener le Soudan du Sud à la paix et à la raison, n'en savaient rien. Il devait y avoir une conférence de presse, des journalistes étaient donc déjà sur place. Un appel au calme a été lancé. On ignore le bilan. Certains témoins, dans la nuit, ont avancé que des civils auraient été touchés dans l'enceinte du camp des Nations unies. Puis le silence s'est fait. Riek Machar a même pu traverser la ville pour rentrer dans sa nouvelle résidence, à la périphérie, sans être obligé de se frayer un chemin en combattant avec sa garde rapprochée. La guerre entre les siens et les unités fidèles au président, Salva Kiir, n'a pas commencé à l'aube de l'anniversaire de l'indépendance, ce jour si particulier au Soudan du Sud.

50. Factional Fighting Breaks Out in South Sudan's Capital

The New York Times, Jacey Fortin, 2016 07 09

Juba - Gunfire again echoed across South Sudan's capital on Friday, a day after fighting among military factions there left at least five dead, in a new outbreak of violence that has threatened an already-tense stalemate just days before the country is to celebrate its fifth independence day. Witnesses in the capital,

Juba, described the sound of "serious shooting" in several neighborhoods on Friday evening, including near the airport, and where United Nations and American offices are. Details were scarce, and some residents were staying indoors. On Thursday, soldiers loyal to South Sudan's president and fighters supporting its vice president opened fire on one another in the Gudele neighborhood of Juba, officials said. That fighting broke out after the two factions confronted each other at a roadside checkpoint around 8 p.m., officials said. The military said soldiers had been carrying out "routine" checks, and a spokesman for the former rebels loyal to Vice President Riek Machar said that government troops had tried to arrest his bodyguards, when gunfire erupted. Each side blamed the other for shooting first. At least five government soldiers were killed in the fighting, the military said in a statement. At least two soldiers loyal to the vice president were wounded, a spokesman said.

51. 'This Has Pushed a Button': Kenyan Killings Stir a National Outcry

The New York Times, Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 07 09

Nairobi - The bodies were found in horrible shape. The skull of Willie Kimani, the lawyer, had been fractured in many places. Blunt force trauma, the coroners said. Josphat Mwenda, the client, had blood in his chest cavity, suggesting that he had been repeatedly hit by something very heavy and very hard. Joseph Muiruri, the taxi driver, who had the bad luck of driving the two after they left court two weeks ago, had been badly beaten as well, finished off with a length of rope. The lawyer and the client had been working on a police abuse case, and all three were last seen in police custody. Human rights groups say it is a sign of how cheap life has become on Nairobi's streets that police officers apparently thought the best solution to accusations against them was to kidnap and kill three people, including a well-known lawyer and a taxi driver who had nothing to do with the case. But if so, the police miscalculated. Four officers have been arrested and the case has exploded like few others in Kenya, provoking marches, protests, the involvement of the F.B.I. and outrage that has turned into violence. Hordes of young men stormed a police station this week and burned the metal container where the victims had been secretly held. Lawyers vowed to boycott the courts for a week, out of solidarity for their fallen colleague, and their absence has paralyzed Kenya's justice system.

52. Berlin Says Iran Sought Nuclear Equipment

The Wall Street Journal, Anton Troianovski, 2016 07 09

Tehran - Iran continued trying to illegally procure nuclear equipment from Germany after forging last year's landmark nuclear agreement with world powers, German intelligence officials said, even as the Foreign Ministry in Berlin and the White House played down the reports. German authorities detected repeated efforts by Iran-tied companies and organizations to obtain such equipment in the months after July 2015, when Tehran and six world powers reached the deal in Vienna, officials said. Under the pact, Iran agreed to scale back its nuclear capabilities in exchange for the lifting of most international sanctions. Such efforts continued this year, but at a significantly lower level, the German officials said, elaborating on two recent German intelligence reports covering 2015. However, U.S. and German officials on Friday rejected the suggestion that Iran might have breached the agreement since it went into effect on Jan. 16. "We have no information to indicate Iran has procured any materials in violation of the" deal, a senior Obama administration official said. "We understand that Germany shares this view."

53. Iran, criticising Merkel, says to press on with missile programme

Reuters News, 2016 07 09

Dubai - Iran will press on with its missile programme "with full force" based on national security needs, a foreign ministry spokesman was quoted as saying on Saturday, adding that critical comments by Germany's leader were unhelpful. Chancellor Angela Merkel told the parliament in Berlin on Thursday that missile launches by Iran earlier this year were inconsistent with a U.N. resolution urging it to refrain for up to eight years from missile work designed to deliver nuclear weapons. Foreign Ministry spokesman Bahram Qasemi said Merkel's remarks were "not constructive" and would have no bearing on the programme, according to state news agency IRNA. Reiterating Tehran's assertion that the missiles are not designed to carry nuclear weapons, he added: "Iran will continue with full force its missile programme based on its defensive plans and national security calculations." On Friday, Iran rejected as "unrealistic" a report by U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon criticising its missile launches as inconsistent with its deal with world powers to curb sensitive nuclear activity in exchange for sanctions relief.

54. Iraq PM announces recapture of key base from IS militants

The Associated Press, 2016 07 09

Baghdad - Iraq's prime minister says government forces have recaptured a key air base in northern Iraq from the Islamic State group. In a statement issued on Saturday, Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi describes the recapture of the Qayara air base as "important" to the long-awaited military operation to retake the IS-held city of Mosul. The town of Qayara is located southeast of Mosul. Al-Abadi called on "the residents of Mosul to get ready to liberate their city."

55. Suicide bombers strike shrine near Baghdad

The Washington Post, Loveday Morri & Mustafa Salim, 2016 07 09

Baghdad - At least 40 people were killed in a suicide bombing at a Shiite shrine north of Baghdad, medical officials said Friday, as Iraqis took to the streets of the capital to demonstrate against a government they say is failing to protect them. Three suicide bombers dressed in military uniforms opened fire on worshipers gathered at the shrine in Balad late Thursday, said Brig. Gen. Yahya Rasoul, a spokesman for the Iraqi military. Two then detonated their explosives at the shrine's gate, and the third was killed before he could trigger his device, Rasoul said. By Friday afternoon, the death toll had climbed to 40 people, said Saib al-Shami, deputy head of Balad hospital. He said 74 people were wounded. Seven of those killed were not immediately identified because they were burned beyond recognition in the fire that followed the bombing, Shami said. The Health Ministry confirmed the figures. The incident comes less than a week after the Islamic State's deadliest single suicide bombing in Iraq, which killed at least 292 people in the Karrada neighborhood of Baghdad early Sunday. A spate of attacks in several countries have been linked to the group during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, a surge of violence that has coincided with Islamic State losses in Iraq and Syria.

56. Palestinians Stabbing Less but Shooting More, as Israel Cracks Down

The New York Times, Isabel Kershner, 2016 07 09

Jerusalem - The Palestinian cousins had planned a shooting rampage on an Israeli train car; they took along knives, in case their improvised guns jammed. But after sneaking into Israel from their homes in the occupied West Bank, the pair encountered metal detectors at a train station. So they took a taxi to Tel Aviv instead and shot diners in a popular restaurant in the upscale Sarona complex, killing four Israelis. Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security agency, said this week that the attack a month ago was "inspired" by the Islamic State, and that one of the assailants, Muhammad Mhamra, 21, had returned from studies in Jordan as a supporter of the extremist group. As with a growing number of lone-wolf attackers worldwide, the authorities said there was no evidence that he and his cousin Khaled, 20, had been officially recruited by the Islamic State, also called ISIS or ISIL, or had received any support from it. Nine months into a surge of Palestinian attacks that at one point included several stabbings a day, officials and experts said that the knife violence had waned, but that there was a rise in the number of young Palestinians seeking to shoot Israelis. More than 30 Israelis and two American visitors have been killed by Palestinian attackers since Oct. 1; more than 200 Palestinians have been killed by Israelis in the same period, many while attacking or, according to the Israeli authorities, intending to do so.

57. No letup in fighting as Syrian military extends cease fire

The Canadian Press, 2016 07 09

Beirut - Syria's military said Saturday it would extend its own cease-fire for three days, even as pro-government forces advanced against rebels in the north. The military had declared a nationwide cease-fire for the Eid al-Fitr holiday July 6, expiring July 8 at midnight, but it had little impact on the ground, as pro-government forces choked off the last supply route to opposition areas in the contested city of Aleppo on Thursday. Rebels responded with a rocket barrage on residential areas in the government side of the city Friday night, killing 44, state media said. The Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights put the toll at 38 dead, among them 14 children and 13 women. The Observatory said another nine people, including eight women and children, were killed in presumed Russian or Syrian government airstrikes and rocket attacks on the opposition-held side of the city. U.N. deputy spokesman Farhan Haq said in New York on Friday that the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs is "extremely concerned at the unfolding situation in Aleppo, Syria, particularly the situation for the estimated 300,000 people trapped in the eastern part."

58. Car bomb hits army outpost in Turkey, killing 3

Associated Press, 2016 07 09

Istanbul - A vehicle laden with explosives hit an army outpost in southeastern Turkey on Saturday, killing three people, according to a statement published by the governor's office. The Mardin province governor's office said two soldiers and a civilian woman were killed in the Saturday attack at a military outpost in the town of Cevizlik. The statement also stated seven people were wounded, including three people who are in critical condition. The Turkish Armed Forces also published a statement about the attack that put the number of wounded soldiers at 12, with one soldier in critical condition. It wasn't immediately clear why the two accounts differed. Both statements blamed "the separatist terror organization" for the attack, a description used by Turkey for the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party, or the PKK. Security forces have begun operations to apprehend the attackers.

1. Encryption actually protects law-abiding Canadian citizens

Toronto Star, Brenda McPhail, 2016 07 10

OpEd: When it comes to policing and national security, far too often Canadians are asked to let fear trump their rights. Recently, the front page of the Toronto Star featured the headline, "Encryption creating a barrier for police ...," potentially convincing some readers that the technology's only purpose is to aid criminals. Rarely do we see headlines such as, "Encryption protects thousands of Canadians' credit card information," or "Encryption enables secure communications for every Canadian." or even the aspirational, "Canada leads the way in cybersecurity for its citizens." Increasingly, when we hear about encryption in the media, or from public safety officials, it's presented as a danger - something that prevents those whose job it is to keep us safe from fulfilling their role. However, in the vast majority of transactions online by ordinary, law-abiding citizens, encryption is a good thing that makes personal, sensitive data harder to capture and decipher. Indeed, if more data were stored in encrypted form, sensational breaches of privacy - like the one that drove some Ashley Madison users to suicide - could be avoided. Acknowledging that encryption can be a good thing for society doesn't erase police concerns about data access; it contextualizes them. We at the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA) have long been supporters of warrants, the process by which police can go before a judge to demonstrate that their need to intercept a suspect's private communications is reasonable and proportionate. While we understand that warrants aren't helpful if data can't be decrypted, reports indicate police now have the tools, and are working with technology companies, to gain access to even the most complex of encrypted data. For example, as we learned from the Project Clemenza investigation, police can now decrypt BlackBerry communications and are making extensive use of Stingray technology, which allows for the mass interception of cellphone data. We also know the FBI has developed a hack to intercept messages on Tor networks, which are designed for secure, private communications. Even the infamous Apple v. FBI case ended with the FBI getting what it wanted. For example, when the Communications Security Establishment used information from the free Internet service at a major Canadian airport to track the wireless devices of thousands of ordinary airline passengers for days after they left the terminal, many Canadians felt intuitively it was intrusive and wondered if it was illegal. But it wasn't. That's the kind of situation that erodes the trust that is fundamentally necessary for the social license law enforcement needs to function effectively. (Note: Dr. Brenda McPhail is the director of the privacy, technology and surveillance project at the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.)

2. If Mark Zuckerberg was hacked, do we have any chance of protecting our data?

The Toronto Star, Raju Mudhar, 2016 07 10

Commentary: If the titans of the tech industry can get hacked, what hope is there for the rest of us? That's the general conclusion after the news that Facebook's Mark Zuckerberg and former Twitter CEO Dick Costolo have had some of their social media accounts compromised in the past few weeks. For Zuckerberg, it was his Pinterest and LinkedIn accounts. Then, Costolo's Twitter account suddenly featured some questionable tweets. He clarified online that it was another social account that had been compromised. Both men were actually targeted by a hacker group called Our Mine, who often pursue high-profile victims and brag about their skills online. In May, they also hacked the SoundCloud account of Canadian musician Deadmau5. For Zuckerberg and Costolo, it's believed that the hacks originated from LinkedIn's 2012 data breach. That breach was initially thought to be 6.5 million records, but now is believed to have consisted of more than 117 million records. The pair were obviously targeted, but the truth is that despite the fact that they are high profile and tech savvy, they are human and their technology usage is just as haphazard as the rest of us. In Canada, high-profile ransomware attacks have centred around hospitals, but in early June, it was reported that the University of Calgary paid $20,000 in order to free its data after an attack. Meanwhile, the cost of dealing with attacks is increasing - from the cleanup costs, legal fees and the growing business of cyber insurance. According to an annual global data breach study done by IBM, the average cost of a data breach in Canada is $6.03 million, based on a country-specific study in which 24 companies participated. That's slightly higher than the average $4 million (U.S.) cost in the U.S. Due to those costs and ramifications, the frequency of large-scale breaches means that the problem is rising to the executive level, with many understanding how serious the issue is.

3. Learn from British debacle on Iraq intel oversight

Toronto Star, Andrew Mitrovica, 2016 07 10

OpEd: The damning verdict has been rendered. Last week, after years of snail-paced study, a card-carrying member of the British establishment finally made public an encyclopedia-sized autopsy of how the British political, military, diplomatic and intelligence establishment essentially concocted a case to launch an illegal war in Iraq. As Sir John Chilcot makes plain, central to making that now discredited case were the largely anonymous inhabitants of the British "intelligence community." What Chilcot makes also plain is just how breathtakingly inept that so-called "community" was in assisting the now equally discredited Prime Minister Tony Blair in fashioning his case for war since we now know, beyond any doubt, that all of it was founded on comical dribs and drabs of worthless intelligence. Of course, there is nothing even remotely funny about the human consequences of a case for war built on sandcastle-like intelligence. The scale and nature of the suffering Iraqis have had to endure, and continue to endure, is almost incomprehensible. But the architects of this calamitous war, including British spies, remain rather comfortably around, still immune from any meaningful accountability for their shockingly disastrous performance. Arguably, this is Chilcot's most chilling and instructive finding. And it is a lesson that Canadians should heed carefully at a time when this nation's vast national security apparatus - that was constructed, in large measure, to mirror the British - has, since 9/11, been lavished with extraordinary resources, people, money and powers by a succession of Conservative and Liberal governments. As a possible remedy for this debacle, Chilcot has reportedly recommended strengthening the current mechanisms in place to keep watch over the supposed watchers. Recall that Canada's Liberal government recently set up a small parliamentary review body to somehow keep tabs on the security intelligence "architecture" that spans 20 agencies and departments, employs thousands and enjoys multibillion dollar budgets. If Chilcot has taught us anything it's this: a tiny parliamentary committee modelled after the British committee isn't going to keep Canada's spies in check. What happened in Britain can certainly happen here. We had better listen to that warning. (Note: Andrew Mitrovica is the author of Covert Entry: Spies, Lies and Crimes Inside Canada's Secret Service.)

4. Obama Tells NATO That 'Europe Can Count On' the U.S.

The New York Times, Mark Landler and Rick Lyman, 2016 07 10

Warsaw - President Obama, acknowledging that the trans-Atlantic alliance faces an unprecedented array of threats from terrorism, migrant flows and an aggressive Russia, said on Saturday that "in good times and in bad, Europe can count on the United States -- always." "We haven't simply reaffirmed" the alliance, Mr. Obama said at a news conference. "We're moving forward with the most significant reinforcement of collective defense any time since the Cold War." Mr. Obama spoke in Warsaw at the end of a NATO summit meeting that illustrated how radically the global security situation has changed since he took office in 2009. Europe, the anchor of the trans-Atlantic alliance, is battling centrifugal forces unleashed by Britain's vote to leave the European Union. Russia, with which Mr. Obama had tried to cultivate a friendly relationship, continues to be an implacable adversary. This was the president's last NATO summit meeting, and the mood was occasionally wistful. During a morning meeting, he chatted warmly with Prime Minister David Cameron of Britain, whose days in office are also winding down. Mr. Obama's fellow leaders showered him with praise and promised to stay in touch. But the challenges facing the alliance are so acute that the tone was for the most part more urgent than reflective.

5. Family of Marie Colvin, Slain U.S. Journalist, Sues Syria

The New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 07 10

Beirut - Relatives of Marie Colvin, a veteran American war reporter who died more than four years ago in an artillery barrage in Syria, have filed a wrongful-death lawsuit against the Syrian government, accusing it of targeting and killing her as part of a systematic strategy to silence civilian journalists and activists covering the war. The civil complaint, filed Saturday in federal court in Washington, contends that high-ranking Syrian officials, including President Bashar al-Assad's brother Maher and other top advisers, worked in concert to locate, track and target foreign journalists and Syrians who had helped them. It lays out new details of the events leading to Ms. Colvin's death, citing witnesses and government sources and documents uncovered in what the family's lawyers described as a three-year investigation. Ms. Colvin, a longtime correspondent for The Sunday Times of London, was killed on Feb. 22, 2012, along with a French photojournalist, Rémi Ochlik, when Syrian government forces shelled an apartment building used by journalists. The attack occurred during weeks of bombardment of the rebellious neighborhood of Baba Amr in the city of Homs — the first of many operations in which government forces used siege tactics and indiscriminate shelling against rebel-held areas — and before the emergence of extremist Islamist militant groups like the Nusra Front and the Islamic State.

6. Experts support leaving troops in Afghanistan

The Washington Post, Pamela Constable, 2016 07 10

Washington - President Obama's decision to keep 8,400 troops in Afghanistan is seen by some critics as a sign of political failure, but it is being endorsed as a crucial necessity by a range of U.S. experts and former officials, including a long list of former ambassadors and senior generals who served in Afghanistan. Although the president's action belies his previous pledge to cut current troop levels by half and his hopes of ending U.S. involvement in the conflict before leaving office, supporters said it will shore up Afghans' wavering faith in the United States, put Taliban insurgents on notice, and encourage both NATO allies and international donors to stay engaged. "Afghanistan is a place where we should wish to consolidate and lock down provisional progress into something of a more lasting asset," a group of 13 former senior U.S. civilian and military officials in Afghanistan, headed by retired Marine Corps Gen. John R. Allen, wrote in a letter to the president last month, urging him to maintain the current level of 10,000 troops until the end of his term. Reaffirming the American commitment, they said, would help stem the flow of Afghan refugees, boost "the morale of the Afghan military and Afghan people" and even help change next-door Pakistan's role as "an incubator of violent extremism."

7. Micah Johnson, Gunman in Dallas, Honed Military Skills to a Deadly Conclusion

The New York Times, Richard Fausset, 2016 07 20

Garland, Tex. - There was a time when he was known as a well-mannered young man — a regular at his church and a pleasant presence on a tree-lined, suburban, multicultural street in a neighborhood called Camelot. He grew up to serve his country in Afghanistan. But on Thursday night, 25-year-old Micah Johnson, an African-American, drove his car to a rally against police violence and began killing officers in downtown Dallas, hoping to single out the white ones. In the process, he also managed to bring his war back home, killing at least one fellow military veteran and heightening fears that the nation he had been deployed to protect overseas was now failing to address its growing racial divide at home. The Dallas police remained on edge Saturday. In the late afternoon, officers drew their weapons and cleared an area near the back of their headquarters after a report of a suspicious person in a department parking garage. The agency later said that no one had been found. In the past several days, as demonstrators jammed the streets in a number of American cities, protesting police violence, new details emerged about Mr. Johnson's life. They revealed a young man who had returned in disgrace from his stint abroad in the Army Reserve, but then continued a training regimen of his own devising, conducting military-style exercises in his backyard and reportedly joining a gym that offered martial arts and weapons classes.

8. Is the Islamic State Unstoppable?

The New York Times, Hassan Hassan, 2016 07 10

OpEd: Before Fayad Tayih abandoned the Islamic State earlier this month, he detected a striking trend: More people inside the self-declared caliphate were signing up to become suicide bombers. Mr. Tayih had been working in an administrative job for the jihadist group in Deir al-Zour, in eastern Syria, at the time. "Those who were working with me noticed the same thing," he told me over Wickr, an encrypted messaging app. Statistics released by the Islamic State confirm his observations. According to monthly updates from Amaq, the group's official news outlet, the Islamic State was carrying out 50 to 60 suicide attacks per month in Iraq and Syria last November. Today the number of such attacks is 80 to 100 per month, an average of two to three operations a day. The trend peaked in March, with 112 members blowing themselves up in Syria and Iraq. The Islamic State is shifting tactics, and not just on the battlefields of Syria and Iraq. The group is reverting to insurgency tactics it relied on before June 2014, when it took over Iraq's second-largest city, Mosul, and declared the formation of a caliphate. This operational change has been on plain display in recent weeks: Hundreds of civilians were killed in a spate of suicide attacks attributed to the Islamic State in Turkey, Iraq, Bangladesh and Saudi Arabia. In Baghdad last week, more than 280 civilians were killed when a car bomb exploded outside a shopping mall.

9. The Secret Rules of the Drone War

The New York Times, 2016 07 10

Editorial: Early this month, the Obama administration revealed its estimate of the number of civilians killed since 2009 in counterterrorism airstrikes outside of Iraq, Afghanistan and Syria. In a three-page report that offered little insight into the government's secretive drone campaign, officials said they had concluded that between 64 and 116 civilians died in 473 strikes. President Obama simultaneously issued an executive order that called on government agencies to adopt stricter guidelines and develop better technology to reduce the risk of killing innocent people in places where the United States is not a declared combatant. Those include Pakistan, Yemen, Somalia and Libya. Additionally, the order -- which can be repealed or amended by Mr. Obama's successor -- calls for the annual release of civilian casualty numbers from drone strikes. While the order is a step toward greater transparency, it is curious that Mr. Obama waited until near the end of his presidency to do this. At the same time, his administration continues to fight in court to prevent the disclosure of documents that would offer substantive information about the legal underpinnings of the program and the criteria the government uses to authorize strikes.

10. US imported terrorism to Middle East, new Philippines president says

RT News, 2016 07 10

Washington - Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte has accused the US of importing terror to the Middle East through its interventions, pointing to Iraq, Libya and Syria as examples. Speaking at an event being held in honor of the holy Islamic day of Eid'l Fit'r in Davao City on Friday, the leader challenged the narrative that the Middle East is the root of terrorism. "It is not that the Middle East is exporting terrorism to America; America imported terrorism (to the Middle East)," he said. Duterte slammed the US and UK for presenting Saddam Hussein as a dictator in order to justify the Iraq war of 2003, and for failing to admit their mistakes after the fact. "They forced their way into Iraq," he told the Muslim crowd. "After almost 10 years of investigation, it turned out there was no legal basis to declare war against Iraq. You see, it's a useless war," he explained. "Look at Iraq now. Look what happened to Libya. Look what happened to Syria. Even children are being doused with gasoline. They were pushed to the wall for the failed promises," he added. The Philippines is not without its own issues of unrest, as groups in the country's minority Muslim regions have been fighting for autonomy in the largely Christian country since the late '60s.

11. Should the Dallas shootings be called terrorism?

Yahoo News, David Iaconangelo, 2016 07 10

Analysis: For much of the American public, talking about terrorism means talking about violence inspired by fundamentalist interpretations of Islam. And some commentators, especially among conservatives, insist that the Obama administration should paint the ongoing war on terror as a struggle against "radical Islam." The president has struck back with palpable frustration against such criticisms, saying that such a framework meshes with the propaganda of groups like Al Qaeda and the self-proclaimed Islamic State. "They want us to validate them, by implying that they speak for those billion-plus people, that they speak for Islam," said President Obama in June. "And if we fall into the trap of painting all Muslims with a broad brush, and imply that we are at war with an entire religion, then we are doing the terrorists' work for them." But the shooting of five Dallas police officers on Friday, and other recent incidents like it, may resurface concerns about how reflexively Americans – or at least the American media – associate the terrorism with extremist Islamic ideology in the post 9/11 era. Few reports have framed the sniper attack by Micah Johnson, a 25-year-old African-American who killed five Dallas police officers and wounded nine other people before dying from a bomb detonated by a police robot, as terrorism. Part of that may be because Johnson does not appear to have had strong ties with activist groups of any ideological stripe, as the New York Times noted on Friday, although his Facebook page indicated that he supported the New Black Panther Party, whose leaders have encouraged violence against whites, Jews, and law enforcement

12. Stolen British Bullets 'In the Hands of IS jihadis'

Mail on Sunday, Charlotte Wace & Mark Nicol, 2016 07 10

London – A huge cache of ammunition has been stolen from a British Army training camp in the Middle East - and is now feared to be in the hands of Islamic State. A Mail on Sunday investigation has discovered the haul of 87,000 5.56 bullets - enough to equip three infantry regiments - was taken from under the noses of UK troops during a desert exercise in Jordan. Military sources have told this newspaper that the thieves - possibly acting on the orders of IS - cut a hole in the perimeter fence of an ammunition compound, drove a lorry inside, and towed away the container in which the bullets were stored. The theft happened in March while 1,600 British troops were taking part in Exercise Shamal Storm - a series of large-scale desert manoeuvres also involving American and Jordanian soldiers. The Mail on Sunday understands that the ammunition was not guarded around the clock but that British military vehicles regularly passed the compound. It is believed the thieves watched UK soldiers for several days and timed their raid to avoid the patrols. Crack SAS troops tried to recover the container when it was noticed it had gone missing - but their efforts were in vain. The incident is thought to be the largest theft of British military equipment for decades. Last night, a member of the Defence Select Committee demanded an urgent inquiry into how the deadly haul was removed from the training area near the coastal city of Aqaba, where troops also set up a field hospital and practised dealing with chemical and biological weapons threats.

13. Russian Spy In the Cotswolds Who Sent Her Report Back to Moscow Via Her Washing Line Mail on Sunday, Anne McElvoy, 2016 07 10

Moscow – On a hot summer's day in wartime, a dapper young woman with a broad smile pushes a bicycle along a quiet lane deep in the Oxfordshire countryside. With her is a nervous-looking man with intense brown eyes. Passers-by notice the couple holding hands. Yet far from being innocent star-crossed lovers, they are two of the Cold War's most important spies, serving Stalin's military intelligence network and betraying some of our vital nuclear secrets to Moscow. The 'romance' is a cover for controller and agent. The woman is Sonya, the code name of Ursula Kuczynski, of the GRU (Soviet military intelligence) - a German-born illegal living undercover with her British-born husband Len, also a Soviet spy. She sends secrets back to Moscow with the help of a specially adapted washing line. The man is Klaus Fuchs, also a German immigrant. He is a gifted physicist, working on the Tube Alloys project. At the heart of it is the manufacture of pure uranium-235. Tube Alloys would go on to become the basis of the Manhattan Project in Los Alamos, New Mexico, which developed the first nuclear weapon. Its betrayal by Fuchs gave Moscow a leap forward worth at least two years in its nuclear programme. New material unearthed from MI5 and East German files confirms that both before and after the war, many of Britain's nuclear secrets were betrayed by Fuchs, with Sonya as his controller. Worse still for the reputation of Britain's security services, recently opened files reveal that MI5 had been alerted to the dangers posed by Sonya and her brother Jurgen, but failed to act.

14. The easy way to foil hackers: sticky tape The Sunday Times, Helen Lewis, 2016 07 10

London - Mark Zuckerberg and the FBI boss both use low-tech kit to thwart anyone trying to access their laptop webcams. It's not paranoia if they really are out to get you. When Mark Zuckerberg posted a photo of himself next to his laptop to celebrate the photo-sharing network Instagram reaching 500m monthly users, eagle-eyed observers spotted something interesting about his computer. There was a square of opaque sticky tape over the webcam. The idea that someone is watching you while you type may sound far-fetched, but it isn't. Documents leaked by Edward Snowden revealed that between 2008 and 2012 GCHQ ran a surveillance program called Optic Nerve that captured still images from Yahoo! webchats. In one six-month period, it collected stills from 1.8m Yahoo! users. And it's not just governments: hackers can trick users into downloading malware that gives them remote access to the computer, including the camera. "Hacking a webcam is trivial once a computer has been compromised," says Richard Stiennon, a cyber-security expert at the analyst IT-Harvest. "The hack also turns off the 'on air' light next to the camera so you are unaware you are being viewed."

15. The Real Story of our son Jihadi Jack Mail on Sunday, David Rose, 2016 07 10

London- It was on his third day in the dank Victorian hulk of Wandsworth Prison that John Letts, a distinguished botanist whose organic cereals have been trialled on Prince Charles's land, reached his low point. Jailed, along with his wife Sally, for trying to send money to their 20-year-old son, widely known as 'Jihadi Jack' - alleged to be one of the first white Britons to join Islamic State in Syria - Mr Letts had nothing to read and nothing to do, except contemplate ruin. Astonishingly, the respectable middle-class couple had been remanded in custody by a judge, despite there being no objection to bail from police or the Crown Prosecution Service. It was five days before they were freed at a special Old Bailey hearing last month and they are now awaiting trial at the Old Bailey early next year, charged with fundraising for terrorism. The judge who finally released them described Mr Letts and his book editor wife Sally Lane, 54 - held at Bronzefield women's prison, Surrey - as 'two perfectly decent people' who 'ended up in custody because of the love of their child'. Mr Letts, 55, recalls the dread as he stared at the window of his stuffy cell, the daylight obscured as a previous occupant had plastered the glass with Samaritans leaflets.

16. Echoes of Isil tactics in black militant's online 'self radicalisation'

The Sunday Telegraph, Gordon Rayner, 2016 07 10

London – It sounds like a terrorist rallying cry from al-Qaeda or Isil: "Kill the pigs who kill our kids!" Yet this call for the murder of police officers was the slogan chanted by Malik Shabazz, at the time the leader of the New Black Panther Party, at a protest 20 years ago. Black extremist groups are nothing new in America. They rose to prominence in the mid-Sixties as an alternative to the non-violent stance of Martin Luther King, but in recent years they have found a new, more powerful tool than mass rallies: social media and the internet. Micah Johnson, the gunman who killed five police officers in Dallas, was a follower of several of America's most violent black rights groups, but may never have attended any of their meetings or rallies. A group calling itself the Black Power Political Organization claimed on its Facebook account that it was behind the attack, though there is no evidence Johnson had any connection to it. Police are investigating whether he had become self-radicalised by reading material posted online by the likes of the New Black Panther Party (NBPP), the African American Defense League, the Nation of Islam and Black Riders Liberation Party. He had either "liked" or followed them on his Facebook page, but told police before he was killed in a stand-off that he was not affiliated to any groups. It believes black Americans should have their own sovereign nation, and its 10-point platform calls for a country in which black people can make their own laws, with all black prisoners in US jails released to "the lawful authorities of the Black Nation".

17. Spies warned invading Iraq would inspire terrorists

The Sunday Telegraph, Robert Mendick, 2016 07 10

London – Britain's spy chiefs warned Tony Blair just weeks before the invasion of Iraq that he would be putting the UK at risk of increased terror attacks. A top-secret report released to the Chilcot inquiry spells out how al-Qaeda was planning to use the invasion to target Britain. The intelligence report also warned of the danger of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons falling into the hands of terrorists. Setting out the increased risk of attack, the Joint Intelligence Committee wrote in February 2003: "The threat from al-Qaeda will increase at the onset of any military action against Iraq. They will target Coalition forces and other Western interests in the Middle East. "Attacks against Western interests elsewhere are also likely, especially in the US and UK, for maximum impact. "The worldwide threat from other Islamist terrorist groups and individuals will increase significantly." The Chilcot report concedes that the war radicalised Muslims to attack the West. Two of the 7/7 bombers left videos in which they linked their actions to the invasion of Iraq. One said the attacks "will continue and pick up strengths till you pull your soldiers from Afghanistan and Iraq... Until we feel security, you will be targets."

18. FED:Migrants want mistreatment acknowledged

Australian Associated Press, 2016 07 10

Melbourne - Elderly migrants who for decades were refused Australian citizenship on political grounds are calling for official acknowledgement they were mistreated from the federal government. Hundreds of migrants who came to Australia under a post-war settlement scheme were denied naturalisation for decades without being given a reason, an SBS investigation has found. Declassified immigration and ASIO files showed the migrants were recorded as national security risks because of suspected or confirmed associations with the Communist Party of Australia or some migrant community groups. ASIO, the national spy agency, kept hundreds of migrants and their communities under surveillance for decades and maintained a secret list of thousands earmarked for potential internment and other restrictions because of their political beliefs, the investigation found. The measures were taken from the 1950s to the 1970s. The migrants told SBS they suffered severe consequences because of their residency statuses - including being targeted for deportation, criminal charges, restricted travel to their homelands and social exclusion.

19. Surfacing threat

South China Morning Post, Minnie Chan, 2016 07 10

Beijing- The PLA Navy has dramatically extended the reach of its submarines in the South China Sea, raising the risk to US warships, experts say. As the world focuses on the war of words between China and the US over the militarisation of the disputed South China Sea, a silent, underwater fight for supremacy between the two countries is heating up. US Defence Secretary Ash Carter said in a speech in New York in April that the US would spend more than US$8 billion next year to ensure it had "the most lethal and most advanced undersea and anti-submarine force in the world". That budget - a roughly 14 per cent increase - will include spending on the development of undersea drones. PLAN subs can operate more regularly with the facilities in the South China Sea, such as Fiery Cross, and they will be in a better position to monitor US naval movements. Collin Koh Swee Lean, Nanyang Technological University Two months earlier, Admiral Harry Harris, the head of the US Pacific Command, complained to lawmakers in Washington that "I don't have the submarines that I feel I need" to counter Chinese militarisation of the South China Sea. The People's Liberation Army Navy now has about 70 submarines - very close to the US' total - with 16 of them nuclear-powered, according to the Pentagon's annual report to Congress last year on China's military and security development. Fifteen of China's non-nuclear submarines are stealthy, equipped with quiet Stirling air-independent propulsion (AIP) engines that also allow them to stay submerged for longer.

20. 3 Indonesian fishermen abducted off Malaysian waters

Xinhua News Agency, 2016 07 10

Kuala Lumpur - Three Indonesian fishermen were abducted by gunmen off the Malaysian waters on the North Borneo state of Sabah, police said Sunday. Five gunmen in a speedboat intercepted a Malaysian-registered fishing trawler late Saturday, said Sabah police chief Abdul Rashid Harun. State news agency Bernama quoted Harun reporting that three Indonesia fishermen were kidnapped out of the seven on board the trawler. Police said no ransom demand had been received so far. Local media reported an Abu Sayyaf commander might be behind the kidnapping.

21. Can Sanctions Make North Korea Budge?

The New York Times, 2016 07 10

ditorial: The new American sanctions on North Korea are hardly surprising, since the regime brutally controls 25 million people, has an aggressive nuclear program and is improving its ability to launch missiles that could one day hit the United States. The question is: Are these sanctions connected to a strategy beyond punishment? On Wednesday, the Obama administration sanctioned North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-un, for human rights abuses for the first time. The sanctions, which freeze assets in the United States and prohibit doing business with Americans, were also applied to 14 other senior officials in the intelligence and security ministries and other entities. A State Department report, mandated by Congress, detailed the officials' responsibility for extrajudicial killings, forced labor and torture. It is estimated that 80,000 to 120,000 North Koreans are in political prison camps. Administration officials said it was important to include the functionaries at the core of the brutal system because the public exposure puts them on notice that if the political situation on the peninsula changes, they can be held accountable. If fully carried out, the multinational sanctions approved by the United Nations Security Council in March after North Korea conducted its fourth nuclear weapons test would be more effective. The Security Council banned the trade of all conventional weapons as well as luxury goods. It also mandated that all North Korean cargo entering or leaving a country be inspected by that country. Asset freezes and travel bans were imposed on some 16 people and 12 companies, and North Korea was also forbidden to sell gold and rare-earth minerals.

22. 14 Dead In Clashes After Terrorist Burhan Wani's Killing In Kashmir

Daily Herald, 2016 07 10

Jammu - Violent clashes broke out in several places of Jammu and Kashmir with situation particularly "bad" in south Kashmir, the police said. More than 90 of those wounded were security personnel, senior police officer SM Sahai said. "Deeply anguished at the loss of precious lives, pray for the speedy recovery of the injured," Home Minister Rajnath Singh said in a tweet. Central forces have been sent to aid the police in Kashmir. There is curfew in large parts of Srinagar and several areas of south Kashmir. Security forces were attacked and attempts were made to snatch their weapons. Many incidents of stone pelting and arson were also reported. Chief Minister Mehbooba Mufti said that "disproportionate use of force for crowd control results in loss of precious lives" and urged the police to follow Standard Operating Procedure. "I express profound grief over the tragic death of the youths and extend my heart-felt condolences to the bereaved family members," she said in a statement. Senior police officers at a press conference today said they were practicing restraint. Mobile internet services have been blocked across the Valley. The Amarnath Yatra has also been suspended temporarily at the Jammu base camp. School board exams have been postponed.

23. Mali: une attaque armée près de la frontière burkinabè fait deux morts

Radio France Internationale, 2016 07 10

Gao - Samedi 9 juillet, des hommes armés ont attaqué une localité malienne située à quelques dizaines de kilomètres de la frontière avec le Burkina Faso. Deux gardes, composantes de l'armée malienne, ont été tués. Il est plutôt rare que des attaques armées se déroulent de ce côté du centre du Mali. La localité de Dinangourou dépend administrativement de la ville malienne de Koro et est située à quelques dizaines de kilomètres de la frontière avec le Burkina Faso. C'est là, ce samedi 9 juillet, que des hommes armés, « enturbannés » selon des témoins, sont arrivés. Ils ont tout de suite ouvert le feu sur des gardes, composantes de l'armée malienne. Deux soldats maliens ont été tués sur le coup. Selon des sources, ces assaillants, non formellement identifiés pour le moment, ont ensuite pris la direction du sud alors que selon d'autres sources, ils seraient arrivés du Burkina Faso et auraient repris le chemin inverse juste après l'attaque. Si cette dernière hypothèse se confirme, l'opération non encore revendiquée serait peut-être l'œuvre de la Katiba du Macina du groupe Ansar Dine. Cette unité combattante, qui a fait allégeance au chef islamiste touareg Iyad Ag Ghali, annonçait récemment dans une vidéo que sa branche armée, dirigée par un Burkinabè, allait multiplier les attaques contre le Burkina Faso et le Mali.

24. Violence Resumes in South Sudan's Capital

The New York Times, Jacey Fortin & Josh Kron, 2016 07 10

Juba - Heavy gunfire and factional fighting in South Sudan's capital continued on Sunday, a day after the nation marked the fifth anniversary of its independence. Military helicopters were flying over the city, Juba, and armored vehicles rolled through the streets, witnesses said, as bursts of gunfire were heard in different areas. People took shelter inside their homes and hid beneath their beds as the shooting rose and fell in phases. "We are fighting at Gudele, Rock City and Jebel," said William Gatjiath Deng, a spokesman for Vice President Riek Machar, referring to neighborhoods and suburbs of Juba. "There are a lot of bodies; I can't even count them." The United Nations peacekeeping mission in the country said on Twitter that a "heavily armed exchange" took place near its base at about 8:30 a.m. The renewed violence broke a short and uneasy calm on Saturday, after fighting had erupted Friday. That violence killed at least 150 people, with the toll expected to rise because casualties were still being counted. Factions of the South Sudanese Army loyal to President Salva Kiir and those backing Mr. Machar, who until this year led a rebellion against the government, have been fighting throughout the capital since Thursday, when the two sides confronted each other at a roadside checkpoint. Five government soldiers were killed in those exchanges.

25. South Sudan 'back to war', says VP Riek Machar's spokesman

BBC News, 2016 07 10

Juba - South Sudan is "back to war", a spokesman for the vice-president has told the BBC, as rival factions clash and hundreds have been reported killed. Forces loyal to Vice-President Riek Machar say government troops attacked their positions in the capital, Juba. Col William Gatjiath, Mr Machar's military spokesman, told the BBC President Salva Kiir "isn't serious" about a peace agreement. The government has not responded to Col Gatjiath's comments. He said "hundreds" of Mr Machar's troops had died on Sunday, and that troops loyal to Mr Machar were advancing on Juba from different directions. UN representatives have reported heavy exchanges of gunfire near their headquarters in the suburb of Jebel.

26. Soudan du Sud: violents affrontements entre l'armée et les ex-rebelles

Radio France Internationale, 2016 07 10

Juba - Le Soudan du Sud célèbre ce samedi 9 juillet ses cinq ans d'indépendance mais c'est un bien triste anniversaire. Le plus jeune Etat africain est déchiré par une guerre civile depuis plus de deux ans et demi. Des tirs d'arme automatique étaient entendus, vendredi, en fin d'après-midi, non loin du palais présidentiel, à Juba, au moment où le président Salva Kiir et son vice-président, Riek Machar, étaient réunis pour une conférence de presse. Dans ces affrontements entre l'armée sud-soudanaise et les ex-rebelles, il y a eu « plus de 150 morts », a annoncé un porte-parole de Riek Machar. Après ces deux jours de troubles, l'atmosphère était tendue à Juba, la capitale. Il n'y a pas eu de festivités. Pas de défilé ni de célébrations publiques d'aucune sorte non plus. C'est un anniversaire sans faste. A Juba, on se remet à peine des violences de ces derniers jours. Certains carrefours sont toujours bloqués, plusieurs commerces sont fermés et, selon l'ambassade américaine à Juba, un grand nombre de militaires patrouillent dans la ville afin de restaurer le calme. Les premières informations recueillies par RFI font part de victimes qui seraient, pour l'essentiel, des soldats. Le bilan est lourd. « Il y a plus de 150 morts », a déclaré Roman Nyarji, un des porte-parole de Riek Machar, ancien chef des rebelles redevenu vice-président suite à l'accord de paix qui a mis fin à deux ans e demi de guerre civile.

27. Two Killed in Terrorists' Attack on Provincial Officials in Western Iran

Fars News Agency, 2016 07 10

Tehran - Two provincial officials, including a governor and a legislator, were injured and two others were killed in a terrorist attack in Western Iran on Sunday. "A team of provincial officials, including Dalahou's governor and (member of the parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission Heshmatollah) Falahatpisheh were attacked by four assailants in Rijab region (in Kermanshah province)," Farhad Tajari, the representative of Gilan-e Qarb region at the parliament, said on Sunday. "They riddled the car carrying the officials with bullets and then set fire to the car and fled the scene," he added. Tajari said that Falahatpisheh and Dalahou's governor were injured in the terrorist attack with the latter in critical conditions. Meantime, two others including the car driver and a provincial health official were killed in the attack.

28. Iran, Once Quiet About Its Casualties in Syria and Iraq, Now Glorifies Them

The New York Times, Thomas Erdbrink, 2016 07 10

Tehran - The first news report, to a nation usually kept in the dark about military matters, was shocking: 13 Iranian soldiers, all with links to the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps, had been killed in an ambush near the Syrian city of Aleppo. What followed this spring may have been even more surprising. Details about the soldiers appeared extensively in the Iranian news media, which not only gave the names of the dead but lionized them with sweeping life stories. Poster-size portraits were plastered all over their hometowns. For years, Iran covered up its military activities in Syria and Iraq, so the government could deny any official involvement on the ground. Coffins arrived with the bodies of soldiers who went unidentified, referred to only as "defenders of the shrines" of the Shiite saints. When the bodies began to come home in larger numbers, the state news media began calling them "volunteers." No longer. Now every Iranian killed in action is named, his picture published, his valor lauded in elaborate tributes in the hard-line news media and on Instagram accounts dedicated to the fighters. The reason for the change, analysts say, is not some newfound dedication to transparency but a rift between the Iranian establishment's hard-liners, who control the military, and the moderates.

29. ISIS downs jet near Palmyra, 2 Russia pilots killed

Al-Arabiya News, 2015 07 10

Moscow - Two Russian pilots died near the Syrian city of Palmyra when their helicopter was shot down by ISIS fighters, bringing the total number of Russian troops killed in the Syrian conflict to 12, Moscow said. The defence ministry said a Syrian helicopter flown by Riafagat Khabibulin and Yevgeni Dolgin "came under fire" from ISIS on Saturday and crashed. The militant group claimed responsibility for the attack, according to SITE monitoring group. The pilots "had used up all their ammunition and were on their way back when they came under the fire of terrorists and crashed," the defence ministry said, adding: "The crew died." SITE quoted an ISIS statement as saying: "Soldiers of the Caliphate downed a Russian assault helicopter when it attempted to attack their positions. This resulted in its destruction and killed those who were on board."

30. Ukrainian military shell LPR from heavy artillery – militia

TASS World Service, 2016 07 10

Moscow - The Ukrainian military units over the past 24 hours shelled, including from artillery of 152mm, positions of the people's militia in the self-proclaimed Lugansk People's Republic (LPR), a representative of the LPR's defense authority said on Sunday. "For example, from the direction of the Mironovsky settlement, from 152mm-caliber weapons they shelled Logvinovo and Kalinovka," the LuganskInformCenter quoted him. The people's militia reported the shelling from positions of the Ukrainian military was made on Luganskaya, Lozovoye, Pervomaisk. Besides artillery, the Ukrainian military uses 82mm mortars, various kinds of grenade launchers and other arms. "We do not have losses," the source said.

31. Russia 'Has All Reasons' to Assume NATO Buildup is Directed Against It

Sputnik News Service, 2016 07 10

Moscow - US troops land with parachutes at the military compound near Torun, central Poland, on June 7, 2016, as part of the NATO Anaconda-16 military exercise. According to the politician, the decision to deploy a missile defense system is premature and inappropriate, taking into account the fact that Moscow perceives this move as a provocation. "Russia takes this NATO decision as directed against it, and has all reasons for this," he said. From the perspective of the SPD, NATO countries should seek dialogue with Russia in accordance with international rules and reach an agreement on missile defense instead of starting the next stage of the arms race. According to him, the West should find a balance between ensuring military security and maintaining cooperation with Moscow. "Russia feels that using this missile defense poses challenges to it. That is why we advocate an open dialogue with Moscow," Mützenich stressed. At the NATO summit in Warsaw that took place on July 8-9, the members of the alliance decided to deploy four multinational battalions in the Baltic states and Poland as well as ballistic missile defense systems (BMDS) in Bulgaria, Romania, Poland, Turkey and Spain.

32. Obama describes the new kind of warfare his successor will have to wage

The Washington Post, Greg Jaffe & Michael Birnbaum, 2016 07 10

Warsaw - President Obama, who had pledged to end America's wars, described the landscape he was leaving to his successor as a state of quasi-war that could extend for years to come. Obama, who was speaking Saturday to reporters at the NATO summit here, noted with pride that he has cut the size of the U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan from 180,000 troops to fewer than 15,000. But U.S. drones and fighter jets are striking targets in seven countries on a regular basis, a span of geography that is virtually unprecedented in American history outside of major wars. U.S. Special Operations forces are still conducting dangerous raids in countries such as Iraq, Afghanistan and Syria. The president spoke forthrightly, and with a hint of frustration and regret, about the scope of the military campaign he is leaving behind. "As commander in chief of the most powerful military in the world, I spend a lot of time brooding over these issues," he said. "I am not satisfied that we have got it yet. I can say it is better than when I came into office." Obama was in Warsaw for his last NATO summit, which was overshadowed by violence and angry demonstrations at home in the wake of fatal shootings in Dallas, Baton Rouge and Falcon Heights, Minn.

33. If a Carrot for Jordan Works, Syrian Refugees Will Stay Put

The New York Times, Somini Sengupta, 2016 07 20

Amman, Jordan - On a busy thoroughfare in Amman, Jordan's capital, a coffee seller named Mohammed

Al Mulki no longer shivers when he sees a police car pull up. At a nearby sweet shop, the counterman, Zuheir Taleb, no longer slips out of the back when a uniformed official walks in. And in the country's north, on scorching fields a few miles from the Syrian border, Badra Hadahed, a diabetic grandmother doing backbreaking work, no longer worries that she will be plucked from the cucumber fields and sent back to her home. Like many Syrians who fled their country's civil war, all three had been working illegally in Jordan. But under a shrewd, delicate experiment that grew out of Europe's desire to contain the influx of foreigners to its shores, Jordan has been persuaded to let these Syrians make an honest living — in return for potentially big financial rewards. Jordan, which has 650,000 Syrian refugees registered with the United Nations inside its borders, has long made it nearly impossible for them to work legally, citing concerns about high unemployment among its citizens. But under the new experiment, the government has given out 13,000 work permits to Syrians, and is promising to issue up to 50,000 by year's end — and tens of thousands more in the future.

34. In Yemen, lives shattered by an American-made bomb

The Washington Post, Sudarsan Raghavan, 2016 07 10

Sana'a -The 15-year-old boy had entered his neighborhood mosque to attend morning prayers. The bakery worker was asleep in his attic apartment with his wife and child. And the civil servant was getting ready for work. At that moment, a warplane from a coalition led by Saudi Arabia dropped an American-made cluster bomb over their densely packed enclave. The device, banned by scores of countries but not the United States or Saudi Arabia, sent explosive spheres the size of baseballs raining down. The civil servant miraculously escaped death. The bakery worker was severely injured. The teenager was killed. The United States is playing a quiet but lethal role in the killing and wounding of thousands of civilians in Yemen's civil war. In recent years, Saudi Arabia has purchased U.S. fighter jets and other American-made weapons in deals worth billions of dollars, and the Pentagon has provided the coalition with training, aerial refueling support and intelligence as it attacks targets in Yemen. White House press secretary Josh Earnest has defended the Obama administration's backing of Saudi Arabia and the other members of the coalition, calling them "effective national security partners." But criticism is growing over the U.S. involvement in the war. Human rights groups and some American lawmakers have urged a ban on weapons transfers to Saudi Arabia, saying the airstrikes have had a devastating impact on civilians and have violated international laws.

35. Six killed in two PKK attacks in Turkey

Agence France Presse, 2016 07 10

Istanbul - of a village guard in two separate attacks on Sunday, the army and local media said. One Turkish soldier was killed along with the guard in the car bombing on a military outpost in the eastern province of Van early on Sunday, the army said. Village guards are local people who work in cooperation with the Turkish security forces throughout eastern Turkey to protect their settlements from the PKK. At least 15 people were injured including 10 soldiers and five village guards. Among those wounded, one was seriously injured in the mainly Kurdish province, the army said in a statement. Later on Sunday afternoon, four soldiers were killed and another soldier was injured in a roadside bomb attack against an army vehicle in Hakkari province in Turkey's troubled southeast, Dogan news agency reported, quoting the military.

36. NATO to use surveillance planes against ISIS

Agence France Presse, 2016 07 10

Moscow - NATO leaders on Saturday agreed to deploy sophisticated surveillance aircraft to support the US-led fight against ISIS in Syria, Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg said. Stoltenberg said a summit of the 28 NATO leaders in Warsaw had formally approved a plan for the alliance's AWACS planes to fly over international airspace and help the US-led coalition. "We will provide AWACS support and the plan is to have them to flying over international airspace and Turkey and that will allow us to look into airspace in Iraq and Syria," Stoltenberg told a news conference. The planes are one of the few concrete assets that NATO has, with most of its military hardware belonging to individual member states. AWACS are aircraft with powerful radars that allow them to monitor airspace for hundreds of kilometers around. They can also be converted into command posts to coordinate bombing raids and other air operations.

1. B.C. judge to rule whether couple was entrapped by police in terrorism sting

The Globe and Mail, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 07 23

Ottawa - John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were high. In June, 2013, the Muslim converts were at a hotel in the Okanagan city of Kelowna, where they were supposed to be working on a terrorist plan to kill revellers and first responders during an attack at the British Columbia Legislature grounds on Canada Day. But the husband and wife, heroin addicts who had rarely ventured far from their Surrey basement suite and subsisted on welfare payments, spent much of their time smoking marijuana and playing video games. It was on that trip, defence lawyers say, police "finally crossed over their own self-imposed line in the sand." It was then, the defence argues, that the RCMP went from investigating a crime to manufacturing one. Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody were arrested on July 1, 2013, hours after they placed potentially explosive pressure-cooker devices outside the legislature in Victoria. The plot was international news. The couple were found guilty by a jury in June, 2015, of conspiring to murder persons unknown and making or possessing an explosive substance – in both cases for the benefit of or at the direction of a terrorist group. But their convictions have not been entered. Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody have argued that they were victims of police entrapment and, a year after those arguments began, Justice Catherine Bruce of the B.C. Supreme Court is to deliver her decision at the end of this month. The court heard that the RCMP began looking at Mr. Nuttall after the Canadian Security Intelligence Service told the force in early 2013 that he had tried to purchase potassium nitrate, which can be used in explosives. The Mounties had been contacted about Mr. Nuttall before. A man he met at a mosque in 2011 told police that Mr. Nuttall had talked about fighting a holy war in Afghanistan.

2. Security for Rio Olympics needs to be co-ordinated effort

CBC News, Jamie Strashin, 2016 07 23

Toronto - Beach volleyball player Sarah Pavan is determined to stay focused on winning a medal at the upcoming Rio Games. At the same time she is aware of concerns surrounding the security and safety of athletes in Brazil. Canadian families optimistic amid Rio safety concerns. "It's sad. Our world is a crazy place right now but we have been travelling all over the place all summer long," Pavan says. "It makes me so sad to see the things that are happening these days but we have to keep doing our jobs as professionals and try and put that aside when we can." Pavan says she has worked too hard to let anything derail her at this point. "We know that security measures are being heightened and everything is being taken care of," Pavan says. "That's not something that I want to worry about because I want to enjoy these Olympics as much as I can." Pavan and the rest of the beach volleyball team won't be staying in the Athletes' Village. Instead, they will stay closer to Rio's famed Copacabana Beach, where competition runs nearly every day throughout the Games. "I feel like this sort of thing happens before every Olympics," she says. "There's always a lot of speculation about everything going wrong and they usually end up pretty good." Brazil is spending hundreds of millions of dollars and hiring thousands of additional security personnel to ensure these Games are safe. But a crippling recession has undermined these efforts as the government has often been unable to pay police salaries and supply basic supplies like gas and paper. "The criminality in Rio is a big issue. The disparity between people who have a lot of money and those who don't is great," says Michel Juneau-Katsuya, a former senior officer with the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). "Also, the local cops are corrupted so it's very difficult at this point to feel totally secure." Despite this, the goal is to have more than 85,000 security officers deployed, more than double that of London 2012. It's an indication the global security situation is more precarious today than ever. "We are living in the most complex, high-velocity threat environment I have ever witnessed in three decades of national security and law enforcement work," says Ray Boisvert, a former assistant director of intelligence at CSIS. Just this week, Brazil was rocked by the arrest of 12 people suspected of pledging allegiance to the Islamic State group ISIS. Brazil has no history of conflict with militant groups but the upcoming Games have obviously put the country in the spotlight. The arrests are the first-ever related to alleged extreme Islamist terrorism in Brazil.

3. The immorality of Canada's foreign policy on Sri Lanka

LankaWeb, Ranjith Soysa, 2016 07 23

Commentary: The Canadian Prime Minister issued a statement on Sri Lanka on 18th May 2016 and stated that he had met a number of victims of war in Sri Lanka and he understands the unfortunate and bleak situation they were facing. He said that the Canadian Tamils were an integral part of the Canadians. He said that he was convinced that the foreign and the Commonwealth judges and investigators must be included in the mechanism to help the war victims in the investigation of war crimes in Sri Lanka. It is expected that the foreign minister of Canada, Stephane Dion who will be visiting Sri Lanka will confirm the position held by Justin Traudeau and will insist that the UNHRC resolution should be implemented in full and he will also visit the Northern Province and shed tears on the Tamil victims while placing the blame on the Sri Lankan defence forces for having defeated the LTTE terrorists. The Canadian policy of damning the Sri Lankan Government and the defence forces while treating the terrorists and the separatists of the Tamil Eelam with kid gloves is a well-established story as told by the veteran Canadian journalist, Stewart Bell in his book, Cold Terror, the Review of Operations Cribble, Canadian Intelligence officer Stephen Dubrial's review based on 15 warrants issued, the judgement of Canadian Federal Judge Lewins. Stewart Bell in his book discusses how the Canadian Government funded the Tesco, the Tamil Eelam Society which in turn funnelled funds to the LTTE. One of the directors of TESCO, Devakumar Sabapathy issued a threat to kill the former President of Sri Lanka and his brother. But, Canada acted as if they did not hear any such report by covertly supporting the LTTE front organization. (the details outlined regards above incidents were based on a defence report of Keerthi Warnakulasuriya of Sunday Divaina) Bell in his book on the subject of Snow Tigers (the LTTE) stated that the LTTE and its fronts used every conceivable tactic- government grants, front companies, fraud of every type migrant smuggling and drugs. "One CSIS report estimates that $2 million a year, in collections funnelled to the Tigers from Canada to support the war effort. Another CSIS study puts the figure at $ 1 million a month...to put it bluntly, Canada is the support base for a terrorist organization that has killed more than 100 politicians, assassinated the leaders of two countries -India and Sri Lanka - and carried out more suicide bombings than any other militant group in the world". Then he referred to the massive bomb explosion at the Central Bank and says " Although, the bombing was carried out by the local Tiger operatives, the plot originated in Toronto. Sri Lankan intelligence officials tell me they traced the explosives used in the bomb and found they had come from the Ukranian shipment purchased 2 years earlier with money wired from British Colombia, Canada".

4. Canadians didn't link Syrian refugees with increased terror risk, poll suggests

The Canadian Press, Stephanie Levitz, 2016 07 23

Ottawa - People who backed a plan to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees to Canada in a matter of months largely expected no increased risk of terrorism as a result, newly released federal polling information reveals. About 44 per cent of those surveyed in November were in support of the plan. And of them, about 60 per cent thought there would be no change to the terrorism threat facing Canada in the next six months. However, 35 per cent of respondents didn't support the plan were concerned, and 55 per cent of them told pollsters they thought the threat of terrorism in Canada would increase in the next six months. Overall, the results suggest that while people around the world may directly link immigration with terrorist threats, that's generally not what is happening in Canada, said one expert. The telephone poll of 1,512 Canadians was carried out by Harris/Decima between Nov. 18 and 24, 2015 and had a margin of error of 2.5 per cent, 19 times out of 20.

5. Arabic magazine promotes hate

Toronto Sun, 2016 07 23

Editorial: There are a number of worrisome components to the story of a London, Ontario, magazine running an article questioning basic facts about the Holocaust. Al Saraha, a monthly Arabic language publication, ran an article in their latest issue headlined "The Question Which Everyone Ignores: Why Did Hitler Kill the Jews?" The article, as a Postmedia Network story explains, says Jews in Germany promoted "promiscuity... homosexuality... every type of sexual deviance." It then goes on to question whether the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust was in fact 6 million, and claims people believe that number due to "Jewish propaganda". The magazine's publisher has offered an apology for running the offending article - which was written by an Egyptian author for another publication. It's unfortunate enough when anti-Semitic writings like this appear on fringe websites and online hate forums. But another thing altogether to see such contemptible, anti-Semitic rantings appear in community publications distributed in Canada. Ontario deputy premier and London area MPP Deb Matthews even bought advertising in the magazine to reach its readership. She's now quite rightly pulling her ads indefinitely.

6. Legal experts mull risks to privacy

The Chronicle-herald, 2016 07 23

Halifax - Cyber-crime and privacy issues top the agenda at the International Society for the Reform of Criminal Law annual conference in Halifax this week. It is the first time the conference, slated to run Sunday through Thursday has been held east of Montreal. Judges, lawyers, legislators and law enforcement officials from around the globe will weigh in on the difficult balance between the rights of the individual and society's collective security, said Hon. Justice Michael MacDonald, Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, who is co-chairing this year's conference along with Supreme Court Justice Thomas Cromwell. "It's a huge challenge in the face of technology that's changing at warp speed," MacDonald said. "The Internet is changing our lives daily and it's a challenge at the best of times to find that right balance between protecting your and my privacy with the need to protect society," he said. While judges are loath to give police the right to hack anyone's account without good reason, with the Internet changing life in almost every way, the justice system has to act appropriately to make sure the use of the Internet as an instrument of crime is minimized, MacDonald said. One of the biggest challenges is that of the principle of open court, he said. "In Nova Scotia and Canada and all leading democracies we value our open courts principle, which means everything that happens must be open to the public and the public must be able to scrutinize to make sure justice is administered properly," MacDonald said.

7. Faulty software is main reason for pay problems, union says

The Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 07 23

Ottawa - The pay problems affecting more than 80,000 public servants appear to be rooted in more than insufficient training, as users complain of problems with the software the government purchased to manage its compensation system. The union representing nearly 600 employees at the government's centralized pay centre in Miramichi, N.B., is disputing the Liberal government's claim that the problems stem from poor training. In addition to a lack of training and understaffing, the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSAC) also blames the issues on software problems with Phoenix. "Workers at the pay centre in Miramichi have been doing their best to pay people accurately and on time. But insufficient staff, training and flaws in the new Phoenix pay system are preventing these workers from doing so," PSAC said in an e-mail. "The software appears to have inherent problems that cannot be easily addressed." More specifically, the union said the system is not equipped to process irregular pay, such as overtime, maternity top-ups and shift pay for workers on Canadian Coast Guard ships. Another source who regularly uses Phoenix said employee names randomly disappear from the system, meaning there is no record of the public servant. IBM, the software designer, said it does not comment on the specifics of its client agreements.

8. Banks eye biometrics to boost security

The Canadian Press, Alexandra Posadzki, 2016 07 23

Toronto - In the not-too-distant future, your bank will be able to prevent fraud by learning how you type, your car will unlock when it senses the electrical activity of your heart and the security system at your office will recognize your facial features. That's according to experts in the field of biometrics, which identifies a person by measuring unique characteristics such as their fingerprints, their retinas or their voice. But these types of distinctive identification authentication processes offer more than the promise of a higher degree of security than traditional passwords. Biometrics will also free consumers from the need to memorize a myriad of characters - a convenience that will appeal to anyone who needs to access a secure computer or network regularly. "People are having to jump through more and more hoops to create a secure authentication," says Karl Martin, founder of Nymi, a Toronto-based startup that created a wristband that can identify its wearer based on their electrocardiogram, or the electrical activity of their heart. "How many times a day do you have to prove who you are, whether it be through a password or a biometric or other means?" Banks - and the financial services industry, more broadly - have been one of the quickest adopters of biometrics technology, given their strong need for security and identity verification, says Bianca Lopes, director of strategy at Bio-Connect. "They're inherently wired and regulated to protect the customer with things like know-your-client and anti-money laundering rules," says Lopes, whose company helps businesses integrate biometrics technologies across various channels.

9. Canadians to keep wearing Kurd flag

The Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 07 23

Ottawa - Canada's top soldier has decided special forces troops in Iraq will continue to wear the Kurdish flag on their uniforms in addition to the Maple Leaf, despite questions about the practice. National Defence says Gen. Jonathan Vance recently approved the flag patches in part to show solidarity with "a region facing existential threats," but that they should not be construed as support for an independent Iraqi Kurdistan. That may be wishful thinking, say experts, one of whom compared it to a foreign military force wearing the Quebec flag in Canada. The Kurds' distinctive red, white and green flag with a sun emblem has been on the Canadian soldiers' uniforms since they arrived in northern Iraq to help the Kurdish peshmerga fight ISIL in 2014. The practice wasn't publicly known until Vance led a group of Canadian journalists on a tour of the mission in April. At the time, Canada had several dozen special forces operatives in the region, though the Trudeau government is expanding the contingent to 200. The military initially defended the flag patches, which are on one shoulder with the Canadian flag on the other. Officials said they were used for cohesion with Kurdish and allied forces, and to ensure Canadian forces could be easily identified by friends on the battlefield. Nonetheless, a review was ordered after experts warned that sporting the Kurdish flag, rather than the Iraqi flag, could be interpreted by both Iraqis and Kurds as support for an independent Kurdistan. National Defence spokesman Daniel Le Bouthillier said Friday the review was recently completed and Vance had decided to keep the Kurdish flag patches.

10. StatsCan wants its freedom from central federal IT department: documents

The Canadian Press, 2016 07 23

Ottawa - The country's chief statistician believes Statistics Canada must have complete control of its own digital systems rather than having to turn to the federal government's central IT department. Workers at the statistics agency were told earlier this year that it was antithetical having someone else look after IT services when the Liberals vowed during the election to make Statistics Canada more independent from the federal government. The details are contained in documents obtained by The Canadian Press under the Access to Information Act that included speaking notes for chief statistician Wayne Smith. "Dependence on another party for informatics services impedes our ability to deliver our programs, to innovate and transform, (and) to better address new and emerging data needs," Smith's speaking notes read. "As such, this dependence is incoherent with the notion of independence, not to mention protection of the confidentiality of respondent data." Shared Services Canada and the statistics agency have had a rocky relationship amid outages and sluggish systems critical to Statistics Canada's mandate. Smith also wrote in response to a staff question that "programs have suffered and continue to suffer delays" since Statistics Canada handed over oversight of its systems to Shared Services Canada, creating "challenges in terms of reliability, timeliness, effectiveness and affordability of IT architecture."

11. Life is anything but a cabaret

The Toronto Sun, Anthony Furey, 2016 07 23

Column: "We have no troubles here," the Master of Ceremonies in the Berlin Kit Kat Klub sings in the final scene of the 1972 Liza Minelli film Cabaret. "Here life is beautiful. The girls are beautiful. Even the orchestra is beautiful." No troubles, eh? I thought of this tragi-comic scene upon learning of the horrific attacks in Munich on Friday believed to be conducted by an 18-year-old Iranian-German who also killed himself. The movie's set in the early 1930s in Germany. While the characters have been obliviously going about their scandalous exploits, the seeds of Nazism are flourishing around them. And while in the opening scene the cabaret club was a symbol of liberty and frivolity, in that last scene we see the audience is now full of uniformed Nazis. Oops. Looks like the party's over. How could they have been so naive to keep the drinks flowing while the walls were caving in around them? Good question. Maybe we should also put it to German Chancellor Angela Merkel and all those globalists who told us everything would be fine after 1.1 million migrants entered Germany in one calendar year alone. The killer himself wouldn't have been a part of that influx. But his actions, along with those of a 17-year-old Afghan asylum seeker who attacked passengers on a train in Germany on Tuesday, make you wonder about the effective integration of young men from that part of the world. When you've got hundreds of thousands of men arriving from countries that have - and let's be generous here - views that don't completely overlap with Europe's values, you're going to run into some conflicting notions of what constitutes a good party.

12. It's All Connected

The Globe and Mail, Mark MacKinnon, 2016 07 23

Analysis: It was just before dawn on the morning of July 15, and I was trying to explain to my six-year-old daughter why - instead of a planned day at the park - I was suddenly heading to the airport to catch a flight to a city called Nice. "A bad man hurt a lot of people in France," was the best explanation I could come up with. As I watched her turn the news over in her head, disappointment spreading on her face, I realized it was a sentence I'd uttered three times in 18 months. Barely 36 hours later, I called her from a sun-baked plaza in the historic old city of Nice. That day in the park would have to be postponed again. Some men with guns had tried to take over the government in Turkey. Instead of coming home, Daddy was flying somewhere else. More bad men, more people hurt. After we hung up, I contemplated how little sense any of this must make to her. She's not alone. All of us - including and especially the political and economic elites who have long stood atop this suddenly wobbly pyramid - have been left reeling by events. A "period of instability" is upon us, historian Margaret MacMillan told me this week, one that has parallels to the pre-war periods of the 20th century that she's written acclaimed books about. Future historians are likely to judge today's leaders on whether they seek to calm - or simply take advantage of - the choppy waters that we're in. Anger at the system: Rarely, it seems, has the world spun so rapidly, have events felt so out of control. The headlines blur into one another, feeding the sense of a world in chaos. The war in Syria bleeds into the refugee crisis. The refugees' march into Europe boosts politicians on the nationalist right. The truck attack in France is followed by the shooting of police in Louisiana. Then it's a man with an axe on a train in Germany. On Friday, it was a shooting at a mall in Munich. "Brexit" in Britain is knocked from the top of the news by a putsch attempt in Turkey.

13. Khadir et des militants tiennent un jeûne de 48 heures

La Presse, Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 07 23

Montréal - Le député Amir Khadir et une poignée de militants ont entamé hier soir une grève de la faim symbolique de 48 heures au centre-ville de Montréal pour dénoncer la détention illégale des prisonniers politiques en Iran. Du même souffle, le député solidaire presse le gouvernement canadien d'intervenir pour libérer l'anthropologue québécoise Homa Hoodfar, incarcérée à Téhéran depuis un mois et demi pour des motifs nébuleux. «Mme Hoodfar enseignait ici à Concordia», rappelle Amir Khadir, en montrant du doigt un bâtiment de l'université montréalaise. «Elle est détenue de façon tout à fait injustifiée et a des problèmes de santé. Elle est exactement dans la situation qui a poussé des prisonniers politiques à faire la grève de la faim pour avoir des soins de santé», déplore le député solidaire qui s'est joint «par solidarité» aux militants du Réseau international de solidarité pour les droits de l'homme en Iran. De Vancouver à Hambourg, de nombreux militants jeûneront ainsi jusqu'à demain soir. Homa Hoodfar n'est pas une «personne dangereuse», mais une «personne très douce» et une universitaire réputée, soutient la militante Elahé Machouf, bien déterminée à rester à la place Norman-Bethune jusqu'à demain, 18h. «Elle voyageait dans différents pays musulmans pour faire des recherches sur comment les femmes musulmanes font face aux lois islamiques», explique-t-elle. La professeure québécoise de 65 ans est loin d'être la seule intellectuelle, militante ou syndicaliste à être incarcérée pour des considérations politiques dans le pays de l'ayatollah Khamenei. Des centaines de détenus ont dû recourir à la grève de la faim pour des «choses banales» depuis un an seulement, dénonce Amir Khadir. Récemment, une femme s'est privée de nourriture pendant 15 jours pour pouvoir appeler ses enfants, alors qu'un syndicaliste a souffert d'une hémorragie intestinale à la suite d'une grève de la faim de 63 jours, donne en exemple Elahé Machouf.

14. Occupation d'un groupe d'autochtones à Gatineau

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 07 23

Gatineau - La Confédération des peuples autochtones du Canada se prépare à un rassemblement qui risque de perturber le centre-ville de Gatineau, à partir de samedi. Le groupe, dirigé par Guillaume Carle, a annoncé qu'il souhaitait occuper les lieux, à l'angle de la rue Montcalm et du boulevard Alexandre-Taché, jusqu'au 6 août prochain. La raison invoquée pour ce rassemblement est la tenue d'une «consultation publique sur tous les droits autochtones reconnus par la décision de la Cour suprême dans la cause Daniels visant l'adoption des droits des peuples autochtones aux Nations Unies et le débat de l'Île Victoria et des chutes chaudières concernant le Projet Zibi». La délégation prévoit se rencontrer à 8 h dans le stationnement du Maxi & Compagnie, pour ensuite se rendre à proximité du pont des Chaudières, vers 9 h. Le groupe, qui n'est pas reconnu par l'Assemblée des Premières Nations, avait déjà manifesté dans les rues de Gatineau et d'Ottawa, au début juin. Certains membres du groupe s'étaient déplacés à cheval jusqu'à Rideau Hall, où ils souhaitaient rencontrer le gouverneur général David Johnston. Aux édifices fédéraux des Terrasses de la Chaudière, dans le secteur Hull, des mesures sont prises en prévision des perturbations que pourrait causer ce rassemblement. Les fonctionnaires sont tenus de se présenter au travail comme à l'habitude. Mais on leur conseille d'avoir en main le numéro de téléphone et le courriel d'un superviseur, de manière à pouvoir l'informer s'ils sont incapables d'entrer dans l'immeuble.

15. Scoffield: Trump, children and refugees - three ways politics touched us this week

Ottawa Citizen, Heather Scoffield, 2016 07 23

Analysis: With most of the country's MPs deep into riding work or away on summer holiday, it's the chatter among public servants that echoes the loudest these days in the parliamentary precinct. Instead of gabbing about the weather, their talking about who is getting paid and who is not. The government's new pay system, Phoenix, has not been working properly, and this week officials acknowledged that more than 80,000 government employees - about one-quarter of the work force - had had serious problems with their pay. In scenes more often associated with emerging markets on the brink of debt default, government officials apologized, pointed to emergency funding and promised to make employees whole, all while admitting to breaches of private information. Meanwhile, the rest of the country reeled with the thought of Donald Trump as U.S. president; received brand new cheques from the federal government to spend on their children; and seemed to pay little heed to the handful of politicians left in Ottawa to discuss what else they can do for desperate refugees in the Middle East. Even as Trump and the Brexit movement thrive on anti-immigrant sentiment, in Canada politicians are wrangling over which party can do the most to help endangered families overseas. This week, MPs on the immigration committee held an emergency summer session to decide how Canada could come to the aid of Yazidis, a religious minority facing genocide in Iraq at the hands of ISIL.

16. La Turquie en ébullition

La Presse, Tolga Bilener, 2016 07 23

Chronique: Les habitants du pays ont vraiment eu du mal à comprendre, dans la soirée du 15 juillet 2016, qu'une tentative de coup d'État était bel et bien en train de se dérouler. C'était tellement inattendu; la procédure tellement archaïque et amateur. La tentative a vite été avortée, laissant derrière elle 300 morts et une nation stupéfaite. Dès le lendemain, le gouvernement turc du Parti de la justice et du développement (AKP), au pouvoir depuis 2002, a lancé une campagne politico-judiciaire pour punir les putschistes. Sous l'ordre du président de la République Recep Tayyip Erdogan, le gouvernement a finalement décrété l'état d'urgence dans tout le pays à partir du 20 juillet, pour une durée de trois mois... renouvelable. Une mesure nécessaire selon le gouvernement, car le risque d'une nouvelle tentative de coup d'État existerait toujours. Celui-ci estime qu'il faut agir vite pour éradiquer tous les éléments impliqués dans le soulèvement du 15 juillet, non seulement dans l'armée, mais aussi dans l'ensemble de l'appareil d'État. Le gouvernement montre essentiellement du doigt une confrérie religieuse musulmane, dont le leader, Fethullah Gülen, se trouve en exil aux États-Unis. L'extradition de celui-ci est réclamée, en soulignant que la réponse de Washington aura des conséquences sur les relations turco-américaines.

17. Obama Denies U.S. Involvement in Coup Attempt in Turkey

The New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 07 23

Washington - President Obama on Friday pushed back against persistent speculation in Turkey that the United States was behind the failed military coup there, saying that the rumors threatened the safety of Americans in the country and could damage its ties with the United States. "Any reports that we had any previous knowledge of a coup attempt, that there was any U.S. involvement in it, that we were anything other than entirely supportive of Turkish democracy are completely false, unequivocally false," Mr. Obama said at a news conference at the White House. The president said he had impressed that message on President Recep Tayyip Erdogan when the two spoke by telephone on Tuesday. A few days earlier, Turkey's labor minister, Suleyman Soylu, who is close to Mr. Erdogan, told a television station that "America is behind the coup." The rumors have been fueled by the fact that a Turkish cleric, Fethullah Gulen, whom Turkey's leaders accuse of being the coup's puppet master, is living in self-imposed exile in Pennsylvania.

18. In the eye of Turkey's political storm

The Globe and Mail, Joanna Slater, 2016 07 23

Saylorsburg, PA - Just down the road from a Pennsylvania flea market lives the man accused of masterminding last week's failed military coup. It is high summer in this rural corner of northeastern Pennsylvania – a time of blue skies, boating on the Delaware River, and, if Turkey's President is to be believed, plots to overthrow his government. Just down the road from a flea market and a maze made out of corn stalks sits the compound home to Fethullah Gulen, the influential cleric accused of masterminding last week's failed military coup. It's an accusation that Mr. Gulen has categorically denied. Inside the compound, there is mostly silence, save for the chirping of birds and the buzz of planes high overhead. There are very few people evident – a handful of men walk the paths between sculpted pine trees and a couple of children ride bikes near a row of houses built to accommodate visitors. The quiet here is a world away from the turmoil gripping Turkey, where President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has declared a state of emergency and detained or suspended more than 60,000 military personnel, judges, teachers, civil servants and police officers. Mr. Erdogan has urged his supporters to stay in the streets following the attempted coup, which left nearly 300 people dead. For nearly two decades, Mr. Gulen has lived in self-imposed exile in this hamlet of about 1,000 people in the Pocono Mountains. The founder of a movement known as "Hizmet," or service, Mr. Gulen's teachings focus on education. His supporters have started hundreds of secular schools and charities across Turkey and beyond. A moderate preacher rooted in the Sufi mystic tradition of Islam, Mr. Gulen is known for emphasizing interfaith dialogue.

19. Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard seeks easing of parole conditions in US court

Deutsche Welle, 2016 07 23

Berlin - Jonathan Pollard served 30 years in prison for stealing hundreds of secret and top-secret documents and selling them to Israel. He was paroled in November but is still considered a security threat - so he wears a tracking device. But as Pollard's attorney Eliot Lauer argued for an easing of some restrictions on Friday, US District Judge Katherine Forrest cautioned that her authority was limited. "The information [Pollard stole] is ridiculously stale, and it's the type of information that no human being could reasonably recall," Lauer told Forrest, referring to the 30-year-old documents. He said Pollard was being denied a job at an investment firm because of the computer monitoring. The 61-year-old Pollard is required to wear an electronic tracking device and has to submit his work computer to monitoring. Assistant US Attorney Rebecca Sol Tinio told Forrest the restrictions were imposed by the US Parole Commission on the grounds that Pollard could still reveal secrets - a claim rejected by his lawyer.

20. Pentagon Revamps Law of War Manual to Protect Journalists

The New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 07 23

Washington - The Pentagon on Friday revised its manual for interpreting the international laws of war, adding language to protect reporters engaged in battlefield news gathering. But the Defense Department's overhaul of its Law of War Manual left unchanged other disputed sections that scholarly critics have called inaccurate and dangerous — including rules for weighing when it is lawful to fire on a military target even though civilians are present. The manual, issued last year, is the latest in a series of official guides to rules for warfare tracing back to a set of concise rules, known as the "Lieber Code," that President Lincoln issued to Union soldiers during the Civil War. But last year's version, which is about 1,200 pages, has attracted controversy. Its section about war correspondents portrayed journalism as close to spying, said reporters should get authorization to enter a war zone, and spoke of censoring their work. And it stated that if reporters relayed information that could be useful in combat, that "could constitute taking a direct part in hostilities" — meaning it would become lawful to intentionally kill them. Journalism advocates objected, saying the section could lead commanders to put reporters at risk, and that other governments might cite the manual as justification for targeting them.

21. Seeking Justice in El Salvador

The New York Times, 2016 07 23

Editorial: In 1993, just days after the United Nations published a report about the brutal civil war in El Salvador between the military-led government and leftist guerrilla groups, the country's legislature hastily passed an amnesty law. It absolved all the actors in the conflict, which lasted 12 years, left an estimated 75,000 dead and continues to reverberate in the country's politics and psyche to this day. This month, though, El Salvador's top court struck down key parts of the law in a remarkable ruling that opens the door for relatives of victims of war crimes to hold torturers and killers accountable. In a 4-to-1 ruling, the court found that the law violated El Salvador's constitution and international treaties by offering "absolute and unconditional" amnesty for atrocities. The court did not offer a clear blueprint of what the government needed to do in response to the ruling. Human rights groups have long called for the establishment of a special human rights prosecution unit to investigate war crimes. However, there appears to be little political will in El Salvador to revisit a painful chapter of its history in courtrooms. Politicians across the political spectrum have questioned the viability of war crimes tribunals at a time when the country's judicial institutions are overwhelmed by endemic gang violence. President Salvador Sánchez Cerén warned that the ruling threatened the "fragile coexistence" that binds Salvadoran society.

22. Turkey presses for return of cleric

The Washington Post, Hugh Naylor, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - Turkey's top diplomat urged the United States on Friday to quickly hand over a self-exiled cleric whom Turkish leaders have linked to last week's coup attempt - an issue that risks causing serious tension between the two allies. Foreign Minister Mevlut Cavusoglu told the state-run broadcaster TRT that Turkey was ready to take part in a commission proposed by Washington to discuss the extradition of Fethullah Gulen. But Cavusoglu insisted there was no need for it to take a long time. "If you want to draw out the Gulen extradition issue, it can take years, but if you are decisive, it can be completed in a short period," he said, according to the Reuters news agency. Since a failed July 15 coup by military units, Turkey has carried out a widespread crackdown on members of the army, police, judiciary and educational institutions. Tens of thousands of people have been arrested, fired or suspended on suspicion of sympathies to Gulen.

23. Kerry, on private travel to Nice, to visit American hurt in attack

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Paris - U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry is in Nice on Saturday "on private business" and will visit an American still hospitalized after a truck driver deliberately plowed into a crowd in the city during Bastille Day celebrations last week. Three U.S. citizens were among the 84 killed in the attack, in which Tunisian delivery man Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel drove a 19-tonne truck along a packed sea-front promenade before police shot him dead. "Secretary Kerry is in Nice today on private business," a senior State Department said in a statement. "While there, he will visit with an American injured in last week's terrorist attack who is recovering in a local hospital."

24. Attack on RAF jogger Doubts over terrorist motive

The Daily Telegraph, 2016 07 23

London - Police hunting two suspects who carried out a knifepoint attack on an RAF man out running near his base have said it may have been an attempted robbery. Detectives are scouring CCTV footage and carrying out door-to-door interviews after the attack, which raised fears of a Lee Rigby-style terrorist attempt on Armed Forces personnel. The incident at RAF Marham in Norfolk left other military installations at heightened levels of vigilance. Armed police and a helicopter were later scrambled to Bulford Camp, Wilts, after three men were reportedly sighted nearby with a rifle.

25. Russians bomb Syria base after SAS move out 'to make US do deal'

The Daily Telegraph, Ben Farmer, 2016 07 23

London - Russian jets bombed a military outpost just hours after SAS troops had left to bully the West into closer cooperation in Syria, US officials have said. Aircraft used cluster arms on the remote south-east base shortly after the 20 special forces troopers moved out as the Kremlin tried to force Washington into a controversial deal of joint action. British and US special forces based across the border in Jordan regularly worked with Syrian rebel allies at the At Tanf outpost before the attack on June 16, said The Wall Street Journal. Details of the raid emerged as the US negotiated an "anti-terror pact" for closer ties with Moscow, which would see them strike Islamic State (Isil) and al-Qaeda aligned jihadists, while effectively shoring up Bashar al-Assad. The Cold War enemies support opposing sides in the conflict, with Russia bombing in support of the Syrian government, while the US arms and trains rebels. The raid was a bid to put pressure on Washington, US officials said. After the first wave of bombing, US commanders warned Russian counterparts the garrison was part of the international military coalition against Isil and should not be attacked. But around 90 minutes later, circling US pilots saw Russian jets drop a second barrage. A US spy plane crew tried to reach the Russian fliers on agreed emergency frequencies, but they did not answer. Four rebels were killed in the strike. When US officials demanded an explanation from Moscow, they were told Russian pilots had struck the outpost because they thought it was an Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant base.

26. Spies are waging war on Corbyn, says McCluskey

The Times of London, Michael Savage and Oliver Wright, 2016 07 23

London - Senior Labour MPs have launched a furious attack on the leader of Britain's biggest union after he accused the security services of waging a secret campaign to undermine Jeremy Corbyn. In a claim that led to anger and derision, the Unite general secretary, Len McCluskey, suggested that there were "dark practices" within the intelligence services, with agents posing as Corbyn supporters to launch anonymous online attacks against Labour MPs with a view to damaging the Labour leader's reputation. MPs said Mr McCluskey, a firm ally of Mr Corbyn, had "lost the plot" for making the inflammatory comments. They also warned that it was a deliberate attempt to protect Mr Corbyn and his supporters from taking the blame for a rising tide of abuse and intimidation within the party. Mr Corbyn has been hit by a series of claims that he had overseen a growth of bullying and misogyny within Labour since he won the leadership. Dozens of female Labour MPs have written to him accusing him of failing to stop "an extremely worrying trend of escalating abuse and hostility". Chris Bryant, the former shadow Commons leader, said Labour under Mr Corbyn had "become a home for bullies". Mr McCluskey made his allegations about a secret service plot in lengthy comments to The Guardian.

27. Soldiers on 'high alert' at camps

The Sun, David Willetts, 2016 07 23

London – Army bases were in lockdown yesterday and thousands of soldiers put on "high alert" after a second security scare. Troops at Bulford, Tidworth and Larkhill camps in Wiltshire were told to be vigilant going to and from work. Personnel training near perimeters got an armed guard, a source said. It followed reports on Thursday of three men near Bulford with an AK-47. They were found with an air rifle but no malicious intent, cops said. Just hours earlier, the RAF Regiment soldier in his 20s fought off two men who tried to bundle him into a car outside RAF Marham, Norfolk. Cops hope to get DNA from blood on his knuckles from one of his Middle Eastern assailants, who are still on the run.

28. MI5 may be stirring Corbyn strife

The Daily Telegraph, Ben Riley-Smith, 2016 07 23

London – Len McCluskey the Unite leader, has claimed Britain's intelligence agencies may be responsible for the bullying and abuse directed towards critics of Jeremy Corbyn. The union boss, a loyal supporter of the Labour leader, said the security services had a history of "dark practices" and suggested "Right-wingers" in disguise may be responsible for the actions attributed to the Labour leader's supporters. Mr McCluskey told The Guardian: "Do people believe for one second that the security forces are not involved in dark practices? I have been around long enough ... the type of stuff that we ultimately find out about, about who was involved in who, the 30-year rule. "We found out just a couple of years ago that the chair of my union then, the Transport and General Workers Union, was an MI5 informant at the time that there was a strike taking place that I personally as a worker was involved in."Anybody who thinks that that isn't happening doesn't live in the same world that I live in. Do you think that there's not all kinds of Right-wingers who are not secretly able to disguise themselves and stir up trouble?" Mr McCluskey made his comments as Mr Corbyn was accused by nearly half of the female MPs in his party of failing to stop the "disgusting and totally unacceptable" abuse of women by his supporters.

29. Police arrest eleventh suspect of terrorist plot in Brazil

Agência Brasil, Paulo Victor, 2016 07 23

Sao Paula - Another of the 12 Brazilians targeted by the Federal Police's Operation Hashtag over alleged conspiracy to launch terrorist attacks in Brazil was arrested Friday (Jul. 22). He turned himself in to police officers in the late afternoon in a small town in Mato Grosso that borders on Bolivia. He was the eleventh suspect to be arrested in the case, and will be sent to a federal prison after being heard by the police. A total 12 temporary detention warrants have been issued for this operation. They are effective for 30 days and may be extended by another 30. Police are still after one last remaining target of the operation that investigates the involvement of Brazilians in planning terrorist attacks inspired by Islamic State.

30. Merrylands Police Station incident: Man charged after burning car set alight

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, 2016 07 23

Canberra - A 61-year-old man is charged after a car he was driving was set alight in the driveway of the Merrylands Police Station in Sydney's west. A man has been charged over a dramatic incident in which a car he was driving was set alight in the driveway of the Merrylands Police Station in Sydney's west. The interior of the 61-year-old man's car was on fire before he drove it into the roller door of the station's underground car park on Thursday night, police said. Police ruled out any link to terrorism but said the man had a history of serious mental health issues. He was taken to Royal North Shore Hospital with serious burns and remains under police guard. He was charged with destroying or damaging property with the intention of endangering life.

31. Open health data for intel

The Advertiser, 2016 07 23

Canberra – Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull is considering giving the nation's spy agencies access to mental health records to help curb terrorism. But he said any such move would be carefully considered, acknowledging it would be a huge change to the privacy system. Mr Turnbull, pictured, has already asked counter-terrorism co-ordinator Greg Moriarty to conduct a review into what further measures Australia can take to protect itself in the wake of the deadly Nice attack. On radio yesterday Mr Turnbull said allowing spy agencies to access mental health records was being looked at.

32. Waihopai documentary digs into the world of spies, eyes and peace video

StuffNZ, Philip Matthews, 2016 07 23

Wellington - They walked through a vineyard and cut fences in the dead of night, approached the enormous white domes of the spy base and said, "In the name of Jesus Christ, we disarm you". Then they plunged sickles into a dome, which deflated like a balloon, and they cried next to a shrine they set up. The three men were a teacher, a farmer and a Catholic priest. The teacher, Adrian Leason, said, "Catholic spirituality was the glue that brought us together." Leason, Father Peter Murnane and farmer Samuel Land were charged for the 2008 attack on the Waihopai spy base near Blenheim that New Zealand's prime minister at the time, Helen Clark, called "a senseless act of criminal vandalism". But was it senseless? As Leason says, the three men drew on a tradition of Christian pacifism and direct action. Scruffy, bearded and sometimes barefoot, they looked like Russian mystics. Leason is the central figure in a new documentary that spreads outwards from that incident at Waihopai to encompass the vast subject of global surveillance and New Zealand's role in the Five Eyes alliance. Viewers of The 5th Eye may experience unsettling flashbacks from 2014 as these figures appear before you: Edward Snowden, Kim Dotcom, Nicky Hager and Glenn Greenwald. They were strange days indeed. "The goal is to package up a whole lot of information about the issue and give it to people as something digestible," says co-director Errol Wright. "It puts events in order and in context." Father Peter Murnane, left, Adrian Leason and Samuel Land are released on bail at the Blenheim District Court in 2008. A jury later found the Waihopai Three not guilty. There is so much to digest and comprehend that co-director Abi King-Jones spent two years in editing to have it ready for the premiere in Wellington during the New Zealand International Film Festival on July 23. Screenings in Auckland and Christchurch will follow.

33. China pulls missiles ahead of sea ruling

South China Morning Post, Minnie Chan, 2016 07 23

Beijing - Surface-to-air weapons were probably removed from Woody Island in the Paracels to be shipped back to mainland for maintenance, report says. China removed its new generation surface-to-air missiles from Woody Island in the South China Sea two days ahead an international tribunal ruling on a territorial dispute in the waters, IHS Janes Defence magazine -reported, citing satellite images. The images from Airbus -Defence and Space showed a -battery of HQ-9 missiles was -removed on July 10, two days -before the Permanent Court of -Arbitration in The Hague rejected Beijing's claims over the South China Sea, the report said. The HQ-9s have a range of 200km and can intercept aircraft and incoming missiles. The report said the missiles, which have been on Woody Island in the Paracels since at least February, were probably shipped back to the mainland for maintenance by a Type 072A landing ship docked in the island's -harbour. Beijing-based naval expert Li Jie said the possible removal of the HQ-9s could be a response to the Pentagon's decision to withdraw its USS John C. Stennis carrier from the South China Sea on July 5, showing both Beijing and Washington were keen to reduce the risk of military confrontation.

34. U.S. national security advisor to visit China amid tensions over South China Sea, THAAD

Yonhap English News, 2016 07 23

Washington - U.S. National Security Adviser Susan Rice will visit China next week for talks with top Chinese officials, her office said Friday, as tensions between the two countries have flared anew over the South China Sea and the THAAD missile defense system. The four-day visit starting Sunday comes after an international tribunal rejected China's territorial claims to most of the South China Sea in a victory for the Philippines and other Southeast Asian nations locked in maritime disputes with Beijing. It also comes after South Korea and the United States announced a joint decision to deploy a Terminal High Altitude Area Defense battery in the South to better defend against growing nuclear and missile threats from North Korea. China has strongly protested both the South China Sea ruling and the THAAD deployment decision.

35. Philippines president vows to continue army's modernization

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific, 2016 07 23

Manila - President Rodrigo Duterte has assured the troops that he will continue the previous administration's efforts to modernize the military. A press statement from the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) public affairs office quoted Duterte as saying as much, when the new Commander in Chief visited for the first time the Sixth Infantry Division headquarters at Camp Siongco in Datu Odin Sinsuat, Maguindanao, on Saturday [23 July]. "There will even be no refocusing of the modernization thrust. We will only adjust our priorities," Duterte was quoted as saying. "For the time being, we will be attending to the more pressing needs of our soldiers now engaged in focused military operations in Basilan, Sulu, central Mindanao, and other areas in southern Philippines," Duterte added.

36. 20,000 troops eyed to crush terrorists

The Manila Times, Catherine S. Valente, 2016 07 23

Manila - President Rodrigo Duterte wants to deploy up to 20,000 more soldiers to put an end to terrorist attacks and kidnappings of foreigners in Mindanao. Meeting with top military and police officials at the Armed Forces' Western Mindanao headquarters in Zamboanga City, Duterte said more government troops are needed to put an end to "embarrassing" terrorism in the country. "It started many, many years ago. It's like we're being slapped on the face, every time there is a foreigner executed or a local ... it embarrasses the country," the President said. "One day we'll just have to decide and one day we'll just have to say, 'we'll finish everything.' We can't be slapped on the face like this every day," he added. Duterte said 10,000 to 20,000 additional troops would be needed to combat terror groups in various areas in Mindanao.

37. Malaysia foils 'IS plot against police'

Bangkok Post, 2016 07 23

Kuala Lumpur - Malaysian authorities said on Saturday that they had foiled a bomb plot against top police officers and arrested 14 suspected Islamic State (IS) operatives in a week-long operation. The suspects included a senior IS member who is believed responsible for recruiting a Malaysian IS militant, Abu Ghani Yaacob, who was killed in Syria on April 17, said Khalid Abu Bakar, inspector-general of police. "Based on a search, police managed to seize one completed IED weighing one kilogramme, for use in a planned attack on the top PDRM leadership," Khalid said in a statement, using the Malay acronym for the Royal Malaysian Police, and referring to an improvised explosive device, or bomb. Malaysia's security agencies have stepped up preventive measures against IS spreading in the Muslim majority, but multi-ethnic country. A few months ago, officials estimated nearly 50 Malaysians, most of them from the Malay majority, had joined IS in Syria and Iraq.

38. Kerry to urge ASEAN to launch talks to ease South China Sea disputes

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Paris - U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry will urge Southeast Asian nations in meetings in Laos next week to find diplomatic ways to launch talks on easing tension over the South China Sea following an international court ruling that denies China's claims in the sea. "The Secretary will reinforce our hope that ... the parties will now turn to constructively engaging in a effort to find diplomatic ways to peacefully interact in the South China Sea," a senior U.S. official said before a meeting of the 10-nation Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) in Laos' capital Vientiane on Sunday. 39. S. Korea's FM Yun to highlight Pyongyang's nuke threat at ASEAN meetings

Yonhap English News, 2016 07 23

Vientiane - South Korea's Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se said Saturday that he will drive home the fact that North Korea's nuclear and missile threats stretch beyond the neighboring regions and affect the entire international community as he joins a series of meetings led by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). He made the remarks in a brief meeting with reporters at Incheon International Airport before leaving for the Laotian capital of Vientiane where he will hold talks with his ASEAN counterparts in the days to come. "I will emphasize that the threat emanating from the North's nuclear bombs and missiles not only poses problems for the Korean Peninsula and Northeast Asia but the wider world at large," he said. "At the same time, I will endeavor to deliver the message to all participating countries that the Security Council's resolutions should be thoroughly implemented," he added. Yun is to arrive here on Sunday. He is to attend a series of meetings including the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) slated for the last day of the annual event on Tuesday

40. Pak-based terror groups target India's interests in Af: envoy

Press Trust of India, Yoshita Singh, 2016 07 23

United Nations - Pakistan-based terror groups such as LeT, the Taliban, JeM and al-Qaeda target India's interests and goals in Afghanistan and pursue other objectives like creating sanctuaries and safe havens in tribal areas between Kabul and Islamabad, Afghan envoy to the UN has said. "In Afghanistan, regional terrorist groups have cooperated with the Taliban based on their common goals and mutual interests. These groups include Lashkar-e-Taiba, Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan, Jaish-e-Mohammad, Al-Qaeda and Lashkar-e-Islam, Sipah-e-Sahaba, Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan, Eastern Turkistan Islamic movement. "These groups pose a strategic threat to the security and stability of Afghanistan," Permanent Afghan Representative Mahmoud Saikal said here at an open briefing of the Counter- Terrorism Committee on foreign terrorists yesterday.

41. Kerala police arrest man from Thane for alleged IS links

Hindustan Times, 2016 07 23

Mumbai - A team of Kerala police and the Maharashtra anti-terrorist squad (ATS) have arrested a man from Kalyan in Thane for being part of a group that allegedly radicalised and recruited youth to undertake terrorist activities, officials said on Saturday. Rizwan Khan will be produced before a court in Thane and Kerala police will seek a transit remand on Saturday. This is the second arrest by Kerala police, who have been camping in Mumbai since a week, in the last few days. On Thursday, Kerala police arrested 45-year-old Arshid Qureshi, a public relation manager with controversial preacher Dr Zakir Naik's Islamic Research Foundation, from Navi Mumbai for allegedly radicalising youth and recruiting them to Islamic State. Qureshi's name surfaced after Kochi Police registered a complaint against Yahya alias Bestin Vincent, a Christian from Palakkad who converted to Islam and is believed to have joined IS. Yahya went missing from Kochi along with his wife Merin Jacob alias Mariyam.

42. Fear, Hunger and Frustration for a South Sudan Mired in Crisis

The New York Times, Jacey Fortin, 2016 07 23

Juba - For nearly two weeks, they have hunkered in a schoolyard with nothing to do and nowhere else to go, dozens of people battling hunger, swarms of mosquitoes -- and fear. "I just want peace so I can go back to school," said Betty Christian, a chatty 19-year-old who fled her home here in the capital, Juba, when clashes erupted across the city this month. As she ran to find shelter, she passed soldiers who debated whether to shoot her, she said. When they decided not to shoot because she was female, she thanked them. Eventually, Ms. Christian made her way to this makeshift displacement site with her aunt and several of her cousins. But she has not heard from her mother since the gunfire began, and does not know where to find her. South Sudan's civil war is supposed to be over. In April, after more than two years of conflict that killed tens of thousands of people, the opposition leader, Riek Machar, returned to Juba with nearly 1,400 troops to resume his post as the vice president to his wartime rival, President Salva Kiir. To steady South Sudan, the world's newest nation, Mr. Kiir and Mr. Machar formed a transitional government, and for months soldiers from both sides of the conflict endured a tense coexistence in Juba.

43. South Sudan Vice President Machar sacks minister after 'defection'

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Juba - South Sudan Vice President Riek Machar has fired a minister who he said had defected to his long-time rival President Salva Kiir's party. The rift between Machar and Taban Deng Gai has raised the prospect of further turmoil after months of fighting, as members of a faction led by Gai threatened to replace their leader. Two years of civil war that erupted after Kiir sacked Machar as Vice President in 2013 has killed more than 10,000 people and displaced over 2 million, many of whom fled to neighbouring countries. In a letter to party members and his military commanders late on Friday, Machar said Gai will be relieved of his position as mining minister, and had been expelled from the party.

44. L'Afrique de l'Ouest se ligue contre Boko Haram

El Watan, 2016 07 23

Abuja - Le président nigérien, Mahamadou Issoufou, et son homologue libérienne, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, ont décidé, à Niamey, de convoquer prochainement un sommet de l'Afrique de l'Ouest et centrale pour combattre le groupe terroriste Boko Haram. «Nous avons décidé de convoquer dans les prochains jours une réunion au sommet de ces deux régions pour harmoniser davantage les solutions dans le cadre de la lutte contre Boko Haram», a indiqué le chef d'Etat nigérien. L'annonce a été faite par M. Issoufou au cours d'une conférence de presse co-animée avec la présidente libérienne, également présidente en exercice de la Conférence des chefs d'Etat de la communauté économique des Etats de l'Afrique de l'Ouest (Cedeao) au terme de sa visite officielle de travail et d'amitié de 24 heures au Niger. Le groupe terroriste Boko Haram, qui commet des attaques meurtrières depuis 2009 dans le nord du Nigeria et s'est étendu par la suite à d'autres pays voisins (Niger, Cameroun et Tchad), a fait plus de 20 000 morts et forcé plus de 2 millions de personnes à se déplacer dans les pays limitrophes. Au Niger précisément, la secte terroriste a commis des attaques meurtrières à plusieurs reprises depuis février 2015 contre des localités du sud-est du pays situées à la frontière du Nigeria, notamment Bosso et Diffa, depuis ses positions nigériennes, qui ont coûté la vie à des centaines de civils et de militaires nigériens et fait des milliers de déplacés au Niger et au Nigeria.

45. Deux terroristes se sont rendus à l'armée à Jijel

El Watan, 2016 07 23

Alger - Les terroristes B. Ishak et B. Houdaïfa se sont rendus aux autorités sécuritaires relevant du secteur opérationnel de Jijel, a indiqué, hier, un communiqué du ministère de la Défense nationale (MDN). Il s'agit de deux frères. Le premier B. Ishak s'est rendu jeudi dernier. Son frère, quant à lui, a fait sa reddition hier après-midi en possession, selon le MDN, d'un fusil semi-automatique de type Seminov.

46. Libye: Ban Ki-moon craint l'éparpillement des combattants du groupe EI
RFI, 2016 07 23

Tripoli - Un rapport du secrétaire général de l'ONU Ban Ki-moon s'inquiète d'une possible dispersion des combattants de l'organisation Etat islamique en Libye. Acculés dans leur bastion de Syrte, ces 2 000 à 5 000 combattants pourraient chercher à fuir dans des pays voisins et notamment en Tunisie. C'est un rapport porteur d'une bonne nouvelle : l'organisation Etat islamique est en déroute en Libye. Elle perd du terrain. La ville de Syrte, fief de la branche libyenne du groupe EI et ville symbolique qui a vu naître Mouammar Khadafi pourrait d'ailleurs tomber très rapidement, estime ce document confidentiel remis au Conseil de sécurité.

47. Mali: retour au calme à Kidal mais la tension demeure
Radio France Internationale, 2015 07 23

Kidal - Le calme est revenu à Kidal, dans le nord du Mali, après les violents affrontements qui ont opposé dans le nord du pays les ex-rebelles touaregs de la Coordination des mouvements de l'Azawad et des membres du GATIA, un groupe armé pro-gouvernemental. L'enjeu était le contrôle de la ville. Ce vendredi après-midi, la CMA a de nouveau le contrôle de Kidal. La vie reprend peu à peu à Kidal selon des témoins, mais la situation est encore très tendue. Selon plusieurs sources, les derniers combattants du GATIA, ce groupe armé favorable au gouvernement, ont quitté les rues de cette ville du nord du Mali. Une information confirmée par Fared Ag Almahmoud, porte-parole du GATIA, qui a indiqué que ses troupes se sont repliées à quelques kilomètres de la ville. Mais celui-ci précise que si ses troupes se sont retirées, c'est parce qu'elles ont conclu un accord avec la CMA. « Nous nous sommes retirés à partir du moment où les responsables locaux de la CMA ont accepté que la CMA et la Plateforme se retirent », affirme-t-il.

48. Tehran calls S. Arabia 'founding father of Daesh, al Qaeda'
Tehran Times, 2016 07 23

Tehran - Reacting to a recent barrage of anti-Iranian remarks by Saudi Foreign Minister Adel al-Jubeir, the Iranian Foreign Ministry on Saturday lambasted the Saudi kingdom, calling it "the founding father of Daesh and al Qaeda." During a lecture on terrorism organized by the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Brussels and hosted by Egmont Research Center, Saudi Foreign Minister Adel al-Jubeir had accused Tehran of expansionist policies and "harboring" terrorism. The acid comments were rejected by Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Bahram Qasemi as "absurd, unfounded, and repetitious." "Adel al-Jubeir, who is these days desperately obsessed with smudging the footprints of the interventions of Saudi officials in numerous terrorist attacks over the past decades, thinks can deflect the public opinion of the world from endless disgraces of his country as the founding father of Daesh and al Qaeda through propaganda," Qasemi stated in a statement carried by the official website of the Iranian Foreign Ministry. Iran and Saudi Arabia have been supporting opposing sides in regional developments in the Middle East region, particularly in Syria.

49. Iran arrests 40 terrorists, interior minister says
Tehran Times, 2016 07 23

Tehran - Iranian security forces have arrested 40 members of a terrorist group in the eastern parts of the country, the interior minister announced on Thursday. Abdolreza Rahmani-Fazli said the suspects had been arrested over the previous two nights, the IRIB reported.

50. Turkish, Russian foreign ministries work on Putin-Erdogan meeting - Turkish president

TASS World Service, 2016 07 23

Moscow - Turkey's President Recep Tayyip Erdogan hopes to have a meeting with Russia's President Vladimir Putin in mid-August, he said this in an interview with France-24 on Saturday. "Right now, the Turkish Foreign Ministry negotiates it with the Russian counterparts," he said. "Of course, the recent events in Turkey, apparently, will change the visit timing. But I think, if nothing extraordinary happens, a meeting with the Russian president may take place about mid-August." On July 20, Russian presidential press secretary Dmitry Peskov told journalists a meeting between the Presidents of Russia and Turkey, Vladimir Putin and Recep Tayyip Erdogan, will be held in Russia in early August. "They (Putin and Erdogan) agreed to hold the meeting in early August, it will take place in the Russian Federation, but the city and the exact date are so far being considered," the Kremlin representative said.

51. Russian Tu-22M3 long-range bombers attack terrorist facilities in Syria

TASS World Service, 2015 07 23

Moscow - Tu-22M3 (NATO reporting name: Backfire-C) bombers of Russia's Aerospace Force have delivered new airstrikes against facilities of the Islamic State terrorist organization (outlawed in Russia) in Syria and destroyed two command posts, the Russian Defense Ministry's press office said. "On July 21 at 05:00 a.m. Moscow time [02:00 GMT], six Tu-22M3 long-range supersonic bombers delivered another massive attack against newly-detected facilities of the Islamic State terrorist organization east of Palmyra, as well as in As-Suhnah, Arak and Et-Teibe in the province of Homs," the press office said in a press release obtained by TASS. "According to objective control data, the airstrikes destroyed two terrorist command posts, manpower and military hardware in shelters," the press office said. "Sukhoi Su-35S [Flanker-E] fighter jets that took off from the Khmeimim airbase provided air cover for the Tu-22M3 long-range bombers," the press office added.

52. Islamic State said to shun withdrawal offer in surrounded Syrian city

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Beirut - Islamic State appeared to have shunned an offer for its fighters to withdraw safely from the Syrian city of Manbij and clashes with U.S.-backed forces raged ahead of its expiry, a spokesman for Washington-backed forces said on Saturday. The Syria Democratic Forces alliance, made up of Arab and Kurdish fighters and backed by the United States, made rapid advances against the jihadists last month after launching a campaign to flush them out of territory along the Turkish border, through which they had for years moved weapons and fighters. The SDF quickly surrounded Manbij, but the fight to take the city has been tougher, with slow advances inside it in recent weeks. On Thursday the SDF-allied Manbij Military Council said Islamic State militants would be allowed to leave the city with light weapons, without a fight, if their departure took place within 48 hours. The offer had been initiated by local actors, the Council's spokesman Sharfan Darwish said, without elaborating.

53. Intelligence collection, monitoring of people with mental-health issues seen as keys to improving safety

The Wall Street Journal Online, Julian E. Barnes & Matthew Dalton, 2016 07 23

Berlin - First the massacre by truck in Nice, France, then an ax attack on a German train and now a shooting spree in Munich: Over the past 10 days, Western Europe has seen the calm of everyday life shattered by high-profile acts of violence. The motives and circumstances of each attack were different but the string of violence has officials in the region asking if terrorism is becoming a fact of life that Europe must learn to accept. The initial assessment by authorities is that Friday's German attack was committed by Ali David Sonbody, a teenager who was believed to have been in psychiatric care and taken an interest in mass killers including Anders Behring Breivik, the right-wing terrorist who killed 77 people in Norway exactly five years before. If the assessment holds, the Munich attack would be an exception in a year when Islamic State has either directed or inspired most of the terror attacks in Europe. U.S. and European officials said they were proceeding cautiously because the assessment could change in the days to come. But security officials said the recent string of attacks in both Europe and America show the importance of improving intelligence collection, and improving services and monitoring of people with mental-health issues. "We are living in fear whether it is from terrorists or [mentally ill] people," said a U.S. official in Europe. "Whether they are self-radicalized or mentally ill they can terrorize and change peoples lives. We have two problems here, we have to focus on both." U.S. officials say the one thing European intelligence and law-enforcement officials could do quickly is find a mechanism with which to share more intelligence and law enforcement information, and share it more widely. American officials have been pushing Europe for more intelligence sharing with the U.S.—not simply providing information on terrorists or potential terrorists who are intent on attacking the U.S. but a far broader swath of information.

54. Gunman in Munich Kills 9, Then Himself, the Police Say

The New York Times, Multiple Reporters, 2016 07 23

Munich - A gunman opened fire outside a shopping mall in Munich late on Friday afternoon, killing nine people, wounding 21 and sending Germany's third-largest city into lockdown as the police scrambled to find what they initially thought were as many as three assailants. By early Saturday, the authorities said the attack was probably the work of a single gunman, an 18-year-old German of Iranian descent who they said held both German and Iranian citizenship. The body of the presumed gunman, whose name was not immediately made public, was found less than a mile from the mall with a self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head, officials said. During a news conference early Saturday, Hubertus Andrä, the chief of the Munich police, said it was unclear what had motivated the assailant, who lived in the city for more than two years and had no police record. He said the authorities were not certain that the rampage was a terrorist attack. "The events of last night and tonight make us sad, speechless, and in particular right now, our thoughts are with the victims," Chief Andrä said. Three of the wounded were in critical condition, officials said. The bloodshed sent this well-ordered, Baroque city into a panic, as the authorities declared a state of emergency and halted public transportation in the middle of the rush-hour commute. Members of an elite counterterrorism squad fanned out across the city, and residents were ordered to stay indoors. In some places, pedestrians could be seen raising their hands as they walked past police officers who had their weapons drawn.

55. Munich gunman fixated on mass killing, had no Islamist ties

Reuters, 2016 06 23

Berlin - A German-Iranian teenager who shot dead nine people in Munich was a deranged lone gunman obsessed with mass killings who drew no inspiration from Islamist militancy, police said on Saturday. The 18-year-old, born and raised locally, opened fire near a busy shopping mall on Friday evening, triggering a lockdown in the Bavarian state capital. Seven of his victims were themselves teenagers, who police said he may have lured to their deaths via a hacked Facebook account on what was the fifth anniversary of twin attacks by Norwegian mass murderer Anders Breivik that killed 77 people. The Munich shooting, in which a further 27 people were wounded, some seriously, was the third act of violence against civilians in Western Europe - and the second in southern Germany - in eight days. Bavarian state crime office president Robert Heimberger said the gunman, who German media named as Ali David Sonboly, was carrying more than 300 bullets in his backpack and pistol when he was later found dead of a gunshot wound.

56. Gunman kills nine at Munich mall

The Globe and Mail, Staff and Wire Services, 2015 07 23

Berlin - A man found dead near a shopping centre in Munich, Germany killed himself and was likely the lone gunman in an attack that killed nine people and injured 16 others, a spokesman for the Munich police said on Saturday. Earlier police, citing eyewitness accounts, had said they were looking for up to three suspects in the shooting attack at the Munich Olympia Shopping Centre (OEZ) that sent shoppers running for their lives and shut traffic across the city. But early Saturday, a Munich police spokesman said it was now believed likely that only one man was responsible for the shooting. "We can give a cautious 'allclear signal.' It looks like the body found near the OEZ was the gunman," a police spokesman told reporters. Authorities had told the public to get off the streets as the city - Germany's third biggest - went into lockdown with transport halted and highways sealed off. A police spokesman initially said up to three gunmen were on the run after the shooting. The Bavarian capital was placed under a state of emergency as police hunted for them and special forces were deployed in the city. "We are telling the people of Munich there are shooters on the run who are dangerous," he said. "We are urging people to stay indoors."

57. Opinion: Germany faces terror

Deutsche Welle, Christoph Strack, 2016 07 23

Opinion: Terror and panic in Munich: The bloodbath at the Olympia shopping center in the Bavarian capital has shaken Germany to the core. The country is in shock and now faces a major challenge, says Christoph Strack. It has been a terrible, sorrowful night. Shots were fired, many were injured, at least 10 people have been killed. There's been talk of terrorism, though nothing has been confirmed. But for those who witnessed the attack, it was undoubtedly terror. And this in Munich, the proud capital of Bavaria, a state known for its good policing and vigilance - and for which it has also been criticized. Terror is fear. And fear has arrived in Germany, in its cities. The fear that struck Norway five years ago today, when Anders Behring Breivik launched a massacre in Oslo and on the island of Utøya. And the fear that just a week ago hit the streets of Nice, when the lives of 84 people were cruelly cut short as they celebrated France's national holiday, Bastille Day. A few days later, a young Afghan refugee injured several Chinese tourists in an ax and knife attack on a regional train near Würzburg, also in Bavaria. For the first time Germany came face to face with hatred, from a 17-year-old refugee who attacked the people and the country that had reached out to help him.

58. German chancellor to hold security council in wake of Munich attack

EFE News Service, 2016 07 23

Berlin - The German chancellor is to hold a meeting Saturday with German MPs and security officials in light of Friday's shooting attack at a Munich shopping mall that left at least 10 dead, including the suspect. The meeting is to take place at 12:30 (10:00 GMT) at the Federal Chancellery in Berlin, government spokesperson Steffen Seibert said. Chancellor Angela Merkel is to speak at 14:30 (12:30 GMT) following the talks. Participating ministers include Vice-Chancellor Sigmar Gabriel, Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Interior Minister Thomas de Maiziere, Defense Minister Ursula von der Leyen, Chief of Staff Peter Altmeier, Justice Minister Heiko Mass and Transport Minister Alexander Dobrindt.

59. Erdogan issues decree to shutter 2,340 institutions in Turkey

Deutsche Presse-Agentur, Shabtai Gold, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has issued a decree to close 2,341 institutions - including schools, charities, unions and medical centres - in the wake of last week's failed coup, the state-run Anadolu news agency reported Saturday. The decree - the first to be made under the powers of the state of emergency, according to local media - also extends the legal time a person can be detained to 30 days. The decree has been entered into the Official Gazette of the government. A government official insisted the institutions targeted all have connections to the movement of US-based preacher Fethullah Gulen, who Erdogan blames for the failed putsch. The measure will now move to parliament, which is dominated by Erdogan's conservative Justice and Development Party (AKP). The legislature has oversight powers on such decrees, adopted as part of the state of emergency which entered into force Thursday.

60. Munich gunman raised locally, had no ties to Islamic state –police

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Berlin - A German-Iranian teenager who shot and killed nine people and then himself in Munich on Friday had received psychiatric care and was in all probability a lone gunman who had no ties to Islamic State, police said. The 18-year-old triggered a lockdown in the Bavarian capital after opening fire near a busy shopping mall. He was carrying a further 300 bullets in his backpack when he was later found dead of a gunshot wound, state prosecutor Robert Heimberger said on Saturday. Following a police search of the attacker's room, Munich police chief Hubertus Andrae all but ruled out an Islamist link in the killings. "Based on the searches, there are no indications whatsoever that there is a connection to Islamic State" or to the issue of refugees, he told a news conference.

61. Lone Gunman's 'Rampage' Puts Munich on Lockdown

The Wall Street Journal, Multiple Reporters, 2016 07 23

Berlin - A lone gunman killed nine people in and around a Munich shopping mall in a shooting spree police described as possible terrorism, putting the southern German city in lockdown during a nearly seven-hour manhunt until police said the attacker had killed himself. Heavily armed police from across the country combed Munich Friday night, searching for what witnesses had said were multiple shooters and responding to emergency calls that turned out to be false alarms. After 1 a.m., police said the gunman, whom they described as an 18-year old dual German-Iranian citizen who had lived in Munich for at least two years, was dead and appeared to have acted alone. The shooter's motives weren't immediately clear, and officials said they were considering all possibilities, including Islamist and right-wing terrorism. The man hadn't been known to police, they said. Police said 21 people were brought to hospitals after the attack, three of them with serious injuries. Late into the night, police officers and other officials were consoling friends and relatives of the attack's victims at a KFC restaurant near the shopping mall. At least a dozen people huddled inside, while more stood on the parking lot, their sobs audible from the street. "There were children and teenagers that are dead," said the restaurant's manager, who was pacing outside. "Why do people do such things? The assault, described by police as a "rampage," began shortly before 6 p.m. at a McDonald's across the street from the shopping mall. The assailant opened fire with a pistol, then continued to fire inside the mall, where the nine people were killed.

62. Fusillade à Munich : "Un acte d'un déséquilibré plutôt qu'un acte motivé politiquement" pour Claude Moniquet

RTL, Philippe Robuchon, 2016 07 23

Paris - Un jeune homme de 18 ans d'origine iranienne a abattu neuf personnes dans un centre commercial de Munich le 22 juillet avant de retourner l'arme contre lui. Acte d'un déséquilibré ou attentat islamiste ? Pour l'heure, la police allemande reste très prudente quant aux motivations de l'auteur de la fusillade. Invité de RTL, Claude Moniquet, spécialiste des questions de terrorisme, juge "étonnant" le scénario selon lequel Daesh serait derrière cette attaque. "On est en face d'un jeune iranien, c'est-à-dire (qu'il y a) 95% de chances (qu'il soit) chiite. Or, les chiites et Daesh se livrent une guerre sans merci. Un chiite agissant pour Daesh, c'est impossible." L'ancien agent de la DGSE écarte aussi l'hypothèse d'un attentat d'extrême droite. "On voit assez mal un immigré d'origine iranienne pratiquer des attentats xénophobes et néonazis." Selon les premiers éléments de l'enquête, l'auteur de la fusillade se serait suicidé : un mode opératoire qui ne correspond pas aux habitudes de Daesh. "Le terroriste se fait tuer par son ennemi. L'islam prohibe le suicide comme les autres religions monothéistes. C'est quelque chose qui penche plutôt vers l'acte d'un déséquilibré qu'un acte motivé politiquement", explique Claude Moniquet.

63. Terror Content Taken Offline

The Wall Street Journal, Valentina Pop, 2016 07 23

Brussels - The amount of terror-related material taken offline in Europe after requests from law-enforcement agencies has increased sharply since the Paris attacks in November, according to a new official report. The European Union's Internet Referral Unit, a task force within the bloc's law-enforcement agency Europol, has identified over 70 platforms used by terror groups to spread propaganda, Europol said Friday. Platforms refer to social-media websites such as Facebook or Twitter and to instant messaging apps such as WhatsApp or Telegram. Over 90% of the content the unit flagged to internet service providers was swiftly removed, it said. Europol doesn't have the authority to block content on its own and has to rely on online service providers. The unit was set up in July and has since assessed over 11,000 cases of presumed extremist content online and referred nearly 10,000 to be taken down. Of that total, 8,949 were removed, Europol said.

64. Turkey shakes up security forces in post-coup crackdown

Agence France Presse, Stuart Williams & Raziye Akkoc, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - Turkey on Friday detained almost 300 members of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan's guard and began shaking up the security forces one week after a failed coup, as US President Barack Obama denied having any prior intelligence of the putsch. Supporters celebrated the coup's failure to unseat Erdogan, but the Turkish strongman faced growing global criticism over the mass detentions and sackings of tens of thousands of people. In the latest swoop, Turkey detained 283 members of the presidential guard, an official said, There are at least 2,500 members of the guard, according to local media. Meanwhile, the Turkish government has cancelled 10,856 passports mainly of state officials "due to flight risk with the holders either in custody or on the run," the official said. In the most significant institutional changes since the coup, powerful Interior Minister Efkan Ala said the gendarmerie would in future be part of the interior ministry and not the army.

65. Turkey in shake-up of security forces after failed coup

Al Jazeera English, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - Interior ministry announces take-over of key security force from army in wake of failed coup.

Turkish authorities have announced a shake-up of the security forces a week after a section of the army attempted to overthrow the government in a failed coup. In the most significant institutional changes since the coup attempt, Interior Minister Efkan Ala said on Friday that the gendarmerie would in future fall under the interior ministry and not the army. The gendarmerie, which is responsible for public order in rural areas that fall outside the jurisdiction of police forces, as well as assuring internal security and general border control, had always been part of the military and its removal is a blow to the armed forces' clout. "The gendarmerie will definitely be dependent entirely on the interior ministry," Ala said, in an interview with the Turkish news broadcaster, NTV. Claiming that the coup threat "is not yet over", Ala also disclosed that authorities had cancelled a total of 10,856 passports "due to flight risk".

66. Turkey spy chief survives despite Erdogan criticism... for now

Agence France Presse, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - Turkey's powerful spy chief Hakan Fidan is to stay on in his job after presiding over an intelligence failure that allowed the botched coup, but his position is under review, President Recep Tayyip Erdogan said in an interview broadcast Saturday. There has been intense speculation over the future of Fidan, head of the National Intelligence Organisation (MIT) and widely seen as one of the most powerful men in the country, after Erdogan publicly rebuked him for failing to see the putsch coming. Erdogan late on Friday held a two-hour meeting with Fidan at the presidential palace but there was no statement afterwards that Turkey's top spy was to go. "No, he did not offer his resignation. We did not discuss this," Erdogan said in an interview with France 24 television. Following reports that MIT had intelligence of the coup hours beforehand but did not warn Erdogan, the president admitted there had been an intelligence failure.

67. Turkey's Erdogan, using emergency decree, shuts private schools, charities, unions

Reuters News, 2016 07 23

Istanbul - President Tayyip Erdogan tightened his grip on Turkey on Saturday, ordering the closure of thousands of private schools, charities and other institutions in his first decree since imposing a state of emergency after the failed military coup. A restructuring of Turkey's once untouchable military also drew closer, with a planned meeting between Erdogan and the already purged top brass brought forward. In the decree, published by the Anadolu state news agency, Erdogan extended to a maximum of 30 days from four days the period in which some suspects can be detained. It said this was to facilitate a full investigation into the coup attempt. Erdogan, who narrowly escaped capture and possible death during the July 15 coup attempt, told Reuters in an interview on Thursday he would restructure the armed forces and bring in "fresh blood".

68. Failed Turkish Coup Accelerated a Purge Years in the Making

The New York Times, Multiple Reporters, 2016 07 23

Ankara - Night had fallen and the weekend had begun, but the head of Turkey's spy agency remained at work in the main security compound in Ankara, struggling to track reports of strange military activities across the country. Suddenly, a roar of gunfire erupted as a fleet of choppers blasted the gates of the compound. As guards fired in the air, a helicopter tried to land beside the agency while others dropped ropes to send down commandos, according to a security official who was inside at the time, and spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters. More than a sudden attack on the government, the attempted coup this month has emerged as a turning point in a yearslong struggle for control of the Turkish state. The battle lines were clear: allies of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan against a collection of adversaries, including members of the military and followers of Fethullah Gulen, a Muslim cleric who leads a secretive religious movement from his self-exile in Pennsylvania. Agents inside the intelligence service had long feared a fifth column was taking shape inside the Turkish state, and they spent years compiling dossiers on tens of thousands of citizens, scrutinizing their pasts for any hints of rebellion or links to Mr. Gulen. As dramatic and violent as the night was, the aftermath has been equally as stunning. Mr. Erdogan has imposed a sweeping purge, labeling tens of thousands of civil servants and others as potential enemies of the state.

1. Surrey couple freed as judge blasts 'farical' RCMP sting

Vancouver Sun, Ian Mulgrew, 2016 07 30

Vancouver - Former Surrey residents John Nuttall and Amanda Korody embraced in the B.C. Supreme Court lobby Friday, passionately kissing, free after 37 months of imprisonment, their terrorism convictions overturned. "We're just happy," Nuttall said to reporters before leaving in a cab. But within hours, after a "nice lunch on The Drive," four Vancouver police cruisers screeched to a halt and the couple was taken away in handcuffs. Late in the afternoon, they went before B.C. provincial court Judge Reg Harris and agreed to peace bond terms that included geographic restrictions banning them from the legislature grounds, Canadian Forces bases, synagogues and Jewish schools. They were then released again. Their lawyers told the court the couple will initially be living in Victoria. Under the peace bond, they are prohibited from using the Internet to call up fundamentalist Islamic websites and from possessing weapons or explosives, including knives except when preparing food. They must also report to a bail supervisor. Korody appeared in provincial court without her customary head scarf and her red hair was fashioned in neat corn rows. Federal prosecutor Raymond Leong refused to comment on the peace bond proceedings. "It was horrible, it was so scary - you should have seen the looks on their faces," said Nuttall's mother Maureen Smith, who was present during the takedown on Commercial Drive. The police sting was triggered by warnings from Canadian Security Intelligence Service. Nuttall's mother said both would require counselling and care to return to normal given the past three years of prosecution and pre-trial custody.

2. B.C. case proves terror still an issue

The Winnipeg Sun, 2016 07 30

Editorial: John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were found guilty on terror charges last June and the couple will soon be released from jail with nothing added to their record. Yes, you read that right. There's no typo there. While a jury found the two guilty, on Friday a British Columbia Supreme Court judge threw that verdict out. As The Canadian Press explains it: "Justice Catherine Bruce said police instigated and skillfully engineered the very terrorist acts committed by John Nuttall and Amanda Korody, who believed they were planting pressure-cooker bombs that would blow up at the legislature on Canada Day in 2013." It's a landmark ruling that found the accused entrapped by the RCMP. Previous attempts to argue entrapment in terror-related cases all failed. Bruce added that the accused were mere "foot soldiers" and "marginalized people" who couldn't have made any headway with their plans were it not for the undercover officers leading them. But extensive audio and video recordings show that Nuttall and Korody were intent on committing a terror attack on home soil. As both the RCMP and CSIS have reported in recent years, there are hundreds of people in Canada who have either returned from participating in terror abroad or have shown interest in going abroad. We need good police work that monitors and arrests them if need be. It's not enough to sit back and wait until after an attack happens.

3. B.C. terror convictions tossed

National Post, Brian Hutchinson, 2016 07 30

Vancouver - The attempt by undercover RCMP officers - encouraged and instructed from senior levels - to lure a pair of hapless Vancouver-area layabouts into a contrived plot to bomb the B.C. legislature buildings was a debacle. From start to finish. That's putting it mildly. B.C. Supreme Court Justice Catherine Bruce described it best. She pulled no punches while reading her long-awaited decision Friday in a downtown Vancouver courtroom. After listening to arguments made over the past 12 months, Bruce had to determine whether the Mounties had entrapped John Nuttall and his common-law wife, Amanda Korody. Both were unemployed and dope-sick, living hand-to-mouth in a basement apartment they could barely afford and which they rarely left. In her scathing hour-long delivery, a highlight-reel summary of her 210-page written judgment, Bruce denounced the RCMP's actions and the undercover sting operation they hatched. "This was a clear case of police-manufactured crime," the judge declared. The Mounties unfairly snared the pair, in what Bruce described as an "offensive" and "illegal" abuse of process. "I find that the RCMP knowingly facilitated a terrorist activity by providing money and other services to the defendants that helped and made easier the terrorist activities," she said. Court was told police were alerted to Nuttall and Korody in late 2012 by the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS). Nuttall had been heard around Surrey, a Vancouver suburb, muttering about making jihad. To any reasonable person, the ramblings of a basement-dwelling, nonetoo-swift punk rock guitarist and recovering heroin addict in his early 40s, someone prone to absurd conspiracy theories, might have seemed ridiculous.

4. Bangladeshi-Canadian named as Dhaka cafe attack mastermind

The Indian Express, Staff Writer, 2016 07 30

Dhaka - A Bangladeshi-Canadian was on Saturday identified as the mastermind of Bangladesh's worst terrorist attack at a cafe in Dhaka's high-security diplomatic zone that killed 22 people mostly foreigners, police said following new information from a raid on a terrorist hideout. An overnight security raid at Kalyanpur area in Dhaka four days ago provided police the clue to identify Tamim Chowdhury as the architect of the recent Islamist assaults, a police officer familiar with the investigations told PTI on anonymity "We found Tamim Chowdhury to be the mastermind of the two (back-to-back terrorist) attacks... a manhunt was launched to track him down as we think, he now lives in Bangladesh since his return (from Canada) three years ago," he said. The officer added that evidence gathered from the scene of the July 26 raid at Kalyanpur, in which nine militants were killed, led police to identify Chowdhury, believed to be in his mid 30s, as the mastermind of the July 1 attack on the Holey Artisan restaurant and the assault on an Eid congregation at northern Sholakia six days later. A Bangladeshi newspaper earlier reported that Chowdhury appeared as the leader and main financier of a reorganised Jamaatul Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB). Bangladesh earlier attributed the two attacks to the clandestine outfit. The report suggested that Chowdhury was working as the link between the reorganised JMB and the ISIS, which claimed the responsibility for the July 1 attack when the terrorists killed 22 people, among them 17 foreigners including an Indian and two police officers.

5. Ottawa may help alleged victims of peacekeepers

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 07 30

Ottawa - The federal government is considering support for victims of alleged sexual exploitation and abuse by peacekeepers after a damning UN report brought the number of Canadian offenders - whose names are being kept secret - to five, the Star has learned. The news of potential victim support comes just days after it was revealed two Quebec provincial police officers retired before they faced disciplinary hearings for alleged sexual exploitation or abuse while on a UN mission in Haiti. By leaving, the officers avoided being disciplined by the force. Documents prepared in February by the deputy minister of foreign affairs for Global Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion show Ottawa was aware of five separate cases of alleged sexual exploitation or abuse by Canadian peacekeepers in Haiti dating to 2013. In two incidents, Canadian peacekeepers have been accused of fathering children with Haitian women. Currently, Ottawa has no policy or legislation to address paternity claims for victims abused by Canadian peacekeepers sent to protect them. Global Affairs told the Star the Canadian government is examining the way it handles complaints of abuse against Canadian peacekeepers, particularly when paternity claims are made.

6. Mohamed Harkat's long fight to stay

Toronto Star, Debra Black, 2016 07 30

Analysis: Mohamed Harkat - an Algerian who says he was wrongly accused of being an Al Qaeda sleeper agent - hopes he can finally win his freedom and the right to stay in Canada. "What the government is doing is wrong, and it's not fair," Harkat said in an exclusive interview with the Star. "And they got the wrong guy." Harkat, who came to Canada in 1995 and claimed refugee status, has been fighting deportation since his arrest on a national security certificate in December 2002. He still dreams of one day becoming a Canadian citizen, even though his life in Canada has been very different from what he'd expected. "I thought one day I would have children, a house, a family. . . . Everything is destroyed. When I met Sophie, we had a plan to buy a house and have children." The 47-year-old Harkat says he's innocent and will face torture and persecution in his native Algeria if he is deported. Canada Border Services Agency did not comment on the specifics of the case, but confirmed that Harkat is under a removal order, following a Federal Court decision upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada. Esme Bailey, a senior media spokesperson for CBSA, added that the removal order "can only be enforced once due process under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act has taken place." A February 2016 CBSA document - marked top secret - states that, "should Mr. Harkat be allowed to remain in Canada, it can be presumed that, given the opportunity, he would work toward the ends espoused by the Bin Laden Network." It recommends his removal from Canada. His lawyer, Barbara Jackman, plans to argue, in a formal petition to the public safety minister, that Harkat will face torture and persecution if sent back. She also plans to argue he is not a threat to Canada and should be allowed to stay on humanitarian grounds. In early September, she will seek an exemption from deportation.

7. A renewed attempt to find some common ground with Russia

Toronto Star, David Olive, 2016 07 30

Comment: This might seem a curious time for Ottawa to make a 180-degree turn in trying to restore healthy relations with Russia. But there were Stéphane Dion, Canada's foreign affairs minister, and his Russian counterpart, Sergey Lavrov, meeting Monday on the neutral ground of a Pacific nations summit in Laos for a 30-minute cover-the-waterfront talk on issues of common interests. The under-reported incident is a breakthrough for both countries. Canada has been stridently critical of the Kremlin since Russia's occupation of the Crimea two years ago and has prohibited contact between high-level officials in the two countries. But the Trudeau government, which earned a mandate in October for its promise to strengthen ties with both Russia and China, has broken the silence. To be sure, Dion reiterated to Lavrov on Monday Canada's acute concern about Russia's threatening gestures in Ukraine and elsewhere in Eastern Europe, and the Kremlin's controversial role in the Syrian conflict. But the two chief diplomats found common ground on expanded trade, counterterrorism, space exploration, Arctic sovereignty, technology exchanges and other pressing issues. This is a break in the hostile front the West has maintained against Russia after its theft of the Crimea in 2014. Western sanctions have been in place ever since.

8. Preparing for President Trump

Toronto Star, Paul Wells, 2016 07 30

OpEd: That was a lovely convention the Democrats had in Philadelphia. With 100 days to go until the U.S. presidential election, it is now time for Canada's government to consider whether it can do anything to help stop Donald Trump's election. And if the disaster cannot be stopped, Canada must prepare for the worst. The Democratic convention was a methodical display of strategy as theatre. Its speakers were more prominent than those who spoke at the Republican convention a week earlier in Cleveland. They were more genuinely eager to see the party's nominee elected. And they covered the ideological waterfront, from Bernie Sanders to the nominally Republican former mayor of New York, Mike Bloomberg. Hillary Clinton's acceptance speech was upbeat, carefully broad in its appeal, and delivered about as well as she will ever deliver a speech. If conventions made the difference, Clinton would be a shoo-in. But campaigns have their own momentum. Most polls suggest Trump has been cutting into Clinton's lead. I'm on the record with predictions that Trump will never be president. I think it would be foolish to cling to that certainty any more. Clinton would be no godsend for Canada. She opposed the Keystone XL pipeline, which the Trudeau government still pretends to support, before Obama did. As a border-state senator for New York she was frosty to expressions of Canadian interest when it clashed with her perceptions of New Yorkers' interest. But, to borrow Bloomberg's adjective, she's sane. Trump's remarks on NATO, combined with the growing evidence that he is deeply beholden to Russia's Vladimir Putin, makes him an entirely different order of menace to Canada.

9. Canada Day bomb plot couple freed after judge rules police entrapped them

The Guardian, Ashifa Kassam, 2016 07 30

Toronto - A Canadian couple found guilty of planting homemade bombs outside a government building will walk free after a court in British Columbia ruled the pair was entrapped by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) into carrying out a "police-manufactured crime". John Nuttall, 41, and Amanda Korody, 33, were found guilty of terror charges last year after they planted inert pressure cooker bombs on the steps of British Columbia's provincial legislature in 2013, ahead of Canada Day celebrations that drew thousands of revellers to the area. The verdict was thrown out on Friday, after BC supreme court justice Catherine Bruce said the RCMP had manipulated the two converts to Islam into carrying out the plot. "This was a clear case of police-manufactured crime," Bruce wrote in her ruling. "The world has enough terrorists. We do not need the police to create more out of marginalized people." The judge pointed to the couple's mental capacity to back the assertion that the crime had been instigated by police. "The defendants also demonstrated that they were not very intelligent, gullible and quite naive and child-like," she said of Nuttall and Korody, who were dependent on social assistance to get by as they struggled to overcome emotional and addiction issues.

10. Judge says RCMP engineered terror plot

The Globe and Mail, George Omand, 2016 07 30

Ottawa - A British Columbia couple convicted of terrorism charges have had their verdicts tossed out in a scathing court decision that flays the RCMP for its "egregious" conduct in manipulating naive suspects into carrying out a police-manufactured crime. But John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were quickly rearrested and placed under a peace bond before finally being released. The Crown also immediately filed an appeal. B.C. Supreme Court Justice Catherine Bruce said the Mounties used trickery, deceit and veiled threats to engineer the terrorist acts for which Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody were arrested on Canada Day three years ago. The couple believed they were planting pressure-cooker bombs to kill and maim crowds gathered to celebrate at the B.C. legislature. "The world has enough terrorists. We do not need the police to create more," Justice Bruce said in a landmark ruling Friday as she characterized the RCMP's methods as "multifaceted and systematic manipulation." "There is clearly a need to curtail the actions of police ... to ensure that future undercover investigations do not follow the same path." Justice Bruce said Mounties involved in a months-long sting launched in early 2013 knowingly exploited Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody's vulnerabilities to induce them to commit an offence.

11. Terrorism sting a massive waste

The Times Colonist, 2016 07 30

Editorial: John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were two losers who needed help, but the RCMP gave them the wrong kind of help and wasted huge amounts of police resources and public money in the process.

The two were arrested on Canada Day 2013, and charged with multiple terrorism-related offences after planting what they believed were pressure-cooker bombs on the B.C. legislature grounds. A jury found them guilty in June 2015 of three terrorism-related charges, but B.C. Supreme Court Justice Catherine Bruce delayed registering the convictions at the request of defence lawyers, who argued the Mounties had entrapped their clients. On Friday, Bruce ruled that Nuttall and Korody were indeed entrapped, and said that without the help of the police, the two could not have carried out their bomb plot. Her decision will mean a stay of proceedings. It's not the same as an acquittal, but it means the two go free. The Crown has appealed. It would be wrong to minimize the threat of terrorism; the killings in Nice show what one angry, unbalanced person can do. It would be naïve to assume it couldn't happen here. And it's a credit to the RCMP that they learned of Nuttall's desire to become a terrorist and set out to learn how far he would go. It's how far the police went that is the problem. Evidence presented at the couple's trial plainly showed clear thinking and effective planning were not their strong point. Nuttall proposed a plan to hijack a Via Rail passenger train — the rail service ceased operations in 2011. Other plots included hijacking a nuclear submarine and storming CFB Esquimalt.

12. 'Important errors' turned terror case

Vancouver Sun, Ian Mulgrew, 2016 07 30

Vancouver - While driving his children to Florida on holiday from North Carolina's Duke University, Professor Omid Safipulled over Friday to celebrate the release of convicted Canada Day bombers John Nuttall and Amanda Korody. Safi's expert testimony underpins the reasoning and the understanding of Islam used in B.C. Supreme Court Justice Catherine Bruce's decision Friday to stay the guilty terrorism verdicts rendered last year against the pair. Safiwas an the expert witness in the copycat Boston bombing case that the judge said police manufactured and reviewed hundreds of pages of conversations recorded between undercover RCMP officers and the couple in the B.C. case. "In my opinion, the many undercover officers committed two important errors," he said in an interview. "First, they repeatedly and systematically dissuaded Mr. Nuttall from accessing and consulting credible Muslim authorities, even when he kept asking to do so." The judge agreed completely. Nuttall persistently emphasized to undercover officers that he was not knowledgeable about matters related to Islamic theology, the Qur'an and teachings related to jihad and was searching for authentic Islamic guidance. "Had Mr. Nuttall been allowed to do so, it would have been reasonable to assume that a credible Muslim scholar would have pointed out the restrictions on attacks on civilians as clearly stipulated in the Qur'an and the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad," Safisaid. "Second, the RCMP officers put themselves (rather than Muslim scholars) in the position of interpreting Islamic theology and did so in an erroneous way to suggest that had Mr. Nuttall killed someone, it would have been God's will for him to do that. I find their (and any state's agents) putting themselves in the situation of offering such erroneous and dangerous interpretations of any religion to be profoundly problematic."

13. B.C. Supreme Court ruling could force police to rethink methods, experts say

The Globe and Mail, Ian Bailey, 2016 07 30

Analysis: A B.C. judge's harsh rebuke of an undercover RCMP terrorism sting and her decision to let the hapless couple who plotted to blow up the B.C. Legislature walk free puts such U.S.-style investigative techniques clearly out of bounds in Canada and will force police to rethink their methods, lawyers and security watchers say. On Friday, B.C. Supreme Court Justice Catherine Bruce refused to register the convictions against John Nuttall and Amanda Korody, agreeing with defence lawyers who said the pair were manipulated into planting what they thought were pressure-cooker bombs that would go off during Canada Day celebrations in 2013. Although jurors found the pair guilty, Justice Bruce noted in a sharp criticism: "The world has enough terrorists. We do not need the police to create more out of marginalized people." Lawyers for the pair described them as low-income former drug addicts who were easily manipulated. Mr. Nuttall had a criminal record for drug-related offences, mischief and carrying a concealed weapon, and was sentenced in 1996 for kidnapping and robbery as well as aggravated assault. The pair's trial heard that the RCMP focused on the couple after the Canadian Security Intelligence Agency informed the Mounties in 2013 that Mr. Nuttall had tried to buy potassium nitrate, which can be used to make explosives. As a result, the Mounties launched a Mr. Big sting. An undercover Mountie posing as an Arab businessman approached Mr. Nuttall, beginning a scheme over five months in 2013 that included a four-day trip to Kelowna to finalize a terrorist plot. Eventually, the couple were arrested after planting three explosives made from pressure cookers that police had rendered inert on the grounds of the B.C. legislature. Although convicted by a jury in 2015, Justice Bruce held off registering the convictions pending the legal arguments by the defence that the pair were entrapped by the RCMP.

14. Canada Judge Rules That Police Entrapped Couple in Bomb Plot

The New York Times, Ian Austen, 2016 07 30

Ottawa - A Canadian couple who planted what they believed were pressure-cooker bombs outside British Columbia's legislature in 2013 were freed on Friday after a judge ruled that they had been entrapped by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The couple, John Stuart Nuttall and Amanda Marie Korody, are recovering drug addicts who once lived on the street. They had been convicted of terrorism-related charges and were possibly facing life in prison because of their actions on Canada Day on July 1, 2013. But in a scathing decision, Justice Catherine Bruce of the Supreme Court of British Columbia found that the Mounties had instigated the terrorist plot and manipulated the common-law couple. "The defendants were the foot soldiers, but the undercover officer was the leader of the group," Justice Bruce wrote in a decision that also dismissed the credibility of testimony by several police officers. "Without the police it would have been impossible for the defendants to carry out the pressure-cooker plan," she added.

15. Travel Smart: Cyberthieves to take advantage of Rio Olympics

The Toronto Star, Henry Stancu, 2016 07 30

Analysis: Personal safety should be a key concern for anyone at the Olympics in Rio de Janeiro in August, and so should cybersecurity. The Games will attract not only athletes and spectators, but hackers eager to sniff Wi-Fi traffic, snatch data and infect devices with malware. So, taking steps to safeguard your digital information is as crucial these days as protecting your money and belongings. Losing cash, credit cards, a passport or visa to a pickpocket or purse snatcher can ruin a vacation, but identity theft can be even worse, and it can all begin anywhere you use an insecure Wi-Fi hot spot. On its "Cyber security while travelling website" (travel.gc.ca), the Government of Canada warns us to "use free computing resources with the assumption that any information you enter could be seen by an unauthorized third party." The Rio Olympics will no doubt be third-party central in terms of hackers. Just as it's smart to travel with as few valuables as possible to cut the risk of losing them or having them stolen, the same goes for the amount and sensitivity of data you take with you. Communication Security Establishment Canada (CSEC), the organization that looks after the protection of electronic information at the national level, has the following tips for travellers: Password protect your device and change the password before setting out on a trip. It's also a good idea to periodically change your password when you get back.

16. Erdogan's purge goes too far

National Post, 2016 07 30

Editorial: The latest events in Turkey, where President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has expressed his determination to bring both the country's army and intelligence force under the president's (read his own) control, are the latest to belie claims that Turkey is on the road to becoming an authentic democracy. Certainly, the dishonourable discharge of about 40 per cent of the country's admirals and generals in the wake of this month's failed coup gives some sense of where things are headed; but purging the military after an attempted putsch is perhaps an inevitable response, even if in this case the action seems to have been executed with a scope and determination that go beyond a simple expulsion of plotters. So, for that matter, does Turkey's investigation or suspension of tens of thousands of followers of the U.S.-based Islamic cleric, Fethullah Gulen - the elderly Sunni preacher whom Turkey accuses of planning and directing the failed coup - offer a helpful glimpse into how the country intends to deal with perceptions of dissent from here on out. Soldiers, police, teachers, journalists and government officials have all been swept up in the purge, in a manner so swift it gives the clear impression the government had prepared a list of critics well before the failed coup was launched.

17. The jihadis' symbolism

National Post, Rex Murphy, 2016 07 30

Comment: What was last week's Islamist horror? Was it when a gunman lured people to a McDonald's in Munich, Germany, and opened fire on children? Was that before or after the self-proclaimed jihadist ran a truck through a crowd of revellers in Nice, France? There are so many of these nowadays, it's getting difficult to keep the timeline straight. There was that axe attack on a train. Was that between Nice and Munich? I'm pretty sure all these were after the horrific butchery that left 49 people dead and scores wounded at a gay nightclub in Florida, but the attacks come with such speed, it's difficult to keep track. We need a terror spreadsheet. Oh ya, there was also that "small" attack on an old French priest at the church near Rouen, Normandy, France. Considering the sadistic extravagances of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant on the battlefield, and considering the long-running persecution of Christians in the Middle East, how could so "limited" an atrocity as slitting the throat of an 84-yearold Catholic priest, while he was celebrating Mass in his church, be expected to claim the eyes and ears of a terrortormented world? For one, the butchers made him kneel in front of his own altar to receive the knife across his throat.

18. L'étrange mort de la laïcité turque

La Presse, Shlomo Avineri, 2016 07 30

Opinion: Les suites du coup d'État militaire manqué en Turquie soulèvent une question essentielle : le président Recep Tayyip Erdogan continuera-t-il sur le chemin autoritaire qu'il emprunte, souvent d'un pas décidé, ou bien renouera-t-il le dialogue avec ses opposants pour réduire les profondes fractures dont souffre la société turque ? Les initiatives d'Erdogan depuis l'échec du putsch – les nouvelles d'arrestations en masse et de milliers de purges touchant militaires, juges, policiers et enseignants ont presque immédiatement suivi – semblent confirmer le plus pessimiste des deux scénarios. Ce serait pourtant une erreur de voir ce qui se passe aujourd'hui en Turquie au prisme du seul Erdogan, de sa personnalité et de ses penchants autoritaires. Avec son Parti de la justice et du développement (AKP), il incarne un glissement tectonique de la politique turque, qui n'est pas sans rappeler ce qu'ont connu d'autres pays à majorité musulmane du Moyen-Orient. En s'efforçant de réorienter l'histoire turque hors des voies de la laïcité radicale définie par Kemal Atatürk, le fondateur de la Turquie moderne, l'AKP a d'abord semblé vouloir sortir du moule autoritaire kémaliste. Parce qu'ils soutenaient la nature laïque du kémalisme, les observateurs occidentaux perdirent de vue, pour beaucoup d'entre eux, que le régime était plus proche du fascisme européen des années 30 – à savoir un État nationaliste à parti unique, galvanisé par le culte rendu à la personne d'Atatürk lui-même – que des démocraties libérales. Ce n'est qu'à partir des années 50 que le système s'est lentement assoupli.

19. Turkey's military losing its grip on power

Toronto Star, Olivia Ward, 2016 07 30

Analysis: When a breakaway group of military officers attacked Turkey's main cities with tanks and war planes, it took both the government and the public by surprise. "It was horrifying," says Erdeniz Sen, Turkey's consul general in Toronto. "We didn't know what was happening. They were attacking the police, the satellite stations, the parliament. They tried to assassinate the prime minister and the president. People were simply shocked." But the short-lived coup was put down, when millions answered a call by President Recep Tayyip Erdogan to go to the streets, and since then his power appears only to have increased. Massive purges have jailed or dismissed thousands of his suspected foes. However, the military, which has considered itself a pillar of stability in Turkey for decades, is in tumult, with about 40 per cent of its top general staff jailed or fired, more than 1,500 officers removed and thousands of soldiers charged with supporting the coup. Under a state of emergency, Erdogan has moved swiftly against suspected supporters of the secretive exiled Turkish cleric Fetullah Gulen, a one-time political ally, and the man he blames for the coup and condemns as a terrorist.

20. Russian Spies Said to Hack Clinton's Bid

The New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, 2016 07 30

Washington - Computer systems used by Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign were hacked in an attack that appears to have come from Russia's intelligence services, a federal law enforcement official said on Friday. The apparent breach, coming after the disclosure last month that the Democratic National Committee's computer system had been compromised, escalates an international episode in which Clinton campaign officials have suggested that Russia might be trying to sway the outcome of the election. Mrs. Clinton's campaign said in a statement that intruders had gained access to an analytics program used by the campaign and maintained by the national committee, but it said that it did not believe that the campaign's own internal computer systems had been compromised. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the fund-raising arm for House Democrats, also said on Friday that its systems had been hacked. Together, the databases of the national committee and the House organization contain some of the party's most sensitive communications and voter and financial data. Meredith Kelly, a spokeswoman for the congressional committee, said that after it discovered the breach, "we immediately took action and engaged with CrowdStrike, a leading forensic investigator, to assist us in addressing this incident."

21. D.N.C. Hack Raises a Frightening Question: What's Next?

The New York Times, Amanda Taub, 2016 07 30

Analysis: If Russia was indeed behind last week's leak of stolen data from the Democratic National Committee, we may be seeing one of the most sordid tools of its domestic politics deployed as a hostile weapon in foreign policy. There is a Russian word for this practice: "kompromat." A portmanteau of the Russian words for "compromising" and "material," it refers to the timeworn tradition of obtaining information and using it to smear or influence public officials. Unscrupulous Russian politicians have been doing it for decades; there are kompromat websites (which, unsurprisingly, are often blocked or harassed). The way it works is simple. First, Kremlin insiders or other powerful individuals buy, steal or manufacture incriminating information about an opponent, an enemy, or any other person who poses a threat to powerful interests. Then, they publish it, destroying the target's reputation in order to settle public scores or manipulate public events. If American law enforcement officials and analysts are correct in their assessment that Russia was behind this spring's hack of the Democratic National Committee's computer servers, it seems that kompromat is being translated to the international stage. The United States has had plenty of experience with hackers, government and otherwise, but the D.N.C. hack is something new. Rather than using the information seized for intelligence purposes, the hackers selected damaging excerpts from the cache of stolen data, and then leaked them at a pivotal moment in the presidential election.

22. The Real Plot Against America

The New York Times, Timothy Egan, 2016 07 30

Opinion: In retrospect, it worked out much better than planned. Who'd have thought a pariah nation, run by an authoritarian who makes his political opponents disappear, could so easily hijack a great democracy? It didn't take much. A talented nerd can bring down a minnow of a nation. But this level of political crime requires more refined mechanics -- you need everyone to play their assigned roles. You start with a stooge, a fugitive holed up in London, releasing stolen emails on the eve of the Democratic National Convention, in the name of "transparency." Cyberburglars rely on a partner in crime to pick up stolen goods. And WikiLeaks has always been there for Russia, a nation with no transparency. The emails show office gossip -- catty, sometimes crude back-and-forth by party operatives, and a bias for one candidate. Ho-hum. To make the plot work, reporters have to take the bait. On cue, they decry the fact that politics is going on inside a major political party. The horror -- Democratic hacks saying nasty things about Senator Bernie Sanders. Next, leftist extremists have to act like leftist extremists -- that is, myopic to the greater good, guided by a Trumpian sense that they alone know how to solve the world's problems, and everyone else is a sellout. Angered at the contents of the cyberheft, they boo any mention of their party's nominee. And told by Senator Sanders, the man who brought them there, that booing is too easy, they boo his call to unite to save their country from a monster. But Russia still has to seal the deal. Some work remains. If enough angered lefties won't go for the Democratic nominee, a longtime foe of Vladimir Putin, it will be just enough to put a Putin puppet in the White House. And it would also usher in the term that drove the right wing crazy when George H.W. Bush used it -- a New World Order. Plus, Putin despises Hillary Clinton. Like Trump, his skin is rice-paper-thin, albeit a paler shade of orange; and, like Trump, he never forgets a slight. He still hasn't gotten over Clinton's comment on George W. Bush's infamous look into Putin's soul. As a former K.G.B agent, said Clinton, "he doesn't have a soul."

23. After Yemeni's 13 Years in Guantánamo, Freedom for the Soul Takes Longer

The New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 07 30

Tallinn, Estonia — When guards brought Ahmed Abdul Qader to the plane that would take him away from the Guantánamo Bay prison a year and a half ago, he asked permission to pause before boarding. Closing his eyes, he tried to leave behind the burden of his 13 years of captivity. Mr. Qader was about 17 — an overweight Yemeni teenager suspected of being a terrorist — when the United States military brought him to Guantánamo. When he left, he was past 30, his hair thinning, and about to start a new life in Estonia, a tiny Baltic country he had never heard of before it had decided to resettle a detainee a few months earlier. A day later, he was in his new home, a modestly furnished studio apartment in Tallinn provided by the Estonian government. But the past, he soon realized, was not so easy to escape. Snow was falling, and he was eager to touch it. He started for the door, then suddenly panicked, fearful that something — he was not sure what — could go wrong if he went outside. “Any trouble I get myself in now — even an honest mistake — will be a hundred times worse than if any normal person did it,” Mr. Qader said recently, trying to explain how that sense of paralysis has stayed with him. “I thought that after two months’ release, I’d be back to normal,” he said. “But I cannot live my life regularly. I try, but it is like part of me is still at Guantánamo.”

24. U.S. and Israel appear close to sealing biggest military aid deal

The Washington Post, Carol Morello & Ruth Eglash, 2016 07 30

Washington - A senior Israeli official will arrive in Washington next week for a final round of negotiations involving the largest military aid package the United States has ever given any country and that will last more than a decade after President Obama leaves office. Brig. Gen. Yaakov Nagel, the acting head of Israel's National Security Council, has been dispatched with instructions to meet with White House officials in hopes of signing an agreement "as soon as possible," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office said this week. That represents a striking about-face for Netanyahu, who angered the Obama administration when he mused during a February meeting with his cabinet that Israel might decide to wait and "reach an agreement with the next administration." Nagel's visit signals that Netanyahu may have concluded that he won't necessarily get a better deal than the one he can forge with Obama, with whom he has had a visibly testy personal relationship. Both countries are now eager to strike a deal before Obama's term ends.

25. Snowden, WikiLeaks clash over DNC emails

The Washington Post, Andrea Peterson, 2016 07 30

Washington - Two of the biggest names in government data leaks clashed over how to responsibly release information on Twitter late Thursday. It started when Edward Snowden tweeted that WikiLeaks's "hostility to even modest curation" was a mistake. WikiLeaks wasn't happy about the criticism - and hit Snowden back by accusing him of pandering to Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton. The spat spotlights a major split between how WikiLeaks and Snowden have handled the data they helped make public. Snowden worked with The Washington Post and other news outlets to expose National Security Agency surveillance programs. The journalists vetted the documents, many of which have not been made public, and chose to withhold some information that government officials said would compromise national security. WikiLeaks's approach to data disclosure is more radical: It often posts massive, searchable caches online with few, if any, apparent efforts to remove sensitive personal information.

26. Clinton, Trump struggle for national security upper hand

Associated Press Newswires, Robert Burns, 2016 08 30

Washington - In their struggle for the upper hand on national security, Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump are emphasizing strikingly different themes - he as the bold and cunningly unpredictable strongman who will eliminate terrorism; she as the calm, conventional commander in chief who will manage all manner of crises. Terrorism is Trump's national security touchstone, and the Islamic State group is his target. He promises to wipe it out, and quickly. Clinton accuses him of fearmongering and of denigrating the U.S. military as gutted and worn out. She presents herself as the anti-Trump. "America's strength doesn't come from lashing out," she said in accepting the Democratic nomination Thursday. "Strength relies on smarts, judgment, cool resolve, and the precise and strategic application of power." By implication, Trump is cast as bombastic, scattershot, impulsive and fanciful. National security has emerged as a key focus of the campaign — not so much the candidates' plans as their temperaments. Trump says he is best suited because he would be a dealmaker and deliberately unpredictable, thus making it more difficult for adversaries to counter his military or diplomatic moves. Clinton pitches her steadiness and depth of experience from eight years in the Senate and four years as President Barack Obama's secretary of state.

27. New documentary pierces the psychology of modern suicide bombers

The Intercept, Murtaza Hussain, 2016 07 30

Analysis: In a scene from Norwegian journalist Paul Refsdal's new documentary Dugma: The Button, Abu Qaswara, a would-be suicide bomber, describes the sense of exhilaration he felt during an aborted suicide attack against a Syrian army checkpoint. "These were the happiest [moments] I've had in 32 years. If anyone had felt exactly what I felt at that moment, Muslims would want to go through the same feeling and non-Muslims would convert just to experience it," he enthuses to the camera, visibly elated by his attempted self-immolation. Abu Qaswara's attack failed after his vehicle was blocked by obstacles on the road placed by the Syrian military. But speaking shortly after he returned from his mission, it was clear that his brush with death had filled him with euphoria. "It was a feeling more than you can imagine," he says. "Something I cannot describe, it cannot be described." Dugma follows the lives of several volunteers fighting with Jabhat al-Nusra, al Qaeda's former affiliate organization in Syria. Refsdal, who previously produced a film while embedded with the Afghan Taliban, spent six weeks living with al-Nusra fighters in Syria. The men profiled are not Syrians, but volunteers from abroad. Abu Qaswara is a Saudi citizen who traveled to fight in Syria, while another character in the film, Abu Basir al-Britani, is a British-born convert to Islam. Raised in London, Abu Basir came to public attention last year when British reporters discovered that he had formerly been an amateur rock musician named Lucas Kinney in a band called Hannah's Got Herpes. The film profiles Abu Qaswara and Abu Basir as they prepare for their respective missions. The men have been approved by al-Nusra leadership to be placed on "the list," a roster of individuals cleared to conduct suicide attacks. As one al-Nusra religious leader counsels Abu Qaswara, "[This] is about a human life, the most precious thing you have." Adding, "A person would not sacrifice himself for tons of money, but as you can see, the young men compete over martyrdom operations."

28. What's the Future of Chinese Hacking?

Motherboard, Adam Segal, 2016 07 30

Analysis: Adam Segal, the Ira A Lipman Chair for Emerging Technologies and National Security and director of the Digital and Cyberspace Policy Program at the Council on Foreign Relations, is the author of The Hacked World Order: How Nations Fight, Trade, Maneuver, and Manipulate in the Digital Age. After years of public reporting on the theft of intellectual property, business strategies, and trade secrets, last month the cybersecurity firm FireEye issued a report headlining a steep decline in Chinese cyber espionage against organizations in the US and 25 other countries. The number of network compromises by 72 suspected China-based groups dropped from 60 in February 2013 to less than 10 by May 2016. While FireEye did not rule out the possibility that improvements in tradecraft were leading to less detection (FBI Director James Comey once compared Chinese hackers to drunk burglars who kick in the door and knock over a vase on their way out with the TV), US Assistant Attorney General John Carlin confirmed the company's findings that attacks were less voluminous but more focused and calculated. A combination of the threat of US sanctions, a diplomatic accord signed by President Barack Obama and President Xi Jinping, and internal reforms of the People's Liberation Army may have temporarily produced a dramatic decline in cyber espionage, but is it time to shut down the firewall, send the threat intelligence analysts home, and declare victory? Very unlikely. China hacks because it wants to move its economy from labor intensive manufacturing to high technology innovation.

29. US Nato General's Plot Over Ukraine

Daily Mail, Larisa Brown, 2016 07 30

London – Hacked private emails have revealed how a US Nato chief attempted to persuade Barack Obama to get tough with Russia over its aggression in Ukraine. They reveal a campaign by General Philip Breedlove to convince the White House to escalate efforts to halt Moscow aggression. But he feared the president viewed Nato and Europe as a 'threat' because their gung ho attitude could drag the US into a war with Russia. The messages also reveal a group of secret agitators close to General Breedlove campaigned to secure weapons for government troops in Ukraine fighting Kremlin-backed separatists. But the efforts intensified the conflict between the West and Russia. His leaked emails were written in September 2014 after the EU and the US imposed sanctions on Vladimir Putin and he withdrew some troops from eastern Ukraine.

30. May delayed Hinkley deal over China security fears

The Daily Telegraph, Steven Swinford & Emily Gosden, 2016 07 30

London – Theresa May has delayed approving Britain's first new nuclear power station for a generation amid security concerns about China's involvement, it emerged last night. The Prime Minister told François Hollande, the French president, last week that she needed more time to make a final decision and reportedly questioned the role of Chinese firms involved in the Hinkley Point C deal. Nick Timothy, Theresa May's joint chief of staff, previously warned that the Chinese could use their role in the programme to "build weaknesses into computer systems which will allow them to shut down Britain's energy production at will". Mr Timothy, in a blog post last year, said that MI5, which has been involved in discussions about Hinkley Point, had concerns over China, saying that the country's intelligence services "continue to work against UK interests at home and abroad". Under the terms of the deal, state-owned Chinese companies will take a 33.5 per cent stake in Hinkley Point and have the opportunity to design and build a nuclear reactor in Essex. The new Prime Minister's approach contrasts with that of her predecessor, David Cameron, and George Osborne, his chancellor, who supported the Hinkley Point deal and hailed the start of a "golden decade" in which Britain would be China's "best partner in the West".

31. Putin wages propaganda war on UK

The Times of London, Dominic Kennedy, 2016 07 30

London - President Putin has launched a secret propaganda assault on Britain from within its own borders, The Times can reveal. The Kremlin is spreading disinformation through a newly opened British bureau for its Sputnik international news service, and is infiltrating elite universities by placing language and cultural centres on campuses. Analysts said that the push was part of Russia's military doctrine, which specifies the use of "informational and other non-military measures" in conflicts. Moscow's intelligence agencies were accused by US cybersecurity experts this week of hacking the computer servers of the Democratic National Committee, which has nominated Hillary Clinton as its candidate in November's presidential election. The release of 20,000 stolen emails, many of them embarrassing to the party's leaders, was blamed on the Kremlin after retrieved data suggested the documents had passed through its computers. It has led to suspicion that Russia is trying to subvert the US political system and gather support for the Republican nominee, Donald Trump. The Russians' main British target is Edinburgh, which has been chosen as the UK headquarters of Sputnik. Since opening in the city, the news agency has published reports suggesting that the Labour MP Jo Cox may have been killed because of a plot by supporters of the European Union to sway the referendum result, a conspiracy theory that has run on Russian television. It also peddles the myth that the West agreed never to expand Nato to Russia's borders, a key plank of Moscow propaganda to excuse its 2013 invasion of Ukraine.

32. Student spent his loan trying to join terrorists

The Daily Telegraph, Lydia Willgress, 2016 07 30

London – A radicalised teenager who spent his student loan trying to join Isil has been jailed for three-and-a-half years. Cubeyda Jama, 19, was arrested at Stansted Airport as he attempted to make his way to Syria in February. Police discovered the Middlesex University student had a map of Turkey, digital copies of the extremist magazine Dabiq, Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant videos and equipment including torches, a camera and a laptop. The Finn, who had been living in the UK since 2010 with his father, admitted one charge of preparing acts of terrorism. Jama, who appeared at the Old Bailey, was sentenced to three-and-a-half years in a young offender institution and given an additional one-year licence period.
