Manila - Gunmen have kidnapped four Malaysians from a ship off the east coast of Sabah state in waters where Abu Sayyaf militants are known to operate, local media reported on Saturday. If the Philippine Islamist group is confirmed to be behind the kidnapping, it would be their second such hostage-taking in as many weeks and comes amid an uptick in such attacks. Major Felimon Tan of the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) Western Mindanao Command, said the military was verifying the reported kidnapping after Malaysian authorities informed them of the incident on Friday. "Whether or not they were seized by the Abu Sayyaf or brought to the Philippines, we have yet to confirm," Tan told AFP. "We confirm receiving reports of this incident (four Malaysians kidnapped) but information remains sketchy at the moment and efforts are being exerted to ascertain all details of the incident," Tan told Manila Bulletin through a text message. "We have also coordinated with our Malaysian counterparts but details of which we are not at liberty to divulge," he added.

22. India-Saudi Arabia join hands to fight terror as Modi wraps up visit

Hindustan Times, Staff reporter, 2016 04 04

New Delhi - India and Saudi Arabia on Sunday agreed to expand strategic cooperation in areas of counter-terrorism, defence, trade and investment as Prime Minister Narendra Modi concluded his visit to the kingdom. Modi, who called on Saudi King Salman bin Abdulaziz, was conferred Saudi Arabia's highest civilian honour, the King Abdulaziz Sash. The two leaders agreed to enhance cooperation in counter-terrorism operations, intelligence sharing and capacity-building to strengthen cooperation in law enforcement, anti-money laundering, drug-trafficking and other transnational crimes, said a joint statement issued after their meeting. Modi also invited Saudi companies to invest in the infrastructure sector in India. The two leaders condemned terrorism in all forms and manifestations, irrespective of who the perpetrators were and of their motivations. "They called on all states to reject the use of terror against other countries, dismantle terrorism infrastructures where they happen to exist and to cut off any kind of support and financing to the terrorists operating and perpetrating terrorism from their territories against other states; and bring perpetrators of acts of terrorism to justice," it said.

23. Kidnap of M'sian sailors signals rising piracy threat in South Philippine waters (Canada)

TODAY (Singapore), Staff reporter, 2016 04 04

Manila - The fate of four Malaysian sailors who were kidnapped off a tugboat remains unknown, with the authorities no closer to opening lines of communications with the kidnappers. Sabah police chief Abdul Rashid Harun said yesterday that the authorities have not been contacted by the kidnappers. "There are no developments," he said in a WhatsApp message. The seizure of the four sailors on Friday night by eight armed men near Ligitan, a small island off the eastern coast of Sabah, was the latest in a series of kidnappings in the lawless waters and coastlines of the southern Philippines in the past year. The four Malaysian men from Sarawak are Wong Teck Kang, 31, Wong Hung Sing, 34, Wong Teck Chii, 29, and Johnny Lau Jung Hien, 21. They were part of a nine-member crew on a tugboat travelling from Manila to Malaysia, but the kidnappers released the other five, comprising Indonesians and Myanmarese. The Malaysian government is reportedly contemplating suspending trade and movements of essential goods from the east coast of Sabah to the southern Philippines. More than 18 foreign citizens are being held in the southern Philippines by kidnap-for-ransom groups pledging allegiance to Islamic State (IS), said the Philippine military. The Muktadir group has the fastest speedboats in the area and often commits abductions and then hands over the victims to Abu Sayyaf, which handles ransom negotiations, said Mr Singer. Several members of the group have outstanding arrest warrants for kidnapping in the Philippines and Malaysia. In September, Abu Sayyaf abducted two Canadians, a Norwegian and a Filipino from a resort in the southern Philippines. The group has released videos demanding ransom payments in return for the hostages' release. In the past year, Abu Sayyaf has pledged allegiance to IS, but the Philippine military has said that the group does not receive direct support from the international terror organisation and operates more as a criminal gang than as ideologically driven rebels.

24. N.K. rebukes 'anachronistic' sanctions, urges U.S. to seek talks

Yonhap English News, Staff reporter, 2016 04 04

Seoul - North Korea on Monday called the latest U.N. sanctions "anachronistic and suicidal" and urged the United States to make efforts to ease tensions on the divided peninsula. A month ago the United Nations Security Council imposed the toughest sanctions in decades over the North's January nuclear test and long-range rocket launch in February. A spokesman at the North's powerful National Defense Commission (NDC) said that the international community's "anachronistic and suicidal" sanctions have made Pyongyang even strengthen its will to pursue self-reliance. Washington's moves for "a war of aggressions against the DPRK to stifle it militarily created the worst crisis in which it may make a retaliatory nuclear strike at the U.S. mainland any moment," the spokesman was quoted as saying by the Korean Central News Agency. The DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name. The North has ratcheted up its bellicose rhetoric against Seoul and Washington in recent weeks, threatening to make a "pre-emptive" strike against them. "The more the U.S. sticks to its show of power against us, the faster it would face a nuclear catastrophe and self-destruction," he said.

25. Terror caused more harm to Muslims: Kaaba Imam

Hindustan Times, Pawan Dixit, 2016 04 04

Lucknow - Imam-e-Kaaba, Sheikh Saleh Bin Mohammad Ale Talib asserted that terrorism had caused more harm to Muslims than any other community and the main reason behind terrorism was lack of education among Muslims. The Imam was in Lucknow on Sunday to preside over the International Conference on Islam and World Peace. Kaaba is the holiest shrine for Muslims across the world. Addressing a huge gathering at the Eidgah ground in Aishbagh, Talib said: "Some people are portraying a wrong image of Islam. Islam propagates peace and harmony and is against bloodshed." Talib said: "Terrorism has caused more harm to Muslims than to any other community. And terrorism has no connection with Islam." "Lack of education among Muslims was the main reason behind terrorism," he said. Talib also urged members of the Muslim community all across the world to educate their children. "Only with education, Muslims can fight against terrorism," he asserted. The Imam-e-Kaaba also expressed concern over veiled attacks on Saudi Arabia.

26. The world needs to combat terrorism with unified stance: PM Narendra Modi

Economic Times (India), Sreeram Sundar Chaulia, 2016 04 04

New Delhi - Prime minister Narendra Modi's threenation tour of Belgium, the US and Saudi Arabia from March 30 to April 3 has reinforced his track record of furthering international security and economic prosperity. He made significant statements in Brussels, Washington and Riyadh at a time when the international community is desperate for solutions to pressing problems. Although there are no big-bang announcements from this prime ministerial journey, the undercurrent is that India is at the centre of global policymaking. Modi made interventions in all three countries about the grave threat posed by transnational terrorism and the means to tackle it. The core message he has delivered is the need for unity among concerned nations instead of narrow, individualistic responses that play into the hands of violent extremists.

27. Xi's meeting with Obama 'eases tensions'

China Daily, An Baijie, 2016 04 04

Beijing - President Xi Jinping's meeting with US President Barack Obama has helped to alleviate tensions at a time when some countries have been playing up the South China Sea issue, Foreign Minister Wang Yi said. The meeting, which took place on Thursday on the sidelines of the Nuclear Security Summit in Washington, was closely watched by the international community because many countries are pessimistic about the current state of Sino-US ties, he said. "The Americans have said that they will not take sides (in the South China Sea issue), so it should not be a problem for the China-US relationship," Wang said. The relationship should not be affected by historical problems between China and some US allies, and the positive dialogue between the two leaders has reassured the international community, he added. During the 90-minute meeting, Xi and Obama discussed a range of issues, including economic policies, cooperation on nuclear security, maritime issues and the stability of the Korean Peninsula. The two leaders agreed to deepen cooperation and manage differences of opinion to expand common interests. It was the only bilateral meeting arranged by Obama's team during the summit.

28. Azerbaijan says three of its servicemen killed in Nagorno- Karabakh clashes

Reuters, 2016 04 04

BAKU/YEREVAN - Three Azeri servicemen were killed in fresh fighting with Armenian-backed separatists over the breakaway Nagorno- Karabakh region on Monday, Azerbaijan's Defence Ministry said. Dozens were killed on both sides at the weekend in the biggest flare-up of violence over the region in years, creating a risk that the conflict, frozen for two decades, could again erupt into full-out war. Accounts from both sides indicated the fighting was not at the same level of ferocity as at its peak on Saturday, but there was still large-caliber fire being exchanged. The separatist military said it had destroyed an Azeri army unit, while Azerbaijan said it had struck a separatist command point, causing several casualties. Reuters could not independently verify those assertions.

Jerusalem-- The Palestinian observer at the autopsy of Abdel Fattah al-Sharif, the Palestinian stabber shot in Hebron recently after he was already "neutralized," said the accused soldier's late shot was the fatal one. If the official results of Sunday's autopsy agree with the observer's opinion, the determination would significantly enhance the IDF prosecution's case against the soldier, likely for manslaughter, whose shooting of Sharif on March 24 was captured on video and went viral nationally and globally. Some reports indicated the indictment could be filed within two weeks.

31. Panama Papers: Massive Tax Haven Document Leak Exposes Corruption and Crime on Global Scale

Haaretz, Uri Blau and Daniel Dolev, 2016 04 03

Jerusalem--A massive leak of millions of documents has revealed that heads of state, criminals and celebrities conduct and sometimes conceal their business activities in tax havens. The leak exposes holdings in shadowy companies that are owned by 11 past and present heads of state, and reveals how partners of Russian President Vladimir Putin clandestinely transferred no less than $2 billion through banks and companies registered in tax shelters. The source of the leaked documents is a very powerful yet not very well-known law firm called Mossack Fonseca. This firm has branches in Hong Kong, Miami, Zurich and more than 35 other locations around the world, among them Israel. The documents reveal many Israeli connections and disclose that businesspeople with Israeli citizenship as well as Israeli banks and companies have used the law firm to register companies in tax havens around the world. The documents expose, among other things, firms controlled by the prime ministers of Iceland and Pakistan, the king of Saudi Arabia and the children of the president of Azerbaijan registered in tax havens. They refer to at least 33 companies and individuals that have been on a United States government blacklist for having connections with Mexican drug lords, terror organizations like Hezbollah and rogue states like North Korea and Iran. One of the companies exposed in the leaked documents provided fuel for the aircraft used by the Syrian government to bomb and kill thousands of its citizens.

Nusra--The spokesman for Al-Qaeda's Syrian affiliate, Al-Nusra Front, his son and 20 other jihadists were killed in air strikes Sunday in the northeast of the country, a monitor said. Abu Firas al-Suri was meeting with other leading Islamist fighters in a Nusra stronghold in Kafar Jales when the raids struck, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said. "Abu Firas al-Suri, his son and at least 20 jihadists of Al-Nusra and Jund al-Aqsa and jihadists from Uzbekistan were killed in strikes on positions in Idlib province," its chief Rami Abdel Rahman told AFP. It was not immediately clear if the raids were carried out by Syrian regime warplanes or their Russian allies. Two other targets belonging to Al-Nusra and allied jihadist group Jund al-Aqsa in the north of Idlib province were also attacked, Abdel Rahman said, leaving many seriously wounded.

34. Leaked Documents Detail Offshore Accounts

New York Times, Steven Lee Myers, 2016 04 04

Washington-- A group of news media outlets published articles on Sunday based on what they said were 11.5 million leaked documents from a Panama law firm that helped some of the world's wealthiest people -- including politicians, athletes and business moguls -- establish offshore bank accounts. The German newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung said its reporters had obtained the documents from a confidential source. The newspaper then shared the files with other media organizations, like The Guardian and the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists. In an article, the investigative journalism organization said the documents revealed the offshore accounts of 140 politicians and public officials, including a dozen current and former world leaders and several individuals with close ties to President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia. The organization said reporters at 100 news media outlets working in 25 languages had used the documents to investigate the law firm, Mossack Fonseca, and its clients, including political figures in countries like Iceland, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. It is not illegal in many cases to have offshore bank accounts. But they are used in some instances by wealthy individuals and criminals to hide money and business transactions, and to avoid paying taxes. The leak followed a series of high-profile breaches in recent years in which individuals working for governments or companies have amassed internal files and then given them to media organizations. In 2014, Edward J. Snowden, a contractor for the National Security Agency, gave reporters what intelligence officials have estimated was at least 1.5 million documents from the agency. Hundreds of articles have been published based on those documents.

36. Contre le terrorisme, l'Italie tire les leçons de la lutte antimafias

Le Figaro, 2016 04 04

Rome--Jusqu'ici, l'Italie n'a pas subi d'attentat djihadiste grave sur son territoire. Cependant, elle a été l'un des premiers pays européens confronté à des organisations subversives liées aux instances islamistes radicales. Des groupes qui ne commettaient pas de délits en Italie, se limitant souvent à fournir un soutien aux combattants actifs dans d'autres pays. Le phénomène s'est manifesté lors de la guerre en Bosnie et des arrivées de combattants musulmans vers le front balkanique. Il s'est renouvelé avec les cellules liées à al-Qaida impliquées dans l'organisation d'attentats et le recrutement de miliciens pour mener des attaques en Irak et en Afghanistan. Ces dernières années, l'influence de l'État islamique est devenue dominante dans le recrutement de combattants étrangers. Face à ces menaces, les autorités italiennes se sont appuyées sur deux expériences majeures de ces quarante dernières années: les succès dans la lutte contre le terrorisme intérieur et contre les mafias. Dans les deux cas, les institutions sont parvenues à obtenir d'importants résultats sans pour autant exagérer le rôle du renseignement. Elles ont concentré leurs efforts sur les forces de l'ordre et la magistrature, sans renoncer à adopter des outils d'investigation plus modernes ou plus percutants, toujours par le biais de nouveaux instruments légaux approuvés par le Parlement. Nous avons ainsi mis en place une législation de pointe concernant les collaborateurs de justice, souvent appelés «repentis», actualisé la réglementation sur les écoutes téléphoniques et, désormais, sur les opérations clandestines sur Internet.

38. Mastermind of Ankara blast escaped due to delayed intelligence: Report
Hurriyet, 2016 04 02

Ankara--A pro-government newspaper in Turkey has claimed that the mastermind of the March 13 bomb attack in Ankara that killed at least 37 people was able to escape security officials in the southeastern province of ?anl?urfa because two policemen in Ankara delayed communicating critical information. The report in daily Karar stated that both police officers were temporarily suspended from duty, while an investigation has been launched into their possible links with what the government calls the "Fethullahist Terrorist Organization (FETÖ)/Parallel State Structure (PDY)." The third suicide attack that hit Turkey's capital in five months was claimed by the outlawed Kurdistan Freedom Hawks (TAK), a terror group linked to the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK). Ensuing investigations revealed that two suicide bombers were behind the blast, while the authorities believe the mastermind of the attack was Vahit Ayçil, who allegedly provided the explosives. Karar reported on April 1 that Ayçil "narrowly escaped security officials" in ?anl?urfa, to which he fled after the attack, due to "delays in intelligence" being provided to related intelligence units.

39. Officials Home In On Terror Network

Wall Street Journal, Matthew Dalton, 2016 04 04

Brussels--At least 22 radical Islamists from Europe linked to the terror network behind the Brussels and Paris attacks are suspected to be still at large, putting security services on high alert as they rush to prevent Islamic State from striking again in the region. Many of the fugitives have been involved in previous Islamic State plots, officials say, and almost all of them have spent months or years fighting in Syria. Interviews and confidential court documents seen by The Wall Street Journal portray the fugitives as part of an extensive web of young men who developed a deep hatred of the West after embracing radical Islam at underground mosques and clandestine meetings in Molenbeek, a heavily Muslim district in the heart of Brussels. They have since become central to Islamic State's plans to strike the West, according to investigators, who suspect the Brussels network is behind the movement of battle-hardened operatives from Syria to Europe. "We see many plots and several cells that we now know are part of the same network," said Jean-Charles Brisard, president of the Center for the Analysis of Terrorism, a Paris think tank. "They're already here. The problem is how to find them."

D'une manière générale, ils sont également plus nombreux à partager cet avis sur le grand banditisme, le trafic de drogues, etc. Qu'est-ce que cela traduit de l'état d'esprit actuel des Français ? Quels sont les enseignements à tirer de ce sondage ? Jérôme Fourquet : Il m'apparaît important de souligner plusieurs choses. En premier lieu, rappelons que le score de 91%, relatif aux Français qui jugent que les sanctions contre le terrorisme ne sont pas assez sévères, n'est pas étonnant. 1. A weak global economy the biggest threat to global security

Globe and Mail Online, Ray Boisvert, 2016 04 05

Op-ed: Reviewing the increasing number of hot spots for violent conflict, along with the long list of economic challenges facing the international community, reminded me of how fragile societies truly are. But no more so than with respect to democracies. The democratic institutions we have created, the values that have been forged, the rights and freedoms that are now enshrined, along with the great Canadian mosaic that has given conscience to a world-respected set of core beliefs, are increasingly under threat. But for the first time in generations, the source of that existential threat is from within our very political culture that is now beset with economic uncertainty. Although I have spent 30 years assisting in the mitigation, in one form or another, of an ever-transforming list of serious threats to Western civilization, never have I been as apprehensive. A perhaps unusual basis for that sentiment, but one that is emblematic of the problem, is the U.S. Republican party nomination process. The unprecedented level of ugly public discourse in the run-up to the November general election will certainly cause important transformations to our politics, our economy and our collective security. For early evidence, just look at the extreme or non-conventional parties voted in by the European public during their dark economic times - from Greece and Spain, to Hungary and Poland. What were once fringe parties or dying political movements, be they hyper-socialists, deep authoritarians, or extreme conservative traditionalists, are now alive and gaining strength. 2. Richard Fadden says Canada not at war with ISIS, but special powers needed

CBC News, Kathleen Harris, 2016 04 05

Canada is not at war with ISIS, but security and intelligence forces need special powers to fight the "sophisticated" terror group, says the outgoing security adviser to the prime minister. Richard Fadden, who announced his retirement last week after nearly 40 years of public service, told CBC Radio's As It Happens that ISIS does not pose an "existential" threat to Canada, but it is accomplishing its prime objective of breeding terror. Military personnel deployed in Syria and Iraq may feel like they are fighting a war, but Fadden said that is not the perspective of Canada's security intelligence agencies. "I think people would think we are fighting a very, very serious situation that requires a great deal of attention and probably some new powers and resources. But I think most of my colleagues would say no, it wasn't war," Fadden told host Carol Off. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has faced sharp criticism for similarly rejecting the label "war." He said the word suggests the fight can be won by one side or the other, and in this case there is no path for ISIS to win against the West. Fadden added that constitutionally a war is formally declared by the Queen or her representative, the Governor General. But no matter what the conflict is called, Fadden urged "calm discussion" around new anti-terror laws that were brought in under the previous Conservative government to fight groups like ISIS. In the past, Fadden said, polarized debate has been fuelled in the wake of a crisis by hyper-partisans, "gotcha" media and academics who are better versed in theory than in practical solutions. "Do I like the idea as a Canadian citizen that instrumentalities of the state have powers that could affect me? No, I do not," he said. "But we are facing international terrorism threats of the sort we have not faced before, and Parliament has decided it needs some extreme tools." Fadden said he does not have to personally agree or disagree with the direction of the government, but he would have quit if he believed Bill C-51 had crossed the line. Last month, CSIS director Michel Couombe revealed that agents have used new powers to disrupt suspected terrorist threats nearly two dozen times since last fall. In the wide-reaching interview, Fadden also said he does not believe the fast-tracked process to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees into Canada presented significant security risks, because equivalent checks were put in place.

3. AFP intensifies operations to rescue Samal hostages

Philippine Star, Roel Pareño, 2016 04 05

Zamboanga City - Government troops have intensified their operations to rescue three foreigners and a Filipina taken from a resort on Samal Island. Maj. Filemon Tan Jr., spokesman for the Western Mindanao Command, yesterday said they are doing their best to rescue Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, Norwegian Kjartan Sekkingstad and Marites Flor, who are reportedly being held by their captors in Sulu. Tan said rescue operations are not dependent on the April 8 deadline set by the Abu Sayyaf. In a video clip released on Facebook on March 8, the kidnappers said they would execute the hostages if their demands are not met. The Abu Sayyaf demanded a P1-billion ransom for each of the hostages. "The deadline set is the deadline of the Abu Sayyaf...we will do our best to rescue the kidnap victims the soonest time possible...their safety is our primary concern," Tan said.

4. Countering the 'dirty bomb' threat: five things about radiological materials

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 04 05

Ottawa - World leaders are scrambling to ensure radiological materials don't fall into the hands of terrorists intent on exploding a "dirty bomb." Stopping groups such as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant from carrying out such an attack came up at the recent nuclear security summit in Washington. Here are five things to know about these materials, including what Canada is doing to secure them. What are they? Radioactive sealed sources are used in a variety of tools _ from construction gauges that measure concrete density to tumour-zapping machines in hospitals. The threat: Security officials fear terrorists could strap a conventional explosive to a radiological source to create a so-called dirty bomb. It would likely kill few people but could spread radiation over a wide area, potentially making a city's downtown uninhabitable for weeks or longer. Simply leaving an exposed source in a public area could have a similar effect. How likely is it? There has never really been a successful attack involving a radiological device. But officials have been working to prevent such material from going astray, studying the possible effects of an assault and figuring out how best to clean up the contamination. "I think the threat is real, but equally that threat needs to be kept in perspective," said Jez Littlewood, an expert in security studies at Carleton University's Norman Paterson School of International Affairs.

5. Lawsuit claims Mounties didn't pay former agent

The Province (Vancouver), Keith Fraser, 2016 04 05

Vancouver - A man who claims to be a former agent for the RCMP is suing the force for allegedly failing to pay him for his clandestine activities. The man, identified in a lawsuit only as Agent E, says that from 2001 until late 2014 he worked under the RCMP to provide investigative services in the areas of national security, money laundering and drug trafficking. He claims in the suit filed in B.C. Supreme Court in Vancouver that he gathered information regarding specific targets identified by the RCMP, including brokering transactions involving the import and export of controlled substances at the request of the Mounties. Agent E says he brokered meetings between smugglers and traffickers that would not otherwise have occurred and relayed details of those meetings to RCMP officials. He also claims to have facilitated the production of controlled substances under the direction of the RCMP and to have helped international investigations of "representatives of foreign entities" dealing with passport fraud and money laundering. "The plaintiff's services generated information of value to the RCMP in respect of approximately 40 investigative targets," the suit reads. "The identities of the targets and details of the information provided to the RCMP cannot be disclosed in this pleading as the information would risk exposing the plaintiff's identity."

8. A Key Similarity Between Snowden Leak and Panama Papers: Scandal Is What's Been Legalized

The Intercept, Glenn Greenwald, 2016 04 05

Commentary: FROM THE START of the reporting based on Edward Snowden's leaked document archive, government defenders insisted that no illegal behavior was revealed. That was always false: Multiple courts have now found the domestic metadata spying program in violation of the Constitution and relevant statutes and have issued similar rulings for other mass surveillance programs; numerous articles on NSA and GCHQ documented the targeting of people and groups for blatantly political or legally impermissible purposes; and the leak revealed that President Obama's top national security official (still), James Clapper, blatantly lied when testifying before Congress about the NSA's activities -- a felony. But illegality was never the crux of the scandal triggered by those NSA revelations. Instead, what was most shocking was what had been legalized: the secret construction of the largest system of suspicionless spying in human history. What was scandalous was not that most of this spying was against the law, but rather that the law -- at least as applied and interpreted by the Justice Department and secret, one-sided FISA "courts" -- now permitted the U.S. government and its partners to engage in mass surveillance of entire populations, including their own. As the ACLU's Jameel Jaffer put it after the Washington Post's publication of documents showing NSA analysts engaged in illegal spying: "The 'non-compliance' angle is important, but don't get carried away. The deeper scandal is what's legal, not what's not." Yesterday, dozens of newspapers around the world reported on what they are calling the Panama Papers: a gargantuan leak of documents from a Panama-based law firm that specializes in creating offshore shell companies. The documents reveal billions of dollars being funneled to offshore tax havens by leading governmental and corporate officials in numerous countries (the U.S. was oddly missing from the initial reporting, though journalists vow that will change shortly).

9. Colombian in drug, uranium plots gets 13 years in U.S. prison

Reuters, 2016 04 05

New York--A Colombian who pleaded guilty to U.S. narcotics charges stemming from a probe that began with him trying to help a paramilitary group get uranium for a "dirty bomb" to attack the U.S. embassy in Bogota was sentenced to 13 years in prison. Jhon Jairo Cruz Trejos, who authorities call a freelance weapons trafficker, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Naomi Reice Buchwald in Manhattan after pleading guilty in November to charges including conspiring to import cocaine into the United States. Cruz Trejos, who is expected to get credit for time spent in custody after his February 2014 arrest in Colombia, said in court that "a lot that was done there was bluster," adding that he had been seeking money to fund his legitimate business as a mechanic. Buchwald said while some evidence indicated he lacked criminal sophistication, "that evidence is inconsistent with the amount of discussion about weaponry and the numerous discussions the defendant was involved in over numerous years."

10. Pentagon kicks off overhauled employee appraisal program

Washington Post, Eric Yoder, 2016 04 05

Washington--The Defense Department on Friday began another overhaul of how it evaluates its civilian federal employees, this time with the support of employee unions whose opposition doomed the previous program. The first stage of the new Defense Performance Management and Appraisal Program involves about 15,000 employees, many in the national capital area. That includes several relatively small components, such as the Pentagon Force Protection Agency, plus the headquarters operations of some larger ones, such as the Navy's civilian personnel branch. Over the next two years, the large majority of the 750,000 employees in the Defense Department civilian workforce will have their performance rated under the system. The intent is to "create a fair, credible, and transparent performance appraisal process throughout the Department," said a Pentagon memo announcing the program's and the entities in the first phase. "This program will link individual performance to Department of Defense values and organizational mission; will ensure ongoing recognition and communication between employees and supervisors throughout the appraisal cycle; and will be critical to effective mission accomplishment and increased employee engagement."

11. U.S. Met With Belgians on Security Concerns Before Attacks (Canada)

New York Times, Eric Schmitt, 2016 04 05

Washington- A "foreign fighter surge team" of experts from the F.B.I., the State Department and the Department of Homeland Security met with their Belgian counterparts a month before the Brussels terrorist attacks to try to correct gaps in Belgium's widely criticized ability to track terrorist plots, American officials said. The half-dozen experts focused on long-term structural fixes to the Belgians' failure to share intelligence effectively and to tighten porous borders, but not on providing information about suspected Islamic State operatives. The recommendations, even if accepted, would not have prevented the attacks at the Brussels Airport and in the city's subway last month, the officials said. But the gaps addressed in two days of meetings, held at Belgium's request at the United States Embassy in Brussels, underscore the urgency and the frustration senior American officials say they feel as they prod many European allies to embrace the kind of counterterrorism lessons the United States learned after the Sept. 11 attacks. Andrew M. Liepman, a former deputy director at the National Counterterrorism Center who is now a senior policy analyst at the RAND Corporation, said there were dual challenges ahead for European Union countries to overhaul their internal security bureaucracies as well as to enhance cooperation and intelligence-sharing among themselves. Some countries, like Germany and the Netherlands, take the need to share seriously, Mr. Liepman said. Others share a common language that engenders trust, most notably the so-called Five Eyes countries: the United States, Britain, Australia, Canada and New Zealand.

12. Extremist toured UK mosques to preach jihad

London Times, Andrew Norfolk and Dominic Kennedy, 2016 04 05

London--Britain's biggest Islamic sect allowed a militant linked to al-Qaeda to tour dozens of mosques on a jihadist recruitment drive that spawned terror plots and murders. Senior representatives of the Deobandi sect, a supposedly moderate movement that controls almost half of Britain's 1,600 mosques, hosted the extremist cleric Masood Azhar during a 30-day visit in which hundreds of young Muslims were urged to seek weapons training at terrorist camps in Pakistan. Those who followed Azhar's advice included Rashid Rauf, a co-ordinator of the July 2005 London suicide bombings. Also recruited during the tour in 1993 of 42 Deobandi mosques was a 19-year-old student, Omar Saeed Sheikh, later convicted of beheading the American journalist Daniel Pearl in Pakistan. Azhar, then an associate of Osama bin Laden, now leads a globally banned Pakistani terror organisation linked to numerous fatal attacks in Kashmir, Afghanistan and India. Details of his "prepare for jihad" British tour, until now a closely guarded secret, undermine the argument that mainstream mosques have played little or no role in violent Islamist radicalisation.

13. Isis supporters threaten London with terror attacks in new propaganda video

The Independent (UK), Lizzy Dearden, 2016 04 05

London--Isis supporters have released a new video calling for terror attacks in London, Berlin and Rome against a backdrop that suggests the terror group's propaganda machine may be in crisis. The video, called "Fight them, Allah will punish them by your hands", calls on extremists to "kill (infidels) wherever you find them". After showing footage of the attacks in Paris and Brussels, as well as 9/11, the narrator calls the previous atrocities a "cautionary message" to nations fighting the so-called Islamic State. "If it was Paris yesterday, and today in Brussels, Allah knows where it will be tomorrow," a narrator says in English. "Maybe it will be in London or Berlin or Rome." The propaganda film was released on Monday by a group called Al Wa'ad Media Production, which activists in Raqqa say support Isis.

14. Imams sent to NZ to foil radicals

New Zealand Herald, Kurt Bayer, 2016 04 05

Wellington - Egypt's Government is sending Cairo-educated imams to "take control" of New Zealand mosques and Islamic centres in a new drive to reduce radicalisation and counter jihadism. The imams - trained at the ancient Al-Azhar University, regarded as the foremost institution in the Islamic world for the study of Sunni theology and sharia law - will spend up to three years working alongside local mosque leaders promoting moderate Islam and tolerance. One imam is already working at a Wellington mosque and three more are applying for work visas, according to Egypt's Ambassador to New Zealand, Tarek al-Wasimy. Explaining true Islam and promoting its peaceful message was an important first, proactive step in protecting the world from militant Islam and terrorism, he said. "We are all combating terrorism. It has no borders and nobody is immune," he told the Herald yesterday. "We don't want anything to happen here like what has happened in Belgium, Paris, Madrid or London so we are sending imams to explain Islam and to take control of Islamic centres and mosques here." Mr al-Wasimy said the imams were funded by the Egyptian Government and Al-Azhar, which dates back to 970 and in recent years has embarked on a global initiative to improve the image of Islam, promote tolerance, and battle radicalisation and recruitment of young Muslims by extremist groups.

"We have no choice but to work together because terrorists now know no borders... so why should we?" he posed at a press briefing following bilateral talks with President Kenyatta at the Presidential Palace on Monday evening. Kenya's Foreign Affairs Cabinet Secretary Amina Mohamed had earlier told Capital FM News that the threatened cuts had been one of President Kenyatta's motivations for visiting France. Hollande said the two leaders had also agreed for their governments to collaborate in the area of education. He said Kenyan aspiring craftsmen and technicians should be encouraged to pursue training in France and return home to build their country.

20. ICAO Moves to Avert Attacks in Nigeria, Cameroun, Egypt, Others (Canada)

This Day, Dele Ogbodo, 2016 04 05

Abuja - The President in Council of the International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO), Mr. Bernard Olumuyiwa Aliyu, has said the body is strategising with the Ministers of Aviation of Nigeria, Cameroun, Niger, Somali, Egypt and countries within the continent to stem any terrorist attack on their airports. One of the strategies, Aliyu said, would be the adoption of biometric passport or the e-passport to monitor closely the movement of passengers within and outside the region. He admitted that ICAO had been having very close relationship with the Ministers of Aviation on aviation security challenges in Mali, Somali, Egypt and Nigeria, adding that aviation security was a very sensitive issue which ICAO cannot put in public domain. The ICAO boss, who is seeking re-election bid for a second term, made the disclosure at a get-together dinner organised Sunday night in Abuja for him by the Minister of State for Aviation, Mr. Hadi Sirika. He stated that ICAO was working hard to make the airports safe across Africa, adding that "bombing at airports is one of the critical issues that we are discussing at the moment," as he said ICAO and Nigeria would have to collaborate very closely on the matter. Aliyu alleged that corruption had impacted on the national economy and retarded the growth of the civil aviation, adding however that there was light at the end of the tunnel because of the present posture of President Muhammadu Buhari and his current fight against corruption. "I'm hopeful for our country because of the posture and the determination of Buhari regarding his fight against corruption. This is the bane of our society that has impacted all aspects of the national economy including the civil aviation. "I'm very hopeful now with the determination of the minister and the support that he is receiving from government, when he visited me in Montreal, Canada, I told him that we cannot afford to miss this opportunity. "With me being at ICAO and he being the minister for aviation, we will put ICAO resources at the disposal of Nigeria in all its efforts to move the sector forward." In his remark, Sirika, said government is committed to making sure that Aliyu is re-elected as president of the council before the end of the year based on his experience and achievements that he has recorded in his first term. He said: "We began his campaign for a second term and it was huge success and welcomed by every country and nation so far. When I spoke to the delegates of the United States and Canada about the representation of Aliyu they told me that you cannot do any better."

23. Clearing up paramilitary activity key to Colombian peace process: rebel leader

Xinhua News Agency, Victoria Arguello, 2016 04 05

Caracas - Investigating and clearing up paramilitary activity is essential to the peace process involving the Colombian government and the armed leftist movements, a top rebel commander has said. The paramilitary activity, as an extension of the state apparatus, should be cleared up for the government to reach a lasting peace deal with the rebel groups, Antonio Garcia, leader of the National Liberation Army (ELN), said in an interview published Monday on Venezuelan news website Noticias 24. Garcia described paramilitary activity as "the use of exacerbated violence as a mechanism to terrorize the people so they fail to take action" to change their economic, political and social reality. The government of Colombia has been battling two insurgencies for decades such as the ELN and the larger Armed Revolutionary Front of Colombia (FARC). Peace talks with the FARC began in Havana, Cuba, in November 2012, and talks with the ELN are expected to begin soon in Ecuador.

Panama City - Panamanians have long shrugged off their country's checkered reputation as a financial haven for drug lords, tax dodgers and corrupt oligarchs. If they're crooks, they've learned from the world's wealthy nations, they like to joke. That same defensiveness has re-emerged amid the fallout from the leak of 11.5 million confidential documents from the Panama-based law firm Mossack Fonseca revealing details of how some of the globe's richest people funnel their assets into secretive shell companies set up here and in other lightly regulated jurisdictions. Ramon Fonseca, a co-founder of the firm, said Monday that his country's success in establishing itself as an offshore banking giant has bred jealousy from first-world rivals at a time of increasing competition and scrutiny of the industry in the aftermath of the global financial crisis. "It's very unfair what's happening because there's not a level playing field," Fonseca told The Associated Press in an interview. 25. Govt rethinks security nod to Chinese firms after snub on Masood Azhar

Hindustan Times, Staff reporter, 2016 04 05

New Delhi - India considered reviewing clearance for Chinese investment in a tit-for-tat response on Monday after Beijing snubbed New Delhi by blocking a move to have Pakistan-based Jaish-e-Mohammed militant group chief Masood Azhar on the UN sanctions list. Official sources said the move to review security clearance for Chinese firms investing in India is meant to send a message to Beijing for its action in the UN four days ago. India has reasons to be upset because Azhar is the lynchpin in the audacious Pathankot airbase attack in January. "Pakistan has an important place in Chinese diplomacy. China's intervention in that case must be seen in this context. China will stop supporting Pakistan when it starts being affected by terrorism," junior foreign minister and former army chief VK Singh said in Gorakhpur. India and China share an uneasy relationship since the 1962 war between the two Asian giants over longstanding territorial disputes in Arunachal Pradesh and Jammu and Kashmir's Ladakh region that the Chinese claim to be theirs. The Chinese intimacy with Pakistan, supplying India's bitter rival with arms and tipping the regional balance, has been a diplomatic thorny point too.

more small tactical nuclear weapons which could be at greater risk of theft' sums up the focus of global concern," Swarup said.

New Straits Times, Staff reporter, 2016 04 05

Sandakan - The authorities have retrieved a coal-laden barge towed by 10 Indonesians when they were kidnapped by Abu Sayyaf militants in the southern Philippines last month. The barge, Anand 12, was recovered in the waters off Tungku in Lahad Datu in an Eastern Sabah Security Command (Esscom) operation two days ago. On March 26, the barge was on its way to the Philippines with its cargo from northern Kalimantan when armed men hijacked the tugboat, Brahma 12, that was towing it near Alice Reef off Tawi-Tawi. District Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency commander Captain Razak Abd Rahman said the barge with 7,000 tonnes of coal could have drifted across the border to where it was retrieved and towed to Lahad Datu. "Two MMEA assets, Kilat and Banggi 35, as well as a marine police boat PA 47, were sent to waters off Tungku after receiving information about it at 10.30am." The barge was found 8.4 nautical miles northeast from the Tun Sharifah Rodziah Platform and 13.7 nautical miles southeast of Tungku. It has since been towed by a tugboat to Fordeco Jetty in Lahad Datu.

28. N. Korea's GPS jamming targeted at aircraft navigation system: official

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 04 05

Seoul - North Korea's continuing attempts to jam South Korea's Global Positioning System (GPS) may be aimed at disrupting the navigation systems of aircraft, government officials said as the communist country continued to send jamming signals on Tuesday. In a provocative operation that started in late March, North Korea has been sending GPS-jamming signals across the border. The signals began last Thursday and continued on and off into Tuesday, according to military and information and communication technology (ICT) sector officials. "An assessment showed that North Korea's near daily GPS-jamming activity seems to be targeting aircraft's navigation equipment," an intelligence source said, asking not to be named. But the North Korean operation has not yet resulted in any trouble with South Korea's aircraft because they use both GPS and an inertial navigation system that is immune to jamming attacks, the official said. In the GPS disruption campaign so far, the North has sent jamming signals on a total of 100 occasions and their maximum output reached more than 45 decibels, the official said. The strength of the signals are constantly lessening or increasing in what appears to be a new type of assault operation, according to the official.

Seoul - South Korea on Tuesday dismissed North Korea's thinly veiled call for dialogue, reiterating that the communist state must immediately stop its provocative acts and rhetoric, and take "sincere" efforts toward denuclearization. On Sunday, Pyongyang mentioned the need for "negotiations" for the first time since the U.N. Security Council (UNSC) adopted a new sanctions resolution early last month to punish the unruly regime for its nuclear test in January and long-range rocket launch in February. "We urge North Korea to stop its provocations and threats immediately and take a path toward denuclearization with sincerity based on the realization that denuclearization is the only choice (it should make)," an official at Seoul's Foreign Ministry told Yonhap News Agency on the condition of anonymity. "As long as the North refuses to show its willingness to denuclearize and shuns any change, pressure by us and the rest of the world will continue," he added, pointing out that the international community, "with a united voice," is calling on the North to make good on its past denuclearization commitments. A unification ministry official also issued a similar statement, stressing that the international community will continue to put pressure on the North to give up its nuke arsenal.

New Delhi - Investigating agencies have laid their hands on a video clip of one of the assailants who gunned down National Investigating Agency officer Tanzil Ahmed Sunday in UP's Bijnor district early Sunday morning and are likely to release his photograph to the media on Tuesday. Investigators are reasonably confident that the suspect -who appears in CCTV footage of the wedding Ahmed attended before being shot dead -was one of the killers. Another suspect, about whom the investigators are less sure, too has been identified in the videos. "We have shown the footages to the hosts and they have not been able to identify the two men. we have sent their pictures to caterers and others to confirm if the two were known to them," said a senior officer associated with the high-level probe into the murder. Investigators are also looking into whether Ahmed was eliminated because of the important role he had played in terrorism-related probes. Inspector general of police (IG) ATS Asim Arun said investigators had yet to zero in on the motive behind the murder. "We are looking into the terror angle and other aspects as well," he told TOI. Investigators have also traced the movement of the suspects from footage of another CCTV camera installed at a private property outside Ahmed's village. The two are seen on a motorcycle.

The study by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute also noted that the Chinese expansion in the South China Sea and Russia's annexation of Crimea and support of Ukrainian separatists also accounted for nudging spending up 1 per cent in real terms, compared to 2014. For weapons manufacturers, the nonstop pace of airstrikes targeting Islamic State fighters in Iraq and Syria, as well as Saudi-led bombing of Yemen's Shiite rebels and their allies, means billions of dollars more in sales.

35. Data of nearly 50 million Turks allegedly leaked online

Associated Press, 2016 04 05

Istanbul-Hackers have posted a database online that seems to contain the personal information of nearly 50 million Turkish citizens in what is one of the largest public leaks of its kind. The leaked database contains 49,611,709 entries and divulged considerable private information, putting people at risk of identity theft and fraud. Entries include data such as national ID numbers, addresses, birthdates and parents' names. The hackers spotlighted the information for Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, his predecessor Abdullah Gül, and Prime Minister Ahmet Davutoğlu. The leak came with the message: "Who would have imagined that backwards ideologies, cronyism and rising religious extremism in Turkey would lead to a crumbling and vulnerable technical infrastructure?"

36. Jihadi Cool: Belgium's New Extremists are as Shallow as They are Deadly

Newsweek, Kurt Eichenwald, 2016 04 05

Column: Anyone surprised by the murderous attack in Brussels has not been paying attention. On a per capita basis, Belgium has been Europe's hotbed of young Muslims who travel to Syria to fight alongside the Islamic State militant group (ISIS) and then return home, often ready to kill. But the world should hesitate before crediting this attack to ISIS, because doing so tends to infuse the group with power that it does not have. These European attackers are not like the Al-Qaeda members of old--the radicalized adherents to fundamentalist Islam. Many of these new age killers were small children when the World Trade Center fell in 2001 and have spent much of their lives watching major wars in Afghanistan, Iraq and now Syria. Their knowledge of Islam is quite limited; they are more like jihadi hipsters than dedicated Islamists, or what some experts in the intelligence community call "jihadist cool." They celebrate what the Dutch coordinator for security and counterterrorism called "pop-jihad as a lifestyle." These are youths who gather in groups, such as the recently dismantled Sharia4Belgium. They know less about Osama bin Laden than they do about Tupac Shakur; Belgians who travel to Syria to fight often revere the deceased American rapper on social media, identifying themselves with his lyrics about life in the inner cities. But these attackers also have their own rap music, hip clothes popular with young Muslims that are sold by companies like Urban Ummah and slogans akin to what might be found on a bumper sticker ("Work Hard, Pray Hard.") Their tweets often end with terms like #BeardLife and #HijabLife. While in Syria, they send selfies to their friends showing themselves wearing kohl, a traditional Middle Eastern eye shadow.

38. Manuel Valls veut engager une bataille identitaire contre les salafistes

Radio France International, 2016 04 05

Paris--Manuel Valls annonce une augmentation des budgets sécuritaires ces prochaines années pour répondre à la menace terroriste. Le Premier ministre français, qui intervenait lundi 4 avril lors d'un colloque intitulé « Islamisme radical et démocratie », promet aussi d'engager une bataille « identitaire ». Le Premier ministre français Manuel Valls appelle ça un discours de vérité. Et face au terrorisme, il n'y a pas que « le défi sécuritaire », comme il l'appelle, mais aussi le vivre ensemble. Selon Manuel Valls, il a un ennemi: le salafisme. « Il y a une forme de minorité agissante des groupes qui sont en train de gagner la bataille idéologique, culturelle, a lancé le Premier ministre. Les salafistes doivent représenter aujourd'hui seulement 1% des musulmans dans notre pays. Et, d'une certaine manière, il n'y a qu'eux qu'on entend. »

41. Women are sirens for jihad

London Times, Graham Keeley, 2016 04 05

Madrid--Women are taking a greater role in jihadist terrorism cells in Spain, organising the recruitment and indoctrination of Isis fighters. They also plan the route that female volunteers take to Syria or Iraq to become sex slaves. Jorge Fernández Díaz, the Spanish interior minister, said that at least four imminent attacks were thwarted there last year. Madrid formed a special unit to halt the radicalisation of prisoners by convicted jihadist terrorists as part of its efforts to avert an attack similar to those in Paris and Brussels. Wire taps are routinely used to listen into telephone calls and prisoners' behaviour inside jail is closely monitored by specialist officers.

3. Arms deal by Canadian firm raises issues about Ottawa oversight Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 04 06

Ottawa - A new UN panel report says a shipment of armoured personnel carriers to Libya from a Canadian-owned company's Mideast facilities several years ago violated an international arms embargo - an incident that raises questions about how extensively Ottawa should be policing the defence and military trade conducted by its citizens abroad. The March 2016 report, which flagged a transfer of armoured vehicles produced by Streit Group, a company first established in Ontario in the 1990s, was drawn up by experts monitoring global compliance with the United Nations Security Council arms embargo against Libya in place since 2011. Streit is owned by Guerman Goutorov, a Canadian citizen who lives in the United Arab Emirates. His Canadian-based company is Streit Manufacturing in Innisfil, Ont. The UN panel's reporting on what it calls an "illicit transfer" of armoured personnel carriers comes amid a growing debate in Canada over the military and defence goods that Canadians sell to Mideast countries - including a $15-billion deal with Saudi Arabia - and increasing concern that Ottawa is not doing enough to monitor, control and shine a light on this flourishing business.

4. Bodyguard to late North Korean dictator seeks asylum in Canada

Toronto Star, Nicholas Keung, 2016 04 06

Toronto - For more than a decade, Lee Young-guk was a bodyguard for the man who would go on to become one of the world's most brutal dictators. After a failed attempt to flee North Korea in 1994, when the Communist regime rewarded a smuggler in China for forcibly returning him to Pyongyang, Lee finally escaped to South Korea where he became a citizen -- and a vocal critic of his former boss, Kim Jong-il. Now, Lee is on the run again. On March 13, the now-53-year-old arrived in Toronto with his wife and two young children, and once again became an asylum seeker, this time fleeing what he claims are threats and persecution by South Korea for his outspoken criticism of their neighbour to the north. "I was arrested in a demonstration. Police beat me and tortured me. They released me but continued to follow me and threaten me," said Lee, who changed his name to Lee Young-dae after his defection to Seoul. "They are very sensitive to any criticism against the North. I feared they would send me back to Pyongyang." Kim Jong-il ruled North Korea with an iron fist, with thousands imprisoned, tortured or dying of starvation during his 17-year reign that ended when he died of an apparent heart attack in 2011.

5. Canadian bank fined $1.1 million for failing to report suspicious dealing

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 04 06

Ottawa - The federal anti-money laundering agency has levied a $1.1-million penalty against an unnamed Canadian bank for failing to report a suspicious transaction and various money transfers. It is the first time the Ottawa-based Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, known as Fintrac, has penalized a bank -- and it's being billed as a warning to thousands of other businesses. Generally, the centre tracks cash flows linked to terrorism, money laundering and other crimes by sifting through millions of pieces of data annually from banks, insurance companies, securities dealers, money service businesses, real estate brokers, casinos and others. In this case, Fintrac spokesman Darren Gibb said he cannot legally discuss details of the bank's infractions, and the federal agency is exercising its discretion to withhold the identity of the financial institution, which recently paid the penalty of $1,154,670. But Fintrac wants to send a strong message that it will take whatever measures are needed to encourage compliance with the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act. The agency depends on a steady flow of reports about suspicious dealings, electronic fund transfers and large cash transactions in order to produce needed intelligence, Gibb said in an interview. "The reporting to us is absolutely critical. Without those reports, Fintrac is out of business," he said Tuesday. "We're going to be extra-diligent to ensure that entities are submitting suspicious transaction reports when they should be." Some 31,000 businesses across the country must furnish Fintrac with reports. The agency, in turn, provided 1,260 disclosures of financial intelligence to police and national security partners in 2014-15.

6. Panama Papers leaks show change doesn't happen by itself, says Edward Snowden

Canadian Press, Tamsyn Burgmann, 2016 04 06

Vancouver - A trove of leaked data about offshore tax havens in Panama highlights more than ever the vital role of the whistleblower in a free society, says one of the tech era's most prominent figures to expose state secrets, Edward Snowden. The former U.S. intelligence contractor said Tuesday that the so-called Panama Papers, which were given to journalists by an anonymous source, demonstrate that "change doesn't happen by itself." "The media cannot operate in a vacuum and ... the participation of the public is absolutely necessary to achieving change," the ex-National Security Agency analyst said during a video conference from Moscow. Snowden was speaking from exile on a panel organized by Simon Fraser University examining the opportunities and dangers of online data gathering. The 32-year-old remains wanted by the U.S. government on charges of espionage after leaking classified documents in 2013 as evidence that government spy agencies were monitoring citizens' telecommunication.

7. Snowden says Panama Papers show whistleblowers 'vital' to society

Globe and Mail, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 04 06

Vancouver - Edward Snowden, the former U.S. National Security Agency contractor responsible for the release of thousands of classified documents detailing the American government's use of mass surveillance, says the Panama Papers show the role of the whistleblower in a free society has become "vital." Mr. Snowden, who is living in Russia under political asylum, made the comments via video link during a sold-out event hosted by Simon Fraser University on Tuesday night. Mr. Snowden said the Panama Papers reveal "the most privileged and the most powerful members of society are operating by a different set of rules." "I think that this shows, more than ever, the role of the whistleblower in a free society has become not only desirable but vital," he said. The Panama Papers are a cache of 11.5-million records leaked from Mossack Fonseca, a Panamanian law firm that has been retained by politicians and business leaders around the world to channel money beyond their countries' borders and into tax havens through the use of offshore accounts. Mr. Snowden, when asked about Canada's new anti-terror legislation, cited its connection to the United States and the Five Eyes intelligence alliance. "You put everything in one big, giant bucket. I would suspect this is what C-51 is really about," he said. "It's about broadening that bucket and making sure we put more Canadian information in that sharing bucket, so that it's more easily shared. Now I don't want to say that it's absolutely what's happening, but ... this is how it works, this is what we do for every other country." Mr. Snowden received a standing ovation at the end of the 90-minute event. Tuesday's event, held at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre, was part of the SFU President's Dream Colloquium, which brings leading thinkers to the university. The event was also live-streamed online. This was not the first time Mr. Snowden directly addressed a Canadian audience. He also spoke via web link to a crowd of more than 1,000 students at Toronto's Upper Canada College in February of last year.

8. Top Mountie says 500 organized crime investigators now on terrorism cases

Vancouver Sun, Kim Bolan, 2016 04 06

Vancouver - About 500 Mounties who were working on organized crime investigations have been moved to national security and terrorism cases, RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson said Thursday. That means some major investigations targeting the highest echelons of organized crime are on hold, the top RCMP leader told The Vancouver Sun's editorial board. "That number of trained and experienced officers absent from the organized crime fight impacts our efforts on organized crime," Paulson said. "It is a significant percentage because we are taking the people with the experience in terms of evidence collection, wiretaps, search warrants and interrogations, high-value investigative techniques, that we bring to organized crime, and we are putting them on terrorism cases." Paulson said a major organized crime investigation could involve dozens of officers for years. "It takes between 40 and 100 people to run a full-sized project and that's a multi-year, wiretap, agent, undercover operation. That's a big enterprise," he said. "So you are looking at, in effect, probably four or five project-style targeting initiatives that aren't being deployed." While federal policing resources devoted to organized crime are down, the RCMP also has "provincial resources in B.C. that are dedicated to organized crime," he said, referring to successes of the Combined Forces Special Enforcement Unit.

9. Class-action suit filed over watch lists of fliers (Canada)

Washington Post, Matt Zapotsky, 2016 04 06

Washington--A new class-action lawsuit alleges that untold thousands of people placed on the U.S. watch listing system deserve monetary damages for what it says are the unpleasant and unconstitutional consequences of having their names on various federal registers. The suit - filed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria on behalf of 18 American Muslims, including a 4-year-old - is perhaps the broadest challenge to the federal watch listing system, though it is hardly the first. One of the plaintiffs, Osama Ahmed, 24, a pharmacy technician living in Wayne County, Mich., said he was pulled aside at the Detroit airport on a trip back from Yemen in 2011 and detained for seven hours while authorities questioned him about politics, his religion and his trip. Ahmed said the agents saw pictures on his phone of him holding a gun - which he said is a common activity in Yemen - and alleged that he was "training." "Honestly, I was scared," he said. "I felt like I was kind of being put in a position where I did nothing wrong but they might try to link something to me." Ahmed said FBI agents later took him to lunch and tried to persuade him to become an informant. The lawsuit alleges that federal authorities often use the no-fly list - and the offer to take people off it - to cultivate sources. Another plaintiff, Anas Elhady, 22, of Dearborn, Mich., said he was trying to return to the United States last year from Canada by car when he was handcuffed and taken to a cell so cold that he soon began begging for help.

10. Facebook's WhatsApp Bolsters Encryption

Wall Street Journal, Robert McMillan, 2016 04 06

New York--Facebook Inc.'s WhatsApp texting service said it had strengthened its encryption so that only the sender and receiver are able to read the contents of messages. WhatsApp has been working for more than a year to ensure the encryption works on different phone platforms and for different types of messages. On Tuesday, a spokesman said the more secure encryption is now available for all of the service's one billion users. Facebook's move comes as the nation debates the uses and limits of encryption technology. Over the past month, Apple Inc. and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have been locked in a bitter struggle over the FBI's demands that Apple help unlock its mobile phones. The FBI argues that it will be less effective without ways to tap into the communications of terrorists and criminals. Apple and other technology companies argue that encryption is essential to protecting consumer privacy.

11. ISIS Internet operation impossible to stop: U.S. commander

Washington Times, Rowan Scarborough, 2016 04 06

Washington--The nation's top military officer in charge of cyber warfare said on Tuesday that the U.S. is powerless to shut down the vast information network operated on the Internet by the Islamic State terror army. Like no other terrorist group, the Islamic State has embraced cyber space, and its associated messaging apps and platforms, to spread propaganda, recruit foreign killers and plan massacres, such as the March 22 attacks in Brussels. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing, Sen. Joe Manchin asked Navy Adm. Michael S. Rogers, chief of U.S. Cyber Command, "why can't be shut down the part of the Internet. Why can't we interrupt ISIS's ability to go on social media and attract? Why aren't we able to infiltrate that more?" "The idea you are going to shut down the Internet, given its construction and complexity, is just not [doable]," answered Adm. Rogers, who also directs the National Security Agency, which works to intercept ISIL's communications.

Acting associate attorney general Stuart Delery - who oversees a broad swath of operations in the department, including all civil lawsuits, civil rights cases and antitrust matters - said in an interview that he will vacate his post April 14 and return to the private sector. He gave no specific reason, other than that he wants to spend more time with his sons, ages 11 and 15. "It seems like, all things considered, a good time for this," Delery said. "I've had a great experience here." During his time at Justice, Delery personally defended the department's positions on Obamacare, the Defense of Marriage Act and the National Security Agency's bulk collection of Americans' phone records. He spearheaded an initiative designed to protect service members' rights, and he was involved in implementing revamped federal policies for same-sex couples.

14. Spy probe morphed into child porn case

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 04 06

Riverside, Calif--FBI agents entered Keith Gartenlaub's home in Southern California while he and his wife were visiting her relatives in Shanghai. Agents wearing gloves went through boxes, snapped pictures of documents and made copies of three computer hard drives before leaving as quietly as they had entered. The bureau suspected that Gartenlaub was a spy for China. The FBI had obtained a secret search warrant to enter the house, citing national security grounds. The agents were searching for evidence that Gartenlaub, an information technology manager at Boeing, had leaked computer information about the defense contractor's C-17 military transport plane to people acting on behalf of China. But since the search in January 2014, no spy or hacking charges have been brought against him. Instead, seven months later, he was charged with the possession and receipt of child pornography. He has denied the charges, but a jury convicted him in December.

15. Islamic sect schools are investigated over radical clerics and 'terrorist sympathisers'

London Times, Dominic Kennedy and Andrew Norfolk, 2016 04 06

London--Schools run by Britain's biggest Islamic sect are being investigated after evidence emerged of the influence of radical clerics and alleged terrorist sympathisers. A scholar named Qari Hanif Jallundari was a guest at the Rabia school in Luton, Bedfordshire, in 2013. According to an audio recording, he had previously addressed fighters of Jaish-e-Mohammed (JeM) in Pakistan, a proscribed terrorist organisation. He told jihadists: "Tomorrow belongs to Muslims. We have to maintain a united front and frustrate the efforts of those who want to divide on the lines of jihadi and non-jihadi factions. In my view every Muslim is a mujahid." The school he visited is run by the Rabia Educational Trust charity, which educates boys and girls. It is part of the Deobandi movement, which controls about 40 per cent of mosques in Britain and is considered by many to be moderate. Yesterday it was revealed that dozens of Deobandi mosques played host to a militant with al-Qaeda links during a 1993 tour that spawned terror plots. The Department for Education is investigating schools including Rabia after evidence was uncovered by a BBC investigation whose findings were shared with The Times. Mr Jallundari told The Times: "Jihad is by no means synonymous with terror or indiscriminate murder. Islam unreservedly condemns the taking of innocent life: of women, children and elderly."

London--Terrorism investigators are to be completely locked out of WhatsApp after the company re-engineered its systems to make it powerless to comply with warrants to hand over suspicious communications. A security upgrade to the world's most popular messaging service means that its engineers can no longer unscramble encrypted communications sent by its one billion users. WhatsApp's decision will further antagonise GCHQ, MI5 and MI6, which believe that American technology companies fail to provide adequate assistance to terrorism investigations. 18. Al-Qa'ida man named masked video star as Sunshine Coast soldier

The Australian, Mark Schliebs, 2016 04 06

Sydney - Former Queensland soldier Mathew Stewart was identified as the mysterious star of a Taliban propaganda video by al-Qa'ida's top media expert in 2006, files from the Australian Federal Police reveal. A year after widespread speculation that a masked Australian who appeared in a 2005 extremist video broadcast in the Middle East was the Sunshine Coast man, a senior, US-born al-Qa'ida strategist and confidant of Osama bin Laden, Adam Gadahn, identified

Stewart by name. The files also show that Stewart gave an interview and was photographed with a Turkish journalist in Afghanistan in 2006, when he said he was a cocaine-snorting party boy in Brisbane before joining the Australian Army to find some meaning for his existence. Since 2002, when it was revealed that he had travelled to Afghanistan soon before the 9/11 attacks, there has been much speculation over Stewart's whereabouts, or even if he was still alive. His family has maintained he is dead, and held a funeral for him, and Australian authorities have never publicly confirmed sporadic reports that Stewart was alive and still an active member of al-Qa'ida. However, last October, The Australian revealed that authorities believed he was the al-Qa'ida member pictured and interviewed in a Syrian jihadist magazine, which said "Hamza Australi" was a former Australian soldier who went to Afghanistan in August 2001. He was now in Syria on al-Qa'ida's behalf, to train fighters in its local branch, Jabhat al-Nusra, he said.

19. New law used in 'terror threat'

The Daily Post (New Zealand), Staff reporter, 2016 04 06

Wellington - The prospect of an imminent terrorist act led our internal intelligence agency to carry out urgent surveillance without a legal warrant under special new powers. It is unclear whether the suspected terrorist activity was aimed inside New Zealand or offshore. The fact was revealed in a sparse report from Security Intelligence Service director Rebecca Kitteridge made public this week. It reveals only that she exercised her powers to authorise spying in New Zealand without a warrant. Under law, the maximum time period the power can be exercised is 24 hours. The report from Ms Kitteridge also shows the SIS followed up its urgent surveillance with an application for a warrant "in relation to the same subject matter", continuing the intelligence operation. The report reveals the act was required under a law change passed in 2014. It also requires the Inspector- General of Intelligence and Security - currently Cheryl Gwyn - to investigate the use of the power to make sure it was appropriate. The law change shows the broad conditions under which the SIS director could do warrantless surveillance. The use of the power can only come after the director is satisfied it is needed for the "detection, investigation or prevention of any actual, potential or suspected terrorist act or facilitation of a terrorist act".

20. Afghan Terror Fight Enlists Villagers

Wall Street Journal, Jessica Donati and Habib Khan Totakhil, 2016 04 06

KOT, Afghanistan -- An Afghan spy agency is recruiting villagers for militias to hold back Islamic State fighters seeking to expand their foothold in this opium heartland in eastern Afghanistan. The program, which one top official says the government hopes to roll out across the country and may later use against the Taliban, is President Ashraf Ghani's riskiest attempt to defend rural villages -- and a part of his much larger counterinsurgency strategy. The government has closely guarded the program, and news of it hasn't been reported since its establishment in August 2015. Details of the program came from Afghan government officials, local village leaders and Western officials who have been monitoring its progress. The CIA pays most of the Afghan intelligence agency's bills, said Afghan security officials who work in intelligence and are familiar with its operations. But the NDS has discretion over how the funds are spent.

21. In Pakistan, tackling extremism is a political minefield

Associated Press, Kathy Gannon, 2016 04 06

Islamabad--Tackling extremism is a political minefield in Pakistan, where politicians openly consort with leaders of banned militant groups and sympathy exists within the security forces and civil administration for perpetrators of crimes committed in the name of religion. As a result, many remain skeptical of the state's ability to put an end to the militant violence that kills hundreds of Pakistani civilians each year. A suicide bombing in a park in Lahore that killed 72 people, many of them Christians celebrating Easter Sunday, brought renewed international attention to Pakistan's extremism problem. In the aftermath, security forces arrested hundreds of suspected militants. At the same time, however, demonstrators calling for the implementation of Islamic law and expressing their support for the man who murdered an anti-blasphemy campaigner were allowed to congregate freely in the capital. On social media, pictures circulated showing senior members of Pakistan's elite police forces praying at the grave of Mumtaz Qadri, the policeman charged with killing the secular, left-leaning politician Salman Taseer because he defended a Christian woman accused of blasphemy. When Qadri was hanged for the murder in February, tens of thousands of Pakistanis rallied in his support.

22. Taliban Leader, Trying to End Infighting, Appoints Critics to Senior Posts

New York Times, Mujib Mashal and Taimoor Shah, 2016 04 06

Kabul-- In a compromise bid to unite the ranks after months of infighting, the Taliban's new leader has appointed the brother and son of Mullah Muhammad Omar, the movement's deceased founder, to senior leadership posts, a spokesman for the insurgent group said on Tuesday. The appointments are the latest move by the supreme Taliban leader, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Mansour, to publicly consolidate his authority after a leadership struggle last summer. Facing criticism or outright rebellion from field commanders who distrusted his ties to Pakistan and his handling of the succession, Mullah Mansour brutally quashed breakaway groups and sought to buy the support of other skeptical commanders, all while maintaining a publicity campaign that has portrayed the Taliban as united under his command, according to interviews with Taliban members. They spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid angering Mullah Mansour. Now, the announcement that he had formally brought two of the most influential skeptics back into the fold -- Mullah Abdul Manan, the brother of Mullah Omar; and Mullah Muhammad Yaqoub, the founder's son -- was expected to help bring other dissenters into line right as the Taliban's annual offensive is expected to pick up momentum in Afghanistan.

All Africa, Jonathan Nda-Isaiah, 2016 04 06

President Muhammadu Buhari on Tuesday in Abuja disclosed that Boko Haram has a strong material resources and has a close link to the international terrorist group ISIL. According to him in a statement by his special adviser media, Femi Adesina, ending insurgency in Africa will require stronger collaboration and commitment from governments, financial institutions and security agencies in tracking the sponsorship of terrorist activities. In a farewell audience at the State House with the High Commissioner of Kenya to Nigeria, Mr. Tom Amolo, President Buhari said terrorist attacks in Africa bear similar trademarks of intense planning, strong alliances and proper financial sponsorship, which must be thoroughly investigated and reversed. "Terrorist activities always have financial sponsorship and this can be seen in their acquisition of weapons, their movements and other logistics."

27. Somali Militants Are Proving Resilient in the Face of Losses

New York Times, Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 04 06

Nairobi--The Shabab are not having a good week. On Tuesday, African Union forces said they had killed six commanders of the Shabab, the powerful Islamic insurgent group that has terrorized Somalia for years. Among the six killed in the Janale area, the African Union said, were a Yemeni explosives expert and a Kenyan trainer. This followed the announcement on Monday that the Pentagon had killed Hassan Ali Dhoore, a senior member of the Shabab's security and intelligence wing, in an airstrike. And a few days before that, the African Union said that allied forces -- which include the African Union troops, Somali security services and American air power -- had killed more than 20 "terrorists." Still, analysts question how effective this strategy is. Just like in other battle zones, such as Afghanistan or Iraq, Somalia's militants have proved resilient in the face of superior firepower.

29. Are Brazil's reinsurers ready for the Olympics?

Business News Americas, 2016 04 06

Brazil might not be known as a target for terrorism, but the country is becoming increasingly concerned as Rio's time to host of the Olympic Games is fast approaching. Panelists at Brazil's reinsurance conference in Rio de Janeiro agreed that local reinsurers are not ready for the global event, which will take place in the city from August 5th to the 21st. "One of the things that is often ignored is the platform that is created by these events," said Napoleon Montes-Amaya, vice president of war, terrorism and political violence in Latin America at Hiscox MGA. "The host country - or city, like Rio - inherits all the world's problems." Montes-Amaya noted that while Brazil might not currently be high on the list of targets of terrorist groups, that could change when such a large concentration of people from around the world attend the international sporting event this August.

Straits Times, 2016 04 06

Malacca - The Islamic State-linked terror cell that plotted the kidnapping of local leaders, including Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Razak, was a lesser-known group desperate to gain notoriety. The group, Kumpulan Fisabillah, had initially planned to strike several low-value targets in Kedah. Federal Special Branch Counter-Terrorism Division tactical operations officer Assistant Superintendent Sufian Ali said they changed their plans to that of the abduction of prominent politicians, including Najib, Home Minister Datuk Seri Dr Ahmad Zahid Hamidi and Defence Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein. This, he said, was so that the little-known group could gain "fame". Speaking at an intellectual discourse here yesterday, Sufian said among the items seized from the group, which included two Royal Malaysian Air Force personnel, was a flashbang grenade, otherwise known as a stun grenade.

Seoul - A British journalist who runs a website that documents technology development and issues in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea said on Tuesday that he will appeal a decision by the Republic of Korea to block his site for allegedly violating the country's National Security Law. Martyn Williams, whose website has been blocked in the ROK for almost two weeks, said the site does not violate the security law, which bans praising, sympathizing or Williams has written about issues ranging from cell phone usage in the DPRK and its satellite technology, to a little-known computer operating system developed by the country. He said much of the content on his website is based on announcements made by Pyongyang and Seoul and reports in the media.

33. Forensic test underway on vessel hijacked by Abu Sayyaf

Jakarta Post, Anggi M. Lubis, 2016 04 06

Jakarta - Anand 12, one of the vessels manned by a crew of Indonesians possibly kidnapped by terrorist group Abu Sayyef, is currently undergoing a forensic test in Malaysia and the results are expected to be announced in 10 days' time, Foreign Minister Retno LP Marsudi has said. The Indonesian-flagged Anand 12, along with Brahma 12, were carrying a combined cargo of 7,000 tons of coals when they were hijacked in Philippine waters nearly two weeks ago. Brahma 12 was found drifting close to Sabah's east coast on March 29. The ship's owners reportedly received phone calls demanding a ransom of around US$1 million from a person who claimed to be a member of Abu Sayyaf. The discovery of Anand 12 is expected to reveal and measure the capability of the group. Retno told reporters in a press briefing on Tuesday that the tugboat was found drifting in the waters off Sabah, with its barges still intact. She said that Anand 12 had been towed to Fordeco Jetty in Lahad Datu and was currently in the hands of the Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency (APKMM). "Given the location of the hijacking and its proximity to Malaysia, I established communications with the Malaysian Foreign Minister on March 31 and requested support. The Malaysian government is ready to assist at any time," she said during the conference.

34. India will suffer if security checks on Chinese firms tighten: expert

Global Times, Staff reporter, 2016 04 06

Beijing - India stands to lose more than gain if it tightens its security checks on Chinese firms after Indian media claimed the country is considering scrapping security clearance to Chinese companies, analysts warned. Hu Zhiyong, a research fellow with the Institute of International Relations at the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences, told the Global Times that India stands to lose if it tightens security reviews of Chinese firms. "Chinese companies may think twice about their expansion plans in India over the possible security clearance review. Thus, India's development, which relies on China to improve its poor infrastructure, will be hindered," Hu said. According to a report in Indian newspaper Hindustan Times on Tuesday citing official sources, India's home ministry was reconsidering its security clearance for Chinese firms in India, and might cancel all proposals from Chinese firms cleared in the past nine months. The review move was allegedly made after China "blocked" a move to put "Pakistan-based Jaish-e-Mohammed militant group chief Masood Azhar on the UN sanctions list four days ago," as India believes that Azhar should be held responsible for the January attack of an Indian air force base, located on the Indian- Pakistani border, the report said.

35. N.K. cyber capabilities pose serious challenges to U.S.: cyber command chief

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 04 06

Washington - North Korea's cyber capabilities pose serious challenges to the United States, the U.S. cyber commander said Tuesday, emphasizing the communist nation has steadily been bolstering its capabilities and has been "quite active" in the cyber domain. Adm. Michael S. Rogers made the assessment in a statement submitted for a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing, saying the North is one of the countries that his command is watching "most closely," along with Russia, China and Iran. "Iran and North Korea represent lesser but still serious challenges to U.S. interests. Although both states have been more restrained in this last year in terms of cyber activity directed against us, they remain quite active and are steadily improving their capabilities," Rogers said. "Both of these nations have encouraged malicious cyber activity against the United States and their neighbors, but they currently devote the bulk of their resources and effort to working against their neighbors." The North's cyber capabilities have been a greater focus of attention since a massive hacking attack on Sony Pictures in late 2014, which Pyongyang is believed to have carried out in retaliation for Sony's release of a comedy film ridiculing North Korean leader Kim Jong-un.

36. Sharing terrorism information is key

The Japan News, 2016 04 06

Interview: Extremist militant group the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) has continued to carry out indiscriminate acts of terrorism, from the Paris attacks in November to the attacks in Belgium last month. The Japanese government is poised to remain vigilant against terrorism as it prepares to host the Group of Seven summit in the Ise-Shima area next month. The Yomiuri Shimbun interviewed National Public Safety Commission Chairman Taro Kono, 53, on Friday about Japan's counterterrorism measures. The following are excerpts of the interview. The Yomiuri Shimbun: The Belgium attacks were carried out despite the fact that Belgian authorities were on high alert. What are the lessons to be learned? Taro Kono: I realized how difficult it is to prevent suicide bombings. Even if one decides to make a bomb in Japan, police are in contact with relevant businesses -- so if there are any suspicious purchases of explosive materials or purchases involving abnormally large amounts of materials, police can obtain information. When it comes to bombs and small arms, it's safe to say that Japan maintains stricter control compared to Europe. Q: Shortcomings have been identified in both investigations and at an institutional level [regarding Belgian authorities]. A: Information was not delivered effectively. In this field, the Japanese police system is one step ahead. But when it comes to soft-target terrorism in which attackers target places where large numbers of unspecified people gather, it's frankly difficult for police to stave off all attacks on their own. Cooperation from relevant businesses is essential.

48. Atmosphere of Distrust Hinders EU Anti-Terror Cooperation

Der Spiegel, 2016 04 06

Berlin--Following the attacks in Brussels, calls are growing for European intelligence services to work together more closely. But cooperation is difficult because Germany's secret service has little trust in its EU partners, and has even spied on them. The man who wants to explain the psyche of Germany's foreign intelligence service is sipping a cappuccino and talking about the abduction of German tourists in the Sahara Desert a few years ago. A crisis committee was meeting at the Foreign Ministry in Berlin, and agents at the Federal Intelligence Service (BND) in Pullach, outside Munich, were trying to figure out how to get information about the kidnapers. Human lives were at stake, the pressure considerable. The French intelligence services had good sources in the region, but they were unwilling to share their information with the Germans, so the BND decided to spy on the French to gain access to it. This was how it came about that the Germans spied on a government agency in a friendly country, one they treated as one of their closest political allies. Friendly? Allied? These are not categories with which the man with the cappuccino is familiar in his work. A senior BND official at the time, he prefers to keep his name a secret. He recounts the episode to explain why an intelligence service sometimes finds it necessary to spy on one of its partners -- and how it could happen that the BND spied on so many institutions in Europe. Our business, says the man, is based primarily on suspicion. It took only a few hours after three bombs had exploded in Brussels and 35 people had been killed for politicians and experts to begin calling for better cooperation among intelligence services in Europe.

Le drapeau turc est encore le même, les photos d'Atatürk ornent toujours les bureaux des hauts responsables et les bâtiments officiels, la laïcité est toujours inscrite dans la Constitution, mais dans la réalité, elle est de plus en plus submergée par la lame de fond de l'islam politique dont le déferlement a commencé lentement et insidieusement depuis 2002, date de la première victoire des islamistes du Parti de la justice et du développement (AKP) d'Erdogan. Le Figaro, 2016 04 06

Paris--L'Éducation nationale tente de remettre de l'ordre dans le maquis des établissements hors contrat, en multipliant les inspections inopinées et en sollicitant des inspecteurs arabophones. Aujourd'hui, une cinquantaine d'établissements musulmans, accueillant 5000 élèves, fonctionnent en France. Partout, à la périphérie des grandes villes, des projets voient le jour, souvent de petites écoles, ne comptant qu'une ou deux classes et une quinzaine d'élèves. Mais le mouvement est largement amorcé. Les maires se plaignent d'être en première ligne face à l'afflux de demandes mais de n'avoir aucun moyen de contrôler, ensuite, ce qui se passe à l'intérieur des établissements scolaires. L'Éducation nationale étudie le dossier de près. «Nous explorons toutes les pistes possibles, y compris celle d'une évolution substantielle du droit», affirme-t-on dans l'entourage de Najat Vallaud-Belkacem. La question des écoles hors contrat, qui ne sont pas tenues de respecter les programmes de l'Éducation nationale, est prioritaire. Après les attentats de novembre, une série d'inspections «surprise» a été lancée dans des établissements soupçonnés de radicalisation.

55. Suisse et ONU ensemble contre le djihadisme

Le Temps, Luis Lema, 2016 04 06

Genève-- Lutter contre les conditions qui favorisent la radicalisation: c'est l'objectif d'une conférence qui va se tenir à Genève Une manière d'ouvrir la voie? Ou de se montrer simplement à côté du sujet? Main dans la main, les Nations unies et la Suisse entendent initier une nouvelle ère face à la menace mondiale du terrorisme, incarnée aujourd'hui par l'organisation Etat islamique (Daech). Jeudi et vendredi, en présence de nombreux ministres et experts, se tiendra à Genève une ambitieuse conférence internationale, dans le cadre de la stratégie antiterroriste mondiale lancée par l'ONU il y a dix ans. Une conférence de plus? Oui, mais à la différence qu'il ne sera nullement question de bombarder les djihadistes, de renforcer la collaboration entre les services de renseignement ou encore de couper les flux financiers des organisations terroristes. Un seul mot d'ordre ici: la prévention. D'une certaine manière, il s'agira pour la communauté internationale de trouver les moyens de donner plus, et mieux, que ce qu'offre aujourd'hui Daech aux candidats potentiels à la « radicalisation » .

56. Why the EU's deal with Turkey to stem Migrant Flow is deeply flawed

Newsweek, Owen Matthews, 2016 04 06

Analysis--For Ayla Agit, the deal signed in March between Europe and Turkey to stem the flow of migrants and refugees was a prayer answered. "Finally, we have a chance to get a new life in Germany!" says Agit, who was driven from her home this past October by fighting. The twist: Agit isn't a Syrian refugee; she's a Turkish citizen. Her hometown of Cizre was the scene of running street battles between armed Kurdish militants and the Turkish army last year that left close to 200 dead. Now she and thousands of other internally displaced Turkish Kurds are planning to join the exodus to Europe. Under the terms of the deal, all Turkish citizens are to be granted visa-free travel, though not the right to work, in the 26 nations in Europe's border-free Schengen area. In exchange, Turkey agreed to take back all refugees who cross into Greece using irregular means after March 20. For every person accepted back by Turkey, the EU promised to take a Syrian asylum seeker from camps in southeast Turkey. The Europeans will also hand over 6.5 billion euros ($7.3 billion) to help Ankara deal with the estimated 2.7 million Syrian refugees currently on its soil. All Agit, a widow with five children, needs to get is the plane fare and a biometric Turkish passport. Once on EU soil, she and all Turkish Kurds like her who can prove political persecution or a threat to their lives if they return home are eligible to claim political asylum. Agit is likely to qualify, as her brother is in jail for membership in an illegal organization and police have raided her home multiple times. And thanks to a tourism industry depressed by a series of bombings in Ankara and Istanbul, Turkish charter airlines are offering one-way flights to Europe for as little as $55.

1. Ex-CSIS informant Eid to learn verdict

Ottawa Citizen, James Bagnall, 2016 05 02

Ottawa - Sometime after 11 a.m. Monday, Superior Court Judge Timothy Ray will give us his take on Roland Eid - the building tradesman charged four years ago with fraud in connection with his company ICI Construction. The proceeding before Ray began a little more than a year ago, wrapping up in early March. Ray has been dissecting a small mountain of evidence and testimony ever since. The case, nearly a decade in the making, has been avidly followed in parts of Ottawa's business community - not least because Eid belongs to a prominent family of Lebanese immigrants. His eldest brother, Jean, is a partner with the upscale hair design salon, Rinaldo's. Eid Eid, an executive with Nova Networks, previously served as chief technology officer at Corel Corp., the graphics software company founded by Michael Cowpland. Roland Eid channelled his entrepreneurial instincts in a different direction. The youngest of nine siblings, Roland worked from the ground up at various local construction firms. A decade ago he launched ICI Construction, which won millions of dollars in contracts courtesy of the RCMP and Foreign Affairs. ICI was petitioned into bankruptcy early in 2008, just weeks after Eid and his family left Ottawa for Lebanon under mysterious circumstances. Eid had arranged late in 2007 to transfer $1.7 million from his company to a personal account in Beirut. He claimed he had $300,000 in additional commitments from a private investor in Ottawa. Defence counsel Richard Addelman argued at trial that this money was to have financed a housing project in Syria, which effectively controlled large swaths of Lebanon. Addelman said Roland Eid spent much time and effort organizing Canadian and other suppliers in preparation for the work. Financing was the key: Eid claimed that once the Syrians saw $2 million in his Lebanese bank account, they would match it. Eid's defence is that he had intended to return $2 million to ICI. But the Syrians did not produce the money. Eid also maintained - in an interview conducted before the trial began - that his Beirut bank temporarily froze the money that had been transferred from Ottawa. The RCMP conducted an initial investigation but put things on hold when it became apparent Eid was not keen to return to Ottawa. Canada does not have an extradition treaty with Lebanon. Then, to the surprise of nearly everyone, the Eids returned in 2012 equipped with emergency passports issued in Lebanon. Eid said he was on the run from Hezbollah, the Shia Muslim group. Starting in the late 1990s, Eid had been informing the Canadian Security Intelligence Service about the activities of certain members of the Lebanese community here and abroad. We know he was an informant because CSIS acknowledged his role in a reply to one of his an access-to-information requests. Eid last year launched a $24-million civil suit against the RCMP and CSIS, alleging that these government agencies "created the circumstances that led to the loss of ICI."

2. 10 Indonesian sailors return home after being released by Philippine militants.

Agence France Presse, 2016 05 02

Jakarta - Ten Indonesian sailors held hostage by Abu Sayyaf Islamic militants returned home on Sunday (May 1) after being freed in the southern Philippines, less than a week after the gunmen beheaded a Canadian captive. About five weeks after being abducted, the 10 tugboat crew turned up outside the house of the provincial governor on the remote Philippine island of Jolo. They flew back to Jakarta later the same day, arriving on a private plane at an air force base before being driven away in a minibus without speaking to reporters. Officials did not say if any ransom was paid for the 10 Indonesians. Abu Sayyaf does not normally free hostages unless a ransom is paid. There has been a recent upsurge of kidnappings in the strife-torn southern Philippines, and the Indonesians' release came just six days after Abu Sayyaf beheaded Canadian tourist John Ridsdel, for whom they had demanded a US$21 million ransom. Abu Sayyaf does not normally free hostages unless a ransom is paid. There has been a recent upsurge of kidnappings in the strife-torn southern Philippines, and the Indonesians' release came just six days after Abu Sayyaf beheaded Canadian tourist John Ridsdel, for whom they had demanded a US$21 million ransom. The authorities said the group is still holding at least 11 foreign hostages - four sailors from Indonesia and four others from Malaysia, a Canadian tourist, a Norwegian resort owner and a Dutch birdwatcher.

3. DFA: Philippines working for safe release of all Abu Sayyaf captives.

Philippine Star, 2016 05 02

Manila - The Philippines will continue working for the safe release of foreign nationals being held captive by the Abu Sayyaf group, the Department of Foreign Affairs said. "The Philippine Government is pleased at the positive developments resulting in the safe release of 10 Indonesian nationals abducted by the Abu Sayyaf on March 26, 2016," the DFA said in a statement released Monday. "While intensified operations continue on the ground, the DFA maintains close coordination with concerned foreign governments in ensuring the safe return of all the remaining hostages," it also said. The Abu Sayyaf still holds four Indonesian crew members of another tugboat seized on April 1 in the waters off Sempornah, Sabah and brought to Sulu. The group, which the Philippines and the US have categorized as a terrorist group, is also holding three remaining Samal tourists -- a Canadian, Norwegian, a Filipino woman -- a Dutch national, four Malaysians, a Chinese national and six other Filipinos. The release of the 10 Indonesian captives came almost a week since the Abu Sayyaf beheaded Canadian captive John Ridsdel after the deadline to pay a P300-million ransom lapsed.

4. ISIL inspires kidnapper copycats, expert says

Ottawa Citizen, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 05 02

Ottawa - It's like a high-stakes game of poker, except there's no walking away from the table. That's how Alan Bell describes what happens when a Canadian is kidnapped overseas and held for ransom. Bell is a former British special forces operative who has both kidnapped and helped rescue kidnap victims. In a recent interview, he talked about the dark and dangerous dance between negotiators and hostage-takers that takes place far more often than many Canadians may realize. "Kidnapping is the easiest crime in the world to commit," says Bell, who now runs Toronto-based security company Globe Risk International, which helps companies develop kidnap-response plans. "And everybody knows it. Organized criminals know it. Terrorists know it. Guerrillas, they know it as well." While actual statistics are difficult to find because most cases go unreported, it's widely believed the number of cases is on the rise, and Bell says there are two reasons for that. First, Canadian mining, oil and gas companies are being forced to go to ever more remote and dangerous places to find undeveloped reserves. Second, numerous guerrilla and terrorist groups in Africa, the Middle East and Asia have been inspired by ISIL. That is what should worry travellers. "Countries around the world where it was never sort of threatening, they're becoming dangerous because every single little organization is affiliating itself with ISIL and trying to outdo it or do exactly what it did with their brutality," he said.

5. La guerre éclate entre policiers et manifestants

La Presse+, Audrey Ruel-Manseau; Gabrielle Duchaine, 2016 05 02

Montréal - La marche se déroulait sans heurts, dimanche après-midi. Depuis une heure, les centaines de manifestants réunis pour dénoncer le capitalisme déambulaient sans itinéraire au centre-ville de Montréal. Puis, le groupe s'est arrêté devant le poste de quartier 20 du SPVM. C'est là que la rue Sainte-Catherine est devenue le théâtre d'un affront enflammé entre manifestants et policiers. Le rassemblement de la Convergence des luttes anticapitalistes (CLAC) au centre-ville de Montréal était organisé dans le cadre de la Journée internationale des travailleuses et travailleurs. Des manifestations de quartier convergeaient vers le centre-ville et les manifestants s'étaient donné rendez-vous devant l'entrée de l'Université McGill et au Square Philips, au coin des rues Sainte-Catherine et Union, à 15 h. Majoritairement vêtus de noir de la tête aux pieds, les manifestants réunis en ces deux lieux ont pris la rue simultanément. Ils se sont retrouvés à l'angle des rues Maisonneuve et Robert-Bourassa. De là, ils se sont de nouveau divisés. « On se sépare, c'est plus dur pour la police de nous suivre », criait un des participants pour scinder le groupe en deux. Des policiers, principalement à vélo, suivaient la marche sans toutefois s'immiscer. Ce rassemblement était, tel qu'écrit dans un communiqué de presse envoyé par la CLAC, « l'occasion de pointer du doigt certaines des entreprises et institutions financières les plus pourries et les plus violentes au pays, voire au monde, qui ont pignon sur rue dans notre ville ». Ainsi, les manifestants s'arrêtaient devant des endroits stratégiques tels que la tour KPMG, « une tour de capitalistes véreux », ou encore le 1145, rue Union, là où « depuis 1880, la haute bourgeoisie canadienne [...] se réunit dans un club privé (le Club Saint-James) pour les grands rendez-vous des estis de crosseurs » comme on l'entendait dans le porte-voix.

6. Les casseurs vite muselés

Journal de Montréal, Hugo Duchaine, 2016 05 02

Montréal - La stratégie policière a cette fois permis de limiter les débordements. Les centaines de policiers mis sur un pied d'alerte sont parvenus à museler rapidement la poignée de casseurs présents à la manifestation anticapitaliste, hier, au centre-ville de Montréal. Les policiers sont intervenus rapidement et en grand nombre afin d'éviter les débordements et procéder à quelques arrestations. Bien contenus, les débordements n'ont mené cette fois qu'à neuf arrestations, selon le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM). C'est beaucoup moins que les 80 arrestations effectuées lors du même événement l'an passé. La manifestation, qui a débuté à 15 h, s'est déroulée dans le calme pendant plus d'une heure, avant qu'un affrontement n'éclate devant le poste 20 sur la rue Sainte-Catherine. Des projectiles ont alors été lancés aux agents et deux vitrines du poste ont été fracassées. Les policiers ont riposté avec des fumigènes et des gaz irritants. Un avis de dispersion a ensuite été donné à la foule. Les manifestants se sont enfuis dans les rues avoisinantes, poursuivis par des agents. RÉPONSE DÉMESURÉE « C'est vrai qu'on a lancé des choses sur le poste de police, je comprends que les policiers aient répliqué», concède Bianca Buitrago-Poulin. Elle déplore cependant les poursuites en petits groupes ensuite menées par les agents. Zachary Gourd estime que les «policiers ont été très corrects, contrairement aux années précédentes » pendant la manifestation. Il déplore cependant la réponse démesurée lorsque certains manifestants ont «exagéré un peu». ANTICAPITALISME C'était la neuvième manifestation du 1er mai organisée par la Convergence des luttes anticapitalistes (CLAC). «Les inégalités s'agrandissent et il y a de moins en moins de classe moyenne», dénonce la manifestante Alia Gariépy.

7. Le terrorisme philippin ravivé sous la bannière de l'Etat islamique

Le Temps (Suisse), Harold Thibault et Bruno Philip, 2016 05 02

Jolo, Philippines - Le groupe Abou Sayyaf, ex-affidé d'Al-Qaida spécialisé dans la piraterie, a décapité la semaine dernière un otage canadien faute d'obtenir une rançon Les deux hommes en moto ont abandonné, le 25 avril, près de la mairie de Jolo, une île de l'extrême sud-ouest des Philippines, leur sac contenant la tête d'un otage. Le Canadien John Ridsdel, 68 ans, avait été kidnappé, le 21 septembre 2015 au soir, avec un compatriote et son épouse philippine, ainsi qu'un Norvégien, dans une marina sur une petite île faisant face à Davao, la principale ville de Mindanao, la grande île du sud. Son exécution par un groupe islamiste est venue rappeler au monde le risque terroriste qui pèse sur le pays. Après leur capture, les quatre otages avaient été transférés à 500 kilomètres de là, à Jolo, non loin de la Malaisie. Le groupe Abou Sayyaf (ASG selon l'acronyme anglais) avait exigé d'abord 1 milliard, puis finalement 300 millions de pesos (plus de 6 millions de francs) pour chacun d'entre eux, posant une échéance au 25 avril, soit deux semaines avant la tenue des élections générales. Le président Benigno Aquino a annoncé mercredi dernier que « d'intenses opérations » étaient en cours. « Il faut s'attendre à des victimes, mais la plus haute importance doit être donnée à la neutralisation des activités d'ASG », a déclaré le chef de l'Etat. Ce groupe terroriste créé en 1991 et longtemps affilié à Al-Qaida s'est trouvé une nouvelle raison d'être: l'organisation Etat islamique. Un meneur d'Abou Sayyaf, Isnilon Hapilon, a prêté allégeance à l'EI en 2014. Début janvier 2016, les militants de quatre groupes armés distincts de Mindanao sont apparus dans une vidéo, faisant allégeance à l'organisation, munis de son drapeau noir et blanc.

8. Payer des rançons ferait augmenter le nombre d'enlèvements

Agence QMI, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 02

Ottawa - La position du gouvernement de Justin Trudeau, qui ne verse pas de rançon aux preneurs d'otages, est la bonne, selon Jonathan Powell, qui a été chef de cabinet de l'ancien premier ministre britannique Tony Blair. M. Powell a aussi agi comme président du comité conjoint du renseignement. Dans une entrevue à Global News, il a affirmé qu'il y aurait davantage d'enlèvements si les gouvernements acceptaient de payer pour obtenir la libération des prisonniers. «Si vous payez une rançon, si les gouvernements paient des rançons, ils ne vont qu'encourager ces personnes à revenir et à prendre d'autres otages», a affirmé M. Powell, ajoutant: « Vous placeriez vos populations à risque, partout dans le monde.» L'organisation du G7 a adopté, il y a deux ans, une politique qui refusait le versement de rançon.

9. Philippine militants free 10 Indonesian hostages.

Associated Press, Jim Gomez, 2016 05 02

Manila - Abu Sayyaf militants have freed 10 Indonesian tugboat crewmen who were seized at sea in March and taken to a jungle encampment in the southern Philippines, officials said Sunday. The Indonesians appeared to be in good health when they were dropped off Sunday in front of the house of Sulu province's governor in the town of Jolo, said the town's police chief, Junpikar Sitin. The 10 men were then brought to a Philippine military camp, where arrangements were to be made for them to be turned over to Indonesian officials. Jolo's mayor, Hussin Amin, welcomed the release of the Indonesians, but said he was unaware whether a ransom had been paid. Abu Sayyaf gunmen beheaded a Canadian hostage in Sulu last Monday after they failed to receive a huge ransom by a deadline they had set. Philippine troops launched an offensive against the Abu Sayyaf after the beheading, and Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has vowed to help the Philippines bring the killers to justice.

10. We need to change the questions we ask about Muslims

Toronto Star, Azeezah Kanji, 2016 05 02

Op-ed: The new Environics survey of Muslims in Canada -- the sequel to their 2006 study -- includes some important pieces of data for contesting persistent, unfounded stereotypes. Many news reports headlined the fact that 83 per cent of Muslims feel "very proud" to be Canadian. It is also noteworthy that only 1 per cent of Muslim Canadians believe that "many" or "most" in the community support "violent extremists like Daesh." And only 3 per cent said they had ever seen or heard violent extremism being promoted in a mosque in Canada. But instead of simply heaving a sigh of relief, we should also ask: why the intense need to determine whether Muslims are dangerous/radicalizing to violent extremism/supportive of Daesh/proud to be Canadian, in the first place? These questions reveal as much about Canadian society as a whole as they do about the Muslim Canadian communities placed under scrutiny. These types of anxieties about Muslims are more a product of dominant narratives than a reflection of reality. After all, analyses by government agencies and academics indicate that far right-wing and white supremacist violence is a greater danger in North America than is political violence by Muslims -- but the right-wing and white-supremacist threat generally fails to stimulate the hand-wringing about "enemies within" elicited by reports of "radicalized Muslims." 11. CIA's Recounting of Bin Laden Raid Gets Mixed Reaction

Voice of America, Chris Hannas, 2016 05 02

Washington - The United States' ultra-secretive Central Intelligence Agency tweeted the details of an operation that killed a top terrorist leader Sunday, drawing thousands of retweets and likes from apparent supporters while others responded with criticism that ranged from "please don't" to "WTF?" The terrorist was al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden. The operation was the one President Barack Obama approved in May 2011 that involved special operations forces flying helicopters into a compound in Abbottabad, Pakistan and later dumping bin Laden's body into the sea. Twitter has been around since 2006, but the CIA is a relative newcomer with an account dating back just two years. The agency's 1,600 tweets usually involve its history, profiles of agents killed in service or public comments from current officials. But with the fifth anniversary of the bin Laden raid, the CIA announced it would "live" tweet the details as if they were happening again to its 1.3 million followers. Over the course of six hours, the tweets laid out the events that ultimately ended what had been a nearly decade-long search for the man whose organization killed nearly 3,000 people on September 11, 2001.

12. CIA Chief on ISIS: Not Just an Organization, 'It's a Phenomenon'

Meet The Press (NBC), Sally Bronston, 2016 05 01

Washington - On the fifth anniversary of the raid that killed Osama bin Laden, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency John Brennan spoke exclusively with NBC's Chuck Todd on "Meet the Press". In a wide-ranging interview, Brennan soberly discussed the threat of ISIS, dismissed allegations of Saudi Arabia's role in 9/11, and reacted to Donald Trump and the current political climate in the country. On the threat of ISIS, Brennan assured viewers, "We will destroy [ISIS], I have no doubt in my mind. And we have to remove the leadership that directs that organization to carry out these horrific attacks." ISIS' number one is Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, and if he were to be killed, Brennan believes it would have an affect on the terrorist group. "If we got Baghdadi, I think it would have a great impact on the organization, and it will be felt by them," he said. Brennan warned fighting ISIS has its unique challenges, calling them not just an "organization," but "a phenomenon." "We know that ISIS is trying to carry out attacks in Europe and in other parts of the globe. Also, we are working very, very closely with our European partners," he said. Brennan was careful not to oversell America's ability to affect change in the Middle East. "The United States has only limited influence to shape events in the Middle East. And a lot of individuals think that the United States can wave a magic wand, and we can't," the CIA Director said.

13. Former NSA head: US safer from terrorism than Europe

The Hill, Harper Neidig, 2016 05 01

Washington - Former National Security Agency (NSA) Director Gen. Michael Hayden said on Sunday he believes the U.S. is safer from terrorism than European countries. During a radio interview with John Catsimatidis, Hayden was asked if European nations are becoming larger targets than the U.S. "No question about it," Hayden responded. "Now, John, that doesn't mean there's no threat here. There are a variety of things that actually make us more safe." The first, Hayden said, is simply that Europe is closer to where groups like the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria operate. "Second is we're actually pretty good at this, John," he continued. "Our security services have a pretty good record compared to the European services, or at least to many of the European services."

14. Snowden: Without encryption, everything stops

The Hill, Rebecca Savransky, 2016 05 02

Encryption protects property," the former National Security Agency (NSA) contractor said during a debate with CNN's Fareed Zakaria that aired Sunday. "Without it, our economy stops. Our government stops. Everything stops." Snowden, who previously leaked documents revealing the extent of the NSA's surveillance program, said we are in the midst of the "greatest crisis in computer security in history." He said computer security bumped terrorism out of the top spot on our list of national security threats. "Our intelligence agencies say computer security is a bigger problem than terrorism, than crime, than anything else," he said.

15. Fears Isil could use Northern Ireland as 'back door' into UK

London Daily Telegraph, Kate McCann, 2016 05 02

London - Northern Ireland could become a backdoor route for Isil terrorists to launch an attack on the UK, security sources fear. Ministers have been warned that the region is an easy target for Islamist groups seeking to launch plots in the UK because the Prevent anti-terror strategy does not apply and police are focused on sectarian violence instead of external threats. Fears that terror cells could base themselves in the Republic of Ireland to plan an attack and then slip across the border, which is not closely monitored, have added to serious concerns in Whitehall. Two senior Government ministers admitted there is a problem with border security and warned there is a "blind spot" to Islamist terrorism in Northern Ireland, making the British mainland vulnerable. One said: "There is an issue to do with the open border because if you can get into southern Ireland you have got border-free access into the UK. So someone could come from abroad or be radicalised in Ireland and move easily across the border into the UK."

16. Isis sex slave kidnapped by British 'new Jihadi John' suspect Siddhartha Dhar (Canada)

The Independent (UK), Adam Withnall, 2016 05 02

London - A Yazidi teenager who was held as a sex slave by Isis says she was kidnapped and trafficked by the British jihadist and likely masked executioner Siddhartha Dhar. Nihad Barakat said the man who is widely suspected to be the so-called "new Jihadi John" from Isis propaganda videos is now one of the most senior commanders among foreign fighters in Mosul, the group's Iraqi stronghold. Dhar, a former British Hindu who preferred to go by the nickname Abu Rumaysah after his conversion to Islam, skipped police bail to travel to Syria with his wife and young children in 2014. When she fled Isis for the second time, Ms Barakat was helped by the Canadian charity CYCI, which pays local agents to get Yazidis out of captivity. It is a costly and controversial process.

17. Manus Island asylum seekers could get more than $125,000 in compensation, lawyer says

ABC (Australia), Richard Ewart, 2016 05 01

Canberra - An application will be heard today in Papua New Guinea's Supreme Court seeking compensation for detainees at the Manus Island immigration detention centre, after . Ben Lomai, the lawyer leading the case, says the application covers over 900 asylum seekers, and possible compensation could be in the vicinity of $125,000 per asylum seeker. "Right now we have filed for 600 asylum seekers and we are yet to process another 300 plus," Mr Lomai told the ABC. The numbers include those currently in the detention centre, as well as those that were there previously or others who had been transferred to Nauru. Mr Lomai said the compensation figure was calculated based on past damage compensation cases, in correlation with the average time each asylum seeker spent at the detention centre. It is still unclear whether Canberra or Port Moresby will be responsible for paying the compensation should the courts rule in their favour, but Mr Lomai said "we will be seeking to enforce the judgment against the Commonwealth of Australia". "The independent state of Papua New Guinea is named as one of those responsible," Mr Lomai said.

18. Shot teen Numan Haider 'set on fighting for Islamic State'

The Australian, Chip Le Grand, 2016 05 01

Canberra - Numan Haider was determined to travel to Syria and wage violent jihad for the emerging terror group ISIL months before he made the fatal decision to attack counter-terrorism detectives at a suburban police station, according to ASIO intelligence. A sworn statement by the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation case officer assigned to monitor Haider and disrupt his plans details the level of organisation behind the teenager's descent into extremism, which ended in his being fatally shot by police. The document reveals that as of June 2014, Haider was using a mobile phone falsely registered to vacant land, spoke in code to discuss his travel plans, took steps to avoid surveillance and had decided to fight for ISIL, soon to become Islamic State. The statement also details a July 2014 meeting between ASIO agents and Haider at his parents' home in Melbourne's Endeavour Hills, where the agency warned Haider about young Muslims becoming radicalised and travelling to Syria, and the extreme teachings of the Al-Furqan prayer group led by self-styled cleric Harun Mehicevic. Haider falsely claimed he had stopped attending Al-Furqan meetings. According to a statement sworn last week by case officer Julia Carrington and tendered as evidence at an inquest into the 18-year-old's death, Haider came to ASIO's attention in May 2014 as the unidentified owner of a mobile phone regularly in contact with a person of interest to ASIO connected to Al-Furqan. "ASIO knew Al-Furqan to be a place where an extremist form of Islam was discussed and where several men who had likely travelled to Syria had attended," it says. ASIO identified Haider as the phone's user and on June 12 obtained a warrant to intercept his calls and text messages. The intercepted material indicated that Haider was "security-aware, supporting of the group now referred to as Islamic State and intent on travelling to Syria". On June 29, ISIL leader Abu Bakr al- Baghdadi gave rise to Islamic State, declaring a caliphate in Iraq and Syria. While it was not illegal then for Australians to travel to Syria for humanitarian work, ASIO intelligence suggested this was not Haider's aim.

19. Afghan Taliban may return to negotiating table

The Express Tribune, Kamran Yousaf, 2016 05 02

Islamabad - The main faction of the Afghan Taliban led by Mullah Akhtar Mansoor may return to the negotiating table with Afghan government representatives despite escalating violence in Kabul which has dented peace efforts. The Taliban expressed their willingness to resume the fledgling peace process following recent talks between the group's interlocutors and Pakistani authorities in Islamabad, officials familiar with the development told The Express Tribune on Sunday. All of them spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. Last week, a three- member delegation from the Taliban's Qatar office travelled to Pakistan as part of the latest efforts to revive the fragile reconciliation process. Although the Taliban insisted the delegation visited Pakistan to discuss issues related to Afghan refugees and the border, officials said the trip's objective was to explore the possibility of direct talks with Kabul.

20. Govt requests to Facebook for user data rise sharply

Pakistan Dawn, Tauseef Razi Mallick, 2016 05 02

Karachi - The government made 471 requests to Facebook for data related to 706 accounts/users in the latter half of last year, marking a two-fold increase in the number of requests made to the social networking site during the first six months of 2015. The details were given in a bi- annual transparency report, "Global Government Requests Report", issued by Facebook recently. Between January and June of 2015, 192 such requests were made for data related to 275 users/ accounts, meaning that there was a 145 per cent jump in the number of requests made by the government to the social media giant during the second half of the year. The website said: "Based on legal requests from the Pakistan Telecom Authority, Facebook restricted access to six items that were alleged to violate local laws prohibiting blasphemy."

21. US to use further cuts to get Dr Afridi out

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 05 02

Washington - The US Congress, which last week withdrew funds for an F-16 deal to force Pakistan to act against the Haqqani network, is now considering another cut, this time to persuade Islamabad to release Dr Shakil Afridi. Congressional sources told Dawn that a group of Republican and Democratic lawmakers were working on a new measure to use aid cuts to get Dr Afridi out of prison. Dr Afridi, who assisted US efforts in tracking down Osama bin Laden but is now serving a 23-year prison term in Pakistan, is considered a hero in the United States. In January 2014, President Barack Obama signed a bill that proposed to withhold $33 million from assistance to Pakistan over Dr Afridi's detention. In May that year, the House of Representatives overwhelmingly passed another measure linking the provision of military aid to Pakistan to Dr Afridi's release. But congressional sources told Dawn that this year the lawmakers want a more substantial cut to force Pakistan to release Dr Afridi.

22. La Tidjaniya, arme secrète du « soft power » marocain en Afrique

Le Monde, Youssef Ait Akdim, 2016 05 02

Kano - Nigeria L'émir de Kano, entre islam et finance De Fès à Kano, en passant par Tivaouane et Kaolack au Sénégal, la Tidjaniya s'affirme comme la confrérie soufie la plus importante d'Afrique de l'Ouest. Elle puise pourtant ses sources au nord du Sahara, entre l'Algérie et le Maroc. Le nom de la tariqa (« confrérie ») vient de celui de son fondateur, Ahmed Tidjani (1737-1815), qui l'établit dans sa ville natale d'Ain Madhi, aux portes du désert oriental algérien. Mais c'est au Maroc voisin, à Fès, où il fut accueilli par le sultan alaouite Souleiman, qu'il est enterré. Son mausolée est l'objet d'un pèlerinage qui tient, pour ses adeptes, un rang presque aussi haut que celui de La Mecque. La zaouia (inzawa, « se retirer »), siège de la confrérie Tidjaniya au Maroc, est un atout maître dans les ressources de la diplomatie religieuse de Rabat en Afrique, que lui conteste d'ailleurs le pouvoir algérien. Les deux pays se disputent ainsi l'organisation des rencontres internationales de la confrérie. Après la première grand-messe des « tidjanes » mise en place par le gouvernement algérien en 2006, le royaume marocain a organisé à Fès, en mai 2014, un pèlerinage massif de dignitaires religieux d'Afrique de l'Ouest pour marquer le 200e anniversaire de la mort d'Ahmed Tidjani.

23. Sudanese shepherd gave away Bisha terrorist

Saudi Gazette, Abdullah Al-Qamshah, 2016 05 02

Bisha - A Sudanese shepherd, grazing sheep in a farm to the east of Bisha, has foiled an attempt of a terrorist to run away from the security forces surrounding the village by hiding in a mountain. The terrorist was one of two who were killed by the security forces on Friday. The terrorist, who was on the run, entered the farm and tried to persuade the shepherd with money to give him the keys of a car that was parked in the farm, supply him with water and clothes and allow him to use his mobile phone. The shepherd turned down the offer and informed the owner of the farm about the incident and asked him to come immediately so that they could confront the armed terrorist together. Shahrani said when a security patrol arrived at the scene, the armed man started firing randomly against all people in the farm, including the security men.

24. Dilma Rousseff, Facing Impeachment in Brazil, Has Alienated Many Allies

New York Times, Andrew Jacobs, 2016 05 02

Brasilia - As Dilma Rousseff wages a last-ditch battle to stave off impeachment and save her presidency, she has accused her rivals in Congress of creating turmoil, saying they are orchestrating a coup d'état to oust her. More than two-thirds of Brazil's lower house voted last month to approve an impeachment measure on charges that she illegally borrowed from state banks to plug budget holes. (She is not accused of stealing for her personal enrichment.) Many experts say the next step, a trial in the Senate that could begin in the coming weeks, will probably end in her removal. "I will struggle with all my might until the coup-mongers are defeated," Ms. Rousseff said in an interview. But many political analysts say Ms. Rousseff's slow-motion downfall can also be tied to an autocratic persona and a go-it-alone work style that has driven away scores of political allies, former staff members and cabinet ministers, many of whom have endured searing episodes of public humiliation. "She's alienated so many politicians and squandered the good will of so many people, in part because of her terrible political skills but also because of her arrogance," said Edson Sardinha, the editor of Congresso em Foco, a magazine that focuses on government corruption. "In her hour of need, very few people are willing to run to her defense."

25. 'Iranian rush' poses diplomatic challenges

Korea Herald, Bae Hyun-jung, 2016 05 02

Seoul - South Korea's efforts to improve relations with sanction- freed Iran, while providing new momentum for its economy, is likely to come with a few challenges for its diplomatic blueprint. Citing Iran's alleged military exchanges with North Korea, as well as its persisting tension with Middle East power Saudi Arabia, experts suggested that South Korea should maintain balance amid the multilateral frame. It was Iranian Ambassador to Korea Hassan Taherian who stepped out to clear doubts on Iran's partnership with nuclear-driven North Korea. South Korean Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se (left) shakes hands with Iranian counterpart Mohammad Javad Zarif, during talks in Tehran on Nov. 7, 2015. (Yonhap) "There is no military cooperation with North Korea whatsoever," he told reporters in a press conference, the week before President Park Geun-hye's departure to Tehran. The event is not only the first summit since the two countries established diplomatic channels in 1962, but also the first visit by a female state leader since the Islamic Revolution in 1979.

26. Abu Sayyaf Releases 10 Indonesian Sailors Held Hostage in Philippines (Canada)

New York Times, Floyd Whaley, 2016 05 02

Manila - Ten sailors from Indonesia who had been held hostage in the Philippines for more than a month were released on Sunday, officials from both countries said. President Joko Widodo of Indonesia said during a televised address in his country on Sunday night that the sailors were in good condition and would be flown to Jakarta immediately. The 10 men were kidnapped on March 26 from a tugboat that was passing through the pirate- infested waters of the southwestern Philippines. Indonesian officials said shortly afterward that ransom had been demanded from the sailors' company, but there was no confirmation from either country on Sunday that money had changed hands. The men were abducted by Abu Sayyaf, a militant organization that has functioned as a kidnap-for-ransom gang in the southern Philippines for more than two decades. Last week, after Abu Sayyaf beheaded a Canadian hostage, Mr. Aquino vowed again to kill or capture all members of the group. "We believe this is the result of continuing focused military operations we have been conducting," Restituto Padilla, a military spokesman, said of the sailors' release. "In order to move freely, they needed to let go of some of the hostages."

27. Police and military on red alert in south Philippines (Canada).

Gulf News, Barbara Mae Dacanay, 2016 05 02

Manila - The police and the military placed all forces on red alert nationwide after two political supporters died, and unidentified armed men bombed a church and seven schools in the southern Philippines ahead of the May 9 poll. "The order was given by Philippine National Police (PNP) chief Director General Ricardo Marquez," said PNP spokesman Chief Superintendent Wilben Mayor, adding that the south is an election hot-spot. AL Qaida and Daesh-linked Abu Sayyaf members were suspected to have carried out the bomb attack on the Catholic church as "a diversionary tactic," said Padilla, adding that joint military and police operations were launched against the Abu Sayyaf in their lairs in the south after they beheaded one Canadian captive and threw his head in a sack in front of the Jolo municipal hall on April 25.

28. 6 Potential Threats of Military Attack Deterred by Iranian Armed Forces' Power

Fars News Agency, 2016 05 02

Tehran - Deputy Chief of Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces Major General Mohammad Baqeri said 6 highly likely military attacks on Iran have been deterred in the last two decades due to the country's deterrence, including its missile, power. "After the end of the sacred defense (the Iraqi-imposed war against Iran 1980-1988), we have come under the threat of military aggression 6 times," General Baqeri said, addressing a ceremony in Tehran on Monday. He reminded the American officials' admission of their plots to attack Iran in the past, and said all their war plans failed due to the opposition of "the political class (in the US), on one hand, and our missile, naval and defensive deterrence, on the other hand". General Baqeri warned that while the threat of military attack against Iran has faded out today, the enemies are seeking an opportunity to implement their ominous plots as soon as they find the country in a weak defensive position.

29. Iraq Cleric's Followers Trigger Political Crisis

Wall Street Journal, Matt Bradley, Ghassan Adnan, 2016 05 02

Baghdad - Followers of a firebrand Shiite cleric who has long tormented the U.S. have triggered a crisis that threatens Iraq's political stability and hampers its efforts to fight Islamic State extremists. Protesters loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr stormed Baghdad's government seat, occupied the Iraqi parliament and even attacked a senior lawmaker. They withdrew Sunday, but a committee of Sadr supporters organizing the protests said demonstrators would return after an Islamic religious holiday which ends Tuesday, according to Iraqi state television. The turmoil thrust Iraq's fragile government into one of the biggest political crises of its young democracy at an important moment for U.S. officials who see stability in Baghdad as essential to the fight against Islamic State. Vice President Joe Biden visited Iraq last week, the highest ranking U.S. official to do so since 2011. U.S. officials expressed confidence the Iraqi government was addressing issues the protesters raised, and voiced hope that the government wouldn't be distracted from the fight against Islamic State. The protests showed Mr. Sadr's ability to shape events in Iraq at a perilous time. Low oil prices have gutted Iraq's economy and Islamic State controls about a fourth of its territory. And for nearly a month, amid chair throwing and fist fights, Iraq's parliament has failed to put enough lawmakers on the floor to vote on a new cabinet.

30. IRGC: No Role for Foreign Forces in Persian Gulf Security

Fars News Agency, 2016 05 02

Tehran - A senior commander of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps blasted deployment of foreign forces in the Persian Gulf as a source of instability, stressing that the IRGC, itself, is capable of establishing security in the region. "The foreign forces don't play any role in establishing security in the Persian Gulf and they are not helpful to regional stability," Commander of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps Second Naval Zone General Ali Razmjou said, addressing the IRGC commanders and forces in Bushehr province on Sunday. He, meantime, underlined the IRGC forces' high capability and power to deter the enemies' aggression and protect the Persian Gulf. Commander of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps Navy Rear Admiral Ali Fadavi in late March underlined Iran's deterrence power, and said 100 IRGC vessels are always deployed in the Persian Gulf to confront any threats.

Saudi Gazette, Maryam Al-Sughayar, 2016 05 02

Riyadh - Security expert and information security researcher Muhammad Amin revealed the number of cyber-attacks targeting the Kingdom last year was 60 million, a figure that made Saudi Arabia the most attacked country in the Middle East. He attributed the high number of cyber-attacks to the Kingdom's status and distinct role in the region in the political, financial and security arenas. "It is a country that is rich in oil and gas and it has potentials that criminals and other countries seek to take advantage of. All these factors make the Kingdom a target of these attacks, which is deemed the most prominent contemporary security problem," he said. Amin added that the government sectors recorded the most number of hacking attempts with oil, gas, financial and telecommunications sectors ranking among the most affected.

Riyadh - According to the security spokesman of the Ministry of Interior (MOI) MajGen Mansour Al-Turki, Saudi security forces thwarted, yesterday, an eminent terrorist attack and apprehended two explosive packed vehicles. During the fire exchanged with security men, the man believed to be the ring leader was reportedly killed. The clashes took place at a barren space located at the Asir governorate in the south-western Saudi Arabia. Authorities now go over monitoring video tapes in hopes of tracking down those who placed explosives, which were later detonated, at the city street police center in the Al-Ahsaa governorate (east side of the country). 35. The Giant Al Qaeda Defeat That No One's Talking About

Politico Magazine, Michael Morell, 2016 05 02

Comment - Something significant and positive just happened in the Middle East, and most Americans are not aware of it. The United Arab Emirates, under the banner of a Saudi-led coalition, late last month delivered a major blow to the most lethal Al Qaeda group on the planet - Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), the primary Islamic extremist group operating in Yemen. The Sunni Gulf states are often painted in the Western media as shying away from a fight, not being capable of a fight and not willing to deal with terrorists and extremists in their midst. The UAE operation in Yemen proved that none of these characterizations are true of Abu Dhabi. On the weekend of April 23-24, the Emirati military, with the support of the Yemeni military and local Yemeni tribes, seized from AQAP the strategically important city of Mukalla and the surrounding area. Mukalla, Yemen's fifth-largest city, hosts the country's second largest port--from which AQAP was earning substantial revenues by taxing the shipment of goods there. The city was to be the center of AQAP's Islamic emirate in Yemen. Its loss is a major blow to AQAP. It is the equivalent of the Islamic State losing Mosul or Raqqa. The military operation was well planned and executed. The Emiratis worked with local Yemeni tribes to secure their support for the operation, and the Emiratis trained a cadre of Yemeni soldiers to assist in the operation. The attack itself involved choreographed air, naval and ground operations. The operation, which some thought would take weeks, took only days. And now the coalition is shifting to operations to ensure that AQAP cannot return--to include the establishment of good governance in the area. It is a textbook solution of dealing with terrorist groups that hold territory. The implications of the Emirati operation are significant. It is the kind of military capability and willingness to act against terrorists that should become a model for other countries in the region. It is the kind of action that the United States should support--both with tangible assistance and public statements. And, it is the approach to dealing with terrorists holding territory that will work against other extremist groups, including the Islamic State, winning the support of local tribes, training local Sunni forces to take the fight to the enemy, and fighting ourselves where necessary. Note: Michael Morell is the former acting director and deputy director of the CIA.

36. 'There was nobody to help me stop my son joining Isis' (Canada)

The Guardian (London), Kate Connolly, 2016 05 02

Berlin - Scrolling through photos on her mobile phone, Saliha Ben Ali stops at a picture of her son, Sabri, as a three-year-old sitting on Father Christmas's lap. Santa's white-gloved hands envelope Sabri's small torso and that of the little boy sitting to his right. Both lads stare straight ahead, looking slightly bewildered. "To think, they were the only guys who were scared of Santa Claus that day," Ben Ali recalls. "Now both of them are dead." Sabri died in Syria aged 19, fighting for Isis, sometime between August 2013 and 8 December that year, when an unknown man telephoned Ben Ali's husband to tell them he had been killed. She is still haunted by the 10-second phone call in which the man said "congratulations, your son is a martyr". Bilal, the boy with whom Sabri shared Santa's lap as a toddler and later went to school with him in Brussels, died in Paris on 13 November 2015. He was the jihadi who detonated a suicide bomb outside the Stade de France football stadium during the murderous night of attacks. "I was stunned when Sabri did what he did," Ben Ali says. "I saw the signs before he went that something was wrong, that he was being manipulated, but there was nobody to help me. Then when I saw what Bilal did, I simply could not believe it." At the workshop in a communist-era prefab in Berlin, Ben Ali shares her experiences with two other mothers. Christianne Boudreau's son Damian Clairmont, 22, left his native Canada for Syria to fight alongside Isis in late 2012. She heard of his death via Twitter in January 2014. Karolina Dam, a New Zealand-born Danish citizen, lost her 18-year-old son Lukas a year ago when he was killed in the Syrian border town of Kobani during a US-led coalition airstrike.

37. Comment Europol lutte contre la propagande djihadiste sur Internet

Le Point, Marc Leplongeon, 2016 05 02

Paris - La communication de l'EI peut-elle être contrée ? Un officier supérieur du centre antiterroriste d'Europol répond aux questions du Point.fr. Cette cellule est composée de 17 personnes et a été mise en place très rapidement après les attentats de janvier 2015 contre Charlie Hebdo et l'Hyper Cacher de Vincennes. Le coeur de métier d'Europol est l'analyse criminelle. Historiquement, nous possédions un service appelé « check the web » dont l'objectif était de surveiller sur Internet toutes les sources ouvertes, c'est-à-dire les sources que tout le monde peut consulter. Nous suivons ainsi depuis une dizaine d'années l'évolution de la propagande terroriste et nous concentrons principalement sur deux groupes que sont Al- Qaïda puis l'État islamique (EI). Qui en sont les grands penseurs ? Quels thèmes sont le plus souvent abordés ? Vers quelles plateformes se tournent- ils pour diffuser leurs contenus ? C'est une approche très stratégique et basée sur une véritable expertise. Nous avons parmi nous des agents de nombreux pays, qui parlent donc plusieurs langues et qui sont spécialisés dans la propagande islamiste, celle du salafisme sunnite, notamment. On arrive à être « dans le temps » de la propagande. C'est effectivement une partie de notre activité. Mais soyons clairs : nous n'avons pas le pouvoir de supprimer nous-mêmes les contenus, nous ne faisons que des propositions aux plateformes qui les hébergent et nous centralisons les demandes des États membres. Cela permet d'instaurer une relation de confiance et de longue durée avec nos interlocuteurs. Les chiffres sont encourageants. Depuis notre création en juillet dernier, nous avons évalué 7 300 contenus et avons fait 6 400 propositions de retrait. 94 % de nos demandes ont été acceptées par les plateformes.

38. En Allemagne, une troisième force politique à droite toute (Canada)

Berlin - Le parti populiste allemand a confirmé, lors de son congrès, son rejet de l'islam et sa proximité avec la Russie de M. Poutine. Déjà bien implantée dans plusieurs États-régions, Alternative pour l'Allemagne (Alternative für Deutschland-AfD), qui tenait son congrès à Stuttgart (Bade-Wurtemberg) les 30 avril et 1er mai, pourrait devenir la troisième force politique allemande à l'issue des prochaines élections législatives de l'automne 2017. Derrière l'Union chrétienne-démocrate (CDU) et le Parti social-démocrate (SPD) mais devant Die Linke, la gauche radicale, et les Verts. Comment qualifier ce parti créé en 2013 contre l'euro mais qui, depuis l'exclusion de ses fondateurs en 2015, n'avait pas de programme? «Conservateur et libéral», comme l'affirment ses deux présidents Frauke Petry et Jörg Meuthen, ou nationaliste, voire d'extrême droite, comme les propos et le comportement de certains de ses dirigeants le laissent penser? Le congrès de ce week-end n'a pas levé l'ambiguïté. L'AfD a également décidé d'interdire les minarets, les appels des muezzins et le voile intégral. Les congressistes ont sifflé un délégué qui préconisait de dialoguer avec les représentants de cette religion en Allemagne. Le parti est contre l'abattage des animaux selon les rites juif et musulman. Les congressistes n'ont approuvé qu'en extrémis la possibilité pour l'Allemagne d'accueillir des immigrants qualifiés « sur le modèle canadien ».

39. Islam doesn't belong in Germany, insists hard-right party

London Times, David Charter, 2016 05 02

Berlin - A hard-right German party that is third in national polls sharpened its antiimmigrant stance yesterday by declaring that "Islam does not belong" in the country. Alternative for Germany (AfD), which was founded three years ago to oppose the euro, confirmed its anti-Islam stance at a manifesto-writing conference that also called for a ban on minarets, the burka and the Muslim call to prayer. The move was a direct riposte to Angela Merkel, who said last year in the face of growing anti-immigrant feeling that Islam did "belong to Germany". That was before the influx of more than one million migrants seeking asylum -- many from Islamic countries -- which further polarised opinion. Polling yesterday put support for AfD on 13 per cent, putting it third behind Mrs Merkel's Christian Democratic Union and her coalition partners, the Social Democratic party.

Voici, point par point, ce qu'on peut en retenir. . Plus de tolérance dans un climat tendu Pour mesurer le degré de tolérance en France, la CNCDH utilise une sorte de thermomètre national qu'elle a baptisé «indice longitudinal de tolérance». Plus les Français se montrent ouverts d'esprit, plus cet indice est élevé.

Face à cette crise, les politiques d'aide de l'Occident sont insuffisantes, quand elles ne se fourvoient pas Ancien directeur à la Banque mondiale et à l'Agence -française de développement (AFD), conseiller de plusieurs gouvernements africains, Serge Michailof est engagé depuis près de quarante ans dans les questions de développement. Dans son dernier - livre, Africanistan. L'Afrique en crise va-t-elle se retrouver dans nos banlieues? (Fayard, 2015), il dresse un parallèle entre la situation au Sahel et en Afghanistan. Vous craignez que de la crise actuelle au Sahel émerge un nouvel Afghanistan. D'autres Etats sont-ils susceptibles de s'effondrer comme le Mali en 2012? La comparaison à laquelle je procède a été parfois jugée excessive. Pourtant je persiste et signe. Ces régions n'ont rien de commun sur les plans géographique, historique ou culturel, mais elles partagent de graves fra-gilités structurelles : une démographie qui va dans le mur, une agriculture en panne, une misère rurale dramatique - moins de 0,5 % d'accès à l'électricité -, pas de création -d'emplois, une montée des tensions pour l'accès à la terre, à l'eau et aux pâturages, une aggravation des fractures ethniques et religieuses, la dissémination d'armes légères et une immense faiblesse des institutions publiques, qui fait que l'Etat est absent dès que l'on sort des villes.

43. Turkish Drones Target ISIS in Syria, Kill 34

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 05 02

Istanbul - The Turkish military stated that shelling by Turkish artillery and drones which were launched from southern Turkey struck ISIS targets in Syria on Sunday, killing 34 militants. Turkish howitzers and multiple rocket launchers first hit ISIS targets about 12 km (seven miles) south of the border, then four drones that took off from the Incirlik base in southern Turkey destroyed further targets, the military explained. The strikes, which destroyed six vehicles and five gun positions for ISIS, came in retaliation to ISIS rocket attacks on Sunday when four rockets fired from Syria hit the Turkish border town of Kilis and wounded eight people. The border town of Kilis and surrounding area has been hit frequently by rocket fire from ISIS-controlled Syrian territory in recent months, killing civilians. In the past year, Turkey has also witnessed suicide bombings linked to the ISIS as well as attacks linked to Kurdish militants.

1. Comment le Canada se protège contre le terrorisme?

La Presse canadienne, Ugo Giguère avec Adrian Wyld, 2016 05 29

Une synthèse des mécanismes de défense en place au Canada a été réalisée par deux analystes de la Bibliothèque du Parlement. Voici comment travaillent les services de sécurité face aux différentes menaces. Radicalisation - Mobilisation citoyenne: La Table ronde transculturelle sur la sécurité, formée de citoyens de différentes collectivités, fournit au gouvernement des avis sur l'impact des politiques et des programmes de sécurité nationale. - La Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) et le ministère de l'Immigration, des Réfugiés et de la Citoyenneté du Canada (IRCC) mobilisent les communautés ethniques, culturelles et religieuses. - Les autorités disposent aussi de pouvoirs de surveillance, de recherche, d'écoute électronique et de perquisitions après obtention d'ordonnances de la cour. Planification d'attaques terroristes - Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS): Il utilise des sources humaines pour enquêter sur les menaces. Depuis 2015, il dispose de pouvoirs précis pour exercer des activités à l'étranger. - 280 ententes avec des organismes étrangers appuient ses activités. - Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST): Il recueille de l'information sur les signaux électromagnétiques étrangers. Il offre aussi une aide opérationnelle aux autorités et au SCRS. Il est autorisé à intercepter des communications.

2. No Gitmo here

Globe and Mail, 2016 05 30

Editorial: The long, painful and messy in-camera trials of Mahmoud Jaballah may have finally come to an end after almost two decades - or so it is to be hoped. Mr. Jaballah, an Egyptian carrying a false Saudi passport, first arrived in Canada claiming refugee status. Quite likely, he did have a reasonable fear of persecution that would entitle him to the protection of the UN Refugee Convention. But the government also believed he had a whiff of violent religious fundamentalism about him, and a suspicion of guilt by association with jihadists. So Canada couldn't just send him back to the cruel prisons of Hosni Mubarak's Egypt. But the Canadian authorities also believed they could not allow him to live at large in this country. So they decided to detain him, but without trying him. Within a few years, the fact that several men were being held under "security certificates" in cases more or less like Mr. Jaballah's, for indefinite time periods, without knowledge of all the evidence against them, was realized to be a scandal against Canada's values and the rule of law. In 2007, the Conservative government introduced the Special Advocates Program, so that some lawyers could examine the evidence against people detained in this way, and act on their behalf, questioning the government's allegations, though without actually disclosing the evidence to the detainees. Last week, Justice Dolores Hansen of the Federal Court of Canada detailed reasons showing a number of weaknesses in the government's evidence against Mr. Jaballah. For example, a CSIS agent was found to have confused "an Afghan refugee camp" with "a refugee camp in Afghanistan" - not proof that he was ever in Afghanistan. As a result, the most recent security certificate against Mr. Jaballah, who has been under house arrest for some time, has been declared to be unreasonable.

3. The Daesh files

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard and Andrew Bailey, 2016 05 30

Toronto - Entry date. Blood type. DOB and Nationality. Education. Employment. Would you like to be a fighter, martyr, security guard or administrator? These are the questions Daesh recruits answer on an entry form when joining the group. Bureaucracy is not something that leaps to mind when thinking of terrorists, but Daesh has proven meticulous in its record-keeping and data entry. In recent months, Daesh defectors have been leaking these to journalists and academics, providing an intriguing snapshot of who joins the group and how. One database, which lists more than 4,000 members, including information on 16 Canadians, was shared by researcher Amarnath Amarasingam and analyzed by Toronto Star data specialist Andrew Bailey. The most striking information gleaned is the vast diversity of recruits, debunking theories that there is a common Daesh profile. Of the 4,078 entries, the average birth year is 1988, which means most recruits were 25 or 26 when they arrived in Syria between 2013 and 2014, the period covered by the database. But more than 770 recruits are under the age of 21. Information about the Canadians matched 12 names already public - recruits from Ontario, Alberta and Quebec. The identities of the remaining four cannot be confirmed, including a 30-year-old Toronto man who goes by the name Abu Musa al Kanadi and says he was a chemical engineering student. He did not include any contact numbers in his registration form. A man who answered the phone number listed by another Canadian man said he had already spoken to CSIS and the RCMP but that his brother was in Saskatchewan, not Syria. He would not provide contact information. The number of recruits going to Syria peaked in July 2014, after Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi declared the group's caliphate. The categories that list recruiters and those who facilitate travel would likely be valuable intelligence for law enforcement agencies trying to stem the flow of fighters. Four of the Canadians in the database - Zakria Habibi and Samir Halilovic from Sherbrooke, Que., as well as a Montreal recruit and Abu Musa al Kanadi - list al-Shimali as their contact and state they entered through Jarabulus. There are 19 others who list Canada as a country where they had travelled before coming to Syria. Among them is Erius Alliu, an Albanian-born American, who stated that he had lived as a child in Greece before moving with his family to Canada in 2002. Seven years later, he moved to Boston and worked as a cook before travelling to Syria in 2014. The 19-year-old claims he paid a taxi driver in Turkey $650 to reach the border and then paid another $400 to be smuggled into Syria.

4. Khalistan terror camp in Canada plotting attacks in Punjab: India to Trudeau govt

Times of India, Rohan Dua, 2016 05 30

Chandigarh - Almost six months after the Pathankot terror attack, intelligence agencies have sent an alert to Canada's Justin Trudeau government, saying that pro-Khalistan terrorists are running a camp near Mission city in British Columbia to carry out strikes in Punjab. According to a report prepared by Punjab intelligence sleuths, Canadian Sikh Hardeep Nijjar has taken over as the operational head of Khalistan Terror Force (KTF) and formed a module comprising Sikh youths to carry out the attacks. The Punjab government has already submitted the report to the ministry of external affairs and ministry of home affairs to seek Nijjar's extradition. The report makes a reference to the January 2 Pathankot airbase attack, saying Nijjar "was to arrange weapons from Pakistan but due to high alert on the border in the wake of Pathankot incident, it could not materialise".

5. U.S. ambassador says Arctic Council a good venue to co-operate with Russia

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 05 30

Ottawa - The U.S. envoy to Canada says the Arctic Council is a great venue for his country to talk to Russia despite Moscow's differences with the West over Ukraine. Ambassador Bruce Heyman told The Canadian Press important progress can be made by the full engagement with the eight-country council in dealing with a wide range of issues, including environmental protection and maritime safety. The U.S. took over the rotating chairmanship of the council last year from Canada, and Heyman is bound for the Arctic on a nine-day diplomatic tour departing Sunday to more than a dozen locations with his fellow Ottawa-based envoys. The trip comes after the March 10 meeting at the White House between Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and President Barack Obama, where the two leaders affirmed environmental co-operation in the Arctic. The Liberals have come under fire from the Conservative opposition for their desire to open diplomatic dialogue with Russia. The Conservatives accuse the Liberals of being disloyal to Ukraine, which has been dealing with Russian aggression across its eastern borders since 2014 when its Crimean peninsula was unilaterally annexed. Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion has said it is in Canada's national interest to talk to Russia, especially about the Arctic, but the Conservatives say that amounts to cosying up to Russian President Vladimir Putin.

6. Un Canadien détenu depuis deux ans connaîtra bientôt son verdict

La Presse canadienne, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 30

Dubaï - Un verdict devrait être rendu cette semaine concernant les accusations déposées contre un Canadien emprisonné depuis deux ans aux Émirats arabes unis (ÉAU), une détention que les proches de l'homme et des groupes de défense des droits de la personne estiment arbitraire. Le procès de Salim Alaradi avait commencé pour des accusations liées au terrorisme avant que ces dernières soient brusquement retirées en mars et remplacées par des infractions de moindre importance. M. Alaradi a immigré au Canada en provenance des ÉAU en 1998, mais est retourné dans ce pays en 2007 afin de lancer une entreprise d'électroménagers. Il était en vacances avec sa famille à Dubaï lorsqu'il a été arrêté, en août 2014. Il faisait partie d'un groupe de 10 hommes d'origine libyenne appréhendés à peu près à la même époque.

7. What happened to the Toronto 18 plotters?

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard, 2016 05 30

Toronto - A decade ago, 18 suspects were rounded up in what remains Canada's largest terrorism case since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Eleven were convicted, while seven were either acquitted or had their charges stayed or withdrawn. One of the four youths arrested was convicted and sentenced in 2009 but released immediately, given credit for pretrial custody. Only four of those convicted remain behind bars today. Below are the cases of the 10 convicted adults and where they are now. ZAKARIA AMARA Born: Jordan, Aug. 18, 1985 Trial: Pleaded guilty in October 2009 and was sentenced to life. He appealed but the Ontario Court of Appeal upheld the sentence. The Supreme Court of Canada turned down an appeal to hear the case in 2013. Today: Serving his sentence at an undisclosed federal penitentiary. Parole: Will be eligible for full parole on June 2. Case: Amara converted to Islam from Christianity around the age of 10, two years before he came to Canada. He dropped out of Ryerson University to support his family and worked at a Canadian Tire gas bar. The group of suspects eventually split in two, with Amara and some of his friends plotting to blow up downtown Toronto targets. They built and tested a remote-controlled detonator and ordered three tonnes of ammonium nitrate to be used in truck bombs.

8. Governments Turn to Commercial Spyware to Intimidate Dissidents (Canada)

New York Times, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 05 30

San Francisco - In the last five years, Ahmed Mansoor, a human rights activist in the United Arab Emirates, has been jailed and fired from his job, along with having his passport confiscated, his car stolen, his email hacked, his location tracked and his bank account robbed of $140,000. He has also been beaten, twice, in the same week. Mr. Mansoor's experience has become a cautionary tale for dissidents, journalists and human rights activists. It used to be that only a handful of countries had access to sophisticated hacking and spying tools. But these days, nearly all kinds of countries, be they small, oil-rich nations like the Emirates, or poor but populous countries like Ethiopia, are buying commercial spyware or hiring and training programmers to develop their own hacking and surveillance tools. The barriers to join the global surveillance apparatus have never been lower. Dozens of companies, ranging from NSO Group and Cellebrite in Israel to Finfisher in Germany and Hacking Team in Italy, sell digital spy tools to governments. A number of companies in the United States are training foreign law enforcement and intelligence officials to code their own surveillance tools. In many cases these tools are able to circumvent security measures like encryption. Some countries are using them to watch dissidents. Others are using them to aggressively silence and punish their critics, inside and outside their borders. "There's no substantial regulation," said Bill Marczak, a senior fellow at the Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs, who has been tracking the spread of spyware around the globe. "Any government who wants spyware can buy it outright or hire someone to develop it for you. And when we see the poorest countries deploying spyware, it's clear money is no longer a barrier."

9. CIA ex-boss: secretive spooks tolerated in UK more than in US

The Guardian (London), Mark Brown, 2016 05 30

London - British people are not demanding more transparency from the intelligence services as loudly as Americans, the former director of the US National Security Agency (NSA) and CIA has said. Michael Hayden played a pivotal, leading role in American intelligence until he was replaced as director of the CIA shortly into the presidency of Barack Obama. In a wide-ranging talk on the fourth day of the Hay festival, Hayden addressed CIA torture, targeted killings, what he thinks about Edward Snowden and how Facebook is perhaps a greater threat to privacy than government. Hayden said the security services were changing faster in the US than the UK. "You as a population are far more tolerant of aggressive action on the part of your intelligence services than we are in the United States," he said.

10. Cyber attacks on Lloyds drop 80pc

London Daily Telegraph, Tim Wallace, 2016 05 30

London - Lloyds Banking Group has seen an 80pc drop in cyber attacks as online criminals and fraudsters have switched their attention to other industries. Banks have been under increasing pressure from hackers, driving the Bank of England to include cyber attacks in reports on the key risks to the financial sector. Business group TheCity-UK warned that 75pc of fraud is now online, often through malicious email scams, indicating the scale of fraud entering the digital world. Yet Miguel-Ángel Rodríguez-Sola, Lloyds' digital boss, said there has been a sudden drop in cyber attacks on banks. "There had been an increase in the UK in terms of cyber attacks, between June and February this year," he said, noting that denial of service (DDOS) attacks became particularly common. "However, over the last two months I have had fivetimes less than at the end of last year."

11. Probe into UK intelligence hub after whistleblower claims Pentagon issued 'misleading' information

i News (UK), Cahal Milmo, 2016 05 30

London - Plans to turn a Northamptonshire RAF base into one of Washington's largest intelligence hubs are in the balance after a Pentagon watchdog agreed to open an investigation into the decision to site the £200m centre in Britain. Senior Congress leaders called for an inquiry after saying they had been passed information from whistleblowers alleging that the Pentagon used "inaccurate or misleading" information to justify its choice of RAF Croughton, near Milton Keynes, for an ultra-secure intelligence analysis centre covering US operations in Europe and Africa. Documents obtained by i show that the inspector general of US Department of Defence has now agreed to investigate the process that led to the selection of the UK air base, which already acts as a major US secret intelligence centre and has a direct cable link to Britain's GCHQ in Cheltenham. RAF Croughton is known to serve as a relay station for CIA agent communications and has been at the centre of claims that it acts as a support site for US drone strikes carried out in the Middle East. The Pentagon yesterday rejected the claims that the selection process was not properly followed and insisted that the British base remains the "optimal location" for its new Joint Intelligence Analysis Complex (JIAC).

12. Student seeks compensation after terror charges collapse

London Times, Jeremy Watson, 2016 05 30

London - A medical student is seeking compensation after a case against him involving serious terror charges collapsed. Yousif Badri, 30, became the first person in Scotland to be charged under three sections of the Terrorism Act 2000, after being suspected of planning a serious act of violence in the aftermath of Lee Rigby's murder. On May 22, 2013, Fusilier Rigby, a British Army soldier, was attacked and killed by Michael Adebolajo and Michael Adebowale near the Royal Artillery Barracks in Woolwich, southeast London. Mr Badri was arrested by police in June 2013 as he went into a Sainsbury's store for a sandwich. Detectives found a large tub of nails at his flat but no hammer and concluded they could be an ingredient for a bomb. However, he was cleared of any wrongdoing at the High Court in Glasgow last October. In a move dubbed "unusual" by legal sources, Judge Lord Turnbull told the jury that he "wholeheartedly agreed" when they returned the not guilty verdicts.

13. Lead negotiator had no hostage experience

Australian Associated Press, Karlis Salna, 2016 05 30

Sydney - The primary police negotiator during the Lindt Cafe siege had never before worked in a hostage situation and had no counter-terrorism experience other than role playing with colleagues, an inquest has heard. The senior sergeant, identified only as "Peter", has also told the inquest into the December 2014 siege at Martin Place in Sydney that he had never before been involved in an operation where the offender had refused to directly communicate with negotiators. The officer, who has been with NSW Police for more than 29 years, had just four weeks of formal training as a negotiator, including an initial course at Goulburn in 2004, and two subsequent weeks in 2005 and 2006. He undertook a counter-terrorism course in 2009, which included some training in relation to Islamic extremism. But the inquest into the siege, during which hostages Tori Johnson and Katrina Dawson, as well as gunman Man Haron Monis were killed, heard on Monday that Peter had never before worked in a hostage situation, or a counter-terrorism operation. Asked by counsel assisting the coroner, Jason Downing, why he was picked to be the primary negotiator, he responded: "I think that at the time Reg just said 'go primary'."

16. Bouira Des femmes et des enfants otages des terroristes ?

Le Soir (Algérie), H.M., 2016 05 29

Bouira, Algérie - L'opération militaire déclenchée le 17 mai dernier et qui s'est soldée, pour le moment, par l'élimination de 11 terroristes et la capture d'un douzième, se poursuit toujours mais est en butte, depuis mardi dernier, à une sorte de blocage. Selon des sources sécuritaires sûres, depuis mardi, les chefs militaires qui supervisent cette opération depuis leur QG installé sur les hauteurs de la crête Ighil Zeggagh, que nous avons déjà évoquée au début de cette opération et qui domine cette forêt, sont confrontés à un dilemme : les trois terroristes qui restent du groupe encerclé depuis le début et qui était composé de quinze individus, selon les informations précises fournies aux militaires par un terroriste capturé vivant au tout début de l'opération, se seraient retranchés dans une casemate dans laquelle vivaient, depuis plusieurs mois, des femmes et des enfants. Aussi, et selon toujours notre source, ces familles des terroristes auraient été utilisées pour le moment comme véritable bouclier par ces trois terroristes parmi lesquels un certain Gerrache Boudjemâa, un terroriste notoire, ancien du GSPC et d'Aqmi et qui aurait rallié récemment le groupe Jund Al Khalifa, qui avait fait allégeance à Daesh. Outre cela, et toujours selon notre source, c'est parce que ces trois terroristes, qui sont étrangers à la région, n'auraient aucun lien avec les familles qui vivaient jusque-là dans ces casemates, qu'ils sont prêts à se faire exploser et refusent toute négociation avec les miliaires.

17. La culture face au terrorisme au coeur d'un débat à l'Alecso

Le Temps d'Algérie, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 29

Tunis - 65 pour cent des jeunes adhérant aux organisations terroristes sont âgés entre 17 et 19 ans, tels sont les chiffres avancés par une étude présentée vendredi par la psychologue spécialisée en adolescence, Lilia Bouguerra, dans le cadre du forum organisé par l'Organisation arabe pour l'éducation, la culture et les sciences (ALECSO) portant sur le thème "Le rôle du tourisme culturel dans la lutte contre le fléau du terrorisme auprès des jeunes" au siège de l'Alecso à Tunis. Tirant la sonnette d'alarme quant à ce fléau dont les jeunes sont la première cible, l'étude portant sur les aspects sanitaires, psychologiques et sociaux des adolescents détenus pour des affaires liées au terrorisme a touché un échantillon de 200 filles et garçons âgés entre 13 et 23 ans, détenus actuellement soit à la prison de Mornaguia ou à Bouchoucha. Lilia Bouguerra a fait remarquer qu'une enfant de 10 ans a été impliquée dans une affaire terroriste. Ceci pour dire que ces groupes ont recours à l'élément masculin pour le front laissant la gente féminine pour des occupations logistiques ou d'accompagnement. Pour elle, les résultats de cette étude concordent parfaitement avec les études réalisées dans le monde tenant à signaler que le jeune qui se trouve généralement adolescent, ayant connu l'échec dans sa scolarité et sans emploi dispose de ce point de vue de beaucoup de temps libre ce qui le laisse le plus influencé et attiré à la dérive et à la délinquance.

18. Mali: 5 casques bleus tués dans une attaque "terroriste"

Agence France-Presse, Serge Daniel, 2016 05 29

Bamako - Cinq Casques bleus ont été tués dimanche dans une embuscade "terroriste" dans le centre du Mali, une première dans cette région, alors que le pays connaît depuis une dizaine de jours une recrudescence des attaques meurtrières contre l'armée et les soldats de l'ONU. Ce nouvel assaut contre la Mission de l'ONU au Mali (Minusma) n'a pas été immédiatement revendiqué. La mission des Nations unies a rapporté qu'une attaque "terroriste" l'avait visée dimanche aux environs de 11H00 (locale et GMT), ciblant "un convoi de la force de la Minusma, pris dans une embuscade à 30 km ouest de (la ville) de Sévaré", dans la région de Mopti. "Selon les informations préliminaires, cinq Casques bleus ont été tués. Un autre a été grièvement blessé et son évacuation médicale est en cours", a ajouté la mission dans un communiqué. Cette attaque survient quelques jours seulement après la mort vendredi de cinq soldats maliens, tués dans l'explosion d'une mine au passage de leurs véhicules entre les localités d'Ansongo et d'Indelimane, dans le nord du Mali, selon l'armée. Et cinq Casques bleus tchadiens avaient déjà été tués le 18 mai, dans une autre embuscade au nord d'Aguelhoc, dans le nord-est du Mali. L'attaque avait été revendiquée par un cadre du groupe jihadiste malien Ansar Dine, allié à Al-Qaïda et qui a contrôlé le vaste nord du Mali pendant près de dix mois, entre 2012 et janvier 2013.

19. 3 N. Korean defectors may arrive in S. Korea this week: Yonhap

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 05 30

Seoul - Three North Korean defectors, who fled from a restaurant where they worked in China, may arrive in South Korea as early as this week, Yonhap News Agency reported on Monday. The defectors, all women in their late 20s, are staying in Thailand, waiting to board a flight to Seoul, after leaving a North Korean-run restaurant in the northwestern Chinese province of Shanxi, the report said, citing an unnamed source. Last month, a group of 12 female workers and their male manager, who had been working at another North Korean restaurant in China, fled to South Korea in a rare en masse defection. North Korea operates dozens of restaurants in China and other Asian countries as part of its efforts to earn hard currency. Their employees are said to come under strict scrutiny from North Korean authorities. South Korea's government estimates that North Korea rakes in about $10 million each year through those restaurants. (Full report)

20. China denies media report of secret nuclear deal with N. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 05 30

Beijing - China denied a media report on Monday that Beijing and Pyongyang recently inked a secret deal for which North Korea would receive food aid from China in return for holding back on conducting its fifth nuclear test. Citing unidentified sources in Beijing, the U.S.-based website "Boxun," which often publishes critical reports on the Chinese Communist Party, reported on Sunday that the secret deal was made earlier this month after a Chinese special envoy was dispatched to Pyongyang. China sent the envoy to Pyongyang after receiving intelligence that North Korea could conduct another nuclear test to celebrate the end of a rare congress of the North's ruling Workers' Party, according to the report. China's foreign ministry spokeswoman Hua Chunying, when asked about the report, replied, "I wonder where you saw the report. I have not heard about that." But, Hua said, "As close neighbors, China and North Korea are in close communication through different channels." North Korea wrapped up its first party congress in 36 years earlier this month that cemented leader Kim Jong-un's grip on power and enshrined a policy of simultaneously pursuing nuclear advances and economic development.

21. S. Korea shipped US$350,000 worth of defense goods to Uganda in past 3 yrs

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 05 30

Seoul - South Korea exported defense goods totaling some US$350,000 to Uganda over the past three years, data showed Monday as the African country vowed to cut off security and military cooperation with rival North Korea. According to the data by the Ministry of National Defense and the Defense Acquisition Program Administration, South Korea shipped some $320,000 worth of bulletproof vests and helmets in 2013 to Uganda. The equipment was sent to Uganda's defense ministry. In 2014, $20,000 worth of South Korean grenades were shipped to Uganda, while another $10,000 worth of flares were exported in 2015, the data also showed. During the three-year period, however, South Korea did not buy any defense goods from the African country. Uganda currently maintains a 45,000-strong military force, with an annual defense budget of $400 million. In August last year, South Korea set up military attache offices in Uganda and Ethiopia as it reached out to the African region. "The establishment of the military attache office in Uganda was carried out in consideration of the fact that Uganda was keeping friendly relations with North Korea," a military official here said.

"We monitored a cyber attack on May 24 which was conducted from three countries and led by hackers in Saudi Arabia and they launched deceive attacks on the Statistical Center of Iran and of course such an attack is not important technically," Hadianfar told reporters in Tehran on Sunday. He also dismissed any relations between the hackers and the ISIL terrorist group, and said, "The hacker already had a hacking record and was identified by FATA." Hadianfar also rejected Iran's retaliatory measures against Saudi Arabia, and said Tehran has sent the IPs to the Interpol and Saudi Arabia's Cyber Police and is pursuing the case but there is no reason to think that the Saudi government has been involved in the attack.

Dubai - Cyber criminals can easily hack user's personal information from public WiFi networks as hackers rely on the fact that many people are relaxed about the security of the networks they connect to. Public WiFi is everywhere and as it gains popularity in the region, with free connections available in most public places but there are also dangers surrounding it. Gemalto staged a live hacking demonstration to highlight the dangers of public WiFi networks and how users can protect themselves and their personal information from hackers in Dubai on Wednesday. The company has revealed how cyber criminals can easily use public WiFi networks to access private information on users' devices. 25. Iran Chooses to Deprive its Citizens From Performing Hajj After its Indecisive Stance

Riyadh - For the second time, the Iranian delegation in charge of discussing Hajj arrangements for Iranian citizens with officials at the Saudi Ministry of Hajj and Umrah left the city of Jeddah yesterday without signing the protocol for the arrangements. The protocol was not signed despite the delegation changing their minds about their refusal to sign it the first time round and arriving in Jeddah where a preliminary agreement was signed on Wednesday. However, the delegation later returned and refused to sign the final agreement the day after. The Ministry of Hajj and Umrah yesterday said that continuous meetings that lasted several hours were held on Wednesday and Thursday. Despite this, the delegation "expressed its desire to leave without signing the protocol concerning the arrangements for their pilgrims, and left the city of Jeddah at dawn yesterday".

27. Accord Turquie-UE: les Turcs exigent des visas

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 30

Ankara - La Turquie tournera le dos au pacte sur les migrants avec l'Union européenne si ses ressortissants ne sont pas exemptés de visas pour se rendre dans l'espace Schengen, a mis en garde le chef de la diplomatie turque. Alors que le bras de fer se tend entre Ankara et Bruxelles, le ministre turec des Affaires étrangères, Mevlüt Cavusoglu, a redit qu'il était "impossible" pour son pays d'assouplir sa législation antiterroriste, l'une des 72 conditions demandées par l'UE. "Nous leur avons dit: "Nous ne vous menaçons pas". Mais il y a une réalité. Nous avons conclu deux accords et les deux sont liés l'un à l'autre", a déclaré M. Cavusoglu à un petit groupe de journalistes, dont l'AFP, à Antalya (sud). Si nécessaire, a poursuivi M. Cavusoglu, Ankara pourrait prendre des mesures "administratives" pour bloquer l'accord sur les migrants. La semaine dernière, le président Recep Tayyip Erdogan avait prévenu qu'aucune loi relative à l'accord "ne sortira du Parlement" turec si aucun résultat n'était obtenu sur les visas.

28. Djihad : procès pour les sept de Strasbourg

Le Figaro, Angélique Négroni, 2016 05 30

Strasbourg - Ces hommes étaient partis en Syrie fin 2013. Ils minimisent leur implication dans les rangs armés de l'État islamique, mais l'un d'eux reconnaît que là-bas, « c'était pas le monde des Bisounours ». Terrorisme Les attentats du 13 novembre vont planer sur le procès qui s'ouvre ce lundi à Paris et porte sur une filière d'acheminement de djihadistes présumés. Partis en Syrie fin 2013 et arrêtés à leur retour quelques mois plus tard, en mai 2014, sept hommes de 24 à 26 ans, tous originaires de Strasbourg, doivent être jugés jusqu'au 7 juin pour « association de malfaiteurs en vue de la préparation d'actes de terrorisme ». Par le biais d'une même filière, deux frères notamment, Karim et Foued Mohamed-Aggad, avaient rejoint les terres syriennes. Mais tandis que le premier était revenu en France, trois mois plus tard environ, et comparait à ce procès, le second était resté en Syrie, donnant de loin en loin des nouvelles à sa famille jusqu'à ce que son nom retentisse brutalement à travers l'actualité : Foued Mohamed-Aggad a été identifié comme l'un des trois kamikazes du Bataclan. Près de sept mois après cet attentat, les sept prévenus vont, dès lors, avoir sans doute plus de difficulté à convaincre le tribunal que leur séjour de quelques mois avait un but humanitaire, comme ils l'avaient affirmé. D'autant que ce départ avait été organisé après la rencontre décisive avec Mourad Farès, connu pour avoir été l'un des principaux rabatteurs de djihadistes français. « Tous les djihadistes dont on parle dans les journaux sont passés par moi » , s'était même vanté dans la presse ce Franco-Marocain d'une trentaine d'années qui, après avoir été arrêté en Turquie en 2014, est aujourd'hui écroué en France et sera jugé ultérieurement.

29. Le djihadiste français Omar Omsen, toujours vivant, apparaît dans un reportage

Le Figaro, Anne-Laure Frémont, 2016 05 30

Non identifié - La mort de ce Niçois auteur de nombreuses vidéos de propagande djihadiste avait pourtant été annoncée l'an dernier. Sa mort avait été annoncée, sans être confirmée, en août 2015. Omar Omsen, qui se targue d'être l'un des principaux recruteurs de djihadistes français en Syrie via ses vidéos de propagande, est cependant bien vivant: il apparaît dans un sujet intitulé «Djihad, les recruteurs» diffusé sur France 2 jeudi prochain dans l'émission Complément d'enquête. Omar Omsen se présente comme l'Émir autoproclamé d'une katiba (groupe de combat) de Français, affiliée au Front Al-Nosra, branche syrienne d'al-qaida. L'homme de 41 ans, bien connu des services de sécurité français, a lui-même contacté le journaliste Romain Boutilly en apprenant qu'il faisait un sujet sur les recruteurs, indique le site de Francetv info. Il assure avoir mis en scène sa mort «afin de pouvoir sortir de Syrie pour subir une importante opération chirurgicale dans un pays voisin, sans se faire repérer. Une mort pour sortir des écrans radars des nombreux services de renseignements qui le traquent.» Selon le journaliste, qui reprend les propos du djihadiste, son groupe serait composé de «50 combattants» dont une quinzaine de Niçois, où a vécu Omar Omsen.

30. Les " cyber " experts contre-attaquent en Sologne

La Nouvelle République du Centre-Ouest, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 30

Paris - Celteam Services n'a pas son pareil pour plonger dans les failles informatiques. La société de Neung-sur-Beuvron fait aussi " parler " les téléphones... On pourrait se croire dans une série télé à l'américaine, sur fond de cyberattaques ininterrompues, contre-espionnage informatique et autres téléphones portables à faire parler. Il n'en est rien, la scène se passe à Neung-sur-Beuvron, dans les locaux de Celteam Services. Ce jour-là, Patrice Guichard revient tout juste de l'étranger. Maroc, Suisse, puis Panama dans la foulée. Inutile d'essayer d'en savoir plus sur la nature des missions, le domaine est, on l'imagine, sensible et l'expert en sécurité informatique et électronique (*), forcément très discret sur le sujet. Des anciens du Raid et de la DGSE Depuis le mois d'avril dernier, ce Parisien d'origine a installé sa société sur le Domaine de Villemorant. Le siège est resté à Paris, mais les appareils sophistiqués - et massivement protégés, à l'extérieur comme à l'intérieur du local - ont gagné l'Ecoparc de Neung-sur-Beuvron. A l'intérieur, trois écrans d'ordinateur s'illuminent de flux colorés, au fil des attaques informatiques enregistrées en temps réel, à l'échelle de la planète. L'un d'eux indique que la veille, il y en a eu 6 millions. « En sachant que ce n'est pas représentatif, car on a les données d'un seul éditeur », nous précise immédiatement le P-DG de la société pour nous donner à voir l'ampleur du phénomène. Réunie au complet, l'équipe de Celteam Services pourrait donner des sueurs froides à qui l'aurait après lui... Ils sont 12 experts indépendants au total, des anciens du Raid, de la DGSE, du GSPR (Groupe de sécurité de la présidence de la République) ou encore de N-Tech, ces enquêteurs spécialistes en technologies numériques au sein de la gendarmerie, à intervenir en fonction des missions. Tous ont leur spécialité, de l'espionnage industriel au « Darknet », en passant par les expertises judiciaires, la protection des données, les intrusions logiques, etc.

31. Les fichiers " DaechLeaks " seront-ils utilisés au procès?

Le Monde, Soren Seelow, 2016 05 30

Paris - L'ouverture du procès de la filière djihadiste de Strasbourg, lundi 30 mai, devrait être marquée par un âpre débat sur le versement à l'audience d'extraits des " DaechLeaks ", une fuite de fichiers présentés comme émanant de l'organisation Etat islamique en Irak et au Levant (EIL). Le parquet de Paris a informé, mardi 24 mai, les avocats de la défense qu'il comptait produire à l'audience les fiches de renseignement issues de ces fuites concernant les sept apprentis djihadistes qui comparaissent devant le tribunal pour avoir intégré l'EIL en décembre 2013. Ces documents précisent leur nom, groupe sanguin et date d'arrivée, et surtout leur fonction au sein de l'organisation, à savoir combattant, kamikaze ou inghmasis (combattant équipé d'une ceinture explosive).

Non identifié - Depuis son accession au pouvoir, en 2012, le président chinois modernise les forces militaires, en particulier l'arsenal nucléaire. Cette évolution vise, par certains aspects, à contrecarrer la stratégie américaine en Asie, souligne le chercheur, spécialiste de la région. 1. Goodale not committing to 'oversight' function for all-party security committee
iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 05 31

Ottawa - Despite a Liberal Party campaign pledge to create a committee to "monitor and oversee" national security agencies, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale appeared to be backing away from that vow Monday at the Senate national security committee. "As committee members know, our government has committed to establish a committee of parliamentarians to review and scrutinize the security and intelligence activities of all departments," said Goodale. However, that's not the pledge the party ran on and could mean a significant shift in powers from what the party promised Canadians. According to the Liberal Party website, the government's promise was to "create an all-party committee to monitor and oversee the operations of every government department and agency with national security responsibilities." Bodies like CSIS currently operate on a review model, meaning the Security Intelligence Review Committee conducts after-the-fact rather review of specific agency actions rather than being able to oversee activities as they happen. "The legislation will be before the House very shortly and that will describe exactly the function and the architecture that we have in mind, and it will fulfill the obligations that we have," Goodale said when asked whether the committee would specifically have oversight responsibilities. "The full details will be available then."

2. Government mulls 'super' oversight body for security agencies

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 05 31

Ottawa - Ottawa is considering setting up a "super" Security Intelligence Review Committee that would provide oversight to a number of federal security departments and agencies, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says. He made the revelation Monday during testimony to a Senate committee studying oversight of the Canada Border Services Agency, suggesting that the creation of a "superSIRC" is one of several options to solve a problem at the border agency, which has no process in place to deal with complaints about officer conduct. SIRC is the independent, external review body that reports to Parliament on the operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, ensuring that the spy agency uses its extraordinary powers to intrude on individuals' privacy legally and appropriately. Broadening its reach to include other departments and agencies - making a superSIRC - was first raised a decade ago by Justice Dennis O'Connor during the federal commission of inquiry into the Maher Arar affair. The Canadian engineer was jailed and interrogated in his native Syria for nearly a year after being flown against his will to the Middle East on a U.S. intelligence agency jet. Canadian security agencies had wrongly red-flagged him as a potential terrorist in intelligence exchanges with the United States. Upon learning that the agencies had been forging investigative partnerships that their watchdogs could not replicate, Justice O'Connor proposed a solution observers dubbed "superSIRC." The proposal envisioned transforming the existing CSIS watchdog - SIRC - into a body that could keep tabs on several agencies at once. Security agencies can freely swap information and intelligence, but their respective review bodies remain legally prevented from telling each other what they're learning. The government will launch consultations on Canada's national security framework this summer, which Mr. Goodale said will inform its position on CBSA oversight. The federal cabinet is expected to review the proposed parliamentary oversight committee very soon so that Government House Leader Dominic LeBlanc can table legislation to establish that committee before Parliament breaks for the summer. The committee would include MPs and senators from all parties and monitor the work of 19 agencies with national security responsibilities. Richard Fadden, former CSIS director and national security adviser to the prime minister, said Sunday that the parliamentary committee will need access to classified information if it is expected to be effective. "The logical thing to do would be to establish this committee of parliamentarians, give them some staff, access to classified information, and then work through whether SIRC or the CSEC [Communications Security Establishment Canada] commissioner or the person who reviews military intelligence are integrated properly, or not," Mr. Fadden told CTV's Question Period with The Globe and Mail's Robert Fife.

3. Liberals want to end jailing of child migrants, Goodale tells senators

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 05 31

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says he wants to end the Canada Border Services Agency's practice of detaining child migrants. Goodale told a Senate committee on Monday his department is looking at alternatives to locking away children, but he added the issue is complex and requires study. "There are problems in the system that go beyond simply changing procedures," Goodale said. "Physical capacity is an issue. And we need to make some changes there in order to accommodate alternatives." In a confidential inspection report made public in January, the Red Cross said Canada should jail child immigrants only as a "last resort" and must find alternatives to detention for such vulnerable newcomers. The border services agency holds people who are considered a flight risk or a danger to the public and those whose identities cannot be confirmed. The Red Cross says the border agency detained 10,088 immigrants _ almost one-fifth of them refugee claimants _ in 2013-14 in a variety of facilities, including federal holding centres and provincial and municipal jails. Among these were at least 197 minors, held an average of about 10 days each. Goodale said the lack of independent review of border officer conduct "is a gap that definitely needs to be addressed." However, Goodale said while he agrees with the spirit behind a senator's private bill to create an inspector general for the border agency, he could not support the initiative. He noted the government is about to begin a broad, public consultation process on the national security framework, which could lead to creation of an inspector like the one outlined in the bill. "I need that consultation before I can commit to specific legislation." In addition, Goodale said he has asked officials to do a "broad, internal assessment" of all review functions within the Public Safety portfolio _ including the watchdogs over the RCMP and CSIS _ to identify both gaps and best practices.

4. Americans and Canadian held in UAE acquitted - but 'nightmare' continues

The Guardian (London), Ashifa Kassam, 2016 05 31

Toronto - Two Americans and a Canadian detained for nearly two years in the United Arab Emirates have been acquitted of all charges by the country's supreme court. They remain in detention, however, as their families wonder when the "dark nightmare" will finally end. In August 2014, after decades of travelling and working in the UAE without incident, Salim Alaradi, a Canadian Libyan, and Kamal and Mohamed Eldarat, a Libyan American father and son, were arrested by state security officials. In March, prosecutors dropped the terrorism-related charges but continued to hold the businessmen in custody, on downgraded charges of providing supplies to groups in a foreign country and collecting donations without permission. On Monday, a judge in the UAE declared the three dual nationals, as well as Libyan Issa al Manna, not guilty on all charges. The four men cheered as the verdict was delivered and embraced one another, said the lawyer for Alaradi. Amal Eldarat, 27, said she was elated by the verdict, which came after nearly 21 months of campaigning to have her brother and father released. She had hoped to speak with both after the verdict, but all of the men were whisked away by guards and returned to custody. Their return to prison was blamed on administrative paperwork.

5. Feds say little about Indian media report of extremist allegations in B.C.

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 05 31

Ottawa - Federal authorities were tight-lipped Monday about a report that Sikh terrorists run a training camp in British Columbia. The Times of India reports that Indian intelligence agencies have alerted the Liberal government that pro-Khalistan extremists near Mission, B.C., plan to carry out strikes in Punjab. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale would say only that he doesn't comment on specific security allegations, and that the government follows closely any activity that could threaten the safety of Canadians. If there is information that needs to be acted upon, Canadian police and security agencies respond, he added. The Mounties said they were aware of the media report. "The RCMP monitors all potential threats but we are not in a position to speak to specific allegations, threats or ongoing investigations," said Staff Sgt. Rob Vermeulen, a force spokesman in B.C.

6. India alerts Trudeau govt of Khalistan terror camp in Canada

Hindustan Times, Anirudh Bhattacharyya, 2016 05 31

Toronto - The Indian government has formally taken up with Ottawa the matter of alleged Khalistani arms-training camp being operated in the Canadian province of British Columbia. This was confirmed by official sources on Monday evening. New Delhi's move comes on the heels of a report in an English daily that an individual identified as Hardeep Nijjar, a resident of the Vancouver suburb of Surrey, had taken over as chief of the Khalistan Terror Force and subsequently commenced the training activities near Mission City. A spokesperson for Public Safety Canada, while not referring to a specific issue, said the "government of Canada monitors all potential threats and has robust measures in place to address them". "Canada's security and law enforcement agencies work closely with allies and key partners," the spokesperson added. "When the security and intelligence community receives credible warnings about a specific threat, they work with the appropriate partners to appropriately respond to the threat."

7. Indian media allege existence of 'terror camp' near Mission

Globe and Mail, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 05 31

Vancouver - The federal government said little on Monday about an Indian newspaper report that alleged a pro-Khalistan "terror camp" has been operating out of a small community in British Columbia, though the local mayor cast doubt on the story. The Times of India reported on Sunday that a man who has been living in Surrey since 1995 is the operational head of a group known as the Khalistan Terror Force. The report said the group's members have been operating out of a camp near the city of Mission, east of Vancouver, and plan to carry out attacks in India. The report said Indian officials plan to seek the leader's extradition and believe he was involved in a 2007 attack on a cinema that killed six people. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale told reporters outside a national security and defence committee meeting in Ottawa that he does not comment on operational issues. "People can be assured, however, that wherever there is a credible threat, the police and security authorities of Canada respond appropriately in robust ways. Whatever action needs to be taken is to be taken. But I do not comment on any specifics," he said. Mr. Goodale said the Indian government has not contacted him directly, nor is he aware of it contacting other members of the Canadian government. Sergeant Rob Vermeulen, an RCMP spokesman based in British Columbia, said in a statement that the Mounties are aware of the media report.

8. Innocent verdict for Canadian held in U.A.E., but man remains in custody: family

Canadian Press, Diana Mehta, 2016 05 31

A Canadian imprisoned in the United Arab Emirates for nearly two years has been acquitted of all charges by the country's Supreme Court, his family said Monday as they appealed to Ottawa to help bring the man home. Salim Alaradi had been accused of allegedly providing supplies to groups in a foreign country without permission of the U.A.E. government and collecting donations without the government's permission. But despite the acquittal, Alaradi remains in custody, his daughter said. "Our family is overwhelmed after almost two years of fighting for my father's freedom, but today I cannot say that he is free man because he is still behind bars even though he is innocent," Marwa Alaradi told The Canadian Press. "I am afraid for his safety and his health. Canada needs to get him out today." Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion welcomed Alaradi's acquittal and said he expects an "expedited process" to reunite the man with his family. "The government of Canada raised Mr. Alaradi's case at the highest levels and called for his release and return to Canada," Dion said in a statement. "Canadian officials will continue to provide consular assistance to Mr. Alaradi and his family, including by helping to facilitate his return home." Salim Alaradi immigrated to Canada in 1998 from the U.A.E. but returned there in 2007 to run a home appliance business. He was on vacation with his family in Dubai when he was suddenly arrested in August 2014.

10. Plumber 'shocked' by reports alleging he's a terrorist leader

Vancouver Sun, Kim Bolan, 2016 05 31

Vancouver - A Surrey man whom Indian officials allege is a terrorist mastermind says he is completely innocent and shocked at reports linking him to a 2007 bombing in Punjab. Hardeep Singh Nijjar told The Vancouver Sun that he's a hardworking plumber and proud Canadian who has no time for Indian separatist politics. Nijjar, 38, said he has a meeting with a lawyer today to figure out how to respond to the allegations, which were reported in the Times of India and other newspapers on the Indian subcontinent. "This is garbage - all the allegations. I am living here 20 years, right? Look at my record. There is nothing. I am a hard worker. I own my own business in the plumbing," Nijjar said Monday in a phone interview. "I am very, very shocked. My family and me are very shocked." Nijjar has no criminal history in B.C. India's Central Bureau of Investigation has issued a warrant for Nijjar on charges of attempting to cause an explosion, making or keeping explosives with intent to endanger life or property, and making or possessing explosives under suspicious circumstances. All the charges were laid under India's Terrorist Act. The warrant is also posted on Interpol's site of people wanted in jurisdictions around the world. The media reports say Nijjar was made the leader of a separatist group called the Khalistan Terror Force and was involved in a 2007 cinema bombing in Ludhiana, in India's Punjab state, that left six people dead.

12. Eric Holder: Edward Snowden Performed a 'Public Service,' But Must Be Punished

NBC News, Daniel Arkin, 2016 05 30

New York - Former U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder says fugitive leaker Edward Snowden performed a "public service" but still deserves to be punished. "We can certainly argue about the way in which Snowden did what he did, but I think that he actually performed a public service by raising the debate that we engaged in and by the changes that we made," Holder told former Obama White House adviser David Axelrod on an episode of "The Axes Files" podcast released Monday. But the former attorney general was quick to add that Snowden -- who leaked explosive documents about American government surveillance programs while working as a contractor for the National Security Agency in 2013 -- acted in a way that was "inappropriate and illegal." "I think he harmed American interests," Holder said. "I know there are ways in which certain of our agents were put at risk, relationships with other countries were harmed, our ability to keep the American people safe was compromised."

Washington - The State Department's former top watchdog, in an interview with Fox News, rejected Hillary Clinton's repeated claims that her personal email use was in line with her predecessors' - while saying he would have immediately opened an investigation if he caught wind of a secretary of state using such an account. Howard Krongard, a George W. Bush administration appointee who served as the State Department inspector general from April 2005 to January 2008, cited his own experience in challenging Clinton's insistence that her practices were nothing out of the ordinary. "Certainly to my knowledge at least, Secretary [Condoleezza] Rice did not have a personal server. I certainly never either sent an email to one or received an email from one," said Krongard, who served during Rice's tenure. Further, he said, "I would have been stunned had I been asked to send an email to her at a personal server, private address. I would have declined to do so on security grounds and if she had sent one to me, I probably would have started an investigation."

14. From Ike to Obama, CIA Has Briefed Presidential Candidates

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 05 31

Washington - After the political convention confetti is swept away, a more sobering tradition of the presidential election begins: The regular, top-secret intelligence briefings for Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee. The intelligence briefings could be eye-opening for New York businessman Donald Trump. The Republican's loose-lipped campaign remarks have left some intelligence and foreign policy officials worried about whether he can keep the nation's secrets. Trump has said in interviews that he's looking forward to the briefings. Rep. Adam Schiff, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said he believes many people share his deep concern about Trump's inexperience with handling classified information. "I would have to imagine that those concerns are fairly broadly held, so I wouldn't be at all surprised if the intelligence briefings received by both candidates -- which will be identical -- will be at a more generalized level than they might otherwise be," said Schiff, D-Calif.

15. Guantánamo is planning for prison after Obama

McClatchy News Service, Carol Rosenberg, 2016 05 31

Guantanamo Bay - Military leaders are thinking about whether they will need to put a wheelchair lift into their showcase communal prison three or four years from now, widen some cell doors, add ramps for geriatric captives. Not one of the 80 prisoners is now in a wheelchair and most are in their 30s or 40s. The oldest is 68. But briefings by senior military officials here made clear that they are starting to actively think about operating an offshore Pentagon detention center long after President Barack Obama leaves office. "At some point if detention operations continue here we will have to address, 'Are the doors in the cells wide enough to move wheelchairs in and out? Are there ramps to reach the medical facilities?'" said Rear Adm. Peter Clarke, the detention center commander. "And we've just started looking at that. So I can't tell you we are ready or not. But it's something we can plan for." Obama wants the prison emptied, and a Pentagon plan proposes moving 30 to 40 captives to military detention in the United States and releasing the rest to other countries. But Congress has outlawed any transfers to U.S. soil, and some members are proposing legislation to prevent transfers altogether, to anywhere, prompting speculation that the only way Obama does it is through an Executive Order that opponents of closure warn would be illegal.

16. Obama's Anti-Islamic State Envoy: 'We Have Exposed Their Lies'

Interview - The US has scored some successes against the Islamic State with the deployment of special forces. In a SPIEGEL interview, President Obama's anti-IS envoy Brett McGurk says the terrorist militia is shrinking and calls for help from NATO in battling the Islamists. SPIEGEL: How strong is Islamic State today? Brett McGurk: They are substantially degraded. Forty-five percent of the territory in Iraq has been lost, 20 percent in Syria. We are taking out one of their battlefield commanders almost every three days because we are inside their networks. We know where they are and we can target them with more and more precision. After some intensive work by the intelligence services, we are also targeting their financial system. We found out where they are storing their cash. After some work by the US special forces on the ground, we know where they get their oil out of the ground, how they transport it and we hit those sites. SPIEGEL: Will airstrikes be sufficient for fighting them? McGurk: Don't take my word on that, listen to them. Back in 2014, their leader Abu Bakr al- Baghdadi announced his caliphate was expanding all over the Middle East and into Europe. Now the key spokesman puts out a very different message, admitting that their territory is shrinking, that their leaders are being killed one by one, even that Raqqa and Mosul will fall. It's a very different message. They are no longer able to claim they are a divine movement; they are a criminal terrorist organization. We have exposed their lies by beginning to beat them on the battlefield.

17. Two Americans held by UAE are acquitted (Canada)

Washington Post, Carol Morello, 2016 05 31

Washington - Two U.S. citizens whose imprisonment in the United Arab Emirates had drawn criticism from human rights groups and the Obama administration were acquitted Monday on charges that they supported militants in Libya, according to their family. Kamal Eldarat, 59, and his son, Mohamed Eldarat, 34, were not immediately released but were taken back to prison following the verdict in the UAE's highest court, said Amal Eldarat, the daughter and sister of the defendants. She had heard about the ruling in a call from a U.S. Embassy observer in the courtroom. "It could take a few days for paperwork and the administrative process," she told reporters in a conference call. "Some people can stay for up to three weeks, or a month, and there are some cases where they leave within the same day." Gregory B. Craig, a Washington lawyer representing the Eldarat family, said they were relieved at the verdict but concerned over the continued detention. According to Amal Eldarat, two other defendants who had been caught up in the same security sweep in 2014 also were acquitted Monday - Salim Alaradi, a Libyan Canadian, and a Libyan national whose family has not publicized his case.

18. White House Fails to Detect a Single Cyber Threat

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 05 31

Washington - The White House has been unable to detect a single cyber security threat more than six months after issuing a "national emergency" to deal with what the administration identified as growing and immediate danger, according to a new government report. Six months after President Barack Obama invoked emergency powers to block the assets of any person caught engaging in "malicious cyber-enabled activities," the administration has not identified a single qualifying target, according to the Treasury Department, which disclosed in a report that "no entities or individuals have been designated." The April 2015 directive issued by the White House identified an "increasing prevalence and severity of malicious cyber-enabled activities" among individuals living outside the United States. These activities were said to constitute "an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security, foreign policy, and economy of the United States," prompting Obama to declare "a national emergency to deal with this threat." A half a year later, the White House still has not invoked this power to combat growing cyber threats, despite a rise in such activity among rogue nations such as Iran, North Korea, and China.

19. Channel security fears as ex-judo star faces people smuggling charge

London Daily Telegraph, Ben Riley-Smith, Martin Evans, 2016 05 31

London - Ministers have been accused of ignoring stark warnings about the vulnerability of Britain's small ports amid mounting concern over the country's maritime security. Four reports, the most recent published just last week, warned that people smugglers could exploit lax security around the 7,000 miles of UK coastline. But ministers downplayed the risks, insisting the problem was not a significant priority. The revelation comes as two British men appeared in court charged in connection with a plot to smuggle illegal immigrants across the Channel. Robert Stilwell, 33, a former judo champion who represented Great Britain and has held European and Commonwealth titles, was charged alongside 35-year-old Mark Stribling after 18 Albanians were rescued from a sinking boat off the Kent coast early on Sunday. The two men, who were also on board the inflatable craft, were remanded in custody after making a brief appearance at Medway magistrates' court in Kent. John Vine, the former independent chief inspector of borders and immigration who stepped down in 2014, said lives could be lost due to an increase in migrant crossings this summer. He said he had twice raised concerns about security at smaller ports while in post but feared the issue "wasn't a major priority".

20. Child abuse inquiry turns to Kincora home and claims of MI5 blackmail

The Guardian (London), Henry McDonald, 2016 05 31

Belfast - An inquiry into child abuse across a range of institutions in Northern Ireland will focus on Tuesday on the Kincora boys home scandal including allegations that MI5 blackmailed a paedophile ring which operated there in the 1970s. The historical institutional abuse inquiry will hear evidence from men who were abused at Kincora when they were children and their allegations that the perpetrators were protected because they were state agents spying on fellow Ulster loyalists. A number of Kincora abuse victims have tried through the courts to force the scandal to be included in the national investigation into allegations of establishment paedophile rings operating in Westminster. Gary Hoy tried and failed last month to force the home secretary to include Kincora in the Westminster inquiry. Hoy and others fear that the Kincora inquiry, which is based in Northern Ireland and taking hearings at the court in Banbridge, County Down, will not have access to sensitive MI5 intelligence files on the people who ran Kincora.

21. Australia needs to strengthen cyber-security strategy: national report

Canberra Times, Henry Belot, 2016 05 31

Canberra - The Australian government's newly launched $230 million strategy to bolster cyber-security lacks adequate funding and strategic vision, according to a leading policy group. The strategy, launched by Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull in April, came with an acknowledgement Australia was prepared to take offensive action to protect the national interest. The funding boost came after $400 million was allocated for staff with hacking experience at the Australian Signals Directorate and the announcement of 800 new intelligence and cyber roles within the Department of Defence. But the Australian Centre for Cyber Security's latest discussion paper on cyber threats, published on Monday, found the government had fallen "behind the pace" set by strategic partners. Professor Greg Austin, who prepared the report, said the government had not articulated strategies to reduce the risk of threats, or had an open conversation with the public. "There is quite a gap in the seriousness with which the Australian government discusses cyber threats and the actions taken by the US and the UK," he said. "We don't face quite the same threats as the US but there is evidence to suggest the Australian government is not prepared to recognise the serious threat of cyber crime." Professor Austin said many Australians did not understand the risks cyber crime posed and, as a result, were unlikely to support large-scale investments by the government. In the past six months, the computer system at the Bureau of Meteorology experienced a "massive breach", believed to have originated in China, and it was reported that 97 federal agencies were told to encrypt more data amid "hundreds" of attempted intrusions a month. The report also found the government had not committed "to develop and implement a specialists training plan in the field of countering cyber crime". can

22. Money laundering

New Zealand Herald, 2016 05 31

Wellington - The furore over the Panama Papers is hastening completion of New Zealand's anti-money laundering regime. Prime Minister John Key told his post-Cabinet press conference that a remaining chunk of legislation to complete the country's AML obligations would be hurried through. "There's no question that's as a result of the debate around the Panama Papers and wider global debate," Key said. BusinessDesk reported last July that the Government was looking to extend the AML regime as the number of suspicious transactions reported to law enforcement agencies has more than tripled since the Anti-Money Laundering and Countering Financing of Terrorism Act came into effect in mid-2013. A second tranche of legislative reform would extend anti-money laundering requirements to professions and businesses dealing in high-value goods, such as lawyers, accountants, conveyancing practitioners and real estate agents, Justice Minister Amy Adams said last year.

23. Violence to escalate after ISIS Iraq defeat: Leahy

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 05 31

Sydney - Even if Islamic State is driven out of Iraq, violence impelled by religious differences will continue to escalate across much of the Middle East and further afield, former army commander Peter Leahy says. Writing for The Australian, the former lieutenant general says the intensity of violence and willingness of so many of those involved to die as suicide bombers reflects the extent to which religious ideology is driving the conflict. Now director of the University of Canberra's National Security Institute, Professor Leahy says Australians have become used to long Australian Defence Forces deployments overseas and there should be much more election campaign debate about the nation's operational goals. There has been more discussion about actor Johnny Depp's dogs than the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and what Australian troops are expected to achieve, Professor Leahy says. "We can do better by them, and an election campaign is a good time to start talking about our war aims and what victory looks like. "We might even ... start talking about the ideas behind the threats we have sent our troops overseas to confront. What hope of any acknowledgment that, in the war on terror, we will be fighting multiple wars on multiple fronts for a very long time to come?" Professor Leahy says, in contrast, the terrorists have a clear strategy and believe they are engaged in a cosmic battle between good and evil.

The Express Tribune, Faraz Khan, 2016 05 31

Karachi - A Chinese worker and his driver were wounded in Karachi on Monday in a bomb attack claimed by ethnic nationalists opposed to plans for extensive Chinese investment, police said. The 25-year-old Chinese man, identified as Finche, and his driver were slightly wounded in the attack, said Sindh IG Allah Dino Khawaja. "Apparently, the attack was aimed at the Chinese national," Khawaja said, adding the man was travelling with his driver and a security guard. A low-intensity bomb went off by the road in Gulshan-e-Hadeed, shattering the windows of the van the men were travelling in. Television footage showed construction helmets in a rear seat. A pamphlet signed by a group called the Sindhudesh Revolutionary Army, an ethnic Sindhi separatist group, was found at the site, police said. "The world's most plunderous nation has set its eye on Sindh," the pamphlet said, according to a photograph of it seen by Reuters. "They want to attack Sindh and enslave its people."

25. In quest for ID cards, foreign spies bribed NADRA officials

The Express Tribune, Danish Hussain, 2016 05 31

Islamabad - The corrupt practices through which a number of foreign terrorists have been able to obtain national identity cards has allegedly allowed spies from neighbouring countries to secure legitimate identification documents, the federal government was informed recently. During a recent closed-door meeting, members of the National Database and Registration Authority (Nadra) and intelligence agencies told Interior Minister Chaudhry Nisar that fake identity cards have been issued to Afghan nationals, some of whom worked with Indian intelligence agencies. The matter regained prominence in the wake of a drone strike on Afghan Taliban leader Mullah Akhtar Mansoor in Naushki, Balochistan. Officials had recovered a Pakistani ID card and passport from Mansoor's charred body though it bore the name of Wali Muhammad. It prompted

Nisar to admit during a press briefing on May 25 that "strategic, security and national interests of the country have been compromised to a great extent".

Kabul - A key leader of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) terrorist group was killed in an airstrike in Maidan Wardak province, located some 35 kilometers west of Kabul. According to the defense officials, the ISIS leader was identified as Mujahid and was killed along with one of his bodyguards. The officials did not elaborate further regarding the airstrike and whether it was carried out by the Afghan Air Force or the US Forces. The loyalists of the terror group are believed to have significant presence in eastern Nangarhar province and this is the first time a key leader of the group has been killed near Kabul. Dakar - Hissène Habré, the former president of Chad, was sentenced to life in prison after he was found guilty of crimes against humanity, torture and sex crimes on Monday, more than 20 years after the start of a campaign to hold him accountable for the suffering and death of tens of thousands of people. Mr. Habré, who ruled Chad from 1982 to 1990, when he was deposed by the current president, Idriss Déby, stood trial before a special court in Senegal created to handle the case. Prosecutors had sought a life sentence, which he is expected to serve in Senegal. "The systematic torture at such a large scale was his way of governing," said Gberdao Gustave Kam, the presiding judge on a three-judge panel, who read a summary of the verdict. "Hissène Habré showed no compassion toward the victims or any regret about the massacres and rapes that were committed." Victims and relatives of victims screamed with joy after the verdict was announced. Mr. Habré, who had sat silently during the 90-minute hearing, raised his fists to supporters and shouted for several minutes until armed guards led him away.

But South Sudan's governing elite have done little to focus on something just as critical to the country's health: righting the devastated economy. Radio France Internationale, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 31

Dakar - Au Sénégal, le tribunal spécial africain de Dakar a donc finalement tranché. Ce procès d'Hissène Habré marquera certainement l'histoire de la justice internationale. C'est une première en effet, et pour plusieurs raisons. C'est la première fois qu'un chef d'Etat est reconnu personnellement coupable de viols, qu'un ancien chef d'Etat africain est jugé en Afrique, et c'est la première fois au monde que des juridictions d'un pays jugent le chef d'Etat d'un autre pays pour des crimes contre l'humanité. Et tout cela a été possible en recourant au concept de « compétence universelle ». C'est un concept-clé de la justice internationale grâce auquel on peut engager des poursuites contre une ou plusieurs personnes en dehors du pays où les crimes graves ont été commis. Hissène Habré a donc été jugé au Sénégal - alors qu'il est Tchadien - parce qu'une plainte avait été déposée au Sénégal, le pays où il réside depuis son exil en 1990.

According to a report prepared by Punjab intelligence sleuths, Canadian Sikh Hardeep Nijjar has taken over as the operational head of Khalistan Terror Force (KTF) and formed a module comprising Sikh youths to carry out the attacks. The Punjab government has already submitted the report to the ministry of external affairs and ministry of home affairs to seek Nijjar's extradition. Seoul - North Korea on Tuesday attempted yet another launch of its Musudan intermediate-range ballistic missile that ended in failure, sending mixed signals to the international community less than two weeks after proposing talks with Seoul. According to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the missile was fired around 5:20 a.m. in Wonsan, Gangwon Province. "The North has consistently been attempting ballistic missile launches since Kim gave the orders (for a ballistic missile test launch) on March 15. The military is on full alert in case of further provocations by the North," said a JCS official. He added that additional analysis is necessary on details of the launch. YonhapThe Ministry of National Defense refused to formally comment on how far the missile flew but a military official said that the military was unable to determine the direction of the launch, indicating that the flight was too brief to determine even the rough course. There have been speculations within the military that it may have exploded from the launch pad.

Associated Press, Hyung-Jin Kim and Foster Klug, 2016 05 31

Seoul - A North Korean missile launch likely failed on Tuesday, South Korea's military said, the fourth in a series of high-profile failures that somewhat temper recent worries that the North is pushing quickly toward its goal of a nuclear-tipped missile that can reach America's mainland. South Korea's Yonhap news agency said the missile was a powerful mid-range Musudan, which could potentially reach U.S. military bases in Asia and the Pacific. Yonhap cited an unidentified government source as saying the missile exploded at a mobile launch pad as soon as the launch button was pressed. The report, if confirmed, suggests the missile may have even failed to lift off. Yonhap did not say how its source obtained the information. South Korea's military couldn't confirm the report. The Joint Chiefs of Staff said in a statement that North Korea attempted to launch an unidentified missile early in the morning from the eastern coastal town of Wonsan, but that it likely failed. It released no other details.

39. Russia's 'Troll Army' Retaliates Against an Effort to Expose It

New York Times, Andrew Higgins, 2016 05 31

Helsinki - Seeking to shine some light into the dark world of Internet trolls, a journalist with Finland's national broadcaster asked members of her audience to share their experience of encounters with Russia's "troll army," a raucous and often venomous force of online agitators.

The response was overwhelming, though not in the direction that the journalist, Jessikka Aro, had hoped. As she expected, she received some feedback from people who had clashed with aggressively pro-Russian voices online. But she was taken aback, and shaken, by a vicious retaliatory campaign of harassment and insults against her and her work by those same pro-Russian voices. "Everything in my life went to hell thanks to the trolls," said Ms. Aro, a 35-year-old investigative reporter with the social media division of Finland's state broadcaster, Yle Kioski. This "information war," said Rastislav Kacer, a veteran diplomat who served as Slovakia's ambassador to Washington and at NATO's headquarters in Brussels, "is just part of a bigger struggle." While not involving bloodshed, he added, it "is equally as dangerous as more conventional hostile action."

Helsinki - The Tokyo-based security software firm Trend Micro has found strong evidence that employees of Finland's Sanoma corporation have been targeted by an attempted cyber-attack. The Russian cyber-espionage group set up a fake server that closely resembled Sanoma's webmail server, Trend Micro's Senior Threat Researcher, Feike Hacquebord tells Yle. He says the group registered a web address that differed by just one character from the address of Sanoma's genuine webmail server. Hacquebord says the attack most likely occurred last August, and that the fake corporate webmail server operated for a few weeks before it was shut down. Data security firms refer to the cyber-espionage group behind the attacks by various names including Pawn Storm, APT28, Sednit and Sofacy. Hacquebord says the group is part of Russia's state intelligence apparatus. The German intelligence service has confirmed this assessment.

L'assaut a été lancé avant l'aube à partir de trois directions. Il est conduit par les membres de l'unité d'élite spécialisée dans le contre-terrorisme, et entraînée par des forces spéciales américaines. « Les troupes irakiennes sont entrées dans Faloudja avec le soutien aérien de la coalition internationale et de l'armée de l'air irakienne ainsi que l'appui de l'artillerie et des chars », a déclaré le général Abdelwahab al-Saadi, commandant de l'opération. « Il y a une résistance de Daech », a-t-il reconnu. 42. Iran rejects Bahrain espionage, interference allegations

Press TV, 2016 05 31

Tehran - Iran has categorically rejected as "unfounded" espionage and meddling allegations by the Bahraini regime against the Islamic Republic. An appeals court in Bahrain on Sunday upheld the life sentences as well as the citizenship revocation of five Shia activists over allegations that they had been "spying for Iran" and planning attacks in the country. A statement by the prosecution said that the court rejected the appeal by the five defendants and stripped them of their citizenship. In November last year, a Bahraini court handed down life imprisonment sentence to the men after convicting them of "spying for Iran" and seeking to carry out hostile acts against Bahrain. "Since the outset of popular protests in Bahrain, the country's government has been seeking to divert the public opinion from this country's internal crisis through leveling fabricated and delusive accusations against some countries," a source at Iran's Foreign Ministry said on Monday.

44. Hezbollah's Doctrine in Lebanese Elections

Asharq Al-Awsat, Mona Alami, 2016 05 31

Beirut - The municipal elections that were held in Lebanon this month showed a huge drop in the support for Lebanese political parties, including the so-called Hezbollah. The rise of independents, influential families and the Lebanese Communist Party was a sign that Hezbollah's role at the popular Shi'ite base has begun to diminish as a result of its interference in the Syrian war and the rising economic challenges that Lebanon is facing. Many believe that Hezbollah had built its reputation for fighting Israel and for leading to or contributing to Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. Yet this organization, which is religiously, politically and militarily linked to Iran, is facing a growing problem. With its expansion outside Lebanon's border and its belief that it will become stronger than ever, the party has become more fragile. Since 2012, Hezbollah has given up on its essential role to fight Israel by joining the head of the Syrian regime, Bashar Assad, in the war against rebels.

Jerusalem - Interior Minister Arye Dery said on Sunday he was taking steps to revoke the citizenship of a man from Umm al-Fahm who has been charged in connection to a terror attack in Israel in October. Ala'a Ziwad confessed to deliberately ramming his car into two soldiers and then stabbing two additional people, at the Gan Shmuel intersection near Hadera, before he was subdued. Two soldiers, a 19-year-old woman and a 20-year-old man, were admitted to hospital in serious and moderate condition, respectively, after Ziwad hit them. In addition, a 14-year-old girl was hospitalized in moderate condition with stab wounds, while a 45-year-old man was treated for minor stab wounds. Writing on his official Facebook page, Dery said he had filed a request with the Haifa District Court to begin the process of revoking the citizenship of Ziwad, whose mother -- but not his father -- is an Israeli citizen. Dery said the father's residency permit would not be renewed.

46. Kuwait Upholds Death Sentence for Sadiq Mosque Blast Ringleader

Asharq Al-Awsat, Mirza Al-Khuwaylidi, 2016 05 31

Kuwait - Kuwait's Supreme Court on Monday upheld the death sentence handed down to the main convict in the June 2015 bombing of the Imam Sadiq mosque that killed 26 people and left 227 injured. The court confirmed the sentence of capital punishment passed on Abdulrahman Sabah Idan, known as Saud, a stateless man (Bidoon) who drove the Saudi suicide bomber to the mosque during Friday prayers. The attack in Kuwait City was claimed by ISIS. The court also upheld jail terms of between two and 15 years for eight people, including four women, and acquitted 15 others including three women and the owner of the car that was used to drive the suicide bomber to the mosque. The court did not hear the appeals of five others -- four Saudis and a stateless man -- who had been sentenced to death in absentia by a lower court.

47. Terrorists Recruiting Fighters Under US-Planned Ceasefire in Syria

Fars News Agency, 2016 05 31

Tehran - The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights (SOHR) disclosed that the US-manufactured truce plan in Syria paved the ground for the al-Qaeda-affiliated al-Nusra Front to transfer over 3,000 of fresh recruits into the Syrian territories in March. "The Al-Nusra has managed to recruit and transfer thousands of fresh terrorists, including youngsters, to Syria's Northern territories, which shows how the US-backed ceasefire has ended in opposite results," said Rami Abdul Rahman, the president of SOHR. "My sources in al-Nusra told me that at least 3,000 fresh recruits joined al-Nusra in March, including hundreds of the refugees who lived in Northern camps," He further added. Military observers of the Syrian crisis have announced that most of the advances of the al-Nusra front in the battlefields are indebted to its recent recruitment of fresh forces during the ceasefire which has enabled the terrorist group to think about materialization of its old projects.

48. UAE acquits two Libyan-Americans and Canadian of militancy charges

Reuters, 2016 05 31

Dubai - A security court in the United Arab Emirates on Monday acquitted two Libyan-American businessmen and a Libyan-Canadian charged with supporting Libyan militants, a lawyer and a family representative said. "The United Arab Emirates (UAE) Abu Dhabi Supreme Court State Security Chamber found American businessmen Kamal and Mohamed Eldarat not guilty, after nearly two years of arbitrary detainment and a four-month trial," a statement from the Eldarat family said. Kamal and son Mohamed were arrested at their home in the UAE in 2014, according to the family. Paul Champ, a human rights lawyer representing Canadian co-defendant Salim Alaradi - who was arrested while visiting the UAE - said that although the three men had been acquitted, they had yet to be released from custody.

49. Assange: Hollande "est une escroquerie comme de nombreux politiciens"

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 05 31

Paris - Le fondateur de Wikileaks, l'Australien Julian Assange, reclus depuis quatre ans à l'ambassade d'Équateur à Londres, a accusé mardi François Hollande d'être "une escroquerie comme de nombreux politiciens". "On ne peut pas forcément lui en vouloir d'être un hypocrite, cela fait partie de son métier malheureusement", a-t-il ajouté, interrogé par visioconférence par iTélé. La France a rejeté en juillet 2015 une demande d'asile du fondateur de Wikileaks. Julian Assange avait présenté sa requête de manière informelle, dans une longue lettre ouverte publiée le 3 juillet par le quotidien Le Monde. "A cette époque, j'ai révélé comment les trois derniers présidents français faisaient l'objet d'écoutes de la part des Etats-Unis", a-t-il expliqué sur iTélé. Cet espionnage a visé, au moins de 2006 à 2012, François Hollande et ses deux prédécesseurs de droite, Nicolas Sarkozy (2007-2012) et Jacques Chirac (1995-2007), d'après des documents de Wikileaks publiés par le quotidien Libération et le site d'information Mediapart. "On aurait pu penser que le président allait aider les lanceurs d'alerte", estime-t-il. Mais "L'Élysée ne voulait pas heurter les Etats- Unis". L'Australien critique également l'état d'urgence décrété en France après les attentats du 13 novembre à Paris et prolongé jusqu'à fin juillet.

50. Hyper Cacher: un ex-indic de la gendarmerie a vendu des armes à Amédée Coulibaly
BFM TV (Chaîne de télévision - France), C. P. avec Sarah-Lou Cohen, 2016 05 31

Paris - Plus d'un an après la prise d'otages sanglante de l'Hyper Cacher, on sait désormais la provenance d'une partie de l'arsenal utilisé par Amédée Coulibaly. Nouvelles révélations sur les attentats de janvier 2015. Selon les informations de BFMTV, les enquêteurs connaissent désormais l'origine des armes utilisées par Amédée Coulibaly, lorsqu'il a semé la mort dans l'Hyper Cacher. Une partie de son arsenal provient de Lille, d'un ancien indicateur des gendarmes. Claude Hermant. C'est bien l'homme qui a armé, sans le savoir, Amédée Coulibaly. Six mois avant les attentats de janvier 2015, l'ex-mercenaire d'extrême droite achète, avec sa femme, à une société slovaque, les quatre pistolets Tokarev et les deux Kalachnikov qui seront retrouvés plus tard dans l'Hyper Cacher et dans la planque du terroriste. Interrogé par l'antiterrorisme en décembre dernier, Claude Hermant raconte qu'à l'époque, il est un indicateur des gendarmes de la section de recherches de Lille. Sa mission: acheter des dizaines d'armes pour les revendre. Il n'a alors qu'un seul acheteur, un dénommé Samyr.

51. Les conflits sociaux ébranlent l'exécutif belge
Le Monde, Jean-Pierre Stroobants, 2016 05 31

Bruxelles - Le premier ministre, Charles Michel, apparaît isolé face à la multiplication des grèves. Une grève inattendue dans les chemins de fer, commencée jeudi 26 mai et qui ne s'achèvera que mercredi 1er juin, au lendemain d'une paralysie de tous les services publics. Une autre des surveillants pénitentiaires qui dure depuis trente-cinq jours en Wallonie et à Bruxelles. Une grogne des policiers, eux aussi tentés par des actions, qui se disent débordés par les missions liées au maintien du niveau d'alerte terroriste et refusent de remplacer les gardiens de prison. Enfin, un mouvement inédit de protestation des magistrats, qui doivent se croiser les bras à partir du jeudi 2. La Belgique aura rarement été confrontée à des tensions sociales aussi vives alors que le gouvernement de centre-droit, dirigé par le libéral francophone Charles Michel, ne paraît pas près de céder aux revendications des centrales syndicales.

52. Turkey's Erdogan accuses Russia of arming PKK militants

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 05 30

Ankara - Turkish President Tayyip Erdogan has accused Russia of providing anti-aircraft weaponry and rockets to militants of the outlawed Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), government officials said on Monday, confirming reports in local media. Speaking to reporters on board his airplane after a visit to the southeastern province of Diyarbakir over the weekend, Erdogan accused Moscow of transferring weaponry to the PKK via Iraq and Syria, the pro-government Star newspaper said. "At this moment, terrorists are using anti-aircraft guns and missiles supplied by Russia. The separatist terrorist organization is equipped with these weapons. They have been transferred to them via Syria and Iraq," the newspaper reported Erdogan as saying. Two Turkish government officials confirmed Erdogan's comments, but Russia said Turkey must show proof for its claims. Responding to the accusation, Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Mikhail Bogdanov was quoted by Interfax news agency as saying: "When someone says something, let them show evidence."

1. Canada's Spies Won Awards for 'Dangerous' Work in Afghanistan, but Details Remain Secret

Vice News, Justin Ling, 2016 06 01

Canada won't confirm exactly what its spies were doing in Afghanistan, but it has been quietly awarding service medals for their service, according to documents obtained by VICE News. And it was dangerous. Those medals were pinned on to the spooks' chests by Governor General David Johnston, who acts as Canada's head of state, for their work in Afghanistan. But for much of Canada's involvement in the war-torn country, the work of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) remained strictly secret. In recent years, CSIS' work in Afghanistan has slowly come to light. Even now, the government will only say that that CSIS agents were processing detainees and doing basic interviews with possible al Qaeda or Taliban commanders from within Canadian Forces and Afghan military bases. But these new documents, obtained under the Access to Information Act, reveal that CSIS agents may have been directly in harm's way. In 2013, the service created the Operational Service Medal (OSM), awarded specifically for "when the deployment involves a certain level of risk, threat, hardship or operational intensity," according to the regulations creating the medal. Asked specifically what sort of work would qualify an agent for the medal, and whether processing detainees would qualify as significantly risky or intense, the spokesperson refused comment. "As you understand, we would not be able to speak to the specifics of the role played by any award recipient," they wrote. According to the documents, the original plan was to create a Dangerous Operating Environment (DOE) Service Award, which appeared to be specific to CSIS. However, in a 2013 memo, CSIS' 'awards coordinator' wrote that "due to shifting priorities, the Service has not given out any DOE awards." A spokesperson for CSIS confirmed to VICE News that the DOE award was "abandoned prior to implementation." Instead, it was replaced by the more abstractly-named OSM, which is awarded through Canada's Department of National Defence. The government has never publicly admitted that CSIS agents are eligible for the OSM, and the regulations underline that the award is intended for soldiers and police. But according to the documents, CSIS agents are, in fact, eligible. In order to be considered for the OSM, the spy must have serviced 30 cumulative days in the region and would need to serve in "exceptional circumstances and the person must have been deployed specifically to provide that service or support on a full-time basis to the operations." It goes on to note that anything comparable to "normal duty" -- such as visits or inspections -- or work that is done "from the relative safety of a country distant from the theatre or area shall be excluded." Other awards can be granted for regular duty.

2. China's foreign minister to meet with PM

Ottawa - Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi will hold high-level talks with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Parliament Hill on Wednesday as planning gets under way for Mr. Trudeau's official visit to China in the fall. Mr. Wang is also meeting Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion in what the Chinese government said is the first annual meeting of foreign affairs ministers. The two men will discuss the upcoming G20 summit, global issues and human rights, Mr. Dion's office said. Charles Burton, a former counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Beijing, expressed surprise that the government had not informed Canadians that it has set up a formalized arrangement for annual talks with China's foreign minister. "You would have thought if Canada had established a formal mechanism for regular meetings between cabinet ministers of the two countries, normally one would expect that would have been publicly announced. It is quite a major thing," Mr. Burton said in an interview. Mr. Wang's visit was announced Monday in Beijing and late Tuesday in Ottawa. Usually such visits are made public days before the event.

China has made it a precondition of negotiations on free trade that Canada ensure an energy pipeline from the oil sands to the coast of British Columbia. It also wants the federal government to lift foreign investment restrictions on Chinese state-owned enterprises in the oil and gas sector. Mr. Trudeau promised before last fall's election that he would lift the restrictions that were put in place by the former Conservative government, although Mr. Burton noted that Canada's security agencies have concerns about Chinese control of vital Canadian resource companies. "You have Canadian security agencies who are concerned about more Chinese state investment leading to more security problems. It seems to be the security agencies, human-rights groups and public opinion at large are wanting more input into the process which we engage China," Mr. Burton said. Mr. Trudeau's former national security adviser, Richard Fadden, said the Chinese have been heavily engaged in spying and cyberattacks in Canada. "Their broad approach is to use the vacuum-cleaner approach. They'll, you know, pretty well take anything," Mr. Fadden, a former director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, said in an interview on Sunday. "So I think it's actually quite difficult to balance all of this and make sure we have a work-a-day relationship, while at the same time making it very clear we don't like the cyberattacks."

3. Accused attacker facing additional terrorism charges

Toronto Star, Wendy Gillis, 2016 06 01

Toronto - More than two months since he was alleged to have attacked three members of the Canadian Forces at a Toronto recruitment centre, Ayanle Hassan Ali is now facing a slew of new terrorism-related charges, setting the stage for what could be a precedent-setting test of Canada's little-used terrorism legislation. Ali, a 27-year-old Montreal native, yelled out "Allah told me to come here and kill people" in the midst of the alleged March 14 attack, according to Toronto police Chief Mark Saunders. The alleged declaration fuelled speculation Ali may be the latest architect of a terrorist attack on Canadian soil, while comments from those close to Ali suggested he was mentally ill. Two developments in the case Tuesday only deepened the opposing versions of Ali. Following a psychiatric assessment, Ali was found unfit to stand trial "due to the ongoing psychotic symptoms of a major mental illness," according to a statement from his lawyer, Maureen Addie. He will now be treated with antipsychotic medications, with the goal of helping him become fit to stand trial. Another fitness assessment will be conducted and a followup hearing is scheduled for July. The fitness ruling was made within hours of the RCMP announcing it had laid nine new charges against Ali, all allegedly committed "for the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a terrorist group." The Mounties did not say what terrorist group, or what new evidence has been uncovered since the incident. The new charges are: three counts of attempted murder, two counts of assault causing bodily harm, three counts of assault using a weapon and one count of carrying a weapon. The alleged offences are a duplication of the nine charges already laid by Toronto police on March 15, one day after the attack, except with the terrorism enhancements. They have been laid under section 83.2 of the Criminal Code, legislation passed after the 9/11 attacks that specifically targets crimes involving terrorism.

4. Border service officials seize arms export bound for Iraq at Toronto airport

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 06 01

Toronto - Border officials say they've seized a cache of gun parts and police equipment at Toronto's Pearson International Airport that was destined for Iraq. The Canada Border Services Agency says the discovery of the arms stemmed from an incident in February, when officers at the Rainbow Bridge border crossing in Niagara Falls, Ont., identified a man who was the subject of "an intelligence lookout." During an interview with the man, officers discovered an airline waybill indicating an export of auto parts to Iraq. The CBSA says further investigation revealed documentation and photos that caused officers to suspect gun parts were in fact involved in the export shipment, which was located at the Toronto airport's cargo facility. Officers at the Rainbow Bridge immediately contacted their counterparts at the Toronto airport, who tracked down the shipment at a cargo services warehouse. A CBSA spokeswoman said the seizure was only announced Tuesday because the agency had to wait for confirmation from Global Affairs that the arms were in violation of United Nations Iraq Regulations. "The interaction at the Rainbow Bridge and then the colleagues at the bridge contacting colleagues at Pearson, that was all very quick," said Antonella Digirolamo. "What we do at ports of entry across Canada is we help with the administration of export legislation, but we had to defer to our colleagues at Global Affairs Canada."

5. Canadian acquitted in UAE case released from prison after nearly two years

Canadian Press, Diana Mehta, 2016 06 01

Ottawa - A Canadian acquitted of charges he faced in the United Arab Emirates has been released from prison and could leave the country as early as Wednesday, his family told The Canadian Press, calling the news "an amazing surprise." Salim Alaradi had been accused of providing supplies to groups in a foreign country without permission of the U.A.E. government and collecting donations without the government's permission. The 48-year-old was found not guilty in the case on Monday, but wasn't immediately released, prompting his family to appeal to Ottawa to help bring him home. Alaradi's family said his Emirati lawyer was told around 10 p.m. local time on Tuesday that the man could be picked up from an Abu Dhabi prison. "We are shocked because we didn't see this coming. This was an amazing surprise for my family," Alaradi's oldest daughter Marwa Alaradi told The Canadian Press. "But I ask that we remain cautious until my father is safely home with us." Salim Alaradi is spending the night with his local lawyer and plans to leave the country as early as Wednesday, his family said, with plans to be accompanied to the airport by Canadian officials. "He is happy but his exhaustion and stress was very clear," Alaradi's daughter said of her father's state. "He is very sick." Alaradi's Canadian lawyer has said the father of five plans to leave the U.A.E. and travel to Istanbul where he will meet his family and receive immediate medical treatment.

6. Free trade, high seas security hang over Chinese minister's visit to Ottawa

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 06 01

Ottawa - High seas geopolitical tensions in Asia and free trade aspirations will hang over the arrival of China's foreign minister in Ottawa today for talks with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his cabinet. Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi is set to meet his Canadian counterpart, Stéphane Dion, but will also pay a visit to Trudeau's Parliament Hill office. Visiting foreign ministers usually stick to talking to their counterparts, but Trudeau's insertion into Wang's itinerary shows the importance the government is placing on China at a pivotal time. Wang's visit to Ottawa comes just a week after China expressed its unhappiness with the declaration made at last week's G7 leaders' summit in Japan, where Trudeau sided with the group in expressing concern about the rising tensions in the South China Sea. Several countries in the region oppose Chinese assertive posture, with Japan particularly taking umbrage over the Beijing's claims in the East China Sea. This is significant because the disputed waters also include important international shipping lanes. Beijing may have taken exception to the G7's stand on the dispute, but it also has high ambitions for deepening economic ties with Canada, including a free trade deal. Trudeau made positive strides with Chinese President Xi Jinping during his first round of international travel last fall. The Chinese leader praised the vision of Trudeau's father, Pierre, for establishing diplomatic relations with the People's Republic in 1970 during a meeting at the G20 in Turkey.

Il y en a un qui a atterri dans ma voiture, probablement par pur hasard.» Rapidement, l'habitacle s'est retrouvé complètement envahi par la fumée. En plus de l'engin fumigène, les malfaiteurs lui ont également lancé un tract dénonçant l'embourgeoisement du quartier. La scène a d'ailleurs été captée par des caméras de surveillance situées à proximité. «Il y en a un qui a essayé de nous faire sortir de la voiture, a confié l'homme. Il a essayé d'ouvrir la porte, mais elle était barrée. Quand on est sorti, il s'est sauvé.» M. 9. Man charged with terrorism for attack on soldiers

Globe and Mail, Jill Mahoney and Colin Freeze, 2016 06 01

Toronto - A Toronto man accused of attacking Canadian soldiers with a knife has been charged with a terrorism offence just as a judge found him unfit to stand trial. Ayanle Hassan Ali, 27, was earlier charged with nine counts, including three of attempted murder, following unprovoked attacks at a North Toronto military recruiting centre in March. Witnesses described soldiers subduing a knife-wielding man who had tried to hurt them, allegedly saying, "Allah told me to come here and kill people." No soldiers were seriously injured. The Islamic State terrorist group has been urging extremists in North America and Europe to use such tactics against uniformed soldiers. On Tuesday, the RCMP announced in a statement that they laid a catch-all terrorism charge against Mr. Ali - specifically, a Criminal Code offence stating he committed all of his other alleged crimes for "the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a terrorist group." The Mounties did not state which terrorist group they are accusing Mr. Ali of being aligned with and they did not discuss what evidence they have that led the Crown to believe he was motivated by terrorist ideals. The fresh charge came as Mr. Ali was in court for a hearing to determine if he's mentally fit to stand trial. In late March, Mr. Ali was ordered to undergo a 30-day psychiatric assessment, which was later extended to 60 days.

10. New Mental Health Plan Could Be 'Turning Point'

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 06 01

Ottawa - The federal government is poised to unveil a new mental health strategy that could be the "turning point" for an employer once dubbed the "worst of the worst" for its high level of chronic stress and depression among Canada's public servants, said a leading mental health advocate. Bill Wilkerson, chair of Mental Health International who is leading a pan-European campaign on depression, said a successful plan would change the way executives lead, managers manage and employees work, eliminating the stress that infected the public service like a "super bug" over the past decade. That would, in turn, reduce absenteeism, boost morale, make employees more productive, innovative and better policy-makers. Without a mental health strategy, Wilkerson says the much-promised renewal of the public service - the latest known as Blueprint 2020 - will remain elusive. "A mental health strategy should be the heartbeat of public service renewal," Wilkerson said in an interview. "Without it, renewal is nourished by empty calories of rhetoric and distrust between public servants and their employer."

12. RCMP, bureaucrats rapped for improperly collecting personal info

CBC News, Dean Beeby, 2016 06 01

Ottawa - The RCMP and federal bureaucrats have been rapped for breaching their duty by gathering identifying data on people who ask for government information. It's the second time officials have been caught violating rules that are supposed to provide a large measure of anonymity for people who use Canada's Access to Information Act. The Mounties and public servants have promised to stop collecting the identifying information as of this month after Canada's information commissioner found the practice to be "arbitrary and unnecessary." The government "has breached its duty to assist requesters without regard for their identity," concludes the report of the commissioner's year-long probe, which responded to complaints by CBC News. The problem arises in a web-based tool that allows requestors to file and pay for official requests for government information under the Access to Information Act. The tool is currently used by 33 departments and agencies, many of them large. Online requests cannot be completed without first indicating the requester's gender in a mandatory "title" section, where the only options are "Ms." or "Mr." And all requests made to the RCMP on the site require the requestor to provide a date of birth.

15. Brother of Slain Taliban Chief's Driver Presses Charges over U.S. Drone Hit

Washington - The Pentagon refused on Monday to comment on the charges that the brother of a man, who was killed in a U.S. drone strike alongside the Taliban's slain chief Mullah Akthar Mansour, has pressed against U.S. officials. A Pentagon source only said that the U.S. government does not recognize verdicts issued by courts abroad, mainly those linked to national security. Mansour was travelling by car near the Pakistani town of Ahmad Wal on May 21 when he was killed. U.S. officials described the car's driver as a "second male combatant" but according to Pakistani security officials he was a chauffeur named Mohammad Azam who worked for the Al Habib rental company based out of Quetta, the region's main city. His brother, Mohammad Qasim, said Azam was an innocent man who was providing for his four children and had been murdered.

16. China, Russia Undeterred by Weak Obama Cyber Security Policy

Washington Free Beacon, Bill Gertz, 2016 06 01

Column - The Obama administration policy of avoiding assertive action against foreign hackers came under fire from Congress last week, and is raising concerns that the White House is failing to protect the country from large-scale cyber attacks. Christopher Painter, the State Department's coordinator for cyber security, defended the administration's strategy for deterring massive data breaches, like China's pilfering of sensitive personnel records on 22 million federal workers, known as "deterrence by denial." This strategy bears no relationship to the strategic doctrine of deterring foreign nuclear attacks by threatening to inflict massive nuclear blasts against any state that threatens to use its nuclear arms on the United States or its allies. Instead, "deterrence by denial" refers to a defensive effort to protect information networks against an onslaught of increasingly sophisticated and innovative cyber intrusions in the hope that foreign data thieves will eventually give up trying--rather than any effort to actually deter such attacks before they occur. The policy fits the overall Obama administration approach of limiting the use of assertive or offensive action against foes and doing as little as possible against those undermining U.S. interests. Instead, the administration uses only diplomatic and law enforcement means that have had little or no effect in deterring massive hacker attacks, primarily from China, along with those originating in Russia, Iran, and North Korea.

17. CIA to detail secret Cold War actions

The Hill, Julian Hattem, 2016 05 31

London - The CIA is planning to offer details about four previously undisclosed covert actions conducted during the Cold War, a federal advisory committee declared in a report. It is unclear which actions will be detailed, however they will be from the Ronald Reagan administration or earlier. The disclosures will be published in upcoming volumes of an official State Department compendium of documents, called the Foreign Relations of the United States series. "CIA consistently reviews both specific documents and compiled volumes in a timely manner, and in 2015 it agreed to acknowledge four covert actions that will be documented in future volumes," the Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation claimed in a report published last week. The advisory panel is charged with declassifying State Department records and compiling the Foreign Relations of the United States series.

18. Clinton Aide Says Little Thought Was Given to Potential Issues Over Private Email

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, Steven Lee Myers, 2016 06 01

Washington - Hillary Clinton's chief of staff at the State Department said in sworn testimony released Tuesday that Mrs. Clinton's advisers gave little thought to the problems her private email server might create if they were forced to turn over her communications under public records law. "Certainly from my standpoint, I wish that had been something we thought about," Cheryl D. Mills, who was chief of staff when Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state, testified in a deposition on Friday in a lawsuit against the State Department brought by a conservative legal group. Ms. Mills's comments -- contrite at times, defensive at others -- represented the first sworn public accounting from a member of Mrs. Clinton's inner circle about the controversy over her exclusive use of a private email account during her State Department tenure. Ms. Mills insisted during nearly seven hours of testimony that Mrs. Clinton's use of the private clintonemail.com account, housed on a server in her home, was "absolutely not" an attempt to evade the Freedom of Information Act, as many of her critics have charged. She acknowledged, however, that the account was tightly held. Unless Mrs. Clinton emailed other officials first from her account, they had to go through gatekeepers in Mrs. Clinton's office to get her email address.

Washington - The FBI wants to exempt its burgeoning national database of fingerprints and facial photos from a federal law that gives Americans the right to sue for government violations of the Privacy Act, such as refusing to tell a person if he or she is in the system. The bureau also wants to shield its data storehouse from other Privacy Act rules, including one that lets people ensure that the information the government holds about them is accurate. The proposed exemptions, published in May in the Federal Register, have stirred objections from an array of privacy and civil rights advocates. They say that such carve-outs remove a critical check on the use of the huge database in criminal investigations. In particular, they are concerned about the bureau's deployment of still-developing facial recognition technology to identify potential suspects. Such technology, they say, may have lower accuracy rates for black people, young people and women. And they worry that it could be misused to track protesters at political rallies. "The Privacy Act was enacted to ensure that individuals had an enforceable right to know the records that the government keeps about their activities," said a coalition of groups in a letter to the Justice Department, whose 45 signatories include the American Civil Liberties Union, Amnesty International, the National Immigration Law Center and the ride-sharing services Uber and Lyft. "This is an extraordinarily broad proposal, and the system it affects is extraordinarily sensitive -- particularly for the communities it may affect the most." But the FBI and Justice Department say the reason they are seeking the exemptions is to ensure that ongoing investigations are not compromised by people learning they are the subjects of probes. They also say that another federal rule gives people the ability to obtain any criminal records they might have in the database. Moreover, the agencies say, only criminal mug shots are searched using facial recognition technology. And it is used only to come up with leads, not to identify a suspect or verify an identity.

20. Military judge shouts down accused 9/11 mastermind at Guantánamo war court
Miami Herald, Carol Rosenberg, 2016 06 01

Guantanamo Bay - Accused 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed began complaining to his military judge, and the judge shouted him down in a brief, at times baffling, episode Tuesday at the war court. At one point, Mohammed, 51, inexplicably announced in Arabic "this is a nuclear bomb in the world," as related through a court interpreter, after Army Col. James L. Pohl, the judge, threatened to eject him from court. After court, Mohammed's attorney, David Nevin said he thought the remark "referred to the World War II bombing of innocent people in Hiroshima in Japan," and called it "a placeholder for the idea that the United States has done harmful acts." Pohl reminded the alleged terrorist known as KSM that his Pentagon-paid lawyers speak for him in court. "He's an American," Mohammed replied, as Pohl continued to try to shut him up. "They're American." Mohammed, facing a death-penalty tribunal whose date has not yet been set, has mostly let his lawyers speak for him. But he chimed in at the end of lengthy legal arguments over a proposal to take sworn videotaped testimony here in October from elderly and infirm relatives of people killed on Sept. 11, 2001. The war court prosecutor wants to preserve the testimony for use at trial, and the sentencing portion, if Mohammed is convicted of war crimes.

21. Minn. ISIL trial hears closing arguments ; Prosecutors say trio ready to kill; defense says it was bluster

USA Today, Aamer Madhani, 2016 06 01

Minneapolis - The case against three young Somali-American men being tried on charges that they conspired to join the Islamic State wrapped up Tuesday. Prosecutors argued that the men eagerly pursued the opportunity to fight and commit murders under the "direction and control" of the extremist group. Defense attorneys countered in their closing arguments in the three-week trial of Guled Omar, 21; Abdirahman Daud, 22; and Mohamed Farah, 22, that their clients showed bluster in some of their private conversations but were never serious about fighting in Syria. Their lawyers said they were entrapped by a government informant into a conspiracy that has led to six of their former friends pleading guilty to conspiracy to provide material support for the Islamic State, also known as ISIL or ISIS. The jury will begin deliberations Wednesday. The trial has captured the attention of the Twin Cities' large Somali-American community, which has seen about a dozen young people recruited to the extremist group's fight in Iraq and Syria.

22. No warrant needed for cell-site data

Washington Post, Spencer S. Hsu, 2016 06 01

Washington - A split federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that police do not need a search warrant before obtaining cell-tower location data that can trace the long-term movements of a suspect's mobile phone, while conceding that the law had come "unmoored" from society's notions of privacy. The full U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, whose jurisdiction includes Virginia and Maryland, ruled 12 to 3 that police can obtain "cell-site" location information, or CSLI, under decades-old rules that allow authorities to collect business or "third party" records, such as banking transactions or numbers dialed from a landline phone, with a court order. "The Supreme Court may in the future limit, or even eliminate, the third-party doctrine. Congress may act to require a warrant for CSLI. But without a change in controlling law, we cannot conclude that the Government violated the Fourth Amendment in this case," Judge Diana Gribbon Motz wrote for the majority. Motz said that arguments by two men convicted in armed robberies around Baltimore - who thought search warrants should be required for the collection of their cell-tower location data - would conflict with established Supreme Court doctrine and recent rulings by federal appellate courts in Florida, Cincinnati, New Orleans and Philadelphia. The Maryland defendants, Aaron Graham and Eric Jordan, argued that investigators' gathering of seven months of phone records - including an average of 130 neighborhood location data points per day over 221 days - amounted to "dragnet surveillance" revealing patterns of their lives. Police seeking the phone records were not required to show a judge probable cause that a crime had been committed, as needed for a search warrant.

23. T.S.A. Is Training Dogs to Stay One Sniff Ahead of Bomb Makers

New York Times, Ron Nixon, 2016 06 01

San Antonio - Ajax is one of 230 dogs at the Transportation Security Administration's facility here on Lackland Air Force Base training to become bomb-sniffing canines. Dogs that pass the course will be deployed to the nation's airports, a first line of defense against terrorist bomb attacks. The assignment is becoming increasingly difficult as terrorists adopt techniques using household chemicals to construct bombs that make it hard even for a dog's sensitive nose to discern. "So we're now asking dogs not just to find a needle in a haystack -- now we're also saying to the dog, 'We need you to find any sharp object in the haystack,'" said Clive Wynne, a professor at Arizona State University. He is leading a study funded by the Office of Naval Research to develop methods to train dogs to identify a wide variety of common ingredients that could be used to make bombs. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the federal government has spent billions on technologies to emulate the nose and brain of a trained bomb dog, which can detect minute traces of explosives. And while researchers have made progress, when it comes to accuracy, nothing quite beats the nose of a dog. "Dogs can detect a teaspoon of chemical in a million gallons of water -- nearly enough to fill two Olympic-size swimming pools," said Craig Angle, a professor in Auburn University's Canine Performance Sciences program. "They perform at a really high level. They're like the Peyton Mannings or Brett Favres of canines."

24. U.S. Issues Travel Alert for Terrorism Risks in Europe This Summer

Wall Street Journal, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 05 31

Washington - The State Department on Tuesday alerted U.S. citizens traveling to Europe to heightened risks of terrorism, citing events in France and Poland this summer that are expected to draw large crowds. The European soccer championships and the Tour de France bicycle race, both hosted in France in June and July, could be terrorist targets, the alert said. The Catholic Church's World Youth Day in Krakow, Poland, in late July, expected to draw up to 2.5 million visitors, will result in stricter security screenings there, the alert said. The message distributed Tuesday was an alert, not a warning. Warnings are seen as indicative of a higher-level threat.

The State Department often issues alerts for large-scale events, such as the Olympics. The State Department last issued a travel alert for Europe in March after terrorist attacks in Brussels killed nearly three dozen people. That message said terrorist groups continue to plan attacks throughout Europe in such public venues as sporting events and tourist sites.

25. US warns of summer terror risk in Europe

London - Tens of thousands of American tourists were warned yesterday that they are at risk of terrorist attacks across Europe this summer, leading to fears that holidays will be cancelled en masse. The US State Department issued an unusually broad travel alert that applies to the whole continent for this month, next month and August. It warns American citizens that they could be in danger at major events, tourist sites, city centres, restaurants and on public transport. The advice singles out European Championship football matches in France and a Catholic youth festival in Cracow, Poland, warning that the large number of tourists would present "greater targets for terrorists planning attacks in public locations". It also raised the spectre of co-ordinated attacks across the continent. Will Geddes, a security expert, said that Americans tended to be more alarmist about security alerts but the warnings were backed up by intelligence. He added: "[The alert] could have economic knock-on effects because a lot of Europe is so reliant on the US dollar during the summer." Raffaello Pantucci, director of international security studies at the Royal United Services Institute, said of the warning: "I think it reflects the reality of the threat picture in Europe... If you look at France alone in the past year, you've had attacks and attempted attacks on public, in museums, attacks in music halls, attempted attacks at religious sites, attacks on random police officers. So it's a very broad threat picture. Isis has given people a pretty broad direction -- find a gun, find a lot of people and just shoot."

"The president has had the opportunity to speak on this a number of times, and I think a careful review of his public comments would indicate that he does not," White House press secretary Josh Earnest said Tuesday, a day after Holder appeared on a podcast and acknowledged the role that Snowden's disclosures played in fostering a public debate about the role of government in surveillance.

27. Blair government's rendition policy led to rift between UK spy agencies

The Guardian (London), Nick Hopkins, Richard Norton-Taylor, 2016 06 01

London - British involvement in controversial and clandestine rendition operations provoked an unprecedented row between the UK's domestic and foreign intelligence services, MI5 and MI6, at the height of the "war on terror", the Guardian can reveal. The head of MI5, Eliza Manningham-Buller, was so incensed when she discovered the role played by MI6 in abductions that led to suspected extremists being tortured, she threw out a number of her sister agency's staff and banned them from working at MI5's headquarters, Thames House. According to Whitehall sources, she also wrote to the then prime minister, Tony Blair, to complain about the conduct of MI6 officers, saying their actions had threatened Britain's intelligence gathering and may have compromised the security and safety of MI5 officers and their informants. The letter caused a serious and prolonged breakdown of trust between Britain's domestic and foreign spy agencies provoked by the Blair government's support for rendition.

28. May ignored warnings over Channel planes

London Times, Peter Dominiczak, Steven Swinford, 2016 06 01

London - Theresa May ignored warnings from a former security minister and cancelled an aerial surveillance programme designed to stop migrants crossing the Channel into Britain to save £4 million, The Daily Telegraph can disclose. The Home Secretary agreed to scrap the surveillance contract in January despite being told by Baroness Neville-Jones, a former security minister and chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee, that it was a risk to Britain's border security. It comes amid growing criticism of border security after evidence emerged that people smugglers are increasingly using small boats to ferry migrants across the Channel to small ports and harbours on the coastline. Two British men were arrested at the weekend after a boat carrying 18 Albanian migrants was rescued off the coast of Kent. The Home Office announced yesterday that new vessels would be brought into service to patrol British coastal waters. However, the plans were dismissed as a "joke" by Conservative MPs after it emerged that the boats will not be fully operational until the end of 2017.

29. MI5 'used Kincora sex abuse to blackmail politicians'

The Independent (UK), Lesley-Anne McKeown, 2016 06 01

Belfast - Hundreds of top secret police documents about the former Kincora Boys' Home in Northern Ireland have been declassified and handed over to a public inquiry, a lawyer has revealed. Some 26 boxes of material have been retrieved from Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) archives and given to the Historical Institutional Abuse (HIA) Inquiry which is examining allegations of child prostitution, vice rings and blackmail plots at the notorious east Belfast facility. Barrister Joseph Aiken, counsel to the HIA, said: "When the inquiry began this was all marked secret. At the request of the inquiry it has all been declassified by the PSNI and made available to the inquiry." It has long been claimed a high ranking paedophile ring preyed on vulnerable young boys in Kincora during the 1970s. It is further alleged the UK security services knew about the abuse but did nothing to stop it, instead using the information to blackmail and extract intelligence from the influential men, including senior politicians and establishment figures, who were the perpetrators.

30. Top brass let us down, says siege negotiator

The Australian, Dan Box, 2016 06 01

Sydney - The police negotiator speaking to the hostages held in the Lindt cafe siege says he felt "let down" by his senior officers, who did not respond when provided with the gunman's demands. The negotiator, who can be identified only as Peter, yesterday told an inquest into the December 2014 siege that he was not told at the time that his commanders considered meeting some of Man Haron Monis's demands. Among them was that Christmas lights strung outside the cafe in Sydney's Martin Place be switched off. The negotiators referred this to senior officers - involved in the police response to the siege, but were never told of their decision. As primary negotiator, it was Peter's role to speak directly to the hostages, in the hope of communicating with Monis. "If we did get permission to have the lights turned off, we would use that then as a bargaining tool to say 'We've done something for you, what about something back in regards of hostages?' " he told the inquest.

Luis Almagro, a former Uruguayan foreign minister, has called Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro a "petty dictator," accusing him of disrupting democracy by blocking the opposition-controlled congress and putting loyalists in the Supreme Court. Venezuela views the OAS as a pawn of hostile U.S. policy, and Maduro has dismissed Almagro as a turncoat working for its ideological adversaries in Washington. Times of India, Neeraj Chauhan, 2016 06 01

New Delhi - The investigation into the recent blasts in Haryana is heading towards the possibility of "lone wolf" attacks by a trained, professional bomb-maker, who is most likely testing his bombs for something big, sources have told TOI. While refraining from linking it to Islamic State yet, sources said the possibility is not being ruled out. The forensic analysis of the bomb used in the May 26 bus blast in Pipli has suggested that the suspect used "300 to 400g of explosive material -potassium chlorate, ammonium nitrate tied with a proper circuitry and 12 volt battery and quartz watch used as a timer". "The way these IEDs we re tied is a work of a professional hand, who has definitely not used the internet formula to make the bomb.The bombs were of low intensity but the person is definitely trying to do something big," said an officer.

39. Beijing works on air defence zone in South China Sea Beijing works on new ADIZ (Canada)

South China Morning Post, Staff reporter, 2016 06 01

Beijing - China is preparing an air defence identification zone (ADIZ) in the South China Sea, two years after it announced a similar one in the East China Sea, according to sources close to the People's Liberation Army and a defence report. But one source said the timing of any declaration would depend on security conditions in the region, particularly the United States' military presence and diplomatic ties with neighbouring countries. "If the US military keeps making provocative moves to challenge China's sovereignty in the region, it will give Beijing a good opportunity to declare an ADIZ in the South China Sea," the source said. The revelation came ahead of the Shangri-La Dialogue in Singapore, a security forum attended by defence officials from various nations, including Admiral Sun Jianguo and US Secretary of Defence Ash Carter. Disputes in the South China Sea are expected to head the agenda of the three-day event, which starts on Friday. Top Chinese and US officials will also meet next week for their annual strategic and economic dialogue in Beijing. In a written response to the South China Morning Post on the zone, the defence ministry said it was "the right of a sovereign state" to designate an ADIZ. "Regarding when to declare such a zone, it will depend on whether China is facing security threats from the air, and what the level of the air safety threat is," the statement said.

Tensions between China and neighbours Vietnam, Malaysia, Brunei and the Philippines over sovereignty in the South China Sea have risen since Beijing embarked on major land reclamation work on disputed islands and reefs in the area. A report in Canada-based Kanwa Defence Review said Beijing had defined the area of the ADIZ in the South China Sea, and the timing of the announcement would be a political decision.

41. Chinese embassy rejects U.S. paper's account of military air encounter over S. China Sea

Xinhua News Agency, Zhi Linfei, 2016 06 01

Washington - The Chinese Embassy in Washington on Tuesday rejected the New York Times' account about a recent air encounter between Chinese and U.S. military planes over the South China Sea. The Chinese military aircraft acted professionally while it watched the U.S. Navy spy plane carrying out close reconnaissance in Chinese coastal waters, said Zhu Haiquan, a spokesman for the Chinese embassy, in a letter to the Times published on the paper's website Tuesday. "Our operation was completely compliant with safety and professional standards. The attempt at intimidation by American military aircraft in the South China Sea, however, was not," Zhu pointed out. The encounter occurred about two weeks ago over China's Hainan Island. The Chinese Defense Ministry in Beijing has accused the American plane of espionage, saying the Chinese aircraft responded properly in line with professional standards and a bilateral agreement. "Regarding the incident raised in the editorial, our information indicates that Chinese military aircraft followed from a safe distance and monitored the American plane carrying out close reconnaissance in Chinese coastal waters," Zhu wrote in the letter, responding to the May 21 Times editorial entitled "Playing Chicken in the South China Sea."

North Korea's state-run Central News Agency reported early Wednesday that the official, Ri Su-yong, told the Chinese that it was the "permanent" policy of the North to try to expand its nuclear arsenal while striving to rebuild its economy. to carry out attacks in Punjab. According to 'Toronto Sun', Canada's public safety minister Ralph Goodale's office refused to comment on the allegations, but said the government monitors "all potential threats and has robust measures in place to address them". The Canadian authorities did not comment on Nijjar's alleged visits to Pakistan or his detention by the Thailand Police that were mentioned in the report by Punjab intelligence investigators.

Moscow Times, Staff report, 2016 05 31

Moscow - Controversial performance artist Pyotr Pavlensky has been nominated for the Russian Security Services' (FSB) Prize for Literature and the Arts for the artistic protest which saw him light the door of the FSB headquarters on fire. 47. President: Iran Concerned about Security of Regional States

Fars News Agency, 2016 06 01

Tehran - Iranian President Hassan Rouhani underlined the Armed Forces' efforts to establish security not only in Iran but also in other regional countries. "The Islamic Republic of Iran thinks not only about its people's interests and territory but also about supporting and helping the oppressed people of this dear region; the day Erbil faced the danger of collapse, the Iranian Armed Forces, political forces, the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC), Basij (volunteer forces) and government saved that territory," Rouhani said, addressing a large gathering of Iranian people in the Western city of Mahabad on Tuesday. He also referred to the threat posed by the ISIL and al-Nusra terrorist groups to Damascus, and reminded that Iran positively responded to the Syrian government's demand for help at that time.

48. Al-Qarni's shooter was a member of Filipino Hezbollah

Arab News, Saeed A-Khotani, 2016 06 01

Riyadh - The dead shooter of prominent Saudi scholar and preacher Sheikh Ayedh Al-Qarni, at Zamboanga city, Philippines, in March this year, was a member of the Filipino Hezbollah group. This was disclosed to Arab News on Monday by Al-Qarni, in an exclusive interview after the scholar spent almost three months of hospitalization and recovery from his injuries in both the Philippine and Saudi hospitals. "Some investigators told me, when I was under treatment in the Philippines, that the initial investigation indicated the killed shooter in my incident was a Filipino Shia member of the Hezbollah group and he was a regular visitor to the Iranian cultural center where usually Shia cult was propagated and Iran advocacy promoted," he said.

49. Former Mossad chief: Netanyahu is a fear monger, administration will soon come to an end

Jerusalem Post, Staff Report, 2016 06 01

Jerusalem - The former director of Israel's national intelligence agency Mossad said on Tuesday that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was a "fear monger" and believed the "countdown" to the end of his administration "has begun." In an interview with al-Jazeera Tuesday, Efraim Halevy also commented that the phenomenon of Jewish extremism in Israel eclipsed the threat of a nuclear Iran and that top generals in the IDF believed Hamas in Gaza "is the best situation for Israel." Speaking with Mehdi Hasan, host of the program UP Front, Halevy spoke candidly about Netanyahu's performance in the premiership, insinuating that his former boss used fear as a political tool in order to garner support. "I think he is a fear monger. I think he uses fear in a way in which one should not use," Halevy said. "I think nobody should vote out of fear," he added.

50. No independent evidence of Badreddine's death: STL

Lebanon Daily Star, Ned Whalley, 2016 06 01

Beirut - The Special Tribunal for Lebanon deliberated Tuesday whether it should terminate the prosecution of Hezbollah commander Mustafa Badreddine. It first must establish whether he is actually dead. Badreddine's death was reported in Lebanese media on May 13. He was allegedly killed in an explosion near the Damascus airport, but details of the attack remain unclear. Hezbollah blamed "takfiris" for his killing. Commentators have suggested that the successful targeting of the party commander would have been a substantial achievement for rebel groups operating in the area, and alleged that Hezbollah covered up Israeli responsibility to avoid confrontation. In a televised eulogy of Badreddine, Hezbollah Secretary-General Sayyed Hasan Nasrallah dismissed the allegations, but reiterated the party's long-standing refusal to cooperate with the court. Prosecutors have submitted requests to Lebanese authorities for additional confirmation, including a death certificate.

52. Top Jewish Terror Suspect Meir Ettinger Freed From Israeli Detention

Haaretz, Chaim Levinson, 2016 06 01

Jerusalem - The Shin Bet security service's number one Jewish suspect of terrorism was released on Wednesday after 10 months in administrative detention. Meir Ettinger, the grandson of the slain far-right activist Meir Kahane, was detained following the murder of the Dawabsheh family in the West Bank village of Duma last July, and was placed in administrative detention for six months. His detention was later extended by a further four months. The Shin Bet did not seek to extend the administrative detention order again. Ettinger remains under various restrictions, including a ban from the West Bank and East Jerusalem and a curfew. He is also barred from making contact with 93 people. Following his detention, a judge noted that Ettinger encouraged acts of violence that harmed Israel's security, and that he organized a violent revolt aimed at toppling the state.

53. Alienation grows in Brussels district that bred Paris attackers

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 06 01

Brussels - When Moroccan-born former boxer Mohamed Idrissi orders a young man out of his gym for smoking, the respect is tangible. The youngster stubs out his cigarette and leaves, head bowed. Inside the gym, the muted thud of leather gloves striking punchbags resumes. Idrissi's influence goes beyond his job as a coach at the Brussels Boxing Academy, near the Molenbeek district of the Belgian capital where Islamist militants, several of them of Moroccan origin, planned last year's deadly Paris attacks. Since the Nov. 13 bloodshed in Paris, security has been tightened in Molenbeek, a district described by its own mayor as a "breeding ground" for violence, and many Muslims say they feel stigmatized. Idrissi is angered by frequent police checks of people with Moroccan roots which he sees as racial profiling although police deny this. But he bites his tongue in the presence of young men to avoid repeating "the kind of comments we warn parents can feed into their radicalization."

Paris - Plus de six mois après les attentats de Paris et Bruxelles, l'identité des principaux organisateurs se précise. Parmi eux, plusieurs Français, dont un mystérieux homme clef, Abou Souleymane. Enquête. Une enquête colossale. Un réseau djihadiste aux ramifications tentaculaires. Deux cents jours après les attentats de Paris (130 morts), dix semaines après ceux de Bruxelles (32 tués), la justice française et son homologue belge déploient des moyens considérables pour reconstituer la genèse des actes terroristes les plus meurtriers jamais survenus dans les deux pays. Elles doivent aussi établir les responsabilités respectives de la quarantaine de djihadistes identifiés, dont une moitié a été interpellée. Treize d'entre eux - kamikazes ou fugitifs débusqués - ont trouvé la mort. A ce jour, seul Salah Abdeslam, 26 ans, unique survivant des commandos du 13 novembre, est détenu en France. Mais le « logisticien » du réseau a refusé de s'exprimer lors de sa première audition, le 20 mai. Quatre autres membres du groupe djihadiste font l'objet d'une demande d'extradition de la Belgique vers la France.

55. Haine en ligne : les mesures des géants du Web ne satisfont pas les associations

Le Figaro, Elsa Trujillo, 2016 06 01

Non identifié - La Commission européenne, Facebook, Twitter, YouTube et Microsoft ont convenu d'un code de conduite contre les propos haineux sur Internet. Mais l'UEJF et SOS

Racisme remarquent un flou relatif des mesures annoncées. Un premier grand pas commun des géants du Web contre la haine en ligne. Dans le code de bonne conduite dévoilé mardi par la Commission européenne, Facebook, Twitter, YouTube et Microsoft s'engagent à «avoir des procédures claires et efficaces» pour examiner les signalements de «discours de haine illégaux» sur leurs différentes plateformes. Parmi les dispositifs prévus, la suppression des contenus haineux sous 24 heures ainsi que la mise en place de formations renforcées des employés. Ces mesures sont jugées floues par l'UEJF et SOS Racisme, qui avaient assigné Twitter, YouTube et Facebook en référé mi-mai pour l'inefficacité de leurs systèmes de modération. «Des formations de personnels sont évoquées sans que l'on sache si les équipes seront en sous-effectif ou non, et si elles pourraient être amenées à être renforcées», note Dominique Sopo, président de SOS Racisme, contacté par Le Figaro . «Il faudrait surtout s'intéresser au nombre de personnes préposées à cette tâche.»

56. Les nouvelles menaces terroristes

Paris - Le compte à rebours a commencé : plus qu'une poignée de jours avant le coup d'envoi de l'Euro 2016; quelques semaines d'ici au top départ du 103e Tour de France. Deux événements sportifs qui vont drainer des millions de supporters et de touristes, français et étrangers, dans les stades, les « fan L zones » et les bars, sur les places des villages et le long des routes. Policiers, gendarmes, militaires, spécialistes de la sécurité civile et du renseignement, eux, n'ont guère le coeur au ballon rond ni au vélo. Ils sont sur les dents, mobilisés par dizaines de milliers - 90000 pour veiller sur l'Euro, 23000, sur la Grande Boucle. Malgré l'ampleur inédite du dispositif, même ces professionnels ne sont pas entièrement rassurés. « Les stades et les fan zones, on sait gérer. Mais comment va-t-on protéger les attroupements qui se formeront aux terrasses des cafés? » s'interroge un membre de l'état-major du ministère de l'Intérieur. « 100 % de précautions, ce n'est pas le risque zéro », a reconnu Bernard Cazeneuve dans une récente interview au quotidien L'Equipe. Jamais la tension n'a été si palpable. Car jamais la menace terroriste n'a été si lourde. Patrick Calvar, patron de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI), a sonné l'alarme à plusieurs reprises depuis le début de l'année. Le 17 février, devant les sénateurs de la commission des Affaires étrangères et des Forces armées, il a affirmé disposer d'« informations faisant état de la présence de commandos [djidhadistes] sur le sol européen, dont [les services de renseignement] ignor[ent] la localisation et l'objectif ». Face aux députés de la commission de la Défense, le 10 mai, il a insisté : « Nous savons que Daech planifie de nouvelles attaques [...] et que la France est clairement visée [...]. La question n'est pas de savoir "si", mais "quand" et "où". » La vigie du renseignement français, dont les services ont déjoué 15 projets terroristes depuis août 2013, s'attend à « une nouvelle forme d'attaque : une campagne terroriste caractérisée par le dépôt d'engins explosifs dans des lieux où est rassemblée une foule importante, ce type d'actions étant multiplié pour créer un climat de panique ». Autres scénarios redoutés : une opération menée contre une école et l'instrumentalisation de mineurs.

57. Un djihad en version française

L'Express, Boris Thiolay, 2016 06 01

Paris - Plusieurs milliers de combattants francophones de Daech visent l'Hexagone. Ce phénomène trouve son origine dans les années 1990, quand s'implantent sur le territoire des réseaux djihadistes qui ont fait souche. Le blondinet n'a guère plus de 10 ans. Héros pathétique d'une vidéo diffusée par l'organisation Etat islamique (Daech), le 14 mai dernier, Abou Moussab (« le pursang », « le noble », son nom de guerre) est un petit Français totalement fanatisé. L'enfant explique vouloir suivre « les traces de son père », un Français converti, tué au combat en Syrie. L'orphelin aurait « aimé lui demander une faveur : faire une opération martyre et aller en France pour les faire exploser ». L'apprenti terroriste passe ensuite aux travaux pratiques. Il enseigne à un garçonnet encore plus jeune que lui à tirer à la kalachnikov. Au terme d'une mise en scène nauséuse, les gamins exécutent au pistolet deux prisonniers agenouillés. Cette vidéo n'est pas une première. Mais elle rappelle encore une fois que la France est une cible prioritaire pour l'Etat islamique. Afin d'y commettre des attentats, l'organisation djihadiste a besoin de recrues françaises, qui connaissent les lieux visés, ainsi que de francophones, capables de se fondre dans la masse.

1. Canadian identified as terror leader

Toronto - After the nearly-decapitated body of a 68-year-old Hindu priest was found in western Bangladesh on Tuesday, the local ISIL affiliate claimed responsibility in a communiqué that vowed to "cleanse" the country of "filth." It was the latest in a wave of sectarian killings in Bangladesh - many of them attributed to a regional franchise of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant that is reportedly led by a Canadian and former Southwestern Ontario resident Tamim Chowdhury. "He is from Windsor," said professor Amarnath Amarasingam, a post-doctoral fellow at Dalhousie University's Resilience Research Centre. "People who knew him say he was a quiet guy. Not much else is known about him at the moment." According to a report in the Beirut Daily Star, Chowdhury now uses the alias Shaykh Abu Ibrahim Al-Hanif and was identified in the latest edition of the ISIL propaganda magazine Dabiq as the "emir" of its branch in Bangladesh. In the magazine, distributed in April, Al-Hanif comes across as a violent hatemonger, referring to Hinduism as a "filthy, cow-worshipping religion" and threatening to "slaughter" those who did not subscribe to his militant version of Islam. "We let our actions do the talking," the lengthy interview quoted him saying. "And our soldiers are presently sharpening their knives to slaughter the atheists, the mockers of the prophet and every other apostate in the region." About 180 extremists have left Canada to take part in terrorism abroad, CSIS said in March. Another 60 have returned to Canada and police have prevented dozens more from leaving. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale outlined his national security agenda in a blog post this week in which he said the government was now collecting basic passport information from those exiting Canada. "This fills a significant security loophole," he said. The Liberals had also made arrangements for "stronger co-operation on no-fly lists to deny air travel to those who pose serious risks to aviation security or are likely to travel abroad for the purpose of engaging in terrorism," he wrote.

2. Couple convicted in B.C. terror case were 'easy target' for RCMP, lawyer says Globe and Mail online, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 06 08

Vancouver - A husband and wife convicted of placing potentially explosive pressure-cooker devices outside the B.C. Legislature were an "easy target" for an aggressive undercover police operation because they were isolated, impoverished and vulnerable due to their dependence on methadone, a defence lawyer said Tuesday. John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were found guilty by a jury last year of conspiring to murder persons unknown and making or possessing an explosive substance - in both cases for the benefit of or at the direction of a terrorist group. They were arrested on July 1, 2013. Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody have argued they were victims of police entrapment. A hearing into that aspect of the case began in July, with closing arguments beginning earlier this week. Mark Jetté, Ms. Korody's lawyer, told the B.C. Supreme Court on Tuesday that undercover RCMP officers set out to establish a rapport with the couple, and it was easily done. "They know enough about these two, that they are socially isolated. ...They know they're impoverished," he said. "...To that extent, it's an easy target for a sophisticated undercover operation." Mr. Jetté said police also knew Mr. Nuttall and Ms. Korody, who had both been addicted to heroin, were dependent on methadone. He said there were times during the investigation when they could be seen consuming it, though only Ms. Korody had a prescription. "They're basically chugging methadone from a bottle," he said. Mr. Jetté is expected to continue his argument Wednesday, focusing on the couple's vulnerabilities. Tuesday, Ms. Sandford questioned whether the RCMP should have launched the elaborate operation - in which an undercover officer presented himself as a businessman with jihadist ties and approached Mr. Nuttall - at all. She said the Mounties had been told by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service that Mr. Nuttall had tried to purchase potassium nitrate, though she said that information was not corroborated. Potassium nitrate can be used in explosives.

3. PM adds 3 women to deputy minister posts

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 06 08

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has promoted three more women into deputy minister jobs as the wave of senior-ranking bureaucrats' retirements continues. In the latest shuffle of the senior ranks, three of the five promotions went to women. Marta Morgan, the associate deputy minister at Finance, moves into the top job at Immigration and Refugees and Citizenship at the end of the month to replace Anita Biguzs. Biguzs is retiring after overseeing the Liberals' resettlement of 25,000 Syrian refugees. Morgan's job was not filled in this round of moves. Manon Brassard, the Treasury Board assistant deputy minister who oversees compensation and labour relations, becomes president of the Economic Development Agency of Canada for the Regions of Quebec, a position that has been vacant for several months. Brassard has been stickhandling a thorny round of collective bargaining with 18 federal unions to replace the existing sick-leave regime with a new short-term disability plan. The government also didn't announce her replacement. Chantel Maheu, the assistant secretary to cabinet responsible for plans and priorities at the Privy Council Office, steps up to PCO's deputy secretary post overseeing plans and consultations. Her move is effective Sept. 6. The moves come with the retirements of three longtime bureaucrats - Biguzs at Citizenship, along with Ward Elcock and Margaret Biggs, former deputy ministers who have been working as PCO senior advisers. A career bureaucrat, Elcock was most recently special adviser on human smuggling and illegal migration. He held a series of senior posts, including director general of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and deputy minister at National Defence. Biggs was the former president of the defunct Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

4. China's microphone diplomacy flops

Editorial: In strict diplomatic terms, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi's recent visit to Canada could not be termed a success. It was the first visit by a Chinese foreign minister in seven years. It was also the first opportunity for the new Liberal government to demonstrate its eagerness to patch up relationships it claims were strained under the Conservatives. Luo Zhaohui, China's ambassador to Canada, says a lot of important work got done: the launch of a mechanism to improve dialogue; talks on trade and business relations; plans to increase student mobility, fight corruption and "hunt-down and surrender ... fugitive offenders." And, of course, the usual "candid and in-depth exchange of views on sensitive issues ... of mutual concern." Unfortunately, all of it was overshadowed by Wang's decision to lecture a Canadian journalist for daring to question him on China's record on human rights. "I would like to suggest to you that please don't ask questions in such an irresponsible manner," he said. The reporter's remarks demonstrated "arrogance" and "prejudice," and were "unacceptable." "We welcome goodwill suggestions but we reject groundless or unwarranted accusations," he said.

5. Federal photo-matching scheme quietly singles out passport fraudsters

Ottawa - Federal officials used photo-matching technology to identify 15 high-risk people - all wanted on immigration warrants - who used false identities to apply for travel documents. The Liberal government might make the facial-recognition scheme permanent to help find and arrest people ineligible to remain in Canada due to involvement with terrorism, organized crime or human rights violations. It's just the latest example of federal efforts to zero in on lawbreakers using biometrics - physical identifiers such as images, fingerprints or iris scans. The photo-matching idea emerged from concerns that people wanted by the Canada Border Services Agency might use fake names to obtain genuine Canadian travel documents from the Immigration Department's passport program, say internal memos released under the Access to Information Act. "Genuine Canadian passports and other travel documents are of high value to persons who seek to establish false identities," says a memorandum of understanding between the border and immigration agencies. "Individuals who have outstanding immigration arrest warrants can evade detection by law enforcement by using false identities to travel, or to live within communities while retaining access to benefits and services."

Ottawa - Le président du Conseil du Trésor, Scott Brison, a approuvé des mesures intérimaires qui permettront aux syndicats de négocier comme si le projet de loi C-4 adopté par le gouvernement Harper - qui retirait leur droit à l'arbitrage - n'avait jamais existé. Pour l'Association canadienne des employés professionnels (ACEP), qui compte 11 000 membres parmi lesquels des économistes, analystes, traducteurs fédéraux, l'annonce du président du Conseil du Trésor est «une bonne nouvelle», puisque ses membres ont toujours préféré la voie de l'arbitrage dans le cadre des négociations, au lieu de la conciliation ou du recours à la grève. «Lorsque le gouvernement conservateur nous a retiré notre droit à l'arbitrage, notre syndicat s'est retrouvé en position délicate.

7. Personal email, BBMs subject to FOI, privacy watchdog tells public servants

Canadian Press, Allison Jones, 2016 06 08

Toronto - Ontario's information and privacy commissioner has told government and public sector staff that their personal email and BlackBerry Messenger accounts are subject to freedom of information requests. Brian Beamish issued a guideline Tuesday for Ontario's public institutions to help them comply with access legislation. All public servants should be aware that "records relating to government business are subject to provincial access legislation, even if created, sent or received through instant messaging tools or personal email accounts," Beamish wrote. "There has been some confusion around these issues, but it is imperative that all public servants, elected officials and political staff understand that information requests for records about public business cannot be evaded by using instant messaging or personal email accounts." Political staffers often use tools such as BlackBerry Messenger to communicate with each other, and those records don't tend to be included in responses to access-to-information requests. Tom Henheffer, the executive director of Canadian Journalists for Free Express, said government and party staffers of all stripes use BBM "constantly." "Anything that could potentially be embarrassing, they all know to use BBM or personal email," he said.

8. RCMP terrorism sting based on 'deceit and tricks,' must be condemned: lawyer

Canadian Press, Geordon Omand, 2016 06 08

Vancouver - Illegal police tactics during an undercover operation that led a couple to be found guilty of terrorism-related offences endanger public rights, shock the conscience of Canadians and must be strongly condemned, says a statement of defence filed in B.C. Supreme Court. John Nuttall and his common-law wife Amanda Korody were found guilty last year, but their convictions are on hold while their lawyers argue the RCMP entrapped their clients into planting what they believed were pressure-cooker bombs at the B.C. legislature. The Mounties used "deceit and tricks" throughout the elaborate sting, read the statement of defence. Nuttall's lawyer, Marilyn Sandford, told the court Tuesday that police aided and abetted terrorist activity by helping the couple design, construct and transport the homemade explosives. "It matters not that the RCMP knew the devices would not explode," she said. "The RCMP knowingly facilitated terrorist activity." Nuttall and Korody were arrested in July 2013 after an undercover operation that began five months earlier. Sandford criticized what she called a lack of oversight on the operation, suggesting it would not have continued for as long had operational plans been properly communicated to RCMP superiors in Ottawa. "Clearly, there is something inherently problematic about (police) setting up a pretend terrorist group," she said. "All of this ought to have been carefully considered." The sting went from gathering intelligence about Nuttall, whose outspoken views on radical Islam had already flagged him to police, to an operation designed to see whether undercover operators could induce him to commit terrorist acts, Sandford said.

C'est du moins ce que recommande le deuxième rapport du Groupe de travail mixte sur la santé mentale formé par le gouvernement et les syndicats. 11. 12 ans de prison pour un Américain voulant rejoindre l'EI (Canada)

Sacramento, Californie - Un Américain de 22 ans a été condamné à 12 ans de prison hier pour avoir voulu rejoindre en Syrie les combattants du groupe Etat islamique (EI). Nicholas Teausant, un Californien converti à l'islam, avait plaidé coupable en décembre de tentative de soutien à une organisation terroriste. Il avait été arrêté en mars 2014 près de la frontière canadienne, alors qu'il tentait de rejoindre la Syrie et l'organisation jihadiste. Sa peine de prison doit être suivie de 25 années de liberté surveillée. "Nous ne devons avoir aucune tolérance face au terrorisme. Il n'y a pas de marge d'erreur", a commenté un juge fédéral, John Mendez, en imposant sa condamnation à Sacramento, en Californie. D'après les autorités, Nicholas Teausant avait attiré l'attention du FBI en 2013 en écrivant sur des réseaux sociaux qu'il voulait "mener un jihad violent et participer à la chute de l'Amérique". Dans ses échanges avec un informateur du FBI, il a ensuite évoqué des attaques dans le métro de Los Angeles avant de faire marche arrière.

12. Comey: FBI pursuing 1,000 ISIS cases across U.S.

Minnesota Public Radio (MPR), Matt Sepic, 2016 06 08

Minneapolis - Less than a week after a federal jury in Minneapolis found three Somali-American men guilty of trying to join ISIS, the head of the FBI said Minnesota is not the focus of anti-terror recruitment efforts, but counterterrorism remains the bureau's top priority. Director James Comey met Tuesday with business and community leaders in the Twin Cities. During a brief news conference at the FBI's field office in Brooklyn Center, Comey said terror recruitment is a problem across the country. "The bureau has close to 1,000 open cases in all 50 states focused on people who are at some stage between consuming the poison from the group we call ISIL to acting on that poison, either by traveling or moving toward violence here in the United States." Comey said the number of people attempting to travel began dropping last August, from six to 10 a month to one or two, but the number of recruitment cases agents are pursuing has held steady. Comey said recent high-profile prosecutions may be deterring some travelers, and the families of others may be warning them away. But Comey said some recruits may be planning attacks on American soil.

13. F.B.I. Steps Up Use of Stings in ISIS Cases

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, 2016 06 08

Washington - The F.B.I. has significantly increased its use of stings in terrorism cases, employing agents and informants to pose as jihadists, bomb makers, gun dealers or online "friends" in hundreds of investigations into Americans suspected of supporting the Islamic State, records and interviews show. Undercover operations, once seen as a last resort, are now used in about two of every three prosecutions involving people suspected of supporting the Islamic State, a sharp rise in the span of just two years, according to a New York Times analysis. Charges have been brought against nearly 90 Americans believed to be linked to the group. The increase in the number of these secret operations, which put operatives in the middle of purported plots, has come with little public or congressional scrutiny, and the stings rely on F.B.I. guidelines that predate the rise of the Islamic State. While F.B.I. officials say they are careful to avoid illegally entrapping suspects, their undercover operatives are far from bystanders. In recent investigations from Florida to California, agents have helped people suspected of being extremists acquire weapons, scope out bombing targets and find the best routes to Syria to join the Islamic State, records show. Officials said in interviews that because social media has given extremists a cloak of anonymity, these undercover stings -- both online and in person -- have become increasingly vital to gathering evidence and deterring possible attacks inside the United States. "We're not going to wait for the person to mobilize on his own timeline," said Michael B. Steinbach, who leads the F.B.I.'s national security branch. He added that the F.B.I. could not afford to "just sit and wait knowing the individual is actively plotting."

14. Report finds sweeping flaws with visa partners

The Hill, Julian Hattem, 2016 06 07

Washington - More than one-third of countries participating in a program allowing their citizens to enter the United States without a visa are failing to live up to requirements for sharing information about suspected terrorists and criminals. The finding, contained in a Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released this week, heightened officials' concerns about potential vulnerabilities in the visa waiver program and its possible exploitation by terrorists. "Thousands of Europeans have gone to fight in Syria and Iraq, and most of them are from countries that have visa-free access to the United States," House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Michael McCaul (R-Texas) said in a statement on Tuesday. "These extremists are only a plane-flight away from our shores, which is why overseas counterterrorism cooperation is critical. "But if our partners do not share data about terror suspects quickly and transparently, such fanatics might be able to slip through the cracks to enter our country." Around the world, 38 nations participate in the visa waiver program, including friends and allies such as the United Kingdom, France and Japan. In order to participate, each of those 38 nations is required to agree with the U.S. to share information about lost or stolen passports, suspected terrorists and criminal history.

15. U.S. airport security improves since screening lapses: DHS

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 06 07

Washington - The U.S. Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is working to improve airport screening after major lapses last year, a U.S. government investigator said on Tuesday, adding that the agency has embraced oversight. "As a result of our audit reports ... TSA is now, for the first time in memory, critically assessing its deficiencies in an honest and objective light," said John Roth, inspector general of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, the TSA's parent agency. "We are generally satisfied with the response we have seen at TSA." "We went from a cultural situation where we were fought at every turn to one in which they now embrace oversight in a way that I think is ... positive," he added, in testimony before a U.S. Senate committee. In a covert audit, department staff succeeded in bringing banned items through airport checkpoints and raised concerns about the TSA's vetting of its workforce.

16. U.S. regulators, FBI warn banks on cyber threat after Bangladesh heist

Reuters, Jim Finkle, Jonathan Spicer, 2016 06 07

Boston - U.S. regulators on Tuesday told banks to review the cyber security they have in place to protect against fraudulent money transfers and other threats to a global payments network, months after hackers stole $81 million from the Bangladesh central bank's account at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. The notice from the Fed and other financial regulators comes two weeks after the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation urged banks to look for signs of possible cyber attacks and asked them to hunt for technical clues that they have been targeted by the same group, according to a notification seen by Reuters. The warnings suggest that U.S. government and law enforcement agencies are concerned that recent attacks on banks in emerging-market economies could lead to losses for big U.S. firms that rely on the so-called SWIFT fund-transfer network, which serves as the backbone of international finance. In early February, thieves hacked into Bangladesh Bank's interface with SWIFT's network and peppered the New York Fed with payment instructions. Most of the requests were blocked, but four were filled, amounting to $81 million that went to accounts in the Philippines and remains missing.

17. 17 things we learned from GCHQ director at Cheltenham Science Festival

Gloucestershire Echo, Aled Thomas, 2016 06 08

Cheltenham - Robert Hannigan, the Director of GCHQ was unveiled as a the 'senior GCHQ official' who would appear with Times journalist Ben Macintyre at a sell-out event at Cheltenham Science Festival called: For Your Eyes Only: The Secret Life of GCHQ. Seeing as the place runs on numbers we thought we'd review the event with a list. * Robert Hannigan is not at all ambivalent about Edward Snowden. He can't say that people have died because of his leaks, but he does know that terrorists being tracked, learned what GCHQ was doing via Snowden's leaks and then disappeared and nobody knows what they got up to. * GCHQ cannot compete with tech companies like Google when it comes to pay. But brilliant people (and not just brilliant technologists, but brilliant linguists, analysts, engineers and the rest) work at GCHQ because of the 'mission'. Doing interesting work to protect Britain, and Cheltenham. People like living here, they settle and they want to stay. * GCHQ's position is that Britain will be safer in the E.U. It is of course the government's position.

18. A peek behind the curtain at GCHQ

BBC News, Rory Cellan Jones, 2016 06 08

London - It has long been the most secretive of Britain's intelligence agencies - but, lately, GCHQ has been tiptoeing ever so carefully out of the shadows. Last month, the signals intelligence operation opened a Twitter account - "Hello World," was its first offering - and last night its director spoke for an hour at an event where he even took questions from members of the public. Mind you, this was friendly territory - the Cheltenham Science Festival in GCHQ's home town. The session had been billed as an interview between the Times journalist Ben Macintyre and "a senior GCHQ official", but the level of security in the town's Imperial Gardens was an indicator of just how senior that official might be. So the audience - some of whom probably worked for him - cannot have been surprised when Robert Hannigan walked on to the stage. "Over the past few years we've been talked about by people who are not necessarily our greatest fans", so it was important for a democracy to explain a little more about how the agency operated, he said.

19. British agents bring most wanted people trafficker to face justice

London Times, Nadeem Badshah, 2016 06 08

London - One of the world's most wanted people smugglers, Mered Medhanie, has been arrested after an operation involving Britain's National Crime Agency (NCA) and GCHQ. The 35-year-old Eritrean is accused of masterminding an international smuggling network that is responsible for the deaths of hundreds of migrants in the Mediterranean. Medhanie, dubbed "The General" because he styled himself on Muammar Gaddafi, the former Libyan dictator, was arrested in the Sudanese capital Khartoum in May before being extradited to Italy on Tuesday. The NCA said it tracked him down to the address in Khartoum. He is accused of being partly responsible for the Lampedusa tragedy in October 2013 in which at least 359 migrants, the majority from Eritrea and Somalia, lost their lives when their boat capsized off the Italian coast.

20. L'« infobésité » des services secrets britanniques

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 06 08

Non identifié - Plusieurs documents secrets publiés par le site The Intercept montrent que seule une infime partie des trop nombreuses données collectées est véritablement analysée par les services. L'accumulation massive de données personnelles renforce-t-elle la sécurité des Etats? Le site TheIntercept s'est procuré une présentation confidentielle qui met en lumière l'inflation des données collectées par l'un des programmes secrets du GCHQ, les services secrets britanniques. «Contrairement à [l'attentat de] Mumbai, la majeure partie des données utiles lors du G20 de Londres ont été recueillies par les moyens classiques», se félicite la présentation . Mais elle révèle aussi une ombre - de taille - au tableau: seule une infime partie (3%) des informations collectées a été réellement «vue » par des agents. D'ordinaire, ce ne serait pas un problème: comme leurs homologues américains, les agents du GCHQ collectent d'immenses quantités de données, principalement pour pouvoir y effectuer ensuite des recherches. Mais dans le cas présent les données ont été collectées par Preston, un programme spécifique et ciblé, qui ne «met sur écoute électronique» que des personnes suspectées de terrorisme ou d'autres activités illégales... et donc susceptibles de contenir des informations très précieuses. Ce document et d'autres, fournis par le lanceur d'alerte Edward Snowden, montrent que les services britanniques souffrent depuis la fin des années 2000 d'«infobésité»: trop de données, trop peu d'agents, et trop de «bruit» numérique qui ne permet pas d'isoler les informations significatives.

22. Program to turn youth from terror faces review

Sydney- An official de-radicalisation program aimed at pulling young Australian Muslims back from the brink of extremism will be reviewed following the arrest on terrorism charges of one of its former participants. NSW Police Deputy Commissioner Catherine Burn has confirmed the draft program, which was already due to be reviewed, will be subject to further scrutiny after a 16-year-old Sydney boy who was participating in the initiative was arrested over allegedly planning a terrorist attack. "As a result of recent events we are also reviewing the program to make sure it can be effective as it can be," Ms Burn told The Australian. "While we cannot guarantee that the program will be successful on all occasions we will continue to provide this pathway while also ensuring that we do all we can to maintain the safety and security of our community." In April, the 16-year-old was arrested after he allegedly sought to obtain a weapon for a terrorist attack. The youth, who remains in custody, was allegedly planning an attack to coincide with Anzac Day commemorations. It subsequently emerged the boy was one of a handful of extremists working with police on a highly sensitive de-radicalisation program.

23. Training scaled back despite terror threat

Australian Associated Press, Karlis Salna, 2016 06 08

Sydney - As the nation's law enforcement agencies were being told to prepare for a major terrorist attack, NSW Police did nothing to update its negotiation strategy for dealing with violent extremism, an inquest has heard. Training for the negotiation squad, which played a pivotal role in trying to bring about a peaceful resolution to the 2014 Sydney siege, was also being scaled back. Under questioning from Dr Peggy Dwyer, counsel assisting the family of slain cafe manager Tori Johnson, the state's top negotiator on Wednesday confirmed that "financial constraints" had caused a scaling back of counter-terrorism training courses available to his team members. "That's partly correct," the officer, identified by the codename "Graeme", said on Wednesday. "The national platform for taking police negotiators and bringing these types of incidents to their attention ran twice a year. However, that was cut back to once a year." The detective chief inspector said police had since developed a plan for "working meetings" to rotate around the country to provide updates and up-skill negotiators. One pilot course has been run so far.

28. Nigeria, battling Boko Haram in north, faces new threat from 'Niger Delta Avengers' in south

Washington Times, Guy Taylor, 2016 06 08

Washington - A surge of attacks by militants on oil and gas wells and pipelines in southern Nigeria is threatening to derail the army's campaign to defeat the Islamist terror group Boko Haram in the north, as the government finds itself fighting separate insurgencies raging on opposite ends of Africa's most-populous country. The bombing of pipelines by a group calling itself the "Niger Delta Avengers" has cut Nigeria's oil output by half in recent weeks and forced the government of President Muhammadu Buhari to begin shifting military assets -- including some U.S.-trained forces -- away from the fight against the brutal Boko Haram movement, which has declared its allegiance to Islamic State. "There are signs that military resources are being diverted from the northeast to beef up the military presence in the Delta, because what's going on in the Delta fundamentally affects the revenue of the nation," said John Campbell, a former U.S. ambassador to Nigeria. "The fear," said Mr. Campbell, now with the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, "is that if you reduce the military pressure that's being applied in the northeast on Boko Haram, which is on a backfoot but is not destroyed, the group will be able to revive itself quite quickly."

29. Bangladesh launches crackdown on militants

Agence France Presse, 2016 06 08

Dhaka - Bangladesh police on Tuesday launched a deadly crackdown on Islamist militants as a 70-year-old Hindu priest became the latest victim in a series of gruesome killings by the extremists. As a government minister tried to portray the recent attacks as part of a conspiracy involving Israel's Mossad spy agency, security forces waged deadly gun battles with members of a home-grown militant group. Two "high-ranking" members of the Jamayetul Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB) were shot dead in a battle in Dhaka and another was killed in a northwestern district, police told AFP. The two JMB members killed in the capital had roles "in most of the recent attacks" including the bombing of a Shiite mosque and the murder of a liberal professor, said deputy commissioner of police M.R. Khaled. The third victim was killed in another gunfight in the town of Godagari in the northwestern district of Rajshahi, said local police chief Abu Forhad.

32. New vice unification minister vows to make N.K. give up nukes

Seoul - South Korea's new vice unification minister said Wednesday that he will do his best to prod North Korea into giving up its nuclear weapons program. Kim Hyung-suk said at his inaugural ceremony that the country should ramp up efforts to make North Korea abandon its nuclear weapons while keeping the principle of building trust between the two Koreas. "North Korea's nuclear weapons program poses a threat to South Korea's security and also serves as the biggest stumbling block to an improvement in inter-Korean ties and peaceful unification," Kim said. Earlier in the day, President Park Geun-hye conducted a small-scale reshuffle of vice ministerial officials and presidential aides including Kim. Kim, a former presidential secretary on unification, replaced Hwang Boo-gi, who served as the country's vice unification minister for about 18 months from November 2014. The new vice minister told reporters that denuclearization should be a top priority when it comes to the resumption of inter-Korean dialogue. "We do not say that we will not hold talks with North Korea," Kim said. "But we believe that if there is inter-Korean dialogue, it should be held in a proper manner and it should deal with core issues."

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 06 08

Seoul - South Korean police said Wednesday that North Korea was behind three separate cyberattacks carried out earlier this year, claiming the reclusive country sent a large number of malware-tainted emails by disguising the senders. Between January and February, North Korea sent a large number of emails to South Koreans, including local journalists, defectors and North Korea experts, said the National Police Agency (NPA), wrapping up their months-long investigation. In late January, a link to a video clip, edited as if South Korean President Park Geun-hye was supporting the North's nuclear development, was distributed to 38,988 people. Police said the emails, which were disguised as if they were sent from local broadcasters, seem to be part of a propaganda campaign by the North. In the following month, more emails, pretending to be from a police officer, were sent to 48 people, including North Korean defectors and Pyongyang experts, asking for cooperation in the investigation of the fake video clip. Police said the emails contained viruses that could have infected the recipients' computers.

Disputes should be resolved by the parties directly involved through consultation, he said at the end of the eighth China-US Strategic and Economic Dialogue in Beijing. US Secretary of State John Kerry reiterated US support for negotiations and peaceful resolution. "The US does not take a position on the sovereignty of any of the land features in the South China Sea, but we do believe all claimants should exercise restraint," he said. 39. Defiant Bashar al-Assad Vows to Retake 'Every Inch' of Syria

New York Times, David E. Sanger, Rick Gladstone, 2016 06 08

Washington - Syria's president promised to retake "every inch" of the country from his foes on Tuesday in a defiant speech that appeared to reject the humanitarian relief effort and peaceful transition of power that the United States, Russia and more than a dozen other nations have pressed for since last fall. The speech by President Bashar al-Assad was his first major address since the effort to mediate an end to the civil war broke down in Geneva in April. It reflected his sense that Russian intervention in the war has bolstered his position -- and his ability to remain in power for the foreseeable future -- as the war enters its sixth year. Mr. Assad's defiance was notable partly because of efforts in recent months by Secretary of State John Kerry and other leaders of a 17-nation collaboration, known as the International Syria Support Group, to set a series of deadlines and limits that Syria could not violate. Every one of the directives has been broken. A cease-fire devised in Munich in February collapsed. Mr. Kerry's demand at that time -- that humanitarian access had to begin within weeks -- was briefly observed in a few towns before access was again largely blocked. "The speech was, unfortunately, vintage Assad -- unrepentant and damaging to international efforts to end the brutal civil war that has ravaged the country for more than five years -- the same international efforts that his principal backers, Russia and Iran, support," Mark C. Toner, a State Department spokesman, said in a statement on Tuesday night. "His remarks show once again how delusional, detached and unfit he is to lead the Syrian people."

40. Hamas is ready for war with Israel

Foreign Policy, David Patrikarakos, 2016 06 08

Gaza City - Gaza City, GAZA -- The first thing you notice about Gaza: the donkeys. Attached to carts invariably driven by middle-aged men, they weave in and out of traffic, hauling fruits and vegetables through the city center. Gaza still bears the scars of the 2014 war between Hamas and Israel. The 51-day conflict resulted in the deaths of 2,300 Gazans, with 10,000 others wounded; 66 Israeli soldiers and six Israeli civilians also lost their lives. Gaza's infrastructure was decimated: A recent U.N. report stated that only 17 percent of the 18,000 homes destroyed during the conflict have been repaired, and an estimated 75,000 Gazans remain displaced. Tensions are once again high in the strip. Gazans are fearful that another war looms on the horizon. I wanted to know if Hamas members felt the same. My fixer Mahmoud and I went to find out, driving through Gaza City and eventually arriving in a narrow street, where a man in robes greeted us. This is "Mostafa,"* a senior advisor to a Hamas minister. He opened a tall, metal door and ushered us inside. We took a seat inside a large room with just two sofas furnishing the entire space. "What is happening in Jerusalem is a normal reaction to what is happening in the West Bank -- the arrests of people day and night, killing people day and night, the burning of children," he said.

"Jordan will act with all firmness and force against anyone seeking to undermine its security," he said on a visit to the headquarters of the intelligence services. "National unity is the weapon we will use to thwart all plans that aim to disrupt stability and cohesion." He added that the country would not be weakened by "the terrorist acts of traitors". Earlier, the authorities imposed a media blackout on information about Monday's early morning attack, the official Petra news agency reported. It said the sweeping ban covered not only traditional media such as newspapers and broadcasters, but also internet sites and social media networks.

42. Jordan Bars News Media Coverage of Shooting at Intelligence Office

New York Times, Kareem Fahim, 2016 06 08

Amman - Jordan's government on Tuesday barred the country's news media from publishing reports on a shooting at an intelligence office near Amman that killed five people and raised fears that militants had been able to penetrate one of the region's most powerful and ruthlessly effective counterterrorism agencies. Jordanian officials cast the shooting, which occurred on Monday, as an "isolated and individual act," and said they had arrested the killer. There were no immediate claims of responsibility from militant groups like the Islamic State that might suggest the attack, which killed three intelligence officers and two other employees at the office, had had broader organizational support. Local news reports said the suspect might have been detained at the intelligence building sometime before the shooting -- suggesting revenge as a possible motive. The secrecy order, which prevented the publication of any news on the assault, including on social media, showed that the attack had struck a nerve in Jordan -- momentarily denting official boasts of successes in thwarting militant attacks and, more generally, in protecting the country from the kind of violence seen in nearby Syria and Iraq. "For Jordan, it is a big shock," said Oraib al-Rantawi, the director of the Al Quds Center for Political Studies in Amman, the capital, speaking of the shooting on Monday. "We are proud to have maintained our security and stability in this region for the past five years."

43. Over 100 terror suspects nabbed in a month (Canada).

Riyadh - In pre-emptive strikes, the Saudi security authorities have nabbed as many as 101 terror suspects from 12 nationalities in the month of May. Local daily Al-Watan said on Tuesday that the suspects, who were involved in terror cases or were wanted for security reasons, consisted of 62 Saudis, 20 Yemenis, five Syrians, four Indians, two Egyptians, two Pakistanis and one each from Canada, Afghanistan, Chad, Ethiopia and the Philippines. According to the security sources, the Canadian who was caught on May 26, represented the first citizen from Canada to be on the list of wanted criminals. He is currently being interrogated. Nine Americans were also arrested on charges of supporting terrorism in addition to four Britons of whom one is serving a four-year-jail term. (Full Report).

Christian Science Monitor, Taylor Luck, 2016 06 08

Amman - A group of unknown assailants succeeded Monday in striking an institution that has been on the top of jihadists' hit-lists for nearly two decades: Jordan's General Intelligence Department (GID). Known and feared as the mukhabarat, they are Jordan's first line of defense, the linchpin of the kingdom's stability, and the West's greatest asset in the war on terror. The Jordanian government announced late Monday that it had arrested a suspect in the attack, which killed three officers and two employees at a GID branch on the outskirts of Amman, near the Baqaa Palestinian refugee camp. But even though the motives and identity of the attacker have yet to be revealed, both the government and security analysts immediately suspected the self-declared Islamic State (IS). IS had warned of a wave of attacks around Ramadan, which starts Monday. Observers say among potential targets for IS worldwide, Jordan's intelligence services would be at the top of its list. "Jordan's contribution to the war on ISIS is not by airstrikes, or bombings, or ground troops - it is by its intelligence," says Oraib Rantawi, political observer and director of the Al Quds Center for Political Studies. "When you talk about intelligence [on IS], you talk about the Jordanian GID."

45. Austrian bank shuts terror account of pro-BDS Austrian-Arab center

Jerusalem Post, Benjamin Weinthal, 2016 06 08

Berlin - The Austrian financial giant Bawag closed the bank account of the pro-BDS Austrian-Arab cultural center (OKAZ), which hosted a Palestinian terrorist in Vienna in April. A spokesman for New York-based investment firm Cerberus - the principal owner of the Bawag bank - told The Jerusalem Post on Tuesday that the account was closed. OKAZ is part of the BDS (Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions) movement targeting the Jewish state. OKAZ held an April event with the convicted Palestinian terrorist Leila Khaled, who is a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). The EU and the US both classify the PFLP as a terrorist organization. Khaled hijacked American TWA flight 840 in 1969. A year later, she hijacked EL AL flight 219. When asked about terror finance, a Bawag spokeswoman, said that it adheres to all anti-terrorism laws. The OKAZ did not immediately respond to a Post query.

46. Car bomb targets police station in Turkey's Mardin

Al Jazeera, Hashem Ahelbarra, 2016 06 08

Istanbul - Three people killed and several others wounded in bomb attack on police building in Midyat near Syrian border. Three people have been killed and several others wounded in a car bomb attack on a police station in the country's southeastern province of Mardin. Hospital sources said more than 20 people, including police officers and civilians, were wounded in Wednesday's attack in the town of Midyat, a region where government forces are battling Kurdish separatists. In televised comments, Prime Minister Binali Yildirim said: "One police officer and two citizens have been confirmed dead so far." According to images posted on Twitter, glass from blown-out windows littered the streets and plumes of black smoke could be seen rising from the building. Turkey has been hit by a series of similar attacks in recent months.

47. Copernic révolutionne les contrôles d'identité

Le Figaro, Alette de Broqua, 2016 06 08

Aix, France - Avec son terminal mobile d'identification biométrique, la société entend lutter contre le terrorisme. Technologie Son boîtier n'est pas beaucoup plus imposant qu'un terminal de paiement par carte bancaire, mais le dernier-né de la société aixoise Copernic pourrait bien être une des solutions aux problèmes posés par le terrorisme, la circulation de faux documents ou la migration massive auxquels sont confrontées la plupart des polices. Le C-One e-ID est un terminal mobile d'identification biométrique de personnes et d'authentification de documents sécurisés. « Il est le plus abouti du marché et n'a aucun équivalent dans le monde », soutient son président Jacky Lecuire. À tel point que les deux leaders du marché de l'identification, le français Morpho (filiale de Safran) et l'américain Crossmatch, l'ont inclus dans leurs gammes. Des besoins pour l'Euro Ce terminal intègre la totalité des fonctions nécessaires aux opérations de contrôle d'individus et de leurs papiers : capteur biométrique d'empreinte digitale homologué par le FBI, appareil photo et logiciel de reconnaissance faciale, lecteur de toutes sortes de papiers d'identité et de leurs informations stockés dans une puce. Copernic peut embarquer des bases de données ou être relié à ces bases et croiser les informations. Il peut enfin éditer un document d'identité, ce qui pourrait être très utile au moment où les migrants rentrent en Europe.

48. Ex-CIA agent loses fight against extradition to Italy

Lisbon - A former CIA agent says she will be extradited to Italy to serve a prison sentence for her part in the U.S. extraordinary renditions program after Portugal's Constitutional Court rejected her final appeal. Sabrina de Sousa told The Associated Press Wednesday she is waiting to be told when she will be taken to Italy, where she was convicted in absentia and has a four-year sentence to serve. Since her October arrest in Lisbon on a European arrest warrant, De Sousa has lost her extradition fight at a lower Lisbon court and her appeal of that decision to the Portuguese Supreme Court. De Sousa was among 26 Americans convicted for the 2003 kidnapping in Milan of terror suspect Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr. She insists she wasn't involved in the abduction. (Full report).

49. French officials doubt Ukraine arrest linked to soccer bomb plot

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 06 08

Paris - French investigators believe a Frenchman detained in Ukraine with a cache of weapons and explosives was more likely involved in arms smuggling than tied to a militant group, the prosecutor leading the case said on Tuesday. France has requested Kiev's cooperation but is still awaiting a response more than 24 hours after Ukraine's state security service (SBU) said the suspect had planned "terrorist attacks" during the Euro 2016 soccer tournament which kicks off on Friday in France. "This young man is unknown to French intelligence services, and the judicial authorities for now are leaning towards a possible arms smuggling case," Thomas Pison, the state prosecutor for Nancy, said by telephone. SBU chief Vasyl Hrytsak said on Monday the 25-year-old had made contact with armed groups in Ukraine. In a sting operation, the suspect was stopped at the Polish border with rocket launchers, Kalashnikov assault rifles and explosives.

50. Jouets ou armes de guerre, les drones sont sous surveillance

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 06 08

Paris - A quelques jours de l'Euro 2016, le risque d'un attentat terroriste à l'aide de ces engins volants est pris très au sérieux. Les organisateurs de l'Euro 2016, qui débute vendredi 10 juin, le savent: la menace pourrait surgir du ciel comme un insecte insaisissable. Vient à l'oreille le Vol dubourdon, l'interlude orchestral entêtant de Rimski-Korsakov. Bourdonner, bourdonnement... Les Britanniques ont un verbe pour cela: to drone. Jouet inoffensif ou intrus dangereux? Se déplaçant à basse altitude, d'une masse métallique très faible, l'aéronef sans pilote échappe aux radars classiques. Si les services de renseignement semblent privilégier d'autres modes d'action (bombes dans les transports, kamikazes dans les fans-zones, fusillades visant des supporteurs), l'attentat au drone - une stratégie meurtrière évoquée à plusieurs reprises par l'organisation Etat islamique, qui a déjà utilisé du gaz moutarde au Kurdistan irakien - est envisagé avec sérieux. La parade est plus sophistiquée que celle mise en oeuvre lors du dernier défilé du 14-Juillet ou, en décembre 2015, au Bourget, pour la COP21.

51. L'inquiétude demeure sur les fans zones

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 06 08

Paris - Si le ministère jette toutes ses forces pour assurer l'esprit festif de l'événement, la polémique demeure. Branle-bas de combat général parmi les services de sécurité. À quelques jours du coup d'envoi de l'Euro, l'État donne l'ultime tour de vis à un dispositif titanesque. Au total, 90 000 personnes sont mobilisées pour garantir coûte que coûte l'esprit « festif » de la compétition. Clef de voûte de cette pesante architecture, le ministère de l'Intérieur engage à lui seul 77 000 de ses personnels. Soit 42 000 policiers, 30 000 gendarmes et 5 200 techniciens de la sécurité civile. Une partie des 10 000 militaires de l'opération « Sentinelle » déployés dans les transports compléteront le maillage régional. Cette levée des troupes ne se fait pas sans peine. Les syndicats de police sont montés au créneau pour déplorer, à l'image de Jean-Claude Delage, secrétaire général d'Alliance (majoritaire chez les gradés et gardiens), un « souci de plus à gérer, dans un contexte déjà très tendu ». Le préfet de police a lui-même parlé d'« épuisement avancé » des forces de l'ordre. Conscient que l'État ne peut plus tout faire, Bernard Cazeneuve exhorte autant que nécessaire l'organisateur et le club des villes hôtes à une « coproduction de sécurité ». En charge de la protection d'une centaine de sites officiels, parmi lesquels les dix stades abritant les matches, les 24 lieux de résidence et terrains d'entraînement ou encore le centre de la porte de Versailles qui va accueillir les médias de la planète, Euro 2016 SAS a embauché au total 10 000 gardes privés venant d'une soixantaine de sociétés expertes dans la sécurité événementielle. En faisant appel à une multiplicité d'opérateurs, l'organisateur a tiré les leçons du fiasco des JO de Londres en 2012, quand les Anglais avaient dû appeler à la rescousse 3 500 militaires, faute d'avoir pu recruter assez de personnel formé. Le club des dix villes hôtes présidé par Alain Juppé va quant à lui recourir à 3 500 agents de sécurité pour filtrer les entrées dans les fans zones. « Ces lieux festifs seront hypersécurisés avec un temps d'accès de trois heures comme dans les aéroports, assure Olivier Duran, porte-parole du Syndicat national des entreprises de sécurité.

52. Selon l'Ukraine, le Français arrêté préparait " quinze " attentats

Le Monde, Elise Vincent et Benoît Vitkine, 2016 06 08

Kiev - Le profil et les motivations de Grégoire M., un Français de 25 ans interpellé le 21 mai en Ukraine avec un important arsenal de guerre et soupçonné par les Ukrainiens d'avoir eu des projets terroristes, étaient toujours flous, mardi 7 juin au matin. Les conditions de l'arrestation du jeune homme, originaire d'une commune rurale de la Meuse, ont fait l'objet, lundi 6 juin, d'un récit très détaillé de la part de Vassyl Hrytsak, le patron des services de sécurité ukrainiens (SBU). Des précisions en décalage avec le mutisme des autorités françaises, retranchées derrière le secret de l'enquête et l'attente officielle d'une réponse à leur demande d'entraide judiciaire. Lors d'une conférence de presse organisée à Kiev, lundi 6 juin, Vassyl Hrytsak a ainsi abondamment décrit la manière dont ses services avaient procédé. Pour arrêter Grégoire M. en flagrant délit avec notamment trois lance-roquettes, six Kalachnikovs, un gros stock de munitions et plus de 100 kg de TNT, le SBU a tendu un " piège " au jeune homme. Ses services suivaient cet employé d'une coopérative agricole du Bas-Rhin depuis décembre 2015.

53. Spanish espionage enters Brexit debate

El Pais (Spain), John Carlin, 2016 06 08

London - Speaking on the BBC last month, the editor of The Spectator, a conservative weekly magazine, stated that cooperation among EU members on security issues was pointless, among other things because Spain's intelligence services are "a disaster." Just a few minutes later, the same program interviewed Sir John Sawers, who was head of Britain's MI6 foreign intelligence service from 2009 to 2014. Sawers came out in defense of his Spanish counterparts, stating that

"contrary to what has been said, they are very, very good." Sawers...spoke with EL PAÍS this week inside the bar of a London hotel that used to be a meeting point for spies during World War II. Asked to explain why he told the BBC that Spain's intelligence services (CNI) were "very, very good," he replied that it is one of the most "admirable" services in Europe. He called CNI director Félix Sanz, "whom I know well," an exemplary public servant, both as a general and as a chief of intelligence. "At the operational level, the British and Spanish teams share a great mutual respect. Both also share decades of experience fighting terrorism, which means they have special abilities and a deeply rooted resilience when it comes to addressing the current threat of Islamic terrorism. The Spanish actively helped the British intelligence services, for instance, when we were preparing for potential threats against the London Olympic Games of 2012."

1. BCCLA says warrantless spying on Canadians must end
CBC.CA, Liam Britten, 2016 06 24

Ottawa - The B.C. Civil Liberties Association is in federal court seeking access to government documents it says it needs for its ongoing court case on the alleged illegality of Canada's spying program. Special post-9/11 powers allow the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) to collect phone, email and internet-use details from Canadians communicating with other countries and share that information with other Five Eyes countries. Five Eyes is an intelligence alliance consisting of Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the U.K. and the U.S. In a lawsuit originally launched in 2013, the BCCLA maintains the collection of this data violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and should be stopped -- but it needs more documentation to make its case. "The CSE is engaged in what is surely one of the largest warrantless surveillance activities directed at Canadians," the BCCLA's litigation director, Grace Pastine, told On The Coast guest host Michelle Eliot. "We're seeking information that will tell us what kind of information the CSE is collecting, how they are storing it, who they are sharing it with and how long they're keeping it for. We believe Canadians have a right to know what one of their federal spy agencies is doing and the privacy protections that are in place." Pastine says the CSE should operate like the RCMP and CSIS which need warrants before gathering such information.

2. No telling how we're being watched

Vancouver Sun, Ian Mulgrew, 2016 06 24

Column: Canada's version of the Star Chamber is about to get another case - the B.C. Civil Liberties Association challenge of the mass interception of Canadians' international telephone and Internet use. The group claims the Communications Security Establishment is spying on citizens in violation of the charter's protections against unreasonable search and seizure, but needs to see secret material to make its case. "We believe this dragnet program is probably one of the largest surveillance efforts the Canadian government has ever launched against its own citizens," BCCLA litigation director Grace Pastine said outside the Federal Court in downtown Vancouver. This battle began in October 2014 after the disclosures of U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden; the BCCLA filed suit demanding to know who the CSE was watching, what data it was collecting, how long it was storing the information and how it was protecting privacy. Under the National Defence Act and a secret ministerial directive, the agency is permitted to read Canadians' email and text messages as well as listen to their international phone calls. It is also authorized to collect and analyze the metadata automatically produced each and every time someone uses a mobile phone or accesses the Internet. But there is no court or committee that monitors the interception of these private communications and metadata, and no judicial oversight of the CSE. The agency is shrouded in secrecy. "In addition, the (BCCLA) does not seek the disclosure of information that would tend to reveal sources, targets or the identity of national security or intelligence, nor does the respondent seek the granular details of specific operations or the specific no doubt evolving technologies that underpin investigative techniques." Full disclosure of the scope of the CSE's activities might be embarrassing to the government, he maintained, but that does not mean it is injurious to national security interests. In particular, Martin pointed out that judicial warrants are required by other government agencies, including the 16 others involved in national security. "(The Canadian Security Intelligence Service) is subject to judicial control and there is no reason why CSE should not be," he insisted. Lawyers for the Surrey couple found guilty in the Canada Day terror plot earlier this year gave up in frustration trying to pry information from the CSIS via the same process.

3. PM's CSIS oversight plan is, in reality, nearly toothless

Toronto Star, Thomas Walkom, 2016 06 24

Column: Will Justin Trudeau's government keep its pledge to undo the worst parts of Stephen Harper's wide-ranging antiterror laws? The signs are not encouraging. To date, the Trudeau government has moved firmly on only one portion of that particular election promise: the formation of a parliamentary committee to oversee the country's various security agencies. But that proposed committee would be hedged in by so many restrictions as to render it almost toothless. Meanwhile, the substantive security amendments the Liberals promised in last year's election campaign are being put off until at least the fall. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says he wants to consult first. That the new government is moving so hesitantly on its predecessor's antiterrorism law should come as no surprise. When the Harper Conservatives introduced Bill C-51 last year, Trudeau's response was carefully inconsistent. He said his Liberals didn't like the bill but would vote for it anyway -- and then amend it if they won power. In their election platform, the Liberals vowed to "repeal the problematic elements of Bill C- 51" and introduce a new bill that better protected civil liberties. To that end, they made eight specific promises, ranging from establishment of a parliamentary oversight committee to partial repeal of a provision that, with judicial consent, allows the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to engage in any disruptive activity short of bodily harm, obstruction of justice or violation of a person's sexual integrity. In the latter case, the Liberals didn't promise to remove this disruptive power entirely. Yet they now promise redress only for people with names similar to those on the no-fly list. These people, some of whom are infants, will eventually be able to apply for unique identification codes testifying to their innocence. But the proposed National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians, announced last week by Goodale, is particularly instructive. Designed to oversee CSIS and other spy agencies, it would be made up of MPs and senators hand-picked by the prime minister of the day.

4. Security lessons on the anniversary of the Air India bombings

Ottawa Citizen, Francois Lavigne, 2016 06 24

OpEd: Thursday, June 23 marks another year since the terrible events of that day in 1985 when 331 people died as the result of two bomb explosions attributed to Sikh extremists based in Canada. Thirty-one years have gone by, yet for many the pain still lingers. Mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, still mourn the senseless loss of life. As one who worked on finding out who was responsible for these heinous crimes, I also still live with the echoes of these senseless murders. Every year as June 23 approaches, the 331 voices screaming in my head get louder. Some may believe that since the Major Report on the Air India bombing, issued in 2010, the matter is closed. This massive report put much of the blame for how the catastrophe unfolded - and the subsequent failure to find and prosecute those responsible - on the backs of the men and women of the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS). I have taken issue with that and have said so before. If there is blame, that blame certainly should not fall on these people alone. It should fall on the government's failure to listen to what the men and women of CSIS were telling it. It should fall on the shoulders of those who brushed aside the warnings and refused to give CSIS and the RCMP the tools and resources they requested over and over. It should fall on those whose shortsightedness and biases made the tragedy a political issue to be handled through spin, blaming those who deserved it least. This is why Air India must not be forgotten or swept away in memory. The men and women of CSIS who now bear much of the blame for the events of June 23, 1985, are owed an apology. Those who realized after the fact that they had failed in their duty to Canadians because they, not CSIS or the RCMP, had the hubris to believe they knew better than those whose job it is to protect Canadians - they are the ones who should hear those 331 voices in their heads. (Note: François Lavigne is a former Canadian Security and Intelligence Service officer who was part of the original investigation into the bombing of Air India Flight 182.)

5. Arafat's shadowy money man visits Israel

Times of Israel, Avi Issacharoff, 2016 06 24

Jerusalem - Deceased Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's former money man Muhammad Rashid visited Israel on June 12 and held meetings with Israeli officials as well as figures connected to Syrian rebel groups, the official newspaper of the Palestinian Authority, Al-Hayat al-Jadida, reported. According to the report, Rashid traveled on a Canadian passport, arrived with a delegation of senior officials from Iraqi Kurdistan, and stayed at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. During the visit, Rashid, who is a fugitive from the PA, where he has been convicted of embezzlement, was said to have met with Knesset Speaker Yuli Edelstein and an IDF intelligence officer. From Jerusalem, Rashid reportedly went on to Haifa and met with senior Israeli officials at a restaurant, where the delegation was hosted by Deputy Minister for Regional Cooperation Ayoub Kara, a confidant of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

6. B.C. advocacy group decries document redactions in federal spying case

Ottawa - Three years after it sued the federal government and alleged the Communications Security Establishment was unlawfully spying on Canadians, the BC Civil Liberties Association says it still has not received information pertinent to its case. Lawyers for the BCCLA and the Attorney-General of Canada were in federal court on Thursday for a hearing into the matter. The association has said the documents it has received through disclosure have been heavily redacted. David Martin, a lawyer representing the association, told the court the government can find a way to release more information about the spy agency's conduct without jeopardizing national security. "The BCCLA says this can effectively and safely be done," he said. Mr. Martin said the type of metadata being intercepted by the Communications Security Establishment should be disclosed, as well as the volume. Metadata refer to logs of phone and Internet communications. Mr. Martin said he would also like the government to reveal what is being done with the information, how long it's being retained and the manner in which it's being disseminated to domestic and foreign agencies. Robert MacKinnon, a lawyer for the Attorney-General of Canada, told the court there has already been significant information disclosed and the association is not entitled to everything it seeks. The Communications Security Establishment captures and shares material in partnership with allies in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. They are collectively known as "the Five Eyes." Members cannot eavesdrop on their own citizens but metadata that are collected and shared can show intelligence analysts who is talking to who, even when the contents of the underlying conversations are unknown.

7. Fear stifles PS whistleblowers

Ottawa Citizen, Don Butler, 2016 06 24

Ottawa - A fear of reprisals is the main reason federal public servants are reluctant whistleblowers, says a report done for the Office of the Public Sector Integrity Commissioner. The report, Exploring the Culture of Whistleblowing in the Federal Public Sector, was prepared by Phoenix SPI, an Ottawa public opinion and market research firm. It summarizes the results of 10 focus groups held with federal public servants last November in Ottawa, Winnipeg, Regina, Quebec City and Moncton. One group in each location was conducted with non-management employees and the other with executives and managers. While many said there was greater awareness about whistle-blowing now and more procedures are in place to facilitate it, the report says some public servants were skeptical about the extent to which things had really changed, suggesting the supposed changes "amount to 'window-dressing.'" Fear of reprisals was such a dominant theme that it rated its own section in the Phoenix report, which notes that the issue was identified and discussed by all groups before it was even introduced as a topic of discussion. "Most participants believe that fear of reprisals for reporting wrongdoing is a real concern," the report says, though the extent to which the concern is real can vary. "For example, it was suggested that some departments are probably worse than others, given their internal culture," says the report. "In other words, the fear is justified, but to different degrees depending on context and circumstances." Moreover, a majority of managers in each focus group said concerns about reprisals for reporting wrongdoing "are as justified or more justified" for public service managers, partly because they have no union to support them. The report, Exploring the Culture of Whistleblowing in the Federal Public Sector, was prepared by Phoenix SPI, an Ottawa public opinion and market research firm.

8. Is Iran holding a Canadian hostage?

Globe and Mail, 2016 06 24

Editorial: Homa Hoodfar, a 65-year-old Canadian-Iranian university professor, should be home in Montreal right now but is instead being held by the Iranian government in the country's most notorious jail - a place where prisoners are routinely tortured. She has not been allowed contact with her family or her lawyer since she was arrested on June 6 in Tehran by Iran's Revolutionary Guard. No official charges have been announced. The Canadian government does not have formal diplomatic relations with Iran. Officials say they don't know why Ms. Hoodfar was arrested, and that they are concerned for her health. Ms. Hoodfar suffers from a neurological disorder and is unlikely to have access to the medication she needs. This farce would be unacceptable under any circumstances, but it is even more appalling because it appears Ms. Hoodfar may have been taken prisoner in the hope of exchanging her for another Canadian-Iranian dual citizen living in Toronto. Iran has long wanted to get its hands on Mahmoud Reza Khavari, the former chief of the Melli Bank of Iran, who fled to Canada in 2011 after prosecutors tried to question him in connection with an alleged embezzlement and money-laundering scheme. Iranian Justice Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi made the link after Ms. Hoodfar was seized, when he criticized Ottawa for not handing over Mr. Khavari. Ms. Hoodfar may be, in effect, a hostage. Seizing an innocent woman and holding her in a hellhole of a prison as negotiation collateral is something gangsters and terrorists do, not nations.

9. Lifting Mexican visa rules runs counter to official advice

CBC.CA, Janyce McGregor, 2016 06 24

Ottawa - The Canadian government is proceeding with a campaign promise to lift the visa requirement for Mexican travellers on Dec. 1, even though public servants are warning the move comes with significant risks. Information obtained by CBC News shows government officials have cautioned Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's government about proceeding ahead of a thorough review. The information includes a number of conditions Mexico should be required to meet in advance of the visa lift, including unfettered access by officers of the Canadian Border Services Agency at Mexican airports and a new information-sharing agreement between the CBSA and relevant Mexican authorities. Even so, officials identified a series of risks if the visas are lifted as expected during the visit to Canada by Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto. Peña Nieto will be in Canada starting on Sunday for a state visit. The Mexican president arrives in Ottawa late Monday night and will meet with Trudeau ahead of the Three Amigos North American leaders summit on June 29. The visa issue has been a longstanding irritant in Canada's bilateral relationship with Mexico, with Peña Nieto's government pushing hard for a resolution.

Ottawa Citizen, Ian Macleod, 2016 06 24

Ottawa - The Supreme Court of Canada has rejected an Ottawa man's bid to learn why the RCMP raided his south-side townhouse in its investigation into the 2014 Parliament Hill shootings. Mounties executed a warrant to search the Heatherington Road home of Farhan Nur in May 2015, looking for any evidence connected to Michael Zehaf-Bibeau, who gunned down National War Memorial sentry Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, 24, Oct. 22, 2014. Zehaf-Bibeau, 32, then stormed Centre Block with an old rifle, wounding a parliamentary security officer before being quickly killed in a wild shootout with police and security officers in the Hall of Honour. Shortly before, he recorded a cellphone video saying the attack was "in retaliation for Afghanistan and because (former prime minister Stephen) Harper wants to send his troops to Iraq." The RCMP has long suspected jihadi sympathizers exploited Zehaf-Bibeau's faltering mental state and influenced him to launch the armed attack. Nur and another man whose south-side Ottawa home was searched - police have never charged or named either as a suspect or material witness in the Hill attacks - asked an Ontario court to order the release of RCMP affidavits, called "Information to Obtain" (ITOs), setting out the confidential details police used to win judicial approval for the warrants. The Nur warrant, according to case documents filed with the Supreme Court, authorized seizure of a desktop computer, black Samsung laptop and other electronic devices. It also gave police permission to search the devices for "any emails associated to Zehaf-Bibeau's email address, michaelzehaf@hotmail.com, or any electronic communications, including sent and unsent communications believed on reasonable grounds to have been sent by or received by Farhan Nur."

11. Opinion: Canadian Muslims thankful for their blessings

Saudi Gazette, Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan, 2016 06 24

In the holy month of Ramadan, Canadian Muslims feel particularly grateful to Allah. They enjoy more freedom, prosperity, better education and health care systems, convenient lifestyle, security and the support of their fellow countrymen than do Muslims in many other countries. Perhaps the most striking illustration of the goodwill they enjoy is the Ramadan message they received from Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, who also joined Muslim Liberal Members of Parliament for iftar on the first day of fasting. He sent greetings to Canadian Muslims in a video beginning with "Assalam alaikum." He followed up with a written message that praised Muslims for their contributions to Canada. He said: "Ramadan reminds all of us to show appreciation for the countless blessings we enjoy and to put the needs of others before our own. This shows the tolerance and beauty of Canada and why Muslims here feel so grateful. Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan is a retired Canadian journalist, civil servant and refugee judge.

12. Privacy protections outdated, says watchdog

Ottawa - Canada's privacy watchdog has warned Prime Minister Justin Trudeau that federal privacy protections are "ill-suited" for the 21st century. In a letter obtained by the Star, Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien told Trudeau the rules around government's handling of private information has not kept up with technological advances or society's expectations. The Privacy Act, which governs how the federal government uses Canadians' personal information, has not been substantially changed since it was introduced in 1983. When the law was introduced, most government business was conducted on paper. Now, government departments and agencies increasingly hold vast sums of information electronically - bringing a new set of issues, challenges and vulnerabilities. "One of the biggest changes in the privacy realm is technology, Canadians' relationship to it, and the desires by government and industry to harness its power for various purposes," Therrien wrote in a Nov. 10 letter, obtained under access to information law. "In this complex, new environment, modernization of our privacy framework and the pressing need for greater transparency around how technology is used is critical to maintaining citizens' trust in government and the digital economy." The Star requested an interview with Therrien but he was unavailable.

13. She fought for women's rights

Globe and Mail, Amira Elghawaby, 2016 06 24

Commentary: The first time I encountered Canadian-Iranian anthropologist Homa Hoodfar was during a small, intimate talk she gave to students at Carleton University. It was the late 1990s and she was there to discuss her then-recent book, Between Marriage and the Market: Intimate Politics and Survival in Cairo. For a young woman who was raised in Canada, but who visited her parent's homeland of Egypt frequently, I found Ms. Hoodfar's findings revelatory. Even though I had seen firsthand the full agency of my Muslim relatives in Egypt, I couldn't shake the stereotypes prevalent even then of Muslim women in general as docile, passive actors. Ms. Hoodfar's anthropological research in Egyptian villages shattered those stereotypes, opening doors to experiences in which women were frequently making deliberate decisions about their and their family's lives, that often covertly co-opted male control. Her research highlighted how women worked effectively within conservative communities, to take positions of authority within the home. In other words, Ms. Hoodfar, a professor of anthropology at Concordia University, turned misconceptions and assumptions about Muslim women on their head. So the news of her current imprisonment in Iran struck me as not only unjust, but deeply ironic. Ms. Hoodfar's important work has helped further understanding of Muslim women, including Iranian women. In a widely quoted 1993 essay, she shows how many Iranian women were in fact robbed of their agency during the rule of Reza Shah when they were forced to de-veil: "One can effectively argue that such outfits, in the existing social context, contributed to the exclusion of women of popular classes and pushed them toward seclusion, rather than laying the groundwork for their liberation," she wrote then. 14. Stop debating semantics and do something to stop ISIL

National Post, Lauren Heuser, 2016 06 24

Column: Remarkably, last week's parliamentary debate over whether to recognize that the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) is committing genocide skirted one key question: how will declaring genocide affect what Canada is doing to prevent it? Perhaps this was an oversight. Perhaps the Tories really believed that calling a thing by its proper name is a triumph in its own right. If so, they were mistaken. Canada's recognition of this atrocity changes nothing on the ground. However, as the Liberals were right to note, genocide is a legal term. And it's one that triggers significant responsibilities. Now that the government has accepted that ISIL is trying to wipe out the Yazidi population, it should make clear how it intends to make good on its obligations. Specifically, under the Genocide Convention, Canada is now obliged to "prevent and punish" the perpetrators of this crime. This is not as pie-in-the-sky as it sounds. Canada is obviously not expected to solve this gargantuan problem alone. Rather, the obligation rests on all signatories to the convention, but to differing degrees, depending on each state's capacity to influence the perpetrators' actions, its geographical distance from the events and the strength of its political ties. So the bar for Canada is not that high. But however low it may be, there can be no question that Canada has not yet crossed it. The Liberals will, of course, tell a different story. They will note that they have put in calls for the United Nations to take "urgent action" to investigate and prosecute ISIL. But we must be honest about where such efforts will lead, or more precisely, not lead.

15. What motivates homegrown terrorists?

Ottawa Citizen, John McCoy, 2016 06 24

Commentary: Many of us are trying to make sense of events around the heartbreaking recent shooting in Orlando. Omar Mateen's targeting of a historically persecuted community and revelations about his own apparent struggle with his identity have caused a great deal of confusion about his motivations. Did Mateen carry out a mass shooting or was it a hate crime? Was he a terrorist, a so-called "lone wolf" or just a very troubled individual? On top of these lingering questions, the caustic debates over gun control and whether the events in Orlando were related to so-called "Islamic terrorism" have coalesced to create a toxic soup of media coverage and political grandstanding. These kinds of questions are not unfamiliar to us. In Canada less than two years ago, many of these same points of debate came up around the Parliament Hill shootings of October 2014 and the actions of another troubled young man, Michael Zehaf-Bibeau. Zehaf-Bibeau had displayed signs of mental illness and addiction and by all accounts led a directionless life. If we look more closely at these cases, not just at Mateen and Zehaf-Bibeau, but at many other "homegrown" terrorists, we can identify some shared factors and motivations. The sad truth is that these figures are not uncommon, and what drives them are issues and struggles related to their identity. We can begin by looking at one of the few larger studies that have been conducted on violent extremists: a 2010 study by a U.S. army psychologist John Venhaus, who examined more than 2,000 individual cases. Venhaus concluded that the motivations of these individuals could be placed in four categories: revenge, status, thrill, and identity seekers. Of these categories, identity seekers were the most common, roughly 40 per cent.

16. A Senate committee wants to crack down on spy agencies' cozy relationship with Hollywood

Vice News, Jason Leopold, 2016 06 23

New York - The Intelligence Community is going to have to justify its relationship with Hollywood. Senators Richard Burr and Dianne Feinstein, the Republican chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, included an amendment in the annual intelligence-spending bill passed late last month that calls for the Director of National Intelligence to submit an annual report to congressional oversight committees detailing how the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies interact with the entertainment industry. The measure, which defines the entertainment industry broadly, follows a series of reports published by VICE News over the past year detailing the agency's role in the production of 22 entertainment-related projects between 2006 and 2011. They included major motion pictures like Zero Dark Thirty and Argo; reality television series such as Top Chef; the cable drama series, Covert Affairs; and books including The Devil's Light by Richard North Patterson. In the case of Zero Dark Thirty, writer and producer Mark Boal and Katherine Bigelow gave CIA officers involved in the operation that resulted in the killing of Osama bin Laden gifts including dinners, fake pearl earrings, a bottle of tequila, and tickets to a Prada fashion show. The filmmakers, in turn, got access.

17. FBI sees no evidence gunman was gay

Los Angeles Times, Molly Hennessy-Fiske, 2016 06 24

Los Angeles - Since the shooting at an Orlando, Fla., nightclub last week that left 49 people dead, reports have emerged that gunman Omar Mateen frequented the gay club, used gay dating apps and had gay lovers. But the FBI has found no evidence so far to support claims by those who say Mateen had gay lovers or communicated on gay dating apps, several law enforcement officials said. On Tuesday, Univision aired a report in which "Miguel," a man wearing a disguise to conceal his identity, alleged that he had sex with Mateen after meeting him on Grindr. He said Mateen had sex with other men too, including a threesome with a Puerto Rican who allegedly told Mateen, after having had unprotected sex with him, that he was HIV-positive. But investigators do not consider the man's account credible, according to one senior law enforcement official with access to the investigation. In seeking to verify the reports, federal agents have culled Mateen's electronic devices, including a laptop computer and cellphone, as well as electronic communications of those who made the claims, law enforcement officials said. So far, they have found no photographs, no text messages, no smartphone apps, no gay pornography and no cell-tower location data to suggest that Mateen -- who was twice married to women and had a young son -- conducted a secret gay life, the officials said.

18. How to confront the terrorist threat

Washington Post, Michael B. Mukasey, Jamil N. Jaffer, 2016 06 24

Op-ed - Omar Mateen may have acted alone, but, sadly, his is not an isolated case. The carnage in Orlando, like that in San Bernardino, Brussels and Paris, offers three specific lessons for policymakers willing to learn from these tragic events. The first is that we cannot afford to disarm unilaterally in this war by limiting the legal authorities used by our law enforcement and intelligence professionals to identify and apprehend these killers before they strike. Here in the United States, we have made just that mistake. In the aftermath of the illegal disclosures of classified information by Edward Snowden, a bipartisan coalition of liberal Democrats and libertarian Republicans joined with President Obama to limit the collection of telephone and Internet metadata that disclosed no content but offered a way to determine whether suspected terrorists were communicating with people in the United States. The second lesson is that we are safer when we take the fight to the terrorists overseas, instead of waiting until they attack us at home. This is true whether the attacks at home are undertaken by trained operatives, as in the cases of Paris and Brussels, or by those radicalized at home, as in the cases of San Bernardino, Calif., and Orlando. People such as Mateen take inspiration from two sources: a radical interpretation of Islam and the apparent success of terrorists at home and abroad. The third lesson is that no measures that may stoke emotions but are ultimately ineffectual - such as race- or religion-baiting, closing our borders to certain religious minorities or national groups, or building massive walls to be paid for in some mythical way by a foreign government - are likely to have a measurable impact on the ability of terrorists to operate against us at home. Nor will the unwillingness of the president, or the obvious reluctance of his former secretary of state, to describe the problem for what it is - radical Islamic terrorism - help us. Note: Michael B. Mukasey was U.S. attorney general from 2007 to 2009 and a U.S. district judge from 1988 to 2006. Jamil N. Jaffer is a former associate counsel to President George W. Bush.

19. Tech companies are wary of tool that can detect terrorist images on Internet

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 06 24

Washington - President Obama suggested that extremist information spread online inspired a Florida man to commit the deadliest mass shooting in U.S. history at a gay nightclub in Orlando last week - the latest in a long line of terrorist attacks in which Islamist propaganda played some role in radicalizing the assailant. Now a Dartmouth College researcher and a nonprofit group say they have created a technology that can help Internet companies instantly detect images and videos generated by terrorists and their supporters and remove them from their platforms. It is, they say, a way to cleanse popular online sites of gory videos and propaganda from the Islamic State, which is also known as ISIS and Daesh, that can serve to incite and inspire people to commit acts of violence. "If you could search out the beheading videos or the picture of the ISIS fighter all in black carrying the Daesh flag across the sands of Syria, if you could do it with video and audio, you'd be doing something big," said Mark Wallace, chief executive of the Counter Extremism Project (CEP), a nonpartisan policy group. "I believe it's a game-changer." The White House has signaled its support. "We welcome the launch of initiatives such as the Counter Extremism Project's National Office for Reporting Extremism (NORex) that enables companies to address terrorist activity on their platforms and better respond to the threat posed by terrorists' activities online," said Lisa Monaco, Obama's assistant for homeland security and counterterrorism. But a number of major social-media companies are wary of the idea. They say that there is no consensus in the United States or globally on what constitutes a terrorist image, and that they might end up expunging material posted by researchers or media organizations. And, they say, once a database is created, governments around the world will place additional data requests on them - and some countries will probably demand the removal of legitimate political content under the guise of fighting terrorism.

20. Britain Votes to Leave E.U.; Cameron Plans to Step Down

New York Times, Steven Erlanger, 2016 06 24

London - Britain has voted to leave the European Union, a historic decision sure to reshape the nation's place in the world, rattle the Continent and rock political establishments throughout the West. Not long after the vote tally was completed, Prime Minister David Cameron, who led the campaign to remain in the bloc, appeared in front of 10 Downing Street to announce that he planned to step down by October, saying the country deserved a leader committed to carrying out the will of the people. The stunning turn of events was accompanied by a plunge in the financial markets, with the value of the British pound and stock prices in Asia plummeting. The margin of victory startled even proponents of a British exit. The "Leave" campaign won by 52 percent to 48 percent. More than 17.4 million people voted in the referendum on Thursday to sever ties with the European Union, and about 16.1 million to remain in the bloc. "I will do everything I can as prime minister to steady the ship over the coming weeks and months," Mr. Cameron said. "But I do not think it would be right for me to try to be the captain that steers our country to its next destination." In Berlin, the German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, called the news "truly sobering" and said, "It looks like a sad day for Europe and for Britain." "The main impact will be massive disorder in the E.U. system for the next two years," said Thierry de Montbrial, founder and executive chairman of the French Institute of International Relations. "There will be huge political transition costs, on how to solve the British exit, and the risk of a domino effect or bank run from other countries that think of leaving."

21. Cameron resigns after Brexit defeat

London Times, Michael Savage, Lucy Fisher, 2016 06 24

London - David Cameron dramatically announced his resignation this morning after a shock vote for Brexit that changes the country's political landscape and shatters the continent's postwar settlement. Speaking on the steps of Downing Street after the referendum result, Mr Cameron pleaded for calm as he said he was not the right man to lead Britain out of the European Union and a new leader needed to be in place by the Tory conference in October. "The British people have voted to leave the European Union and their will must be respected," said Mr Cameron. "The will of the British people is an instruction that must be delivered. "I will do everything I can as prime minister to steady the ship over the coming weeks and months. But I do not think it would be right for me to try to be the captain that steers our country to its next destination." The pound plunged to a 31-year low as global markets reacted to the prospect of years of uncertainty, including over the future of the UK itself. The Bank of England said it would "take all necessary steps to meet its responsibilities for monetary and financial stability", adding that it had made contingency plans in a bid to avert panic. Alex Salmond, the former Scottish first minister, said he was certain that his successor, Nicola Sturgeon, would now demand a second independence referendum. The ballot is set to stoke further calls for similar plebiscites in other member states of the bloc. This morning Marine Le Pen, leader of the French far-right party Front National, seized on the UK result, tweeting her delight and demanding an in/out EU referendum in France.

22. SNP says Scotland 'sees its future as part of the EU' and Sinn Fein calls for vote on Irish unity after Brexit win

London Daily Telegraph, Barney Henderson, Auslan Cramb, 2016 06 24

London - The SNP warned that Scotland "sees its future as part of the EU" while Sinn Fein called for a vote on Irish unity following the Leave victory, throwing the very future of the Union into doubt. Nicola Sturgeon, Scotland's First Minister, indicated Brexit could precipitate another vote on Scottish independence while her predecessor Alex Salmond said he expected her to begin moves towards breaking-up Britain. "Scotland sees its future as part of the EU," she said, adding: "Scotland clearly and decisively voted to remain part of the European Union, 62 to 38 per cent." The SNP manifesto for May's Scottish Parliament elections said there should be another ballot if there was a "significant and material" change in circumstances from the 2014 vote, such as Scotland being taken out of the EU against its will. Declan Kearney, Sinn Fein's national chairman, delivered a strongly-worded statement in which he stated English voters had "dragged Northern Ireland out of the EU". "English votes have overturned the democratic will of Northern Ireland. This was a cross community vote in favour of remaining in the EU. This British Government has forfeited any mandate to represent the economic or political interests of people in Northern Ireland."

London Times, Sean O'Neill, 2016 06 24

London - Victims of Colonel Gaddafi's torturers are demanding an independent review of the decision not to prosecute a former MI6 spy over Britain's role in their abduction and forced return to Libya in 2004. Abdel Hakim Belhaj and Sami al-Saadi have challenged the Crown Prosecution Service decision not to prosecute the unnamed senior intelligence official. Sue Hemming, CPS head of counter-terrorism cases, ruled this month that there was insufficient evidence to prosecute, after consultations with Alison Saunders, the director of public prosecutions. The CPS has appointed in-house lawyers to conduct a Victims' Right of Review of the decision but representatives of the Libyan families say that "a review by CPS staff junior to the original decision-makers is bizarre".

24. Curb your attack dogs, Shorten tells Turnbull

The Australian, Rosie Lewis & Jared Owens, 2016 06 24

Canberra - Bill Shorten has demanded Malcolm Turnbull "call the attack dogs" off Labor candidate Anne Aly, after Justice Minister Michael Keenan attempted to "smear" the counter-terrorism expert as soft on Islamic extremism. Dr Aly, a Curtin University professor whose counter-radicalisation program is funded by the Turnbull government, was targeted over a letter to the NSW District Court in which she advocated structured mentoring rather than a tough jail sentence for two young radicals, Mohammed Junaid Thorne and Mostafa Shiddiquzaman, who had pleaded guilty to using false identities to obtain plane tickets. Mr Keenan said the letter demonstrated "pretty poor judgment" on the part of Dr Aly, who is running against hawkish Liberal MP Luke Simpkins in the outer-Perth seat of Cowan. "I do support early intervention programs -- they are an important part of what we do; that doesn't extend to trying to reduce the jail sentence for a convicted criminal and a known hate preacher," he told ABC radio. The Opposition Leader defended Dr Aly as an "up and coming" candidate, saying Australians would trust the Egyptian-born academic over Mr Keenan when it came to deradicalisation. "She's a migrant girl who's come across here and done very well for herself. She's a respected researcher and leader in counter-radicalisation," Mr Shorten said. "You don't have to take my word for it. President (Barack) Obama and the White House, the Department of Homeland Security of the US, invited Anne Aly to the White House; they didn't invite Michael Keenan." The Prime Minister said he was not aware of the spat between Dr Aly and Mr Keenan. Mr Shorten said that was "not good enough" and Mr Turnbull needed to "call the attack dogs off Anne Aly".

Sao Paulo - Islamic State has begun posting digital propaganda in Portuguese, presenting an apparent threat and a new challenge to Brazilian security officials just six weeks before the start of the Olympic Games. The postings, which have surfaced on encrypted webpages and an instant-messaging platform, lay out the tenets of the radical militant group. Brazil's federal intelligence agency, the ABIN, told The Wall Street Journal Thursday that Islamic State's Portuguese-language channel reflects its "extremist ideologies." "The opening of this new front of disseminating information aimed at extremist indoctrination, directed at the Portuguese-speaking public, increases the complexity of the work of confronting terrorism, and represents an additional facility of radicalizing Brazilian citizens," ABIN said.

Havana - Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos and the head of the country's leftist FARC rebels agreed Thursday on a cease-fire and rebel disarmament deal that moves the country to the brink of ending a 52-year war that has left more than 220,000 people dead. At a ceremony in Havana, Santos and FARC commander Rodrigo Londono, better known as Timochenko, watched as their lead negotiators signed a deal laying out how 7,000 rebel fighters will demobilize and hand over their weapons once a peace accord is implemented. In attendance were U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, a special U.S. envoy and the presidents of Cuba, Chile and Venezuela and other Latin American countries. "We're getting closer to the end of the armed conflict than at any time in more than five decades," said Cuban President Raul Castro, a guarantor of the talks. 30. Mexico's long history of human rights issues

Toronto Star, Martina Jimenez, 2016 06 24

Analysis: Claudia Medina Tamariz was sleeping in her home in the port city of Veracruz on a steamy August night in 2012 when they came for her. Two navy officers and several policemen broke down her door, smashing a hallway mirror. They grabbed her and her husband from their bed, blindfolded them, and rampaged through the apartment. "What do you want? Where is your search warrant, I asked them," recounted Medina, 35. "They dragged me down the stairs, barefoot and in my pyjamas, put me in a van and drove me to the naval base near the airport." There, the naval officers tied her to a chair, threw water on her and tortured her with electric cables, shouting, "We know who you are. You are la Buena, la jefa, the head of narcotrafficking. Confess." She was charged with nine offences, including arms and drug trafficking crimes, and was forced to sign a false confession - "They threatened to go after my children if I didn't sign it" - and paraded in front of Veracruz media, her prison mug shot broadcast everywhere. Once in court, Medina retracted the confession and all charges were dropped, thanks to the intervention of Centro Prodh, a Mexican human rights organization, and of Amnesty International. She and three other female human rights activists came to Ottawa this week, in advance of a visit by Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto, who will arrive Monday for a state visit with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and for the North American Leaders summit with U.S. President Barack Obama Wednesday. Trade: Canada and Mexico are one another's third-largest trading partners, with two-way merchandise trade reaching more than $37.8 billion in 2015. The countries have collaborated closely on regional trade issues, including the Trans Pacific Partnership, an agreement of 12 Pacific Rim countries that has been signed but not yet in force. Investment: Canada is the fourth-largest foreign investor in Mexico (more than $29 billion between 2000 and 2014), with a strong presence in mining, banking and aerospace. There are 3,517 Canadian companies operating in Mexico, including Goldcorp, Bombardier, Scotiabank and Magna International. The kidnapped sailors were crewmembers of tugboat Charles OO. Indonesian media reported that the boat captain phoned his wife and told her that gunmen who introduced themselves as Abu Sayyaf intercepted them at sea on Wednesday then demanded 20 million ringgits for their safe release. The militants and their hostages were last seen heading to Tawi-Tawi, one of five provinces under the Muslim autonomous region. There was no immediate statement from the boat owner, PT Rusianto Brothers. The hostages were reportedly formed into two groups by their Abu Sayyaf abductors. Times of India, Indrani Bagchi, 2016 06 24

New Delhi - China remained the last major obstacle in the way of India's membership bid in the Nuclear Suppliers Group as 47 of 48 members supported New Delhi's application at the group's special plenary session in Seoul on Thursday. The session debated until midnight but failed to come to a conclusion after hours of discussions, with China adamant in its opposition. Questions and doubts by other fence-sitting countries dissolved in the course of the evening, leaving China as the last man standing against India. Officials in Seoul said the meeting would restart on Friday. After Thursday's NSG meeting, delegations were asked to revert to their headquarters for fresh instructions. China raised a procedural block early in the day, refusing to admit the India membership issue to be discussed in the meeting. This, diplomats in the room said, caused a delay of over five hours, as the members wrestled with an agenda item. The discussions began at 9pm and ended around midnight, but remained in a deadlock.

35. Latest test reveals N. Korean missile capable of flying 3,500 km: military

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 06 24

Seoul--North Korea's latest test of its Musudan mid-range missile indicates that the country is capable of firing a missile with a range of 3,500 kilometers, South Korea's military officials said Friday. In the latest test fire of the intermediate-range ballistic missile (IRBM) which the North calls the Hwasong-10, one of the two that were launched soared to an altitude exceeding 1,000 km and flew some 400 km before hitting the East Sea. The North launched the missiles on Wednesday near Wonsan on their east coast, but the first crashed without flying very far. It was the first time a North Korean IRBM has flown that far. All previous launch attempts ended in failure, having either exploded or crashed. The military officials said the Wednesday launch was likely to be aimed at testing the IRBM's engine performance or its maximum flight range. It said the latest test showed tangible gains vis-a-vis the past.

36. Next police chief promises counterterrorism squad will respect human rights

Jakarta Post, Marguerite Afra Sapiie, 2016 06 24

Jakarta - The top counterterrorism official who received approval from the House of Representatives on Thursday to become the next National Police chief, Comr. Gen. Tito Karnavian, has made assurances that Densus 88, the police's counterterrorism squad, would respect human rights. "I will hold a special briefing with senior officials of Densus 88 so that they will take precautions when using their authority, which tends to get violent," Tito said on Thursday. Tito, who served as Densus 88 chief in 2009, said the force would get assistance from the National Commission of Human Rights (Komnas HAM) in order to gain a better understanding of the importance of upholding human rights in counterterrorism operations.

37. S. Korea to keep sanctions on N. Korea until they show effect: ministry

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 06 24

Seoul--South Korea will use sanctions against North Korea until they succeed in discouraging Pyongyang's development of nuclear weapons, its foreign ministry said Friday. The pledge comes two days after North Korea test-fired two intermediate-range ballistic missiles in defiance of international sanctions designed to deter its development of nuclear weapons and their delivery systems. "We will consistently implement sanctions against North Korea over a sufficient timeframe until they have an effect, based on examples like that of Iran," the ministry said in a report to the National Assembly's foreign affairs and unification committee.

38. U.N. aviation agency voices 'grave concerns' over N.K. GPS jamming (Canada)

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 06 24

Seoul-- A U.N. aviation agency has expressed "grave concerns" over North Korea's attempts to jam GPS signals in the South and decided to send a letter to Pyongyang to warn against such activity that could cause serious safety problems, the foreign ministry said Thursday. "The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) held the 208th board meeting in Montreal, Canada, from May 16-June 17 and adopted the decision to send a warning to the North with regard to the GPS disruption issue," the ministry said in a press release. "In addition, the ICAO board decided to send a letter in the name of its secretary general to the North to let the country know the results of the discussion at the meeting," it added. South Korea said jamming signals were sent from five North Korean regions -- Haeju, Yonan, Pyonggang, Kumgang and Kaesong - - between March 31 and April 6.

Xinhua News Agency, 2016 06 24

Manila - The Abu Sayyaf on Friday released Marites Flor, a Philippine woman who was abducted by the group from a posh resort in southern Philippines along with other three men in September last year. Maj. Filemon Tan, spokesman of the military's Western Mindanao Command, confirmed the release of Flor in Jolo town in Sulu, a stronghold of the Abu Sayyaf. "She is physically okay," Tan said, adding that Flor was freed in front of the residence of Sulu Governor Abdusakur Tan in community Asturias at around 4:30 a.m. He said Flor was turned over to the custody of the Joint Task Force Sulu of the Armed Forces of the Philippines in Jolo at around 11 a.m. for medical check-up. The two other victims, Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, were beheaded on April 25 and June 13, respectively for failure to meet ransom deadline.

40. Netflix is just a CIA plot, says Kremlin

London Times, Tom Parfitt, 2016 06 24

Moscow - The Kremlin has accused the global film streaming company Netflix of being part of an American plot to subvert Russian society and culture. Vladimir Medinsky, the minister of culture who is a loyal supporter of President Putin, said that the film streaming service was on the US government payroll along with Silicon Valley giants. He explained his theory to a Russian news service. The White House had realised "how to enter every home, creep into every television, and through that television, into the head of every person on earth, with the help of Netflix. "It turns out that our ideological friends [the US government] understand perfectly well which is the greatest of the arts," he said in an allusion to Lenin's famous phrase about the propaganda power of cinema. "And you thought, what -- that all these gigantic start-ups appear by themselves? That some boy student thought something up and billions of dollars flutter from above?"

41. FM Repeats Iran's Demand for West's Commitment to N. Deal Undertakings (Canada).

Fars News Agency, 2016 06 24

Tehran - Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif reiterated the need for loyalty of the world powers, specially the western states, to the nuclear deal struck with Tehran in July. "Iran has completely fulfilled its commitments in the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA) and it is not deviating from it; on the other hand the other side should not deviate from its commitments," Zarif said in a joint press conference with his French counterpart Jean-Marc Ayrault in Paris on Wednesday. Yet, Ayatollah Khamenei reiterated that the arrogant party seeking continued animosity is not Tehran, but Washington that wants regime change in Iran. "Some imagine that hostilities are the result of our belligerence towards the US; (then if that's true) what has the Islamic Republic done to France? Why did France play the bad cop in the nuclear talks and why are the Netherlands and Canada showing enmity (towards Iran)," the Supreme Leader asked.

42. Iranian Hackers Take Down Saudi Supreme Council for Youth and Sport's Website

Fars News Agency, 2016 06 24

Tehran - A group of Iranian hackers attacked the website of the Saudi Supreme Council for Youth and Sport (SCYS) on Wednesday. The group that has introduced itself as "Zone H" hacked the Saudi Supreme Council for Youth and Sport (SCYS). As a conventional move, the hackers released the information below to prove the success of their cyberattack: This is a CACHE (mirror) page of the site when it was saved by our robot on 2016-06-20 18:52:14" The website has gone out of service since yesterday. The Supreme Council for Youth and Sport (SCYS) is run by Abdullah Bin Musa'ad Bin Abdul Aziz. The attack seems to be a response to several cyberattacks by Saudi hackers on a number of Iranian government websites in recent weeks. The documents released by the Yemen Cyber Army after it hacked the Saudi Foreign Ministry in May, 2015 showed that former Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al- Faisal in a letter to Chief of the Royal Court Khalid al-Tuwajiri has proposed adoption of a plan to harm Iran's national security.

44. Israel to ratify nuke test ban treaty within 5 years

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 06 24

Jerusalem - Year after year, Dr. Lassina Zerbo returns to Israel with the hope of convincing the Jewish state to ratify an international treaty banning nuclear tests, a move the UN nuclear test ban czar claims would have little negative effect on Israel's security but would be a "serious step forward in showing goodwill on arms control." Though his task may seem Sisyphean and occasionally "frustrating," the head of the United Nation's Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization sees progress being made, notably in the fact that this year he met personally with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, instead of meeting with a cabinet minister as he has done in the past. Netanyahu, for his part, was apparently convinced of the argument, saying this week that Israel would ratify the treaty at some point in the future, depending upon "the regional context and the appropriate timing."

45. Jordan Fears Terror Attack on Syria Border May Herald New ISIS Front

Haaretz, Zvi Bar'el, 2016 06 24

Jerusalem - The explosion of a booby-trapped car Tuesday at the military post near the entrance of the Al-Rukban refugee camp in northeastern Jordan was expected. King Abdullah of Jordan had warned in recent months at every local or international forum of the possibility of terror in the kingdom. While this seems to be the first time attackers have used a car bomb in Jordan, a more important distinction is that the explosion was the second attack in the past two weeks against military targets. Earlier this month five soldiers were killed in an attack on an intelligence base near the Palestinian refugee camp of Al-Baqaa, north of Amman. Tuesday's attack killed four border guards, an intelligence officer and a policeman. Jordanian intelligence has recently learned that operatives of the Islamic State (also known as ISIS or ISIL) are among the 60,000 Syrian refugees living in the desert refugee camps of Al-Rukban and Hadlat, on the Syria-Jordanian border.

46. Police heighten security in Jerusalem for third Friday prayer of Ramadan

Jerusalem Post, Daniel K. Eisenbud, 2016 06 24

Jerusalem - Over 3,000 police officers from a breadth of units across the country will be deployed throughout Jerusalem, with an emphasis on the Old City, to oversee security as tens of thousands of Muslims converge at al-Aksa Mosque for Ramadan's third week of Friday prayers, police said Thursday. According to police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld, since the holiday commenced earlier this month, heightened security measures have been ongoing throughout the capital. To date, he said no incidents of violence have taken place in the Old City or Temple Mount, where scores of Muslims have converged at al-Aksa Mosque, Islam's third holiest site, to observe Friday prayers for the month the holiday takes place. "Israeli police have carried out security assessments and units will be deployed in and around the Old City area from the early hours of the morning on Friday in order to allow the thousands of people to come into the Temple Mount areas for prayers," he said.

47. When Reporters Become the Targets in Syria

The Media Line, Noga Tarnopolsky, 2016 06 24

Jerusalem - On Tuesday, the organization Reporters Without Borders (known by its French acronym RSF) denounced the Turkish government for arresting its longtime representative in Turkey, Erol Önderoglu, on charges of "terrorist propaganda" a month after having taken part in a campaign of solidarity with pro-Kurdish media. It was only the latest insult against journalists trying to survive and work in the post-Arab Spring era. On June 12th, RSF slammed Turkish authorities when a Syrian journalist named Ahmed Abdelqader, 33, the founder and editor of the online journal Aynala al-Watan ("Eye on Homeland) who is a refugee in southeastern Turkey, just barely managed to survive a second assassination attempt. Islamic State claimed responsibility the drive-by shooting of Abdelqader in the southeastern city of Urfa on the evening of 12 June. According to RSF, over 200 reporters have been killed since the Arab Spring erupted in 2011, and at least 50 remain missing or are held by armed Islamist militias.

LE FIGARO. - Qu'est-ce qui pêche, selon vous, dans la réponse antiterroriste aujourd'hui ? Alain MARSAUD.- L'exécutif navigue avec difficulté, au fil des drames qui se succèdent. On cherche en vain la stratégie, ce n'est pas aisé. On sait que quelque 2 000 Français, souvent d'origine maghrébine, partis pour la Syrie, l'Irak ou la Libye, accompagnés de 400 mineurs, nés sur place ou partis avec eux, vont revenir en France. Ne serait-ce que parce que les revers de l'État islamique réduisent peu à peu son territoire. Or nous n'avons ni les outils juridiques ni les structures pour traiter massivement des profils aussi inquiétants. Concernant les mineurs, certains, âgés de 10 ans à peine, ont porté les armes et participé à des exécutions. Comment traiter judiciairement et socialement ces enfants soldats ? Notre système pénal repose sur une quasi-irresponsabilité pénale pour les moins de 13 ans, or ces enfants, totalement déstructurés devront bien être pris en compte puisque certains ont tué.

49. Roger Maudhuy : « Molenbeek nage en plein complotisme ! »

Bruxelles - Trois mois après les attentats de Bruxelles, l'historien, qui a vécu cinq ans dans cette commune, retrace la longue dérive du quartier vers le communautarisme. Roger Maudhuy n'est pas un expert, ni en terrorisme, ni en sociologie. Il connaît Molenbeek pour y avoir habité plusieurs années, en avoir arpenté les rues et y avoir discuté avec beaucoup de gens. Historien, « folkloriste », comme il se définit, vivant aujourd'hui dans l'est de la France, il en livre un portrait saisissant. Si son livre - Molenbeek. Vingt-cinq ans d'attentats islamistes, Éditions Michalon, juin 2016 - a le défaut d'être désordonné, il a le mérite d'être « cash ». Par touches réalistes, Roger Maudhuy explique comment Molenbeek, commune bruxelloise, est devenu ce ghetto travaillé par le fondamentalisme musulman et ce repaire pour djihadistes. LE FIGARO. - Trois mois après les attentats de Bruxelles, l'atmosphère dans le quartier de Molenbeek a-t-elle changé? Roger MAUDHUY. - Si la situation a changé, c'est en pire ! Non seulement trafics en tous genres et islam radical sont toujours là, mais, en plus, Molenbeek nage dans le complotisme. La grande majorité des jeunes est persuadée que les services secrets sont à l'origine des attentats, organisés par les Juifs, les Américains, les Français ou qui sais-je encore, pour nuire aux musulmans. À les entendre, la présence de GI américains dans le Thalys lors de l'attaque l'été dernier n'était pas fortuite. Des armes avaient sciemment été remises à Medhi Nemmouche avant l'attaque du Musée juif de Bruxelles.

50. Un petit « manège » parisien très sécurisé

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 06 24

Paris - Alors qu'une réplique des scènes de guérilla urbaine ayant éclaté le 14 juin dernier en plein Paris était redoutée, la manifestation parisienne de ce jeudi contre la loi travail a été comme une mer d'huile. Force est de constater que rarement un défilé syndical, l'un des plus courts et atypiques qui soient, n'a fait l'objet d'un tel niveau de sécurisation. Un « cataplasme » bleu très imposant a été déployé par les forces de l'ordre sur le modeste parcours et dans ses rues adjacentes. Dès mercredi, en effet, le préfet de police avait demandé et obtenu l'appui de 25 forces mobiles, CRS et escadrons de gendarmerie, pour verrouiller le dispositif. Plusieurs dizaines d'agents en civil du Bureau d'information de voie publique (BIVP), épaulés par leurs très discrets collègues de la Direction du renseignement, étaient disséminés dans la foule tandis qu'une demi-douzaine de brigades anticriminalité se tenaient en alerte. Au total, 2 100 agents étaient mobilisés.

51. Viernheim hostage-taker wasn't carrying lethal weapon

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 06 24

Berlin - The 19-year-old German man who took over a dozen people hostage in a cinema in western Germany on Thursday was not carrying a lethal weapon, prosecutors have confirmed. The man, who special police units shot dead after storming the building in Viernheim, Hesse, was carrying two blank firing guns, prosecutors in Darmstadt said on Friday. One of the weapons was a pistol the other was a rifle. He was also carrying a fake hand grenade. The attacker was identified by prosecutors on Friday morning as a 19-year-old German born in the city of Mannheim, which is about a 20-minute drive from Viernheim. Before his death he was living in northern Germany, prosecutors said. Authorities have still given no further information as to a possible motive for the attack. Hesse's interior minister Peter Beuth told DPA that the man was shot dead after a struggle with police. Police from nearby Darmstadt said on Thursday that there was no evidence of an Islamist background behind the attack. Security officials also told DPA that they do not currently suspect that there was a terrorist motive, and that the man was psychologically disturbed.

1. Brexit prompts new agenda for North American Leaders' Summit

Globe and Mail, Robert Fife, 2016 06 27

Ottawa - The three leaders of North America will trumpet the benefits of liberalized free trade and the necessity of countries to work in unison when they gather in Ottawa for a summit that had been set up largely to focus on the environment but has been turned upside down by the stunning British vote to exit the European Union. Officials say Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto, who arrives in Canada on Monday for a state visit, will remind North Americans "how lucky we are to be where we are ... and we are a lot more successful when we tackle shared problems together rather than put up walls." Sources say the two leaders will sign agreements on educational exchanges, and share "best practices" on ending the social isolation and exploitation of indigenous people in both countries. Canada will also offer intelligence and training to combat Mexico's drug violence. "We are going to have a wide-ranging discussion on security, and for Mexico, it truly has very significant security issues," a Canadian official said. "We have world-class talent on that part on all of our institutions, from the RCMP, CSIS [Canadian Security Intelligent Service] and CSE [Communications Security Establishment]. We have world-class assets that countries like Mexico could really learn from."

2. Proposed security review panel called 'positive' but with caveats

The Lawyer's Weekly, Cristin Schmitz, 2016 07 01

Toronto - National security lawyers are welcoming the Liberals' proposed creation of a committee of MPs and senators to oversee all federal entities involved in national security matters, but say the government must go much further to improve review and oversight. Tabled in the Commons June 16 by government House Leader Dominic LeBlanc, Bill C-22 would establish a cross-party, security-cleared "national security and intelligence committee of parliamentarians" that would be appointed by the prime minister, via cabinet. Like the other national security lawyers contacted by The Lawyers Weekly, NDP justice critic Murray Rankin sees the bill as positive, but expressed "concerns" he hopes the government will address during a national security law reform consultation in the summer. "It's certainly a very positive step forward," said the former Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) legal adviser and ex-special advocate. "I am impressed that we finally have a proposed parliamentary oversight mechanism." Yet "one of the key things is access to the kind of information the committee will need to do its job, and it all turns on that," he added.

3. Canadian academic jailed in Iran for dabbling in feminism, security: family

Canadian Press, Staff report, 2016 06 27

Montreal - A Montreal-based university professor being held in an Iranian jail is being investigated for 'dabbling in feminism and security matters,' according to her family. Homa Hoodfar's niece, Amanda Ghahremani, said the Tehran public prosecutor made a statement to Iranian media on the case on Friday. Ghahremani said the family doesn't know whether Hoodfar has been charged with a crime. She said the prosecutor's statement was the first indication of why the 65-year-old professor has been held in Iran's notorious Evin prison since her arrest on June 6. "We're very concerned that we have no news from her, that the family hasn't been able to see her, that the lawyer hasn't been able to see her, and we don't know her mental state, her health, or the conditions of her detention," Ghahremani told The Canadian Press.

4. Detained British-Iranian woman linked to 2009 protests: Iran

Agence France Presse, 2016 06 27

Tehran - An Iranian-British woman detained in Iran on charges of seeking to overthrow the government was implicated in anti-regime protests in 2009, a judicial official said. There had previously been scant information about the grounds for the arrest in April of Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, a 37-year-old employee of the Thomson Reuters Foundation. But a report from Iran's Mizan news agency late Friday said she was implicated in mass protests against the re-election of hardline president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2009, a movement dubbed "the sedition" by the authorities. The report follows news last week that another dual-national woman arrested in June was suspected of "feminism and security" offences. Iranian media said Canadian-Iranian Homa Hoodfar, a 65-year-old Montreal professor, was among the founders of the Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML) group, headquartered in London. She was "arrested for anti-security activities," state broadcaster IRIB said.

5. Federal government prepares biggest refresh of its web offerings ever

Ottawa Citizen, Vito Pilioci, 2016 06 27

Ottawa - Canadians are about to see big changes in the way they receive services from the federal government online. More than 1,500 disparate, and often completely different looking websites, with strange and long Internet addresses, are in the process of being combined under the easy to remember Canada.ca umbrella. Everything from the way Canadians access information about the weather to how they apply for government jobs, access benefits and even inquire about financial matters such as taxes is about to change. "I'm really excited about this project. Canada.ca is such a great way to improve our service delivery to Canadians," said Michel Laviolette, director general, digital service directorate of the federal Citizen Service Branch. "We are working with 90 partner institutions to migrate their content from their old environment to Canada.ca. If you go on Canada.ca, you will notice it's organized differently by themes and tasks, such as 'find a job' or 'get a passport'. We are organizing the content that way." The hodgepodge approach to technology integration in the past has led to patchwork evolution of technological solutions that offer no uniformity and haven't been able to keep up with Canadians' demand for new online services and faster information delivery. It's also led to security breaches, including a cyber attack that crippled the Finance Department and Treasury Board in 2011, which was linked with attempts to gather data about the potential takeover of Potash Corp. of Saskatchewan. It took officials more than a week to alert the department responsible for national cyber-security about the attack due to the difficulty in tracking down information on various government networks. Laviolette said one of the biggest benefits that Canadians will see as a result of moving all federal departments and agencies under the Canada.ca umbrella will be in the boost to network security. With a single point to protect, running in a secure data centre by qualified employees, the portal will be more secure than it has been in the past.

6. Mexico's Brutal Human Rights

Ottawa Citizen, Alex Neve, 2016 06 27

Op-ed - North American friendship is in the air. It is Canada's turn to host the North American Leaders Summit, a meeting of Canada's prime minister and the U.S. and Mexican presidents that has come to be known as the "Three Amigos" over the years. But before the trio of friends get together Wednesday, Mexico's President Enrique Peña Nieto will travel to Canada for an official visit. Several issues will dominate his talks with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Mexico's chilling human rights crisis must top that list. For that is precisely what it is: a human rights crisis. Canadians were reminded of that grim reality this week as four remarkable female human rights defenders travelled to Ottawa for meetings with parliamentarians, officials and civil society allies. The prime minister should insist on measurable advances to overcome the entrenched impunity that protects human rights violators from facing justice. He should highlight as well that it is long past time for the Peña Nieto government to implement the many reforms that United Nations and inter-American human rights bodies have recommended to Mexico. At the same time, there are steps the prime minister could take to concretely demonstrate that Canada recognizes the gravity of Mexico's human rights crisis. Note: Alex Neve is Secretary General of Amnesty International Canada.

7. Pension delay pushing military vets to the brink

Toronto Star, Allan Woods, 2016 06 27

Toronto - After a bomb-scarred tour in Afghanistan, a descent into a cloud of anger and anxiety and forcible retirement from the military due to his psychological problems, Kevin Sweeney thought he had finally hit rock-bottom last January. As he waited for his first pension payment on that winter day about a month after his release, a government case manager charged with easing his transition into civilian life referred the 45-year-old veteran, a married father of two, to the Kingston food bank. The suggestion left him feeling humiliated, but it only foreshadowed the problems ahead. He was forced to wait five months to begin receiving a military pension - a $1,188.91 monthly cheque that he earned during more than a decade of service to the country. Sweeney's is a tale of a man who suffered from a faceless and troubled bureaucracy, but it is not unique. Canadian Forces Ombudsman Gary Walbourne said the military has been working on a 13,000-case pension backlog that has resulted in 1,300 complaints to his office since 2007. In response to questions from the Star, Walbourne's office said that the problem appears to be caused by an overloaded and understaffed department within National Defence that is responsible for processing pension applications. There have also been nearly 20,000 requests from reservists who want to pay money in lieu of service in order to access or increase their military pensions - a process known as a "buy back."

8. Somali cabinet minister who called Toronto home killed in Al-Shabaab hotel siege

CBC.CA, Shanifa Nasser, 2016 06 27

Toronto - A Somali cabinet minister who called Toronto home was among 15 people killed Saturday when gunmen stormed a hotel in that country's capital in an hours-long attack that reportedly began with a suicide bomber detonating a vehicle loaded with explosives. Buri Mohamed Hamza was born in Somalia and served as the country's state minister for the environment. He died when his room at Mogadishu's Nasa-Hablod hotel collapsed from the force of the powerful car bomb, the Associated Press reported Sunday. But he was also a family man, with a wife and two children -- a daughter, Raja, and a son, Mohamed, both in their 20s -- who lived in Woodbridge, Ont., a suburb northwest of Toronto. Neighbour Abdiqani Ismail told CBC News that Hamza held dual Somali-Canadian citizenship and the two had been good friends for about 20 years.

9. 'Lone wolf' attacks shift security burden to companies

Los Angeles Times, Natalie Kitroeff, 2016 06 27

Los Angeles - The people handling security for the nation's busiest malls and amusement parks are no longer retired cops. They are a 24-year veteran of the FBI, a former CIA operative and the onetime chief of counterterrorism for Scotland Yard. The theme-park industry's annual security bill, already roughly $250 million a year, is expected to grow by more than $100 million over the next few years, according to one consultant. Disneyland, Universal Studios Hollywood and SeaWorld all installed metal detectors outside their gates for the first time in December. "Lone wolf" shootings, including those at the Pulse nightclub in Orlando, Fla., this month, and in San Bernardino in December, have forced businesses to shoulder more of the cost and responsibility of securing America against terrorism. American companies were already spending about $341 billion on security in 2014, more than three times as much as they did in 1990, after adjusting for inflation, according to ASIS International, a professional group for security personnel. The group said that since 2013, companies have been spending about 10% more on security each year. Closed-circuit cameras alone have become an $8-billion industry, about 17 times larger than two decades ago.

10. At least 10 hurt at chaotic, bloody neo-Nazi rally at Capitol

Sacramento - A rally by a small group of neo-Nazi demonstrators at the state Capitol on Sunday erupted into a violent clash with protesters that left at least 10 people injured - five of them stabbed - and closed down streets as more than 100 police in riot gear and on horseback intervened to halt the mayhem. Demonstrators battled with sticks, protest signs and other weapons as the Traditionalist Worker Party group - which said it wanted to assist supporters of presumptive Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump - began setting up for a scheduled noon rally on the west steps of the Capitol. Even before the event began, clashes broke out at numerous locations around the Capitol grounds among the 400 people gathered for and against the rally, which had been heavily promoted - and denounced - in recent days on various websites. Injuries were reported on both sides of the altercation. The Traditionalist Worker Party bills itself as a group of about 500 followers nationwide "defending faith, family, and folk against the politicians and oligarchs who are running America into the ground." "We intend to achieve that goal by building a nationwide network of grassroots local leaders who will lead Americans toward a peaceful and prosperous future free from economic exploitation, federal tyranny, and anti-Christian degeneracy," the group states on its website. The group and its California affiliate, Golden State Skinheads, sent about 30 people to speak up for Trump supporters who have been denied their freedom of speech, spokesman Matt Parrott said after the violence. The party's chairman is Matthew Heimbach, who reportedly is Parrott's son-in-law and briefly was a Trump delegate until his racial views became known. He sparked national headlines when he was accused of shoving an African American woman at a Trump rally in Kentucky in March. Heimbach could not be reached Sunday, but anti-hate groups that monitor such organizations have labeled Heimbach as a rising leader among white nationalists.

11. Jones Act Eases Border Control Challenges (Canada)

Maritime Executive, Staff report, 2016 06 27

New York - The Lexington Institute, a nonpartisan, nonprofit think tank, has released a study stressing the critical role that the American maritime industry and the Jones Act play in strengthening U.S. border security and helping to prevent international terrorism. The study notes that since 9/11, the Jones Act has taken on new significance for national security, with the law playing a critical role in helping to secure the homeland from the threat of international terrorism. Were the Jones Act not in existence, the Department of Homeland Security would be confronted by the difficult and costly requirement of monitoring, regulating and overseeing foreign-controlled, foreign crewed vessels in coastal and internal U.S. waters, states the study. The current debate of enhancing U.S. border security has focused almost exclusively on illegal movement of people and drugs into the southern United States from Mexico. Yet, the southern land border is actually the smallest at 1,989 miles. The U.S. border with Canada is almost three times longer at 5,525 miles. "The prospect of terrorists on the inland waterways system is a particularly daunting challenge to homeland security. Via the inland waterways, a terrorist could reach America's heartland and many of its largest and most important urban centers. [These waterways] carry an enormous weight of the nation's internal commerce. ... Guarding every potential target along the inland waterways against terrorist attack is an impossible task."

12. Not a day in April passed without an act of terrorism. By the end of the month, the toll told the story: 180 incidents, 1,385 injured, 858 killed (Canada)

Los Angeles Times, Robyn Dixon, Aoun Sahi, 2016 06 26

Johannesburg - From government and police reports, terrorism databases, news accounts and their own independent reporting, Times journalists in the U.S. and around the globe compiled a record of every fatal act of terrorism during the 30 days of April. They confirmed 858 deaths in 27 countries. An additional 1,385 were injured. Recent attacks in Paris and Brussels, San Bernardino and Orlando, Fla., have left Americans and Europeans feeling besieged. But the data show that terrorism strikes everywhere -- from Armenia to Peru, India to Thailand, Bangladesh to the Philippines. The deadliest places were chronic trouble spots -- Iraq, Afghanistan and Syria -- and most of the dead were Muslims, slain by other Muslims. The number of terrorist attacks around the world actually decreased by 13% last year, according to the U.S. State Department, the biggest decline in more than a decade. But the reality is that terrorist attacks over the last 15 years have become more deadly, more indiscriminate and more wide-ranging. During April, not one day escaped bloodshed committed by terrorists. Five victims in April were known to be Westerners: a Canadian beheaded in the Philippines, the three French soldiers killed in Mali and a taxi driver slain in Northern Ireland.

13. Thefts Redirect Arms From C.I.A.

New York Times, Mark Mazzetti, Ali Younes, 2016 06 27

Amman - Weapons shipped into Jordan by the Central Intelligence Agency and Saudi Arabia intended for Syrian rebels have been systematically stolen by Jordanian intelligence operatives and sold to arms merchants on the black market, according to American and Jordanian officials. Some of the stolen weapons were used in a shooting in November that killed two Americans and three others at a police training facility in Amman, F.B.I. officials believe after months of investigating the attack, according to people familiar with the investigation. The existence of the weapons theft, which ended only months ago after complaints by the American and Saudi governments, is being reported for the first time after a joint investigation by The New York Times and Al Jazeera. The theft, involving millions of dollars of weapons, highlights the messy, unplanned consequences of programs to arm and train rebels -- the kind of program the C.I.A. and Pentagon have conducted for decades -- even after the Obama administration had hoped to keep the training program in Jordan under tight control. The Jordanian officers who were part of the scheme reaped a windfall from the weapons sales, using the money to buy expensive SUVs, iPhones and other luxury items, Jordanian officials said.

14. The Security Consequences of Brexit

New York Times, Editorial Board, 2016 06 25

Editorial - Apart from creating economic turmoil, Britain's calamitous vote to leave the European Union could have no less profound foreign policy consequences, weakening the interlocking web of Western institutions and alliances that have helped guarantee international peace and stability for 70 years. This is also a testing moment for President Obama, who has been understandably preoccupied with building alliances in Asia, but must once again make Europe and the trans-Atlantic alliance a priority and find ways to rebuild consensus and chart a united path forward. Otherwise, the major beneficiaries will be Russia and China, both challenging the established Western-led order. Since World War II, the United States, aided principally by Britain, has worked to reduce the potential for international conflict, with particular success in Europe; encourage democratic governance; promote free markets; and lift billions of people out of poverty. This was achieved by working with its allies to establish multiple reinforcing institutions, including NATO, the military alliance that now has 28 members; the E.U., the economic alliance that will have 27 members when Britain leaves; the World Bank; and the International Monetary Fund. In short, together America and Europe wrote the rules and norms by which much of the world now lives. The policies pursued by the West have sometimes been flawed and sometimes failed, but the system that linked America and Europe in a common defense and common political cause ended the Cold War, reunited Germany, built a new Europe and sought in one way or another to address every other major threat. A crucial brick in that system is now in danger of being removed. This stunning development comes at a time when these institutions were already under stress and when many people on both sides of the Atlantic had grown complacent about the relationship and its reinforcing commitments. Europe is economically battered, overwhelmed by refugees fleeing chaos in the Middle East and fearful of attacks within its borders by the Islamic State and other terrorists.

15. With ' Brexit , ' Washington's Direct Line to the Continent Suddenly Frays (Canada)

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 06 27

Washington - American officials struggling to reimagine their strategy after Britain's decision to divorce the European Union say the most urgent challenge will be to find a way to replace their most reliable, sympathetic partner in the hallways of European capitals. It will not be easy. No nation shares Washington's worldview quite the way Britain does, they say; the country has long been the United States' most willing security ally, most effective intelligence partner and greatest enthusiast of the free-trade mantras that, until recently, were a keystone of America's internationalist approach. And few nations were as willing to put a thumb as firmly on the scales of European debates in ways that benefit the United States. Now that quiet diplomatic leverage -- including moderating European trade demands and strong-arming nations to contribute more to NATO military missions -- is suddenly diminished. Even if Britain eventually regains its influence on the Continent -- a big if -- it will be deeply distracted for years. Moreover, the loss of Britain's strong voice in Europe comes at a particularly bad moment: just as the United States and its allies are debating how to handle a revanchist Russia and reinvigorate NATO, hurry along an American-European trade pact that has been languishing, and work through a diplomatic settlement in Syria that could relieve the migrant crisis in Europe. If Britain can no longer play that indispensable role for Washington, surely there is another country that can? Perhaps, but it is hard to think of who. It is not a role Germany has shown a real willingness to step into. Its post-World War II ethos still prevents it from committing combat forces, and it is not a member of the inner circle of intelligence sharing called the "Five Eyes," a club made up of the Anglo victors of World War II. (The other three are Canada, Australia and New Zealand.) A lengthy negotiation to improve the intelligence relationship last year ended with only modest changes.

16. £1m to keep 'tortured' Libyans out of court

London Times, Sean O'Neill, 2016 06 27

London - Almost £1 million of taxpayers' money has been spent attempting to prevent a claim by alleged victims of rendition and torture reaching the courts. Abdul-Hakim Belhaj and his wife Fatima Boudchar want a public apology for Britain's role in their abduction and transfer in 2004 to Libya, where they were imprisoned. They allege, on the basis of papers found in the abandoned office of Colonel Gaddafi's intelligence chief, that MI6 worked with the CIA in the extraordinary rendition. Government lawyers say that the case should not be heard in the courts because it would damage diplomatic relations with the United States.

17. Sturgeon: Scotland could block referendum result

London Times, Lindsay McIntosh, 2016 06 27

Edinburgh - Nicola Sturgeon has suggested that the Scottish parliament could block Brexit. Holyrood will be required to vote on a legislative consent motion (LCM) on the UK's exit from the EU. The mechanism is used for UK laws that affect Scotland such as acts devolving powers. It would be used to ask Holyrood to agree to EU law being extinguished in Scotland. Yesterday the first minister said that it could, therefore, be used to oppose the result of the referendum. One legal expert was quick to throw cold water over the idea, saying that it would have no effect and Westminster would just push through the policy to honour the result of the referendum. Ms Sturgeon's willingness to float the idea shows that she is preparing to play hardball. Asked on the BBC's Sunday Politics Scotland if she would consider urging the Scottish parliament not to back an LCM, she said: "Of course. If the Scottish parliament was judging this on the basis of what's right for Scotland then the option of saying, 'We're not going to vote for something that is against Scotland's interests'. . . of course that is on the table."

The Advertiser, James Dowling, 2016 06 26

Canberra - Federal authorities are almost certain Australia's most senior terrorist Neil Prakash is not only alive, but also again reaching out to extremists. The Government announced in April that former Melburnian Prakash had been killed by a US missile while hiding in an Islamic State stronghold in Mosul. But senior security officials now believe the US missed its man and Prakash is alive and seeking out fellow jihadis. It is understood there is intelligence that suggests Prakash has been in contact with sympathisers in the UK. Also, intercepted chatter among the jihadi groups overseas suggests the wanted Australian extremist is alive. The Australian Federal Police have a warrant for the arrest of Prakash on foreign incursion offences and being a member of a terrorist group.

Canberra - Seven men, including three Australians and a New Zealander abducted in Nigeria last week have been released, according to a statement issued to media by their Australian employer last night. "Five of the men have been injured, two of them seriously, and all are currently receiving attention from a team of medical specialists," a spokesman for Perth-based mining company MacMahon said. Perth mechanic Tim Croot, 24, evaded capture during the ambush, and a local driver was shot dead. "While we are relieved to be able to reunite the seven men with their loved ones, we are deeply saddened by the loss of the local driver Matthew Odok, who was fatally injured during the initial incident," MacMahon chief executive Sy van Dyk said. The kidnappings, in an area of southern Nigeria notorious for armed gangs, were initially thought not to be terror-related.

A commission was instructed to investigate the claims by the Taliban militants regarding their access to biometric system and review of the biometric system in the Ministry of Defense, MoD said. According to a statement by MoD, the commission rejected the Taliban claims as baseless after concluding their investigation, saying the enemies of the country are exaggerating regarding the access to the system. MoD further added that the biometric system is centralized in the Ministry of Defense and is not even available in the units and Corps of the Afghan National Army. The statement by MoD said the system is well protected and can only be accessed with a specific code which the reliable security officials have access to only.

Toronto Star, Evelyn Kwong, 2016 06 27

Mogadishu - A Somali cabinet minister with links to Woodbridge is among the 15 killed people in an Islamic extremist attack on a hotel in Somalia's capital, police say. "I'm trying to stay strong and it's kind of hard," Mohamed Hamza said Sunday night from Woodbridge, where he lives with his mother and sister, just hours after learning that his father, Buri Hamza, State Minister for the Environment in Somalia, was killed in the attack. Capt. Mohamed Hussein, a senior Somali police officer, said four attackers also died in the assault on Saturday which was claimed by Al Shabab, Somalia's militant rebels who are allied to Al Qaeda. "He was the best father, I loved him a lot, I loved when he could visit us," Mohamed Hamza said. Remembered as an active and passionate man by friends and family in Toronto, Somali police confirmed that Hamza died when his hotel room collapsed due to a powerful car bomb which the extremists used to blast their way into the Nasa-Hablod Hotel. "It's a tragedy. He was very well known for being a 'big guy' in terms of fighting for the cause in Somalia" longtime friend Bashi Hosh told the Star. Hosh remembers working closely with Hamza and, notably, his "passion" to fight the instability in Somalia while still in Canada.

Davao City - They've been there, done that, and it hasn't work. An all-out war strategy has failed to neutralize the Abu Sayyaf, according to Sulu Gov. Sakur Tan, who says poverty in the province must instead be tackled. "That all-out war was declared many times by previous presidents. All-out war nang all-out war, but look at what happened, the Abu Sayyaf is still there," Tan said. He noted that the Abu Sayyaf continues to kidnap foreign and local hostages for ransom. "What we need, I think, is we have to address the requirements of the community. We need to address the poverty prevailing in the area," Tan said. "The people, we need the support of the people on our side. If we have the support of the people they won't exist. We do not even have to go to war," Tan said. The Abu Sayyaf recently beheaded two Canadian hostages who failed to come up with the P300-million ransom for each hostage.

The display was performed in front of veteran military officers and weapons experts who met at a recent seminar on the development of military technology. Mahanakorn University of Technology developed the robot, one of several robot prototypes that experts are collaboratively trying to develop to support national security missions. Using robots, especially for bomb retrieval missions, has long been considered by the Thai military. 26. S. Korea urges N.K. to halt making military threats

Seoul--South Korea urged North Korea on Monday to halt making military threats as Pyongyang warned of a shelling attack on the South similar to the one it waged in 2010 in response to Seoul's crackdown on illegal fishing near the western sea border. North Korea on Monday condemned South Korea for its operation with the United Nations Command (UNC) to repel Chinese fishing boats operating illegally in neutral waters between the two Koreas around the Han River estuary. "They should stop their reckless military provocations at once, bearing in mind that they may spark off an inescapable retaliatory action from the Korean People's Army like the Yeonpyeong Island shelling incident," the Korean Central News Agency (KCNA) said. In November 2010, North Korea launched an artillery attack on South Korea's Yeonpyeong Island near the tense maritime border. The attack killed four people, including two civilians, and injured 18 others.

Isnilon Hapilon, who leads the ASG faction al-Harakat al-Islamiyah in Basilan province in southern Mindanao, has been named to head the groups by Abu Baker al-Baghdadi, the caliph of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS). This assessment was based by Abu Abdulrahman al-Filibini-who speaks the Filipino language fluently-on a supposedly recent video. The ASG, according to Abdulrahman, has called on the jihadists' groups to join forces with Hapilon, who has a bounty of $5 million on his head under the United States Rewards for Justice Program. 28. I, Snowbot

New York Magazine, Andrew Rice, 2016 06 27

New York - Edward Snowden's body might be confined to Moscow, but the former NSA computer specialist has hacked a work-around: a robot. If he wants to make his physical presence felt in the United States, he can connect to a wheeled contraption called a BeamPro, a flat-screen monitor that stands atop a pair of legs, five-foot-two in all, with a camera that acts as a swiveling Cyclops eye. Inevitably, people call it the "Snowbot." The avatar resides at the Manhattan offices of the ACLU, where it takes meetings and occasionally travels to speaking engagements. More than one person told me that, after talking to Snowden for hours on end, they got the sense that he is lonely. His conversation is preoccupied with the theme of escape. He recently collaborated on a track with a French musician, delivering a spoken-word monologue on surveillance over an electronic beat, and recommended the title: "Exit." Snowden sometimes says that although he lives in Russia, he does not expect to die there, and he told me he is optimistic that he will find a way out, somehow. Maybe some Scandinavian country will offer him asylum. Maybe he can work out some kind of deal -- whether outright clemency or a plea bargain -- with the Justice Department. Wizner has been working with Plato Cacheris, a well-connected Washington defense attorney, but so far, there have been no official signals that the Justice Department would be willing to offer the kind of lenient terms Snowden would accept. And a window may be closing. He is unlikely to receive a more receptive hearing from Hillary Clinton, who has said he shouldn't be allowed to return without "facing the music." As for Donald Trump: He has called Snowden a "total traitor" and suggested he should be executed. "If I'm president," he predicted last year, "Putin says, 'Hey, boom -- you're gone.?' " So the comparatively thoughtful Obama may be Snowden's best hope, but even Snowden's allies concede that they doubt the outgoing president has the inclination to offer a pardon.

29. Russian Hack Said To Reach Beyond Democrats

Wall Street Journal, Nicole Hong, 2016 06 27

New York - The attack on the Democratic National Committee's computer network this past spring was part of a broader monthslong campaign by Russian hackers against groups with ties to U.S. politics, according to a new report. Party officials and security researchers disclosed about two weeks ago that the DNC's system was compromised in April by two hacking groups with links to Russian intelligence services, one of the largest known breaches of a U.S. political organization. On Sunday, cybersecurity firm SecureWorks Corp. concluded that one of the hacking groups, dubbed "Fancy Bear" in security circles, also targeted the emails of presumptive Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton's campaign, as well as email accounts belonging to U.S.-based military spouses, political activists and journalists who wrote critically about Russia and others. Over the past year or so, the hackers tried to penetrate nearly 4,000 individual email accounts, researchers said.

Qaa, Lebanon - Suspected ISIS suicide attacks in a northeastern Lebanon border village killed six people Monday and wounded at least 19 others. A security source told The Daily Star that four suicide bombers blew themselves up near a Lebanese Customs center in the village of Qaa. The six killed were in addition to the suicide bombers. The source said the blasts took place about 10 minutes apart. The army said in a statement that a suicide bomber blew himself up around 4:20 a.m. near the residence of a Lebanese national in the town of Qaa. That explosion was followed by three others on the road near that house. Four soldiers on a patrol were injured while heading to the site of the first explosion. Two are in a critical condition. The agreement will be officially announced Monday afternoon. 35. Le Hezbollah plus défiant que jamais

Le Soir (Belgique), Baudouin Loos, 2016 06 27

Beyrouth - Au Liban, le mouvement chiite pro-iranien reste le parti le plus puissant. Malgré un certain isolement et des critiques, il assume ses choix - comme celui d'aider Assad en Syrie - avec l'assentiment de son parrain, l'Iran. La bombe n'a fait que deux blessés légers. Elle visait la façade d'une banque libanaise connue, Blom. Ce dimanche 12 juin au soir, tous les regards se sont tournés vers le mouvement pro-iranien Hezbollah. Car, pour beaucoup d'observateurs, cet attentat visiblement conçu pour ne pas tuer, une technique... inhabituelle au Liban, se voulait être un message à qui de droit. A savoir au secteur bancaire local qui serait tenté d'obéir aux injonctions américaines. Car une loi américaine de 2015 impose des sanctions contre les institutions financières étrangères qui feraient des transactions avec le Hezbollah, considéré comme terroriste. Concrètement, le Congrès exige la fermeture d'une centaine de comptes en banque appartenant à des caciques du parti islamiste chiite. Ce 24 juin, Hassan Nasrallah, le chef du Hezbollah, s'est lancé dans une diatribe édifiante. « Nous ne serons pas touchés, ni affectés par les sanctions américaines car aussi longtemps que l'Iran a de l'argent, nous en aurons. Nous recevons de ce pays de l'argent qui ne passe pas par les banques. De même que nous recevons des roquettes que nous utilisons pour menacer Israël, nous recevons notre argent. Aucune loi ne peut nous empêcher d'en recevoir. Nous sommes très clairs sur le budget du Hezbollah. Ses revenus et ses dépenses, ce qu'il mange ou boit, ses armes et ses roquettes, tout cela vient de la République islamique d'Iran. »

Jerusalem Post, Ben Hartman, 2016 06 27

Jerusalem - An east Jerusalem dentist and several members of his family have been arrested for carrying out a bombing that left an IDF officer seriously wounded in May, the Shin Bet said on Sunday. According to the Shin Bet, 36-year-old Samer Mahmoud Dawoud Alhabiya, stashed 56 small pipe bombs in his dental office in Abu Dis, as well as two firebombs and one large pipe bomb. The Shin Bet said Alhabiya told investigators he began planning his attacks in February because of what he called "desecrations of Al-Aksa Mosque and Israel's harming of Palestinian children." Several bombs were remotely detonated by cellphone in the May 10 attack near the Palestinian village of Hizma, seriously wounding Sec.-Lt. Shahar Roditi, who suffered shrapnel wounds and broken facial bones. An IDF patrol had spotted a suspicious device near Hizma, located near the northern Jerusalem neighborhood of Pisgat Ze'ev; it was detonated when the soldiers stopped to inspect it.

39. Confiance sur l'avenir de l'alliance militaire franco-britannique

Le Monde, Nathalie Guibert, 2016 06 27

Paris - Les autorités françaises ne craignent pas les effets du " Brexit " sur les accords bilatéraux entre les deux pays Une bouée rassurante flotterait-elle sur l'océan des inquiétudes nées du " Brexit "? L'alliance militaire entre la France et le Royaume-Uni tiendra bon, assurait-on à Paris, vendredi 24 juin. Le ministère de la défense français a fait part de sa confiance. " C'est un partenariat d'exception, celui de deux puissances nucléaires, membres du Conseil de sécurité et engagées sur le terrain des opérations, une relation fondée sur des arrangements bilatéraux solides. " Les deux partenaires maintiennent leurs " initiatives communes " en vue du sommet de l'OTAN des 8 et 9 juillet : demande d'un plan d'économies dans la bureaucratie de l'Alliance, accord sur les nouvelles forces à déployer à l'Est face à la Russie, ou encore refus de voir l'OTAN se transformer en coûteuse agence de cyberdéfense à la place des Etats qui ne voudraient pas investir. " Le Royaume-Uni va demeurer un allié fort et engagé de l'OTAN, et il continuera à jouer un rôle déterminant " , a d'ailleurs souligné à Bruxelles le secrétaire général de l'Alliance, Jens Stoltenberg.

40. EU security strategy to push for closer defence co-operation

Financial Times, Alex Barker, 2016 06 27

Brussels - Europe's first security strategy in more than a decade is to push for closer EU defence co-operation, paving the way for multinational headquarters, military procurement and deployments to help cope with "times of existential crisis". A draft version of the EU's "global strategy" seen by the Financial Times casts serious defence integration as "the norm" that will boost the bloc's defence industry and better project Europe's foreign policy clout in its neighbourhood. The paper overseen by Federica Mogherini, the EU's foreign policy chief, is part of a multi- pronged political move towards the goal of a joint European military force, which was outlined in the Lisbon treaty but has been far from being realised. All advocates though are realistically hoping for small steps towards more combined forces. It comes at a time of great political uncertainty, posing both a threat and opportunity for the EU. Germany and France see a push to deepen common defence and security co-operation within the EU -- long resisted by Britain -- as one way to show the union has unity and purpose in the wake of the UK vote to leave the EU. Ms Mogherini's paper will be discussed at a summit of EU leaders on Wednesday. A German defence white paper in July will echo many of the calls to move to so-called "structured co-operation", where willing EU nations systematically pool military kit, armed forces and decision-making power.

41. Nanterre: un commissaire de la DGSI jugé

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 06 27

Nanterre, France - Un commissaire de police est jugé demain à Nanterre pour "violences" sur une avocate, soupçonné de l'avoir giflée lors d'une garde à vue à la Direction centrale du renseignement intérieur (DCRI, devenue DGSI) en avril 2014, des faits qu'il conteste. Le policier, 58 ans, toujours en poste à la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure, comparait devant le tribunal correctionnel pour "violences volontaires par une personne dépositaire de l'autorité publique sur un avocat dans l'exercice de ses fonctions". Le 1er avril 2014, l'avocate, inscrite au barreau des Hauts-de-Seine, avait accusé le commissaire de l'avoir giflée et insultée alors qu'elle assistait un suspect gardé à vue dans les locaux du service antiterroriste et de contre-espionnage à Levallois-Perret, près de Paris. Son client était interrogé sur l'identité du kamikaze qui avait perpétré un attentat-suicide ayant tué cinq touristes israéliens et le chauffeur bulgare de leur car, à l'aéroport de Bourgas, en Bulgarie, en 2012. Au cours de son audition, le commissaire lui avait assuré qu'il ne risquait pas d'être mis en cause dans ce dossier.

42. PKK terrorists funded by drug trafficking, ministry report says

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 06 27

Istanbul - Lice, a town in the southeastern city of Diyarbakır, has seen heavy military presence this week. Flanked by helicopters, troops swept through acres of cannabis fields hidden in plain sight in secluded areas of the district. The operations shed light on how the PKK terrorist organization rakes in profit from drug cultivation in Lice, and now an Interior Ministry report revealed that the organization earns more than $1.5 billion a year from the cultivation and smuggling of narcotics. The terrorist organization has escalated attacks against the army, police and civilians since last summer, after it unilaterally ended a fragile two-year cease-fire which saw militants withdraw from the Turkish territories, although they covertly stored weapons across Turkey. Following a string of brutal attacks in the southeast and big cities, attention turned to how the small faction, whose leaders hide out in Northern Iraq, finances such bloody operations. A report from Anadolu Agency based on Interior Ministry sources shows that the terrorist group is heavily involved in the drug trade, from the production of narcotics to their delivery, distribution and sales. This "narco-terrorism" brings in massive revenues for the PKK, particularly cannabis production in the southeast, where PKK activities are concentrated.

1. Call for up to nine years in prison surprises ex-CSIS spy's defence

Ottawa Citizen, James Bagnall, 2016 06 28

Ottawa - Crown attorney Moray Welch on Monday suggested former construction boss Roland Eid should serve "seven to nine" years in prison for his part in the 2008 bankruptcy of ICI Construction. Welch made his view known during a hearing before Superior Court Justice

Timothy Ray to discuss sentencing. Ray last month found Eid guilty of 10 counts of breaching the Criminal Code and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The judge ruled Eid had defrauded ICI Construction's creditors, causing them to suffer combined losses of $3.8 million. Eid controlled ICI Construction through his wife's ownership of the firm. Eid's counsel, Richard Addelman, appeared surprised by the Crown's relatively hard-line position on sentencing. "I want to make a submission that's realistic," he said following the hearing. Addelman had pointed out to Ray earlier in the day that Eid's actions took place before 2012, when the former Conservative government amended the law to include minimum sentences for fraud and other criminal offences. "No minimum sentences were imposed" under the previous (pre-2012) regime, Addelman told Ray. He added that a minimum could amount to a conditional sentence, in which Eid would serve time at home subject to certain restrictions. (Under the current law, which doesn't apply in this case, there is a minimum two-year sentence where the fraud exceeds $1 million.) Addelman later made it clear he would not necessarily argue for a conditional sentence. He said this would depend on evidence he intended to place before Ray as part of the pre-sentencing process. An important factor from the defence point of view is Eid's mental state in 2007 and 2008, when he was travelling back and forth from his native Lebanon. Eid, a former informant with the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, claimed he spent much time gathering intelligence about Hezbollah, a Shia Muslim group.

2. CSIS locks horns with diplomats over anti-terror info sharing

CBC News, Dean Beeby, 2016 06 28

Canada's spy agency has been frustrated in trying to track Canadians who travel overseas to fight for ISIS and other extremist groups because the country's diplomatic service is refusing to play ball. That's the complaint of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, which says Global Affairs Canada (GAC) has not volunteered key security information, and drags its feet when asked for specific files on citizens and others. The rare glimpse into a squabble between spies and diplomats appears in a document obtained by CBC News under the Access to Information Act. The spy agency has been "concerned that GAC was not sharing information in a proactive manner and that its vetting process for responding to CSIS requests was causing lengthy delays," says a November 2015 account of the dispute. The problems occurred just months after controversial anti-terrorism bill, C-51, became law. The legislation was designed to smooth security information sharing among 17 federal agencies, including CSIS and Global Affairs Canada. Canada's privacy commissioner railed against the bill, saying it set the bar too low and unreasonably intrudes on privacy. The Liberals helped pass C-51, but since forming the government have said they will improve on it, though without providing specifics. A Canadian Press report in March said at least four federal agencies have already used the information-sharing powers conferred by the bill, including CSIS. But the newly released document shows the transition has been fraught -- largely because of the reluctance of the diplomatic service to hand over personal information on Canadians gleaned from passports and consular services. "CSIS has been in discussions with GAC to address challenges with respect to timely sharing of information related to threats to national security, for example Canadians travelling overseas to fight for extremist groups," says the RCMP document, signed Dec. 1 by Commissioner Bob Paulson. The RCMP, CSIS and Global Affairs were in talks last fall to break the logjam, drafting a "declaration" to "facilitate timely information sharing" based on what Canada's diplomats gathered from citizens visiting or contacting embassies and missions, among other things. A spokeswoman for CSIS, Roxanne Ouellette, declined comment on the "specific operational issues" raised by the document, saying only that the spy agency works in "close collaboration" with the diplomatic service.

3. Welcome parliamentary oversight is not enough to fix security policy

Toronto Star Online, 2016 06 28

Editorial: The lives of Canadians have never been more transparent to the state's security apparatus, yet the security apparatus remains troublingly opaque to the people. That dangerous asymmetry was compounded by the Harper government's overreaching Anti-Terrorism Act, formerly Bill C-51, which introduced vast new powers for spy agencies last year and yet did nothing to make them more accountable. It was reassuring, then, to see the new Liberal government table Bill C-22 last week, an important first step toward accountability. The legislation would finally give to Canada what most of our allies already have: a parliamentary committee that provides democratic oversight of our national security establishment. The all-party committee's members -- seven MPs and two senators -- would be sworn to secrecy and given statutory power to scrutinize all spying and clandestine operations, across all agencies and departments, in order to evaluate their effectiveness and legality. If passed, Bill C-22 would provide an essential check on a security apparatus that should not be allowed to wield its considerable power with impunity. But this proposal, as written and on its own, will barely begin to restore the balance between public safety and individual freedoms that the Conservatives' security policy so badly skewed. To do that, the government will need to take at least three steps. Undo the most egregious aspects of the Anti-Terrorism Act. No amount of oversight can address the profound pitfalls of the Tories' draconian security policy. The act compromises Canadians' privacy in unprecedented ways, criminalizes the "promoting" of terrorism, gives CSIS the power to perform the sort of dirty tricks it was created to pre-empt, and allows imprisonment of up to five years to prevent crimes that "may be carried out." The Liberals have said they are undertaking a public consultation to determine which parts of the act should be repealed. But what can the public possibly say to make the above violations of civil rights acceptable?

4. Bizarre pleas from accused

Toronto Sun, Sam Pazzano, 2016 06 28

Toronto - Rohinie Bisesar, who's accused of stabbing another woman in Toronto's underground PATH system, was in court Monday, pleading her innocence and urging federal authorities to investigate her claims of international terrorism. "I know something has happened to myself and my former common-law ... something we're exposed to while we were both in investment banking," said Bisesar, who was deemed mentally fit for trial last month. "This is an important is sue t hat should be investigated by federal (authorities)," said Bisesar. "I know this matter has to be dealt with as soon as possible." Bisesar is charged with first-degree murder. Toronto Police alleged Bisesar stabbed 28-year-old newlywed Rosemarie Junor last December inside Shoppers Drug Mart in the underground PATH system. In May, Bisesar fired her lawyer Calvin Barry, but the reasons are covered under a publication ban.

5. Contre la radicalisation, le "vivre ensemble"

Le Devoir, Marco Fortier, 2016 06 28

Québec - Québec appuie cinq projets qui visent à développer l'esprit critique des jeunes Pour lutter contre la radicalisation menant à la violence, le gouvernement Couillard vient de donner le feu vert à cinq projets qui cherchent à développer l'esprit critique des étudiants du secondaire et du collégial. Ces projets visent à canaliser les idées radicales des jeunes avant leur éventuelle conversion à la violence, a expliqué la ministre de l'Immigration, de la Diversité et de l'Inclusion, Kathleen Weil, lundi à Montréal. Ces initiatives se veulent complémentaires au resserrement de la surveillance policière et à d'autres mesures mises de l'avant depuis qu'une douzaine de jeunes Québécois ont fui ou tenté de fuir en Syrie pour combattre les " ennemis d'Allah ", au cours des derniers mois. " Ces mesures visent à bâtir une société inclusive, à développer l'esprit critique des jeunes. On n'est pas en train de vous dire que les jeunes qui vont participer à ces projets de dialogue sont à risque de se radicaliser ", a expliqué le ministre Weil. Le mot d'ordre commun aux cinq projets est la promotion du " vivre ensemble ", une expression citée abondamment par le maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre. Ils visent aussi à développer l'estime de soi et l'appartenance au Québec des étudiants.

6. Defence minister praises N.B. for 'leadership' on immigration

New Brunswick Telegraph Journal, John Chilibeck, 2016 06 28

Fredericton - Canada's defence minister remembers with fondness what it was like to be the only turbaned military member when he first trained to become an officer at Base Gagetown in the early 1990s. Harjit Sajjan said New Brunswick would benefit from more immigrants as a way of combating aging demographics and an exodus of young families. It starts, he said, with local leaders telling people from different cultures they can offer them a safe and friendly new home. "There is sometimes fear lurking in immigration populations because of everything they've seen and read in the news, especially these days," said the Liberal minister in an interview at Isaac's Way, a restaurant in downtown Fredericton, before appearing at an evening event with local Liberal MP Matt DeCoursey at the University of New Brunswick. "They want to know how they'll be treated. And the openness that New Brunswick is showing is a message that would be welcomed around the world." In a wide-ranging discussion that touched on everything from Liberal Premier Brian Gallant's efforts to create a bigger cyber security hub in New Brunswick to the importance of Base Gagetown for Canada's military, it was the topic of immigration that brought out his most passionate words. In the past, Sajjan has credited his faith with ensuring he wouldn't run with a bad crowd, including a childhood friend who turned into a drug dealer and was eventually killed in a nightclub. Sajjan went on to become a detective in the Vancouver Police Department for 11 years working to bust gangsters and disrupt organized crime. Before winning the election last year, he did three tours of duty in the Afghanistan war as an intelligence officer trying to defeat the Taliban. He is what many people consider a quintessential immigrant success story. "I speak about this very directly because I've seen racism where immigrants say, 'I don't want to be here'," he said, referring to experiences in other parts of Canada. "Every time I hear people like Matt talking about the importance of immigration, that's the kind of message people around the world want to hear." Gallant has been pressing Sajjan and other members of the federal Liberal cabinet on putting more money toward New Brunswick becoming a cyber security hub, something the premier believes could bolster the province's weak economic growth and attract more talent.

7. Degree program targets cybercrime

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman, 2016 06 28

Montreal - With dark iClouds looming on the horizon, we have entered a veritable era of cyber warfare. Forced to fight off such enemies as headless worms, hidden ghostware and - straight out of Terminator - machine-to-machine (M2M) attacks, the billions of connected devices in the world have created a cyber battlefield so dangerous to navigate that virtually no one is safe from a cyberattack. As information and communication technology (ICT) has become integral to almost every facet of modern society, cybersecurity has become one of the hottest fields around. With a goal of boosting supply and expertise in the burgeoning field, Polytechnique Montréal and Deloitte have teamed up to educate a new crop of cybersecurity experts. The engineering school, which is part of Université de Montréal, and the professional services firm are joining forces to fight cybercrime by expanding and upgrading Polytechnique's cybersecurity program - and creating a state-of-the-art curriculum that will meet current market needs. They aim to create the first bachelor's degree in cybersecurity - which will be offered in English next year as well - by offering three cutting-edge certificate programs in cyber investigation, online fraud and IT network computer security.

8. DND moving 500 into building with asbestos

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 06 28

Ottawa - The Department of National Defence is moving some 500 staff into a building in Gatineau that has asbestos as it tries to find accommodation for workers left without offices because of a fire in another facility. The fire broke out in the Louis St. Laurent building April 21, forcing the shutdown of that facility and the need to find new offices for the 1,800 DND and Canadian Forces staff who worked there. Some 1,400 staff are now being relocated at different office locations across Ottawa and Gatineau, while another 400 continue to work from home. About 500 of the employees will be relocated to the National Printing Bureau building, 45 Sacré Coeur Boulevard in Gatineau, by the end of the summer, said Lt.-Cmdr. Lora Collier. She acknowledged the building contains asbestos. "It is contained and encapsulated and does not pose a threat to employees," she said. "There is no associated health or safety risk to employees who may be relocated to work in that building." Although a number of employees have raised the issue with the Citizen, Collier said the DND has not received any concerns from employees. June Winger, executive vicepresident of the Union of National Defence Employees, said the presence of asbestos is an ongoing problem with many DND buildings. It is not uncommon to see warning signs about asbestos in certain facilities, she added.

9. Du théâtre contre la radicalisation des jeunes

Agence QMI, Marie-Christine Trottier, 2016 06 28

Québec - Québec mise sur cinq projets de tables rondes, de théâtre et d'actions communautaires pour lutter contre la radicalisation des jeunes menant à la violence. Environ 165 000$ seront injectés sur deux ans pour intervenir auprès de 17000 jeunes de partout au Québec. Ces cinq projets font partie du Plan d'action 2015-2018 pour lutter contre la radicalisation au Québec. Herman Deparice-Okomba, directeur général du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence (CPRV) voit d'un bon oeil ces cinq projets annoncés hier matin. En effet, ce genre d'initiative a déjà fait ses preuves au Royaume-Uni et dans certains pays scandinaves.

10. Five groups to battle radicalization

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 06 28

Montreal - The Quebec government has chosen five organizations to work with youths in high schools and CEGEPs to improve social cohesion - and prevent radicalization leading to violence. With a total of $165,000 in funding, the groups will seek to counter extremist messages and Islamophobia through theatre, workshops and discussion groups, especially in areas and schools with diverse populations. Immigration Minister Kathleen Weil said the projects are meant to improve the "vivre ensemble" - or social cohesion in Quebec - and are part of the government's action plan to fight radicalization, announced last year after eight youths left Montreal to join extremist groups in the Middle East and another 10 were stopped at the airport. "We are convinced of the importance of prevention and dialogue to fight prejudice and discrimination and to counter hate speech promoting violence," said Weil, at a news conference Monday. "Without being naive and thinking this approach alone will solve such a complex problem with such immense ramifications, we are doing this also because we believe in the enormous potential of our youths ... to make a more just and inclusive society." The five groups were chosen out of only six which submitted proposals to the Quebec government, perhaps reflecting the dearth of expertise in the province in this admittedly new field of research.

11. 'Spy House,' a Reminder of Betrayal, Sits Empty in New Jersey

New York Times, Filip Bondy, 2016 06 28

Montclair, New Jersey - Amid the 75 houses inside the oak-lined, no-outlet neighborhood, a single home stands unoccupied, a celebrity eyesore. Inside the house, the baseboards have been torn from the walls, with wires visibly protruding. The back deck is deteriorating, and the foundation may be pitched slightly toward the wildlife preserve adjacent to the back yard. Around here, in a section of town called Fieldstone, everyone knows the peach-colored colonial with a sagging facade as the spy house, where a flock of Federal Bureau of Investigation agents arrested the Murphy family six years ago, on June 27, 2010. Richard and Cynthia Murphy were really Vladimir and Lidiya Guryev, Russian spies, part of a Northeast corridor cell that was soon sent back to Moscow by the United States government in an exchange. The Guryevs and their two talented, popular daughters, Katie and Lisa, became an inspiration for the FX show "The Americans." They are long gone, but the unoccupied house remains a frustrating story of its own and an unwanted symbol of betrayal for the community.

12. Authorities warn of hacking hazards in Rio

USA Today, Kevin Johnson, 2016 06 28

Washington - If Zika, political instability and contaminated water weren't enough, U.S. intelligence officials warn Americans traveling in August to the Olympic Games in Rio and other destinations abroad that proprietary information stored on electronic devices is at high risk for theft by spies and cyber criminals who increasingly target global events as troughs rich in valuable intelligence. Bill Evanina, the nation's chief counterintelligence executive, urged travelers to carry "clean" devices, free of potentially valuable archives that could be tapped for economic advantage, personal data or security information. Just as the Olympics draw the world's most talented athletes, Evanina said, the games and other international events represent a "great playground" for government intelligence services and criminals, if only because of the "sheer number of devices." A little more than a month before the Rio games and in the midst of the summer travel season, the U.S. government will launch a multimedia campaign Wednesday to advise travelers of the increasing threat. The program, "Know the Risk; Raise Your Shield," warns in part that foreign security services and criminals track visitors' movements through their mobile phones and are able to control such things as internal microphones remotely, often without the users' knowledge. "When you travel abroad, assume that your personal information will be breached," Evanina said.

13. Racist hate groups are evolving

Los Angeles Times, James Queally, 2016 06 28

Los Angeles - The two groups at the center of a violent Sacramento rally that left at least seven people with stab wounds on the Capitol grounds Sunday represent a marriage of the past and future of white supremacist organizations, experts and law enforcement officials said. The Traditionalist Worker Party is a white nationalist group emblematic of a surge in "intellectual racism" that has pervaded extremist circles in the last decade. The group it held the rally in conjunction with -- the Golden State Skinheads -- is among California's oldest, largest and most violent white supremacist organizations, experts say. Joanna Mendelson, a researcher with the Anti-Defamation League's Center for Extremism in California, said the event seemed to follow a strategy used frequently by white power groups in recent years. The groups will often announce a rally, seemingly bait counter-demonstrators into violence, and then use video footage of the attacks as further evidence of the "white genocide" they use as a rallying call. The pattern was similar to an incident in Anaheim earlier this year, where three people were stabbed after protesters attacked a small band of Ku Klux Klan members. "Their biggest kind of whine right now is the idea that white people are being subjected to genocide," Mark Potok, editor of the Southern Poverty Law Center's Intelligence Report magazine, said of the violence in Anaheim. "That kind of video simply illustrates how white people and particularly white nationalists are under attack."

14. Facebook and YouTube block terror videos

London Times, James Dean, 2016 06 28

London - Social networks and video-hosting services have begun automatically to remove extremist videos from their sites after complaints that they were failing to stem the spread of hate online. Videos are being checked against databases of extremist content and automatically removed from Facebook, YouTube and other sites if they are found to breach their terms. Internet companies have been criticised by politicians globally for allowing Islamic State (Isis) militants to upload videos of executions to their plat-forms. The videos generally remain online until they are reported. The companies are now using technology originally invented to identify "hashes", or digital fingerprints, in copyrighted videos. If a software scan detects one of these fingerprints, the video is taken down. The fingerprints can be applied to known extremist material so that they can be detected as soon as they are uploaded.

15. Fear That 'Brexit' Vote Will Stoke Xenophobia

New York Times, Dan Bilefsky, 2016 06 28

London - In Birmingham, protesters held a banner outside a mosque that said "rapefugees not welcome." Expletive-laced graffiti was scrawled on the front of a Polish community center in London. Far-right protesters in Newcastle displayed banners saying, "Stop immigration, begin repatriation." Less than a week after a referendum on British membership in the European Union, which galvanized fears about untrammelled immigration into the country, human rights advocates and leading politicians expressed alarm that the vote had given license to xenophobia, unleashing hatred among an economic underclass. Although the police in at least two major cities said they had not recorded an increase in hate crimes after the vote, there were concerns that anti-immigrant sentiment was now rippling through British society and infecting daily life.

16. Referendum has sparked 'open season' for racists

The Independent (UK), Ted Jeory, 2016 06 28

London - British Muslims are suffering an "explosion" in faith-based hatred with many women now afraid to conduct their daily lives, according to a new report which also warns of heightened racism following the UK's vote to quit the EU. The annual survey by the anti-Muslim hate monitoring group Tell MAMA found a 326 per cent rise in incidents last year, while the Muslim Council of Britain group of mosques said it had compiled a dossier of 100 hate crimes over the weekend alone. Political leaders including David Cameron and Jeremy Corbyn both voiced concern in the Commons yesterday, while Labour grandee Harriet Harman said many now seemed to believe it was "open season" for racists. Poles and other minority groups have suffered several verbal attacks throughout the country in recent days, and the National Police Chiefs' Council said it had detected a 57 per cent rise in reports to a police online hate crime-reporting site between Thursday and Sunday compared to the corresponding days four weeks ago. Tell MAMA's survey found that while far-right activists are often behind the incidents online, many attacks are happening in the real world - at schools and colleges, in restaurants and on public transport.

Former Sydney preacher Mostafa Mahamed, now known as Abu Sulayman, has even attempted to launch a hashtag on social media, successfully - encouraging others to express solidarity with jihadists in the Libyan city of Benghazi. As a senior sharia official with al-Qa'ida's Jabhat al-Nusra group in Syria, Mahamed is the highest-ranking terrorist Australia has produced, placing him on a US kill list and making him go to great lengths to hide his whereabouts. Yet after a year trying to avoid the spotlight, the 32-year-old appears to be positioning himself as the public face for the group. Kabul - Taliban announced in the last week of May the appointment of Mullah Haibatullah Akhunzada to succeed its former leader Mullah Akhtar Mansour, who was killed by an American air raid. The new leader was born in a small village in Kandahar province, in southern Afghanistan, known as the capital of the political decision-making in the country. Haibatullah belongs to the Pashtuns group, same as the former Taliban leaders Mullah Mohammad Omar and Mullah Akhtar Mansour. Being the son of a scholar, Akhunzada received his education at an early age in religious schools in Kandahar. He later moved to Pakistan, where he pursued his religious studies. During the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, Mullah Haibatullah fought alongside the Afghan Mujahideen against the Soviet forces, particularly alongside the troops of the former Taliban Leader Mullah Akhtar Mansour before being appointed as Taliban's leader.

21. Mali: l'avenir de la mission de l'ONU discuté et acté cette semaine

Radio France Internationale, Marie Bourreau, 2016 06 28

New York - Le Conseil de sécurité de l'ONU s'apprête à renouveler, mercredi 29 juin, le mandat de la Mission multidimensionnelle intégrée de l'ONU pour la stabilisation au Mali (Minusma). Compte tenu d'un contexte terroriste très difficile, il s'agit de l'opération de maintien de la paix la plus meurtrière. C'est une opération de maintien de la paix qui n'en porte que le nom. Car le mandat de la Minusma, qui doit être renouvelé cette semaine, en fait clairement une mission de lutte contre le terrorisme. Ce mot n'apparaît pas dans la résolution, qui parle plutôt de menaces asymétriques. Mais clairement, le Conseil de sécurité a pris la mesure des enjeux dans le nord du Mali, face à la multiplication des attaques contre les casques bleus déployés et la pression des pays contributeurs de troupes. Non seulement les effectifs sont revus à la hausse, avec 2 500 casques bleus et policiers supplémentaires, mais le mandat de la Minusma est aussi clarifié. Sa posture est beaucoup plus robuste, offensive et combative.

23. Amid Crisis, Rio Gov. Warns Olympics Could Be 'Big Failure'

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 06 27

Rio de Janeiro - Rio de Janeiro's acting governor warned Monday that the Olympic Games could be a "big failure," because of budget shortfalls that threaten to compromise security and mobility during the games. In an interview with Rio's O Globo daily, Francisco Dornelles said the state is still awaiting a 2.9 billion Brazilian real ($860 million) payout from the federal government aimed at shoring up state coffers ahead of the Aug. 5-21 event. The funds were allocated last week but have not yet reached the state, and Dornelles warned that without them, police patrols may grind to a halt by the end of the week, for lack of gas money. "How are people going to feel protected in a city without security," Dornelles was quoted as asking. "I'm optimistic about the games, but I have to show reality," he said. "We can have a great Olympics, but if some steps aren't taken, it can be a big failure."

Times of Israel, 2016 06 28

Rio De Janeiro - An Israeli high-resolution imaging satellite will strengthen security during the Olympics and Paralympic Games taking place in Rio de Janeiro this summer. The announcement was made last week by Brazilian Defense Minister Raul Jungmann, who said the Eros-B satellite will allow very detailed inspections of the city during the sporting events in August and September, the G1 news portal reported Friday. "This is an Israeli satellite at a low Earth orbit altitude capable of capturing high-resolution images of up to 50 centimeters [about 1 1/2 feet] in an area of 450 kilometers [some 31 miles], thus enabling the identification of objects, people, cars and goods," Jungmann explained to the local media. He added that the Eros-B satellite will be used on an experimental basis for six months as a security complement and, in the future, will support in border surveillance.

25. 'Talks with Abu to continue for hostages' release' (Canada).

Philippine Star, Jose Rodel Clapano, 2016 06 28

Manila - Incoming presidential adviser on the peace process Jesus Dureza yesterday said the administration of president-elect Rodrigo Duterte would have to continue negotiating with the Abu Sanyaf for the release of its remaining hostages. In a television interview, Dureza said the situation is complicated and there is no single approach in dealing with the bandit group. "You cannot put it in a box. It has to be a calibrated approach," Dureza said. He said the government cannot just order an offensive against the Abu Sanyaf because there are communities, families and hostages involved. Last week, the Abu Sanyaf agreed to release their Filipina captive, Marites Flor, who was later presented to Duterte in Davao City. Dureza said no ransom was paid for Flor's release. Flor was kidnapped along with Norwegian national Kjartan Sekkingstad and Canadians Robert Hall and John Ridsdel on Samal Island in September 2015.

26. China stresses app obligations in information security

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 06 28

Beijing - Mobile app providers must fulfill "six obligations" when operating in China, including requiring real-name registration and preserving records of their users' activity for at least two months, a new regulation has made clear. Firstly, app providers must verify users' identities by requiring mobile phone numbers or other information, according to the regulation released by the Cyberspace Administration of China on Tuesday. Secondly, they should protect users' information and cannot use the information without the users' consent. Thirdly, the providers should improve their censorship and punish anyone releasing illicit information through warnings, suspension of service or shutting down accounts, the regulation said. Under Chinese law, online rumormongers and those who promote extremism or terrorism can face prison sentences.

27. China submits implementation plan on sanctions against N. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Kim Deok-hyun, 2016 06 28

Seoul - China has submitted an action plan on how to implement its sanctions against North Korea in tandem with the ongoing global efforts to punish Pyongyang for conducting its nuclear and missile tests earlier this year, a government source said Tuesday. "We have learned that China has turned in its implementation report" to the U.N. sanction committee for North Korea, the source told Yonhap News Agency on the condition of anonymity. In March, the U.N. Security Council asked the 193 member countries to draw up their own plans on how to enforce the sanctions on the North under its latest resolution adopted in the wake of Pyongyang's fourth nuclear test and a long-range missile launch in January and February. They were required to submit the plans within 90 days of the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) adopting the resolution. That fell on June 2 (local time), though it is not a mandatory deadline. Though it passed the deadline, the submission was much faster than in 2013 when it took Beijing about seven months to send in its implementation report in connection with a UNSC resolution.

28. Duterte Abu Sayyaf Group dialogue (Canada).

Gulf News, Barbara Mae Dacanay, 2016 06 28

Manila - President-elect Rodrigo Duterte is considering holding talks with a 28-year-old hostage-taking group that has links with Daesh in Syria and Iraq and the Al Qaida terror network, which was once led by the late Osama Bin Laden. "The Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG), they are not my enemies. I know that [their fight] is connected with the issue of Mindanao," said Duterte during a celebration party for him by supporters in Cebu City, central Philippines, late on Saturday night, the transcript of which reached Manila's media offices. "I just want a clarification: Are they willing to talk or just fight it out?" asked Duterte. The ASG abducted Flor, Sekkingstad, and Canadians John Ridsedl and Robert Hall from a resort on Samal Island off Davao City and took them to Sulu last September. Ridsdel and Hall were beheaded after the P300 million (Dh23 million) ransom demanded for each of them was not paid by ASG's deadline of April 27 and June 13, respectively. Hall was Flor's boyfriend.

29. Govt dismisses ransom-paying claims for release of kidnapped sailors

Jakarta Post, Marguerite Afra Sapiie, 2016 06 28

Jakarta - Coordinating Political, Legal and Security Affairs Minister Luhut Pandjaitan insists the government has never paid ransoms for the release of Indonesian sailors held hostage by Philippine groups. He was responding to lawmaker TB Hasanuddin, who claimed the government had paid ransoms demanded by the Abu Sayyaf militant group for the release of kidnapped Indonesian sailors, an alleged practice he claims to be the reason why kidnappings continue to occur. "If we had paid the ransoms, we would have to account for the money spent," Luhut asserted on Monday in Jakarta. Jakarta is in communications with Manila to coordinate efforts for the release of seven Indonesian sailors held hostage by Philippine groups in Sulu waters on June 20, Luhut said, adding that Defense Minister Ryamizard Ryacudu was in the Philippines to discuss the matter.

31. CIA and FBI desperately try to steal the show from Russian spies

Pravda, Alla Pustova, 2016 06 28

Moscow - American officials have come up with another way to spend tax-payers' money. Now they offer the White House an "efficient way to struggle against Russian spies." To achieve that, they suggest reviving a special body to "monitor Russian agents." The initiative in the spirit of the Cold War has taken form of a bill authorizing intelligence activities for 2017. The authors of the bill want to restore a work group appointed by the US president. According to the document, the group will work to unmask Russian spies and Russian-sponsored assassinations, investigate 'front' groups, media manipulation, covert broadcasting, and secret funding." Traditionally, the committee will also combat Russia's influence in the media. Pravda.Ru asked an expert opinion from a historian of special services, retired FSB Major-General, Valery Malevanny. "Intelligence is categorized into legal and illegal intelligence. The US National Council of Intelligence, which is headed by CIA Director General Brennan, actually gives specific commands to track Russia's illegal intelligence agents, who operate not only in the United States, but throughout Latin America," the official said.

32. Edward Snowden Criticizes 'Big Brother' Measure in Russia

New York Times, Ivan Nechepurenko, 2016 06 28

Moscow - Edward J. Snowden, an American who took refuge in Russia after leaking a trove of classified United States data from global surveillance, has criticized a proposed Russian law as an assault on freedom of speech, and has been rebuffed in an effort to collect a free-speech prize in Norway. Mr. Snowden, who was charged by the United States in 2013 with violating the Espionage Act, was invited to Norway by a writers' advocacy group to receive the prize, and sought guarantees in court that he would not be handed over to the American authorities. News agencies reported on Monday that a court in Oslo rejected his bid. His criticism of the Russian law came over the weekend, when he said on Twitter that it was "an unworkable, unjustifiable violation of rights that should never be signed." The law was passed by the lower house of Parliament on Friday; the speaker of the upper house, Valentina I. Matviyenko, signaled on Monday that her chamber would pass it as well. "Mass surveillance doesn't work," Mr. Snowden wrote. "This bill will take money and liberty without improving safety."

33. Russia is harassing U.S. diplomats all over Europe

Washington Post, Josh Rogin, 2016 06 27

Column - Russian intelligence and security services have been waging a campaign of harassment and intimidation against U.S. diplomats, embassy staff and their families in Moscow and several other European capitals that has rattled ambassadors and prompted Secretary of State John F. Kerry to ask Vladimir Putin to put a stop to it. At a recent meeting of U.S. ambassadors from Russia and Europe in Washington, U.S. ambassadors to several European countries complained that Russian intelligence officials were constantly perpetrating acts of harassment against their diplomatic staff that ranged from the weird to the downright scary. Some of the intimidation has been routine: following diplomats or their family members, showing up at their social events uninvited or paying reporters to write negative stories about them. But many of the recent acts of intimidation by Russian security services have crossed the line into apparent criminality. In a series of secret memos sent back to Washington, described to me by several current and former U.S. officials who have written or read them, diplomats reported that Russian intruders had broken into their homes late at night, only to rearrange the furniture or turn on all the lights and televisions, and then leave. One diplomat reported that an intruder had defecated on his living room carpet. In Moscow, where the harassment is most pervasive, diplomats reported slashed tires and regular harassment by traffic police. Former ambassador Michael McFaul was hounded by government- paid protesters, and intelligence personnel followed his children to school. The harassment is not new; in the first term of the Obama administration, Russian intelligence personnel broke into the house of the U.S. defense attache in Moscow and killed his dog, according to multiple former officials who read the intelligence reports.

Riyadh - The Secretary-General of the United Nations Ban Ki-moon called for the release of political prisoners, journalists and civil society activists in Yemen before Eid Al-Fitr. His comments came after he recently said that he was optimistic about the release of prisoners and detainees. This confirms the report that Asharq Al-Awsat published last week about the fact that the detainees who were recently released by the rebel militias in Yemen were in fact citizens who were arrested from their homes, on roads and at checkpoints, and that they have nothing to do with the legitimate forces and the fighting. The local sources from Taiz that informed Asharq Al-Awsat about this added that there are still many citizens who are languishing in the militias' prisons in various areas under their control. Talking about his meeting with the legitimate government and rebel delegations, Ban Ki- moon said that "The situation in Yemen is of profound concern".

"This crime is a new result of the terrorist, obscurantist thought that is spreading in the region like a plague and which has started to pose a major risk to its people," said Hizbullah in a statement. "It threatens Lebanon and its people without differentiation and regardless of sects and affiliations," the party warned. The bombings are also "the product of the clandestine and public support that is being offered by some countries and entities in the region and the world to these terrorist murderers in terms of arming, media assistance and political protection," Hizbullah added. These politicians "are conducting the biggest misinformation campaign to conceal the ugliness of this malicious thought," Hizbullah charged.

Le Hezbollah a condamné les opérations kamikazes de Qaa dans lesquelles il a vu « un nouveau produit de la pensée terroriste obscurantiste qui se répand, tel un fléau, dans la région et qui menace l'ensemble des Libanais, toutes appartenances régionales et communautaires confondues ». « Le crime de Qaa est aussi le résultat de l'appui direct ou secret apporté par certains États de la région et du monde à ces terroristes meurtriers, au niveau soit de l'armement et de l'équipement, soit de l'appui médiatique, moral et politique », a indiqué le Hezbollah dans un communiqué, dans lequel il a présenté ses condoléances aux familles des victimes. Le parti chiite a insisté sur « la nécessité de combattre le terrorisme, d'exposer ses plans et d'empêcher son expansion, contrairement à ce que certains hommes politiques entreprennent au Liban où ils pratiquent la plus grande opération de leurre afin de camoufler l'atrocité de ce courant terroriste rancunier, à travers des tribunes médiatiques qui leur sont assurées et des déclarations truffées d'arguments et d'excuses censés couvrir les horreurs commises par les terroristes ». 43. Affaire de Tarnac: Coupat et ses complices seront-ils jugés pour terrorisme?

Le Figaro, Journaliste maison, 2016 06 28

Paris - Les juges avaient retiré cette qualification pour les dégradations commises sur des lignes TGV en 2008 et ordonné un non-lieu. Le parquet de Paris a fait appel. Le feuilleton judiciaire dure depuis près de huit ans. D'ores et déjà renvoyés en procès pour des sabotages de lignes TGV en 2008, Julien Coupat et deux autres membres du groupe de Tarnac doivent-ils être jugés pour des faits à caractère terroriste? La cour d'appel de Paris répond mardi. Le «groupe de Tarnac», présenté comme proche de l'ultra-gauche, est soupçonné d'être à l'origine de dégradations de lignes SNCF sur des caténaires dans l'Oise, l'Yonne et la Seine-et-Marne. Dans un premier temps, les juges d'instruction chargés du dossier avaient renvoyé à l'été 2015 huit membres du groupe en procès. Parmi les prévenus, Julien Coupat, son ex-épouse Yildune Lévy et deux autres personnes devaient être rejugés pour «association de malfaiteurs». 44. Attentats : les experts accélèrent

Le Soir (Belgique), David Coppi, 2016 06 28

Bruxelles - Commission d'enquête Un rapport programme les débats sur les services de sécurité Après l'organisation des secours, les commissaires doivent s'interroger à propos de nos services de sécurité. Auditions des patrons de la police et de la Sûreté, puis des enquêteurs, enfin des responsables politiques... Deux mois après son installation, la commission d'enquête sur les attentats du 22 mars prend un nouveau départ. Ne nous emballons pas : elle se prépare à prendre un nouveau départ. Majorité et opposition en conviennent : ça traîne, ça cafouille, et les travaux qui avaient trait à l'organisation des services de secours, à Zaventem et à Maelbeek, laissent tout le monde dubitatif. Peut-être l'attente était-elle démesurée. On exagère toujours. En l'occurrence, ces premières semaines de débats ont permis de mettre en lumière certains dysfonctionnements dans la coordination des services de secours, ambulances et pompiers, arrivés sur les lieux des attentats un peu dans le désordre, parfois pour des raisons « communautaires » : la province du Brabant flamand (comprenant Zaventem) a snobé la Région bruxelloise. Un classique. Ajoutez l'embrouillamini - qui a dit quoi à qui ? - à propos de la non-fermeture du métro bruxellois entre les explosions à Zaventem et à Maelbeek, et le compte est bon : les commissaires vont rédiger une série de recommandations (le 4 juillet, pour une part) afin que tout cela se passe plus efficacement à l'avenir (en toute hypothèse), où il sera notamment question de réunifier les fonctions de coordination.

46. Terrorisme : la loi sur la sécurité dans les transports toujours pas appliquée

Le Point, Journaliste maison, 2016 06 28

Paris - Alors que le risque d'attentat est au plus haut, la loi amplifiant le champ d'action de la SNCF et de la RATP ne devrait être opérationnelle que fin septembre. Elle a été adoptée le 9 mars 2016 par le Parlement puis a été promulguée par le président de la République le 22 mars. Depuis, plus rien. Trois mois plus tard, la loi relative à la prévention et à la lutte contre les incivilités, contre les atteintes à la sécurité publique et contre les actes terroristes dans les transports collectifs de voyageurs n'a toujours pas été appliquée, rapporte RTL. Et ce, malgré les coups de semonce du gouvernement sur une menace terroriste qui n'a jamais été aussi importante. Ou, concernant les incivilités, alors qu'une étude de l'Observatoire national de la délinquance et des réponses pénales, publiée mardi, montre que 30 % des atteintes personnelles dans les lieux publics se passent dans les transports. Dans l'arsenal législatif dont s'est dotée la France pour lutter contre les attentats, le texte Savary - du nom de son rapporteur, le député PS de Gironde Gilles Savary - doit amplifier le champ d'action des services de transports. La SNCF et la RATP pourront en effet solliciter des enquêtes administratives concernant des recrutements sur des postes relatifs à la sécurité des personnes (conducteurs, aiguilleurs, sécurité des systèmes d'information). Objectif : s'assurer qu'elles ne sont pas fichées « S ».

1. CSIS joins Twitter, hilarity ensues

The Hill Times, 2016 07 20

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) started up a Twitter account last week, and had a little fun with people with its first tweet. "Yes, we're on Twitter. Now it's your turn to follow us," it told the Twittersverse. Social media users responded with good humour, generally.

Ian Adam asked CSIS through Twitter, "And if you follow back, should I be really, really nervous?" Things got a little more serious as writer and marketing consultant Karen Geier, under the handle Happy L'il Tree, wrote, "loving the completely chill attitude regarding your charter busting surveillance of citizens. GREAT COMEDY GUYS." CSIS also received a tweet from the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) Canada, which said, "Welcome to Twitter! Allow us to offer some neighbourly advice: 'password' is never a good password!" The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) became an early follower of CSIS on Twitter. When the CIA joined Twitter in 2014, it tweeted, "We can neither confirm nor deny that this is our first tweet." (Full report)

2. Electronic spy agency mum on foreign info-sharing that could lead to torture

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - Canada's electronic spy agency won't say how often it shares information that could lead to someone being tortured in an overseas prison. The Communications Security Establishment - which monitors threats from foreign terrorists and spies - has censored documents that spell out the figures, even though the RCMP and Canadian Security Intelligence Service have revealed such numbers in the past. The reticence prompted Amnesty International Canada to say "much greater transparency" is needed from the Ottawa-based CSE. "At stake is Canada's compliance with crucial international human rights obligations to prevent torture and ill-treatment," said Alex Neve, Amnesty's Canadian secretary general. The secretive CSE has been thrust into the national spotlight in recent years due to leaks by Edward Snowden, the former spy contractor who worked for the National Security Agency, CSE's American counterpart. It is also among a handful of Canadian agencies, including the RCMP, CSIS, the Canada Border Services Agency and National Defence, bound by a government instruction that allows it to share information with foreign partners - even when it means someone could be abused as a result of that exchange. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said earlier this year the Liberals will review the "troubling set of issues" raised by the foreign-sharing policy, enacted by the previous Conservative government. A four-page 2010 federal framework document says when there is a "substantial risk" that sending information to - or soliciting information from - a foreign agency would result in torture, the matter should be referred to the responsible deputy minister or agency head. Records obtained by The Canadian Press under the Access to Information Act offer a glimpse into how the CSE handled such cases in the first three months of 2015. The quarterly report to CSE Chief Greta Bossenmaier, labelled Top Secret and for Canadian Eyes Only, told her the number of cases that required a "mistreatment risk assessment" and the level of risk associated with passing the information to others. But those details were deleted from the publicly released version of the document. The report says there were "no known instances" of a recipient country's non-compliance with conditions attached to information-sharing during the three months. But little else was disclosed. The CSE faces "unique considerations" it must weigh when discussing details of assessments, said Christopher Williams, a senior spokesman for the intelligence agency. "With this in mind, we are not able to release the specific number you have requested without risking revealing insight into our capabilities." However, the number and content of such assessments are reviewed by the independent watchdog who keeps an eye on the CSE, said Williams.

3. Why France--again?

The Hill Times, Phil Gurski, 2016 07 20

Op-ed: The horror of what happened in Nice compounds the horror of what happened in Paris in January and November 2015. These large-scale attacks got a lot of attention, but there were also some smaller ones like the killing of a police officer and his wife and an attempt to blow up a gas plant that have to be added to the list of terrorist attacks in France. It seems that France is making the headlines for all the wrong reasons. It is natural, then, to ask why? Why does France seem to suffer more from terrorism than its immediate neighbours? Is there something unique about that country that spawns terrorism? Can France identify these elements in order to make adjustments and prevent future attacks? I have read dozens of op-ed pieces on news sites around the world that seek to answer these questions. A variety of people--political scientists, psychologists, sociologists and others--have provided both the analysis and prescription for the terrorist disease that plagues France in particular. Case solved. If only it were that easy. France has done a terrible job of integrating Muslims. Yes, integration is a two-way street and it is not all the state's fault, but there is a huge gap between different types of citizens. France could learn a lot about how we do things here in Canada. French prisons are breeding grounds for radicalization; this is a tough problem to solve, but something needs to be done about it. French Muslims are estimated to represent between 60-80 per cent of the prison population, widely disproportionate to their almost 8 per cent of the general population. Note: Phil Gurski worked for over 30 years as an intelligence analyst in Canada, including 15 at CSIS. He is the author of The Threat from Within: Recognizing Al Qaeda-inspired Radicalization and Terrorism in the West.

4. Canada to pledge up to $200 million to help Iraq

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - Canada will open its wallet to help Iraq's shattered economy when it co-hosts a major meeting in Washington on Wednesday to discuss the Middle East country's current and long-term needs. Officials from 24 nations are expected to attend the Iraq pledging conference, which aims to raise more than $2 billion for humanitarian aid in the country, as well as for de-mining efforts and long-term stability. Up to $200 million of that will come from Canada, the government announced on Tuesday. Bessma Momani, a Middle East expert at the University of Waterloo, said improving governance in Iraq and laying the foundation for economic growth is essential to address the root problems that led to the rise of ISIL. Such assistance is long overdue, she added. "Initially, this was viewed as simply a military operation," she said of the international community's fight against ISIL. "But you can't just cut out the cancer. We should have been investing in this years ago." Yet she also warned that progress will take a long time, and the prospects for Iraqi prosperity are not guaranteed. The U.S. and Canada are co-hosting the pledging event with Germany, Japan and the Netherlands, and the focus will be less on fighting the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant and more on starting Baghdad down the road to recovery.

5. Canada urged to aid vulnerable Yazidis

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 07 20

Toronto - Canada should resettle thousands of Yazidis and lead a referral of the Islamic State's genocide against the religious minority to the International Criminal Court (ICC), the opposition and Yazidi groups say. In emotional testimony to the House of Commons immigration committee on Tuesday, a Yazidi woman who survived the Islamic State attack on Iraq's Sinjar mountain in August, 2014, said the world has remained silent as her people suffer in what the United Nations has called genocide. Nadia Murad Basee Taha and fellow advocates asked Canada to create a special resettlement program for Yazidis, as Germany has. "I am very grateful to Germany, for example, who received some refugees and also who opened its borders for the Yazidis to flee," Ms. Taha said through an interpreter. She is one of 1,100 Yazidi women and girls who recently resettled in Germany. "I would like ... Canada to help with the immigration and with the asylum processes. Our people have been suffering for the past two years and they must be helped." Yazidis are a Kurdish minority group that practice an ancient faith. Because most of them have been unable to leave their home country of Iraq, the United Nations does not consider them refugees for resettlement in countries such as Canada. However, they face persecution by the Islamic State, which deems them "infidels," according to Ms. Taha. "They forced us to change our religion. They raped us. They sold us. ... And this continues today," she said, recollecting her village's capture by the Islamic State nearly two years ago.

6. Charette brings 'political acumen' to new U.K. post

Ottawa Citizen, Tom Spears, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - Janice Charette will become Canada's new high commissioner to Great Britain and Northern Ireland as part of a major shuffling of the ambassadors and high commissioners who are the face of Canada around the world. In all, 26 people are taking over top diplomatic posts, as the announcement from Foreign Minister Stéphane Dion says the government is aiming for more diversity and more women among its diplomats. The group includes 13 men and 13 women. Charette was Clerk of the Privy Council from 2014 until early this year. Choosing her puts an experienced bureaucrat with good political instincts in the U.K. during the biggest upheaval in British politics in a century, said Jean Daudelin of Carleton University's Norman Paterson School of International Affairs. "She had a successful career in the public service under the Liberals and under the Conservatives. She was assistant deputy minister and deputy minister under the Liberals, and she became Clerk of the Privy Council under Stephen Harper. So she was already a mandarin," he said. Add in her stints with Justice, Health Canada, and Citizenship and Immigration, and "she had an exceptionally broad experience in the public service. The fact that Harper chose her, when you consider how politicized his appointments were, was certainly a recognition that her knowledge and grasp of the function of bureaucracy was exceptional."

7. Death wish in Turkey

Ottawa Citizen, 2016 07 20

Editorial: Following the botched coup attempt in Turkey, there have been alarming cries from within the country for the reinstatement of the death penalty. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who's further seeking to consolidate his power - already his grip is tight - says if the people are baying for blood, who's he to deny them? Well, the European Union, at least, had strong words for the Turkish leader. Ankara has long campaigned for EU entry. The rules aren't up for interpretation. "No country can become an EU member state if it introduces the death penalty," Federica Mogherini, the EU's foreign policy chief, says. Erdogan's musings about the death penalty, which was abolished in 2004, are part of a wider crackdown after last week's brief uprising failed to dislodge the Turkish strongman. The numbers show an anti-democratic purge in full swing - a darkly ironic trend in the wake of a failed putsch. The New York Times reports that 6,000 military members, nearly 9,000 police, 30 governors and 3,000 judges have been given the boot. On Tuesday, the government purged 15,000 education staff, and ordered 1,500 university deans to quit their jobs. This all comes as Canada this week announced a new ambassador to Turkey and a new consul general to Istanbul. The new ambassador, Chris Cooter, is a career diplomat. While Turkey is by no means Canada's largest diplomatic priority, Cooter's experience will be needed more than ever. Elliot Tepper, a senior fellow at the Norman Paterson School of International Affairs at Carleton University, notes that Turkey's leadership has become "increasingly authoritarian."

8. Dion shuffles diplomatic ranks

Globe and Mail, Robert Fife, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion made a batch of diplomatic appointments on Tuesday, replacing several controversial Conservative appointees with experienced diplomats and naming two well-known Liberals to plum posts. The Liberal government shuffled the decks in the Middle East to remove inexperienced ambassadors named by former prime minister Stephen Harper and filled key posts in Pakistan, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Israel and Jordan with career diplomats. "It is a return to normal diplomacy in terms of appointments. People with decent credibility and to give real voice to the Foreign Ministry before we had the Harper government," said Ferry De Kerckhove, a former envoy to Indonesia and Egypt who knows many of the new ambassadors. The large diplomatic moves come in the midst of chaos in Europe and the Middle East, with the British vote to exit the European Union, Turkey in turmoil and a series of terrorist attacks. Canada's outspoken ambassador to Israel, Vivian Bercovici, was replaced by Deborah Lyons, a respected diplomat who was envoy to Afghanistan. Ms. Bercovici, named to the post by Mr. Harper in 2014, was widely viewed within Global Affairs Canada as someone who was unschooled in diplomacy and too ideologically connected to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud government.

9. Diplomatic dance

Ottawa Citizen, 2016 07 20

Editorial: One of Ottawa's most rumoured diplomatic appointments was finally confirmed Tuesday: Former Clerk of the Privy Council Janice Charette will be high commissioner to Great Britain and Northern Ireland, a plum posting many would argue she richly deserves. Charette's appointment was part of a major overhaul of the top foreign postings. Most of the new jobs will be filled by career public servants, some with long pedigrees. For example, Ian Burney, a seasoned trade negotiator (and son of Canada's former ambassador to the United States, Derek Burney), will become ambassador to Japan, as Canada looks to more trade agreements in Asia. The government also shunted out two controversial Harper-era appointees: Bruno Saccomani, a former RCMP officer who handled the prime minister's security detail prior to his placement in Jordan; and Vivian Bercovici, whose outspoken views made for a bumpy ride as top envoy to Israel. Senior public servants replace them.

10. Diplomatie canadienne Important remaniement, Cannon épargné

La Presse+, Hugo de Grandpré, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - Le gouvernement Trudeau a procédé à un remaniement de taille aux plus hauts échelons de la diplomatie canadienne, hier, remplaçant 26 ambassadeurs, hauts commissaires et consuls. Il en a profité pour déloger certains des choix les plus controversés du gouvernement Harper, dont Vivian Bercovici en Israël et Bruno Saccomani en Jordanie, et les remplacer par 13 femmes et 13 hommes, principalement issus de la fonction publique. L'ancien ministre conservateur Lawrence Cannon a quant à lui été épargné, et il devrait garder son poste à Paris jusqu'à la fin de son mandat, en mai 2017. Gros plan sur six de ces changements de visage pour le Canada à l'étranger.

11. Ex-Tory minister survives Liberals' diplomatic shuffle

Ottawa Citizen, Jason Fekete, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - The Liberal government is leaving a former Conservative cabinet minister in one of Canada's plum diplomatic postings - for now - and signalling it will do things differently in naming foreign envoys. Lawrence Cannon, Canada's ambassador to France and a former minister in Stephen Harper's government, was left untouched Tuesday in a sweeping round of diplomatic appointments that saw new ambassadors, high commissioners and consuls general named in more than two dozen postings. The list of new envoys included appointments to the United Kingdom, Japan, Jordan, Turkey and Israel, as the Liberals replaced Conservative-appointed ambassadors and put their own diplomatic stamp on foreign relations. Another important appointment looms in China, where Ambassador Guy Saint-Jacques' term expires in October. The process to replace him is underway. Cannon remains in his post at a sensitive time following the terrorist attack in Nice. A spokesman for Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, said Cannon likely will stay until his five-year appointment expires in May 2017. "Lawrence Cannon is still in the post because he, like everyone else that's currently serving for us, has all the confidence of the minister. He's serving until (May 2017), so that will be part of the next cycle," said Joseph Pickerill, director of communications for Dion.

12. Les cendres du Phénix

Le Droit, Jean Gagnon, 2016 07 20

Editorial - Chose rare en politique canadienne, le gouvernement fédéral s'est excusé lundi auprès de quelque 80000 fonctionnaires qui ont dû vivre, dans certains cas survivre, avec les défaillances de Phénix, le nouveau système de traitement de la paie de ses employés. Dès la mise en place de Phénix amorcé sous l'ancien gouvernement conservateur au coût de 300 millions $, la sonnette d'alarme était tirée par l'Alliance de la fonction publique du Canada (AFPC) qui craignait déjà, en juin 2013, qu'un manque de ressources humaines et une formation inadéquate des employés ne se traduisent par des retards dans le traitement des paies des fonctionnaires fédéraux. Malgré l'inquiétude syndicale, Ottawa martelait en mars dernier que la mise en service de la phase I de Phénix s'était déroulée avec succès, hormis quelques problèmes mineurs réglés rapidement.

13. Liberals replace Tory political appointments in major diplomatic shuffle

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - The Liberal government's new ambassador to Japan was lauded Tuesday by a former Conservative trade official as a good choice for helping Canadian exporters crack the world's third largest economy. Ian Burney was Canada's chief negotiator on its free trade agreement with South Korea, a deal which viewed as a breakthrough in Asia. The bilateral Canada- Japan free trade process is all but dead as Japan has turned its attention to the 12-country Pacific Rim pact known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership. But with the ratification of the TPP in doubt _ both U.S. presidential candidates are against it, and Canada is holding consultations well into the fall _ revitalizing a deal with Japan is now more crucial, said Adam Taylor, a senior aide to former Conservative trade minister Ed Fast. "If there's anybody who's shown they have the skill, patience and temperament and the familiarity with the issues to take a deal that looks like it's in the ditch and bring it back on track, it would be Ian Burney," Taylor said. "I'm a Tory, but if this is a sign where the trade folks will go in the new government, that's actually good for Canada." Burney has a distinguished diplomatic pedigree: his father, Derek, served as Canada's ambassador to the U.S. under Brian Mulroney and was the head of Stephen Harper's transition team when it won power in 2006.

14. Mideast appointments signal shift in Ottawa's approach to region

Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, 2016 07 20

Toronto - Tuesday's shakeup of Canadian diplomats will hardly register on the Richter scale but, in the Middle East, a couple of deft moves signal Canada is taking a much more hands-on approach to regional issues. Israel has been watching for evidence of a shift since Canada's Liberals won the October election. Within hours of being sworn in, Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion announced that Canada will strive for a more balanced policy in the Middle East, one that includes reaching out to "other legitimate partners in the region" besides Israel. He even described Canada's role as being that of an "honest broker" - no words make Israeli leaders shudder more than those two. Stephen Harper's government was very good to Israel and Benjamin Netanyahu's government knew it had a staunch supporter in Canadian Ambassador Vivian Bercovici. It also knew the next Canadian representative could not be so one-sided. But in Deborah Lyons, whose name as the ambassador-designate leaked two months ago, the Israelis are being mollified by the appointment of a fair-minded career diplomat of substantial seniority. Ms. Lyons, most recently, has been Canada's ambassador to Afghanistan, a posting that gives her credibility in conflict zones. But prior to that is where her résumé gets really interesting.

15. Phoenix flaw put PS personnel files at risk

Ottawa Citizen, Terry Pedwell and Aedan Helmer, 2016 07 20

Ottawa - The Public Service Alliance of Canada is renewing its call to scrap the government's Phoenix payroll system in light of newly released documents indicating that a flaw exposed the personal information of thousands of civil servants. "We knew this was going to be a disaster right from Day 1," PSAC executive vice-president Chris Aylward fumed Tuesday evening. "We knew this was going to be a Gong Show, and look where we are today," he said. "This is completely unacceptable. ... It's time to shut it down." Documents obtained by CBC News reportedly show officials were warned as early as Jan. 18 that the Phoenix system has a flaw that allows widespread access to employees' personnel records, including social insurance numbers. In an emailed statement to Postmedia, Public Service Minister Judy Foote's office confirmed government officials discovered the flaw early in the Phoenix rollout. "Shortly after the Phoenix system was launched, four departments reported that their managers were able to view the names and ID numbers of employees from across the federal government. As soon as this (was) discovered, a system fix was put in place to prevent this issue (from) reoccurring," according to government spokeswoman Annie Trepanier. "The department conducted a security review and assessed this incident as low risk." CBC reported as many as 70,000 public servants had access to the personal records of all 300,000 employees enrolled in the Phoenix system.

16. Phoenix pay system also breached federal workers' privacy

Ottawa - A dysfunctional compensation system that's withholding paycheques from federal workers has also been breaching their privacy, CBC News has learned. Newly released documents show senior officials were warned as early as Jan. 18 that the new Phoenix system has a flaw that allows widespread access to employees' personnel records, including social insurance numbers. Despite the warning, the faulty software was broadly implemented this spring -- without alerting the unions or any employees that their private details were no longer secure. The disclosure of a massive privacy breach appears in documents obtained by CBC News under the Access to Information Act, deepening a crisis that has already touched some 80,000 public servants and triggered a wave of hiring to patch the problems. The briefing material prepared by Public Services and Procurement Canada indicates that up to 70,000 public servants had access to the personal details of all 300,000 employees covered by the system. A spokeswoman for Canada's privacy commissioner confirmed the department "has reported this matter to our office and we have followed up with them." Valerie Lawton said she could provide no further details. The minister in charge, Judy Foote, said she learned only this week of the internal breach of private information. "I am aware of it, and I've been told that none of the information became public," she said in an interview.

17. U of T student interrogated in Bangladesh

Globe and Mail, Mahnoor Yawar, 2016 07 20

Toronto - Bangladeshi police have confirmed that a University of Toronto student is being interrogated, without clarifying his whereabouts or his condition, or saying whether he was being charged - escalating concerns over possible human-rights violations in his detention. Tahmid Hasib Khan, 22, and a fellow detainee, British citizen Hasnat Karim, 47, were among several hostages who survived a terrorist attack at a restaurant in Dhaka that left 23 people dead on July 1. They were then taken in by police for questioning. Family members have had no contact with Mr. Khan since July 3, aside from a phone call from an unknown agency confirming his detention. "We have to conduct the investigation through interrogation of witnesses, rescuers and others concerned. The puzzle cannot be solved without interrogation," the Dhaka Metropolitan Police commissioner said, according to a report in The Dhaka Tribune newspaper. Local outlets also reported that the commissioner evaded questions about the nature of the detention. The DMP's counter-terrorism and transnational crimes unit is said to be investigating. The commissioner's statement marks the first time law-enforcement authorities have acknowledged that Mr. Khan, a permanent resident of Canada, has been in custody since the attack. Last week, the deputy commissioner said everyone rescued had been "released."

18. A new jihadist threat may be on the horizon in Syria

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 07 20

Column - As the U.S.-led coalition has begun to gain ground against the Islamic State in Syria, officials have begun focusing attention on another jihadist group they fear may pose a more dangerous long-run threat there, the al-Qaeda affiliate known as Jabhat al-Nusra. Jabhat al-Nusra has played a clever waiting game over the past four years, embedding itself with more moderate opposition factions and championing Sunni resistance to Syrian President Bashar al-

Assad. The group has mostly avoided foreign terrorist operations and has largely escaped targeting by U.S. forces. Meanwhile, it has developed close links with rebel organizations such as Ahrar al-Sham that are backed by Turkey, Qatar and Saudi Arabia. But the global jihadist ambitions of Osama bin Laden remain part of Jabhat al-Nusra's DNA. U.S. officials report increasing evidence that the group is plotting external operations against Europe and the United States. Its operatives are said to have tried recently to infiltrate Syrian refugee communities in Europe. A stark warning of the danger ahead comes from the Institute for the Study of War, which closely follows events in Syria. In a forthcoming forecast, the institute argues that by January 2017, "Jabhat al-Nusra will have created an Islamic emirate in northwestern Syria in all but name" and will merge with the supposedly more moderate Ahrar al-Sham.

19. Evidence On Coup Plot Sent To U.S.

Wall Street Journal, Carol E. Lee, 2016 07 20

Washington - The Obama administration's receipt on Tuesday of a cache of documents as part of Ankara's demand for the extradition of a U.S.-based cleric formally kick-starts a delicate process, with implications for the U.S.-led fight against Islamic State and relations between the allies. Turkish officials said the material, sent by email, contains evidence that would prove Muslim cleric Fethullah Gulen, who has lived in Pennsylvania for nearly two decades, was behind the attempted coup. Ibrahim Kalin, a spokesman for Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, told reporters that government evidence shows that "a clique" of Mr. Gulen's followers serving in the Turkish army carried out the failed coup. The White House said the Justice Department had begun to review the documents as part of a process that ultimately would require U.S. federal court action for approval of an extradition, while distancing President Barack Obama from the final decision. Mr. Obama spoke by phone Tuesday with Mr. Erdogan, discussing both the accusations against Mr. Gulen and growing U.S. concerns about Turkey's widening crackdown in response to the attempted coup, White House press secretary Josh Earnest said. Mr. Obama offered U.S. assistance in Turkey's probe into the coup, Mr. Earnest said.

20. Experts Skeptical of Brazil Group's ISIS Pledge Before Olympics

ABC News, James Gordon Meek, Lee Ferran, 2016 07 20

New York - Experts are questioning a recent pledge of allegiance to ISIS by a purported group of extremists in Brazil in what may be an attempt to rattle the international community before the Rio Olympics. A group calling itself Ansar al-Khilafah Brazil on Sunday pledged its loyalty to ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi on the messaging app Telegram and promised to "wage jihad against the enemy of Allah." The group also posted ISIS propaganda translated into Portuguese. But J.M. Berger, a terrorism expert who closely follows ISIS' online activity, said he doubts Ansar al-Khilafah Brazil actually exists. "The Ansar al-Khilafah Brazil Telegram channel appears to be the work of an ISIS social media activist rather than reflecting any bricks-and-mortar initiative," said Berger, a co-author of "ISIS: State of Terror." John Horgan, an ISIS expert who teaches at Georgia State University, said he didn't know if the group was real, but he called ISIS supporters "masters of exploiting opportunity," such as security concerns over the Olympics. A U.S. counterterrorism official told ABC News, however, that while ISIS isn't known to have any cells in Rio de Janeiro, "we should take every threat like this seriously."

21. NATO Muscles Up to Fight ISIS (Canada)

Wall Street Journal, NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg, 2016 07 20

Op-ed - From the horror of 9/11 to the mass shooting in Orlando, the U.S. has become grimly familiar with the pain of terrorist attacks. It is a pain shared by the people of Nice, Brussels, Istanbul and many other cities. By the millions who have fled Islamic State and the war in Syria and the millions more who are still there. America, you are not alone in this fight. Your friends and allies stand with you. And so does NATO. That is why I will join coalition defense ministers in Washington, D.C., this week as they intensify the fight against ISIS. The global coalition to counter ISIS, led by the U.S. and including every NATO ally, is making good progress. But the job is far from complete. It needs all the support it can get, and NATO is stepping up to help. Last week, NATO leaders met in Poland and agreed on three immediate steps to project stability in North Africa and the Middle East. First, NATO's advanced Awacs surveillance aircraft will provide valuable information directly to coalition forces. Second, the alliance is launching Operation Sea Guardian, a new maritime security operation in the Mediterranean, to include counterterrorism and intelligence-sharing. It can also work with the navies and coast guards of the region to strengthen their ability to fight terrorism. Third, NATO is stepping up support for its partners in the Middle East and North Africa and helping them to better secure their own countries and push back against violent extremism. Through NATO's long experience in the Balkans and in Afghanistan, the alliance has learned that an essential ingredient for long-term stability is the strength of local forces and institutions. In response to a more assertive Russia, NATO has implemented the biggest increase in its collective defense since the Cold War. After years of falling budgets, defense spending by European NATO allies and Canada rose last year. And it will rise again this year.

22. Turkish minister pressures U.S. to extradite Gulen

Washington Post, Souad Mekhennet, Thomas Gibbons-Neff, 2016 07 20

Interview - Washington Post correspondents Souad Mekhennet and Thomas Gibbons-Neff interviewed Turkey's Minister of Foreign Affairs Mevlut Cavusoglu on Tuesday at his offices in Ankara. The 30-minute interview was conducted in English. Cavusoglu spoke forcefully about Fethullah Gulen, an opponent of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and a U.S. resident who the Turkish government believes was behind the coup attempt. And the minister made it clear that Turkey - a key U.S. ally in the fight against the Islamic State, also known as ISIS and ISIL - expects Gulen's extradition. White House press secretary Josh Earnest said the Justice and State departments will review material Turkey has presented. Following is a condensed version of the interview: WP: Is the country secure? Mevlut Cavusoglu: It was a coup attempt we have faced on the 15th of July, and everything is under control right now, but I cannot say that the threat is 100 percent away. Therefore, we are taking some measures, investigations continue and legal actions are also taken against this group. WP: Some people in the United States and Europe raised concerns that now, after the coup, the Turkish government has used this as an excuse to get rid of any critical people. MC: It is us who faced this coup attempt, not the United States or the European Union. We have been trying to explain how dangerous this Gulen terrorist organization is. Some of [our] colleagues couldn't understand and believe it, and some of them didn't want to understand. As I explained to [Secretary of State] John Kerry last night on the phone, this is a matter of national security to us. You saw how they randomly killed people with helicopters, jets, cannons - they bombed the Turkish parliament. In our history we had very bloody coups and we suffered a lot; we have lost young generations. But none of these coups have ever targeted the Turkish parliament.

23. GCHQ and Leamington charity aim to inspire girls to take up a career in cyber security

The Courier (Leamington Spa), Staff report, 2016 07 20

Leamington Spa - National security experts at GCHQ are working with a Leamington charity to offer a free cyber security course for teenage girls this summer. The Smallpeice Trust is running the CyberFirst Futures residential course with GCHQ at Birmingham University from August 1 to 4, during which participants will gain an insight into the next generation of cyber security tools. The course will also test their skills in dealing with modern and advanced cyber defence scenarios. Open to 16 and 17-year-old girls, those taking part in the four-day course will work closely with experts from GCHQ, the Smallpeice Trust and academia, gaining an insight into the importance of cyber security and getting first-hand experience of defending against a cyber-attack. Chris Ensor from GCHQ said: "We want to develop a diverse, continuous flow of people with the right skills and knowledge to help protect the UK against future cyber-attacks.

24. Unapologetic Foreign Secretary Meets the Press

New York Times, Gardiner Harris, 2016 07 20

London - In his first news conference as British foreign secretary, Boris Johnson stood beside Secretary of State John Kerry on Tuesday and said he would not apologize for his past insults of President Obama and Hillary Clinton. "I'm afraid that there is such a rich thesaurus now of things that I have said that are being one way or another, through what alchemy I do not know, somehow misconstrued that it would really take me too long to engage in a full, global itinerary of apology to all concerned," Mr. Johnson said. "And I think most people who read these things in their proper context can see exactly what was intended," he continued. "And indeed, I find that virtually everybody I've met so far in this job understands that very well, particularly on the international scene." Mr. Johnson recently described Mr. Obama as "part-Kenyan" with an "ancestral dislike of the British Empire." In 2007, he likened Mrs. Clinton to Lady Macbeth and wrote that she has "got dyed blond hair and pouty lips, and a steely blue stare, like a sadistic nurse in a mental hospital." But on Tuesday, Mr. Johnson -- who was born in New York City, spent part of his childhood in Brussels, and speaks French and Russian -- said Britain would become even more outwardly focused under its new government. "I want us to reshape Britain's profile as an even greater global nation," said Mr. Johnson, who wrote a book on Winston Churchill. "A Britain that is more active, more outward facing, more energetic on the world stage than ever before."

25. Biden, Turnbull agree on closer military ties

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 07 20

Sydney - Amid growing concerns about Beijing's assertiveness in the South China Sea, Malcolm Turnbull and US Vice-President Joe Biden have pledged to step up joint military training to deal with "any challenge" in the region. Australia has also agreed to broaden its training commitment in Iraq, to instruct law enforcement officers in counter-terrorism techniques to help them retain areas recaptured from Islamic State and keep order there. Mr Biden said there would be a greater unity between US and Australian forces, stressing "it's important that we stand together". "We also discussed steps Australia and the US are taking so our troops can train more together and increase our interoperability so that we are fully prepared to respond to any challenge -- to any challenge -- in the Pacific with a united front," Mr Biden said after talks with Mr Turnbull in Sydney. The Vice-President used his Australian visit, which concludes today with a speech hosted by Sydney University and the Lowy Institute, to reaffirm the US was a "Pacific power" and in the region to stay. Mr Biden said the US and Australia urged China and The Philippines to abide by the Permanent Court of Arbitration's ruling on the South China Sea.

26. Dhaka cafe siege: Bangladesh investigates possible Australian link to terror attack (Canada)

ABC (Australia), James C. Bennett, 2016 07 20

Dhaka - Bangladesh authorities investigating this month's deadly terror attack at a Dhaka cafe are now exploring potential foreign links, including one man who had been living in Australia. The whereabouts of the man, named as Abu Terek Mohammad Tajuddin Kausar, are now unknown, but the acknowledgement of possible foreign involvement marks a major development in Bangladesh, which had consistently rejected Islamic State's claim of responsibility. Bangladesh authorities said they were tracking Mr Tajuddin, who is originally from Lakshmipur, south of Dhaka, and has spent time living in Australia, but said they were currently unsure of his whereabouts. The Australian Federal Police were contacted regarding Mr Tajuddin but a spokesperson said the AFP would not comment on intelligence matters. Bangladesh authorities are examining a list of potential militants which also includes suspected IS recruiters. Twenty-two people, 18 of them foreign nationals, in Dhaka's upmarket Gulshan district on July 1 -- a major escalation in Bangladesh's Islamist violence. Until recent days Bangladeshi authorities had blamed homegrown groups for the attack. Bangladeshi security consultant Shahab Enam Khan said there was now little doubt that means IS was involved. "We are now discovering, and there is now credible evidence that people from here had linkages with ISIS," he said. "This is significant for sure, because the government actually ruled out the possibility of ISIS for some time. But now that there is new evidence ... these particular linkages between the missing boys and the connection with Syria, well there is a possibility of some sort of linkages between the homegrown terrorists as well as with ISIS." Mr Khan said alongside Mr Tajuddin, Bangladesh was also searching for two others who had spent time in Western countries. "One from Canada, and the other one studied in Japan, so you now can see that there is a growing trend and a credible trend that is coming up -- that we have a strong transnational linkage," he said.

27. Terrorists have rights: Lindt cop

The Australian, Ean Higgins, 2016 07 20

Sydney - The police commander who held off ordering tactical officers to storm the Lindt cafe until after hostage Tori Johnson was killed has told an inquest gunman Man Haron Monis "had the same rights as anyone else", prompting the victim's mother to charge out of the courtroom, calling the officer "an absolute disgrace". Johnson's mother Rosie Connellan and father Ken Johnson made their dramatic departure moments after the commander also described the siege as "high-stakes games" and declined an opportunity to apologise for using the term. The detective chief superintendent's testimony triggered a legal debate about the authority of police to use lethal force against terror suspects in emergency situations. The Lindt siege, in which Johnson and barrister Katrina Dawson were killed, was Australia's biggest domestic terror incident since the rise of Islamic State. Towards the end of the afternoon session yesterday, the police officer, whose name has been suppressed by state coroner Michael Barnes, was being cross-examined by the barrister for the Johnson family, Gabrielle Bashir SC. Ms Bashir was questioning the officer on one of the key issues at the inquest -- why as forward commander he did not order the storming of the cafe after Monis fired a shot in the direction of escaping hostages, in what he - accepted from the start was an ongoing act of terrorism inspired by Islamic State.

29. US declines to speculate on coup threats

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 07 20

Washington - The White House has said that it would not like to speculate if Pakistan was next after Turkey to have a military coup and reiterated its desire to continue a productive relationship with the country. The possibility of a military coup in Pakistan was explored at a Washington think-tank this week and it resurfaced at the White House news briefing on Monday afternoon when an Indian journalist referred to this debate and asked if Pakistan was next. "Well, I'm certainly not going to speculate about the political situation in another country. Obviously the United States has an important relationship with Pakistan," said White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest. He said Pakistan and the US did "not agree on everything," but they effectively coordinated on a variety of national security issues that were important to fighting extremists and protecting the citizens in both countries.

31. Kenya security accused of murder and abduction: report

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 07 20

Nairobi - Security agencies are killing and abducting men in north-east Kenya who they suspect of links to Islamist extremists, a rights group said Wednesday. Human Rights Watch (HRW) documented 34 "enforced disappearances" and 11 suspected "extrajudicial killings" over two years in Garissa, Mandera and Wajir counties as part of counterterrorism operations in Kenya's predominately ethnic Somali north-east. "People in northeastern Kenya deserve protection from Al-Shabaab attacks, not further abuse from the authorities," said HRW executive director Ken Roth, adding the cases documented were "just the tip of the iceberg." The report details people taken from their homes by masked, armed men who did not identify themselves, or beaten in the streets, before being driven away in government vehicles. Some of the disappeared were last seen in police or military custody. None has been charged with any crime, nor are their families able to trace them.

33. Brazil probes Olympics threats after group backs Islamic State

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 07 20

Brasilia - Brazil's intelligence agency said on Tuesday it was investigating all threats to next month's Rio Olympics after a presumed Brazilian Islamist group pledged allegiance to Islamic State (IS) less than three weeks before the Games. The SITE Intelligence Group that monitors the internet reported that a group calling itself "Ansar al-Khilafah Brazil" said on the Telegram messaging app on Sunday that it followed IS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi and had promoted IS propaganda in Arabic, English and Portuguese. Brazilian authorities stepped up security measures following the truck massacre in Nice last week, planning security cordons, further roadblocks and the frisking of visitors in Rio de Janeiro for the Olympics. Police and soldiers took part over the weekend in drills near sports facilities and along transport routes. "All threats related to the Rio 2016 Games are being meticulously investigated, particularly those related to terrorism," the Brazilian intelligence agency ABIN said in a statement when asked to comment on the previously unknown group's claim of support for Islamic State. "Many are dismissed and those that deserve attention are investigated exhaustively," ABIN said. An agency spokeswoman declined to comment on whether the posting by the group presented a credible threat.

34. WhatsApp Is Briefly Shut Down in Brazil for a Third Time

New York Times, Vinod Sreeharsha, 2016 07 20

Rio de Janeiro - For months, authorities in Brazil have sought access to digital data from WhatsApp to aid in criminal investigations. WhatsApp has repeatedly resisted the requests. On Tuesday, the same clash erupted again, for the third time in less than a year. A Brazilian judge in a state criminal court in Duque de Caxias, in Rio de Janeiro, ordered a nationwide shutdown of WhatsApp after the popular messaging service, which is owned by Facebook, did not turn over user data requested by authorities as part of a criminal investigation. A few hours later, Brazil's Supreme Court overturned the order. Despite the brevity of the episode, the case is part of a broader debate worldwide about when law enforcement officials and governments should have access to the digital data kept by tech companies. Many of the companies, like Apple and Microsoft, have said they are unwilling to turn over such data to authorities because doing so would infringe on the privacy rights of their customers. But authorities have argued that they need the data for security reasons. In Brazil, WhatsApp faced two previous shutdowns -- one last December, and another in May -- for not turning over digital information. Both of those bans were also quickly overturned on appeal by higher court judges. In March, a Facebook executive was briefly taken into custody for refusing to comply with similar orders to turn over information from WhatsApp. In the court ruling on Tuesday that ordered WhatsApp to be shut down, Judge Daniela Barbosa Assumpção de Souza said in a court statement that WhatsApp "cannot be offered to more than 100 million Brazilians without complying with the laws of the country, while failing to comply with judicial orders and obstructing criminal investigations."

35. Bangladesh café attack: Investigators identify new suspects in CCTV footage

Reuters, 2016 07 20

Dhaka - Bangladeshi investigators poring over CCTV footage believe they have spotted four new suspects, including a woman, involved in a bloody attack on a cafe+ in the capital, Dhaka, this month, a senior security official said on Tuesday. Twenty-two people were killed in the attack, most of them foreigners, after five young Bangladeshi men stormed into the restaurant in an upscale part of the capital in an assault claimed by Islamic State. The five men were all killed hours later when security forces battled their way into the cafe to end the siege. Authorities have detained at least two people+ for questioning in connection with the attack and an official from the elite, police-run Rapid Action Battalion (RAB) said accomplices of the attackers might have been detected. In the video, the suspects were seen walking on the pavement and road and a "suspicious" car was also seen on the road.

36. Bangladesh in Urgent Hunt to Root Out Recruiters for Islamic State (Canada)

New York Times, Ellen Barry, Maher Sattar, 2016 07 20

New Delhi - Bangladesh, reeling from a sudden intensification of terrorism this summer, has begun an urgent search for men suspected of building an Islamic State presence in the country and recruiting young Bangladeshis to fight in Syria and Iraq. Bangladesh's government has maintained that the escalating attacks there were the work of domestic terrorists supported by domestic patrons, and it has dismissed claims of responsibility from groups like the Islamic State and Al Qaeda. But a list of 10 high-value suspects that was released this month, after the harrowing siege of a restaurant in Dhaka, tells another story. The list includes three Bangladeshi expatriates -- longtime residents of Canada, Australia and Japan -- who have long been sought by the police and suspected of setting up training and recruitment pipelines for the Islamic State. A fourth man on the list vanished last year after telling his brother he planned to fight for the Islamic State in Iraq, the police said. The most talked-about of the suspects, Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury, is believed by some analysts to act as a coordinator of the Islamic State's activities in Bangladesh and parts of northeast India. No suspects have been arrested because some operated in countries with stronger legal protections, the police said, and others have disappeared.

37. Beijing policies driving Chinese Muslims to IS: study

Agence France-Presse, Staff reporter, 2016 07 20

Beijing - Tough religious restrictions on Muslim minorities in China's far west may have driven more than 100 to join the Islamic State group, a US think tank said Wednesday. Beijing has long claimed that IS is recruiting Uighurs from the mainly Muslim region of Xinjiang, and blamed outside forces for fomenting deadly acts of violence there and elsewhere in China that have claimed hundreds of lives. At the same time, authorities have banned or strictly controlled the observance of certain Muslim practices, such as growing beards and fasting during Ramadan, saying they are symbols of "Islamic extremism". Those policies "could be a push factor driving people to leave the country and look elsewhere for a sense of 'belonging'", the Washington, DC-based New America Foundation wrote in a study of leaked registration documents for IS fighters. The findings were based on data from more than 3,500 foreign recruits provided by a defector from the jihadist organisation. Of those, 114 came from Xinjiang, the study says, making it the fifth highest contributor of fighters among the provinces and regions named in the data -- after three areas in Saudi Arabia and one in Tunisia. Overall, recruits were more likely to come from "regions with restive histories and tense local-federal relationships", the report said.

38. Gov't condemns N. Korea's resumption of encrypted number broadcasting

Seoul - South Korea's government on Wednesday condemned North Korea's resumption of encrypted number broadcasting, a method used in the past to send orders to its spies operating in the country. The Ministry of Unification expressed "deep regret" over the North's latest provocation. Pyongyang on Friday resumed the broadcasting after a 16-year-long hiatus following Seoul's decision a week earlier to deploy an advanced U.S. antimissile system in South Korea by the end of 2017. "We can't speak conclusively about North Korea's hidden intentions behind the broadcasting. But we urge North Korea desist from such outdated practices and seek ways to promote inter-Korean ties," Unification Ministry spokesman Jeong Joon-hee said in a press briefing. The radio broadcast, which seemed to be a book cipher, lasted for 12 minutes, and began at 00:45 a.m. on Friday with a female announcer saying, "Starting now, I will give an assignment to exploration agent No. 27." The announcer then said, "On page 459, number 35, on page 913, number 55, on page 135, number 86, on page 257, number 2," followed by more numbers.

New Delhi - ISIS operatives in India had approached Naxalite groups to understand their modus operandi for perpetrating terror and were also planning to buy firearms from them, NIA has said, revealing the sinister plans of the international terrorist outfit. This has been mentioned in the supplementary chargesheet filed by the anti-terror probe agency in a special court here against 16 people, including the absconding main recruiter of ISIS+ in India Shafi Armar, for allegedly indulging in terror-related activities in the country. The NIA has slapped Armar and 15 others+ with charges under various sections of Indian Penal Code, Unlawful (Activities) Prevention Act and Explosive Substances Act. The chargesheet against Armar was filed in a Mumbai court on Monday in a different case related to ISIS. The NIA had registered a case against ISIS on December 9, 2015. 41. S. Korea's top brass convenes emergency meeting on N.K. provocations

Seoul - South Korea's military on Wednesday held an emergency meeting of top commanders from all service branches to discuss ways to better deal with North Korea's relentless military provocations, including the latest missile launch, officials said. In the video conference call held at Seoul's Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), top commanders from the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps said they are expecting additional military provocations from the North ahead of the Ulchi-Freedom Guardian (UFG) joint military drills set for August. Seoul and Washington hold the UFG drills annually and use the event to examine the forces' ability to secure security on the Korean Peninsula and maintain joint defense capacities. "North Korea may conduct its fifth nuclear test, and test-fire submarine-launched ballistic missiles and ballistic missiles launched from the ground, taking issue with the annual joint exercise between the two allies," the JCS said in a statement. It said as the South Korean military also expects various forms of provocative acts from the North in the areas near the border that divides the two Koreas, commanders discussed countermeasures and agreed to beef up surveillance and preparations against any military threats from the North.

He is also suspected of seeking similar support from the North Korean Embassy in China in October 2013, although the embassy turned him down, prosecutors said. The death of Santoso, the leader of the East Indonesia Mujahidin (MIT) terrorist group, will change the course of counterterrorism efforts in the country because of the inclusion of the Indonesian Military (TNI) in the country's counterterrorism operations. Initial information on the death of Santoso, aka Abu Wardah, was released to the public on Monday evening after a firefight involving Santoso's group and personnel of Operation Tinombala at Tambarana village in Poso, which ended with two terrorists being shot dead. One of them resembled Santoso. The National Police eventually confirmed on Tuesday that Santoso was one of the two who were shot dead during the firefight. London Times, Tom Parfitt, 2016 07 20

London - Russia's Federal Security Service has detained officials at the powerful Investigative Committee for alleged links to the mafia godfather Shakro the Young. The security service said that it had arrested Major General Denis Nikandrov, deputy head the Moscow directorate, along with Mikhail Maksimenko, head of the committee's internal security division, and Mr Maksimenko's deputy, Alexander Lamonov. Service sources said that General Nikandrov was suspected of promising to free Shakro, whose real name is Zakhary Kalashov, for $1 million. Officers were searching the suspects' homes and places of work. A lawyer for Mr Lamonov said that the detained had men denied doing anything wrong. There was speculation that the detentions could be part of one of the frequent carve-ups between factions of the siloviki -- clans in the military, security services and police vying for power in the Kremlin. 45. One Russian Security Agency Raids Another, in Rare Sign of Dysfunction

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 07 20

Moscow - Russia's main domestic intelligence service raided the Moscow headquarters of an investigative agency on Tuesday, in a rare sign of dysfunction in the country's domestic security services. The raid, recalling the rivalries and infighting of the immediate post-Soviet period, played out on a main street in the capital, New Arbat, and ended with arrests of three senior prosecutors. Agents of the Federal Security Service, or F.S.B., the main successor to the Soviet K.G.B., searched the offices of the Investigative Committee, the powerful branch of the prosecutor's office that deals with politically hued crimes. The raid was all the more baffling because the two agencies are generally viewed as operating in lock step to repress political dissent, crack down on organized crime and pursue other high-profile cases in the capital. The Investigative Committee's Moscow office, for example, pursued cases against the protest punk band Pussy Riot and the opposition leader Aleksei A. Navalny.

47. Ukraine fighting threatens to reignite full-scale conflict
Financial Times, Roman Olearchyk, 2016 07 19

Kiev - Ukraine's top military commander promised an "adequate response" after seven Ukrainian soldiers were killed and 14 injured in the past 24 hours in fighting with Russian-backed separatists controlling the country's breakaway far east. The battles mark one of the bloodiest days of fighting this year, as an uptick in the daily shelling and gunfire threatens to reignite full-scale fighting in a smouldering 26-month conflict that has claimed nearly 10,000 lives. The heightened hostilities are also a stark reminder that while last year's internationally brokered peace accord succeeded in reducing the fighting from peak 2014 levels, the so-called Minsk agreements have failed to deliver a lasting ceasefire or progress on reintegrating the war-torn east with the rest of Ukraine. these youths have adopted the takfiri ideology, which brands those who do not agree with it as infidels. "They have expressed their desire to contribute toward realizing the Islamic khilafat and to support weak Muslim communities," Al-Moshaweh said. Speaking to Makkah Arabic daily, Al-Moshaweh said many militants joined the terrorist group in order to find out the truth or just to experience the thrill of fighting. "They did not listen to anti-terrorism awareness programs and media campaigns," he pointed out. Al-Moshaweh said terrorist groups have found it easy to recruit young Saudis who subscribe to extremist views and believe in violence through their social networking websites.

52. Europe eyes Israeli technology for spotting lone-wolf terrorists online

Reuters, 2016 07 20

Tel Aviv - European powers are trying to develop better means for pre-emptively spotting "lone-wolf" militants from their online activities and are looking to Israeli-developed technologies, a senior EU security official said on Tuesday. Last week's truck rampage in France and Monday's axe attack aboard a train in Germany have raised European concern about self-radicalized assailants who have little or no communications with militant groups that could be intercepted by spy agencies. "How do you capture some signs of someone who has no contact with any organization, is just inspired and started expressing some kind of allegiance? I don't know. It's a challenge," EU Counter-Terrorism Coordinator Gilles de Kerchove told Reuters on the sidelines of an intelligence conference in Tel Aviv. Internet companies asked to monitor their own platforms' content for material that might flag militants had begged off, De Kerchove said.

53. Netanyahu vows to respond with 'iron fist' if attacked

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 07 20

Beirut - Premier Benjamin Netanyahu said Tuesday that Israel would respond with an "iron fist" if attacked, in a speech marking 10 years since a devastating conflict with Hezbollah in Lebanon. Netanyahu described the war as "a clash between an extremist terror organization with an Islamist ideology and a free democratic Israel." "We are in a global battle. We are aware of the nature of the threats we face, and are preparing for any scenario," he said at a ceremony at the Mount Herzl military cemetery. "If the quiet is kept, those facing us will enjoy quiet. But if the need arises, we will respond to aggression - and the response will be powerful. Whoever thinks they will find 'spider webs' here will get an iron fist." The 2006 conflict erupted when Israel retaliated for a cross-border raid in which Hezbollah captured two Israeli soldiers and killed three, and quickly spiraled into a fully fledged war. Hezbollah fired thousands of rockets into northern Israel, which carried out strikes across Lebanon.

54. Saudi Arabia Detains Turkish Military Attaché to Kuwait

Asharq Al-Awsat, Abdul Hadi Habtoor, 2016 07 20

Riyadh - Turkey's military attaché in Kuwait was recently arrested at the King Fahd International Airport in Saudi Arabia on his way to Europe. The attaché, identified as Mikail Gullu, was arrested at an airport in the Saudi city of Dammam as he attempted to board a flight to Germany, reports said. Turkish sources confirmed that Gullu had been successfully turned in to authorities in Turkey, however, no further details were given on his arrival to Ankara, Turkey's capital. The same sources said that Gullu was promised a high-post as a reward should the plotted coup in Turkey prove successful. They added that he was going to be assigned head to the military industrial sector as an incentive for the part he played in the coup. "He was stopped based on a Turkish request and was detained during his attempt to flee over his likely links to the coup in Turkey," sources added. Ankara put the military diplomat on the wanted list for involvement in the organization of a military coup.

55. US-led strikes 'kill 56 civilians' in Syria

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 07 20

Beirut - At least 56 civilians, including children, were killed in strikes by a US-led coalition on Tuesday near a Syrian village held by ISIL, an opposition monitor said. The civilians had apparently been mistaken for the extremists and were bombed while fleeing fighting in Aleppo province, according to the Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights. "There are at least 56 dead, including 11 children, and dozens more wounded, including some in critical condition," said Observatory director Rami Abdel Rahman. The monitor says it determines what planes carried out raids according to their type, location, flight patterns and the munitions involved. Asked about the strike near Al Tukhar, the US-led coalition against ISIL said it had "conducted air strikes near Manbij ... recently" and that it was looking into the reports alleging civilian casualties. Al Tukhar lies 14 kilometres north of the town of Manbij, a key ISIL stronghold that has been repeatedly targeted in raids by the US-led coalition.

56. " Il y a un terrain favorable à la formation des intentions meurtrières "

Le Monde, Guillaume Poingt, 2016 07 20

Grenoble - Le passage à l'acte d'un individu n'est possible que parce qu'il est sensible au message déployé par les organisations terroristes Sebastian Roché, directeur de recherche au CNRS (Pacte/Sciences Po Grenoble/université Grenoble Alpes), a réalisé une vaste étude sur les rapports entre des collégiens et les institutions publiques. Que désigne la préradicalisation et pourquoi vous y être intéressé? La préradicalisation précède l'intention de passer à l'acte. La radicalisation est la phase qui suit et se traduit par un passage à l'acte, ce qui suppose de la logistique et des complices, ce dont mon étude ne traite pas. La grande question est de savoir si les itinéraires des jeunes qui passent à l'acte sont des itinéraires individuels. Je voulais prendre le contre-pied de la théorie du " loup solitaire " et savoir s'il y a quelque chose dans la société qui prépare les jeunes à accepter un message radical.

57. « Encore trop de blocages dans le renseignement international »

La Dépêche du Midi (Toulouse), Jean-Pierre Bédéï, 2016 07 20

Damas - Quels sont les ressorts qui ont permis à Daech de devenir une puissance terroriste ? Daech a prospéré en Irak et en Syrie sur la déstabilisation des États. Ce qui lui permet de se proclamer « un proto-état ». Il occupe aujourd'hui un espace Irak-Syrie, et il a une capacité à faire une propagande efficace sur des esprits fragiles en utilisant tous les moyens techniques de communication. On a même affaire à une propagande professionnalisée à travers le Net. Nous avons pu mesurer que Daech connaît parfaitement les ressorts qui guident les démocraties, comment celles-ci peuvent être affaiblies par une violence aveugle. Son but n'est pas de gagner en Syrie, mais de mettre à feu et à sang les démocraties et de casser le vivre-ensemble français par exemple. Malheureusement, après la barbarie de Nice, j'ai entendu des discours très violents de la part de la foule. Quant à certains responsables politiques, ils ont été en dessous de tout car en refusant l'unité nationale, ils sont tombés dans le piège que leur tend Daech. Comment fonctionne la propagande de Daech ? Daech dispose d'un journal que l'on peut consulter sur le Net, traduit en onze langues. La propagande s'appuie sur sept branches médiatiques spécialisées dans la production de contenus visuels, écrits, ou audios. Daech est capable d'adapter son discours sur le fond comme sur la forme au public qu'il vise : à chaque âge, à chaque sexe, à chaque aire géographique correspondent des messages différenciés avec la perspective d'un monde meilleur, idéalisé. Pourquoi la France est-elle devenue la cible privilégiée de Daech ? Parce que la France a un rôle à jouer. Parce que c'est une nation singulière. Parce qu'au travers de son histoire et de son action, elle est la seule capable de parler à tout le monde, à tous ces acteurs de la zone des conflits. Il n'y a pas beaucoup de pays qui ont des liens sur les plans diplomatiques, politiques, et même parfois personnels entre chefs d'État. En même temps, la France doit continuer, en tant que puissance militaire, à faire le travail pour éradiquer Daech. KADER ARIF Député de la Haute- Garonne, rapporteur de la commission d'enquête sur Daech « Les fournisseurs d'accès Internet et de réseaux sociaux ne semblent pas avoir pris la mesure du danger que représente Daech » « La France est la cible privilégiée de Daech car elle est la seule capable de parler à tout le monde ».

58. Allemagne / Terrorisme - Attaque à la hache: réactions mesurées en Allemagne

Radio France Internationale, Pascal Thibaut, 2016 07 20

Berlin - Les prises de position sont restées prudentes en Allemagne après l'attentat commis par un jeune Afghan dans un train régional en Bavière, lundi 18 juillet au soir. Cette agression a ensuite été revendiquée par l'EI. Les réactions et les commentaires restent mesurés en Allemagne, jusqu'à présent épargnée par le terrorisme islamiste, suite à l'agression commise par un jeune Afghan dans un train le 18 juillet au soir. Le ministre de l'Intérieur bavarois, un membre du parti conservateur CSU très critique contre la politique migratoire d'Angela Merkel refuse tout amalgame. « On ne peut pas nier qu'il s'agisse d'un réfugié mais nous ne devrions pas en tirer un jugement simpliste sur les réfugiés », a déclaré Joachim Hermann. Bien que l'organisation Etat islamique ait revendiqué pour la première fois un attentat en Allemagne, les autorités se veulent prudentes sur le degré réel de connexion entre l'auteur de l'agression et Daech. Défi de l'intégration Les commentaires dans la presse restent également mesurés. « La contre-stratégie ne consiste pas uniquement à plus de sécuritaire, écrit ainsi un quotidien régional. Il faut tendre la main à ces jeunes avant que l'EI ne le fasse » . Plusieurs autres journaux estiment également que de telles agressions sont difficilement évitables et que le défi principal réside avant tout dans l'intégration des nombreux réfugiés.

59. Bernard Cazeneuve : « L'état d'urgence ne peut pas être un état permanent »

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 07 20

Nice - Au lendemain de l'attentat de Nice, le ministre de l'intérieur se dit « préoccupé de l'exacerbation de certaines tensions dans la société française ». Mis en cause par la droite et l'extrême droite pour sa gestion de la menace terroriste, Bernard Cazeneuve, le ministre de l'intérieur, répond dans une interview au Monde, et s'en prend à ceux qui, en proposant des « lois d'exception », veulent « s'affranchir de l'Etat de droit ». La droite a immédiatement mis en cause le gouvernement après l'attentat de Nice, survenu le 14 juillet. Y a-t-il eu une faille dans la sécurité ou au niveau des services de renseignement ? A Nice, la polémique a commencé dans les minutes qui ont suivi la commission de l'abject attentat. Des élus ont proféré des accusations et mis en cause les services de l'Etat. Que s'est-il passé ? Un individu, qui n'était pas connu des services de renseignement, qui n'avait jamais été condamné pour des faits en lien avec le terrorisme, est passé à l'acte de manière extrêmement violente. L'enquête en cours tend à montrer qu'il s'est très récemment radicalisé, et qu'il n'avait pas combattu aux côtés de l'organisation Etat islamique [EI] . D'ailleurs, cette dernière n'a pas revendiqué l'organisation de cet acte terroriste mais y a apposé a posteriori son logo. Ceux qui prétendent savoir garantir le risque zéro mentent aux Français. Il est extrêmement difficile de détecter la préparation d'un tel attentat et je veux saluer le courage des policiers et la rapidité de leur intervention.

60. Bruxelles mesure ses critiques contre Erdogan

Le Monde, Cécile Ducourtieux et Jean-Pierre Stroobants, 2016 07 20

Bruxelles - L'UE s'alarme de la répression après le putsch raté en Turquie, mais ne veut pas braquer son partenaire-clé - Bureau européen - Réunis à Bruxelles lundi 18 juillet, les ministres européens des affaires étrangères devaient se livrer à un exercice périlleux : condamner la tentative de coup d'Etat en Turquie et, en parallèle, mettre en garde le régime du président Recep Tayyip Erdogan quant au respect des libertés. Le tout sans menacer, si possible, l'accord conclu en mars entre Ankara et Bruxelles pour endiguer les flux de migrants débarquant en Grèce. La haute représentante Federica Mogherini pensait avoir trouvé la bonne formule : l'Etat de droit doit, dit-elle, être protégé « pour le bien de la Turquie », qui espère, officiellement du moins, toujours adhérer à l'Union européenne. Le pays menace cependant de réintroduire la peine de mort, ce qui serait contraire à toutes les valeurs de l'Union et du Conseil de l'Europe, où il siège. Aussi Mme Mogherini fut-elle tenue de rappeler qu' « aucun pays ne peut adhérer à l'UE s'il introduit la peine de mort ». La chancelière allemande, Angela Merkel, avait déjà téléphoné à M. Erdogan pour lui faire passer le même message. Et le ministre français des affaires étrangères, Jean-Marc Ayrault, rappelait que la peine de mort a été officiellement abolie en Turquie en 2004, dans le cadre de la candidature d'Ankara à l'entrée dans l'Union.

61. Doubt cast on Bavaria axe attacker's nationality

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 07 20

Berlin - German authorities have cast doubt on whether a teenager who went on an axe rampage on a Bavarian train was really an Afghan refugee, saying Wednesday he might have been from Pakistan. The Isis group released a video on Tuesday purportedly featuring the 17-year-old, who was shot dead by police following the train attack in which he injured five people, two of them critically. However, sources close to the German security services now think he might have pretended to be Afghan on arrival in Germany in 2015 in order to have a better chance at securing asylum, television station ZDF reported. In the Isis video the youth uses phrases of a dialect of Pashto spoken in Pakistan and not Afghanistan and experts have indicated that his accent is also clearly Pakistani, ZDF said. A Pakistani document was also found in his room. The name he used in the video, "Mohammed Riyadh", does not match the name under which he registered in Germany, Riaz Kahn, the station added. German authorities said they had authenticated the video.

62. Erdogan targets more than 50,000 in purge after failed Turkish coup

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 07 20

Istanbul - Turkey vowed to root out allies of the U.S.-based cleric it blames for an abortive coup last week, widening a purge of the army, police and judiciary on Tuesday to universities and schools, the intelligence agency and religious authorities. Around 50,000 soldiers, police, judges, civil servants and teachers have been suspended or detained since the coup attempt, stirring tensions across the country of 80 million which borders Syria's chaos and is a Western ally against Islamic State. "This parallel terrorist organization will no longer be an effective pawn for any country," Prime Minister Binali Yildirim said, referring to what the government has long alleged is a state within a state controlled by followers of Fethullah Gulen. "We will dig them up by their roots," he told parliament. A spokesman for President Tayyip Erdogan said the government was preparing a formal request to the United States for the extradition of Gulen, who Turkey says orchestrated the failed military takeover on Friday in which at least 232 people were killed. U.S. President Barack Obama discussed the status of Gulen in a telephone call with Erdogan on Tuesday, the White House said, urging Ankara to show restraint as it pursues those responsible for the coup attempt.

63. Germany faces self-radicalization among frustrated young refugees

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 07 20

Berlin - Few details are known about the attacker who seriously injured four people on a train near Würzburg on Monday night. According to Bavarian Interior Minister Joachim Herrmann, he was a 17-year-old asylum seeker from Afghanistan, who had been living in the Würzburg area since March 2015. Radicalization among refugees is not a new problem. Germany's domestic intelligence agency, the Verfassungsschutz, last year warned that refugees could be targeted by "Salafists" - the agency's term for Muslims who preach an ultra-conservative version of Islam - though in practice many Salafists distance themselves from IS. Julia Reinelt, head of international affairs at the de-radicalization organization the Violence Prevention Network (VPN), agreed that this does happen. "There certainly are recruitment attempts [by Salafists], beyond what the Verfassungsschutz claims," she told DW. Meyer Husamuddin, an imam who works with de-radicalization projects in the town of Wiesbaden, has also noticed that young unaccompanied refugees are vulnerable to radicalization. "Some of them are in a difficult psychological situation because their parents are often still in danger - and then maybe things aren't going so well here," he said. "Then it can happen that one or two of them become a ready victim for those who want to manipulate them." And Husamuddin has also noticed that radical Islamists have "discovered that there are certain people who it's easier to provoke into doing things." "My impression at the moment is that the networks trying to recruit for Daesh are weakened," he added, using the Arabic acronym for IS. "But the fact that they want to [recruit] - I do believe that."

64. How Monday's train attack by a 17-year-old Afghan could change the German refugee debate

Washington Post, Rick Noack, 2016 07 20

Washington - Germany has so far been spared a large-scale Islamist terrorist attack similar to the ones that have targeted neighboring France and Belgium. But Monday's attack on a German train by a 17-year-old Afghan refugee has brought new fears about radicalized individuals, as more information emerged that the attacker had pledged loyalty to the Islamic State militant group in a video. According to the SITE Intelligence Group, the teenager went on to threaten more Islamic State attacks "in every village, city and airport." The "welcoming culture" that defined Germany last year during the migrant influx has largely disappeared, and Monday's attack could mark another significant development in the country's public debate about refugees. "Anti-immigration and Islamophobic opinions in the German population will grow, and there is a high risk of attacks on refugee centers in the coming weeks and months," said Daniel Koehler, director of Germany's Institute on Radicalization and De-Radicalization Studies and a fellow at George Washington University's Program on Extremism. "The current right-wing populist, extremist and anti-immigration movement will experience another surge in support. They will try to capitalize on this," he said.

65. Le renseignement face aux « zombies du terrorisme »

Le Point, Christophe Labbé avec Olivia Recasens, 2016 07 20

Paris - Défi. Notre système de renseignement issu de la guerre froide n'est plus adapté à la menace mutante. Daech en a fait son objectif ultime : « Liquidier la zone grise. » Dans la tête des idéologues de l'Etat islamique, la « zone grise », ce sont tous ces Occidentaux de confession musulmane, « indépendants et neutres, qui refusent de rejoindre le califat ». La méthode prônée pour y parvenir est de multiplier sur le sol de l'adversaire les actions destructrices du ciment social. En commettant son massacre un 14 Juillet, jour de fête nationale, Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel a parfaitement répondu aux vœux de l'EI. Réveiller les « zombies du terrorisme » qui dorment chez nous est la dernière étape du plan de Daech pour empoisonner le regard des « Gaulois » sur leurs compatriotes musulmans et amorcer un cycle infernal de défiance afin de liquider au plus vite la « zone grise ».

Le Monde, Soren Seelow, 2016 07 20

Nice - Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel, " fasciné par l'ultraviolence ", s'était intéressé depuis peu à l'islam radical, selon le procureur François Molins Les enquêteurs commencent à y voir un peu plus clair sur la personnalité, les préparatifs et les soutiens logistiques de Mohamed Lahouaiej - Bouhlel, qui a tué 84 personnes à Nice, le 14 juillet. Lundi, le procureur de la République de Paris, François -Molins, est revenu, en conférence de presse, en détail sur les dernières avancées. Le magistrat s'est attardé sur la personnalité trouble du Tunisien, décrit par de nombreux témoins comme " très éloigné des considérations religieuses ", " particulièrement violent à l'égard de son épouse et de ses enfants ", - consommant du porc, de l'alcool et de la drogue, et ayant une " vie sexuelle débridée ". Selon les informations du Monde, plusieurs de ses proches ont rapporté que le tueur avait une sexualité violente à l'égard des femmes, et fréquentait tout autant les hommes. Le tueur était en instance de divorce. Son ex-compagne, sortie sans charge de garde à vue dimanche, a d'ailleurs dû être exfiltrée de son appartement et mise à l'abri avec ses enfants, en raison des menaces qu'elle recevait. " Un intérêt certain et récent "Malgré ce profil en apparence peu compatible avec l'idéologie rigoriste de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI), Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel a donné quelques signes de radicalisation récente. Un témoin a affirmé aux enquêteurs que le tueur avait récemment évoqué l'EI, expliquant qu' " il ne comprenait pas pourquoi Daesh (l'acronyme arabe de l'EI) ne pouvait pas prétendre à un -territoire ".

67. Radicalisé, un conducteur de VTC cachait des explosifs

Nice - Deux détonateurs et 400 grammes de dynamite ont été retrouvés au domicile de cet individu visé par une fiche S. Sécurité Au moment où le procureur de la République de Paris a imputé la tuerie de Nice à un « terrorisme de proximité », l'interpellation dans le Val-de-Marne d'un chauffeur de VTC radicalisé dissimulant de l'explosif à son domicile a pris une résonance singulière. Si la section antiterroriste du parquet de Paris ne s'est pas saisie du dossier au dernier stade des investigations, l'affaire demeure inquiétante. Elle s'est nouée dans la nuit de dimanche à lundi, lors d'un contrôle à Sucy-en-Brie. Vers 2 h 30, un équipage de la brigade anticriminalité (BAC) intercepte un chauffeur VTC pour une infraction routière. À bord du véhicule, où se trouve un passager, les policiers découvrent des passeports et des permis de conduire provenant d'un cambriolage perpétré le 14 juillet sur la commune voisine de Saint-Maur-des-Fossés. Vérifications faites, il s'avère que le chauffeur de VTC affiche un vertigineux palmarès. Fiché S en raison de sa radicalisation religieuse, cet homme de 22 ans est connu pour 26 dossiers dont plusieurs condamnations écopées entre 2011 et 2014 pour trafics de stupéfiants, violences aggravées et atteintes aux biens.

68. Thousands detained as Turkey vows to smoke out Gülen supporters

The Guardian (London), Kareem Shaheen, 2016 07 20

Ankara - As the dust settled on an attempted coup in Turkey, a crackdown has ensued. Thousands of judges and soldiers have been detained and Turkish officials have vowed to "cleanse" a bureaucracy that they say has entrenched supporters of an exiled cleric, Fethullah Gülen, in positions of power. It is a hunt that the government fully expects the opposition in parliament to stand behind - now that their warnings and enduring paranoia over a coup by Gülenists have, they say, become manifest. But how did it come to this? The Gülenists once found common cause with Recep Tayyip Erdogan, supporting his Justice and Development (AK) party when it was founded on a realist, pro-European and business-friendly platform in the wake of a 1997 coup. They remained allies as Erdogan initiated peace talks with the separatist insurgency of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), and through the liberalisation of the economy and EU accession talks. Gülen's acolytes were allies of Erdogan, partners in purges of the military over the last decade that turned into witch hunts, and ironically lead to the promotion of officers who would later take part in Friday's attempted coup. Gülen's supporters were instrumental in prosecuting two wide-ranging investigations and trials, known Ergenekon and Sledgehammer affairs, targeting "deep state" structures that were accused of planning to remove the AK party from power. "Let me put it this way," said one Turkish government official. "Nobody, I mean nobody, was aware at the time that the Gülen movement had a secret agenda. Let's keep in mind that [in 2007] it was a very different situation, with the armed forces openly threatening to overthrow the government." Since then, the relationship has steadily declined. Both sides accused each other of wanting to consolidate control.

71. Turkey government fears second coup attempt as army leaders are purged

The Independent (UK), Patrick Cockburn, 2016 07 20

Istanbul - Turkish leaders are fearful that there may be a second attempt at a military uprising in the country following the failure of the recent coup. Several important military units are confined to their bases and President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has been slow to return to Ankara from Istanbul, apparently because the capital has not been deemed completely secure. Fears of a second coup attempt stem from the realisation by the Erdogan administration that the infiltration by pro-coup forces of the senior ranks of the 600,000-strong armed forces and intelligence apparatus went far deeper than originally suspected. Some 85 generals and admirals or almost a quarter of the total of 375 were jailed yesterday by a court, a sign that the government privately believes that the plot involved many more senior officers than the small clique it has publicly claimed was behind the abortive putsch. Other sources suggest that the true figure for generals detained is 125. Arrests at a high level are continuing with Mr Erdogan's advisor on the air force, Lt Col Erkan Krivak, arrested yesterday. Soldiers from the Second Army, which is fighting a widespread Kurdish rebellion in the south east of the country, have been ordered to stay in their camps in the embattled region. The Second Army commander, General Adem Huduti, is the most senior military commander arrested. The gates into the main base of the 3rd Corps in Istanbul, theoretically part a Nato rapid reaction force, are blocked by municipal dump trucks and heavy vehicles according to eye witnesses. "They are fearing another attempt at a coup," says Asli Aydintasbas of the European Council on Foreign Relations in Istanbul, pointing to the extensive nature of the purge of the senior officer corps and judiciary, a quarter of whose members have been dismissed. Those arrested for secretly backing the original coup include some from Mr Erdogan's inner circle such as Ali Yazici, his military secretary. Soli Ozel, professor of international relations at Kadir Has University in Istanbul and a columnist at Haberturk newspaper, says that "the number of Manchurian Candidates" in the upper ranks of the government is extraordinary - a reference to the film about secret agents and "sleepers" who infiltrated the top political leadership in the US in the 1950s at the height of the Cold War.

72. Turkey intelligence agency suspends 180 personnel

Yeni Safak (Turkey), 2016 07 20

Ankara--The National Intelligence Organization of Turkey (MIT) has suspended 180 personnel following the foiled coup of July 15, which was aiming at toppling the democratically elected government. MIT personnel were discovered to have been inactive before the discharge. Before MIT, Turkey's Prime Ministry suspended almost 260 personnel, including 257 individuals of 230 clerks, six advisers and two legal advisers. Turkish prime ministry suspends 257 personnel Turkey's Prime Ministry suspended almost 260 personnel on Tuesday amid a nationwide move against those suspected of having links to Friday's military coup attempt which killed hundreds of people. According to premiership sources, the 257 individuals include 230 clerks, six advisers and two legal advisers. Suspensions have also taken place in other top institutions in the country. In a separate operation in Turkey's Religious Affairs Directorate, 492 people were suspended from duty over Friday's attempted coup. The deadly coup attempt occurred late on July 15 when rogue elements of the Turkish military tried to overthrow the country's democratically elected government. At least 208 people, including members of the security forces and civilians, were martyred in Istanbul and Ankara and nearly 1,500 others wounded as they protested against the coup. The government has said the attempted coup was organised by followers of US-based preacher Fethullah Gulen, who is accused of a long-running campaign to overthrow the state through supporters within Turkish institutions, particularly the military, police and judiciary, forming the so-called parallel state.

73. Turkish intel informed top generals hours before coup attempt, says army

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 07 20

Ankara - Turkey's National Intelligence Organization (MIT) informed the country's top generals hours before the coup attempt was initiated by a group of soldiers within the army on July 15, while Chief of General Staff Gen. Hulusi Akar evaluated the information and issued all necessary warnings and orders against "this despicable and miserable attempt," according to a statement published on the General Staff's official website on July 19. Beginning the statement by announcing that the attempts of the "terrorist traitors who are members of an illegal gang [the Fethullahist Terrorist Organization - FETÖ] and who have nestled into the Turkish Armed Forces [TSK]" had been suppressed as of July 17 at 4:00 p.m. throughout the country, the General Staff continued by denouncing any relation between this group and the "flag-loving, overwhelming majority" within the army. "The information given by the National Intelligence Organization on July 15, 2016, at around 4:00 p.m. was evaluated at the General Staff headquarters with the attendance of Chief of Staff General Hulusi Akar, Chief of the Army General Salih Zeki Çolak and Deputy Chief of Staff General Yasar Güler," said the statement, elaborating on the precaution orders given regarding the end of mobility of all military vehicles including tanks, planes, helicopters and concerning the return of the ones currently mobilized to posts.

74. With Coup Crushed, Turkish Leaders Pursue a Rival in the U.S.

New York Times, Tim Arango, Ben Hubbard, 2016 07 20

Istanbul - Turkey's president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, says that a mild-mannered Muslim cleric living in self-imposed exile in rural Pennsylvania was pulling the strings of a coup attempt last week that almost succeeded in taking over the state, and killing Mr. Erdogan himself. Now, Mr. Erdogan says that many thousands of Turkish citizens -- soldiers, policemen, bureaucrats, teachers, judges, lawyers and many more professions -- are all part of the cleric's movement and must be punished. Tens of thousands of people have already been arrested or suspended from their jobs in the four days since the coup failed, after a night of violence that plunged the country into chaos. Mr. Erdogan and the cleric, Fethullah Gulen, have been adversaries in recent years, and Turkey has said before that Mr. Gulen must be extradited by the United States. Now, though, Mr. Erdogan appears determined to get him back, a matter that threatens to aggravate relations between the two NATO allies. But who is Mr. Gulen? And is it possible he is behind such a vast conspiracy? James F. Jeffrey, a former American ambassador to Turkey now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, called the organization a "cultlike" movement, and said no one really had solid information about its size and aims. But many experts on Turkey, Mr. Jeffrey included, say the followers of Mr. Gulen have sought to gain power within Turkey by infiltrating state institutions, most successfully the judiciary and the police. "They are a state within a state," he said. "They have infiltrated many places."

1. Darktrace repêche un ancien agent du SCRS

Direction informatique (site web), Dominique Lemoine, 2016 07 20

Toronto - Darktrace s'implante au Canada avec l'ouverture d'un bureau à Toronto et nomme à la tête de sa direction au Canada un ancien agent de renseignements au service du Canada (SCRS) et de l'Angleterre (MI5), David Masson. Cette multinationale se spécialise en produits de cybersécurité pour les entreprises. Elle a été fondée en 2013 à Cambridge en Angleterre et elle serait née d'une collaboration entre des mathématiciens de l'Université Cambridge et d'anciens agents du MI5, le service de renseignement responsable de la sécurité intérieure au Royaume-Uni de Grande-Bretagne et d'Irlande du Nord. L'approche de Darktrace miserait notamment sur l'apprentissage automatique (ou machine learning en anglais) pour reconnaître le comportement normal d'un utilisateur, d'un réseau ou d'un appareil informatique et pour pouvoir détecter une anomalie de comportement qui trahirait une attaque ou intrusion, plutôt que sur la surveillance d'attaques connues.

2. How I became a Heritage Front poster girl

The Canadian Jewish News, Elisa Hategan, 2016 07 21

Commentary: "The problem with this country is they don't believe in freedom of speech," Ernst was saying. "I'm just a publisher. I don't condone violence, but if it happens, I don't want to hear about it. What those boys do after they leave the meeting is none of my business." I was sitting in the living room of the world's most notorious Holocaust denier, Ernst Zundel, surrounded by wall-to-wall bookshelves creaking under the weight of Nazi propaganda, revisionist history books and stacks of Did Six Million Really Die?, the booklet that had earned him his reputation. Staring down at us from an ornately framed oil painting was Zundel's beloved icon, Adolf Hitler. It was the spring of 1992, and I had just turned 17. Most of my days were spent in Zundel's Carlton Street townhouse cutting newspaper clippings and assisting with office duties. I also ran errands for him - mailed newsletters at the post office, fetched his favourite goose-liver paté from the corner grocery store. He paid me in meals and attention, which I desperately craved. I was born in Romania and came to Canada at age 11, two years before the fall of Nicolae Ceausescu's dictatorship. My parents split up soon after our arrival, and my father returned to Bucharest, where he died shortly after. By age 16, I was transitioning between my abusive mother's house and various group and foster homes. I didn't have any friends and lived in a rough inner-city neighbourhood where other kids picked on me because I didn't fit in. I missed Romania desperately. Droege, in turn, introduced me to his close friend Ernst Zundel, who lived a short five-minute walk from my place and needed help around his fortified townhouse. Being the youngest member of the Heritage Front gave my life purpose and direction. They were my newfound family. I had an ideology now; my anger was whittled into shape. When I was hungry or needed a place to sleep, I could depend on Ernst or Wolfgang to help. Before I met Ernst, I had no animosity toward Jews. But the twisted "facts" that he presented day after day quickly desensitized me to the horrors of the Holocaust. Soon I didn't even believe it happened. The Heritage Front's rapid growth was unparalleled in the history of Canada's far right - within a year, we were filling meeting halls with hundreds of angry skinheads, many of whom were told to infiltrate the Reform party so that "someday we can take over." It would be dangerous to leave - I was 18 now and knew too much for them to let me go easily. And besides, I wanted to do more than just drop out - I wanted to make a difference. I needed to make them pay for what they had done. With the help of anti-racist individuals who had been targeted by the Heritage Front for harassment, I began to spy on the Front. For four long months, I collected information on its leaders' criminal activities and stole Zundel's mailing lists. I signed more than two dozen affidavits and provided police with a list of people who owned illegal guns. Months later, I testified against Droege and two other Heritage Front members in front of a Human Rights Commission tribunal, which resulted in convictions and jail sentences. These convictions, along with the subsequent revelation that Front co-leader Grant Bristow was an undercover CSIS agent, led to the Heritage Front's dissolution the following year. 3. Le CSTC avare de détails sur le partage d'information pouvant mener à la torture

Ottawa - L'agence d'espionnage électronique du Canada refuse de préciser à quelle fréquence elle partage de l'information pouvant mener à la torture d'un individu dans une prison étrangère. Le Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications Canada (CSTC) - qui analyse les menaces de terroristes et espions étrangers - a censuré des documents présentant ces données, même si la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) et le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) ont déjà révélé ces chiffres dans le passé. Cette réticence a poussé Amnistie internationale Canada à affirmer que le CSTC devait faire preuve d'une « plus grande transparence ». Le CSTC a été placé sous les projecteurs ces dernières années en raison des informations coulées par Edward Snowden, l'ancien sous-traitant de l'agence de sécurité nationale américaine (NSA), l'équivalent du CSTC au sud de la frontière. Le Centre fait également partie d'une poignée d'agences canadiennes - incluant la GRC, le SCRS, l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada et la Défense nationale - qui ont le droit de partager des informations avec des partenaires étrangers, même si cela signifie qu'une personne pourrait être torturée par la suite. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a indiqué plus tôt cette année que les libéraux se pencheraient sur les problèmes liés à cette politique de partage d'information, mise en place par le gouvernement conservateur précédent.

4. 'Exceedingly exceptional' break for far from 'normal criminal'

London Free Press, Jane Sims, 2016 07 21

London, Ont. - Stephen Solis-Reyes is, by all accounts, exactly what an Ottawa judge who dealt with him said he is: "not the normal criminal." A London judge agreed Wednesday to lift a travel ban imposed on the Heartbleed Hacker, part of his conditional sentence for breaking into the federal tax collector's website in 2014, but not without telling the computer whiz the move is "exceedingly exceptional." It pays to be good and Solis-Reyes - a Western University student serving house arrest for his crime, but now free to go to an elite international computer programming competition in California - is very, very good. "It means a lot, for sure," Solis-Reyes said outside the London courthouse of the judge's decision. "I think he is expecting big things from me. He's expecting what I do in this competition is going to help society and help me in the future." The 21-year old Londoner was convicted in May of four charges - two counts of mischievous, unauthorized use of a computer and obstructing a police officer - for sending technosavants through the federal government in 2014. That spring, as the income tax-filing deadline neared for Canadians, Canada Revenue Agency's website was breached by someone exploiting the so-called Heartbleed computer bug. About 900 social insurance numbers were stolen and the website had to be shut down, the tax deadline extended by a week and the RCMP began investigating. The Crown ultimately dropped 13 other charges against the Londoner, who maintained he'd broken into the system only to demonstrate its vulnerability.

5. Canada's push for closer China trade ties hits problems -sources

Reuters, David Ljunggren, 2016 07 21

Ottawa - Canada's push for closer trade ties with China has slowed amid unease with the extent of economic access Beijing is asking for and its human rights record, several sources familiar with the matter said, impeding a top priority for Liberal Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Trudeau, whose election win last year was warmly welcomed by Chinese leaders, may also trim plans for a full week visit to China ahead of a G20 summit in September, deciding instead to take a shorter, more symbolic trip with less focus on trade than initially predicted. Trudeau, 44, promised to concentrate on expanding trade with China and India when he took office in November, seeking to help spark a sluggish export sector. But the sources said Ottawa did not fully appreciate how challenging it would be to handle an increasingly assertive China. "Nothing substantive is going to happen quickly," said one person close to the matter. "This is a process that will take a decade." Trudeau is popular in Beijing, which favorably recalls his father Pierre Trudeau, who established diplomatic relations with China in 1970 while he was prime minister. China has tried hard to woo Trudeau, who was the guest of honor at a special Chinese reception in Ottawa in January which featured rare photos of his father in the Chinese capital. The Liberals want to energize an anemic export sector they say is overly dependent on the United States, which took 78 percent of all Canadian goods shipped abroad in May - the highest proportion for almost a decade. Canada ran its two biggest trade deficits ever in April and May of this year. Bilateral trade with China in 2015 totaled just C$85.3 billion ($65.1 billion), with Canada running a C$45.9 billion deficit, according to Statistics Canada. By contrast, 2015 two-way trade with the United States was C$651.7 billion. China's embassy in Ottawa said it was unable to respond to requests for comment in time. The office of Trade Minister Chrystia Freeland said Canada and China "see this as a long-term relationship" and the two sides were "building a deep foundation and technical knowledge of one another". In 2012, concerns about China gaining undue influence prompted the former Conservative government to ban foreign state-owned enterprises from taking majority stakes in oil sands firms. The Conservatives were also very critical of China's human rights record and opinion polls at the time showed most Canadians were nervous about closer relations with China, a trend that has continued.

6. Canada concerned about Turkish emergency state, possible death penalty comeback

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 07 21

Ottawa - Canada has expressed sharp concerns over Turkey's imposition of a three-month state of emergency and reports that it may reintroduce the death penalty in response to last week's botched coup attempt. "Canada supports a democratic Turkey and respects the need for thorough investigations and prosecutions against the perpetrators of the recent attempted coup," Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion said in a statement released Wednesday night. "This must be done in accordance with Turkish and international law. Given this imperative, Canada is concerned by the state of emergency declared by President Erdogan today." Dion also said Canada is equally troubled by reports of the firings and detentions of tens of thousands of people, including members of the judiciary, public servants, teachers, academics, members of civil society and the media. But he said Canada is "especially concerned" about reports Turkey might bring back the death penalty, which it abolished 12 years ago. "The death penalty undermines human dignity and is incompatible with Turkey's international obligations. Canada urges Turkey to comply fully with its relevant obligations under international human rights law," Dion said. Erdogan has mused about reinstating the death penalty, which Turkey abolished in 2004 as a step toward joining the European Union.

7. Canada to take part in Iraqi city of Mosul's liberation from ISIS with field hospital

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 07 21

The United States and France appear on the verge of taking a more active role in liberating Iraq's second largest city from the Islamic State, and Canada will support the effort by deploying an army field hospital and medical staff, Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan said Wednesday. A French government spokesman has said allied nations are preparing for a co-ordinated strike on Mosul, which extremists have turned into a stronghold in the nearly two years since they overran the region. At an air force base near Washington, U.S. Defence Secretary Ash Carter is hosting a meeting of countries, including Canada, who are taking part in the war against the Islamic State. They are planning the next phase of the campaign in conjunction with the Iraqi government. Sajjan says Canada will add an extra medical unit to its current special forces training and assistance mission. "There were gaps that needed to be filled in the coalition and one of them was the medical facility," Sajjan told CBC News in an interview. The Role 2 hospital has limited bed space, but will be able to provide emergency care and evacuation for casualties coming back from the fight for Mosul. He said the decision involves up to 60 personnel, but it will not mean an increase to the overall size of the Canadian deployment in Iraq. As part of the reboot of the mission in February, the government also beefed up its intelligence gathering capability, notably with greater involvement of the country's electronic eavesdropping service, the Communications Security Establishment. It also reportedly deployed specialists from the military's 21st Electronic Warfare Regiment, which intercepts and decodes enemy transmissions. Sajjan, who visited Iraq after the NATO summit in early July, said the capability is "paying off in a tremendous way."

8. Cannon: the bipartisan diplomat

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 07 21

Ottawa - In the months leading up to last year's election, Conservative organizers in Quebec held their breath as Lawrence Cannon mulled a return to politics. The former minister would have had to quit his job as Canada's ambassador to France, but there were signs he was willing to provide a much-needed boost to the Conservative campaign in the province. His wife and their two children returned to live in Canada around that time, and the Conservatives were running high in the polls in the Quebec City area, where a winnable riding was his for the taking. Instead, Mr. Cannon gambled and decided to stay in Paris. He quickly ingratiated himself to the new Liberal government, surviving this week's purge of a number of Conservative appointees in Canada's diplomatic ranks. He now gets to finish his fifth year in France. A Liberal official said the government wants to make it clear that "having had a career in another party is not a death sentence." Shortly after he was sworn in last November, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau was accompanied by Mr. Cannon as he went to the Élysée Palace for an official visit with French President François Hollande. Mr. Trudeau was impressed by his ambassador's performance, and the feedback he received in Paris and Ottawa was unanimously favourable. "The Prime Minister wants to reprofessionalize the diplomatic service," the senior Liberal source said. "Lawrence is doing a good job over there and the Prime Minister has decided that he will finish his term."

10. Defeating Islamic State will not end terrorism: Dion

Globe and Mail, Paul Koring, 2016 07 21

Defeating the Islamic State in the proto-caliphate it has ruthlessly carved out of Iraq and Syria won't end extremist terrorism, Foreign Minister Stéphane Dion said on Wednesday as Canada co-hosted a multinational conference aimed at raising $2-billion (U.S.) to rebuild Iraqi cities devastated by the military campaign. "We need to make the basic distinction between Daesh and the problem we have with terrorism inspired by radical and false interpretation of Islamism," Mr. Dion said, referring to the Islamic State by its Arabic acronym. "Daesh pretends to be a state. They try to conquer villages, towns, cities, and they do it in Iraq, in Syria, in Libya. We are confident that we'll get rid of that. It will be difficult, but we are making progress." But the minister warned: "Once it's done, terrorism is still there. Daesh as an organization is likely to survive that, and you have alQaeda, Boko Haram. So we'll need to continue to work very hard, all together, with our police, intelligence services and deradicalization efforts, and we'll continue to fight." Canada, which co-hosted the fundraising conference in Washington, pledged $200-million (Canadian) - or about 10 per cent of the target - even before the daylong gathering got under way.

11. État d'urgence en Turquie: le ministre canadien Dion est inquiet de la situation

Presse canadienne, 2016 07 21

Ottawa--Le ministre canadien des Affaires étrangères, Stéphane Dion, a fait part mercredi soir de sa préoccupation de la décision du président de la Turquie, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, de décréter l'état d'urgence dans son pays. Le communiqué qu'a écrit le ministre Dion mentionne que le Canada appuie une Turquie démocratique et respecte le besoin d'enquêtes approfondies et de poursuites contre les auteurs de la récente tentative de coup d'État. Il rappelle toutefois que ce travail doit être mené conformément à la législation turque et au droit international. Le gouvernement du Canada, ajoute-t-il, est aussi préoccupé par les informations qui rapportent qu'ont eu lieu des dizaines de milliers de licenciements et de détentions, y compris de membres de la magistrature, de fonctionnaires, d'enseignants, d'universitaires, de membres de la société civile et de représentants des médias.

12. New Brunswick city feeling the pressure of public servants' pay problems

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 07 21

The acting mayor of the small Maritime city at the centre of the public service pay fiasco has a message for the more than 80,000 federal government workers who have not been paid properly: It is not our fault. "In the community, there's a level of discomfort because of the intense scrutiny," Adam Lordon, acting mayor of Miramichi, N.B., told The Globe and Mail on Wednesday. The coastal city of about 18,000 people is home to the federal government's main centre for its new pay system, Phoenix, which has made headlines for failing to compensate more than 80,000 public servants properly. Mr. Lordon asked frustrated public servants to remember that the pay centre staff in Miramichi are working as hard as they can to address their concerns. Mr. Lordon said the pay centre has been a "life saver" for the city, which suffered job losses in recent years when pulp-and-paper mills in the area closed. He said he is working to ensure that Miramichi does not get blamed for the problems, which would have unfolded regardless of the central pay system's location. In cities such as Miramichi, residents voice their concerns directly to their local political leaders.

13. New pay pal for the PS

Ottawa Citizen, 2016 07 21

Editorial: Give the prime minister credit for this much, at least: he knows he can't respond to the public-service pay fiasco by simply blaming the former government of Stephen Harper. Instead, amid news this week that as many as 80,000 public servants haven't received proper paycheques, and hundreds more have gone months without being paid at all, and, oh, by the way, there was a massive privacy breach that could end in lawsuits or worse, Justin Trudeau addressed the crisis directly. "We are working right away on helping the most vulnerable while we make sure that the system functions for everyone," he said Wednesday. "It's something I have engaged in personally and tasked the Clerk of the Privy Council to oversee." Good. But lest the PM show himself to be one of those who believes words are the same things as actions, he needs to get results, fast. By now, public servants know this sorry saga well: The then-Conservative government decided, for political reasons, to shift the government pay centre to Miramichi. Few compensation staff were willing to move there. Still, pay services for 46 departments were transferred to Miramichi, N.B., in 2015. Next came the Phoenix pay system, which went live in February. And pay services for dozens more departments were transferred east. A shaky pay system, high volumes of work at a new facility and incomplete training - they created compensation carnage. Public Services Minister Judy Foote quickly pledged to hire 100 skilled people for a "satellite" pay centre in Gatineau to help out, but the government has had trouble recruiting them.

14. PM promises to fix Phoenix

Ottawa Citizen, Jason Fekete, 2016 07 21

Gatineau - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is trumpeting the new Canada Child Benefit that just landed in parents' bank accounts across the country, but the government's inability to properly pay tens of thousands of federal workers is proving to be a costly distraction for the Liberals. Speaking at a news conference in Gatineau Wednesday to highlight the CCB payments that have started flowing, Trudeau promised to fix problems with the Phoenix pay system that have resulted in more than 80,000 public servants not being paid what they are owed. The problems have also extended to members of Parliament, some of whom quietly acknowledge they have not been paid in recent weeks. Federal officials apologized this week for continuing issues with the new pay system, but admit it could take months to completely fix the problem. Trudeau said the government is taking the situation "very seriously" and he is personally getting involved. He said he has asked Privy Council Clerk Michael Wernick to oversee getting the Phoenix system functioning properly and that everyone is paid what they are owed. "We are working right away on helping the most vulnerable, while we make sure that the system functions for everyone, and it's something that I have engaged in personally and tasked the clerk of the Privy Council to oversee. We are making sure that this situation gets fixed for the families who are needing our help," Trudeau said. "We are taking this very, very seriously and ensuring that people get the support and the pay that they are owed."

15. PM urges Turkey to respect rule of law

Globe and Mail, Laura Stone, 2016 07 21

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau says those who have been arrested in connection with the attempted coup d'etat in Turkey should be able to defend themselves in a "robust and legitimate process" in that country. Mr. Trudeau's concerns, which he says Canada has raised with the Turkish government, come after the arrests of thousands of allegedly pro-coup soldiers and police officers following the failed putsch to overthrow President Recep Tayyip Erdogan's government last Friday. About 60,000 others have been purged from positions in the military, police, civil service, schools and universities. Mr. Erdogan on Wednesday declared a three-month state of emergency and has also said he will consider public demands to reinstate the death penalty. "Coup d'etats are never a good thing," Mr. Trudeau said on Wednesday. "But at the same time, we are concerned that the democratic institutions, Turkey's constitution, are respected; that the rule of law continues," he added, in response to questions from reporters. "We need assurances that all those who have been arrested in connection to this coup d'etat will have the chance to defend themselves in a robust and legitimate process, and those are the concerns we have underlined with Turkey," Mr. Trudeau said.

16. Post-ISIL challenges come into focus as Canada attends Washington meeting

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 07 21

Ottawa - With a military victory over the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant in sight, Canada and its allies are turning their attention to what comes next _ keeping Iraq together and stopping the spread of terror. Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion and Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan were in Washington on Wednesday, where they and representatives from dozens of other countries heard that the fight against ISIL was going better than expected. A second day of meetings is scheduled for Thursday. U.S. officials said the militant group's forces had squeezed into the Iraqi city of Mosul and its Syrian stronghold, Raqqa. Preparations are currently underway to liberate Mosul, and while the effort isn't expected to be easy, success would eliminate the last real vestige of ISIL presence in Iraq. Sajjan, who said Canada will deploy up to 60 military personnel to a hospital in northern Iraq, wouldn't say how long he expects the fighting to last. But he did describe the pending battles for Mosul and Raqqa as the "final push" in the military campaign.

17. Trudeau calls Phoenix pay problem an 'unacceptable situation'

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 07 21

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau says the ongoing problem with the Phoenix pay system that has affected tens of thousands of government workers "is an unacceptable situation" inherited from the former Conservative government. "This is an unacceptable situation and we are trying to fix it," Trudeau said in French during an interview Wednesday morning with Radio-Canada's François Cormier and Martine Defoy. "We inherited the system from the previous government," he added, echoing last week's words from Scott Brison, president of the Treasury Board, who told CBC News the Liberals "inherited a mess from the Harper government," which "let the system deteriorate." While the new system was spearheaded under the previous Conservative government, it rolled out in phases under the Trudeau government's watch earlier this year in spite of a warning from the largest union representing federal public servants. The Public Service Alliance of Canada said thousands of its members experienced problems during the first phase of the rollout, which began in late February, and in April the union warned the Liberals not to move ahead with the second phase.

18. Turquie - État d'urgence dans un climat totalitaire

Le Devoir, Philippe Orfali, 2016 07 21

Montréal--En déclarant l'état d'urgence sans crier gare et en sommant des centaines d'universitaires de rentrer au pays sous peine de représailles, la Turquie s'est engagée dans une trajectoire aussi inquiétante qu'imprévisible mercredi. La purge se poursuit au pays de Recep Tayyip Erdogan, cinq jours après le coup d'État raté. Arrestations, suspensions, destitutions... Le coup de balai d'Ankara touche plus de 58 000 personnes, enseignants, policiers, juges, généraux et journalistes. Neuf mille d'entre eux ont été emprisonnés. Le président turc a annoncé tard mercredi " l'instauration de l'état d'urgence pour trois mois ", au bout d'une rencontre de cinq heures du Conseil de sécurité national, lui permettant d'imposer un couvre-feu et de restreindre le droit de manifester, et celui de circuler dans certains secteurs. Le ministre des Affaires étrangères du Canada, Stéphane Dion, s'est dit lui aussi " préoccupé " par les actions d'Ankara, appelant la Turquie à respecter les droits élémentaires des milliers de personnes qui auraient été arrêtées sans motifs, et de mettre fin à " des actes troublants de rétribution et d'intimidation ". Dans les universités montréalaises également, la crise politique turque se fait sentir. Elles sont nombreuses à accueillir des dizaines d'étudiants d'origine turque chaque année. La répression annoncée étonne.

19. As U.S. and allies close in on Mosul, it's what comes after that stokes worry (Canada)

Washington Post, Dan Lamothe, 2016 07 21

Joint Base Andrews, Md. - As leaders from across the U.S.-led coalition against the Islamic State group meet in Washington this week, they are increasingly facing a crucial question: How will the coalition help the Iraqi government put the city of Mosul back together after it is taken back from the militants? The city of some 2 million people has been the de facto capital of the Islamic State in Iraq for more than two years. Coalition-backed Iraqi troops have been fighting on Mosul's outskirts for weeks as they seek to eventually retake it, but officials have yet to address what would happen after the city is retaken - issues such as how civilians will be cared for, how neighborhoods will be rebuilt and how improvised explosives sown across the city will be found and rendered harmless. Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter said that the "biggest strategic concern" raised at a meeting of coalition defense ministers here Wednesday was that stabilization and efforts to bring governance to Mosul do not lag compared with the military campaign. The issue came up as Gen. Joseph L. Votel, the chief of U.S. Central Command, laid out what the next steps in the fight against the Islamic State will be, Carter said. "Most of our conversation today was not, in fact, about the movements of forces, because that was planned a long time ago. And that's going fine," Carter said Wednesday. "Most of our conversations today was ... about what happens after the defeat of ISIL in Mosul. Stabilization plans, reconstruction plans and so forth. And we're identifying the requirements there, which are large because, as General Votel indicated, it's a large city." The comments came as Secretary of State John F. Kerry joined with leaders from Canada, Germany, Japan and the Netherlands in a conference in Washington devoted to drumming up money to rebuild Iraq. Kerry said that $2 billion already has been promised and will be put toward humanitarian aid, de-mining, immediate stabilization and longer-term recovery.

20. CIA Chief Hedges When Asked if U.S. Saw Turkey Coup Coming

Wall Street Journal, Damian Paletta, 2016 07 20

McLean Va. - Central Intelligence Agency Director John Brennan said intelligence officials were well aware of strains within Turkey and sizable opposition to President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, but he wouldn't say whether they foresaw an attempted coup last week. Mr. Brennan, speaking Tuesday evening to an audience at the Intelligence and National Security Alliance, described the setting U.S. officials were in Friday night when the attempted coup was unfolding. "The first thing you do when you have a situation like that is you try to ascertain the facts, and a lot of time...it's very very difficult because a lot of information is coming in and it is hard to distinguish between rumors," he said. He was interviewed at the event by Jennifer Sims, a former State Department official and intelligence expert. She then asked "Did we see it coming?" Mr. Brennan, said, "We..." and then laughed awkwardly before continuing.

21. Detainee in Cuba is cleared for release (Canada)

Washington Post, Adam Goldman, Julie Tate, 2016 07 21

Washington - Mohamedou Ould Slahi, one of the most controversial and colorful prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the author of a best-selling memoir about his time there, has been cleared for release from the military facility, U.S. officials announced Wednesday. Slahi, 45, who was born in Mauritania, had appeared before a parole-style review board June 2 that recommended his transfer. In making its decision, the board said it considered the detainee's "highly compliant behavior in detention." There also were "clear indications of a change in the detainee's mind-set." "I am just thrilled that he is finally cleared again and the government of Mauritania has said it welcomes him home," said Nancy Hollander, one of Slahi's attorneys. The prison has 76 detainees, and 31 of them have been approved for transfer. In November 1999, Slahi moved to Canada. The next month, Canadian authorities questioned him about Ahmed Ressam, who was arrested with explosives while trying to cross the U.S.-Canada border. Ressam, an Algerian, was convicted of attempting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport and sentenced to 37 years.

22. Donald Trump Sets Conditions for Defending NATO Allies Against Attack (Canada)

New York Times, David E. Sanger, Maggie Haberman, 2016 07 21

Cleveland - Donald J. Trump, on the eve of accepting the Republican nomination for president, said Wednesday that if he were elected, he would not pressure Turkey or other authoritarian allies about conducting purges of their political adversaries or cracking down on civil liberties. The United States, he said, has to "fix our own mess" before trying to alter the behavior of other nations. "I don't think we have a right to lecture," Mr. Trump said in a wide-ranging interview in his suite in a downtown hotel here while keeping an eye on television broadcasts from the Republican National Convention. "Look at what is happening in our country," he said. "How are we going to lecture when people are shooting policemen in cold blood?" During a 45-minute conversation, he explicitly raised new questions about his commitment to automatically defend NATO allies if they are attacked, saying he would first look at their contributions to the alliance. Mr. Trump re-emphasized the hard-line nationalist approach that has marked his improbable candidacy, describing how he would force allies to shoulder defense costs that the United States has borne for decades, cancel longstanding treaties he views as unfavorable, and redefine what it means to be a partner of the United States. He said the rest of the world would learn to adjust to his approach. "I would prefer to be able to continue" existing agreements, he said, but only if allies stopped taking advantage of what he called an era of American largess that was no longer affordable. Giving a preview of his address to the convention on Thursday night, he said that he would press the theme of "America First," his rallying cry for the past four months, and that he was prepared to scrap the North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico and Canada if he could not negotiate radically better terms. He even called into question whether, as president, he would automatically extend the security guarantees that give the 28 members of NATO the assurance that the full force of the United States military has their back.

23. Lawmakers push TSA to strengthen Amtrak passenger security

The Hill, Melanie Zanona, 2016 07 20

Washington - A pair of House lawmakers is backing a bill that would prod the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) into implementing all the requirements of a decade-old law aimed at addressing terror threats on Amtrak. The legislation was crafted in response to a recent watchdog report that found the TSA has "limited regulatory oversight processes" to strengthen passenger security at Amtrak, because the agency has not complied with all of the recommendations mandated by Congress following the 9/11 terrorist attacks. "Right now, three key 9/11 Act passenger rail requirements still remain incomplete," Reps. Daniel Lipinski (D-Ill.) and Barbara Comstock (R-Va.) said in a statement. "With ever-growing security concerns across the nation, our bill directs the TSA to develop a process to follow through on these important security provisions."

24. Nationalist group disavows killer (Canada)

Los Angeles Times, Jaweed Kaleem, Jenny Jarvie, 2016 07 21

Los Angeles - It was 7 a.m on Monday when Fredrix Washington got a call from a cousin with some news: Washington's photo was on television in a segment about the shooting deaths of three Baton Rouge, La., police officers. "Do we know Gavin Long?" the cousin asked. "Was he part of the empire?" Gavin Eugene Long was the killer. The empire was the Washitaw Nation, an "indigenous" black group that claims ownership over vast swaths of the United States and Canada and of which Washington is a top leader. In May 2015 in Jackson County, Mo., Long filed court papers declaring allegiance to the group, which has been monitored by the FBI and tied to sovereign citizen movements. "I don't even want to say his name," Washington said Tuesday in an interview from his apartment in San Pedro. "He's not one of us."

25. Obama's Support of Erdogan Is Stark Reminder of Turkey's Value to U.S.

New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 07 21

Washington - It's hard to remember today that to President Obama, Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey once embodied a new kind of Muslim leader. Mr. Obama regarded him as "a man of principle, and also a man of action," Tom Donilon, the president's former national security adviser, said in 2011. But when Mr. Erdogan began tilting in the direction of authoritarianism, ascending from prime minister to president and setting out to transform Turkey from a parliamentary democracy into a one-man system built around him, their once-intense relationship deteriorated. His frequent phone calls with Mr. Obama ended, and Mr. Erdogan has observed that they rarely speak anymore. On Tuesday morning, the phone calls resumed. Mr. Obama called Mr. Erdogan to deliver what a senior administration official described as a "shout-out" for his resilience in the face of a failed coup attempt, and to express relief that the Turkish president and his family were safe. Mr. Obama's supportive words, even in the face of a state of emergency that Mr. Erdogan declared on Wednesday and a crackdown that extended to banning every academic in the country from traveling abroad, testified to the stark reality the White House confronts with Turkey. Mr. Erdogan may now be a bitter disappointment to the president, but he is still better than any other option -- and, like it or not, remains a linchpin in the campaign against the Islamic State and in a host of other critical issues. For Mr. Obama, as for many of his predecessors, it is a familiar accommodation, struggling to square values and interests in the chaotic landscape of the Middle East. In Egypt, for example, the United States has tolerated a repressive military government in an effort to preserve another crucial alliance in the region.

26. The FBI cleared Orlando killer in 2014; here's why

Los Angeles Times, Del Quentin Wilber, 2016 07 21

Washington - The veteran FBI agent and the local sheriff's deputy took no chances when they got a credible tip about a potential terrorist. In a joint operation, they ran his name through a maze of federal criminal and terrorism databases and scrutinized his telephone records for suspicious contacts. Without a warrant, they couldn't read his emails or listen to his calls. But they watched him from unmarked vehicles to track his daily routine and to see whom he met. They deployed two confidential informants more than a dozen times to secretly record his conversations. They interviewed him twice and persuaded him to provide a written statement -- in which he admitted he had lied to agents. In the end, after a counter- terrorism investigation that stretched from May 2013 to March 2014, the agent and his supervisor concluded that Omar Mateen was not a threat and closed the case. "We don't have a crystal ball, unfortunately," said a senior FBI official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the case remains under investigation. "We went right up to the edge of what we could do legally, and there was just nothing there."

27. U.S. targets growing threat of al-Nusra

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, Adam Goldman, 2016 07 21

Washington - The Obama administration has begun to see Jabhat al- Nusra, al-Qaeda's affiliate in Syria, as a global threat that could eventually rival the Islamic State, echoing a Russian argument that it has long resisted. A new U.S. proposal to coordinate counterterrorism operations in Syria with Russia, discussed by President Obama last week with President Vladimir Putin, is partly designed to stop Moscow's Syrian government ally from bombing civilians and U.S.- backed moderate opposition forces. But stopping al-Nusra, which has been one of the main beneficiaries of the ongoing Syrian civil conflict, appears to have become an almost equally important goal. The proposed deal would start with coordinated U.S. and Russian strikes against al-Nusra. The group's capacity is growing, and it is "the largest al-Qaeda affiliate now in the world," Brett McGurk, the administration's envoy to the global coalition against the Islamic State, said this week. Nicholas Rasmussen, director of the National Counterterrorism Center, told Congress last week that senior al-Qaeda leaders are increasingly migrating to a "growing safe haven in Syria." Some have come from Pakistan and Yemen, where the group has suffered losses, while others may be among those recently released from years of detention in Iran.

28. US intel bulletin warns of persistent threat from 'Western female violent extremists'

Fox News, Matthew Dean, 2016 07 20

Washington - The U.S. intelligence community is warning law enforcement agencies around the country of persistent terror threats posed by radicalized Western women. In a Joint Intelligence Bulletin - or JIB - distributed Tuesday and obtained by Fox News, the FBI, Department of Homeland Security, and National Counterterrorism Center note a "continued trend of Western female violent extremists... engaging or attempting to engage in plotting against targets in the West, including their home countries." The information was circulated after a review of recent arrests, as well as observations made following successful and disrupted plots. The agencies find that extremist-sympathizing Western women "are likely to continue" to follow persistent calls by terror groups like ISIS and Al Qaeda to plot and/or carry out lone wolf-style terror attacks in their home countries or other Western nations. Additionally, FBI, DHS and NCTC warn of the women's potential role in carrying digital surveillance of potential targets over the Internet through a practice known as "doxing." Doxing leverages publicly available information on the web to plot attacks against specific individuals or locations.

29. US sanctions three Iran-based al Qaeda leaders

The Hill, Sylvan Lee, 2016 07 20

Washington - Three senior members of al Qaeda based in Iran have been sanctioned by the Treasury Department for channeling money into the terrorist organization, officials announced Wednesday. Faisal Jassim Mohammed Al-Amri Al-Khalidi, Yisra Muhammad Ibrahim Bayumi and Abu Bakr Muhammad Muhammad Ghumayn were classified as "Specially Designated Global Terrorists." That designation freezes any of their U.S.-based assets and blocks U.S. citizens from engaging in financial transactions with them. "Today's action sanctions senior [al Qaeda] operatives responsible for moving money and weapons across the Middle East," said Adam Szubin, acting under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence. "Treasury remains committed to targeting [al Qaeda's] terrorist activity and denying [al Qaeda] and its critical support networks access to the international financial system."

30. Britain targeted with more than 100 terror attacks in just ONE YEAR amid fears over rise in extremism across Europe

Daily Mail (UK), James Tapsfield, 2016 07 20

London - Some 103 terror attacks were carried out, planned, or foiled in Britain last year, a report has revealed. The figure for the UK was the highest in the EU, with six member states reporting 211 in total, according to Europol. Some 151 people died and more than 360 were injured as a result of terrorism - with the vast majority of fatalities in France, which was hit by the Charlie Hebdo and Paris atrocities in 2015. The figures - which have emerged less than a week after the deadly truck attack in Nice - are significantly higher than in 2014, when four people were killed and six wounded. The EU law enforcement agency's latest Terrorism Situation And Trend Report said the total number of terrorist incidents across the EU in 2015 slightly increased compared with 2014, when there were 201.

31. Chemical plants and water supply are terrorist targets

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 07 21

London - Chemical plants are becoming a "target of choice" for terrorists who may also try to contaminate water supplies or infiltrate nuclear sites, according to Europe's law enforcement agency. The threat posed by Islamic State will only get worse, Europol warned, as it revealed that the number of jihadist attacks across the continent had more than quadrupled in a year. The agency's annual terrorism trends report said that Syrian asylum-seekers could be targets for swift radicalisation by Isis recruiters and that a new generation of fighters was being raised in the so-called caliphate. Rob Wainwright, director of Europol, said the threat was "reinforced" by European Isis fighters who have returned. Chemical plants are becoming a "target of choice by terrorist groups", the report said, and biological toxins such as abrin and ricin had been bought using bitcoin on the dark web. "The phenomenon of individuals travelling for terrorist purposes to conflict zones increases the risk that expertise in the use of chemical weapons can be transferred to the European Union by returning foreign terrorist fighters," the report said.

The Independent (UK), Gavin Gordon, 2016 07 21

London - Peace protesters demonstrating against the deployment of US nuclear missiles at British air bases in the 1980s were kept under close watch by MI5, newly released government papers suggest. Files released by the National Archives in Kew, west London, indicate that peace camps set up around the bases involved were monitored by the security service for evidence of infiltration by "subversive organisations". They include a letter from a senior MI5 officer, JL Jones, to No 10 after Downing Street raised concerns about the activities of protesters who had established two camps at RAF Molesworth in Cambridgeshire, where some of the missiles were stationed. Writing in February 1985, Mr Jones said that the camps - known as the Rainbow Fields Village and the People's Peace Camp - were made up of "floating groups of Quakers and peace and ecology campaigners". "Although individual members of subversive organisations have from time to time been involved with both camps, neither owes its foundation or its continued existence to the support of any subversive group," he wrote.

33. Teenager crashed world computer networks and sent Twitter bomb threats 'to be cool'

London Daily Telegraph, Martin Evans, 2016 07 21

London - A teenage computer hacker, who shut down government networks across the world and sent bomb threats to US airlines, has been spared jail. The 16-year-old, from Plympton in Devon, began targeting the systems of organisations and states he disagreed with when he was just 14. Using a laptop computer in his bedroom, the schoolboy, who cannot be named for legal reasons, caused chaos targeting Iraq's ministry of foreign affairs, the department of agriculture in Thailand and China's security ministry. He also crashed computers in the Japanese town of Taiji, where an annual dolphin hunt takes place, and the Sea-World theme park in Florida. He was arrested after using Twitter to send bomb hoaxes to American Airlines, Delta Air Lines and even the White House, telling them: "There's a nice tick-tick in one of those lovely Boeing planes. Hurry gentlemen, the clock is ticking. High quality." District Judge Diane Baker, sitting at Plymouth Youth Court, told the boy: "I think you got carried away by the fact you thought you were cool, you thought you were clever. You didn't think of what truly happens in the real world if you do these things. I don't think there would be any positive outcome for you going into a youth detention centre. I think it would destroy you." Addressing the court, the teenager said: "I just want to say that I am really sorry for everything that I have done. I didn't really know how serious it was. I am sorry to my family." He was convicted of three offences under the Computer Misuse Act and two under the Criminal Law Act, for the bomb hoaxes. He was given a two-year youth rehabilitation order and a two-year supervision order and told to attend 120 hours' reparation and two courses.

34. Attack fears as man 'drives car packed with gas cylinders into car park before setting himself on fire' near Sydney

The Sun (Australia), Danny Collins, 2016 07 21

Sydney - A man has driven a car packed with gas cylinders into a Sydney police station - in what police believe was a failed terrorist attack. Local media has reported that the man later set himself on fire in the car park of Merrylands police station after the vehicle failed to detonate. Aussie police have apprehended the suspect, who has not yet been identified. He is reported to have suffered burns but no one else was injured during the incident. Firefighters and police are currently on the scene in the suburb, 15 kilometres west of Sydney. Local streets were blocked off as armed officers scoured the area with police dogs. A Sydney Police statement read: "The man was arrested by officers about 8pm. "The perimeter remains in place as a precaution while officers from the Rescue and Bomb Disposal Unit attend and examine the vehicle. "No members of the public or police were injured during the operation." The incident comes just a week after a suspected ISIS-inspired terrorist drove a 19-tonne truck along Nice's promenade on Bastille Day, killing 84. (Full report)

35. Australia link in Bangladesh terror attack (Canada)

The Australian, Mark Schliebs and Greg Bearup, 2016 07 21

Sydney - Bangladesh is investigating the possibility that a man who studied at the University of NSW, and then lived in Sydney with his Australian wife and young child, may have links to a deadly attack in a Dhaka cafe early this month. Twenty hostages, two police officers and six militants were killed in the attack when men with bombs and guns burst into the Holey Artisan Bakery in Dhaka on July 1. They began firing indiscriminately and detonated several bombs. Eighteen of those killed were foreigners. It marked a steep escalation in violence in Bangladesh where Islamist militants have murdered secular bloggers, academics and non- Muslims. The New York Times reported that a list of "high value suspects" was released which contained long-time residents of Canada, Japan and Australia, "who have long been sought and suspected of setting up training and recruitment pipelines for Islamic State". The name Abu Terek Mohammad Tajuddin Kausar was on that list. Dhaka journalist Maher Satter said he spoke to Mr Tajuddin's mother, Tahera Begum, who said that her son has been living in Australia for many years after moved here in 2006. "He would return occasionally to see his family but the last time he returned was in 2013. After that they started to lose touch," Satter said.

Sydney - The police commander in charge at the bloody end of the Lindt cafe siege has conceded his fear of seeing hostages and his own officers blown up by Islamic State-inspired gunman Man Haron Monis meant he would never have ordered police to storm the venue unless a hostage was killed. The officer also agreed, under questioning at a Sydney inquest by NSW State Coroner Michael Barnes, that it took too long for him to assemble information to enable him to decide whether to launch an assault after Monis fired a shot towards escaping hostages. "The buck stops with me, Your Honour," he said yesterday. The officer agreed he was made aware almost immediately that Monis had fired his first shot, in the general direction of the escaping hostages but high, at 2.03am on December 16, 2014. But he said he had been "flying blind" in trying to work out what happened, and did not receive critical bits of information, such as that after the escape, Monis ordered hostage Tori Johnson to his knees, and soon after fired a second shot, before the third shot that killed the cafe manager.

Sydney - A Sydney man who made headlines last year after the Australian Government refused him a passport on national security grounds has been formally denied bail over terrorism charges. Kurdish journalist Renas Lelikan, 38, was charged with being a member of a listed terrorist organisation - the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), after being arrested on Wednesday. Being a member of the PKK carries a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment. Lelikan was due to appear in Parramatta Local Court via video link on Thursday, however was instead represented by his lawyer. Bail was not applied for and was formally refused, with his lawyer telling the court Lelikan intends to apply for bail next week. Australian Associated Press, Toby Mann, 2016 07 21

Sydney - An allegedly radicalised Sydney rioter whose brother died fighting for ISIS and who also has links to dead terrorist Khaled Sharrouf will be kept behind bars, despite being granted parole. Ahmed Elomar was last week granted parole after serving three years of his maximum four-year- and-eight-month sentence for bashing a police officer during the 2012 riots at Sydney's Hyde Park. But the state government was convinced to lodge an appeal after considering a submission from the Commissioner of Corrective Services NSW, who opposed the 33-year-old's release, Minister for Corrections David Elliot said on Wednesday. Fears he has been radicalised and worries about the community's safety were at the centre of the government's opposition to his release, which was heard in the NSW Supreme Court on Thursday. The barrister representing the minister, Lester Fernandez SC, told the court Elomar had links to Australian terrorist Khaled Sharrouf through his uncle Mohamed Elomar. He also had photographs of his brother, who is also named Mohamed and allegedly died while fighting overseas for ISIS, the court heard.

Kabul - Amid a surge in Taliban insurgency, a number of military and political analysts Wednesday pressed the Afghan government to enforce stricter measures to curb the funding sources of Taliban operatives and other terrorist organizations active in the country. They said that the Taliban finance their war machine through illicit drug smuggling and a range of other illicit dealings in their strongholds. "Afghanistan's surveillance and intelligence organs should work together at a district level to tackle the issue and to find out who really provides financial support to them (insurgents)," said military analyst Mirza Mohammad Yarmand. Mian Kamran, chairman of the 'Move on Pakistan' party, was taken into custody in a predawn police raid on charges of vilifying armed forces and trying to foment disorder, a private television channel said. A case had been registered against him at police stations in Lahore and Faisalabad cities in Punjab province and in Islamabad. A police detail from Lahore arrested him. The banners, which bore pictures of army chief General Raheel Sharif, had drawn strong reaction from mainstream political parties of the country. 44. Libyan forces locked in fierce fight with Islamic State in Sirte

Washington Post, Missy Ryan, 2016 07 21

Washington - Forces loyal to Libya's fragile unity government are laying siege to Islamic State militants in the city of Sirte, a senior official said Wednesday, as fighters from the group's strongest affiliate put up stiff resistance to a Western-backed offensive there. The extremists, who took over the coastal city last year, are now holed up in a conference center in central Sirte after forces aligned with the unity government in Tripoli reclaimed other areas of the city in recent weeks, said Mohamed Taher Siyala, the government's foreign minister. About 250 members of the pro-government forces have been killed, and more than 1,000 wounded, Siyala said. He did not have figures for militant losses but said some had been arrested and others were thought to have fled to the south. Government-aligned fighters have had trouble advancing farther because militants have sown the area with booby traps and bombs, and the opposing forces, who are mostly part-time or militia fighters, lack skills and equipment required to disarm them. "We are patient," Siyala said. "We are trying to cut electricity, to cut food."

46. 3 Convicted Over Rallies in Hong Kong

New York Times, Alan Wong, Michael Forsythe, 2016 07 21

Hong Kong - Three leaders of Hong Kong's massive student-led demonstrations in 2014 were found guilty on Thursday of charges stemming from their roles in events that set off 79 days of defiant street protests for free elections in the self-governing Chinese territory. Joshua Wong, 19, the bespectacled public face of the demonstrations, was found guilty of unlawful assembly, as was a fellow student leader, Alex Chow, 25. Nathan Law, 23, who is seeking to win a seat in Hong Kong's legislature in the September elections, was found guilty of inciting people to take part in an assembly, a charge on which Mr. Wong was acquitted. The judge, June Cheung, released the three men on bail until their sentencing, which is set for Aug. 15. They face a maximum of two years in prison although the ultimate punishment may be considerably lighter; the judge is seeking a report from probation officers on whether community service might be a suitable alternative. The charges stemmed from actions on the night of Sept. 26, 2014, when the trio led a group of students to break into a recently fenced-in square in front of the headquarters of the Hong Kong government.

C'est chose faite depuis lundi 18 juillet, après que Syaikh Abu Wardah Santoso a été abattu par les hommes de la force spéciale " Alpha 29 " au nord de cette grosse île de l'Indonésie. Le dernier combat de Santoso, 39 ans, a eu lieu dans son île natale, dans le département de Poso - une région considérée comme l'un des principaux bastions du djihadisme indonésien. Après une journée d'incertitude quant à l'identité du " moudjahid " tué, le ministre de la sécurité Luhut Pandjaitan l'a confirmée mardi devant la presse. " Je peux vous confirmer que Santoso a été abattu. Nous avons également tué - un autre djihadiste - , il s'agit d'un certain Muchtar " , a déclaré le ministre. Selon M. Pandjaitan, la mort de Santoso vient encore un peu plus réduire la force de frappe des Moudjahidine de l'Est indonésien (MIT), le groupe extrémiste qu'il avait fondé et qui avait fait allégeance à l'organisation Etat islamique (EI) en 2014. " Ils n'ont désormais plus que 19 combattants qui se cachent dans les montagnes du centre de Sulawesi " , a-t-il affirmé.

48. Malaysia's counter-terrorism efforts draw India's attention

The Star Online, Zulkifli Abdul Rahman, 2016 07 21

Kuala Lumpur - Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi has shown serious interest in Malaysia's moderation agenda and its counter-terrorism efforts, said Deputy Prime Minister Datuk Seri Dr Ahmad Zahid Hamidi. During his 45-minute meeting with Modi on Tuesday, he said Modi asked extensively about Malaysia's de-radicalisation module, anti-terrorism legislation and welfare of Muslims. Modi told him Malaysia had vast experience in combating terrorism and extremism, and he wanted to know more about terrorism preventive laws such as the Prevention of Terrorism Act (Pota) 2015 and the Special Measures Against Terrorism in Foreign Countries Act 2015. "I explained to him that such laws are not punitive legislation, but are more preventive in nature. "He told me that despite being a smaller nation, Malaysia had contributed much to counter-terrorism efforts at the international level.

49. NIA seeks assistance of six countries in ISIS case probe (Canada).

Press Trust of India, 2016 07 21

New Delhi - The National Investigation Agency (NIA) has sought assistance from six countries, including the US, UAE and Canada, in its ongoing investigation against various suspected ISIS operatives and their terror activities in the country. The probe agency disclosed this in its charge sheet filed before District Judge Amar Nath against 16 suspected ISIS operatives, arrested from across the country allegedly on the charges of recruiting and financing people to join the terror group. The agency claimed that these accused were trying to "advance the cause of ISIS and establish Caliphate in India". It also alleged that they were seeking assistance from Maoist groups and had also planned to use forests of Telangana as hideout. It claimed that the ISIS cadres had received financial assistance through hawala transactions for purpose of organising meeting, travel expenses, recruitment and training to carryout the subversive activities of ISIS in India.

50. Park defends THAAD deployment plan again

Yonhap News Agency, Song Sang-ho, 2016 07 21

Seoul - President Park Geun-hye on Thursday defended the recent decision by Seoul and Washington to deploy an advanced U.S. antimissile system here, stressing she won't bow to "criticism and resistance" to protect the nation. Presiding over a session of the National Security Council, Park vowed to devise "all necessary measures" to protect the nation from North Korea's persistent military threats, ordering her government to be fully ready to "strongly retaliate" if provoked. The NSC meeting was convened two days after Pyongyang launched three ballistic missiles in an apparent protest against the allies' decision to deploy a Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) battery to South Korea's southern county of Seongju. "The government has made the decision to deploy THAAD as it judged that the deployment was the best way to protect the nation and the people from North Korea's threats," Park said, pointing out that there are continuing calls from some politicians and citizens to scrap the plan. "If there is any other way -- other than the deployment of THAAD -- to protect our people from North Korea's possible missile attacks, (those against THAAD should) make a proposal," the commander-in-chief added.

51. U.S., S. Korea building new paradigm of cooperation: Lippert

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 07 21

Seoul - The top U.S. diplomat in South Korea said Thursday that bilateral cooperation between Seoul and Washington is "enduring," adding that the two allies are building a "new paradigm of cooperation." Mark Lippert, the U.S. ambassador, noted that cooperation on the so-called New Frontiers including space, cyber and health would bring benefits not just to bilateral ties but also to the Asia-Pacific region as a whole. "We are working together to make a real difference in our bilateral relationship and in the global community. And a key feature of this cooperation is that it is enduring. It will survive. And it will thrive," he told a forum held in Seoul. "We are transforming our alliance. Our two countries are building a new paradigm of cooperation," he added. He emphasized the new frontiers of cooperation that U.S. President Barack Obama and South Korean President Park Geun-hye agreed to work on together in a summit held in October last year. They include such areas as space, cyber, health, energy and the environment. Lippert said that those areas represent "critical" issues for the 21st century that cover both challenges and opportunities, which cannot be tackled or enjoyed by a single country. He said that it requires deep cooperation and collaboration.

52. Whither terrorism in Bangladesh? (Canada)

Dhaka Tribune, Faiz Sobhan, 2016 07 21

Oped: After the terrorist attack on Holey Artisan Bakery on July 1, the country and the residents of Gulshan, Banani and Baridhara, sometimes referred to as the 'tri-state area', is still reeling from the shock. The law enforcement and intelligence agencies find themselves in a race against time and are undoubtedly working overtime to unearth any plots and find the perpetrators before they strike again. The authorities have gained some important information from one of the attackers involved in the Kishoreganj attack and are following up other leads. The Holey Bakery attack points to an escalation by IS members in Bangladesh to take their operations to the next level. Shaykh Abu Ibrahim al-Hanif is suspected of being Bangladeshi- Canadian Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury. He has a Bachelors degree graduate in chemistry from the University of Windsor, Ontario and around thirty years of age. There are reports that he left Canada for Bangladesh around 2013 or 2014 but not much else is known about him.

53. EU and US to investigate shock murder of Ukraine journalist

EU Observer, Andrew Rettman, 2016 07 21

Brussels - EU and US experts are to take part in the investigation of a murder of a prominent journalist in Ukraine for the sake of transparency, Ukrainian authorities have said. The international participants were invited on the order of Ukrainian president Petro Poroshenko on Wednesday (20 July), shortly after a car bomb killed Pavel Sheremet, an award-winning investigative reporter, in Kiev city centre. Khatiya Dekanoidze, the head of Ukraine's national police, later told press she had already met with forensic experts from the US Federal Bureau of Investigation to create a special task force. The killing caused shock in Ukraine and immediately reverberated in Brussels and in Washington. The EU foreign service said "a swift and transparent investigation must be carried out to bring those responsible for this crime to justice". A spokesman for the US State Department voiced "support of a full and impartial investigation that will bring those responsible to justice".

54. High-flying Russian spies banished to Siberia as punishment for 'indecent' graduation stunt where they paraded through Moscow which revealed their identities

Daily Mail (UK), Multiple reporters, 2016 07 21

London - Dozens of high-flying trainee Russian spies have been banished to the Siberian wilderness after taking part in 'indecent' graduation that compromised their identities. The agents staged a brash cavalcade of black Mercedes Gelandewagens through Moscow streets in a mafia-style show of strength to mark their graduation from the FSB Academy. They were given the choice of quitting the country's elite security service or being stationed in Chukotka or Kamchatka, and almost all of them picked the second option. Both locations are more than eight hours flying time from Moscow. A spy source said: 'It was important for the FSB leadership to teach their graduates a lesson for such a provocative behaviour.'

55. Tensions raised after journalist is killed in Ukraine car bomb attack

The Independent (UK), Natalia Zinets, 2016 07 21

Kiev - An award-winning journalist working for the online investigative website Ukrainska Pravda was killed by a car bomb in central Kiev early yesterday morning, in what Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko said was an attempt to destabilise the country. Pavel Sheremet, a Belarussian known for his criticism of his home country's leadership and his friendship with the slain Russian opposition leader Boris Nemtsov, was driving to work in the car of the website's owner when it was blown up. The killing was a throwback to the days of violence against journalists that Ukraine, under a pro-Western leadership since the 2014 Maidan protests, hoped to have shed. "It seems to me this was done with one aim in mind - to destabilise the situation in the country, possibly ahead of further events," Mr Poroshenko said in televised comments. He has asked experts from the US Federal Bureau of Investigation to join the murder investigation in the interests of "maximum transparency". Earlier, senior Interior Ministry officials said they could not rule out Russian involvement in the murder. In Moscow, Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said: "The murder of a Russian citizen and journalist in Ukraine is a very serious cause for concern."

According to the ambassador, this is a framework document to be filled with concrete areas of cooperation. "Also, our officers are trained at Canadian military colleges, which is very important because they learn to think together with Canadians, with their NATO partners in the same way. Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 07 21

Beirut - A captive Lebanese Hizbullah fighter has appeared in a video released by al-Nusra Front, al-Qaida's Syria branch, a monitor said on Wednesday. "The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights has received a copy of a video showing regime forces and allied fighters who were captured days ago at the al-Safa checkpoint in the outskirts of Rankous in the western Qalamoun region," the Observatory said. The video shows four captives, including the Lebanese Hizbullah fighter, knowing that fourteen combatants were apprehended by al-Nusra, the monitor added. The Observatory did not mention the name of the Hizbullah captive in its statement. In the video, the captives urge the Syrian army and its allies not to enter the towns of Hureira and Ifra in Wadi Barada or else the hostages would be "killed." Saudi Gazette, Mansour Al-Shihri, 2016 07 21

Riyadh - A lawyer defending 32 people facing trial on charges of spying for Iran was himself accused of committing legal excesses that include inciting hostility against the Kingdom by foreign countries. According to informed sources, the lawyer, who was not identified, violated a royal decree that incriminates support for extremist religious ideology. The lawyer was part of the legal team chosen by the accused to defend them in court. The defendants include 30 Saudis, an Iranian and an Afghan. He, however, could not defend the suspects because he never attended any court session nor did he meet with his clients in prison. After failing to defend his clients in the court, which is still trying the 32 men, the lawyer posted a number of tweets on his Twitter account from abroad. He attacked the state and cast doubts on the integrity of the Saudi judicial system. He also boasted about being the main speaker at a symposium organized by a hostile group in Germany.

62. Renewed building of West Bank security barrier leaves 'gaps' for terrorists

Jerusalem Post, Tovah Lazaroff, 2016 07 21

Jerusalem - Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's pledge Wednesday to complete 42 kilometers of the West Bank security barrier in the area of the South Hebron Hills does little to stop Palestinians from executing terror attacks against Israelis. That's because the abandoned South Hebron Hills section of the barrier that Netanyahu visited on Wednesday, which mostly hugs the Green Line, represents just a fraction of the 320 kilometer "gaps" in the West Bank security barrier. It doesn't even complete the stretch of the barrier that winds from Beersheba, through the South Hebron Hills and onward to Jerusalem. If the 42 kilometers in the South Hebron Hills are completed within a year as promised, the barrier would reach the edge of the Gush Etzion region of the West Bank and then stop, thereby leaving at least an 11 kilometer gap between the barrier and Jerusalem. The barrier around Jerusalem, is also, incomplete.

63. STL sets sentencing hearing for Akhbar, chief editor August 29

Beirut - The U.N.-backed Special Tribunal for Lebanon will determine the sentence for local daily Al-Akhbar and its editor-in-chief, who have been found guilty of contempt, during a session next month, Judge Nicola Lettieri said Wednesday. According to an STL press release, Lettieri scheduled a sentencing hearing for August 29, and invited the accused to attend the hearing. Last week, the tribunal set up to investigate the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri found Akhbar and chief editor Ibrahim al-Amin of contempt for publishing the names and photos of alleged secret witnesses in the case. Lettieri said that both the paper and its editor had "knowingly and willfully" interfered with the administration of justice by publishing the disclosed information in the Hariri case. The STL is tasked with prosecuting those responsible for the Feb. 14, 2005 bombing that killed Hariri and 21 others, plunging Lebanon into political turmoil.

Le Monde, Nicolas Chapis, Julia Pascual, et Soren Seelow, 2016 07 21

Paris - Le ministre de l'intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, s'inquiète des tensions et défend les mesures de l'exécutif Mis en cause par la droite et l'extrême droite pour sa gestion de la menace terroriste, Bernard Cazeneuve, le ministre de l'intérieur, répond dans une interview au Monde, et s'en prend à ceux qui, en pro-posant des " lois d'exception ", veulent " s'affranchir de l'Etat de droit ". La droite a immédiatement mis en cause le gouvernement après l'attentat de Nice, survenu le 14 juillet. Y a-t-il eu une faille? A Nice, la polémique a commencé dans les minutes qui ont suivi la commission de l'abject attentat. Des élus ont proféré des accusations et mis en cause les services de l'Etat. Que s'est-il passé? Un individu, qui n'était pas connu des services de renseignement, qui n'avait jamais été condamné pour des faits en lien avec le terrorisme, est passé à l'acte de manière extrêmement violente. L'enquête en cours tend à montrer qu'il s'est très récemment radicalisé, et qu'il n'avait pas combattu aux côtés de l'organisation Etat islamique- EI - . Paris - Bernard Squarcini Le directeur central du renseignement intérieur (DCRI) de 2008 à 2012 rappelle au gouvernement qu'il peut encore et doit agir. Charles Pasqua avait lancé qu'« il faut terroriser les terroristes ». Aujourd'hui, ils semblent ne plus avoir peur de rien... Nous faisons face à des individus qui ont souvent été impliqués dans la petite et moyenne délinquance. Ils ont pour consigne de ne pas se faire repérer, de masquer leur radicalisation ou encore de faire croire qu'elle s'est faite en un temps record, comme Mohamed Merah, en 2012. Nous sommes dans la taqiya et la théorie du bon voisin : on va en boîte de nuit, on boit de l'alcool... Nous devons trouver une réponse pénale et revoir totalement notre stratégie, en emprisonnant, en restreignant les libertés et en mettant hors d'état de nuire ces islamistes qui nous menacent. Les politiques doivent accepter que, pour être efficace, le renseignement ne soit jamais figé. Et encore moins politisé. Trop de choses reposent sur les seules épaules de la police et des services de renseignements.

66. « Cette loi est un compromis entre sécurité et liberté individuelle »

24 Heures (Suisse), Florent Quiquerez, 2016 07 21

Berne - Nouveau préposé fédéral à la protection des données, Adrian Lobsiger défend la loi sur le renseignement Sa nomination avait suscité quelques crispations sous la Coupole en mars dernier. D'aucuns s'inquiétaient de l'arrivée d'un ancien haut cadre de l'Office fédéral de la police (FedPol) au poste de préposé à la protection des données. A 55 ans, Adrian Lobsiger entame son mandat alors que les défis ne manquent pas en matière de défense des libertés individuelles. Première bataille: la future loi sur le renseignement, en votation le 25 septembre. Interview. Cette loi va-t-elle trop loin, comme l'estiment les opposants? Je ne suis pas là pour faire peur aux gens. Mais il faut se rendre compte que chaque Etat a la possibilité de saisir les informations de ses citoyens. La différence entre un pays démocratique comme la Suisse et un régime autoritaire, c'est que la marge de manoeuvre et les possibilités données à l'Etat de droit sont ancrées dans la loi, qui détermine le cadre procédural et les instruments de recours auprès d'une justice indépendante. Le texte qui est soumis en votation est le produit d'une longue discussion, dont l'origine remonte aux attentats du 11 septembre 2001. Nous sommes au bout de ce processus. Les libertés individuelles sont donc assez respectées? Nos services ont été consultés tout au long du processus législatif. Le résultat obtenu aujourd'hui représente un compromis entre les besoins de sécurité et la défense des libertés individuelles. Nous avons été entendus et je peux vivre avec ce compromis. La question qui se pose maintenant est la suivante: est-ce qu'on préfère le statu quo ou un changement? La majorité du parlement veut ce changement, et je respecte ce choix. Si le citoyen veut aussi donner plus de pouvoirs aux services de renseignements, alors il doit voter en faveur de ce texte. S'il veut se contenter du droit en vigueur, il doit dire non. Dans ce cas, la discussion sera très probablement close pour longtemps.

68. Des militaires français sont morts sur le sol libyen

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 07 21

Paris - L'Élysée a annoncé le décès de trois soldats dans ce pays où des membres des forces spéciales sont engagés contre Daech. Afrique du Nord Trois sous-officiers français sont morts en Libye lors de la chute d'un hélicoptère, a expliqué mercredi François Hollande. Cette annonce est la confirmation de la présence de militaires français dans ce pays, jusqu'alors jamais officiellement reconnue, même si ce secret était depuis plusieurs mois un secret de polichinelle. « La Libye connaît une instabilité dangereuse. C'est à quelques centaines de kilomètres seulement des côtes européennes. Et en ce moment même, nous menons des opérations périlleuses de renseignement » dans ce pays, a expliqué le président, sans autre précision. La date, le lieu et les conditions de la mort de ces hommes demeurent flous. François Hollande a simplement évoqué un « accident » . La presse locale avait annoncé, dès dimanche, ces décès dans un crash près de Benghazi, la grande ville de l'Est libyen. Un groupe islamiste agissant dans cette zone a affirmé avoir abattu un hélicoptère et des photos de la carcasse d'un MI35, de fabrication russe, ont été diffusées sur les réseaux sociaux. Un officier du général Khalifa Haftar, basé dans l'est de la Libye, assure que les Français ont été visés « dans le secteur de Magroun, à environ 65 kilomètres à l'ouest de Benghazi » . Le nombre exact de soldats français présents en Libye, membres du service action de la DGSE ou des forces spéciales, est inconnu, mais ils ne seraient que peu nombreux. La décision d'envoyer des forces sur le terrain aurait été prise fin 2015, alors que l'État islamique gagnait du terrain en Libye.

69. Erdogan gives himself broad powers with state of emergency

Globe and Mail, Mark MacKinnon, 2016 07 21

Turkish President Tayyip Recep Erdogan declared the start of a three-month state of emergency on Wednesday, deepening a crackdown on political opponents in the wake of a failed military coup. Among other powers, the decree allows the government to declare curfews, restrict media broadcasts and conduct on-the-spot searches. Residents and visitors will be required to carry identification at all times. Mr. Erdogan, as President, also gains the ability to pass new laws by decree, without consulting parliament. "This measure is in no way against democracy, the law and freedoms," Mr. Erdogan said in a televised statement. "On the contrary, it aims to protect and strengthen them." The decree - which was met with applause and honking from supporters of Mr. Erdogan who watched the broadcast on a large screen set up on Istanbul's central Taksim Square - also allows the Turkish military to act beyond its borders "to capture or incapacitate persons who [have] carried out [disruptive] actions in Turkey." The new measures come amid a post-coup purge in which almost 60,000 members of the military, police, civil service, judiciary, media and academia have lost their jobs since Saturday under suspicion of affiliation with the movement Mr. Erdogan blames for inspiring the putsch attempt.

70. France / Terrorisme - Attentat de Nice: les interrogatoires se poursuivent

Nice - Cinq jours après l'attentat de Nice, l'enquête continue. Repérage des lieux avant le 14 juillet, recherches sur Internet effectuées par le terroriste, l'attentat était bel et bien prémédité.

Sur les cinq personnes toujours entendues par la police, deux ont vu leur garde à vue prolongée au-delà de quatre jours : un proche du terroriste âgé de 40 ans ainsi qu'un jeune homme de 22 ans. Ce dernier se trouve être le destinataire d'un SMS envoyé le soir même de l'attentat. Dans ce message, Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlej évoque la fourniture « d'autres armes ». Après son interpellation samedi 16 juillet, son domicile a été perquisitionné. Les enquêteurs y ont trouvé de l'argent en liquide et de la cocaïne. Ce même homme a désigné un Albanais, toujours en garde à vue, comme le fournisseur du pistolet du tueur de Nice. 71. Germany is likely to face more extremist attacks, says interior minister

Berlin - Germany is likely to face more extremist attacks, its interior minister said on Wednesday, although he played down any link between the government's open-door refugee policy and an axe assault aboard a train in Bavaria two days before. "Like several EU countries, like the whole EU, Germany is also in the target area of international terrorism ... the situation is serious," said Thomas de Maiziere. Meanwhile, German authorities cast doubt over whether the teenager behind Monday's train attack was really an Afghan refugee, saying he might have been from Pakistan. Mr de Maiziere said the teenager was believed to be a "lone wolf" attacker who had been "inspired" by ISIL but was not a member of the group. "This is perhaps a case that lies somewhere between a crazed rampage and terrorism," the minister said. He said investigators were still trying to determine the true identity of the 17-year-old who was shot dead by police following the train attack in which he injured five people.

72. Germany Seeks to Calm Public After Assault on Train

Berlin - The German government on Wednesday sought to calm fears about the terror threat as more details emerged about the perpetrator of Monday's attack -- the first here claimed by Islamic State -- suggesting he would have been virtually impossible to detect. The new elements painted the 17-year-old assailant as a model immigrant who kept out of trouble and, by all appearances, was well on his way to becoming integrated. The attack by the teenager, who registered as a refugee traveling alone from Afghanistan in 2015, has rattled a country that had so far been spared a major terror attack despite welcoming over one million migrants, many from war-torn countries, last year. The news played into fears fueled by populist and conservative politicians that the record wave of newcomers, often undocumented and receiving only cursory screening, is making the country more vulnerable to terrorism and crime.

Profitant d'une visite au centre national d'entraînement des forces de gendarmerie de Saint-Astier (Dordogne), le chef de l'État a jugé que si la colère était « légitime », elle ne pouvait pas « dégénérer dans la haine et la suspicion ». « Pour conjurer la menace, nous devons plus que jamais préserver notre cohésion nationale, faire prévaloir le rassemblement sur l'essentiel, a-t-il lancé. Ce que veulent faire les fanatiques, c'est nous opposer, nous fragmenter, a-t-il ajouté. Nous ne leur offrirons pas cette opportunité. » Alors que l'opposition appelle l'exécutif à muscler encore le dispositif sécuritaire, le président a une nouvelle fois défendu son bilan, plaidant pour « mettre en oeuvre » ce qui existe, avant d'« imaginer d'autres lois ». « Nous sommes résolus à prendre toutes les mesures utiles pour protéger les Français dans le respect de nos règles démocratiques, a-t-il précisé.

76. Swiss authorities indict 13 Tamil Tiger supporters for supporting LTTE

Colombo Page, News Desk, 2016 07 21

Bern - The Office of the Attorney General of Switzerland has indicted 13 accused associated with Sri Lanka's terrorist group Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) for providing financial support to the organization through a sophisticated microcredit system. The 13 accused, who come from Switzerland, Germany and Sri Lanka, have been charged with supporting and or being members of a criminal organization, fraud, false certification, and money laundering, the Switzerland Attorney General's office said today. According to the Switzerland Attorney General's office, at the time of the offences, the LTTE was acting through a Swiss offshoot known as the World Tamil Coordinating Committee. This in turn acted through cantonal representatives. As a result of the continuing civil war in Sri Lanka, the LTTE's financial needs increased considerably. Accordingly, LTTE leaders in Switzerland devised and implemented a systematic and rapid method for obtaining money from the Tamil diaspora in Switzerland.

77. Turkey's Erdogan declares state of emergency after coup bid

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 07 21

Istanbul - Turkish President Tayyip Erdogan declared a state of emergency on Wednesday as he widened a crackdown against thousands of members of the security forces, judiciary, civil service and academia after a failed military coup. Erdogan said the state of emergency, lasting three months, would allow his government to take swift and decisive measures against supporters of the coup and was allowed under the constitution. Emergency rule, which would take effect after it is published in Turkey's official gazette, would allow the president and cabinet to bypass parliament in passing new laws and to limit or suspend rights and freedoms as they deem necessary. Before announcing the state of emergency, Erdogan said the sweep was not yet over and that he believed foreign countries might have been involved in the attempt to overthrow him. Around a third of Turkey's roughly 360 serving generals have been detained since the coup attempt, a second senior official said, with 99 charged pending trial and 14 more being held. The Defence Ministry is investigating all military judges and prosecutors, and has suspended 262 of them, broadcaster NTV reported, while 900 police officers in the capital, Ankara, were also suspended on Wednesday. The purge also extended to civil servants in the environment and sports ministries. More than 20,000 teachers and administrators have been suspended from the Education Ministry. One hundred intelligence officials, 492 people from the Religious Affairs Directorate, 257 at the prime minister's office and 300 at the Energy Ministry have been removed from duty.

78. Turkish Leader Declares a State of Emergency

New York Times, Ben Hubbard, Ceylan Yeginsu, 2016 07 21

Ankara - Turkey's president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, declared a three-month state of emergency on Wednesday that gave the state extra powers to pass laws as the authorities pursue individuals suspected of attempting to topple his government. The declaration followed the firing and suspension of tens thousands of soldiers, educators and civil servants in recent days on suspicion of complicity in the failed coup last week. In a televised address on Wednesday evening, Mr. Erdogan said the extra powers were needed to protect Turkey's democracy, and he criticized Western nations who have accused his government of overreaching in its efforts to root out opponents. "The aim is to rapidly and effectively take all steps needed to eliminate the threat against democracy, the rule of law and the people's rights and freedoms," Mr. Erdogan said. "This measure is in no way against democracy, the law and freedoms," he added. "On the contrary, it aims to protect and strengthen them."

1. Where Is The Accountability For Ottawa's Communications Spies?

Huffington Post, Monia Mazigh, 2016 07 22

Commentary: The Communications Security Establishment (CSE) Commissioner report has been just released. For those who don't know what the CSE is, it is the agency related to the Department of National Defence that spies on communications received from abroad. In their own words, their work focuses on "collecting foreign signals intelligence in support of the Government of Canada's priorities, and on helping protect the computer networks and information of greatest importance to Canada." It is important to emphasize that CSE is not supposed to spy on communication of Canadians in Canada or abroad. In that regard, the commissioner's mandate is mainly to review CSE activities and their compliance with the law, and in the case of complaints, to undertake investigation. However, the commissioner report, which is supposed to be an independent exercise conducted by a review body, seems more and more like a self-congratulatory document where criticism directed at the CSE or its activities is hard to find. The situation can be compared to a professor rating her own students in a national competition. Of course, she would like them to pass, and of course she would be lenient in marking. Rather, in such circumstances we need a professor from a different school, and the students' names should be hidden. In previous years, two main problems became clear to the public in regard to CSE activities: The stipulations protecting the privacy of Canadians are not always respected, as CSE was reminded by Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien. The lack of safeguards when it comes to information sharing with other agencies -- the Canada Security Intelligence Agency (CSIS), for example. Indeed, in defence of the CSE's activities, Minister of National Defence Harjit Sajjan recently minimized the amount of information revealed through metadata, usually collected by CSE during its operations. Metadata, or data on data, shouldn't be of a privacy concern for Canadians, according to minister Sajjan. Leaving it up to the minister in charge to decide what is acceptable and what is not, or what is lawful and what is not, is far from a democratic and accountable model. We need review mechanisms with the necessary autonomy, independence and structure to create true accountability. For instance, the ambiguous relationship between CSE and CSIS, described in the report, can't be investigated by any review body. There are currently agencies to oversee respectively CSIS (SIRC) and the CSE (the office of the CSE commissioner), but there is no "super-SIRC" to oversees them both and launch investigations on both of them. The parliamentary oversight presented by the government in Bill C-22 isn't clear if this aspect will be included in its mandate.

3. Donald Trump's NATO comments 'not helpful', says Harjit Sajjan

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 07 22

Ottawa - Donald Trump's comments that, if elected president, the U.S. wouldn't automatically come to the aid of allies are "not helpful," Canada's defence minister says. The presumptive Republican nominee said this week that some NATO members aren't spending enough on defence and instead relying on the U.S. to protect them. That would change if he's elected, Trump told the New York Times. While Trump appeared to be directing his comments at European allies, Canada spends less than one per cent of its gross domestic product on defence. That is half the NATO target and puts Canada near the back of the pack among the alliance's 28 members. In an interview with The Canadian Press, Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan defended NATO and Canada's military contributions. He pointed to Canada's recent promise to lead a NATO force in Latvia and its role in the fight against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant as proof the country is pulling its weight.

4. Feds looking to keep criminals, spies out of trusted traveller programs

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 07 22

Ottawa - Smuggling drugs, hate propaganda or people across the border could get you a lifetime ban from a trusted traveller program like Nexus under planned new rules. The Canada Border Services Agency has launched a month-long consultation on proposals that clearly spell out what will bar people from joining a program - or get them kicked out. Trusted traveller programs are intended to speed the flow of low-risk, known citizens across borders by steering them into express queues, giving security officers more time to focus limited resources on those who may pose a higher risk. Nexus, with more than 1.3 million members, is jointly administered by the Canadian and U.S. border agencies. The Canpass Air program allows permanent residents and citizens of Canada and the United States to enter Canada through major airports. Currently, someone must be "of good character" to become a trusted traveller. Under the amendments, that provision would be replaced with a detailed list of eight criteria - from a drug smuggling conviction to espionage allegations - that could prevent membership.

5. Goodale shows no sign of meeting demands of hunger-striking immigration detainees

Canadian Press, Colin Perkel, 2016 07 22

Toronto -- Dozens of immigration detainees have entered a dangerous phase of their protest hunger strike, but there was little sign Thursday that the federal government would meet their demands. Among those demands are an immediate meeting with Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale and a 90-day limit on such detentions. "Sometimes, it feels like we're being kidnapped and held against our own wills," Richard Chinedu Abuwa said over the phone from the Central East Correctional Centre, where he has been for more than two years. "Some of us sit here for months, years, and years upon end not knowing what our futures hold for us, and it just really sucks." Abuwa was one of more than 50 detainees who began refusing food - and in some cases liquids as well - 11 days ago. As of Wednesday, the federal government said, 15 detainees at the Central East Correctional Centre in Lindsay, Ont., were still refusing meals. Dr. Michelle Fraser, one of 65 health-care professionals who wrote to Goodale last week urging he meet the detainees and end indefinite detentions, warned the hunger strikers could soon start suffering serious, potentially lethal health effects. "It is shameful that 50 immigration detainees must resort to a hunger strike to capture the attention of the Canadian government," Fraser said. "This hunger strike is a sign of the desperation."

Les causes de cette situation inacceptable sont multiples, croit le dirigeant syndical. En commençant par les conservateurs Stephen Harper et Tony Clement, qui «n'ont jamais écouté les avis des syndicats», en passant par de hauts fonctionnaires qui «ont obéi aux ordres de peur de perdre leur emploi s'ils avaient osé donner l'heure juste», et du gouvernement libéral qui n'a jamais voulu entendre raison «pour freiner l'implantation de la deuxième phase», en avril dernier.

7. Ontario Arabic paper probed for hate crime

National Post, Joe O'Connor, 2016 07 22

London - Police in London, Ont., are investigating a possible hate crime after an article appeared in an Arabic-language community newspaper that said Jews inflated the number of Holocaust victims from between "100,000 and 600,000" to six million. Beneath the headline "The Question Which Everyone Ignores: Why Did Hitler Kill the Jews?", the article in the June/July edition of Al Saraha also blames the Jews for Germany's "economic collapse" in the 1920s and for promoting "promiscuity ... homosexuality ... every type of sexual deviance." "This Jewish propaganda succeeded," the article says, "until it became prevalent throughout the media that six million Jews were victims of Hitler, even though the total number of Jews in Germany was less than a quarter of this figure that they say Hitler burned!" The article was reprinted from al-Masry al-Youm, an Egyptian daily newspaper operating in a notoriously anti-Semitic media landscape. Al Saraha is distributed in Middle Eastern restaurants and grocery stores throughout the Greater London area. It is recommended as a source for immigrant news by the London and Middlesex Local Immigration Partnership, an Ontario government-funded agency. London Const. Chris Loizides said "steps" are being taken to see "whether (the article) qualifies as a Criminal Code offence inciting hatred, promoting hatred or, on the contrary, is it free speech." A local member of the Arab-Canadian community initially alerted B'nai Brith, the Jewish human rights and advocacy group, about the article.

8. Phoenix pay system to blame for twice breaching public servants' private data, says deputy minister

CBC.CA, Katie Simpson, 2016 07 22

Ottawa - Public servants had their private information breached twice when Ottawa launched its new computerised pay system, the government said Thursday. The deputy minister of Public Works, Marie Lemay, confirmed the incidents in an open letter to staff posted on the department's web site Thursday afternoon. The statement comes two days after CBC News first reported on privacy problems caused by 'Phoenix'. "Our Departmental Oversight Branch thoroughly reviewed these situations and determined that they posed low risk to employee privacy," Lemay wrote. "There was no evidence that employee personal information ever left the hands of federal employees or government contractors." The implementation of Phoenix has also been blamed for significant pay problems affecting more than 80,000 federal government employees. Lemay's letter said the first breach took place between March and July of 2015. Employee names, pay amounts, and 'Personal Record Identifiers', known as (PRI), were "inadvertently used by IBM to test the system during the development phase of Phoenix," the post said. "This information was immediately deleted as soon as the issue was detected. In addition, the employee information consisted of scrambled data that would have required technical expertise and significant time to make it readable." The incident was reported to the Privacy Commissioner, and was published in the 2015-2016 annual report on the Privacy Act.

Guantanamo's Child was co-directed by Shephard and Patrick Reed, and produced by White Pine Pictures. Based on her book about Omar Khadr by the same name, the documentary premiered at the 2015 Toronto International Film Festival. They are nominated in a category recognizing outstanding long-form coverage of current affairs and news. "This is a huge honour for everyone who worked hard to make this film. It wasn't an easy one to make," said Shephard, who is currently on leave for the yearlong Atkinson Fellowship, during which she's exploring topics including the radicalization of youth. "At a time when the world seems even more divided and we use hashtags to discuss terrorism and civil rights, we're just thrilled such as documentary is being recognized."

10. Système de paye Phénix Ottawa confirme deux cas «d'atteinte à la vie privée»

Le Droit, Julien Paquette, 2016 07 22

Ottawa - La sous-ministre de Services publics et Approvisionnement Canada, Marie Lemay, a confirmé jeudi que le système de paye Phénix a connu des brèches de sécurité. Dans une lettre publiée sur le site web du ministère, à la suite d'un reportage de CBC, Mme Lemay soutient que deux cas «d'atteinte à la vie privée» sont survenus durant la «mise en oeuvre préliminaire de Phénix», soit entre mars et juillet 2015 et entre février et avril 2016. «Je comprends que les employés soient préoccupés par la situation, et je tiens à vous assurer que nous prenons très au sérieux la protection des renseignements personnels des employés. Lorsque nous prenons connaissance d'un cas d'atteinte à la vie privée, nous suivons une approche systématique pour nous attaquer aux causes et aux conséquences», affirme Marie Lemay dans sa lettre. La sous-ministre précise que les évaluations de la direction générale de la surveillance de son ministère ont révélé que les brèches représentaient un risque faible d'atteinte à la vie privée. Toujours selon Mme Lemay, rien ne permet de croire que «les renseignements personnels des employés avaient été consultés par d'autres personnes que des fonctionnaires ou des entrepreneurs du gouvernement». Une analyse du Commissariat à la protection de la vie privée a d'ailleurs permis d'en apprendre davantage sur les deux brèches. La première touchait les noms, le salaire et le code d'identification de dossier personnel (CIDP) des employés. Ils ont été utilisés par erreur par IBM au moment de tester le système. Les renseignements utilisés ont ensuite été supprimés.

11. Turkey urges Canada to act against group it blames for failed coup

Globe and Mail, Joe Friesen, 2016 07 22

Ottawa - The Turkish government is calling on Canada to "take the necessary steps" to address what it describes as a terrorist organization responsible for last week's failed coup. Turkish Consul-General Erdeniz Sen told The Globe and Mail's editorial board Thursday that his country, which has detained thousands of people since the attempted coup, has "concrete evidence" that the followers of the religious cleric Fethullah Gulen, who now lives in self-imposed exile in the United States, are behind the plot. Mr. Gulen has denied involvement. Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan said earlier this week that Mr. Gulen's followers constitute a terrorist organization that has infiltrated the military and public service. About 60,000 soldiers, police, judges, civil servants, teachers and academics have been suspended, detained or placed under investigation since the coup was put down, measures that have alarmed human-rights advocates around the world. Mr. Sen declined to say whether there are specific actions it has asked the Canadian government to take, but said it's a subject his country has raised routinely with its Canadian counterparts in the context of terrorist threats. He wouldn't discuss whether there is a Gulen movement in Canada, saying only that it is "everywhere." "The Canadian authorities know the elements. U.S. authorities know the elements. We want from our allies and partners to take the necessary measures about this organization," Mr. Sen said, referring to what he called the Fethullah Gulen terrorist organization.

12. A reality check on the Middle East from America's spy chief

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 07 22

Column - America's top spymaster offered contrarian assessments of some key issues: warning against "hyping" the threat posed by the Syrian al-Qaeda affiliate (terrorist group) Jabhat al-Nusra, cautioning against Obama administration plans to share intelligence with Russia on Syrian targets and questioning Turkish claims that last Friday's coup attempt was organized by a cleric living in the United States. National Intelligence Director James Clapper made the characteristically blunt comments in an interview Wednesday. He expanded on a warning he made in an interview in May that the United States can't by itself "fix" the problems of the turbulent Middle East. Clapper's skeptical view is shared by President Obama and has reinforced the administration's wariness about committing military force in Syria. Clapper began the wide-ranging discussion by questioning the recent "groundswell" of concern about Jabhat al-Nusra. He said that the Syrian al-Qaeda affiliate poses only a "nascent" danger to the U.S. homeland and "doesn't approach the threat" posed by the Islamic State. Jabhat al-Nusra's ability to attack the United States and Europe is "aspirational" rather than "imminent," he said, describing as overly "strident" recent news reports about increasing evidence of external plots by the group. Asked whether Turkish allegations that cleric Fethullah Gulen planned the attempted coup passed the "smell test" of credibility, Clapper answered: "No. Not to me." He said that Secretary of State John F. Kerry "was right on the ball" to press the Turks to back up their extradition request with evidence of Gulen's involvement. "We haven't seen it yet. We certainly haven't seen it in intel."

13. Donald Trump's Remarks Rattle NATO Allies and Stoke Debate on Cost Sharing

New York Times, Sewell Chan, 2016 07 22

London - Donald J. Trump's statement that the United States might not come to the defense of NATO allies that do not foot their share of the bill fueled anxiety on Thursday in a Europe that is already deeply unsettled about Russia's assertive posture, Britain's decision to withdraw from the European Union and the rise of inward-looking populist and nationalist parties. In an interview with The New York Times, Mr. Trump suggested that if elected president he would use a country's level of military spending as a factor in deciding whether the United States would honor its commitment to defend any member nation that comes under attack. While President Obama and other American officials have also pressed European countries in recent years to increase military spending in line with their commitments to NATO, Mr. Trump more explicitly linked financial considerations to the strategic response he would order as president in the event of an attack by Russia. His comments left some European officials concerned that the United States under Mr. Trump would edge away from the security guarantees that Washington has provided to the Continent since World War II. But they also stoked the debate over cost sharing after years in which Europe had been slow to meet its commitments on military spending. Jens Stoltenberg, NATO's secretary general and a former prime minister of Norway, said that he "will not interfere in the U.S. election campaign," but made clear that he was alarmed by Mr. Trump's remarks. "Solidarity among allies is a key value for NATO," he said in a statement. "This is good for European security and good for U.S. security. We defend one another. We have seen this in Afghanistan, where tens of thousands of European, Canadian and partner-nation troops have stood shoulder to shoulder with U.S. soldiers."

14. How the Real Edward Snowden Helped Write the Ending to Oliver Stone's 'Snowden'

The Daily Beast, Jen Yamato, 2016 07 22

Washington - The NSA's worst nightmare made his San Diego Comic-Con debut by way of video chat, moments after the first public screening of Oliver Stone's Snowden. "The FBI actually gets a copy of this talk because we're going through Google Hangouts, which unfortunately has a sort of built-in surveillance capability," joked Edward Snowden, his face peering down on a theater full of critics and journalists. He joined Stone and stars Joseph Gordon-Levitt and Shailene Woodley from Moscow, his home for the foreseeable future, "live--from the internet." Snowden tracks the NSA analyst as he wrestles with the decision to blow the lid off of the U.S. government's top-secret global surveillance program, an act that made him persona non grata in America and changed history. The telling of this historic expose, co-scripted by Stone and Kieran Fitzgerald, is authorized by Snowden, who appears as himself in the final coda. Snowden makes its official world premiere in September at the Toronto Film Festival, so bringing a tech-oriented political thriller to a July geekfest filled with superhero fans in spandex cosplay was a curious move. But its official release, timed for a fall Oscar berth, is not slated until September 16th. Snowden ...confirmed that life as an international fugitive isn't all that terrible. "I can confirm that I'm not living in a box," he said. "I actually live a surprisingly free life." "I love my country. I love the things that we try to do," he declared. "I have serious policy disagreements with some agencies of government, particularly senior officials. The working level guys by and large are good people trying to do the best they can. But they're often ordered more or less to do bad things, for what they believe to be a good reason."

In the opening remarks for the conference, US secretary of state John Kerry welcomed the attendees - a who's who in the corridors of power, from the UK's new foreign secretary Boris Johnson as well as heads of state from countries including France, Finland, Sweden, Canada, Japan, Kuwait and Australia, as well as the FBI and military leaders. Mr Kerry said: "We are engaged in an historic effort. Nothing like this coalition has ever before been assembled. And we're not following a manual on antiterrorist coalition-building, we're writing it." Mr Kerry likened Isis to a bacteria or a virus, "resilient" and adaptable to changing conditions. It requires a multi-faceted attack -an attack against its supply lines, its oil facilities, tanker trucks and cash storage sites.

16. Snowden to Help Develop a Safer Phone for Journalists

New York Times, John Markoff, 2016 07 22

Cambridge, Mass. - The former National Security Agency contractor Edward J. Snowden said Thursday that he planned to help develop a modified version of Apple's iPhone for journalists who are concerned that they may be the target of government surveillance. The announcement was made during a one-day conference on "Forbidden Research" held at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Media Lab. Mr. Snowden, who spoke via a video connection from Russia, where he is living in exile, said he was working with Andrew Huang, a computer hacker known as Bunnie who studied electrical engineering at M.I.T., to see if it would be possible to modify a smartphone to alert journalists working in dangerous environments to electronic surveillance. Mr. Snowden, who is a board member of a nonprofit group called the Freedom of the Press Foundation, said he was concerned that cellphones and smartphones serve as tracking devices that automatically create electronic dossiers that give third parties, including governments, detailed information on location. As an example of the dangers of location data, he cited the mortar attack in 2012 by the Syrian government that killed Marie Colvin, an American journalist who was reporting in Homs, Syria, for The Sunday Times of London. "The radio frequency emissions of her communications that she used to file those news reports were intercepted by the Syrian Army," he said.

17. Trump says help for NATO allies would depend on their spending (Canada)

Washington Post, Carol Morello, Adam Taylor, 2016 07 22

Washington - Presidential candidate Donald Trump has set off alarm bells with a suggestion that a Trump administration would not automatically defend fellow members of NATO from a Russian attack if they have not lived up to their financial obligations. Trump, in an interview transcript published Thursday in the New York Times, went beyond his earlier assertions that he might reconsider the U.S. role as one of 28 nations in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, because many European countries are not spending enough on defense. When asked whether he would provide military aid to the Baltic countries if Russia were to attack, Trump replied, "If they fulfill their obligations to us, the answer is yes." Trump was more vague when asked what he would do if the answer were no. "Well, I'm not saying if not," he said. "I'm saying, right now there are many countries that have not fulfilled their obligations to us." Though U.S. administrations have for decades complained that Europe is getting a free ride, Trump's comments represented a repudiation of Article 5, the heart of the alliance, that an attack on one is considered an attack on all. Article 5 was first invoked after the terrorist attacks against the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, and is the reason European and Canadian troops were sent to Afghanistan. "There's no question the NATO allies could be doing more," said James Goldgeier, dean of the School of International Service at American University. "But nobody ever said we're going to pick and choose who we're going to defend based on how much they're spending. The alliance would unravel if everyone did that."

Washington Post, Valerie Strauss, 2016 07 22

Washington - The government of Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has asked education officials in Texas and California to investigate publicly funded charter schools in those states that it says are linked to a Muslim cleric living in the United States, a man the government alleges was the mastermind of a coup attempt this month. The Turkish government also is planning to bring more complaints in other parts of the United States. The Erdogan government, through the international law firm Amsterdam & Partners, recently filed a formal complaint with the Texas Education Agency against a charter network called Harmony Public Schools, which operates 46 math, science and technology campuses in Texas and has received more than $250 million in federal and state money. Turkey alleges that the Harmony schools are part of a network of more than 160 charter schools in more than 25 states started by Turkish men, all said to be inspired by Fethullah Gulen, the preacher who lives in seclusion in Pennsylvania. The complaint in Texas alleges, among other things, that the schools have abused public funds, funneled money to Gulen's movement - known as Hizmet (or "service") - violated legal requirements surrounding open and competitive bidding and discriminated against employees on the basis of national origin and gender. Officials at the Harmony schools - the first of the network of charters said to be Gulen-inspired - have repeatedly denied any connection to Gulen or any intent to proselytize at the schools. Soner Tarim, a co-founder and chief executive of Harmony Public Schools, said the allegations against the successful charter schools are false.

19. White nationalists and other 'alt-right' activists are feeling more at home

Washington Post, David Weigel, 2016 07 22

Cleveland - Geert Wilders strolled toward Quicken Loans Arena, drawing the usual amount of double takes. Clad in a trim blue suit, wearing sunglasses under his silver-blond coif, he stopped to talk to Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa) and a small crowd of foreign journalists began to gather. "He heads the Freedom Party in the Netherlands," King explained to a delegate who was wondering about the fuss. "A little bit of controversy here and there, but who among us hasn't created some?" In another year, the far-right Wilders would not have made it past the Republican National Convention's perimeter. He has proposed moratoriums on new Muslim immigration to his country and a similar halt on mosque construction. "I don't hate Muslims," he has said. "I hate Islam." But the rise and nomination of Donald Trump had inspired Wilders - and expanded his American fan base. He was just one of many people who might have been labeled extremists, and whose views are rejected by the old elite of the Republican Party, but who attended the convention and related events with a sense that their politics were finally winning. "I was at a McDonald's, having a hamburger, and I asked the young person who served me, 'Are you going to vote?'" Wilders said. "He told me: 'Sir, I've never voted, but for the first time in my life I have registered. I will vote for Trump. I feel that he's addressing the problems.' It's the same that you see in the Netherlands - my party, being the strongest, is supported by the people who never voted before."

20. Boris Johnson once outed MI6 spy 'for a laugh'

Politics.co.uk, Adam Bienkov, 2016 07 20

London - There was some nervousness in the Foreign Office when it was announced that Boris Johnson had been made foreign secretary. Part of Johnson's new role involves overseeing MI6. This is a highly sensitive and delicate task which some within his department worry he is unsuited for. A piece by Adam Boulton in this week's Sunday Times also claimed that responsibility for MI6 was "being quietly shifted to the prime minister and National Security Council". However, the Foreign Office strongly denied this yesterday, telling Politics.co.uk that there were no plans to strip the department of responsibility for the secret service. "As has been long standing practice, responsibility for SIS and GCHQ lies with the foreign secretary. This has not changed and will not change," a spokesperson said.

21. France tells us how not to counter extremism

The Independent (UK), Frank Foley, 2016 07 22

Op-ed - In the wake of the Nice attack, doubts have been raised once again about the tough French approach to countering extremism. Less commented on is the fact that the UK Government is pursuing anti-extremism policies that come straight out the French playbook. Whether it is "disrupting" non-violent extremism, or making Muslims feel that they are increasingly being monitored, the French authorities have been implementing hard-line policies for decades - and it has not done them any good. The UK Government's pursuit of French-style tactics is unusual if you consider the two countries' chequered history on matters of terrorism. When France was attacked by jihadist militants in the mid-1990s, it launched an unrelenting crackdown on extremist circles. French officials also poured scorn on "Londonistan" across the English Channel, where radicals were allowed to roam free. When London was hit by the 7/7 bombings in 2005, France told Britain (with some justification) that "we told you so" and maintained its own draconian response to terrorism. The British ramped up counterterrorism policies after 7/7. Yet my research indicates that the UK's response to jihadist terrorism has generally remained more proportionate than that of the French - and arguably with better results. Both countries still have a considerable problem of radicalisation, but France has faced a wave of terrorist attacks since 2012 unparalleled in any other western country. Something has been going seriously wrong in its efforts to combat extremism. Note: Frank Foley is a lecturer in the department of war studies at King's College London and author of "Countering Terrorism in Britain and France: Institutions, Norms and the Shadow Of The Past".

22. Military on alert after serviceman escapes kidnap attempt

London Times, Deborah Haynes, John Simpson, 2016 07 22

London - Military personnel were on terror alert last night after an RAF serviceman fought off two men who tried to abduct him close to an airbase in Norfolk. In an assault that revived fears of a Lee Rigby-style attack, the victim, who is married and in his late twenties, escaped being dragged into a car by tackling the first attacker to the ground. The serviceman sprinted off before the second man, armed with a military-style knife, could catch him during the confrontation close to RAF Marham on Wednesday afternoon. The suspects are still being hunted. Detective Superintendent Paul Durham, from the Norfolk and Suffolk major investigation team, said that terrorism may have been the motive for the attack but it could have been a non terrorism-related abduction or attempted robbery. Norfolk police urgently want to locate the dark-coloured people carrier used by the suspects, who were of Middle Eastern appearance. The vehicle could have been a Ford Galaxy.

23. One in ten become victims of cybercrime

London Times, Richard Ford, 2016 07 21

London - One in ten adults have been victims of fraud or computer misuse offences, according to official figures published today. An estimated 5.8 million fraud and cyberoffences are committed annually, pushing the overall crime figures in England and Wales to more than 12 million. The first official estimate of the scale of online shopping scams, virus attacks, ticket frauds, computer hacking and theft of bank details along with credit and bank card fraud shows that fraud is the most common crime experienced by the public. The chance of being a victim of victim of fraud is the same regardless of class, region and whether a person lives in a rural or urban area, according to the Crime Survey of England and Wales. Official crime figures from the Office for National Statistics (ONS) showed that excluding fraud and cybercrime, there were 6.3 million crimes in the 12 months to March 2016, a fall of 6 per cent.

24. 'Car-bomb' attacker targets police station

The Australian, Simone Fox Koob, 2016 07 22

Canberra - A man claiming to have a bomb drove a car laden with gas cylinders last night into the underground car park of a western Sydney police station that has been the target of terror threats. Terrified witnesses were told by police to run after hearing a "loud bang" at the Merrylands station at about 7pm. Police with guns drawn used fire extinguishers to douse the blaze as the man attempted to set the makeshift car bomb alight. A man was arrested about an hour later after a tense standoff with police. He was taken under police escort to hospital in a serious condition, suffering burns. NSW Police said no officers or bystanders had been injured. The Bomb Disposal Unit assessed the car as police set up a perimeter around the station. Authorities believe that the would-be bomber, a man in his 60s, has mental health problems but counter- terrorism police were to be called in to help local investigators determine the motive for the attack. However, late last night police said terrorism or violent extremism was "not one of our lines of inquiry". "There is nothing to indicate this is in any way related to terrorism," said Assistant Commissioner Dennis Clifford. "We keep an open mind but we are not leaning that way at this stage." He would not release any more details about the attacker or his motivation, saying only there was "nothing to indicate he is linked to anyone else". Mr Clifford said police had been on high alert. He paid tribute to officers at the station.

25. $30k travel bill for new boss

New Zealand Herald, Nicholas Jones, 2016 07 22

Wellington - The GCSB director has racked up a travel bill of more than $30,000 after little more than two months in the job. Andrew Hampton has released his travel and hospitality expenses for the year ending June 30, along with other public service chief executives. They have also outlined what gifts they received - including craft beer, apples, kiwifruit and mince pies, merino socks and tickets to the Royal Edinburgh Military Tattoo. And while one chief executive spent $5185 on taxis, Chai Chuah, the director-general of health, takes the Airbus from Auckland Airport. A disclosure regime for chief executive expenses, gifts and hospitality was introduced by the State Services Commissioner in 2010. Between his start date on April 26 and June 30, Hampton spent $29,000 on international travel and nearly $1000 on domestic trips. "Every year there are a series of meetings between foreign intelligence agencies. My arrival at the GCSB coincided with these meetings, which I attended in Europe and the United States. These are annual meetings that previous directors have also attended," Hampton said.

26. Agencies to focus on 'lone wolves'

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 07 22

Canberra - Malcolm Turnbull has ordered Australia's counter- terrorism agencies to urgently develop a strategy to prevent rapidly radicalised terrorists carrying out Nice-style attacks in public areas. The government has been advised that the threat of an attack by "lone-wolf" terrorists using a truck or knife and potentially causing scores of casualties could last for decades. Senior sources have told The Australian the Prime Minister is particularly concerned that while it would be hard for a terrorist to obtain a cache of automatic weapons here, an attack using a vehicle as a weapon could cause devastating casualties. Mr Turnbull has called in counter-terrorism co-ordinator Greg Moriarty and directed him to quickly identify lessons for Australia arising from the Bastille Day attack in Nice, in which Tunisian Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel ploughed a truck through a crowd that had been watching fireworks, killing more than 80 people, including 10 children. A key aspect of Mr Moriarty's report will be to advise on how vulnerable Australia's public areas are, and how authorities can protect open areas where large numbers congregate. Security agencies believe Lindt cafe attacker Man Haron Monis, who converted from Shia to Sunni Islam in the days before the siege, might fit that profile. Mr Moriarty said the threat was deep, global and multidimensional and Mr Turnbull had discussed "the need to position the country to be both secure and united, not just for tomorrow or next year but for ... generations". He said a "one size fits all" approach would not succeed.

27. Balance between terror, mental health: PM

Australian Associated Press, 2016 07 22

Canberra - Greater access to mental health files could be on the table as part of a review into lone-wolf terrorism in Australia. Malcolm Turnbull has asked his top counter-terrorism adviser Greg Moriarty for ideas on how to prevent lone-wolf attacks in the aftermath of the Nice massacre and Sydney's Lindt cafe siege. Agencies will be asked to take a fresh look at their terrorist investigation watchlists to see if there are connections with mental health concerns or a history of crime. The prime minister says police and security services can already access mental health records where there is suspicion of terrorist activities. But asked whether the government wanted access to mental health files of those considered at risk of committing a terrorist act, the prime minister said his first priority was to ensure Australians were safe. He admitted it would be a huge step. "It's important that this be looked at carefully," Mr Turnbull told 3AW on Friday.

28. Home raided after burning car slams into security door

ABC (Australia), 2016 07 22

Canberra - Police have searched the home of a western Sydney man who allegedly set his car alight and rammed it into the car park of Merrylands Police Station in what the Police Commissioner has described as a "drama-laden" incident. Officers raided the Greystanes home of 61-year-old Peter Zhurawel and have removed a number of items for examination. "We do know that a vehicle ... drove into the driveway ... and a short distance onto the footpath, detonated and [the driver] self-immolated inside the vehicle," Police Commissioner Andrew Scipione said. "From that point forward, police ... managed to secure that vehicle, the vehicle then rolled down the driveway and while still on fire, it rolled into the wall and then further into the garage door." Commissioner Scipione said officers "went above and beyond" using fire extinguishers to put out the flames and remove a gas bottle that had been opened and was inside the vehicle. "They then secured the vehicle and managed to recover some petrol ... and then ultimately, they removed the driver who at that stage was seriously burned," he said.

29. Malcolm Turnbull says Government could probe terror suspects' links to mental illness, past criminal behaviour

ABC (Australia), Staff Writer, 2016 07 22

Canberra - Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has indicated the Federal Government may want access to the mental health files of individuals suspected of terrorist activity. The Government's top anti-terror adviser has been asked to investigate Australian terror suspects' potential links with mental illness and past criminal behaviour. The Prime Minister's request to counter-terrorism coordinator Greg Moriarty is part of a full "lessons learnt" review of Australia's defences against so-called "lone wolf" attacks, such as those carried out with a , an and guns in . Mr Turnbull has told Macquarie Radio the Government wants to protect people's privacy, but that needs to be balanced with national security. "I think it's important that we are all mindful of the new environment in which we're operating and that is why we've got to look at it very carefully," Mr Turnbull said. Mr Turnbull conceded accessing the files would be a "huge step". "Yes it would be, and that's why it's important to speak with some precision. "You've got a number of important interests to balance here. Mental health alone, leaving aside issues of terrorism, is a gigantic challenge." Mr Turnbull said he valued Australia's "very significant" privacy protections, but his priority was to keep people safe.

30. Security services doing good job: Stratfor

Australian Associated Press, Max Blekin, 2016 07 22

Canberra - The lack of large-scale terror attacks in the US and Australia show security services are doing a good job, a US private sector intelligence group says. Terrorist group Islamic State's call to adherents to conduct "lone wolf" attacks was a response to police pressure and an admission of weakness. In an analysis of "lone wolf" terrorism, Stratfor security analyst Scott Stewart says organised terror groups are more effective at mounting large attacks as they contained skilled operatives. But they were also more likely to attract attention of counter-terrorism services. "Judging from the lack of such attacks, at least in North America and Australia, they are doing a good job," Mr Stewart said. Terror leaders have now urged supporters to conduct "lone wolf" attacks but that was an admission that they were incapable of conducting attacks themselves. Most "lone wolf" attacks are very effective but some are, such as that by Norwegian fascist Anders Breivik, who killed 77 people in 2011, and the Islamist who drove a truck into a crowd in Nice, France on July 14, killing 84. That's police going about their everyday activities. It's also alert citizens reporting suspicious conduct. Based on sheer numbers, both are more likely to encounter grassroots terrorists than officers of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation. The Australian government has recognised this with the "be alert not alarmed" and similar campaigns and the national security hotline.

34. Dix-sept soldats tués dans une attaque terroriste au Mali Bamako promet une riposte appropriée

Nampala, Mali - Au moment où les efforts se multiplient pour une application effective des Accords de paix d'Alger, le Mali enregistre une nouvelle attaque terroriste, qui a visé le camp militaire de Nampala. Revendiqué par deux groupes armés, un peul (ANSIPRJ) et un terroriste (Ansar Dine), cet attentat a coûté la vie à dix-sept soldats de l'armée malienne mardi à l'aube à Nampala, dans la région de Ségou, à environ 510 km de la capitale malienne. Selon un communiqué rendu public par l'armée malienne, l'attaque a été lancée "mardi à 5h30 (heure locale et GMT) par des individus armés dont l'identité reste à déterminer" contre le camp de Nampala, ville de la région de Ségou, à environ 510 km de Bamako. Ayant fait état dans un premier bilan de "12 morts et une trentaine de blessés parmi les militaires", les autorités maliennes ont revu, par la voix du ministre de la Défense Tièman Hubert Coulibaly, ce chiffre à la hausse. "Nous avons perdu 17 hommes et déplorons 35 blessés à Nampala", a-t-il déclaré à la Télévision publique malienne. Indiquant que des spécialistes étudiaient les modes opératoires des assaillants et des groupes armés actifs dans la région pour les identifier, le ministre malien a promis : "Nous ferons en sorte que cette attaque terroriste coordonnée qui s'est portée sur nos positions à Nampala fasse l'objet d'une réponse appropriée". Revendiquée auprès de l'agence AFP par "l'Alliance nationale pour la sauvegarde de l'identité peule et la restauration de la justice (ANSIPRJ)", mouvement armé dont la création a été annoncée en juin, qui se défend d'être djihadiste ou indépendantiste, cette attaque a fait l'objet d'une autre revendication.

Tripoli - Le Mufti de la Libye considère la présence de soldats français sur le sol libyen comme une déclaration de guerre. Le Mufti de la Libye, Saddok Al-Gharani, a estimé que l'annonce par le ministère français de la Défense de la mort de trois de ses soldats à l'ouest de la ville de Benghazi constituait une "déclaration de guerre" à la Libye, appelant les Libyens à dénoncer cette ingérence. M. Al-Gharani, qui intervenait mercredi sur la chaîne de télévision "al-Tanassouh", a affirmé que "la Déclaration du ministère français de la Défense de morts parmi ses soldats en Libye et leur fierté à leur égard équivalent à une déclaration de guerre". "C'est un devoir légitime pour tous les Libyens de manifester pour condamner l'intervention française en Libye", a-t-il ajouté. L'ancien Mufti a souligné dans son intervention la nécessité d'unir les Libyens pour contrer ce qu'il appelle "une agression extérieure" en disant: "la question est maintenant claire, notre pays subit une invasion étrangère". "Maintenant, la lumière matinale a ébloui les yeux (...) Les Français se battent contre les révolutionnaires à Benghazi", a-t-il encore souligné.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 07 21

Brasilia - Brazil arrested 10 people on Thursday suspected of belonging to a poorly organized group supporting Islamic State (IS) and discussing acts of terrorism during next month's Olympics in Rio de Janeiro, Justice Minister Alexandre Moraes said. The group, described as "absolutely amateur" by the minister, were all Brazilian citizens and in contact via internet messaging groups such as WhatsApp and Telegram. They did not know each other personally, the minister said. Though Brazil has no history of conflict with known militant groups, Moraes said the Games had made the Latin American country a more likely target, particularly because of participation by countries fighting IS. "Today was the first operation against a supposed terrorist cell in Brazil," he said. "Brazil was not part of the coalition against IS, but because of the upcoming Olympics and because it will receive many foreigners, Brazil becomes part of the target." SITE Intelligence Group, a U.S. company that monitors the internet, reported the previously unknown group calling itself "Ansar al-Khilafah Brazil" said on the Telegram messaging app on Sunday that it followed IS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, and had promoted IS propaganda in Arabic, English and Portuguese. It is unclear what relation those detained on Thursday may have with that group.

37. Brazil arrests group plotting 'acts of terrorism' before Olympics

Buenos Aires Herald, Staff report, 2016 07 21

Buenos Aires - Brazil arrested 10 people on Thursday on suspicion of belonging to a group supporting Islamic State (IS) and preparing acts of terrorism during next month's Olympics in Rio de Janeiro, Justice Minister Alexandre Moraes said. The loosely organized group were all Brazilian citizens and in contact via internet messaging groups such as WhatsApp and Telegram, but did not know each other personally, the minister said. The group did not have direct contact with IS though some of its members had made "pro forma" declarations of allegiance to the militant Islamist group, the minister said. He did not elaborate. "Those involved participated in an online group denominated 'the defenders of Sharia' and were planning to acquire weapons to commit crimes in Brazil and even overseas," Moraes told a news conference. "It was an absolutely amateur cell, with no preparation at all, a disorganized cell," the minister said, adding that authorities decided to intervene when the group started to plan actions. He said members of the group had visited a weapons site in neighboring Paraguay that sells AK-47 assault rifles, but there was no evidence they acquired any weapons. Two people will be brought in for questioning, in addition to the 10 already detained, he added.

But Sarmiento says she's unsure if she will vote yes or no in a plebiscite later this year in which Colombians will be asked to accept or reject a peace deal between the government and leftist Farc guerrillas that would end more than half a century of war. 39. Fumbles Beset Security Staffing For Rio Games

Wall Street Journal, Will Connors, Benjamin Parkin, 2016 07 22

Rio de Janeiro - People with no security experience and minimal training are being hired to screen for weapons outside Olympic venues, with just two weeks left before the Games begin and Brazil on edge about Thursday's arrests of suspected terrorists. The federal government waited until July 1 to award the contract for private workers to monitor X-ray machines and pat down spectators at checkpoints outside Olympic facilities in Rio de Janeiro. Similar tenders for previous Games were in place as much as a year in advance. The result is a mad dash by the small Brazilian temp agency that won the 17.3 million reais ($5.3 million) contract to supply as many as 7,000 screeners the government now says it needs. As of Monday, only about 1,500 workers had been hired, according to a person familiar with the effort who pronounced the 11th-hour recruiting spree "a mess." New hires for the screener jobs, which pay about $9.50 a day, described haste and confusion. More than a dozen interviewed by The Wall Street Journal said they needed minimal qualifications to land the jobs, were given few instructions beyond where to report for work, and often found nobody around when they reported to their worksites. "How are you going to do this [job] if you don't have any practical training?" said Priscila Siqueira, a 31-year-old former IT worker who landed a screener post. "If I had to search someone, and they had a weapon or a bomb, then what? I wouldn't know what to do."

40. Le Brésil arrête dix personnes suspectées de planifier une attaque terroriste pendant les JO

A quinze jours de la cérémonie d'ouverture des Jeux olympiques (JO) de Rio de Janeiro, à laquelle doit assister le président français, François Hollande, la police brésilienne a annoncé, jeudi 21 juillet, l'arrestation de dix personnes, soupçonnées de planifier une attaque terroriste pendant l'événement. Les suspects, placés en détention provisoire, appartiendraient à un groupe virtuel, « Defensores da Sharia » (Les défenseurs de la charia), faisant la promotion de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI). Selon les autorités brésiliennes, les présumés djihadistes, programmaient l'achat d'armes, tel un fusil AK-47, afin de commettre des crimes « au Brésil et à l'extérieur du territoire ». L'emprisonnement de deux autres personnes, en cours d'examen, pourrait être décidé dans les prochaines heures. Le coup de filet s'inscrit dans le cadre d'une opération antiterroriste dite « Hashtag » initiée en avril avec la collaboration de services étrangers de renseignement. 41. Olympic security: Brazil adjusts to new threats with help from global partners

Christian Science Monitor, Taylor Barnes, 2016 07 21

Rio de Janeiro - Even amid questions of whether Brazil will face international threats of terror as host of the first Summer Olympics in the southern hemisphere, nations from around the globe have stepped up to offer support and training opportunities to prepare it for this extraordinary situation. Some 75 governments - including odd bedfellows like Russia, Yemen, Turkmenistan, and the United States - will gather surveillance intelligence in command centers in Rio and Brasília. Brazilian law enforcement has sent teams of observers to foreign sporting events like the Tour de France and Baku European Games to learn about large-scale event security firsthand. The United States has been a top trainer for Brazilian law enforcement in the period leading up to the 2014 World Cup and the Olympics. In one training, the US antiterrorism assistance office taught Brazilian police case studies on the 1999 Columbine school shooting and the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. Brazilian security officials say the cooperation will not only benefit athletes and fans here for the Olympics this summer, but could leave Brazil's forces with a legacy of new professional skills that can be applied more broadly at home, ranging from detection of fake documents to improved airport security. Successfully hosting the sporting event will give the country - better known for its deeply troubled domestic security record, and underpaid law enforcement suffering poor working conditions - a positive international bump. For a nation that has long sought a more prominent role on the international stage, and touted "South- South" relations, Brazil, the trainee, could potentially become the trainer, sharing its new skills with other Southern Hemisphere nations, or other host nations, down the line. "Wherever there has been an important event, we've had Brazilian police collecting information," Andrei Rodrigues, a federal agent and the head of Brazil's special government agency dedicated to mega- event security, said in an interview with Brazil's Zero Hora. Rodrigues has been invited to create a database of best practices in partnership with Japan, which will host the 2020 summer games, and has said observers from Russia and Qatar, the sites of the two upcoming World Cups, will come to Brazil for the August Games. "Police from several countries are working with us," Mr. Rodrigues added in a separate interview. "Mutual cooperation between countries is vital."

42. Ten arrested in Brazil over Olympics terror plot

Globe and Mail, Stephanie Nolen, 2016 07 22

Rio De Janeiro - Brazilian police have arrested 10 people, and issued warrants for two more, who they say were radicalized online by the Islamic State group and were discussing plans to attack the Olympic Games, which begin here Aug. 5. These are the first-ever arrests related to alleged Islamist terrorism in Brazil and the first use of an anti-terror law passed in March. Brazil's intelligence agencies have little experience in combatting terrorism, which has raised questions about how prepared the country is to ensure security at the Olympics. But Minister of Justice Alexandre de Moraes said those arrested on Thursday were "amateurs" who had no specific target and that crime was a bigger security concern during the Games than terrorism. Federal police say those arrested are all Brazilian nationals, that they had no actual contact with the Islamic State but consumed media from the group online, and communicated with each other through the message services WhatsApp and Telegram. The group members were located in 10 different Brazilian states and are between 20 and 40 years of age. They called themselves Defenders of Sharia. The genders of the group members were not given by police. Mr. de Moraes has said that foreign intelligence agencies are assisting with efforts for the Games, and that they were involved in gathering the information that led to these arrests. He said that some members of the group had sworn an oath of allegiance to Islamic State and that they planned to carry out an Orlando nightclub-style mass shooting attack. They did not have bomb materials, he added.

43. Abu Sayyaf wants P200M ransom for 5 Malaysians (Canada).

Manila Times, Al Jacinto, 2016 07 22

Zamboanga City - Abu Sayyaf militants have demanded a P200 million ransom for the release of five Malaysian sailors they kidnapped in Sabah. Borneo Post reported that one of the hostages, Tayudin Anjut, 45, phoned his employer to say that they are being held captive in Basilan, one of five provinces under the Muslim autonomous region. Anjut said the kidnapers were demanding the ransom for their freedom, but Philippine military and police authorities could not immediately confirm nor deny the report. The President had earlier vowed to wipe out the Abu Sayyaf, linked to international terrorist groups, during his term. He, however, also raised the possibility of talking peace with the bandits. Duterte has ordered an all-out offensive against the Abu Sayyaf. The group beheaded Canadian John Ridsdel in April. On June 13, Abu Sayyaf rebels also executed another Canadian, Robert Hall, after the group's demand for P300 million ransom was not met.

44. Activist-turned-scholar urges action on N.K. abductees

Korea Herald, Yeo Jun-suk, 2016 07 22

Seoul - On April 29, 1992, South Korea's top intelligence agency arrested dozens of activists for plotting to overthrow the government by building underground socialist organizations. The authorities described the groups as the biggest antistate entity ever established in the country's modern history. One of those arrested was Baik Tae-ung, who served as leader of the South Korean Socialist Coalition of Workers or "Sanomaeng" in Korean. Despite the plea that he was exercising the right to political freedom, the then 29-year-old activist was sentenced to life in prison, a sentence which was later reduced to 15 years. Baik was designated as a prisoner of conscience by Amnesty International and released in 1999 through a special pardon from former President Kim Dae-jung. He flew to the United States, where he earned a doctoral degree on international human rights law and passed the bar exam in the State of New York. Now the activist-turned- professor has returned to South Korea with a new mission - to bring home people abducted by North Korea. In 2015, his related activities won him the membership of the United Nations Human Rights Council's Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, representing Asia-Pacific states. "The South Korean government should come forward to address this issue as it has significant meaning in the nation's modern history. It is not just a matter of bringing an individual back home. It is about healing wounds from the past," Baik said in an interview with The Korea Herald.

45. Foreign ties to Gulshan attack under scrutiny (Canada).

Dhaka Tribune, Tribune Desk, 2016 07 22

Dhaka - Investigators suspect that the three local militant groups who carried out the Gulshan terror attack were assisted by several foreign extremist groups as well as some home-grown militant leaders now staying abroad. The unified platform was established in 2014 as agreed by the detained top leaders of banned outfits Jama'atul Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB), Ansarullah Bangla Team and Hizb ut-Tahrir at Kashimpur High Security Jail, as their aim is the same - establishing Islamic rule in the country by uprooting the democratic forces. They think the attack was launched based on an order issued by the detained leaders recently. Another key suspect behind the Gulshan terror attack is Bangladesh-origin Canadian citizen Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury. Investigation sources said that he might be working to maintain communication between the local groups and Islamic State through his links in Afghanistan.

46. Gov't bolsters countermeasures to deter N.K. cyberattacks

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 07 22

Seoul - South Korea is beefing up its governmentwide countermeasures to prevent possible cyberattacks by North Korea, officials said Friday. The Ministry of Science, ICT and Future Planning said the number of cyberattacks by North Korea more than doubled in the first half of this year. The cyberattacks "are judged as a part of North Korean provocations to trigger public anxiety" in South Korea, the ministry said. Last month, South Korean police said North Korea hacked into more than 140,000 computers at 160 South Korean firms and government agencies. About 42,000 documents were suspected to have been stolen, including defense-related information. The ministry urged people to install antivirus software and avoid opening suspicious emails. South Korea has been on high alert against hacking attacks by North Korea following the North's fourth nuclear test in January and a series of missile launches in recent months. (Full report)

Times of India, Staff Report, 2016 07 22

Mumbai - The Kerala police along with the Maharashtra anti-terrorism squad arrested Arshid Qureshi, alleged to be a member of Zakir Naik's Islamic Research Foundation (IRF), on Wednesday night for recruiting Kerala youths for the terror outfit Islamic State. If his links with IRF are confirmed, this could be the first arrest of a member of televangelist Naik's organisation, under the scanner since two of the Bangladesh cafe attackers said they were inspired by his preachings. An IRF spokesperson refused to comment. Qureshi was held + after the police raided a flat in Seawoods. He was produced before a magistrate's court in CBD-Belapur on Thursday and remanded in transit custody for four days. He will be questioned by the Maharashtra ATS and later taken to Kerala. Based on this statement, the Palarivattom police slapped charges under Section 13 of the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act (UAPA) on the duo and booked them under sections of the IPC.

48. Military support in C.Sulawesi counterterrorism operation praised

Jakarta - National Police chief Gen. Tito Karnavian expressed his thanks to Indonesian Military commander Gen. Gatot Nurmantyo over the latter's support for Operation Tinombala, which led to the death of Indonesia's most wanted terrorist Santoso in a shootout in Poso, Central Sulawesi, Monday. "Without good cooperation, the operation would not have yielded the optimal result that we've seen now," he said on Wednesday. Responding to The Jakarta Post's question about two of Santoso's followers who were still at large, namely Basri and Ali Kalora, Tito asserted that the police would continue Operation Tinombala by using two methods, namely hard and persuasive approaches. He highlighted the importance of Operation Tinombala, saying that in terrorism networks in Indonesia, there was a concept called Qaidah Amina, in which Poso was considered an ideal place to launch their radical movements.

New Delhi - Days before Bangladesh home minister Asaduzzaman Khan Kamal is to visit India, the National Investigation Agency (NIA) has been asked to probe the Dhaka link to Islamic State operative Abu Al-Musa Al- Bangali, who was arrested from Burdwan two weeks ago. Government sources say the home ministry, which will share the details with Kamal next week, has asked NIA to probe Musa as he was reportedly in touch with Jamaat-ul- Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB) senior leader Mohammad Suleiman, suspected to be the prime conspirator of the Dhaka bakery attack. The agency will take custody of Musa from West Bengal CID. It is suspected that Suleiman could be in India. Sources added that Kamal will visit the NIA headquarters on July 27. Moscow Times, Staff report, 2016 07 21

Moscow - The Kremlin has denied reports that Russian intelligence warned the Turkish government of an imminent coup, the RBC newspaper reported Thursday. Iran's Fars news agency, citing diplomatic sources in Ankara, alleged Wednesday that Moscow warned Turkish President Recep Erdogan of a military coup being prepared against his government several hours before the start of the coup on July 15, which killed 290 people. Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said Russia's government was unaware of such communications with Turkey's government prior to the failed coup. "I have no information of that nature and I do not know which sources the Fars agency are citing," he said on Thursday.

51. Ukraine's Security Services and Rebels Are Said to Be Equals in Torture

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 07 22

Moscow - A report by two leading human rights groups released on Thursday accuses Ukraine's Western-backed security services of practicing abuse and torture in a manner similar to that of the rebel groups they are fighting. In the report about disappearances and torture in the Ukraine war, titled "You Don't Exist," Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International document harrowing abuse by both sides, including waterboarding and the use of electrical shocks. "People in eastern Ukraine who are being seized and hidden away by the warring sides are at the mercy of their captors," Tanya Lokshina, a researcher with Human Rights Watch and one of the authors of the report, said in a statement. "It is never legal or justified to seize people off the streets, cut them off from contact with family and lawyers, and beat and abuse them," she said. Ukraine's domestic intelligence agency, the Security Service of Ukraine, denies illegally detaining suspects in the conflict. And yet as recently as May, it refused to allow a United Nations delegation investigating reports of torture access to sites where suspects were alleged to be held illegally.

54. Al-Qaeda in Syria executes 14 'government forces'

Al Arabiya, 2016 07 22

Beirut - Al-Qaeda's Syrian affiliate Al-Nusra Front has executed 14 captured men it accused of fighting for President Bashar al-Assad, in retaliation for a regime advance near Damascus. A video distributed via the group's social media accounts showed 14 men, many with injuries including black eyes, stating their names as they lined up in pairs in front of the group's black flag. "Implementation of the death sentence against a group of... regime prisoners because of their attack on Harira village in Wadi Barada," text on the video read. The footage showed the men being shot in the head simultaneously as they knelt in front of Al-Nusra fighters. Wadi Barada is an area in the Qalamun region of Syria's Damascus province and is mostly controlled by an array of opposition groups, including Al-Nusra. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights monitor said that Al-Nusra had threatened to execute prisoners if government forces entered Harira.

55. Hizbullah Shells IS in al-Qaa Outskirts, Inflicting Casualties

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 07 22

Beirut - Hizbullah on Thursday bombarded the posts of the extremist Islamic State group in the outskirts of the eastern border town of al-Qaa, inflicting casualties, Hizbullah's Military Media reported. It said the party fired heavy machineguns, artillery and multiple rocket launchers after detecting IS movements and gatherings in the al-Kahf area. On Wednesday, Hizbullah destroyed a bulldozer for the al-Qaida-linked al-Nusra Front in the outskirts of the northeastern border town of Aarsal. The bulldozer was carrying out reinforcements in the area of Wadi al-Khayl when the fighters destroyed it. Artillery shelling by the Lebanese army had on Tuesday destroyed al-Nusra's posts in the Wadi al-Khayl and Khirbet Younin areas amid army shelling of the outskirts of Aarsal, Ras Baalbek and al-Qaa. The army has been shelling the outskirts of the three towns for several days now. Troops have been on high alert since the unprecedented suicide bombings that hit the Christian border town of al-Qaa in late June.

56. IDF adapting training to Hezbollah battle doctrine

Jerusalem - Ten years after the Second Lebanon War, the IDF has made substantial changes in the way it trains its infantry for war against Hezbollah - arguably Israel's most formidable military threat in the immediate region. In the lead up to the 2006 conflict, the infantry had become rusty at war, spending nearly all of its time in counter-terrorism and anti-riot missions in the West Bank. The little training it did do involved largely unrealistic scenarios, like fighting in open areas, which were starkly different from the village battlefields of southern Lebanon that awaited it. Today, according to a senior military source who is familiar with current infantry training practices, nearly every aspect of preparations has been revamped. The length of training programs for conscripts and reserves has grown exponentially under the current chief of staff.

Jerusalem - Al-Qaida-influenced terrorists have issued directives to "lone wolf" attackers to carry out attacks against the Israeli Olympic delegation at the upcoming Rio Olympics, The Foreign Desk reported Thursday. The jihadis reportedly published a list of athletes to be targeted on social media, including the US, French and British delegations in addition to the Israelis. "One small knife attack against Americans/Israelis in these places will have bigger media effect than any other attacks anywhere else in sha Allah," the social media call read, according to The Foreign Desk. "Your chance to take part in the global Jihad is here! Your chance to be a martyr is here!" the jihadis said, citing the easy process of obtaining visas for travel to Brazil as well as the wide availability of guns in "crime-ridden slums." News site Globonews reported that the members of the group were linked to ISIS. It was not possible to immediately confirm this.

58. Nusra official denies group plotting foreign terror attacks

Beirut - An official in Al-Nusra Front denied that the Al-Qaeda affiliate in Syria was plotting foreign terror attacks for the time being amid a flurry of warnings from Washington that the group is threatening US national security. "We in Nusra emphasize that [our] interest is maintaining a strong and standing Jihad in As-Sham (Syria), and all other desired interests to target the US and the West will be marginalized and absent," Abu Ammar as-Shami, a self-described spokesperson for the organization, claimed Thursday. Shami, who is reportedly a veteran Al-Qaeda member, wrote a series of comments on Twitter in response to David Ignatius's July 19 Washington Post column entitled "A new jihadist threat may be on the horizon in Syria," a reference to Nusra. Ignatius cited US officials as saying that there is "increasing evidence that the group is plotting external operations against Europe and the United States."

The security message, published online and sent to US travellers registered with department, did not give further details on the reported threat, but reiterated existing guidance for visitors to Saudi Arabia. "Remember to vary your routes and times in all instances when traveling in the Kingdom," the notice said. "All US citizens are encouraged to be aware of their surroundings, and take extra precautions when travelling throughout the country." 60. 'Jealous' al Qaeda reduced to trumpeting rival Islamic State's terror attacks

Washington - Perhaps out of jealousy, al Qaeda is out with a special edition of its online magazine Inspire with stories devoted to a terrorist attack carried out by a rival -- the Bastille Day truck massacre in Nice, France. Inspire is published by al Qaeda's Yemeni branch, al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), a group dedicated to attacking the U.S. homeland. The Islamic State, another Salafist jihad group, claimed responsibility for the Nice carnage, in which Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel plowed a refrigerated truck at high speed through a dense crowd of revelers July 14, killing 84. Inspire lauded Bouhlel for using a truck rather than explosives, the acquisition of which might have caught the attention of French security agencies. "I think AQAP is jealous they haven't been able to succeed in a while and that ISIS has gotten all the attention lately in the media," said Steven Stalinsky, executive director of the Middle East Media Research Institute, which distributed the edition.

Suite au décès en garde à vue d'Adama Traoré, plusieurs émeutes ont éclaté en banlieues pour dénoncer la "négrophobie" et le racisme. Pourtant les études montrent que les Français font figure de bons élèves par rapport aux autres citoyens européens. Atlantico : Le décès d'Adama Traoré au cours de sa garde-à-voir pour une affaire d'extorsion de fonds a déclenché de nombreuses réactions sur les réseaux sociaux et de la part d'associations de lutte contre le racisme et les violences policières. Plusieurs associations françaises ont d'ailleurs appelées à manifester contre les violences policières en reprenant les arguments du mouvement américain . Quelle est selon vous la réalité de cette idée au sein de la société française ? Comment se positionne-t-elle en comparaison avec les autres pays européens par exemple ? Zohra Bitan : Je préfère ne pas poser la question en ces termes car comparaison n'est pas raison. Je ne souhaite pas minimiser ce qui se passe en France, mais le rapport aux populations de couleurs ou issues de l'immigration n'est pas du tout le même.

Nice - Nice : une étrange réquisition judiciaire Panique et incompréhension à la mairie de Nice. Le 20 juillet, la Sous-direction antiterroriste (SDAT) a envoyé aux agents qui gèrent la vidéosurveillance de la ville une « réquisition judiciaire urgente » leur demandant « l'effacement complet des enregistrements de vidéosurveillance de l'ensemble des caméras desservant la promenade des Anglais filmant pour la plupart d'entre elles l'action terroriste commise le soir du 14 juillet » . « C'est la première fois que l'on nous demande de détruire des preuves, précise une source proche du dossier. Le centre de vidéosurveillance et la ville de Nice pourraient être poursuivis pour cela et, d'ailleurs, les agents en charge du dispositif n'ont pas compétence pour se livrer à de telles opérations. » La demande paraît d'autant plus étonnante que, depuis vendredi, la SDAT a engagé une opération de sauvegarde des 30 000 heures de vidéosurveillance liées aux événements. Contacté par Le Figaro , le parquet de Paris confirme l'information : « Cela a été fait dans ce cas précis pour éviter la diffusion non contrôlée et non maîtrisée de ces images. » Du côté de la police nationale, on rappelle que « 100 % des vidéos susceptibles d'être intéressantes ont été récupérées » .

63. Erdogan says Turkey's military to be restructured after abortive coup

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 07 22

Ankara - Turkish President Tayyip Erdogan told Reuters on Thursday that there were significant intelligence failures ahead of last week's attempted military coup and that the armed forces would quickly be restructured and have "fresh blood". In his first interview since declaring a state of emergency following last Friday's abortive coup, Erdogan said a new coup attempt was possible, but would not be easy, saying "we are more vigilant". "It is very clear that there were significant gaps and deficiencies in our intelligence, there is no point trying to hide it or deny it. I told it to the head of national intelligence," Erdogan told Reuters in his palace in Ankara, which was targeted during the coup attempt. Erdogan, describing how events unfolded on the night of the coup attempt, while he was on holiday with his family near the coastal resort of Marmaris, he said he had initially not believed a phone call from his brother-in-law informing him that soldiers had started blocking streets in Istanbul. He was initially unable to reach the head of the armed forces or the head of the national intelligence agency, and after some difficulty was able to contact the prime minister, he said.

64. France / Terrorisme - France: opération anti-terroriste à Argenteuil, en banlieue parisienne

Radio France Internationale, Journaliste maison, 2016 07 22

Argenteuil - En France, une opération anti-terroriste a été menée ce jeudi après-midi en région parisienne dans la ville d'Argenteuil, dans le Val d'Oise. Deux logements étaient visés. Les policiers de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) avec l'appui des policiers d'élite du Raid ont perquisitionné à Argenteuil à deux adresses différentes, avenue du Parc et avenue Maurice Utrillo. Cette opération est sans rapport avec l'attaque menée le 14 juillet à Nice, elle visait à vérifier un renseignement anonyme faisant état d'un projet d'action violente, a indiqué une source policière, qui a précisé que la section antiterroriste du parquet de Paris est saisie des investigations. Interrogé par RFI, un habitant du quartier, Evariste, qui se trouve bloqué dans un commerce situé face à l'un des sites témoigne : « Il y avait au moins une quarantaine de personnes, plus la police de la ville qui encadraient le lieu à hauteur de 300 m. Il y en a qui sont montés par le haut, d'autres par-devant. Une quinzaine de personnes du Raid avec des robots, des béliers sont entrés. Après, cinq chiens sont venus avec leurs maîtres des policiers du Raid, arrivés sur les lieux ils sont restés au moins une trentaine de minutes et ils sont sortis avec trois femmes et un homme menottés. Après quelque temps, nous avons remarqué sept personnes du Raid avec des policiers scientifiques avec des masques et des valises. Ils sont rentrés et restés longtemps puis sont sortis avec une jeune femme d'environ 19, 22 ans en pleurant. Ils l'ont mise dans la voiture de police et ils sont partis avec eux. Au moment où je vous parle une partie de la cité est quadrillée, personne ne passe. Tout est sécurisé. Il y a des banderoles de la police pour que personne ne franchisse la zone. Ils sont en pleine intervention. »

65. Nice: Hollande réunit ses ministres, cinq suspects mis en examen

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 07 22

Paris - Le président François Hollande, sous le feu des critiques, réunit vendredi ses ministres pour un nouveau Conseil restreint de sécurité et de défense, au lendemain de la mise en examen des cinq suspects en contact avec Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlej avant l'attentat de Nice. Ce Conseil, le quatrième depuis la tuerie du 14 juillet, se tiendra à 10H00, immédiatement après un entretien entre le chef de l'Etat et son ministre de la Défense Jean-Yves Le Drian. Le volet judiciaire a avancé avec la mise en examen et le placement en détention provisoire de cinq personnes - quatre hommes âgés de 21 à 40 ans et une femme de 42 ans - ayant été en contact avec le tueur avant l'attentat de Nice qui a fait 84 morts et 331 blessés. L'enquête révèle une préparation de longue date, un acte "mûri" pendant plusieurs mois avec des "complicités" et des "soutiens", selon le procureur de Paris, François Molins. Chokri C., Mohamed Oualid G. et Ramzi A. sont poursuivis pour "complicité d'assassinats en bande organisée en relation avec une entreprise terroriste". Ramzi A. est aussi mis en examen pour "infractions à la législation sur les armes en relation avec une entreprise terroriste", comme un couple d'Albanais, Artan H. et Enkeledja Z. Ces trois derniers suspects sont soupçonnés d'avoir participé à la fourniture du pistolet avec lequel Lahouaiej Bouhlej a tiré sur des policiers avant d'être abattu.

66. Nice attacker 'plotted for months and had accomplices'

The Guardian (London), Kim Willsher, 2016 07 21

Paris - The French-Tunisian man who drove a lorry into crowds celebrating Bastille Day in Nice, killing 84 people and injuring hundreds more, had help planning the attack, Paris prosecutor François Molins has revealed. Evidence from telephones and computer records suggested that Mohamed Lahouaiej-Bouhlel was not a recently radicalised "lone wolf", as previously thought, but had several accomplices and had planned his attack for up to a year. Molins told a press conference on Thursday that after the attack on the offices of Charlie Hebdo magazine in January 2015, in which 12 people died, Bouhlel sent a text message to one suspect that read: "I am not Charlie. I'm happy they have brought some of Allah's soldiers to finish the job." The prosecutor revealed what he described as "significant advances" in the inquiry, as four men and a woman suspected of helping Bouhlel appeared before a judge in Paris accused of being involved in a terrorist operation. The prosecutor said it was increasingly evident that Bouhlel's attack was premeditated and that he had logistical and planning support from the five, with whom he had been in regular contact. "He seems to have envisaged and developed his criminal plans several months before carrying them out," Molins said.

67. Russian intelligence saved Erdogan from coup - media reports

Russian Press Digest - Russica Izvestia, Dmitry Kalinin, 2016 07 22

Moscow - Reports that Russian intelligence warned the Turkish president about the military coup, allowing him to escape and retain power, appeared in various Russian media outlets in the evening of July 20. However, it is unclear to what extent the reports are true: Erdogan himself said that he learned about the coup from his brother-in-law. Russian media have reported that Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan was warned by Russian intelligence services about the military coup against him that was thwarted in the early hours of July 16. The Russian media outlets that have spread the version of Moscow's involvement in Erdogan's victory over the plotters cite the major Iranian news agency Fars, which, in turn, refers to reports by several Arab media outlets (in particular, the Sudanese newspapers Al Sudan Al Youm). The Arab media outlets cite anonymous Turkish diplomats as their source. According to the version that appeared in the Iranian media, Russia's military intelligence based at Khmeymim airbase in Syria managed to intercept and decode sensitive Turkish military radio messages.

De quoi relancer une nouvelle fois le débat sur la surveillance des personnes suspectes ou fichées S en ligne. Depuis dix-huit mois, l'arsenal de mesures déployé par le gouvernement à cet égard n'a pourtant cessé de se muscler. Et des voix s'élèvent pour instaurer de nouvelles mesures. Saisir des appareils et exploiter leurs données La solution la plus directe est de récupérer directement les appareils des suspects, afin d'examiner leurs contenus. Des perquisitions peuvent être menées dans tout lieu privé, aussi bien un logement qu'une entreprise, que fréquente un suspect ou un témoin. La loi autorise la saisie des données informatiques directement à la source (saisie d'un disque dur ou leur copie sur un support physique, tel qu'une clé USB). «Il est également possible d'accéder à des données se situant en dehors du lieu de la perquisition à l'aide d'un ordinateur se trouvant sur place. Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin avec Vincent-Xavier Morvant, 2016 07 22

Nice - Une semaine après la tuerie de Nice, l'examen du dispositif policier du 14 Juillet fragilise les déclarations du ministre de l'Intérieur. La police nationale absente à l'entrée de la promenade des Anglais Alors que Bernard Cazeneuve assurait le 16 juillet à la sortie du conseil de défense que la « police nationale était présente et très présente sur la promenade des Anglais » le soir du 14 Juillet, aucun fonctionnaire de l'État n'était en fait déployé à l'entrée du périmètre de sécurité, au moment où le terroriste Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel a foncé dans la foule au volant d'un camion de 19 tonnes en passant par le trottoir. Comme l'a reconnu la Place Beauvau elle-même, les effectifs de la police nationale, présents sur ce premier point de contrôle « Gambetta », avaient en effet été relevés à 21 heures par leurs collègues municipaux. Seuls deux agents de la ville et leur voiture gardaient donc l'entrée de la Prom'. Placés au milieu de la chaussée derrière deux barrières de sécurité et revêtus d'un gilet jaune, ils étaient en charge d'assurer la « déviation de la circulation et un contrôle visuel » dans le flot des nombreuses voitures. Au moment de la tragédie, les premiers policiers nationaux, eux, étaient postés à plus de 370 mètres plus bas, au point « Meyerbeer ». Situé au début de la zone événementielle de la Prom'Party, il était protégé par six fonctionnaires. « Répartis sur les voies », comme l'a précisé le ministre de l'Intérieur dans un communiqué diffusé dans la nuit de mercredi à jeudi, « ce sont les premiers intervenants face au camion meurtrier » .

70. Turkish Intelligence Spied on People Involved in Coup Attempt

Sputnik (Russia), Staff report, 2016 07 21

Ankara - Turkish intelligence service had spied on those arrested and dismissed after the failed coup attempt before it happened, Yasin Aktay, deputy chair of Turkey's ruling Justice and Development Party (AKP), told Sputnik on Thursday. "There were lists [of participants before the coup]. The country's intelligence spied on all of them... Of course it knows who is who but everything is in line with the law. We never struggle with people only because they are adherents of a certain organization or have certain political views," Aktay said. He also called participants of the coup attempt members of a terrorist organization.

1. Tamim's dangerous Canada connection

Bangladesh Daily Star, Staff Correspondent, 2016 08 09

Dhaka - Meet Tamim Chowdhury -- the man who is now thought to have masterminded the Holey Artisan attack in Gulshan that left 20 diners, 17 of them foreigners -- dead on July 1. Only a week later, he led the attack near the Eid congregation in Sholakia that left four, including two cops, dead. Terrifying new information has been gleaned about Tamim, a longtime resident of Calgary in Canada. He used to mix with people who had joined IS, and many of them went to Syria where the terror group controls a large part of territories. He was deemed such a dangerous man that religious leaders in Windsor, where Tamim was born, had asked him around 2013 not to mix with youths at the mosques, fearing that he might radicalise them. It is estimated that some 180 Canadians have left the country to take part in jihadi war around the world, the director of Canadian Security Intelligence Service said in March, according to the National Post. About 60 have come back already, and Tamim was probably one of them.

2. Aminata Traoré, invitée indésirable?

Le Devoir, Marie-Michèle Sioui avec Boris Proulx, 2016 08 09

Montréal - « Le message, c'est que l'hémisphère nord, qui est donneur de leçons de démocratie, foule aux pieds ses propres principes. » La phrase est tombée comme une condamnation, formulée par Aminata Traoré, une ex-ministre malienne à qui le Canada a refusé l'entrée au pays, où elle devait participer au Forum social mondial (FSM), organisé pour la première fois dans un pays situé au nord de l'équateur. Au téléphone, lundi soir, la militante altermondialiste -- et féministe, et femmes d'affaires, et écrivaine -- semblait résignée. Pendant que son passeport diplomatique circulait encore entre les mains d'employés qui devaient s'affairer à réviser sa première demande de visa refusée, Mme Traoré a annoncé qu'elle se rangeait, une fois de plus, du côté des exclus. « Par principe, j'ai décidé d'annuler ma participation au FSM, parce qu'on n'a jamais été confrontés à une situation pareille. Par solidarité, je ne vais pas y aller alors que 200 autres n'ont aucune chance de venir », a-t-elle lancé. La veille, 312 personnes avaient contacté les organisateurs du FSM pour les aviser du rejet de leur demande de visa. Un chiffre que le ministère de l'Immigration ne peut pas confirmer, car il soutient qu'il n'a pas de liste définitive des participants attendus.

3. Canada pulls logo from anti-Israel forum; Two Liberal MPs object to tone of cartoon

National Post, Graeme Hamilton, 2016 08 09

Toronto - The federal government has distanced itself from a major international gathering opening Tuesday in Montreal following complaints that its programming included anti-Semitic content. The World Social Forum, expected to draw more than 10,000 participants, was told last week to remove the Canadian government logo from its list of partners after two Liberal MPs expressed disgust over what they called a "blatantly anti-Semitic cartoon" on the event's website. MPs Anthony Housefather, representing the Montreal riding of Mount Royal, and Michael Levitt, representing the Toronto riding of York Centre, also took exception to the World Social Forum's heavy emphasis on the anti-Israel BDS movement. "The Prime Minister, the Government of Canada, and the Canadian Parliament have been very clear that we oppose the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement and that anti-Semitism is never acceptable," the MPs said in a statement. Forum organizers cancelled a session that had been scheduled to show how Islamist terrorists are "in the service of world Zionismcapitalism." The page for the event had featured a cartoon of a hook-nosed orthodox Jew with a Star of David on his hat, a drawing that Reuben Poupko, co-chairman of Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) Quebec, said was "not so different from those that appeared in Nazi papers." Housefather said the federal government did not provide a grant to the Forum, but it did subsidize the employment of two students working with the organization.

4. Governments must clarify whether citizens can legally volunteer with anti-ISIL forces: study

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 08 09

Toronto - Governments need to clarify whether their citizens can legally serve as volunteer fighters in armed groups battling the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) in Syria and Iraq, a study released Tuesday has recommended. The Institute for Strategic Dialogue report found that governments "appear reluctant to state clearly" whether the hundreds of Western anti-ISIL fighters, many of them military veterans, have broken any laws. The hazy legality has led to confusion and uncertainty among both volunteer fighters and law-enforcement agencies over whether Westerners joining forces with Kurdish militias could be prosecuted at home. The Canadian government has sent mixed signals on the issue: while verbally discouraging Canadians from taking up arms against ISIL, Ottawa has not prevented them from travelling or arrested them, although some have been questioned by the RCMP upon returning. "There is a need in some instances for governments to clarify the legal situation surrounding anti-ISIS foreign fighters," according to an advance copy of the 64-page report obtained by the National Post.

5. Opinion: Searching for the shadowy Canadian leader of ISIS in Bangladesh

Bangladesh Daily Star, Amarnath Amarasingam, 2016 08 09

The name Tamim Chowdhury first came on my radar in early 2015 when I was doing interviews with friends of another Windsor jihadi who had gone off to fight in Syria: Ahmad Waseem, known as Abu Turab, who was killed in March 2015 in Tal Hamis. Tamim's name was floating around as someone who may have also left for Syria. I jotted down his name, but then became busy with other things. Some months later, I spoke to another friend of Waseem's and remembered to also ask about Tamim. He seemed a little surprised, and remarked that Tamim, facing harassment from law enforcement in Canada, had decided to simply move back to his home country of Bangladesh. Nothing to worry about, he said. I was skeptical. The next time I saw his name appear, it became clear that Tamim was indeed important. A colleague of mine, who asked to be anonymous, pointed me to the ISIS Study Group website (which as of this writing has gone offline) where Tamim was mentioned as one of the leaders of ISIS in Bangladesh.

6. Trois ans pour l'usurpateur d'identité

Le Droit, Louis-Denis Ebacher, 2016 08 09

Gatineau - Un fabricant de faux passeports de Gatineau, ayant permis à un des criminels les plus notables du Canada de fuir le pays, écope trois ans de pénitencier. Harbi Mohamoud Gabad, 50 ans, a plaidé coupable à des chefs reliés à la production de faux documents, vendredi, au palais de justice de Gatineau. Au lieu d'entamer un procès complexe qui aurait duré cinq semaines, Gabad a reconnu les faits rapportés par la procureure de la Couronne, Geneviève DePassillé. Le ministère public s'est entendu avec l'avocat de la défense, Richard Dubé, sur la peine de trois ans, en échange du plaidoyer. Entre août 2011 et mars 2014, Gabad a approché au moins 13 personnes vulnérables du Vieux-Hull, dont des itinérants et des toxicomanes. En échange de leurs cartes d'identité, il leur offrait de l'argent ou du crack. Les cartes ont servi à fabriquer de faux passeports. Au moins deux des documents contrefaits ont servi à deux criminels bien connus, a rappelé Me DePassillé à la juge Rosemarie Millar, de la Cour du Québec. «L'un a permis à un dénommé (Rabih) Al Kalil de sortir du pays. Depuis ce temps, explique la procureure, il a été arrêté en Grèce et extradé.» Al Kalil est accusé de meurtre, et fait partie des cibles des policiers dans le cadre du projet «Loquace» à Montréal. Rabih est le frère de la présumée tête dirigeante de son clan, Hisham «Terry» Alkhalil. La famille a quitté la Colombie-Britannique il y a quelques années pour s'installer à Ottawa.

7. Turkey plays politics in Canada, warns outlaw group behind failed coup is operating here

National Post, Joseph Breen, 2016 08 09

Ottawa - Five Turkish parliamentarians will bring a dire warning to their Canadian counterparts on Parliament Hill on Tuesday -- that the same gang of outlaw terrorists who waged a bloody failed coup against the Turkish state is also deeply established in Canada. And just as Turkish civil society is being purged of followers of the Hizmet movement, described by President Recep Tayyip Erdogan as a "cancer" justifying the return of the death penalty, so too should Canada move to suppress this threat -- from closing Hizmet schools and restricting finances to extraditing leaders, the Turkish delegation will argue. The wider world "didn't really grasp the seriousness" of the July 15 coup, Selcuk Unal, Turkey's Ambassador to Canada, said in an interview. It revealed a covert "parallel state," under the control of exiled preacher Fethullah Gulen, willing to murder and blackmail its way to power, Unal said. "It is not a small, disorganized thing. It was an organized and serious thing."

8. 50 G.O.P. Officials Warn Donald Trump Would Put Nation's Security 'at Risk'

New York Times, David E. Sanger, Maggie Haberman, 2016 08 09

Washington - Fifty of the nation's most senior Republican national security officials, many of them former top aides or cabinet members for President George W. Bush, have signed a letter declaring that Donald J. Trump "lacks the character, values and experience" to be president and "would put at risk our country's national security and well-being." Mr. Trump, the officials warn, "would be the most reckless president in American history." The letter says Mr. Trump would weaken the United States' moral authority and questions his knowledge of and belief in the Constitution. It says he has "demonstrated repeatedly that he has little understanding" of the nation's "vital national interests, its complex diplomatic challenges, its indispensable alliances and the democratic values" on which American policy should be based. And it laments that "Mr. Trump has shown no interest in educating himself." Late Monday, Mr. Trump struck back. The signatories of the letter, he said in a statement, were "the ones the American people should look to for answers on why the world is a mess, and we thank them for coming forward so everyone in the country knows who deserves the blame for making the world such a dangerous place." He dismissed them as "nothing more than the failed Washington elite looking to hold onto their power." Among the most prominent signatories are Michael V. Hayden, a former director of both the C.I.A. and the National Security Agency; John D. Negroponte, who served as the first director of national intelligence and then deputy secretary of state; and Robert B. Zoellick, another former deputy secretary of state, United States trade representative and, until 2012, president of the World Bank. Two former secretaries of Homeland Security, Tom Ridge and Michael Chertoff, also signed, as did Eric S. Edelman, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's national security adviser and as a top aide to Robert M. Gates when he was secretary of defense.

9. Don't give Trump nuclear codes; He's unfit to be president, a former Minuteman III launch officer says.

Los Angeles Times, John Noonan, 2016 08 09

Op-ed - Since the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima in 1945, American presidents have thought of their nuclear responsibilities as the heaviest burden one could shoulder. Harry Truman wrote, "We have discovered the most terrible bomb in the history of the world." Dwight Eisenhower, no stranger to conflict, said that nuclear bombs have made war "not just tragic, but preposterous." John F. Kennedy called the weapons a "sword of Damocles," one all Americans were forced to live beneath. Those men bring us to 2016 and the Republican candidate for president, Donald Trump, who also had some deep thoughts on nuclear weapons. That is, "If we have them, why can't we use them?" Having spent five years of my life as a Minuteman III launch officer, and a year as an instructor teaching young officers how to run that weapon system, I'm equipped to answer the Trump campaign's question. The very point of nuclear weapons is that they are never used. We have them to dissuade hostile powers from attacking us, and vice versa. Trump simply cannot be trusted with weapons that can kill millions. He cannot be handed the nuclear "football" -- a briefcase containing the war plans and codes for our nuclear forces--and be made responsible for its contents. Note: John Noonan is a Republican national security expert and former Minuteman III nuclear launch officer.

10. Former CIA Officer Evan McMullin to Launch Independent Presidential Bid

ABC News, Staff report, 2016 08 08

New York - Evan McMullin, a former CIA counterterrorism officer, will run for president as a third-party conservative alternative to Donald Trump, GOP operatives working to back the candidate told ABC News today. The operatives working on McMullin's bid resigned from Better for America in order to push his candidacy. Better for America, a 501(c)(4) organization that cannot officially endorse or back McMullin's bid, has been working for months on trying to select a candidate and get on ballots throughout the country. In some states, like Texas, they will likely have to sue to get on the ballot. A 501(c)(4) is an issue-based nonprofit that can raise unlimited funds and does not have to disclose its donors. It's an extreme uphill climb, but his supporters are confident McMullin, 40, can act as a disruptor who they hope can peel off some red states in a race where some Republicans are still resistant to Donald Trump.

11. Newly declassified papers reveal U.S. tensions on Argentina's 'dirty war'

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 08 09

Washington - The Obama administration on Monday released more than 1,000 pages of newly declassified documents relating to U.S. policy toward Argentina's "dirty war" of the late 1970s and early 1980s. The documents, most from the administration of President Jimmy Carter, reveal a near-constant internal tension between U.S. eagerness to push human rights as Carter's signature foreign policy issue, and concerns that cutting off aid and trade with Argentina's ruling military junta could be counterproductive and might push it toward a closer relationship with the Soviet Union. "When we take actions toward Argentina, which are interpreted as punitive, we not only enrage the right-wing ideologues, we also arouse the business sector and the media in the U.S.," Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carter's national security adviser, wrote in a March 1979 memo to then-Secretary of State Cyrus Vance. President Obama announced the declassifications in March, on a visit to Argentina that coincided with the 40th anniversary of the coup that brought the junta to power. "I believe we have a responsibility to confront the past with honesty and transparency," Obama said at the time. An initial tranche of the documents, the same ones as those now made public, were presented to Argentine President Mauricio Macri by Secretary of State John F. Kerry during a visit to Buenos Aires last week.

12. The state of cyber security: we're all screwed

The Guardian (London), Dan Tynan, 2016 08 09

Las Vegas - When cybersecurity professionals converged in Las Vegas last week to expose vulnerabilities and swap hacking techniques at Black Hat and Defcon, a consistent theme emerged: the internet is broken, and if we don't do something soon, we risk permanent damage to our economy. "Half of all Americans are backing away from the net due to fears regarding security and privacy," longtime tech security guru Dan Kaminsky said in his Black Hat keynote speech, citing a July 2015 study by the National Telecommunications and Information

Administration. "We need to go ahead and get the internet fixed or risk losing this engine of beauty." There's no lack of things to be worried about: organized cybercriminal gangs; government surveillance; not to mention hack attacks from nation states. That may be good news for the cybersecurity industry, which is expected to grow more than 10% annually and surpass $200bn worldwide by 2021, according to research firm Markets and Markets. But it's bad news for the rest of us. As we conduct more of our lives online, we're being asked to become increasingly savvy about computer security. Many are simply uninterested or not up to the task.

Belfast Telegraph, Deborah McAleese, 2016 08 09

Belfast - Dissident republicans are now capable of launching a bomb attack on mainland Britain, security sources believe. A "few dozen" hard line republican terrorists are responsible for the heightened security fears across Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. Security sources have confirmed that the New IRA is currently the most dangerous terrorist organisation operating in the province. Intelligence gathered by both police and MI5 suggests that the paramilitary group has improved its bomb-making techniques and is highly capable of launching a bomb attack in the UK.

14. Inside MI5: My own safety does not keep me awake at night... you take certain measures and get on with life

Belfast Telegraph, Deborah McAleese, 2016 08 09

Belfast - In her bootcut jeans, trainers and T-shirt, she could easily be the girl next door. Mel is in her 30s. She is pretty, fresh-faced and smiley. She also laughs a lot. You could imagine her as the life and soul of the party during a night out with the girls. But behind the smiles and laughter lies a secret that only her closest family members know. Mel is an MI5 spy, highly trained in espionage and the use of informants. During six years operating in Northern Ireland, the information she has uncovered has helped prevent innumerable terrorist atrocities. It is Mel's job to find people with access to secret intelligence about Northern Ireland's terrorist groups, and build a relationship with them to obtain the secrets. "It's not that different to any other job really. I have normal working hours and I don't take work home. I spend a lot more time at my desk than people would think. There is a lot of paperwork to make sure we are authorised and covered legally to go out and meet agents," she explained.

15. Surveillance: Taking liberties? (Canada)

Financial Times, Gonzalo Viña, 2016 08 08

London - Growing up in Tehran, Fred Ghahramani remembers being told by his mother to be careful with what he said on the telephone because "the secret police is always listening". After several members of his family disappeared, Mr Ghahramani's father, an academic from an ethnic minority, escaped with his family to Canada when the boy was just nine years old. But his childhood fears of Ayatollah Khomeini's security service remain fresh in Mr Ghahramani's mind. It is why the Vancouver-based tech entrepreneur has pledged $1m to help campaign groups fight what he sees as a growing encroachment on privacy and civil liberties in his adopted country and in other major democracies. "You could hear them on the other end of the line - - it was quite comical that they might want to listen to a child, but you still had to be careful with what you said. You had to second guess your thoughts," Mr Ghahramani says. "I am not saying we are there yet, but my great worry is that we are sleepwalking into that same kind of environment." Canada, Australia, France, New Zealand and others have introduced powers to give security services and police far-reaching surveillance powers. No country, however, is going quite as far as the UK in creating laws that give government agencies the ability and the right to gather information. Adding to traditional forms of targeted surveillance, security services will soon have new powers to mine information about individuals via the explosion in data generated by smartphones and tablets. Mr Ghahramani, the Iranian émigré, remains sceptical about the security claims made not just by the British government but by many others around the world. "Canada and France have been collecting data in bulk for over four years, and yet terror attacks still happen. In the case of the Paris attacks, the terrorists communicated through unencrypted SMS. In the US, the NSA's bulk data collection programs have been in place even longer," he says. "The truth is, it's never actually been proven that bulk data collection can stop terrorism."

16. Australia's white jihadists

The Courier-Mail, Paul Syvret, 2016 08 09

Column: One of the favourite refrains of the more extreme anti-Islam brigade in Australia, as they try to dust themselves with a thin layer of mangled reason, is that "maybe not all Muslims are terrorists, but all terrorists are Muslim". Australia's counter-terrorism authorities clearly have a more sophisticated and informed view of what might constitute a threat to this country. We saw this over the weekend with the arrest of far-right activist Phillip Galea, who was charged with collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist act and planning or preparing for a terrorist act. He remains in custody. Galea has been associated with right wing groups, including Reclaim Australia and splinter group the United Patriots Front (UPF). Although, given the shifting sands of allegiances out on the fringes, Reclaim Australia claims he is not currently a "member" of this loose grouping; no, he's just attended some of the rallies that have been staged under its banner in recent times. At least Galea, who told a court on Sunday that the charges were a "conspiracy against the patriot movement" and didn't apply for bail (he remains in custody and says he will fight the charges), has some mates on the outside prepared to support him. Take Melbourne man Neil Erikson, who has drifted in and out of the various puddles around the patriots' pond, such as Reclaim Australia, the UPF and the Australian Liberty Alliance. All are basically rabid anti-Islam groupings with a pathological fear that halal food is the start of a slippery slope to Mecca, that multiculturalism is a failure and if you don't like our brand of ultranationalism then "f--- off 'cos we're full".

17. Australian man may face more charges over alleged far-right plot

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Sydney - A member of an Australian anti-immigration group accused of planning an attack may face additional charges in what the government said was the first time federal terrorism laws had been used to target such right-wing groups. Phillip Galea, 31, has been charged with acts done in preparation for a terrorist act and collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist act, after being arrested in Melbourne on Saturday. Victoria state Assistant Commissioner Ross Guenther told reporters that he or his associates may face additional charges. Galea will return to court on Tuesday for his next hearing. "That's always a possibility given that we're in an early part of the investigation," Guenther said on Monday. Australia, a staunch U.S. ally, has been on heightened alert for attacks by home-grown Islamist radicals since 2014 and authorities say they have thwarted a number of plots. But far-right activist groups and political parties opposed to Islam and Asian immigration are on the rise in Australia. One Nation, a political party headed by right-wing firebrand Pauline Hanson, secured four senate seats and king-maker status in national elections held last month by running on a protectionist, anti-Islam platform.

18. Australia sets up specialist cyber unit to trace terrorism payments

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Sydney - Australia has set up a cyber-intelligence unit to identify terrorism financing, money laundering and financial fraud online, the government said on Tuesday, because of "unprecedented" threats to national security. The measure expands on a major platform of conservative Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, who narrowly won re-election last month after promising to improve Australia's cybersecurity and transform the economy into a tech-savvy business hub. Justice Minister Michael Keenan said the new unit, set up under money-tracking agency the Australian Transaction Reports and Analysis Centre (AUSTRAC), would investigate online payment platforms and financial cybercrime to crack down on money-laundering and criminal networks. "We know that the use of fraudulent identities continues to be a key enabler of serious and organised crime and terrorism," Keenan said in a statement. The statement said the new AUSTRAC unit would work with the Australian and New Zealand government-funded identity support service, ID Care, to target job recruitment scams that crime syndicates used to recruit innocent people to traffic money between jurisdictions. The new unit would also work with the Australian Cybercrime Online Reporting Network to identify patterns and trends that could indicate large-scale financial scams or their methodology, Keenan said. Reuters previously reported that a decision by Australia's major banks to stop offering overseas remittance services had driven the money transfer business underground, making it harder for the authorities to track.

19. China 'spies' put power sale at risk (Canada)

The Australian Financial Review, Aaron Patrick and Primrose Riordan, 2016 08 09

Canberra - Chinese spies have been caught by the intelligence services conducting "brazen" espionage in Australia over the past year, hardening concerns within the federal government about allowing a Chinese company to buy a $10 billion power company from NSW. Senior government officials were "deeply concerned by the consequences" of a Chinese state-owned company, State Grid Corp, being issued a 99-year lease to operate Ausgrid, which provides all of Sydney's electricity, according to a security source. There were at least 60 cyber attacks on energy networks last financial year, according to official figures. Cabinet's national security subcommittee has already been briefed on their concerns and Treasurer Scott Morrison seems not to be afraid of vetoing the deal, which would fund a large part of the NSW Coalition government's new infrastructure projects. "That's the job. There are no easy decisions. This is not an easy decision and there are implications of the decision either way. Foreign investment is a very sensitive issue out there in the public and it has to be managed carefully," Mr Morrison said. The decision over Chinese investment in Australia's power grid is shaping up as the first major foreign policy test of the re-elected Turnbull government, which wants to promote foreign investment to drive the economy. Along with State Grid Corp, Cheung Kong Infrastructure, the largest publicly-listed infrastructure company in Hong Kong, is also waiting for government clearance to purchase a 99-year lease for 50.4 per cent of Ausgrid. State Grid Corp already owns electricity networks in South Australia and Victoria and was cleared by the Foreign Investment Review Board to bid last year for Transgrid, a NSW electricity distributor that was sold to Canadian interests.

20. E-currencies regulated to fight terrorism (Canada)

Sydney Morning Herald, Jewel Topsfield, 2016 08 09

Jakarta - Australia is moving to become one of the first countries to regulate e-currencies such as bitcoin under its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws. Bitcoin - the most prominent digital currency to emerge globally - is backed by a computer code rather than a physical substance such as gold or mainstream currency. The anonymity of payments using digital currencies make them attractive for terrorism financing, according to Australia's financial intelligence agency, AUSTRAC, which is co-hosting a counter-terrorism financing summit with Indonesia in Bali this week. Justice Minister Michael Keenan will inform the summit of the work Australia is doing to improve its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing legislation after a review recommended the regulation of digital currencies. "The report ... recommends strengthening an already robust legal framework to respond to new and emerging threats," he said. "The government is committed to facilitating growth and innovation in this sector and appropriate anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing regulation will aid that development." The AUSTRAC report, Terrorism Financing in Australia 2014, said electronic, online and new payment methods posed an emerging terrorism financing risk, which was likely to increase over the short term as use of these systems grew. In 2014, Canada became the first country to regulate bitcoin and other virtual currencies under its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws.

21. Police intercepted alleged terrorist's phone calls for months, Melbourne court hears

ABC (Australia), Sarah Farnsworth, 2016 08 09

Melbourne - Police bugged telephone calls made by an alleged far- right extremist charged with plotting a terrorist act for eight months, a Melbourne court has heard. Braybrook man Phillip Galea, 31, is charged with planning to commit a terrorist act and collecting material in connection to a terrorist act. Police allege Galea is a political extremist linked to far- right groups. Galea did not apply for bail at a brief hearing in the Melbourne Magistrates' Court. A federal police prosecutor said large volumes of electronic material were seized from his home and police needed to transcribe lengthy phone calls made by him. The court heard Galea's phone calls were lawfully bugged by authorities from January 2015 onwards and some calls run as long as three hours. Galea's defence lawyer argued he had been given a vague summary of the allegations against his client and opposed the prosecution's request for extra time to prepare the case. Magistrate Lousia Bazzina described it as an extraordinary delay. The court heard Galea is suffering from audio and visual hallucinations from what was described as a "flash bang" from his arrest in raids of his home on the weekend.

22. Shadow warriors working to bleed the terrorists dry

The Australian, Nivell Rayda and Amanda Hodge, 2016 08 09

Jakarta - A few months ago Agus Santoso, deputy chairman of Indonesia's financial intelligence unit PPATK, bumped into convicted terrorist Muhammad Jibril in the green room of a television station. Jibril had just been released after serving a five-year sentence for harbouring Noordin M Top, the late mastermind of the 2004 bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta, the 2005 Bali bombings and the 2009 bombings of Jakarta's JW Marriot and Ritz Carlton hotels. He was unusually eager to meet Santoso. "He said to me; 'Pak Agus, I have been praying that one day we could meet. Please help me. All of my bank accounts have been suspended, my assets frozen. I can't go to the bank and open an account. They won't even let me make a transfer'," Santoso - recalls. The same thing had happened to his Malaysian wife and their four children. They couldn't leave or enter the country without being questioned by immigration and their belongings scrutinised, Jibril complained. He couldn't get loans to open a business. He even tried to use a fake ID but he was recognised. "I told him, you are a convicted terrorist," Santoso says. "Your name appears at the UN Security Council sanctions list. Your father is Abu Jibril (a firebrand cleric with ties to Jemaah Islamiah). Your younger brother died in Syria fighting for ISIS. "If you want to open an account you need to renounce your radical views. You can pray, you can fast, you can perform the Haj as many times as you want. But you can't preach and tell people to wage jihad against infidels." Jibril had fallen victim to what those in the backrooms of the counter-terrorism finance world call "disruption" -- a sort of spy-craft in a cardigan that can comprise covert or overt actions to frustrate terrorist suspects. Australian intelligence agencies have already identified self- funded terrorism as one of the biggest issues, with aspiring terrorist fighters more likely to use personal salaries, welfare payments, business profits or even small personal loans to self-fund terrorism or contribute to extremist groups in the Middle East, such as Islamic State.

23. 700 insurgents killed, wounded in a week: MoD

Pajhwok Afghan News, Ahmad Shah Erfanyar, 2016 08 09

Kabul - The Ministry of Defence (MoD) on Monday said some 700 insurgents were either killed or wounded over the past one week during operations underway in 13 provinces. Maj. Gen. Mohammad Habib Hesari, MoD operations head, told a press conference here that 19 government forces-planned operations were underway in Nangarhar, Kunar, Laghman, Paktika, Paktia, Khost, Kandahar, Zabul, Helmand, Ghor, Farah, Kunduz and Takhar provinces. As a result of these operations, he said at least 518 rebels were killed and another 188 wounded during the past one week in various areas of the country. He said most of the casualties inflicted on insurgents were in Nangarhar, Helmand and Kunduz provinces and 43 insurgents were also detained during the period. Without providing specific figures, Hesari said a minimal number of security personnel also suffered casualties during the past one week.

24. Airstrikes Are Barely Holding Off Taliban in Helmand, Afghan Officials Say

New York Times, Mujib Mashal, Taimoor Shah, 2016 08 09

Kabul - The Afghan security forces are struggling to head off an intensified Taliban offensive in Helmand Province in recent weeks, heavily relying on American airstrikes as the insurgents have again tightened the noose around Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, according to officials and residents. Even as Afghan and American officials insist that they will not allow another urban center to fall, concerned about the political ramifications for the struggling government in Kabul as well as the presidential campaign in the United States, residents and local officials describe Lashkar Gah as practically besieged. The main road connecting the city and the highway to the southern commercial and military hub of Kandahar has been repeatedly blocked in recent days by the Taliban, who blew up several bridges. Civilian passengers can travel on an alternate dirt road, but have to pass through insurgent checkpoints. Many businesses and nongovernmental organizations based in Lashkar Gah are trying to evacuate, and the road blockages have added to their alarm. The Afghan forces' continuous failure to hold ground in a province that has seen the deployment of a large number of troops and resources, as well as hundreds of NATO military advisers, is taking a toll on the residents of Lashkar Gah. The city has long been a haven for people displaced from other areas of Helmand by the constant back and forth between the Taliban and the coalition and government forces.

25. Dozens killed in Quetta bomb attack

Gulf News, Mohsin Ali, 2016 08 09

Islamabad - More than 60 people were killed and dozens injured in a suspected suicide bomb explosion on Monday in the capital of Pakistan's restive southwestern Balochistan province, officials said. The blast, one of the worst attacks in the province long plagued by a low-scale separatist insurgency, occurred at the Civil Hospital in Quetta. The attacker targeted lawyers gathered outside the emergency ward of the hospital where the body of the slain president of Balochistan Bar Association, Bilal Anwar Kasi, was brought for autopsy. Kasi was earlier shot dead by unknown gunmen on Mannu Jan Road in the provincial capital when he was on his way from his home to Balochistan High Court. The dead and the injured included lawyers, police officials and journalists, the national broadcaster said and quoted Balochistan home minister Sarfraz Bugti as saying that the incident appeared to be a suicide attack.

26. Le terrorisme vous choque-t-il encore ?

Journal de Montréal, Lise Ravary, 2016 08 09

Chronique - Les islamistes, salafistes, daeshistes et autres fanatiques qui se réclament d'un islam violent, façon 7e siècle, sont en train de remporter une victoire inattendue dans la guerre qu'ils mènent aux mécréants, musulmans, juifs ou chrétiens: nous rendre insensibles à la barbarie. La surabondance d'attentats meurtriers use l'humain, c'est normal Les attentats, devenus monnaie courante, nous émeuvent pendant quelques heures et puis on passe à autre chose. À quoi bon s'en faire si on ne peut rien y faire, non ? TROP LOIN Hier, un kamikaze s'est fait exploser au milieu d'une foule en deuil devant un hôpital, à Quetta au Pakistan. Bilan, 70 personnes et 122 blessés. L'attentat a été revendiqué par l'État islamique. Il y a quelques années, j'aurais été bouleversée par cette nouvelle. Maintenant, je ne suis qu'horrifiée. À Pâques, un autre attentat avait fait 75 morts au Pakistan, dont le tiers étaient des enfants. Nul ne va nier que c'est terrible, mais nous haussons collectivement les épaules : le Pakistan est une poudrière depuis la création de la République islamique en 1947. Et c'est si loin. À ma surprise, on a peu parlé ici du meurtre du mannequin vedette Qandeel Baloch, 26 ans, la Kim Kardashian du Pakistan, étranglée par son frère qui ne pouvait supporter le déshonneur que suscitait le francparler de sa soeur - elle militait contre les crimes d'honneur - et ses photos sexy sur internet. Sans doute inspirés par certains commentaires sur le châtement infligé au blogueur saoudien Raif Badawi, combien ont pensé : «elle a couru après»? La désensibilisation fait son oeuvre.

28. Alors que 23 ressortissants égyptiens ont été enlevés dans l'est libyen

Liberté (Algérie), Lyès Menacer, 2016 08 08

Syrte - Une bataille "décisive" se prépare contre Daech à Syrte Le gouvernement d'union nationale (GNA) de Fayez al-Sarraj, fort du soutien de l'aviation américaine, est décidé à en finir avec la branche libyenne de l'autoproclamé État islamique (Daech), acculé dans son fief à Syrte, mais continuant toutefois à opposer une résistance farouche aux forces gouvernementale. Dans un communiqué diffusé hier, le GNA a annoncé en effet le lancement prochainement de ce qu'il considère comme le dernier assaut pour libérer la ville natale de l'ancien guide Mouammar Kadhafi des mains de ce mouvement terroriste. C'est le "début du compte à rebours pour la dernière phase des opérations militaires contre (...) Daech" dans cette ville côtière située à 450 km à l'est de Tripoli, ont annoncé ces forces dans un communiqué transmis aux agences de presse. Selon le texte, les commandants de l'opération ont tenu des réunions "intensives" avant l'assaut "final et décisif" pour "éradiquer la bande de Daech de la ville de Syrte". Samedi, leur centre de presse a publié des photos de soldats étudiant un plan de la ville. Les forces du GNA tentent d'atteindre le Centre de conférences "Ouagadougou", le complexe où les terroristes ont établi leur centre de commandement et sont aujourd'hui pris en étau.

Ottawa - Le ministre canadien de la Défense nationale, Harjit S. Sajjan, séjournera en Afrique, notamment en République démocratique du Congo (RDC), en Éthiopie, au Kenya, en Tanzanie et en Ouganda du 09 au 16 août 2016. 30. South Africa and Terrorism - the Links Are Real

Institute for Security Studies, Albertus Schoeman, 2016 08 09

Analysis - Since the bombings by People against Gangsterism and Drugs (PAGAD) in Cape Town in the late 1990s, there has not been a serious terror attack in South Africa. Yet links continue to be found between South Africa and international terrorism. In June the US embassy in South Africa alerted its citizens in the country to possible terror attacks, and the UK and Australia similarly revised their travel alerts. How real is the threat? Evidence suggests that South Africa has been used as a transit point for terrorists, and as a base for planning, training and financing terror operations. But perhaps the bigger problem is government communication in response to the allegations and mounting evidence. Rather than shedding light and inspiring confidence, the official line has fostered distrust and uncertainty. What we do know is that South Africa has a long history when it comes to violent extremism. Note: Albertus Schoeman, Consultant, Transnational Threats and International Crime Division, ISS Pretoria.

31. War of words in Boko Haram extremist leadership struggle

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Lagos - A struggle within Nigeria's Islamic extremist group Boko Haram is playing out in public, with a new leader named by the Islamic State group accusing the longtime leader of killing his own people and living in luxury while fighters' babies starve. Abu Musab al-Barnawi, named by the Islamic State group last week as the new governor of its West Africa Province, alleges that Abubakar Shekau has killed fellow Muslims including his own fighters, neglected hungry women and children and failed to provide food and weapons to fighters. His audio message apparently was made Friday and posted by the New York-based Sahara Reporters, a Nigerian news group. Shekau responded in a video posted on YouTube, saying al-Barnawi is not qualified to lead the group but insisting that "we have not reneged on our loyalty to the leadership of (Abu Bakr) al-Baghdadi," the Islamic State leader. The video, which was posted Sunday night and removed by YouTube for violating its standards, ends with Shekau firing repeatedly in the air. He is flanked by two fighters hefting rocket-propelled grenade launchers. The video starts with an unidentified masked man in front of a large group of armed fighters announcing their refusal to follow al-Barnawi and calling Shekau "our leader." Then Shekau, with his trademark bushy beard and camouflage, threatens more attacks and warns "President (Muhammadu) Buhari, very soon you will see us inside your home, the presidential palace."

32. Security Screeners Cut Corners at Rio Games

Wall Street Journal, Multiple reporters, 2016 08 09

Rio de Janeiro - Security screeners posted outside some Olympics venues have taken to waving spectators through checkpoints without X-raying their bags in order to help reduce long lines, the latest breakdown in a process that has raised fears about lax security at the Rio Games. Olympics security officials have at times been halting the use of X-ray scanners and instead inspecting bags by hand to help shorten wait times, an organizing committee spokesman said Monday. He said security personnel were also performing "random" checks, an acknowledgment that at times not all bags are being screened in an effort to speed the lines. At several Olympics locales over the weekend, including the beach-volleyball stadium in Copacabana and the equestrian venue in Deodoro sports complex on the city's north side, screeners opted for visual inspections of bags in lieu of machine screening of backpacks and purses. In some cases, screeners didn't review bags at all, although ticket holders were required to walk through metal detectors.

33. China determined to battle on two fronts as North Asian tensions spike

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Beijing/Tokyo - As China diplomatically confronts the United States and South Korea over new missile defenses and intensifies pressure on Japan at sea over disputed islets, Beijing is signaling it is prepared to stand its ground on two key regional fronts. Mainland analysts see little immediate chance for an easing of tensions now roiling across Northeast Asia, saying a rising China is showing it is keen to shape its own battlefield despite fresh threats. "This action is China saying to the world that it has the ability to fight two regional conflicts on its doorstep," said Ni Lexiong, a naval expert at the Shanghai University of Political Science and Law. "If [Japan] is actively making provocations in our South China Sea, then in the East China Sea, on its doorway, it will face a little pressure," Ni said. Beijing's claims to much of the South China Sea were invalidated last month in an emphatic ruling by an arbitration court in The Hague in a case brought by rival claimant, the Philippines. The region's deepening fault lines after the ruling were exposed at the weekend as a fleet of Chinese coast guard and fishing vessels sailed near Japanese-controlled islets in the East China Sea. Japan warned China on Tuesday ties were "deteriorating markedly". Tokyo worries that Chinese control of the South China Sea, through which much of the oil it imports is shipped, threatens its national security and takes Beijing a step closer to extending its influence into the Western Pacific.

34. India seeks US help to crack Pakistan terror fund trail

The Hindu, Vijaita Singh, 2016 08 09

New Delhi - India has initiated the process to corner Pakistan globally regarding its patronage to the Al Rehmat Trust, a front for the terrorist outfit Jaish-e-Mohammad (JeM), which carried out the attack at the Pathankot airbase in January this year. India has approached select European countries and the U.S., who are part of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) to seek the bank transaction details of the Al Rehmat Trust, which operates a dozen offices in Pakistan. Indian agencies suspect that the Trust, founded by Jaish chief, Maulana Masood Azhar, has over Rs. 100 crore in its kitty and the money is used for funding and training terrorist modules. The National Investigation Agency had sent a letter rogatory (judicial request) to Pakistan in April this year, seeking the donation and bank details of the trust.

35. Japan demands China withdraw gov't ships from waters near Senkakus

Kyodo News, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Tokyo - Japan demanded Tuesday that China promptly withdraw its government vessels from waters around the disputed Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea, saying Beijing's attempt to change the status quo has badly hurt bilateral ties. Tokyo's strongly worded protest came after some Chinese government vessels continued to enter Japanese waters around the islets in recent days despite repeated protests from Japan, escalating tensions in the area. Foreign Minister Fumio Kishida summoned Chinese Ambassador to Japan Cheng Yonghua to the Foreign Ministry on Tuesday morning and protested against the Chinese move around the Japanese-administered, Chinese-claimed uninhabited islands, according to the ministry. "The Chinese side is attempting to change the status quo in a one-sided manner. I cannot help saying that because of this, the situation surrounding Japanese-Chinese relations has markedly deteriorated," Kishida was quoted as telling the ambassador. It was the first direct protest lodged by a Japanese Cabinet member over the recent Chinese activities around the islets, which China calls Diaoyu, following repeated protests by Japanese Foreign Ministry officials. Kishida told Cheng that Chinese vessels' repeated entry into Japanese territorial waters is totally unacceptable, as it violates Japan's sovereignty and escalates tensions, the ministry said.

36. S. Korea, U.N. aviation body to discuss reaction to N. Korea's unannounced missile launches

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Seoul - South Korea and the United Nations' air navigation regulator, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), will discuss this week ways to respond to North Korea's recent launches of ballistic missiles that came without the necessary declaration of no-fly zones, the foreign ministry said Tuesday. "North Korea's unannounced launches of ballistic missiles will surely be discussed," spokesman Cho June-hyuck said in a briefing, referring to the meeting between Vice Foreign Minister Cho Tae-yul and ICAO Secretary General Fang Liu slated for Thursday in Seoul. "Actions that can be taken in regards to North Korea's firing off of ballistic missiles in violation of relevant regulations will be part of the discussion," the spokesman said, adding that international civil aviation security will be one of major issues to be dealt with at the meeting. The planned meeting comes as South Korea is ratcheting up diplomatic efforts to tighten the screws on North Korea following the country firing off a series of ballistic missiles in defiance of bans imposed by the international community. Last week, South Korea alerted the ICAO and the International Maritime Organization (IMO) about the dangers of North Korea's recent ballistic missile launches conducted without prior warning, including the test-firing that took place on Aug. 3.

37. Taurus missiles to start operation with S. Korean Air Force this year

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Seoul - South Korea plans to deploy dozens of "jamming proof" air- to-ground guided missiles that can be carried on its F-15K fighters in a bid to bolster its strike capabilities amid mounting military threats from North Korea, military officials said Tuesday. Dozens of Taurus missiles will be brought in from Germany by the end of this year as the U.S. government has recently approved the exports of critical military GPS receivers which can be attached to war planes, according to the military. The receivers are vital because they are not affected by North Korean GPS jamming. The military said the F-15K Slam Eagle is designed to penetrate the North's air defense systems and precisely destroy major military facilities. If armed with the Taurus missile, the plane can hit North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang while flying over Daejeon, 164 kilometers south of Seoul. It also said the jets could fire off a Taurus over the East Sea and hit the North missile launching facility in Hwadae, in the northern part of North Korea.

38. THAAD discord amplifies through Minjoo's China visit

Korea Herald, Shin Hyon-hee, 2016 08 09

Seoul - The controversial visit by six first-termers of The Minjoo Party of Korea to China was met with little fanfare since their arrival on Monday, as the Seoul government continued to slam the trip and reaffirmed the need to station the U.S.' Terminal High Altitude Area Defense system here. "We're at a critical moment when it's more important than anything to gather strength from all people in unison to surmount this grave security situation, instead of incurring internal division and confrontation through social controversy," Prime Minister Hwang Kyo-ahn said at a cabinet meeting on Tuesday. President Park Geun-hye later echoed Hwang's views during her speech at the ruling Saenuri Party's convention to elect a new leadership. "The disputed THAAD installment is a minimal defense measure to safeguard the survival of the nation and of the people, as well as an inevitable one to counter North Korea's nuclear and missile threats," she said. As the six lawmakers pressed ahead with the trip, despite criticism from the government and some fellow party members, they ran into a series of snags for scheduled meetings with Seoul's Ambassador Kim Jang-soo and Korean businesspeople in Beijing.

"Leakage of the information showed the Iranian negotiators' wisdom and cleverness because the same issue has turned into a problem in the US," Salehi told FNA on Monday. 42. 'Aleppo's Regime' Falls Apart, Russia Carries out Strikes to Prevent its Collapse

Asharq Al-Awsat, Caroline Akoum, 2016 08 09

Beirut - The opposition factions' success in breaking the siege of Aleppo has changed the military balance on the ground with hopes that such advance could reflect on the negotiations expected to be held in Geneva end of August. Sporadic fighting continued in south Aleppo on Sunday after regime forces and their allies witnessed a blow when opposition factions succeeded to break the siege of the city's eastern districts and to surround its western neighborhoods. Meanwhile, Aleppo's operation room asserted that opposition factions aim to "liberate the city." On Sunday, Jaish al-Fatah announced it had captured a number of regime forces members in the areas where the opposition was able to advance. Activists asserted that the Syrian regime and its ally, Russia, had amplified their air assaults particularly in Aleppo's Ramouseh area, to prevent the complete collapse of regime forces.

44. Car bombs target pro-government militia in Yemen, 10 dead

Gulf News, Staff Report, 2016 08 09

Sana'a - Yemeni security officials say at least 10 fighters from a pro-government militia have been killed when suspected Al Qaida militants targeted their convoy with two car bombs. The officials say the attack took place late on Sunday in the Yafea area in Lahj province, where Yemen's Al Qaida branch controls several areas, including a large base in which it has stockpiled heavy weapons looted from army depots elsewhere. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorised to talk to the media. Al Qaida has taken advantage of Yemen's civil war to gain a foothold in several southern Yemeni areas. The war pits troops and militiamen loyal to the internationally recognised government, backed by a Saudi-led coalition, against Shiite Al Houthi rebels and a former president's loyalists. 45. Iran backed Iraqi, Lebanese Shiite militias deploy to Syria's Aleppo

Associated Press, 2016 08 09

Beirut - Iran-backed Shiite militant groups from Lebanon and Iraq are deploying hundreds of additional fighters to front lines in the Syrian city of Aleppo, Iranian media and militia officials said Monday, after Syrian rebels breached a government-imposed siege and cut a key government route to the contested city over the weekend. The reinforcements by at least four groups, described by officials and state media as "elite," will shore up Syrian President Bashar Assad's forces there as fighting over control of the city intensifies. Rebels breached the Syrian government siege on opposition neighborhoods in the city of Aleppo Saturday, opening a corridor in the south and marking a major military breakthrough. The push prompted an intensive airstrike campaign Sunday as insurgent groups put up a massive defense to protect the new corridor and gain new ground.

46. Major security flaw in 900m Android phones, tablets, says Check Point

Times of Israel, Dan Schwartz, 2016 08 09

Jerusalem - Nearly a billion Android phones and tablets are vulnerable to malware that could allow hackers "complete control of devices and access to sensitive personal and enterprise data on them," according to Israeli cybersecurity firm Check Point. The hacks are possible due to a series of four vulnerabilities -- dubbed QuadRooter -- affecting Android devices built on Qualcomm chipsets, which are found in nearly two-thirds of mobile devices. "If any one of the four vulnerabilities is exploited, an attacker can trigger privilege escalations and gain root access to a device," said the Check Point research team that discovered the problem. Unlike most malware, which can be rooted out or at least detected by antivirus software, there's little users can do except wait for Qualcomm to issue patches to fix the problem, according to Check Point.

Jerusalem - A United Nations worker in Gaza has been arrested for using his position to aid Hamas military activities, the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) announced on Tuesday. The UNDP is tasked with projects to help the Strip's inhabitants, including projects to rehabilitate homes damaged in warfare. Burash had worked as a UNDP engineer since 2003. 49. Blow for migrant deal as Turkey rejects EU terror law demands

Istanbul - The EU's demand that Turkey must overhaul its terror laws in return for visa-free travel is "impossible" in the aftermath of last month's attempted coup, the country's EU minister has warned. In an interview with the Financial Times, Omer Celik dealt a fresh blow to the fragile deal between the EU and Ankara that has helped stem the flow of refugees and migrants to European shores. For the EU to ease visa requirements for 79m Turkish citizens -- one of a series of incentives promised in return for Turkey's help with the refugee crisis -- Turkey needs to amend its sweeping terror legislation in line with EU law and guidance from the Council of Europe. Mr Celik said that Turkey was open to discussions about counterterror law with European partners and could commit to reforms in the longer term. He warned, however, that it was "impossible" in the short term after the government was almost overthrown by alleged supporters of Fethullah Gulen, an exiled cleric who Turkey has branded a terrorist. He strongly denies the accusation.

50. Chartres : deux ans de prison pour consultation répétée de sites faisant l'apologie du terrorisme

France 3 - (Régions) avec l'Agence France-Presse, Fabienne Marcel, 2016 08 09

Chartres, France - Un homme de 31 ans a été condamné lundi par le tribunal correctionnel de Chartres à deux ans de prison ferme pour avoir consulté de manière répétée des sites liés à la commission d'actes terroristes. Le tribunal correctionnel de Chartres, qui le jugeait en comparution immédiate, l'a placé sous mandat de dépôt à l'issue de l'audience, a-t-on appris de source judiciaire, confirmant une information du journal local L'Écho Républicain. Le parquet avait requis une peine d'un an de prison ferme. L'homme a été interpellé à la fin de la semaine dernière à Chartres après avoir été repéré par les services de renseignement. Les investigations ont montré qu'il avait pris l'habitude de consulter des sites internet faisant l'apologie du terrorisme, selon cette source. Sur son mur Facebook, l'homme aurait laissé entendre qu'il voulait voir détruire la Tour Montparnasse à Paris. "Les enquêteurs n'ont pas trouvé d'éléments qui permettent de penser à un projet clairement établi", indique cette source judiciaire. "Cet homme ne faisait pas l'objet d'une fiche S.

51. Erdogan : " Les Occidentaux ont laissé les Turcs seuls "

Le Monde, Christophe Ayad, Marie Jégo et Marc Semo, 2016 08 09

Ankara - Le président turc, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, rejette les critiques sur l'ampleur des purges en cours en Turquie depuis la tentative de coup d'Etat dans la nuit du 15 au 16 juillet. Il menace de rompre les accords migratoires signés avec l'Union européenne Trois semaines après la tentative de putsch qui a ébranlé la Turquie dans la nuit du 15 au 16 juillet, le président Recep Tayyip Erdogan a reçu Le Monde, samedi 6 août, à -Istanbul, pour lui accorder son premier entretien à la presse occidentale depuis ces événements. Le chef de l'Etat turc, en butte à de virulentes critiques en Occident sur l'ampleur des purges post-coup d'Etat, reproche à ses partenaires, européens comme américains, leur manque d' " empathie " et de soutien. Alors qu'il doit rencontrer son homologue russe, Vladimir Poutine, mardi, à Saint-Pétersbourg, M. Erdogan dessine les contours d'une probable rupture avec l'Union européenne (UE) sur la question migratoire ainsi que sur les droits de l'homme. Vous avez déclaré que les Occidentaux avaient " pris le parti des putschistes et des terroristes ". Qu'est-ce que vous leur reprochez? Pendant la tentative de putsch, une partie des leaders du monde occidental m'ont appelé au téléphone. Cela n'était pas suffisant. Nous n'étions pas face à une attaque terroriste ordinaire. Nous comptons 240 martyrs et 2 200 blessés. Le monde entier avait réagi à l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo . Notre premier ministre s'était joint à la marche dans les rues de Paris. J'aurais souhaité que les leaders du monde occidental réagissent également à ce qui s'est passé en Turquie et qu'ils ne se contentent pas de quelques clichés pour condamner - la tentative de putsch - . Ou alors, j'aurais voulu qu'ils viennent ici en Turquie.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Amsterdam - A European counter-terrorism intelligence database designed to generate greater intelligence sharing among allies to avert deadly Islamist attacks has gone online after overcoming traditional reluctance by spy agencies to sharing information. European officials were spurred into setting up the project by the Paris attacks last November by Islamist militants which exposed intelligence gaps. A total of 130 people were killed in those attacks. Hosted by the Dutch intelligence service in the Hague, the database went live on July 1, the German Interior Ministry and the German domestic intelligence agency (BfV) said. "The intelligence database will make it much easier and quicker to share information about possible threats," said one intelligence official. The database enables European intelligence agencies to share real-time information about suspected Islamist militants collected by members of the Counter-Terrorism Group (CTG), which groups all 28 European Union countries, Switzerland and Norway.

53. Facebook Denies Withholding User Data in German Criminal Investigations

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Berlin - Facebook rejected on Monday claims made by Germany's state authorities that it was reluctant to co-operate with them on criminal investigations, saying many of the requests it received for user data were incorrectly formulated. Several regional interior ministers have complained that the social media group is hesitant to respond to requests for data and have called on the Federal Justice Ministry to introduce new laws. But Facebook said it had provided "round the clock assistance" to the authorities in Bavaria following a spate of violent attacks in Munich, Wuerzburg and Ansbach last month. A spokeswoman for the Justice Ministry said it was examining whether there was a need to change the law or whether there was a problem with its implementation.

54. La Turquie conquise par l'islamisme

Journal de Montréal, Loïc Tassé, 2016 08 09

Chronique- Suite au coup d'État raté du 15 juillet dernier, le gouvernement turc est devenu encore plus dictatorial et plus islamiste qu'auparavant. Sous prétexte de lutter pour la démocratie, Recep Tayyip Erdogan a purgé toutes les forces d'opposition chez les militaires, les policiers, les juges, les professeurs, les fonctionnaires et les journalistes. La Turquie n'est plus un pays démocratique. Si Erdogan va jusqu'au bout, la Turquie basculera complètement dans le camp des islamistes. Aujourd'hui, Erdogan rencontre Vladimir Poutine à Saint- Pétersbourg. Poutine doit regarder avec angoisse la montée d'Erdogan. Quant aux membres de l'OTAN, ils se demandent de plus en plus quoi faire avec ce pays. 1 Pourquoi tant de Turcs ont-ils manifesté aux côtés d'Erdogan ? Ce dimanche, près de cinq millions de Turcs sont descendus dans les rues aux côtés d'Erdogan, prétendument pour soutenir la démocratie. Mais ce chiffre ne veut pas dire grandchose. Erdogan a fait arrêter ou fait renvoyer de leur poste plus de 60 000 personnes. Dans de telles conditions, beaucoup de Turcs veulent donner l'impression de soutenir Erdogan. Car l'opposition est réduite au silence. Les médias sont presque tous contrôlés par Erdogan ou fermés. Ceux qui critiquent le gouvernement d'Erdogan risquent la prison. Erdogan recevra bientôt de nouveaux pouvoirs qui devraient lui permettre de gouverner en vrai dictateur.

55. New spyware detected targeting firms in Russia, China: Symantec

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Frankfurt - A previously unknown hacking group variously dubbed "Strider" or "ProjectSauron" has carried out cyber-espionage attacks against select targets in Russia, China, Iran, Sweden, Belgium and Rwanda, security researchers said on Monday. The group, which has been active since at least 2011 and could have links to a national intelligence agency, uses Remsec, an advanced piece of hidden malware, Symantec researchers said in a blog post. Remsec spyware lives within an organization's network rather than being installed on individual computers, giving attackers complete control over infected machines, researchers said. It enables keystroke logging and the theft of files and other data. Its code also contains references to Sauron, the all-seeing title character in The Lord of the Rings, Symantec said. Strider is the nickname of the fantasy trilogy's widely traveled main character Aragorn. Separately, Moscow-based Kaspersky Lab has labeled the same group using the Remsec spyware as "ProjectSauron".

56. Saudis Offer Aid To German Probe

Berlin - Saudi authorities offered Berlin help in investigating two attacks claimed by Islamic State in Germany last month, officials from both countries said on Monday. Authorities here said the terror militia abroad hadn't only inspired the attacks, but also appeared to have helped execute them by instructing both perpetrators in how to maximize casualties. The investigation had shown that Islamic State members abroad had helped the perpetrators and that at least one of them had a Saudi cellphone number, a German official said. The findings, derived from a probe of the perpetrators' electronic devices, suggest a more deliberate campaign by Islamic State to attack Germany than authorities had expected in the immediate aftermath of the attacks, which left several people wounded. The atrocities by two recently arrived asylum seekers have punctured a sense of calm in Germany, which had so far been spared the large-scale terror assaults seen in France and Belgium. Chancellor Angela Merkel, who presided over the arrival of well over a million refugees since the beginning of last year, has seen her popularity ratings plummet in the weeks following the attacks. The German government welcomed Saudi Arabia's offer to share intelligence on the attacks, which both took place in the southern state of Bavaria.

Der Spiegel, Multiple reporters, 2016 08 08

Berlin - When Nils D. turned his back on the Islamic State (IS), he thought about sex. He had spent a year serving the terrorist militia, performing guard duty and working as a cook. He had discovered severed heads on the street and watched beheadings. He had listened to the screams of people being tortured and looked on as they were hung from metal poles with their hands tied behind their backs. These are the kinds of atrocities he had exposed people to as a member of a special unit that was tasked to arrest alleged spies, traitors or other opponents of IS. But by the beginning of November 2014, he wanted out. He came up with a false pretense to travel to Turkey. He wanted to meet his mother and sister in Istanbul and then journey onward to his home in Dinslaken, Germany, a town in the country's Ruhr region. Nils D. has never said what was going through his mind that day, but his mobile phone's browser history provides some answers. He perused a list of the most wanted criminals on the German Federal Criminal Office's website because he feared he might get arrested in Germany. He also looked up ferry connections from Turkey and long-distance buses to his home state of North Rhine-Westphalia, because he feared getting checked at the airport. He also looked on the website of a popular retailer for new plus-size clothes because he needed an inconspicuous outfit and was too corpulent for normal attire. In addition, he searched for hotels in Istanbul and for sightseeing tips in the city for the days he would be spending with his mom and sister, Annika. Most of all, though, Nils D. thought about sex. He searched for terms like "Red Light Istanbul" online. One query result contained the heading, "Bordello in Istanbul." His phone also saved the names of dozens of relevant porn clips he had played. Before he boarded a bus from Istanbul back home, he deleted the data stored on his mobile phone. The images of him with his buddies in battle gear, the photo of him standing behind a masked, bound man holding a pistol to his head -- all of it was supposed to disappear before his return. Today, Nils D. is being held in a German prison as a convicted terrorist. The Higher Regional Court in Düsseldorf sentenced him to four years and six months behind bars.

Ankara - Plus de 26.000 personnes ont été interpellées en Turquie à la suite du coup d'Etat manqué du 15 juillet, dont 16.000 ont été officiellement arrêtées et placées en détention provisoire, a annoncé aujourd'hui le ministre de la Justice, Bekir Bozdag. Dans une interview diffusée en direct à la télévision, le ministre a ajouté que 6000 autres suspects étaient toujours en prison mais qu'aucune charge n'avait encore été officiellement retenue contre eux. Quelque 7700 autres sont en liberté mais font l'objet d'une enquête pour leur implication présumée dans la tentative de putsch. Le ministre a aussi mis en garde mardi les États-Unis de ne pas sacrifier les relations bilatérales en raison du "terroriste" Fethullah Gülen, à l'origine, selon Ankara, du putsch avorté du 15 juillet.

59. Une adolescente radicalisée mise en examen

Le Figaro, Journaliste maison, 2016 08 09

Melun, France - La mineure de 16 ans avait publié sur Internet des messages jugés « inquiétants » par les enquêteurs. Radicalisation Une mineure de 16 ans a été mise en examen, ce lundi à Paris, et placée en détention provisoire. L'adolescente, interpellée jeudi dans le cadre d'une opération antiterroriste à Melun, en Seine-et-Marne, se disait prête à commettre un attentat sur le sol français. La jeune fille était administratrice d'un groupe sur la messagerie en ligne Telegram où, lors de conversations, « elle a relayé de nombreux messages de propagande du groupe État islamique, a relayé des appels à la commission d'un attentat et a également exprimé son intention de passer à l'acte » , selon une source proche de l'enquête. C'est grâce à ces messages que les enquêteurs ont pu remonter jusqu'à l'adolescente, qui n'a pas d'antécédent judiciaire. Les perquisitions menées par les policiers d'élite du Raid, notamment au domicile familial de la jeune fille, n'ont pas permis de découvrir des armes ou des explosifs. L'ordinateur et le téléphone de la mineure sont en cours d'exploitation et « il n'y a pas eu à ce stade d'autres interpellations » , ajoute cette même source. « Très radicalisée » , la fille a été inculpée pour « association de malfaiteurs en relation avec une entreprise terroriste criminelle » et « provocation à la commission d'actes de terrorisme par un moyen de communication en ligne » .

1. Tamim's dangerous Canada connection

Bangladesh Daily Star, Staff Correspondent, 2016 08 09

Dhaka - Meet Tamim Chowdhury -- the man who is now thought to have masterminded the Holey Artisan attack in Gulshan that left 20 diners, 17 of them foreigners -- dead on July 1. Only a week later, he led the attack near the Eid congregation in Sholakia that left four, including two cops, dead. Terrifying new information has been gleaned about Tamim, a longtime resident of Calgary in Canada. He used to mix with people who had joined IS, and many of them went to Syria where the terror group controls a large part of territories. He was deemed such a dangerous man that religious leaders in Windsor, where Tamim was born, had asked him around 2013 not to mix with youths at the mosques, fearing that he might radicalise them. It is estimated that some 180 Canadians have left the country to take part in jihadi war around the world, the director of Canadian Security Intelligence Service said in March, according to the National Post. About 60 have come back already, and Tamim was probably one of them.

2. Aminata Traoré, invitée indésirable?

Le Devoir, Marie-Michèle Sioui avec Boris Proulx, 2016 08 09

Montréal - « Le message, c'est que l'hémisphère nord, qui est donneur de leçons de démocratie, foule aux pieds ses propres principes. » La phrase est tombée comme une condamnation, formulée par Aminata Traoré, une ex-ministre malienne à qui le Canada a refusé l'entrée au pays, où elle devait participer au Forum social mondial (FSM), organisé pour la première fois dans un pays situé au nord de l'équateur. Au téléphone, lundi soir, la militante altermondialiste -- et féministe, et femmes d'affaires, et écrivaine -- semblait résignée. Pendant que son passeport diplomatique circulait encore entre les mains d'employés qui devaient s'affairer à réviser sa première demande de visa refusée, Mme Traoré a annoncé qu'elle se rangeait, une fois de plus, du côté des exclus. « Par principe, j'ai décidé d'annuler ma participation au FSM, parce qu'on n'a jamais été confrontés à une situation pareille. Par solidarité, je ne vais pas y aller alors que 200 autres n'ont aucune chance de venir », a-t-elle lancé. La veille, 312 personnes avaient contacté les organisateurs du FSM pour les aviser du rejet de leur demande de visa. Un chiffre que le ministère de l'Immigration ne peut pas confirmer, car il soutient qu'il n'a pas de liste définitive des participants attendus.

3. Canada pulls logo from anti-Israel forum; Two Liberal MPs object to tone of cartoon

National Post, Graeme Hamilton, 2016 08 09

Toronto - The federal government has distanced itself from a major international gathering opening Tuesday in Montreal following complaints that its programming included anti-Semitic content. The World Social Forum, expected to draw more than 10,000 participants, was told last week to remove the Canadian government logo from its list of partners after two Liberal MPs expressed disgust over what they called a "blatantly anti-Semitic cartoon" on the event's website. MPs Anthony Housefather, representing the Montreal riding of Mount Royal, and Michael Levitt, representing the Toronto riding of York Centre, also took exception to the World Social Forum's heavy emphasis on the anti-Israel BDS movement. "The Prime Minister, the Government of Canada, and the Canadian Parliament have been very clear that we oppose the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement and that anti-Semitism is never acceptable," the MPs said in a statement. Forum organizers cancelled a session that had been scheduled to show how Islamist terrorists are "in the service of world Zionismcapitalism." The page for the event had featured a cartoon of a hook-nosed orthodox Jew with a Star of David on his hat, a drawing that Reuben Poupko, co-chairman of Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) Quebec, said was "not so different from those that appeared in Nazi papers." Housefather said the federal government did not provide a grant to the Forum, but it did subsidize the employment of two students working with the organization.

4. Governments must clarify whether citizens can legally volunteer with anti-ISIL forces: study

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 08 09

Toronto - Governments need to clarify whether their citizens can legally serve as volunteer fighters in armed groups battling the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) in Syria and Iraq, a study released Tuesday has recommended. The Institute for Strategic Dialogue report found that governments "appear reluctant to state clearly" whether the hundreds of Western anti-ISIL fighters, many of them military veterans, have broken any laws. The hazy legality has led to confusion and uncertainty among both volunteer fighters and law-enforcement agencies over whether Westerners joining forces with Kurdish militias could be prosecuted at home. The Canadian government has sent mixed signals on the issue: while verbally discouraging Canadians from taking up arms against ISIL, Ottawa has not prevented them from travelling or arrested them, although some have been questioned by the RCMP upon returning. "There is a need in some instances for governments to clarify the legal situation surrounding anti-ISIS foreign fighters," according to an advance copy of the 64-page report obtained by the National Post.

5. Opinion: Searching for the shadowy Canadian leader of ISIS in Bangladesh

Bangladesh Daily Star, Amarnath Amarasingam, 2016 08 09

The name Tamim Chowdhury first came on my radar in early 2015 when I was doing interviews with friends of another Windsor jihadi who had gone off to fight in Syria: Ahmad Waseem, known as Abu Turab, who was killed in March 2015 in Tal Hamis. Tamim's name was floating around as someone who may have also left for Syria. I jotted down his name, but then became busy with other things. Some months later, I spoke to another friend of Waseem's and remembered to also ask about Tamim. He seemed a little surprised, and remarked that Tamim, facing harassment from law enforcement in Canada, had decided to simply move back to his home country of Bangladesh. Nothing to worry about, he said. I was skeptical. The next time I saw his name appear, it became clear that Tamim was indeed important. A colleague of mine, who asked to be anonymous, pointed me to the ISIS Study Group website (which as of this writing has gone offline) where Tamim was mentioned as one of the leaders of ISIS in Bangladesh.

6. Trois ans pour l'usurpateur d'identité

Le Droit, Louis-Denis Ebacher, 2016 08 09

Gatineau - Un fabricant de faux passeports de Gatineau, ayant permis à un des criminels les plus notables du Canada de fuir le pays, écope trois ans de pénitencier. Harbi Mohamoud Gabad, 50 ans, a plaidé coupable à des chefs reliés à la production de faux documents, vendredi, au palais de justice de Gatineau. Au lieu d'entamer un procès complexe qui aurait duré cinq semaines, Gabad a reconnu les faits rapportés par la procureure de la Couronne, Geneviève DePassillé. Le ministère public s'est entendu avec l'avocat de la défense, Richard Dubé, sur la peine de trois ans, en échange du plaidoyer. Entre août 2011 et mars 2014, Gabad a approché au moins 13 personnes vulnérables du Vieux-Hull, dont des itinérants et des toxicomanes. En échange de leurs cartes d'identité, il leur offrait de l'argent ou du crack. Les cartes ont servi à fabriquer de faux passeports. Au moins deux des documents contrefaits ont servi à deux criminels bien connus, a rappelé Me DePassillé à la juge Rosemarie Millar, de la Cour du Québec. «L'un a permis à un dénommé (Rabih) Al Kalil de sortir du pays. Depuis ce temps, explique la procureure, il a été arrêté en Grèce et extradé.» Al Kalil est accusé de meurtre, et fait partie des cibles des policiers dans le cadre du projet «Loquace» à Montréal. Rabih est le frère de la présumée tête dirigeante de son clan, Hisham «Terry» Alkhalil. La famille a quitté la Colombie-Britannique il y a quelques années pour s'installer à Ottawa.

7. Turkey plays politics in Canada, warns outlaw group behind failed coup is operating here

National Post, Joseph Breen, 2016 08 09

Ottawa - Five Turkish parliamentarians will bring a dire warning to their Canadian counterparts on Parliament Hill on Tuesday -- that the same gang of outlaw terrorists who waged a bloody failed coup against the Turkish state is also deeply established in Canada. And just as Turkish civil society is being purged of followers of the Hizmet movement, described by President Recep Tayyip Erdogan as a "cancer" justifying the return of the death penalty, so too should Canada move to suppress this threat -- from closing Hizmet schools and restricting finances to extraditing leaders, the Turkish delegation will argue. The wider world "didn't really grasp the seriousness" of the July 15 coup, Selcuk Unal, Turkey's Ambassador to Canada, said in an interview. It revealed a covert "parallel state," under the control of exiled preacher Fethullah Gulen, willing to murder and blackmail its way to power, Unal said. "It is not a small, disorganized thing. It was an organized and serious thing."

8. 50 G.O.P. Officials Warn Donald Trump Would Put Nation's Security 'at Risk'

New York Times, David E. Sanger, Maggie Haberman, 2016 08 09

Washington - Fifty of the nation's most senior Republican national security officials, many of them former top aides or cabinet members for President George W. Bush, have signed a letter declaring that Donald J. Trump "lacks the character, values and experience" to be president and "would put at risk our country's national security and well-being." Mr. Trump, the officials warn, "would be the most reckless president in American history." The letter says Mr. Trump would weaken the United States' moral authority and questions his knowledge of and belief in the Constitution. It says he has "demonstrated repeatedly that he has little understanding" of the nation's "vital national interests, its complex diplomatic challenges, its indispensable alliances and the democratic values" on which American policy should be based. And it laments that "Mr. Trump has shown no interest in educating himself." Late Monday, Mr. Trump struck back. The signatories of the letter, he said in a statement, were "the ones the American people should look to for answers on why the world is a mess, and we thank them for coming forward so everyone in the country knows who deserves the blame for making the world such a dangerous place." He dismissed them as "nothing more than the failed Washington elite looking to hold onto their power." Among the most prominent signatories are Michael V. Hayden, a former director of both the C.I.A. and the National Security Agency; John D. Negroponte, who served as the first director of national intelligence and then deputy secretary of state; and Robert B. Zoellick, another former deputy secretary of state, United States trade representative and, until 2012, president of the World Bank. Two former secretaries of Homeland Security, Tom Ridge and Michael Chertoff, also signed, as did Eric S. Edelman, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's national security adviser and as a top aide to Robert M. Gates when he was secretary of defense.

9. Don't give Trump nuclear codes; He's unfit to be president, a former Minuteman III launch officer says.

Los Angeles Times, John Noonan, 2016 08 09

Op-ed - Since the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima in 1945, American presidents have thought of their nuclear responsibilities as the heaviest burden one could shoulder. Harry Truman wrote, "We have discovered the most terrible bomb in the history of the world." Dwight Eisenhower, no stranger to conflict, said that nuclear bombs have made war "not just tragic, but preposterous." John F. Kennedy called the weapons a "sword of Damocles," one all Americans were forced to live beneath. Those men bring us to 2016 and the Republican candidate for president, Donald Trump, who also had some deep thoughts on nuclear weapons. That is, "If we have them, why can't we use them?" Having spent five years of my life as a Minuteman III launch officer, and a year as an instructor teaching young officers how to run that weapon system, I'm equipped to answer the Trump campaign's question. The very point of nuclear weapons is that they are never used. We have them to dissuade hostile powers from attacking us, and vice versa. Trump simply cannot be trusted with weapons that can kill millions. He cannot be handed the nuclear "football" -- a briefcase containing the war plans and codes for our nuclear forces--and be made responsible for its contents. Note: John Noonan is a Republican national security expert and former Minuteman III nuclear launch officer.

ABC News, Staff report, 2016 08 08

New York - Evan McMullin, a former CIA counterterrorism officer, will run for president as a third-party conservative alternative to Donald Trump, GOP operatives working to back the candidate told ABC News today. The operatives working on McMullin's bid resigned from Better for America in order to push his candidacy. Better for America, a 501(c)(4) organization that cannot officially endorse or back McMullin's bid, has been working for months on trying to select a candidate and get on ballots throughout the country. In some states, like Texas, they will likely have to sue to get on the ballot. A 501(c)(4) is an issue-based nonprofit that can raise unlimited funds and does not have to disclose its donors. It's an extreme uphill climb, but his supporters are confident McMullin, 40, can act as a disruptor who they hope can peel off some red states in a race where some Republicans are still resistant to Donald Trump.

11. Newly declassified papers reveal U.S. tensions on Argentina's 'dirty war'

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 08 09

Washington - The Obama administration on Monday released more than 1,000 pages of newly declassified documents relating to U.S. policy toward Argentina's "dirty war" of the late 1970s and early 1980s. The documents, most from the administration of President Jimmy Carter, reveal a near-constant internal tension between U.S. eagerness to push human rights as Carter's signature foreign policy issue, and concerns that cutting off aid and trade with Argentina's ruling military junta could be counterproductive and might push it toward a closer relationship with the Soviet Union. "When we take actions toward Argentina, which are interpreted as punitive, we not only enrage the right-wing ideologues, we also arouse the business sector and the media in the U.S.," Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carter's national security adviser, wrote in a March 1979 memo to then-Secretary of State Cyrus Vance. President Obama announced the declassifications in March, on a visit to Argentina that coincided with the 40th anniversary of the coup that brought the junta to power. "I believe we have a responsibility to confront the past with honesty and transparency," Obama said at the time. An initial tranche of the documents, the same ones as those now made public, were presented to Argentine President Mauricio Macri by Secretary of State John F. Kerry during a visit to Buenos Aires last week.

12. The state of cyber security: we're all screwed

Las Vegas - When cybersecurity professionals converged in Las Vegas last week to expose vulnerabilities and swap hacking techniques at Black Hat and Defcon, a consistent theme emerged: the internet is broken, and if we don't do something soon, we risk permanent damage to our economy. "Half of all Americans are backing away from the net due to fears regarding security and privacy," longtime tech security guru Dan Kaminsky said in his Black Hat keynote speech, citing a July 2015 study by the National Telecommunications and Information

Administration. "We need to go ahead and get the internet fixed or risk losing this engine of beauty." There's no lack of things to be worried about: organized cybercriminal gangs; government surveillance; not to mention hack attacks from nation states. That may be good news for the cybersecurity industry, which is expected to grow more than 10% annually and surpass $200bn worldwide by 2021, according to research firm Markets and Markets. But it's bad news for the rest of us. As we conduct more of our lives online, we're being asked to become increasingly savvy about computer security. Many are simply uninterested or not up to the task.

Belfast Telegraph, Deborah McAleese, 2016 08 09

Belfast - Dissident republicans are now capable of launching a bomb attack on mainland Britain, security sources believe. A "few dozen" hard line republican terrorists are responsible for the heightened security fears across Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. Security sources have confirmed that the New IRA is currently the most dangerous terrorist organisation operating in the province. Intelligence gathered by both police and MI5 suggests that the paramilitary group has improved its bomb-making techniques and is highly capable of launching a bomb attack in the UK.

14. Inside MI5: My own safety does not keep me awake at night... you take certain measures and get on with life

Belfast Telegraph, Deborah McAleese, 2016 08 09

Belfast - In her bootcut jeans, trainers and T-shirt, she could easily be the girl next door. Mel is in her 30s. She is pretty, fresh-faced and smiley. She also laughs a lot. You could imagine her as the life and soul of the party during a night out with the girls. But behind the smiles and laughter lies a secret that only her closest family members know. Mel is an MI5 spy, highly trained in espionage and the use of informants. During six years operating in Northern Ireland, the information she has uncovered has helped prevent innumerable terrorist atrocities. It is Mel's job to find people with access to secret intelligence about Northern Ireland's terrorist groups, and build a relationship with them to obtain the secrets. "It's not that different to any other job really. I have normal working hours and I don't take work home. I spend a lot more time at my desk than people would think. There is a lot of paperwork to make sure we are authorised and covered legally to go out and meet agents," she explained.

15. Surveillance: Taking liberties? (Canada)

Financial Times, Gonzalo Viña, 2016 08 08

London - Growing up in Tehran, Fred Ghahramani remembers being told by his mother to be careful with what he said on the telephone because "the secret police is always listening". After several members of his family disappeared, Mr Ghahramani's father, an academic from an ethnic minority, escaped with his family to Canada when the boy was just nine years old. But his childhood fears of Ayatollah Khomeini's security service remain fresh in Mr Ghahramani's mind. It is why the Vancouver-based tech entrepreneur has pledged $1m to help campaign groups fight what he sees as a growing encroachment on privacy and civil liberties in his adopted country and in other major democracies. "You could hear them on the other end of the line - - it was quite comical that they might want to listen to a child, but you still had to be careful with what you said. You had to second guess your thoughts," Mr Ghahramani says. "I am not saying we are there yet, but my great worry is that we are sleepwalking into that same kind of environment." Canada, Australia, France, New Zealand and others have introduced powers to give security services and police far-reaching surveillance powers. No country, however, is going quite as far as the UK in creating laws that give government agencies the ability and the right to gather information. Adding to traditional forms of targeted surveillance, security services will soon have new powers to mine information about individuals via the explosion in data generated by smartphones and tablets. Mr Ghahramani, the Iranian émigré, remains sceptical about the security claims made not just by the British government but by many others around the world. "Canada and France have been collecting data in bulk for over four years, and yet terror attacks still happen. In the case of the Paris attacks, the terrorists communicated through unencrypted SMS. In the US, the NSA's bulk data collection programs have been in place even longer," he says. "The truth is, it's never actually been proven that bulk data collection can stop terrorism."

16. Australia's white jihadists

The Courier-Mail, Paul Syvret, 2016 08 09

Column: One of the favourite refrains of the more extreme anti-Islam brigade in Australia, as they try to dust themselves with a thin layer of mangled reason, is that "maybe not all Muslims are terrorists, but all terrorists are Muslim". Australia's counter-terrorism authorities clearly have a more sophisticated and informed view of what might constitute a threat to this country. We saw this over the weekend with the arrest of far-right activist Phillip Galea, who was charged with collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist act and planning or preparing for a terrorist act. He remains in custody. Galea has been associated with right wing groups, including Reclaim Australia and splinter group the United Patriots Front (UPF). Although, given the shifting sands of allegiances out on the fringes, Reclaim Australia claims he is not currently a "member" of this loose grouping; no, he's just attended some of the rallies that have been staged under its banner in recent times. At least Galea, who told a court on Sunday that the charges were a "conspiracy against the patriot movement" and didn't apply for bail (he remains in custody and says he will fight the charges), has some mates on the outside prepared to support him. Take Melbourne man Neil Erikson, who has drifted in and out of the various puddles around the patriots' pond, such as Reclaim Australia, the UPF and the Australian Liberty Alliance. All are basically rabid anti-Islam groupings with a pathological fear that halal food is the start of a slippery slope to Mecca, that multiculturalism is a failure and if you don't like our brand of ultranationalism then "f--- off 'cos we're full".

17. Australian man may face more charges over alleged far-right plot

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Sydney - A member of an Australian anti-immigration group accused of planning an attack may face additional charges in what the government said was the first time federal terrorism laws had been used to target such right-wing groups. Phillip Galea, 31, has been charged with acts done in preparation for a terrorist act and collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist act, after being arrested in Melbourne on Saturday. Victoria state Assistant Commissioner Ross Guenther told reporters that he or his associates may face additional charges. Galea will return to court on Tuesday for his next hearing. "That's always a possibility given that we're in an early part of the investigation," Guenther said on Monday. Australia, a staunch U.S. ally, has been on heightened alert for attacks by home-grown Islamist radicals since 2014 and authorities say they have thwarted a number of plots. But far-right activist groups and political parties opposed to Islam and Asian immigration are on the rise in Australia. One Nation, a political party headed by right-wing firebrand Pauline Hanson, secured four senate seats and king-maker status in national elections held last month by running on a protectionist, anti-Islam platform.

18. Australia sets up specialist cyber unit to trace terrorism payments

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Sydney - Australia has set up a cyber-intelligence unit to identify terrorism financing, money laundering and financial fraud online, the government said on Tuesday, because of "unprecedented" threats to national security. The measure expands on a major platform of conservative Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, who narrowly won re-election last month after promising to improve Australia's cybersecurity and transform the economy into a tech-savvy business hub. Justice Minister Michael Keenan said the new unit, set up under money-tracking agency the Australian Transaction Reports and Analysis Centre (AUSTRAC), would investigate online payment platforms and financial cybercrime to crack down on money-laundering and criminal networks. "We know that the use of fraudulent identities continues to be a key enabler of serious and organised crime and terrorism," Keenan said in a statement. The statement said the new AUSTRAC unit would work with the Australian and New Zealand government-funded identity support service, ID Care, to target job recruitment scams that crime syndicates used to recruit innocent people to traffic money between jurisdictions. The new unit would also work with the Australian Cybercrime Online Reporting Network to identify patterns and trends that could indicate large-scale financial scams or their methodology, Keenan said. Reuters previously reported that a decision by Australia's major banks to stop offering overseas remittance services had driven the money transfer business underground, making it harder for the authorities to track.

19. China 'spies' put power sale at risk (Canada)

The Australian Financial Review, Aaron Patrick and Primrose Riordan, 2016 08 09

Canberra - Chinese spies have been caught by the intelligence services conducting "brazen" espionage in Australia over the past year, hardening concerns within the federal government about allowing a Chinese company to buy a $10 billion power company from NSW. Senior government officials were "deeply concerned by the consequences" of a Chinese state-owned company, State Grid Corp, being issued a 99-year lease to operate Ausgrid, which provides all of Sydney's electricity, according to a security source. There were at least 60 cyber attacks on energy networks last financial year, according to official figures. Cabinet's national security subcommittee has already been briefed on their concerns and Treasurer Scott Morrison seems not to be afraid of vetoing the deal, which would fund a large part of the NSW Coalition government's new infrastructure projects. "That's the job. There are no easy decisions. This is not an easy decision and there are implications of the decision either way. Foreign investment is a very sensitive issue out there in the public and it has to be managed carefully," Mr Morrison said. The decision over Chinese investment in Australia's power grid is shaping up as the first major foreign policy test of the re-elected Turnbull government, which wants to promote foreign investment to drive the economy. Along with State Grid Corp, Cheung Kong Infrastructure, the largest publicly-listed infrastructure company in Hong Kong, is also waiting for government clearance to purchase a 99-year lease for 50.4 per cent of Ausgrid. State Grid Corp already owns electricity networks in South Australia and Victoria and was cleared by the Foreign Investment Review Board to bid last year for Transgrid, a NSW electricity distributor that was sold to Canadian interests.

20. E-currencies regulated to fight terrorism (Canada)

Sydney Morning Herald, Jewel Topsfield, 2016 08 09

Jakarta - Australia is moving to become one of the first countries to regulate e-currencies such as bitcoin under its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws. Bitcoin - the most prominent digital currency to emerge globally - is backed by a computer code rather than a physical substance such as gold or mainstream currency. The anonymity of payments using digital currencies make them attractive for terrorism financing, according to Australia's financial intelligence agency, AUSTRAC, which is co-hosting a counter-terrorism financing summit with Indonesia in Bali this week. Justice Minister Michael Keenan will inform the summit of the work Australia is doing to improve its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing legislation after a review recommended the regulation of digital currencies. "The report ... recommends strengthening an already robust legal framework to respond to new and emerging threats," he said. "The government is committed to facilitating growth and innovation in this sector and appropriate anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing regulation will aid that development." The AUSTRAC report, Terrorism Financing in Australia 2014, said electronic, online and new payment methods posed an emerging terrorism financing risk, which was likely to increase over the short term as use of these systems grew. In 2014, Canada became the first country to regulate bitcoin and other virtual currencies under its anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws.

21. Police intercepted alleged terrorist's phone calls for months, Melbourne court hears

ABC (Australia), Sarah Farnsworth, 2016 08 09

Melbourne - Police bugged telephone calls made by an alleged far- right extremist charged with plotting a terrorist act for eight months, a Melbourne court has heard. Braybrook man Phillip Galea, 31, is charged with planning to commit a terrorist act and collecting material in connection to a terrorist act. Police allege Galea is a political extremist linked to far- right groups. Galea did not apply for bail at a brief hearing in the Melbourne Magistrates' Court. A federal police prosecutor said large volumes of electronic material were seized from his home and police needed to transcribe lengthy phone calls made by him. The court heard Galea's phone calls were lawfully bugged by authorities from January 2015 onwards and some calls run as long as three hours. Galea's defence lawyer argued he had been given a vague summary of the allegations against his client and opposed the prosecution's request for extra time to prepare the case. Magistrate Lousia Bazzina described it as an extraordinary delay. The court heard Galea is suffering from audio and visual hallucinations from what was described as a "flash bang" from his arrest in raids of his home on the weekend.

22. Shadow warriors working to bleed the terrorists dry

The Australian, Nivell Rayda and Amanda Hodge, 2016 08 09

Jakarta - A few months ago Agus Santoso, deputy chairman of Indonesia's financial intelligence unit PPATK, bumped into convicted terrorist Muhammad Jibril in the green room of a television station. Jibril had just been released after serving a five-year sentence for harbouring Noordin M Top, the late mastermind of the 2004 bombing of the Australian embassy in Jakarta, the 2005 Bali bombings and the 2009 bombings of Jakarta's JW Marriot and Ritz Carlton hotels. He was unusually eager to meet Santoso. "He said to me; 'Pak Agus, I have been praying that one day we could meet. Please help me. All of my bank accounts have been suspended, my assets frozen. I can't go to the bank and open an account. They won't even let me make a transfer'," Santoso - recalls. The same thing had happened to his Malaysian wife and their four children. They couldn't leave or enter the country without being questioned by immigration and their belongings scrutinised, Jibril complained. He couldn't get loans to open a business. He even tried to use a fake ID but he was recognised. "I told him, you are a convicted terrorist," Santoso says. "Your name appears at the UN Security Council sanctions list. Your father is Abu Jibril (a firebrand cleric with ties to Jemaah Islamiah). Your younger brother died in Syria fighting for ISIS. "If you want to open an account you need to renounce your radical views. You can pray, you can fast, you can perform the Haj as many times as you want. But you can't preach and tell people to wage jihad against infidels." Jibril had fallen victim to what those in the backrooms of the counter-terrorism finance world call "disruption" -- a sort of spy-craft in a cardigan that can comprise covert or overt actions to frustrate terrorist suspects. Australian intelligence agencies have already identified self- funded terrorism as one of the biggest issues, with aspiring terrorist fighters more likely to use personal salaries, welfare payments, business profits or even small personal loans to self-fund terrorism or contribute to extremist groups in the Middle East, such as Islamic State.

23. 700 insurgents killed, wounded in a week: MoD

Pajhwok Afghan News, Ahmad Shah Erfanyar, 2016 08 09

Kabul - The Ministry of Defence (MoD) on Monday said some 700 insurgents were either killed or wounded over the past one week during operations underway in 13 provinces. Maj. Gen. Mohammad Habib Hesari, MoD operations head, told a press conference here that 19 government forces- planned operations were underway in Nangarhar, Kunar, Laghman, Paktika, Paktia, Khost, Kandahar, Zabul, Helmand, Ghor, Farah, Kunduz and Takhar provinces. As a result of these operations, he said at least 518 rebels were killed and another 188 wounded during the past one week in various areas of the country. He said most of the casualties inflicted on insurgents were in Nangarhar, Helmand and Kunduz provinces and 43 insurgents were also detained during the period. Without providing specific figures, Hesari said a minimal number of security personnel also suffered casualties during the past one week.

24. Airstrikes Are Barely Holding Off Taliban in Helmand, Afghan Officials Say

New York Times, Mujib Mashal, Taimoor Shah, 2016 08 09

Kabul - The Afghan security forces are struggling to head off an intensified Taliban offensive in Helmand Province in recent weeks, heavily relying on American airstrikes as the insurgents have again tightened the noose around Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, according to officials and residents. Even as Afghan and American officials insist that they will not allow another urban center to fall, concerned about the political ramifications for the struggling government in Kabul as well as the presidential campaign in the United States, residents and local officials describe Lashkar Gah as practically besieged. The main road connecting the city and the highway to the southern commercial and military hub of Kandahar has been repeatedly blocked in recent days by the Taliban, who blew up several bridges. Civilian passengers can travel on an alternate dirt road, but have to pass through insurgent checkpoints. Many businesses and nongovernmental organizations based in Lashkar Gah are trying to evacuate, and the road blockages have added to their alarm. The Afghan forces' continuous failure to hold ground in a province that has seen the deployment of a large number of troops and resources, as well as hundreds of NATO military advisers, is taking a toll on the residents of Lashkar Gah. The city has long been a haven for people displaced from other areas of Helmand by the constant back and forth between the Taliban and the coalition and government forces.

25. Dozens killed in Quetta bomb attack

Gulf News, Mohsin Ali, 2016 08 09

Islamabad - More than 60 people were killed and dozens injured in a suspected suicide bomb explosion on Monday in the capital of Pakistan's restive southwestern Balochistan province, officials said. The blast, one of the worst attacks in the province long plagued by a low-scale separatist insurgency, occurred at the Civil Hospital in Quetta. The attacker targeted lawyers gathered outside the emergency ward of the hospital where the body of the slain president of Balochistan Bar Association, Bilal Anwar Kasi, was brought for autopsy. Kasi was earlier shot dead by unknown gunmen on Mannu Jan Road in the provincial capital when he was on his way from his home to Balochistan High Court. The dead and the injured included lawyers, police officials and journalists, the national broadcaster said and quoted Balochistan home minister Sarfraz Bugti as saying that the incident appeared to be a suicide attack.

26. Le terrorisme vous choque-t-il encore ?

Journal de Montréal, Lise Ravary, 2016 08 09

Chronique - Les islamistes, salafistes, daeshistes et autres fanatiques qui se réclament d'un islam violent, façon 7e siècle, sont en train de remporter une victoire inattendue dans la guerre qu'ils mènent aux mécréants, musulmans, juifs ou chrétiens: nous rendre insensibles à la barbarie. La surabondance d'attentats meurtriers use l'humain, c'est normal Les attentats, devenus monnaie courante, nous émeuvent pendant quelques heures et puis on passe à autre chose. À quoi bon s'en faire si on ne peut rien y faire, non ? TROP LOIN Hier, un kamikaze s'est fait exploser au milieu d'une foule en deuil devant un hôpital, à Quetta au Pakistan. Bilan, 70 personnes et 122 blessés. L'attentat a été revendiqué par l'État islamique. Il y a quelques années, j'aurais été bouleversée par cette nouvelle. Maintenant, je ne suis qu'horriifiée. À Pâques, un autre attentat avait fait 75 morts au Pakistan, dont le tiers étaient des enfants. Nul ne va nier que c'est terrible, mais nous haussons collectivement les épaules : le Pakistan est une poudrière depuis la création de la République islamique en 1947. Et c'est si loin. À ma surprise, on a peu parlé ici du meurtre du mannequin vedette Qandeel Baloch, 26 ans, la Kim Kardashian du Pakistan, étranglée par son frère qui ne pouvait supporter le déshonneur que suscitait le francparler de sa soeur - elle militait contre les crimes d'honneur - et ses photos sexy sur internet. Sans doute inspirés par certains commentaires sur le châtement infligé au blogueur saoudien Raif Badawi, combien ont pensé : «elle a couru après»? La désensibilisation fait son oeuvre.

Syrte - Une bataille "décisive" se prépare contre Daech à Syrte Le gouvernement d'union nationale (GNA) de Fayez al-Sarraj, fort du soutien de l'aviation américaine, est décidé à en finir avec la branche libyenne de l'autoproclamé État islamique (Daech), acculé dans son fief à Syrte, mais continuant toutefois à opposer une résistance farouche aux forces gouvernementale. Dans un communiqué diffusé hier, le GNA a annoncé en effet le lancement prochainement de ce qu'il considère comme le dernier assaut pour libérer la ville natale de l'ancien guide Mouammar Kadhafi des mains de ce mouvement terroriste. C'est le "début du compte à rebours pour la dernière phase des opérations militaires contre (...) Daech" dans cette ville côtière située à 450 km à l'est de Tripoli, ont annoncé ces forces dans un communiqué transmis aux agences de presse. Selon le texte, les commandants de l'opération ont tenu des réunions "intensives" avant l'assaut "final et décisif" pour "éradiquer la bande de Daech de la ville de Syrte". Samedi, leur centre de presse a publié des photos de soldats étudiant un plan de la ville. Les forces du GNA tentent d'atteindre le Centre de conférences "Ouagadougou", le complexe où les terroristes ont établi leur centre de commandement et sont aujourd'hui pris en étau.

Selon ce communiqué, le ministre sera accompagné de l'ex-sénateur libéral et Lieutenant-général à la retraite Roméo Dallaire (celui qui commandait la Mission des Nations unies pour l'assistance au Rwanda (MINUAR) pendant le génocide de 1994), et de l'ancienne procureure en chef du Tribunal pénal international pour l'ex- Yougoslavie (TPIY) et du Tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda (TPIR) et ex-Haut-commissaire des Nations unies aux droits de l'homme Louise Arbour. 30. South Africa and Terrorism - the Links Are Real

Institute for Security Studies, Albertus Schoeman, 2016 08 09

Analysis - Since the bombings by People against Gangsterism and Drugs (PAGAD) in Cape Town in the late 1990s, there has not been a serious terror attack in South Africa. Yet links continue to be found between South Africa and international terrorism. In June the US embassy in South Africa alerted its citizens in the country to possible terror attacks, and the UK and Australia similarly revised their travel alerts. How real is the threat? Evidence suggests that South Africa has been used as a transit point for terrorists, and as a base for planning, training and financing terror operations. But perhaps the bigger problem is government communication in response to the allegations and mounting evidence. Rather than shedding light and inspiring confidence, the official line has fostered distrust and uncertainty. What we do know is that South Africa has a long history when it comes to violent extremism. Note: Albertus Schoeman, Consultant, Transnational Threats and International Crime Division, ISS Pretoria.

31. War of words in Boko Haram extremist leadership struggle

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Lagos - A struggle within Nigeria's Islamic extremist group Boko Haram is playing out in public, with a new leader named by the Islamic State group accusing the longtime leader of killing his own people and living in luxury while fighters' babies starve. Abu Musab al-Barnawi, named by the Islamic State group last week as the new governor of its West Africa Province, alleges that Abubakar Shekau has killed fellow Muslims including his own fighters, neglected hungry women and children and failed to provide food and weapons to fighters. His audio message apparently was made Friday and posted by the New York-based Sahara Reporters, a Nigerian news group. Shekau responded in a video posted on YouTube, saying al-Barnawi is not qualified to lead the group but insisting that "we have not reneged on our loyalty to the leadership of (Abu Bakr) al-Baghdadi," the Islamic State leader. The video, which was posted Sunday night and removed by YouTube for violating its standards, ends with Shekau firing repeatedly in the air. He is flanked by two fighters hefting rocket-propelled grenade launchers. The video starts with an unidentified masked man in front of a large group of armed fighters announcing their refusal to follow al-Barnawi and calling Shekau "our leader." Then Shekau, with his trademark bushy beard and camouflage, threatens more attacks and warns "President (Muhammadu) Buhari, very soon you will see us inside your home, the presidential palace."

32. Security Screeners Cut Corners at Rio Games

Rio de Janeiro - Security screeners posted outside some Olympics venues have taken to waving spectators through checkpoints without X-raying their bags in order to help reduce long lines, the latest breakdown in a process that has raised fears about lax security at the Rio Games. Olympics security officials have at times been halting the use of X-ray scanners and instead inspecting bags by hand to help shorten wait times, an organizing committee spokesman said Monday. He said security personnel were also performing "random" checks, an acknowledgment that at times not all bags are being screened in an effort to speed the lines. At several Olympics locales over the weekend, including the beach-volleyball stadium in Copacabana and the equestrian venue in Deodoro sports complex on the city's north side, screeners opted for visual inspections of bags in lieu of machine screening of backpacks and purses. In some cases, screeners didn't review bags at all, although ticket holders were required to walk through metal detectors.

33. China determined to battle on two fronts as North Asian tensions spike

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Beijing/Tokyo - As China diplomatically confronts the United States and South Korea over new missile defenses and intensifies pressure on Japan at sea over disputed islets, Beijing is signaling it is prepared to stand its ground on two key regional fronts. Mainland analysts see little immediate chance for an easing of tensions now roiling across Northeast Asia, saying a rising China is showing it is keen to shape its own battlefield despite fresh threats. "This action is China saying to the world that it has the ability to fight two regional conflicts on its doorstep," said Ni Lexiong, a naval expert at the Shanghai University of Political Science and Law. "If [Japan] is actively making provocations in our South China Sea, then in the East China Sea, on its doorway, it will face a little pressure," Ni said. Beijing's claims to much of the South China Sea were invalidated last month in an emphatic ruling by an arbitration court in The Hague in a case brought by rival claimant, the Philippines. The region's deepening fault lines after the ruling were exposed at the weekend as a fleet of Chinese coast guard and fishing vessels sailed near Japanese-controlled islets in the East China Sea. Japan warned China on Tuesday ties were "deteriorating markedly". Tokyo worries that Chinese control of the South China Sea, through which much of the oil it imports is shipped, threatens its national security and takes Beijing a step closer to extending its influence into the Western Pacific.

The Hindu, Vijaita Singh, 2016 08 09

the attack at the Pathankot airbase in January this year. India has approached select European countries and the U.S., who are part of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) to seek the bank transaction details of the Al Rehmat Trust, which operates a dozen offices in Pakistan. Indian agencies suspect that the Trust, founded by Jaish chief, Maulana Masood Azhar, has over Rs. 100 crore in its kitty and the money is used for funding and training terrorist modules. 35. Japan demands China withdraw gov't ships from waters near Senkakus

Kyodo News, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Tokyo - Japan demanded Tuesday that China promptly withdraw its government vessels from waters around the disputed Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea, saying Beijing's attempt to change the status quo has badly hurt bilateral ties. Tokyo's strongly worded protest came after some Chinese government vessels continued to enter Japanese waters around the islets in recent days despite repeated protests from Japan, escalating tensions in the area. Foreign Minister Fumio Kishida summoned Chinese Ambassador to Japan Cheng Yonghua to the Foreign Ministry on Tuesday morning and protested against the Chinese move around the Japanese-administered, Chinese-claimed uninhabited islands, according to the ministry. "The Chinese side is attempting to change the status quo in a one-sided manner. I cannot help saying that because of this, the situation surrounding Japanese-Chinese relations has markedly deteriorated," Kishida was quoted as telling the ambassador. It was the first direct protest lodged by a Japanese Cabinet member over the recent Chinese activities around the islets, which China calls Diaoyu, following repeated protests by Japanese Foreign Ministry officials. Kishida told Cheng that Chinese vessels' repeated entry into Japanese territorial waters is totally unacceptable, as it violates Japan's sovereignty and escalates tensions, the ministry said.

36. S. Korea, U.N. aviation body to discuss reaction to N. Korea's unannounced missile launches

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Seoul - South Korea and the United Nations' air navigation regulator, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), will discuss this week ways to respond to North Korea's recent launches of ballistic missiles that came without the necessary declaration of no-fly zones, the foreign ministry said Tuesday. "North Korea's unannounced launches of ballistic missiles will surely be discussed," spokesman Cho June-hyuck said in a briefing, referring to the meeting between Vice Foreign Minister Cho Tae-yul and ICAO Secretary General Fang Liu slated for Thursday in Seoul. "Actions that can be taken in regards to North Korea's firing off of ballistic missiles in violation of relevant regulations will be part of the discussion," the spokesman said, adding that international civil aviation security will be one of major issues to be dealt with at the meeting. The planned meeting comes as South Korea is ratcheting up diplomatic efforts to tighten the screws on North Korea following the country firing off a series of ballistic missiles in defiance of bans imposed by the international community. Last week, South Korea alerted the ICAO and the International Maritime Organization (IMO) about the dangers of North Korea's recent ballistic missile launches conducted without prior warning, including the test-firing that took place on Aug. 3.

37. Taurus missiles to start operation with S. Korean Air Force this year

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 09

Seoul - South Korea plans to deploy dozens of "jamming proof" air- to-ground guided missiles that can be carried on its F-15K fighters in a bid to bolster its strike capabilities amid mounting military threats from North Korea, military officials said Tuesday. Dozens of Taurus missiles will be brought in from Germany by the end of this year as the U.S. government has recently approved the exports of critical military GPS receivers which can be attached to war planes, according to the military. The receivers are vital because they are not affected by North Korean GPS jamming. The military said the F-15K Slam Eagle is designed to penetrate the North's air defense systems and precisely destroy major military facilities. If armed with the Taurus missile, the plane can hit North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang while flying over Daejeon, 164 kilometers south of Seoul. It also said the jets could fire off a Taurus over the East Sea and hit the North missile launching facility in Hwadae, in the northern part of North Korea.

38. THAAD discord amplifies through Minjoo's China visit

Korea Herald, Shin Hyon-hee, 2016 08 09

Seoul - The controversial visit by six first-termers of The Minjoo Party of Korea to China was met with little fanfare since their arrival on Monday, as the Seoul government continued to slam the trip and reaffirmed the need to station the U.S.' Terminal High Altitude Area Defense system here. "We're at a critical moment when it's more important than anything to gather strength from all people in unison to surmount this grave security situation, instead of incurring internal division and confrontation through social controversy," Prime Minister Hwang Kyo-ahn said at a cabinet meeting on Tuesday. President Park Geun-hye later echoed Hwang's views during her speech at the ruling Saenuri Party's convention to elect a new leadership. "The disputed THAAD installment is a minimal defense measure to safeguard the survival of the nation and of the people, as well as an inevitable one to counter North Korea's nuclear and missile threats," she said. As the six lawmakers pressed ahead with the trip, despite criticism from the government and some fellow party members, they ran into a series of snags for scheduled meetings with Seoul's Ambassador Kim Jang-soo and Korean businesspeople in Beijing.

39. Lawyer with links to Russian secret service says Edward Snowden is 'alive and well'

The Express (UK), Will Stewart, 2016 08 08

London - A lawyer with close links to the Russian secret services took the extraordinary step of announcing that US whistleblower Edward Snowden is "alive and well". Rumours spread following a mysterious 64-character tweet appeared on Snowden's Twitter account and was then deleted, triggering speculation that he had been kidnapped or even killed. Lawyer Anatoly Kucherena said: "I can authoritatively say that he is alive and well, he is living in Russia and is busy with his favourite work." The lawyer, close to the secret services, did not explain how suspicious messages appeared on Snowden's Twitter account, or what they meant. Nor has Snowden been seen in public.

Le Temps (Suisse), Alexandre Lévy, 2016 08 09

Sofia, Bulgarie - Connu pour être le beau-frère de l'un des frères Kouachi, responsables de la tuerie de « Charlie Hebdo » en janvier 2015, Mourad Hamyd aurait tenté de rejoindre la Syrie via la Bulgarie. Une tendance qui inquiète de plus en plus les autorités du pays Suspecté dans un premier temps par les enquêteurs d'être le « troisième homme » de la tuerie à Charlie Hebdo en janvier 2015, Mourad Hamyd avait été rapidement mis hors de cause: âgé à l'époque de 18 ans, il était à son lycée au moment de l'attaque. De plus, Mourad, qui se trouve être le beau-frère de Chérif, l'un des frères Kouachi, a vigoureusement condamné leur « crime barbare », s'en prenant au passage à ceux qui avaient « jeté son nom en pâture » .

41. Leakage of IAEA's Secret Information on Iran Troubling US

Fars News Agency, 2016 08 09

Tehran - Head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran (AEOI) Ali Akbar Salehi underlined that disclosure of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)'s secret information about Iran has backfired and turned into a problem in the US. "Leakage of the information showed the Iranian negotiators' wisdom and cleverness because the same issue has turned into a problem in the US," Salehi told FNA on Monday. "The Americans say why Iran's nuclear breakout has decreased to 4 months from the previous one-year period; therefore, you (the Iranians) shouldn't worry and they should be concerned," he added. Late in July, the AP claimed that it has obtained a leaked document that is the only text linked to last year's deal between Iran and six foreign powers that hasn't been made public, although US officials say members of Congress have been able to see it.

42. 'Aleppo's Regime' Falls Apart, Russia Carries out Strikes to Prevent its Collapse

Asharq Al-Awsat, Caroline Akoum, 2016 08 09

Beirut - The opposition factions' success in breaking the siege of Aleppo has changed the military balance on the ground with hopes that such advance could reflect on the negotiations expected to be held in Geneva end of August. Sporadic fighting continued in south Aleppo on Sunday after regime forces and their allies witnessed a blow when opposition factions succeeded to break the siege of the city's eastern districts and to surround its western neighborhoods. Meanwhile, Aleppo's operation room asserted that opposition factions aim to "liberate the city." On Sunday, Jaish al-Fatah announced it had captured a number of regime forces members in the areas where the opposition was able to advance. Activists asserted that the Syrian regime and its ally, Russia, had amplified their air assaults particularly in Aleppo's Ramouseh area, to prevent the complete collapse of regime forces.

43. Canadian Green Party Votes to Support Boycott of Israel

Haaretz, 2016 08 09

Jerusalem - Canada's Green Party voted on Sunday to support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel, despite the opposition of party leader Elizabeth May. The vote followed a heated debate over Israel during the final plenary session of the party's national convention in Ottawa, according to reports in the Canadian media. "I'm deeply disappointed," May said after the vote. "The party policy on this issue is a position I can't support," she said, calling BDS tactics ineffective and "polarizing." Opinions among Greens were sharply divided. "I've never felt prouder to be a member of this party," said Dimitri Lascaris, the party's justice critic who tabled the motion. "We took a brave stand today for human rights," he said, despite facing accusations of anti-Semitism. He added some Jewish delegates supported the position.

44. Car bombs target pro-government militia in Yemen, 10 dead

Gulf News, Staff Report, 2016 08 09

Sana'a - Yemeni security officials say at least 10 fighters from a pro-government militia have been killed when suspected Al Qaida militants targeted their convoy with two car bombs. The officials say the attack took place late on Sunday in the Yafea area in Lahj province, where Yemen's Al Qaida branch controls several areas, including a large base in which it has stockpiled heavy weapons looted from army depots elsewhere. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorised to talk to the media. Al Qaida has taken advantage of Yemen's civil war to gain a foothold in several southern Yemeni areas. The war pits troops and militiamen loyal to the internationally recognised government, backed by a Saudi-led coalition, against Shiite Al Houthi rebels and a former president's loyalists. 45. Iran backed Iraqi, Lebanese Shiite militias deploy to Syria's Aleppo

Associated Press, 2016 08 09

Beirut - Iran-backed Shiite militant groups from Lebanon and Iraq are deploying hundreds of additional fighters to front lines in the Syrian city of Aleppo, Iranian media and militia officials said Monday, after Syrian rebels breached a government-imposed siege and cut a key government route to the contested city over the weekend. The reinforcements by at least four groups, described by officials and state media as "elite," will shore up Syrian President Bashar Assad's forces there as fighting over control of the city intensifies. Rebels breached the Syrian government siege on opposition neighborhoods in the city of Aleppo Saturday, opening a corridor in the south and marking a major military breakthrough. The push prompted an intensive airstrike campaign Sunday as insurgent groups put up a massive defense to protect the new corridor and gain new ground.

46. Major security flaw in 900m Android phones, tablets, says Check Point

Times of Israel, Dan Schwartz, 2016 08 09

Jerusalem - Nearly a billion Android phones and tablets are vulnerable to malware that could allow hackers "complete control of devices and access to sensitive personal and enterprise data on them," according to Israeli cybersecurity firm Check Point. The hacks are possible due to a series of four vulnerabilities -- dubbed QuadRooter -- affecting Android devices built on Qualcomm chipsets, which are found in nearly two-thirds of mobile devices. "If any one of the four vulnerabilities is exploited, an attacker can trigger privilege escalations and gain root access to a device," said the Check Point research team that discovered the problem. Unlike most malware, which can be rooted out or at least detected by antivirus software, there's little users can do except wait for Qualcomm to issue patches to fix the problem, according to Check Point.

47. Shin Bet: UN worker used his position to aid Hamas military projects

Jerusalem Post, Staff Report, 2016 08 09

Jerusalem - A United Nations worker in Gaza has been arrested for using his position to aid Hamas military activities, the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) announced on Tuesday. The suspect was named as 38-year-old Wahid Abdullah Burash of Jabalia in Gaza, an employee of the United Nations Development Program. The UNDP is tasked with projects to help the Strip's inhabitants, including projects to rehabilitate homes damaged in warfare. Burash had worked as a UNDP engineer since 2003. He was tasked with demolishing homes damaged in warfare and evacuating the waste. According to the Shin Bet, Burash was instructed by a senior Hamas official in 2014 to use his position in order to help the organization. In 2015, he allegedly helped build a naval marina for use by Hamas's military in northern Gaza.

49. Blow for migrant deal as Turkey rejects EU terror law demands

Financial Times, Laura Pitel, Jim Brunson, 2016 08 09

Istanbul - The EU's demand that Turkey must overhaul its terror laws in return for visa-free travel is "impossible" in the aftermath of last month's attempted coup, the country's EU minister has warned. In an interview with the Financial Times, Omer Celik dealt a fresh blow to the fragile deal between the EU and Ankara that has helped stem the flow of refugees and migrants to European shores. For the EU to ease visa requirements for 79m Turkish citizens -- one of a series of incentives promised in return for Turkey's help with the refugee crisis -- Turkey needs to amend its sweeping terror legislation in line with EU law and guidance from the Council of Europe. Mr Celik said that Turkey was open to discussions about counterterror law with European partners and could commit to reforms in the longer term. He warned, however, that it was "impossible" in the short term after the government was almost overthrown by alleged supporters of Fethullah Gulen, an exiled cleric who Turkey has branded a terrorist. He strongly denies the accusation.

51. Erdogan : " Les Occidentaux ont laissé les Turcs seuls "

Ankara - Le président turc, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, rejette les critiques sur l'ampleur des purges en cours en Turquie depuis la tentative de coup d'Etat dans la nuit du 15 au 16 juillet. Il menace de rompre les accords migratoires signés avec l'Union européenne Trois semaines après la tentative de putsch qui a ébranlé la Turquie dans la nuit du 15 au 16 juillet, le président Recep Tayyip Erdogan a reçu Le Monde, samedi 6 août, à -Istanbul, pour lui accorder son premier entretien à la presse occidentale depuis ces événements. Le chef de l'Etat turc, en butte à de virulentes critiques en Occident sur l'ampleur des purges post-coup d'Etat, reproche à ses partenaires, européens comme américains, leur manque d' " empathie " et de soutien. Alors qu'il doit rencontrer son homologue russe, Vladimir Poutine, mardi, à Saint-Pétersbourg, M. Erdogan dessine les contours d'une probable rupture avec l'Union européenne (UE) sur la question migratoire ainsi que sur les droits de l'homme. Vous avez déclaré que les Occidentaux avaient " pris le parti des putschistes et des terroristes ". Qu'est-ce que vous leur reprochez? Pendant la tentative de putsch, une partie des leaders du monde occidental m'ont appelé au téléphone. Cela n'était pas suffisant. Nous n'étions pas face à une attaque terroriste ordinaire. Nous comptons 240 martyrs et 2 200 blessés. Le monde entier avait réagi à l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo . Notre premier ministre s'était joint à la marche dans les rues de Paris. J'aurais souhaité que les leaders du monde occidental réagissent également à ce qui s'est passé en Turquie et qu'ils ne se contentent pas de quelques clichés pour condamner - la tentative de putsch - . Ou alors, j'aurais voulu qu'ils viennent ici en Turquie.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Amsterdam - A European counter-terrorism intelligence database designed to generate greater intelligence sharing among allies to avert deadly Islamist attacks has gone online after overcoming traditional reluctance by spy agencies to sharing information. European officials were spurred into setting up the project by the Paris attacks last November by Islamist militants which exposed intelligence gaps. A total of 130 people were killed in those attacks. Hosted by the Dutch intelligence service in the Hague, the database went live on July 1, the German Interior Ministry and the German domestic intelligence agency (BfV) said. "The intelligence database will make it much easier and quicker to share information about possible threats," said one intelligence official. The database enables European intelligence agencies to share real-time information about suspected Islamist militants collected by members of the Counter-Terrorism Group (CTG), which groups all 28 European Union countries, Switzerland and Norway.

53. Facebook Denies Withholding User Data in German Criminal Investigations

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Berlin - Facebook rejected on Monday claims made by Germany's state authorities that it was reluctant to co-operate with them on criminal investigations, saying many of the requests it received for user data were incorrectly formulated. Several regional interior ministers have complained that the social media group is hesitant to respond to requests for data and have called on the Federal Justice Ministry to introduce new laws. But Facebook said it had provided "round the clock assistance" to the authorities in Bavaria following a spate of violent attacks in Munich, Wuerzburg and Ansbach last month. A spokeswoman for the Justice Ministry said it was examining whether there was a need to change the law or whether there was a problem with its implementation.

54. La Turquie conquise par l'islamisme

Journal de Montréal, Loïc Tassé, 2016 08 09

Chronique- Suite au coup d'État raté du 15 juillet dernier, le gouvernement turc est devenu encore plus dictatorial et plus islamiste qu'auparavant. Sous prétexte de lutter pour la démocratie, Recep Tayyip Erdogan a purgé toutes les forces d'opposition chez les militaires, les policiers, les juges, les professeurs, les fonctionnaires et les journalistes. La Turquie n'est plus un pays démocratique. Si Erdogan va jusqu'au bout, la Turquie basculera complètement dans le camp des islamistes. Aujourd'hui, Erdogan rencontre Vladimir Poutine à Saint- Pétersbourg. Poutine doit regarder avec angoisse la montée d'Erdogan. Quant aux membres de l'OTAN, ils se demandent de plus en plus quoi faire avec ce pays. 1 Pourquoi tant de Turcs ont-ils manifesté aux côtés d'Erdogan ? Ce dimanche, près de cinq millions de Turcs sont descendus dans les rues aux côtés d'Erdogan, prétendument pour soutenir la démocratie. Mais ce chiffre ne veut pas dire grand-chose. Erdogan a fait arrêter ou fait renvoyer de leur poste plus de 60 000 personnes. Dans de telles conditions, beaucoup de Turcs veulent donner l'impression de soutenir Erdogan. Car l'opposition est réduite au silence. Les médias sont presque tous contrôlés par Erdogan ou fermés. Ceux qui critiquent le gouvernement d'Erdogan risquent la prison. Erdogan recevra bientôt de nouveaux pouvoirs qui devraient lui permettre de gouverner en vrai dictateur.

55. New spyware detected targeting firms in Russia, China: Symantec

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 08

Frankfurt - A previously unknown hacking group variously dubbed "Strider" or "ProjectSauron" has carried out cyber-espionage attacks against select targets in Russia, China, Iran, Sweden, Belgium and Rwanda, security researchers said on Monday. The group, which has been active since at least 2011 and could have links to a national intelligence agency, uses Remsec, an advanced piece of hidden malware, Symantec researchers said in a blog post. Remsec spyware lives within an organization's network rather than being installed on individual computers, giving attackers complete control over infected machines, researchers said. It enables keystroke logging and the theft of files and other data. Its code also contains references to Sauron, the all-seeing title character in The Lord of the Rings, Symantec said. Strider is the nickname of the fantasy trilogy's widely traveled main character Aragorn. Separately, Moscow-based Kaspersky Lab has labeled the same group using the Remsec spyware as "ProjectSauron".

Berlin - Saudi authorities offered Berlin help in investigating two attacks claimed by Islamic State in Germany last month, officials from both countries said on Monday. Authorities here said the terror militia abroad hadn't only inspired the attacks, but also appeared to have helped execute them by instructing both perpetrators in how to maximize casualties. The investigation had shown that Islamic State members abroad had helped the perpetrators and that at least one of them had a Saudi cellphone number, a German official said. The findings, derived from a probe of the perpetrators' electronic devices, suggest a more deliberate campaign by Islamic State to attack Germany than authorities had expected in the immediate aftermath of the attacks, which left several people wounded. The atrocities by two recently arrived asylum seekers have punctured a sense of calm in Germany, which had so far been spared the large-scale terror assaults seen in France and Belgium. Chancellor Angela Merkel, who presided over the arrival of well over a million refugees since the beginning of last year, has seen her popularity ratings plummet in the weeks following the attacks. The German government welcomed Saudi Arabia's offer to share intelligence on the attacks, which both took place in the southern state of Bavaria.

Der Spiegel, Multiple reporters, 2016 08 08

Berlin - When Nils D. turned his back on the Islamic State (IS), he thought about sex. He had spent a year serving the terrorist militia, performing guard duty and working as a cook. He had discovered severed heads on the street and watched beheadings. He had listened to the screams of people being tortured and looked on as they were hung from metal poles with their hands tied behind their backs. These are the kinds of atrocities he had exposed people to as a member of a special unit that was tasked to arrest alleged spies, traitors or other opponents of IS. But by the beginning of November 2014, he wanted out. He came up with a false pretense to travel to Turkey. He wanted to meet his mother and sister in Istanbul and then journey onward to his home in Dinslaken, Germany, a town in the country's Ruhr region. Nils D. has never said what was going through his mind that day, but his mobile phone's browser history provides some answers. He perused a list of the most wanted criminals on the German Federal Criminal Office's website because he feared he might get arrested in Germany. He also looked up ferry connections from Turkey and long-distance buses to his home state of North Rhine-Westphalia, because he feared getting checked at the airport. He also looked on the website of a popular retailer for new plus-size clothes because he needed an inconspicuous outfit and was too corpulent for normal attire. In addition, he searched for hotels in Istanbul and for sightseeing tips in the city for the days he would be spending with his mom and sister, Annika. Most of all, though, Nils D. thought about sex. He searched for terms like "Red Light Istanbul" online. One query result contained the heading, "Bordello in Istanbul." His phone also saved the names of dozens of relevant porn clips he had played. Before he boarded a bus from Istanbul back home, he deleted the data stored on his mobile phone. The images of him with his buddies in battle gear, the photo of him standing behind a masked, bound man holding a pistol to his head -- all of it was supposed to disappear before his return. Today, Nils D. is being held in a German prison as a convicted terrorist. The Higher Regional Court in Düsseldorf sentenced him to four years and six months behind bars.

1. Co-operation, outreach best terrorism defence

London Free Press, Peter Fragiskatos MP, 2016 08 16

Op-ed - By its nature, terrorism targets innocent people and seeks to create distrust among citizens through shock, panic and fear. This is what makes it the weapon of the ignorant and of the cowardly. And last week, our region and city felt its impact. What is the way forward and how should we respond? By keeping in mind a few important truths about what keeps societies secure. The first of these is the need to remain vigilant, yet reasonable. Questions will be asked about whether more could have been done to keep us safe from the likes of Aaron Driver. This is appropriate, but unless the conversation is measured, we might end up trying to fix what is not broken. The result will be that important resources needed to maintain public safety -- time, energy and money -- could be used ineffectively. Avoiding this problem requires us to search first for lessons, not in what went wrong, but in what went right. Last Wednesday, various agencies -- the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the London Police Service, Strathroy-Caradoc and the Ontario Provincial Police -- worked together to thwart an act of terrorism. The importance of this cannot be overstated. When the RCMP was informed about an imminent attack, they acted swiftly and were successful. Local forces were involved and engaged. Partnership, rather than rivalry, is what defined this effort and we are all safer because of it. This example, in fact, provides a model as we move forward. Note: Peter Fragiskatos is the Member of Parliament for London North Centre. Prior to being elected in October, he taught political science at King's University College.

2. Single bullet killed terror suspect, dad says

Toronto Star, Alex Ballingall, 2016 08 16

London - The suspected terrorist who allegedly planned an attack on a major Canadian urban centre last week was killed by a bullet as Mounties descended upon him outside his sister's home, according to his family. Wayne Driver, a retired military officer whose youngest son Aaron Driver died after detonating an explosive device inside a taxi during the confrontation with police in Strathroy, Ont., told the Star that the family also plans to give him an Islamic funeral Thursday - on what would have been his 25th birthday. Both Driver and Aaron's older brother, Rob, say they were told by the RCMP that an autopsy concluded the 24-year-old died from one of two gunshots wounds. Driver said he was told that one bullet pierced his son's spleen, and another went through his heart and liver. Aaron's father doesn't remember the last time he saw his son. Wayne Driver said Aaron had been estranged from much of his family for years, leaving home when he was 16 and then dropping out of high school while living in a group home. He said his youngest child had an emotional upbringing, which included his mother's death when he was just 7 and the loss of his son, who died during childbirth when Aaron was 19. He was profoundly affected by both losses, Driver said. He supported his son's conversion to Islam until he realized how radical he had become. Driver said sometime around Christmas 2014, he was contacted by the Canadian Security Intelligence Committee. Driver recalled feeling sick and perplexed when shown an inch-thick file outlining his son's online comments. He said it included photos of mass graves and people who had been beheaded, with his son allegedly claiming that the people depicted deserved to die. "I don't understand," he said, explaining that he's always felt such acts epitomize cowardice and cruelty. "It's not like butterflies. It's like somebody has punched you in the stomach."

3. What will it take to stop the next Aaron Driver?

iPolitics, Tasha Kheiriddin, 2016 08 16

Column - "There's nobody there to support (the families). There's nobody there to give them strength or any counselling support in any way, shape or form. And the loss of life impacts everybody in the end." That's Christianne Boudreau commenting on the case of Aaron Driver, the 24-year-old Ontario man who died recently in a confrontation with police after authorities were told by the FBI he was plotting to carry out a terrorist attack. Boudreau can relate: Her son Damian died in 2014 fighting for ISIS in Syria. Damian converted to Islam as a teenager and became progressively more obsessed with fighting President Bashir al-Assad. He was under CSIS surveillance for two years before he left Canada, and was executed by the Syrian army. After his death, Boudreau founded two organizations to combat youth radicalization and reach out to parents whose children had joined radical groups such as ISIS. Boudreau spoke to Toronto's AM640 radio from France about her son's case in the wake of Driver's death, and following a federal announcement to the effect that Canada would be stepping up its anti-radicalization efforts. Early news reports suggested that Public Security Minister Ralph Goodale would be announcing details of the plan today. Turned out Goodale was not announcing anything, but meeting and holding a photo-op with a Montreal organization that conducts de-radicalization initiatives. That didn't impress Boudreau. "It's a camera, election, posturing thing," she told me. "They really need to start putting action behind their words."

Chronique - Plus on en apprend sur Aaron Driver, l'islamiste qui a été neutralisé par la GRC alors qu'il s'apprêtait à commettre un attentat suicide, plus on se pose des questions... Lutter contre le terrorisme est une atteinte à la liberté de pensée ? En juin 2015, Driver (qui avait été arrêté pour «activités suspectes» sur les réseaux sociaux) a été remis en liberté sous conditions. On lui demandait, entre autres, de s'engager à ne pas troubler l'ordre public, d'assister à «des séances de counseling religieux» et de porter un bracelet électronique. LES DROITS DE DRIVER À l'annonce de ces conditions, l'Association manitobaine des droits et libertés (AMDL) s'était immédiatement portée à la défense d'Aaron Driver. «On parle d'un citoyen canadien qui n'a pas été inculpé d'un crime, mais qui sera surveillé grâce à un bracelet de surveillance chaque heure du jour, a lancé le directeur de l'AMDL, Corey Shefman. C'est franchement inacceptable.» Je sais qu'il est facile de jouer au gérant d'estrade une fois qu'on sait comment les choses ont tourné... Mais je me demande si, à la lumière des événements récents, le directeur de l'AMDL dirait la même chose aujourd'hui. Défendrait-il encore les droits d'Aaron Driver sachant que le gars était aussi dangereux? «La GRC demande à M. Driver de promettre qu'il va bien se comporter, a dit Corey Shefman.

5. Airy-fairy platitudes no deterrent to terrorism

Postmedia News, Mark Bonokoski, 2016 08 16

Column - If I were taxi driver Terry Duffield, I'd have two questions for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale and his plans on curbing radicalization. First, what in hell were the cops thinking when they had jihadist wannabe Aaron Driver's residence surrounded, yet still allowed him to get into my cab with a bomb in his knapsack? Why didn't they confront this 24-year-old terrorist before he had the opportunity to blow me up? And secondly, how did a homegrown terrorist known to security agencies, who had been on a peace bond for ISIS-related activity, and who once had a monitor shackled to his ankle, manage to get the materials in a small southwestern Ontario town like Strathroy to successfully make that bomb? These are questions Goodale did not address, nor did he allude to Duffield's brush with the unexpected that all Canadians should now be worried about as a part of their future. This jihadi insanity is not going away any time soon.

6. Border security issues with US are piling up for new Canadian Government

Inside Policy (Macdonald-Laurier Institute), Scott Newark, 2016 08 16

Comment - When the new Government assumed office almost nine months ago, it was clear that they had new policy priorities and that they were specifically intent on a more inclusive and consultative process for decision making than their predecessor. Some sceptics, myself included, cautioned that while this was understandable, governing was about making choices and taking action and not just holding media events to celebrate 'inclusion' and 'outreach'. Put differently, governing is more difficult than campaigning but that's what Governments are elected to do. This substantive lack of progress is evident in a number of areas and as we prepare for the return of Parliament in September, Canada-US border security is clearly an area where specific actions are required. This is true, not only because of the inherent priority of the subject given our geographical situation, but also because of a changing security-focused world and the need to deliver on border security focused commitments. Additionally, although it is sometimes taken for granted, Canada-US relations is our highest foreign policy priority and border security issues are a central part of that discussion. The importance of this failure to deploy sensor surveillance technology along the Canada-US border cannot be overstated. Without it, Canada and the US face increased risk of cross border smuggling of weapons, drugs, tobacco and people. In today's world that's an unacceptable risk and what's required is action not repetitive 'consultation' or more RCMP navel gazing. While a joint Canada-US database is the obvious starting point, in today's travel-facilitated world it will be necessary to expand the database to trusted allies such as the other 'Five Eyes' partners (UK, NZ, Australia) as well as the EU and indeed others. Note: Scott Newark is a former Alberta Crown Prosecutor who has also served as Executive Officer of the Canadian Police Association, Vice Chair of the Ontario Office for Victims of Crime, Director of Operations to the Washington D.C.-based Investigative Project on Terrorism and as a Security Policy Advisor to the Governments of Ontario and Canada. A variation of this article appears in FrontLine Security magazine.

7. Canada.ca web renewal costs soaring with more expenses coming

Ottawa Citizen, Vito Pilioci, 2016 08 16

Ottawa - Expenses related to the federal government's web renewal project are already skyrocketing and the initiative is only in its second official year. The push to gather a vast majority of the government's departments and agencies under the Canada.ca web address -- as opposed to the various disparate websites they previously had -- has already cost the federal government at least $9.2 million, of which $5.4 million has been paid. The contract, which was awarded to Adobe Corp. in March 2015, was originally valued at $1.54 million. And the true cost of getting Canada.ca fully operation will be millions more, however an exact dollar amount remains elusive. The price of the project rockets upward when factoring in the costs associated with getting each of the government's departments and agencies ready for the switch to Canada.ca. Each of the departments that are preparing to switch to Canada.ca are responsible for building any costs associated with the website switch into their existing budgets. However, none of the spending is being tracked by Treasury Board of Canada, which is the department responsible for ensuring government resources are properly managed. The acknowledged additional spending for the website switchover from the listed departments equals $19.79 million. There are a total of 90 federal departments and agencies that are required to switch to Canada.ca by the end of 2017.

8. Canadian government pledges $35 million to fight radicalization

Montreal Gazette, Katherine Wilton, 2016 08 16

Montreal - Ottawa will spend $35 million over five years to fund programs that reach out to vulnerable people open to radicalization in a bid to prevent terror attacks in Canada. The federal government will establish a national centre for de-radicalization that will coordinate efforts across Canada to fight extremism. Most of the money will go to groups and organizations at the community level that are best equipped "to intervene in the right way, with the right tools and at the right time," Public Security Minister Ralph Goodale said on Monday. Goodale visited Montreal's de-radicalization centre to learn what the centre is doing to help young people who are vulnerable to extremism and violence. "The events of the last week or so have demonstrated in Canada that we need to get better and better at understanding and dealing with the serious issue of radicalization," Goodale said. More information about the national centre will be released in the coming weeks. In the meantime, federal officials are consulting experts in order to recruit the right people to work at the centre.

9. Canadian-trained forces clearing the way to retake Mosul from ISIS

CTV.CA, Josh Dehaas, 2016 08 16

Ottawa - CTV News has learned that Canadian-backed Kurdish forces have spent the past 48 hours clearing the way to take back Mosul, the last major stronghold of ISIS and its de facto capital in Iraq. The Peshmerga spent Sunday and Monday reclaiming a dozen villages near Iraq's second- biggest city, sources told CTV's Mercedes Stephenson. The Canadian Special Forces helped the Kurdish troops plan the operation and remained close enough to the combat that they could see the fighting and provide real-time advice -- but they were not on the frontline. No Canadian soldiers were injured.

10. Critics slam oversight on immigration detention reforms

Toronto Star, Nicholas Keung, 2016 08 16

Toronto - Migrants advocates welcome Ottawa's reforms of the immigration detention system, but say the government is falling short on creating proper oversight of the agency responsible for the enforcement operations. "It is encouraging the federal government is promising actions and reforms to the immigration detention system. Detention of immigrants needs to be absolutely the last resort and the government recognizes that," said Josh Paterson of the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association. "The thing is, we need to put an end to housing migrants in criminal population. The money dedicated to the immigration infrastructure must not become the reason to detain more migrants and for longer period of time." Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale announced on Monday that $138 million would be invested to "enhance alternatives to detention" and invest in rebuilding immigration holding facilities. He also plans a series of community consultations.

11. Detention centres will be replaced

Toronto Star, Tondra McCharles, 2016 08 16

Ottawa - The federal public safety minister says a $138-million plan unveiled Monday to replace two immigration detention centres in greater Vancouver and Montreal will ease pressure on an overburdened national system. However, Ralph Goodale offered nothing to expand or replace an immigration holding centre in the greater Toronto area. And there was nothing that immediately addresses the needs of the more than 200 individuals - about 30 per cent of illegal immigrant detainees in Ontario - who end up in provincial maximum-security jails. Last month, a hunger strike by a group of about 50 immigrants in two Ontario jails highlighted widespread concerns about the length and conditions of their detention. At the time, Goodale, the minister responsible Canada Border Services Agency, promised reforms were coming.

12. Feds want RCMP to look into Canadian firm's armoured car shipments to war-torn Libya

CBC.CA, Murray Brewster, 2016 08 16

Ottawa - The Liberal government has asked the Mounties to look into a UN report that found a Canadian-owned company shipped dozens of armoured personnel carriers into the chaos of Libya, possibly in violation of an arms embargo. In a statement released late Monday, the Global Affairs Department said a copy of the UN panel's findings about the Streit Group has been handed to the Mounties. There's no indication at the moment whether the RCMP intends to launch a full-blown investigation. The Liberal government says it will leave the matter up to law enforcement. "It is the role of the RCMP to investigate potential offences under Canadian law, while the prosecution of offences under federal jurisdiction is the responsibility of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada who will determine if Canada has jurisdiction to prosecute based on the facts of the case," spokesman Francois Lasalle said in a statement. The department didn't say when the UN report, which was released in March, was shared with the Mounties.

13. Goodale pledges $138M for immigration detention centres in Laval and B.C.

Montreal Gazette, Katherine Wilton, 2016 08 16

Montreal - The Liberal government will spend about $138 million to rebuild holding centres in Laval and British Columbia, which means fewer immigration detainees will have to be held in provincial correctional facilities. The money will also be spent to enhance alternatives to detention to "ensure that detention is truly a last resort," Canada's Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale announced on Monday. About 450 to 500 individuals are detained under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act at any given time. Some are detained pending deportation while others are deemed a flight risk, pose a security risk or don't have proper identification. In 2014, a Red Cross investigation found numerous shortcomings at Canadian facilities for immigrant detainees including triple bunked cells, lack of support for detained children and inadequate mental health care.

14. Guilty plea ends case that pitted cellphone privacy rights against border security powers

National Post, Graeme Hamilton, 2016 08 16

Montreal - A Quebec man arrested last year at the Halifax airport for refusing to provide border officers with the password for his cellphone pleaded guilty Monday and was ordered to pay a $500 fine. Alain Philippon's plea on the eve of a scheduled trial brought an abrupt end to a case that was being watched closely as a test of the line between privacy rights and the state's power to control its borders. Robert Currie, director of Dalhousie University's Law and Technology Institute, said the plea deal represents a "missed opportunity" to explore an emerging legal question. Philippon, 39, was returning to Canada from the Dominican Republic in March 2015 when he was pulled aside by the Canada Border Services Agency and as part of a search asked to provide access to his BlackBerry. He refused to give the password and was charged under the federal Customs Act with hindering or preventing an officer from doing his job.

CBC.CA, Murray Brewster, 2016 08 16

Ottawa - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan knows how many troops he wants to send to Africa, but says he has no clear direction from cabinet on where to place them. Sajjan told reporters in a conference call on Monday, at the end of a five country tour in the troubled region, that an announcement on Canada's renewed United Nations peacekeeping commitment will be made shortly. He wouldn't say what the number might be. There has been a lot of speculation about a possible Canadian contribution to existing missions in Mali, and perhaps even Congo. When asked if any country had been stricken off his list as a result of the fact-finding mission, Sajjan did not rule out South Sudan, or any nation in the region.

16. I'm very glad the Mounties got their man in Strathroy

Globe and Mail, Margaret Wentz, 2016 08 16

Column - The biggest story in Canada this weekend was the triumph of Penny Oleksiak, the dazzling young Canadian who took the swimming world by storm. Lucky us. The biggest story could have been the triumph of Aaron Driver, the Islamist-inspired jihadi warrior, if he had blown himself up at a train station in Southern Ontario and taken a dozen innocent people with him. We'll never know, of course. Just as Mr. Driver stepped into a taxi, police opened fire and he detonated a bomb. Officially, we don't know what killed him, but either way the Mounties got their man. I'm sorry they had to do it, but I don't have a shred of sympathy for him - only for his family, who saw him going to the dark side and were helpless to prevent it. Mr. Driver had rejected help. He sought out martyrdom. All the evidence indicates that he was a traitor to his country. The RCMP don't get much good press these days. They're usually portrayed as the gang that can't shoot straight. Most stories about the Mounties are meant to tell us how sexist, racist and incompetent they are. They deserve a lot of credit for getting this one right. Around 8:30 a.m. last Wednesday, the FBI sent them a screen shot of a man with his faced masked, taken from a homemade "martyrdom" video. By 11 a.m., Canadian authorities had identified the suspect. At 4:30 p.m., when the man got into a taxi outside his house in Strathroy, Ont., police were waiting for him. Ralph Goodale, the minister of public safety, says Canada needs to step up its counter-radicalization efforts. I'm all for that. The trouble is, nobody knows what works. And nobody will ever devise the perfect combination of police powers and social intervention that will keep us completely safe. Like it or not, sometimes the only solution is the violent one.

Montréal - L'annonce de la réfection des centres de détention canadiens doit relancer la réflexion, jugent des groupes Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a annoncé lundi des investissements de 138 millions de dollars, principalement pour moderniser les centres de détention d'immigrants à Laval et en banlieue de Vancouver. Des voix s'élèvent pour réclamer la fin de cette pratique, digne d'un traitement réservé aux criminels dans certains cas. En mai dernier, Carmelo Monge s'est présenté aux bureaux de Citoyenneté et immigration Canada 1010 à Montréal, croyant qu'il repartirait avec un permis de travail renouvelé. Il a plutôt été arrêté. " Ils m'ont mis les menottes et alors je me suis senti comme si j'avais fait quelque chose de très grave ", relate-t-il, encore sous le choc. " Je ne suis pas un criminel, je suis ici pour travailler, pour aider ma famille restée au Mexique ", dit l'homme de 45 ans. Il est au Canada depuis huit ans, en attente d'une demande de résidence permanente fondée sur des considérations humanitaires, après avoir vu sa demande d'asile déboutée. À son arrivée au centre de détention de Laval, des bâtiments entourés de barbelés, c'est la surveillance constante qui l'a marqué. " J'ai vu une femme du Pakistan avec son enfant à l'entrée, avec des gardes autour d'eux ", rapporte M. Monge.

Toronto - A University of Toronto student remains in custody in Bangladesh following publication of pictures that allegedly show him holding a gun at the scene of a deadly hostage-taking. However, questions remain unanswered about the context of photos that appear to show Tahmid Hasib Khan on the rooftop of the Holey Artisan Bakery during the July 1 attack that killed 20 hostages. The New York Times and Guernica magazine have published reports quoting hostages as saying that Khan, 22, was also a hostage, and that he was photographed after being ordered to hold an unloaded pistol. In a report that included the images, the Dhaka Tribune acknowledged that "by themselves, the photos present no hard evidence that links... Tahmid directly to the attackers." Toronto Star, Alyshah Hasham, 2016 08 16

Toronto - After a two-year battle with Transport Canada, Ayaan Farah could have her security clearance and job restored. A Federal Court judge quashed the decision to revoke the US

Airways employee's security clearance, because Transport Canada failed to give her enough information to defend herself against allegations of links to individuals with criminal records. The decision was "both procedurally unfair and substantively unreasonable," Justice Susan Elliott wrote in a ruling released Monday. Elliott sent the matter back to the federal Minister of Transport Marc Garneau to be considered again in light of her ruling. Elliott's ruling comes seven months after a federal court hearing and almost two years since Farah's security clearance was revoked in late 2014, effectively resulting in her losing her job of eight years at Pearson International Airport. In an interview, Farah said she is elated by the ruling but exhausted by how long the process has taken.

24. 15 Guantánamo Detainees Are Sent to Emirates in Largest Obama-Era Transfer

New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 08 16

Washington - The Pentagon said on Monday that it had sent 15 Guantánamo detainees to the United Arab Emirates in the largest single transfer of the Obama administration. The move eliminated a fifth of the wartime prison's remaining population, which dropped to 61. While it appears increasingly unlikely that President Obama will succeed in closing the prison before he leaves office in January, the transfer brought him significantly closer to another goal: getting out every detainee who has been approved for transfer. Some have been stranded on that list for years because they could not be repatriated. The detainees sent to the United Arab Emirates included 12 Yemenis and three Afghans. The United States had held each of them without trial for about 14 years. Their departure reduced the list of prisoners approved for transfer to 20 men, although a parole-like review board occasionally adds new names to it. "The United States is grateful to the government of the United Arab Emirates for its continued assistance in closing the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay," Lee Wolosky, the State Department special envoy who negotiates such transfers, said in a statement. The Obama administration has made a sustained diplomatic push to persuade Persian Gulf states to resettle detainees from troubled countries like Yemen. American security officials see them as attractive places to send such detainees both because they share the same language and culture, and because they have security agencies with the capacity to monitor them.

25. Brooklyn Man Charged With Killing Imam and Assistant Near Mosque

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 08 16

New York - Two days after an imam and his assistant were gunned down after afternoon prayers in Queens, the police said late Monday that a man they had in custody had been charged in the killings. The man, Oscar Morel of Brooklyn, 35, who was taken into custody late Sunday after the police connected him to a hit and run that occurred about a mile away from the fatal attack, faces two counts of second-degree murder and two counts of criminal possession of a weapon, the police said. A police official said investigators had found what they believe was the murder weapon in the man's home as well as clothes matching the description of what the gunman had been wearing during the shootings. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the gun was found inside a wall in his apartment, on Miller Avenue in the East New York neighborhood, in a cavity that had apparently been cut open and resealed. A man who answered a phone listed for Mr. Morel's family said that he was stunned by the arrest. "That is our relative," the man said, his voice soft and shaking with emotion. "We are just finding out ourselves. We're pulling together the pieces as well."

26. Documents Confirm CIA Censorship of Guantánamo Trials

The Intercept, Mattathias Schwartz, 2016 08 15

Washington - In January 2013, during the military trial of five men accused of plotting the 9/11 attacks, a defense lawyer was discussing a motion relating to the CIA's black-site program, when a mysterious entity cut the audio feed to the gallery. A red light began to glow and spin. Someone had triggered the courtroom's censorship system. The system was believed to be under the control of the judge, Col. James Pohl. In this case, it wasn't. "The 40-second delay was initiated, not by me," Pohl said. He was referring to the delayed audio feed, which normally broadcasts to the press and other observers seated in the gallery. The gallery is cut off from the courtroom by three layers of soundproof Plexiglas. "I'm curious as to why ... if some external body is turning the commission off under their own view of what things ought to be, with no reasonable explanation, then we are going to have a little meeting about who turns that light on or off." Later, Pohl said the censorship was the work of an "OCA," short for "Original Classification Authority." In the future, he said, no external body would be permitted to unilaterally censor what was happening in his courtroom. Many have speculated that Pohl's "OCA" is in fact the CIA. That speculation is now confirmed with the release of three new documents by The Intercept. The documents show the evolution of secret rules governing what is and is not allowed to be discussed before the military court at Guantánamo.

27. Hackers Say They Hacked NSA-Linked Group, Want 1 Million Bitcoins to Share More Motherboard (Vice), Lorenzo Franceschi-Bicchierai, 2016 08 15

New York - A mysterious hacker or hackers going by the name "The Shadow Brokers" claims to have hacked a group linked to the NSA and dumped a bunch of its hacking tools. In a bizarre twist, the hackers are also asking for 1 million bitcoin (around $568 million) in an auction to release more files. "Attention government sponsors of cyber warfare and those who profit from it!!!!" the hackers wrote in a manifesto posted on Pastebin, on GitHub, and on a dedicated Tumblr. "How much you pay for enemies cyber weapons? [...] We find cyber weapons made by creators of stuxnet, duqu, flame." The hackers referred to their victims as the Equation Group, a codename for a government hacking group widely believed to be the NSA. The security firm Kaspersky Lab unmasked Equation Group in 2015, billing it as the most advanced hacking group Kaspersky researchers had ever seen. While Kaspersky Lab stopped short of saying it's the NSA, its researchers laid out extensive evidence pointing to the American spy agency, including a long series of codenames used by the Equation Group and found in top secret NSA documents released by Edward Snowden. The Equation Group, according to Kaspersky Lab, targeted the same victims as the group behind Stuxnet, which is widely believed to have been a joint US-Israeli operation targeting Iran's nuclear program, and also used two of the same zero-day exploits.

Most voters in the U.S. encounter some kind of machine during the voting process, whether they vote directly on a touchscreen device or put their paper ballot into a scanner. But which system is used is up to officials overseeing the 9,000 separate voting jurisdictions across the country, not the federal government. Johnson encouraged states to implement recommendations that include making sure electronic voting machines are not connected to the internet while voting is taking place.

29. Promises unfulfilled: How a State Department plan to stabilize Iraq broke apart

Washington Post, Jeff Gerth, Joby Warrick, 2016 08 15

Washington - A week before the last U.S. soldiers left his country in December 2011, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki traveled to Washington to meet the team that would help shape Iraq's future once the troops and tanks were gone. Less than three years later, the relatively calm Iraq that Maliki had led in 2011 was gone. The country's government was in crisis, its U.S.-trained army humiliated, and a third of its territory overrun by fighters from the Islamic State. Meanwhile, State Department programs aimed at helping Iraqis prevent such an outcome had been slashed or curtailed, and some had never materialized at all. Clinton's political foes would later seek to blame her, together with President Obama, for the Islamic State's stunning takeover of western Iraq, saying the State Department failed to preserve fragile security gains achieved at great cost by U.S. troops. Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump last week asserted that Obama "founded" the Islamic State and that Clinton was "the most valuable player" in the group's creation. Trump later contended that he was being sarcastic. But an intensive review of the record during Clinton's tenure presents a broader picture of missteps and miscalculations by multiple actors -- including her State Department as well as the Maliki government, the White House and Congress -- that left Iraqi security forces weakened and vulnerable to the Islamic State's 2014 surge. Documents and interviews point to ambitious plans by State Department officials to take control of dozens of military-run programs in Iraq, from training assistance for Iraqi police to new intelligence-collection outposts in Mosul and other key Iraqi cities. But the State Department scrapped or truncated many of the plans, sometimes at the behest of a skeptical

Congress and other times on orders from the White House, which balked at the high costs and potential risks of U.S. civilians being killed or kidnapped. Still other efforts were thwarted by a Maliki government that viewed many of the programs as an unwelcome intrusion in Iraqi affairs.

30. Trump proposes ideological test for Muslim immigrants and visitors to the U.S.

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 08 16

Washington - Donald Trump called Monday for a Cold War-style mobilization against "radical Islamic terror," repeating and repackaging calls for strict immigration controls -- including a new ideological litmus test for Muslim visitors and migrants -- and blaming the current level of worldwide terrorist attacks on President Obama and Hillary Clinton. In a grab bag of promises to battle the Islamic State organization together with Russia and anyone else who wants to join the fight, the Republican nominee underlined the need to improve intelligence and shut down militant propaganda, recruiting and financing. But he provided few specifics on how he would expand such efforts beyond those already underway. "My administration will aggressively pursue joint and coalition military operations to crush and destroy ISIS," Trump said in a speech in Youngstown, Ohio, using an acronym for the Islamic State. "International cooperation to cut off their funding, expanded intelligence sharing and cyberwarfare to disrupt and disable their propaganda and recruiting .??. It's got to be stopped." Trump softened the tone of previous comments on a number of things, including his description of NATO as "obsolete" and filled with members who don't pay their fair share for U.S. "protection." He said the United States would work closely with NATO on counterterrorism, and he congratulated the alliance for establishing a new division to handle the threat "since my comments."

31. US nukes at Turkey base at risk of seizure: report

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 08 15

Washington - Dozens of US nuclear weapons stored at a Turkish air base near Syria are at risk of being captured by "terrorists or other hostile forces," a Washington think tank claimed Monday. Critics have long been alarmed by America's estimated stockpile of about 50 nuclear bombs at Incirlik in southern Turkey, just 70 miles (110 kilometers) from the border with war-torn Syria. The issue took on fresh urgency last month following the attempted coup in Turkey, in which the base's Turkish commander was arrested on suspicion of complicity in the plot. "Whether the US could have maintained control of the weapons in the event of a protracted civil conflict in Turkey is an unanswerable question," said Monday's report from the Stimson Center, a nonpartisan think tank working to promote peace. "From a security point of view, it's a roll of the dice to continue to have approximately 50 of America's nuclear weapons stationed at Incirlik Air Base in Turkey," report co-author Laicie Heeley said.

32. British MPs given Mossad self-defence training after Jo Cox murder

Indo-Asian News Service, 2016 08 16

London - British MPs are being taught unarmed street-fighting techniques used by the Israeli intelligence agency Mossad in a bid to protect themselves from stalkers, terrorists, and political extremists in the light of Jo Cox's murder, it was reported on Monday. According to the Telegraph, the self-defence training known as "Krav Maga" -- Hebrew for "contact combat" -- combines jiu jitsu, judo, boxing, and street fighting. It teaches MPs how to defend themselves against attacks, including swinging punches to the head, a bottle, glass, or ashtray to the head, and a "slash with a knife, most commonly a 3-4 inch lock blade or kitchen utility knife". They will also learn how to disarm a lone-wolf attacker. The training comes in the wake of the brutal murder of Jo Cox, a Labour member of parliament who was shot and stabbed in her Batley and Spenningsdale constituency in June.

33. More than 30,000 Muslims meet in UK to reject Isis

The Independent (UK), Matt Payton, 2016 08 16

London - Thousands of Muslims from across the world converged on the UK for a convention where they rejected extremism and violence of terror groups such as Isis. More than 30,000 members of the Ahmadiyya Islamic movement met at Oakland Farm in Hampshire for a three-day convention, the 50th time the annual event has taken place. On the final day, attendees were led by the global Caliph of the movement in a vow of peace and a pledge of allegiance to their home countries. "The only thing the terrorists are achieving is to completely violate the teachings of the Holy Koran and of the Holy Prophet Muhammad," His Holiness Hazrat Mirza Masroor Ahmad told attendees. "Let it be clear that they are not practising Islam, rather it seems as though they have invented their own hate-filled and poisonous religion." The Ahmadiyya movement has 129 centres across the UK including the Baitul Futuh Mosque in south London, the biggest in Western Europe. The movement was founded in India in 1889 with a strong emphasis of peace over violence and tolerance over extremism.

34. Deleted Lindt Cafe siege texts 'not needed': deputy commissioner

Sydney Morning Herald, Ava Benny-Morrison, 2016 08 16

Sydney--One of NSW's most senior police officers says she did not believe any of the text messages she deleted after the fatal Lindt Cafe siege needed to be retained. Among the text exchanges on December 15 and 16, 2014, were requests to return calls, updates on coming briefings and words of support as the Martin Place siege rolled on. Now police intelligence specialists are trying to recover those deleted messages to hand over to the inquest into the siege. Deputy Commissioner Catherine Burn was quizzed about her decision to delete the texts during her highly-anticipated evidence at the inquest on Monday. "Ordinarily I would delete text messages, it would depend on the timing," she told the NSW Coroner's Court. "I delete them at different times periodically or at the time. "To my knowledge or recollection none of the texts I had are ones I thought I needed to keep or needed to retain. "If they could be recovered that would be good ... I would prefer that would be the case if we could recover them."

35. FIRB boss defends advice on Ausgrid

The Australian, Glenda Korporaal, 2016 08 16

Canberra--The Foreign Investment Review Board made a unanimous decision to recommend Scott Morrison block the Chinese bidders for Ausgrid on the basis of "detailed analysis" by security agencies, FIRB chairman Brian Wilson said yesterday. In an interview with The Australian, Mr Wilson defended FIRB's handling of the decision, saying the board had not "changed its mind" on the suitability of the bidders after it greenlighted the short list a few months ago. He said its final decision to recommend the bids was based on new information supplied to the board with security concerns "not immaterial". "There has been a huge amount of detailed analysis done on these assets by all sorts of agencies and things become apparent." Mr Wilson added that the FIRB board, which includes the former head of ASIO and ASIS David Irvine, was "100 per cent united" on the decision. He said it had been made after the recommendations of security agencies were "tested and tested very strongly".

36. GCSB wins power to spy on Kiwis

Dominion Post, Vernon Small, 2016 08 16

Wellington--The Government is set to break a long-standing ban on the Government Communications Security Bureau (GCSB) spying on New Zealanders with a sweeping revamp that brings our spy agencies under a single law. Prime Minister John Key yesterday said Cabinet had accepted the bulk of changes, including extra powers for the GCSB, as recommended by the Cullen-Reddy review in March. He said the changes were the most significant reform to the agencies' legislation in the country's history. New Zealanders had a high degree of confidence the Government was "not out there snooping on their private thoughts, their private emails or aspects of their life that have no relevance to other New Zealanders", he added. They expected the GCSB and the Security Intelligence Services (SIS) to look for genuine or real threats that one or two of a very small group of people potentially posed.

The report also includes new details about terrorists who "exploit weaknesses to operate across the region's borders." Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 08 16

New Delhi - The attack on a CRPF patrol in Nowhatta area of downtown Srinagar, presumably the first such strike coinciding with the Independence Day, came amid preoccupation of security forces with controlling violent civilian mobs over the past one month, which put counter-insurgency operations on the back-burner. "Though the security bandobast had been tightened ahead of the Independence Day, as is done every year, it seems terrorists could hide in the area ahead of the strike as no counter-insurgency operations have been taken up in over a month. The J&K police and CRPF have been too busy responding to daily law and order situations and controlling riotous mobs," a senior J&K police officer pointed out. "Sustained counter-insurgency operations are needed to ensure that terrorists are on the run and cannot hide in an area for a possible strike.

Dhaka Tribune, Tanveer Ahmed, 2016 08 16

This indeed proved to be true when Indira Gandhi warned Bangabandhu about a possible plot by then Maj Gen Ziaur Rahman and Lt Col Faruk Rahman. Bangabandhu told Indira he considered them as his sons and he believed they could never think of harming him. Bangladesh was barely four- years-old when some derailed army officers and their men staged a bloody coup and killed the man who had led the nation to freedom from Pakistan in 1971. In an interview with Anthony Mascarenhas, self-confessed killers Faruk and Col Abdur Rashid said that Zia had known about the coup beforehand. Indian intelligence had tipped off how furious Pakistani generals were planning to terminate Sheikh Mujib. The discussions also included possible options for a military takeover during the chaos that would follow the killing.

"We got this details and now we are verifying these information," Saiful, a senior officer, told Reuters. Police have accused JMB of several attacks over the past 18 months that have ratcheted up fears about militancy. JMB says it is affiliated to ISIS but the government insists ISIS has no presence in Bangladesh. Police say Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury, a Canadian citizen and the prime suspect, is still at large in Dhaka. Analysts say ISIS identified him in April as its national commander.

44. Bombings laid at door of separatists

Sydney Morning Herald, Lindsay Murdoch, 2016 08 16

Bangkok--A wave of bombings targeting Thailand's tourist areas last week is likely to be linked to militant Malay separatists fighting south-east Asia's longest-running war, according to sources with knowledge of the conflict. If proven - and no group has yet claimed responsibility - the attacks mark an alarming escalation of the conflict by militants who have for years concentrated their violence on Thailand's four southern border provinces. Beheadings, bombings, drive-by shootings and vicious assaults have left more than 6300 people dead and at least 11,500 injured in the conflict, which is rarely reported outside Thailand. The bombs which killed four people and injured 33 others last week are likely to have been planted by hardline militants operating in a cell on their own who want to intensify pressure on Thailand's military government by targeting tourism, sources say.

Hundreds of people have been killed over the past few years in resource-rich Xinjiang, strategically located on the borders of central Asia, in violence between the Muslim Uighur people who call the region home and ethnic majority Han Chinese. The government has blamed the unrest on Islamist militants, though rights groups and exiles say anger at Chinese controls on the religion and culture of Uighurs is more to blame for the unrest. Seoul--South Korea said Tuesday that more information is needed to analyze whether control of North Korea's intelligence agency has changed following the latest overhaul of its cabinet

The Ministry of State Security, Pyongyang's intelligence agency, was previously placed under the control of the powerful National Defense Commission (NDC) before the country's parliament replaced the NDC with a newly created state apparatus named the State Affairs Commission (SAC) in late June. The NDC previously had three ministries--the Ministry of People's Armed Forces, the North's defense ministry, and the Ministry of People's Security, the North's police agency--under its wing. But as North Korea's state media called the two ministries by different official names, speculation is growing that the official name of the ministry on state security might have been altered.

49. After Raising Ukraine Tensions, Russia Suggests Talks

Wall Street Journal, Andrey Ostroukh, 2016 08 16

Moscow - Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Russia had no intention of breaking diplomatic ties with Ukraine and was discussing the possibility of organizing joint talks with Ukrainian, Russian, French and German officials aimed at resolving the conflict in eastern Ukraine. Mr. Lavrov's comments Monday, at a joint press conference after meeting German counterpart Frank-Walter Steinmeier, came after Russian President Vladimir Putin blamed Ukraine late last week for incidents in Crimea that left two Russian service members dead and said Russia would respond. Mr. Putin had indicated Russia could pull out of a meeting tentatively planned for the sidelines of a meeting of the Group of 20 major economies in several weeks. Russian Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev said last week that Russia could cancel diplomatic relations if Mr. Putin wished. "I don't think that we are in a situation when somebody is interested in breaking diplomatic relations," Mr. Lavrov said Monday. "This is a last resort measure."

50. Calm Urged After Reports of Crimea Skirmish

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 08 16

Moscow - Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, urged Moscow on Monday to reduce tensions with Ukraine after what Russian officials said was a border skirmish with Ukrainian forces in which two Russian soldiers died. Germany is Russia's closest ally in trade and politics among the major European powers, and Mr. Steinmeier has used this position to exert diplomatic pressure. He met Monday with his Russian counterpart, Sergey V. Lavrov, in the Ural Mountains city of Yekaterinburg. Mr. Steinmeier said both Russia and Ukraine should step back from a looming confrontation along their de facto border on the Crimean peninsula, where Russia said two of its soldiers died in a skirmish with a Ukrainian commando group that had slipped across. Russia annexed Crimea in March 2014. Whether any such skirmish took place remains a matter of dispute. Ukraine has denied it, and says the Kremlin invented the story to escalate tensions and to whip up nationalist passions before parliamentary elections next month.

Dolatabadi did not identify the accused person nor the second nationality. The prosecutor said the arrest was part of a crackdown against what officials have portrayed as "Western infiltration". Iran's potential opening up to the West after last year's nuclear deal has alarmed Iranian hardliners. Il a participé à la libération de Manbidj, en Syrie. Les combattants des Forces démocratiques syriennes (FDS), une coalition kurdo- arabe, ont célébré ces dernières heures avec les civils la libération de la ville qui était le principal point de passage vers la Turquie pour les membres de l'État islamique. LE FIGARO. - Qu'est-ce qui vous a poussé à vous engager dans les forces kurdes ? HUBERT. - Plusieurs raisons m'ont poussé à rejoindre les YPG, mais deux épisodes ont eu un effet déclencheur : lorsque Daech a tenté de s'emparer de Kobané, puis a pris le contrôle de Sinjar et massacré les yazidis. À ce moment-là, je travaillais dans le civil en Irak. J'ai vu que Daech était capable d'asservir une population. Mais j'ai aussi vu que les YPG étaient capables de les repousser. J'avais été déçu par les pechmergas (les combattants kurdes irakiens, NDLR), qui avaient fui Qaraqosh et la plaine de Ninive sans se battre. Je parlais kurde, j'avais des contacts sur place, donc j'ai décidé de rejoindre les YPG en Syrie. Pourquoi avoir pris les armes ? Au départ, je voulais plutôt travailler dans le civil. Mais à l'Académie militaire, par laquelle transitent tous les volontaires étrangers, j'ai vu des jeunes Kurdes, qui avaient fait des études comme moi, prendre les armes. Je me devais de les suivre. Nous menons le même combat contre Daech, un ennemi qui nous a clairement déclaré la guerre.

1. 'Rising threat'

National Post, Larry Comeau, 2016 08 17

Letter to the Editor - Re: Liberals Stand Firm On Changes To Bill C-51, Aug. 12; Stop Radicalization, letters to the editor, Aug. 16. Not only is there no national deradicalization plan to deal with radical Islamists, the Trudeau Liberals are sending mixed messages. From naively saying we are not at war with the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant - even though this murderous group has called Canada a legitimate target and claimed last week's thwarted terrorist as its operative - to still planning to remove several provisions from Bill C-51, this government has a disjointed approach to tackling this rising threat. We cannot count on our ability to deradicalize individuals, or on the ability of the RCMP and CSIS to stop future attacks on our soil. Without the timely intelligence from the FBI, we could have had more Canadian casualties last week. Larry Comeau Ottawa. (Full letter).

2. PM says civil liberties must be balanced with security in battling terrorism

Canadian Press, Staff report, 2016 08 16

Halifax - An alleged terrorist plot in Ontario that created anxieties over police monitoring of suspects hasn't shaken Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's emphasis on balancing civil liberties with public safety. In his first reaction to an alleged plot that led to the death of Aaron Driver in Strathroy, Ont., Trudeau said Tuesday that balancing individual rights with keeping Canadians secure from bombing threats has to be handled with care. "Canada is a country that values its freedom (and) its basic charter rights," he said during a stop in Bridgetown, N.S., for an infrastructure funding announcement. "All Canadians expect their government to do two things: to keep Canadians safe and to defend and uphold the values and rights that all Canadians hold dear." "Getting that balance right isn't always easy in the challenging situation we now live in but it's extremely important." During the last federal election, the Liberals pledged to guarantee that all Canadian Security Intelligence Service warrants respect the charter, that the right to lawful protests and advocacy aren't violated, and they pledged to "narrow overly broad definitions (in Bill C-51), such as defining 'terrorist propaganda' more clearly." They also said a Liberal government would limit the Communications Security Establishment's powers by requiring a warrant to engage in the surveillance of Canadians and emphasize community outreach to battle radicalization of youths. Asked if the reforms are being revisited in light of cases like Driver's, Trudeau said the Liberals plan to create an all-party committee of parliamentarians to oversee national security agencies.

3. Review of Harper's Anti-Terrorism Bill Likely to Launch End of Summer

iPolitics, Amanda Connelly, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - The government's highly anticipated review of its national security framework, including the Harper government's controversial anti-terrorism legislation C-51, is expected to start before parliamentarians return from summer break. "Yes, it will be soon -- so most likely before Parliament resumes," said Scott Bardsley, press secretary for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau campaigned on a promise to "repeal the problematic elements of Bill C-51, and introduce new legislation that better balances our collective security with our rights and freedoms." But so far, he has not provided details on when he envisions starting that process despite pressure from critics of the law. Bill C-51, which received royal assent in June 2015, criminalizes the promotion of terrorism, cracks down on vaguely defined "terrorist propaganda" and gives judges the authority to order its removal from the Internet. It also widens the net of who can be preventatively arrested without a warrant, allows for expanded information sharing on people deemed threats to national security among 17 different government departments, and grants the Canadian Security Intelligence Service the new power to actually disrupt suspected terrorist plots instead of just collect information about them.

4. the wake of Driver, Couture-Rouleau, experts say police need to improve assessment of extremists

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 08 16

Toronto - The RCMP thought Martin Couture-Rouleau was on the right track when officers met the 25-year-old radicalized convert on Oct. 9, 2014. Despite his failed attempt to travel to Syria, he seemed to be coming around. Eleven days later, he drove to a strip mall frequented by uniformed soldiers in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que. and killed Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent. Chased by police, he crashed his car and charged officers with a knife before he was shot dead. Following a similar scenario in Strathroy, Ont. on Aug. 10, which ended with the shooting death of ISIL supporter Aaron Driver as he was allegedly about to conduct a bombing, some experts are calling for changes to the way extremists are assessed. Former Canadian government intelligence analyst Phil Gurski said the cases pointed to the need for more thorough and regular assessments of the extremists on the radar of security agencies. "I think it calls for a little more in-depth assessment and analysis of these guys," he said," said Gurski, a radicalization expert who retired last year after a career with the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and Communications Security Establishment. "We have to come up with a system where assessments are being done on a regular basis," he said. "So what that means is you're going to have to have other warrant powers, or source powers or something. Or maybe you talk to Driver once every two weeks as opposed to once every three months kind of thing."

5. « Ces crimes ont un impact majeur sur la communauté »

La Presse+, Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 08 17

Montréal - Le printemps dernier, le chef du Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) et le maire Denis Coderre ont lancé en grande pompe le Module incidents et crimes haineux, une escouade spécialisée contre les crimes à caractère haineux formée de trois policiers. La Presse s'est entretenue avec Fady Dagher, directeur adjoint du SPVM. Q : Pourquoi le SPVM met-il autant d'efforts contre ces crimes ? R : Ce qui me préoccupe énormément dans les crimes haineux, c'est l'impact sur le sentiment de sécurité. Certaines personnes pensent qu'une croix gammée ou un dessin de Mahomet sur une mosquée, ça finit là, on va l'enlever, sauf que c'est incroyable, l'insécurité que ça amène. Ces crimes ont un impact majeur sur la communauté. C'est beaucoup plus gros que juste un mur avec un graffiti à effacer. Q : Pourquoi avoir mis en place une telle équipe spécialisée ? R : Le crime haineux, on l'a toujours traité [au SPVM]. Par contre, l'incident haineux, c'est une première. L'incident haineux nous permet de comprendre de façon plus fine et plus subtile ce qui se passe dans la communauté, [de comprendre] le malaise qu'ont certaines communautés, qu'ont certaines personnes avec des orientations sexuelles ou avec des handicaps. Ça va nous donner une bonne idée de ce qui se passe exactement sur le terrain.

7. Border phone search raises questions: lawyers

Canadian Press, Staff report, 2016 08 17

Halifax - Several thorny questions still haven't been answered in the case of a Quebec man who refused to give border officers his cellphone pass code, say privacy and technology lawyers. Alain Philippon had said he would fight a charge of obstructing border officials but pleaded guilty Monday in Dartmouth, N.S., and was fined $500. He was charged when he refused to unlock his cellphone in March 2015 after flying to Halifax from the Dominican Republic. David Fraser, a privacy lawyer with McInnes Cooper in Halifax, says that because the case didn't go to trial there are still serious doubts about phone searches. "What was at issue in this case is that we are now walking around with devices in our pockets that have a huge amount of very sensitive personal information," he said Tuesday in an interview. "The question is: Under what circumstances can a government agent just go trolling through it without a warrant?"

8. Deux fois plus de crimes contre des groupes religieux

La Presse+, Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 08 17

Québec - Graffitis nazis sur une synagogue, tête de porc devant une mosquée, homosexuels agressés : plus de 250 crimes haineux ont été commis au Québec en 2014, dont près d'une centaine à Montréal. En un an, les crimes ciblant un groupe religieux ont doublé dans la province. Les communautés juive et musulmane sont préoccupées par le phénomène, mais n'observent pas de flambée sur le terrain. Le nombre de crimes haineux perpétrés au Québec était relativement stable dans les dernières années, et même en baisse au Canada. Or, 257 délits haineux ont été rapportés en 2014, un bond de 39 % par rapport à l'année précédente, a révélé le ministère de la Sécurité publique (MSP) dans un volumineux document rendu public lors de l'étude des crédits, en avril dernier. Depuis 2010, il n'y avait jamais eu plus de 200 crimes haineux pendant une année. Cette récente augmentation est « majoritairement attribuable à la hausse des délits motivés par la haine contre certaines religions », selon le MSP.

9. Family with ties to Aaron Driver forced to clarify their relationship

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 08 17

London - As Aaron Driver put the finishing touches on a planned terrorist attack last week, he gave no hint anything was wrong, except for confiding that he was feeling ill. "He says, 'I'm not feeling good.' He's sick. He coughs and says I want to go to a hospital," a 60-year-old friend recalled. A cook for his congregation, he had befriended Mr. Driver when the 24-year-old loner showed up at the local mosque in London, Ont., last year. For initiating this friendship, the cook felt at first like a good neighbour - until last Wednesday. That's when a police intervention made the cook and his family feel like suspected accomplices. As authorities scrambled to neutralize the threat posed by Mr. Driver, they also used some heavy-handed tactics to isolate the family's home. Female family members say police snipers even pointed a laser-scoped rifle at them as they exited their house with their hands up. Three days earlier, Mr. Driver had been at that very house, where the family says he was showing a gentler facet of his personality. On that Sunday, "he trimmed the bushes in the back, the roses and daisies," the cook's 52-year-old wife recalls. She was explaining that her husband and Mr. Driver had bonded over odd jobs. "He was a polite, well-mannered kid, very quiet and shy," she said. Speaking to The Globe and Mail in an hour-long interview, the family members, who knew Mr. Driver by his Islamic name of Harun, say they can't reconcile the police allegations with their interactions with the young man they knew.

10. Fighting crime in the digital age

National Post, Adam Belsher, 2016 08 17

Op-ed - This week, top police officials from coast to coast have descended on our nation's capital for the 111th annual Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police conference. The topic that will shape their discussion, Public Safety in a Digital Age: Real Victims - Real Crime, is timely, given that we're at an important societal juncture. So much of our daily lives now take place online: our wealth passes through jurisdictions in the form of ones and zeros; the most intimate details of our lives, whether they are held by government or industry, rest on servers located somewhere around the globe; and our critical infrastructure, whether it is managed by the public or private sector, is operated digitally. Given the recent media coverage of data breaches and many people's personal experiences with fraudulent phishing schemes, it's understandable that we, as consumers and citizens, want to erect the highest walls possible around our valuable digital assets. This is a natural human reaction, but it isn't a realistic societal response, given the magnitude of our online world. Consider some facts. Ninety per cent of the data that has ever been created has been produced in the past two years. Every minute, 300 hours of video are uploaded to YouTube. Current prototypes of driverless cars generate a gigabyte of data a second. This year alone, 1.4 billion smartphones will be shipped. In the next five years, it is estimated that there will be 50 billion connected devices worldwide. And these are conservative estimates, given the exponential innovation we've seen in the field of information technology in recent years. Securing ourselves and our digital assets on our own is not feasible. We cannot create a zero-risk digital environment. The statistics underscore this. In Stats-Can's last national analysis on crime, it reported that the overall crime rate is down to its lowest point since 1998. However, three areas of crime have increased significantly: fraud, child exploitation and terrorism. What ties these together is the fact that they are crimes that are enabled by our digital connectivity and how hard it is for police agencies to deter and investigate these felonies, because technology allows the perpetrators to conduct their crimes with relative anonymity. But that has not deterred police forces throughout the country from trying to tackle these issues - especially in the case of child sexual exploitation, which is one of the most heinous crimes imaginable. Note: Adam Belsher is CEO of Magnet Forensics, a software company headquartered in Waterloo, Ont., that supports more than 3,000 police, national security and other agencies with investigative authorities in 93 countries by developing evidencemanagement tools.

11. Goodale contradicted over claim that no immigration detainee wrote him

Toronto Star, Tondra McCharles, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - Advocates for a group of hunger-striking immigration detainees were shocked Monday to hear Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale say none had replied to his request for details of why their detention was unfair. In fact, 17 of 50 detainees in two Ontario jails who ended a hunger strike in July responded to Goodale's invitation conveyed to them by Canada Border Services Agency officials. Syed Hussan, a member of the End Immigration Detention Network, told the Star that many wrote Goodale to make their individual case, and others did not. "Many of the detainees refused to participate. They didn't know what it was for. They didn't know it came from Goodale's office," Hussan said, adding many felt that, "the onus is not on the detainee to prove why he shouldn't be in there. The onus is on the government to explain why someone is in prison without trial or charges, in the case of the people we work with, mostly for two-plus years." Scott Bardsley, a spokesman for Goodale, told the Star Tuesday that the minister was not fully briefed with the latest information on the hunger strikers' file prior to a news conference in Laval, Que., Monday.

12. Honduras ' ' No . 1 enemy ' in limbo ; Activist urges Justin Trudeau to help stem rights abuses in mining companies

Toronto Star, Marina Jimenez, 2016 08 17

Toronto - Padre Melo lives every day as though it is his last. He knows assassins are out to kill him. And, eventually, they may succeed. "I cannot walk in the streets or ride my bike," said Melo, a Jesuit priest, human rights activist and radio host from Honduras. Melo, whose real name is Ismael Moreno Coto, travelled to Toronto this week to talk about the risks he faces in his home country at an event hosted by Canadian Jesuits International. "I have police patrolling outside my house, but I don't know if they are protecting me or watching me. I am the government's No. 1 enemy." Honduras is one of the deadliest places in the world to be an environmental activist, according to Global Witness, an international non-governmental organization focused on natural resource exploitation. Between 2010 and 2014, 101 environmentalists were killed in the country, and few of the cases have been prosecuted. This is a fact Melo knows well. On March 2, 2016, Berta Caceres, a recipient of the Goldman Environmental Prize and a close friend of Melo's, was shot to death. Such impunity seems shocking in a country of just eight million and one with a strong Canadian presence. Canada signed a free-trade agreement with Honduras in 2014 and an estimated 100,000 Canadians visit each year. But it's the mining sector where Canada has the biggest impact: 90 per cent of all foreign mining investments in Honduras are Canadian, according to the Council on Hemispheric Affairs (COHA), a Washington, D.C., think-tank.

13. No surprises in Trudeau's stance on terrorism

Toronto Star, Paul Wells, 2016 08 17

Column - So far on terrorism, Justin Trudeau is more or less the prime minister Stephen Harper told us he would be. On the very day Trudeau became leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, in April 2013, he sat in Ottawa for an interview with Peter Mansbridge of the CBC. Two bombers had just detonated their home-brew contraptions at the Boston Marathon, killing three and wounding hundreds. How would you respond if you were prime minister, Mansbridge asked. "Over the coming days," Trudeau replied, "we have to look at the root causes." Two years later Trudeau won the election. And then last week the RCMP shot and killed Aaron Driver in Strathroy, Ont., before he could kill anyone else, and we have had a chance to see how Trudeau handles terrorism. To a great extent, in any public sense, he doesn't. The prime minister returned from three weeks of vacation to a series of regional infrastructure announcements. It's Ralph Goodale, his minister of public safety -- who was first elected to the Saskatchewan legislature when Justin Trudeau was three years old -- who has been the government's face in the aftermath of Strathroy. So if you're looking for a prime minister who personalizes the government's fight against terror, who is depicted by his staff working on it alone late into the night, Trudeau may disappoint.

14. Police chiefs want new law that would compel people to reveal passwords

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - Canada's police chiefs want a new law that would force people to hand over their electronic passwords with a judge's consent. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has passed a resolution calling for the legal measure to unlock digital evidence, saying criminals increasingly use encryption to hide illicit activities. There is nothing currently in Canadian law that would compel someone to provide a password to police during an investigation, RCMP Assistant Commissioner Joe Oliver told a news conference Tuesday. "The victims in the digital space are real," Oliver said. "Canada's law and policing capabilities must keep pace with the evolution of technology." The chiefs' proposed password scheme is "wildly disproportionate," because in the case of a laptop computer it would mean handing over the "key to your whole personal life," said David Christopher, a spokesman for OpenMedia, a group that works to keep the Internet surveillance-free. "On the face of it, this seems like it's clearly unconstitutional."

Le Devoir, Marie-Michèle Sioui, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - Le gouvernement fédéral a transmis à la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) les conclusions d'un rapport de l'Organisation des Nations unies (ONU), qui révèle qu'une entreprise canadienne aurait opéré le transfert illicite de véhicules blindés vers la Libye. En mars, un rapport de l'ONU a avancé que l'entreprise ontarienne Streit aurait transféré en 2012 des véhicules blindés de ses installations des Émirats arabes unis vers la Libye, pourtant sous un embargo commercial qui y interdit la vente d'armements. Selon le comité de l'ONU concernant la Libye, tout transfert de véhicule blindé vers le pays de l'Afrique du Nord devrait être interdit. En 2014, des membres de ce comité ont rencontré des représentants de Streit, qui se sont défendus d'avoir agi illégalement. Or, selon la CBC, qui a eu accès à des avis de livraison et des reçus de vente, l'entreprise canadienne aurait continué de vendre des véhicules blindés à la Libye et au Soudan du Sud après avoir été avertie par l'ONU.

16. Workers plan protest to crank up pressure on Foote to fix Phoenix

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - The giant Public Service Alliance of Canada is cranking up the pressure on Public Services Minister Judy Foote to fix the troubled Phoenix pay system by staging a public protest by workers in her home province. Employee frustration over the malfunctioning pay system has escalated in recent weeks as new cases of public servants being unpaid, overpaid or not paid at all keep cropping up, but Thursday's planned demonstration is the first political action against the Liberals since PSAC first sounded the alarm about the massive project more than a year ago. The rally will be held at Harbourside Park in St John's NL, drawing public servants from federal offices there as well as from Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Until now, the unions have been working with senior bureaucrats at Treasury Board and Public Services and Procurement Canada to try and resolve mushrooming pay problems caused by Phoenix which appear to be getting more complicated. It also comes the day before Foote is expected to have her first face-to-face meeting with PSAC President Robyn Benson and Debi Daviau, president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. Unions have complained that Foote has dodged responsibility for the fiasco and let her senior bureaucrats take the heat. She didn't appear as a witness at the government operations committee meeting that was hastily called last month to discuss Phoenix.

17. 'Shadow Brokers' Leak Raises Alarming Question: Was the N.S.A. Hacked?

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 08 17

Washington - The release on websites this week of what appears to be top-secret computer code that the National Security Agency has used to break into the networks of foreign governments and other espionage targets has caused deep concern inside American intelligence agencies, raising the question of whether America's own elite operatives have been hacked and their methods revealed. Most outside experts who examined the posts, by a group calling itself the Shadow Brokers, said they contained what appeared to be genuine samples of the code -- though somewhat outdated -- used in the production of the N.S.A.'s custom-built malware. Most of the code was designed to break through network firewalls and get inside the computer systems of competitors like Russia, China and Iran. That, in turn, allows the N.S.A. to place "implants" in the system, which can lurk unseen for years and be used to monitor network traffic or enable a debilitating computer attack. According to these experts, the coding resembled a series of "products" developed inside the N.S.A.'s highly classified Tailored Access Operations unit, some of which were described in general terms in documents stolen three years ago by Edward J. Snowden, the former N.S.A. contractor now living in Russia. But the code does not appear to have come from Mr. Snowden's archive, which was mostly composed of PowerPoint files and other documents that described N.S.A. programs. The documents released by Mr. Snowden and his associates contained no actual source code used to break into the networks of foreign powers. Whoever obtained the source code apparently broke into either the top-secret, highly compartmentalized computer servers of the N.S.A. or other servers around the world that the agency would have used to store the files.

18. Ex-CIA officer running for president will sue Texas to get on ballot

Dallas Morning News, Jamie Lovegrove, 2016 08 16

Washington - Independent presidential candidate Evan McMullin, an ex-CIA officer and congressional policy wonk who launched his campaign last week to offer "Never Trump" Republicans a conservative option, faces a steep political challenge gaining enough support to affect the November election. And by jumping into the race so late, McMullin will need to clear significant legal hurdles, as well. Filing deadlines for independent candidates in more than half of the states have already passed, and several more deadlines are fast approaching. That will mean going to court -- including in Texas, where an independent had to gather nearly 80,000 signatures by May. "Our intention in Texas is to file a legal challenge, and we think that the great people of Texas will agree with us that there shouldn't be artificial boundaries on the kinds of people that can run for president," said Joel Searby, the campaign's chief strategist. Noting that Texas' May 9 petition deadline -- by far the earliest in the country -- fell long before the Democratic and Republican nominating conventions, Searby argues that prospective independent candidates were unable to take into consideration the choices of the two major parties before deciding whether to run.

19. F.B.I. Provides Congress Email Inquiry Documents

New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 08 17

Washington - The F.B.I. on Tuesday handed over to Congress documents related to its investigation of Hillary Clinton's private email server after House Republicans pushed the bureau to surrender material it had gathered before it concluded last month that she should not face criminal charges. The documents were believed to include notes from the F.B.I.'s 3½-hour interview with Mrs. Clinton in early July, the last step in a lengthy investigation into her email practices as secretary of state that continues to dog her run for president. "The F.B.I. has turned over a 'number of documents' related to their investigation of former Secretary Clinton's use of a personal email server," according to a statement from the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. "Committee staff is currently reviewing the information that is classified Secret. There are no further details at this time."

20. FBI defends decision not to charge Clinton, gives documents to Congress

Washington Post, Matt Zapotosky, Karoun Demirjian, 2016 08 17

Washington - The FBI on Tuesday forcefully defended its decision not to criminally charge Hillary Clinton in connection with her use of a private email server as secretary of state in a letter to lawmakers that laid out its rationale for refusing to do so. The letter was sent to House Oversight Committee lawmakers the same day that the bureau released to the GOP-controlled Congress a variety of material from its investigation. It marked yet another occasion in which the FBI leadership responded to - and in some cases rebutted - GOP claims about why the Democratic presidential nominee should have been charged. But the material turned over to lawmakers - which included an investigative summary; reports known as "302s" containing interviews with Clinton and others; and classified emails found on her private server - may give Republicans fodder to criticize Clinton in the months before the election. Or it could, that is, if that material - some of which is classified - is released or leaked by Republicans, which could put them in an awkward spot. But there was confusion Tuesday night among lawmakers about what material could eventually be released.

21. Hackers Claim to Hit NSA-Linked Super-Cyberespionage Group

ABC News, Lee Ferran, 2016 08 16

New York - A group of mysterious hackers recently claimed to have broken into the systems of another hacking group with suspected links to the National Security Agency, and the attackers are now attempting to auction off the cyber superweapons they said they found. Cybersecurity experts were abuzz Monday after a group calling itself the Shadow Brokers claimed in stilted English in messages online to have hacked the Equation Group. The Equation Group was revealed last February to be an extremely high-level veteran hacking squad with "solid links" to the creators of the cyber superweapon Stuxnet, which was reportedly used in a joint NSA-Israeli intelligence operation that targeted an Iranian nuclear facility. Cybersecurity experts were initially split on whether the hack was legitimate, but after initial analysis of some teaser code released by the Shadow Brokers, some have come to the conclusion that at least those tools appear to be real. "The level that a nation-state would have to go through to fake this stuff would be like nothing we've seen before and highly unlikely," said one cybersecurity expert, who requested he not be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject. The U.S.-based cybersecurity firm Symantec wrote today in a blog post, "It will take some time to assess all of the released files. However, early indications are that at least some of the tools released are functioning exploits."

22. Powerful NSA hacking tools have been revealed online

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 08 17

Washington - Some of the most powerful espionage tools created by the National Security Agency's elite group of hackers have been revealed in recent days, a development that could pose severe consequences for the spy agency's operations and the security of government and corporate computers. A cache of hacking tools with code names such as Epicbanana, Buzzdirection and Egregiousblunder appeared mysteriously online over the weekend, setting the security world abuzz with speculation over whether the material was legitimate. The file appeared to be real, according to former NSA personnel who worked in the agency's hacking division, known as Tailored Access Operations (TAO). "Without a doubt, they're the keys to the kingdom," said one former TAO employee, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive internal operations. "The stuff you're talking about would undermine the security of a lot of major government and corporate networks both here and abroad." Said a second former TAO hacker who saw the file: "From what I saw, there was no doubt in my mind that it was legitimate."

24. US officials: Up to 100,000 Iran-backed fighters now in Iraq

Fox News, Lucas Tomlinson, 2016 08 16

Washington - As many as 100,000 Iranian-backed Shiite militia are now fighting on the ground in Iraq, according to U.S. military officials -- raising concerns that should the Islamic State be defeated, it may only be replaced by another anti-American force that fuels further sectarian violence in the region. The ranks have swelled inside a network of Shiite militias known as the Popular Mobilization Forces. Since the rise of Sunni-dominated ISIS fighters inside Iraq more than two years ago, the Shiite forces have grown to 100,000 fighters, Col. Chris Garver, a Baghdad-based U.S. military spokesman, confirmed in an email to Fox News. The fighters are mostly Iraqis. Garver said not all the Shia militias in Iraq are backed by Iran, adding: "The [Iranian-backed] Shia militia are usually identified at around 80,000." According to some experts, this still is an alarmingly high number. "The effect of the Obama administration's policy has been to replace American boots on the ground with the Iranian's. As Iran advances, one anti-American actor is being replaced with another," Thomas Joscelyn, a senior fellow at the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, said in a recent phone interview.

25. Hate preacher's jail time poses radicalisation risk

London Times, Richard Ford, 2016 08 17

London - The jail sentence for Anjem Choudary poses a challenge to the Prison Service, which is being criticised for failing to do enough to prevent radicalisation. He begins his time behind bars weeks after a report found complacency among prison managers over the problem of Islamic extremism in jails. Ian Acheson, author of a report commissioned by Michael Gove, the former justice secretary, called for special units in top-security jails to hold proselytising Islamist inmates. He said that intelligence in the prison system showed that a group of jihadist prisoners were preaching to the 12,500 Muslim inmates in England and Wales. Choudary has been held in Belmarsh top-security jail in southeast London, where a special unit -- effectively a jail within a jail -- enables the Prison Service to hold the most dangerous and disruptive inmates. It is likely that he will remain at the prison for some time while his behaviour is assessed. David Wilson, a former prison governor who is now professor of criminology at Birmingham City university, said: "The Prison Service will have to limit opportunities for radicalisation to take place but it can be done."

27. Revealed: how Anjem Choudary inspired at least 100 British jihadis

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 08 16

London - Anjem Choudary and his extremist groups are believed to have inspired at least 100 people from Britain into terrorism, including organisations committed to campaigns of murder against the west, the Guardian has learned. Choudary avoided serious criminal charges for years, but his own conviction for terrorism, agreed unanimously by an Old Bailey jury in July, can now be reported after legal restrictions were lifted. Documents from intelligence sources say his groups were at the heart of the Islamist movement in Britain, which has been left facing a "severe" threat of jihadi attack. Choudary and an acolyte, Mohammed Rahman, were convicted after they urged support for Islamic State and pledged allegiance to the group. The conviction represents only a fraction of the jihadi mayhem to which the lawyer is linked.

28. Beijing to Canberra: expect investments to be scaled back

The Australian, Glenda Korporaal and Andrew White, 2016 08 17

Canberra--The Chinese embassy has warned that the rejection this year of two bids by Chinese companies to invest in Australia showed "clear protectionist tendencies" which would have a "serious impact on the enthusiasm" of firms wanting to invest in Australia. "The Chinese government is highly concerned about the statement by the Australian Treasurer on his preliminary decision to block the sale of the 50.4 per cent of Ausgrid in a 99-year lease to foreign bidders on national security grounds," the embassy said yesterday in reply to questions from The Australian. It noted that last week's move by Scott Morrison was the second time the government had rejected bids for Australian assets by Chinese interests, referring to the bid for the giant Kidman cattle property assets which was knocked back before the election, despite the bid being revised following an earlier response from the Treasurer. The embassy said the handling of the two deals "shows a clear protectionist tendency" which "would have serious impact on the enthusiasm of Chinese firms which want to come and invest in Australia". "The Australian side stated on many occasions that it welcomes Chinese business investment, but made decisions just to the contrary. "The Chinese side hopes that the Australian government will make efforts to create a fairer, better and more transparent trade and investment environment for Chinese enterprises." The embassy said the Chinese company State Grid had "been involved in this commercial project for a long time and has been invited to table a binding offer". Representatives for bidders led by the State Grid electricity company and Hong Kong infrastructure company Cheung Kong Infrastructure, which were involved in the two final bids for a 99-year lease on NSW electricity company Ausgrid, are now assessing their situation following last week's surprise "preliminary" rejection of their bids on the grounds of national security.

29. Dunne doesn't trust spies with expanded powers

Newstalk ZB, Felix Marwick, 2016 08 17

Auckland--United Future Leader Peter Dunne said provisions that will give SIS and GCSB staff immunity from criminal liability are amongst his concerns, though he accepts there will be situations where it would be desirable. But he believes they have an attitude that the law is a minor irritation they treat as they see fit, and he thinks they've read too many Le Carre novels. "I just don't think that they're sufficiently clear of that attitude to be confident that they could act responsibly under the type of environment being proposed in this bill." SIS and GCSB Minister Chris Finlayson said how criminal immunity is determined, and by whom, could lie with the courts.

30. Gold Coast start-up partners shocked by terrorist 'customers'

The Australian, Mark Schliebs, 2016 08 17

Brisbane--Two digital entrepreneurs from the Gold Coast have inadvertently been linked to Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood and the leaking of hacked information from the US Democratic party. Friends Karl Lehnert, 37, and Michael Tippett, 34, started business HotSnail six years ago, to cater to grey nomads who wanted to keep abreast of their mail while on the road. The service allows customers to have letters sent to designated post office boxes, then scanned and electronically sent to them, and several small businesses have joined frequent travellers in their customer base, including a gift shop, cosmetics distributor and a mowing service. But now, via one of their customers, a suburban Gold Coast post office box of theirs appears as the registered postal address for the websites of the Muslim Brotherhood and Bitcoin sellers. DCLeaks.com -- a website making headlines in the US following the leaking of phone numbers and email addresses of current and former Democrats in the House of Representatives -- also has the same address listed.

31. 11 convicted on terror charges

Gulf News, Mohsin Ali, 2016 08 17

Islamabad - Pakistan's Chief of Army Staff General Raheel Sharif on Tuesday confirmed the death sentences of 11 men convicted by military courts on terrorism charges. A statement issued by the military's public relations wing said these "hardcore terrorists" -- all belonging to banned insurgent outfit Tehreek e Taliban Pakistan (TTP) -- had been involved in committing "heinous offences related to terrorism". One among them, named Zia Ul Haq, was involved in suicidal attacks and killing of a deputy inspector general of police, several other police officials and an ISI operative in the southwestern Balochistan province. The convicts also include those who were involved in sectarian killings, kidnapping and killing of civilians and personnel of Frontier Constabulary and killing of Major Majeed of the Pakistan Army. In January 2015, Pakistan empowered military courts to try civilians for terrorism-related offences.

32. Pakistan offers India bilateral arrangement on non-testing of nuclear weapons

The Express Tribune, Staff Correspondent, 2016 08 17

Islamabad - In an attempt to promote restraint and responsibility in South Asia, Pakistan has offered its nuclear-armed arch rival for a bilateral arrangement on non-testing of nuclear weapons, the Foreign Office said on Tuesday. Prime Minister's Adviser on Foreign Affairs Sartaj Aziz had earlier this month renewed Islamabad's proposal to New Delhi for simultaneous adherence to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT). A similar proposal, Nafees Zakaria said, which was made following Pakistan's nuclear tests in 1998, did not elicit a favourable response from India. "Pakistan has indicated the possibility that the two countries may consider a bilateral arrangement, which is reflective of its policy of promoting restraint and responsibility in South Asia and its consistent support for the objectives of the CTBT," the spokesperson said in a statement.

35. Latest Boko Haram Video Reignites Debate Over Negotiations

Voice of America, Chika Oduah, 2016 08 17

Abuja - It has been two days since the jihadist sect Boko Haram released a video that showed as many as 50 of the missing Chibok schoolgirls still alive, and the Nigerian government has yet to reach out to the family of the girl who was singled out in the video. The lack of contact has again left the families of the Chibok girls feeling neglected. "No one from the Nigerian government has contacted us. Maybe it's because we are poor or because we don't have oil in Chibok. We are nobody. But I am glad to know that God has answered my prayers by keeping her alive," said Esther Yakubu, whose daughter appeared in the video. "The message I have for the federal government is to release the [jailed] fighters so that the [other] fighters will release the girls." Boko Haram's latest video has sparked a fierce debate within Nigeria about the possibility of negotiations between the federal government and the jihadist sect. Last year, Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari said he was open to talking to a credible Boko Haram leader.

36. Shabab Militants Killed by U.S.-Backed Somalis

New York Times, Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 08 17

Nairobi - United States forces assisted Somali commandos in killing several members of the Shabab militant group in an attack last week, an American military spokesman said on Tuesday, but it was not clear whether any high-level operatives had been eliminated. The raid took place last Wednesday, when a contingent of elite American troops acting as military advisers accompanied Somali forces in an assault on a Shabab checkpoint in Saakow, a remote outpost in southern Somalia that has become a notorious hide-out for the militants. American Special Forces have been quietly working in Somalia for years, with increasing success. As the Somali-led force approached the checkpoint, the militants opened fire, setting off a gun battle, said Lt. Cmdr. Anthony Falvo, a spokesman for the United States military's Africa Command. Three Shabab militants died; no Americans were hurt. "U.S. advisers accompanied the Somali-led force, which is standard for what we do in that area," said Commander Falvo, who added that the American forces were armed but did not participate in the firefight.

37. Brazilian Intelligence Service Stokes Olympic Terrorism Fear for Its Own Benefit

The Intercept, Lucas Figueiredo, 2016 08 16

Washington - The enemy could not have chosen a worse time to turn up. On the eve of a major international sporting event, Brazil was simultaneously living through profound economic and political crises. With the country at its weakest moment and fears spreading rapidly, the bombshell dropped: A secret service report leaked to the press revealed that a group of Brazilian citizens, in collusion with foreign agents, planned to arm themselves in order to commit acts of violence and thus further destabilize the country. That was 30 years ago, in the first year of the post-dictatorship era. The event was the 1986 FIFA World Cup in Mexico. In Brazil, President José Sarney's government was a disaster, and the cumulative inflation would reach 65 percent that year. The dangerous enemy rehearsing the moves to plunge the country into chaos? According to the secret service, which at the time was known as the National Information Service (Serviço Nacional de Informações, or SNI), the threat was the return of guerrilla warfare, funded by foreign agents, principally from Germany, but also involving the left-leaning opposition Workers' Party and the trade union federation Unified Workers' Central. Of course, the threat was just a delusion. It was fabricated by the SNI to warrant the criminalization of social movements and help stop the construction of a left-wing political project, but not only that. The creation of a dangerous enemy right at the beginning of the democratic transition justified the existence of an entity that had become the symbol of the dictatorship. That was neither the first nor the last time that the Brazilian secret service, aiming to maintain or expand its powers, "planted" in its reports the existence of a radical internal enemy colluding with powerful foreign enemies. In 1960, when the entity was still called the Information and Counterinformation Federal Service, the threat was embodied by a picture of Fidel Castro nailed to the façade of the National Students' Union headquarters in Rio de Janeiro. Four years later, in the early days of the civil-military dictatorship, the red alert was triggered by the discovery of a nightclub suspiciously named Battleship Bartemkin (a play on words of the classic Soviet propaganda film Battleship Potemkin). For years, the secret service has fought to raise its budget and prestige in the state's hierarchy. Recently, it requested the right for its agents to wiretap and carry firearms. ABIN continues to hope for increased power and resources and refuses to abandon its dark legacy from the dictatorship era. Its current general director, Wilson Roberto Trezza, is a veteran from the SNI era. After the Olympics, he might be substituted out for Janér Tesch Hosken Alvarenga, yet another agent trained in the National Information Service.

Global Times, 2016 08 17

Beijing--China is facing a serious threat of Internet vulnerabilities to hacking, as statistics show that over 200,000 vulnerabilities were found from 2009 to 2016, a cyber security expert said at a conference on Tuesday. According to China's National Vulnerability Database (CNVD), domestic Internet security monitoring platforms reported 25,314 vulnerabilities in 2015. Meanwhile, a report published by a security center affiliated to IT company Qihu 360 showed that 43.9 percent of 2.3 million monitored websites were found to have vulnerabilities, and 12.3 percent had high-risk vulnerabilities as of November 2015. Yan Hanbing, a senior official with the National Computer Network Emergency Response Technical Team Coordination Center (CNCERT), said Tuesday that an increasing number of cyber vulnerabilities have been found by general software or revealed by individuals, partly due to the activity of domestic Internet security monitoring platforms in recent years. Yan made the remarks at the 2016 China Internet Security Conference, which was jointly held by Qihu 360 and the Cyber Security Association of China on Tuesday in Beijing.

41. China says cyber rules no cause for foreign business concern

Reuters, 2016 08 17

Beijing--China's pending cyber security law will not create obstacles for foreign business, China's Foreign Ministry said, responding to concerns by international business lobbies over the planned rules. More than 40 global business groups last week petitioned Premier Li Keqiang, according to a copy of a letter seen by Reuters, urging China to revise draft cyber rules they believe are vague and discriminate against foreign enterprises. The groups say the pending rules, including a cyber security law that could be passed this year, include provisions for invasive government security reviews and onerous requirements to keep data in China. They say the regulations would impede China's economic growth, create barriers to market entry and impair the country's security by isolating it technologically. The ministry, in a faxed statement to Reuters late on Tuesday night, said the law will not be used to "carry out differential treatment and will not create obstacles and barriers for international trade and foreign businesses investing in China." "As for the legal requirement for internet operators to provide relevant data in the course of enforcement agencies' counter-terrorism and criminal investigations, this is necessary for safeguarding national security and investigating crimes. All countries do this," the ministry said

"After checking those documents, police have said Nurul Islam Marzan was 'friend' of Shibir," Chowdhury told bdnews24.com on Tuesday. Vice-Chancellor Prof Iftekhar Uddin Chowdhury said they identified Marzan as a former student after seeing his photo in the media and crosschecking them with his certificates and photo in university documents. 43. Experts call for strengthened global cooperation to tackle cyber crimes

People's Daily (China), 2016 08 17

Beijing--With transnational cyberspace crimes on the rise, cyber security experts at home and abroad have once again called to reinforce global cooperation in an effort to crack down on such crimes. "Cyber crimes have become more transnational in recent years. Global cooperation is now urgent and necessary due to the complexity and urgency of the crimes," noted Zhong Zhong, deputy head of the Cyber Security Protection Bureau under China's Ministry of Public Security. Zhong said that China has built an effective cooperation framework with multiple countries, including the U.S. and Russia, to tackle cyber crimes across all fields. China's ongoing anti-cyber crime campaign was launched in April. Targeting personal information leaks, the campaign has so far bagged over 1,900 suspects and discovered more than 23 billion instances of leaked personal information, according to Zhong. Zhong made his remarks at the 2016 China Internet Security Conference, which was jointly held on Aug. 16 in Beijing by IT company Qihoo 360, the Internet Society of China (ISC) and the Cyber Security Association of China.

45. N.K. restaurant workers resettle in S. Korea after April mass defection

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 08 17

Seoul---- A group of 13 North Korean defectors who worked at a restaurant in China have recently begun to resettle in South Korea after undergoing Seoul's probe into what caused their massive defection in April, Seoul's unification ministry said Tuesday. In early April, one male manager and 12 female workers who worked at a Pyongyang-run restaurant in the Chinese eastern port city of Ningbo defected to South Korea en masse. The Ministry of Unification said that it is true that they have begun to resettle in South Korea, but it cannot reveal further details due to concerns over their safety. The high-profile defection came as North Korea was slapped by the U.N. Security Council's tougher sanctions in March over its fourth nuclear test in January and long-range rocket launch the following month. The rare massive defection has garnered attention over whether the sanctions have a major impact on pressuring North Korea, as Pyongyang-run restaurants in foreign countries have served as one of main sources of hard currency for the North. But the case has also sparked a row in South Korea over whether they defected to Seoul of their own free will following North Korea's repeated claims that the female workers were abducted by Seoul's spy agency. The National Intelligence Service (NIS) has held them under its protection without sending them to a state-run resettlement facility, saying that the case is a high-profile defection and North Korea is using it as propaganda.

50. A Turkish Three-Step Roadmap For Syria Including Assad's Departure

Asharq Al-Awsat, Said Abdul Razzak and Youssef Diab, 2016 08 17

Ankara, Beirut - Turkey has set a three-step scenario for a political solution in Syria summarized in protecting the borders, preventing the creation of states controlled by the Kurdish Democratic Union Party (PYD) and the return of refugees currently residing in neighboring countries. Turkish Prime Minister Binali Yildirim asserted during an interview with the Turkish Karar newspaper published yesterday that the new era would not see a state structure based on Syria's sectarian, ethnic or regional basis. Yildirim said that when there is no sectarian structure, this means that Bashar Assad will not be in Syria "in the long-run." The prime minister said a solution in Syria will preserve Syria's territorial integrity, and therefore, a strong state could not be formed in the presence of the Kurdish PYD in North Syria. Diplomatic sources had previously told Asharq Al-Awsat newspaper that "Turkey would not accept the presence of Assad, but rather agrees on his staying during a short transitional period."

51. Hezbollah cells in West Bank busted by Israeli security forces

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, Danielle Ziri, 2016 08 17

Jerusalem - The Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) on Tuesday announced that it had taken down a number of terrorist cells in the West Bank whose members had been recruited through Facebook by elite Hezbollah Unit 133 in Lebanon and the Gaza Strip. It also has cracked down on efforts by Hezbollah to recruit Arab Israelis. The arrests included a cell from Kalkilya in the West Bank that was ordered to carry out an attack on an IDF patrol. The cell's leader, Mustafa Kamel Hindi, 18, was recruited by a Hezbollah agent named Bilal through Facebook and was given instructions via email, according to the Shin Bet. The cell was arrested in June before it was able to carry out a shooting attack on an IDF patrol for which its members had trained with target practice and mock bomb assembly. The defendants have already been indicted in the Judea Military Court. Israel's ambassador to the UN Danny Danon on Tuesday called on the Security Council to designate Hezbollah as a terrorist organization.

55. NATO Can Do More to Destroy Islamic State -- If We Ask (Canada)

Wall Street Journal, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, 2016 08 17

Op-ed - The goal of the recent attacks directed or inspired by Islamic State on civilians in the U.S. and Europe is to create an atmosphere of fear and to intensify political tensions across the world. As the terrorist organization continues to lose ground in Iraq and Syria, it is focusing more on spreading terror abroad. Central Intelligence Agency Director John Brennan has repeatedly warned that Western countries should expect more attacks. As Islamic State shifts its strategy, the U.S. and its allies should as well. The time has come for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to invoke its self-defense clause so the full weight of the alliance is brought to bear against Islamic State, also known as ISIS. Although ISIS has carried out attacks throughout the West, only seven of America's 27 NATO allies -- Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, Turkey and the U.K. -- have joined the U.S. in directly attacking the group. Many other NATO countries could contribute special- operations forces, attack aircraft and surveillance assets to ongoing operations, thereby multiplying the effect. Creating a NATO rapid-reaction force to serve as an attack force against Islamic State would make a major impact. NATO countries have advanced capabilities in intelligence, airpower, special operations and other areas that are required to combat terrorists. Bringing the many resources of NATO nations to bear in the fight against Islamic State -- and taking the fight to Iraq and Syria -- would help to eliminate ISIS safe havens and to stanch the flow of refugees into Turkey and Europe. Eliminating Islamic State's hold on Raqqa and Mosul is essential. If successful, this would reduce the organization's ability to raise funds, plan terror operations abroad and attract individuals from all over the globe. Note: Ms. Feinstein, a Democrat from California, is vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

56. « La Suisse doit rattraper son retard »

Le Temps (Suisse), Bernard Wuthrich, 2016 08 17

Berne - Le 25 septembre, les Suisses votent sur la nouvelle loi sur le Renseignement, combattue par un référendum de la gauche. L'ancien chef du Service de renseignement suisse, Peter Regli, la juge nécessaire dans le contexte actuel. La loi sur le renseignement (LRens) élargit les moyens d'action du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC). Celui-ci pourra, en cas de graves menaces d'attentat, d'espionnage, de cyberagressions, d'utilisation d'armes chimiques ou d'attaques contre les infrastructures suisses, mener des opérations de surveillance préventive également dans des espaces privés: écoutes téléphoniques, surveillance des réseaux câblés, intrusion dans des réseaux informatiques pour acquérir des informations. « Pour qu'une mesure de surveillance soit mise en place à l'encontre d'une personne, il faut plus qu'un soupçon approximatif ou qu'une barbe bien fournie, contrairement à ce que les opposants affirment. Il faut une menace concrète et grave dans ces domaines précis », insiste la conseillère nationale et criminologue Rebecca Ruiz (PS/VD) qui, contrairement à la majorité du PS, soutient cette loi. Par ailleurs, le SRC devra au préalable obtenir l'accord du Tribunal administratif fédéral et du Conseil fédéral sous le contrôle de la Délégation des commissions de gestion du parlement et d'une autorité de surveillance indépendante.

Celui qui fut le patron du Service de renseignement suisse de 1991 à 1999 reste un expert réputé dans le domaine. Pour lui, la LRens doit donner au SRC les moyens nécessaires pour faire face aux menaces d'aujourd'hui. « Des moyens que nos adversaires utilisent déjà et que notre Etat n'a pas encore à sa disposition. Nos ennemis sont armés de longues hallebardes alors que nous n'avons que des couteaux militaires pour nous défendre. »

58. Coup d'envoi pour la loi sur le renseignement

Tribune de Genève, Florent Quiquerez, 2016 08 17

Berne - La menace terroriste sert les partisans du texte qui sera voté le 25 septembre, sans décourager ceux qui dénoncent un Etat fouineur. La campagne démarre. Après un été lourdement marqué par les attentats, les partisans de la loi sur le renseignement semblent avoir un boulevard devant eux jusqu'à la votation du 25 septembre. Hier après-midi, un comité réunissant des élus de tous les partis (sauf les Verts) a officiellement lancé la campagne. Attaques meurtrières en France et en Allemagne, retour de djihadistes en Suisse, cyberattaque contre Ruag: les exemples ont fusé pour justifier l'importance de la nouvelle loi. « Le terrorisme n'appartient plus uniquement aux films et aux livres », a lancé Beat Flach (Vert'lib. /AG). « Dans ce nouveau contexte international, notre Service de renseignement (SRC) est dépassé, a ajouté Corina Eichenberger (PLR/AG). Il faut l'adapter aux nouvelles réalités. » Garde-fous La nouvelle législation veut donner davantage de moyens au SRC: renforcer en quelque sorte la panoplie des espions helvétiques. La loi qui sera votée le 25 septembre leur permettra de mener des opérations intrusives. Ils pourront s'infiltrer dans des ordinateurs, procéder à des écoutes téléphoniques ou poser des caméras dans des locaux privés.

59. Germany accuses Turkey of supporting terrorism: report

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 08 16

Berlin - The leaked report states the German government's belief that Ankara has been deliberately financing Islamist and terror organizations with the direct consent of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, according to the report aired by ARD on Tuesday. The document written by the Interior Ministry was a confidential answer to a question posed by Die Linke (the Left Party) in the German parliament (Bundestag). "The numerous affirmations of solidarity and support for the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, for Hamas and for armed Islamist opposition groups in Syria by the ruling AKP party and president Erdogan underscore their ideological affinity to their Muslim brothers," the document states, according to ARD.

60. Turks of all political stripes oppose coup attempt - even ardent critics of Erdogan

The National (UAE), Lorena Rios, 2016 08 17

Istanbul - Time and again since the failed coup of July 15, president Recep Tayyip Erdogan has urged his countrymen to take to the streets and squares of Istanbul and Ankara to declare their unity and determination to defend Turkey's democracy. And Turks responded, day after day, in their millions. In an unprecedented display of unity, president Erdogan stood alongside the leaders of Turkey's main opposition parties. Even though the pro-Kurdish People's Democratic Party (HDP), long a thorn in Turkey's side, was excluded from the show of unity, Kurds also joined what were dubbed the "Democracy and Martyrs" demonstrations. The failed coup, which was instigated by a faction of the armed forces, has united Turks as never before. For whatever the differences between the political parties there is one thing that troubles them more: the fear they all share of being forced to live under military rule.

61. Un service de renseignement mieux armé mais mieux surveillé

Agence Télégraphique Suisse (ATS), Journaliste maison, 2016 08 16

Berne - Le Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC) disposera d'un nouvel arsenal de mesures pour lutter contre le terrorisme. Mais il sera davantage surveillé. Aperçu du projet soumis en votation et qui ne devrait pas entrer en vigueur avant la mi-2017. Avec la nouvelle loi sur le renseignement, les agents du SRC pourront surveiller des communications (courrier, téléphone, courriel), observer des faits dans des lieux privés, si nécessaire en installant des micros, ou perquisitionner secrètement des systèmes informatiques et y installer des "chevaux de Troie". Le Conseil fédéral estime à une dizaine par an le nombre de cas pouvant faire l'objet de ces "recherches spéciales", un cas complexe pouvant nécessiter plusieurs mesures. Celles-ci ne seront utilisées qu'en dernier recours pour lutter contre le terrorisme, la prolifération d'armes et l'espionnage. Le SRC pourra ainsi observer une personne revenue d'une zone de conflit djihadiste, un espion infiltré auprès d'une autorité suisse ou le responsable du bras armé d'un parti interdit à l'étranger qui planifie des attaques en Suisse. Pas question en revanche de se servir de cet arsenal pour pister l'extrémisme violent.

1. Civil liberties still struggling under Liberals ; Government dragging its heels on review of security legislation

Regina Leader Post, Greg Fingas, 2016 08 18

Column - Canada's ongoing debate over the protection of civil liberties has taken a few noteworthy turns this summer. And what's normally considered a quiet season could have significant ramifications for Canadians, whether or not they're currently monitoring the political scene. On the one hand, the federal NDP has reiterated its outrage at C-51, the surveillance bill that was forced through by Stephen Harper's Conservative government with the supposedly grudging support of Justin Trudeau's Liberals. Since taking power, the Liberals have made excuses to drag their heels even in providing minimal accountability for the exercise of wideranging powers to intrude on Canadians' civil rights. At the same time, the Conservatives and others are not only refusing to acknowledge any flaws in Canada's existing security state, but are also hinting at demanding even more of a crackdown on personal freedoms. And some seem to be treating the foiled attack planned by Aaron Driver as an excuse for even more surveillance and disruption powers. In fact, the peace bond scheme pushed by the Conservatives failed utterly. Despite being subject to limits on individual action set up by C-51, Driver - working alone - was able to assemble an explosive device as part of a plan to attack civilians. Moreover, it was FBI surveillance, not any action by CSIS or any other Canadian authority, that identified Driver's plans in time for the RCMP to respond. Yet somehow we're now facing calls for even more severe intrusions on privacy.

2. Goodale seeks new anti-terror measures; Peace bonds have failed to stop extremists

Ottawa Citizen, Ian Macleod, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - Stronger anti-terror measures are needed after a court- ordered peace bond failed to stop jihadist Aaron Driver from making bombs and plotting an attack, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said Wednesday. "What the incident shows is that peace bonds are tools and instruments with limited capacity, it's not a perfect solution to every situation," Goodale told reporters Wednesday after a speech to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. One option would be to amend the Criminal Code to require professional de-radicalization counselling for individuals suspected as terrorist sympathizers "to change (their) behaviour," he said. Leading terrorism experts say the problem goes beyond court orders to keep the peace, especially when dealing with individuals willing to sacrifice their lives for the jihadist cause. Peace bonds are based on threat assessments by the RCMP, possibly with input from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). With Driver and Couture-Rouleau, those assessments proved to be wrong, said Wesley Wark, a terrorism expert at the University of Ottawa. "That threat assessment was basically that Aaron Driver was a person that liked to talk very openly about his support for the Islamic State (of Iraq and the Levant), jihad and all the rest of it, but was unlikely to take any action," he said. "Who at the end of the day has the final say on the threat assessment? How do they come up with judgments and were those judgments reviewed from time to time or were they set in stone?"

3. Ottawa pledges to hire deradicalization adviser after man's death in standoff with RCMP

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, Laura Stone, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - Following the fatal police shooting of would-be suicide bomber Aaron Driver, Canada's Public Safety Minister says the Liberals will "up our game" in the fight against terrorism by imminently hiring a deradicalization adviser. "What the incident in Strathroy demonstrates is that this is important," Ralph Goodale told reporters on Wednesday. He said the new adviser will be hired within weeks and could succeed in counter-terrorism challenges where police and intelligence services are falling short. Details are under wraps, but observers are keen to see how the approach will take shape, especially since the global track record of such initiatives is mixed. "There are all kinds of these programs all over the world. Everyone's got one," said Phil Gurski, a former analyst at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. And yet, he added, no one has really figured out the best approach. CSIS recently canvassed outside experts for feedback on which governments' deradicalization - or "countering violent extremism" (CVE) - programs are working best. Many replied that none are known to be working particularly well. "Some expressed skepticism as to the relevance of CVE initiatives, highlighting the lack of supporting empirical evidence thus far to measure their effectiveness," says a CSIS discussion paper recently published online. Other experts told CSIS such programs are only valuable "provided that their implementation is not led by governments ... [because] governments are not credible messengers."

4. Our wolves will come to you': ISIL ramps up anti-Canada propaganda after Ontario terror incident

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 08 18

Toronto - An image circulated by an ISIL propaganda outfit on Wednesday showed Toronto burning while a terrorist watched from nearby mountains, a wolf at his side. "Our wolves will come to you," it read. As expected, ISIL has ramped up its propaganda campaign against Canada following last week's police killing of Aaron Driver, an ISIL supporter in Strathroy, Ont. who was allegedly in the final stages of planning a bomb attack. Attempting to capitalize on the incident, the pro-ISIL al-Wa'd Foundation released two posters on its Telegram channel on Wednesday, including the one showing an apocalyptic Toronto, according to the SITE Intelligence Group. "O worshippers of the cross in Canada, now now fighting came, our wolves will come to you from where you will not know so you won't enjoy life," it read. The second poster showed a terrorist walking through a destroyed Toronto street. "Soon very soon," it read. ISIL makes heavy use of propaganda, much of it distributed on social media. A retired senior Canadian Security Intelligence Service official, Andy Ellis, said in April that Canadians were part of the ISIL propaganda wing, which valued their English-language skills.

5. Unlike Trudeau, jihadists don't take holidays

Toronto Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 08 18

Column - While Prime Minister Justin Trudeau seems to be on perpetual holidays this summer, one of his cabinet ministers has finally addressed an issue the Liberals have long avoided -- how to combat jihadists in Canada. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale was in Montreal this week to announce a new strategy for fighting home-grown terrorism. In the wake of a thwarted attack by ISIS-connected jihadist Aaron Driver, Goodale says he wants Canada to become a global leader in understanding and countering radicalization. This will be no easy feat. Earlier this year, Canadian Security Intelligence Service Director Michel Coulombe told a Senate national security committee that 180 individuals with ties to Canada are fighting alongside foreign terrorist groups -- including about 100 with the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria -- while another 60 or so are back in Canada. The Trudeau government has been reluctant to talk about the threat of home-grown jihadists in Canada. But Goodale's new interest in counter-radicalization is better late than never.

6. 'A very peaceful man:' wife of Calgary imam detained in Turkey recounts ordeal

Canadian Press, Lauren Krugel, 2016 08 18

Calgary - Rumeysa Hanci breaks down in tears when she recounts how she spent her 13th wedding anniversary, travelling home to Calgary from Turkey and not knowing when she would see her husband, Davud, again. She said Turkish authorities have not explained why they have imprisoned the imam, who has Canadian and Turkish Citizenship. Allegations in Turkish media that he was involved in last month's coup attempt make no sense to Rumeysa. "My husband is a very gentle and kind man," she said, sitting at the dining room table of the family's northwest Calgary house, photos spread out in front of her showing the couple beaming on their wedding day and Davud's face sandwiched between those of his grinning sons. "He's not involved with any violence. He's a very peaceful man." Turkish news reports say Davud has ties to Fethullah Gulen, the U.S.-based cleric who the Turkish government accuses of masterminding a July 15 coup attempt.

7. Feds farm out web-hosting duties to U.S. server

Ottawa Citizen, Vito Piliéci, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - Canada.ca isn't as Canadian as it sounds. The federal government initiative to move all of its departmental and agency websites to the Canada.ca domain includes farming out the web-hosting duties for the site to Amazon Web Services in the United States. A recent draft plan produced by the government for cloud computing requires that only data which the government has deemed to be "unclassified" -- which means it cannot be of harm on a national or personal level -- should be allowed to be stored on servers outside of Canada. However, it is unclear whose responsibility it is to determine what information is considered sensitive. And when information is deemed sensitive, it remains unclear how and where that data will be stored. Julia Sullivan, a spokeswoman for Employment and Social Development Canada, which is overseeing the Canada.ca initiative, said no sensitive information is being stored on the American servers. She also said, as more departments join the Canada.ca website, such as Canada Revenue Agency which accepts Canadians' tax filings online, there will need to be workarounds in place to ensure that sensitive data isn't sent to the American servers.

8. Goodale urges public discussion on police access to passwords and digital data

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - Canadians need to think about how far police should be allowed to go in accessing their electronic devices and communications, the federal public safety minister says. A federal review of cybersecurity will provide a chance to discuss a proposal from Canada's police chiefs for a new law that would compel people to hand over passwords with a judge's consent, Ralph Goodale said Wednesday. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police says the measure is needed to fight criminals in cyberspace who increasingly use tools to hide their identities and communications. In the United States, there are literally thousands of smartphones and other digital devices "sitting on shelves" because authorities can't get into them, said Terrence Cunningham, a police chief in Massachusetts and president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. "And we know that those devices hold the answers to the questions that we need so that we can hold people accountable and prosecute some of these cases," Cunningham said during the Canadian chiefs' annual conference this week.

Merouane Ghalmi et Daniel Minta Darko (en mortaise) se sont d'abord rendus en Malaisie pour brouiller les cartes. Interceptés à leur retour à Montréal le 2 février 2015, Merouane Ghalmi et Daniel Minta Darko avaient un plan pour rejoindre Ahrar Al-Sham, un regroupement d'organisations islamistes et salafistes lié au Front Al-Nosra, la branche d'AlQaïda en Syrie. Selon les documents de février et mars 2015 qu'a dévoilés la Cour du Québec, Ghalmi et Darko étaient proches de Sami Elabi, du quartier Dollard-des-Ormeaux. Selon la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) et les recherches de notre Bureau d'enquête, ce djihadiste se bat aux côtés du Front Al-Nosra, le bras d'Al-Qaïda en Syrie.

10. Jailed reporter says freedoms under threat

Calgary Sun, Bill Kaufmann, 2016 08 18

Calgary - Other nations are ahead of Canada in helping journalists abused by repressive governments, once-imprisoned reporter Mohamed Fahmy said in Calgary Wednesday. Fahmy, who was jailed for 438 days in Egypt on trumpedup terrorism charges while a reporter for Al Jazeera English, said his experience led him to draft a charter to ensure Ottawa aids journalists detained abroad. "We wrote up a protection charter partnering with Amnesty International and one of the main points was the need for a new law obligating the government to help journalists imprisoned," Fahmy, 42, told a GlobalFest Human Rights Forum audience. "I'm hoping the government will respond." Fahmy said a moreenlightened Trudeau government gives him hope after last fall's electoral defeat of what he called a less-responsive Harper administration. Fahmy was openly critical of what he dubbed the Harper government's lukewarm response to his detention in Egypt that began in 2013 and ended in September of last year.

11. Le Canada accusé de planifier une « invasion »

La Presse+, Jean-Thomas Léveillé, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - Le Canada est en train de « concocter » un plan visant à « renverser les institutions démocratiquement élues du Burundi », accuse le parti au pouvoir à Bujumbura. La récente tournée africaine du ministre canadien de la Défense, Harjit Sajjan, avait pour objectif de préparer « la venue d'une force d'invasion au Burundi », affirme un communiqué publié mardi soir par le Conseil national de défense de la démocratie - Forces pour la défense de la démocratie (CNDD-FDD). La tournée du ministre Sajjan, terminée lundi, avait pour objectif d'évaluer le rôle accru que pourrait jouer le Canada au sein des missions de maintien de la paix des Nations unies (ONU). Accompagné par le lieutenant-général à la retraite Roméo Dallaire ainsi que l'ancienne haute-commissaire des Nations unies aux droits de l'homme Louise Arbour, le ministre Sajjan s'est rendu en Éthiopie, au Kenya et en Ouganda, de même qu'en Tanzanie et en République démocratique du Congo, deux pays voisins du Burundi. Le choix de ces destinations n'est pas « une simple coïncidence », affirme le communiqué signé par le président du CNDD-FDD, Pascal Nyabenda, qui demande aux pays de la région « de rejeter toutes doléances » du Canada concernant le déploiement d'une force onusienne au Burundi ou ailleurs dans la région.

12. Le collège de Maisonneuve se dote d'une équipe anti- radicalisation

Montréal - Les intervenants devront prendre garde de ne pas devenir des informateurs de police, avertit une experte Le collège de Maisonneuve, qui a été aux prises avec l'extrémisme religieux au cours des derniers mois, s'apprête à embaucher cinq professionnels dans l'espoir de désamorcer les idées " radicales " des étudiants. Selon ce que Le Devoir a appris, la direction du collège prépare l'embauche de trois travailleurs de corridor et de deux autres spécialistes de la radicalisation en vue de la rentrée scolaire. Les cours commencent lundi prochain, mais le processus de sélection des cinq professionnels sera terminé dans deux semaines. Ce projet-pilote de 400 000 $ survient après une série de cas de radicalisation d'étudiants du collège. Certains ont tenté d'aller faire la guerre en Syrie pour le groupe armé État islamique, classé comme terroriste par le Canada. Sabrina Djaermame et El-Madhi Jamali, deux anciens élèves du collège de Maisonneuve arrêtés en 2015, font face à la justice pour avoir planifié un attentat à Montréal, en plus d'avoir cherché à aller faire le djihad en Syrie. Des tensions, des bagarres sont aussi survenues entre des groupes du collège au cours des derniers mois. De jeunes musulmans se sentent exclus et stigmatisés. " Les travailleurs de corridor seront sur le terrain pour recueillir la parole des étudiants. Leur défi est de se faire accepter, de gagner la confiance des jeunes pour les aider ", dit Line Légaré, porte-parole du collège de Maisonneuve. En plus des trois travailleurs de corridor, deux autres professionnels seront embauchés pour appuyer les étudiants et le personnel du collège. Ces experts, formés en relations interculturelles ou qui ont un profil de psychologue ou de travailleur social, aideront la communauté du collège à comprendre et à réagir aux idées " radicales ".

13. Lutte contre le terrorisme Des démarches judiciaires amorcées dès 2015

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche, 2016 08 18

Montréal - Transparence dans les cas d'« engagements à garder la paix » Les péripéties de Merouane Ghalmi et Daniel Minta Darko sur la route du djihad ont pu être rendues publiques hier grâce aux démarches judiciaires entamées dès 2015 par La Presse pour faire augmenter la transparence dans les dossiers où des suspects de terrorisme se voient imposer des « engagements à garder la paix » devant un juge sans être accusés d'une infraction criminelle. À plusieurs reprises ces dernières années, les autorités ont invoqué l'article 810.011 du Code criminel qui permet d'arrêter un individu et de le conduire devant un juge pour qu'il s'engage à respecter une série de conditions si les autorités ont des « motifs raisonnables de craindre la possibilité [qu'il] commette une infraction de terrorisme ». C'est ce qui avait été fait dans le cas de Ghalmi et Darko, qui s'étaient notamment engagés à ne pas entrer en contact avec des terroristes et à porter en tout temps un bracelet électronique GPS qui permettait de les suivre à la trace (leurs engagements ont expiré depuis et n'ont pas été renouvelés, si bien qu'ils sont libres comme l'air). Pour justifier cette procédure, la police a rédigé une déclaration assermentée qui décrivait ses craintes en s'appuyant sur ses enquêtes. La déclaration a été montrée à des juges, mais jamais déposée en cour, ce qui rendait sa consultation impossible pour les journalistes et la population en général.

14. Lutte contre le terrorisme Un père remue ciel et terre pour sauver son fils

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche; Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 08 18

Pierrefonds - Le père de Merouane Ghalmi n'a fait ni une ni deux. Lorsqu'il a appris que son fils avait quitté la résidence familiale de Pierrefonds à destination de la Turquie, il s'est arrangé pour le faire arrêter par la police turque. Puis il a sauté lui-même dans un avion pour aller le retrouver dans une geôle anatolienne et le ramener coûte que coûte à la maison. C'était en juillet 2013. À l'époque, Merouane Ghalmi était âgé de 21 ans. Adeptes de sports de combat, il avait commencé à développer une ferveur religieuse intransigeante qui inquiétait ses proches. Il se renseignait sur des groupes islamistes, ne buvait plus, ne sortait plus avec des filles. Surtout, il passait des heures à discuter sur Skype avec Sami Elabi, un autre jeune du quartier qui était l'un des premiers Québécois partis rejoindre des groupes djihadistes en Syrie. Elabi avait invité Merouane Ghalmi à venir le rejoindre. La famille Ghalmi soupçonnait ce qui se passait. Le récit de ses efforts est contenu dans deux déclarations assermentées de la GRC rendues publiques hier à la suite des démarches d'un groupe de médias, dont La Presse. Les documents avaient été présentés à un juge l'an dernier pour justifier l'imposition de conditions qui visaient à garder sous surveillance Ghalmi et un de ses amis, Daniel Minta Darko, en raison de leurs sympathies envers des groupes terroristes.

15. Ottawa veut serrer la vis aux terroristes potentiels

Agence QMI, Guillaume St-Pierre, 2016 08 18

Ottawa - L'incident d'Aaron Driver incite la Sécurité publique à s'intéresser à une douzaine de personnes ciblées Le gouvernement Trudeau souhaite serrer la vis aux terroristes en puissance visés par un engagement à ne pas troubler l'ordre public. Ralph Goodale dit avoir pris des précautions auprès d'une douzaine de personnes. Le ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a reconnu mercredi que l'attentat déjoué de justesse la semaine dernière en Ontario a exposé les failles du système de surveillance actuel. «Cet incident démontre que les ordres de ne pas troubler la paix sont des outils qui ont des capacités limitées», a commenté M. Goodale en marge de la conférence annuelle de l'Association canadienne des chefs de police (ACCP). Le décès du sympathisant du groupe armé État islamique Aaron Driver, tombé sous les balles de la GRC mercredi dernier, accentue le débat au sujet de la sécurité nationale. Selon la GRC, Driver en était rendu à la dernière étape de sa planification pour perpétrer un attentat en sol canadien. L'homme de 24 ans a pu concocter son plan même s'il était soumis à un engagement de ne pas troubler l'ordre public en lien avec du terrorisme depuis 2014.

16. Pas des loups solitaires

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine; Vincent Larouche, 2016 08 18

Montréal - Daniel Darko et Merouane Ghalmi n'étaient pas des loups solitaires. L'enquête de la GRC a révélé des liens directs avec un ancien élève du collège de Maisonneuve parti combattre en Syrie, avec le centre islamique Asshaba d'Adil Charkaoui et avec un Montréalais qui, selon toute apparence, fait du recrutement pour un groupe terroriste en direct de la Syrie. Explications. DARKO ET GHALMI Jusqu'à récemment, les deux jeunes hommes habitaient à moins de deux kilomètres l'un de l'autre, le premier à Dollard-des-Ormeaux, l'autre à Pierrefonds. Ils ont préparé leur voyage ensemble. C'est Ghalmi qui a invité Darko à se joindre à lui. Ils ont tout caché à leur famille. Ils ont quitté le Canada à quelques jours d'intervalle et ont suivi le même itinéraire, prenant un vol vers la Malaisie « pour brouiller les cartes ». De là, ils se sont envolés, ensemble, vers la Turquie, où ils ont été interceptés et renvoyés. SAMI ELABI Il est ce Montréalais parti, bien avant la vague actuelle d'aspirants djihadistes, pour combattre au sein du front Al-Nosra, la branche d'Al-Qaïda en Syrie. Il a grandi dans le même quartier que Ghalmi et Darko. Il a longtemps été actif sur les réseaux sociaux, où il se montrait dans des vidéos et photos, armes à la main. En interrogatoire, Merouane Ghalmi a avoué que c'est Elabi lui-même qui lui avait demandé d'aller le rejoindre. Darko a lui aussi été interrogé par la police au sujet d'Elabi. Il a dit le connaître, mais a refusé de dévoiler la nature de ses conversations avec lui.

17. RCMP feared that restricting would-be radicals would backfire in Canada, affidavits show

Toronto Star, Allan Woods, 2016 08 18

Montreal - As Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale promised to toughen the requirements on terror suspects who are subject to restrictive peace bonds, newly unsealed court documents show police feared one Montreal man could launch an attack in Canada if he were prevented from travelling abroad. The warning from RCMP Cpl. Brenda Makad is contained in a police affidavit used in support of a peace bond application in 2015 against Daniel Minta Darko. "Even though I believe that the desire to leave Canada in order to join the fighting in Syria is Darko's priority, the call to action in the West and the incidents Canada has suffered recently lead me to fear that faced with the impossibility of leaving, Darko would act here," Makad said in the affidavit. The 28-year-old Muslim convert, along with Merouane Ghalmi, 24, travelled halfway around the world to try to "shuffle the cards" and throw authorities off their trail, the police allege in the affidavit. They were intercepted in Turkey and returned to Canada, the affidavit said. In Canada, RCMP officers investigated and interviewed the two men. Individual affidavits of the interviews were then used to obtain peace bonds -- with restrictive conditions -- against both. Among the allegations in the police affidavits: Darko lied to police and Daesh propaganda was found on his cellphone, and Ghalmi enjoyed a close friendship with Canadian jihadist Sami Elabi. The two affidavits were released in a Montreal court Wednesday after a media challenge of the sealing order. The peace bonds against the two men were in effect for 12 months and expired earlier this year, Crown prosecutor Lyne Décarie said in an email to the Star. The problem with peace bonds, said Canadian terrorism researcher Amarnath Amarasingam, is that there are only restrictions--on movement, on communication, on association-- without positive intervention. "There is no followup, no attempt to provide further help and supervision," he said. "We tell them what they can't do and leave it at that."

18. Terrorism near-miss has Liberals looking to toughen peace bonds

Toronto Star, Tondra McCharles, 2016 08 17

Ottawa - The federal Liberal government says it may toughen the law on peace bonds to require terrorist sympathizers to take mandatory de-radicalization counseling. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said the death of Aaron Driver in Strathroy last week, where RCMP sharpshooters believe they pre-empted a planned terror attack, showed the current limitations of peace bonds. "We have recognized for this incident and beyond it that peace bonds have some usefulness but they're not a panacea. They're a tool that has limitations," Goodale told reporters. One option for the federal Liberal government, which is undertaking widespread public consultations on the country's national security laws, is to require individuals subject to a peace bond to meet regularly with de-radicalization experts, he said. However, Goodale acknowledged that there are not many such experts or counselors in Canada and said that is "exactly why" the Liberals are spending $35 million to set up a centre for countering violent extremism, "to have national capacity and national coherence to deal with these very issues." The Liberals promised the centre in last year's campaign "and we were scoffed at," he said. But it is still not up and running. Goodale said any peace bond changes would come as part of a package of changes the government is looking at in its review Canada's national security framework, and C-51, the Conservatives anti-terror law of 2015. He got testy with reporters when pressed about why the Liberals are taking so long. The Liberals promised consultations and reforms in the 2015 election campaign. "You don't develop good law in a panic," he retorted.

Washington - He's a grandfather and longtime Washington suburbanite who now commands a powerful fighting force in northern Africa. He's also a former CIA asset and anti-Islamist warrior who stands in the way of peace in Libya. The United States and its allies can't figure out what to do about Khalifa Hifter, the Libyan general whose refusal to support a fragile unity government has jeopardized hopes for stability in a country plagued by conflict. Since he emerged as an important post-revolution figure in 2014, Western governments have struggled to define an effective policy to deal with Hifter, who has styled himself as an antidote to extremists while building his own power base and shunning the political process brokered by the United Nations. "Hifter is threatening many of the Western-backed initiatives in Libya and the establishment of a recognized political power," said Barak Barfi, a scholar at New America, a Washington think tank. "Hifter doesn't have the strength on the battlefield to deliver on his promises to defeat Islamists, but he can act as a spoiler."

20. AP Sources: Manafort tied to undisclosed foreign lobbying

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 17

Washington - Donald Trump's campaign chairman helped a pro-Russian governing party in Ukraine secretly route at least $2.2 million in payments to two prominent Washington lobbying firms in 2012, and did so in a way that effectively obscured the foreign political party's efforts to influence U.S. policy. The revelation, provided to The Associated Press by people directly knowledgeable about the effort, comes at a time when Trump has faced criticism for his friendly overtures to Russian President Vladimir Putin. It also casts new light on the business practices of campaign chairman Paul Manafort. Under federal law, U.S. lobbyists must declare publicly if they represent foreign leaders or their political parties and provide detailed reports about their actions to the Justice Department. A violation is a felony and can result in up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Manafort and business associate Rick Gates, another top strategist in Trump's campaign, were working in 2012 on behalf of the political party of Ukraine's then-president, Viktor Yanukovich. People with direct knowledge of Gates' work said that, during the period when Gates and Manafort were consultants to the Ukraine president's political party, Gates was also helping steer the advocacy work done by a pro-Yanukovich nonprofit that hired a pair of Washington lobbying firms, Podesta Group Inc. and Mercury LLC.

21. FBI aiding Ukraine probe that revealed Manafort ties

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 08 18

Washington - FBI officials recently formed a partnership with the Ukrainian anti-corruption agency that has uncovered records showing that Donald Trump's campaign chairman, Paul Manafort, was to receive millions of dollars in alleged off-the-books payments. The involvement by the FBI, which has been working "hand in hand" since June with Ukrainian investigators, could heighten potential legal problems for Manafort and draw further scrutiny by U.S. authorities to his extensive political and financial ties to Ukraine. Manafort this week issued a strong denial, saying he never received off-the-books payments and calling the reports "unfounded, silly and nonsensical." Neither he nor his attorney responded to requests for comment. The Ukraine inquiry is examining whether Viktor Yanukovich, the ousted Ukrainian president and leader of a pro-Russian party, looted assets when he fled the country for Moscow in 2014. The anti-corruption investigation discovered a "black ledger" showing $12.7 million in alleged payments to Manafort between 2007 and 2012 from that party, called the Party of Regions.

22. Former NSA Staffers: Rogue Insider Could Be Behind NSA Data Dump

Motherboard (Vice), Lorenzo Franceschi-Bicchierai, Joseph Cox, 2016 08 18

New York - There are a lot of unanswered questions surrounding the shocking dump of a slew of hacking tools used by an NSA-linked group earlier this week. But perhaps the biggest one is: who's behind the leak? Who is behind the mysterious moniker "The Shadow Brokers"? So far, there's no clear evidence pointing in any direction, but given the timing of the leak, and the simple fact that very few would have the capabilities and the motives to hack and shame the NSA publicly, some posited The Shadow Brokers could be Russian. But there's another possibility. An insider could have stolen them directly from the NSA, in a similar fashion to how former NSA contractor Edward Snowden stole an untold number of the spy agency's top secret documents. And this theory is being pushed by someone who claims to be, himself, a former NSA insider. "My colleagues and I are fairly certain that this was no hack, or group for that matter," the former NSA employee told Motherboard. "This 'Shadow Brokers' character is one guy, an insider employee." The source, who asked to remain anonymous, said that it'd be much easier for an insider to obtain the data that The Shadow Brokers put online rather than someone else, even Russia, remotely stealing it. He argued that "naming convention of the file directories, as well as some of the scripts in the dump are only accessible internally," and that "there is no reason" for those files to be on a server someone could hack. He claimed that these sorts of files are on a physically separated network that doesn't touch the internet; an air-gap.

23. Hacked Attack Code Looks Genuine

Wall Street Journal, Robert McMillan, 2016 08 18

New York - Evidence is mounting that a mysterious hacking group claiming to have stolen data from a spying operation linked to the National Security Agency is telling the truth. Security vendor Kaspersky Labs ZAO, which first identified the NSA-linked operation last year, said files released in the latest hack use an unusual mathematical approach it had seen in that operation's code. Kaspersky dubbed the operation the Equation Group, and said it appeared to be supporting U.S. interests in cyberspace. The new files were released last weekend by a hacking group calling itself the Shadow Brokers, which claims to have a bigger cache of files it is offering to sell. They appear to be attack code that targets security software on routers that direct computer traffic around the internet. "This code similarity makes us believe with a high degree of confidence that the tools from the Shadow Brokers leak are related to the malware from the Equation Group," Kaspersky said in a blog post. Two former NSA employees said the code published by the Shadow Brokers looked authentic.

24. Iran Cash Held Until Prisoner Release

Washington - New details of the $400 million U.S. payment to Iran earlier this year depict a tightly scripted exchange specifically timed to the release of several American prisoners held in Iran. The picture emerged from accounts of U.S. officials and others briefed on the operation: U.S. officials wouldn't let Iranians take control of the money until a Swiss Air Force plane carrying three freed Americans departed from Tehran on Jan. 17. Once that happened, an Iranian cargo plane was allowed to bring the cash home from a Geneva airport that day. President Barack Obama and other U.S. officials have said the payment didn't amount to ransom, because the U.S. owed the money to Iran as part of a longstanding dispute linked to a failed arms deal from the 1970s. U.S. officials have said that the prisoner release and cash transfer took place through two separate diplomatic channels. But the handling of the payment and its connection to the Americans' release have raised questions among lawmakers and administration critics.

The Hill, Jesse Byrnes, 2016 08 17

Washington - Independent presidential candidate and former CIA operative Evan McMullin on Wednesday argued that Donald Trump shouldn't get security briefings as the GOP presidential nominee. "If there's anyone that shouldn't be trusted with regard to intelligence it's Donald Trump, both in the literal sense and with regard to our intelligence services," McMullin said on CNN's "The Lead" Wednesday. "He shouldn't have access to these briefings," continued McMullin, who served for 11 years at the CIA, noting the briefings involve highly sensitive material. "Hopefully we're not sharing everything we could be with him," he added. McMullin said Trump wouldn't be able to get a security clearance if applying for a "low-level job at the CIA" because he has been "co-opted by Vladimir Putin."

26. NSA's use of software flaws to hack foreign targets posed risks to cybersecurity

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, Andrea Peterson, 2016 08 18

Washington - To penetrate the computers of foreign targets, the National Security Agency relies on software flaws that have gone undetected in the pipes of the Internet. For years, security experts have pressed the agency to disclose these bugs so they can be fixed, but the agency hackers have often been reluctant. Now with the mysterious release of a cache of NSA hacking tools over the weekend, the agency has lost an offensive advantage, experts say, and potentially placed at risk the security of countless large companies and government agencies worldwide. Several of the tools exploited flaws in commercial firewalls that remain unpatched, and they are out on the Internet for all to see. Anyone from a basement hacker to a sophisticated foreign spy agency has access to them now, and until the flaws are fixed, many computer systems may be in jeopardy. The revelation of the NSA cache, which dates to 2013 and has not been confirmed by the agency, also highlights the administration's little-known process for figuring out which software errors to disclose and which to keep secret. The hacker tools' release "demonstrates the key risk of the U.S. government stockpiling computer vulnerabilities for its own use: Someone else might get a hold of them and use them against us," said Kevin Bankston, director of New America's Open Technology Institute. "This is exactly why it should be U.S. government policy to disclose to software vendors the vulnerabilities it buys or discovers as soon as possible, so we can all better protect our own cybersecurity."

27. NSA website recovers from outage amid intrigue

Politico, Eric Geller, 2016 08 17

Washington - The National Security Agency's website was offline for almost a full day until Tuesday evening, in an unexplained outage that began shortly after hackers claimed to have stolen a collection of the agency's prized cyber weapons. It's unknown if the two events are connected. POLITICO first noticed that the agency's website wasn't working at 10:54 p.m. Monday. It came back online around 5 p.m. Tuesday. The outage began a few hours after a mysterious group called the Shadow Brokers claimed to have stolen cyber weapons from the Equation Group, a sophisticated hacking group suspected of being linked to the NSA. Some cybersecurity experts, as well as fugitive NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden, suggested that the alleged thefts may be connected to the uproar over suspected Russian cyber spying on the Democratic Party -- but no information has surfaced to link the two, or to connect the alleged thefts with the NSA website outage. During the outage, the NSA homepage itself was accessible, but all links on the page led to "Service Unavailable" error pages, except for blog posts listed under the "What's New" section. (Those may be hosted on another server.) An unnamed source told FedScoop that the outage was due to an ongoing "internal review."

28. Nuclear 'spy' claims FBI tricked him into confession

London Times, Robin Pagnamenta, Boer Deng, 2016 08 18

London - An engineer accused of stealing American nuclear secrets for a company owned by the Chinese state that is investing in Hinkley Point has accused the FBI of tricking him into making incriminating statements. Szuhsiung "Allen" Ho, an American citizen born in Taiwan, was arrested in Atlanta in April and accused of spying. He is now in prison awaiting a decision on a $1 million bail hearing. The US Justice Department has accused him of threatening US security by attempting to recruit American nuclear experts for the Chinese government. He denies the charges. Dr Ho, 66, was working for China General Nuclear Power Corp, a partner in the Hinkley Point nuclear power station in Somerset. He is also accused of conspiring to produce plutonium for the Chinese government. If found guilty, he could face life in prison and a $250,000 fine. Peter Zeidenberg, Dr Ho's lawyer, said at a bail hearing on Tuesday in Knoxville, Tennessee, that his client was tricked into answering questions without legal representation.

29. The Shadow Brokers Mess Is What Happens When the NSA Hoards Zero- Days

Wired, Andy Greenberg, 2016 08 18

New York - When the NSA discovers a new method of hacking into a piece of software or hardware, it faces a dilemma. Report the security flaw it exploits to the product's manufacturer so it gets fixed, or keep that vulnerability secret--what's known in the security industry as a "zero day"- -and use it to hack its targets, gathering valuable intelligence. Now a case of data apparently stolen from an NSA hacking team seems to show the risks that result when the agency chooses offense over defense: Its secret hacking tools can fall into unknown hands. On Wednesday, networking equipment firms Cisco and Fortinet warned customers about vulnerabilities revealed in data posted to the web days earlier by an anonymous group calling itself Shadow Brokers. The group claimed it obtained the data by hacking of an elite espionage team known as Equation Group and linked to the NSA. Shadow Brokers described its haul as a cache of encrypted "cyberweapons" that it would auction to the highest bidder. The data dump also contained an unencrypted sample with 300 megabytes of information including hacking software--known as "exploits"--designed to target networking appliances from Cisco, Fortinet, Juniper and TopSec.¹ Based on Fortinet and Cisco's urgent warnings in response to the exploits' leak, it appears that some of those exploits had in fact been secret zero-day flaws. That raises the likelihood that the data was in fact stolen from NSA hackers--a view increasingly held by security experts analyzing the data. More broadly, it also raises new questions about the NSA practice of keeping zero days secret rather than reporting them to affected companies. "There's always that delicate balance: how do they accomplish their mission, hack their adversaries, and still protect the rest of us?" asks Jeremiah Grossman, a prolific web security researcher and chief of security strategy at the firm SentinelOne. "The longer you haven't reported it, the higher the likelihood it will eventually leak."

30. Trump makes intel community queasy

Politico, Nahal Toosi, 2016 08 17

Washington - Just ahead of his first classified briefing, Donald Trump said he didn't trust the work of America's intelligence agencies. Well, they don't exactly trust him either. Interviews over the past several months with current and former intelligence officials and intelligence experts revealed significant trepidation about the notion of a Trump presidency -- an uneasiness that the Republican nominee's latest comments are likely to exacerbate. Several sources cited Trump's unpredictability, his harsh rhetoric about Muslims, his vocal support for torture and his suggestions that he'd go after terror suspects' families as causes of concern, even among the most hawkish elements of the intelligence world. "The wholesale slaughter of families of terrorists -- it is understood as a war crime," an Army intelligence officer told POLITICO. "You can see how emotionally it might seem like a satisfying" thing to say, "but no matter how much you might wait to raze and salt the earth ... people understand the right versus wrong component of it." A terrorism expert at a D.C. think tank described the mood about a possible President Trump in the intelligence community as "fearful."

31. US Intelligence Assessments Fully Corrupted by Wish to Please Boss (Canada)

Sputnik (Russia), Staff report, 2016 08 18

Washington - The entire US intelligence assessment apparatus has been undermined by a pervasive culture of providing the country's military and political leaders with false and misleading conclusions that they want to hear, retired Canadian diplomat Patrick Armstrong told Sputnik. US Central Command (CENTCOM) is investigating a US House of Representatives Joint Task Force report that alleges the command manipulated intelligence on the fight against the Daesh terrorist group, CENTCOM spokesperson Kyle Raines told Sputnik on August 11. "The entire government structure in the United States has been completely corrupted, over time but especially during the Obama administration," Armstrong, a specialist on the Soviet Union and Russia who previously served as political counsellor in the Canadian Embassy in Moscow, said on Wednesday. The investigation has aroused concern among senior US political figures. Last week, US Senator Kelly Ayotte said that CENTCOM officials must be held accountable for manipulating intelligence about the coalition's efforts to defeat and destroy the Islamic State. Armstrong said CENTCOM's misleadingly optimistic assessments about the success of the US strategy were expressions of an intelligence culture that ignored and harshly punished dissidents and honest, independent assessments.

33. Cautious support for spying reforms

New Zealand Herald, Isaac Davison, 2016 08 18

Auckland--The Human Rights Commission has given cautious support to the Government's spying reforms. However, the human rights watchdog says it is concerned about the broad definition of national security in the legislation, which will come before Parliament tomorrow. Chief commissioner David Rutherford said today that the proposed changes to laws governing the Security Intelligence Service (SIS) and the Government Communication Security Bureau (GCSB) addressed concerns the commission had previously raised about the agencies. These concerns included stronger authorisation for spying warrants, greater oversight of the agencies, and strengthened requirements regarding compliance with human rights law. Rutherford said the proposed changes were "a significant improvement" but there were aspects of the bill which were still a concern. "Chief among these is the definition of national security," he said.

34. National Security must come firm in any China deal

The Australian, Greg Sheridan, 2016 08 18

Column: The Turnbull government made exactly the right decision in rejecting proposed Chinese bids for majority ownership of the NSW poles and wires company Ausgrid, and it did so in substantially the right way. There is no reputational damage to Australia in this at all. Most, not all, of the criticism of both the decision and the process has been wildly overblown and demonstrates a lack of understanding of the national security issues involved or the reality of Chinese foreign investments and strategic policy. There are three positions open to a government. Either the Chinese can invest in any Australian infrastructure, in which case our national security would be hopelessly compromised. Or they can invest in no Australian infrastructure. This would be a very controversial and discriminatory policy, hard to justify and cost some otherwise welcome investment. Or there is reality, that difficult and sensitive cases must be exhaustively evaluated case by case. The Ausgrid rejection by Scott Morrison was on national security grounds. This was the unanimous recommendation of every relevant national security agency and the unanimous view of every member of the Foreign Investment Review Board. Calls for greater transparency are utterly ridiculous. Name the nation that publishes the most sensitive vulnerabilities and secrets of its critical national infrastructure.

The Australian, Annabel Hepworth and Andrew White, 2016 08 18

Sydney--Ausgrid, the NSW electricity network operator at the centre of a surprise foreign investment rejection on national security grounds, is carrying cables on behalf of the National Broadband Network, as well as leasing its own cables to telecoms operators. After bids from State Grid Corp of China and Cheung Kong Infrastructure were rejected by Scott Morrison last week on national security grounds, the NBN confirmed that it used Ausgrid towers carrying power lines to run cables as part of its network in NSW. The NBN was the centre of an earlier row over national security when Chinese equipment manufacturer Huawei was blocked from supplying the multi-billion-dollar network being built by the federal government. The Treasurer has declined to explain the national security concerns over the Ausgrid bidders, throwing the bids into chaos ahead of a Friday deadline for the bidders to respond and try to keep their bids alive.

36. Preachers guilty of recruiting for IS (Canada)

Sydney Morning Herald, Nick Miller, 2016 08 18

London--Two radical British preachers convicted of inciting support for Islamic State had been in contact with a Blackburn teenager who plotted an attack on a Melbourne Anzac Day parade last year, Fairfax can reveal. The preachers were part of a wider network of radicals who at the time were focused on recruitment of vulnerable, impressionable youths, and indoctrinating them in hatred of the West and loyalty to IS. Anjem Choudary, 49, and Mohammed Mizanur Rahman, 33, were found guilty of encouraging support for a terrorist organisation at the Old Bailey on July 28, with reporting restrictions on the convictions lifted on Tuesday. "Choudary and Rahman are believed to have been recruiters and radicalisers for over 20 years," the Metropolitan Police said. A psychologist, Dr Tim Diggie, said the teen's online contact with IS sympathisers had the effect of "normalising extremist views justifying violent behaviour". The boy had also been in contact with Aaron Driver - a Canadian, 24, who died last week in Ontario after a confrontation with police in which he was shot. Driver had made a martyrdom video.

The former US assistant secretary of state for South Asia was among half a dozen American scholars - - and a Pakistani journalist -- who analysed the current political situation in Pakistan at a recent seminar in Washington. The speakers highlighted different weaknesses and strengths in the current political set-up and its relations with the country's powerful military establishment. All agreed that the military would retain its 'dominating influence' over the civilian set-up but would not bring it down. "The military does not want snap elections," said Ms Raphel, a respected Pakistan sympathiser in Washington who recently faced an FBI investigation for her alleged friendly relations with Pakistani diplomats. Pékin - L'envoi réussi d'un satellite " quantique " permettra à Pékin de tester une technologie destinée à un usage commercial et militaire La Chine a pris une longueur d'avance dans la maîtrise des technologies de cryptage en lançant, mardi 16 août, un satellite de communication quantique. Pékin se démarque ainsi en mettant à l'essai, au niveau spatial, une technique de transmission de clés d'encodage réputée inviolable, fondée sur les lois de la physique quantique. Le projet est suivi de près par les physiciens mais aussi par les militaires. Une fusée Longue Marche 2-D tirée mardi à 1 h 40 de la base de Jiuquan, dans le désert de Gobi, a placé en orbite un satellite d'expérimentation quantique à échelle spatiale (Quess, selon l'acronyme anglais). Egalement surnommé Mozi, du nom du philosophe et scientifique chinois du Ve siècle avant J.-C., il permettra, sur une mission de deux ans, de tester l'envoi de clés hypersécurisées. " De tels moyens en disent long sur les ambitions de la Chine. Elle n'hésite pas à investir des sommes colossales dans ces recherches ", commente Hoi Kwong Lo, chercheur en cryptographie quantique à l'université de Toronto (Canada). La recherche quantique est l'une des priorités du treizième plan quinquennal, feuille de route présentée en mars et qui guidera l'économie chinoise jusqu'à la fin 2020.

49. N.K. diplomat defector, wife from highly privileged families: source

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 08 18

Seoul--A top North Korean diplomat and his wife who defected to South Korea come from privileged backgrounds as they are descendants of prominent guerrillas who fought against Japanese colonialists in the 1930s, a source familiar with the matter said Thursday. Thae Yong-ho, who served as minister at North Korea's embassy in London, is believed to be the son of late four-star general Thae Pyong-ryol who actively took part in the anti- Japanese campaign, led by North Korea's late founder Kim Il-sung, according to the source. The North's diplomat Thae, his wife and children have recently defected to South Korea, making him one of the highest-level North Koreans to desert the repressive regime, South Korea's unification ministry said Wednesday. As minister, he was the No. 2 man at the diplomatic mission there. "A North Korean diplomat usually works in overseas missions for three years, but Thae had worked in London for 10 years, mainly because of his good family ties," the source said.

50. N.K. leader orders tighter surveillance to prevent defection: source

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 08 18

Seoul--North Korean leader Kim Jong-un has sent security agents overseas to monitor government officials and business personnel following the high-profile defection of a senior diplomat, a source familiar with the regime said Thursday. The leader has also ordered the execution of those who failed to prevent the recent defections, claimed the source, who declined to be identified, adding anti-aircraft machine guns were used to kill the condemned. He said Kim has ordered North Korean diplomatic missions and overseas restaurants to root out even the slightest chance of people leaving their posts without permission. "Kim has threatened an immediate pullout of overseas business operations that fail to perform," the source said, adding that he has ordered tighter crackdowns on North Koreans watching smuggled DVDs of South Korean dramas and other programs.

51. NK diplomat's defection blow to Kim regime

Korea Herald, 2016 08 18

Seoul--A high-ranking North Korean diplomat's recent defection to the South is expected to have a substantial impact on the Kim Jong-un leadership, but local experts said it may be a stretch to see it as an omen of Pyongyang's downfall. Seoul's Unification Ministry on Wednesday announced Thae Yong-ho, a minister based in London, has come to South Korea with his family and is under protection. Thae's defection is the latest in the recent string of defections by the North's elite group. The North Korean Embassy in London where Thae Yong-ho had worked (Yonhap)Local media, citing sources, has reported that Thae and his wife are both descendants of guerillas who fought against Japanese colonialists in the 1930s, which would make them members of highly-privileged families. According to the source, Thae's family ties had allowed him to work in overseas missions for 10 years, instead of the conventional three. Experts say Thae's defection is likely to have a significant impact on Kim's regime, as sources have said that the young leader has "become enraged" and has ordered families of overseas officials to return to North Korea. Thae Yong-ho during an interview in 2004 (Yonhap)Kim Yong-hyun, a professor of North Korean studies at Seoul's Dongguk University, said that the regime's unstable nature may have contributed in some part to the defection, along with recent sanctions. "(The impact) is mostly psychological. The very fact that a high-ranking diplomat has defected deals a blow to the Kim regime, which is barely hanging on amid international sanctions and pressure," He said.

52. North Korean Diplomat, Who Embraced London, Defects

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, Rick Gladstone, 2016 08 18

Seoul - He enjoyed a bit of tennis at the local club. He indulged in curry at an Indian restaurant in the west London neighborhood where he lived. As the No. 2 North Korean diplomat in Britain, he chaperoned a brother of his country's reclusive leader to an Eric Clapton concert last year. The diplomat, Thae Yong-ho, 55, seemed to embrace the trappings of a comfortable life in a capitalist capital thousands of miles from dreary North Korea, never hinting at disloyalty. He had lived in London for a decade, trusted because of his family's impeccable legacy in North Korean history. So it was a shock on Wednesday when South Korea announced that Mr. Thae had betrayed his hermetic homeland by becoming the most senior North Korean official to defect in nearly two decades. How and when the diplomat had eluded his colleagues at the North Korean Embassy, who are required to monitor one another to thwart treason, was not clear. But a South Korean government spokesman, Jeong Joon-hee, said at a news conference that the diplomat had arrived recently in South Korea with his wife and family, proclaiming disillusionment with the increasingly isolated government of the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-un. Mr. Jeong did not specify how many family members had accompanied Mr. Thae or whether any remained in North Korea, where they could be at risk of reprisal. Nor did he explain the route taken by Mr. Thae, second in rank to Ambassador Hyon Hak-bong in London.

53. Sayyaf threatens to behead hostage; Indonesian escapes (Canada).

Manila Times, Al Jacinto, 2016 08 18

Zamboanga City - Suspected Abu Sayyaf militants have threatened to behead a young Filipino man they had kidnapped in the southern province of Sulu if their ransom demand is not paid. This developed as an Indonesian tugboat crew member who was set for execution by the Abu Sayyaf escaped Wednesday and was rescued by villagers in a coastal town in Sulu. The militants are demanding P1 million in exchange for the life of Patrick James Almodovar, who is in his early 20s, or they will kill him on August 24. In a video clip released by the Abu Sayyaf, Almodovar appealed to the government to save his life and pay the ransom. Speaking in the Tausug dialect, he begged Governor Totoh Tan and Jolo Mayor Kerkar Tan to pay the Abu Sayyaf despite the strict no-ransom policy of the government. The militant group has beheaded a Malaysian man and two Canadian hostages in Sulu after their family failed to pay ransom money.

Ba'asyir, the spiritual leader of Islamic organization Jamaah Ansharut Tauhid (JAT), was sentenced to 15 years in prison in 2011 after the South Jakarta District Court declared him guilty of funding a military training camp for a terrorist group in Aceh.

55. Cyberespionnage Un oeil pour les espionner tous

L'Humanité, Pierric Marissal, 2016 08 18

Moscou - Sauron, l'outil de cyberespionnage le plus ingénieux jamais conçu, est actif depuis juin 2011. Son existence vient d'être mise au jour. Le 30 juillet dernier, le FSB, le service de renseignements de Moscou, a reconnu que pas moins de vingt systèmes informatiques gouvernementaux, militaires et scientifiques russes ont été infiltrés par un cyberespion. Ce programme dont les spécificités ont été publiées mardi dernier est nommé comme le méchant du Seigneur des anneaux, représenté par un menaçant oeil cerclé de flammes : Sauron. Parfaitement camouflé, cet espion a pu se fondre pendant des années - les premières infections découvertes datent de l'été 2011 - au coeur des réseaux les plus stratégiques. Sauron a espionné aussi en Iran et au Rwanda, au sein d'une ambassade à Bruxelles. Touchées aussi, des entreprises de télécommunication et une compagnie aérienne chinoise. « Et on n'a découvert que le sommet de l'iceberg », reconnaissent dans leur rapport les chercheurs de la société de sécurité informatique russe Kaspersky. Lorsque le cyberespion s'est niché, il se développe et crée son propre écosystème camouflé « On était vraiment très excités », raconte à l'Humanité Orla Cox, qui dirige le département de recherche en sécurité de Symantec, entreprise qui a débusqué le programme chez l'un de ses clients stratégiques, en octobre dernier. « Ces découvertes-là, on en fait à peine une fois par an. »

Fars News Agency, 2016 08 18

Tehran - Spokesman of Iran's Supreme National Security Council (SNSC) Keivan Khosravi underlined anti-terrorism cooperation among Tehran, Damascus and Moscow, adding that they will use all their capacities to this end. "Cooperation among Iran, Russia, Syria and the resistance front against the Takfiri terrorist stream has been underway for some time and continues growingly," Khosravi said on Tuesday. Noting that the three countries' high- ranking political, security and military officials have held several meetings to increase cooperation within the framework of their common interests, he said, "The military intelligence, commandship, training and territorial capacities of the member states have been devoted to this cooperation." Khosravi added that given the progress and victories gained in the battle field of war against the terrorist groups, decisions are made to exchange the aforementioned capacities.

57. Analysts expect escalation in Yemen violence

Gulf News, Jumana Al Tamimi, 2016 08 18

Dubai - Iran-backed Al Houthi militias and forces loyal to former president Ali Abdullah Saleh used peace talks in Kuwait to regroup themselves and prepare for more fierce battles in Yemen, analysts have said. While the internationally-recognised Yemeni government of Abd Rabbo Mansour Hadi offered some concession during the talks, Al Houthis and their allies refrained from showing any intention to reach a peaceful settlement, analysts added. "When Al Houthis went to the talks, they had in mind of buying time and distracting the international community and the Arab coalition in their efforts to find a serious solution," said Fadel Al Rubei, a Yemeni political analyst based in Aden. "When Al Houthis went to the talks, they were planning to regroup themselves and reinforce their positions on the ground," he added to Gulf News. The Kuwait talks, which started in April with the aim of finding a peaceful end to the Yemeni civil war, broke down on July 7.

58. How the Islamic State Seized a Chemical Weapons Stockpile

Foreign Policy, Harald Doornbos, Jenan Moussa, 2016 08 17

Washington - Abu Ahmed told us how the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIS) came to acquire some of the world's most fearsome weapons, which were claimed as spoils of war from Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's forces months before its creation. Roughly four months before the split between the Nusra Front and ISIS, in December 2012, dozens of Syrian jihadi fighters climbed a hill toward Regiment 111 -- a large army base near the town of Darat Izza, in northern Syria. That town had been taken roughly five months earlier by a coalition of rebel groups. But while they had besieged Regiment 111 since the summer of 2012, they still had not succeeded in capturing the base from the troops loyal to President Assad. The weather had turned bad in winter, however, making it more difficult for the Syrian Air Force to hold off the rebels with airstrikes. Moreover, the base was huge, sprawling over almost 500 acres, and difficult to protect from all approaches. Syrian Army soldiers inside Regiment 111 successfully defended their base during the first rebel attack in early November 2012, killing 18 Nusra fighters in the process. But the cold December wind only fortified the rebels' resolve. The base was a goldmine: home to guns, artillery, ammunition, and vehicles. And deep inside Regiment 111's bunkers lay something even more valuable -- a cache of chemical weapons.

59. Liberation of Sana'a Continues, Russia Rejects 'Political Council'

Asharq Al-Awsat, Arafat Madabish and Abdul Hadi Habtoor, 2016 08 18

Aden, Riyadh - Yemen's Vice President and Army Deputy Chief Commander, Lieutenant General Ali Mohsen Al Ahmar, is finalizing the battle to liberate the capital Sana'a within the framework of a military operation that was launched last week. Well-informed sources said that Ahmar was mobilizing tribes located around the capital to fight with the national army. The sources also said that the Yemeni vice president has held important meetings and (secret) talks with security and military leaders, as well as tribal sheikhs and political leaders from the General People's Congress, who were supporting the rebels in Sana'a and Omran. The sources, however, declined to reveal the names of those who have recently joined the legitimate forces. In the same context, Chargé d'Affaires of the Russian Embassy in Yemen Oleg Dremov rejected recent media reports that Russia could officially announce its support to the rebels' political council.

60. Russia defies U.S. with second day of strikes

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 08 18

Moscow/Beirut - Russia launched a second day of airstrikes against Syrian militants from an Iranian air base, rejecting U.S. suggestions its cooperation with Tehran might violate a U.N. resolution as illogical and factually incorrect. State Department spokesman Mark Toner Tuesday called the Iranian deployment "unfortunate," saying the United States was looking into whether the move violated U.N. Security Council Resolution 2231, which prohibits the supply, sale and transfer of combat aircraft to Iran. Russia bristled at those comments Wednesday after announcing that Russian SU-34 fighter bombers flying from Iran's Hamadan air base had for a second day struck Daesh (ISIS) targets in Syria's Deir al-Zor province, destroying two command posts and killing more than 150 militants. "It's not our practice to give advice to the leadership of the U.S. State Department," Maj. Gen. Igor Konashenkov said in a statement.

61. U.S. Military and Lebanese Army Conclude Joint Military Exercise

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 08 18

Beirut - The Lebanese Army and the United States armed forces concluded an annual bilateral military exercise Wednesday, the U.S. Embassy in Beirut said. The nine-day combined exercise, dubbed "Resolute Response 2016," began on Aug. 8, at the Jounieh Naval Base and included land and sea drills, the U.S. Embassy statement said. The U.S. Navy, U.S. Coast Guard, U.S. Army and the Lebanese Army completed activities that included explosives disposal, diving exercises, and maritime board, search, and seizure procedures, it added. Resolute Response is one of more than 60 military exercises U.S. Central Command conducts with its partner nations each year. This particular exercise was part of a routine theater security cooperation engagement plan, with the primary focus of reassuring regional nations of the United States' commitment to security and stability, the embassy said. It also provided an opportunity for the U.S. Military to train their Lebanese counterparts.

62. UN experts: Extremists foiling governments with encryption

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 18

The United Nations - Increasing numbers of foreign fighters for the Islamic State group and al-Qaida are returning home, potentially to carry out attacks, and are using the "dark web" or encrypted messaging that the most sophisticated intelligence agencies can't penetrate, U.N. experts said in a report circulated Wednesday. The experts monitoring sanctions against the extremist groups said governments highlighted the challenge to national security from the communication methods being used by these "foreign terrorist fighters" and people being radicalized at home who need to be monitored and investigated. They said the rise in the use of the "dark web" -- a collection of thousands of websites which use tools to maintain anonymity -- and especially encrypted messaging "has closed off the ability of even the most sophisticated agencies to penetrate huge quantities of messages." The result, the experts said, is that governments are "potentially losing much of their previous technological advantage over terror groups."

63. 2 Car Bombs in Eastern Turkey Kill 6, Wound at Least 219

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 18

Ankara - Two car bombings targeted police stations in Turkey, killing at least six people and wounding 219 others, officials said Thursday. A car bombing attack on a police station in the eastern province of Van late Wednesday killed a police officer and two civilians. At least 73 other people -- 53 civilians and 20 police officers -- were wounded, officials said. Authorities blamed that attack on the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, which has launched a campaign of car bombings targeting police stations or roadside bomb attacks on police vehicles. Last week, PKK commander Cemil Bayik threatened increased attacks against police in Turkish cities. Hours later, another car bombing hit police headquarters in the eastern Turkish city of Elazig early Thursday, killing at least three police office officers and wounding 146 other people, Gov. Murat Zorluoglu said. At least 14 of them were in serious condition. Mahmut Varol, the deputy mayor for Elazig, told Haber Turk television that the explosion occurred on the grounds of the police headquarters and caused cars parked nearby to catch fire.

64. A window on key target of 'witch hunt' in Turkey

Los Angeles Times, Umar Farooq, 2016 08 18

Unidentified placeline - For much of the last month, in squares across Turkey, hundreds of thousands gathered for a "democracy watch" -- part celebration of the failure of a coup attempt that killed hundreds, and part an expression of determination to find and punish those responsible. But not everyone poured into the streets. "It's right to be proud of what is achieved against the failed coup and traitors," said Orhan, a middle-aged teacher from Istanbul who asked that his full name not be used for his safety. "But on the other hand, a witch hunt started, and looking at my friends now I feel like a Jew under Hitler's rule." Orhan belongs to Hizmet, a movement of millions of Turks inspired by the teachings of Fethullah Gulen, a 75-year-old cleric living in exile in Pennsylvania. Although Gulen's public teachings center on a moderate form of Sufi Islam, his critics say he is the head of a cult that has masked a plan to infiltrate much of Turkey's government and military infrastructure. The Turkish government this month formally asked the U.S. to arrest and extradite Gulen, alleging he used followers in the military to engineer an uprising that threatened to plunge the country back into the cycle of military intervention that has beset the nation since 1960.

65. German Who Plotted to Bomb U.S. Targets in Europe Gets Out of Prison Early

New York Times, Sewell Chan, 2016 08 18

Berlin - A German man who trained in Pakistan with an offshoot of Al Qaeda and confessed in 2009 to plotting to bomb American targets in Germany was released from prison this week. The decision to grant early release to the leader of the plot, Fritz Gelowicz, comes as the country grapples with the aftershocks of two recent attacks in Bavaria by people claiming loyalty to the Islamic State. Mr. Gelowicz, 36, was sentenced in 2010 to 12 years in prison. Counting time served before his sentencing, he had been in prison for nearly nine years and was eligible for early release based on good behavior and because he was no longer deemed to be a danger, according to Andreas Vitek, a spokesman for the Düsseldorf Higher Regional Court. Mr. Gelowicz will have to report regularly to a probation officer. The court in Düsseldorf released Mr. Gelowicz on Monday, but the decision did not receive widespread attention until Wednesday, after his defense lawyer, Dirk Uden, wrote about it on his website.

66. L'inquiétant retour des jihadistes de Syrie

La Dépêche du Midi (Toulouse), Journaliste maison, 2016 08 18

Paris - Avec l'effondrement progressif du califat instauré par l'État Islamique (EI), une problématique épineuse émerge sur les radars des différents acteurs politiques et sécuritaires : celle du retour au pays des Français engagés dans les rangs de l'organisation terroriste. D'autant que l'Hexagone avance le contingent de combattants le plus fourni d'Europe avec 645 adultes présents en Syrie et en Irak dont 245 femmes, selon les chiffres de Patrick Calvar, patron de la DGSI. « Pour assurer notre sécurité, nous devons nous occuper des vétérans. Il ne faudra pas perdre de vue que parmi eux, il y aura des terroristes très aguerris mais aussi des gens relevant d'ores et déjà de la psychiatrie et dont nous ne savons pas ce qu'ils vont devenir », avait pointé le patron du renseignement lors de la présentation de son rapport le 24 mai devant le Parlement, rappelant au passage que « le phénomène des vétérans d'Afghanistan avait donné le GIA en Algérie et les attentats de 1995 en France ». Des vétérans capables de passer à l'acte à l'instar Abdelhamid Abaaoud, l'un des cerveaux des attentats du 13 novembre, exemple le plus éloquent de terroriste ayant mis à profit son « expérience » militaire pour frapper sur le sol national. Mais les Français ne seront pas les seuls dangers potentiels à la fin de la guerre. « Beaucoup de Tunisiens, un peu moins de Marocains et d'Algériens » présents en Syrie « ont la capacité de venir très facilement sur notre territoire et la plupart sont francophones », a prévenu M. Calvar.

Marseille - Vivant en foyer à Marseille, il allait sur les sites jihadistes depuis L'Alcazar II s'appelle Jean-Claude Caldora. Il a 29 ans et, il y a quelques jours, il a été écroué par le tribunal correctionnel de Marseille qui a posé sur son "cas" un regard empreint de gravité. Quelques jours plus tôt, la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) avait signalé cet individu au parquet de Marseille en le désignant comme "un islamiste radical " consultant régulièrement les sites djihadistes faisant l'apologie du terrorisme ou incitant à la commission de tels actes. Jean-Claude Caldora était domicilié au foyer d'accueil Saint-Jean-de-Dieu de la rue de Forbin (2e) et fréquentait régulièrement la bibliothèque municipale de l'Alcazar, tout près de la Canebière (1er). L'enquête a permis d'établir qu'il s'intéressait essentiellement aux sites d'information sur le conflit en Syrie et en Irak, à des sites d'achats de vêtements et d'accessoires islamistes. Il aurait notamment fréquenté un site reprenant une publication de Alhayat, la société de médias de l'État islamiste, consacrée à la haine envers les Occidentaux et les juifs.

1. Parole Board extends day parole for Saad Gaya, member of Toronto 18

Canadian Press, Diana Mehta, 2016 08 31

Toronto - A man who pleaded guilty to participating in a plot to bomb targets in Toronto has had his day parole extended as the Parole Board of Canada found he has made a "strong beginning" to his period of conditional release. In January, Saad Gaya was initially granted six months of day parole, with special conditions that included avoiding contact with those involved in criminal activity and a requirement to participate in religious counselling to deal with religious extremism. The board has since reviewed his case and decided to extend his day parole up until his statutory release date, which a spokeswoman said is in January 2017. Gaya, now 28, was one of the so-called Toronto 18 – a group of men and youths who were accused of plotting to bomb targets in Ontario that included the Toronto Stock Exchange, CSIS headquarters and a military base, all in protest of Canada's military involvement in Afghanistan. Eleven were ultimately convicted of terrorist offences. Gaya, a former science student at Hamilton's McMaster University, was arrested in 2006 while unloading a delivery truck filled with three tonnes of bags marked ammonium nitrate fertilizer. He was originally sentenced in 2010 to 12 years in prison, and an appeal court increased that to 18 years.

2. Bangladesh terrorism suspect had Alberta ties, sources say

Edmonton Journal, Yolande Cole, 2016 08 30

Calgary - A Canadian accused of masterminding a deadly attack in Bangladesh last month is the latest person with ties to Calgary and extremist groups overseas. Bangladeshi police say Tamim Chowdhury was behind an attack at a Dhaka restaurant on July 1 that left more than 20 people dead. Chowdhury was one of three suspects killed by police near the Bangladesh capital over the weekend. Sources say the man spent time in Calgary and was spotted at a local prayer centre with Damian Clairmont, who died fighting alongside terrorist groups in Syria in April 2012. Clairmont's mother, Christianne Boudreau, said she felt sick to her stomach when she heard about the Dhaka attack. Reached in France, Boudreau said she had learned through George Washington University researcher Amarnath Amarasingam that Chowdhury apparently had ties to the same Calgary prayer group that her son had been a part of before going to Syria.

3. Bring Homa home

Globe and Mail, 2016 08 31

Editorial: Homa Hoodfar, an anthropology professor at Concordia University, is being treated abominably as a pawn in Iranian politics. At this rate, she may well die from illness in a notoriously horrendous prison without having been charged or convicted of any crime. Prof. Hoodfar is a triple citizen of Canada, Iran and Ireland. She has travelled back and forth to Iran, and she appears to have had a considerably more benign view of the social and political order in Iran than most Canadians do. She has extensively studied the culture and lives of women in Iran. In 2013, President Hassan Rouhani of Iran (the equivalent of a prime minister rather than a president) appointed Shahindokht Molaverdi as deputy minister of women and family affairs. Ms. Molaverdi sounds like the sort of person that Prof. Hoodfar would approve of. Earlier this year, she visited Iran and was detained by the counterintelligence unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps. She was freed for a while, but not allowed to leave Iran, and then she was moved to the horrific Evin Prison - which may be said to specialize in political prisoners. Appearances suggest that Prof. Hoodfar has been set up by the Revolutionary Guards, as if she were some sinister Western agent trying to undermine Iranian values. Surely Mr. Rouhani should stand up against the Revolutionary Guards to demand Prof. Hoodfar's freedom, even though he may have many other tasks to deal with.

4. Canadian Taliban prisoner pleads for his family's lives

Toronto Star, Jesse Winter, 2016 08 31

Toronto - A kidnapped Canadian and his American wife have appeared in a new video pleading for their lives. Joshua Boyle and Caitlan Coleman were kidnapped by the Taliban in 2012 while on a backpacking trip in the mountains of Afghanistan. In the two-minute, 32-second video shared by SITE Intelligence group, Boyle, 33, and Coleman, 31, say that if the Afghan government doesn't stop executing Taliban prisoners, their captors will kill them and other prisoners. "They will execute us, women and children included, if the policies of the Afghan government are not overturned, either by the Afghan government or by Canada somehow, or United States," Boyle says in the video. He appears wan, with a long, unkempt beard and Coleman is seen dressed in black clothing covering everything but her face. They each speak slowly, in turn, apparently reading from a script held off camera. "Our captors are terrified at the thought of their own mortality approaching and are saying that they will take reprisals on our family," Boyle says in the video. In May, the Afghan government hanged six inmates linked to the Taliban. Coleman was pregnant when the couple was kidnapped in 2012. In November her parents received a letter telling of how she'd given birth to a second child while being held in captivity. The video is the first time she or Boyle have been seen in three years. In 2013, the couple appeared in two videos asking the U.S. government to free them from the Taliban.

5. Ce qui cloche

La Presse+, Agnès Gruda, 2016 08 31

Chronique: En 2015, les consulats canadiens des quatre coins du monde ont traité 2 361 013 demandes pour des visas de séjour au Canada. La vaste majorité, soit 83 %, ont reçu une réponse favorable. Mais 17 % ont été rejetées. Faut-il en conclure que les témoignages cités dans mon dossier de dimanche dernier sur « La loterie des visas » ne constituent que des cas d'exception ? Et que globalement, notre système d'accueil de visiteurs occasionnels va très bien, merci ? Malheureusement, non. C'est vrai que près de 2 millions d'étrangers ont pu voyager au Canada l'an dernier, pour rendre visite à leurs proches, assister à une conférence ou simplement en touristes. Mais le système de sélection a fermé les portes du Canada à plus de 400 000 visiteurs potentiels. Parfois pour des raisons légitimes. Mais trop souvent, par un simple réflexe de méfiance, doublé d'un aveuglement bureaucratique. Car ce qui ressort avant tout des nombreux témoignages recueillis avant, mais aussi après la publication de mes articles, c'est l'aspect aléatoire, obscur et aveugle de la machine qui décide qui aura droit de fouler brièvement le sol canadien, et qui ne l'aura pas.

6. China promises humane, lawful treatment of detained Canadian

Reuters, Ben Blanchard and Michael Martina, 2016 08 31

Beijing - Chinese Premier Li Keqiang promised on Wednesday that a Canadian man held in China for two years on suspicion of spying would be treated humanely and lawfully, but the man's family expressed frustration and called for his release. China indicted Canadian citizen Kevin Garratt in January on charges of spying and stealing state secrets. He was detained in August 2014 near China's sensitive border with reclusive North Korea. State media says Chinese authorities had found evidence that Garratt worked with Canadian espionage agencies to gather intelligence in China. China strictly regulates religious activities within its borders but China's Foreign Ministry says the case has nothing to do with Garratt's faith. Asked about Garratt, Li told a joint news conference with Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau in Beijing that China and Canada would continue to communicate on the issue. "As for the individual case you have raised, I want to say that China is a country with rule of law and our judicial authorities will handle it in strict accordance with the law, and give the relevant case humane treatment," Li said in rare public comments by a top Chinese leader on such a touchy issue. With Trudeau by his side, Li said China would grant consular access in such cases if they involved foreigners. "For these cases, the departments of both sides will continue to remain in touch and we believe it's essential for our two countries to remove disturbances and work together to uphold the other interests of China-Canada relations."

7. City study circle was one of terror 'clusters'

Calgary Herald, Dan Taekema, 2016 08 30

Calgary - Tamim Chowdhury was once held up as an academic example to other students at Forster Secondary School in Windsor. On Saturday he was killed in a shootout with police in Bangladesh, accused of being the mastermind behind a terrorist attack that killed at least 20 people. Pat Osborne, who was just starting out as a business teacher at the now-shuttered school when Chowdhury was a student there, said he remembered him as a "real bright kid." "Tamim was one of our highest award winners in terms of winning academic scholarships to the University of Windsor," he said. "Later on we used him as an example of a kid who worked hard and was able to receive money for university." On Saturday, police stormed a two-storey building near Dhaka, the capital city of Bangladesh, and killed three suspected militants, including Chowdhury. Bangladesh police chief A.K.M. Shahidul Hoque stated that Chowdhury was the mastermind behind a July 1 attack on a popular cafe and another attack on an Eid congregation on July 7 that left three dead. According to the chief, police received a tip Chowdhury was in the house. When a SWAT team raided the building they were shot at and, when the suspects failed to surrender, they were killed. Chowdhury's death has done little to answer questions about how a southern Ontario student became a suspected terrorist leader.

8. Des efforts pour contrer l'intégrisme et l'islamophobie

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine, 2016 08 31

Montréal--Au coeur du débat sur la radicalisation depuis le départ de plusieurs de ses ex-élèves vers la Syrie, le collège de Maisonneuve prend les grands moyens pour repousser l'intégrisme religieux hors de ses murs. L'établissement met en branle une série de mesures visant à promouvoir la diversité et à donner un meilleur soutien aux élèves et aux employés. Apprivoiser l'islam Les élèves du collège qui se sont radicalisés « s'étaient bricolé un islam de pacotille », déplore le professeur de sciences politiques Jean-Félix Chénier, qui organisera un atelier hebdomadaire destiné à démystifier cette religion qui compte plus de 1,6 milliard de fidèles dans le monde. M. Chénier cible autant les élèves musulmans que les autres. Par des discussions, des lectures et la venue de conférenciers experts et de Québécois musulmans « bien ancrés dans la communauté », il espère déboulonner certains préjugés, répondre aux questions que bon nombre de jeunes se posent et contrer l'islamophobie. Lors des ateliers, qui seront parascolaires et facultatifs, le thème de l'islam ne sera pas abordé de manière théologique, mais plutôt philosophique et politique. « On veut distinguer l'idéologie de la religion », explique le professeur.

9. Harjit Sajjan wants to do homework first, then pick a UN mission later

Toronto Star, Paul Wells, 2016 08 31

Column: Harjit Sajjan's office offered me an interview with the defence minister. This was more than a week ago now, after Sajjan landed in Vancouver from a week-long visit to Africa. And if you want the truth of it I sat on the interview for days because I wasn't entirely sure what to make of it. After our conversation, Sajjan and two other ministers announced Canada will contribute 600 soldiers and $450 million over three years, to United Nations peacekeeping. The sound of self-congratulation from some corners has been so hearty that a lot of what Sajjan told me stands as a useful corrective. Please stow, if you will, your noble image, from some half-forgotten high school social studies class, of blue-helmeted soldiers, sternly guarding a neat line between two carefully separated armies somewhere. Those days are gone and they are not coming back. "This is not the peacekeeping of the past," Sajjan told me. "There's no peace to keep. We've also made it clear that peace operations are going to be risky." Traditional peacekeeping was a relic of 19th- and early 20th-century industrial war, when massed armies would hurl themselves at one another in ways that actually made them relatively easy to separate, delineate and track. Latter-day asymmetric combat, led in many cases by ragtag groups of militants armed with a few trucks and sidearms, follows no neat lines. Civilian and paramilitary groups intermingle, as do friendly and unfriendly armies. Allegiances shift. It's hard to even know where to send the blue helmets.

10. Iran - La famille d'Homa Hoodfar craint qu'elle meure en prison

Le Devoir, Marie-Michèle Sioui, 2016 08 31

Montréal--La famille de la Montréalaise Homa Hoodfar, emprisonnée en Iran depuis trois mois, craint que l'ex-professeure de l'Université Concordia laisse sa vie derrière les barreaux de la prison d'Evin, à Téhéran. " Le temps passe et nous avons peur qu'elle ne puisse plus endurer cette situation et, dans un tel cas, nous ne savons pas ce qui pourrait arriver... Nous ne voulons même pas penser à ce qui pourrait arriver ", a déclaré sa nièce, Amanda Ghahremani, au Devoir. Un membre de la famille de la Canado-Iranienne a pu la voir il y a quelques semaines : Homa Hoodfar rentrait alors d'un séjour à l'hôpital et était si faible qu'elle pouvait à peine marcher ou parler. " Nous n'avons pas de nouvelles depuis ", s'est inquiétée Mme Ghahremani. Tenue dans le noir par l'Iran, la famille s'est résignée à interpellier les médias pour faire bouger les choses. " On a voulu respecter le processus légal, mais nous avons vu tellement de violations des droits en Iran : ils ne lui ont pas donné accès à un avocat, à sa famille, à ses médicaments ou à un médecin indépendant qui puisse s'assurer qu'elle est en bon état ", a énuméré sa nièce.

11. PM shows readiness to bolster ties by joining Chinese-led bank

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe, 2016 08 31

Beijing - Signing on as member of Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank a way to curry favour with Beijing, but does little to resolve the tension between Ottawa's desire to profit from China and the will among Chinese leaders to further bring Canada into their nation's economic orbit Hours after landing in Beijing, Justin Trudeau signalled Canada is ready to take the first step in a promised "reset" of its relationship with its second-largest trading partner by applying for membership in the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank, a China-led institution the United States has refused to join. Canadian Finance Minister Bill Morneau is expected to meet Wednesday afternoon with Jin Liqun, the bank's president, in Beijing, at the outset of Mr. Trudeau's inaugural trip to China as Prime Minister. "We are looking very favourably at the possibility of joining," Mr. Trudeau said Tuesday after arriving in China. The AIIB is China's answer to the U.S.-dominated World Bank and the Japan-dominated Asian Development Bank. The new global financial institution is headquartered in Beijing, with China as its largest shareholder. Though it has been built as an international organization - with Western countries contributing to its governance standards and English as its language of operations - the bank, in selecting which highways, power plants and railways to fund, gives China new power to exert regional influence. Signing up is a way for Ottawa to curry favour, sending a message that it supports a project central to China's ambitions in challenging the existing world order. It will not, however, bring new wealth to Canadian corporations, since the AIIB's universal procurement policy allows any company access to project bidding, regardless of whether its home country has membership in the bank.

12. Put Focus On Child Soldiers

Ottawa Citizen, Roméo Dallaire, 2016 08 31

Op-ed: Twenty-two years ago, I was the force commander of the UNAMIR peacekeeping mission before, during and after the Rwandan genocide. I witnessed first-hand, in one of humanity's darkest hours, the horrific impacts of conflict and genocide. This experience has produced an unrelenting drive in me as a humanitarian to both prevent conflict and protect peace. With this experience as a backdrop, it was with immense pleasure that I recently returned from a five-country fact-finding mission to Africa with Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan and esteemed colleagues Justice Louise Arbour and Ambassador to the United Nations Marc-André Blanchard. Over a week, we reached out to the highest authorities in Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and the Democratic Republic of the Congo to understand how Canada can re-engage in peace support operations in the region. We undertook this trip, in the words of Minister Sajjan, to discover the ground truth about conflict. It is only through an intimate understanding of how and why conflict persists that we will be in a position to effectively contribute to its prevention. The most obvious observation, without a doubt, was the brutal fact that war has radically changed. Therefore, our tactics and approach must change also. Today, children are both the primary drivers and victims of conflicts around the globe and particularly in Africa. From Mali to the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Somalia, children continue to swell the ranks of both state and non-state armies. It is in this complex and ambiguous conflict environment that Canada will eventually re-engage in peace support operations. Note: Roméo Dallaire is a retired lieutenant-general and founder of the Roméo Dallaire Child Soldiers Initiative.

13. Tracking radicalized Calgarians overseas is mission of mother who lost son

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 08 31

The mother of a Calgary man who died in Syria fighting with ISIS is working to uncover names of other radicalized young people with links to the city. Christianne Boudreau spends a lot of time online, researching and reaching out to people, trying to connect the dots between all the young men associated with her son Damian Clairmont. She said the recent discovery of yet another Calgary connection to the group Islamic State in Iraq and Syria is certainly not the last. "We don't know all of them so we don't know for sure, we're still trying to dig up names, but it's getting so challenging because they're dying so fast," she said. Calgarian killed in Bangladesh The names of a handful of young men have surfaced in connection to Clairmont's prayer group in Calgary, including Tamim Chowdhury, who was recently killed by police in Bangladesh after allegedly orchestrating a deadly attack in a restaurant in that country's capital, Dhaka.

14. Trudeau opens Canada's door wider to China and exploratory talks on free trade

Canadian Press, Andy Blatchford, 2016 08 31

Beijing - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has brought Canada closer to China after agreeing with the Chinese premier to deepen the countries' relationships _ and explore a possible free trade deal. After meeting with Trudeau, Chinese Premier Li Keqiang told reporters through a translator that Canada and China will launch a feasibility study on an eventual free-trade deal. A senior Canadian official later said the two countries have ongoing technical discussions on free trade, but stressed that there are no negotiations under way at this point. "This year marks 45 years of diplomatic relations between Canada and China," Trudeau said as he stood beside Li in Beijing's

Great Hall of the People, which overlooks Tiananmen Square. "My father, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, played an important role in establishing a partnership between our two countries when he was prime minister. So, I'm very happy to be extending that effort now." The countries also agreed to hold annual meetings between the Chinese premier and the Canadian prime minister on a range of issues, including national security and the rule of law. Asked if he had raised human rights concerns and the case of a jailed Canadian, Trudeau said the foundation of a good relationship is the ability to be frank and open about issues that can be worked on together. He added that he's "highlighted a number of consular cases" every time he's had the opportunity to sit down with Chinese leaders. Those cases include Kevin Garratt, a Canadian imprisoned for more than two years in China on espionage charges. Trudeau himself has indicated in the past that there's no evidence to support the accusations against Garratt. The prime minister did not say what China has told him about Garratt's case. Li insisted through a translator that China is a country of the rule of law. He said judicial authorities will handle cases in strict accordance with the law. He added that individuals will be treated in a "humanitarian way."

15. American Is Facing Spy Trial in China, and Husband Seeks Obama's Help

New York Times, Chris Buckley, 2016 08 31

Beijing - An American businesswoman faces trial in China on spying charges dating back 20 years, including that she tried to recruit Chinese in the United States to spy against their homeland, her husband said on Tuesday. He urged President Obama to raise the case with President Xi Jinping of China at a Group of 20 summit meeting in eastern China beginning over the weekend. The businesswoman, Phan Phan-Gillis, widely known as Sandy, was indicted last month on the espionage charges after having been detained while visiting China last year. But her husband, Jeff Gillis, said he had held off revealing the indictment while new lawyers for his wife tried to come to grips with the case. "The time really is critical for Sandy, with the imminent meeting between President Obama and Xi Jinping," Mr. Gillis said by telephone from the couple's home in Houston. The prosecutors' claims against Ms. Phan-Gillis include that she spied while visiting Guangxi, a region of southern China, in 1996, he said. "Sandy is absolutely innocent," he said. "Chinese officials did not even check their own internal databases to see if Sandy was in the country then. She wasn't even in China." The indictment also charges that Ms. Phan-Gillis tried to recruit Chinese people in the United States in the late 1990s to work for a "foreign spy organization," Mr. Gillis said. He said that that allegation was also false and that trying Ms. Phan-Gillis over allegations of events two decades ago in another country defied law and common sense.

16. American Mom Held by Afghan Militants Pleads for U.S. Help (Canada)

The Daily Beast, Shane Harris, Sami Yousafzai, 2016 08 30

Washington - An American woman held by Afghan militants along with her husband and two young sons is seen pleading for U.S. intervention in a new video obtained by The Daily Beast. The video is intended to convey a message to the governments of Afghanistan, Canada, and the United States that there will be consequences for the execution of Taliban prisoners in Afghan jails, said a member of the Haqqani network, a Taliban affiliate that is holding the family captive and made the video. Caitlan Coleman and her Canadian husband Joshua Boyle were kidnapped while hiking in Afghanistan in 2012. Their families have previously said that Caitlan gave birth to two boys while in captivity. In the new video posted online by jihadists, Coleman and Boyle each speak in turn, slowly and apparently from a script prepared by their captors. "We have been told that the Afghan government has executed some of their prisoners...and that our captors are frightened of the idea of further executions," Coleman says. "Because of their fear, they are willing to kill us, willing to kill women, and to kill children, to kill whoever in order to get these policies reversed or to take revenge." "I ask if my government can do anything to change the policies of the Afghan government to stop their policy of executing men before these men start executing their prisoners," Coleman said. In May, the Afghan government executed six Taliban members. The Haqqani source said that the video was made two to three months ago, but that it's being released now in response to Monday's ruling by an Afghan court that Anas Haqqani, the brother of the network's leader, will be executed for his role in helping to raise funds for the network. The Haqqani have conducted devastating terrorist attacks in Afghanistan, including some against U.S. forces. U.S. officials said they are aware of reports of the video and are working to free Coleman and her family. While Boyle is a Canadian citizen, U.S. officials are working to release all the family members and view the two children as American citizens. Recently, the Haqqani were close to a deal with the Canadian government to free Boyle, but he refused to return home without his wife and children, an Afghan Taliban source said.

17. FBI Director: Americans Never Had 'Absolute Privacy'

Nextgov.com (US), Frank Konkel, 2016 08 31

Washington - FBI Director James Comey said his agency is preparing for a renewed conversation on encryption by collecting information regarding how "widespread default encryption" has affected law enforcement at the federal level. Comey said default encryption--especially on mobile devices-- in the post-Edward Snowden era has fundamentally impacted law enforcement agencies at the local, state and federal levels, providing a near "absolute privacy" he argued had never occurred before in history. Comey said the FBI has been unable to collect evidence from 650 of 5,000 devices, including mobile phones and tablets, received from state and local governments this year. The FBI is tallying that data and other statistics, Comey said, for a public conversation on encryption--specifically the balance between security and privacy--sometime after the Nov. 8 election. Encryption briefly became a hot-button issue in early 2016 when tech giant Apple refused to comply with an FBI request to crack an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino shooters.

18. Key ISIS Officer Reported Dead in Syria's North

New York Times, Eric Schmitt, Anne Bernard, 2016 08 31

Washington - The senior Islamic State strategist Abu Muhammad al- Adnani was killed in northern Syria, the group announced on Tuesday, signaling the death of one of the world's most-wanted terrorists. In Washington, the Pentagon spokesman, Peter Cook, confirmed that an American "precision strike" near Al Bab, Syria, on Tuesday night had targeted Mr. Adnani, but could not confirm his death. "We are still assessing the results of the strike," he said in a statement. Two American officials, speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence, said a United States military drone had hit a vehicle Mr. Adnani was thought to be traveling in, following a close collaboration between the Central Intelligence Agency and Special Operations forces to track him. A founding member of the Islamic State, Mr. Adnani, a 39-year-old Syrian, was the group's chief spokesman and propagandist, running an operation that put out slickly produced videos of beheadings and massacres that shocked the world and sent a rush of recruits running to join the group in Syria. Accounts from arrested members of the Islamic State confirmed Mr. Adnani's role as an operational leader as well. He oversaw the group's external operations division, responsible for recruiting operatives around the world and instigating or organizing them to carry out attacks that have included Paris, Brussels and Dhaka, Bangladesh.

19. The CIA's Venture-Capital Firm, Like Its Sponsor, Operates in the Shadows

Washington - Forterra Systems Inc., a California startup focused on virtual reality, was in need of money and its products didn't have much commercial appeal. Then funds came in from a source based far from Silicon Valley: In-Q-Tel Inc., a venture-capital firm in Virginia funded by the Central Intelligence Agency. One catalyst for the 2007 infusion, according to a former Forterra executive and others familiar with it, was a recommendation by a man who sat on the board of the venture-capital firm-- and also on the board of Forterra. In-Q-Tel pumped in cash, Forterra developed some tools useful to the military, and government contracts started coming in. Like the agency that founded it, the CIA-funded venture- capital firm operates largely in the shadows. In-Q-Tel officials regard the firm as independent, yet it has extremely close ties to the CIA and runs almost all investment decisions by the spy agency. The firm discloses little about how it picks companies to invest in, never says how much, and sometimes doesn't reveal the investments at all. Even less well-known are potential conflicts of interest the arrangement entails, as seen in this Forterra example and others continuing to the present. Nearly half of In-Q-Tel's trustees have a financial connection of one kind or another with a company In-Q-Tel has funded, a Wall Street Journal examination of its investments found.

20. U.S. Defends Its Curbs On Money Laundering

Wall Street Journal, Emily Glazer, Aruna Viswanatha, 2016 08 31

New York - U.S. banking regulators sought Tuesday to "dispel certain myths" around anti-money-laundering rules that critics contend have inadvertently cut off access to the U.S. financial system for some countries, businesses and individuals. The Treasury Department, along with four bank regulators, published an unusual, four-page "fact sheet" along with a lengthy blog post to clarify regulatory expectations related to the rules. While the statements didn't change the rules, they emphasized that the government doesn't take a "zero-tolerance" approach to enforcing anti-money-laundering laws and reserves enforcement action for the most egregious instances of widespread or intentional wrongdoing, such as recent fines related to movement of drug-cartel money. Regulators resolve about 95% of compliance failures without penalties, three senior Treasury officials said in the blog post. The problem, argue critics of the U.S. government's approach, is that anti-money-laundering enforcement has caused banks to pull back from some customers who aren't suspected of illegal activity. That has become a challenge recently along the southwestern U.S. border with Mexico, as well as for island nations and emerging-market economies. It is often harder to track the movement of cash in those areas, and banks don't want to risk getting caught up in money tied to drug or human trafficking. For banks, the risk has grown particularly prominent given multibillion-dollar penalties levied in recent years on several banks that failed to keep dirty money out of the U.S. financial system or didn't appropriately alert authorities to suspicious transactions.

21. White Lives Matter Has Been Declared a Hate Group

New York Times, Liam Stack, 2016 08 31

New York - A white nationalist group called White Lives Matter, which calls itself an opponent of the Black Lives Matter movement, has been declared a hate group by the Southern Poverty Law Center, an organization that tracks extremist groups in the United States. "The White Lives Matter website says their movement is dedicated to the preservation of the white race. That tells you all you need to know," said Heidi Beirich, the director of the Intelligence Project at the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala. "They're against integration, immigration. This is standard white supremacist stuff." The group, which grew out of a social media meme, argues that white Americans are victims of a genocide caused by factors like the immigration of nonwhite people and marriage between white Christians and nonwhites or Jews, Ms. Beirich said. The law center's designation is meant to draw attention to and increase scrutiny of the group's activities. Researchers with the law center said White Lives Matter had been promoted by the Aryan Renaissance Society, a group in Texas that is a member of the United Aryan Front, a white nationalist coalition.

22. Why Killing Top Terrorists May Not Hurt Groups

New York Times, Max Fisher, 2016 08 31

Analysis - It seems obvious: Killing terrorist leaders should weaken their organizations, depriving those groups of strategic direction and ideological appeal. The death of someone like Abu Muhammad al-Adnani, a senior Islamic State figure reported killed on Tuesday in Syria, should seem like a significant setback for the group. But scholars have struggled to find evidence that killing leaders is an effective way to dismantle terrorist organizations, instead finding ample evidence that it makes little difference. That research seems to apply especially to the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, whose attributes make it resilient to losing even a top figure like Mr. Adnani. Two features make a terrorist group able to withstand a senior officer's death, according to research by Jenna Jordan, a Georgia Tech professor and a leading expert on the subject. The first is popular support. Groups need a steady stream of recruits and a pool of potential new leaders. Support among civilians in areas in which the groups primarily operate also makes them more stable, by broadening support networks and helping them to safely retrench when needed. Leaders are usually killed in or near communities that support them, resulting in those communities rallying behind the terrorist group and against whoever did the killing. The second feature is not something usually associated with groups like the Islamic State: bureaucracy. The more a terrorist group resembles a corporate organizational chart -- often with administrative, payroll and logistical staff -- the more stable it is, and the better able to handle a leader's death.

23. State spying helps to create extremists. My father was one of them

The Guardian (London), Francis Beckett, 2016 08 31

Op-ed - When you lock people up without trial, "whether it is in Belmarsh or Guantánamo Bay, you recruit more terrorists than you contain", warned Shami Chakrabarti earlier this year. She has said that senior intelligence officials made a successful bid for enormous power post-9/11, particularly in government surveillance. And appalling attacks in France and Belgium have made us more likely to give the security services the power to curtail our liberties. But should we? I claim some special insight. For at least the first 10 years of my life, from 1945 to 1955, my childhood home was under constant MI5 surveillance. My parents knew it, though I did not; and I have spent a lot of the past two years with recently released MI5 records at the National Archives, reading verbatim my parents' telephone conversations from 60 years ago and the spies' reports on their movements. I recognise a few of the people described as the adults who peopled my childhood, and I can picture in my mind where the watcher's car was parked when he reported on my family's movements. My father, John Beckett, was a leading fascist. He was in prison for nearly four years during the second world war, then under a sort of house arrest, not allowed to live within 20 miles of London or to travel more than five miles from his home. When these restrictions were lifted, the surveillance continued, masterminded by Graham Mitchell, who became deputy director of MI5 in 1956. It is mostly Mitchell's memoranda I have been reading. They betray a deeply unhealthy pleasure in the secret power his position gave him over the life of another man. At one point Mitchell believes (probably wrongly) that he has caught John out in an extramarital affair. Telephone intercepts have John telling his wife he is having dinner with a male friend, but the man following him says it is a female friend who joins him in the restaurant.

24. UK and France restate commitment to border treaty after Calais talks

The Guardian (London), Multiple reporters, 2016 08 30

London - British and French interior ministers have ordered a fresh review of security in Calais and confirmed they will continue with the treaty under which British border checks are carried out on French soil. A joint statement issued by the home secretary, Amber Rudd, and her French counterpart, Bernard Cazeneuve, says they will work together to strengthen security around the "shared border" in Calais and "strongly diminish" the migratory pressures that have attracted 7,000 migrants to the Channel tunnel port. The statement from the two ministers confirms their commitment to the 2003 Le Touquet treaty but makes no reference to calls from some French politicians for an asylum "hotspot" processing centre to be set up in Calais to consider claims for asylum in Britain. French rightwing politicians, including Nicolas Sarkozy, have called for Le Touquet to be scrapped or changed, raising the prospect of the UK border returning from Calais to Dover. But the joint statement issued by Rudd and Cazeneuve after a meeting in Tuesday clearly says they are committed to "preserve the vital economic link". The two ministers say they recognise the humanitarian situation in Calais and they will step up their joint efforts to improve the situation.

25. Australia warns new lawmakers to weigh Chinese investment cautiously

Reuters, Tom Westbrook, 2016 08 31

Sydney - Australia has urged legislators to take a more cautious approach in backing China's pursuit of "legitimate interests" and stay alert to the motives guiding its investments, in a briefing book published by the non-partisan parliamentary library. Authored by government officials and distributed ahead of Tuesday's opening of parliament, the booklet raises concerns that "creating a Eurasia-wide, China-led bloc to counter the United States" is the long-term aim of China's "One Belt, One Road" project, including its investments in northern Australia. "Some see this initiative as a profound challenge to the current global political and economic status quo," a parliamentary library researcher wrote in the booklet, designed to guide lawmakers on issues likely to come before them. "Australia needs to adopt a more economically and strategically prudent attitude in determining how the Australia-China economic relationship is to further develop." In Beijing, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Hua Chunying told reporters she was not familiar with the booklet, but cooperation between Chinese and Australia companies was based on market principles and was mutually beneficial. "We hope the government of the relevant country can create a just, fair and transparent environment for Chinese enterprises investing abroad," she told a daily news briefing. The caution comes after Australian Treasurer Scott Morrison this month blocked the sale of electricity network Ausgrid to China and Hong Kong buyers, citing undefined national security concerns.

He says cyber criminals use whatever money they get to fund further crime and even if a ransom is paid, there is no guarantee someone will get their files back. The electronic spy agency, the GCSB, has raised concerns that these sorts of cyber attacks are becoming more common. (Full report)

27. 4 suicide-bombing vests, large cache of explosives seized near Kabul

Kabul - A large cache of explosives and weapons was seized in Kapisa province close to capital Kabul by the operatives of the Afghan intelligence. The National Directorate of Security (NDS) said the cache was discovered during an operation conducted in the vicinity of Kapisa province but no further details were given. 28. Hostage video aimed at pressuring Afghan govt over militant case- Taliban source (Canada).

Reuters, 2016 08 31

Peshawar - The release of a video showing a U.S. and a Canadian citizen held hostage by the Taliban is designed to pressure the Afghan government not to impose the death sentence on the son of a feared militant leader, a Taliban source said on Wednesday. U.S. and Canadian officials have said they are aware of the video of Caitlan Coleman, a U.S. citizen and her Canadian husband, Joshua Boyle, who were kidnapped in 2012 while on a backpacking trip. A State Department spokesman said on Tuesday the validity of the video was being studied but offered no further comment. According to a senior member of the Taliban, who spoke on condition of anonymity, the timing of the release was aimed at pressuring the Afghan government not to execute Anas Haqqani, son of Jalaluddin Haqqani, founder of the feared Haqqani network.

30. "Children Suicide Bombers" Drop the Fake Masks of ISIS

Asharq Al-Awsat, Waleed Abdul Rahman, 2016 08 31

Cairo- The video that featured a group of children who shot captives in Iraq; the arrest of a child who was trying to implement a suicide bombing operation with an explosive belt; and the bloody suicide attack implemented by another child in a wedding party south of turkey have raised many questions on ISIS's recruitment of children. Egyptian experts in extremist groups' affairs see that ISIS's exploitation of children in its terrorist attacks drops the last fake mask of the organization, and suggests that the organization's adoption of this new trend perhaps aims at saving expenditures and avoiding the loss of its experienced members. On another hand, experts say that ISIS used children to fuel its wars by indoctrinating its bloody ideology in their young minds, as part of the so-called "schools of Caliphate" by training children on three levels: intellectual, combatant, and psychological.

Cairo - Libya's pro-Government of National Accord (GNA) forces announced on Monday they are fortifying their control over ISIS' stronghold in Sirte, after heavy fighting that left dozens dead and wounded. U.N. secretary-general's special representative for Libya Martin Kobler expressed his appreciation for the "heroic Libyan efforts" and the advancement achieved so far against the "barbaric enemy that should be defeated," meaning ISIS. Kobler revealed he had a meeting with French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault during which they discussed the current situation in Libya. On Monday, pro-GNA forces announced they had "totally liberated" one of the two districts where ISIS fighters were holed up after an evening assault on their positions. "Our forces have totally liberated district Number One" in northern Sirte, the campaign's media center said.

33. Militants attack pipeline in Nigeria's Delta as others pursue talks

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 30

Abuja - A militant group said on Tuesday it attacked a pipeline operated by a subsidiary of Nigeria's state oil company in the country's southern Delta region, just a day after the most prolific rebel group in the restive energy hub said it had halted hostilities. OPEC member Nigeria has seen its oil output fall by around 700,000 barrels a day to 1.56 million bpd due to attacks on oil pipelines in the southern energy hub, home to much of the country's oil and gas wealth, since the start of the year. The Niger Delta Greenland Justice Mandate said it attacked the Ogor-Oteri pipeline in Delta state, operated by Nigerian Petroleum Development Company (NPDC) and Nigerian energy company Shoreline, at around 03:00 a.m. (0200 GMT) on Tuesday. Niger Delta Avengers, the group that claimed responsibility for most attacks in the impoverished region where militants want a greater share of the country's oil wealth, said on Monday it had halted hostilities. "The Niger Delta Greenland Justice Mandate remains underdressed on its mission to getting justice for the people," said the group, previously unknown before an attack on Aug. 11.

34. Nigerian commander: Only weeks left for Boko Haram

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 31

Maiduguri - Nigeria's army expects to seize Boko Haram's last few strongholds in the northeast over the next few weeks, the commander in charge of crushing the jihadist group's seven-year insurgency said on Wednesday. The army missed a December deadline set by President Muhammadu Buhari to wipe out the group, which wants to set up an Islamic caliphate in the area around Lake Chad, but has retaken most of its territory - at one point the size of Belgium. Major General Lucky Irabor, commander of the operation, said the jihadists were now holed up in a few pockets of the Sambisa forest - where more than 200 girls kidnapped from the town of Chibok in 2014 are believed to be held - and two areas near Lake Chad and would be flushed out "within weeks". Despite the set-backs, Boko Haram still manages to stage regular suicide bombings in Nigeria and neighbouring Chad, Niger and Cameroon. Since 2009, more than 15,000 people have been killed, 2.3 million displaced and the local economy decimated. "Almost all of the locations held by the Boko Haram terrorists have been reclaimed. We are talking only of a few villages and towns," Irabor said in an interview at his base in Maiduguri in Borno state, birth place of the insurgency.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 30

Santos's four-year push to negotiate an end to 52 years of war with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) was finally concluded last week and he has promised to give Colombians the final decision. "It's a clear and simple question that leaves no room for any confusion," Santos said after signing the document. 36. Venezuela arrests opposition activists ahead of anti-government rally

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 08 31

Caracas - Venezuela has arrested several opposition activists accused of plotting violence during an anti-government rally scheduled for Thursday, President Nicolas Maduro said on Tuesday, and opposition leaders slammed the arrests as intimidation. The opposition is calling on sympathizers from across the country to march in the capital of Caracas to push for a recall referendum against Maduro, who calls the rally a plot to stir up violence and set the stage for a coup. The upcoming march follows months of tensions between Maduro and the opposition-controlled legislature, exacerbated by triple-digit inflation, Soviet-style product shortages and a severe economic recession. "We must win the battle against the coup - before, during, and after the dates announced by these fascists," Maduro said in a televised broadcast. "We've captured a group of people carrying important equipment, C4 explosives. We're trying to capture a number of them in real time." Maduro called opposition party Popular Will "the party of violence that is mixed up in the coup of Sept. 1." He accused opposition leaders of seeking to stage a putsch similar to one that briefly toppled late socialist leader Hugo Chavez in 2002.

37. Vote on whether to remove president nears in Brazil's Senate

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 31

Brasilia - Senators debated the fate of Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff into the wee hours of Wednesday, then planned a short break before casting votes that will decide whether to remove her permanently as leader of Latin America's most populous country. Many of the 81 senators signed up to speak Tuesday afternoon on the fifth day of her impeachment trial, prompting Chief Justice Ricardo Lewandowski to announce that they would go as long as it took for everyone to be heard. He said the trial would resume late Wednesday morning for the final vote on removing her. Passionate closing arguments by Rousseff's accusers and speeches by her allies appeared to be doing little to tip the balance in her favor on the eve of the impeachment decision. Suspended by the Senate in May, Rousseff faces permanent removal for breaking fiscal responsibility laws in her managing of the federal budget. Most of the senators making statements attacked Rousseff, blaming her for Brazil falling into its deepest recession in decades and saying she ignored signs of a slowdown.

The AFP Western Mindanao Command said about two dozen militants were killed in the clash. One of them was the body of Mohammad Said alias Amah Maas, an Abu Sayyaf sub-leader blamed for the beheading of Canadian hostages John Ridsdel and Robert Hall earlier this year after their families failed to raise P600 million in ransom.

Gulf News, Gilbert P. Felongco, 2016 08 31

Manila - Ongoing clashes on an island in the Philippines have cost the lives of at least 40 combatants, mostly Abu Sayyaf, officials said on Tuesday. The chief of the armed forces' public affairs office, Marine Col. Edgard Arevalo, said the number of fatalities in the clashes in Sulu had already reached 40 as fighting spread out to different areas of the southern Philippine island as the military stepped up the hunt for the militants. Of the fatalities, 25 are from the Abu Sayyaf while 15 are from the military. President Rodrigo Duterte has vowed to destroy the Abu Sayyaf following the recent execution of an 18-year-old student who was abducted earlier. The terror group is still holding in the mountains of Sulu Norwegian Kjartan Sekkingstad, one of three foreigners and a Filipina abducted in September 21, 2015 in the resort island of Samal in Davao del Norte. 40. Canadian father sues over denial of HK passport to son

South China Morning Post, Chris Lau, 2016 08 31

Beijing - Timothy Loh says boy should be entitled to travel document by virtue of family's Chinese descent A Canadian father of Chinese descent is suing the government for not granting his Canada-born son a Hong Kong passport on the grounds the boy is not a Chinese national. Timothy Loh and his son Hudson Timothy George Loh argued through their lawyers yesterday at the High Court that the 11 year old should be qualified for a passport due to their Chinese heritage and close ties with the city. But legal representatives for the director of immigration and passports appeal board countered that their claims were bending the law. They suggested the matter would be better resolved if the son were to be naturalised as a citizen. But presiding judge Mr Justice Anderson Chow Ka-ming said one of the possible consequences of that could be his son losing consulate protection by Canada even if he was still allowed to use his Canadian passport. "He is not prepared to concede it to this extent," barrister Hectar Pun Hei said, for the Lohs.

44. N. Korea building railway long-range missile launchers on railroad: report

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 31

Seoul - North Korea is building a mobile long-range missile launcher system that can move along the country's railroad tracks, the U.S.- based Radio Free Asia (RFA) reported Wednesday, citing sources in the communist country. A North Korean resident in Kangwon Province told RFA that North Korean engineers have been working on the mobile missile system since May at a state-run motor vehicle factory. The plant is under the supervision of the North's Second Economic Commission that is in charge of the ammunition industry. The unidentified North Korean source said that technicians have built some six railway-mounted launcher vehicles per month. Another source in North Hamgyong Province also said he heard the government is manufacturing vehicles to launch a long-range missile that can move over the country's railways. According to the source, the North's Second Economic Commission is overseeing the production of mobile missile launchers as North Korean leader Kim Jong-un emphasized in March the need to diversify the country's nuclear attack capability against the enemy. "North Korea has no other way but to produce such launchers because China has suspended the exports of large-scale vehicles capable of handling mobile missile launchers," the informant said.

45. N. Korea executes vice premier in July: Seoul official

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 31

Seoul - North Korea has carried out the execution of a vice premier and punished two senior officials, a Seoul official said Wednesday, as the North's leader is seeking to further strengthen his reign of terror. The official said North Korea executed the 63-year-old Kim Yong-jin by firing squad last month after being branded as an "anti-party and anti-revolutionary element." He was investigated by the North's intelligence agency due to his sitting posture shown at a key parliamentary meeting held in late June. North Korean leader Kim Jong-un, who took power in late 2011, is believed to have executed more than 100 government and military officials, including his once-powerful uncle Jang Song-thaek, as he seeks to consolidate his oppressive rule. The Seoul official also said that two other senior officials were punished for lapses. He said the North sent Kim Yong-chol, 71, the head of the United Front Department (UFD), to a rural farm for one month of reeducation starting in mid-July as he showed a "heavy-handed" attitude and was blamed for abusing his power. "As Kim is expected to further show his loyalty (to the North's leader) after (reeducation), the government is keeping close tabs on the possibility that North Korea will show a more hard-line attitude toward South Korea," the official said.

46. Sanctions putting squeeze on N.K. leader's ability to secure funds: minister

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 08 31

Almaty, Kazakhstan - North Korean leader Kim Jong-un is facing difficulty in securing funds needed to govern the country as tougher international sanctions have affected the inflow of hard currency, South Korea's pointman on unification said Tuesday. Unification Minister Hong Yong-pyo also said that a series of defections by North Koreans, including senior diplomat Thae Yong-ho, seem to be the result of tough U.N. Security Council (UNSC) sanctions imposed on the North. "It is hard to exactly grasp the situation, but North Korea's governing funds are on the decline and (the North's leadership including Kim) is under pressure," Hong told Yonhap News Agency during his visit to Kazakhstan. On March 2, the UNSC slapped its toughest ever sanctions to date on Pyongyang after the reclusive regime detonated its nuclear device and fired off a long-range rocket launch earlier in the year. "North Korea claims that the sanctions have dealt a blow to the lives of ordinary people, but in reality, Pyongyang is seen as having difficulty in managing the regime (due to the sanctions)," Hong said of his assessment of the impact of the U.N. sanctions. He said that the sanctions also seem to encourage more North Koreans to flee the repressive regime as they are under high pressure to provide money to the regime.

47. Two foreign workers get jail for terror funding

Strait Times, Danson Cheong, 2016 08 31

Singapore - Two Bangladeshi workers detained in April under the Internal Security Act were yesterday jailed for financing terrorism. Mamun Leakot Ali, 30, was given 21/2 years, while Zzaman Daulat, 34, will face two years behind bars. Both were part of a group of six workers charged under the Terrorism (Suppression of Financing) Act in May. Calling for deterrent sentences, DPP Nicholas Khoo said the two men could have thought the worst punishment they would face for their actions would be repatriation, but the courts needed to send a message that such crimes would be "roundly condemned". He added that "great violence can be perpetrated with relatively small amounts of money". The men were part of a group called the Islamic State in Bangladesh (ISB). The duo had provided between $200 and $500 to fund terrorist attacks in their home country. Both men had initially claimed trial, but yesterday, they pleaded guilty and asked the court for leniency.

Moscow - Is Islam Karimov, the ruthless dictator who has ruled Uzbekistan for 25 years, dead or alive? Uzbek authorities insist that President Karimov, 78, is in a stable condition in hospital after suffering a brain haemorrhage at the weekend, reportedly after drinking vodka toasts to the country's Olympic medallists. Yet a host of well-informed regional experts and analysts, citing insider sources, are equally adamant that Mr Karimov is dead. Analysts are concerned that his death could trigger in- stability in Uzbekistan, a mainly Muslim country of 32 million people that borders Afghanistan. "It's a fact," Daniil Kislov, editor of the well- respected Ferghana news agency, told The Times. "The Uzbek authorities will only announce his death when they feel the time is right. They could drag the announcement out for days." Ferghana is an Uzbek website that has been banned at home since 2005 and is now based in Moscow. Mr Kislov challenged the Uzbek authorities to present "proof" that Mr Karimov was still alive. "Show us a video of him in his hospital ward," he wrote in an online post. Dmitry Peskov, a spokesman for the Kremlin, said that Russia, which neighbours Uzbekistan, was working on the assumption that he was alive.

Berlin - An Islamic State supporter who was shot dead in Russia after he attacked police officers with an ax had planned to travel to Germany to join members of his family there, two people who knew him told Reuters. Usman Murdalov, 21, and his friend Sulim Israilov, 18, armed themselves with axes and attacked a traffic police post near Moscow on Aug. 17. In a video posted online a day later, they professed loyalty to Islamic State. The two people who knew him said that Murdalov, up to the point when he left his home village in the Russian region of Chechnya on Aug. 12, had been making arrangements to travel to Germany to join his father and his step-mother who moved there three months earlier. Germany has seen a spate of violent attacks in the past few months, including two blamed on Islamists. Security officials have said that people with extremist links, some of them Chechens, are getting into Germany by passing themselves off as migrants and asylum seekers. Ingo Decker, head spokesman for the interior ministry of the German state of Brandenburg, declined to comment on Murdalov or his family, but said the state had been dealing with large numbers of Chechen refugees for years.

50. Iran Satellite Launch Prompts Fear of Long Range Ballistic Missile Attack

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 08 31

Washington - Iranian officials announced on Tuesday that the country is preparing to launch three new satellites into space, renewing concerns from defense experts about Iran's ongoing research into long-range ballistic missile technology that could help it fire a nuclear weapon at Western nations. Mohsen Bahrami, the director of Iran's space agency-- which has long been suspected of providing cover for weapons research--announced that Iran would launch its newest satellite, dubbed "Friendship," later this year. "The Dousti (Friendship) satellite (built) by (experts at) Sharif University of Technology is the first satellite which will be launched in the second half of this (Iranian) year," which began on March 20, Bahrami was quoted as saying by the country's state-controlled press. Defense experts and former U.S. officials told the Washington Free Beacon that the test is likely cover for Iran to pursue illicit intercontinental ballistic missile technology, which could enable the Islamic Republic to fire a nuclear weapon over great distances. Asked about the reports on Tuesday, a State Department spokesman told the Free Beacon that it will not take a position on the launch before it has occurred.

Beirut - Daesh (ISIS) spokesman and head of external operations Abu Mohammad al-Adnani, one of the group's longest-serving and most prominent leaders, has been killed in Aleppo province in Syria, the group said Tuesday, threatening to avenge his death. Adnani had been one of the last remaining members alive of the group that founded Daesh, along with the group's self-appointed caliph Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi. As Daesh's spokesman, he was its most visible member. As head of external operations as well, he was in charge of attacks overseas, an increasingly important tactic for the group as its core Iraqi and Syrian territory has been eroded by military losses. Shortly after the announcement, a U.S. defense official told Reuters the United States carried out an airstrike in Syria's town of Al-Bab targeting a senior Daesh official, declining to disclose the target and saying the operation was still being reviewed. Jerusalem - Journalists have found and mapped at least 72 mass graves in Iraq, the most comprehensive survey so far, and expect that many more will be uncovered as the territory that Islamic State controls in both Syria and Iraq continues to shrink. In Syria, the Associate Press (AP) has obtained locations for 17 mass graves, including one that is believed to contain the bodies of hundreds of members of a single tribe who were killed when Islamic State took over their area. In at least 16 of the graves in Iraq, the territory is still too dangerous to excavate, and officials say they cannot even guess the number of dead. According to AP, which has spent months investigating the issue, the number of known victims ranges from 5,200 to more than 15,000. Speaking at a press conference ahead of an event commemorating fallen Druze soldiers, Pardo said that "If a divided society crosses a certain threshold, you can reach phenomena such as civil war, in extreme cases," adding that the distance between the present-day situation in Israel and a civil war is growing smaller. "I'm afraid we're in that direction," he added. Pardo made his comments in response to a question regarding the threats facing Israel. "Threats to countries today are internal and not external. The Lehava organization, headed by Bentzi Gopstein, organized five camps in the West Bank's southern Hebron Hills over the summer, each lasting for three days. Video of the camp published by the Yedioth Ahronoth newspaper shows dozens of youths taking part in military-style training exercises, including running through obstacle courses and instruction in Krav Maga self-defense. According to Yedioth, some of the training was to be used to teach youths how to fight Israeli security forces, which have launched a crackdown against Jewish extremists in recent years.

57. Palestinian Officials Abuse Journalists
The Media Line, Katie Beiter, 2016 08 31

Jerusalem - Journalists critical of Palestinian policies in the West Bank and Gaza Strip have been imprisoned and tortured according to Human Rights Watch (HRW), a New York-based NGO devoted to human rights activism. HRW released a report August 30 documenting five instances of rights abuses against journalists. According to HRW, officials in the West Bank and Gaza have a long history of clamping down on journalists and restricting freedom of the press by arresting, torturing and bringing criminal charges against them. "The governments in both areas arrest and try to silence those who criticize the authorities and it is having a chilling effect on free speech and public debate on important issues like health, corruption, poverty and politics," Sari Bashi, the Israel/Palestine Director of HRW said. Bashi said that HRW has documented a number of cases in the past five years of activists and journalists being arrested, tortured and charged for expressing criticism of the authorities.

58. US asked to pressure Israel to stop extrajudicial executions

Gulf News, Nasouh Nazzal, 2016 08 31

Ramallah - An official request by the Palestinian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has been submitted calling on the US to put pressure on Israel to end its practice of extrajudicial executions. The call comes after Israeli occupation soldiers gunned down 38-year-old Eyad Zakaria Hamed last week in front of his home in the town of Silwad, just north of Ramallah. An Israeli investigation into the killing showed that Hamed did not pose a threat to the soldiers involved in the shooting. He was unarmed at the time of his murder. The soldier was questioned and released to his unit, an ultra-orthodox Jewish battalion called Netzah Yehuda. International legal and human rights organisations have documented Israel's practice of extrajudicial executions among other crimes contrary to international law. In March, an Israeli rights group has released a video showing the moment an Israeli soldier appears to shoot dead a wounded Palestinian in Hebron minutes after he had stabbed another soldier.

59. Assad Knew about Operation Euphrates Shield, Ankara Aims to Prevent a "Kurdish Corridor"

Asharq Al-Awsat, Saeed Abdelrazek, Paula Astih, 2016 08 31

Ankara, Beirut - Turkey issued a strong warning to Kurdish Forces in north Syria, asking them to immediately move north the Euphrates or become another target, and have called on Washington to abide by its promises in this regard. Turkish deputy Prime Minister Numan Kurtulmus said the main target of Operation Euphrates Shield launched by Ankara last week in North Syria, was to prevent the establishment of a Kurdish corridor stretching from Iraq to the verge of the Mediterranean Sea. Speaking in Ankara on Monday, Kurtulmus said that all relevant parties, including the regime of Bashar Assad, were informed of Turkey's operation in Syria. The Turkish prime minister's office had denied on Monday claims saying Turkish forces were targeting civilians in Syria. Kurtulmus said: "Turkey is not an invader, and does not launch wars. Russia had informed Syria about the operation and we are certain about it."

60. Frankfurt airport terminal reopens after security scare

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 08 31

Frankfurt - Authorities say Frankfurt airport is fully reopened after a portion of Terminal 1 was evacuated when a person entered a secure area without undergoing required searches. Airport operator Fraport said in a Twitter message Wednesday that the airport was returning to normal operations after a disruption that lasted about two hours. All passengers were evacuated as a precaution and had to go through security controls again. Fraport said there were some delays caused by the incident and advised passengers to check with their airlines on the status of their flights. No information was given on whether the person responsible for the alert had been found. (Full report).

61. Italy expels Russian accused of inept bid to buy Nato secrets

London Times, Tom Kington, Deborah Haynes, 2016 08 30

Rome - Italy has handed a suspected Russian spy back to Moscow two months after he was allegedly caught buying Nato secrets from a Portuguese agent. European security sources said that the detention of Sergei Pozdnyakov would have embarrassed and enraged Moscow at a time of tension between Russia and the West. "This was a counter-intelligence coup for the Italians and the Portuguese," one source said. Court documents suggest that the Russian had already got his hands on Nato secrets from the same alleged agent. Mr Pozdnyakov, suspected of being a senior member of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service, had allegedly travelled to Italy without obtaining diplomatic immunity -- a basic error of tradecraft. Paying an official for secret information is illegal, although unspoken diplomatic rules usually mean that a foreign intelligence officer caught running agents is expelled within 48 hours. On this occasion the Russian was freed only last month, without fanfare, after eight weeks behind bars. His alleged occupation was never proved and the Russian embassy described him as a diplomat.

62. Teenage German Girl is Charged With Attempted Murder and Supporting ISIS

Asharq Al-Awsat, Majid al-Khateeb, 2016 08 31

Hanover - German federal prosecutors have charged a 16 year old girl of Moroccan origin named Safia S. who was accused of stabbing a German policeman in the neck with a knife. She was charged with attempted murder, being a supporter of a foreign terrorist organisation and inflicting serious bodily harm on a policeman aged 34 after a six month investigation. A 19 year old man of Syrian origin who knew about the plan to attack non-Muslims was charged with failing to report a crime. The investigation proved that the young extremist has already written about her intentions to carry out a suicide attack in Germany to a friend in Britain via the internet. Safia S. stabbed a policeman in the neck with a kitchen knife she was carrying at a train station in the city of Hanover which is the capital of Lower Saxony on February the 26th. Reports issued by the investigative committee said that she provoked the police more than once and stabbed the policeman whilst he was checking her personal identity.

63. Un policier attaqué par un déséquilibré à Toulouse

Le Figaro, Angélique Négroni, 2016 08 31

Toulouse--Un esprit dérangé qui exprime sa folie en s'emparant de l'actualité. Tel semble être le profil de celui qui a poignardé, ce mardi à Toulouse, un agent de sécurité de 21 ans, dont les jours ne sont pas en danger, en criant : « J'en ai marre de la France, de ce pays ! » L'agression est survenue en début d'après-midi. Venant déposer plainte pour le vol de son portable, au commissariat du centre de la ville, A. A., un Français de 31 ans, d'origine algérienne, quitte les lieux le temps de récupérer le numéro de série de son téléphone. En revenant, et reconnu par l'agent de sécurité, il se fait ouvrir la porte vitrée. C'est alors qu'il s'en prend à un autre fonctionnaire, affecté à la sécurité et qui contrôlait les sacs de personnes à l'entrée. Sortant un couteau de cuisine à lame fixe, le forcené tente d'égorger ce dernier, qui lui tourne le dos. A. A., qui a fait plusieurs séjours psychiatriques, avait déjà fait parler de lui. En 2013, sur le mur du même commissariat, il avait tagué l'inscription suivante : « affaire Merah = Sarkozy + DCRI = terrorisme » . L'année suivante, et lors d'une manifestation propalestinienne, il avait projeté des cocktails Molotov contre les forces de l'ordre et contre une synagogue de la ville.

1. Canadians lack understanding of CSE and why it needs to snoop

The Hill Times, Phil Gurski, 2016 09 05

Op-ed: If there is one spy agency in Canada that is poorly understood and about which much of little veracity has been published it has to be CSE, or the Communications Security Establishment. CSE has a number of roles, but the one that gets the most public attention is signals intelligence, or SIGINT. This method of intelligence collection entails capturing telecommunications in a variety of forms by a variety of techniques, few of which are known. This is indeed a good thing: the spy agency that openly shares how it gathers intelligence will not be in the spy business very long. This may sound sacrilege to some, but some things need to remain secret. CSE is not a law-enforcement agency and does not go to court to acquire warrants to collect information, unlike CSIS and the RCMP. It is limited to the collection of intelligence outside Canada and it cannot include Canadians (or Americans, British, Australians, and New Zealanders for that matter--Canada's so-called "five eyes"partners) in its dragnet. And yet, some information pertaining to Canadians has apparently been picked up, and the scale of that collection appears to be on the upswing, according to a recent National Post article. Should Canadians be worried? It is hard to say, but I will go with no. Before I explain why I think that there are limited circumstances under which CSE should be able to collect information on Canadians, it would be remiss not to note that I worked for that organization for almost 20 years. I knew how it operated very well in the pre-9/11 period, but would not purport to be an expert on how it operates now. Nevertheless, I am certain that the same rigour and observance of Canadian law, as well as internal policies, are being followed today much as they were when I was there. We do not know precisely what kinds of information were collected, but there is a particular circumstance under which Canadian communications should and must be intercepted by CSE, and I think that Canadians would agree with me. 2. 10 choses qui ont changé depuis le 11 septembre 2001

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles (site web), Mélanie Meloche-Holubowski, 2016 09 06

Ottawa - Quinze ans ont passé depuis la pire attaque terroriste de l'histoire des États-Unis. Les attaques sur le World Trade Center et le Pentagone ont fait 2977 morts... et le monde continue d'en subir les conséquences. Voici 10 choses qui ont changé depuis cet attentat qui est resté ancré dans nos mémoires. Charles-Philippe David, de la Chaire Raoul- Dandurand de l'UQAM, Nicolas Hénin, un journaliste français qui a été retenu en otage par le groupe armé État islamique (EI), Michel Juneau-Katsuya, expert en sécurité nationale, Stéphane Berthomet, codirecteur de l'Observatoire sur la radicalisation et l'extrémisme violent, et Rachida Azdouz, psychologue et spécialiste en relations interculturelles, de l'Université de Montréal, ont parlé de ces nombreux changements à l'émission 24-60. 1. L'attentat à New York a inauguré une nouvelle ère « Le 11 Septembre a été un moment fondateur, le début d'une nouvelle époque. On le voit même dans les discours utilisés au cours des attentats depuis. On dit : "ça ne sera plus jamais comme avant" », illustre le journaliste Nicolas Hénin. Le vrai exemple du terrorisme à grande échelle, c'est le 11 Septembre. Et c'est resté. Nicolas Hénin Ce fut aussi le début d'une guerre de longue haleine entre l'Occident et les groupes djihadistes (Al-Qaïda, puis le groupe armé État islamique), croit Nicolas Hénin. Vaincre le terrorisme est un défi sérieux et ambitieux. Ainsi, la bataille sera de longue haleine, affirme M. Hénin, qui ajoute que les pays occidentaux doivent s'attendre à subir d'autres attaques terroristes au cours des prochaines années.

3. Fewer feel government is broken, survey finds

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 09 06

Ottawa - Most Canadians think the federal government is working better today with the Liberals at the helm than when the Conservatives were in power, a new survey suggests. The survey by The Environics Institute and the Institute on Governance into public perceptions about the way they are governed found Canadians are more likely to feel government is working - as opposed to broken - than they were in 2014. Two surveys into Canadians' views of how we are governed were conducted 18 months apart, the most recent in February, but the comparative results are being made public now for the first time. They suggest Canadians may still have the same complaints about government as they did in 2014 but that concerns about its lack of trustworthiness, its corruption or its not being responsive to citizens' wants and needs have declined significantly. Keith Neuman, executive director of The Environics Institute, said he couldn't conclusively say the change was due to the so-called Trudeau effect because the survey didn't ask about political affiliations or how respondents voted. New governments always have a honeymoon period, especially when replacing a long-serving predecessor. Heightening the contrast, one survey was conducted during the final leg of the Tory era while the second was conducted during the early months of the Justin Trudeau government.

4. Firm owned by Canadian sold armoured vehicles to Sudan despite export ban

Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York, 2016 09 06

Toronto - A Canadian-owned company has sold 30 armoured vehicles to Sudan, newly obtained documents show, despite Canadian regulations that ban the export of military and paramilitary equipment to the war-torn country. Because of Sudan's violent crackdown in Darfur, Canada imposed sanctions more than a decade ago that prohibit Canadian citizens from selling "arms and related material" to anyone in Sudan. Its definition of this material includes "military and paramilitary equipment." The documents, United Arab Emirates export permits obtained by The Globe and Mail, indicate that the Typhoon armoured trucks were exported to Sudan by Streit Security Vehicles, which is part of Streit Group, owned by Canadian businessman Guerman Goutorov. The papers show that Streit Security Vehicles exported 30 armoured Typhoon trucks to Sudan in 2012 from its factory in the UAE. The "end user" is listed as the "Sudan Police." A spokesman for Streit Group would not comment on the Sudan sale. But when asked about a similar sale in South Sudan, the company insisted its vehicles are not military vehicles and are not exported with any form of weaponry. A Globe investigation over the past 18 months has documented a growing number of examples of Canadian sales of military-related equipment to countries with poor human-rights records, including a $15-billion deal to sell weaponized armoured vehicles to Saudi Arabia.

5. Islamistes et collabos

Journal de Montréal, Richard Martineau, 2016 09 06

Chronique - Dans son dernier numéro, le magazine français Marianne consacre sa couverture aux femmes d'origine arabe et de culture musulmane qui combattent courageusement l'islamisme. On défend maintenant le port du burkini dans nos écoles ! Parmi elles: une psychanalyste, une chercheuse, une enseignante, deux réalisatrices et l'essayiste québécoise Djemila Benhabib. LES TRAITRES Dans une (trop) courte entrevue, Mme Benhabib parle des féministes de gauche qui défendent les barbus sous prétexte que la haine des femmes est plus acceptable lorsqu'elle vient «d'ailleurs». «Désormais, je mets les islamo-gauchistes sur le même plan que les islamistes, dit-elle. Je ne fais plus de différence, car ces femmes apportent leur complicité en toute connaissance de cause. «Elles nous font autant de tort que les islamistes, elles ont choisi leur camp. «Ce courant nous a trahis. Il a lâché les démocrates iraniens, puis algériens, il a lâché la laïcité et il a lâché les femmes. «C'est impardonnable.» Bref, pour Djemila Benhabib, fini le temps où l'on marchait sur des oeufs quand venait le temps de nommer les complices des barbus. Ce ne sont pas des «islamo-gauchistes» ou des «idiots utiles». Ce sont des islamistes, point. Ces gens permettent à l'idéologie islamiste d'avancer, d'occuper davantage de terrain et de faire reculer la liberté des femmes. Donc, appelons-les par leur nom.

6. It's in Canada's self-interest to defend rights

Ottawa Citizen, Shannon Gormley, 2016 09 06

Op-ed: Another meeting between a powerful dictatorship and a liberal democracy, another chance to pretend that by defending universal values, governments unavoidably hurt their countries' own interests. China has perfected the art of censoring speech, repressing minorities, jailing critics and flouting the rule of law at home. The consequences of its abuse extend beyond the mainland, though. Not content to delete the online musings of 14-year-olds in their parents' Shanghai apartments, China is sending its censors abroad. A South Korean court recently yanked a classical music performance from a theatre in Seoul. Why would a court of law in a democratic country demote itself to the position of crazed art critic? The court itself noted that the Chinese Embassy threatened South Korea with financial reprisals if the show went on. And why would the Chinese Embassy lower itself to issuing threats about a show in a foreign country? The show was about the Falun Gong, a minority group that China pathologically persecutes. If only the stakes were no higher than art. But by persecuting yet another minority, China inflames international terrorism while supposedly fighting domestic terrorism: In Xinjiang province, where most Uighur Muslims live, China doesn't let kids enter mosques, doesn't let mosques broadcast the call to prayer, and doesn't let anyone who might go to mosque travel without ID cards, wear head scarves, grow large beards, or give their children names that sound too Muslimy. 7. L'imam Hamza Chaoui prêche dans des lieux publics

La Presse+, Philippe Teisceira-Lessard, 2016 09 06

Montréal - Le controversé imam Hamza Chaoui, au coeur l'an dernier d'un projet avorté de « centre communautaire islamique » destiné aux jeunes Montréalais, offre maintenant ses enseignements religieux dans des lieux publics. L'homme organise occasionnellement des sorties, destinées aux jeunes hommes, qui mélangent « soccer, rappels religieux, barbecue », selon sa page Facebook. Elles s'ajoutent à ses cours hebdomadaires à la mosquée Soumna, dans Parc-Extension. La dernière sortie a eu lieu à la fin du mois d'août au parc Jarry. Il en a publié des images sur les réseaux sociaux. On l'y voit s'adressant à un groupe d'une douzaine de jeunes, dont au moins deux enfants. « Soyez au rendez-vous pour d'autres sorties », a écrit le prêcheur. Dans un message à La Presse, M. Chaoui a affirmé qu'il « poursui[t] toujours [s]es activités religieuses d'imam et de prédicateur avec les jeunes et avec la communauté en général dans différentes mosquées ». « Les sorties ne sont pas un remplacement du centre que nous n'avons pas encore ouvert dans l'Est, a-t-il précisé. Les sorties ne sont pas en collaboration avec une mosquée ou un centre culturel en particulier, c'est une activité indépendante. » Islam et démocratie Hamza Chaoui expose que l'islam et la démocratie sont « complètement » incompatibles parce qu'un homosexuel ou un athée peut devenir député. « Le vote en islam est haram [un péché] et n'est pas permis », a-t-il dit. « La démocratie est un système de mécréance et il faut le boycotter. » -- Hamza Chaoui M. Chaoui juge aussi sévèrement le système criminel canadien, qui n'apprendrait pas aux criminels à ne plus recommencer. Dans un prêche prononcé en 2013, il défend notamment l'amputation d'une main devant la foule pour punir les voleurs ainsi que la lapidation pour les époux adultères. Il souligne toutefois que les musulmans d'ici ne devaient pas se faire justice eux-mêmes ou appliquer cette loi au Canada.

9. Petit lexique pour mieux comprendre

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine, 2016 09 06

Non identifié - Islamique ou islamiste ? Ça veut dire quoi, faire le djihad ? Les Arabes sont-ils tous musulmans ? Un niqab, est-ce que ça couvre le visage ou seulement les cheveux ? Au Québec, l'enjeu de la radicalisation choque. Il soulève les passions... et il sème beaucoup de confusion. Pour démêler tout ça, nous avons demandé l'aide du professeur de sociologie à l'UQAM Rachad Antonius, expert de l'islam et des communautés arabes au Québec. Petit lexique illustré. Arabe ou musulman ? Tous les Arabes ne sont pas musulmans et les musulmans ne sont pas tous Arabes. Définitions. Musulman Un musulman est quelqu'un dont la religion est l'islam, mais cela n'exclut pas qu'on puisse devenir non pratiquant ou non croyant. Il y a 1,4 milliard de musulmans dans le monde, répartis dans divers continents et pays différents, et ayant des cultures très diversifiées. De plus, les sociétés musulmanes sont traversées par des interprétations très variées, parfois contradictoires de l'islam, explique M. Antonius. Arabe Les Arabes sont les citoyens de pays où la langue arabe est dominante (22 pays). Ce n'est pas un groupe ethnique à proprement parler, mais avant tout une culture et une identité politiques. La grande majorité des Arabes sont musulmans, mais beaucoup d'Arabes sont chrétiens ou juifs. Les Arabes ne constituent que 20 % des musulmans. Une forte proportion des Québécois arabes sont chrétiens, précise M. Antonius. À noter : la Turquie, l'Iran et l'Afghanistan ne sont pas des pays arabes.

10. Principal under investigation for anti-Muslim posts

Toronto Star, Noor Javed, 2016 09 06

Toronto - The York Region District School Board is investigating allegations that an elementary school principal put anti-Muslim posts on her Facebook page. A spokesman for the board said it was aware of concerns raised by a community member about public postings on a Facebook page under the name Ghada Sadaka. Sadaka is identified as a principal in the York board on the page. "We take all matters of this nature seriously. After learning of the allegations, the board has begun an investigation," said YRDSB spokesperson Licinio Miguelo. "This is a personnel matter, and as such details cannot be provided, however we will conduct a thorough investigation, follow all protocols and policies and take any necessary measures," he said. Some of the Facebook posts the principal is alleged to have shared and commented on include: videos purportedly showing violent "Muslim takeovers" of Paris and London; articles expressing concerns around bringing refugees to Canada, given their "terrorist sympathies"; and another headlined: "Must see: Dutch mayor tells fellow Muslims they can f----- if they don't like freedom." Sadaka, the new principal at Sir Wilfrid Laurier Public School in Markham, referred all questions to the board's head office when contacted by the Star Friday. "I appreciate your questions, but for any further information you will have to go through the board office," she said.

11. That's anti-Canadian

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 06

Editorial: Kellie Leitch, the Conservative MP and candidate for her party's leadership, caused a stir last week when she e-mailed supporters with a questionnaire that asked them, among other things, whether the federal government should screen potential immigrants for "anti-Canadian values." Ms. Leitch was duly criticized, but she didn't back down. "Screening potential immigrants for anti-Canadian values that include intolerance towards other religions, cultures and sexual orientations, violent and/or misogynist behaviour and/or a lack of acceptance of our Canadian tradition of personal and economic freedoms is a policy proposal that I feel very strongly about," she said Friday. It's now clear that Ms. Leitch is all too happy to play identity politics. This is the same person who, as minister for the Status of Women during the federal election campaign last year, announced the creation of a tip line for people to report "barbaric cultural practices." She later claimed she was misunderstood. She wasn't. It's clearly her practice to sell policies that raise fears of Muslim immigrants based on inaccurate stereotypes about their culture and beliefs.

12. Air Force, Short of Drone Pilots, Uses Contractors to Fight Terror

New York Times, Michael S. Schmidt, 2016 09 06

Washington - The American military's extensive use of drones against the Islamic State and other terrorist groups has resulted in a shortage of Air Force pilots and other personnel to operate the aircraft, leading the Pentagon to rely more on private contractors for reconnaissance missions in Afghanistan and Iraq. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Pentagon has used contractors to perform many duties traditionally carried out by uniformed personnel, like protecting military bases and feeding service members. The contractors who are now serving as drone pilots are based in the regions where the drones are flown, and they are legally prohibited from being "trigger pullers" and firing weapons, Air Force officials said. But there is no limit on the type of reconnaissance they can perform, and they are providing live video feeds of battles and special operations. As the Obama administration has accelerated its campaign against the Islamic State in Iraq, Syria and Libya over the past 10 months, the Pentagon has added four drones flown by contractors to the roughly 60 that are typically flown every day by uniformed Air Force personnel. Over the next two years, the Pentagon plans to add six more operated by contractors, the officials said. The number and identities of contractors working on the drone flights are considered classified information, the Air Force said. But Pentagon officials said there are at least several hundred contractors, many of them former drone or fighter pilots who are making double or triple their military salaries.

13. Hillary Clinton Accuses Russia of Interfering With U.S. Election

New York Times, Amy Chozick, 2016 09 06

Moline, Illinois - Hillary Clinton accused Russian intelligence of interfering with the American election, implying that President Vladimir V. Putin viewed a victory by Donald J. Trump as a destabilizing event that would weaken the United States and buttress Russian interests. "It's almost unthinkable," Mrs. Clinton said on Monday, referring to what she called recent "credible reports about Russian interference in our elections" and citing a hacking of the Democratic National Committee's emails in July. "We've never had the nominee of one of our major parties urging the Russians to hack," Mrs. Clinton said in a news conference. "I want everyone -- Democrat, Republican, Independent -- to understand the real threat that this represents." The comments, Mrs. Clinton's most extensive yet on one of the more unusual subplots of the presidential campaign, came after a Washington Post report that United States intelligence and law enforcement agencies are probing a wide, covert Russian effort to disrupt the presidential election. Asked by a reporter if Russia's actions amounted to a cyberwar, Mrs. Clinton said, "I'm not comfortable using the word 'war.'"

14. Inside Menwith Hill

The Intercept, Ryan Gallagher, 2016 09 06

Washington - The narrow roads are quiet and winding, surrounded by rolling green fields and few visible signs of life beyond the occasional herd of sheep. But on the horizon, massive white golf ball-like domes protrude from the earth, protected behind a perimeter fence that is topped with piercing razor wire. Here, in the heart of the tranquil English countryside, is the National Security Agency's largest overseas spying base. Once known only by the code name Field Station 8613, the secret base -- now called Menwith Hill Station -- is located about nine miles west of the small town of Harrogate in North Yorkshire. Originally used to monitor Soviet communications through the Cold War, its focus has since dramatically shifted, and today it is a vital part of the NSA's sprawling global surveillance network. For years, journalists and researchers have speculated about what really goes on inside Menwith Hill, while human rights groups and some politicians have campaigned for more transparency about its activities. Yet the British government has steadfastly refused to comment, citing a longstanding policy not to discuss matters related to national security. Now, however, top-secret documents obtained by The Intercept offer an unprecedented glimpse behind Menwith Hill's razor wire fence. The files reveal for the first time how the NSA has used the British base to aid "a significant number of capture-kill operations" across the Middle East and North Africa, fueled by powerful eavesdropping technology that can harvest data from more than 300 million emails and phone calls a day. Over the past decade, the documents show, the NSA has pioneered groundbreaking new spying programs at Menwith Hill to pinpoint the locations of suspected terrorists accessing the internet in remote parts of the world. The programs -- with names such as GHOSTHUNTER and GHOSTWOLF -- have provided support for conventional British and American military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. But they have also aided covert missions in countries where the U.S. has not declared war. NSA employees at Menwith Hill have collaborated on a project to help "eliminate" terrorism targets in Yemen, for example, where the U.S. has waged a controversial drone bombing campaign that has resulted in dozens of civilian deaths.

15. Intelligence community investigating covert Russian influence operations in the United States

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 05

Washington - U.S. intelligence and law enforcement agencies are probing what they see as a broad covert Russian operation in the United States to sow public distrust in the upcoming presidential election and in U.S. political institutions, intelligence and congressional officials said. The aim is to understand the scope and intent of the Russian campaign, which incorporates cyber-tools to hack systems used in the political process, enhancing Russia's ability to spread disinformation. The effort to better understand Russia's covert influence operations is being spearheaded by James R. Clapper Jr., the director of national intelligence. "This is something of concern for the DNI," said Charles Allen, a former longtime CIA officer who has been briefed on some of these issues. "It is being addressed." A Russian influence operation in the United States "is something we're looking very closely at," said one senior intelligence official who, as others interviewed, spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss a sensitive matter. Officials are also examining potential disruptions to the election process, and the FBI has alerted state and local officials to potential cyberthreats. The official cautioned that the intelligence community is not saying it has "definitive proof" of such tampering, or any Russian plans to do so. "But even the hint of something impacting the security of our election system would be of significant concern," the official said. "It's the key to our democracy, that people have confidence in the election system."

16. Obama Met With Putin, Said Hackers Shouldn't Create a Cyber 'Wild Wild West'

ABC News, Jordyn Phelps, 2016 09 05

New York - President Obama addressed his tense, 90-minute-long meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin on the sidelines of the G20 in a press conference on Monday. The two leaders apparently held fast to their positions on hot button issues like cyber-security and brokering a cease-fire in Syria. Russian hackers having been implicated in some current cyber threats and security issues was a key topic. Though Obama didn't identify specific instances, he said "we have had problems with cyber intrusions from Russia in the past" and that the goal is to not to duplicate a "cycle of escalation" that has occurred in arms races of the past. "What we cannot do is have a situation where this becomes the wild, wild West, where countries that have significant cyber capacity start engaging in unhealthy competition or conflict through these means," the president said. He added that nations have enough to worry about in the realm of cyber attacks from non-state actors without nation-states engaging in hacking against one another.

17. Isis 'given hitlist' as MoD puts 20,000 soldier names online

London Times, Deborah Haynes, 2016 09 06

London - The Ministry of Defence was accused of a security blunder last night for publishing online the name, rank and army number of 20,000 soldiers and potential recruits. The details of every regular officer, reservist officer and university trainee were available on the government website. One soldier described it as effectively providing a "target list" for Islamic State militants at a time of heightened security risk. The three documents also include every adult volunteer in the army cadet force. "This is a serious security threat when Isis and other groups are looking to target individuals," Major Chris Green, a reservist who has left the force but whose details are on a list, said. One serving reservist who is named said: "They've basically provided a target list for Isis." The Army List has always been a publicly accessible document as a hard copy, with online versions published in recent years. An MoD spokesman said: "The security of our people is our foremost concern and we keep measures to address the threats to them under constant review."

18. ISIS Recruiter Reaches out to British Model Using Facebook

Asharq Al-Awsat, Raneem Hannoush, 2016 09 06

London - West Yorkshire's anti-terror police announced on Sunday its fears of a former British model being led on for recruitment by the terror group ISIS. The model was being recruited through Facebook. The Sunday Times has discovered that Kimberley Miners, 27, has been reached out to by the ultra-hardline group through social media, Facebook. A British ISIS member fighting in Syria appearing under the alias Abu Usamah al-Britani had been contacting her. The recruiter has been grooming Miners to become a bride to one of the militants abroad and has been preparing for her departure from the United Kingdom. Miners codenamed herself as Aisha Lauren al-Britaniya and has posted images of women brandishing rifles and other weapons. A spokesman for the British Home Office told Asharq Al-Awsat newspaper in a phone interview that the matter concerning Miners touches very sensitive grounds, which is why MI5 and anti-terror police will maintain top discretion during investigations.

19. It's High Time for Prisons Within Prisons to Hold Jihadists

The Daily Beast, Maajid Nawaz, 2016 09 05

London - The recent terrorism conviction of Anjem Choudary, the West's most prolific media cheerleader for the so-called Islamic State, raised questions about his incarceration in prisons that have--in some cases --been labelled jihadist training camps. Indeed, terrorist recruitment in prisons is one of the biggest challenges the West faces today, and Jihadi- Joker Anjem Choudary would thrive in such an environment. Prison radicalization is a real and sustained problem. Petty criminals predisposed to violence like "shoe-bomber" Richard Reid caught trying to blow up a transatlantic flight out of Paris in 2001 initially were radicalized in this very way, by mixing with hardened jihadist ideologues inside Britain's jails, only to come out and attempt to attack the United States. As of this summer there were 12,633 Muslims in prison in England and Wales. While of the 147 convicted terrorists in UK jails, 137 defined themselves as Muslim. A 20 percent increase in the jail population has been outstripped by a 122 percent rise in Muslim inmates. Muslims make up just one in twenty Britons, but one in seven inmates. In the U.S., rough estimates suggest that 35,000- 40,000 prisoners convert to Islam each year. Nationally at around 350,000 inmates, 15 percent of the U.S. prison population is Muslim. This is more than 18 percent the proportion of Americans who are Muslim. That's a huge disparity. These psychologically vulnerable Muslim prisoners must not be allowed to mix with charismatic, committed and convincing jihadist ideological recruiters.

20. MPs to urge ban on UK arms sales to Saudi Arabia

The Guardian (London), Patrick Wintour, 2016 09 05

London - Fresh calls for a UK ban on arms sales to Saudi Arabia are due to be made this week when the powerful all-party select committee on arms export controls meets to finalise a report expected to be deeply critical of the 18-month Saudi-led bombing campaign in Yemen. A cross-party push will be made for the committee to urge the UK to suspend its multibillion-pound arms sales to Saudi Arabia in a move that would infuriate Riyadh, unnerve arms manufacturers and embarrass the Conservative government. Since the 16-strong committee last met before the recess, Saudi airstrikes on 15 August left 19 killed and 24 injured when a raid hit a Yemeni hospital supported by Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF). It was the fourth attack on an MSF facility in Yemen in a year, and led to the MSF withdrawing from parts of Yemen. MSF insisted it had shared the hospital's GPS coordinates with all parties involved in the conflict. On 25 August the United Nations' top human rights official, Zeid Ra'ad al-Hussein, called for an international independent inquiry into the Saudi air campaign. The UN's report showed that 60% of the civilian deaths documented in a one-year period resulted from airstrikes carried out by the Saudi-led coalition on weddings, markets, schools and hospitals. In several of those attacks, the UN said it was unable to identify any possible military target. The UK government has said it was not against an international inquiry, but favoured a Saudi-led inquiry. In August at a press conference in Bahrain, the Saudi-led coalition cleared itself of breaches of humanitarian law in six out of eight cases investigated, including raids last year on a delivery by UN World Food Programme trucks that had not coordinated with the coalition.

21. Parliament's back for Snoopers' Charter. Former head of GCHQ talks to El Reg

The Register (UK), Alexander J. Martin, 2016 09 05

London - Parliament has returned from recess (only for a fortnight before conference season begins) and the House of Lord's committee stage examination of the Investigatory Powers Bill will resume this afternoon. The upper chamber had been waiting for the publication of a review of the bill's bulk powers, which had been led by the independent reviewer of terrorism legislation, David Anderson QC. Bulk hacking missions were addressed last week at a panel convened by the Chartered Institute of IT. Academics, National Crime Agency representatives, and Sir David Omand -- the former director of GCHQ and visiting professor at KCL -- discussed the difficulties that traditional law enforcement techniques encountered when attempting to tackle cybercrime. Corresponding with The Register, Sir David explained how in his experience such bulk hacking powers were necessary for law enforcement purposes on the internet, rather than just being necessary for national security reasons. Omand wrote: "The recent serious rise in global cybercrime by organised criminal groups...has only reinforced the importance of having the specialist techniques and international liaisons of the secret agencies available to support the investigations of law enforcement."

The demonstrators say they have "shut down London City Airport to protest the UK's environmental impact on black people". Police said the nine protesters locked themselves together and erected a tripod on the runway, while it has been reported that they bypassed security and reached the airport by using a rubber dinghy to cross the docks. As of around 10.15am, there had been seven arrests, but only two protesters had been removed from the runway.

23. Universal credit poses a major security risk, spies tell No 10

London Times, Oliver Wright, 2016 09 06

London - The universal credit welfare programme was sent back to the drawing board because spies warned that it was insecure and could lead to millions of people being hacked, a report reveals. Experts working for GCHQ, the government's listening agency, contacted Downing Street in alarm after being "fobbed off" by the Department for Work and Pensions over security flaws in the benefits programme. As a result plans to launch the service next year were abandoned. Today only about 300,000 people are receiving benefit payments through universal credit and the system will not be fully operational until 2022 at the earliest. GCHQ's involvement in delaying universal credit is revealed in a report by the Institute for Government into how the welfare reform programme went disastrously wrong.

24. Australian police take seriously on terror attack from IS

Xinhua News Agency, Matt Walsh, 2016 09 06

Canberra - Police in Australia on Tuesday said they will take seriously on the threat posed by "lone wolf" terrorists, in the wake of a frightening statement from an Islamic State (IS) publication calling for public executions at famous landmarks. The article was published in the first edition of terror magazine Rumiya, and it calls on Australian followers of IS to kill citizens "even in their backyards." Police commissioner Graham Ashton said the threat would still be taken seriously, especially in the lead up to finals for the two major sporting competitions, the Australian Football League (AFL) and the National Rugby League (NRL). "If we need to beef up that (security) presence, we will," he told the press on Tuesday. "There is nothing at this stage to suggest," he said. "This is propaganda from IS. If anything does emerge of any specificity it will be acted upon quickly by our Joint Counter Terrorism Strike Team." Victoria's Premier Daniel Andrews said while the national threat level for terrorism remains at "probable," Victoria Police was taking the threat "very seriously." The state's capital, Melbourne, is set to host a number of AFL and NRL finals over the next month.

25. Many Chinese nationals still aligned with Beijing, says Dibb

The Australian, Cameron Stewart, 2016 09 05

Canberra - A dangerous number of Chinese nationals in Australia owe their primary allegiance to Beijing rather than to Australia, one of the country's leading strategic experts has warned. Professor Paul Dibb says the Chinese community in Australia has adopted an increasingly - strident pro-Chinese government view in recent years, largely influenced by the Chinese embassy in Canberra. It is a trend, he says, that risks fuelling a fresh backlash against foreign investment in Australia. "The fact is that there are a considerable number of Chinese residents and students here that feel nostalgic about the People's Republic and its ruling party," Professor Dibb writes in The Australian today. "If that is so, we have a dangerous case on our hands with a group of people who are not integrating and who owe allegiance to a foreign power." Professor Dibb's comments come amid growing political debate about the issue of Chinese investment in Australia and its implications for national security. Chinese President Xi Jinping has urged Malcolm Turnbull to adopt a "fair" and "transparent" approach to investment after China was angered by the rejection of two $10 billion-plus bids for the NSW Ausgrid power network. "The debate about Chinese investment in Australia and the presence here of a large Chinese community raises serious questions about Chinese influence and intentions," Professor Dibb writes.

26. Teen allegedly built cooker bomb

The Age, Jane Lee, 2016 09 05

Canberra - A teenager followed instructions from an Islamist propaganda article called "Make a bomb in the kitchen of your mom" to prepare for a Mother's Day terror attack in Melbourne, a court has heard. Victoria Police seized items used to build explosive devices in a raid on the boy's family home in Greenvale last year, including three bombs they later detonated under safe conditions in a nearby park. Fairfax Media has reported that police believed the raid thwarted a massacre the boy had planned for Mother's Day in May last year. The 18-year-old - referred to as MHK - has pleaded guilty to partially constructing an improvised explosive device and accessing documents related to such devices in preparation for or planning a terrorist act. He appeared in the Supreme Court on Monday for a pre-sentence hearing. Prosecutor Sarah McNaughton, SC, said police had found documents from a 2010 issue of Al Qaeda propaganda magazine Inspire on the boy's computer. The court heard the teenager told shop staff he was buying a pressure cooker for his mother and fairy lights for his sister but instead used the items to make the bomb for a planned terror attack.

27. Turnbull vows no pause in fight against ISIS

The Australian, David Crowe, 2016 09 05

Canberra - Malcolm Turnbull has urged an "unrelenting" military campaign to defeat Islamic State amid talks with fellow leaders on a political settlement in Syria, one week after announcing new rules to widen the scope for Australian strikes on terrorist targets. The Prime Minister spoke with Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday on the challenges in Syria and held a formal meeting last night with Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, a key figure in the effort to halt the radicalisation of foreign fighters. The talks were held on the sidelines of the G20 summit in Hangzhou where US President Barack Obama held talks with Mr Putin but failed to reach an agreement on halting offensives by forces loyal to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in areas held by rebels backed by the US. Mr Turnbull declared at the G20 summit in Turkey last year that a political solution was the ultimate objective in Syria to end a war that has killed an estimated 500,000 people, setting off a storm among some conservatives in Australia at a time when former prime minister Tony Abbott put more weight on military operations against Islamic State.

Alger - La France espionne l'Algérie. Les Etats-Unis espionnent la France. Tout le monde s'espionne. Même si les chefs d'Etat et de gouvernement jouent les vierges effarouchées, cette information est une réalité connue de tous. Surtout sur le volet économique où l'espionnage des entreprises et laboratoires ignore les pays amis. La nouveauté ce sont ces révélations confiées par Bernard Barbier, un ancien cadre des services d'espionnage français, Bernard Barbier, rapportés lors du Symposium central supélec. Cet ancien espion confirme les révélations faites déjà par Le Monde en mars 2014. Le quotidien vespéral français avait révélé que les services secrets français espionnait l'Algérie, le Canada, la Côte d'Ivoire, l'Iran grâce à un logiciel. Bernard Barbier a abondé dans le même sens que les anciennes révélations, rappelant que c'est grâce à un logiciel malveillant du nom de code Babar que la Direction générale des services extérieurs (DGSE, espionnage extérieur français) espionne un certain nombre de pays, dont l'Algérie. Selon cet ancien limier, le logiciel "Babar" a été détecté par les services canadiens qui ont retrouvé des traces dudit logiciel dans plusieurs pays, comme l'Iran, l'Espagne, la Grèce, la Côte d'Ivoire ou l'Algérie.

31. Analysts: Negotiating With Nigeria's Oil Militants Could Encourage Them

Voice of America, Chris Stein, 2016 09 06

Lagos - If Nigeria's government plans to sit down with the militant groups that have wreaked havoc on its oil industry, they will need a lot of chairs. More than a dozen groups have appeared since attacks on oil pipelines started earlier this year, each claiming their own constituencies and making their own demands. While some in the Niger Delta say dialogue is the best way to save lives and quell the ongoing insurgency, others say the government's July decision to talk with the militant groups is merely encouraging them. Starting earlier this year, a group calling itself the Niger Delta Avengers took credit for a series of blasts targeting pipelines and other types of oil infrastructure that severely disrupted Nigeria's oil output. The Joint Niger Delta Liberation Force, Utorogun Liberation Movement, Red Scorpion and the Reformed Egbesu Boys are all groups that have popped up in recent months. Some, like the Niger Delta Greenland Justice Mandate, say they've carried out attacks. Others merely list demands, or claim they're not taking part in government negotiations.

32. DGSN: liens avérés entre le Polisario et les membres du réseau de trafic de drogue démantelé

La Relève (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 09 04

Boujdour, Maroc - DGSN: liens avérés entre le Polisario et les membres du réseau de trafic de drogue démantelé près de Boujdour Les premiers éléments de l'enquête menée par la Brigade nationale de la police judiciaire (BNPJ) sur le réseau de trafic international de drogue, démantelé jeudi, ont démontré l'existence de ramifications régionales de ce réseau dans les camps de Tindouf et le nord du Mali. Les premiers éléments de l'enquête ont également permis d'établir des liens avérés de ses membres avec des responsables du Polisario et leur collusion avec des activités terroristes, indique la Direction générale de la sûreté nationale (DGSN). Ces investigations ont prouvé que le propriétaire de la drogue saisie, originaire du nord du Mali, a passé un accord avec l'un des trafiquants connu dans les camps de Tindouf sous le nom de "Robio" en vue de garantir l'opération de transport et d'acheminement de la drogue au Mali en contrepartie d'une importante somme d'argent, précise vendredi la DGSN dans un communiqué. Le dénommé "Robio" a mobilisé tous les moyens logistiques pour la réussite de cette opération, dont il a confié l'exécution à un groupe de personnes originaires de Tindouf, en l'occurrence un chauffeur, un guide et des transporteurs, parmi lesquels figure le fils du soi-disant "ministre du Développement" de la fantomatique "RASD" et ancien wali du soi-disant camp d'Es-Smara, souligne la même source. Et d'ajouter que "Robio" est connu pour ses activités dans les domaines du crime organisé transfrontalier et est soupçonné d'implication dans des actes terroristes, dont le rapt de trois Européens dans le camp de Rabouni près de Tindouf .

33. South Sudan to Allow More U.N. Peacekeepers, but Force Will Be No 'Panacea'

New York Times, Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 09 05

Ukunda, Kenya - Under intense pressure, South Sudan's beleaguered government has relented and will allow more United Nations peacekeepers into the country. In the two and a half years since civil war erupted, South Sudan has been the scene of atrocities including civilian massacres, the forcing of children into militias, the burning of emergency food supplies and the widespread rape of women and girls, including Western aid workers. Tens of thousands of people have been killed. On Sunday night, during a visit by the United Nations Security Council to Juba, South Sudan's capital, the government agreed to allow the addition of 4,000 peacekeeping troops to the existing force of 14,000 soldiers, police and military observers. Top American officials, including Secretary of State John Kerry and Samantha Power, ambassador to the United Nations, had been pushing hard for the increase and the Security Council authorized the expansion of the force last month. African nations had also supported the move, though South Sudan's government had claimed that it would be an affront to its sovereignty. Shortly after the decision was made public, Ms. Power said that South Sudan's government was weak in terms of the rule of law and warned that the peacekeeping force would not be a "panacea."

"The 'no' won't win. The 'yes' camp will win. I'm completely sure of that and I am not worried about what some call Plan B. I'm absolutely convinced," he said in an interview with AFP on Monday. Santos said he had not been obliged to put the agreement ending the 52-year conflict with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, to a referendum. "But a referendum is a democratic thing, it gives much more legitimacy to an agreement like this one. That's why I insisted there be a referendum," he said.

39. G20 will cooperate in battle to fight graft (Canada)

China Daily, Zhang Yanin, 2016 09 06

Beijing - Members of the G20 have agreed to advance the anti- corruption campaign and refuse to offer "safe havens" for corrupt officials who remain at large in foreign countries. Speaking to journalists at the end of the two-day G20 Leaders Summit in the lakeside city of Hangzhou, Zhejiang province, President Xi Jinping said important breakthroughs have been made this year in the fight against graft with fugitive repatriations and recovery of assets. G20 members have decided to set up an anti-corruption research center in Beijing to provide intelligence support for capturing fugitives and recovering their illegal assets. The summit also passed the G20 2017-18 Anti-Corruption Action Plan, Xi said. "These anti-graft achievements will leave corrupt officials no place to hide in G20 members' territories and in the world at large," Xi said. In recent years, many G20 economies, including the United States and Canada, have become popular destinations for fugitive corrupt officials due to the lack of signed bilateral extradition treaties and legal differences, according to China's Ministry of Public Security. Many corrupt officials have transferred billions of yuan in ill-gotten assets to foreign accounts either through money-laundering and underground banks, according to the ministry.

When the time comes, I will eat you in front of people," Duterte told an audience of Filipinos late on Monday night while in Laos for a regional summit. "If you make me mad, in all honesty, I will eat you alive, raw." Duterte often hurls abusive insults at critics and is waging a brutal war on crime in which nearly 3,000 people have been killed since he took office on June 30. The Abu Sayyaf are a small band of Islamic militants based on remote southern islands of the mainly Catholic Philippines and are listed by the United States as a terrorist organisation. They are notorious for kidnapping foreigners to extract ransoms, and this year beheaded two Canadian hostages.

Op-ed: In a sign of rapprochement with China, the administration of Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Wednesday announced its decision to apply to join the China-backed Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB). Canada, a key US ally, could become the first North American state to assume AIIB membership. More than four decades after his father began paving the way for Sino-Canadian relations in the 1970s, Trudeau is set to open a new era in the bilateral relations. Unlike his predecessor Stephen Harper, who tied Canada closely to the US, Trudeau has opted for a more balanced diplomacy since he took office. The new prime minister aims to rebalance the Harper government's pro-US policies, diluting the excessive political flavor attached in its dealings with China and securing a balance between China and the US. Under Harper's value-based China policy, Sino-Canadian relations encountered myriad stumbling blocks. The Conservative government's approach to developing relations with China was clouded by political prejudices, hostility toward Chinese State-owned enterprises and a failure to recognize the innumerable development opportunities cooperation with China offers. It also left the international community with the strong impression that Canada was unable to disengage itself from the US influence on its foreign policy. 45. Vote in Hong Kong Deepens a Thorn in China's Side (Canada)

New York Times, Michael Forsythe, Alan Wong, 2016 09 06

Hong Kong - In Canada, it is the Québécois. In Spain, the Catalans. In Britain, the Scots. Now, China must deal with its own version of a democratically elected indigenous movement, elevated to positions of political power on Sunday in the only place in the authoritarian country where that is possible: Hong Kong. Six young people -- none older than 40 -- were elected to Hong Kong's legislature on platforms that called for the city's 7.3 million people to decide their own fate, a generation after Britain and China decided it for them by negotiating the handover of the onetime British colony to Chinese rule. These new legislators stand apart from more established and moderate pro-democracy lawmakers who for decades have tried to work with Beijing while pushing for expanded direct elections. Their success speaks to the cost in public opinion that Beijing has suffered for its steadfast refusal to compromise on popular demands for greater participation in the selection of Hong Kong's leader next year.

46. Iran, Britain Exchange Ambassadors after 5 Years (Canada).

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 06

Tehran - Hamid Baeedinejad and Nicholas Hopton submitted their credentials to senior officials in London and Tehran on Monday afternoon to launch their careers as Iran and Britain's ambassadors. "It is over one year that the Islamic Republic of Iran and Britain's embassies have resumed operation and all the current affairs were carried out by the two countries' charge d'affairs. Now fter the rise of (appropriate) conditions to enhance the two countries' relations, the two (states) have decided to station their envoys in Tehran and London," a source at the Iranian foreign ministry said. The parliament approval came a week after the US and Britain targeted Iranian financial sectors with new punitive measures. The sanction against CBI and Iran's petrochemical industry was adopted in a unilateral move by the US, Canada and Britain outside the UN Security Council as other council members, specially Russia and China, had earlier warned against any fresh punitive measure, including sanctions, against Iran.

47. Supreme Leader Calls for Reinvigoration of Iran Cyberspace Activities to Confront Enemies' Threats

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 06

Tehran - Supreme Leader of Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyed Ali Khamenei underlined the vital importance of cyberspace's potentials and capacities in the promotion of the country in various fields and also in defusing enemies' threats. "The enemy is seeking to pervert devoted and righteous youths from the essence of religion; today this is being done across the cyber world," Ayatollah Khamenei said on Tuesday on the occasion of the commencement of education at seminaries across Iran. He noted that confronting this scheme was the first and foremost responsibility of the clergymen, and said, "Seminaries and religious scholars should equip themselves with the capability to confront the massive enemy army." The Supreme Leader said that the cyber world was a simultaneous source of blessing and cursing.

48. 'Iran, aided by proxy terrorist groups, biggest existential threat to Israel'

Jerusalem Post, Daniel K. Eisenbud, 2016 09 06

Jerusalem - Citing Iran and its proxy terrorist organizations, Hamas and Hezbollah, as the greatest existential threats to Israel, former Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) head and current chairman of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, Avi Dichter, said the Middle East is undergoing "tectonic movements." "We used to have three enemy countries: Syria, Jordan and Egypt," said Dichter Monday during an international press briefing at The Israel Project's headquarters in Jerusalem. "We signed a peace treaty with Egypt and Jordan, and today we have four enemy countries - Syria, Lebanon, the Gaza Strip, which has an army of terrorists, and Iran, an enemy state." While Israel has historically engendered a robust level of deterrence against hostile neighbors by winning several damaging wars, he contended that a recently empowered Iran, aided by its allies, now poses the most imminent danger to Israel's security.

49. Canada entry rules change for dual citizens

Gulf News, Derek Baldwin, 2016 09 06

Dubai - Dual citizen Canadians must show a Canadian passport to enter the country under tightened entry rules effective September 30. An estimated 40,000 Canadians live and work in the UAE with many returning home for annual holidays or work-related matters. In years past, the government said that dual citizens often entered Canada using their foreign passports backed up by a citizenship card or a provincial driver's licence to confirm they were Canadian citizens. Now, this practice will end for dual citizens flying into Canada. Without a proper Canadian passport, Canadian citizens will not be allowed to enter the country as part of a new electronic travel authorisation system. In a new advisory, the Canadian government warned that "Canadian citizens will need to have appropriate documents to travel to Canada before they can board their flight. Visa-exempt foreign nationals, meanwhile, travelling to Canada have been shown leniency until the new system is fully online.

50. Lebanon indicts Syria intelligence officers for mosque bombings

Now Lebanon, Albin Szakola, 2016 09 06

Beirut - The Lebanese judiciary has issued an indictment against two Syrian intelligence officers on charges of orchestrating the 2013 twin bombing of two mosques in Tripoli that left dozens dead. On Friday, Judge Alaa Khatib formally indicted Captain Mohammad Ali Ali, who serves in Syrian military's intelligence notorious Brigade 235, commonly known as the "Palestine branch," as well as Nasser Jowban, an official in the regime's Political Security Branch for the bombings. The 44-page report issued by the judge following up on the terror attack accused the two officers of "planning and supervising" the attack. Not only were the two officers indicted, but an "ongoing inquiry" was also opened by Judge Khatib to uncover the identity of the Syrian regime officials who "ordered the attack." "The investigation shows that the order was issued by a high-level security apparatus in Syrian intelligence," a summary of the indictment prepared by Lebanon's state National News Agency said.

51. Shortage of IT specialists exposes govt networks to spy threats

Arab News, Sharif M. Taha, 2016 09 06

Riyadh - An information technology expert said a shortage of specialized cadres in information security has exposed government and service sector networks to spy and infiltration attacks. Last week, the Electronic Security Center (ESC), an affiliate of the Interior Ministry, detected foreign attacks targeting the electronic networks of a number of government agencies and other vital sectors in the Kingdom. Dr. Hani Al-Zaid, an expert in information security, told local media that the issue is linked to challenges facing the Saudization of technical jobs, notably those related to information security. Based on his experience in the government sector, he said there were two challenges facing the Saudization of technical jobs: Shortage of specialized cadres in information security, and difficulty in the recruitment of qualified cadres due to limited privileges of such jobs. According to the ESC report last week, the foreign electronic attacks came on a number of governmental and service sector networks.

52. STL: Telecoms expert details final calls before bombing

Lebanon Daily Star, Ned Whalley, 2016 09 06

Beirut - A telecoms expert described to the Special Tribunal for Lebanon how a covert network of cellphones exhibited striking call patterns in the leadup to the assassination of ex-Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, culminating in a flurry of activity in the hour before his death. John Edwards Philips testified that the activity of a group of eight "red phones" can be strongly associated with the crime. "They worked in a pattern together. They were coordinated and cohesive," he said. Philips is the prosecution's primary expert on cell-siting and the analysis of call data records. Overlaying coverage maps with satellite photos, he demonstrated the remarkable activity of the red phones in the final minutes before a massive car bomb killed the former prime minister outside Beirut's St. Georges Hotel. Prosecutors say they have identified a number of covert networks used in the conspiracy, giving each a color. The red phones were allegedly used in the actual execution of the bombing.

53. Washington Still Sees Hizbullah 'Terrorist Organization' (Canada).

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 09 06

Beirut - Washington emphasized that the United States will continue to regard Hizbullah as a terrorist organization and will continue to tighten surveillance and sanctions against its institutions and members, the Saudi Okaz daily reported on Sunday. "U.S. Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Thomas Shannon had stressed during meetings with Lebanese officials that the U.S. will not back down from regarding Hizbullah as a terrorist organization and tightening surveillance and sanctions against its institutions and members," well-informed sources in Beirut told the daily. The Arab League, United States, France, the Gulf Cooperation Council, Australia, Canada, the Netherlands, and Israel have classified Hizbullah as a terrorist organization. In December 2015, the U.S. Congress voted to impose sanctions on banks that deal with Hizbullah. In May, Lebanon's central bank instructed the country's banks and financial institutions to comply with the new measure against the Lebanese Shiite group.

54. Agression islamiste à la prison d'Osny

Le Figaro, Paule Gonzalès, 2016 09 06

Osny, France - Un surveillant a été attaqué à l'arme blanche dimanche par un détenu radicalisé, aidé par plusieurs complices. Terrorisme Pas un acte isolé, mais concerté entre plusieurs détenus... À la prison d'Osny, dans un quartier dédié supposé accueillir les candidats à la déradicalisation, l'agression dimanche de deux surveillants, dont l'un gravement atteint, fait froid dans le dos. Le détenu auteur des faits, Bilal T., a frappé sa victime à l'aide d' « une lame de 25 cm très fine et très aiguisée qui a transpercé de part en part la gorge du surveillant à 2 mm de la carotide, puis est passée à quelques millimètres du poumon », affirme-t-on de sources pénitentiaires. Selon ces dernières, l'individu bénéficiait de fortes complicités parmi les autres détenus, avec lesquelles cette agression aurait été programmée. Les enquêteurs auraient trouvé sur un autre détenu des liens qui font penser que l'idée était de procéder à une « exécution » telle que Daech a l'habitude de les pratiquer. Selon des personnels pénitentiaires, l'auteur de l'agression « aurait badigeonné l'une des portes de cellules du sang du surveillant et aurait levé les mains afin de prier ». Enfin, un téléphone portable a été retrouvé dans l'une des cellules de cette unité dédiée. Tous ces éléments ont conduit le parquet antiterroriste de Paris à ouvrir une information judiciaire pour terrorisme. D'autant que Bilal T. a toujours été considéré par les magistrats, dès son interpellation, comme un élément dangereux avec des finalités très claires.

55. Allemagne : le gendarme de la vie privée étrille les services de renseignement

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 06

Berlin - Une inspection menée sur une installation des services de renseignement allemands a débouché sur 12 plaintes formelles. En Allemagne, les révélations d'Edward Snowden sur les activités de surveillance des Etats-Unis n'en finissent pas de faire des vagues. La très grande proximité et la collaboration entre la National Security Agency américaine (NSA) et le Service fédéral de renseignement (BND) a notamment déclenché une enquête du commissaire fédéral pour la protection des données (BfDI). Il a pu se rendre dans l'une des installations conjointes de la NSA et du BND, à Bad Aibling, dans le sud du pays. Il en a tiré une analyse juridique, classifiée, que s'est procurée le site allemand spécialisé Netzpolitik . Une analyse au lance-flammes Cette analyse est extrêmement sévère pour le BND: le commissaire a dénombré 18 violations sévères de la loi, et a adressé 12 plaintes formelles liées à ces manquements. Netzpolitik note qu'il s'agit du nombre de plaintes adressé par le commissaire sur une année entière pour tout l'appareil fédéral allemand. Selon le BfDI, le BND a créé et utilisé au moins sept bases de données sans aucun fondement légal. Ces bases, écrit-il, doivent être détruites immédiatement. Une sacrée épine dans le pied des services allemands et américains: parmi celles-ci figure XKeyscore, le «Google» pour espions, l'outil qui leur permet de chercher dans la masse de trafic internet intercepté. Il s'agit de l'un des instruments les plus utilisés par les services américains et leurs plus proches alliés. Cet outil, écrit le commissaire, permet de «scanner l'intégralité du trafic internet dans le monde, à la fois les métadonnées [qui communique avec qui, quand et combien de temps] et le contenu» .

57. J.-Y. Camus : « L'appel des peuples à un retour de souveraineté mérite un vrai débat »
Le Figaro, Marie-Laetitia Bonavita, 2016 09 06

Opinion - LE FIGARO. - Comment expliquer le faible score du parti de Merkel et la poussée de l'AfD ? Jean-Yves CAMUS. - La chancelière allemande a fait un pari : présenter à la population l'affaire de l'accueil des réfugiés comme un sujet devant être traité comme un intérêt supérieur de la nation. Elle a pris cette décision seule, avec l'aide de quelques conseillers, mais elle est suffisamment fine pour connaître les réticences que cela allait engendrer. Cette décision, elle l'a prise pour des raisons humanistes, compte tenu de ses convictions religieuses et des années noires de l'Allemagne lors de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, mais également pour des raisons démographiques et pour donner un signal à l'ensemble des pays européens qui rechignaient à ouvrir leur portes aux migrants venant selon elle pour des raisons politiques. Les agressions sexuelles de Cologne et les attentats terroristes ont montré que non seulement la méthode consistant à répéter « cela va marcher » n'est pas unanimement acceptée mais que l'intégration des migrants prend du temps et qu'elle n'est pas automatique. La chute de Merkel est également liée au phénomène politique de l'extrême droite en Allemagne. Certes, le parti de la chancelière CDU a reculé de la deuxième à la troisième place dans son fief en Mecklembourg-Poméranie Occidentale mais il ne s'est pas effondré. Mais c'est l'AfD qui a connu une grosse poussée depuis les dernières élections européennes et tout laisse à penser qu'il enregistrera un bon score lors des élections de Basse-Saxe dimanche prochain et de Berlin le 18 septembre prochain. L'AfD gagne sur les abstentionnistes et capte l'espace libéré par le parti néonazi NPD qui chute de 6 % à 3 %, confirmant qu'il n'y a pas de place pour ce genre de parti.

58. La circulation obscure du renseignement policier
Le Temps (Suisse), Fati Mansour, 2016 09 06

Genève - Le rapport des députés porte un regard nuancé sur la manifestation sauvage du mois de décembre et sur les informations dont disposait l'ex-numéro deux de la police Un regard plus apaisé sur la manifestation sauvage ayant défigurée le Grand Théâtre et sur l'action de la police genevoise. Le rapport de la Commission de contrôle de gestion, présenté lundi à la presse par la socialiste Nicole Valiquet Grecuccio, ne relève aucun dysfonctionnement important du côté des forces de l'ordre. Le principal point noir réside dans la transmission, la traçabilité et l'interprétation du renseignement. En d'autres termes, la hiérarchie disposait du scénario des casseurs, mais elle ne le savait pas vraiment ou tendait à le minimiser. Personne n'a oublié cette aube du 20 décembre 2015 et son cortège de vitres brisées, de murs tagués et de symbole culturel attaqué à l'huile de vidange. L'engagement de la police a été beaucoup critiqué et les députés poussés à s'intéresser à la question. Parallèlement et après un rebondissement inattendu, Christian Cudré-Mauroux, le chef des opérations, a été dégradé de ses fonctions de numéro deux pour avoir négligé des renseignements en sa possession avant la manifestation, et surtout caché ces éléments à ses supérieurs lors de l'enquête qui a suivi. Un recours a été déposé par l'intéressé et la procédure administrative est toujours en cours. Le rapport des députés ne porte pas sur le comportement adopté par ce haut fonctionnaire après la manifestation. Son rôle est toutefois omniprésent dans l'analyse de la préparation du dispositif. Après 19 séances de travail et 18 personnes auditionnées, la sous-commission est convaincue d'une chose: le contexte de l'époque a été un facteur non négligeable. « En cette fin d'année, c'est l'alerte terroriste qui mobilise toutes les attentions dans les services, les Fêtes approchent et il faut faire tenir le personnel sur la durée », relève Nicole Valiquer Grecuccio. Danger mal évalué Malgré cette fébrilité post-Bataclan, l'appel au défilé sauvage est bien repéré par la brigade chargée de récolter des informations sur le terrain. Une première note du 15 décembre fait état de 400 à 800 manifestants mais n'est pas très alarmiste. Une seconde note du 17 décembre, un renseignement dit « fermé » car hautement confidentiel, diminue de moitié le nombre mais évoque la présence du Black Bloc, l'itinéraire et surtout la cible du Grand Théâtre.

60. Soupçonné d'avoir giflé une avocate, un grand flic de la DGSI fixé mardi

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 05

Nanterre,France - Un commissaire de la Direction centrale du renseignement intérieur (DCRI, devenue DGSI), une avocate. Elle accuse le grand flic de l'avoir giflée lors d'une garde à vue. Mensonge, répond-il. L'accusation a requis à son encontre sursis et amende. La justice se prononce mardi. Le huis clos se déroule le 1er avril 2014, au quatrième sous-sol des locaux du service antiterroriste et de contre-espionnage à Levallois-Perret (Hauts-de-Seine). Interrogé sur l'identité du kamikaze qui avait perpétré un attentat à l'aéroport de Bourgas, en Bulgarie, en 2012, le client de l'avocate avait décidé de garder le silence. Après deux auditions par des capitaines, leur supérieur, commissaire très bien noté, avait emmené l'homme et son avocate dans une pièce adjacente pour tenter de l'inciter à parler. L'avocate raconte que le policier avait assuré à son client qu'il ne risquait pas d'être mis en cause. Inquiète des "pressions" induites par cet entretien informel, elle avait souhaité que cette remarque soit consignée dans la procédure.

61. Un Algérien fiché « S » condamné au Mans

Ouest-France, Julien Belaud, 2016 09 06

Mans, France - La défense a plaidé que l'habit ne fait pas toujours le moine. Mais le tribunal a prononcé une peine - en deçà des réquisitions - pour non-respect de l'assignation à résidence. Il a été condamné pour vols en réunion et usage de faux papiers. En situation irrégulière, il a échappé à une reconduite à la frontière, présentant un document qui faisait de lui un citoyen d'Irak. Chez son frère, un pistolet à gaz lui appartenant a été retrouvé lors d'une perquisition. Selon son épouse, il aurait évoqué une « théorie du complot » à propos des récents attentats. Alors quand cet Algérien de 46 ans, fiché « S », n'est plus venu « pointer » au commissariat du Mans, comme le lui imposait une assignation à résidence, tout l'a désigné comme un terroriste en puissance. En tenue de combat, une dizaine de policiers l'ont interpellé au mois de juillet, puis il a été placé en détention. Abdel a comparu, hier, devant le tribunal correctionnel du Mans, pour menaces de mort sur son épouse et non respect de l'assignation à résidence. Chemise bleu ciel et blanche, le prévenu aux faux airs de Julien Clerc peine à convaincre. « C'est des mythes ! » Les menaces de mort ? « C'est des mythes ! Elle est malade de la tête, elle manipule tout le monde ! Mais je lui pardonne. » Son oubli d'être allé au commissariat ? « J'y suis allé, ils m'ont dit de dégager ! Dis-moi, M. le juge, je fais quoi ? » Le pistolet ? « Je l'ai trouvé. Et je l'ai gardé pour le 14 juillet ! » Sa tentative d'échapper à la police ? « J'ai eu peur d'être expulsé en Algérie. J'ai des problèmes avec l'extrémisme, là-bas. » « Vent de panique » Le procureur de la République décrit « un habitué du mensonge et de la dissimulation, qui a déjà été jugé ici même sous une fausse identité ». Il requiert « dix à douze mois ferme » .

62. Un suspect clé arrêté à Bruxelles

Le Soir (Belgique), Journaiste maison, 2016 09 06

Bruxelles - Un suspect clé dans l'enquête sur les attentats de Paris, et qui était activement recherché par la police depuis son départ précipité d'un centre de réfugiés en Autriche en décembre, a été arrêté en juillet à Bruxelles, révèle lundi la chaîne américaine CNN. Trahi par son passage sur Facebook, il devrait être remis prochainement à l'Autriche, d'après CNN, qui cite le parquet fédéral comme source. Cet homme de nationalité marocaine, Abid Tabaoui, était arrivé au centre de réfugiés le 10 décembre, le jour même où deux autres suspects - Adel Haddadi, un Algérien de 29 ans, et Mohamad Usman, un Pakistanais de 35 ans - avaient été arrêtés dans le cadre de l'enquête. Les enquêteurs avaient trouvé le téléphone d'Abid Tabaoui à côté du lit d'Adel Haddadi.

2. Canadian planes providing intelligence for allies' IS bombing campaign

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 09 07

Ottawa - Despite the withdrawal of Canada's fighter jets from Iraq and Syria last spring, a senior officer says Canadian military aircraft are providing vital intelligence to allies for air strikes and other operations against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. Brig.-Gen. Shane Brennan, commander of Canada's Joint Task Force-Iraq, says the number of Canadian intelligence officers assigned to the anti-ISIL effort has grown to 50. Their mission is to analyze the pictures taken by the Auroras so the coalition can plan air strikes and ground operations. "What we do is gather the trends and the activities of what is happening with Daesh," Brennan said from the task force's headquarters in Kuwait. "That is used to support what you would call targeting, whether that's munitions-based or lethal targeting, or other types of targeting." Brennan described the work of the Auroras and intelligence officers as a "critical contribution" to the fight against ISIL.

3. Edward Snowden lauds 'courageous' asylum seekers who sheltered him: 'They had a hundred chances to betray me' (Canada)

National Post, Theresa Tedesco, 2016 09 07

Interview - Edward Snowden, the world's most wanted dissident, looks back on his escape from Hong Kong. The National Post's Theresa Tedesco communicated with him via encrypted text messages through his Canadian lawyer, Robert Tibbo. The interview has been edited and condensed. Q: How are you? How is life in Russia? A: I'm doing surprisingly well, given some rather sinister figures are still feeling a bit vengeful about having been thrust into the spotlight. Public opinion regarding my decision to reveal mass surveillance to journalists has been moving favourably around the world, including perhaps unexpectedly the U.S. where even the former attorney general who once charged me as a criminal now says that while he can't condone it, he believes what I did was a "public service." Most of my time nowadays is focused on my work at the Freedom of the Press Foundation I sleep in Russia, but thanks to technology, I move all over the world. Q: Do you have any regrets? Would you have done anything differently? A: One of the things we've seen in the wake of these revelations is that the abuse of intelligence by authorities acts like a kind of cancer of government. The longer they go undetected, the harder they become to remove. Because the public at large wasn't permitted to know of them, and therefore couldn't object, we reached a point where critical masses of government staff became implicated in these abuses domestically and via foreign liaisons. At that point, if you actually try to enforce the law and bring investigation and charges, you've got half of the institution fighting you, even if they know it's immoral, because they worry they might be the next one to be held to account. Had I known what was going on sooner, if I had come forward earlier, maybe we'd be in a better place. But there's always next time.

4. Government to stop using ISIL, will refer instead to Daesh

Canadian Press, Staff report, 2016 09 07

Ottawa - The Liberal government will no longer refer to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant and will instead call the group by a different, potentially insulting name: Daesh. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale revealed the change in a report on terrorism released last month, saying ISIL is neither Islamic nor a state and that the report would instead use the group's Arabic acronym. Global Affairs Canada and the Department of National Defence also say they are both adopting Daesh to refer to the group. The decision continues a trend that has been sweeping through western governments. France and the United Kingdom are among those that have adopted the term in recent years.

5. La paille et la poutre

Le Devoir, Francine Pelletier, 2016 09 07

Chronique - Plutôt que de déclarer la guerre au burkini, deux écoles secondaires ont choisi de respirer par le nez, cette semaine, en rangeant le controversé maillot dans la catégorie des " accommodements raisonnables ". Mieux vaut encourager les étudiantes musulmanes à se baigner emmitouflées, croit la Commission scolaire de Montréal, que de les reléguer à la marge et à l'isolement. Applaudissons à sa sagesse et à son courage, le geste étant sûr de susciter la condamnation chez ceux qui maudissent le voile musulman, n'y voyant qu'une " propagande islamiste " éhontée. Permettre le port de ce maillot, rappelons-le, ne veut pas dire applaudir à celui-ci. Cela dit, si c'est l'islamisme qui inquiète, si c'est le recul de l'égalité hommes-femmes qui fait peur, mettons au moins l'opprobre au bon endroit. Pourquoi toujours s'en prendre à de simples citoyennes plutôt qu'aux véritables prosélytes, aux vrais coupables d'un credo moyenâgeux ? L'Arabie saoudite. Il est toujours un peu troublant de constater combien le vitriol se répand devant des femmes un peu trop habillées alors que l'indifférence perdure envers un régime connu non seulement pour ses tortures et ses exécutions, mais également pour avoir exporté l'extrémisme religieux. Si l'ensemble des pays musulmans aujourd'hui -- du Moyen-Orient à l'Asie du Sud-Est en passant par l'Afrique -- plonge dans le fondamentalisme, c'est beaucoup à cause de l'islam pratiqué au royaume des Saoud. Né il y a trois siècles en plein désert, le wahhabisme -- du nom du clerc qui lui a donné son nom, Mohammed ben Abdelwahhab -- a été façonné " par un environnement austère et xénophobe, opposé à l'art, aux sanctuaires et à la musique, à mille lieues de l'islam cosmopolite de Bagdad ou du Caire ", dit une enquête du New York Times sur l'extrémisme saoudien. Les pétrodollars donnent aux autorités religieuses un " budget extravagant pour exporter leur courant sévère de l'islam ". Selon un rapport de l'U.S. Council on Foreign Relations (2004), des douzaines de mosquées sont construites dans le monde, y compris au Canada. Aujourd'hui, on trouve des mosquées financées par l'Arabie saoudite à Toronto, à Ottawa, à Calgary, à Québec, et jusqu'au " pôle Nord ", à Inuvik et à Iqaluit.

6. Liberals play 'long game' with China

Postmedia News, Marie Danielle Smith, 2016 09 07

Hong Kong - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau wrapped up his first official visit to China Tuesday with another push for close co-operation, including on human rights, and for openness and inclusiveness in the global economy. "The kinds of anxieties we're seeing around the world as people are closing in are going to leave us all poorer and worse off," he said Tuesday in Hong Kong, expanding messages Canada brought to the Group of 20 table Sunday and Monday. "There are not as many bright spots in terms of growth and openness and trade as we'd like to see around the world." Addressing concerns in Canada, Trudeau strengthened his language on human rights Tuesday, appearing more relaxed in Hong Kong on the last day of his visit. He said he didn't see a trade-off between human rights and a closer economic relationship. "I think you have to talk fully and frankly about human rights and engage and talk about the challenges that need to be faced," he said.

7. Meet the Canadian who hid Snowden

National Post, Theresa Tedesco, 2016 09 07

Hong Kong - It's mid-afternoon and Robert Tibbo has sweat through his second shirt of the day in the sweltering subtropical humidity of the Hong Kong summer. Sitting in a small, non-descript conference room on the ninth floor of the High Court building in Central Hong Kong, the Canadian-born barrister is one of the busiest human rights lawyers in the Chinese city-state, and the strain of coming to the constant aid of more than 70 refugee clients who depend on him for more than just their asylum cases is showing. In recent days, Tibbo has dealt with eviction notices, improper charges on utility bills and general complaints about not having enough money to buy groceries, which he temporarily rectifies by reaching into his own pocket. "Good lawyers are hard to find, but one with a big heart is even more rare," said Jonathan Man, a solicitor at Hong-based Ho, Tse Wai & Partners who has worked on numerous cases with Tibbo. "He is somebody who has devoted his life to protecting refugees and people seeking asylum and he takes that very seriously," added Laura Poitras, a U.S. journalist and Oscar-winning documentary director who has worked with Tibbo.

8. Radicalisme: le nouveau mot fourre-tout

Le Huffington Post (Québec), Bruno Massé, 2016 09 06

Non identifié - La semaine dernière, l'Office national de l'énergie décide d'annuler les audiences publiques concernant l'évaluation du pipeline Énergie Est. Dans son communiqué, elle porte le blâme sur les perturbations d'activistes lors du premier jour d'audiences, qu'elle qualifie de violentes. Parce que les activistes ont fait du bruit. Lise Ravary est certaine qu'il s'agit de radicaux alors ça doit être vrai. Ce glissement sémantique n'est pas nouveau. De la création du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence (CPRMV) aux mesures draconiennes de l'État d'urgence en France, nos gouvernements profitent des attentats de l'État islamique pour tenter de marginaliser la dissidence politique sous toutes ses formes. Le CPRMV, ou «pas de chicane dans ma cabane» D'abord, on ratisse large. Non satisfait de s'attaquer seulement à l'intégrisme religieux, le CPRMV fait d'une pierre deux coups pour réduire une multitude de discours et de pratiques complexes au seul «radicalisme», comme si tout cela équivalait. Dans sa typologie des «types de radicalisation», le Centre met sur un pied d'égalité les intégristes religieux, les néonazis, «l'extrême-gauche» et oui, des environnementalistes... qui utiliseraient «la violence pour défendre leur cause». C'est un rapprochement dangereux et intellectuellement malhonnête, mais bon, les conservateurs l'ont fait en premier. Ce flou s'explique peut-être du fait que le CPRMV ne définit jamais ce qu'il considère comme violent. Est-ce que briser une vitre, c'est violent? Est-ce que faire du bruit, comme prétend l'ONÉ, c'est violent? Et lorsqu'un membre de l'EI fait sauter une bombe, est-ce aussi grave que lorsque des activistes pour les droits des animaux libèrent des belettes en cage? C'est ce qu'on présume, non? Tandis que le Code criminel du Canada qualifie surtout de violence une atteinte à l'intégrité physique d'une personne (i.e. blesser réellement quelqu'un), ce manque de clarté de la part du Centre témoigne soit d'incompétence, ou alors, et plus probable: du projet volontaire de marginaliser, voire de profiler pour ensuite criminaliser les gens qui ont d'autres positions que celle du gouvernement. Bien sûr, ce gouvernement qui fait la guerre aux pauvres, lui, il n'est pas radical, il n'est pas violent. La compagnie minière financée à même nos impôts, celle qui s'enfuit avec le minerai, pollue l'eau et empoisonne la population, elle n'est pas radicale, elle n'est pas violente.

9. Royaume-Uni Condamnation d'un prêcheur islamiste bien connu de la GRC

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine; Vincent Larouche, 2016 09 07

Londres - L'un des prêcheurs radicaux les plus influents d'Occident, suivi sur les réseaux sociaux par les terroristes canadiens Martin Couture-Rouleau et Michael Zehaf Bibeau, vient d'être condamné à plus de cinq ans de prison au Royaume-Uni pour avoir soutenu le groupe armé État islamique (EI). En 2013, il avait prédit un attentat au Canada. Les Anglais le surnomment « l'homme le plus détesté » de leur pays, le « prêcheur de haine ». Anjem Choudary, avocat de 49 ans d'origine pakistanaise, prédicateur emblématique dans les milieux islamistes britanniques, marchait sur une fine ligne depuis plusieurs années. Il s'était fait « le porte-parole des extrémistes, faisant des commentaires des plus déplaisants, mais sans jamais franchir le seuil de la criminalité », comme l'a expliqué au Guardian le commandant Dean Haydon, chef de l'escouade antiterroriste de Scotland Yard. Du moins jusqu'à ce que le prédicateur appelle à soutenir l'EI dans une série de vidéos publiées sur la plateforme YouTube, après avoir prêté allégeance au chef du groupe terroriste, Abou Bakr al-Baghdadi, donnant ainsi les munitions nécessaires aux autorités pour l'arrêter. Un « tournant » pour la police ; un cas qui pourrait se reproduire chez nous avec l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions de la loi antiterroriste. Un attentat au Canada Cela faisait bien 20 ans que Choudary était dans la ligne de mire des autorités, multipliant les sorties controversées et les propos extrémistes, parfois au sujet du Canada. Dans une entrevue accordée à La Presse en 2013, un an avant les attaques de Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu et d'Ottawa, il avait par exemple martelé que le pays risquait de subir un attentat terroriste en raison des politiques étrangères d'Ottawa de l'époque. « Le soutien apporté à Israël et la guerre à la terreur, considérée par les musulmans comme une guerre contre l'Islam, placent le Canada dans la même position que les États-Unis, la Grande-Bretagne et la France », avait-il déclaré. Martin Couture-Rouleau, auteur de l'attentat contre des militaires à Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, et Michael Zehaf Bibeau, le tireur du parlement, suivaient tous deux Anjem Choudary sur Twitter. 10. 10 years of legal limbo for 9/11 suspects

Washington Post, Missy Ryan, 2016 09 07

Washington - When the George W. Bush administration announced in September 2006 that 14 major terrorism suspects had arrived at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, military lawyer Morris Davis heralded it as a sign of the government's commitment to attaining justice. For Davis, then chief military prosecutor at the top-security facility, the end of the suspects' detention at secret CIA prisons overseas promised a credible legal reckoning in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "I want our grandchildren to look at Guantanamo the way we look back at Nuremberg," Davis told the lawyers on his team, offering as a model the prosecution of Nazi officials that followed World War II. "We felt we had the ability to conduct these trials in a way that ... the country would be proud of." Ten years later, none of those 14 "high value" detainees brought to Guantanamo Bay have been convicted or sentenced in the military commissions. Roughly half a dozen cases tried in other commission proceedings have resulted in convictions, but most have been thrown out on appeal. A clutch of cases is moving so slowly in preliminary proceedings that the trial of five suspects accused of organizing the 9/11 attacks is expected to begin at the earliest in 2020, nearly 20 years after hijacked planes struck the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

11. After Edward Snowden Fleed U.S., Asylum Seekers in Hong Kong Took Him In

New York Times, Patrick Bohler, 2016 09 07

Hong Kong - When the 42-year-old Filipino woman opened the door of her tiny Hong Kong apartment three years ago, two lawyers stood outside with a man she had never seen before. They explained that he needed a place to hide, and they introduced him as Edward Snowden. "The first time I see him, I don't know who he is," the woman, Vanessa Mae Bondalian Rodel, recalled in an interview. "I don't have any idea." Ms. Rodel is one of at least four residents of Hong Kong who took in Mr. Snowden, the former National Security Agency contractor, when he fled the United States in June 2013. Only now have they decided to speak about the experience, revealing a new chapter in the odyssey that riveted the world after Mr. Snowden disclosed that the N.S.A. had been monitoring the calls, emails and web activity of millions of Americans and others. At the time, governments and news outlets were scrambling to find the source of the leaks, which were published in The Guardian and The Washington Post. In an interview recorded in a hotel room, Mr. Snowden identified himself and revealed he was in Hong Kong. Then he went into hiding. About two weeks later he turned up in Moscow. It was never clear where Mr. Snowden was holed up during those critical days after leaving his room at the five-star Mira Hotel, when the United States was demanding his return. As it turns out, he was staying with Ms. Rodel and others like her -- men and women seeking political asylum in Hong Kong who live in cramped, substandard apartment blocks in some of the city's poorest districts. They were all clients of one of Mr. Snowden's Hong Kong lawyers, Robert Tibbo, who arranged for him to stay with them.

12. DHS secretary Johnson vows 'no stone unturned' on election security

Politico, Nick Gass, 2016 09 06

Washington - Faced with the potential threat of an election compromised by foreign hackers, Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson on Tuesday sought to reassure Americans, pledging to "leave no stone unturned" when it comes to ensuring the integrity of the process. "Well first, we have a lot of confidence in the integrity of the election process itself," Johnson told MSNBC's "Andrea Mitchell Reports." "There are some 9,000 state and local jurisdictions that are involved in the election process, including national elections, we've looked at a fair amount of it. We've looked at what states and cities do." Johnson went on to say that "we have a lot of confidence in the process itself, we're in the mode now of wanting to leave no stone unturned, and so, what DHS, my department, has been going over the last several weeks is contacting state election officials to say, we want to leave no stone unturned."

13. Dinner, drinks and a near fatal ambush for U.S. diplomats

Foreign Policy, Colum Lynch, 2016 09 07

Washington - On the night of July 7, seven American diplomats in Juba left a farewell dinner early and were headed back to the U.S. Embassy, anxious to avoid the city's deepening chaos, when their two-car convoy was ambushed by the South Sudanese presidential guard of Salva Kiir. South Sudanese troops fired between 50 and 100 rounds at the two armored SUVs as soon as they passed the presidential palace. No one in either vehicle, which included James Donegan, the second-highest ranking U.S. official in South Sudan, was hurt or killed in the attack, but it wasn't for a lack of trying: Three separate clusters of South Sudanese soldiers unloaded on the unarmed diplomats' vehicles. Eventually, a U.S. Marine rapid response team from the embassy had to fetch three of the waylaid Americans and their South Sudanese driver. State Department officials provided Foreign Policy with conflicting accounts of whether the department had conducted a formal investigation into the incident, with one official saying it hadn't, and another saying it had carried out some form of investigation. But both officials said they have demanded South Sudan carry out an investigation and hold those responsible to account. The State Department has also downplayed the role of the South Sudanese in targeting U.S. diplomats, saying there was no way to know whether Kiir's presidential guard knew who they were shooting at. "We do not believe our vehicles and personnel were specifically targeted," a State Department official told FP. "I think we can speak with certainty the people in the convoy did not identify themselves necessarily to the soldiers or say that it was an American convoy."

14. Missed opportunities to stop OPM cyber breach spelled out

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 09 07

Washington - It was time to purge the hacker from the U.S. government's computers. After secretly monitoring the hacker's online movements for months, officials worried he was getting too close to critical information and devised a plan, dubbed "the Big Bang," to expel him. Trouble was, with all their attention focused in that case, they missed the other hacker entirely. A new congressional report provides previously undisclosed details and a behind-the-scenes chronology of one of the worst-ever cyberattacks on the United States, laying out missed opportunities before the break-in at the Office of Personnel Management exposed security clearances, background checks and fingerprint records. That attack - widely blamed on China's government - compromised personal information of more than 21 million current, former and prospective federal employees, led to the resignation of the OPM director and drew outrage over changing explanations about the hack's seriousness. The report by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform faulted the personnel agency for failing to secure sensitive data despite warnings for years that it was vulnerable to hackers. It concluded that the hacking revealed last year could have been prevented if OPM had put in place basic, required security controls and recognized from an earlier break-in that it was actually dealing with a sophisticated, persistent enemy. OPM Acting Director Beth Cobert said in a statement the agency disagrees with much of the report and it "does not fully reflect where this agency stands today." She said the OPM hack "provided a catalyst for accelerated change within our organization," including hiring new cybersecurity experts and strengthening its security.

15. Oregon confrontation heads to court

Los Angeles Times, Rick Anderson, 2016 09 07

Portland - For weeks in Oregon's rugged backcountry, the two brothers were the face of the armed occupation of a wildlife refuge -- two men dressed in flannel and cowboys hats with copies of the Constitution jammed in their breast pockets. Now Ammon and Ryan Bundy -- behind bars since the occupation wound down after the shooting death of one protester and the systematic arrests of others -- are headed to trial in Portland for their leading role in taking over the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge. The federal court trial of the Bundy brothers along with six codefendants is expected to spark lively arguments over the government's right to control federal land such as the wildlife refuge in southeast Oregon. The Bundys and their antigovernment followers occupied the site for 41 days in January and February, surrendering soon after one occupier was killed by state police. For taxpayers, the takeover tab came to $9 million in costs and damage, federal officials estimated. Millions more are being spent on the resulting federal trials this year and next.

16. U.S. Fears E-Piracy Could Manipulate Electoral Results

Asharq Al-Awsat, Heba El Koudsy, 2016 09 07

Washington - U.S. intelligence and law enforcement agencies are investigating several attempts to break through the systems and electronic voting records for the U.S. coming presidential elections, which will be held on November 7. The agencies are concerned that these cyber attempts might affect the results of the elections between Republican candidate Donald Trump and Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton. They see these attacks as a broad covert Russian operation in the United States to sow public distrust in the upcoming presidential election and in U.S. political institutions. The effort to better understand Russia's covert influence operations is being coordinated by James R. Clapper Jr., the director of national intelligence. "This is something of concern for the DNI," said Charles Allen, a former longtime CIA officer who has been briefed on some of these issues. "It is being addressed."

17. U.S. Sends Iran Two More Loads of Cash

Wall Street Journal, Jay Solomon, Carol E. Lee, 2016 09 07

Washington - The Obama administration followed up a planeload of $400 million in cash sent to Iran in January with two more such shipments in the next 19 days, totaling another $1.3 billion, according to congressional officials briefed by the U.S. State, Treasury and Justice departments. The cash payments -- made in Swiss francs, euros and other currencies -- settled a decades-old dispute over a failed arms deal dating back to 1979. U.S. officials have acknowledged the payment of the first $400 million coincided with Iran's release of American prisoners and was used as leverage to ensure they were flown out of Tehran's Mehrabad on the morning of Jan. 17. The revelations come as Congress returns from a summer recess with Republicans vowing to pursue charges that the White House paid ransom to Tehran, a charge President Barack Obama has repeatedly rejected. Sen. Marco Rubio (R., Fla.) introduced legislation on Tuesday that would bar such payments to Iran in the future and seeks to reclaim the $1.7 billion for victims of Iranian-backed terrorism. The Obama administration briefed lawmakers on Tuesday, telling them that two further portions of the $1.3 billion were transferred though Europe on Jan. 22 and Feb. 5. The payment "flowed in the same manner" as the original $400 million that an Iranian cargo plane picked up in Geneva, Switzerland, according to a congressional aide who took part in the briefing. The $400 million was converted into non-U.S. currencies by the Swiss and Dutch central banks, according to U.S. and European officials.

18. Death to Cheshire florist, declares Isis magazine

London Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 07

London - A florist who featured in an Isis magazine that called for attacks on ordinary Britons said he was shocked to find himself the target of terrorist death threats and "didn't know any jihadis". Counter- terrorism police interviewed Stephen Leyland, 64, from the Manchester area, yesterday after his image was featured in the Isis magazine Rumiya. "They said that the foreign secretary [Boris Johnson] had asked about it," he said. The photograph of Mr Leyland and his stall was apparently lifted at random from the internet and printed with a caption encouraging Isis supporters to take: "Even the blood of a merry Crusader citizen selling flowers to passersby." The Isis magazine listed children playing in parks, businessmen riding to work, old men buying lunch and even the flower seller in the street as "fair game". It also named sites in other Western countries such as Bondi Beach and Melbourne cricket ground in Australia as potential targets.

The PSNI said the find included explosive devices and bomb-making parts as well as chemicals, ammunition and a gun. The searches across the Co. Antrim port town were a joint operation between the PSNI and the Metropolitan police. Among the locations searched around Larne today was a disused quarry and a number of addresses in the town. 20. Hate preacher Anjem Choudary could be free in two years

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, Duncan Gardham, 2016 09 07

London - The hate preacher Anjem Choudary could be released from jail in just over two years, prompting criticism that his prison sentence yesterday for terrorism offences was not enough of a deterrent. Choudary, 49, who headed an extremist network that inspired plots both in the UK and overseas, had faced a maximum sentence of ten years at the Old Bailey after pledging allegiance to Islamic State. However the preacher, who refused to acknowledge the court, was sentenced to five and a half years despite the judge concluding that he was dangerous and calculating. Haras Rafiq, of the anti-extremism group Quilliam, said that five years was not enough. "Choudary has been directly linked to hundreds of individuals that have gone out to Iraq and Syria. He has been doing this for 15 to 20 years. There are people he has allegedly radicalised who have got longer sentences."

21. UK immigration minister confirms work to start on £1.9m Calais wall

The Guardian (London), Alan Travis, Angélique Chrisafis, 2016 09 07

London - Work is about to begin on "a big, new wall" in Calais as the latest attempt to prevent refugees and migrants jumping aboard lorries heading for the Channel port, the UK's immigration minister has confirmed. Robert Goodwill told MPs on Tuesday that the four-metre high wall was part of a £17m package of joint Anglo-French security measures to tighten precautions at the port. "People are still getting through," he said. "We have done the fences. Now we are doing the wall," the new immigration minister told the Commons home affairs committee. Building on the 1km-long wall along the ferry port's main dual-carriageway approach road, known as the Rocade, is due to start this month. The £1.9m wall will be built in two sections on either side of the road to protect lorries and other vehicles from migrants who have used rocks, shopping trolleys and even tree trunks to try to stop vehicles before climbing aboard.

22. 'Terror tinnie' accused to fight charges

Australian Associated Press, Genevieve Gannon, 2016 09 07

Melbourne - Six Melbourne men accused of attempting to flee to Indonesia by boat as part of a plan to join Islamic State fighters in Syria are expected to fight the charges. A tentative date of May 15 has been set for a contested committal hearing for the men who each face a single count of making preparations for incursions into foreign countries to engage in hostile activities. Islamic preacher Robert 'Musa' Cerantonio, Shayden Thorne, Kadir Kaya, Antonio Granata and Paul Dacre were arrested near Cairns in May towing a seven-metre boat en route to Cape York. Police allege they planned to use the vessel to travel to Indonesia, and then on to Syria. Murat Kaya, who was arrested in counter-terror raids in Melbourne a few days later, is said to have bought the boat. Prosecutors have built a large, circumstantial case against the co-accused based on some-2000 statements and exhibits, and the volume of material is expected to grow, the Melbourne Magistrates' Court heard on Wednesday.

23. "Flaws" in govt anti-terror funding round

Australian Associated Press, Rashida Yosufzai, 2016 09 07

Canberra - Federal Labor has seized on a scathing audit outlining flaws on how the federal government picked organisations to help prevent radicalisation. Only 21 of the 42 programs awarded almost $1 million in funding as part of a counter-terrorism strategy should have been successful, the Australian National Audit Office said. That's if the Attorney-General's Department had picked those that properly met the criteria needed for funding. The initiative was about backing community-based and non-government groups to help people steer away from violent extremism. But the department pushed through 46 of the 59 applications that did not properly meet the criteria - which led to 10 of those being fully approved. The report said the process through which applications were given funding was flawed in "significant respects". As well, many of the funded organisations have yet to indicate whether they'll register onto a directory connecting people at risk of radicalisation with help - a key requirement.

24. ASIO evidence at siege inquest kept secret

Australian Associated Press, Daniel McCulloch, 2016 09 07

Sydney - Could Australia's intelligence agency have done more to stop gunman Man Haron Monis before the fatal Sydney Lindt Café siege? A coronial inquest has been examining what the Australian Security and Intelligence Organisation (ASIO) knew about Monis and whether it should have taken action against him before he staged the December 2014 siege. All evidence relating to ASIO has been gathered in private, and the information may never be made public, it has been revealed. The inquest has examined whether Monis should have been detected, kept under surveillance or on a security watch list. It has also looked at whether Monis should have been predicted to commit a politically motivated attack, and what role ASIO played during the Martin Place siege. Critically, it has explored the response to 18 National Security Hotline reports made days before the siege relating to violent and offensive images on Monis' Facebook page. ASIO had begun looking into the reports but had not yet completed its inquiries by the time the siege occurred, with questions emerging about whether it should have acted with greater urgency.

25. Malcolm Turnbull says Australians should be 'very alert' after IS call for lone wolf attacks

ABC News, Liam Cochrane, 2016 09 07

Vientiane - Malcolm Turnbull says an Islamic State propaganda magazine's calls for attacks in Sydney and Melbourne should be taken seriously, with terrorists looking for soft targets after setbacks on the battlefields of Syria and Iraq. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull says recent calls for terrorist attacks at Australian landmarks should be taken seriously. An Islamic State propaganda magazine has called for 'lone wolf' attacks at locations in Sydney and Melbourne. The threats have been but not by the Prime Minister, who said recent attacks around the world showed the danger of so-called lone wolf terrorists. Speaking in Laos, Mr Turnbull said the calls for violence in Australia represented desperation on the part of the Islamic extremists. "As Daesh (Islamic State) comes under more and more pressure on the battlefield in Syria and in Iraq -- as it is rolled back, as its territory is being taken back -- it will resort to terrorist activities outside of the Middle East," he said. "The capacity of Daesh, of course, is much less than they proclaim it to be. "But we do have to be very alert to the actions of these lone actors -- individuals who, as I've described in the national security statement last week, for a variety of reasons, may be radicalised.

26. Rare gift as undercover G20 spooks go under the covers (Canada)

Adelaide Advertiser, Tory Shepherd, 2016 09 07

Vientiane - Gifts, "honeypots" and cyber hacking are among the weapons used by the Chinese to hunt top-secret information at the G20 summit. Delegates at the global economic forum were warned not to accept presents such as USB sticks that could gather data, and to resist overly friendly people who might be out to scam secrets. Australians were warned about "honeypots" - women or men who might try to seduce them in order to steal information or plant a listening device. Another strategy is to give a gift with a bug inside. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull and the Australian delegation travelled to Hangzhou in China for the summit - and for those without encrypted communications networks, the main internet option was the easily hacked official G20 network. Among the more old-fashioned espionage efforts were "tourists" who looked remarkably un-touristy as they focused long lenses on jour-nalists along Hangzhou's fam-ous riverfront. As Mr Turnbull addressed the crowd at the B20 business leaders' meeting, a man in uniform sidled up behind journalists to read what they were writing. News Corp Australia was warned not to write anything about spies while in China because of the possibility of being detained or not being allowed a visa in the future. Peter Jennings, the Australian Strategic Policy Institute's executive director, said honeypots were "part and parcel of espionage", adding: "(Sex) has often been used as a way of trying not only to get people in but then to create a suitable basis (for blackmail)." Russian ships sailed close to the coast during the Brisbane G20 and in 2013 Russia reportedly spied on other countries at the G20 by giving out "Trojan Horse" USB sticks, while Canada was accused of allowing spying at the 2010 G20. 27. Spy bill lacking some robust privacy protection

New Zealand Herald, Gehan Gunasekara, 2016 09 07

Op-ed: The much-anticipated New Zealand Intelligence and Security Bill is before a Parliament select committee. There is unlikely to be loud applause from Edward Snowden, however, as the bill does little to address the concerns regarding mass surveillance he exposed in 2013 and the subsequent mischiefs that have come to light including the GCSB spy agencies spying on New Zealand residents. The bill follows the recommendations of the independent Cullen-Reddy Report as to how these should be addressed and it does implement many of them. The devil, however, is in the detail. On the one hand the bill strengthens privacy protections by expanding the number of the Privacy Act's rules that now apply to the intelligence agencies. Thus an individual may complain that information about them that was used, say, in a security clearance, was out of date, inaccurate or misleading, and another may complain that information about them was retained longer than necessary by the intelligence agency. The bill's requirements for the issue of warrants for surveillance is also relatively robust. There are, despite this, some weaknesses. First, the Privacy Commissioner can only investigate breaches by the intelligence agencies and make recommendations to agencies and to the Prime Minister, which the latter is not obliged to follow. Note: Gehan Gunasekara is an associate professor in commercial law at the University of Auckland and researches and teaches privacy law.

28. Teen claims divine intervention turned him from jihad

The Australian, Pia Akerman, 2016 09 07

Sydney - A Muslim youth who believes God sent police to catch him before he could detonate a bomb in Melbourne could be freed within weeks if a judge agrees to his bid for a sentence served solely in a youth justice centre. The 18-year old, who cannot be identified, yesterday gave evidence during a plea hearing in the Victorian Supreme Court, telling judge Lex Lasry how he had started planning to mount a domestic terrorist attack early last year after watching Islamic State videos online. He said he downloaded an al-Qa'ida bombmaking instruction manual and bought pipes, a pressure cooker, screws and explosive materials after an ISIS recruiter told him to target a Melbourne train, police station or the CBD. "At the time I thought this was what God wanted for me," he said, telling the court he now believed God had answered his prayers for guidance by causing his arrest in May last year. "It's something I thank God for every day," he said. "People would have died." The teen has pleaded guilty to preparing for or planning a terrorist attack. He has been held in a youth justice centre since his arrest, with his barrister, Robert Richter QC, arguing he should be sentenced to remain there for three years instead of being imprisoned in an adult jail.

Pakistan Dawn, Baqir Sajjad Syed, 2016 09 07

Islamabad - Despite the successes of Operation Zarb-i-Azb, threats to peace persist, Chief of Army Staff General Raheel Sharif said on Tuesday, calling for the implementation of the National Action Plan (NAP) and wide-ranging legal and governance reforms to sustain the military's achievements against terrorists. Speaking at what may well be his last Defence Day ceremony as army chief, Gen Sharif said: "Operation Zarb-i-Azb has attained its military objectives, and today the Pakistan flag flies proudly over all parts of our dear homeland." But, at the same time, he admitted that "internal and external threats to peace have not been completely eliminated". The general shared his view of the measures necessary to address these continuing threats, calling for the effective implementation of NAP, addressing weaknesses in the criminal justice system and reforms to break the nexus between organised crime, corruption and terrorism.

30. Kaboul frappée par une série d'attentats

Le Monde, Julien Bouissou, 2016 09 07

Kaboul - L'offensive talibane s'intensifie et n'épargne plus la capitale afghane Kaboul s'enfonce dans la guerre. La capitale afghane a été frappée par trois attentats-suicides en moins de vingt-quatre heures, qui ont fait au moins trente-six morts et une centaine de blessés, à proximité du ministère de la défense. Plusieurs passants, policiers et soldats se sont alors rendus sur le lieu de l'explosion pour venir en aide aux victimes. C'est à ce moment précis qu'un kamikaze s'est infiltré dans la foule, près d'un pont, et s'est fait exploser. Selon les autorités, la première bombe a été actionnée à distance, et la deuxième, par un insurgé. Des corps ont été projetés dans la rivière Kaboul, et, face à l'afflux de blessés, on a dû en transporter certains à l'arrière de pick-up de la police. Selon un bilan provisoire, ce double attentat a fait trente-cinq morts et cent trois blessés dont un général et plusieurs hauts responsables des forces de sécurité. Un porte-parole taliban a revendiqué la double attaque et a indiqué que la première détonation visait le ministère de la défense, et la seconde la police. Quelques heures plus tard, vers 23 heures, une lourde explosion a retenti dans le centre de la capitale, à Shar Naw, devant un bâtiment abritant une ONG afghane. " L'explosion a été si violente qu'elle nous a réveillés. On a ensuite entendu des coups de feu. Plusieurs quartiers sont bouclés et la ville est paralysée ", témoigne une habitante de la capitale. Une voiture piégée a explosé avant que deux assaillants pénètrent dans les locaux de l'ONG, selon un mode opératoire souvent employé par les talibans. L'assaut des forces de sécurité afghanes a duré toute la nuit et s'est terminé en fin de matinée par la mort des deux assaillants. Au moins six habitants ont été blessés, et un a été tué. L'intensification de l'offensive talibane dans le pays, où la situation sécuritaire s'est nettement détériorée depuis la fin des opérations de combat de l'OTAN fin 2014, n'épargne plus Kaboul. Les nombreux barrages policiers ou les murs anti-explosion protégeant les bâtiments sensibles de la capitale n'y font rien : les attaques terroristes se multiplient. Le 25 août, trois insurgés ont mené un assaut de plus de dix heures sur le campus de l'université américaine afghane, faisant treize morts. " Ultraradicalisation "Même si cette attaque n'a pas été revendiquée, les analystes soupçonnent les talibans ou le réseau Haqqani, qui lui est étroitement lié, seuls capables de planifier un tel assaut, d'en être les auteurs.

31. Pakistan, India exchange fire at LoC

The Express Tribune, Staff Correspondent, 2016 09 07

Islamabad - Pakistani and Indian troops exchanged fire along the Line of Control (LoC) in Kashmir on Tuesday as Pakistan marked Defence Day, commemorating its successful defence in the 1965 war with India. Pakistan Army's media wing said the Indian soldiers resorted to "unprovoked firing" at Nezapir sector of the LoC - a de facto border that divides Kashmir between the two countries. The Pakistan troops responded befittingly to the India firing, the Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR) said. No loss of life was reported in the exchange of fire that started late night and continued till 10am. This was the second time in four days the two countries traded fire along the LoC amid worsening ties between the two nuclear-tipped neighbours. On August 14 also, Pakistan had accused India of violating the ceasefire. Pakistan strongly denounced what it called grave human rights violations by Indian forces in the disputed Himalayan valley while New Delhi accused Islamabad for stoking unrest in the region.

32. US to Pakistan: Go after terrorists threatening your neighbours

Pajhwok Afghan News, Lalit K Jha, 2016 09 07

Washington - It is in the interest of both Afghanistan and Pakistan to go after terrorists, the United States says, asking Islamabad to do more against the groups targeting its neighbours. "It's in Pakistan's interest, it's in Afghanistan's interest to go after these terrorist groups, to root them out and to destroy them," the State Department deputy spokesman said. Mark Toner told reporters at his daily news conference the US wanted to see peace and stability in the region, a task involving efforts on Pakistan's part, as well as the ability of the Afghan government to provide security to its people. Toner strongly condemned Taliban attacks on the Ministry of Defense as well as CARE International -- an institution dedicated to helping Afghans build a better future. "We commend the courageous actions that were taken by the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces in the aftermath of these attacks. They responded quickly and decisively to the incidents.

33. Best Mechanisms to Combat Modern Fundamentalism

Asharq Al-Awsat, Emile Amin, 2016 09 07

Cairo - The closed-minded fundamentalism is considered among the biggest dangers that threaten the world's societies. Rigid beliefs and rejection of other identities can hold back solving any problem in the community. But the most dangerous problems are those that exploit religions to justify extremist positions. According to the common definition, the first challenge in combating modern fundamentalism is the intellect's allegation that he/she possesses the absolute truth. The root of fundamentalist extremism can be referred to the Philosopher Immanuel Kant, who created the term "Dogma", which means the human being's false belief in his capability of possessing the absolute. According to Kant, people can never achieve that because the nature of the human mind doesn't allow it. The lack of tolerance and forgiveness provided fundamentalists with the opportunity to revive religious conflicts so they can justify their desire in excluding others.

34. ISIS puts new twist on terror recruiting: big money

Christian Science Monitor, Taylor Luck, 2016 09 06

Tunis - The business of recruiting the next generation of terrorists has long preyed on young men with limited prospects. High unemployment across the Middle East points to a vast pool of Muslims who are often undereducated, easily ensnared, or simply bored. But the Islamic State has taken the trend to new lengths, making financial stability a central part of its recruiting pitch, according to defectors. While Al Qaeda has long provided salaries and the latest military equipment - reportedly backed by individual donors from the Arab Gulf - it tended to target ideologically driven recruits, with money often not a factor in their pitch. But the Islamic State, with wealth generated from oil revenues and taxation in the territories it holds, is promising foreign fighters higher salaries, housing, and additional benefits of $250 per month for a family of five, according to Monitor sources, as well as other reports. "It is not a coincidence that ISIS is building its ... networks in the very neighborhoods, towns, and refugee camps that are economically marginalized - something Al Qaeda had never even considered," says Hassan Abu Haniyeh, an expert in jihadist movements who is based in Amman, Jordan.

Pan African News Agency, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 06

Tunis, Tunisie - Le Premier ministre tunisien, Youssef Chahed a estimé que "la lutte contre la corruption et le terrorisme" sont les faces d'un même phénomène ciblant le citoyen, axe central de tout développement", affirmant que la guerre contre la corruption en demandant des comptes aux coupables est "plus complexe, parfois plus difficile que la lutte contre le terrorisme". S'exprimant dans une allocution à l'ouverture, lundi soir à Gammarth, du 5ème congrès ministériel du "réseau arabe pour l'intégrité et de lutte contre la corruption", M. Chahed a précisé que "les stratégies de lutte contre la corruption et les outils d'activation de la reddition des comptes ne peuvent être efficaces en l'absence d'expériences et de formation, outre l'instauration d'une coopération arabe et sud-sud afin que les expériences et les meilleures politiques dans ce domaine profitent à tout le monde sans exception". Le congrès se tient à Tunis du 5 au 7 septembre sur le thème "demander des comptes pour promouvoir le développement durable", rappelle-t-on.

36. Tunisia fears jihadists returning home from Libya, seeks joint action

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 06

Tunis - North African countries should be cooperating more to stop Islamic State fighters who are fleeing their Libyan stronghold of Sirte from returning to their homelands and causing trouble there, Tunisia's defense minister said on Tuesday. Libyan forces aligned with the U.N.-backed government in Tripoli launched their campaign to recapture Sirte in May and are advancing on the last areas under its control. But Tunisia, which estimates that about 4,000 of its nationals left to fight for jihadists groups, is concerned that many are returning to the country and could turn their focus on home soil. "The danger is real. Those who leave Sirte are heading south to eventually join Boko Haram, but some are also going west," the Tunisian minister, Farhat Hachani, told journalists on the sidelines of a gathering of defense and military officials in Paris. "There isn't a regional strategy. Neighboring countries are managing the day to day security and military question ... but while there are terror laws, you need proof that a young person was in a camp or fighting in jihadist ranks," he said.

37. Flash Protest in Venezuelan Town Rattles Maduro

Wall Street Journal, Anatoly Kurmanaev, 2016 09 07

Villa Rosa - In half a year, the residents of this working-class town on Venezuela's main resort island went from fervently cheering the revolution to chasing President Nicolas Maduro through the streets. The town became the epicenter of national attention on Friday when the president's decision to walk through this once-pro-government neighborhood ended in him being surrounded by angry residents banging pots and shouting antigovernment slogans. Mr. Maduro fled to safety, but the incident was captured on video and quickly went viral, highlighting the president's weakening authority at a time of deepening economic turmoil and as a resurgent opposition pushes for a recall referendum to end 17 years of socialist rule. "What we saw that day was nothing less than the break between the ruler and the people," said Jony Rahal, the opposition's lawmaker for Villa Rosa. In response, the government is now besieging the town, residents here say. On Monday, the Socialist Party bused in hundreds of red-clad government workers from across the island to Villa Rosa to intimidate local opposition supporters and transmit images of the town's support for Mr. Maduro.

38. 'IS suicide squad in our midst'

New Strait Times, Farrah Naz Karim and Aliza Shah, 2016 09 07

Kuala Lumpur - Intelligence gleaned by counterterrorism operatives in the country suggest that Malaysia now has, in its midst, suicide bombers ready to die for the Islamic State (IS) group. Bukit Aman's Special Branch Counter-Terrorism Division (SB-CTD) principal assistant director Datuk Ayob Khan Mydin Pitchay said evidence strongly pointed to several individuals pursuing the IS cause here. Police, he said, had been working on this latest piece of intel and were on their case. He said the individuals, who considered themselves "IS operatives", were believed to have been trained for their missions. The aspiring suicide bombers, he said, were as radicalised as the eight IS Malaysians who had returned from Syria to launch terror attacks for IS here. Ayob said as the terror group continues to be pounded by security forces in Syria, scaling down their military might, more fighters would begin returning home.

"Cybersecurity has become a new challenge in our regional security. Due to its complex and sophisticated nature, ASEAN should give more concern to the matter as well as involve other relevant stakeholders [to improve defense]," Wiranto said at an ASEAN Political-Security Community Council meeting on Tuesday. Wiranto further said Southeast Asian leaders should better maximize the implementation of the ASEAN Convention on Counterterrorism.

40. Beijing Wages a Subtle War Against American Power

Wall Street Journal, Andrew Browne, 2016 09 07

Analysis from Shanghai - China, it turns out, didn't deliberately intend to snub President Barack Obama, although the strained protocol when he landed in Hangzhou for a Group of 20 summit over the weekend made it look that way. China plays by its own rules nowadays, even on the simple matter of who should provide mobile stairs for the U.S. president's aircraft. A disagreement over whose set to use -- America's or China's -- forced Mr. Obama to exit from a lower door on folding steps. A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman criticized "arrogant and opinionated" Western media for suggesting Beijing had deliberately tried to humiliate him. But the symbolism was apt. China's behavior toward America during the Obama administration has been marked by episodes of collaboration on the global stage -- a climate-change accord, U.N. sanctions on North Korea, the deal to curb Iran's nuclear program -- and more regular flare-ups of nationalism. Small insults, minor aggressions: Behind the big set pieces of diplomacy, this is how China has sought to undermine the U.S. superpower and emphasize its own growing stature. It bullies Washington's regional friends and allies in territorial disputes. At home, it selectively harasses U.S. investors. And it sends a barely concealed message that American and other Western nonprofit groups aren't welcome by putting them under a police regime. These aggravations amount to a potent challenge to Washington, mainly because Mr. Obama hasn't found a good way to counter them.

41. Canada condemns Pyongyang missiles launch

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 07

Ottawa - Canada on Tuesday condemned Pyongyang's launch of ballistic missiles into the Pacific Ocean one day earlier. In a statement issued Tuesday afternoon, Canadian Minister of Foreign Affairs Stephane Dion said Canada strongly condemns the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK)'s launch of three ballistic missiles on Monday. The DPRK "continues to demonstrate its wilful disregard for its international obligations and the will of the United Nations Security Council through its repeated ballistic missile tests, which are in direct contravention of multiple Security Council resolutions," he said. He pointed out that the DPRK's reckless ballistic missile launches threaten regional and international peace and security, urging Pyongyang to cease its provocations and immediately and verifiably abandon its ballistic missile program.

42. Duterte mulled martial law after Davao blast - Palace

Philippine Star, Christina Mendez, 2016 09 07

Manila - President Duterte considered declaring martial law right after the bombing in Davao City, but decided to declare a state of emergency due to lawless violence instead, Executive Secretary Salvador Medialdea admitted yesterday. Medialdea also signed and issued an order allowing the military and police to invoke warrantless arrest and seizures in certain situations under the state of emergency. Medialdea bared that the President thought of declaring martial law right after the Davao bombing, but he later agreed on declaring a state of emergency due to lawless violence to prevent the violence in Davao from spilling to other parts of the country. Medialdea downplayed insinuations that the President is keen on declaring martial law. He maintained that the military would just augment the police force during operations, which would be an extra effort to prevent terrorist activities.

Dhaka - The Federal Bureau of Investigation has expressed interest to work closely with the Bangladeshi investigators dealing with recent militant attacks, a Foreign Ministry source says. As part of the process, the FBI wanted to let its members interrogate militant suspects arrested in recent months. However, the Bangladesh government has not shown any interest in this regard. "They [the FBI] have told us that they have much knowledge and expertise in this matter and that they want to understand the militants' psychology. But the government has not yet responded positively," a Foreign Ministry official said, declining to be named. According to the official, who was not authorised to talk to media on the matter, the West believes that the Islamic State or other foreign terrorist groups are directly involved in the recent terror attacks in Bangladesh. 44. Japan to check background of nuclear workers to prevent terrorism

Tokyo - Japan's nuclear watchdog decided Wednesday to make operators of nuclear power plants and other nuclear facilities check the background of their workers to prevent terror attacks. Following the recommendation of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Nuclear Regulation Authority will introduce the new regulation in late September, although the actual implementation is expected to be from next year or later due to necessary procedures, such a revision of the rules regarding the handling of nuclear materials. It is also unclear how the new measure will be effective in preventing terrorism as the operators will conduct the background checks based on information workers provide themselves, rather than by referrals to police or other law enforcement authorities. The regulation will cover employees and subcontracting workers who enter restricted areas where nuclear materials are kept and those who have access to important information at the facilities.

45. Kremlin blocks leading pollster amid spy claims

London Times, Marc Bennetts, 2016 09 07

Moscow - Russia has clamped down on the country's only independent pollster, the Levada Centre, days after it published an opinion poll indicating declining support for President Putin's party before this month's parliamentary elections. The Moscow-based pollster was officially blacklisted as a "foreign agent" after a justice ministry inspection discovered that it had received £94,000 in funding from the US defence department in the past three years. The label, which has clear connotations of espionage in Russia, was introduced in 2012 for non-governmental organisations that receive funding from abroad and are engaged in "political" activities. It has been previously been used to put pressure on human rights organisations and independent election monitors, as well as other groups that fail to toe the Kremlin's line. Lev Gudkov, director of the Levada Centre, told The Times that the justice ministry's ruling would make it impossible for the organisation to maintain the trust of respondents and that it could be forced to close down.

46. Russian Security Services Say 'Spy Pen' Found in Pokemon Go Player's Home

Moscow Times, Staff report, 2016 09 06

Moscow - Russian security services say they found a "spy-pen" in the home of video blogger Ruslan Sokolovsky, who was recently detained for filming himself playing Pokemon Go in a Yekaterinburg cathedral. Police have charged Sokolovsky with committing an extremist act and offending religious sensitivities. If convicted, he could face several years in prison. Russia's Investigative Committee said the pen could be used to receive illegal information from abroad. Other potentially incriminating items in the suspect's apartment include a video camera, a tripod, and a professional microphone. Police are also investigating magazines published by the video blogger, which they say contain illustrations which incite religious hatred. Earlier this year, Sokolovsky launched a self-titled magazine for atheists. He wrote that: "we have been inspired by Charlie Hebdo and have decided that there are too few such publications in Russia that take an absolutely amoral approach to ridiculing the contemporary national reality."

Baghdad - An ISIL car bombing struck a bustling commercial area of central Baghdad killing at least 12 civilians. The explosives-laden pick-up truck was left in a parking lot in the Shiite district of Karradah, near a hospital and shops, a police officer said. Up to 28 people were wounded and at least 15 cars were damaged when the bomb detonated late on Monday, he said. Mourners held a funeral procession for some of the dead on Tuesday morning, with men carrying coffins wrapped in Iraqi flags as women wailed and pounded their chests in grief. At the scene of the bombing, shocked residents examined the blood-stained pavement and the damage to nearby shops. ISIL said the suicide attack had been planned to target Shiites. Karradah is a major commercial area of the capital. Its streets are lined with clothing and jewellery stores, restaurants and cafes. The report could not be independently verified and it was not clear how it was determined that chlorine gas was released. Claims involving use of chlorine and poisonous gases are not uncommon in Syria's civil war, and both sides have denied using them while blaming the other. 57. Bundestag: Neo-Nazi NSU 'had more than three members'

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 09 06

Berlin - The spate of murders became public five years ago; the trial has been running for more than three, but the prospect of a resolution is still a long way off in the case of the National Socialist Underground (NSU), a neo-Nazi terrorist cell thought to have been responsible for at least ten murders, two bombings, and 15 bank robberies over a period of several years. Now, the chairman of Germany's second parliamentary inquiry into the staggeringly complex case has said he is convinced that the cell was much bigger than state prosecutors assume, and that authorities were too hasty in assuming that only three people - two of whom are dead - were responsible for all 27 crimes. "If I look at the facts and the evidence, I am deeply convinced that the NSU did not consist of just three people, and that apart from the helpers and supporters who are being prosecuted for providing apartments, cell phones and weapons, there were also co-perpetrators," the Bundestag's NSU committee chairman Clemens Binninger told the "Frankfurter Rundschau" newspaper.

Une première bouteille de gaz vide était extraite de l'habitacle. Dans le coffre, six autres bonbonnes de gaz étaient installées et des feuilles rédigées, selon la police, en arabe ont été retrouvées. 19 ans et radicalisée Très rapidement, les enquêteurs remontent la trace du propriétaire, en Seine-Saint-Denis. Ce dernier signale la disparition de sa fille majeure, 19 ans, sans doute partie avec son véhicule alors qu'elle avait prévenu son père qu'elle passerait le week-end chez une amie. Le père informe la police que sa fille est « radicalisée » et qu'elle tentait de rejoindre des zones de combat djihadistes. Si le papa est inconnu des services de police, sa fille est fichée S, elle est également fichée par la police judiciaire.

59. One of Germany's best known Islamist preachers went on trial in the western city of Düsseldorf on Tuesday on charges of backing "a terrorist group" fighting in Syria.

The Local (Germany), Staff report, 2016 09 06

Düsseldorf - One of Germany's best known Islamist preachers went on trial in the western city of Düsseldorf on Tuesday on charges of backing "a terrorist group" fighting in Syria. Sven Lau, 35, stands accused of supporting and recruiting fighters for the Syria-based Jaish al-Muhajireen wal-Ansar (JMA), or Army of Emigrants and Supporters, which Germany lists as a terrorist organisation. A convert to the ultra-conservative Salafist branch of Islam, Lau gained notoriety in 2014 when he organised a vigilante "Sharia Police" group that patrolled German streets seeking to enforce Islamic law. He was arrested in December in the state of North Rhine-Westphalia, a hotspot for fundamentalist Islam from where a number of fighters have left to wage jihad in Iraq and Syria. Prosecutors allege that Lau was the JMA's main contact in the state's Düsseldorf area and recruited two volunteers in 2013.

C'est extrêmement dangereux" Emmanuel Gauthrin, secrétaire général de FO Pénitentiaire, a réclamé mercredi sur franceinfo la suppression "des unités dédiées au sein même des détentions classiques" après l'agression dimanche de deux surveillants pénitentiaires par un détenu à la maison d'arrêt d'Osny (Val-d'Oise), une unité spéciale de prévention de la radicalisation. C'est suicidaire de faire une unité dédiée sur Osny", a expliqué Emmanuel Gauthrin, secrétaire général de FO Pénitentiaire. 61. Tracking the rise of terrorism; Q&A Loretta Napoleoni

Toronto Star, Oliva Ward, 2016 09 07

Interview - Terrorism is daily fare for Loretta Napoleoni. The Italian-born economist is a world-ranking expert on the financing behind terror networks: author of bestselling books on Daesh (also known as ISIS or ISIL); "rogue" economics, and tracking the dollars that are funneled into terrorist coffers. But she found herself in new and darker territory with her latest book, Merchants of Men: How Jihadists and ISIS turned kidnapping and refugee trafficking into a multi-billion-dollar business. As chairperson of the countering terrorism financing group for the Club de Madrid, Napoleoni closely monitors the flow of dark money. But what she discovered in this three-year project was nothing less than the massive-scale merchandising of human misery. "This is a system that I never knew existed," she says. Q: Is Canada right to refuse to pay ransom? A: It's a good idea. If you feed the bears they will come back for more. But if you decide that is the way forward everyone should stick together. Otherwise you put everyone else in danger.

1. CSIS to brief other agencies on operations

Globe and Mail, CSIS to brief other agencies on operations, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - A controversial law that allows Canada's spies to engage in terrorism-disruption campaigns may pose problems for federal police and diplomats. For this reason, they are being given a peek at some CSIS operations - and even allowed to challenge them. Newly released records suggest that Bill C-51, the controversial 2015 omnibus bill that overhauled the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, has sent ripples throughout the federal-security bureaucracy. CSIS's so-called "threat-reduction activities" (or TRAs) have prompted fears of unintended fallout. To mollify concerns, the spy agency has committed to giving potentially affected agencies a heads up about what it is doing, according to records recently released to The Globe and Mail via access to information laws. For example, an "enhanced consultation memo" was recently signed between CSIS and Global Affairs Canada. While much is redacted in the undated document, CSIS promises to loop in foreign-affairs functionaries about things it is doing. "The Service will provide intelligence assessments ... of TRA measures which have a foreign policy component." On Nov. 24, 2015, CSIS Director Michel Coulombe and RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson cosigned a memo where they agreed to have their lieutenants brief each other on counterterrorism probes. CSIS's "new mandate to reduce threats" could potentially increase the likelihood of the agencies "adversely affecting each other." Mr. Coulombe, the spy chief, told Parliament in March that such powers have been exercised only a couple of dozen times since the bill passed. Prior to that, he once testified that C- 51 could allow CSIS to "go into disrupting a financial transaction," or "disabling a mobile device" or "tampering with equipment." Yet these are among the more innocuous kinds of questionable tactics that global spy agencies engage in. The law says that CSIS officers cannot physically harm a suspect, but it can consider violating his or her Charter rights - so long as the minister and a Federal Court judge first approve.

2. Liberals' slow movement on Bill C-51 raises suspicions

Globe and Mail, Campbell Clark, 2016 09 09

Comment: Ralph Goodale is a minister who can spend 10 minutes answering a yes-or-no question, and that's a particularly useful skill when the topic is ragging the puck. The Liberal government has been putting off promised changes to Bill C-51, the controversial anti-terror legislation passed by Stephen Harper's Conservatives. On Thursday, Mr. Goodale and Justice Minister Jody Wilson-Raybould announced consultations on broader national security issues - the kind the Liberals promised to launch once they'd tabled legislation to replace C-51. But now changing Bill C-51 will come after the consultations, at some point in the future. That delay, Mr. Goodale said, was because the government is following an "orderly" process. He listed some things the government has done in the area of national security, which, he said, shows the Liberals aren't failing to live up to their promises to amend Bill C-51. That's notwithstanding the fact that they haven't lived up to those promises. In their campaign platform, the Liberals promised to legislate eight measures related to Bill C-51, and, they said, "as this legislation is tabled," they would launch broader consultations on national security. Now amending Bill C-51 will wait. The Liberals sounded a lot more rushed in opposition. Bill C-51 had been tricky for leader Justin Trudeau. For fear of looking soft on terrorism, they said they'd vote for the bill, but amend it if they took office. But then many left-leaning voters, the kind that might vote Liberal or NDP, expressed unusual hatred for Bill C-51. In the campaign, the Liberals toughened up a promise to repeal Bill C-51 and replace it. But it's hard to see why the government can't move quickly on the other changes. One was to "guarantee that all Canadian Security Intelligence Service warrants respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms." Bill C-51 allowed judges to authorize violations of the Charter. If the government thinks unconscionable violations of the Charter have been legalized, you'd think they'd hurry to fix it. The Liberal platform also promised to narrow an "overly broad" definition of "terrorist propaganda," and that's not overly complex. Mr. Goodale did say Thursday the government will still make five of those promised measures law, eventually. If you're counting, there's still one platform promise left out, and it's a big one: the pledge to limit the powers of the Communications Security Establishment, Canada's electronic eavesdropping agency, "by requiring a warrant to engage in the surveillance of Canadians." The CSE isn't supposed to target Canadians, but it can pick up their communications when they are targeting foreigners, and do warrantless bulk tracking of communications, intercepting so-called metadata - who called whom, when, for how long. We'll see, eventually. Mr. Goodale, despite his verbal gymnastics, is a serious minister. But he might disappoint those anti-C-51 NDP-Liberal voters who now seem to have gone Liberal. The long version of the discussion paper released for public consultation gives the impression the Liberals aren't looking to roll back spy powers. Its tone suggests they favour the biggest feature of Bill C-51, which was giving Canadian Security Intelligence Service broad powers to "disrupt" threats - traditionally the purview of the RCMP - rather than to just collect intelligence.

4. Being muslim in shadow of 9/11

Ottawa Citizen, Mohammed Adam, 2016 09 09

Column: Only last week, I was making plans with friends to go out to celebrate Eid al-Adha - the Muslim feast of sacrifice - which we thought would fall on Sept. 11. The day being a Sunday, we looked forward to meeting most of our friends at a local restaurant for a big celebration. It never occurred to us that this might be problematic. It was only after I talked to another friend in the United States that I realized that the symbolism of the date was causing considerable consternation among Muslims south of the border. Apparently American Muslim leaders worried that some might interpret the Eid, which involves a lot of merrymaking, as a celebration of the 9/11 attacks. In the age of Donald Trump, Muslim leaders felt there would be a severe backlash and were at a loss how to proceed. However, given the nature of the lunar calendar, the date changed, and Eid is now likely to take place on Sept. 12 or 13. But what it all brought vividly home is that 15 after years after the traumatic attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, 9/11 still haunts Muslims. What I remember most in the immediate aftermath of 9/11 is not just the anger and sickening horror of the attacks, but the feeling that, as a Muslim, I was a marked man. Most of us felt that if your name was Muhammad, Hassan or Fatima, woe for you. Some of us thought our phones were being tapped. It really was weird. Many people I know stopped travelling through the United States, for fear of being targeted. (Note: Mohammed Adam is an Ottawa writer.)

5. Cash seizures jump at Vancouver airport

Globe and Mail, Mike Hager & Kathy Tomlinson, 2016 09 09

Vancouver - As Vancouver's housing market began sizzling, border guards at the nearby international airport were seizing millions of dollars in undeclared cash from Chinese citizens, with total amounts jumping 50 per cent in each of the past three calendar years, government data show. According to the information, released to The Globe and Mail by a New Democrat MLA, during that period, border guards confiscated more than $13- million in hidden currency from 792 Chinese people passing through Vancouver International Airport, which is Canada's second-busiest after Toronto. The average person had $17,000 in hidden bills, bank notes or drafts. That is in addition to the $323million declared at the airport by 20,000 Chinese citizens or passengers on flights to and from that country, during roughly the same period, according to data released to The Globe through a freedom of information request. Experts say these sums of hidden and declared money, which dwarf the funds brought through the airport from other countries, were likely carried by some of the 922,000 people from China recently given 10- year temporary visas, which allow them to visit for up to six months at a time. Former RCMP investigator and financial crimes specialist Kim Marsh said many travellers bring large amounts of money - or bank notes or drafts - instead of transferring them through institutional routes because they want to avoid paying taxes in Canada and get around Chinese currency laws that make it illegal for the average citizen to take more than $50,000 (U.S.) a year out of that country.

6. Did We Train Terror Leader?; Military Probe

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - A senior terrorist killed in Bangladesh last week may have been trained by the Canadian Armed Forces as part of an international military co-operation program, defence sources said Thursday. The Department of National Defence said it was trying to verify whether Mohammad Zahidul Islam, the alleged second-in-command of a pro-Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) faction behind a wave of deadly attacks, had trained in Canada. Also known as "Murad," he was killed by Bangladesh security forces during a raid last Friday. Since then, the Dhaka press has reported the 37- year-old was an army major who had trained at the Canadian Forces junior staff college in 2013-14 before returning to Bangladesh, quitting the military and taking up terrorism. "We are currently looking into the matter, but cannot confirm the information at the moment," said Daniel Le Bouthillier, head of media relations at DND. But defence sources said the Bangladesh press accounts appear to be correct. Canada's Military Training and Cooperation Program has trained more than 2,000 military students from the Asia-Pacific region since 1965. Bangladesh is among the foreign militaries whose students have taken part in the program. "The Canadian Armed Forces has exchange and training programs designed to enhance our bilateral relationships and promote Canadian values," Le Bouthillier said. "These agreements between the CAF and the military forces and government agencies of other nations promote interoperability and by their presence, enhance understanding and co-operation." According to The Daily Star, a Dhaka newspaper, after returning from military training in Canada, Murad "looked interested in religious activities and started telling his friends that he would quit the army as 'many things in the service contradicted his ethics and religious beliefs.' " He retired from the Bangladesh military in July 2015 and his family lost contact with him in April 2016, the newspaper reported.

7. Government terror report omits key issues

Ottawa Citizen, Satyamoorthy Kabilan, 2016 09 09

Column: This weekend marks 15 years since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, on the United States, resulting in the deaths of nearly 3,000 people. So much has changed since that day, but what is patently clear is that terrorism remains a global threat. What does this mean for Canada's security today? Public Safety Canada recently released its 2016 Public Report on the Terrorist Threat to Canada, outlining some of the key national security threats as well as providing a useful description of the National Terrorism Threat Level system. While the report does cover many of the main threats, are there other key issues that need to part of our discussion about the terrorism threat to Canada? Three additional areas merit further attention: 1. Foreign fighter returnees as a potential resource The report has a significant focus on foreign fighters and the threat of returnees. Foreign fighters come home for a range of reasons and should not be considered a homogeneous group. Some are disillusioned by their experiences, with reports of brutal crackdowns against foreign fighters who want to escape the conflict in Syria and Iraq. Could disillusioned returnees serve as credible voices against radicalization and participation in foreign conflicts? We need to understand what opportunities these returnees may present. A returnee whose experience can serve as valuable narrative to help counter radicalization needs to be distinguished from those who still pose a risk to Canada. In June 2015, the Conference Board of Canada's Centre for National Security met to discuss the issue of extremist groups and identified a number of emerging threats, including the rise of anti-government groups such as "sovereign citizens." In the Canadian context, the Moncton, N.B., shooter could be viewed as an anti-government extremist. While it is essential to deal with the current terrorist threat, we should not lose sight of emerging extremist groups. (Note: Satyamoorthy Kabilan is the director of national security and strategic foresight with the Conference Board of Canada.)

8. Immigrants need better screening, Clement says

Globe and Mail, Laura Stone, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - Conservative leadership candidate Tony Clement says he will propose enhanced immigration screening as part of his platform to protect Canadians from potential terrorists. The Ontario MP plans on pitching the idea, part of his national security plank, at a news conference in Ottawa next week. "We should be increasing screening to weed out people who have backgrounds that indicate that they have been involved in terrorist organizations or militant organizations that pose a threat to the country," Mr. Clement told The Globe and Mail. "That, I think, is where we should provide our resources." Mr. Clement was responding to fellow candidate Kellie Leitch's idea to screen immigrants for so-called "anti-Canadian values," which includes intolerance toward religions and sexual orientation, as well as misogyny or violent behaviour. Ms. Leitch told The Globe her proposal is about promoting tolerance and equality, and she wants to have a discussion about what constitutes a "unified Canadian identity," which in her eyes is equality of opportunity, hard work, generosity, freedom and tolerance. But her plan has been panned by some of Ms. Leitch's fellow Conservatives, who've called it everything from "dogwhistle politics" to "Orwellian." While Mr. Clement said it's always a good idea to talk about Canadian values, he doesn't think a values test is the right approach.

10. McGill video coaches students how to respond to a shooter

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman, 2016 09 09

Montreal - The alarming image above is part of a training video McGill University will be showing students to prepare them for the (unlikely) possibility of an active shooter on campus. It is part of a chilling scene that depicts a masked gunman loading a weapon and then stalking the hallways of a campus building, randomly shooting at anyone in his path. "Every second counts," counsels the video. "Active shooter situations are unpredictable and evolve quickly. ... Planning could save your life." McGill has taken the unsettling step of choosing to not just prepare students for the workforce, but for the unlikely event they may one day encounter an active shooter on campus. The new training video, which has been distributed among teachers to share with their classes, coaches faculty and students on how to react if a gunman starts randomly firing in the hallways, classrooms, libraries - or anywhere - on the tranquil university campus. Laced with constant warnings about its disturbing nature, the video provides three main tactics for surviving such an ambush by a shooter: run, hide, fight. "As unlikely as it is, it could happen," the video says. "Odds are you will never face the unthinkable, but if you do, keep the odds in your favour. ... You can never fully prepare for an active shooter, but you can improve your chances of surviving." Ollivier Dyens, deputy provost of student life at McGill, sent out the video to faculty Thursday morning with a note asking them to disseminate as widely as possible "this training video on what to do in the unlikely event of a shooter on campus."

11. Mission de paix - Le gouvernement refuse la demande de vote de l'opposition

Le Devoir, Marie Vastel, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - Alors que le gouvernement Trudeau se prépare à déployer des Casques bleus à l'étranger, les trois partis d'opposition estiment que les libéraux doivent d'abord soumettre toute mission de paix à un vote aux Communes. Le gouvernement préfère cependant rester vague quant à ses intentions. Le ministre de la Défense, Harjit Sajjan, a soufflé le chaud et le froid jeudi. Lorsque le Globe and Mail lui a demandé en entrevue si le Parlement serait invité à se prononcer sur l'éventuelle mission de paix, le ministre a été catégorique : " Non. Nous allons décider au conseil des ministres et aller de l'avant le plus vite possible. " Quelques heures plus tard, il a refusé de confirmer ou d'infirmier cette réponse. Invité à trois reprises à dire si, oui ou non, son gouvernement permettrait aux députés de voter, le ministre a esquivé. " Nous avons été clairs depuis le début ", a-t-il fait valoir en conférence téléphonique en rappelant que le Parti libéral a promis en campagne électorale de renouer avec les missions de paix onusiennes et que cette promesse figurait dans sa lettre de mandat du premier ministre. " Le fait que nous étudions des opérations de soutien de la paix ne devrait pas être une surprise pour personne, et surtout pas pour l'opposition ", a argué le ministre depuis Londres, où il prenait part à une conférence de pays qui participent aux missions de paix des Nations unies.

12. Sajjan wavers on Commons vote

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - The federal government is refusing to commit to a parliamentary vote on troop deployments for what it promises will be a return to a major peacekeeping role for Canada - one or more missions that could hold significant peril for soldiers in an era in which stabilizing conflict zones has grown more dangerous. The government shifted message on this matter within a matter of hours on Thursday. Early in the day, Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan told The Globe and Mail that the Liberals would not put the matter to a vote in the House of Commons. The government is currently considering options for a major new peacekeeping deployment and Mr. Sajjan said in a taped interview that the government had already received an election mandate from voters to deploy soldiers to United Nations operations. Asked twice whether there would be parliamentary votes on peacekeeping deployments, he replied: "No. We will be deciding in cabinet and moving forward as quickly as possible on this." But later in the day, after questions from journalists on a teleconference, Mr. Sajjan declined to answer whether MPs would be asked to vote on peacekeeping deployment. Instead, he said the cabinet will determine how things will proceed. "Once we have that discussion, a process will be decided on," he said. His office later said the government was not ruling out a parliamentary vote. He announced that Canada will host the next UN Peacekeeping Defence Ministerial in 2017. This summit is a new forum, inaugurated this year in London, to improve UN efforts to resolve conflicts. The Liberals are fully within their rights to send soldiers abroad without consulting the Commons, but the past decade saw former prime minister Stephen Harper hold votes in some instances - for extensions or deployments of combat missions.

13. The ISIS leader who once received Canadian military training

Maclean's Magazine, Adnan R. Khan, 2016 09 09

Ottawa - A former Bangladeshi military officer who played a key role in this past summer's deadly terrorist attacks in Dhaka once received military training in Canada, a Department of National Defense source has confirmed to Maclean's. The news follows confirmation last June that Windsor-native Tamim Chowdhury, who had been on Canada's terrorism watchlist since 2013, had emerged as the leader of Islamic State's Bangladeshi affiliate. Now it appears his second in command also had a Canadian connection, bringing to total four people linked to Canada who have been accused in Bangladesh recently of being members of Islamic State. The latest development is perhaps the most disturbing. The man, identified by Bangladeshi media as Muhammad Jahidul Islam and known to his extremist cohorts as Major Murad, was a retired major from the Bangladeshi military, according to press reports, and Chowdhury's "right hand man". Investigators in Bangladesh say Islam had retired from the military in July 2015 after returning home from Canada and described him as the man responsible for training the attackers who targeted the Holy Artisan Bakery, an upscale cafe in the Bangladeshi capital, Dhaka, killing 29, including 18 foreigners. He died in a hail of bullets after police raided his hideout in an apartment north of the city on Sept. 2. According to an investigation carried out by Amarnath Amarasingam, a terrorism expert at the University of Waterloo, a source in Bangladesh says Islam was in Canada as part of an officer training program for military personnel from developing countries: the Directorate - Military Training and Cooperation (DMTC) at the Army Staff College in Kingston, Ont. Another source in Bangladesh also told Maclean's that Islam received military training in Canada as part of the program. A DND spokesperson said Ottawa is aware of reports that Islam trained in Canada. "We are currently looking into the matter, but cannot confirm the information at the moment," Daniel Le Bouthillier, head of media relations, wrote in an email response to a Maclean's query.

14. Wherever it leads, let's applaud consultation on security

Globe and Mail, Wesley Wark, 2016 09 09

Comment: The federal government has just released a long-awaited public consultation document (green paper), titled Our Security, Our Rights. The paper fulfills a Liberal promise to consult with Canadians about national security issues in the aftermath of the very contentious and heated debate over the 2015 anti-terrorism legislation, Bill C-51, passed as one of the last acts of the previous Conservative government. Consultation with Canadians is a great idea, but attendant with real difficulties. The process is unheard of historically - never before has a Canadian government actually encouraged a public debate about the secretive realm of national security. Not surprisingly, few Canadians are well versed in such matters. Our national security literacy is low, whether we are talking about threats or about the tools available to respond to those threats. Due in part to the way Bill C-51 was rolled out, the Liberals face entrenched political views on national security. Conservatives are ready to fight to the end to preserve every inch of C-51; the New Democrats are ready to throw the whole thing out. This green paper will test whether there is space for a genuine, informed political debate in Canada. Another challenge hidden beneath its folds is that it was written by government bureaucrats who - let us face it - have grown up under the Conservatives, are used to their ways and outlook, and may be resistant to change or a new doctrine of openness. Whether the thinking of senior security and intelligence professionals can be "greened" by the green paper remains an interesting question. The green paper is set in the predictable and unavoidable context of finding the right balance between security and rights. But the balancing act is made precarious by two problems. One is that Canadians lean to the rights side of the equation because that is what we know and cherish. The other is a narrow perspective on security threats. Here, the Liberals have fallen into a trap set by the long-standing contention of the previous Conservative government that terrorism was the No. 1 threat to Canadian national security. (Note: Wesley Wark is a visiting professor at the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs, University of Ottawa, and an expert on national security issues. He gave testimony before Parliament on Bill C-51 in the spring of 2015.)

15. Acts of kindness in Canada on 9/11

Washington Post, Peter Marks, 2016 09 09

Washington - As if you needed another reason in this grotesque political season to contemplate a move to the Great White North, along comes "Come From Away," a musical packed with so much Canadian goodwill you'll wonder why an entire province wasn't awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. That maritime province, Newfoundland, is the benevolent locale of this heartwarming and eager-to-please musical, which had its official opening Wednesday night at Ford's Theatre. Its most compelling character, in fact, is the place itself, and more to the point, the embracing spirit of a rough-hewn people who opened their arms and homes to 7,000 airline passengers marooned there on one of the worst days in American history, Sept. 11, 2001. The 15th anniversary of the terrorist acts that resulted in 3,000 deaths in New York, Pennsylvania and Washington - and a fundamental change in the way Americans think about the world - occurs on Sunday. For anyone with even a faint memory of or connection to those events, the musical by the husband- and-wife team of Irene Sankoff and David Hein will reach into a place in your gut you may have wanted left undisturbed. My heart leaped into my mouth several times over the course of the hour and 45 minutes of "Come From Away," episodes triggered by finely detailed depictions of the stranded passengers' realizations of the scale of the horrors, and the townfolk's small but meaningful acts of kindness toward the horde of strangers in their midst.

16. DHS secretary: Ballot counts are largely safe from cyberattack

Politico, Jennifer Scholtes, 2016 09 08

Washington - Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson said Thursday it would be very difficult for hackers to alter Election Day ballot counts. "It is so decentralized and so vast," the secretary said during a forum hosted by The Atlantic. "You've got state governments, local governments, county governments involved in the election process. It would be very difficult to alter the count." Johnson said federal officials are generally concerned, however, about the potential for state actors, hacktivists or cyber criminals to manipulate or interfere with online state election systems. It was recently revealed that hackers had infiltrated voter registration databases in Illinois and Arizona. To help protect against those threats, the Department of Homeland Security has been offering to assist election officials with cyber hygiene evaluations, incident response and information sharing. But the secretary said those offers are being misconstrued. Several state officials have expressed concerns about a federal overreach into local election control.

17. Don't be fooled -- Donald Trump's foreign policy is as scary as ever

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 09 08

Column - Donald Trump is shifting to "responsible candidate" mode now, so his remarks on foreign policy Wednesday night sounded relatively restrained -- until you begin parsing the details. A...head-scratcher came in Trump's discussion of the intelligence briefing he received last month. The correct answer would have been to say: I'm not going to discuss a secret briefing. What Trump did instead was insidious: He implied that Obama had ignored policy recommendations from the intelligence community and "did not follow .??. what our experts said to do." Trump knew this because he's "pretty good with the body language" and "could tell that [the analysts] were not happy." This reflects a chronic misunderstanding of how the intelligence process works. Analysts do not make policy recommendations. It's a violation of their basic tradecraft. What they do, at best, is offer honest, unsentimental assessments of whether policies are working. Over the decades, they've offered withering assessments of U.S. military involvement in Vietnam, Lebanon, Iraq and Syria, to name just a few. But that doesn't mean they've offered policy direction. If Trump gets another intelligence briefing, it should be prefaced with an admonition: "Mr. Candidate: Nothing in this session should be construed as policy advice."

18. Europe should brace for flood of 'hardened' ISIS fighters, US says

McClatchy News Service, Tim Johnson, 2016 09 09

Washington - The likely collapse of the Islamic State caliphate in Iraq and Syria will deal a mighty blow to the terror group but may scatter "hundreds of hardened killers" into Western Europe, top Obama administration officials said Thursday. The likely dispersal of the terrorists makes the sharing of intelligence between Western Europe and the United States ever more essential, the officials said. Allied forces are "getting close" to launching an assault to retake

Mosul, Iraq's second largest city and an Islamic State stronghold, Defense Intelligence Agency Director Vincent R. Stewart, a Marine Corps lieutenant general, told the 2016 Intelligence & National Security Summit in Washington. "I would imagine that the operation will unfold sometime in the next two, three months," Stewart said, adding that "a long and difficult battle" may unfold in the city itself. "The threat that I believe will dominate the next five years for the FBI will be the impact of the crushing of the caliphate, which will happen," FBI Director James Comey said at the forum, which was sponsored by two associations of professional intelligence officials. "But through the fingers of that crush are going to come hundreds of hardened killers who are not going to die on the battlefield."

19. FBI Arrests Two in String of Breaches at CIA, Justice Department

Washington - Two North Carolina men were arrested Thursday on charges that they were part of the hacking group "Crackas With Attitude" that pulled off a series of embarrassing data breaches against the head of the CIA, a senior FBI official, and the Justice Department's case management system. Andrew Otto Boggs, 22, and Justin Gray Liverman, 24, were charged with being part of a conspiracy to access the personal accounts of senior government officials in late 2015 and early 2016. Although court documents didn't name the victims, they include CIA Director John Brennan and then- Deputy FBI Director Mark Giuliano, according to officials close to the case. The hackers also managed to repeatedly access the Justice Department's computer system over a week earlier this year, according to authorities. The hacking group also targeted officials from the White House, Department of Homeland Security, and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, as well as their families, according to authorities. The two men were charged in a criminal complaint filed in federal court in northern Virginia with conspiring to commit offenses against the U.S. If found guilty they could face up to five years in prison.

20. Fifteen years after 9/11, the attacks' effects continue to be felt

Montreal Gazette, Jack Jedwab, 2016 09 09

Opinion: On Sept. 11, 2001, people around the world were riveted to their television screens as terrorists crashed planes into the Twin Towers in New York City. To those of us watching the collapsing skyscrapers, the many people fleeing for their lives and the valiant rescue efforts, it all seemed surreal. That day's horrific events, which killed close to 3,000 people, also included the terrorist hijackings of two other planes, both of which crashed, one into the Pentagon. The shock felt in the United States was massive, and there was a collateral effect on much of the Western world. Over the past 15 years, the images associated with 9/11 have been shown repeatedly on television and in other media. They serve as a stark reminder of the capacity of terrorists to wreak havoc on society. If the world's most powerful nation is vulnerable to such acts, so too are others, as evidenced by subsequent acts of terrorism elsewhere. It's understandable that since then, Americans' collective sense of security has been shaken. Despite all the measures put into place in the aftermath of 9/11 to make citizens feel more at ease, the threat of terrorism remains a very important source of anxiety - and not only in the United States. Fifteen years later, 9/11 comes up in debates about civil liberties, relations between communities, immigration, diversity, the accommodation of difference and the place of religion in our society. The lessons we've drawn from 9/11 have had a clear impact on public policy choices across North America. 21. Former DHS Secretary Tom Ridge warns that terror attacks 'will probably happen again' in U.S. and country 'should just accept the inevitability'

New York Daily News, Adam Edelman, 2016 09 09

New York - The former homeland security secretary who created the color-coded terrorism risk advisory system is now saying that Americans just need to chill out about terror attacks because they "will probably happen again here." The country "should just accept the inevitability" of future attacks, Tom Ridge, who led the Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2005, said Thursday during a forum hosted by The Atlantic in Washington, D.C. "What I really think the country needs to do is accept the reality that it is a global scourge, accept the reality that it will probably happen again here -- we have no idea how many times," added Ridge. "I'm not trying to say that the pain or suffering of a terrorist attack isn't significant, isn't real. It is. But I want America to dial down some of the hyperbole and the hyperventilation," said Ridge, who has called GOP presidential nominee Donald Trump "dangerous."

22. Spy games meet word games as officials warn Russia against election meddling

Baltimore Sun, Ian Duncan, 2016 09 09

Washington - When some of the nation's top spies joined each other on stage at a conference Thursday, the question of whether Russia was behind the hacking of the Democratic National Committee and state elections systems soon came up. The spies carefully skirted the question. We're working with our partners on it, CIA director John Brennan said. It's really a policy question, NSA director Adm. Michael Rogers said. "I'm going to continue the streak of not talking about that," FBI director James Comey said. Then he went on to talk about it in a rather backhanded way. The intelligence officials' comments Thursday mirrored those of other top government leaders this week as the United States tries to figure out what to do about what is widely suspected to be Russian meddling in the upcoming election without saying publicly the Kremlin is behind the attacks.

23. The almost forgotten war in Afghanistan

Globe and Mail, Brahma Chellaney, 2016 09 09

Comment: This Sunday marks the 15th anniversary of the longest war in American history that continues to rage ferociously in Afghanistan, casting a shadow over that country's future and highlighting the failure of U.S. President Barack Obama's strategy to gradually wind down the conflict. Yet the war now attracts little international attention, except when a major militant attack occurs. The current situation in Afghanistan is worse than at any time since 2001, when the U.S. invasion helped oust the Taliban from power, forcing them to set up their command-and-control structure in neighbouring Pakistan, their creator and steadfast sponsor. Today, the resurgent Taliban hold more Afghan territory than before, the civilian toll is at a record high and Afghan military casualties are rising to a level that American commanders warn is unsustainable. From sanctuaries in Pakistan and from the Afghan areas they hold, the militants are carrying out increasingly daring attacks, including in the capital Kabul, as illustrated by the recent strike on the American University of Afghanistan. U.S. president George W. Bush declared war in Afghanistan in response to the world's worst terrorist attack in modern history on Sept. 11, 2001, at home. Yet before he could accomplish his war objectives in Afghanistan, Mr. Bush invaded and occupied Iraq - one of the greatest military misadventures in modern history that destabilized the Middle East and fuelled Islamist terrorism. Mr. Obama came to office with the pledge to end the Bush-era wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. In Iraq, he ended the Bush war, only to start a new war in the SyriaIraq belt.

24. Washington Really Doesn't Want To Deal With A Cyber War With Russia

BuzzFeed News, Ali Watkins, Sheera Frankel, 2016 09 09

Washington - The Obama administration is wary of publicly accusing Russia of meddling in the US election despite increasing pressure from within Washington, for fear of fanning public concerns over the security of the election and igniting a cycle of tit-for-tat cyber attacks, several US government officials told BuzzFeed News. "Do you really want to call it out, and recognize it? With everything you do, you should be reinforcing the public's confidence in the election system," said one US intelligence official, who is frequently briefed on Russia issues. Calling Russia out, he said, could also validate widespread worries over the security of the November election. "Do you really want that shitstorm? I don't think you do." The White House has not assigned blame for the hack of the Democratic National Committee emails, which cybersecurity experts say were most likely stolen by Kremlin-backed hackers. Another US intelligence official said it appeared as though actors in Russia weren't even trying to hide their efforts anymore. The official said his organization had buckled down on official travel to Moscow, urging employees to follow protocol and leave their phones and laptops at home. Asked what that meant for working conditions, the official said "We just have to trust that the facilities we use in the embassy are secure."

25. White House names retired Air Force general as first cyber security chief

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 09

Washington - The White House on Thursday named a retired U.S. Air Force brigadier general as the government's first federal cyber security chief, a position announced eight months ago that is intended to improve defenses against hackers. Gregory Touhill's job will be to protect government networks and critical infrastructure from cyber threats as federal chief information security officer, according to a statement. The administration of President Barack Obama has made bolstering federal cyber security a top priority in his last year in office. The issue has gained more attention because of high-profile breaches in recent years of government and private sector computers. Touhill is currently a deputy assistant secretary for cyber security and communications at the Department of Homeland Security. He will begin his new role later this month, a source familiar with the matter said. Touhill's responsibilities will include creating and implementing policy for best security practices across federal agencies and conducting periodic audits to test for weaknesses, according to the announcement.

26. 'Nothing to stop' Choudary claiming more benefits after jail

London Daily Telegraph, Steven Swinford, 2016 09 09

London - Terrorists should be subject to financial restrictions on their benefits after leaving jail or will just "stick two fingers up at the state" and continue claiming, a former police chief said. Richard Walton, a former head of counter-terrorism command at Scotland Yard, warned that there will be "nothing to stop" hate preachers such as Anjem Choudary claiming benefits after they leave jail. Earlier this week, a judge criticised Choudary for claiming £500,000 in benefits from a country he "so adamantly despises" as he was sentenced to five-and-a-half years in jail for supporting Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (Isil). Mr Walton said yesterday: "Are we prepared to let him come back and carry on claiming benefits? "He has consistently stuck two fingers up at the state. "We could look at the parallels with sex offenders, and post-conviction have an order that limits behaviours."

27. Police claim to have foiled Isis-inspired bomb plot in London

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, Duncan Gardham, 2016 09 09

London - A suspected Islamic State-inspired bomb attack was foiled by police yesterday in what was described as the most significant terror plot against the capital for two years. Counterterrorism detectives arrested two brothers, aged 19 and 20, over fears that they were trying to get hold of chemicals to construct an explosive device in west London. Their alleged targets were unclear but were thought to be random members of the public rather than the military or police. The alleged plot was said to be in the very early stages but sources said that it was more sophisticated than a knife attack carried out at a Tube station in east London last year by a mentally ill man who had been downloading Isis material. It is possible that the brothers were also trying to get hold of guns and other weapons, raising fears of a Paris-style attack on several targets. Security sources indicated that the latest suspected plot could be the most serious in the capital since two Isis supporters, Tarik Hassane and Suhaib Majeed, were held for planning a drive-by shooting of a west London police station in October 2014. They said it was "highly significant" but warned that the nature and scale of the plot would remain unclear until searches in London and the Thames Valley were complete. Scotland Yard said that two men were arrested at an address in west London as part of a "pre-planned, intelligence-led investigation" by the Met's SO15 Counter-Terrorism Command and the South East Counter Terrorism Unit. They were thought to have been put under surveillance by police and MI5.

28. Islamic State calls for acts of terror on Australian soil

Herald Sun, Rita Panahi, 2016 09 09

Canberra - The Islamic State's special brand of subhuman savagery is evident in every page of its official magazine, Rumiya. The latest release, published on Tuesday, contains the usual glorification of violence and evil in the name of Islam but also contains no fewer than four pages devoted to Australia, including the veneration of Australian Lebanese jihadi Abu Mansur al-Muhajir, aka Ezzit Raad, who the terror group claims was killed in Syria. There are also explicit calls for attacks on Australian soil to be carried out by the "lions of the Ummah (Islamic community) and those living in Australia in particular". "Kill them on the streets of Brunswick, Broadmeadows, Bankstown and Bondi," Islamic State proclaims. "Kill them at the MCG, the SCG, the Opera House, and even in their backyards. Stab them, shoot them, poison them and run them down with your vehicles. "Kill them wherever you find them until the hollowness of their arrogance is filled with terror and they find themselves on their knees with their backs broken under the weight of regret for having waged a war against the believers and by Allah's will, and then through your sacrifices, this Ummah will be victorious." Melbourne is described as "a land cloaked in darkness and corrupted by kufr (unbelief), fornication and all forms of vice", and there is derogatory commentary on everything from Australia's "bikini-clad women" to our counter-terrorism laws.

29. Protesters walking fine line

Bay of Plenty Times (New Zealand), Staff Writer, 2016 09 09

Wellington - Legitimate protesters could be charged as terrorists under new legislation unless changes are made, the NZ Law Society says. New Zealand's history of protest at sea, including against the visit of US nuclear vessels during the 1970s and 1980s, was cited during submissions on the law change yesterday. Parliament is considering legislation that will bring New Zealand up to date with current international rules about maritime security. It will create new offences related to maritime terrorism and maritime boarding. But there are concerns that the law change could be used to stifle protest at sea because the definition of what is "terrorism" is too broad. Jonathan Orpin of the New Zealand Law Society appeared before Parliament's Foreign Affairs, Defence and Trade committee yesterday and argued for the terrorism definition to be tightened.

The current definition is to carry out or to threaten acts with the purpose of intimidating a population or to compel a government or organisation. Mr Orpin submitted that should be changed to match the terrorism definition in other legislation - including an intention to induce terror in a civilian population, or to unduly compel or force a government or organisation.

31. Taliban storm ex-Aussie stronghold of Tarin Kowt

The Australian, Greg Bearup, 2016 09 09

Canberra - The Afghan provincial city of Tarin Kowt is under heavy attack from the Taliban, with government buildings targeted and the leadership reportedly having fled the city by air. Tarin Kowt is the capital of Oruzgan, where the majority of Australia's troops were based during the war in Afghanistan. Oruzgan police chief Wais Samim told Reuters that Taliban militants had fought their way to within a few hundred metres of the governor's compound and police headquarters. "If reinforcements do not arrive, this city will collapse into the hands of the Taliban," Oruzgan Governor Karim Khademzai told Agence France-Presse. He said people were unable to flee because insurgents had surrounded the city. Journalist Bilal Sarwary tweeted NATO jet fighters had bombed several locations in the city and the forces of local commander General Raziq had pushed back the Taliban in two locations. An Australian reconstruction force arrived in Oruzgan in 2006, with the force building to 1500 soldiers until the withdrawal in 2013. It was where most of the 41 Diggers who died in Afghanistan were killed and more than 261 were seriously wounded. The war effort cost billions of dollars as Australia attempted to establish security, build roads, open schools and hospitals. The Defence Ministry says its security forces are waging operations in 15 provinces. The Taliban has also brought terror to Kabul with a number of attacks. Analysts have blamed poor leadership at a national level, with President Ashraf Ghani reportedly clashing with Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah. The two rule a government of national unity, which many say is not working.

32. Terror fears as teenager arrested

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 09 09

Canberra - Two days after Islamic State called on its followers to carry out lone-wolf attacks on iconic Australian sites such as Bondi Beach and the MCG, an 18-year-old suspected extremist has been detained at the Sydney Opera House. Police moved swiftly yesterday to detain the boy, who was known to counter-terrorism detectives, after Opera House security staff and members of the public became suspicious of the teenager's behaviour. Police sources last night said there was no threat to the public safety and detectives were exploring whether mental illness was a factor. The arrest comes just days after Islamic State published graphic and detailed instructions to its followers to kill unbelievers in Sydney and Melbourne, in its online magazine Rumiyaah. The release of Rumiyaah, which singled out the Opera House as a target, generated widespread publicity and police are likely to investigate whether it was a factor in the teenager's behaviour. "Light the ground beneath (Australians) aflame and scorch them with terror," the unnamed author of the magazine article said. "Kill them on the streets of Brunswick, Broadmeadows, Bankstown, and Bondi. Kill them at the MCG, the SCG, the Opera House, and even in their backyards.

FO Spokesman Nafees Zakaria, hitting back at Modi's statement, said that "India is in fact that single nation". The FO statement comes as Modi while addressing ASEAN member nations at a summit in Laos sought a coordinated response against the "export of terror", Times of India reported. "Export of terror, growing radicalisation and spread of extreme violence are common security threats to our societies," he told the summit, in what is believed to be another apparent reference to Islamabad.

40. 'NK conducts largest nuclear test'

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 09 09

Seoul - North Korea is believed to have carried out Friday another nuclear test assessed to be its largest one to date, South Korean military said. This marked the fifth official nuclear experiment by the communist state since the UN Security Council adopted a resolution banning it from any nuclear or ballistic missile programs. The Joint Chiefs of Staff said that a magnitude-5.0 artificial earthquake had been detected near Punggye-ri, Hamgyeong Province, where an underground nuclear test site is located. The waves had been reported by the state-run Korea Meteorological Administration. "(The military) believes that it is a nuclear test, and we are conducting further analysis on the nuclear material used and whether the test has succeeded," Defense Ministry spokesman Moon Sang-kyun said in a press briefing. Based on the size of the seismic event, the KMA estimated the yield of the test to be about 10-12 kilotons, which amounts to 67-80 percent of that of the atomic bomb that hit Hiroshima in 1945. Pyongyang's fourth and latest nuclear test in January, which caused a magnitude-4.8 earthquake, was assessed to involve 6 kilotons. No further signs of unusual movement were detected from the North Korean military afterwards, according to military.

43. Australia's double standard over territorial disputes

China Daily, Wang Hui, 2016 09 09

Column: The disputes between Australia and its smaller neighbor East Timor over maritime boundaries could serve as a useful lens for others to see through the double standard of some Western countries. On Aug 29, Australia's Foreign Minister Julie Bishop and the Attorney General George Brandis said in a joint statement that Australia will argue that an arbitration body in The Hague has no jurisdiction to settle a dispute with East Timor over their maritime boundary, adding that Australia did not consider its final report would be binding. The statement was issued the same day a conciliation commission was due to hear an arbitration case initiated by East Timor against Australia in The Hague over the disputed Timor Sea. To cut a long story short, the feud between Australia and East Timor stems from the latter's attempt to renegotiate maritime boundaries with Australia in the Timor Sea, which is abundant in oil and natural gas reserves. Over the years, Australia has allegedly resorted to malpractice, such as spying, to gain commercial profits from a bilateral gas deal. Yet, what is uncommon in the Australia-East Timor dispute is the sharp difference between Australia's attitude towards its own maritime dispute and toward the territorial dispute between China and the Philippines in the South China Sea. Soon after an arbitral tribunal in The Hague handed down its ruling in favor of the Philippines in the South China Sea arbitration case on July 12, Australia joined a chorus led by the United States to press China to accept the ruling, giving a deaf year to China's stance that the arbitral tribunal had no jurisdiction over the case.

They include five bodies of the jihadists at the Holey restaurant and 13 others of alleged terrorists killed in three police operations in recent weeks in Dhaka, among them the Canadian-Bangladeshi Tamim Chaudhry, the alleged intellectual author of the attack on July 1. "No family has formally applied for the body," said Muhammad Yusuf Ali, an additional deputy commissioner of Dhaka police. Payera Begum, the mother of a suspected jihadist, said she claimed the body but did not have resources to bring it home and had sought help from the authorities. "I have asked police if they would give me the body but found no answer. I cannot bring it on my own," she said.

45. Counterfeit cliques backed by spies and mobsters

Dhaka Tribune, Mohammad Jamil Khan, Kamrul Hasan, 2016 09 09

Dhaka - Law enforcers say that at least 40 organised counterfeit syndicates are active in circulating fake notes across Bangladesh now, taking advantage of the massive rush of cash exchanges during Eid-ul-Azha season. Obtaining security materials used in counterfeit money seems very easy. The counterfeit syndicates in Bangladesh are bringing the special paper from Pakistan and the security threads from India, law enforcement sources said. Along with this, involvement of a foreign intelligence agency was also found to be behind the racket. Police's counterterrorism chief Monirul Islam told the Dhaka Tribune that they were suspecting the involvement of a foreign intelligence agency and were investigating the matter. Along with Bangladesh police, officials of Indian intelligence are also working to trace these note forgers.

46. Need to target not only terrorists, but also their supporting ecosystem, says PM Modi

Times of India, Staff Report, 2016 09 09

New Delhi - Three days after he had singled out Pakistan at the G 20 meeting+ for spreading terror across the world, PM Narendra Modi again used a multilateral forum to slam Islamabad as an instigator and global exporter of terror. Speaking at the East Asia summit in Vientiane on Thursday, Modi projected Pakistan as a risk not just to India but to the global community and called for strongest action against all countries using terrorism as an instrument of state policy. "There is one country in India's neighbourhood," he said, "whose competitive advantage rests solely in producing and exporting terrorism". It seems apparent that Modi is not likely to pass up an opportunity to target Pakistan at international forums with India deciding to adopt a muscular response to Islamabad's bid to internationalise+ violent protests in Kashmir.

47. North Korea Claims Success in Latest Nuclear Test

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, Jane Perlez, 2016 09 09

Seoul - North Korea conducted its fifth underground nuclear test on Friday, its government said, despite threats of more sanctions from the United States and the United Nations. The latest test, according to South Korean officials, produced a more powerful explosive yield than the North's previous detonations, indicating that the country was making progress in its efforts to build a functional nuclear warhead. Later Friday, the North's nuclear weapons institute issued a statement saying that the test was successfully conducted for a final check on the explosive power and other characteristics of a "nuclear warhead that has been standardized to be able to be mounted on" its ballistic missiles. A statement from the South Korean military also said that an artificial tremor, registered as magnitude 5, had originated from Punggye-ri in northeastern North Korea, where the North has conducted its four previous underground nuclear tests. A senior official at the Defense Ministry later told reporters that it had concluded that a nuclear detonation had caused the tremor. The ministry estimated the explosive yield was equivalent to 10 kilotons of TNT, the most powerful detonation unleashed in a North Korean nuclear test so far, according to the official, who briefed reporters on the condition of anonymity. The South's government estimated the North's last nuclear test, conducted in January, at 4.8 magnitude with an explosive yield of six to nine kilotons. (By comparison, the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima in 1945 exploded with 15 kilotons of energy.) In Washington, Ned Price, a National Security Council spokesman, said: "We are aware of seismic activity on the Korean Peninsula in the vicinity of a known North Korean nuclear test site. We are monitoring and continuing to assess the situation in close coordination with our regional partners."

48. These North Korean missile launches are adding up to something very troubling

Washington Post, Anna Fifield, 2016 09 09

Analysis from Seoul - North Korea is touting technological progress in its nuclear program, saying after a nuclear test Friday that it can now produce "smaller, lighter and diversified nuclear warheads of higher strike power." But it is also making strides in its missile program, analysts say -- advances that could enable it to outsmart missile defense systems, which could make the missiles more attractive to potential customers. North Korea conducted what it called a "nuclear warhead explosion test" Friday. The country has conducted only five nuclear tests since its program began, but this is the third since Kim Jong Un took power at the end of 2011 and its second this year alone. Under Kim's leadership, North Korea has also sharply accelerated the pace of missile testing, with almost two dozen launches this year alone. While many of this year's tests have not been successful and there are still many unknowns about North Korea's nuclear and missile programs, there have still been noticeable -- and concerning -- improvements. "It seems like North Korea is trying to qualitatively improve its missiles and develop options to evade or fool U.S. missile defenses," said Kelsey Davenport, director for nonproliferation policy at the Arms Control Association. "If this continues unchecked, they could develop an inter-continental ballistic missile that could pose a threat to the United States in the next decade."

49. Why Kim Jong Un Tested a Nuclear Warhead Now

The Daily Beast, Gordon G. Chang, 2016 09 09

Analysis - North Korea is hailing a "successful" fifth nuclear test, which it carried out Friday morning local time. The device tested, which created a 5.3-magnitude tremor at its Punggye-ri test site, was reportedly in the 20- to 30-kiloton range, much more powerful than the North's previous detonations. The last test, in January, yielded only about 7 to 9 kilotons. The North Koreans have been ready to test this device since May. So why did they wait until now? Some are suggesting the detonation celebrated North Korea's Foundation Day, marking the 68th anniversary of the establishment of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. But from all indications, the Kim regime tested at this time because it realized China would not impose costs for the detonation. The test took place three days after Pyongyang's nuclear envoy traveled to Beijing. Choe Son Hui, deputy director-general of the Foreign Ministry's U.S. affairs bureau, arrived in the Chinese capital on Tuesday. We don't know what Choe--who was deputy chief envoy to the six-party denuclearization talks, which have been dormant since 2008--and her interlocutors said this week. Nonetheless, it was evident that the North Koreans were confident of the Chinese reaction. At the moment, Beijing is far more upset with Seoul than Pyongyang.

50. Fragile Weeklong Cease-Fire Holds in Ukraine

Wall Street Journal, Nathan Hodge, 2016 09 09

Moscow - Ukrainian officials and Russia-backed separatists say a tenuous cease-fire has held for a week along the front lines in eastern Ukraine, after months of intense combat over the summer. Government and separatist forces began the truce on Sept. 1, coinciding with the beginning of the school year. "The number of casualties among Ukrainian service members has decreased dramatically," said Col. Oleksandr Motuzyanyk, the Ukrainian government's military spokesman. "Not a single soldier was killed over Sept. 1-4." Fighting erupted in eastern Ukraine in 2014, in the wake of pro-Russia President Viktor Yanukovich's ouster. The conflict has continued to simmer, despite a European-brokered peace deal in early 2015. During two successive summers, casualties spiked as the two sides traded fire along a relatively stable front line. While the shaky cease-fire has held, both sides accuse the other of frequent violations, and exchanges of fire continue at contested points. Major Russian military drills along Ukraine's border have heightened alarm in Kiev amid Washington-Moscow tensions. In a briefing Thursday in Kiev, Alexander Hug of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which monitors the conflict in Ukraine, said a particularly serious incident occurred Monday night around the Stanytsia Luhanska bridge, where both sides exchanged fire with mortars, automatic grenade launchers, small arms and heavy-machine guns. "The episode underlines the fragility of the cease-fire," Mr. Hug said. "One bullet fired in anger can set off an inferno."

51. Snowden Is Turning Into a Liability for Putin

Bloomberg View, Leonid Bershidsky, 2016 09 09

Column - Edward Snowden is increasingly unhappy with the situation in Russia, where he has lived for more than three years. President Vladimir Putin once welcomed the National Security Agency contractor for his propaganda value, but he may be wondering if it's all been worth it. Snowden now openly criticizes the Kremlin on matters of political importance, such as its "anti-terrorism" policy and its own special brand of electoral democracy. The whistle-blower tweets in English, but Russian media, including pro-Kremlin ones, invariably pick up his posts. I would be surprised if the Kremlin weren't irritated. It does its best to squeeze local critics out of the country or discredit them, yet it's stuck harboring a foreigner whose initial gratitude may have worn out and who is less willing to give Putin the benefit of the doubt. Snowden has tweeted that he fears retaliation for his criticism, but he won't desist. There aren't too many ways for the Kremlin to retaliate, though, without handing a moral victory to the U.S. It certainly won't extradite Snowden: In March, when Donald Trump called for the return of the whistle-blower, Peskov said the Russian government's position hadn't changed. It would be no surprise, however, if arrangements were quietly made to move Snowden to another asylum country. With his zealotry, he is a liability to Putin, and he may never really have been an asset.

52. Anti-Iran terror cell received US training

Press TV, 2016 09 09

Tehran - An anti-Iran Kurdish terrorist group says it has received many rounds of military training from US advisers as well as arms and ammunition from both Washington and European countries. Hussein Yazdanpanah, the commander of the so-called Kurdistan Freedom Party (PAK), which seeks to carve out an "independent Kurdish republic" inside Iran and has staged many deadly terror attacks inside the Islamic Republic, made the remarks while speaking to the Associated Press, which reported them on Thursday. "They helped and trained us within the framework of the fight against Daesh," he claimed, referring to the Takfiri terrorist group that has been ravaging Iraq and Syria since 2014. He said, however, that the alleged fight against Daesh "was never an alternative to their struggle" against Iran. He said his group, which had launched six attacks inside Iran this year alone, would continue striking the Islamic Republic.

International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) Director General Yukiya Amano released his 5-page report and circulated it among the representatives of the 35 IAEA member- states here on Thursday. In his latest report on Iran's nuclear activities within the framework of the JCPOA, Amano published one of his shortest reports ever. Amano's report said that Iran has not carried out activities related to reprocessing at the Tehran Research Reactor (TRR) and the Molybdenum, Iodine and Xenon Radioisotope Production (MIX) Facility or at any of the other facilities it has declared to the IAEA.

54. Iran Introduces Halal Internet

The Media Line, Katie Beiter, 2016 09 09

Jerusalem - In an effort to "de-Westernize" and maintain control over internet users and the spread of information, the Iranian government has revealed a state-sponsored internet known formally as the National Information Network. This new service, nicknamed the "halal" (lawful) internet, is another ploy by the Iranian state to limit the spread of information into and around Iran. "The network is basically a government effort to create a nationally controlled internet," Sanam Vakil, an associate fellow at Chatham House, an international affairs think tank, in London, told The Media Line. "Iran is a state that has heavy internet censorship so a national internet would be a way to provide increased government control." This state-sponsored internet acts more as an intranet, which is essentially a private network controlled by an organization, which, in this case, is the Iranian government. In this type of system, all users are identifiable and the state controls what users can and cannot see.

55. 'Iranian Regime is a Failure'...Cannot but Threaten'

Asharq Al-Awsat, Ibrahim al Qurashi, 2016 09 09

Mecca - Saudi Arabia's Grand Mufti Sheikh Saleh bin Abdulaziz Al Asheikh, who serves as Saudi Arabian Minister of Islamic affairs, confirmed that Iranian regime's attempt to politicize Hajj is not accepted and that millions of pilgrims who come every year to perform their rituals should not end up listening to the Iranian slogans of political agendas; noting that "Iranian regime that criticizes Saudi Arabia is a failure and cannot but threaten and deliver speeches." Asheikh said, in a press conference on Wednesday, that Iran today has great animosity against Muslims and it does not want Hajj to pass safely. Muslims of the world fully trust and acknowledge the services rendered by the Saudi government toward the Two Holy Mosques and the pilgrims, added the grand mufti. On Monday, Crown Prince Mohammed bin Nayef had dismissed Iranian criticism of Saudi Hajj management.

56. Abbas, the KGB and the world of Middle East espionage

Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, 2016 09 09

Jerusalem - The revelation that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, whose Fatah nom de guerre is Abu Mazen, was a KGB agent shouldn't surprise those knowledgeable of the PLO movement and Soviet Union methods. Since its creation in 1959, the Fatah group and later the PLO were influenced and supported by various Arab intelligence communities, the KGB, and its satellite security services in the communist bloc. Beyond solidifying ideological bonds, the cooperation was a marriage of convenience. The PLO needed financial support, military training and weapons. The Soviet Union, entangled in the Cold War with the West, wanted to increase its influence in the Middle East. The Soviet Union and its client states in Eastern Europe supported "progressive" movements and groups around the globe, including those who were involved in terrorism. While the Soviet Union tried to keep its hands clean, it instructed the security services of its client state to do the dirty work.

57. Five Israeli Arabs Jailed for Seeking to Join ISIS

Haaretz, Jack Khoury, 2016 09 09

Jerusalem - Five men from the north were sent to prison on Thursday for trying to join the Islamic State. The five, from Sakhnin and Deir Hanna, were given prison sentences ranging from two and a half to six years. Another man, the primary defendant and the leader of the group, is still on trial. The five were convicted as part of a plea bargain. The defendants used to meet frequently in the Sakhnin area starting in early 2014 in order to discuss ISIS and its ideology, expressing support for radical Islam, the charge sheet said. The group practiced fighting by slaughtering sheep in order to "strengthen their hearts," they said, according to the indictment. One of them, Karim Abu Salah, planned to fly to Turkey and then enter Syria in order to join ISIS. But he was detained by the Shin Bet at Ben-Gurion International Airport and blocked from leaving Israel. After this incident, Abu Salah continued to meet the group and discuss ISIS.

58. Hamas spends $100 million a year on military infrastructure

Times of Israel, Avi Issacharoff, 2016 09 09

Jerusalem - As the residents of the Gaza Strip endure daily hardships due to the dire economic situation in the enclave, their Hamas leaders spend over $100 million a year on the group's military wing, the Izz ad-Din al-Qassam Brigades, according to estimates by both Israeli and Palestinian sources. Spending on digging tunnels accounts for some $40 million of that annual sum. By way of comparison, the budget of the last Hamas government, which dissolved in April 2014, was $530 million. In other words, some 20 percent of the budget was funneled toward arming the group with advanced weapons, digging tunnels, training, and salaries for Hamas fighters. Some 1,500 Hamas members from various brigades are currently employed in tunnel digging. The average salary for an excavator is $250-$400 a month -- relatively high for the Strip, where unemployment is rampant. The diggers also receive bonuses and incentives for meeting deadlines set by the Hamas military leadership.

59. Islamic State Outpost Takes Hold Near Jordan and Israel

Wall Street Journal, Yaroslav Trofimov, 2016 09 09

Irbid, Jordan - While international attention is focused on fighting Islamic State in its heartland in Raqqa and Mosul, a much smaller but strategically important pocket of territory has fallen under the extremist group's sway in southern Syria, along the borders of Jordan and the Israeli-held Golan Heights. What makes this particularly alarming is that militants in the mountainous area, known as the Yarmouk Basin, aren't foreign jihadists. They're mostly local villagers, many of them former fighters of the Western-backed Syrian rebel alliance, the Free Syrian Army. That makes them a difficult target, and recent FSA offensives had limited success. "You are fighting against someone who is defending his own village. And our guys fighting there are the cousins of the guys they are fighting against," said Maj. Issam al-Reis, spokesman for the FSA's Southern Front. Islamic State's main region of control is in northeastern Syria and neighboring parts of western Iraq, an area that has been shrinking under recent attacks by Iraqi troops, Kurdish militias and, as of late, the Turkish army. Lt. Gen. Stephen Townsend, the new commander of the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, told The Wall Street Journal in an interview that he thinks the battle to retake Mosul will begin in the coming weeks. However, the push to retake Raqqa in Syria is on hold, he said.

Jerusalem - Asia Ramazan Antar, who was nicknamed the Kurdish Angelina Jolie after the American movie star, was killed near Minbic, a town on the Syrian-Turkish border that was recently liberated from the control of Islamic State. The Facebook page called We Want Freedom for Kurdistan, announced that Antar, 22, was "martyred" in the battle against Islamic State, prompting an outpouring of grief and admiration for the young woman. Antar was recruited into the all-female Kurdish military organization the Women's Protection Units in 2014, and took part in several campaigns against Islamic State. The organization, known as the YPJ, is the all-female brigade of the armed forces of the Syrian region of Kurdistan, according to the Kurdish project. Antar's death comes as Syrian Kurdish groups and their allies said they will approve a constitution for a new system of government in northern Syria next month, defying a Turkish incursion aimed to limit Kurdish influence in the area.

61. Palestinians dismiss Israeli claims Abbas was KGB agent

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 09 09

Ramallah - A spokesman for Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas on Thursday dismissed a claim by Israeli researchers that he worked as a Soviet agent in Damascus in the 1980s. The claim emerged in a report by Israeli public television on Wednesday night citing two researchers who were studying the so-called Mitrokhin papers stored in Britain at Cambridge University's Churchill Archives Centre. "In 1983, he (Abbas) is listed as being groomed by the KGB under the code name Krotov, the mole," one of the Israeli researchers, Isabella Ginor, told the programme. But Mr Abbas' spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeineh said the allegation "falls under the framework of Israeli absurdities which we have got used to." Mr Abbas was born in what was then British mandate Palestine, but his family fled to Syria during the 1948 war triggered by the creation of the state of Israel. Later, Mr Abbas studied for his doctorate in Moscow.

62. 30 to 40 ISIS suspects at large, European officials say

CNN.com, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 09

Washington - European security officials estimate that 30 to 40 suspected ISIS terrorists who helped support the November 13 Paris terror attacks are still at large, CNN has learned. This development comes as European officials told CNN they believe ISIS is ratcheting up its planning for international attacks to retaliate for losses in Syria, Iraq and Libya. An exclusive CNN report this week showed the Paris slaughter, which killed 130 people, was meant to be broader and include other countries, such as the Netherlands. CNN also reported information from the Belgian prosecutor that a man allegedly linked to the Paris attackers was on the loose for months after authorities learned of his existence. "The outlook is as bleak as it has ever been," said Paul Cruickshank, editor of CTC Sentinel, a publication issued by the Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, and a terrorism analyst for CNN. Characterizing the mood at a recent high-level European conference on counter-terrorism, Cruickshank said, "We're talking beyond severe concern." The European countries most firmly in the crosshairs are launching air strikes against ISIS with the US-led coalition: France, Belgium, the Netherlands, the UK and Denmark, as well as Germany, which is flying target reconnaissance sorties.

63. 7 Are Arrested After Police in Paris Find Gas Cylinders

New York Times, Aurelien Breeden, 2016 09 09

Paris - It was an ominous discovery, especially for a city so recently scarred by large-scale terrorism: A car full of gas cylinders, parked in the heart of Paris near Notre Dame Cathedral. It was a puzzling discovery, too, and four days after the car was spotted early on Sunday, the mystery surrounding it still swirls with unanswered questions. But the biggest one -- Was it connected to a terror plot? -- appeared to have been answered late Thursday night with the arrest of three women. Bernard Cazeneuve, the French interior minister, announced that the three women were "in all likelihood preparing new and, moreover, imminent violent actions." Mr. Cazeneuve described the women, ages 19, 23, and 39, as "radicalized" and "fanatics." They were arrested on Thursday evening in Boussy-Saint-Antoine, a small town about 14 miles southeast of Paris.

64. Bonbonnes de gaz à Paris : trois « fanatisées » interpellées dans l'Essonne

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 09 09

Paris - Parmi les trois femmes figure la fille du propriétaire de la Peugeot découverte à Paris dimanche. Elle a été blessée par balle alors qu'elle poignardait un policier. Terrorisme Trois femmes soupçonnées de graviter dans la mouvance islamiste interpellées dans l'Essonne, dont une qui a tenté d'assassiner un policier au couteau avant d'être blessée d'une balle par un fonctionnaire en état de légitime défense... Quatre jours après la découverte, dimanche au petit matin, aux abords de Notre-Dame, à Paris, de six bonbonnes de gaz dans une Peugeot 607 sans plaque d'immatriculation et les feux de détresse allumés, la traque s'est soldée par une opération antiterroriste particulièrement spectaculaire. Lancés dans ce que Bernard Cazeneuve a appelé une « véritable course contre la montre » pour retrouver la piste du ou des derniers occupants de la berline « piégée », les policiers de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) ont localisé jeudi soir trois jeunes femmes dans le secteur de la gare de Boussy-Saint-Antoine. Âgées de 39, 23 et 19 ans, décrites par le ministre de l'Intérieur comme « radicalisées » et « fanatisées », elles étaient sur le point, toujours selon l'hôte de la Place Beauvau, « de préparer de nouvelles actions violentes et de surcroît imminentes ». L'une d'elles n'est autre que l'une des filles du propriétaire de la Peugeot 607, que les limiers traquaient sans relâche depuis ce week-end. À l'approche d'un des agents de l'antiterrorisme, la jeune femme a soudain brandi un couteau avant de se jeter sur lui et de le frapper. Le policier a esquivé le coup. Touché à l'épaule, il a été hospitalisé sans que ses jours soient en danger. L'agresseuse a, quant à elle, été neutralisée par un projectile tiré par l'un des collègues du fonctionnaire pris pour cible.

Boussy--Saint-Antoine, France - Trois femmes ont été interpellées dans la soirée de jeudi 8 septembre à Boussy-Saint-Antoine (Essonne), dans le cadre de l'enquête sur la voiture contenant des bonbonnes de gaz retrouvée le week-end dernier en plein Paris. « Ces jeunes femmes, âgées de 39, 23 et 19 ans, radicalisées, fanatisées, préparaient vraisemblablement de nouvelles actions violentes, et de surcroît imminentes », a déclaré le ministre de l'intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, lors d'une allocution place Beauvau. Tandis que des policiers de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) s'apprêtaient à interpellier les suspects, l'une d'elles a agressé au couteau un fonctionnaire, qui a été blessé à l'épaule. Ses jours ne sont pas en danger, a précisé le ministre. Un de ses collègues a répliqué en faisant usage de son arme, blessant l'assaillante à la cuisse et à la cheville. Selon une source proche de l'enquête, l'agresseuse, Ines, 19 ans, est la fille du propriétaire du véhicule dans le coffre duquel les policiers ont découvert les bonbonnes de gaz.

66. Germany to pour cash into mass surveillance

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 09 08

Berlin - Germany's spies will be working with significantly increased resources next year, if a budget report leaked to three media outlets is approved. The federal domestic intelligence agency, the Verfassungsschutz (BfV) is bidding for an 18-percent budget boost in 2017, up to 307 million euros ($345 million), while the foreign intelligence agency BND will get a 12-percent rise to 808 million euros, according to a report released Thursday by the "Süddeutsche Zeitung" along with public broadcasters NDR and WDR. A special parliamentary committee must now approve the increase - which, like all secret service budgets, are classified - but opposition parties have already voiced their concern. The majority of the increased funds are expected to be plowed into mass surveillance - particularly decrypting what the report calls "non-standardized telecommunications" - meaning widely-used messaging services, such as WhatsApp. Such online services appear to be a particular concern to the BND. "Encryption means that of the more than 70 available communication services ... only less than ten can be gathered and the content read," the budget plan read. The BND says it needs much of the extra money - some 73 million euros over the next few years - to set up "Panos," a new project specifically aimed at decrypting such messaging systems by finding weaknesses in the apps. The leaked plan also says the intelligence agencies need extra money to buy expertise from "external companies and service providers." In the leaked plan, the BfV said it needs extra money because its own resources are currently inadequate to fulfill its mission.

67. L'Administration pénitentiaire face à la poudrière islamiste

Le Figaro, Paule Gozalès, 2016 09 09

Osny, France - L'attaque dimanche de deux surveillants par un détenu placé dans l'unité de prévention de la radicalisation de la prison d'Osny révèle les errements de la stratégie actuelle. Justice « Nos ministres répètent que nous sommes en guerre contre l'islamisme, mais si l'on connaissait avec quelle mollesse l'Administration pénitentiaire la mène, tout le monde serait atterré . » Ce surveillant de prison de la région Rhône-Alpes s'inquiète. Il y a quelques jours, son établissement a reçu de région parisienne un prévenu pour terrorisme particulièrement signalé. « Nous l'avons tout de suite mis à l'isolement. Mais ce n'est pas le cas partout. Et de toute façon, les quartiers d'isolement ne sont jamais complètement étanches. » Un autre détenu a été également transféré de région parisienne vers la région lyonnaise. Par hélicoptère cette fois-ci, du fait de sa dangerosité. Une débauche de luxe bien inutile : à son arrivée, la direction de la prison n'a rien trouvé de mieux que de l'affecter en détention classique. « Autant dire qu'avec ce traitement VIP, il va briller parmi les autres détenus » , souligne ce personnel pénitentiaire. « La population pénitentiaire du Rhône se caractérise par son extrême violence. Il y a un terreau favorable ici pour les gros bonnets de l'islamisme qui, mis sous les feux des projecteurs, peuvent avoir de l'influence et faire leur marché. Il ne faut pas oublier que Khaled Kelkal vient d'ici . »

2. La sécurité et l'esprit européen de Montréal attirent les Américains

Agence QMI, Camille Dufétel, 2016 09 13

Montréal - Avec les différents attentats en Europe, Montréal avec son aspect sécuritaire jumelé à une atmosphère européenne, aurait davantage tenté les touristes américains, dont la présence a été remarquée en ville ces derniers mois. Sentiment de sécurité D'après Michel Juneau-Katsuya, ancien cadre et agent de renseignements senior au Service canadien de renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), rien d'étonnant à tout cela. «C'est d'une certaine logique, on regarde les faits, indique-t-il. On a retrouvé des cellules terroristes importantes en France, en Belgique, en Allemagne, etc., on est notamment menacés par la possibilité d'être attaqués de manière aveugle par des attentats frappant n'importe où, n'importe qui, n'importe quand. L'Europe vit malheureusement une période très trouble.»

3. Les suspects de terrorisme devraient être surveillés en tout temps, ou emprisonnés, dit Tony Clement

Le Devoir, Marie Vastel, 2016 09 13

Ottawa - Les Canadiens soupçonnés de terrorisme ne sont pas assez contrôlés, de l'avis de Tony Clement. Le candidat à la direction conservatrice estime qu'ils devraient être surveillés en tout temps, à défaut de quoi ils devraient être enfermés en prison. Et ce, jusqu'à ce qu'ils ne représentent plus une menace. Le député ontarien a choisi de faire de la sécurité nationale l'objet de sa première conférence de presse en tant que candidat à la succession de Stephen Harper. Tony Clement veut également resserrer la sélection des immigrants et propose un projet-pilote prévoyant que tous les demandeurs passent une entrevue avec un représentant canadien. Le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité(SCRS) vérifie déjà les antécédents de tous les demandeurs, fait remarquer Wesley Wark.

4. My plan to tackle terror

Toronto Sun, Tony Clement, 2016 09 13

Op-ed: My national security policy deals with the real and present threat of terrorism at home and abroad. I believe the first duty of any government is the safety and security of their citizens. Public Safety Canada's recent "2016 Public Report on the Terrorist Threat to Canada" confirms Canada remains at risk from terrorism. On Sunday, we marked the 15th anniversary of the September, 2001 attacks on the United States, in which 24 Canadians lost their lives. Canada is no stranger to terrorism. One of the worst terrorist attacks prior to 9/11 was the bombing of Air India Flight 182 in which 331 people lost their lives, the vast majority of whom were Canadian citizens. This plan was cultivated in Canada by Canadians. We must learn the lessons from this bombing and the Air India Commission's report, as well as the Public Safety Canada report, which acknowledges the "serious and unfortunate reality that terrorist groups, most notably ISIS, use violent extremist propaganda to encourage individuals to support their cause." In spite of the fact that we have had 180 Canadians supporting jihadist movements abroad, 60 who have returned and are on the streets and over 93 who have been seeking to leave since 2014, we have had very few convictions. At the same time, we have had 683 cases of terrorism financing flagged by Fintrac and not one charge. Canadian charities that are linked to terrorism have also gotten away without criminal repercussions. My national security plan calls for: A new Counter-Terrorism Secretariat responsible for investigating and prosecuting terrorism cases Prosecution of those who are seeking to advance the interests of terrorist groups and for those who promote, honour or praise terrorists or terrorist acts with the intention of inducing others to supporting terrorism Prohibiting foreign funds from entering Canada, where the donors or recipients are linked to radicalization. Extra focus will be placed on extremism-and terrorism- connected jurisdictions such as Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar An independent agency to oversee and monitor all charities in order to ensure they do not contribute to terrorism or radicalization publishing a terrorist "wanted" list and a "no-visit" list of well-defined terrorist sympathizers A CSIS review of the Muslim Brotherhood and their associates in Canada New programs to support families who report radicalization of related individuals, and new efforts to work with moderate mainstream Muslim Canadians to identify and counter the political-religious ideology fueling Islamist fundamentalism. Note: Clement is running for the leadership of Conservative Party of Canada.

5. Brave teen and his mom 'still fighting'

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 09 13

Ottawa - Jonathan Pitre completed his second round of chemotherapy Monday and now begins the perilous, nervous wait to see whether his stem- cell transplant has started to work its magic. In an interview late Monday morning, after enduring his final chemo infusion, Pitre, 16, offered a message to the people of Ottawa. "We're still here, obviously, and we're still fighting - and that won't change," said the Russell teenager who was born with a severe form of epidermolysis bullosa (EB), a blistering skin disease. "I'm feeling good. I would say all is great, but of course there have been a few complications here and there. But that's what a transplant is; we're working through it. We'll be back soon." Pitre has been battling a persistent fever since receiving a bonemarrow transplant on Thursday. His temperature has spiked, at times, to 105 F (40.6 C) and higher, and his nose is running. Both are common complications posttransplant. The medical journey that Ottawa's "Butterfly Boy" has travelled the past two weeks has been exhausting. He had a particularly difficult night on Sunday because he had to empty his bladder every two hours to flush the toxic chemotherapy drug, cyclophosphamide, from his system. It can cause bleeding in the bladder. At one stage on Sunday night, Pitre wasn't passing enough urine, so he was given a drug that made him go every 15 minutes. His mother, Tina Boileau, who sleeps in his hospital room, helped her son parade all night to the bathroom with his IV stand. "Yesterday was not a nice day for us, not at all. Both of us," said Pitre, a champion of understatement.

6. Canadian company accused of 'knowingly' breaking Sudan arms embargo

CBC News, Murray Brewster, 2016 09 13

A United Nations panel that monitors sanctions in Sudan has accused a Canadian company of deliberately skirting the long-standing arms embargo against that country with the 2012 sale of more than two dozen armoured vehicles, CBC News has learned. The condemnation of the Streit Group, which has a plant in Innisfil, Ont., is contained in an unpublished, confidential report that has been kept secret at the UN. Excerpts of the report have been obtained by CBC News from high-level international sources. Its findings accuse Streit and the United Arab Emirates, which helped facilitate the 2012 sale, of knowingly breaking the arms embargo imposed over a decade ago against Sudan. The sanctions prohibit the export of weapons to Sudan and rendering technical assistance related to arms. But the allegation being made by investigators, who are working for the monitoring panel, is that Streit supplied unarmed armoured cars knowing that machine guns and other weapons would be put on them by Sudanese authorities, in a process known in the arms trade as diversion. Streit is owned by Canadian businessman Guerman Goutorov. Publication of the full UN Security Council panel report was put on hold by Russia last spring for reasons unrelated to arms trafficking, said one of the sources with knowledge of the file who could not speak publicly.

7. Government use of surveillance devices must be restricted: privacy experts

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 09 13

Toronto - Canada must acknowledge, and then constrain, the government's use of portable surveillance devices that can indiscriminately dredge data from people's smartphones without them knowing, privacy experts say. Everything that is known or suspected about the government's use of these machines - called "IMSI catchers," "cell-site simulators" or "Stingrays" - is chronicled in a comprehensive, first-of-its-kind, 130-page report written by privacy experts and released to The Globe and Mail. Federal police have used these devices for more than a decade, but the practice was confirmed only this year in a series of stories in The Globe. Now, researchers Christopher Parsons and Tamir Israel say it's time for civil society to debate the pros and cons of IMSI catchers, even if many government agencies still won't discuss them. "This ongoing secrecy has the effect of delaying important public debates," the report says. The report was commissioned by the Telecom Transparency Project and the Canadian Internet Policy & Public Interest Clinic. They received grants from the Open Society Foundation, privacy activist Frederick Ghahramani, a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council Postdoctoral Fellowship Award, and the Munk School of Global Affairs at the University of Toronto. The report follows Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale's announcement last week that he is soliciting the public's views on the powers of police and spy agencies. Other countries, such as Germany, have been more open about their use of IMSI catchers. An "IMSI," which stands for "international mobile subscriber identity," is a unique serial number now affixed to every smartphone's chip set. It is one of several digital identifiers that police build modern investigations around if they can tie a specific number to a specific suspect.

8. If potential terrorists can't be monitored 24/7, jail them: Clement

Canadian Press, Joanna Smith, 2016 09 13

Ottawa - Conservative leadership candidate Tony Clement is proposing putting people at high risk of committing terrorist acts behind bars if they cannot be monitored around the clock. "If they are so dangerous to the Canadian population that they deserve a peace bond slapped on them, I would put it to you that unless we can surveil them 24/7, they should be incarcerated," Clement told a news conference Monday in Ottawa. The Ontario MP and former cabinet minister said the case of Aaron Driver, 24, a known terrorist sympathizer who was killed last month in a confrontation with police in Strathroy, Ont., showed the limits of court-ordered peace bonds to deal with people who have extremist ideas. The RCMP has acknowledged that Driver, who was under a peace bond while he planned his thwarted terrorist attack with explosives, was not under constant surveillance and that it was a tip from U.S. authorities that alerted them to his plans. Clement said peace bonds are not enough unless security officials are able to monitor people 24 hours a day. "If that is not possible, then I think the community interest and the national interest is there would be incarceration until they were no longer a threat," Clement said. Clement said this would have to follow a judicial process - and be subject to judicial review - but said the details would be up to the courts.

9. Les fonctionnaires reprennent les négociations avec Ottawa

La Presse canadienne, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Ottawa - L'Alliance de la fonction publique du Canada (AFPC) est de retour, cette semaine, à la table de négociations face au gouvernement fédéral. Les principaux points de mésentente concernent les congés de maladie, mais aussi les salaires des quelque 80 000 travailleurs représentés par l'AFPC. Les négociations ont débuté il y a plus de deux ans. Le regroupement syndical soutient que sa relation avec le gouvernement s'est détériorée avec la récente affaire du nouveau système de paie Phoenix. La plupart des ratés de ce mode de paie touchent des fonctionnaires qui n'ont pas reçu les bonnes rémunérations pour des heures supplémentaires ou autres indemnités. Par ailleurs, au moins 1100 employés fédéraux se sont plaints, selon les autorités, d'erreurs dans leurs indemnités de maternité et autres congés. Enfin, plus de 700 employés n'auraient même pas reçu de chèque de paie.

The Public Prosecution Service of Canada says the teen admitted to counselling the commission of an indictable offence at the direction of, or in association with, a terrorist group. In a release, it says the teen, who cannot be named, was 16 at the time of the offence. No other details have been provided regarding the charges. 11. Mosque visit raises eyebrows

Toronto Sun, Anthony Furey, 2016 09 13

Toronto - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau visited a gendersegregated mosque Monday morning whose imam is a member of a group considered a terrorist organization abroad. Samy Metwally, the lead imam at the Ottawa Muslim Association, is a "a member of the International Union for Muslim Scholars (IUMS)", according to the mosque's website. In 2014 the United Arab Emirates placed the group on its list of designated terrorist organizations. "IUMS was founded by Yusuf al-Qaradawi, the Muslim Brotherhood's leading ideologue and a notorious figure who, among other accomplishments, was for many years banned from entering France and endorsed the murder of Israelis," Daniel Pipes, an author and Islamic studies scholar who has taught at Harvard and University of Chicago, explained via e-mail. The Muslim Brotherhood is also designated a terrorist organization by at least half a dozen countries globally. It has not been designated as such in Canada, though the federal government has come under increased pressure in recent years to do so. The IUMS website posts various theological and political messages from al-Qaradawi in English. In a call for Syrian rebel groups to halt their infighting, he writes: "Allah Almighty has specified you to carry the banner of jihad, and to defend Islam, and to protect the sanctity of Muslims."

12. RCMP Arrested This Ottawa Man Over Terrorism Fears Last Month

Vice News, Rachel Browne, 2016 09 13

Within days of a foiled terror plot that ended in the death of Aaron Driver, a known Islamic State supporter in southern Ontario, Canada's federal police arrested another young man over fears he would participate in terrorism, VICE News has learned. Ottawa man Tevis Gonyou-McLean, 24, was arrested on August 12 and charged with uttering a threat to cause death or harm to another person. The RCMP are also pursuing a terror-related peace bond against him over fears that he might engage in terrorism at home and abroad. At the end of August, Gonyou-McLean was released on a $1,000 bond and 27 bail conditions that heavily restrict his behaviour and movements, according to court records. His name appears on a list provided to VICE News by the Public Prosecution Service of Canada that, experts say, paints the most complete picture of who has been pursued under terror-related peace bonds, which are legal tools used to restrict an individual's movements when there may not be enough evidence to lay a criminal charge. The bail conditions forbid him from communicating with four other Ottawa men who have been embroiled in terrorism cases. They are: twin brothers, Carlos and Ashton Larmond, who recently pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit acts of terror; Awso Peshdary who will stand trial later this year for his alleged role as primary recruiter for a homegrown terrorist network; and Luqman Abdunnur, who was arrested in 2014 after he praised the shooting on Parliament Hill that year. The reasons for the accusations against Gonyou- McLean are not outlined in the court document. His mother told VICE News in an interview that he began espousing extremist views after he converted to Islam in March 2015. The RCMP confirmed to VICE News in an email that Tevis Gonyou-McLean was arrested by the RCMP Ottawa Integrated National Security Enforcement Team (INSET), and is facing a criminal charge as well as a terror-related peace bond application. Because of a court ordered publication ban, "the RCMP will not be commenting any further on this matter," said RCMP spokesperson Annie Delisle.

14. Bill Allowing 9/11 Lawsuits Against Saudis Faces Veto

New York Times, Julie Hirschfeld Davis, 2016 09 13

Washington--The White House said on Monday that President Obama would veto legislation approved by Congress that would allow the families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to sue Saudi Arabia for any role in the plot, escalating a bipartisan dispute with lawmakers over the measure. Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Obama "does intend to veto this legislation," and would work to persuade lawmakers in both parties to change course. If he cannot, the measure could lead to the first veto override of his presidency, as the legislation drew the backing of lopsided majorities in both the House and Senate. "The president feels quite strongly about this," Mr. Earnest said of the legislation, which Mr. Obama has said could dangerously undermine the United States' interests globally, opening the country to a raft of lawsuits by private citizens overseas.

15. Bodies of U.S. Fighters Head Home

SULAYMANIYAH, Iraq -- The bodies of three Americans who died fighting Islamic State as volunteers for a Syrian Kurdish militia began a return home after a weekslong struggle by their families and the U.S. government to repatriate their remains. The long and logistically complex journey from the Syrian battlefield to the U.S. revealed a simple truth: It is far easier for Americans to get to Syrian Kurdistan to fight Islamic State than it is for the remains of the fallen to come home. "I didn't think he was going to get out," Reginald Savage of Raleigh, N.C., said of the remains of his son William, who died in early August. "I was planning on him being buried in Syria." The remains of Mr. Savage, Levi Jonathan Shirley, and Jordan MacTaggart were held for weeks in Syrian Kurdistan after they died fighting against Islamic State forces. Later, they were driven across the region -- in ambulances displaying their so-called martyr photos -- before crossing into Iraqi Kurdistan, where the paperwork needed for the flights to the U.S. was secured, according to representatives of the semiautonomous Kurdish Syrian region of Rojava.

Washington--Former CIA Director James Woolsey, a vocal advocate of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq who promoted allegations that Saddam Hussein harbored illegal weapons, will serve as a senior national security adviser to Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, the campaign announced on Monday. Woolsey's hiring contrasted with Trump's repeated assertions that he was a stalwart opponent of the invasion, although he initially supported it. In the announcement, Woolsey said he supports Trump's plan to expand the U.S. military, which calls for ending Pentagon budget caps and spending billions of dollars for additional troops, ships and aircraft. "Mr. Trump's commitment to reversing the harmful defense budget cuts signed into law by the current administration, while acknowledging the need for debt reduction, is an essential step toward reinstating the United States' primacy in the conventional and digital battlespace," Woolsey said.

17. House Intelligence Committee to Discuss Classified Report on Snowden Ahead of Movie Launch

The Intercept, Jenna McLaughlin, 2016 09 13

Washington--The House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence will meet this Thursday to discuss former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden, who in 2013 gave journalists a massive cache of classified documents detailing the U.S. global surveillance regime. The intelligence oversight panel will be discussing a report prepared by members and staff concerning Snowden's unauthorized disclosures, according to Jack Langer, director of communications for Committee Chair Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Calif., The report is the product of "around two years" of work, he told The Intercept. While Langer noted that the report is classified, he said the committee might publish an unclassified executive summary -- though there aren't any specific plans yet for its release, or to hold public hearings about its contents. When asked whether the timing of report had anything to do with talk of Snowden's return to the United States -- to be pardoned or to face trial -- Langer said the two events were unrelated. The American Civil Liberties Union, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and prominent activists are launching a campaign Wednesday to urge President Barack Obama to pardon Snowden. The announcement is expected to take place at an event in New York, where Snowden will speak via live stream from Moscow.

18. Long-Secret Stingray Manuals Detail How Police Can Spy on Phones

The Intercept, Sam Biddle, 2016 09 13

New York--Harris Corp's Stingray surveillance device has been one of the most closely guarded secrets in law enforcement for more than 15 years. The company and its police clients across the United States have fought to keep information about the mobile phone-monitoring boxes from the public against which they are used. The Intercept has obtained several Harris instruction manuals spanning roughly 200 pages and meticulously detailing how to create a cellular surveillance dragnet. Harris has fought to keep its surveillance equipment, which carries price tags in the low six figures, hidden from both privacy activists and the general public, arguing that information about the gear could help criminals. Accordingly, an older Stingray manual released under the Freedom of Information Act to news website TheBlot.com last year was almost completely redacted. Harris declined to comment. In a 2014 letter to the Federal Communications Commission, the company argued that if the owner's manuals were released under the Freedom of Information Act, this would "harm Harris's competitive interests" and "criminals and terrorist[s] would have access to information that would allow them to build countermeasures." But Stingrays are known for spying on low-level marijuana dealers and other domestic targets, not al Qaeda; as the Electronic Frontier Foundation's Jennifer Lynch said in December, "I am not aware of any case in which a police agency has used a cell-site simulator to find a terrorist." Meanwhile, it is already publicly known that the NSA uses Stingray-like devices to locate suspected terrorists as part of a system known as Gilgamesh.

19. Saudi Aramco's Bid to Buy a Houston Oil Refinery Is a Big Strategic Bet (Canada)

New York Times, Clifford Krauss, 2016 09 13

Houston--The Saudi national oil company is making a bid to significantly expand its operations in the United States at a critical moment in the always uneasy relations between the United States and Saudi Arabia. The company, Saudi Aramco, aims to strengthen its position on the Gulf of Mexico coast by buying a large oil refinery in the Houston Ship Channel that LyondellBasell is putting up for sale. And despite geopolitical tensions between Riyadh and Washington, Saudi Aramco sees the potential acquisition as a way to shore up its exports at a time of erosion in the oil business on which the Saudi economy is still largely reliant. Because of plunging prices, the value of Saudi oil sales has shrunk in recent years. And Saudi Arabia's archrival, Iran, is becoming a more potent commercial competitor now that it is exporting substantial quantities of crude. Four years ago Saudi Aramco completed a $10 billion expansion of a giant oil refinery in Port Arthur, Tex., in a joint venture with Royal Dutch Shell called Motiva Enterprises. The converted plant is now the biggest producer of gasoline, diesel and other petroleum products in the United States. This time, Saudi Aramco wants to do a deal on its own. But its negotiations with LyondellBasell, a Dutch company, come as Congress is moving to allow families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to sue Saudi Arabia for supposed ties between government officials and the terrorists, most of whom were Saudi citizens. The Obama administration has threatened to veto the measure, although an override is possible. Saudi Aramco is in competition for the Lyondell refinery with Texas-based Valero, as well as two big Canadian companies, Suncor and Cenovus.

20. ISIS 'sniped' out 1 shot kills 4 fiends, saves 12 hostages

New York Post, Emily Saul, 2016 09 12

London--A sharpshooter killed a top ISIS executioner and three other jihadists with a single bullet from nearly a mile away - just seconds before the fiend was set to burn 12 hostages alive with a flamethrower, according to a new report. The British Special Air Service marksman turned one of the most hated terrorists in Syria into a fireball by using a Barrett .50-caliber rifle to strike a fuel tank affixed to the jihadi's back, the UK's Daily Star reported Sunday. The pack exploded, killing the sadistic terrorist and three of his flunkies, who were supposed to film the execution, last month, the paper said. The ISIS butcher - who reportedly delighted in burning hostages alive - had been on a US "kill list" for several months, sources told the paper, which did not identify the sniper or the executioner.

21. Freeze frame on terrorism

Herald Sun, Simon Benson and Kate McMahon, 2016 09 13

Melbourne - This is the moment police say terrorism came to suburban Australia. CCTV images obtained by A Current Affair show neighbours armed with nothing more than broomsticks, rocks and fence palings fighting alleged attacker Ihsas Khan in Sydney at the weekend -- holding him at bay until he was caught by police. Minutes earlier, Mr Khan allegedly tried to kill 59-year old Wayne Greenhalgh, who was stabbed repeatedly on his hands and body. Neighbours, including Sivei Ah Chong, 43, ran to aid Mr Greenhalgh -- who made his escape through a neighbouring hairdressing salon. Images showed blood sprayed throughout the salon as Mr Greenhalgh ran for his life -- a flimsy locked security door the only thing between him and Mr Khan. Neighbours then stepped in again as the alleged IS-inspired lone wolf tried to break open the locked door. Using a fence paling, Mr Ah Chong beat Mr Khan over the head to get him away from the salon, where terrified customers were crouching. "He said, I'll kill you. I said, 'mate, you do that to me, you know, I'll kill you' ... He said, 'I'm ready to die'," Mr Ah Chong said. Police later captured Mr Khan using Taser guns. A 22-year-old man is set to appear in a Sydney Court on Wednesday.

The deluge of tip-offs to ASIO and the Australian Federal Police from members of the public comes as TheHerald Sun reveals the average number of calls flooding into the hotline has risen 40 per cent since April this year to number almost 70 a day. Many calls, according to one intelligence official, are now coming from families alerting agencies to a relative who may be attempting to leave the country to join IS. Figures obtained by the Herald Sun show that an average of 2000 calls, emails, letters or text messages a month are being processed through the hotline.

22. Organised crime linked to terrorism: CCC

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 09 13

Brisbane - There is anecdotal evidence that organised crime is financing terrorism, the head of Queensland's Crime and Corruption Commission says. Chairman Alan MacSporran says links between organised crime and the funding of terrorism-related activities is being watched closely in Australia. He agreed there was anecdotal evidence that was occurring "because of the huge cash flow and profits they make, it is a very simple covert way to finance terrorism and something we need to keep a close watch on." Mr MacSporran told ABC Radio drug trafficking was by far the most lucrative vice for organised crime gangs, and crystal methamphetamine (ice) was their product of choice. "I can assure you that ice has been identified, globally, not just in Australia ... as a high threat, in fact the highest threat," he said. "Of our eight organised current investigations, six of them involve trafficking in ice." Mr MacSporran said organised crime was well embedded in the ice trafficking industry and outlaw motorcycle gangs were only part of the problem.

Adelaide - Intelligence officials have revealed that calls from the public to the national security hotline spiked 50 per cent in the 24 hours after the alleged ISIS-inspired lone wolf terrorist attack at the weekend. The deluge of tip-offs to ASIO and the Australian Federal Police has also risen about 40 per cent since April, to almost 70 a day, The Advertiser can reveal. As the Government grapples with the rising terrorism threat, frightening CCTV footage has captured knife-wielding suspect Ihsas Khan on his bloody rampage - and how victim Wayne Greenhalgh, 59, didn't stand a chance. Mr Greenhalgh was stabbed repeatedly, losing some fingers and suffering deep puncture wounds to his chest and neck, as he walked his dog in the Sydney suburb of Minto on Saturday. He remains in a serious condition in hospital. Taken from inside a Minto hair salon, the footage shows Khan, 22 - who friends say was "lost in his own world" - hunt down Mr Greenhalgh. The chilling footage shows Khan attempting to force his way in, wrestling with the door handle while holding the weapon up against the glass. Inquiries about Khan reveal a depressive past and a loner who shunned Muslim religious leaders who tried to reach out to him after his mother died.

25. Returning fighters pose long-term threat

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 09 13

Canberra - The tens of thousands of foreign fighters from the Syrian and Iraqi conflicts will pose a major security threat to the international community for decades to come, a Lowy Institute study says. As Islamic State's caliphate collapses, thousands of these foreign fighters will seek to head home, many with deep ideological beliefs, lethal skills and strong resentments against the West, the think tank says. "These individuals pose a threat not only to the countries to which they return, but to all countries whose citizens travel and trade in the international system," the study says. Foreign fighters flocked to the IS banner, among them more than 100 Australians. The US Central Intelligence Agency believes some 18,000-22,000 foreign fighters remain, with the prospect that many will seek to return to their home or third countries as the caliphate collapses. The study, by Lowy analysts Lydia Khalil and Roger Shanahan, says IS will seek to remain relevant through a global campaign of terrorism. Increasingly, IS is using foreign fighters for attacks outside the Middle East.

26. Student had enduring hatred of Australia, documents reveal

Sydney Morning Herald, Rachel Olding, 2016 09 13

Sydney - A Sydney student charged over a terrorist stabbing attack in Minto told police as far back as 2013 that he hated Australia because of its involvement with the US in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, police documents reveal. Ihsas Khan, then 19, made the admissions after he went on a bizarre rampage with a large pair of scissors, cutting down Australian flags on homes in his street and then standing on the road staring at one of the homeowners. The pharmacy student, who dropped out of university after the incident and was put on psychiatric medication, allegedly stabbed a stranger on Saturday in a planned yet random attack that police said was inspired by Islamic State. Wayne Greenhalgh, who was walking his dog through Minto at the time, suffered near-fatal wounds to his hands and body and had to run for his life into a neighbour's home before Mr Khan tried to smash his way in through a glass door while allegedly shouting "Allah Akbar" and "somebody's going to die today". CCTV footage from the nearby home, which operates a salon out of its garage, shows the terrifying moment Mr Khan tried to smash his way in to get to Mr Greenhalgh. The footage, obtained by A Current Affair, also shows three heroic neighbours trying to force Mr Khan back by swinging a fence paling. He has been charged with committing a terrorist attack and attempted murder. "Wayne would not have survived if it wasn't for the neighbours helping and if Wayne wasn't locked inside the hairdresser salon," said one witness. "I can't imagine what would have happened."

The Australian, 2016 09 13

Editorial: Editorial: The horrific stabbing attack in a Sydney suburb on Saturday, allegedly inspired by Islamic State, underlines the pernicious threat of terrorism within our borders as well as the diabolical challenge confronting law enforcement agencies. The Australian-born alleged terrorist, Ishaq Khan, is a 22-year-old of Bangladeshi descent whose extremist tendencies already had brought him to the attention of police. He launched a ferocious and apparently random attack on 59-year-old Minto resident Wayne Greenhalgh, stabbing him repeatedly. Mr Greenhalgh ran for help and was protected by a neighbour, Sivei Ah Chong, who took to the attacker with a fence paling in the sort of selfless display of suburban solidarity we normally see only in the face of natural disasters. This, apparently, is our brave new world in the age of Islamist terrorism and lone wolf attacks.

29. US to stay engaged with Pakistan 'long into the future'

Washington - The United States would continue to stay engaged with Pakistan and provide it economic assistance "long into the future", said a US State Department spokesperson following a congressional debate, which also explored the possibility of sanctioning Islamabad. In a statement shared with Dawn, the State Department also emphasised the need for Pakistan to take immediate steps to stop cross-border terrorist attacks into Afghanistan. "We have urged the government of Pakistan to redouble its standing commitment to closer counterterrorism cooperation with Afghanistan against all groups that pose a long-term security threat to both countries," the official said. The State Department pointed out that "robust civilian and security assistance" to Pakistan allowed the US to jointly work on issues important to both countries, such as energy, economic growth, security, education and health.

30. Borno Governor Observes Eid-El-Kabir in Town Liberated From Boko Haram

All Africa, Abdulkareem Haruna, 2016 09 13

Maiduguri - The Borno State governor, Kashim Shettima, on Monday led top government functionaries to Konduga, one of the liberated Boko Haram territories, to observe this year's Eid-el-Kabir celebration with internally displaced persons. Director General of the National Orientation Agency (NOA), Garba Abari, Senators Abubakar Kyari and Baba Kaka Garbai, and the Speaker of the state House of Assembly, Abdulkareem Lawal, accompanied the governor. Konduga, about 35km from Maiduguri, the state capital, is the gateway to the dreaded Sambisa forest and one of the 27 local government areas that suffered the most attacks by Boko Haram insurgents. Though the main township was never captured by the insurgents, Konduga was under repeated attacks by Boko Haram which wanted its control for unfettered access to Maiduguri. The persistent attacks forced the villagers to flee into IDPs camps in Maiduguri where they remained for about two years. According to a statement by Isa Gusau, spokesman of Governor Shettima, the delegation arrived Konduga at about 9am and was received by officials of the local government, and a large number of former IDPs who had returned home to Konduga two weeks ago.

31. La fin de l'État islamique à Syrte

Le Figaro, Maryline Dumas, 2016 09 13

Syrte - Face à la mer bleu turquoise, Syrte a pris un air de ville fantôme. Ses bâtiments ne sont plus que des squelettes de béton, ses rues sont encombrées de meubles ou de carcasses de voitures. Il faut tourner à droite et s'éloigner de la route côtière pour trouver un peu de vie dans cette ville qui accueillait 75 000 habitants en 2011. Le territoire de l'État islamique à Syrte s'est réduit à peau de chagrin, passant de 250 kilomètres de côtes libyennes à un kilomètre carré. Les forces fidèles au Gouvernement d'union nationale de Tripoli s'appêtent à crier victoire, mais Syrte est détruite. C'est dans une petite rue parallèle à la mer que se reposent quelques hommes de la brigade al-Marsa. Ils sont à peine une dizaine, ce vendredi. De très jeunes adultes, affalés sur des matelas posés contre le mur d'une maison. Cette bâtisse qui devait être, avant la prise de Syrte par l'EI en juin 2015, une résidence cosy sert aujourd'hui de base arrière à cette brigade venue de Misrata, la ville voisine et centre de commandement de l'opération. Muftah Salem, le chef de l'unité, explique que ses hommes sont arrivés là, dans cette rue à la frontière entre le quartier 1 et le 3, il y a deux semaines. Le front est à 700 mètres d'ici. Cet employé d'une usine de métallurgie est optimiste sur l'issue des combats qui l'opposent à l'État islamique depuis le 12 mai dernier.

Le Monde, Marc-Olivier Bherer, 2016 09 13

Moroni, Comores - Dans ce monde inquiet pour sa sécurité, obtenir un passeport est de plus en plus difficile. Rares sont ceux qui échappent à ce zèle administratif. Certains, en revanche, savent éviter ces tracasseries en achetant la nationalité d'Etats complaisants. Dépasser la notion de nationalité Atossa Araxia Abrahamian suit ainsi le destin de l'un de ces hommes, Ahmed Abdul Khaleq, blogueur engagé pour la défense des droits des apatrides aux Emirats arabes unis. Arrêté une première fois en avril 2011, il est gracié par le président. Libéré, Ahmed Abdul Khaleq reprend ses activités militantes, mais il est bientôt la cible d'incessantes tracasseries. A force, les autorités parviennent à contraindre sa famille de demander un passeport comorien, puis à l'expulser, lui seul, en 2012, vers la Thaïlande. Il vit aujourd'hui au Canada, où il a obtenu le statut de réfugié. Il est l'un des malheureux chanceux de ce triste commerce.

33. Troops Kill Female Suicide Bomber in Borno State

All Africa News, Senator Iroegbu, 2016 09 13

Abuja - The Nigerian military has killed a female suicide bomber at a security checkpoint while attempting to gain entrance into a cattle market in Borno State on the eve of Sallah day celebration. The Director of Army Public Relations (DAPR), Col. Sani Usman, said in a statement that a suspected female suicide bomber was on Sunday September 11, 2016, evening, seen approaching troops' check point located at Kara Cattle market axis, Dikwa, towards Antul and Mukdala, in Dikwa Local Government Area (LGA), Borno State. He said that the suspect was challenged from afar by the vigilant duty sentry but she refused to stop claiming to be coming from Monguno to see her parents in Dikwa. "Troops, sensing the direction of approach was suspicious and abnormal, fired a shot at her and the gallant sentry was proven right as she was carrying a Person-Borne Improvised Explosive Device (PBIED) which exploded with a loud bang, killing her instantly and causing minor injury to two soldiers and a Civilian JTF assisting them," he stated. Usman said that the injured soldiers and the civilian have been treated and have continued with their duties. This incident, he noted, has shown that there are a few of the remnants of the Boko Haram terrorists that are determined to carry out criminal acts to create panic and insecurity in some areas.

34. Beijing, Ottawa to work out an extradition treaty

China Daily, Zhang Yan, 2016 09 13

Beijing - China and Canada agreed on Monday to start discussions on a bilateral extradition treaty that would facilitate the return of corrupt fugitive Chinese officials who remain at large in Canada. The agreement was reached at the China-Canada High-Level National Security and Rule of Law Dialogue in Beijing, where discussions were held on ways to improve cooperation on issues such as law enforcement, combating transnational organized crime, judicial cooperation and exchanges on the rule of law. In depth talks of an extradition treaty and the signing of an agreement on sharing the recovered stolen assets will occur in the coming months, while negotiations are finalized on a yearlong memorandum of understanding on a pilot project in which Chinese experts will be invited to help identify Chinese immigrants who use fraudulent means to enter Canada. "The start of such a discussion is a positive sign preparing the way for formal negotiations on the bilateral extradition treaty," said Zhang Xiaoming, deputy director-general of the Judicial Assistance and Foreign Affairs Department at the Ministry of Justice. Huang Feng, a law professor at Beijing Normal University said, "It marks great progress toward formally signing in the near future a bilateral extradition treaty between the two countries." "The two countries do not have major political or legal obstacles and have established good cooperative foundation, which will help them to communicate effectively and exchange views on signing an extradition treaty," he said.

36. Japan, Canada agree to come down hard on N. Korea at U.N.

Japan News, Staff reporter, 2016 09 13

Tokyo - Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and his Canadian counterpart Justin Trudeau agreed Tuesday to coordinate their response to North Korea's provocative acts, including last week's nuclear test, through the framework of the United Nations, a Japanese government spokesman said. In their roughly 20-minute telephone meeting, Abe and Trudeau shared their resolute condemnation of North Korea's behavior, Deputy Chief Cabinet Secretary Koichi Hagiuda said. Pyongyang claims it detonated a nuclear weapon last Friday, its fifth nuclear test and the latest since January. The country has also been pursuing ballistic missile development, most recently launching three missiles on Sept. 1 believed to have fallen into Japan's exclusive economic zone in the Sea of Japan. Hagiuda quoted Abe as telling Trudeau that North Korea's previously unseen threat level calls for a previously unseen response, and that the international community must take specific action to send a strong message to Pyongyang that further provocative acts will not be tolerated.

Dhaka Tribune, Arifur Rahman Rabbi, 2016 09 13

Dhaka - The terrorist who died in Azimpur on Saturday night was the most important person in New Jamaatul Mujahedin Bangladesh (JMB) after Tamim Chowdhury, police have said. Shamser Uddin alias Jamshed Hossain alias Abdul Karim, who killed himself during a raid at the Azimpur den had been coordinating the terror group after the death of Tamim, who masterminded the Gulshan attack. Shamser was a close and trusted aide of Tamim. Under his instructions, Shamser planned attacks, provided training and implemented targets. Police earlier claimed Zahidul alias Maj (retd) Murad, killed in Dhaka's Rupnagar on September 2, was Tamim's second-in-command. After Tamim's death, Shamser was the interim head of the organisation. He was planning to reorganise the group and carry out more attacks. He was collecting money and arms. Police found four guns and Tk3 lakh at the den.

38. North Korea's sixth nuclear test could come 'any time'

The Independent (UK), Hyung-Jin Kim, 2016 09 13

Seoul--North Korea is capable of detonating another nuclear device at its main atomic test site any time it chooses, Seoul officials have said. The statement comes in the midst of plans from the United States to send two nuclear-capable supersonic bombers to the South in a show of force against Pyongyang. Speculation about any new nuclear test by the North comes just days after it conducted its fifth atomic bomb explosion. Friday's test was the North's most powerful to date, and its claim to have used "standardised" warheads has sparked concerns the country is making headway in its push to develop small and sophisticated warheads to be topped on missiles. After the test, the North's nuclear weapons institute said it will take unspecified measures to further boost its nuclear capability, which analysts said hinted at a possible sixth nuclear test. South Korea's Defence Ministry spokesman Moon Sang Gyun said yesterday that South Korea and US intelligence authorities believe North Korea has the ability to detonate another atomic device anytime at its main Punggye-ri nuclear test site, where the five previous atomic explosions took place.

39. Park holds phone conversation with Canadian P.M. on N. Korean nukes

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 13

Seoul - President Park Geun-hye held a phone conversation with Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Tuesday, and shared views on expanding cooperation to better tackle Pyongyang's nuclear provocations, her office said. During the 20-minute conversation, Park and Trudeau exchanged information on North Korea's latest nuclear test, while finding ways to bolster Seoul-Ottawa ties. The presidential office said the call was arranged upon request from Canada. The North American country has been implementing sanctions against North Korea since August 2011. Last week, Pyongyang conducted its fifth nuclear test despite the international community's call for denuclearization on the Korean Peninsula. In January, North Korea conducted a fourth nuclear test after its previous tests in 2006, 2009 and 2013. (Full report)

41. S. Korea's top diplomat to discuss N. Korean nuke test with China, Russia

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 13

Seoul - South Korea's top diplomat Yun Byung-se is scheduled to discuss North Korea's latest nuclear provocation with his Chinese and Russian counterparts, the foreign ministry said Tuesday. Yun plans to have separate telephone talks with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov Tuesday night to discuss measures that can be taken in response to Pyongyang's fifth nuclear test, foreign ministry spokesman Cho June-hyuck said in a regular briefing. Friday's nuclear detonation test was the strongest yet by the reclusive country. Pyongyang tested its first nuclear device in 2006, followed by 2009 and 2013. It carried out its fourth nuclear test in January of this year. "The ministers plan to assess North Korea's fifth nuclear test and discuss future responses," Cho said. The test prompted South Korea, the United States and other partner countries to rush to adopt tougher sanctions against North Korea which was affected by the harshest United Nations Security Council resolution following its previous nuclear test.

42. The lucrative prospect of bitcoin 'mining' in Tibet

Washington Post, Simon Denyer, 2016 09 13

Kongyu Township, China--Inside a metal shed in the Tibetan highlands of western China, thousands of microprocessors flank narrow corridors, generating a constant hum and stifling waves of heat. Outside, the sky is clear and blue, with a mountain peak looming at the top of a narrow wooded valley. A flock of goats ambles idly past a pile of discarded foam packaging. Inside, though, tranquility is transformed into clamor. Red, blue and green lights constantly flash; cooling water trickles down the walls, and large ventilation fans thrum as they struggle to shift the hot air produced by all this concentrated computing power. This is a bitcoin "mine," the engine room of the world's leading digital currency. The microprocessors here approve and record all the transactions that keep the bitcoin system running. They also compete to solve complex mathematical problems and are rewarded with bitcoins: That's a way of putting fresh digital currency into circulation and incentivizing more people to set up "mining" operations. For a while, bitcoin was effectively kidnapped by drug dealers, becoming the anonymous payment backbone of the Silk Road, a black market in illegal drugs that flourished on the dark Net - until the FBI closed that market down in 2013.

43. U.S. sends B-1B bombers to S. Korea amid N. Korean threats

Yonhap News Agency, Choi Kyong-ae, 2016 09 13

Pyeongtaek, South Korea - The flight by two U.S. B-1B bombers over South Korea demonstrates the "steadfast and unshakable" U.S. commitment to its key Asian ally in the wake of North Korea's nuclear test, the U.S. Forces Korea commander (USFK) said Tuesday. The supersonic bombers left U.S. Andersen Air Force Base on Guam on Tuesday morning and arrived over the skies above the Osan Air Base, south of Seoul, at 10:00 a.m. They flew past the U.S. air base in Pyeongtaek, 70 kilometers south of Seoul, accompanied by a flight of four South Korean F-15K and four U.S. F-16 fighter jets. The flybys highlight the close cooperation between the U.S. and South Korean military forces that keeps them ready to respond at any time to threats, the USFK said. "North Korea's nuclear test is a dangerous escalation and poses an unacceptable threat. The United States has an unshakable commitment to defend allies in the region and will take necessary steps to do so, including operations like this one today, and the deployment of the Terminal High Altitude Air Defense (THAAD) battery to the Korean Peninsula," USFK

Commander Gen. Vincent K. Brooks told reporters at Osan Air Base. "Today's demonstration provides just one example of the full range of military capabilities in the deep arsenal of this strong alliance to provide and strengthen extended deterrence," he said.

44. US flies bombers over SKorea in show of force against North

Associated Press, Lee Jin-Man, 2016 09 13

Osan Air Base, South Korea -- The United States on Tuesday sent two nuclear-capable supersonic bombers streaking over ally South Korea in a show of force meant to cow North Korea after its recent nuclear test and also to settle rattled nerves in the South. The B-1B bombers, escorted by U.S. and South Korean jets, were seen by an Associated Press photographer as they flew over Osan Air Base, which is 120 kilometers (75 miles) from the border with North Korea, the world's most heavily armed. The bombers were likely to return to Andersen Air Force Base in Guam, without landing in South Korea. Such flyovers are common when always high animosity rises on the Korean Peninsula, which is technically in a state of war as there has never been a peace treaty to officially end the 1950-53 Korean War. South Korea does not have nuclear weapons and relies on the U.S. "nuclear umbrella" as a deterrent to North Korea. Washington also stations more than 28,000 troops in the South, and tens of thousands more in Japan. North Korea is keenly aware of the U.S. presence on the peninsula and of what it considers the U.S. nuclear threat. It uses such flyovers and the American military influence in the South in its propaganda as alleged proof of U.S. hostility that it claims as the reason it needs a nuclear bomb program.

Abu Dhabi - The GCC has condemned a bill passed unanimously by the United States congress last week that would allow families of the victims of the September 11 terror attacks to sue the government of Saudi Arabia in US courts. Such legislation undermines international relations and could affect counterterrorism cooperation between Washington and its Gulf allies, the GCC secretary general Abdullatif Al Zayani said. The bill, which president Barack Obama strongly opposes, is "contrary to the foundations and principles of relations between states and the principle of sovereign immunity enjoyed by states," Mr Al Zayani said. "Such laws will negatively affect the international efforts and international cooperation to combat terrorism," he said. Sheikh Abdullah bin Zayed, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation, also criticised the bill the state news agency Wam reported.

Sheikh al-Afiouni delivered the Eid sermon, saying Eid al-Adha this year gives the Syrians hope for the end of the crisis in the country thanks to the Syrian Arab Army and the victories it has achieved. 51. Syrie, les acteurs aux intérêts croisés d'un champ de bataille régional

Le Figaro, Adrien Jaulmes, 2016 09 13

Chronique - L'accord signé entre Kerry et Lavrov devait entrer en vigueur hier soir. Mais le conflit syrien, commencé en 2011 comme une guerre civile entre le régime de Bachar el-Assad et les rebelles, est devenu depuis une guerre aux nombreux intervenants, dont chacun est en mesure de faire capoter la trêve. Régime syrien contre rebelles, islamistes chiites contre islamistes sunnites, Iraniens contre Saoudiens, Turcs contre Kurdes, Kurdes et Turcs contre djihadistes, Russes contre rebelles, Américains soutenant à la fois les Turcs et leurs ennemis kurdes, combattant ou soutenant diverses factions rebelles : le conflit syrien est devenu un champ de bataille à entrées multiples, où s'affrontent forces armées régulières et milices, acteurs locaux et puissances étrangères. En plus de cinq ans de guerre et un demi-million de morts, essentiellement civils, la Syrie est devenue un patchwork de fiefs ennemis qui se combattent ou s'allient dans un jeu compliqué qui défie jusqu'à présent toute solution diplomatique. Le conflit syrien dépasse en violence et en complexité toutes les autres crises contemporaines. Il a développé ses propres règles. C'est une guerre où éviter la défaite tient souvent lieu de victoire, où les interventions étrangères se font autant manipuler par les groupes qu'elles soutiennent qu'elles ne les manipulent et où l'ennemi de son ennemi n'est pas forcément un ami.

52. « Une grande gueule, pas autre chose »

Le Soir (Belgique), Ludivine Ponciau, 2016 09 13

Bruxelles - Le procès de deux membres des « Kamikaze Riders » a débuté ce lundi devant le tribunal correctionnel de Bruxelles. Interpellés le 27 décembre 2015, Saïd Saouti (31 ans) et Mohamed Karay (28 ans) étaient dans un premier temps soupçonnés d'avoir planifié pour le 31 décembre un attentat dans le centre de Bruxelles. Mais cette prévention n'avait finalement pas été retenue. Les deux membres du club de motards suspecté d'être lié à Sharia4Belgium sont poursuivis pour participation aux activités d'un groupe terroriste. Saïd Saouti en tant que dirigeant, Mohamed Karay en tant que membre. C'est suite à un appel anonyme, passé quelques jours avant leur arrestation et dénonçant des projets d'attentats, que les enquêteurs s'étaient intéressés aux deux motards. La date du 31 décembre approchant, ils avaient fini par interpellier les deux suspects mais, depuis, le dossier s'est fortement dégonflé. « Je ne suis pas un musulman extrémiste », a soutenu Saïd Saouti, interrogé sur sa radicalisation présumée. Problème : le contenu de sa page Facebook, l'historique des articles qu'il consultait sur le net et des vidéos qu'il partageait sur Youtube, contenus à propos duquel le juge Pierre Hendrickx l'a longuement interrogé ce lundi, laissent clairement penser que le jeune homme cautionnait les actes de l'Etat islamique, voire qu'il soutenait ouvertement l'organisation terrorisme. L'un de ses contacts Facebook se plaint ainsi auprès de Saouti qu'« on l'empêche de partir », un autre lui signale qu'il a « prêté allégeance ». A une femme qui lui confie ses projets de mourir en martyr, il souhaite « le meilleur ». Un autre « pseudo » le questionne sur la possibilité de tuer des enfants et des femmes. « S'ils le font, alors on peut leur infliger la même chose », lui avait répondu Saïd. D'ailleurs, on est loin d'avoir infligé le dixième de ce qu'ils nous ont infligé. » Certains de ces contenus postés sur le web datent d'août 2014, soit avant que Saïd Saouti ne soit condamné à 6 ans de réclusion pour vol avec violence. Ce qu'il ne conteste pas. « Je n'étais pas assez encadré à l'époque. Ce sont des bêtises que je regrette amèrement.

53. Allemagne: trois migrants syriens arrêtés pour appartenance présumée à l'EI

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Berlin - Trois réfugiés syriens, arrivés en Allemagne lors de l'afflux migratoire de 2015 et soupçonnés d'appartenance au groupe jihadiste Etat islamique (EI), ont été arrêtés mardi dans le nord du pays, a annoncé le parquet fédéral allemand. Les trois hommes Mahir Al-H., 27 ans, Mohamed A., 26 ans, et Ibrahim M. 18 ans ont été interpellés dans le Schleswig- Holstein et leurs appartements font l'objet de perquisitions. Ils étaient arrivés en Allemagne en novembre 2015, au pic de la crise migratoire qui a vu un million de demandeurs d'asile entrer dans le pays. "En l'état actuel des investigations de la police criminelle, les trois accusés sont soupçonnés d'être venus en Allemagne sur ordre de l'organisation Etat islamique pour soit exécuter une mission, soit pour se tenir prêt en vue d'instructions", selon un communiqué du parquet qui a décidé de les poursuivre pour appartenance à une "organisation terroriste étrangère". Mahir Al-H. est soupçonné d'avoir rejoint l'EI en septembre 2015 et d'avoir bénéficié d'une "courte" formation aux armes à Raqa, le bastion du groupe dans le nord de la Syrie. Le mois suivant lui et ses deux complices présumés ont pris la route de l'Europe, via la Turquie et la Grèce, sur ordre d'un responsable de l'EI chargé "des attentats hors du territoire de l'Etat islamique". "Aucune mission ou instruction précise n'a été jusqu'à présent mise en évidence par les enquêteurs", selon le parquet.

54. Bruxelles, ghetto mental et cible de la radicalisation

Le Soir (Belgique), Colette Braeckman, 2016 09 13

Bruxelles - En quoi l'Etat islamique est-il un projet nouveau, globalisant et pourquoi séduit-il tant de jeunes musulmans d'Europe ? Les programmes dits de « déradicalisation » ont-ils une chance de réussir ? N'est-il pas déjà trop tard ? Les questions se sont bousculées au cours du débat sur le thème « Jeunesse, radicalisation et terrorisme » animé par Béatrice Delvaux. Plusieurs intervenants étaient rassemblés : Massimo d'Alema, Ismael Saidi, Johan Lemman, Malika Hamidi, Joh Gatt Rutter, ainsi que Charles Picqué. Au nom de la Fédération des progressistes européens, Massimo d'Alema a d'abord rappelé qu'au départ, Al Qaida avait été une « base » logistique et militaire soutenue par les Occidentaux désireux de contrer les Soviétiques. Après avoir évoqué les effets déstabilisateurs des printemps arabes et de la guerre en Irak, il a pris le temps d'expliquer le projet politique « globalisant », c'est-à-dire totalitaire, de Daesh, qui utilise à son profit la marginalisation sociale de certains jeunes musulmans d'Europe. Pour Malika Hamidi, s'exprimant au nom du réseau « European muslim network », les musulmans vivant en Europe (30 à 40 millions de personnes...) « sont aujourd'hui pris en otage, diabolisés et les programmes dits de déradicalisation sont stigmatisants, sinon contre-productifs ». Un jugement confirmé par Ismael Saidi : « La déradicalisation, cela n'existe pas. Il faut voir les choses en face, certains de ces jeunes sont foutus. C'est en amont qu'il faut agir. Le seul vaccin contre la radicalisation, c'est l'école. Il faut bannir les écoles-poubelles, les mêmes que celles où j'ai étudié... Trop de talents se perdent ... » Charles Picqué, bourgmestre de Saint-Gilles, abonde : « Une tranche d'âge m'inquiète, celle des jeunes qui sont en décrochage après 4 ou 5 années d'études secondaires, ils sont largués. On préfère écrémer le dessus du panier ... »

55. Derrière le commando des femmes, Kassim, l'ennemi public numéro 1

Le Progrès (Lyon), Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Paris - Les trois femmes soupçonnées de vouloir commettre un attentat en France ont été présentées hier à la justice. Deux suspectes ont été mises en examen. Elles ont été téléguidées par Rachid Kassim, ennemi public N° 1 des services secrets. Inès M., 19 ans, Sarah H., 23 ans, et Amel S., 39 ans étaient présentées devant la justice hier soir. Selon BFMTV, Amel S. a été mise en examen pour « association de malfaiteurs en relation avec une entreprise terroriste en vue de commettre des crimes d'atteinte aux personnes » et de « complicité de tentative d'homicide contre un représentant de la force publique ». Sarah H. a elle aussi été mise en examen, et placée en détention provisoire. Inès M. devrait également être mise en examen par les juges antiterroristes. Ces trois femmes, dont les deux plus jeunes étaient connues des services pour leur radicalisation et des velléités de départ en Syrie, avaient évoqué des gares de l'Essonne et de Paris ainsi que des policiers comme cibles potentielles. Elles envisageaient aussi de se procurer des ceintures explosives ou de lancer des voitures contre des bâtiments. Samedi, une première suspecte, Ornella G., 29 ans, une convertie radicalisée, a été mise en examen et écrouée dans l'enquête sur la voiture remplie de bonbonnes de gaz. Son empreinte avait été retrouvée dans le véhicule. D'après son récit, elle et Inès M. ont échoué à mettre le feu au véhicule dans la nuit du 3 au 4 septembre. Rachid Kassim, « l'inspirateur » Les modalités de l'attaque à la voiture piégée correspondent aux consignes que Rachid Kassim dispense via Internet. Ce Français de 29 ans, originaire de Roanne dans la Loire (lire par ailleurs), ancien animateur social parti sur les terres du djihad, est devenu une priorité pour les services de renseignement. Depuis la Syrie, il a été « l'inspirateur » de Larossi Abballa, qui a tué un policier et sa compagne le 13 juin à Magnanville et « a délivré directement ses consignes » aux deux assassins du prêtre de l'église de Saint-Étienne-du-Rouvray.

56. Generation Jihad: Scholar of Islam predicts civil war across Europe as more young Muslims facing poor job prospects turn to radical groups

The Daily Mail Online, Julian Robinson, 2016 09 13

Berlin - A scholar of Islam has warned of civil war across Europe as more young Muslims facing poor job prospects turn to radical groups, it has been reported. Professor Gilles Kepel, from the Sciences Po in Paris, France, said a growing 'Jihad Generation' is likely to continue to carry out terror acts in European cities. The aim of their terror activity is to both incite hatred towards Muslims and, in doing so, cause further radicalisation among young people, the professor of political science said. He told the German newspaper Die Welt that this in turn could lead to the point where Europe enters into civil war. Kepel said the recent terror attacks across the continent were part of a war within Islam rather than between Islam and Western civilization. The extremists, he said, also want to crush more moderate Islamic opposition. After civil war had ruined Europe, he said, the long term goal of the terrorists would then be to build a caliphate 'on the ruins of the old continent'. Kepel said that while most Muslims were not involved in any terror-related activity, a lack of job prospects and their feeling of hopelessness in French suburbs could boost the likelihood of young Muslims becoming radicalised.

57. German police arrest three Syrian refugees suspected of 'IS' connections

Deutsche Welle, Staff Writer, 2016 09 13

Berlin - A statement from Germany's Federal Public Prosecutor's office on Tuesday confirmed earlier media reports that federal police and agents from Germany's GSG 9 special operations unit were involved in pre- dawn raids against terror suspects. Three men were arrested in the raids. All three are Syrian nationals and the prosecutor's office listed their names as Mahir Al-H. (17), Mohamed A. (26), and Ibrahim M. (18). The full names of criminal suspects in Germany are usually not released by officials. The men are suspected of being members of a foreign terror organization, the so-called "Islamic State" ("IS"). According to the investigation so far, the three came to Germany in November with the intention of "carrying out a previously determined order [from IS] or to await further instructions." Mahir Al-H. is believed to have received training from IS in Raqqa, Syria on how to use weapons and explosives in September 2015. One month later, he and the other two suspects are believed to have agreed on a plan to travel to Europe to carry out operations or attacks outside of IS-controlled areas.

58. Non à la surveillance de masse

24 Heures (Suisse), Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Berne - Au nom de la sécurité, de nombreux États renforcent leurs dispositifs de surveillance. Cela semble particulièrement justifié dans une perspective d'efficacité numérique et face à la menace terroriste. Mais on oublie ou on admet trop facilement que certaines mesures de surveillance piétinent plusieurs droits humains fondamentaux. La nouvelle loi sur le renseignement (LRens), sur laquelle nous votons le 25 septembre prochain, n'échappe pas à cette tendance. Parmi la palette de mesures que la loi met à disposition du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC), deux sont particulièrement problématiques. L'exploration du réseau câblé permettra au SRC d'enregistrer tous les flux de données et de les analyser au moyen de mots-clés. Le service de renseignements aura ainsi accès à une quantité énorme de données et au contenu de communications électroniques telles que les e-mails, la téléphonie ou les recherches via Internet. Toutes les personnes se trouvant en Suisse seront touchées par ces mesures de surveillance.

59. Sécurité : à quoi servent 600 millions en deux ans

Le Soir (Belgique), Martine Debuisson, 2016 09 13

Bruxelles - Budget Au menu : matériel informatique, engagement de personnel, surveillance... Le gouvernement a budgété 200 millions en 2015 et 400 millions en 2016 pour lutter contre le terrorisme et renforcer notre sécurité. Voici comment il a déjà réparti la majorité de ces montants. Le gouvernement le répète constamment - et l'opposition le conteste tout aussi régulièrement : étant donné le contexte de violence terroriste que nous connaissons, les dépenses liées à la sécurité sont en nette augmentation car l'équipe Michel y a consacré des moyens supplémentaires. Alors, quels sont ces chiffres ? Et, surtout, comment sont-ils ventilés ? Voici quelques jours, pour son interview de rentrée dans Le Soir, le président du CDH Benoît Lutgen évoquait les 400 millions souvent cités par la majorité fédérale... pour regretter qu'« on n'en connaisse toujours pas la ventilation ». Dimanche, à l'université d'été du MR, le Premier ministre Charles Michel évoquait, lui, le chiffre de « 600 millions en deux ans ». Qu'en est-il finalement ? Et à quoi sont destinées ces sommes ? Nous avons obtenu une note gouvernementale qui détaille les (principaux) montants consacrés à la sécurité et à la lutte contre le terrorisme en 2015 et 2016, et qui en précise les affectations. En 2015, 39,6 millions ont d'abord été octroyés aux services de sécurité lors du contrôle budgétaire. Ensuite, sur une provision de 200 millions prévue par le gouvernement pour les dépenses liées à la sécurité, 40,4 millions ont été libérés dans un premier temps, et 70,9 millions dans un second (en septembre). Soit un total de 150,9 millions. Voici comment ces 150,9 millions ont été ventilés : - 71,8 millions pour la Police, - 31,9 pour la Justice, - 16,4 pour les scanners douaniers, - 12,2 pour les Affaires étrangères, - 6,7 pour la Sûreté de l'Etat, - 5 pour la sécurisation des bâtiments critiques, - 4,8 pour l'Intérieur, - 1,7 pour le Shape, - 0,4 pour l'Ocam, - 0,1 pour le Centre de crise. Ce sont donc la Police et la Justice qui, de manière logique, ont reçu les deux tiers des moyens supplémentaires mis à disposition en 2015 pour la sécurité et la lutte contre le terrorisme.

60. Terrorisme : l'adolescent soupçonné d'avoir voulu "passer à l'acte" à Paris a été mis en examen et écroué

FranceTv Info (site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Paris - Arrêté dans le 12^e arrondissement de Paris chez sa mère, où il était assigné à résidence, le jeune homme, sensible aux thèses de l'islam radical, envisageait de tuer des passants à l'arme blanche sur la promenade de la coulée verte. Le mineur de 15 ans interpellé samedi 10 septembre, dans le 12^e arrondissement de Paris, a été mis en examen dans la soirée du lundi 12 septembre pour association de malfaiteur terroriste en vue de commettre un attentat, selon les informations de franceinfo. Il a été placé en détention provisoire. Aucun lien n'a été établi par les enquêteurs avec la double enquête sur un attentat avorté à la voiture piégée aux bonbonnes de gaz et sur une autre attaque "imminente" que les autorités assurent avoir déjouée en démantelant un commando de femmes jihadistes. Le mineur de quinze ans, interpellé samedi à Paris, avait fait état sur la messagerie cryptée Telegram "d'un passage à l'acte avec une arme blanche", selon une source proche de l'enquête. Cette nouvelle menace s'est traduite samedi par des messages d'alerte concernant plusieurs sites sensibles dans la capitale, notamment des commissariats et certains lieux publics.

61. Terrorisme : Telegram donne du fil à retordre aux policiers

Ouest-France, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 13

Paris - « Telegram est le principal réseau utilisé par les terroristes », confirmait, en mai, Patrick Calvar, patron de la DGSI (Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure). En 2013, les frères russes Nikolaï et Pavel Durov ont créé cette application gratuite pour smartphones qui permet d'échanger messages, photos, vidéos et fichiers de manière cryptée. « On sait intercepter, mais pas décoder » Les échanges se font soit à deux, soit avec un groupe (jusqu'à 5 000 abonnés). « Vitesse et sécurité », promet Telegram. Les données sont cryptées grâce à une clé de chiffrement aléatoire. Les contenus sont illisibles en cas d'interception par un tiers, et s'autodétruisent au bout d'un certain temps. Telegram se paye le luxe d'offrir jusqu'à 300 000 dollars à qui sera capable de déchiffrer ses messages. Un policier explique à l' AFP : « On sait intercepter les données quand A parle avec B, mais on ne sait pas décoder le message, car la clé de chiffrement est inconnue des messageries elles-mêmes qui en font un argument commercial. » Les terroristes utilisent Telegram pour échanger et promouvoir leurs idées. L'application est recommandée par l'État islamique. Infiltrer ces réseaux, y être intégré est possible, assure un enquêteur français, « à condition d'être un bon acteur, d'avoir de solides connaissances culturelles et religieuses pour arriver à faire illusion » .

1. Cellphone monitoring device use should be transparent and limited, researchers say
CBC News, Laura Wright, 2016 09 14

Ottawa - A report by the Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto is slamming Ottawa for its lack of transparency when it comes to government agencies' use of mobile phone monitoring devices.

The devices, known as IMSI catchers, commonly known by their commercial names like Stingray, DRTBOX and Hailstorm, can surreptitiously intercept communications from a mobile device to identify and track the person associated with it. The authors of the 130- page document lay out three main recommendations: they call for transparency on how the monitoring devices are used, they want to ensure they're only used under strict conditions, and they want to minimize the device's impact on peoples' privacy. The devices aren't new, but their use is becoming more common. The authors argue this is due to both the fact that 81 per cent of Canadians have a mobile device they carry with them at all times, and because IMSI catchers are getting cheaper. The authors of the report said the unchecked use of these devices "poses an insidious threat to privacy." Currently, there is no public information about how agencies like the RCMP, CSIS and police forces use these devices. And it's been incredibly difficult for journalists and privacy advocates to get police services across the country to confirm or deny if they even have such a device, let alone use one. It's illegal to use uncertified radio devices under the Radiocommunication Act, which this device falls under. Agencies that want to use one must apply for a licence.

2. IS 'pushing hard' to radicalize our youth

Winnipeg Free Press, Katie May, 2016 09 14

Winnipeg - The case of a Manitoba teen who admitted to promoting terrorism for the Islamic State has attracted national attention as security experts say the radicalization of youth appears to be on the rise. Terrorism expert and retired University of Manitoba professor Peter St. John said the case could be an example of a "desperate" Islamic State trying to lure young westerners with slick online campaigns. "(Islamic State) is pushing very hard to disrupt western societies as much as it can by getting through to young people," he said. "So maybe this is why suddenly, after nothing in Manitoba, we've had a couple of cases like this -- because we don't look on ourselves as a place where terrorists would be. But there is a huge, sophisticated push to reach young people through the Internet." The 17-year- old male from rural western Manitoba pleaded guilty to counselling to commit an indictable offence for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with a terrorist group, namely Islamic State. He was 16 at the time and can't be identified. Details of the offence are scant. The home- schooled teen was charged in November 2015 after police seized computer equipment, books and notebooks from his home. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the RCMP's national security enforcement section were involved in the investigation. The teen tried to convert to Islam at the Brandon Islamic Centre, the Brandon Sun reported.

3. RCMP seek peace bond for Tevis Gonyou-McLean over terror concerns

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 09 14

Ottawa - Just two days after known ISIS supporter Aaron Driver was killed in a confrontation with police in Strathroy, Ont., RCMP in Ottawa arrested a 24-year-old man over concerns he would engage in terrorism. Police took Tevis David Gonyou-McLean of Ottawa into custody on Aug. 12, alleging he uttered a threat to cause death or bodily harm "to unspecified persons," according to court documents. RCMP are now trying to convince a judge to issue an extraordinary peace bond against Gonyou-McLean. On Aug. 19, an officer swore before a provincial court judge that she feared, based on the alleged threat, that Gonyou-McLean might: - Leave Canada to participate in the activity of a terrorist group. -Participate in the activity of a terrorist group. -Commission an offence for a terrorist group. Gonyou-McLean is also barred from communicating with six people, including Ottawa twin brothers Ashton and Carlos Larmond, who are currently serving prison sentences for terror-related offences. He also can't communicate with Awso Peshdary, who is awaiting pre-trial in December for terror-related offences, and Luqmann Abdunnur. At least one security expert doesn't believe those conditions go far enough, however. 'Why isn't he being held?' "It would seem to me that if he's charged, then why isn't he being held?" asked Phil Gurski, a former CSIS agent who now runs a private security firm.

4. Terror suspects getting younger

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 09 14

Toronto - A 15-year-old who robbed a Montreal dépanneur to finance his plan to join the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. A Toronto girl of the same age caught at a Middle East airport on her way to Syria. In Winnipeg, a terrorist offence committed by a 16-year-old. Over the past two to three years, Canadian counterterrorism police have found themselves investigating minors as young as 13 - members of the online generation engrossed in extremism, some of them turned in by their families. "This is something that we've been seeing for a number of years now," RCMP Deputy Commissioner Mike Cabana said in an interview Tuesday. "And not just in Canada actually. It's in other countries as well. The same reality is there." The latest case emerged Monday, when the Public Prosecution Service of Canada announced a youth had pleaded guilty in Manitoba youth court for counselling the commission of an offence for the benefit of, or at the direction of, a terrorist group. In a few cases, police have dealt with adolescent extremists through terrorism peace bonds, including one for a young offender in Thunder Bay, Ont. In Toronto, police arrested an 18-year-old last September on a terrorism peace bond. Intelligence analyst Phil Gurski wrote in a September, 2015, blog post that while those involved in extremist violence were once in the 18-to-28 range, "we are seeing a worrisome development of late: a lowering of the radicalization age." "But I think there is a silver lining. The younger the radical the greater the chance of diversion," wrote Gurski, who worked on radicalization at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and Public Safety Canada. "As the radicals get older, the opportunities for success are smaller." Teenaged extremists may also be more likely to be detected. Assuming they live at home, their families will know if they have disappeared, and may notice changes in their behaviour or that they have been viewing terrorist propaganda on the Internet.

5. Body of alleged terrorist leader unclaimed

Windsor Star, Dan Taekema, 2016 09 14

Windsor - Alleged terrorist leader Tamim Chowdhury's body is lying unclaimed in a medical college morgue. His relatives in Bangladesh have reportedly refused to claim his body and police are attempting to contact his parents with hopes they'll accept his remains. His parents still live in Windsor, multiple sources say. Chowdhury, a former student at J.L. Forster Secondary School who later earned a degree at the University of Windsor, was killed in a shootout with police at the end of August. According to officials in Dhaka, the capital city of Bangladesh, he was the mastermind behind multiple attacks in the country that killed at least two dozen people. Now, authorities are left with the problem of what to do with his body, which is currently being held in the morgue of the Dhaka Medical College and Hospital. "No one has claimed his body," Masudur Rahman, a spokesman for the Dhaka Metropolitan Police, said early Friday. "We are trying to connect with the couple, his parents, then we will deliver the body." According to Rahman, police in Bangladesh have reached out to Interpol, with hopes they can help get in contact with Chowdhury's parents. A spokesperson for the RCMP, which acts as the Canadian arm of the international policing organization, was not immediately able to confirm that was the case. Bengali media outlets reported Chowdhury's uncle identified his body, but refused to claim it out of "humiliation and anger."

6. Fintrac found 'significant' deficiencies at nearly 500 real estate firms: data

Canadian Press, Alexandra Posadzki, 2016 09 14

Toronto - Canada's anti-money laundering agency conducted on-site examinations of more than 800 real estate companies over four-and-a-half years and found "significant" or "very significant" deficiencies during 60 per cent of those visits, new data shows. A document obtained by The Canadian Press through an Access to Information request shows that Fintrac conducted 823 examinations of companies in the real estate sector between 2012 and mid June of this year. The federal anti-money laundering watchdog found "significant" deficiencies with the anti-money laundering and anti-terrorist financing controls at 468 of those companies, while 28 companies had "very significant" deficiencies. Meanwhile, 324 companies had only "limited" deficiencies. None of the companies were named in the document. When asked what constitutes a "limited deficiency," the agency said it includes instances where the deficiencies are minor or the regulations are only partially being followed. According to the watchdog, an example of a significant deficiency is when there is a "excessive number" of minor deficiencies found, or a number of more severe issues. Very significant deficiencies include instances where there is an "unacceptable" number of minor and serious issues, or infractions that are "very serious" in nature.

7. Iran dismisses lawyer of Canadian prisoner

Toronto Star, Olivia Ward, 2016 09 14

Toronto - The outlook for release of Montreal anthropologist Homa Hoodfar from Iran's Evin prison darkened Tuesday with news that a hardline judge has dismissed her lawyer and chosen another to represent her without her consent. "This seems to be standard procedure for this judge, who has been violating many laws," said Hoodfar's niece, Amanda Ghahremani, speaking from Montreal. "He's denied access to her lawyers, her family, she is in solitary confinement and has not been moved to a general ward. Her health is our biggest concern." The judge, Abolqasem Salvati, known for earlier draconian verdicts, has presided over high-profile cases of Iranian-born journalist Jason Rezaian, Canadian permanent resident Mostafa Azizi and Iranian-British charity worker Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, who was sentenced last week to five years in prison. Hoodfar, said to be in "fragile, declining health," was first arrested in March by the counter-espionage service of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, which is in a power struggle with President Hassan Rouhani. She was released on bail after interrogation and arrested again in June.

9. Mosque calls Sun story 'categorically false'

Ottawa Sun, Anthony Furey, 2016 09 14

Ottawa - An Ottawa mosque visited by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau this week said it's "categorically false" that their Imam has links to a terror group. The Sun reported Monday that Ottawa Muslim Association's imam, Samy Metwally, is listed as a member of the International Union of Muslim Scholars on the OMA's website. The IUMS was designated a terrorist organization by the United Arab Emirates and faces criticism from various experts for its supposed ties to the Muslim Brotherhood. "These accusations are, of course, categorically false in what they insinuate and grossly unfair," OMA President Naeem Malik said in a statement. "The OMA and Imam Metwally do not have any ties to terrorist organizations nor do they harbour any ideology in favour of terrorism or extremism." However, the statement does not at any point address what specifically is incorrect about the Sun's reporting and the OMA did not respond to requests for clarification. Their release concludes: "No further statement will be issued, nor will we be available for contact by the media." An OMA spokesman identified as Mr. Ibrahim is also quoted as saying "we are extremely concerned about potential hateful backlash or harm to our institution and congregants." The OMA garnered national attention Monday after Prime Minister Justin Trudeau visited the mosque to acknowledge Eid al-Adha, a Muslim holiday. In a response to questions from the Sun about Trudeau's visit, the prime minister's office pointed out that former PM Jean Chretien attended the mosque in the days following 9/11. Former Conservative cabinet ministers have also visited the mosque, including Jason Kenney. Metwally became the imam there in the summer of 2012.

10. PSAC takes Phoenix pay glitches to labour tribunal, as sick-leave negotiations loom

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 09 14

Ottawa - The foulups of the Phoenix pay system are at the centre of a labour tribunal hearing into whether the federal government is breaking the law by not paying thousands of people properly and on time. The Public Service Alliance of Canada is arguing at a hearing of the Public Service Labour Relations and Employment Board this week that Phoenix pay glitches amount to an "unfair labour practice" because they have effectively changed the terms and conditions of employment for public servants during a period of collective bargaining. "This government put in place a process where our members are not getting paid properly or on time, which is part of their terms of employment," said Chris Aylward, vice-president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. The union filed the unfair labour complaint in June after the second phase of the rollout when complaints from public servants who were being underpaid, overpaid or not paid at all began to mushroom. Public Services and Procurement Canada, the federal paymaster and department responsible for Phoenix, has been holding regular public briefings on efforts to fix the system and updating the size of the backlog of 80,000 files, which it has promised to eliminate by Oct. 31. The tribunal hearing, however, is calling union officials and senior bureaucrats to testify, offering an inside look at how the project was designed, planned, implemented and rolled out in two phases in February and April.

11. Ségrégation sexuelle à la mosquée: Trudeau n'excuse pas sa présence

Le Devoir, Hélène Buzzetti, 2016 09 14

Ottawa - Loin de s'excuser, le premier ministre Justin Trudeau estime que c'est son devoir d'aller à la rencontre des gens, même si cela implique de se retrouver dans une mosquée à un moment où les femmes sont tenues à l'écart. Lundi, M. Trudeau s'est rendu à l'Ottawa Muslim Association pour prononcer quelques mots aux musulmans réunis pour célébrer la fête du sacrifice. Pendant la cérémonie précédant la prise de parole du premier ministre, hommes et femmes étaient séparés. Les hommes occupaient le plancher principal, tandis que les femmes étaient reléguées à un balcon à l'arrière. M. Trudeau a d'ailleurs pris la peine de saluer « les soeurs là-haut » au début de son court laïus. Il s'en est trouvé certains pour critiquer ce choix. L'ancien ministre péquiste Bernard Drainville, celui qui avait défendu la Charte des valeurs québécoises, a écrit sur Twitter lundi soir : « Ségrégation sexuelle cautionnée par Justin Trudeau qui salue " the sisters upstairs " à la mosquée d'Ottawa. » Interrogé à ce sujet mardi, M. Trudeau a quelque peu esquivé la question de la ségrégation sexuelle pour parler de sa responsabilité de bâtir des ponts. « Les valeurs qui définissent le Canada incluent le respect et l'ouverture envers tout le spectre de la diversité. » Selon le premier ministre, « les politiciens ont la responsabilité de rassembler les gens plutôt que de fomenter la division. Et c'est pourquoi je suis heureux de participer à des événements communautaires dans des églises, des temples, des synagogues et des mosquées ».

12. A Hacker Releases Democratic Documents

New York Times, Alan Rappeport, 2016 09 14

New York - A hacker who American intelligence officials believe has ties to the Russian government made public on Tuesday a second batch of documents suspected of having been stolen from the Democratic National Committee's computer system, leaving the organization rushing to contain damage or embarrassment less than two months before the presidential election. The internal documents, which party officials were verifying for authenticity, were distributed at a cybersecurity conference in London. The release was apparently the work of Guccifer 2.0, a self-identified Romanian hacker who claimed responsibility for publishing a trove of the committee's documents before the Democratic convention in July. Donna Brazile, the interim chairwoman of the Democratic National Committee, blamed Russian espionage for the hack and said that foreign agents were trying to help Donald J. Trump, the Republican presidential nominee, be elected. "The D.N.C. is the victim of a crime: an illegal cyberattack by Russian state-sponsored agents who seek to harm the Democratic Party and progressive groups in an effort to influence the presidential election," Ms. Brazile said in a statement. "There's one person who stands to benefit from these criminal acts, and that's Donald Trump."

13. CIA Director John Brennan to Birmingham students: 'I don't want the agency to just look like me'

Alabama.com, Ivana Hrynkiw, 2016 09 14

Birmingham, Ala. - The Director of the Central Intelligence Agency visited Birmingham high school students today to discuss what working for the agency is like and the possibility of starting a CIA ambassador program at Ramsay High School. Brennan stressed that character and integrity are two of the most important things he looks for in potential officers. "Make sure you're taking care of how you're doing on the personal front... integrity can be quashed in a matter of minutes." According to Chanda Nolita Temple, spokesperson for Birmingham City Schools, the students present at the meeting today were students who have shown an interest in careers in government or in security. She also said that they are some of the district's best students. Another purpose of Brennan's speech was to emphasize the diversity he wants to see within the agency. "I don't want the agency to just look like me."

14. DNI Declines Required Damage Assessment of Clinton's Leaked Email Secrets

Washington Free Beacon, Bill Gertz, 2016 09 14

Washington - The U.S. intelligence community declined to conduct a required assessment of the damage to national security caused by former secretary of state Hillary Clinton sending and receiving secrets on a private email server. "ODNI is not leading an [intelligence community]-wide damage assessment and is not aware of any individual IC element conducting such formal assessments," Joel D. Melstad, a spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, said. The most sensitive classified information leaked and possibly obtained by foreign intelligence services included ultra-secret information on U.S. drone strikes, according to American intelligence officials. James Clapper, the director of national intelligence, agreed with security officials who argued against the need to carry out the damage assessment. Intelligence officials argued in internal discussions that since many details of the drone missile program targeting terrorists were disclosed in earlier leaks unrelated to Clinton's use of a personal email server, gauging the damage done by her conduct would be difficult, and possibly unnecessary. Melstad, the DNI spokesman, declined further comment when asked the reasons behind Clapper's decision not to launch the damage assessment.

15. Edward Snowden's former boss speaks out: 'I would have hired him again' -- but not now

Geek Wire, Alan Boyle, 2016 09 14

Seattle - The cybersecurity expert who hired Edward Snowden for his last job is laying out his lessons learned - but admits it would have been hard to stop the man who spilled some of the National Security Agency's most closely held secrets. "Knowing what I knew at the time, I would have hired him again," Steven Bay, a former cyberintelligence analyst for Booz Allen Hamilton, said today in Seattle at the IEEE Computer Society's "Rock Stars of Cybersecurity" conference. "Knowing what I know now, obviously, I wouldn't," he added. Snowden got the job, and started working as an intelligence analyst at the NSA's facility in Hawaii at the beginning of April in 2013. Bay said two red flags came up in the weeks that followed. First, Snowden began asking about a highly classified mass-surveillance program that's now known to the public as PRISM. Bay had access to the PRISM data, but Snowden didn't. Bay didn't give Snowden access to PRISM, but he did provide him with some data that in retrospect he shouldn't have. The second red flag popped up when Snowden started coming in late to work, only a few weeks after starting the job. When Bay asked about it, Snowden told him he was suffering from epilepsy.

16. Hacker Guccifer 2.0 Gives Rambling Speech at Cybersecurity Conference

Motherboard (Vice), Lorenzo Franceschi-Bicchierai, 2016 09 13

New York - The hacker who claimed to be behind the breach on the Democratic National Committee, who goes by the name Guccifer 2.0, was slated to talk via livestream at a London cybersecurity conference on Tuesday. But, perhaps unsurprisingly, Guccifer 2.0, whom experts believe is just a front for Russian government hackers, was a no show. Instead, someone else read out loud a rambling statement purportedly sent by the hacker. In the long statement, Guccifer 2.0 talks about who's really to blame for data breaches (spoiler alert: definitely not hackers like him), accuses Twitter of censoring his "twits," and blames government contractors as the real culprits because they make buggy software. "As a result they pose a threat to the critical infrastructure elements and the national security as a whole. Total computerization along with inadequate software development may cause a lot of troubles," Guccifer 2.0 said, according to a transcript obtained by Motherboard. "That's why it's better to use paper sometimes. We should start now to prevent electronic apocalypse and rise of the machines in the future. Or else it would be too late."

17. How the Trump Organization's Foreign Business Ties Could Upend U.S. National Security (Canada)

Newsweek, Kurt Eichenwald, 2016 09 14

New York - If Donald Trump is elected president, will he and his family permanently sever all connections to the Trump Organization, a sprawling business empire that has spread a secretive financial web across the world? Or will Trump instead choose to be the most conflicted president in American history, one whose business interests will constantly jeopardize the security of the United States? Throughout this campaign, the Trump Organization, which pumps potentially hundreds of millions of dollars into the Trump family's bank accounts each year, has been largely ignored. As a private enterprise, its businesses, partners and investors are hidden from public view, even though they are the very people who could be enriched by-- or will further enrich--Trump and his family if he wins the presidency. A close examination by Newsweek of the Trump Organization, including confidential interviews with business executives and some of its international partners, reveals an enterprise with deep ties to global financiers, foreign politicians and even criminals, although there is no evidence the Trump Organization has engaged in any illegal activities. It also reveals a web of contractual entanglements that could not be just canceled. If Trump moves into the White House and his family continues to receive any benefit from the company, during or even after his presidency, almost every foreign policy decision he makes will raise serious conflicts of interest and ethical quagmires. The Trump Organization has...shown interest in Ukraine. In 2006, Donald Trump Jr. and Ivanka Trump met with Viktor Tkachuk, an adviser to the Ukrainian president, and Andriy Zaika, head of the Ukrainian Construction Consortium. The potential financial conflicts here for a President Trump are enormous. Moreover, Trump's primary partner for his lucrative business in Canada, a well-respected Russo- Canadian billionaire named Alex Shnaider, is also a major investor in Russia and Ukraine, meaning American policies benefiting those countries could enrich an important business connection for the Trump Organization. The dealings of the Trump Organization reach into so many countries that it is impossible to detail all the conflicts they present in a single issue of this magazine, but a Newsweek examination of the company has also found deep connections in China, Brazil, Bulgaria, Argentina, Canada, France, Germany and other countries.

18. Lawmakers Probe Intelligence Officials on How the US Will Respond to a Cyberattack

Nextgov.com, Mohana Ravindranath, 2016 09 14

Washington - The federal government, including the Defense Department, needs a clearer plan about how to respond to attacks on civilian systems, members of the Senate Armed Services Committee argued Tuesday. Sen. John McCain, R.-Ariz., suggested drafting a policy about "what the United States' actions would be in the case of a threat, in the case of an actual attack," he said during a hearing on encryption and cybersecurity. "If you don't act, I guarantee you Congress will act," he said, addressing witnesses Adm. Mike Rogers, director of the National Security Agency, and Marcell Lettre, undersecretary of defense for intelligence. In response to McCain's suggestion, Lettre argued during the hearing that "new legal and regulatory approaches are not as potentially productive as robust" conversations between the public and private sectors. Lettre said the public and private sectors are often able to cooperate "if on the government side, we're able to communicate the problems we're trying to solve, and ask for industry's best expertise and wisdom about solutions."

19. Military experts say climate change poses 'significant risk' to security

The Guardian (London), Oliver Milman, 2016 09 14

New York - A coalition of 25 military and national security experts, including former advisers to Ronald Reagan and George W Bush, has warned that climate change poses a "significant risk to US national security and international security" that requires more attention from the US federal government. The prominent members of the US national security community warned that warming temperatures and rising seas will increasingly inundate military bases and fuel international conflict and mass migration, leading to "significant and direct risks to US military readiness, operations and strategy". In a report outlining climate risks, the group state: "The military has long had a tradition of parsing threats through a 'Survive to Operate' lens, meaning we cannot assume the best case scenario, but must prepare to be able to effectively operate even under attack. Dealing with climate risks to operational effectiveness must therefore be a core priority." Organized by the non-partisan Center for Climate and Security, the group includes Geoffrey Kemp, former national security adviser to Reagan, Dov Zakheim, former under secretary of defense under Bush, and retired general Gordon Sullivan, a former army chief of staff. Recommendations to the federal government include the creation of a cabinet- level official dedicated to climate change and security issues and the prioritization of climate change in intelligence assessments.

20. Obama to be urged to split cyberwar command from NSA

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 09 13

Washington - The Pentagon and intelligence community are expected to recommend soon to President Obama that he break up the joint leadership of the National Security Agency and U.S. Cyber Command to create two distinct forces for electronic espionage and cyberwarfare. The potential move is driven by a sense that the two missions are fundamentally different, that the nation's cyberspies and military hackers should not be competing to use the same networks and that the job of leading both organizations is too big for one person. Obama was on the verge of ending the "dual-hat" leadership in late 2013, but was persuaded to hold off when senior officials, including then-NSA Director Keith B. Alexander, argued against it on the grounds that the two organizations needed one leader to ensure that NSA did not withhold resources from CyberCom. Adm. Michael S. Rogers, currently the head of the NSA and CyberCom, last week told an audience at the Intelligence & National Security Summit that "I believe in the long run the right thing is to keep these two [organizations] aligned, but to separate them." But on Tuesday, Rogers clarified his remarks to suggest now was not the time. At a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the chairman, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz), noted Rogers earlier this year supported retaining the "dual-hat" relationship. "Is it still your professional advice" that such an arrangement is in CyberCom's best interests? McCain asked. "Yes," Rogers replied.

21. Pardon for former NSA contractor Snowden seen unlikely

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 14

Washington - The U.S. government will not budge on its demand that former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden return to face prosecution for stealing thousands of classified intelligence documents, despite new calls for President Barack Obama to pardon him, U.S. officials said on Tuesday. The officials said they expect Snowden's supporters to use the Thursday release of "Snowden" - directed by veteran filmmaker Oliver Stone - to mount a public campaign demanding a pardon before Obama leaves office in January. White House spokesman Josh Earnest said on Monday that Snowden is charged with "serious crimes, and it's the policy of the administration that Mr. Snowden should return to the United States and face those charges." Two other U.S. officials said there are no discussions inside the Justice Department about granting him a pardon.

22. Report: Obama Admin Provided Iranian Terror Orgs With $37.4 Million in Cash

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 09 14

Washington - Iran is estimated to have spent at least $37.4 million in recent U.S. cash payments to fund its global terrorism operation, including organizations responsible for the murder of U.S. citizens, according to new research provided to the Washington Free Beacon by analysts. The recent $1.7 billion cash payment to Iran--which is being described by many in Congress as a ransom payment to the Islamic Republic-- will be used in part to fund Iran's leading military organization, the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC), which is responsible for orchestrating terror attacks that have killed Americans. The new research comes amid a growing scandal over the Obama administration's decision to hand Iran billions in cash as part of an effort to secure the release of several U.S. hostages earlier this year. Leading lawmakers now suspect that the IRGC played a key role in assuming control of this cash, which the White House has admitted to putting directly in Iranian hands, the Free Beacon disclosed Monday evening.

23. Spy agencies concerned about possible U.S. election hacks: NSA chief

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 13

Washington - American intelligence agencies are concerned about reports that foreign governments may be attempting to undermine the Nov. 8 U.S. elections through cyber attacks, Admiral Mike Rogers, the director of the National Security Agency, said on Tuesday. "We continue to be actively concerned," Rogers told a Senate hearing, responding to a question from Senator John McCain, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Marcel Lettre, Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, testified that the government is taking any such activities "quite seriously" and said an "aggressive investigation" is under way. Rogers said he could not provide specifics about spy agencies' current assessment of the alleged hacking in a public setting. But he added, "I will say this, that it continues to be an issue of great focus ... for the foreign intelligence community, attempting to generate insights into what foreign nations are doing in this area." Under further questioning, Rogers declined to characterize the activity as by a foreign nation-state.

24. Syria Agreement Widens U.S. Rift

New York Times, Helene Cooper, David E. Sanger, 2016 09 14

Washington - The agreement that Secretary of State John Kerry announced with Russia to reduce the killing in Syria has widened an increasingly public divide between Mr. Kerry and Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter, who has deep reservations about the plan for American and Russian forces to jointly target terrorist groups. Mr. Carter was among the administration officials who pushed against the agreement on a conference call with the White House last week as Mr. Kerry, joining the argument from a secure facility in Geneva, grew increasingly frustrated. Although President Obama ultimately approved the effort after hours of debate, Pentagon officials remain unconvinced. On Tuesday at the Pentagon, officials would not even agree that if a cessation of violence in Syria held for seven days -- the initial part of the deal -- the Defense Department would put in place its part of the agreement on the eighth day: an extraordinary collaboration between the United States and Russia that calls for the American military to share information with Moscow on Islamic State targets in Syria. "I'm not saying yes or no," Lt. Gen. Jeffrey L. Harrigan, commander of the United States Air Forces Central Command, told reporters on a video conference call. "It would be premature to say that we're going to jump right into it." White House officials were also dubious. "I think we'd have some reasons to be skeptical that the Russians are able or are willing to implement the arrangement consistent with the way it's been described," Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary, said Monday at a briefing. He added, darkly, "But we'll see."

25. Turkey Asks U.S. To Arrest Cleric

Wall Street Journal, Margaret Coker, 2016 09 14

New York - Turkey requested that U.S. authorities detain the Turkish Muslim cleric living in self-imposed exile in Pennsylvania whom President Recep Tayyip Erdogan accuses of masterminding a failed coup that killed at least 271 people in July, according to the state Anadolu news agency. The request comes amid a complex and lengthy extradition process that Turkey is pursuing to have Fethullah Gulen, a onetime ally of the Turkish leader, stand trial in his homeland on charges including leading a terrorist organization, organizing a coup attempt and a variety of financial misdeeds. Mr. Gulen vigorously denies any wrongdoing and says the charges against him are part of a political vendetta that started after his supporters in Turkey's civil service and media in 2013 began investigating and publishing corruption allegations against politicians close to the president.

27. Cameron blamed for rise of Isis

London Times, Deborah Haynes, 2016 09 14

London - An "opportunistic" David Cameron led a botched intervention in Libya that caused the rise of Islamic State in north Africa, a parliamentary inquiry has concluded. The former prime minister was "ultimately responsible" for the failure of the 2011 bombing campaign, according to the foreign affairs committee. He relied on poor intelligence as he allowed an operation designed to protect civilians to "drift" into a campaign to remove Colonel Gaddafi, the report said. Its publication comes two days after Mr Cameron surprised Westminster by standing down as an MP. Britain and France led airstrikes on Libya after an uprising triggered by the Arab Spring. The threat of further violence by Gaddafi spurred western powers to take action but since then thousands of people have been killed and unrest continues to this day. The report into the conflict said that the chief of the defence staff at the time, General Lord Richards of Herstmonceux, "disassociated himself" from the government's claim that the operation was in the national interest. It accuses Mr Cameron of backing regime change without a coherent strategy for the country after the removal of Gaddafi. "By the summer of 2011, the limited intervention to protect civilians had drifted into an opportunist policy of regime change. That policy was not underpinned by a strategy to support and shape post-Gaddafi Libya," it said.

28. Edward Snowden makes 'moral' case for presidential pardon

The Guardian (London), Ewen MacAskill, 2016 09 13

London - Edward Snowden has set out the case for Barack Obama granting him a pardon before the US president leaves office in January, arguing that the disclosure of the scale of surveillance by US and British intelligence agencies was not only morally right but had left citizens better off. The US whistleblower's comments, made in an interview with the Guardian, came as supporters, including his US lawyer, stepped up a campaign for a presidential pardon. Snowden is wanted in the US, where he is accused of violating the Espionage Act and faces at least 30 years in jail. Speaking on Monday via a video link from Moscow, where he is in exile, Snowden said any evaluation of the consequences of his leak of tens of thousands of National Security Agency and GCHQ documents in 2013 would show clearly that people had benefited. "Yes, there are laws on the books that say one thing, but that is perhaps why the pardon power exists - for the exceptions, for the things that may seem unlawful in letters on a page but when we look at them morally, when we look at them ethically, when we look at the results, it seems these were necessary things, these were vital things," he said. "I think when people look at the calculations of benefit, it is clear that in the wake of 2013 the laws of our nation changed. The [US] Congress, the courts and the president all changed their policies as a result of these disclosures. At the same time there has never been any public evidence that any individual came to harm as a result." Snowden still wants to return to the US and seems confident, in spite of all the evidence to the contrary, that it will happen. "In the fullness of time, I think I will end up back home," he said. He is (not) impressed with the British prime minister, referring to Theresa May as a "a sort of Darth Vader in the United Kingdom", whose surveillance bill is "an egregious violation of human rights, that goes far further than any law proposed in the western world".

29. GCHQ blocks 58,000 scam emails from government addresses every day

London Daily Telegraph, Cara McGoogan, 2016 09 13

London - The UK's intelligence agency GCHQ has stepped up the fight against online scammers and created a tool that blocks malicious emails that appear to be sent from government addresses, but are in fact run by cyber criminals. The blocking system can identify when "gov.uk" emails are being sent from IP addresses not associated with an official government computer and block them. GCHQ has been testing the system on emails from the fake "taxrefund@gov.uk" address, which was sending 58,000 messages a day. "Whoever was sending 58,000 malicious emails per day from taxrefund@gov.uk isn't doing it anymore," said Ciaran Martin, the chief executive of the National Cyber Security Centre, which is launching in October.

30. Spymasters plan to build 'Great British Firewall'

Financial Times, Sam Jones, 2016 09 13

London - Ambitious new plans are being drawn up by GCHQ to create a "Great British Firewall" to block malicious websites countrywide and combat a doubling of serious cyber attacks threatening national security over the past year. Though still in its infancy, the scheme is intended to be a flagship project for the new National Cyber Security Centre -- a public-facing arm of GCHQ which will open next month to better co-ordinate the UK's digital defence efforts. The NCSC plan envisions private-sector internet service providers, such as BT, Sky or Virgin Media, voluntarily complying with its proposals, circumventing any need for legislation. Consumers will be able to opt out of the censorship should they wish in order to allay concerns over civil liberties. Malicious websites which automatically infect visitors' computers with malware -- often disguised as legitimate domains -- are one of the most common methods of cyber attack. They are widely used by states such as China, Iran or Russia in efforts to penetrate sensitive government networks, steal commercial information or compromise national infrastructure. They are also a common means for cyber criminals to target individuals.

31. UK judges to decide on Abu Hamza relative's deportation

The Guardian (London), Richard Ford, 2016 09 13

London - British judges will decide if the daughter in law of the Islamic cleric Abu Hamza should be deported on the basis of whether she is a "serious threat" to society, the European Court of Justice ruled today. The EU's most senior court said that the Moroccan woman, who is 32, should not be automatically expelled from the UK simply because of her criminal record for trying to smuggle a SIM card into Belmarsh top security prison where he was held. It said that Britain could expel her if her "personal conduct constitutes a genuine, present and sufficiently serious threat" that may affect the fundamental interests of society. Prison officers at Belmarsh in southeast London found a SIM card in the coin pocket of her jeans beneath her burka in 2010 as she arrived to visit Abu Hamza, a high risk Category A inmate. He had been convicted of inciting violence and was awaiting extradition to the US on terror charges. She had previously visited the hook-handed Islamist extremist behind bars and knew that SIM cards were banned in prisons.

32. Australia courts US, Canada after rejecting Chinese bids for Ausgrid-sources

Reuters, Jamie Freed, 2016 09 14

Sydney - North American bidders will not need an Australian partner to bid for Australian electricity distributor Ausgrid, an adviser on the potentially A$10 billion ($7.46 billion) deal said, after the government rejected sole offers from Chinese interests. Canadian funds such as Canada Pension Plan Investment Board and Borealis Infrastructure had this month been advised during a roadshow that they did not need Australian partners if they bid through a consortium, the source told Reuters. The adviser to the New South Wales state government, which is selling the asset, requested anonymity because he is not authorised to speak publicly. An investment banker representing interested parties said he also had heard from colleagues at the roadshow that no Australian partners were necessary for North American bidders acting through consortiums. "It was a surprise," he said, declining to be identified for reasons of client confidentiality. "Everyone's starting assumption was you needed to have domestic participation." Despite the guidance given on the North American roadshow, there was still significant uncertainty over what kinds of bids would be acceptable and whether the government would risk angering China by approving a majority foreign bid of any sort. Australia last month blocked Chinese state-owned State Grid and privately run Hong Kong firm Cheung Kong Infrastructure (CKI) from bidding for a 50.4 percent controlling stake in Ausgrid, citing national security concerns. State Grid and CKI are believed to have offered about A$13 billion for Ausgrid, the largest power network in the country. While China is Australia's biggest trading partner and a major investor, Canberra cooperates closely on intelligence matters with Canada and the United States. Canadian funds have participated in recent infrastructure deals in Australia including the sales of ports and rail group Asciano and transmission network operator Transgrid. University of Western Australia international relations Professor Mark Beeson said Australia ran the risk of upsetting China if it allowed 100 percent foreign ownership of the grid.

33. Australia to extend money laundering laws

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 09 14

Sydney - The Australian government is reviving long-stalled plans to extend anti-money laundering and counter-terrorist financing laws to capture lawyers, accountants, real estate agents and jewellers, Justice Minister Michael Keenan said. The law reforms have been repeatedly shelved since mid-2007 after opposition from some of the affected sectors - most notably the legal profession. The first tranche of the anti-money laundering laws were put in place a decade ago to compel banks, fund managers and casinos to report the source of their money flows, but the anticipated follow-up to cover other sectors did not eventuate. The Australian government is preparing to release proposals to the public for consultation. "The first step in this process will be the release of industry consultation papers by the Attorney General's Department, which is expected to happen before the end of the year," Keenan said in a statement.

34. Informant warned ASIO of planned Sydney terrorist attack

ABC (Australia), Jessica Kidd and Karl Hoerr, 2016 09 14

Sydney - Court documents have revealed Australia's spy agency ASIO was fed information about two Sydney men who were plotting to carry out a terrorist attack on behalf of Islamic State. Omar Al-Kutobi, 25, and Mohammad Kiad, 27, were under surveillance for about a month when they were arrested and charged with preparing to carry out a terrorist attack in February 2015. Court documents reveal an informant tipped off the Joint Counter-Terrorism Team (JCCT) to the plot on February 10 and said the attack was imminent. "The lions will depart to carry it out in a few hours," the JCCT was told. The JCCT is a multi-agency taskforce comprising New South Wales Police, the Australian Federal Police and ASIO. The same day, counter-terrorism police swarmed on the granny flat Al-Kutobi and Kiad shared in Fairfield and arrested the men. The pair was arrested just minutes after they had filmed a video in which Al-Kutobi can be seen speaking Arabic in front of a home made Islamic State flag. "I swear to God almighty, yellow people, there is no reproach between us," Al-Kutobi said in the video. "You will only get from us the stabbing of your kidneys." Officers also discovered a note which said "we are here to cut off your heads", along with home made napalm, a machete, a hunting knife and instructions and ingredients to make an improvised explosive device.

35. Jihadists predicted to return to Australia as IS loses ground in Iraq and Syria

ABC (Australia), Michael Edwards, 2016 09 14

Sydney - Security agencies are preparing for an onslaught of Australian jihadists returning from fighting with groups such as Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. A new said the number of jihadists seeking to return to Australia would rise after Islamic State suffered military defeats and lost territory from its self-declared caliphate. It is estimated as many as 100 Australians are fighting in Iraq and Syria and experts fear they could use the combat skills acquired there in terrorist operations back here. Airstrikes led by the US and Russia helped roll back the self-declared caliphate to a point where its two main cities -- Raqqa in Syria and Mosul in Iraq -- were under threat. The more ground it loses, the more its foreign fighters look to leave. "Some of them will be seeking to come back to Australia," Lowy Institute research fellow Rodger Shanahan said. "What their intent when they come back to Australia is, that's going to be another thing that's going to exercise the minds of the security agencies."

36. Terror teams seek data access to identify threats

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 09 14

Sydney - Counter-terrorism authorities could be given greater access to intelligence on criminals, local police reports, medical data and welfare information to better identify potential terrorists. The government is examining ways information that might help identify people with extremist tendencies could be cross-checked with other data bases to home in on potential terrorists. The work was announced by Malcolm Turnbull in July and spearheaded by then counter-terrorism co-ordinator Greg Moriarty, who since has become the Prime Minister's foreign policy adviser. Since then, work has focused on examining the personality and behavioural traits of terrorists or extremists with a view to identifying potential markers, The Australian has been told. Saturday's alleged terror attack, in which 22-year-old Ihsis Khan is charged with stabbing his neighbour, 59-year-old Wayne Greenhalgh, in a suburban street, has again highlighted the potential correlation between mental illness and extremism. Mr Khan is understood to have suffered from mental health problems, as have a string of known jihadists, among them Lindt cafe gunman Man Haron Monis, who was diagnosed by at least one psychiatrist as a probable schizophrenic. Mr Khan has never been investigated by the counter-terrorism squad. However, he is understood to have come to the attention of police at least twice.

39. Le nouvel ambassadeur de France se trompe sur toute la ligne

Espace Manager, Raouf Ben Rejeb, 2016 09 13

Tunis - Le nouvel ambassadeur de France à Tunis s'appelle Olivier Poivre d'Arvor. Tout ce qu'on sait de lui c'est que Tunis sera son premier poste à l'étranger. A part d'être le frère du plus célèbre présentateur de journal télévisé PPDA, il a passé toute sa carrière dans la culture. Ecrivain, homme de théâtre, conseiller littéraire dans plusieurs maisons d'édition, sa seule responsabilité majeure c'est d'avoir dirigé la radio France Culture dont il a été éjecté après cinq ans de bons et loyaux services. Parachuté au Quai d'Orsay grâce à Bernard Kouchner ministre des affaires étrangères sous Sarkozy, il a été pressenti pour diriger l'ambassade de France à Athènes puis à Bucarest mais il n'a jamais rejoint ni l'une ni l'autre capitale à ce titre. Le seul titre d'ambassadeur, celui de l'attractivité culturelle il l'a obtenu de Laurent Fabius, l'ex-ministre des affaires étrangères. Est-ce le bon profil pour diriger l'ambassade de France à Tunis. Beaucoup en ont douté. Ses premières déclarations leur donnent malheureusement raison. En effet, interrogé sur ses priorités à Tunis par la radio RTL, Olivier Poivre d'Arvor a eu cette déclaration tout à fait surprenante. Selon lui, sa « mission principale », « c'est d'assurer la sécurité des Français qui se trouvent en Tunisie. «Il y a 30.000 ressortissants, presque 15.000 jeunes dans des lycées français. Ce sont des cibles. Il faut pouvoir les protéger, notamment dans les pays comme la Tunisie dont on sait qu'ils sont fournisseurs de jihadistes». S'il vient en Tunisie rien que pour ça, il se trompe sur toute la ligne. Car en Tunisie ce sont l'armée et les forces de sécurité tunisiennes qui assurent la sécurité et la protection des Tunisiens et des ressortissants étrangers. Peut-être se croit-il dans quelque territoire qui compte sur les étrangers, les Français en l'occurrence pour assurer sa sécurité.

40. Argentina's Macri Expresses 'Disgust' With Venezuelan Government

Bloomberg News, Andrew Rosati, Erik Schatzer, 2016 09 13

Buenos Aires - Argentine President Mauricio Macri expressed his "disgust" with Venezuela's human rights record, adding to increasing criticism President Nicolas Maduro has received from once close regional allies. In an interview with Bloomberg News, Macri faulted his Venezuelan counterpart's refusal to let plans for a recall referendum against his rule to move forward expeditiously, indicating that the political gridlock is only furthering the ongoing crisis in the country. "The process is killing Venezuelans every day," Macri said on the sidelines of a business forum in Buenos Aires. "I'm going to every international forum to say, we cannot accept, we cannot look to the other side, we have to denounce what is going on." The Argentine premier's comments follow harsh rebukes from Brazil and Chile over what they say is a lack of due process in the country.

41. Allies seek new sanctions on NK

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 09 14

Seoul - South Korea and the US on Tuesday said they agreed to push for stronger economic sanctions and other measures to pressure North Korea, indicating that Pyongyang's provocative actions will have "serious consequences." "The two countries will retain our deterrence (against the North) and work with the international society for more powerful and effective sanctions, to create an environment where (North Korea) will have no choice but to change," said South Korea's top nuclear envoy Kim Hong-kyun after talks with his US counterpart Sung Kim. The meeting followed last Friday's nuclear test by the communist country, which was followed by the UN Security Council's condemnation and a pledge to begin weaving a new set of resolutions to punish Pyongyang. Prior to talks with Kim, the US special representative contacted Tokyo and Beijing to talk to his counterparts Kenji Kanasugi and Wu Dawei. He was slated to speak with Russia's deputy foreign minister Igor V. Morgulov on Tuesday afternoon. Sung Kim stated that the leaders of South Korea, the US and Japan have reached a consensus that the North Korean actions required a strong multilateral response at the UN. "We are, of course, working closely with UNSC, our six-party partners, and the broader international community to ensure full implementation of the UNSC resolution 2270 and other existing resolutions. And to take additional steps including new sanctions to demonstrate to North Korea that there are indeed serious consequences to its unlawful and dangerous actions," he said.

42. Envoys Vow to Pursue North Korean Penalties

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 09 14

Seoul - The United States and South Korea vowed on Tuesday to push for the "strongest possible" resolution at the United Nations Security Council, including new sanctions and the removal of existing loopholes, to punish North Korea for its latest nuclear test. The top American and South Korean envoys on North Korea expressed their resolve during a news conference in Seoul, the South's capital, on Tuesday, speaking shortly after two nuclear-capable supersonic bombers from the United States Air Force base in Guam streaked over the South in a show of force. The flight by the B-1B bombers demonstrated the United States' commitment to providing "extended deterrence," including the threat of using nuclear weapons, to protect the South, said Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, the top American military commander in the country. It was also intended to help counter calls among nationalist politicians and scholars here who contend that the South must arm itself with nuclear weapons. On Tuesday, Sung Kim, Washington's top official dealing with North Korea, and his South Korean counterpart, Kim Hong-kyun, reiterated that the South did not need to build its own nuclear bombs or to reintroduce American tactical atomic bombs that were withdrawn in the early 1990s. Their intention was "to secure the strongest possible resolution that includes new sanctions as quickly as possible," Sung Kim said, declining to elaborate on how China, the North's main ally on the Security Council, would respond. "The situation requires a swift and strong international response."

43. Indonesia to start joint maritime patrols this year

Jakarta Post, Marguerite Afra Sapiie, 2016 09 14

Jakarta - Indonesia plans to start implementing coordinated patrols with the Philippines and Malaysia this year as part of efforts to step up maritime defense in regional waters amid the risks of piracy and hostage-taking. The Indonesian Navy is currently drafting the routes for the joint patrols, which would stretch to the piracy-prone waters of the Sulu Sea, to realize the trilateral maritime agreement signed by the three countries in August. Defense Minister Ryamizard Ryacudu said on Tuesday. "I believe we can start the coordinated patrols this year. I will meet the Malaysian defense minister in the near future [to further discuss the plan]," Ryamizard told journalists. Aside from drafting the coordinated patrols routes, the Navy is also mulling the safest routes for commercial ships to use in the area, especially those traveling back and forth among the three countries. Safe routes are important in order to prevent any hijacking and hostage-taking taking place again in the future, he added.

44. PM Hasina calls for combined efforts to battle militancy (Canada).

BDNews24, Senior Correspondent, 2016 09 14

Dhaka - Greeting all Bangladeshis in and outside the country on Eid-ul-Azha, Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina has urged all to come together and raise their voices to fight militancy and terrorism. She said on Tuesday, "It is not just our (Bangladesh's) issue. Extremism and militancy are massive problems for the entire world. And we have to do whatever we can from our own positions to combat them." Security was tight across the country during the main prayers on the Muslim festival. A terror attack on a police check-post near Kishoreganj's Sholakia Eidgah ground on the day of Eid-ul-Fitr in July made law enforcers take no chances this time. The prime minister is scheduled to leave on Wednesday for New York on a 12-day visit abroad. "I'm leaving tomorrow for the UN General Assembly. I also have a programme in Canada. Then I will go to New York."

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 14

Seoul - The top diplomats of South Korea, the United States and Japan will hold a meeting early next week in New York to discuss countermeasures against North Korea's recent nuclear test, the foreign ministry in Seoul said Wednesday. The trilateral meeting will be held among South Korean Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Japanese Foreign Minister Fumio Kishida. They will meet Sunday (local time) on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly session. "During the upcoming meeting to be held amid unprecedentedly grave security situations, they are expected to mostly discuss comprehensive and strong measures against the North," the ministry said in a press release. They will also include additional sanctions both by the U.N. Security Council and main allies, the ministry added. The foreign ministers' meeting comes after the North conducted its fifth nuclear test

Friday in defiance of stepped-up warnings by the international community to halt its military provocations.

46. U.S. has no right to lecture China over North Korea: People's Daily

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 09 14

Beijing - The United States is a troublemaker and has no right to lecture China about taking responsibility for reining in North Korea as tensions on the peninsula are a direct result of U.S. actions, the official People's Daily newspaper said on Wednesday. While China has been angered by North Korea's fifth and largest nuclear test to date last week, it has also blamed the United States for taking what Beijing sees as equally provocative behavior, like a decision to base the Terminal High Altitude Area Defence (THAAD) anti-missile in South Korea. China is North Korea's most important diplomatic and trade partner, and while China has signed up for tough United Nations sanctions on the isolated state, it refuses to cut the country off completely, fearing it may collapse. The United States says it wants China to do more, with U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter last week singling out the role he said China should play. In a commentary, the ruling Communist Party's official paper said the United States was pretending it had nothing to do with the North Korea issue and was putting the blame on others. "People have reason to doubt whether Washington is willing to make the effort to push the North Korea issue in the direction of a resolution," the paper said.

48. Iranian DM Warns against Terrorists' Abuse of Ceasefire to Reenergize

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 14

Tehran - Iranian Defense Minister Brigadier General Hossein Dehqan warned that the ceasefire in Syria should not result in giving a chance to the terrorist groups to revitalize and reinforce themselves. "The ceasefire in Syria should not be in such a way as to enable the sponsors of terrorism to help the terrorist groups get equipped and reorganized," General Dehqan told reporters. The Iranian Defense Minister reiterated that there are concerns that the terrorists take the chance under the ceasefire to supply weapons and reinforce to once again resume their savage operations. He, however, said that the ceasefire should take effect to help the besieged civilians to receive relief aids and find a political solution to the Syrian crisis. Earlier on Tuesday, terrorists violated the temporary nationwide ceasefire brokered by Russia and the US after they launched mortar attacks on government positions in the Northern districts of Aleppo city.

Le procès, qui s'est déroulé le 14 août, n'aurait duré que trois heures, sans chef d'inculpation. «Cinq ans, c'est ridicule, s'est emportée Nazanin au téléphone. Pour quelle raison? On va faire appel, mais combien de temps ça va prendre? Des mois?» Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, 37 ans, travaille pour la Fondation Thomson-Reuters, organe caritatif de l'agence de presse du même nom, qui n'est pas active en Iran - Mme Ratcliffe n'a pas d'activités professionnelles dans son pays natal, précise son mari. 51. Israel's new spy satellite 'not functioning' as expected

Jerusalem - The Ofek-11 reconnaissance satellite launched by Israel on Tuesday evening may be malfunctioning, officials involved in the project said a few hours after launch, though they said they have been able to make contact with the craft. The Israel Aerospace Industries satellite was successfully put into orbit using a Shavit rocket, a locally produced space launch vehicle, the head of the Defense Ministry's Space Department, Amnon Harari, told reporters. However, in the hours after the launch, it was "not clear that everything was in order," he said. Due to the rotation of the Earth, the teams on the ground are only able to make contact with the satellite "once every few hours," something that makes the work of the engineering teams "sevenfold more difficult," said Doron Ofer, CEO of the Israel Aerospace Industries' Space Division.

52. Syria truce largely holds, aid preparations underway

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 09 14

Beirut - A new cease-fire in Syria brought a full day with no combat deaths in the war between President Bashar Assad and his opponents, a monitoring body said, and efforts to deliver aid to besieged areas got cautiously underway. Twenty-four hours after the cease-fire took effect, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said on Tuesday that it had received not a single report of combatants or civilians killed by fighting in any areas covered by the truce. The cease-fire, brokered by the United States and Russia, is supported by countries that back Assad and his opponents, and marks the second attempt this year to halt a war that has so far made a mockery of all peace efforts since fighting began more than five years ago. It also marks the biggest bet yet by the administration of U.S. President Barack Obama that it can work with Russia to end a war that President Vladimir Putin transformed a year ago when he sent warplanes to join the fight on Assad's side.

53. Tarras Says General Security Wrongfully Accused Him of 'Meeting IS Members in Turkey'

Naharnet Newsdesk, 2016 09 14

Beirut - General Security interrogators accused Muslim cleric Sheikh Bassam al-Tarras of meeting Islamic State members during his latest visit to Turkey, media reports said on Tuesday. "Tarras says the interrogators questioned him about his visit to Turkey and accused him of meeting IS members in the hotel in a bid to frame him," the Kuwaiti al-Anbaa newspaper reported. The pan-Arab daily al-Hayat meanwhile said the cleric was arrested "after his number was found on the cellphones of some members of the cell that was apprehended by the General Security on charges of carrying out the Ksara bombing." "During interrogation, the detainees said they were attending the cleric's religious lectures," al-Hayat added. Later on Tuesday, state-run National News Agency said Tarras was released after State Commissioner to the Military Court Judge Hani Helmi al-Hajjar questioned him and verified that he did not confess to having any ties to the bombing.

54. Washington: ISIS Spokesman Confirmed Killed in U.S. Airstrike

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 09 14

Washington - The Pentagon has confirmed that a U.S. air strike killed ISIS leader and spokesman Abu Mohammed al-Adnani in northern Syria end of August. "The strike near Al Bab, Syria, removes from the battlefield ISIS's chief propagandist, recruiter and architect of external terrorist operations," Pentagon press secretary Peter Cook said earlier this week. "It is one in a series of successful strikes against ISIS leaders, including those responsible for finances and military planning, that make it harder for the group to operate." The air strike was conducted by a Predator drone, which fired a Hellfire missile at the car Adnani was traveling in. The United States had said on Aug. 30 that Adnani had been targeted in a strike, but it stopped short of confirming his death. Soon after the strike against Adnani, the Russian defense ministry said it was responsible for his death, a claim Pentagon officials dismissed as a "joke." (Full Report).

55. « Plus de 700 djihadistes sont déjà de retour en Tunisie »

Tribune de Genève, Schneider, 2016 09 14

Berne -En Tunisie, une association se fait le porte-voix de plus de 250 familles touchées par le départ d'un enfant en Syrie ou en Irak A mesure que les défaites s'enchaînent pour le groupe Etat islamique en Syrie et en Irak, la crainte de voir revenir des djihadistes dans leur pays d'origine augmente. Comme en Tunisie, plus grand exportateur de combattants avec 6000 individus sur les 30 000 étrangers estimés l'an passé par l'ONU. La prison ne peut être la seule solution pour eux, alerte une association tunisienne, Rescue Association of Tunisians Trapped Abroad (RATTA). Son président, Mohamed Iqbal Ben Rejeb, simple commerçant, l'a créée en 2013, après avoir réussi à convaincre son frère, handicapé, de rentrer de Syrie au bout d'une semaine. Interview. Comment expliquez-vous le grand nombre de départs de Tunisiens en Syrie et en Irak? Des politiciens et imams tunisiens ont incité des jeunes à aller combattre Bachar el-Assad. Les départs massifs de Tunisie ont eu lieu entre la fin de 2012 et le début de 2014. Ces jeunes sont devenus des combattants, des tueurs ou de simples employés de Daech. Comment la Tunisie fait-elle face aux retours de djihadistes? Plus de 700 personnes sont déjà revenues des zones de conflit entre 2013 et 2015, mais le gouvernement ne veut plus livrer de statistiques officielles. Les retours, c'est notre grande crainte. Les auteurs des attentats du Bardo et de Sousse se sont entraînés en Libye. Quand des personnes embrigadées et préparées au combat reviennent ici, elles représentent des bombes à retardement. Surtout en Tunisie, où il n'y a pas de procédure de déradicalisation.

Schleswig-Holstein, Allemagne - Les terroristes présumés s'étaient mêlés aux réfugiés. Mardi matin, dans la région du Schleswig-Holstein, trois individus, soupçonnés d'appartenir à Daech, ont été interpellés au terme d'une vaste opération de police mobilisant 200 personnes. Pour atteindre l'Allemagne, les suspects ont suivi la même route que certains terroristes qui ont frappé Paris l'an dernier : la route des Balkans. Ils ont même bénéficié « de la même organisation de passeurs », a souligné le ministre de l'Intérieur Thomas de Maizière. « Leurs documents de voyage proviennent du même atelier. » Les trois jeunes hommes, qui se présentent comme syriens, ont été déférés devant un juge. Ils « sont soupçonnés d'être venus en Allemagne sur ordre de Daech pour soit exécuter une mission, soit se tenir prêts en vue d'instructions », a expliqué le parquet fédéral. Thomas de Maizière a précisé qu'« à ce stade de l'enquête », aucune indication d'un attentat en préparation n'avait été retrouvée. Mahir al-H., 17 ans, Ibrahim M., 18 ans, et Mohammed A., 26 ans, constitueraient « une cellule dormante ». Le plus jeune aurait été formé à Raqqa au maniement d'explosifs.

57. Erdogan says there is still a 'long way to go' in anti-Gülen fight

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 09 13

Istanbul - The government has covered significant ground in the fight against the Fethullahist Terror Organization (FETÖ) but there is still a long way to go, President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has said, vowing further measures against the organization, which is blamed for Turkey's failed coup attempt of July 15. "We must make this so-called FETÖ terror organization unable to betray our nation again, along with all of its elements. We are waging this struggle in all our institutions. We have covered significant ground so far but there is still a lot of ground to cover," Erdogan said during an Eid al-Adha holiday ceremony in Istanbul on Sept. 13. The president also claimed that the attempted takeover was not the end of what he called a "great plot," but only one phase. "Those who participated in the coup attempt are certainly members of the FETÖ terror organization. But we know that there is a greater plot. July 15 was not the finale of this plot; it was just a phase of it," Erdogan said, suggesting that this "plot" extended to other Muslim countries around the world.

58. La France a été la cible d'une vingtaine de cyberattaques majeures en 2015

La Tribune (France), Michel Chabriol, 2016 09 14

Paris - Le directeur général de l'ANSSI Guillaume Poupard a indiqué que la vingtaine d'attaques informatiques majeures lancées en 2015 contre la France a principalement concerné des entreprises. Soit clairement de l'espionnage économique. Cela fait évidemment froid dans le dos même si, in fine, ce n'est guère surprenant. "Il faut savoir que la France a connu, en 2015, une vingtaine d'attaques majeures informatiques", a révélé le directeur général de l'Agence nationale de la sécurité des systèmes d'information (ANSSI), Guillaume Poupard, dans le cadre du premier rapport d'activité de l'Agence publié mardi depuis sa création en 2009. Interrogé sur les révélations du "Monde" sur un piratage américain de l'Élysée en 2012, il a répondu lundi lors d'un point presse portant sur le bilan de l'activité de l'ANSSI en 2015, qu'il ne confirmait pas ces informations. Dans un contexte croissant d'attaques informatiques, le secrétaire général de la défense et la sécurité nationale (SGDSN), Louis Gautier, auquel l'ANSSI est rattachée, a pour sa part assuré lundi que "les mois qui viennent vont être marqués par la continuité des nos actions". Notamment dans le domaine de la prévention. "On n'est pas sur un effet de mode", a d'ailleurs expliqué le patron de l'ANSSI, qui a rappelé que dans ce domaine la France n'avait "pas d'amis mais des alliés".

La justice reproche à cet Angevin de 26 ans d'avoir violé son assignation à résidence. 60. Le poste très stratégique du " dernier " commissaire européen britannique

Le Monde, Cécile Ducourtieux, 2016 09 14

Strasbourg - En attendant le Brexit, l'ex-ambassadeur du Royaume-Uni en France, Julian King, sera chargé des questions de sécurité. Si l'on m'avait dit, il y a quelques mois encore, que je serais présent ici parmi vous, je ne l'aurais probablement pas cru. La situation est tout à fait singulière. " C'est par ces mots que Julian King, le probable futur commissaire britannique, a entamé son audition au Parlement de Strasbourg, lundi 12 septembre. Singulière, la situation l'est certainement : quand les Britanniques ont voté pour le Brexit, et que " leur " commissaire de l'époque, Jonathan Hill, a démissionné dans la foulée, son portefeuille - les services financiers - a été confié au Letton Valdis Dombrovskis, et personne à Bruxelles ne pensait qu'il serait remplacé. Au début de l'été, les dirigeants européens espéraient en effet que David Cameron, le premier ministre d'alors, activerait sans attendre la procédure de divorce officielle d'avec l'Union. Mais Londres a décidé de jouer la montre et de faire valoir ses droits à un nouveau commissaire - c'est tout à fait légitime, tant que le pays est membre de l'Union. Et, très symptomatique de la " drôle de guerre " dans laquelle est entrée l'Europe depuis qu'elle a compris que la sortie du Royaume-Uni traînerait probablement en longueur : M. King n'a pas hérité d'un portefeuille insignifiant, ridicule ou humiliant. Certains avaient évoqué pour lui, brièvement, le rôle de gestionnaire en chef des bâtiments de la Commission... Mais, à 52 ans, ce diplomate de carrière, pur produit du Foreign Office, s'est vu attribuer un tout nouveau maroquin, sur un sujet stratégique : la sécurité. Le poste a été créé sur mesure pour celui qui était encore, au début de l'été, ambassadeur du Royaume-Uni en France. Il faut dire que le curriculum vitae de ce parfait francophile, passé par l'École nationale d'administration, est riche. Il collectionne les passages à Bruxelles (il y fut notamment directeur de cabinet des commissaires Peter Mandelson au commerce, puis de Catherine Ashton à la diplomatie), fut en poste comme ambassadeur britannique en Irlande, puis secrétaire d'État pour l'Irlande du Nord. " L'intérêt général " Comme il l'a rappelé lundi soir, à Strasbourg, M. King devra, dans ses nouvelles fonctions, travailler avec plusieurs commissaires, et sans administration sous ses ordres. Et surtout, s'occuper d'un dossier qui relève encore essentiellement de la compétence des États membres. Sans compter qu'il existe déjà un " M. Sécurité " à Bruxelles, le Belge Gilles de Kerchove, " coordinateur de l'UE pour la lutte contre le terrorisme " auprès du Conseil européen... La mission est-elle périlleuse, voire impossible? " M. King a l'intention d'être un commissaire à 100 % ", d'aider, à Bruxelles, à faire avancer des sujets éclatés entre plusieurs agences et directions générales, assure-t-on dans son entourage. Parmi ses priorités, renforcer les moyens financiers et humains d'Europol (l'agence des polices européennes) ou s'assurer que les décisions prises en matière de sécurité sont appliquées.

61. Résistances islamiques au Renseignement

Le Temps (Suisse), Valérie de Graffenried, 2016 09 14

Berne - Sécurité Nicolas Blancho et son Conseil central islamique suisse s'opposent à la loi sur le renseignement. Le conseiller fédéral Guy Parmelin s'en est étonné. Le propre service d'analyse et de prévention du CCIS a été très peu sollicité « Dans cette campagne, je suis étonné de l'opposition du Conseil central islamique suisse. Je constate que l'organisation de Nicolas Blancho combat cette loi et c'est un signal plutôt inquiétant. » Cette petite phrase, le conseiller fédéral Guy Parmelin l'a récemment lâchée dans Le Matin Dimanche, à propos de la loi sur le renseignement (LRens), soumise en votation le 25 septembre. Avant d'ajouter: « Je ne vais pas aller jusqu'à dire que son organisation a quelque chose à se reprocher, car ce n'est certainement pas le cas. Mais cette campagne était aussi l'occasion pour certains milieux de prouver qu'ils condamnent le terrorisme et les risques de dérives en la matière. » Entrer dans les mosquées Nicolas Blancho et ses camarades combattent effectivement la LRens. Parce qu'ils se sentent dans le viseur du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC)? Cette loi permettra aux collaborateurs du SRC de procéder à des écoutes téléphoniques, d'infiltrer des ordinateurs grâce à des mouchards, de poser des caméras dans des appartements privés ou encore de pénétrer des mosquées. C'est ce dernier point qui inquiète le plus le CCIS.

62. Rétenion de tous les fichés "S": "une absurdité", selon Cazeneuve

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 14

Paris - Le ministre de l'Intérieur Bernard Cazeneuve a qualifié mercredi d'"absurdité" la proposition faite par certains à droite, comme Nicolas Sarkozy, de placer en centre de rétention tous les fichés "S" au nom de la lutte antiterroriste. "A partir du moment où vous dites à ceux qui sont surveillés qu'ils le sont, ils se dissimulent", a-t-il expliqué sur France Inter. Les fameuses fiches "S" (pour sûreté de l'Etat) signalent notamment les personnes considérées comme liées à la mouvance islamiste radicale et sont destinées à attirer l'attention des forces de sécurité si l'un des fichés est contrôlé ou interpellé. Celui qui fait l'objet d'une fiche "S" n'en est pas informé. "En terme d'efficacité de la lutte antiterroriste, c'est une absurdité. En termes de principe, prétendre que l'on puisse procéder à la mise en rétention ou en détention d'une personne sans qu'un juge judiciaire n'intervienne, c'est la fin des principes républicains, donc c'est contraire aux principes constitutionnels, c'est contraire à tous les principes de droit et c'est inefficace", a poursuivi M. Cazeneuve.

63. Terrorisme: arrestation à Paris d'un mineur qui "s'était proposé pour une action"

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 14

Paris - Un adolescent "qui s'était proposé pour une action terroriste" a été arrêté mercredi à Paris et placé en garde à vue, a appris l'AFP de sources proches de l'enquête. Né en septembre 2001, le suspect, arrêté dans le XXe arrondissement dans le nord-est de la capitale, était "en lien avec le jihadiste français Rachid Kassim", déjà au coeur de plusieurs enquêtes dont celle sur un commando de femmes démantelé la semaine dernière. Samedi, un autre adolescent, âgé de 15 ans, également en lien avec ce jihadiste et soupçonné de pouvoir "passer à l'acte", avait été arrêté à Paris. Une perquisition était en cours mercredi matin au domicile du mineur arrêté quelques heures plus tôt, les enquêteurs de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) cherchant à établir ses intentions. Au centre des investigations: Rachid Kassim, un propagandiste virulent du groupe jihadiste Etat islamique (EI) qui, depuis la zone syro-irakienne et via la messagerie cryptée Telegram, appelle à commettre des attentats en France. Interrogé à l'issue du conseil des ministres, Bernard Cazeneuve a confirmé cette arrestation, soulignant le travail "extrêmement dense" des services de renseignement destiné "à identifier ceux qui sont susceptibles de passer à l'acte". "Un travail continu qui nous mobilise nuit et jour", a ajouté le ministre de l'Intérieur.

64. Vendeurs appelés à scanner les terroristes

Le Soir (Belgique), Ludivine Ponciau, 2016 09 14

Bruxelles - Terrorisme Une disposition oblige dorénavant les commerçants à signaler les clients suspects La Belgique veut encadrer la vente de produits pouvant servir à la fabrication d'explosifs. Une incitation à la délation sur la base de critères peu précis. A partir du 19 septembre prochain, toute personne ayant eu connaissance de vols, de disparitions ou de transactions suspectes de « précurseurs d'explosifs » est tenue, en vertu d'une loi portant exécution d'une norme européenne, de le signaler auprès de la police fédérale. Certaines substances chimiques, le nitrate d'ammonium et le perchlorate de potassium, par exemple, peuvent en effet servir à la fabrication de charges explosives telles que celles utilisées lors des attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles. En novembre dernier, ce sont trois kamikazes qui se sont fait exploser au stade de France en actionnant leurs ceintures. Quatre mois plus tard, à Zaventem et dans le métro bruxellois, pas une seule arme à feu n'a été utilisée, mais bien trois sacs à dos ou de voyage bourrés d'explosifs. Les terroristes avaient non seulement acquis la capacité technique de fabriquer du TATP, mais ils étaient également parvenus à réunir une importante quantité de précurseurs d'explosifs sans éveiller le moindre soupçon. Et si l'accès à ces substances chimiques avait été rendu plus difficile ?

1. Canada goes extra mile to secure Kevin Garratt's release from China
Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe & Laura Stone, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - The sudden release of a Canadian held for two years in China on suspicion of spying comes after a high-stakes campaign to secure his freedom, including an unusual and unannounced visit four months ago by the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, who met with Chinese officials to try to persuade them that Kevin Garratt wasn't a spy. On Thursday, a bearded Mr. Garratt landed in Vancouver and embraced his family, a free man. He had been accused by Chinese authorities of stealing military and defence research secrets and charged with espionage. His release puts a sudden end to a major irritant between Canada and China less than a week before Premier Li Keqiang arrives in Ottawa for an official visit, and caps an extraordinary effort by the government of Canada, its embassy in Beijing and two prime ministers to push for Mr. Garratt's release. The visit to China by CSIS director Michel Coulombe, Canada's top spy, was one element of that effort, according to multiple sources with knowledge of the meeting. When Mr. Garratt was indicted in January, China's state media said investigators had found evidence he had accepted tasks to gather intelligence for Canada. Mr. Coulombe met with Geng Huichang, the minister in charge of China's powerful state security apparatus, to deliver the message in person that Mr. Garratt, a Pentecostal pastor, did not work for CSIS. The Canadian had first come to China in 1984 and had taught English, operated a kindergarten, sold coffee and conducted humanitarian work in North Korea. He was a missionary, not a spy.

2. Conservatives Double Down On Divisive Policies Canadians Rejected

The Huffington Post Canada, Michel Picard, 2016 09 16

Opinion: The Conservatives lost the election last year because they fell out of touch. This week Conservative MP Tony Clement unveiled a plan that proved just how out of touch his party still is on national security. They still don't get it: Canadians expect their government to protect not only their security, but also their rights. While our government is focused on working hard to grow the economy for middle class Canadians, Mr. Clement has other ideas. Instead of seeking to inspire Canadians with ideas on how to make Canada better, he seeks to prey on ignorance and fear. He put out a plan that is unworkable, unconstitutional and will not make Canadians any safer. His most egregious proposal is to lock Canadians behind bars for crimes they have not committed. That would make a mockery of our rights and of the very idea of justice -- the same values he purports to defend. The previous government criminalized the promotion of terrorism in terms so broad that some thought it made Conservative campaign ads featuring Daesh videos illegal. Now Mr. Clement is proposing to double down on that misguided approach. He tries to whip up fear of immigration by proposing "enhanced screening." Yet Canada already has a robust, multi-layered approach designed by CSIS, the RCMP and our other security agencies.(Note: Parliamentary Secretary for Public Safety)

3. Darkrace Un système immunitaire contre les cybermenaces

La Presse+, Karim Benessaieh, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - Chaque jour au Canada, 1600 attaques de rançongiciels auraient lieu. Mots de passe et dossiers confidentiels volés font régulièrement l'actualité, stimulant la recherche de nouvelles approches pour assurer la sécurité des réseaux. L'une d'elles, conçue à l'Université de Cambridge et imitant le système immunitaire humain à partir des mathématiques probabilistes, semble prometteuse. Elle est proposée depuis 2013 par l'entreprise britannique Darktrace, qui a ouvert en avril dernier son bureau canadien, dirigé par l'ex-agent des services secrets David Masson. Entrevue. Q D'abord, pourriez-vous vous présenter ? R J'ai été membre du service de renseignement britannique, le MI5, pendant plus de 20 ans, puis j'ai travaillé au sein du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) pendant quatre ans. Je m'occupais de cybersécurité et de sécurité nationale en général. Je me suis ensuite joint à la compagnie Darktrace en janvier de cette année, après une invitation à établir un bureau ici, au Canada. Q Expliquez-nous l'approche de type « système immunitaire » au coeur de la technologie proposée par Darktrace. R J'aimerais utiliser une métaphore. On a pris le modèle du système immunitaire humain. La première protection, c'est ma peau. Pour un réseau, c'est le pare-feu. Mais ce n'est pas assez, j'ai besoin d'un système immunitaire à l'intérieur qui a une compréhension innée de mon corps. Au moment où quelque chose traverse la peau, mon système immunitaire sait immédiatement que ce virus ou cette bactérie ne fait pas partie de moi. Q Comment votre « système immunitaire pour entreprises » reconnaît-il les anomalies ? R Il n'a pas besoin d'une formation, n'a pas besoin de recevoir des indications, il est sans cesse à l'écoute. Il comprend le comportement normal des utilisateurs et peut repérer ce qui ne fait pas partie du fonctionnement habituel du réseau. Il apprend par lui-même, sans intervention humaine. C'est nécessaire parce que les réseaux ne sont pas statiques, ils se développent sans cesse, ont des visiteurs, de nouveaux membres. Un humain ne pourrait pas gérer toute cette information. Un ordinateur, lui, le peut.

4. Les conservateurs ne comprennent toujours pas : pour les Canadiens, la sécurité et les droits

Le Huffington Post (Québec), Michel Picard, 2016 09 15

Blogue - Les conservateurs ne comprennent toujours pas: pour les Canadiens, la sécurité et les droits sont importants. Les conservateurs ont perdu l'élection de l'an dernier parce qu'ils étaient déconnectés. Cette semaine, le député conservateur Tony Clement a dévoilé un plan qui prouve à quel point son parti est encore déconnecté en matière de sécurité nationale. Le blogueur Michel Picard explique: Nous allons tenir les engagements que nous avons pris auprès des Canadiens, en garantissant que tous les mandats du SCRS sont conformes à la Charte des droits et libertés; en protégeant le droit des Canadiens de participer à des manifestations et à activités militantes légitimes; en soutenant plus solidement les gens dont le nom se trouve par erreur sur les listes de sécurité du transport aérien; en réduisant la portée des définitions trop générales de la loi en matière de sécurité; et en exigeant un examen législatif des changements apportés à la Loi antiterroriste après trois ans.

5. Public should be concerned about radicalization of youth, Manitoba expert says

CBC.CA, Riley Laychuk, 2016 09 16

A Manitoba expert on defence and security says the public should be concerned about the radicalization of youth online by groups like Islamic State, but they shouldn't panic. Jim Fergusson, head of the University of Manitoba's Centre for Defence and Security Studies, made the comments in response to news this week that a western Manitoba teenager has pleaded guilty to a terrorism-related charge for supporting ISIS online. "We should be concerned. Parents, communities, teachers, et cetera, should have some basic knowledge of how to identify ... the warning signs, if you will, of someone becoming radicalized," Fergusson told CBC News on Wednesday. "A lot of times, nothing happens and it just gets worse and worse." The boy's arrest last November occurred just months after another Manitoban, Aaron Driver, was arrested and questioned about his online support of ISIS. Fergusson said the two arrests aren't surprising. Neither is the fact that both arrests involved young men who are considered attractive recruits for groups like ISIS, he added. He said groups generally seek "youth who tend to be ... vulnerable to being influenced by this type of very simple message with idealist principles" and those "who don't have a great deal of experience [or] a great deal of responsibilities." Fergusson believes the radicalization attempts make some youth feel like they belong and have a purpose. However, as Manitoba deals with two high-profile cases, Fergusson said he believes the radicalization "fad" may be fizzling out. "Once ISIS is completely eliminated and other issues emerge on the international agenda ... this will start to fade and it will be taken over by other things," he said. Fergusson said he expects more people may be on the watch lists of groups like CSIS, but he doesn't expect a surge of arrests in the near future.

6. Real Secret Agents on New 'Call a Spy' Hotline Answer Your Burning Questions

Sputnik Deutschland, Staff report, 2016 09 16

Berlin - If you ever wanted to chat to a spy, now's your chance - a group of German artists have set up the "Call a Spy" hotline. Ariel Fischer from the art group "Peng!" told Sputnik Deutschland that they can set up the hotline anywhere with a stable internet connection. It looks like an ordinary telephone, but is connected to the "Call a Spy" server. The server contains a database of spy's numbers, and randomly selects one to connect the caller with. Calls are routed through a private network that masks the original source of the call. Fischer said that despite the secrecy of intelligence work, the majority of the numbers were freely available on the internet, and come from a range of different countries. "You can find most of the numbers on the internet, some of them are from professional organizations, and some of them became known as the result of intelligence leaks. You just have to search," Fischer explained. "We have a lot of them, including for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, NSA, CIA, FBI, BND (Germany's federal intelligence service), and the BfV (Germany's domestic intelligence service). There are also Italian and French intelligence services. We are also constantly searching for people who might be able to find new numbers so that we can bring 'Call a Spy' to different countries," Fischer said.

7. Canada Can Do More to Fight Money Laundering, Terror Financing

Wall Street Journal, Ben Dipietro, 2016 09 16

Column: A review of Canada's efforts to fight money laundering and terrorism financing received good marks from the International Monetary Fund, though it said more improvement is needed in the country's legal framework and implementation of its programs. The IMF report, released Thursday, was adopted by the Financial Action Task Force as Canada's fourth mutual evaluation. FATF is an intergovernmental organization that establishes standards and advocates for measures to combat money laundering, terrorism financing and other threats to the international financial system. While Canadian authorities were credited with good understanding of the risks the country faces from money laundering and terrorism financing, the IMF report said the exclusion of legal counsels, legal firms and Quebec notaries from its oversight is a "significant loophole" and "raises serious concerns" since legal professionals are at high risk of misuse for money laundering or terrorist financing purposes. "That risk is not satisfactorily mitigated." The report found Canada's anti-money laundering watchdog agency, the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, or Fintrac, is limited by the country's constitution into the types of analysis it can conduct; for instance, Fintrac isn't permitted to request information from any reporting entity. While Fintrac cooperates "effectively" with other law enforcement agencies, the report found the constraints on the organization create a "gap" in the country's ability to fight these problems. The report found shortcomings with Austria's financial intelligence unit, saying it only conducts "very basic operational analysis and does not conduct any strategic analysis to support the operational needs of competent authorities." The unit doesn't have the capability to cross-match suspicious transaction reports or analyze data to uncover trends and patterns and "does not conduct analysis of terrorist financing-related suspicious transactions," the report said.

8. Canadian 'spy' detained by China returns home

Associated Press, Staff Writer, 2016 09 16

Toronto - A Canadian who was detained in China for two years over accusations of spying has been freed and has returned to Canada. Kevin Garratt was indicted by prosecutors in Dandong, a city on the North Korean border where he and his wife ran a coffee shop and conducted Christian aid work for North Koreans. He and his wife, Julia, were arrested in August 2014 by the state security bureau. Julia was later released on bail. China's official Xinhua News Agency had reported authorities found evidence implicating Garratt in accepting tasks from Canadian espionage agencies to gather intelligence in China. Kevin Garratt's release comes just over a week after Justin Trudeau, the Canadian prime minister, visited China. The Chinese premier, Li Keqiang, is to visit Canada in a week's time for talks with Trudeau. Simeon Garratt, the couple's son, has insisted their arrest must have been a mistake. They ran a coffee shop and had worked with North Star Aid, a British Columbia-registered charity that says it seeks to help North Koreans primarily through providing humanitarian aid.

9. Canadian held in China for two years back home, family says

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe & Laura Stone, 2016 09 16

Beijing and Ottawa - Kevin Garratt, the Canadian missionary detained in China for two years, is "extremely happy" to be home, his son says. "It was almost at the point where everyone was losing hope - and then you get the good news," Simeon Garratt, the couple's eldest son, told the Globe and Mail on Thursday. "Honestly, he looks great - a lot better than I was expecting. He's in good spirits, and I think he's extremely happy." The release happened suddenly, Simeon said, with the family notified Wednesday and his father landing in Vancouver the following morning. More than two years after Kevin's arrest - a period that saw him under constant surveillance and, recently, in a room where the lights were permanently kept on - his father was struggling to process what had happened, Simeon said. "I think his thoughts are still pretty scattered now. It all happened at the last minute, even more so for him because he wasn't told anything right up until the time," he said. "It probably hasn't quite hit him yet that he's back. I don't think he's slept probably in a couple of days, at least." The Canadian government has been pushing for Mr. Garratt's release since he and his wife, Julia, were arrested in August, 2014 under suspicion of stealing state military and defence research secrets. While Julia was released on bail in February, 2015, Kevin remained imprisoned. The espionage allegations against him came about a week after Canada accused a China-sponsored hacker of breaching the National Research Council.

10. Canadian held in China on spying accusation has been released: Trudeau's office

Canadian Press, 2016 09 16

Ottawa- A Canadian accused of spying and jailed in China for more than two years has been released and is back in Canada, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's office confirmed on Thursday. Kevin Garratt lived in China for about 30 years, conducted Christian aid work and ran a popular coffee shop near China's border with North Korea. Garratt's wife Julia was also arrested, although she was released on bail about six months later. In January, he was indicted on accusations of spying for Canada and stealing Chinese state secrets. Garratt's family said in a statement that a court in Dandong issued its ruling in the case against him on Tuesday and was deported from China on Thursday and was back in Canada to be with his friends and family. "The Garratt family thanks everyone for their thoughts and prayers, and also thanks the many individuals who worked to secure Kevin's release," it said. The family asked for privacy and said it would release more information in the coming weeks. The brief statement provided no other details. A statement issued Friday by China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said Garratt was allowed to leave after a local court issued a verdict in his case.

11. Canadian Held Two Years on Spy Charges in China Returns Home

New York Times, Ian Austen, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - A Canadian man who worked with a charity that provided food to North Koreans returned to Canada on Thursday after being held in China on espionage charges for just over two years. The family of the man, Kevin Garratt, who is from Vancouver, British Columbia, said in a brief statement that he was deported after a court hearing in Dandong, China, on Tuesday. "The Garratt family thanks everyone for their thoughts and prayers, and also thanks the many individuals who worked to secure Kevin's release," the statement said. Mr. Garratt's detention dampened relations between Canada and China, particularly under the previous Conservative government. Early this month, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau raised Mr. Garratt's case during a visit to China. Mr. Garratt and his wife, Julia Dawn Garratt, were operating a coffee house in China near the border with North Korea as part of a Christian aid mission when they were both arrested in August 2014. Chinese officials later said that they were being held on "suspicion of stealing and spying to obtain state secrets." Ms. Garratt was released on bail and allowed to leave China. But Chinese officials announced in January that Mr. Garratt would be tried on the charges.

"We are delighted that Kevin Garratt has returned safely to Canada and is with his family once more," Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau said in a statement. "We remain deeply impressed by the grace and resilience of the Garratt family." Trudeau said Canadian officials "at the highest levels" were involved in securing Garratt's release. In a statement, the Garratt family thanked everyone "for their thoughts and prayers, and also thanks the many individuals who worked to secure Kevin's release." "Please respect the family's privacy in this time of transition. We will be releasing more information in the coming weeks."

13. China releases alleged Canadian spy

Agence France-Presse, 2016 09 16

Montreal - A Canadian man arrested in China two years ago on charges of spying and stealing state secrets has been freed and is back home in Canada, his family said Thursday. Kevin Garratt was detained in 2014 along with his wife, Julia Dawn, who was later released on bail, in the northeastern Chinese city of Dandong, on the border with North Korea. Before their arrests, Garratt and his wife, both Christians, had run a coffee shop in Dandong and were active in helping send humanitarian aid to impoverished North Korea. Garratt was deported from China on Thursday after a court in Dandong ruled on his case on Tuesday, his family said in a statement. "Kevin... has returned to Canada to be with his family and friends," the family said. "The Garratt family thanks everyone for their thoughts and prayers, and also thanks the many individuals who worked to secure Kevin's release." The family asked for respect of its privacy "in this time of transition," saying it would release more information in the coming weeks. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau welcomed Garratt home, praising his family's "grace and resilience," especially that of Kevin and his wife. Canada's second-largest trade partner after the United States, China has strongly pushed Canada to join the China-backed Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank. Canada said in August it would apply. The United States and Japan -- the world's largest and third-largest economies, respectively -- have declined to join.

14. China says Canadian man it released treated 'based on law'

Agence France-Presse, Nomaan Merchant and Rob Gillies, 2016 09 16

Beijing - China said Friday that a Canadian citizen it detained for two years over spying allegations was allowed to leave the country after a local court issued a verdict in his case, but it refused to say what the verdict was or why he was detained at all. Kevin Garratt's return to Canada was announced Thursday by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, who said he had pressed Garratt's case with top Chinese officials. Garratt had been indicted by prosecutors in Dandong, a city on the North Korean border where he and his wife ran a popular coffee shop and conducted Christian aid work for North Koreans. He and his wife, Julia, were arrested in August 2014 by the state security bureau. While his wife was released on bail, Garratt remained in custody. China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in a faxed statement Friday, said Garratt had been treated "according to law." It said China "fully guaranteed all kinds of procedural rights of Kevin Garratt, and fully respected and implemented the consular rights of the Canadian side," the ministry said. But the ministry declined to say what investigators found or what the outcome of the trial was. A person who answered the phone at the court on Friday, a Chinese state holiday, said officials were not available to discuss the case. Chinese state media have previously reported that authorities found evidence that implicated Garratt in accepting tasks from Canadian espionage agencies to gather intelligence in China.

15. Dutch police to get Canadian BlackBerry data

National Post, Joseph Brean, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - After a police raid on a Toronto technology company, Canada has agreed to share a massive stash of encrypted BlackBerry Ltd. messages with Dutch police investigating an underworld conspiracy involving robberies, drug trafficking, attempted murder and assassinations. But rather than simply hand over the messages, from 20,000 different users, an Ontario judge this week imposed restrictions designed to prevent a "fishing expedition" by police in the Netherlands or any other country. The ruling ensures the data will remain under Canadian control, and not be shared further without a court's approval. The fear is that unfettered disclosure would expose innocent people to the unjustified attention of police, just because they used an encrypted Black-Berry. "Canada remains the home of this data," Judge Ian Nordheimer wrote. The case arose from a Dutch probe of an organized crime ring, in which police seized assault rifles, machine guns, grenades, vehicles, tracking devices, and large sums of money. Unusually, they also kept discovering BlackBerrys that had been modified to send only encrypted messages, outside the normal cellphone network. He later wrote a letter that came before Judge Nordheimer in which he "denies any conscious involvement with anyone who used the services of his company for criminal purposes." Manupassa was also "critical of Dutch authorities for not requesting assistance and/or information from him, prior to taking the steps that they did." The 20,000 users are said to include the Dutch criminal suspects and their associates, but also likely include many innocent users of Ennetcom's service. Most are believed to be Dutch.

16. Federal government argues pay problems 'an honest administrative error,' as tribunal wraps

CBC.CA, Ashley Burke, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - The Phoenix pay problems affecting 80,000 workers is an "honest administrative error," the federal government argued as a labour tribunal came to a close on Thursday. The four-day hearing in front of the Public Service Labour Relations Board wrapped up with closing arguments from both sides. During the tribunal, union representatives and senior officials testified, including the associate assistant deputy minister responsible for the roll out of government's new Phoenix pay system. Rosanna Di Paola testified yesterday that the root cause of the problems are insufficient training, not the technology itself. The Public Service Alliance of Canada filed a complaint in June arguing the Treasury Board of Canada broke the law by not paying public servants accurately or on time after the roll out of Phoenix. "The human suffering that has been exposed in this case is real," Patricia Harewood, the legal officer for PSAC, said during closing arguments. "We have heard stories of public service workers in dire straights after months of being paid inaccurately or not at all," she added. "There is nothing normal or every day about these stories." But the government's lawyer said the labour complaint is in "the wrong forum" and should be thrown out. Sean Kelly, the lawyer representing the Treasury Board of Canada, said that the case is "strictly a contract dispute" that should be dealt with through the grievance process, not through a board hearing. "We are being asked to compensate unknown individuals," argued Kelly. "We don't know how many there are. We don't know their names. We don't know their circumstances." The union argues the government violated the Public Service Labour Relations Act that states an employer is not allowed to change the terms and conditions of employment while it is in collective bargaining with the union.

17. Goodale to host UK terror watchdog, national security committee

iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale will host the U.K.'s terrorism legislation watchdog and members of its Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) next week in Ottawa for a meeting that will include discussion about the government's new national security committee of parliamentarians. The meeting will come as Parliament resumes from its summer sitting and is expected to dive into debate on Bill C-22, which was tabled on June 16 and announced the framework for the government's nine- member committee of appointed parliamentarians who will "review and scrutinize" the activities of national security agencies. The committee brings Canada more in-line with other G7 countries' democratic review and oversight bodies, including congressional intelligence committees in the US. It won't be the first time Goodale sits down with the eight British committee members - back in January, he spent three days in the U.K. and France holding meetings with counterterrorism partners including the ISC. Goodale's office at the time described the trip as an opportunity for the minister to meet with his foreign counterparts on security issues ranging from how best to create a parliamentary oversight committee to how to tackle radicalization and security. David Anderson, the U.K.'s Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation, will also be taking part in the meeting with Goodale and the ISC.

18. Jonathan Pitre - symbol of limitless strength

Ottawa Citizen, Mark Sutcliffe, 2016 09 16

Comment: While the two major candidates running for president of the United States engaged in a pointless battle over who was healthier, Jonathan Pitre, the delightful, clever, resolute young man from Russell, was fighting off fever and the risk of infection after a stem cell transplant in Minnesota. Although his skin is as fragile as the surface of a bubble, and he's been ravaged by chemotherapy and radiation, Jonathan has become a symbol of limitless strength. He is sick, he is battered, but he is not weak. Facing the toughest battle of his young but arduous life, Jonathan has barely blinked. He has summoned a wisdom well beyond his years, a remarkable perspective forged by hardship and realism. He knows the stakes of the risky but potentially life-altering medical journey upon which he has embarked. He's aware of the long struggle ahead and the odds of success. But he seems to approach it all with a serenity and acceptance that most of us can barely achieve during a routine traffic delay. When Jonathan speaks publicly about his circumstances, it is always with clarity and pragmatism. When he told the Citizen's Andrew Duffy this week that he's taking his recovery one day at a time, it wasn't a cliché. He appears to be approaching this passage with a controlled hope and determination, an extraordinary self-discipline and level-headedness. Throughout his ordeal, it seems, he has refused to be either broken by his debilitating illness or dreamy-eyed about a solution. For a teenager with a serious medical condition, he appears to be remarkably devoid of drama.

19. Le Canadien Kevin Garratt est libéré

La Presse canadienne avec le Toronto Star, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - Kevin Garratt, un Canadien détenu depuis plus de deux ans en Chine pour des accusations d'espionnage, a été libéré hier, a confirmé le bureau du premier ministre Justin Trudeau. « Nous sommes heureux que Kevin Garratt soit revenu en toute sécurité au Canada et qu'il soit de nouveau en compagnie de sa famille », a déclaré M. Trudeau dans un communiqué transmis hier en fin de journée. « Je suis très heureux de la tournure des événements », a pour sa part affirmé le père de Kevin Garratt, Ross. Au moment de son arrestation, M. Garratt vivait en Chine depuis environ 30 ans, où il participait à des oeuvres caritatives chrétiennes et tenait un café très populaire près de la frontière avec la Corée du Nord. 20. One week after transplant, Jonathan Pitre can finally rest

The Ottawa Citizen Online, Andrew Duffy, 2016 09 16

Ottawa - One week after his stem cell transplant at the University of Minnesota Masonic Children's Hospital, Jonathan Pitre is finally able to get some rest. Pitre, 16, a Grade 11 student from Russell, Ont., was asleep Thursday morning after one of the most difficult days of his two-and-a-half weeks in hospital. "We are better today, but yesterday was pretty heavy," Pitre's mother, Tina Boileau, said in an email exchange Thursday. Her son's blood pressure "went through the roof" during an exceptionally difficult five-hour bath ordeal Wednesday evening. "It was probably the longest one ever," she said. The bath is a necessary part of the disease management protocol for those with epidermolysis bullosa (EB), a progressive skin disorder that is among the most severe afflictions known to medicine. The bath - a key infection fighting measure - is even more important now for Pitre, whose infection-fighting immune cells were systematically destroyed by chemotherapy and radiation to prepare his body for the stem cell transplant. It normally takes four hours to bathe Pitre, remove his bandages, manage new blisters, and reapply his bandages and wrappings.

21. Phoenix pay glitches 'honest' errors, government tells labour tribunal

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 09 16

Toronto - Phoenix pay system malfunctions that have left thousands of people unpaid are "honest administrative errors" rather than breaches of the labour laws governing the public service, federal lawyers say. Treasury Board lawyer Sean Kelly told a labour tribunal hearing that the Public Service Alliance of Canada has failed to prove that Phoenix's glitches undermine the ongoing round of collective bargaining. Phoenix has been at the centre of a four-day hearing at the Public Service Labour Relations and Employment Board into whether the federal government is breaking the law by not paying thousands of people properly and on time. PSAC had argued Phoenix pay problems amount to an "unfair labour practice" because they have effectively changed the terms and conditions of employment for public servants during a period of collective bargaining. Kelly argued the pay problems public servants are facing are "errors" not unilateral changes to the terms and conditions of employment, which are enshrined in the Public Service Labour Relations Act, collective agreements and the government's directive on pay. "The disruptions to pay ... are not a result of changes to terms and conditions of employment," Kelly said. "This was an honest administration error in processing ... due to untimely and incorrect data entry and slower-than-expected processing times, as opposed to a software malfunction or the intention of the employer to change the terms and conditions of employment."

22. Concern Over Hacked Emails Becomes a Fear of Being Next

New York Times, Nicholas D. Shear, Nicholas Fandos, 2016 09 16

Washington - A panicked network anchor went home and deleted his entire personal Gmail account. A Democratic senator began rethinking the virtues of a flip phone. And a former national security official gave silent thanks that he is now living on the West Coast. The digital queasiness has settled heavily on the nation's capital and its secretive political combatants this week as yet another victim, former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, fell prey to the embarrassment of seeing his personal musings distributed on the internet and highlighted in news reports. "There but for the grace of God go all of us," said Tommy Vietor, a former National Security Council spokesman for President Obama who now works in San Francisco. He said thinking about his own email exchanges in Washington made him cringe, even now. "Sometimes we're snarky, sometimes we are rude," Mr. Vietor said, recalling a few such moments during his time at the White House. "The volume of hacking is a moment we all have to do a little soul searching."

23. Despite fears, American followers of Islamic State are few

McClatchy News Service, Hannah Allam, 2016 09 15

Washington - After remarks that painted a doomsday scenario of lone wolves, random attacks and radicalization via cellphone, Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., had one last ominous thing to say about the Islamic State's ability to attack the United States. "This threat from the foreign fighters cannot be overstated," he warned. Yes, it can. When it comes to the Islamic State's threat to the United States, overstatements are the norm, with rhetoric of the kind Meadows used at a congressional hearing Wednesday sounding alarmist when compared with data and other assessments of the group's ability to attack the United States after years of stepped-up U.S. efforts to fight extremism here and in the Middle East. Although no one in the counterterrorism world would dare consider the Islamic State a vanquished threat, recent studies show that Islamic State-related arrests have slowed, that it's harder now for jihadist recruiters to prey on impressionable Americans and that foreign fighters who leave the so-called caliphate are a much bigger risk for Europe than the United States. In the past four years, 104 people have been arrested in domestic cases related to the Islamic State, according to the Program on Extremism at George Washington University. More than half those cases - at least 58 - came about through the use of confidential informants or undercover stings, tactics that have come under fire from civil liberties groups concerned with entrapment. Seamus Hughes, deputy director of the Program on Extremism, said, "It's clear the arrest tempo has slowed down" and is likely to plateau, if it hasn't already. Hughes said the drop came partly from successes by U.S. authorities in cracking down on Americans trying to travel to or communicate with the extremists. The Islamic State also has become more guarded with its recruiting tactics and forums, he added.

24. Edward Snowden characterized as 'serial exaggerator' in House intelligence committee report

Washington Times, Andrea Noble, 2016 09 16

Washington - A House intelligence committee report on Edward Snowden characterizes the former National Security Agency contractor not as a whistleblower but as a "serial exaggerator" whose theft of 1.5 million classified government documents has done tremendous damage to national security. A 4-page summary of the classified report released by the House committee on Thursday says the bulk of the documents taken "have nothing to do with programs impacting individual privacy interests" but rather pertain to military, defense and intelligence programs. "A review of the materials Snowden compromised makes clear that he handed over secrets that protect American troops overseas and secrets that provide vital defenses against terrorists and nation-states," the report states. "Some of Snowden's disclosures exacerbated and accelerated existing trends that diminished the IC's capabilities to collect against legitimate foreign intelligence targets, while others resulted in the loss of intelligence streams that had saved American lives." "Edward Snowden is no hero - he's a traitor who willfully betrayed his colleagues and his country. He put our servicemembers and the American people at risk after perceived slights by his superiors," said Intelligence Committee Chairman Devin Nunes. "In light of his long list of exaggerations and outright fabrications detailed in this report, no one should take him at his word."

25. Hack the vote? Not easily

Los Angeles Times, Del Quentin Wilber, Brian Bennett, 2016 09 16

Washington - The recent Russian hack into the Democratic National Committee's computers and subsequent FBI warning that two states' elections databases had been victims of cyberattacks are raising fears that a foreign power might penetrate U.S. systems and try to alter the outcome of November's vote. Though possible, such an unprecedented foreign election day hacking would be hard to pull off, experts say. Here are some answers to common questions: How realistic is the threat that hackers could break into U.S. election systems and alter vote tallies? Not very, thanks mostly to the fact that even presidential elections are highly decentralized and often still rely on old-fashioned systems rather than cutting-edge technology. First, there are more than 8,000 separate local jurisdictions where voters cast ballots for president, and each one is largely free to use whatever methods, technology and vendors they deem appropriate, based on varying local or state rules and guidelines. There are few federal mandates on how to conduct elections, and the mechanics of voting have been left to the states. For would-be hackers, that means there's no easy, one-stop target. Secondly, about 75% of all votes this cycle will be cast on paper, said Pamela Smith, president of Verified Voting, which tracks election systems nationwide. And many results are still conveyed by telephone, fax or hand delivery.

26. House Intelligence Committee Urges Obama Not to Grant Snowden Pardon

New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 09 16

Washington - Lawmakers on the House Intelligence Committee unanimously signed a letter to President Obama on Thursday asking him not to pardon Edward J. Snowden, the former intelligence contractor who leaked troves of information about National Security Agency surveillance and data collection in 2013. "We urge you not to pardon Edward Snowden, who perpetrated the largest and most damaging public disclosure of classified information in our nation's history," the bipartisan letter said. "If Mr. Snowden returns from Russia, where he fled in 2013, the U.S. government must hold him accountable for his actions." The committee also said it had completed a 36-page report summarizing the results of its multiyear investigation into the leaks and their effect. The report was classified, but the panel released a three-page executive summary that portrayed Mr. Snowden as a "serial exaggerator and fabricator" who is "not a whistle-blower." "Snowden caused tremendous damage to national security, and the vast majority of the documents he stole have nothing to do with programs impacting individual privacy interests -- they instead pertain to military, defense and intelligence programs of great interest to America's adversaries," the report said. A pardon by the president appears to be unlikely. In late July, the administration responded to an earlier petition campaign by rejecting the idea and saying that Mr. Snowden should return to the United States to face trial.

27. Man pleads guilty in D.C. to supporting al-Qaeda-backed group

Washington Post, Spencer S. Hsu, 2016 09 16

Washington - A dual Dutch-Turkish national pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Washington to providing material support to the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan, a U.S.-designated terrorist group active in Afghanistan. Irfan Demirtas, also known as Nasrullah, 58, faces a maximum of 15 years in prison when he is sentenced Nov. 30. U.S. authorities agreed not to pursue additional charges in a four-count indictment dated Dec. 8, 2011. "I didn't do anything intentionally knowing they were a terrorist organization," the white-bearded Demirtas said Thursday, speaking through a translator. Demirtas remained seated at the plea because of a medical condition that his attorney said made it too painful for him to stand during the 90-minute hearing. Demirtas admitted that between January 2006 and May 2008, he provided funds to IMU leader Tahir Yuldashev and was present when he made threats against Americans, Assistant Federal Defender Mary C. Petras told District Judge Randolph D. Moss. U.S. authorities alleged that Demirtas was raising money, recruiting fighters and "fomenting terror across Europe and the Middle East," then-acting U.S. attorney for the District Vincent H. Cohen Jr. said in a statement when Demirtas was extradited to the United States in July 2015.

28. Polygraph panic: CIA director fretted his vote for communist

CNN.com, Tal Kopan, 2016 09 16

Washington - At his first polygraph test to enter the CIA, the future director had a secret. John Brennan on Thursday recalled being asked a standard question for a top security clearance at his early CIA lie detector test: Have you ever worked with or for a group that was dedicated to overthrowing the US? "I froze," Brennan said during a panel discussion about diversity in the intelligence community at the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation's annual conference. "This was back in 1980, and I thought back to a previous election where I voted, and I voted for the Communist Party candidate," Brennan was responding to a question about barriers to recruiting diverse candidates for the intelligence fields, including whether past records of activism could hurt someone applying for a clearance later in life.

29. U.S. gives 'no free pass' to Russia, other nations on cyberespionage, Justice official warns

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 09 16

Washington - A senior Justice Department official this week issued a thinly-veiled warning to Russia that significant acts of cyberespionage will not be ignored. That would include the Democratic National Committee hack, which would be considered an act of political cyberespionage of the sort the United States traditionally has not publicly attributed to a culpable foreign spy agency. That set of intrusions, disclosed by the DNC in June, has been linked to the Russian government by FBI investigators, though the U.S. government has not publicly acknowledged that. Nonetheless, said Assistant Attorney General for National Security John Carlin, if Russia or any other country thinks "there's going to be a free pass, that we can't figure out what they're doing in cyber-enabled espionage, I think the message should be clear: You're wrong. You can and will be held accountable." Carlin was speaking at a conference Wednesday at the Center for Strategic and International Studies held on the 10th anniversary of the Justice Department's National Security Division. He added that although all nations have spy operations, that does not mean the U.S. government will not take action against cyber spies who are detected. "If you get caught spying," he said, "there are consequences."

30. Cameron et Sarkozy épinglés pour l'intervention contre Kadhafi

Le Monde, Philippe Bernard, 2016 09 16

Londres - Un rapport du Parlement britannique critique la décision de Londres de s'engager en Libye, en 2011, en raison de l'"enthousiasme" de David Cameron est le "responsable final" du chaos et de la guerre civile qui ont suivi l'intervention militaire aérienne de l'OTAN de 2011 en Libye, qui avait conduit à la chute de Mouammar Kadhafi et dont les islamistes sont les principaux bénéficiaires dans le pays et dans tout le Maghreb. Le rapport cinglant de la commission des affaires étrangères du Parlement britannique, publié mercredi 14 septembre, accuse l'ancien premier ministre conservateur britannique de s'être basé sur des "postulats erronés" et "une compréhension incomplète des renseignements" et d'avoir manqué d'une "stratégie cohérente". Le document de 49 pages fait écho au rapport Chilcot, publié le 6 juillet, accablant Tony Blair pour l'engagement britannique en Irak aux côtés des Etats-Unis en 2003, qui a laissé un profond traumatisme dans l'opinion britannique. Le rapport parlementaire met en cause le processus de décision, qui a transformé une intervention censée venir en aide à des civils à Benghazi menacés par la répression du colonel Kadhafi - "une menace surestimée", estiment les députés - en une opération visant à renverser le régime libyen. Les leçons de l'Irak ont été ignorées, estiment en substance les élus. Le résultat de l'intervention des Français, Britanniques et Américains est, selon le document, " un effondrement politique et économique, des affrontements entre milices et tribus, des crises humanitaires et migratoires, des violations des droits de l'homme à grande échelle, la dissémination des armes du régime de Kadhafi dans toute la région et l'expansion de - l'organisation - Etat islamique en Afrique du Nord ".

Turks in Britain are being urged on social media to spy on each other and report suspected political opponents to the authorities in their homeland. The Facebook page Brotherhood in Islam posted the address of a nursery school with the claim that its owners were spreading support for terrorism. Turkish dissidents are living in fear that the authorities in Ankara will suspend their passports and demand that they be extradited for allegedly supporting the failed coup in July. 32. Fears over rise of Chinese CCTV

London Times, Alexi Mostrous, Billy Kember, 2016 09 16

London - China's investment in Britain came under fresh scrutiny last night after Beijing was revealed to be the country's biggest provider of surveillance equipment. Hikvision, a company controlled by the Chinese government, has sold more than a million closed-circuit television cameras and recorders to British clients who have installed them at sites including airports, government buildings, sports stadiums and the London Underground. Former MI6 officers and security ministers called for greater oversight of Chinese business after an investigation revealed that no national security assessment had been made of Hikvision's British operations. Some suggest that the cameras could be hacked from Beijing. Senior figures at GCHQ are understood to be concerned that the government lacks a policy to assess the security risk of foreign investments. Nigel Inkster, former director of operations and intelligence at MI6, said: "There are questions to be asked [on Hikvision]. It's far from evident that they have been." The disclosure comes after Theresa May yesterday approved the £18 billion Hinkley Point nuclear power plant, which will be part-financed by China. The government said yesterday that it would introduce "significant new safeguards" on future foreign investment in nuclear power and critical infrastructure.

33. MI6 failed to check on torture claims by Lee Rigby killer

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 09 16

London - MI6 has been criticised for "serious failings" in its response to allegations that one of the killers of Lee Rigby had been tortured by Kenyan authorities. Sir Mark Waller, the intelligence services commissioner who scrutinises MI6, MI5 and GCHQ, spoke out after investigating the handling of claims by Michael Adebolajo, who killed Fusilier Rigby outside the army barracks in Woolwich, southeast London, in May 2013 with fellow extremist Michael Adebowale. After the murder it emerged that Adebolajo had been arrested in November 2010 in Kenya where he was believed to have been en route to fight with al-Shabaab, the Somali terrorist group. He later claimed that he was mistreated before being deported on suspicion of terrorism. Sir Mark found no evidence of UK involvement in Adebolajo's arrest, nor of mistreatment, but found serious failings in the way MI6 had dealt with the matter. A "crucial email" asking an officer to investigate the allegations was blocked, and Sir Mark was not satisfied that MI6 had sought and obtained assurances from the Kenyans that they did not mistreat Adebolajo.

35. Malcolm Turnbull warns Hanson, Christensen demonising all Muslims is 'counter-productive'

ABC (Australia), Anna Henderson, 2016 09 16

Canberra - Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has warned One Nation and his own outspoken backbencher George Christensen that demonising all Muslims is playing into the hands of extremist groups. "Tagging all Muslims with the crimes of a few is fundamentally wrong and it's also counter-productive," Mr Turnbull told commercial radio station 3AW. "Seeking to demonise or denigrate all Muslims or seek to alienate all Muslims and suggest they're somehow not part of Australia or shouldn't be in Australia, that is exactly what the extremists and terrorists are saying to the Muslim community." One Nation leader Pauline Hanson delivered her first speech to the Senate earlier this week, . She went on to call for a ban on Muslim immigration. Mr Turnbull has rejected that position. "I was asked about her [Hanson's] views on migration and obviously everybody knows I don't agree with them," Mr Turnbull said. Mr Christensen sounded his own warning about Islam in the House of Representatives last night, . He said many immigrants in recent years did not share what he called "Australian values".

36. Sydney man accused of terrorism says he had no intention of hurting anyone

Australian Associated Press, Karl Hoerr, 2016 09 16

Canberra - A Sydney man who admitted to preparing for an act of terrorism decided not to bomb a Shiite prayer hall because someone was inside, a court has heard. In February last year, in a few hours. But Al- Kutobi said he abandoned earlier plans for a bombing and there was no attack imminent at the time of their arrest. He admitted going to a Shiite prayer hall in South Granville along with Kiad two nights before their arrest, armed with a petrol bomb. "We wanted to throw it at the building and blow up the hall," Al-Kutobi said. He said they thought no-one would be there at the time, but a man was at the gate. "When we saw him, straight away, we changed our mind and went back," he said. Al-Kutobi denied claims that their intended target later became a police station. "Did you ever form the intention of hurting anyone?" asked defence barrister Greg Scragg. "No," Al- Kutobi said. Mr Scragg asked his client about the police intelligence that triggered the arrests. "Did you ever have an intention of departing in a few hours for a terrorist attack?"

37. Pakistan's Sindh province moves to block terrorism finance

Gulf News, Mohammad Ashraf, 2016 09 16

Karachi - Officials in Pakistan's Sindh province on Thursday agreed to adopt tougher steps to check the financing of militant and terrorist organisations. The measures include plans to regulate charities, to ensure they do not act as cover to raise funds for banned groups. Sindh Chief Minister Syed Murad Ali Shah presided over a meeting of a sub- committee of the Apex Committee, which was formed to oversee the implementation of the National Action Plan (NAP) to eradicate terrorism in the country. The meeting decided that banned militant outfits that operate under a new name or identity, would not be allowed to work under those pseudo names. Dozens of sectarian and Islamist militant groups were banned by the federal government in line with the global war against terrorism but many of them registered under new names. The groups would then go on to raise the funds, collect valuable hides and skins, and approach individuals as well as business and industrial concerns for donations.

Rabat, Maroc - Le directeur du Bureau Central d'Investigations Judiciaires (BCIJ), Abdelhak El Khayam, a affirmé que le Royaume a toujours été un rempart infranchissable devant les plans terroristes et que la vigilance des appareils sécuritaires marocains a avorté toutes les tentatives terroristes qui visaient le Maroc. M. El Khayam, qui a accordé une interview au quotidien égyptien « Al Watan », dans sa livraison de mercredi, a noté que la force du Royaume en matière de lutte contre le terrorisme réside dans la démarche proactive prônée par le Maroc visant à étouffer dans l'oeuf toute tentative de nature à porter atteinte à la sécurité du Royaume. Cette démarche proactive ambitionne également de faire face aux jeunes qui sont enrôlés par les organisations terroristes pour subir des entraînements ou recevoir des instructions, a-t-il ajouté. Il a noté dans ce sens que la création du BCIJ s'insère dans le plan de modernisation de l'appareil sécuritaire dans le Royaume après les attentats terroristes perpétrés au Maroc ces dernières années et vise également à contrer la menace terroriste qui guette les pays de la région, notamment le Royaume, de par sa position géographique.

"It is interesting to note that the ability of the Boko Haram terrorist group to move freely as they were doing before, the ability to hold ground, the ability to take on territories or ransack large communities and towns has been virtually eliminated," he said. Boko Haram released a video this week that shows hundreds of supporters, suggesting the group is still potent. Buratai dismissed the video as propaganda. "Virtually they want to show that they are still around. To the best of our knowledge and all well-meaning Nigerians who know the happenings in the northeast, they know that those are just empty, boastful positions of the Boko Haram terrorists. They have nothing to show and indeed they are just trying to show their prowess in terms of propaganda," Buratai said.

45. N.Korea ready to 'counter-attack' in face of US 'provocation'

Agence France-Presse, Agence France Presse, 2016 09 16

Seoul - North Korea is ready to "counter-attack" in the face of ongoing "provocation" from the United States, its foreign minister said Thursday amid a spike in tension caused by Pyongyang's latest nuclear test. "The Korean people have indicated that we are ready to wage a counter-attack against provocation by enemies," Foreign Minister Ri Yong-Ho said at a meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement in Venezuela. The warning comes after two US supersonic bombers flew over South Korea on Tuesday in a show of force following North Korea's fifth and largest-ever nuclear test last week. Ri said the nuclear tests were needed to counter "threats" from Washington. "It was inevitable that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea would use the option of nuclear armament after having done everything to safeguard national security in view of constant threats from the United States," he said through an interpreter. He called nuclear tests part of a "legitimate" defense policy to counter US military exercises on the peninsula.

Washington Post, Editorial Board, 2016 09 16

Editorial - Less than two months ago, President Obama approved a presidential policy directive spelling out how the federal government would respond to "significant cyber incidents." In the shadowy world of cyberconflict, this is often a difficult problem: how to identify the source of an attack and respond appropriately. Mr. Obama set benchmarks. He defined a significant incident as one that is likely to result in "demonstrable harm" to the national security, economy or foreign relations of the United States, or "to the public confidence, civil liberties, or public health and safety of the American people." In recent weeks, according to private security experts and government sources, hackers associated with Russia's government have carried out high-profile intrusions intended to weaken that public confidence and disrupt the U.S. election campaign. Mr. Obama should do something about it. Mr. Obama ought to put his foot down, and soon. The cyberattacks are of a piece with a larger attempt by Russian President Vladimir Putin to subvert Western democracies and the ideals of a liberal, rule-based international order. Mr. Putin's broader campaign has included incitement of war in Ukraine, seizure of Crimea, support for right-wing groups and candidates in Europe, and using a tide of war refugees from Syria to create instability. In responding, Mr. Obama must take advantage of the strength of an open society and call out the perpetrators, telling the American people what is happening. Mr. Obama does not need to release sensitive intelligence to effectively make the point. Second, Mr. Obama should order the preparation of economic sanctions against Russian individuals under an executive order he signed that permits sanctions against people linked to malicious cyber-acts. He must put Russia on notice that such disruptive "active measures," as the KGB once called them, will not be tolerated. If Mr. Putin thinks he can get away with generating fog and doubt, the best answer is to drag him and his dirty tricks into the sunshine.

48. Meddling, extremism threaten world peace: Iran

Press TV, 2016 09 16

Tehran - Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif has warned that interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, occupation and extremism constitute serious threats to the world peace, security and development. "It is evident that intervention, invasion and occupation as in the cases of Iraq, Syria and Palestine, leads to extremism. The tragedy of Palestine, the center of anger and desperation felt in the Muslim world, is at the heart of this crisis," Zarif stated at the foreign ministerial meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) in Venezuela's Margarita Island on Thursday. He added, "In such a difficult and challenging situation, self-restraint and full commitment to international law, regulations and norms in addition to UN Charter principles are a matter of absolute necessity." Iranian President Hassan Rouhani is scheduled to attend the summit and deliver a speech on Friday.

50. In leaked emails, Colin Powell says Israel has 200 nukes

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 09 16

Jerusalem - Former US secretary of state and four-star general Colin Powell alleged that Israel possesses some 200 nuclear weapons, in an email apparently leaked by Russian hackers this week. Discussing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's March 2015 speech to Congress about the dangers posed by the Iranian nuclear deal, in an email he sent to US Democratic party donor Jeffrey Leeds, Powell wrote that he doubted the Iranian regime would use an atomic bomb even if it could get one, since "the boys in Tehran know Israel has 200, all targeted on Tehran, and we have thousands." The email was published by the LobeLog foreign policy website. Israel maintains a policy of so-called nuclear ambiguity, neither publicly confirming nor denying the existence of an atomic arsenal. According to a 2014 report by the Federation of American Scientists, however, the Jewish state is believed to possess between 80 and 400 nuclear weapons, though that document's authors estimated the figure was closer to 80.

51. Israel prepares civilians for threat of 230,000 enemy rockets

Jerusalem Post, Yaakov Lappin, 2016 09 16

Jerusalem - The IDF Home Front Command is preparing for the possibility that Hezbollah will fire thousands of missiles from Lebanon into Israel during the next war. A national war drill will be held from Sunday to Wednesday, including a nationwide air raid siren at 7:05 p.m. on Tuesday. The goal of the exercise is to train civilians how to quickly enter "safe zones" in homes and workplaces, in the event of a mass rocket attack. According to assessments by the Home Front Command, in any multi-front conflict, some 95% of enemy rockets would be light-weight and have ranges less than 40 km., and 1% of all incoming projectiles would score direct hits on buildings. A mass rocket attack in a war on multiple fronts would be expected to cause mass disruption and perhaps hundreds of casualties. The Home Front Command has been working with emergency services, government ministries and local authorities to prepare for such a scenario.

52. UN asked to stop Iranian arms smuggling to Yemen

Gulf News, Jumana Al Tamimi, 2016 09 16

Dubai - Saudi Arabia called on the UN Security Council on Thursday to put an end to Iranian weapons smuggling to the Al Houthi militia in Yemen as the clandestine shipments continue despite a UN resolution forbidding it. Saudi Arabia's representative to the UN, Abdullah Al Mouallimi, added in a letter to Security Council president Gerard Van Bohemen that the smuggling of Iranian-made weapons to Yemeni militias fighting the internationally- recognised government of Abd Rabbo Mansour Hadi is not only a violation of the Security Council resolution but also threatens the stability of Saudi Arabia, Yemen and the region as a whole. "We further urge the Security Council to take all necessary measures to demand that Iran complies with all relevant Security Council resolutions, cease and desist from any illegal actions in Yemen," Al Mouallimi added in the letter, which was carried by several regional news agencies.

53. Conférence mondiale sur les religions - Entrevoyer la fin des extrémismes

Le Devoir, Jean-François Nadeau, 2016 09 16

Montréal - L'historienne britannique Karen Armstrong se désole, tout comme d'autres conférenciers invités par la 3e Conférence mondiale sur les religions du monde. " Nous avons applaudi quand le mur de Berlin est tombé et maintenant, il faudrait applaudir parce qu'on veut construire d'autres murs, un mur notamment entre les États-Unis et le Mexique ? " Cette grande conférence se tenait jeudi au Palais des congrès. Pour Amir Hussain, professeur de théologie à la Loyola Marymount University de Los Angeles, " les radicaux et les extrémistes ont peu de contacts avec leur communauté, et les imams ont peu d'influence sur eux ". Pour lui, l'islam est une religion comme une autre. Ses adeptes doivent être libres de participer aux activités de la cité. Ce sont 93 % des musulmans interrogés aux États-Unis après les attentats du 11 septembre 2001 qui rejetaient les attentats au nom de leur religion. " Mais les 7 % qui étaient en faveur des attentats l'étaient pour des motifs politiques ", rappelle Karen Arsmtrong. Beaucoup de jeunes se sont auto-éduqués à l'islam, notent les conférenciers. Ils confondent politique et religion. Dans la plupart des cas, ces jeunes radicaux sont très faiblement liés à la religion musulmane, affirme notamment le professeur Amir Hussain. Au nombre des participants, on comptait le philosophe Charles Taylor, l'aumônier sikh Manjit Singh, Susannah Heschel du collège Dartmouth, Phil Fontaine de l'Assemblée des Premières Nations. La conférence avait pour but de lancer une Déclaration universelle des droits de la personne par les religions du monde, dans un refus de " l'extrémisme religieux ".

55. Fabien Clain aurait constitué un noyau de djihadistes toulousains en Syrie

L'Express, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Damas, Syrie - Dans une enquête diffusée ce vendredi, France Inter révèle que le djihadiste français, "voix" des attentats du 13 novembre, a été repéré par les renseignements avec son frère dans le nord de la Syrie. Au sein d'une communauté toulousaine, ils joueraient le rôle de passeurs mais ne combattraient pas. Son nom apparaît dans un grand nombre de procédures terroristes. Et ses intonations ont été formellement identifiées dans plusieurs vidéos de propagande de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI), dont celle de revendication des attentats de Paris en novembre 2013. Le djihadiste toulousain et d'origine réunionnaise Fabien Clain, proche de Mohamed Merah, le tueur au scooter, semble jouer un rôle à la frontière entre le propagandiste et le commanditaire. Dans une enquête diffusée ce vendredi, France Inter donne des nouvelles du Français de 37 ans. Citant des documents récents des services de renseignement, la radio indique qu'il a été localisé, avec son frère Jean-Michel, au nord de la Syrie il y a quelques mois. Il avait rejoint les rangs des djihadistes au printemps 2015, quittant la France en voiture, avec sa famille.

56. Menaces d'attentats: un adolescent de 15 ans présenté à un juge antiterroriste

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Paris - L'adolescent de 15 ans arrêté avant-hier à Paris parce qu'il était soupçonné de vouloir mener une attaque djihadiste a été déféré ce matin pour être présenté à un juge antiterroriste en vue d'une éventuelle mise en examen, a appris l'AFP de source judiciaire. Le parquet de Paris a requis son placement en détention provisoire, a précisé cette source. Au moins deux autres adolescents de 15 ans ont été écroués ces derniers jours pour des menaces similaires, inspirées par les appels au meurtre sur les réseaux sociaux du propagandiste du groupe djihadiste Etat islamique Rachid Kassim. Celui qui a été arrêté mercredi réside dans le XXe arrondissement de Paris, où il est scolarisé au lycée. A ce stade de l'enquête, se dessine le profil d'un lycéen suivant sa scolarité normalement et qui n'était pas connu des services antiterroristes. Devant les enquêteurs, l'adolescent, né en Egypte, a reconnu avoir été en contact avec Rachid Kassim sur l'application Telegram, selon une source proche de l'enquête. L'exploitation de son téléphone a fait ressortir des éléments montrant qu'il était prêt à passer à l'acte, a ajouté la même source. Selon les enquêteurs, Rachid Kassim a inspiré, de manière plus ou moins directe, les attaques de Magnanville (Yvelines), où Larossi Abballa a tué un policier et sa compagne le 13 juin, et de Saint-Étienne-du-Rouvray (Seine-Maritime), où Adel Kermiche et Abdel Malik Petitjean ont tué un prêtre dans une église le 26 juillet.

57. Menace terroriste "élevée" pour 97% des Français

Le Figaro, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Paris - 97% des Français estiment que la menace terroriste est "élevée" ou "très élevée", indique un sondage Ifop à paraître aujourd'hui dans les quotidiens Midi Libre et La Dépêche du Midi, le premier depuis la découverte de bombes de gaz à Paris. 55% des sondés considèrent la menace terroriste "très élevée" et 42% "élevée", soit deux points de plus en à peine une semaine (95% dans une étude réalisée du 5 au 6 septembre), ajoute Ifop. "L'évaluation de la menace terroriste est extrêmement élevée, quelle que soit la sous-catégorie de population et quelle que soit la proximité politique", souligne l'institut de sondage dans un communiqué.

58. Rachid Kassim, le gourou des enfants terroristes

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Paris - Depuis début août, une dizaine de jeunes, parfois mineurs, en contact avec ce djihadiste français ont été interpellés pour avoir évoqué des projets d'attentat. Depuis l'assassinat, le 26juillet, du père Jacques Hamel - qu'il est soupçonné d'avoir piloté à distance -, Rachid Kassim est étroitement surveillé par la communauté du renseignement. Très actif sur la messagerie sécurisée Telegram, ce djihadiste français de 29ans a multiplié ces dernières semaines les appels au meurtre sur sa chaîne «publique», qui compte 317abonnés. Il a surtout directement incité certains de ses interlocuteurs à passer à l'acte dans des discussions privées. Ancien animateur dans un centre social de Roanne (Loire) - il était chargé d'emmener les enfants à la cantine -, Rachid Kassim s'est reconverti en mentor pour apprentis terroristes, transformant de jeunes Français en martyrs quand il ne les envoie pas en prison. Depuis l'attentat commis dans l'église de Saint-Etienne-du-Rouvray (Seine-Maritime), une dizaine de jeunes gens, souvent mineurs, avec qui il était en contact, ont été interpellés, les services de renseignement ayant finalement trouvé un moyen d'intercepter ses échanges sur Telegram. Donneur d'ordres Ces interpellations préventives ont toutes pour origine un renseignement faisant état d'un projet d'attentat évoqué par Rachid Kassim avec une de ses recrues. Ce donneur d'ordres appelant à passer à l'action avec des moyens rudimentaires - parfois un simple couteau -, la matérialisation de l'intention terroriste est rarement étayée en perquisition.

59. Rachid Kassim, le recruteur français de Daech

Marianne, Frédéric Ploquin, 2016 09 16

Paris - L'homme qui a manipulé le commando de femmes djihadistes de Notre-Dame, à Paris, aurait quitté définitivement la France en mai 2015. C'est le petit Français qui monte au sein de la nébuleuse Etat islamique, en pleine déconfiture sur le terrain militaire, mais toujours avide de porter des coups contre les «mécrites». Son nom, Rachid Kassim, apparaît au coeur d'une dizaine d'enquêtes sur des attentats ou des projets d'attentats. Agé de 29 ans, il maîtrise sur le bout des doigts la messagerie cryptée Telegram, son moyen d'entrer en contact et de travailler au corps les volontaires pour le djihad. Et depuis l'exécution, revendiquée par les services secrets américains, de celui que l'on surnommait le «ministre» des attentats, le Syrien Mohammed Al-Adnani, ce Franco-Algérien passe pour l'un de ses successeurs potentiels. Au point que la CIA et la NSA s'y intéressent désormais de très près. Selon Marianne, ce sont d'ailleurs les services américains qui ont recueilli de très précieuses informations qu'ils ont transmises à leurs homologues français. Le principal bagage de Rachid Kassim, c'est le métier qu'il a exercé pendant au moins deux ans à Roanne, cette ville de la Loire où il a grandi avec sa mère : animateur social. Plus précisément, spécialiste de l'accompagnement scolaire des adolescents. Les jeunes, et même les enfants, il connaît. Il les a suffisamment encadrés pour connaître leurs failles et leurs faiblesses.

60. Renseignement: une loi équilibrée pour affronter les nouvelles menaces

Le Temps (Suisse), Rebecca Ruiz, 2016 09 16

Opinion - Le scandale des fiches est encore bien présent dans l'esprit de nombre de nos concitoyennes et concitoyens. La récolte d'informations personnelles sur près d'un million de citoyens pour lutter contre un prétendu péril rouge fait figure d'épouvantail dans la campagne sur la loi sur le renseignement (LRens). Le Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC) inspire donc la plus grande méfiance, une méfiance compréhensible puisque la société helvétique a été sérieusement ébranlée dans son rapport à l'Etat par cette surveillance de masse qui a concerné principalement des sympathisants de la gauche. On omet cependant souvent de rappeler que ce sombre épisode de l'histoire suisse émane d'une initiative de la police fédérale de l'époque, en l'absence de toute base légale. La loi issue des travaux parlementaires suit une logique inverse et balise précisément l'activité autorisée du renseignement. Alors que la méthode du fichage et du soupçon généralisé a pu se développer dans une zone grise, la LRens interdit la constitution de fichiers de surveillance fondés uniquement sur de vagues soupçons.

61. Shouting at Americans: A Peek Into French Signals Intelligence

Council on Foreign Relations, Alex Grigsby, 2016 09 16

Comment: Something remarkable happened a few months ago. Bernard Barbier, the former head of signals intelligence (SIGINT) between 2006 and 2014 at France's foreign intelligence agency (DGSE), gave a speech at one of France's top engineering schools in which he reflected on his career and imparted some of his wisdom to students. He also said some things that he probably shouldn't have, like confirming that France was behind the Animal Farm advanced persistent threat, commenting on the SIGINT capabilities of European allies, and reacting to the revelation that the U.S. National Security Agency (NSA) had compromised the networks of the French presidency. Last week, Barbier's speech surfaced on YouTube but was quickly taken down (UPDATE: A new version of the video is up here. H/T Boing Boing). However, it was up long enough for French daily Le Monde to transcribe some of the highlights. Here they are, paraphrased and translated from the original French. 1. "I got the order from Mr. Sarkozy's successor [current President Hollande] to shout at the Americans ... it was a great moment in my professional career" Barbier recalls that he was first informed of a possible compromise at the Élysée palace in 2012, when a former colleague working IT security at the palace reached out for analysis on a piece of malware. With the help of a new metadata capability the French obtained in 2012 and Edward Snowden's revelation of the NSA's QUANTUM capability in 2013, Barbier's staff concluded that the attack on the Élysée was the work of the United States. Barbier recalls: 2. "And yes, it was a Frenchman" In 2014, Le Monde published documents from the Snowden archive revealing that Canada's SIGINT agency, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), suspected that Paris was behind a cyber espionage campaign that began in 2009 targeting Iran's nuclear program but also targeting computers in Canada. CSE was able to attribute the campaign to the French based on some reverse engineering revealing that the malware developer used references to a French children's cartoon character, Babar the Elephant. That reference also led Kaspersky to baptise the malware Animal Farm. Barbier recalls that CSE "concluded that he [the malware author] was French. And yes, it was a Frenchman." For me, Snowden is a traitor to his country, but he has nothing to do with Julian Assange. The Americans made Snowden, who was an external contractor, a systems administrator. Those who do that job in the DGSE are bureaucrats that have between fifteen and twenty years of seniority. The possibility of having a Snowden in France is very low. Snowden showed that espionage between allies existed and that Americans compromised hardware, such as that sold by Cisco and poses a problem for technological independence. In that sense, Snowden rather helped us. (Note: Alex Grigsby is the assistant director for the Digital and Cyberspace Policy program at the Council on Foreign Relations.)

62. Turkey detains four over suspected plot against British, German missions

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 09 16

Ankara - Turkish authorities have detained four people as part of the investigation into a potential threat against British and German diplomatic missions in the country but found no links between the suspects and any terrorist groups, state-run Anadolu Agency reported on Sept. 16. The investigation was reportedly prompted by intelligence about a potential Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) threat against the missions. Britain's foreign office had earlier stated that the U.K. Embassy in Ankara had been shut on Sept. 16 for unspecified security reasons. The German Embassy said on its website that its missions were only open for limited operations after a four-day public holiday this week. (Full report).

63. Turquie: quatre arrestations après des menaces contre des ambassades

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 16

Ankara - Trois personnes ont été arrêtées à Ankara et une autre à Istanbul, dans le cadre de l'enquête sur des menaces contre les ambassades britannique et allemande, a rapporté vendredi l'agence de presse Anadolu. L'ambassade britannique à Ankara avait annoncé jeudi qu'elle serait "fermée au public le vendredi 16 octobre pour des raisons de sécurité", sans fournir plus de précisions. De son côté, l'ambassade allemande avait indiqué que ses missions diplomatiques en Turquie allaient "offrir des services limités jusqu'à vendredi", sans étayer davantage sa décision. Selon le journal à grand tirage Bild, missions et écoles allemandes étaient fermées en Turquie en raison de craintes d'une éventuelle attaque. Les autorités turques ont ouvert une enquête après que des services de renseignement ont fait état de probable menace de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI) contre des missions diplomatiques, selon Anadolu. Toutefois, "il n'y a pas de preuves d'appartenance des suspects arrêtés à des organisations terroristes", a indiqué des responsables du ministère turc de l'Intérieur, cités par l'agence Anadolu, précisant que les arrestations ont eu lieu avant les vacances de la Fête du sacrifice (Aïd al-Adha) célébrée lundi. L'ambassadeur britannique en Turquie, Richard Moore, a précisé sur le Twitter que la décision de fermeture de l'ambassade était une "précaution". Les responsables britanniques "travaillent en étroite collaboration avec les autorités turques" qui "prennent les mesures appropriées" compte tenu de menaces, a-t-il ajouté dans son message. La Turquie a été ébranlée cette année par de nombreux attentats attribués aux jihadistes de l'EI ou revendiqués par des rebelles kurdes.

France 3 - Régions (site web), Sophie Courageot, 2016 09 16

Besançon, France - L'information est révélée ce matin pour le journal L'Est Républicain. La police soupçonne ce jeune homme de préparer un attentat à Paris. Selon le journal, le jeune homme a été arrêté la semaine dernière par les hommes du Raid. Il a été mis en examen pour chef d'association de malfaiteurs en vue de la commission d'un acte de terrorisme. L'homme a été écroué. Prénommé Raïme, le suspect était fiché "S". Il aurait prêté allégeance à Daech et cherchait selon les enquêteurs à commettre un attentat à Paris. Des perquisitions ont eu lieu fin août à son domicile dans le quartier Battant à Besançon (Doubs). D'après le quotidien, l'homme avait commencé à rassembler des éléments afin de confectionner une bombe. En Franche-Comté, un autre homme a déjà été mis en cause dans une affaire terroriste. Il s'agit du Pontissalien Yassin Sahli.
