Rio de Janeiro - Brazilian police will take over security screening outside Olympic venues after the private firm contracted to do the job failed to hire enough staff in time for the Games, which begin in a week, Brazil's Ministry of Justice said. Police officers from around the country, including military police, will be stepping in to handle the screening, which includes operating X-ray machines and patting down visitors for weapons and other contraband. The last-minute change is likely to add to security concerns amid global fears of terrorism as hundreds of thousands of athletes and tourists descend on Rio for the Games. The Wall Street Journal reported last week that the firm contracted to hire and train thousands of screeners, Artel Recursos Humanos, had no prior experience with security-related contracts or with contracts for events as big and complicated as the Olympics. Artel was only able to hire 500 workers out of a planned 3,000, and blamed financial difficulties, according to Justice Minister Alexandre de Moraes.

34. Hanson warns Morrison: Don't sell power assets to foreigners (Canada)

The Sydney Morning Herald, Sean Nicholls, 2016 07 30

Canberra - Pauline Hanson has waded into the controversy over the Baird government's part-privatisation of power company Ausgrid, telling federal Treasurer Scott Morrison: "Don't sell our assets". The One Nation senator has posted a video on her Facebook page, noting that Mr Morrison has "on his desk" decisions about three potential asset sales: Ausgrid, gas company Alinta and health company GenesisCare. The sales are being scrutinised by the Foreign Investment Review Board, which will advise Mr Morrison on federal government approval. The NSW government is leasing 50.4 per cent of Ausgrid on a 99-year lease in a deal expected to be worth more than $10 billion. One bidder is the Chinese government-owned State Grid Corporation. The other is the listed, Hong Kong-based company Cheung Kong Infrastructure. Despite Ausgrid being one of three electricity distributors in NSW, Senator Hanson says it would mean "all the electricity in NSW [is] to be sold to overseas interests". Last year electricity company Transgrid was privatised by the Baird government for $10.3 billion to a consortium comprised of a Canadian pension fund, the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority and local infrastructure funds.

35. All eyes on battle of many fronts

The Australian, Cameron Stewart, Paul Maley, 2016 07 30

Canberra - On the evening of September 16, 2014, police intercepted a phone call from Syria to Sydney that would transform the war against Islamic State in Australia. It was from a senior Islamic State operative called Mohamed Ali Baryalei to a suspected Sydney extremist called Omarjan Azari. Baryalei had been in Syria since April 2013 and had established himself as the group's leading recruiter of young Australian Muslims; he was a prime target of Australia's spy services. In a crude bid to defeat surveillance, Baryalei phoned Azari's younger brother. The alleged conversation lasted just a few minutes but by the time it was over it would up-end traditional policing and spur the greatest upheaval in Australia's intelligence community since the Cold War. "What you guys need to do is just pick any random unbeliever," Baryalei allegedly told Azari. "When finished, put the flag of the state in the background and film it and send it off ... Backpacker, tourist, American, French or British even better." Police were stunned. Never before had a terrorist threat developed so quickly. Baryalei's order was briefed up to Australian Federal Police Commissioner Andrew Colvin, who quickly convened a conference with new head of ASIO Duncan Lewis and NSW Police Force Commissioner Andrew Scipione. Unsure if they had months, or moments, to move, they decided to act. Under Operation Appleby, as it came to be known, more than 870 police raided 27 homes in two states in the country's largest counter-terrorism operation. The police who went through the doors that day didn't know it, but they were confronting a new type of terrorism, one that would be repeated over and over in the years to come. Small, spontaneous attacks conducted by homegrown extremists who in many cases had never come to the attention of the security services.

A statement from Singapore's Ministry of Home Affairs said he had embarked on a path of radicalisation before resettling his family in Australia in 2002 and that Zulfikar Shariff had ongoing contact with radical preachers, including Melbourne-based Musa Cerantonio. The ministry has accused the 44-year-old of encouraging online followers to use violence if necessary to establish a global Islamic caliphate.

37. Taliban capture district in Helmand

Associated Press, Mirwais Khan, 2016 07 30

Kandahar - An important district in Afghanistan's southern poppy-growing province of Helmand has fallen to Taliban control after heavy fighting that killed or wounded up to 20 police officers, an official said on Saturday. Abdul Majeed Akhonzada, deputy director of the provincial council, said Kanashin district has "fallen into Taliban hands." The fall of the district, which borders Pakistan and major poppy-producing districts, means "Taliban are in control of 60 percent of Helmand," Akhonzada said. Much of the area of Marjah, Sangin, Garmser and Dishu districts have already fallen to the Taliban, he said. The district police chief and deputy head of the local branch of the national intelligence agency were critically wounded in clashes that began late Friday, he said.

38. Afghan Taliban attempts to attract China support in their campaign

Khaama Press, 2016 07 30

Kabul - The Taliban militants group in Afghanistan is attempting to attract China's support in their ongoing bloody campaign in Afghanistan which has entered to its 15th year with the civilians paying a hefty price of the ongoing violence. According to a Taliban leader quoted in a report by Pakistan's The Express "I can confirm that our delegation had visited China to discuss matters between both countries. They discussed the invasion in the region and to adopt a joint stance against the malicious policies of the invading countries." The Taliban leader further added "Policies of the Islamic Emirate (Taliban) about the region and the world also came under discussion," a Taliban official told The Express Tribune on the condition of anonymity. The official did not make any comment on the possibility of peace talks between the group and the Afghan government. But sources familiar with the visit said both sides "explored prospects" for a political dialogue as Beijing could be an 'honest broker' to start the peace process. This comes as China has stepped up efforts to play a key role in the region amid deteriorating security situation. China was one of the four members of the Quadrilateral Coordination Group which was formed to revive the Afghan peace talks.

39. 36 ISIS militants killed in Nangarhar province of Afghanistan

Reuters News, 2016 07 30

Peshawar - A delegation from the Taliban visited China earlier this month to discuss the situation in Afghanistan, where the insurgent movement is fighting the Western-backed government in Kabul, sources in the Taliban said. A delegation led by Abbas Stanakzai, head of the Taliban's political office in Qatar, visited Beijing on July 18-22 at the invitation of the Chinese government, a senior member of the Taliban said. 42. Strategic aim behind Anti-missile revelation

South China Morning Post, Minnie Chan, 2016 07 30

Beijing - Timing of media reports on successful tests of Chinese system suggests Beijing is responding to South Korea's decision to deploy the US THAAD. Strategic and political goals are likely to be behind China's unusual disclosure this week of advances in one of its antiballistic missile systems, analysts say. On Sunday and Monday, China National Radio, CCTV and PLA Daily's Tv.81.cn website carried reports touting four consecutive successful tests of a "ground-based midcourse defence" (GMD) system at the Korla Missile Test Complex in Xinjiang (新疆). GMD systems plot, target and destroy ballistic missiles in space. CCTV said the four tests indicated that the system was ready for basic deployment in war, making China the second country after the United States to have the -technology.

Yonhap News, 2016 07 30

North Korean Ambassador to China Ji Jae-ryong accompanied Choe from the Beijing airport to the embassy building. Whether Choe would meet any Chinese official in Beijing remained unclear.

44. Clashes between govt, ASG to displace more civilians

The Manila Times, Moh Saaduddin, 2016 07 30

Manila - The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has raised concern over the plight of thousands of civilians displaced by ongoing fighting in Basilan between government forces and jihadist militants supporting the international radical group Islamic State (IS). "The security situation in Basilan is precarious. We are concerned for the civilians as we expect clashes to continue in the coming weeks," Yann Fridez, head of the ICRC sub-delegation in Mindanao, said in a statement provided to the media on Friday. The renewed fighting early this month has dislocated 3,400 families or 17,000 individuals in the towns of Tipo-Tipo, Al-Barka and Ungkaya Pukan where civilians sought refuge with relatives because of shelling and air strikes over the past three weeks. Casualties and injured fighters were reported on both sides, while a few civilians were also wounded as a consequence of the clashes. "We urge all parties to the fighting to exercise utmost precaution to minimize the impact or damage to civilian communities. We also ask them to spare civilian structures such as hospitals, schools and houses, and facilities that are essential for their daily lives," Fridez said.

Agence France Presse, 2016 07 30

Lagos - Dans le Delta du Niger, coeur de la production pétrolière du Nigeria, la population s'inquiète du déploiement d'une force spéciale de l'armée pour mater une nouvelle rébellion qui attaque plateformes et gazoducs. En annonçant ce déploiement cette semaine, l'armée nigériane a demandé aux habitants de la région de « ne pas paniquer » s'ils croisent des mouvements inhabituels de troupes, ainsi que de « lourds attirails militaires ». « Le but de cet exercice est d'entraîner nos forces spéciales et d'autres unités de l'armée nigériane à mener des opérations amphibies dans des environnements riverains », a indiqué l'armée qui dit aussi vouloir cibler les « criminels, les auteurs de kidnappings, les rebelles et les pirates » actifs dans cette région constellée de criques et de marécages. Mais pour de nombreux leaders communautaires de cette immense zone pétrolifère, d'où la première économie africaine tire la quasi-totalité de ses revenus, user de la force ne pourrait être qu'une menace contre les populations et aggraver le conflit avec les Vengeurs du Delta du Niger (NDA), rébellion active depuis le début de l'année.

48. UN Security Council agrees to send police to Burundi

BBC News, 2016 07 30

Bujumbura - The UN Security Council has authorised the deployment of a UN police force to Burundi to try to quell violence and human rights abuses in the country. The council backed a French-drafted resolution to send up to 228 police for an initial period of a year. Burundi earlier said it would accept no more than 50 police officers. More than 400 people have been killed in unrest since President Pierre Nkurunziza said he would run for a third term in office last April. "Given an increase in violence and tension the Security Council must have eyes and ears on the ground to predict and ensure that the worst does not occur in Burundi," said French UN Ambassador Francois Delattre. "This is a strong act of preventative diplomacy," he added. The government of Burundi earlier warned it would agree to no more than 50 UN police officers. Diplomats are now negotiating how to implement the UN Security Council's resolution.

49. Turkey's anti-Gulen crackdown ripples far and wide

Reuters News, 2016 07 30

Mogadishu - Barely 12 hours after a failed coup in Turkey, Somalia's cabinet met in Mogadishu to consider a request from Ankara to shut down two schools and a hospital linked to Fethullah Gulen, the Muslim cleric Turkey blames for the attempted putsch. Such is Turkey's sway in the Horn of Africa nation, where it has spearheaded international reconstruction efforts after decades of war and instability, it was not a difficult decision. Teachers and pupils - almost all of them Somali - at the two huge boarding schools run by Gulen's Nile Academy educational foundation were given seven days to pack their bags and, if they were foreign, leave the country. "Considering the request of our brother country Turkey, the cabinet ministers have agreed upon the following points - to stop the services provided by Nile Academy including schools, hospitals, etc," a July 16 government statement said. A week later the order had been carried out to the letter. Turkey's ties with Somalia are well established. President Tayyip Erdogan became the first non-African leader to visit Somalia in nearly 20 years when he travelled there in 2011 as Turkey's prime minister. Turkey was a major contributor to the humanitarian aid effort during the 2011 famine and Ankara continues to build hospitals and dispatch aid across Somalia.

"The Syrian issue has no military solution. The interfering policies in the region have destroyed the economic structures of the country and it has fully become clear that the Syrian government has not and will not have any substitute," Qassemi said in a meeting with Chief Editorial Writer of Kyodo News Agency Hiroki Sugita in Tehran. Expressing regret of certain countries' double-standard approach in fighting against terrorism and dividing the terrorists into good and bad groups, he said, "Certain states use their oil revenues to destroy the region."

51. Russia has motive, capability and form for U.S. email hack

Reuters, Andrew Osborn, 2016 07 30

Moscow - The Kremlin says it had zero involvement in the hacking of Democratic Party emails while U.S. officials say the hack originated in Russia. We may never know who is right, but one thing is for sure - Russia had motive, capability and form. Seen through Kremlin eyes, Moscow would only be doing what it feels the United States has been doing to it for years anyway - interfering in a geopolitical rival's domestic politics in an attempt to destabilize and shape events. President Vladimir Putin said in February he had seen specific intelligence suggesting Russia's foreign enemies - code for Washington - were preparing to meddle in Russian parliamentary elections later this year. And in 2011, Putin accused the U.S. State Department and Hillary Clinton, its then head, of stirring up street protests against his rule. "We need to head off any external attempts to interfere in the elections, in our domestic political life," Putin, who is facing re-election in 2018, told officers from Russia's FSB security service in February. "You know that certain kinds of (political) technologies exist and have already been used in many countries."

52. FSB Detects Cyberattacks on 20 Russian Organizations, Including Military Targets

Sputnik News Service, 2016 07 30

Moscow - Russian Federal Security Service (FSB) exposed planting of malicious software designed for cyber espionage in computer networks of about 20 Russian institutions, including government and military bodies, FSB press service said Saturday. "Instances of planting of malicious software designed for cyber espionage in computer networks of some 20 organizations located on the territory of Russia have been exposed... Information resources of public authorities, scientific and military institutions, enterprises of the military — industrial complex and other objects of country's critical infrastructure were contaminated," the statement read. The press service stressed that the attack was professionally planned, has similar traits with the previously exposed attacks from all over the world. "The latest sets of software are made for each 'victim' individually, based on the unique characteristics of the targeted PC. The spread of the virus is carried out by the means of targeted attacks on PC by sending an e-mail containing a malicious attachment," the statement continued adding that the software made it possible to do screenshots, turn on web-camera and microphones, collect data from the keyboard use.

53. Syrian civilians begin leaving rebel held parts of Aleppo

The Associated Press, Bassem Mrouem, 2016 07 30

Beirut - Dozens of families and some opposition fighters started leaving besieged rebel-held neighbourhoods in the northern Syrian city of Aleppo on Saturday after the government opened safe corridors for civilians and fighters who want to leave, state media reported. The government completely closed the main road into rebel-held areas of Aleppo on July 17, effectively besieging the 300,000 people living there. Earlier this week, Syrian President Bashar Assad offered an amnesty to rebels who lay down their arms and surrender to authorities in the next three months. About a dozen young men were shown on state TV surrendering to government forces. All had covered their faces, and most were carrying automatic rifles over their head. As the men walked out of a building, Syrian government soldiers pointed their rifles toward them. State TV also showed dozens of women and children arriving in a street lined with heavily damaged buildings in the government-held part of Aleppo's Salaheddine neighbourhood. State news agency SANA said the civilians later boarded buses and were taken to shelters set up by the government on the western side of Aleppo.

54. CIA chief not optimistic Syria will remain one country

Al Jazeera, 2016 07 30

Beirut - John Brennan fears it may be impossible to save Syria from partition, amid conflict in which nearly 400,000 have died. The head of the US Central Intelligence Agency has said he is not optimistic about the future of Syria remaining one country. John Brennan's comments are a rare public acknowledgement by a senior US official that Syria may not survive a five-year civil war in its current state. "I don't know whether or not Syria can be put back together again," he said on Friday at the annual Aspen Security Forum in Colorado. "There's been so much blood spilled, I don't know if we're going to be able to get back to [a unified Syria] in my life time." John Kerry, US secretary of state, expressed similar fears in February, saying he would move towards a "Plan B" that could involve a partition of Syria if a ceasefire did not materialise in advance of peace talks in March. "It may be too late to keep it as a whole Syria if we wait much longer," Kerry told the US Senate foreign relations committee. However, he did not directly advocate for partition as a solution.

55. Yemen government withdraws from Kuwait talks with rebels

The Associated Press, Ahmed Al-Haj, 2016 07 30

Sana'a - Yemen's government delegation on Saturday quit talks in Kuwait with Shiite Houthi rebels, having agreed to resume them earlier this month. Officials with Yemen's internationally recognized government of President Abed Rabbo Mansour Hadi told The Associated Press they were considering proposals to reconvene the talks, which have failed to bridge the gap with the rebels, in Oman. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to brief reporters. Hadi's exiled government is backed by a U.S. assisted Saudi-led military campaign against the Shiite rebels, who overran the Yemeni capital in late 2014. The war has killed some 9,000 people. Hadi's negotiators are demanding the implementation of a U.N. Security Council resolution which stipulates the withdrawal of militias from all cities. The Houthis want the Saudi-led offensives to stop first, and also a share of power in a transitional government.

56. Belgium arrests 2 brothers suspected of plotting attack

Associated Press, 2016 07 30

Brussels - Two brothers have been arrested in Belgium on suspicion of plotting a terrorist attack, the Federal Prosecutor's Office announced Saturday. Nourredine H., 33, and his brother Hamza H. were taken in for questioning following police searches Friday evening in the city of Liege and the Mons region. A Belgian judge will decide Saturday whether the two men should remain in custody. The police searches were carried out at the request of a magistrate specializing in terrorism investigations, the prosecutor's office said in a statement. It said that according to preliminary information, the brothers may have been involved in plans to commit an attack in Belgium. In the search of seven houses in the Mons area and Liege, no weapons or explosives were found, officials said.

57. Turkish authorities free over 800 soldiers in coup probe

The Associated Press, 2016 07 30

Istanbul - Turkish courts on Saturday released over 800 enlisted conscripts who were under arrest as part of the investigation into the July 15 failed coup, the state-run Anadolu news agency said. In Istanbul, 758 out of 989 conscripts under arrest in the coup investigation were freed by the chief public prosecutor's office following a court decision. The prosecutors recommended their release on the grounds they had delivered their testimony and did not pose a flight risk. The conscripts had been doing their compulsory military service when the attempted coup took place. Among those released were military high school students. Another 47 enlisted conscripts were released by a court in Ankara on similar grounds.

According to the latest figures by Interior Minister Efkan Ala, over 9,000 people, mostly in the military, have been put under arrest in the aftermath of the failed coup, which caused the deaths of more than 200 people. Thousands more have been detained, but not formally arrested.

58. Pentagon says US general's comments on coup attempt 'misunderstood'

Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 07 30

Washington - The head of U.S. Central Command was misunderstood when he commented about a recent coup attempt in Turkey, the Pentagon said on July 29. "Any reports that suggest Gen. [Joseph] Votel expressed support in any fashion for the actions of Turkish military officers who undertook illegal military action against the Turkish government are factually inaccurate," Pentagon spokesman Peter Cook said during a press briefing, the state-Run Anadolu Agency reported. Cook's comments comes after Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan lashed out at Votel for commenting that some Turkish officers with whom the U.S. had relations are currently detained for their role in the attempted overthrow. Speaking on July 28 at the Aspen Security Forum in Colorado organized by the Washington-based think tank, Votel said the Turkish government's roundup of coup plotters might impair relations between the two militaries.

59. La colère d'Erdogan

La Presse, Laura-Julie Perreault, 2016 07 30

Istanbul - Plus de 15 000 personnes ont été arrêtées en Turquie depuis le coup d'État raté. Parmi eux, des militaires, des juges, des fonctionnaires, mais aussi une horde de journalistes, dans une rafle sans précédent qui inquiète la communauté internationale. Apeurés, des milliers de Turcs vivent dans la peur, se demandant s'ils seront les prochaines cibles du gouvernement. Pas question de rencontrer une journaliste en personne. Encore moins de donner son vrai nom pour publication. Ancienne chroniqueuse dans un journal visé par le gouvernement turc après le coup d'État raté de la mi-juillet, Zeynep a peur d'être dans la mire du gouvernement. «Je sais qu'ils vont venir m'arrêter un jour. Je redoute le moment où on sonnera à ma porte.» Déjà, plus de 50 de ses anciens collègues ont atterri derrière les barreaux au cours des derniers jours. Tous, ils ont travaillé pour le journal Zaman, l'un des plus lus du pays. Ce quotidien et ses filiales diverses appartenaient jusqu'à récemment au mouvement Gülen, réseau islamique que le président Recep Tayyip Erdogan tient responsable des événements tragiques du 15 juillet qui ont fait au moins 270 morts. Aujourd'hui, ces journalistes emprisonnés sont au nombre des 15 000 personnes arrêtées au cours des deux dernières semaines, selon un décompte d'Amnistie internationale. Les deux tiers de ces arrestations ont eu lieu dans les rangs des forces armées, mais les militaires n'ont été que la première cible des purges: plus de 45 000 personnes ont été limogées, notamment des doyens d'université, des juges et des fonctionnaires. Une interdiction de voyager a été imposée à des milliers d'universitaires. Plus de 1000 écoles soupçonnées d'appartenir au mouvement Gülen ont été fermées.

60. Pour le pays, pour l'islam

La Presse, Laura-Julie Perreault, 2016 07 30

Istanbul - Dans la chambre d'hôpital flambant neuve, Safiye Bayat est tout sourire. Même si elle est alitée après avoir été atteinte à la jambe par une balle de fusil, la mère de famille a le cœur à la fête. La tentative de coup d'État du 15 juillet, orchestrée par une faction des forces armées, a échoué. En partie grâce à elle. Grande admiratrice du président islamoconservateur Recep Tayyip Erdogan, la femme de 34 ans a fait partie des milliers de Turcs qui sont descendus dans les rues pour s'opposer au coup d'État qui était en cours. La plupart ont pris la décision après avoir entendu l'appel du président. Alors qu'il tentait d'échapper aux putschistes, le chef d'État s'est adressé au peuple turc à partir de son cellulaire, demandant à la population de résister. Cet appel a ensuite été lancé par des centaines d'imams qui ont fait des mosquées du pays leurs haut-parleurs. Safiye Bayat, elle, avait pris sa décision bien avant. «Dès que j'ai vu que des chars d'assaut étaient sur le pont du Bosphore, je me suis dit que quelque chose d'extraordinaire se passait. Et c'était mon devoir de citoyenne de ne pas permettre que ça se passe», raconte-t-elle aujourd'hui à partir de son lit de l'hôpital. Son mari a essayé de la retenir, lui rappelant que ses deux enfants de 6 et 10 ans comptaient sur elle. «Quand c'est le sort de mon pays qui est en jeu, je me fiche de ma propre sécurité. Je suis partie à pied, avec une trousse de premiers soins et mon cellulaire, raconte la femme qui porte le voile islamique. C'était la première fois que je désobéissais à mon mari.» Arrivée sur le légendaire pont qui fait le lien entre l'Europe et l'Asie, Safiye Bayat s'est approchée des trois tanks des putschistes. Elle s'est arrêtée quand elle a pu s'adresser à l'un des soldats. «Je lui ai demandé pourquoi ils étaient là. Ce qu'ils comptaient faire. Je leur ai dit que je ne partirais pas avant d'avoir une réponse. Si j'avais été un homme, ils m'auraient tuée. Je me disais que puisque j'étais une femme, ils allaient seulement me rabrouer », dit-elle aujourd'hui.

61. Turkey's Spies Failed to See Coup Coming --- Intelligence service reviewed millions of encrypted messages, found no talk of a plot

The Wall Street Journal, Joe Parkinson and Adam Entous, 2016 07 30

Ankara - In the months before Turkey's failed coup, the country's spy agency penetrated online chat rooms and decoded millions of secret messages but found no mention of the plot, senior Turkish intelligence officials said. Agents checked tips pointing to a coup that led nowhere. Analysts studied the video sermons of an imam who the government alleges directed the plot and speculated if the color of his robes relayed secret orders to his followers. Turkey's spies, juggling terrorist threats from Islamic State and Kurdish separatists, struggled to make sense of clues that never seemed to add up until the conspiracy they feared most materialized on the night of July 15. Failure to detect the coup revealed the limitations of Turkey's spy agency, known as MIT, which is widely seen as operating a far-reaching domestic surveillance system that government critics allege serves to protect President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. The challenge of sifting through a daily avalanche of electronic communications was compounded by encryption apps used by the alleged plotters, leaving Turkey's spy service in the dark this year for several months. U.S. intelligence agencies, whose work with the MIT is colored by distrust, also didn't see the coup coming, officials said, even though it threatened to compromise the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's second-largest army. The agencies saw only brewing political resentment, with U.S. surveillance of communications in Turkey focused on militants, not military officers.

62. Nice: un suspect transféré lundi à Paris

Le Figaro.fr, 2016 07 30

Paris - Un homme, interpellé dans l'enquête sur l'attentat du 14 juillet à Nice, va être transféré lundi à Paris en vue d'une éventuelle mise en examen par un juge antiterroriste tandis qu'un autre a vu sa garde à vue levée. Le suspect, âgé de 36 ans, a été arrêté lundi par la police judiciaire de Nice. Il apparaît dans un selfie pris par l'auteur de l'attaque, Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel, devant le camion lancé sur la foule quelques jours plus tard. Les enquêteurs soupçonnent qu'il aurait pu être au courant des projets du tueur, selon cette source. Loin d'être un loup solitaire, Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel, qui a tué 84 personnes à Nice le soir du 14 juillet, semble avoir "mûri" son projet depuis plusieurs mois et bénéficié de "complicités", d'après le procureur de la République de Paris, François Molins. Quatre hommes, âgés de 21 à 40 ans, et une femme de 42 ans, inconnus des services de renseignement, ont été mis en examen le 21 juillet et placés en détention provisoire. Chokri C., Mohamed Oualid G. et Ramzi A. sont poursuivis pour "complicité d'assassinats en bande organisée en relation avec une entreprise terroriste". L'enquête a mis en lumière leur présence aux côtés du tueur dans les jours ayant précédé le carnage ou, dans le cas de Ramzi A., a révélé que des SMS envoyés par Lahouaiej Bouhlel lui avaient été adressés juste avant la tuerie.

63. France: Manuel Valls veut suspendre le financement étranger des mosques

Radio France Internationale, 2016 07 30

Paris - Manuel Valls propose d'interdire temporairement le financement étranger des mosquées. Le Premier ministre français entend ainsi utiliser ce moyen pour limiter le radicalisme dans certains lieux de cultes, étant donné que l'État français n'a aucune main sur leur financement. Ce qui est d'ailleurs le cas pour toutes les religions depuis plus d'un siècle. Mais cette proposition est largement contestée. Depuis la loi de 1905 séparant l'Église et l'État, ce dernier ne participe pas aux financements des lieux de culte. Les fonds sont donc d'origine privée, mais les besoins diffèrent selon les religions. Ainsi, les cultes catholique et juif possèdent, du simple fait de l'histoire, de nombreux lieux pour leurs fidèles. Pour des raisons patrimoniales, ces églises et ces synagogues appartiennent aux communes, qui ont donc la charge de les entretenir avec les pratiquants. Il n'y a donc pas nécessairement besoin d'en construire de nouvelles. Il en va cependant différemment pour le culte musulman. La deuxième religion de France compte aujourd'hui environ 2 500 mosquées sur le territoire, ce qui n'est pas assez par rapport au nombre de fidèles.

64. Attentats du 13 novembre: l'Autriche a remis deux suspects à la France

Radio France Internationale, 2016 07 30

Paris - Ils avaient été arrêtés en décembre dernier dans un centre de réfugiés en Autriche. Deux hommes soupçonnés d'avoir voulu prendre part aux attentats de Paris du 13 novembre viennent d'être remis à la justice française. D'après le parquet de Salszbouurg, il s'agit d'un Algérien de 29 ans et d'un Pakistanais de 35 ans, qui s'étaient mêlés au flux des réfugiés pour rejoindre l'Europe depuis la Syrie. Ils devaient se rendre à Paris pour « accomplir une mission au nom de l'organisation Etat islamique ». C'est ce qu'a avoué Adel Haddadi, un Algérien de 28 ans, aux enquêteurs autrichiens. Comme deux des kamikazes qui se sont fait exploser au stade de France le 13 novembre, Adel Haddadi et Mohamad Usman, un Pakistanais de 22 ans, sont passés par Leros, en Grèce. À la différence près que ces derniers ont été arrêtés pour usage de faux passeport. Ils avaient été incarcérés jusqu'au 28 octobre, puis avaient gagné l'Autriche où ils étaient hébergés dans un centre d'accueil pour demandeurs d'asile jusqu'à leur arrestation, le 10 décembre.

Le Point.fr, Aziz Zemouri, 2016 07 30

Paris - Le ministre de l'Intérieur Bernard Cazeneuve affirme que le décloisonnement des services de lutte contre le terrorisme fonctionne. Rien n'est moins sûr... « Tragique raté de coordination DGSI-Uclat sur le 2e suspect de #StEtienneduRouvray... » tweetait jeudi le député LR Georges Fenech. L'ex-président de la commission d'enquête parlementaire sur la politique gouvernementale en matière de lutte contre le terrorisme est très affirmatif. Tragique raté de coordination DGSI-UCLAT sr le 2ème suspect de #StEtienneduRouvray. Il y a urgence à créer l'agence nationale anti-terroriste. Officiellement, la centrale du renseignement intérieur qui dispose de l'identité d'Abdel Malik Petitjean depuis le 29 juin ne détenait aucune photo du terroriste. Raison pour laquelle, le 22 juillet, l'Unité de coordination de la lutte antiterroriste (Uclat) rédigeait une note à tous les services de police afin d'identifier un individu (dont la photo est jointe) et qui s'apprêtait à commettre un attentat dans l'Hexagone. La veille, une perquisition de la Sous-direction antiterroriste (Sdat) chez un acolyte de Petitjean avait permis de retrouver une vidéo dans laquelle l'assassin du père Jacques Hamel menace de « détruire ce pays » et appelle à « agresser en masse », notamment « avec des couteaux », le tout en invoquant deux formules rituelles musulmanes en arabe apparemment sans en comprendre le sens. C'est de cette vidéo qu'est tiré le portrait qui accompagne la note de l'Uclat.

1. Exclusif - GRC: des dizaines d'armes volées ou perdues depuis 2008

La Presse, Louis-Samuel Perron, 2016 08 07

Ottawa - Une adolescente de Winnipeg atteinte par balle a frôlé la mort l'an dernier. Le pistolet de son assaillant s'est révélé être une arme de service volée à un policier de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC). Fusil à pompe, pistolet, carabine : 60 armes à feu ont été déclarées volées ou perdues par les agents de la GRC depuis 2008. Entre 2008 et mars 2016, les agents de la police montée ont perdu 48 armes à feu et s'en sont fait voler 12, a appris La Presse grâce à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information. En 2012 seulement, pas moins de 21 armes à feu ont disparu dans la nature. L'an dernier, 10 armes avaient été égarées ou avaient été volées. Onze modèles distincts font partie des armes manquantes, tels un fusil Winchester 70, une carabine Colt M16A1 881 et un pistolet Berreta 1934. Une mitraillette de modèle Heckler & Koch MP-5 a même été déclarée perdue entre 2005 et 2008, révèle un autre document de la GRC. L'arme de service des policiers de la GRC, le Smith & Wesson 5946, est l'arme la plus prisée par les voleurs, puisqu'elle a été subtilisée à 11 reprises depuis 2008. L'arme égarée le plus souvent est toutefois le fusil à pompe (shotgun) Remington 870, déclaré perdu à 18 occasions depuis 2008, dont 8 fois uniquement en 2012. Ce modèle se trouve dans presque tous les véhicules de la GRC.

2. Entrapment decision a pyrrhic victory if Bill C-51 not amended

The Toronto Star, Faisal Kutty, 2016 08 07

OpEd: "They were not capable of carrying out a terrorist attack," said the young man who showed up at my door after midnight on June 3rd, 2006. Hours earlier, Canada had witnessed a massive anti-terror sweep. Seventeen people were arrested (an 18th individual was picked up later), though seven had their charges stayed or dismissed. My client had attended what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police labelled a "training camp" in Rockwood, Ont. a few weeks earlier. The camp was just one of the pieces of two terror plots facilitated by paid government informants. In fact, the RCMP also arranged for delivery of a harmless substance (passed off as ammonium nitrate) to the group in a sting operation. The 19-year-old wanted to reach out to the police. He later testified for the government that there was no training, just some guys "chilling" and trying to "look cool, to look tough." The entrapment defence failed at trial. Given the deferential nature of courts in terrorism trials, the recent B.C. Supreme Court decision tossing out convictions, against John Nuttall and Amanda Korody, was a stunner. "The world has enough terrorists. We do not need the police to create more," said Justice Catherine Bruce in a scathing ruling. "It was the police who were the leaders of the plot." Proactive investigations are the norm in the anti-terrorism realm. Similar to drug, gang and prostitution offences, terrorism due to its very nature is ideal for state actors to infiltrate and disrupt. The problem is that informants sometimes provide the means, opportunity and even inducements to push someone to commit one of the growing numbers of vague and ill-defined terrorist crimes. Indeed, even agencies have an incentive, in the words of former assistant director of the FBI, Thomas Fuentes, to "Keep Fear Alive" with an eye on the budget. 3. Policy on drone strikes is declassified

The Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 08 07

Washington - President Obama must approve operational plans to target overseas terrorist suspects with drones or other weapons outside war zones but in some cases does not sign off on specific strikes, according to newly declassified administration guidelines. In addition to setting out the role of the president, the guidelines emphasize the importance of "verifying" the identity of high-value targets, even as they outline the criteria and legality of striking unidentified others when "necessary to achieve U.S. policy objectives." The guidelines provide rules for targeting U.S. citizens abroad and include lengthy guidance on what to do with captured terrorist suspects. "In no event," the document says, "will additional detainees be brought to the detention facilities at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base." The 18-page top-secret document was declassified and released late Friday, with relatively minor redactions, in response to a federal court order. When Obama signed the guidelines, in May 2013, the administration released a brief "fact sheet" on procedures and criteria for such operations that were drawn from the classified version. Those rules included "near certainty" that the terrorist target was present and that no civilians would be injured or killed, that the target posed a "continuing and imminent" threat to Americans, that capture was not feasible, and that all relevant domestic and international laws were obeyed.

4. Iran executes nuclear scientist who spied for U.S.

Politico.com, Nahal Toosi, 2016 08 07

Washington - The Iranian government has executed a nuclear scientist who was believed to have cooperated with U.S. intelligence but who returned to Iran after claiming he had been abducted and tortured by the CIA. The tale of Shahram Amiri was one of the stranger sagas to emerge from Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state, testing her diplomatic skills in highly sensitive circumstances. His death comes just over a year after Iran and the U.S. struck a deal aimed at reining in Iran's nuclear program, an agreement Clinton was instrumental in launching. State-controlled Iranian media on Sunday confirmed Amiri's execution, quoting an Iranian judiciary spokesman as saying that Amiri "provided the enemy with vital information of the country." His family told the BBC his body had rope marks, indicating he had been hanged, apparently in the past week. Amiri went missing in Saudi Arabia in May or June 2009 while on religious pilgrimage to Mecca. In the following months, Iranian officials accused the U.S. of abducting him. The State Department claimed for months that it "had no information" on Amiri. The Iranian resurfaced publicly on June 7, 2010 in a pair of Internet videos. In one, he claimed he'd been kidnapped by the CIA during his pilgrimage and was being held in Tucson, Arizona, where he has been subject to torture and psychological pressure. In the other, he claimed he was in the U.S. to further his education and was free and safe. Amiri appeared in a third video posted June 29, 2010, where he said he'd escaped U.S. custody and had reached Virginia. Two weeks later, Amiri walked into the Pakistani Embassy in Washington, D.C., which houses an Iranian interests section, and said he wanted to return to Iran.

5. US reportedly elevates the role of Cyber Command

Washington - Now that the US treats cyberwarfare as a staple of its combat operations, it's ready to raise the prominence of its internet warriors. Reuters sources say that the Obama administration is planning to elevate Cyber Command, turning it into a "unified command" that's just as crucial as a major regional section like Pacific Command. The proposed shuffle would also detach Cyber Command from the NSA, giving it more input on the use of online weapons and defenses. There's no guarantee that the reorganization will go through as it exists right now. Neither Cyber Command nor the NSA are commenting, and an unnamed official tells Reuters that the link between Cyber Command and the NSA is "critical to national security." If the report is accurate, though, the reform isn't likely to face significant opposition.

6. Iran says it executed nuclear scientist in US spy mystery

The Associated Press, Nasser Karimi And Jon Gambrell, 2016 08 07

Tehran - Iran executed a nuclear scientist who defected to the U.S. in 2009 and later returned to the Islamic Republic under mysterious circumstances a year later, authorities said Sunday, acknowledging for the first time that they had secretly detained, tried and convicted a man authorities once heralded as a hero. Shahram Amiri vanished in 2009 while on a religious pilgrimage to Muslim holy sites in Saudi Arabia, only to reappear a year later in a series of online videos filmed in the U.S. He then walked into the Iranian interests section at the Pakistani Embassy in Washington and demanded to be sent home. In interviews, Amiri described being kidnapped and held against his will by Saudi and American spies, while U.S. officials said he was to receive millions of dollars for his help in understanding Iran's contested nuclear program. He was hanged the same week as Tehran executed a group of militants, a year after his country agreed to a landmark accord to limit uranium enrichment in exchange for the lifting of economic sanctions. Speaking to journalists Sunday, Iranian judiciary spokesman Gholamhosein Mohseni Ejeji said Amiri was convicted of spying charges as he "provided the enemy with vital information of the country."

7. Military success in Syria gives Putin upper hand in U.S. proxy war

The New York Times, Mark Mazzetti, Anne Barnard and Eric Schmitt, 2016 08 07

Washington - Intelligence assessments circulated in Washington that the Syrian president, Bashar Assad, was losing his grip on power. But then the Russians arrived, bludgeoning CIA-backed rebel forces with an air campaign that has sent them into retreat. And now rebel commanders, clinging to besieged neighborhoods in the divided city of Aleppo, say their shipments of CIA-provided anti-tank missiles are drying up. For the first time since Afghanistan in the 1980s, the Russian military for the past year has been in direct combat with rebel forces trained and supplied by the CIA. The American-supplied Afghan fighters prevailed during that Cold War conflict. But this time the outcome — thus far — has been different. "Russia has won the proxy war, at least for now," said Michael Kofman, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington. Russia's battlefield successes in Syria have given Moscow, isolated by the West after its annexation of Crimea and other incursions into Ukraine, new leverage in decisions about the future of the Middle East. The Obama administration is now talking with President Vladimir Putin's government about a plan to share intelligence and coordinate airstrikes against the Islamic State and other militant groups in Syria, and Putin has thus far met his goals in Syria without becoming caught in a quagmire that some — including President Barack Obama — had predicted he would. But even Obama has expressed wariness about an enduring deal with Moscow.

The Intercept, Cora Currier, 2016 08 07

Washington — The Obama Administration has released its internal guidelines for how it decides to kill or capture alleged terrorists around the globe, three years after they came into effect. They provide a look at the drone war bureaucracy behind hundreds of strikes in Yemen, Pakistan, Somalia and elsewhere, a system President Obama will hand off to his successor. The guidelines show the process is concentrated at the White House, specifically in the National Security Council. They also describe the process for approving so-called signature strikes, where the target of the strike is not a known "high value terrorist," but rather some other "terrorist target," which could be a group of people exhibiting suspect behavior, or a vehicle, building or other infrastructure. Amid all these procedural details, however, the presidential policy guidance, or "playbook," as it has been called, does not provide new insight into when, where, and under what authorities someone can be killed, or what kind of intelligence is necessary to make that decision. Much of the document, which is dated May 22, 2013, echoes public statements by administration officials over the past several years and previously-released material. The general standards for killing terrorist targets away from active battlefields were made public that May, when the president gave a speech and issued an abbreviated version of the guidance, promising that the United States would only undertake lethal action against a terrorist if they posed a continuing, imminent threat to U.S. persons, and if capture was not feasible.

8. U.S. Releases Rules for Airstrike Killings of Terror Suspects

The New York Times, Charlie Savage, 2016 08 07

Washington - The Obama administration has disclosed its rules and procedures for targeting individuals for killing outside conventional war zones — including with drones — further lifting the secrecy surrounding one of its most disputed tactics for fighting terrorism. The newly declassified document shows that if the top lawyers and leaders of the departments and agencies on the National Security Council agree that a proposed strike would be lawful and appropriate, the Pentagon or the Central Intelligence Agency can proceed. If they disagree, or if the person to be targeted is an American citizen, the matter must go to the president for a decision. President Obama issued the 18-page set of rules, sometimes called the drone strike “playbook” but formally known as the Presidential Policy Guidance, in May 2013. It was classified, although the administration publicly said it tightened standards for strikes — including requirements that targets must pose a threat to Americans and the “near certainty” that there would be no civilian deaths. The government had said this year that it intended to make the guidance public as part of a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union. It provided the document to the A.C.L.U. late Friday, and the organization posted it on its website Saturday morning.

9. Trump adviser's comments, ties to Moscow stir unease

Washington - In early June, a little-known adviser to Donald Trump stunned a gathering of high-powered Washington foreign policy experts meeting with the visiting prime minister of India, going off topic with effusive praise for Russian President Vladimir Putin and Trump. The adviser, Carter Page, hailed Putin as stronger and more reliable than President Obama, according to three people who were present at the closed-door meeting at Blair House - and then touted the positive effect a Trump presidency would have on U.S.-Russia relations. A month later, Page dumbfounded foreign policy experts again by giving another speech harshly critical of U.S. policy - this time in Moscow. The United States and other Western nations have "criticized these regions for continuing methods which were prevalent during the Cold War period," Page said in a lecture at the New Economic School commencement. "Yet ironically, Washington and other Western capitals have impeded potential progress through their often hypocritical focus on ideas such as democratization, inequality, corruption and regime change." Page has an ambiguous role in Trump's campaign. But since being named to the Republican nominee's team in March, his stature within the foreign policy world has grown considerably, drawing alarm from more-established foreign policy experts who view him as having little real understanding about U.S.-Russia relations. Many also say that Page's views may be compromised by his investment in Russian energy giant Gazprom.

10. Going into Ukraine

Washington Post, 2016 08 07

Editorial: Donald Trump's assertion that Russia "is not going to go into Ukraine" reminded us that very little reporting has been done in recent months about the state of the conflict in the eastern provinces of Donetsk and Luhansk, which were first invaded by Russian forces in early 2014. That's unfortunate, because while the West's attention has been otherwise occupied this summer, Russia and its proxies have steadily escalated the fighting. According to the United Nations, 20 civilians were killed and 122 injured in June and July, more than double the average monthly toll of the previous nine months. The Ukrainian army, for its part, reported at least 13 soldiers killed in July. Most of the deaths came in shelling attacks by heavy weapons, including artillery and Grad rockets, that were expressly prohibited by the two peace agreements Russia and Ukraine made. Apart from brief periods, the Russian side has never fully observed the cease-fire, according to reports by international monitors. Meanwhile, military supplies continue to pour across Ukraine's eastern border, parts of which Russia exclusively controls. According to statements by Ukrainian officials, at least 19 trains carrying military hardware crossed the border in July. On Aug. 2, authorities reported that 30 tanks, 11 armored vehicles and six Grad rocket systems had been shipped in during the previous week. This despite repeated Russian commitments to pull all such weapons back from the front lines and place them under monitoring.

11. Russia's superior new weapons

The Washington Post, Robert H. Scales, 2016 08 07

Column: In November, while visiting the headquarters of the U.S. Army in Europe, I received a briefing on the performance of the Russian army in Ukraine. In a perfunctory tone, the young intelligence briefer recited the details of the July 2014 Battle of Zelenopillya, in which a single Russian artillery "fire strike" almost destroyed two Ukrainian mechanized battalions in a few minutes. I couldn't help imagining a U.S. armored battalion subjected to a similar fire strike. I realized then that Ukraine had become Russia's means for showcasing what might happen if we ever fought a firepower-intensive battle against it. "You know, guys," I mused in the moment, "this is the first time since the beginning of the Cold War that an American war-fighting function has been bested by a foreign military." This revelation was all the more disturbing because artillery firepower has been a centerpiece of U.S. land warfare for almost a century. At Normandy, the Germans had nothing good to say about the quality of U.S. armor and infantry. But they feared U.S. artillery. The Germans could not mass fire across unit boundaries. But an American invention, the coordinated-fire "time on target," could bring hundreds of guns to bear on a single target, delivering thousands of rounds simultaneously. The effect on the Germans was devastating. During the Gulf War, the Iraqis most feared what they called "steel rain." The "rain" consisted of hundreds of thousands of flashlight-size bomblets stuffed into artillery shells and rocket warheads. U.S. counter-fire radar, mated to multiple-launch rocket systems (MLRS), smothered Saddam Hussein's much-vaunted artillery in a massive series of day-long barrages. The Iraqi artillery never again posed a threat to our troops. (Note: Robert H. Scales is a retired Army major general, a former commandant of the U.S. Army War College and the author of the forthcoming book "Scales on War.")

12. Edward Snowden Not Dead

Sputnik News Service, 2016 08 07

Moscow - A journalist with The Intercept who has worked extensively with the whistleblower in the past says that Snowden is "fine," but refused to elaborate further. The response from the journalist comes in the wake of two mysterious tweets by the famed NSA whistleblower who exposed a rampant regime of domestic surveillance by US intelligence agencies. The first Tweet, reported by SputnikNews earlier this week said "it's time" and called on his colleagues from the NSA to contact a reporter who was covering the full story of the whistleblower's actions as a US intelligence agency contractor and the circumstances that led him to engage in the greatest document leak in American history. The second Tweet, issued on Friday night came in the form of a 64-character code that some believed was a "dead man's switch" designed to trigger a massive document release if Snowden failed to check into his computer at a certain time due to death or capture. The whistleblower has been public about the fact that he has distributed encrypted files to trusted journalists and associates in the event that something happened to him.

13. Michigan man who stockpiled weapons also had al-Qaeda recruiter's CDs

Vice News, Tess Owen, 2016 08 07

Detroit - A man in Michigan who was charged with illegally buying weapons and explosives has alleged links to al-Qaeda, the Detroit News reported on Sunday. Sebastian Gregerson, 29, was arrested on Sunday after he swapped a gun for several grenades with an undercover agent. When federal investigators searched Gregerson's home, they found seven rifles, two handguns, a hatchet, 20 knives including machetes and thousands of ammunition rounds, according to prosecutors. During recorded phone conversations with the undercover agent, Gregerson reportedly talked about making homemade grenades and considered ways to attack buildings and law enforcement. Investigators say they also found a number of CDs with al-Qaeda recruiter Anwar al-Awlaki's name on them. Al-Awlaki was an American imam who joined the terror network in Yemen, and became al-Qaeda's number one propagandist. Although he was killed in a CIA drone strike in 2011, his lessons on YouTube and CD have outlived him and continue to wield considerable influence. "When you look through most of the cases of individuals who get arrested for terrorism charges, the vast majority had al-Awlaki on their laptops," Seamus Hughes, deputy director of George Washington University's Program on Extremism told The Detroit News.

14. Dramatic moment ISIS jihadis laid down their arms after British special forces helped Libyan fighters flush them out

Mail On Sunday, 2016 08 07

London - This is the dramatic moment when Libyan brigades backed by British special forces flushed out Islamic State terrorists in the strategic port city of Sirte last week. The Libyan fighters have spent three months trying to flush out the terrorists from their hideouts in residential suburbs where residents are trapped. The British soldiers have been directing precision bombing raids launched by the US against IS positions. The air strikes were requested by the head of the new UN-installed Government of National Accord, Fayeze al-Serraj. Dozens of jihadis were killed or wounded as their positions were pounded. In one strike a 500lb bomb hit a second-floor window where up to five IS snipers had been seen. The explosion blew three holes in the side of the building and sent vaporising flames into the room, destroying everything and everyone in it. Further strikes destroyed vehicles being used by terrorists attempting to drive out of Sirte. Seven bombing raids were carried out last week, with Libyan Field Commander Mohamed Durant praising the American-British coalition for help to rid Sirte of jihadis who have had the city under their control for nearly two years.

15. MI5's mind readers help foil seven terrorist attacks

London - Specialist unit created by MI5 to "get inside the heads" of terrorists has helped foil seven attacks in the past year. The Sunday Times was granted unprecedented access last week to some of the staff who work at the Behavioural Science Unit (BSU) at Thames House, the headquarters of MI5 on the north bank of the Thames. The main task of a team of criminologists, psychologists, anthropologists and academics is to establish whether people flagged as potential threats are "talkers or walkers" — those who simply boast or those who are preparing to act. Research by MI5 shows more than 60% of so-called lone wolves unwittingly provide clues that they are preparing to strike. The work of the BSU involves picking up signs of such changing behaviour. Neil, an Arabic and Norwegian speaker who has worked for the unit for six years, said: "It takes some doing to go from talking about carrying out a violent act like killing to actually doing it." His team is passed intelligence by officers that is gleaned from a network of informants and the public. The BSU then looks for signs of unusual activity, such as an "increasing sense of grievance, a desire to acquire skills and tactics ... an attempt to identify material for their plans and logistical practice and trial runs".

16. State security is impaired by TDs' lack of scrutiny

The Sunday Times, Staff Writer, 2016 08 07

London - The Army Ranger wing, it seems, is to double in strength as part of the state's response to the elevated terror threat across Europe. The garda security section and military intelligence are to have access to passenger listings on aircraft travelling into and out of key international airports. The Emergency Response Unit, along with units of the Defence Forces, are conducting exercises, rehearsing responses to simulated terror attacks. We know these things only because security correspondents and analysts in the media tell us so. We know almost nothing officially about the capacity of the security forces to cope with any terrorist incident here, beyond generalised declamations by ministers and senior gardai that resources are adequate and that the threat level is low. One will peruse the records of the Dail and Seanad in vain for anything resembling a searching question on national security from any TD or senator of any persuasion. Those who are nominated as spokespersons on justice and defence seem to be utterly uninformed and quite without curiosity. This is in contrast to what happens elsewhere, as governments cope with the fallout from terror incidents. Interactions between parliamentary committees and state security services are almost always in private, for obvious reasons. But in the aftermath of last month's outrages in France, the head of the Directorate General of Internal Security (DGIS), Patrick Calvar, has been briefing members of the security and defence committee of the national assembly. In May, it seems, he warned a closed session of the committee that new terrorist attacks were in preparation, aimed at raising tensions between Muslim communities and the general population. At Westminster, the members of the Intelligence and Security Committee have been hearing from the heads of the intelligence services, MI5 and MI6, as well as the chiefs of the Defence Intelligence staff and the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ). In Germany, the defence committee of the Bundestag has been scrutinising the work of the Military Intelligence Service or Militärischer Abschirmdienst (MAD) as well as the activities of the Federal Intelligence Service or Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND). There are no equivalent processes here.

17. Cyber crime poses 'real threat' to UK economy

The Sunday Mirror, Geraldine McKelvie, 2016 08 07

London – Cyber attacks could devastate Britain's infrastructure and economy, the National Crime Agency has warned. It is urging more businesses to work with law enforcement agencies in a bid to reduce the growing menace. Its report into the crisis said: "A cyber attack that poses an existential threat to one or more major UK businesses is a realistic possibility. "The long-term impact of such a cyber attack could include substantial loss of revenue and margin, of valuable data, and of other company assets." The NCA said it estimated cyber crime already costs the UK economy billions per year - and that is likely to keep rising as businesses struggle to deal with the issue. The report added: "In any calculation we must consider there are millions of individual victims, many thousands of corporate victims and correspondingly substantial losses. "Moreover, the accelerating pace of technology and criminal cyber capability development currently outpaces the UK's collective response to cyber crime. "This cyber arms race is likely to be an enduring challenge, and an effective response requires collaborative action from government, law enforcement, industry regulators and, critically, business leaders." The NCA went on to say that business chiefs should "challenge" their management teams to go beyond normal cyber security standards to ensure "the threat to the UK is reduced".

18. SAS blasts Isis with 'Punisher' in Libya

The Sunday Times, Mark Hookham, 2016 08 07

London – British special forces fired a deadly new weapon nicknamed "the Punisher" during a fierce hour-long battle with Isis in Libya, The Sunday Times has been told. According to a Libyan fighter who claimed to have witnessed the attack, a small team of elite British soldiers used the precision weapon to fire a barrage of "air-burst" grenades above a suspected Isis position in the city of Sirte. The barrage, fired from a sniper's nest on the rooftop of a building, provoked the insurgents into revealing their exact position. When they returned fire with machineguns, a firefight began in the residential district south of the city centre. The Ministry of Defence said this weekend that it "does not comment on special forces". However, accounts have previously emerged of British special forces using Javelin anti-tank missiles and armour-piercing bullets to destroy Isis vehicles packed with explosives and a guided missile to destroy a tank. The latest reported firefight, which took place in the city's "700" district in mid-July, appears to have been the most prolonged frontline engagement involving British troops to have been disclosed. "They [the British] arrived in a very purposeful way, as if they had specific information about Isis positions, and took over our regular sniper's position on the roof," the Libyan fighter said.

19. Security at small ports 'our biggest new threat'

The Sunday Times, Tom Harper, 2016 08 07

London – The head of the National Crime Agency (NCA) has warned that security at small ports is the "greatest emerging threat" to Britain. Lynne Owens, who leads an organisation described as "Britain's FBI", reportedly told police chiefs last month that her officers had dealt with a number of "serious incidents" at UK ports and attempts to get a grip on border controls was "taking up all my time". In a confidential briefing to police and crime commissioners, she revealed that the Home Office is conducting a secret review of port security amid fears of a surge in illegal migrants using sailing boats to land in small harbours or on remote stretches of the coast. A source with knowledge of the meeting said: "All the organised crime gangs are now coming in through the small ports. We have seven different agencies looking after our ports. It's a mess. Everybody is treading on each other and no one knows who is in charge." Asked about Owens's comments, the NCA said: "Lynne was extemporising around bullet points ... Everything we can say publicly we have said."

20. Air of Graft Around Ex-Argentine Government Arouses Fury

The New York Times, Jonathan Gilbert, 2016 08 07

Buenos Aires - One former minister was caught in a convent with about $9 million in cash and luxury watches stuffed into duffel bags. Two others have been indicted on corruption charges, as has a former vice president. Then there is Cristina Fernández de Kirchner, the former president, whose hotel and real estate businesses are being investigated for alleged involvement in a kickback scheme. Argentina's politicians are not new to corruption scandals. But the whiff of graft surrounding officials from Mrs. Kirchner's government, which was voted out of power last year, has infuriated the nation to a point not reached in two decades, when there was a slew of accusations against the administration of former President Carlos Saúl Menem. The scandals are also casting a pall over the achievements of Mrs. Kirchner's political party, which came to power in 2003 as part of a leftist wave that swept through Latin America. The allegations against Mrs. Kirchner and the four other former officials from her party, the Front for Victory, are unproven, though one of the former ministers indicted on charges of corruption, Ricardo Jaime, a former transportation secretary, was convicted separately last year of taking bribes.

Australian Associated Press, 2016 08 07

Canberra - A man accused of preparing a terrorist act has told a Melbourne court he believes the charges are a "conspiracy against the patriot movement". Phillip Galea, 31, from Baybrook, did not apply for bail during his brief appearance in the Melbourne magistrates court on Sunday. Victoria's joint counter-terrorism team arrested Galea in Baybrook on Saturday. He has been charged with collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist act and planning or preparing for a terrorist act. "I will be fighting these charges and I believe they are a conspiracy against the patriot movement," Galea told magistrate Robert Kumar. He has been remanded in custody to next appear on August 9. Police say an "escalating threat" to the community forced them to raid four homes and arrest the 31-year-old man on Saturday.

22. Victoria terror raids end in arrest

The Advertiser, Anthony Dowsley, 2016 08 07

Canberra – Heavily-armed police officers arrested one man after a series of terror raids in Victoria yesterday. Victoria's joint counter terrorism team, comprising officers from Victoria Police and the Australian Federal Police, began the operation about 1pm, arresting 31-year-old Phillip Galea, who allegedly has links to a far-right group. Investigators executed four search warrants – two in Braybrook, one in Bacchus Marsh and one in Tatura – as part of the operation. Police said the raids were "in relation to the ongoing investigation" and stressed there was no immediate or impending threat to the community. Galea was last night assisting investigators with their inquiries. Counter Terrorism Command Assistant Commissioner Ross Guenther said his team had interrupted "something that was quite serious".

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, 2016 08 07

Canberra - A 31-year-old charged with terrorism offences tells a court he believes the charges are a conspiracy against the "patriot movement". A man charged with terrorism offences after raids in Melbourne and central Victoria has told a court he believes the charges are a conspiracy against the "patriot movement". Phillip Galea, 31, from Braybrook in Melbourne's west, has been charged with preparing or planning a terrorist act and collecting or making documents likely to facilitate a terrorist attack. He was arrested yesterday at Braybrook, Bacchus Marsh, north-west of Melbourne, and Tatura, in central Victoria. During a brief hearing at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court, Galea sat in the dock and made no application for bail. He said he would fight the charges and believed they were a conspiracy against the patriot movement. He is due to reappear in court for a committal hearing on August 9. A member of the True Blue Crew, an anti-immigration group, told the ABC Galea was a member.

24. American arrested after entering Pakistan was deported for spying in 2011

Islamabad - An American citizen previously deported from Pakistan on charges of espionage was arrested Saturday in the Pakistani capital for illegally reentering the country, officials said. Officials with Pakistan's Federal Investigation Agency said Matthew Barrett was seized at a guesthouse in the capital and taken into custody, hours after immigration officials at the international airport in nearby Rawalpindi were found to have mistakenly granted him entry. Barrett was deported from Pakistan in 2011 and barred from returning after being found in the area of a "sensitive installation," the Interior Ministry said in a statement. He was charged with spying on Pakistan's nuclear facilities, the ministry said. The government has a large nuclear arsenal and development program, which has been a source of U.S. sanctions and bilateral tension. There has been no comment from U.S. officials, and no further information about Barrett was immediately known except that he obtained his visa at the Pakistani consulate in Houston.

Officials said he used false documents to enter the country, but it was not known whether he was traveling under his real name. He has been charged with violating immigration laws. The incident recalled the case of Raymond Davis, a CIA civilian contractor who was arrested in Pakistan, also in 2011, after fatally shooting two men on the streets of Lahore. Pakistani officials said he had been surveilling and photographing government facilities there. The men had been following him on a motorbike and approached his car with guns drawn.

25. Japan protests as 13 Chinese gov't ships spotted around Senkakus

Naha - Japan lodged two protests Sunday as 13 Chinese government vessels were spotted in waters around the Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea. The number of vessels, located in a contiguous zone just outside Japanese territorial waters, was a record since the Japanese government purchased most of the islands from a private owner in September 2012. The previous record of 12 was logged shortly after the purchase. Two China Coast Guard ships among the vessels entered Japanese territorial waters in the morning. In the afternoon, four ships entered the waters, according to the Japan Coast Guard. Six of the 13 vessels were armed and many Chinese fishing boats were spotted near the territorial waters, it said. Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shinsuke Sugiyama lodged a protest with Chinese Ambassador to Japan Cheng Yonghua, saying the maritime activity was in violation of Japanese sovereignty and unacceptable, according to the Foreign Ministry.

26. China's Youth League Is a Victim of Its Success

Beijing - President Xi Jinping of China in effect wrote an epitaph to the shrunken influence of his predecessor and former rivals this week when the Communist Party announced major changes to its once-powerful Youth League, a training ground for many officials who have been marginalized under Mr. Xi. The Communist Youth League served as a cradle for generations of Chinese leaders, who rose through it into the high ranks of the party. Mr. Xi's immediate predecessor as China's top leader, Hu Jintao, was among the most prominent. Others have included Premier Li Keqiang, Vice President Li Yuanchao and Ling Jihua, the former head of the party's general office. But a reorganization of the Communist Youth League laid out in the state news media on Tuesday indicated that its glory days as a finishing school for China's political elite may have passed. The overhaul promised to shrink the Youth League's central leadership, put it under firmer party control and return it to its grass roots to try to win over the country's young people. "Its ranks will undergo shrinkage at the top and replenishment below," an unnamed Youth League leader said in People's Daily, the party's main newspaper, on Wednesday, explaining the reorganization. "In the face of major changes in the social environment and youth population, there are many areas of the Youth League's development and work that are ill adapted or unsuitable."

27. Cheong Wa Dae says China's criticism of THAAD unreasonable

Yonhap English News, 2016 08 07

Seoul - South Korea's presidential office on Sunday urged China to raise questions over North Korea's nuclear and missile threats, instead of criticizing the planned installation of an advanced anti-missile system on South Korean soil. In a statement, Cheong Wa Dae said Chinese media's criticism of the recent decision by Seoul and Washington to install the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) system in South Korea is unreasonable.

28. Indonesian kidnapped in Sulu sea off Borneo

Agence France Presse, 2016 08 07

Jakarta - Unidentified gunmen have kidnapped another Indonesian sailor in the Sulu Sea where numerous seafarers have been abducted by Islamist extremists in recent months, officials said Sunday. The kidnapping took place Wednesday off the northeast of Sabah state on the Malaysian side of Borneo island, Indonesia's ambassador to Malaysia said. "(The vessel) was intercepted by a boat carrying four armed men," ambassador Herman Prayitno told AFP. The kidnapers took the Indonesian captain after failing to get the 10,000 ringgit ($2,500) they demanded, Prayitno added. They released the two other crew members, an Indonesian and a Malaysian. Indonesia's foreign ministry said it was still trying to find out which group was responsible. Malaysia's marine police chief Abdul Rahim Abdullah told AFP authorities were questioning the two crew members from the boat about the case.

Press Trust of India, 2016 08 07

Parbhani - Maharashtra Anti-Terrorism Squad today arrested one more person for his alleged links with the terror outfit ISIS from Parbhani district of the state. 30. India sets up agency to probe cyberterror

BBC Monitoring South Asia, 2016 08 07

New Delhi - The increasing use of social media by global terror groups, like ISIS [Islamic State] and the Al Qaeda, for radicalizing young people and a sharp upward trend in cyber-related offences has led to the government launching a major initiative in setting up a highly-specialized cyber agency to watch and probe such cases. The agency will work under the Union home ministry and would be to cyber crime what the National Investigation Agency (NIA) is to probing terror-related incidents in the country, sources said. The NIA was set up in the aftermath of the 26/11 Mumbai terror attacks. The new cyber unit will investigate all major cases of cyber crime in close coordination with respective state agencies. The steady increase in cases of breach of cyber security across the country prompted the much-needed move by the Centre. From 5,693 cyber crime related cases registered in 2013, the spike has been to 9,622 in 2014 and 11,592 in 2015. The situation has only gone from bad to worse with 21,248 cases already reported till May this year. Intelligence officials claim they have been closely monitoring the trend in cyber security over the last few years and it has been showing a spiraling increase, particularly in the last four years. And this is what has pushed the government to finally go ahead with a specialized agency to probe incidents related to cyber security. "The intelligence agencies too have been stressing on the need for a professional outfit to deal with cyber security. Things have now started moving and a fund of 400 crore [Indian rupees] has been earmarked for the project. The agency will have highly-trained professionals in cyber security," a government official said.

31. N.K. diplomats summoned for probe into mass defections: report

Yonhap English News, 2016 08 07

Seoul - North Korea has summoned its consuls stationed in Shenyang in order to investigate recent mass defections of restaurant workers at the North's state-run restaurants in China, a U.S.-based media report showed Saturday. In April, a group of 13 North Korean employees at a Pyongyang-run restaurant in the Chinese eastern port city of Ningbo defected to South Korea en masse. In June, three more North Korean restaurant employees working in China escaped to Seoul. The diplomats called in to Pyongyang in early July were reported to be in charge of supervising those areas where the defections took place, said Radio Free Asia (RFA), citing anonymous sources. They have been going through a rigorous review of their loyalty to the regime, it added. Overseas restaurants are an increasingly important source of dollars for the North at a time when international sanctions have cut off Pyongyang from the outside world aimed to dry up the money needed to pursue missile and nuclear development.

32. South Sudan to get new international peacekeeping force

BBC News, 2016 08 07

Juba - South Sudan's government has agreed to let in a new international protection force to try to save a peace deal. Ethnic clashes last month left at least 300 people dead and threatened to revive a civil war that has killed tens of thousands. A 12,000-strong UN mission in South Sudan was unable to prevent attacks. The announcement was made by the East African regional body, Igad, and confirmed by South Sudan cabinet minister Dr Martin Elia Lomuro. President Salva Kiir had previously dismissed the idea of an additional force. The proposal for a new unit in South Sudan was backed by the African Union and discussed at a meeting in Ethiopia of Igad - the Intergovernmental Authority on Development. But much of the details of the force remain unclear.

33. Talks to end war in Yemen are suspended; cease-fire in doubt

Cairo - More than three months of peace talks to end the war in Yemen came to a halt Saturday, leaving in doubt the future of a shaky cease-fire and threatening to deepen what has become one of the world's worst humanitarian crises. The United Nations' special envoy on Yemen, Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed, announced the suspension Saturday in Kuwait, where the talks were being held. He said the negotiations were not a failure and that they would resume in a month at an undisclosed location. A Western diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity as a matter of official policy, told reporters Friday that he was disappointed by the end of the talks and expressed concerns about Yemen's stability. Ahmed convened the talks after a cease-fire was declared in April between the military coalition, which is led by Saudi Arabia and backed by the United States, and the Houthi rebels, who the Saudis say are supported by Iran. He said the talks were being suspended in an effort to find a lasting solution. "We seek a sustainable solution to the conflict," Ahmed said. "We do not want a fragile solution." More than 6,500 people have been killed in the 15-month-long war, and UNICEF said last week that 370,000 children were at risk of starving to death. More than half of Yemenis do not have enough food, aid workers say.

34. Where will we run this time?

Malkalal, South - She was living in the safest place she could find, a white plastic tent on a muddy field where 32,791 people crammed together under a blue United Nations flag. For more than two years, Rachael Mayik had found refuge in this camp from one of the world's most brutal wars. But now the fighting seemed to be speeding toward her. Radios blared reports from the capital, 300 miles away, about the breakdown of a cease-fire between the opposing forces of the president and the vice president. She saw the planes evacuating aid workers from the nearby dirt airstrip. At the field hospital, doctors were making space for an influx of victims. The camp, Mayik knew, could be overrun. "We need a way out," said Mayik, a tall, weary-eyed 56-year-old, squinting into the sun as she walked toward the perimeter fence of the U.N. Protection of Civilians site. In front of her was a guard tower manned by Indian peacekeepers. Beyond it, in a more fortified part of the camp, were 3,000 U.N. employees, two helicopters and an arsenal of weapons. That had once been enough to make her feel safe. Now she wasn't sure. The United Nations operates 16 peacekeeping missions around the world, many of which exist primarily to protect vulnerable civilians. That mandate was reinforced after the genocides in Rwanda and Bosnia in the mid-1990s occurred as outmanned U.N. peacekeeping forces stood by.

35. Iranian Sunni cleric says executions may inflame regional tensions

Reuters, 2016 08 07

Dubai - A leading Iranian Sunni Muslim said the execution of Sunni Islamists last week could inflame sectarian tensions in the Gulf region, while Tehran said it was merely taking a tough stance on foreign-backed terrorism. Iran executed up to 20 Sunni Kurds accused of attacks on security forces. There were no public trials and rights groups said the convictions may have been based on forced confessions. UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Zeid Ra'ad Al Hussein said on Friday that "overly broad and vague criminal charges" had led to "a grave injustice." Iran's Foreign Ministry expressed surprise at the remarks.

36. Saudi, UAE Spy Agencies Involved in 1998 Killing of Iranian Diplomats

Fars News Agency, 2016 08 07

Tehran - Leader of the Islamic Movement of Afghanistan Party Mohammad Mukhtar Mufleh disclosed collaboration among the Saudi and UAE intelligence services and the Taliban to kill the Iranian diplomats in Mazar-e Sharif. "Taliban martyred the Iranian diplomats in cooperation with the intelligence agencies of Saudi Arabia and the UAE," Mukhtar Mufleh told FNA on Sunday. The 1998 killing of the Iranian diplomats in Afghanistan refers to the siege of the Iranian consulate in Mazar-e Sharif, Afghanistan, during the Taliban and Northern Alliance battles of Mazar-e Sharif. Initially the death of 8 Iranian diplomats was reported, but later two other diplomats and a journalist were also confirmed dead. On August 8, 1998 Taliban forces captured Mazar-i-Sharif. After this incident, 11 Iranian diplomats and a correspondent from Iran's state news agency (IRNA) were attacked at the Iranian consulate and subsequently disappeared.

37. Iranian nuclear scientist 'executed for spying'

The Associated Press, 2016 08 07

Tehran - Iran's official news agency, IRNA, is confirming that Iran has executed a nuclear scientist who gave the US intelligence about the country's contested nuclear program. The Sunday report quotes a spokesman for the Iranian judiciary, Gholamhosein Mohseni Ejehi, as confirming the execution of Shahram Amiri. He says Amiri "provided the enemy with vital information of the country." US officials in 2010 said they paid Amiri some $5 million to defect and provide "significant" information about Iran's atomic program. But Amiri later fled the US without the money.

38. Bomb Wounds Russian-Backed Leader of Ukraine Separatist Region

Kiev - The Russian-backed president of a separatist region in Ukraine was wounded on Saturday in an assassination attempt, highlighting rising violence in the country's east. A bomb — the weapon of choice in a half-dozen recent, and mysterious, assassinations in the territory — tore apart a car carrying Igor V. Plotnitsky, the leader of the self-proclaimed Luhansk People's Republic. A political ally said on Twitter that Mr. Plotnitsky had been seriously wounded, potentially creating an opening in the leadership in Luhansk, the smaller of the two separatist enclaves in eastern Ukraine. The bomb was detonated in Luhansk city, the region's capital. Rebels blamed a Ukrainian death squad, while an aide to Ukraine's director of domestic intelligence said Mr. Plotnitsky had fallen victim to infighting in his ranks. Fighting between Russian-backed rebels and Ukrainian government forces since April 2014 has resulted in thousands of deaths, the displacement of over a million people and de facto Russian control of the region. But feuding between proxy forces on the Russian side has for more than a year threatened to spiral into wider violence, deepening an already grave humanitarian situation and possibly complicating matters for President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia in negotiations with the West.

39. Foreign partners demonstrate growing interest in Russian missile-defense systems - top-ranking officer

TASS World Service, 2016 08 07

Moscow - Foreign participants in Russian army competitions and observers demonstrate growing interest to Russian missile defense systems, Commander-in-Chief of the Russian Aerospace Forces Colonel General Viktor Bondarev said on Sunday. "Naturally, the interest is growing. It is a big motivator for our industry, its capacities," he told journalists. He said all countries are welcome to take part in competitions of anti-aircraft gunners next year.

40. Rouhani calls most important upcoming talks with Russian, Azerbaijani presidents

TASS World Service, 2016 08 07

Moscow - Iran's President Hassan Rouhani calls "most important" the talks with Presidents of Russia and Azerbaijan Vladimir Putin and Ilham Aliyev, due on Monday, IRNA reported him as saying before taking a flight to Baku to participate in the trilateral meeting. "Negotiations in this format will be organized for the first time," the Iranian president said. "They are most important both for cooperation between neighboring countries and for improvement of stability in the Middle East and Caucasian regions." "We have planned trilateral and bilateral meetings, which will focus on regional cooperation and on fighting terrorism," he said.

41. Ukrainian military shell DPR, 18 houses damaged

TASS World Service, 2016 08 07

Moscow - The Ukrainian military over the past 24 hours shelled the self-proclaimed Donetsk People's Republic (DPR) 309 times, where 18 houses were damaged, the republic's military headquarters told the Donetsk News Agency on Sunday. "The situation in DPR remains tense," the source told the agency. "The Ukrainian military violated the ceasefire regime 309 times within last 24 hours, and 18 houses were damaged." The Ukrainian military fired 40 artillery shells of 122 and 152mm calibers, 199 mines of 82 and 120mm calibers. Besides, the source continued, they used weapon of IFVs, grenade launchers and arms. Under fire were Zaitsevo and Shirokaya Balka near Gorlovka, Veseloye and Spartak in Yasinovataya suburbs, settlements Alexandrovka and Staromikhailovka in west of Dones, Elenovka to south of Donetsk, and Sakhanka, Kominternovo and Kulikovo in the south. Members of the Contact Group for the settlement of the situation in the east of Ukraine at a meeting in Minsk on April 29 agreed on a complete ceasefire in Donbass starting from midnight on April 30. It is an eighth ceasefire agreement since the autumn of 2014. The sides however continue accusing each other of ceasefire violations.

42. Yemen peace talks in Kuwait end amid fighting

Al Jazeera and agencies, 2016 08 07

Beirut - UN-sponsored talks for establishing peace in Yemen have ended without a breakthrough, as fighting continues between government forces and rebels near the capital Sanaa. The adjourning of the talks on Saturday came after Houthi fighters and the party of Ali Abdullah Saleh, the former president, rejected a UN peace plan and announced the appointment of a 10-member governing body to run Yemen. Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed, the UN envoy on Yemen, announced on Saturday a month-long suspension of the talks, held in Kuwait for more than 90 days, but denied their failure. "We will be leaving Kuwait today but the Yemeni peace talks are continuing," Ould Cheikh Ahmed said in Kuwait City. "We have guarantees and commitments from the two sides that they are ready to return to the negotiating table," he said, while criticising the creation of the council by the Houthis and their allies. The rebels said the plan, which had been accepted by Yemen's internationally recognised government, did not meet their key demand for a unity government - a condition that amounts to an explicit call for President Abd-Rabbu Mansour Hadi's removal.

43. Intense fighting breaks out in Aleppo rebel siege

Reuters, 2016 08 07

Beirut - Syrian rebels broke through to besieged opposition-held areas in eastern Aleppo on Saturday in an assault on a major government military complex meant to end a month-long siege, insurgents and a monitoring group said. Pro-government media outlets denied the siege had been broken and a US State Department official said the situation was "too fluid" to comment. The heavy fighting and air strikes reported from the area seemed to indicate any passage that may have been opened would be far from secure enough for civilians to travel through. Rebels have been trying to break through a thin strip of government-controlled territory to reconnect insurgent areas in western Syria with their encircled sector of eastern Aleppo, in effect breaking a government siege begun last month. The offensive against the government's Ramousah military complex, which contains a number of military colleges, began on Friday. Taking control of Ramousah and linking up with eastern Aleppo would isolate government-held western Aleppo by cutting the southern route out toward the capital Damascus. Two rebel groups and a monitor said on Saturday they had broken the siege, but pro-government media outlets denied the claim and said the Syrian army was in fact regaining recently taken territory from rebels.

44. IS claims Belgian machete attack

The Associated Press, John-Thor Dahlburg, 2016 08 07

Brussels - The Islamic State group has claimed responsibility for Saturday's machete attack in Belgium. A statement by the IS-affiliated Amaq News Agency, posted Sunday on an IS-linked Twitter account, says the attack was carried out by one of the Islamic State group's "soldiers." The statement says the attack on two policewomen in the city of Charleroi was in response to the "Crusader coalition's" campaign against IS and its self-declared caliphate in Iraq and Syria.

45. Belgians ID machete attacker as Algerian criminal, 33

The Associated Press, John-Thor Dahlburg, 2016 08 07

Brussels - Belgian prosecutors on Sunday identified the machete-wielding man who attacked two policewomen as a 33-year-old Algerian known to police for criminal offences but not for terrorist acts.

The Saturday attack was initially was being treated as a terrorist incident, notably because the man shouted "Allahu akbar!" as he slashed at the officers outside the main police station in the city of Charleroi, Prime Minister Charles Michel said. The assailant, shot by a third officer, died later in a hospital. The Belgian Federal Prosecutor's Office said Sunday that the attacker, who it identified only as K.B., had lived in Belgium since 2012. "Since there are indications that the attack may have been inspired by a terrorist motive, the federal prosecutor's office decided to take over the investigation from the district prosecutor's office of Charleroi," the federal office said. The federal prosecutor's office said two police searches were carried out overnight in the Charleroi area, but said no further information about the investigation would be made public Michel said the prosecutors were investigating a possible case of "attempted terrorist murder."

46. Le beau-frère de Kouachi arrêté

Le Figaro.fr, 2016 08 07

Paris - Mourad Hamyd, 20 ans et beau-frère de Cherif Kouachi, a été arrêté en juillet dernier à la frontière turque, soupçonné de vouloir rejoindre la Syrie ou l'Irak pour combattre dans les rangs du groupe Etat islamique. Le JDD, qui révèle l'information, rappelle que la soeur du jeune homme était mariée à Cherif Kouachi, auteur de l'attentat contre Charlie Hebdo en janvier 2015. L'homme avait été soupçonné d'être un complice des deux terroristes qui ont abattu la rédaction du journal. Il avait été entendu de longues heures à partir du 7 janvier 2015 au soir au commissariat de Charleville-Mézières avant d'être relâché, libre de toute charge. A l'époque, il était lycéen, redoublait sa terminale S et ses camarades l'avaient soutenu. A sa sortie de garde à vue, il avait déclaré : "Cet attentat, c'est l'horreur, c'est un crime horrible et je pense aux victimes et à leurs familles (...) Je n'ai rien à voir avec cette histoire, Chérif est juste mon beau-frère avec qui nous avons des rapports assez lointains". Mais on apprend aujourd'hui que le jeune homme est fiché S depuis les attentats de janvier 2015 et de son interpellation et que depuis le 25 juillet dernier, sa famille a signalé sa disparition. Celui qui vient de terminer une première année à l'université a été refoulé le 28 juillet des autorités turques et placé en rétention en Bulgarie.

47. Belgique : l'État islamique revendique l'attaque de Charleroi

Le Figaro.fr, 2016 08 07

Charleroi - Un Algérien de 33 ans, armé d'une machette, a blessé samedi deux policières en faction aux cris de «Allah Akbar» à Charleroi en Belgique. Une enquête a été ouverte par la justice belge pour «tentative d'assassinat terroriste». Deux policières ont été blessées samedi dans le centre de Charleroi en Belgique par un individu armé d'une machette et qui a été abattu par les forces de l'ordre. Dimanche, le premier ministre Charles Michel a indiqué qu'une enquête a été ouverte par la justice belge pour «tentative d'assassinat terroriste». Le premier ministre a évoqué «qu'un certain nombre d'éléments sont apparus immédiatement» pour justifier le caractère de cette enquête dont le fait que l'assaillant avait crié «Allah akbar». Une piste qui semble confirmée par la revendication de l'Etat islamique intervenue dimanche. Le groupe terroriste a publié un communiqué via son agence Amaq pour revendiquer l'attaque. L'agresseur est arrivé aux alentours de 16h00 samedi devant l'hôtel de police. «Il a immédiatement sorti une machette du sac de sport qu'il portait et il a porté des coups très violents au visage de deux policières qui se trouvaient de faction en face de l'hôtel de police en criant Allah akbar», a expliqué le porte-parole de la police de Charleroi, David Quinaux. C'est une troisième policière qui a alors ouvert le feu et abattu l'assaillant, décédé plus tard à l'hôpital. L'une des policières souffre de plaies profondes au visage et a été hospitalisée tandis que sa collègue n'a été que légèrement blessée, précise la RTBF. Toutes deux sont toutefois hors de danger.

48. Turkey's purge marks the endgame in Islamist civil war

Istanbul - Last month's failed coup brought into relief a bitter struggle at the heart of Turkish politics.

From his humble childhood in a working-class neighborhood of Istanbul, President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has steadily transformed the nation in his image over almost a decade and a half in power and become the Turkish republic's most influential leader since its founder, Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. Halfway around the world, Fethullah Gulen, a 77-year-old imam, presides over a somewhat opaque network of schools, charities and businesses in Turkey and more than 100 other countries. He has lived in self-imposed exile in the United States since 1997 and has acted as a kind of global spiritual leader, advocating peace and tolerance. Just years ago, the two rivals were locked in a tactical alliance against an old enemy: Turkey's once-entrenched secularist establishment. But the understanding between their camps eventually crumbled into a fight for power, one that came dramatically to the surface in the July 15 coup attempt by a rebellious faction of the military. Some 270 people died during the 12-hour revolt, including 24 of the coup plotters. Now an enormous purge of suspected Gulenists is underway. Much of the Turkish public and the main opposition parties have rallied around the government despite their differences. Gulen and his congregation seem to be everyone's scapegoat. Not long ago, though, Turkey's leadership had a very different perspective.

49. Hundreds of thousands in massive anti coup rally in Istanbul

The Associated Press, Cinar Kiper And Elena Becatoros, 2016 08 07

Istanbul - Hundreds of thousands of flag-waving supporters gathered in Istanbul Sunday for a giant rally to mark the end of nightly demonstrations since Turkey's July 15 abortive coup that left more than 270 people dead. The gathering at the Yenikapi meeting area by the Marmara Sea waterfront in Istanbul's European side, officially called the "Democracy and Martyrs' Rally," aims to represent Turkish unity and was billed as a cross-party event. Religious leaders and two of Turkey's three opposition parties were attending. The pro-Kurdish People's Democracy Party, or HDP, was not invited. A 60-meter (200-foot) stage was set up for the event, framed by two platforms and draped with massive national flags and banners depicting President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and Turkey's founding father Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. A roll call of those who died opposing the coup was read out as the event began. Crowds formed hours before the official start of the rally on Sunday afternoon, with people braving scorching temperatures as they waited to hear speeches from Erdogan and Turkey's top political leadership. Construction cranes suspended giant Turkish flags beside the meeting area, while flag-draped boats and yachts zipped back and forth along the water. Nearly 15,000 police were providing security at the event, which the state-run Anadolu news agency estimated could be attended by millions. Anti-aircraft batteries were also set up at the event grounds, while two helicopters circled overhead.

50. Machete Attack in Belgium Injures Two Police Officers

The New York Times, Aurelien Breeden, 2016 08 07

Paris - A man carrying a machete and shouting "Allahu akbar" injured two police officers outside a police station in central Belgium on Saturday afternoon. The attack was announced by the police in Charleroi, a city of more than 200,000 about 31 miles south of Brussels, at 4:57 p.m. on Twitter. The police station was sealed off. The Charleroi police said on Twitter that the assailant had been shot and died of his wounds, and that the lives of the two police officers were not endangered. The attack was quickly met with condemnation from Belgian officials. "I strongly condemn the attack in Charleroi," Prime Minister Charles Michel said on Twitter. "Thoughts go to the victims, their families and the police. We are following the situation closely." Interior Minister Jan Jambon called the attack "despicable." He said the country's Coordinating Body for Threat Analysis, which monitors intelligence on terrorism and other threats, was monitoring the situation. A safehouse was rented in Charleroi by Islamic State terrorists who were involved in the deadly assaults in and around Paris on Nov. 13 and Brussels on March 22.

1. What to do about the next Aaron Driver

Toronto - It was what Aaron Driver didn't say during the Skype call that now has shaken Prof. Alexandra Bain and made her question how Canada responds to those drawn to groups like Daesh. Bain, a 61-year-old Fredericton professor, is an unlikely confidante of extremists, many of whom live much of their life online. When she started her research as part of a study on foreign fighters, she vaguely knew about Skype and had never heard of social apps like KIK or Telegram. But, as a mother, a grandmother and a Muslim convert of more than three decades, once Bain had help figuring out the technology, she managed to connect with young aspiring jihadists. They treated me like they treated their elderly auntie, or their mum. Some laughed and said, 'I know you're a coconut, but at least you're willing to listen,' " she says. ('Coconut,' is a term used disparagingly by Daesh groupies to mean not a true Muslim - brown on the outside, white on the inside.) Aaron Driver was one of her subjects who agreed to be interviewed, although at the time she knew him only as "Harun Danyal." During one 45-minute call, she asked him about his passport. He said he was having trouble acquiring one but, if he got it, he would leave for Syria and not look back. Bain says it wasn't her job as an academic to judge or dissuade the actions of her subjects, unless there was a direct criminal threat she had an obligation to report. For someone like Driver, she already knew CSIS and the RCMP were watching him. But as Bain now questions what happened in the final weeks of Driver's life - and considers what a close call it was for others - she wishes more had been done. Both the RCMP and CSIS say they are overwhelmed by the sheer number of potential suspects. The knee-jerk reaction is to offer more funding or power to federal agencies, which runs the risk of bringing undue attention to Muslim communities and further straining relations. What is only recently being discussed in Canada is the idea of more community empowerment or involvement. Canada has already studied many of these issues extensively. There is a $10-million bookshelf of reports funded by the Kanishka Project, a federal government research program that began in June 2011. Academics Sara Thompson and Daniel Hiebert, along with retired CSIS director general Larry Brooks, wrote earlier this year about Canada's state of CVE, calling it "fragmented," rather than "cohesive." Bain is among Canada's academics who have extensively studied those who are drawn to Daesh or like-minded groups.

2. Jihadists aren't misunderstood punks

Column: Here's a crazy idea: Maybe, just maybe, jihadists know full well what they're doing, have thought it through and are deeply committed to it. Could becoming a terrorist be, oh I don't know, an actual choice? Rather than some sort of temporary sickness that mysteriously overcomes them one day as they're surfing the web? For decades, anyone with a dose of common sense has been laughing at the idea that criminals are just misunderstood victims in need of a good cry. So it's a touch tragi-comic to watch the Liberals pretend "counter-radicalization" will be a successful tool in combating Islamist extremism. In 1956, famed lyricist Stephen Sondheim penned the ultimate parody to this notion for the musical West Side Story. After a couple gangsters are chased by their local beat cop Officer Krupke, the petty criminals joke about all the excuses they've got for their delinquency: "Dear kindly Sergeant Krupke, you gotta understand, it's just our bringing up-ke, that gets us out of hand. Our mothers all are junkies, our fathers all are drunks. Golly Moses, naturally we're punks." Then they put together a mock courtroom, where the sympathetic judge doesn't punish the kids for their misdeeds but instead goes after Krupke for daring to hold them responsible for their behaviour: "This boy don't need a judge, he needs an analyst's care! It's just his neurosis that oughta be curbed. He's psychologically disturbed!" Does anyone know if Ralph Goodale can tap dance? Because it sure sounded like Canada's public safety minister was singing Sondheim's tune the other day. Besides, Driver's troubled history is actually an outlier. At least when it comes to Canada. A 2011 CSIS report that analyzed known extremists found "none appeared to have been marginalized within Canadian society," that they had "a high level of academic achievement" and that "immigration trauma is not a significant driver for radicalization in Canada." They were smart guys who did what they did because they believed in the cause.

3. Aaron Driver's 'more powerful' bomb never exploded, RCMP says, revealing new details of tense confrontation

Toronto - The bomb that ISIL supporter Aaron Driver tried to trigger inside his taxi when he was confronted by police on Aug. 10 never fully detonated, RCMP Deputy Commissioner Mike Cabana said in an interview Saturday. Police now believe the blast in the cab was caused by the detonators and that the more powerful explosives never actually ignited, he said, although Cabana added the forensic investigation of the homemade bomb was still underway. "Primary indications are the only thing that exploded were the homemade detonators," Cabana, the deputy commissioner for federal policing, told the National Post. "The forensics are going to confirm that but that's what it looks like." The explosive substance appears to be the same type that police found a formula for making on Driver's computer when they searched his home in Winnipeg on June 3, 2015. "I think so but I don't think the forensics are complete on that, but I think essentially he followed the same recipe." The target of his alleged attack has still not been determined, he added. While Driver had told the taxi driver to take him to Citi Plaza in London, Ont., there is no indication that was the target and Cabana noted there was a train station near the mall. "Was he going there to hop on the train? We don't know yet so we're doing the forensics on the computer, hoping that we're going to find something there but so far we have nothing," he said. Ten days after Driver was killed by police in Strathroy, Ont., as he was allegedly about to conduct a bombing, the deputy commissioner provided a detailed update on what investigators now believe happened and what they have learned so far.

4. Canadian man said to be inspired by ISIS did not fully detonate bomb before the police shot him: Report

Reuters, 2016 08 21

Toronto - A homemade bomb set off last week by a Canadian man who was apparently inspired by the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) failed to fully detonate, a senior police official told the National Post newspaper on Saturday (Aug 20). While there was a blast in the back seat of a taxi in Strathroy, Ontario, as police closed in, it came from the detonators, and explosive material did not go off, Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) deputy commissioner Mike Cabana said. The RCMP could not immediately be reached for comment on the newspaper report. Mr Aaron Driver, 24, was shot dead by the police on Aug 10 and the taxi company in the small town said the driver sustained only minor injuries in the blast. Mr Cabana did not go into further detail on the bomb. He said forensic investigation was still underway. The target of what police have said was an attack plotted by Mr Driver was unclear. Mr Driver, who also used the alias Harun Abdurahman, was arrested last year for openly supporting ISIS on social media, but was never charged with a crime. ISIS militants control parts of Iraq and Syria and they have supporters and sympathizers around the world who have carried out attacks on civilians in several countries. In February, Mr Driver was placed on a peace bond, a court order that restricted his movements. It required he stay away from social media and computers and not have contact with ISIS or similar groups. The RCMP has said officers sought out Mr Driver on Aug 10 after a tip from the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation that morning, which included a "martyrdom video". Mr Cabana said police identified Mr Driver from the video in part through his choice of balaclava.

5. Feel-good anti-terror plan

The Ottawa Sun, David Krayden, 2016 08 21

Column: When RCMP officers were shooting terrorist suspect Aaron Driver last week, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau was face-down in another awkward controversy as his shirtless pinup was distributed across the nation via every gawking media outlet. Insouciant doesn't begin to describe this mindnumbingly indolent leader who invests the majority of his narcissistic life promoting his narcissistic life. The RCMP, who were able to disengage Driver of his ambition to achieve another terrorist statistic, owe absolutely nothing to Trudeau or his government's half-hearted attempts to even recognize, let alone combat, the enemies amongst us. For that they must thank a foreign government — and more specifically, a foreign police force in the FBI — for having the decency to warn us of Driver's intentions. No, I did not write alleged intentions. His objectives were clear enough for anyone with half a mind to ascertain — except the dimwits running our federal government. So what does this mean for the future of Bill C-51, the Harper-era security legislation that Trudeau has consistently declared to be a terrible nuisance and affront to our civil liberties? Obviously, in light of last week's events, Canada's anti-terror bill is not only an innocuous obturation to my civil rights and yours, it clearly does not go far enough.

6. Trudeau's Islamic State fight changes have turned out right

The Ottawa Sun, Jim Warren, 2016 08 21

Column: Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's campaign promise to send more Canadian Special Forces soldiers and military trainers to assist Iraq in the war against Islamic State has turned out to be the right decision. Meanwhile, the removal of our CF-18 aircraft from bombing runs has not had the negative impact many said it would. Sending our men and women in the Canadian forces into harm's way can never be an easy decision. It should only be done when all other options have been exhausted. There are many shades of grey on what is the right thing to do when a prime minister makes the decision to put Canadian lives at risk in a war zone. Tens of thousands of Canadian men and women have made the ultimate sacrifice to protect democracy and to give us the freedom we enjoy. Part of that freedom is our right to select our politicians in a democratic political system that only exists because so many were killed defending it. It makes any decision to put more soldiers' lives at risk all that more important. Defending our country and protecting our allies should not be a political decision. Too many Canadian lives would be at risk if it was.

7. Navy SEAL who wrote bin Laden book must pay government $6.8 million

The Washington Post, Dan Lamothe, 2016 08 21

Washington - The Navy SEAL who wrote a best-selling book detailing the secretive raid that killed al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden must pay the federal government at least $6.8 million under a deal reached late last week to avoid prosecution for not getting pre-publication approval for the work. The deal, which had been expected, was outlined in a six-page decree filed in federal court in Alexandria, Va. It ends a nearly four-year saga for Matthew Bissonnette that began with the publication of "No Easy Day: The Firsthand of the Mission That Killed Osama bin Laden" one year after the raid. Bissonnette ran afoul of the law for not adhering to a nondisclosure agreement he signed as a SEAL that stated that he would submit any work for review by the Pentagon to make sure no classified information was revealed. A decree signed by both federal authorities and Bissonnette and filed Friday said the SEAL and the government reached the deal after "extensive negotiations." It holds that Bissonnette must pay $2.76 million within 30 days, and an additional $1.38 million within six months. He also must file amended tax returns within six months that all of the proceeds he made on the book belong to the United States. Bissonnette, who wrote the book under the pen name Mark Owen, also agreed to pay the government $100,000 for a presentation on leadership that he gave that used slides that included information that was not submitted for Pentagon review first, the decree adds.

8. NSA-linked hackers hoard malware secrets. What could possibly go wrong?

The Los Angeles Times, 2016 08 21

Editorial: Emerging out of the blue, a cryptic online group that calls itself the Shadow Brokers claims that it has purloined a cache of cyber burglary tools from a little known but highly skilled hacking operation dubbed the Equation Group. The Shadow Brokers made some of the tools available for free, but announced that it would auction off the rest -- with a goal of more than half a billion dollars. The incident might have been written off as routine Internet puffery, except that Equation may be a contractor for or even an arm of the National Security Agency -- in other words, a group of the United States' very own cyber thieves. Kaspersky Lab, a Moscow-based cybersecurity analyst, has said Equation Group could be the world's most skillful hacking team; its sophistication and resources have led a number of analysts to conclude that Equation is backed by or part of the NSA. Oh and yes, at least some of the tools the Shadow Brokers dumped online for free reveal previously unknown security flaws in firewalls used to safeguard corporate and government computer networks. How useful they are remains to be seen, but the tools are clearly the work of skillful hackers. The Internet is abuzz with speculation about who the Shadow Brokers might be. Some security researchers -- and former NSA contractor turned whistle-blower Edward Snowden -- believe that it's a Russian-backed group wagging a finger at the NSA. Given the Russians' apparent involvement in the recent leak of emails from the Democratic National Committee, the Shadow Brokers' work could conceivably be another effort to rattle voters prior to the November election.

9. Westerners seen flocking to battle Islamic State while they still can

The Times of Israel, Thomas Watkins, 2016 08 21

Washington - Growing numbers of Westerners appear to be trying to join the battle against the Islamic State group in Iraq before it's too late, frontline volunteer fighters say. IS group jihadists have suffered a string of setbacks in Iraq and Syria in recent months, including the loss of key towns and facilities surrounding the remaining major strongholds in their self-declared "caliphate" — Mosul in Iraq and Raqqa in Syria. Although limited or unreliable public data make it difficult to track numbers, anecdotal evidence suggests aspiring anti-jihadists — many of them military veterans — recognize they may be running out of time to fight IS in a pitched battle as the group loses territory and morphs into a traditional terror group. The volunteers are eager despite being strongly discouraged — and sometimes banned by their home countries — from doing so. With the fight for Mosul expected to begin in the coming months, US-led coalition advisers, warplanes and drones are conducting "shaping operations" that will lay the battle groundwork. Louis Park, a 26-year-old Texan who returned to Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region for a second stint with local anti-IS forces in June, told AFP he had seen a sharp uptick in queries from aspiring Western fighters.

10. The FBI's misstep on Clinton emails

The Washington Post, 2016 08 21

Editorial: The director of the FBI, James B. Comey, did the right thing in announcing the results of the bureau's investigation of Hillary Clinton's email in early July. Realizing that the case was hyper-sensitive in the middle of a presidential campaign, Mr. Comey spoke up when ordinarily he would have simply forwarded his recommendation to prosecutors. He said the investigation determined that she was "extremely careless" in using a home-brew server while secretary of state, but that Ms. Clinton's actions did not warrant prosecution. It was important for the apolitical FBI director to say one way or the other whether there was criminal behavior so voters could make up their own minds. But now Mr. Comey has taken a misstep. The FBI has provided to Congress portions of the investigative files from the year-long probe. Although it is not known precisely which portions, some of the materials include interviews conducted by the FBI. On Capitol Hill, the FBI has deposited the material in a Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility, or SCIF, a room with restricted access. According to the Associated Press, the documents were transmitted to Congress with written warnings not to leak them. "These materials are nonpublic and contain classified and other sensitive material," FBI Acting Assistant Director Jason Herring wrote. "For that reason, these materials may not be further disseminated or disclosed, in part or in full, without obtaining the FBI's concurrence." Access to the documents is restricted to members of the judiciary, intelligence and government affairs committees. Republicans in Congress are unlikely to heed the warnings. Are these members of the GOP, who have enthusiastically exploited the Benghazi and email stories for partisan advantage, whose convention delegates chanted "lock her up," really going to read the FBI files and stay mum? The temptation here for mischief - partial leaks - is enormous.

11. How FBI handed over Clinton material causes a stir

Washington - The political dust-up over the FBI handing documents about the Hillary Clinton email investigation to Congress is intensifying, with Republicans complaining the materials were turned over in such a way that assessing them is difficult and Democrats contending they should not have been given to legislators. On Tuesday, the FBI delivered to Congress an overview of the investigation along with summaries of more than a dozen interviews with senior Clinton staffers, other State Department officials, former secretary of state Colin L. Powell and at least one other person, according to an email from a senior aide to Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) that was sent to congressional offices. The tussle centers over whether the FBI has the authority to impose sharp restrictions on the material, which co-mingled classified and nonclassified documents. The FBI required Congress to maintain the materials in a secure area accessible only by those who have clearances. Also at issue is the aim of Grassley and other Republicans to publicly release the summaries, which include new, unclassified details about the FBI's server investigation. In announcing the agency's findings last month, FBI Director James B. Comey said the investigation was untainted by political influence. Comey has said he wants to release more details than normal about the agents' work to underscore the nonpartisan nature of the probe. But the unusual delivery of the records, and the restriction imposed by the FBI, have fueled the partisan squabble.

12. How to Pass a C.I.A. Background Check

The New York Times, Malia Wollan, 2016 08 21

Analysis: "Withholding information from us will not work in your favor," says Ronald S. Patrick, deputy director of talent development at the Central Intelligence Agency, which receives up to 150,000 résumés a year. Applicants who are offered a job go through a monthslong security clearance, including an intense background check. To pass, you can't have been convicted of a felony ("That's a showstopper for us"); also, no recent illegal drug use. You will be asked about drugs in the application. Tell the truth. "We don't expect you to be shockingly, squeaky clean," Patrick says. "We expect you to have lived a life, to have exercised bad judgment, to have gone through adolescence and made mistakes." Get your finances in order. "The No. 1 reason why Americans spy is for financial gain or need," Patrick says. The C.I.A. sees bad credit and mountainous debt as potential liabilities. Prepare to be spied on. Investigators will come to your town; walk your streets; talk to your ex-colleagues, former roommates and nosy neighbors. They're looking for people not listed as your character references, especially those who don't like you. "I went through a lot of shoes," Patrick says of his former role as a background investigator. Keep your romantic interests American. "If you're in love with a Russian citizen," Patrick says, "we cannot take that risk." Sign over your medical records. "Tell us everything," Patrick says. "It may be embarrassing. It may be something you want to forget, something you've put in your past -- tell us about it anyway."

13. Horrors of a Yazidi woman enslaved by the Islamic State

The Washington Post, Farida Khalaf and Andrea C. Hoffman, 2016 08 21

Book Review: When Islamic State fighters swept into the Yazidi village of Kocho in Iraq in the summer of 2014, teenager Farida Khalaf was kidnapped along with her sister and about 80 other Yazidi girls. Her father and brother and other Yazidi men were defiant but overwhelmed by the onslaught, and were shot to death outside the village. Her mother and other women were forcibly taken to the Islamic State-controlled city of Tal Afar in Iraq, while Farida and the other girls wound up as slaves in the Islamic State's capital, Raqqa, in Syria. The Islamic State refuses to acknowledge the Yazidi religion, and as the girls learned from their captors, their families were slaughtered because they were infidels. "It was our right to kill them," one of the men told them. "For that is what it says in the Quran: 'Kill the Infidels!'" Another man piped in: "And take their wives. That's why you belong to us now, and we can do what we like with you. You don't have any rights." In her book, "The Girl Who Escaped ISIS," Farida recounts the horrors she and the other young women endured in captivity. Her story highlights the suffering caused by the Islamic State's flawed interpretation of the Koran and the group's brutal intolerance of peaceful religions. In Kocho, Yazidis and Muslim Arabs live side by side in tense accommodation. When a local Muslim leader heard that Islamic State fighters were heading toward the village, he knew what was in store for the Yazidi, and he sought to convert them. But Farida's mother and father resisted. Within a few days, the Islamic State had killed her father and kidnapped her mother.

14. The detectives who never forget a face

(Unidentified Placeline) A predator was stalking London. He would board a crowded bus at rush hour, carrying a Metro newspaper, and sit next to a young woman. Opening the newspaper to form a curtain, he would reach over and grope her. The man first struck one summer afternoon in 2014, on the No. 253 bus in North London, grabbing the crotch of a fifteen-year-old girl. She fled the bus and called the police, but by that time he had disappeared. A few months later, in October, he assaulted a twenty-one-year-old woman on the upper level of a double-decker as it approached the White Hart Lane stadium. She escaped to the lower level, but he followed her, and he continued to pursue her even after she got off the bus. She flagged down a passerby, and the man fled. In March, 2015, he groped a sixteen-year-old on the No. 168. On each occasion, the man slipped away from the crime scene by blending into a crowd of commuters. But, each time, he left a trace, because public buses in London are monitored by closed-circuit-television systems. When transit police played back the footage of each sexual assault, they saw the same middle-aged man in spectacles and a black parka. He had thinning hair and a dark mustache that was going gray. After consulting the electronic readers on each bus, investigators isolated one fare card that had been used on all three. If the pass had been bought with a credit card, it could be linked to the perpetrator. But the man had paid for it in cash. The transit police found themselves in a familiar predicament: a case in which a crime is captured on video but no one can identify the perpetrator. London has more than eight million residents; unless somebody recognizes a suspect, CCTV footage is effectively useless. Investigators circulated photographs of the man with the mustache, but nobody came forward with information. So they turned to a tiny unit that had recently been established by London's Metropolitan Police Service. In Room 901 of New Scotland Yard, the police had assembled half a dozen officers who shared an unusual talent:

they all had a preternatural ability to recognize human faces. Most police precincts have an officer or two with a knack for recalling faces, but the Met (as the Metropolitan Police Service is known) is the first department in the world to create a specialized unit. The team is called the super-recognizers, and each member has taken a battery of tests, administered by scientists, to establish this uncanny credential. Glancing at a pixelated face in a low-resolution screen grab, super-recognizers can identify a crook with whom they had a chance encounter years earlier, or whom they recognize from a mug shot. In 2011, after riots broke out in London, one super-recognizer, Gary Collins, a cop focussing on gangs, studied the grainy image of a young man who had hurled petrol bombs and set fire to cars. The rioter wore a woollen hat and a red bandanna, leaving only a sliver of his face uncovered, like a ninja. But the man had been arrested years earlier, and Collins had noticed him at the police station—in particular, his eyes. The rioter was convicted of arson and robbery, and is now serving six years.

15. Pure Hatred Unveiled

Mail on Sunday, Nick Craven, 2016 08 21

London - The wife of jailed hate preacher Anjem Choudary is today unveiled as an extremist herself, spouting vile diatribes supporting Islamic State and predicting 'destruction' for Britain's non-Muslims. Drawing parallels with a Koranic verse, Rubana Akhtar told a secret meeting: 'Allah destroyed them all their houses, Allah completely ruined them... see their houses in utter ruin because of the evils they committed.' She even gets a cheap laugh from her audience of impressionable young women and children as she mocks the plight of an IS victim who was burned alive. Rubana, 41, was caught on camera without her face veil by an undercover reporter last year, but she can only now be identified as the mother of Choudary's five children. She is being investigated by police while her husband faces up to ten years in jail after being found guilty of inviting support for IS. Akhtar is the former leader of the women's section of Choudary's Islamist group al-Muhajiroun, whose aim is to make Britain an Islamic state. After it was banned 11 years ago, Akhtar simply took her lectures underground. Last year, an undercover documentary reporter from Channel 4 Dispatches infiltrated her group - known as 'the Sisterhood' - and recorded a hate-filled rant. But today we reveal recordings that were not broadcast, revealing the true depth of her contempt for Britain's values and people. In her most ominous passage, she draws a parallel with British non-Muslims and non-believers from a Koranic verse who were punished with the wrath of God. Choudary's WhatsApp circle included members of the pressure group Cage and the brother of one of the killers of Fusilier Lee Rigby. Cage has blamed MI5 for turning Emwazi into the publicity-seeking serial killer who beheaded captives and released the bloody results on video.

16. Preacher's followers banned from London

The Sunday Times, Dipesh Gadher & Tim Shipman, 2016 08 21

London – As many as five associates of the hate preacher Anjem Choudary have been placed under draconian anti-terror controls in a new crackdown on domestic extremism. One convicted terrorist has been moved from London to the north of England and banned from Twitter and Facebook in an attempt to stop him radicalising others. The father of two, who is in his thirties, has also been barred from contacting former associates and relatives. None of the individuals has been charged with a criminal offence, but a source indicated it was "effectively like putting someone in jail". Details emerged as Choudary, 49, who faces up to 10 years in jail after drumming up support for Isis, is set to be isolated from other prisoners.

17. How has al-Muhajiroun hidden in plain sight?

The Sunday Times, Andrew Gillian, 2016 08 21

London - Anjem Choudary and his mentor in al-Muhajiroun, Omar Bakri Muhammad, had a standard joke to disarm journalists, interchangeably deployed between the two of them. Even in the group's ideal, polygamous sharia Britain, Choudary would confide with a smile, he would "only have one wife. Nobody else would marry me because of the bad publicity." "It was pretty tongue-in-cheek at times with Anjem," said Adam Deen, a former member of the group who worked with Choudary in the years after the 9/11 attacks and came to know him well. "He enjoyed the game. He absolutely relished being hated. But it was also very, very serious, a very calculated strategy." Just how serious has been underlined by his conviction under anti-terrorism laws for inviting support for a proscribed organisation, Isis. Yet under Choudary, life in al-Muhajiroun was deliberately made to feel like a bad sitcom. One member took his baby on demonstrations wearing a pink bonnet and an "I 'heart' al-Qaeda" label. The more Choudary denounced Christmas as the "pathway to hellfire", demanded the execution of the Pope or launched his poppy-burning "Hell for Heroes" campaigns, the more sophisticated opinion could dismiss him as a buffoon inflated by the tabloids. The most dangerous place in London, said the head of one mainstream Muslim group, was between Choudary and a TV camera. But the danger was all too real, and was hiding in plain sight behind those most British of things: ironic exaggeration and a slightly raised eyebrow. The UK's first Islamist terror attack, the petrol-bombing of a Territorial Army base in 1998, was carried out by a member of al-Muhajiroun. In the two decades since, many of the main terrorist plots in Britain have involved figures with strong links to the group. In little-noticed evidence to the parliamentary intelligence and security committee's inquiry into the affair, MI5 admitted that it had "changed its assessment" of al-Muhajiroun only after the Rigby murder. Until then, the spooks said, membership of the group was not regarded as an "automatic trigger" for investigation.

18. Australian businesses with close ties to China donated $5.5m to political parties, investigation shows

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Chris Uhlmann, 2016 08 21

Canberra - Businesses with Chinese connections gave Australia's major parties more than $5.5 million in 2013 and 2015, helping explain increasing official unease about China's influence on everything from politics to critical infrastructure like power grids. Businesses with Chinese connections gave Australia's major parties more than $5.5 million between 2013 and 2015, making them easily the largest source of foreign-linked donations. An shows some have strong ties with state organisations in China. It helps explain why Australian defence and intelligence agencies are increasingly uneasy about the level of Chinese Government influence here. That concern stretches from influence-buying in politics, through to control over local Chinese-language newspapers, radio stations and community associations. The most public sign of that disquiet was the in NSW electricity distributor Ausgrid. The ABC has sought comment from the Chinese Embassy over whether it has encouraged local organisations to protest on its behalf. Swinburne University Professor John Fitzgerald said many Australian-based Chinese community groups had close links with the Chinese Government. "I'm not sure that the Chinese Government itself is actively coordinating or driving what they do," he said. "But they are keen to remain onside." That was amply demonstrated three weeks ago when about 1,500 Australian-Chinese citizens and residents took to the streets of Melbourne to protest against the United Nations ruling.

19. Paralyzed Afghan, His Family Ripped Apart, Bears Pain of Perpetual War

Lashkargah - Long before the mortar shell landed, killing half of Ezzatullah Khan's immediate family, their lives had turned into a cruel and extended race with death. Mr. Khan's family, which for years had farmed in Helmand Province, first barely survived a brutal drought. Then, the relentless fighting between NATO forces and the Taliban uprooted the family from its ancestral village in the Kajaki District, forcing it from neighborhood to neighborhood in one of the most beaten-up regions of the Afghan war. Brothers, nephews, friends were lost along the way. About three years ago, Mr. Khan and his family finally settled in what they thought was a refuge: a modest three-bedroom mud house in the Chah-e-Anjir neighborhood, just outside Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital. His family was part of a steady flow of displaced Afghans toward the city, seeking shelter amid the heavy security presence there. Even as the rest of the province's vast territory kept switching hands, the population constantly trampled, Mr. Khan, who is in his early 30s, felt relatively safe for the first time in years, he said. Then, last winter, the fighting reached the gates of the provincial capital. Mr. Khan's neighbors began packing up and leaving, one after the other, and he and his family began contemplating yet another move, this time into Lashkar Gah.

20. Afghan forces struggle in northern city of Kunduz

Kunduz, Afghanistan -- The northern Afghan city of Kunduz was on the verge of falling to the Taliban on Saturday, as residents began to flee, and a key district nearby was overrun by insurgents, Afghan officials and local residents reported. Late Saturday, however, it appeared that disaster had been narrowly averted, at least temporarily, military leaders in Kabul said. Fighting here had reached the eastern edge of the city early Saturday, as insurgents captured the nearby Khanabad district. There was also heavy fighting on the city's northern side, and residents said the city, Afghanistan's fifth largest, was surrounded. By the end of the day, government forces appeared to have stalled the Taliban advance, retaking Khanabad. "Kunduz will not fall to the Taliban," Gen. Dawlat Waziri, a spokesman for the ministry of defense, said at a news conference.

Indo-Asian News Service, 2016 08 21

Islamabad - Pakistani security forces have arrested at least 198 terrorists, including of Al Qaeda and Pakistani Taliban, in a combing operation in Punjab province from December 2014 to August 2016, police said. According to police records, those arrested belong to various banned organisations from different cities across Punjab. At least nine Al Qaeda terrorists were arrested, of whom five were caught in Lahore and four in Dera Ghazi Khan. Thirteen of the arrested terrorists belonged to Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan while 176 caught were from the anti-Shia Lashkar-e-Jahngvi group, the most from any organisation, of whom 94 were arrested in Bahawalpur. No terrorist from the Islamic State militant group (Daesh) was arrested in Punjab, police said, according to Pakistan Today on Sunday.

22. China Helps Aung San Suu Kyi With Peace Talks in Myanmar

Beijing - As Myanmar's leader, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, met this past week with Chinese officials during her five-day visit here, China helped arrange a gift for her back home, a reminder that it wants to make itself Myanmar's new best friend. Since assuming power this year, Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi has said her major goal is to end 70 years of civil war with ethnic minorities seeking greater autonomy. The gift, announced Thursday, was a letter signed by three well-armed and stubborn ethnic rebel groups with ties to China that declared their intention to join a peace conference she will convene this month. "I do believe that as a good neighbor China will do everything possible to promote our peace process," Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi said at a news conference here on Friday. "If you ask me what my most important aim is for my country, that is to achieve peace and unity among the different peoples of our union. Without peace there can be no sustained development." But China was not acting out of altruism when it nudged the groups to join the peace talks. After years of encouraging the armed groups, China wants to end the prolonged fighting. The lawlessness created by that conflict has allowed the illegal jade and timber trade, worth billions of dollars, to flourish, but it has also made legitimate commerce across China's southern border with Myanmar almost impossible.

23. Chinese coast guard vessels enter Japanese waters around Senkakus

Naha - Four China Coast Guard vessels entered Japanese territorial waters around the disputed Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea on Sunday, prompting Japan to lodge a protest with China. The ships entered the waters near the Japanese-administered uninhabited islands, which China claims and calls Diaoyu, shortly after 10 a.m., the first such move by Chinese government ships since Aug. 17, and sailed for about an hour before leaving the area, according to the Japan Coast Guard. A patrol boat of the 11th Regional Coast Guard Headquarters based in Naha, Okinawa Prefecture, warned the Chinese vessels, including one apparently equipped with guns, to leave the waters.

24. Concerns grow over heightened terror threats by Pyongyang against S. Koreans

Yonhap News, 2016 08 21

Beijing- In the wake of the recent defection of a high-ranking North Korean diplomat to South Korea, concerns have grown that Pyongyang may be considering terrorist attacks on South Korean nationals in China and East Asian countries. Last week, Seoul said Thae Yong-ho, a minister at the North Korean embassy in London, defected to the South with his family in the latest development that shows even elite officials are becoming disillusioned with the world's most closed and repressive country. Thae is believed to come from the top echelons of North Korean society and was trusted by the regime. North Korean leader Kim Jong-un has reportedly ordered the dispatch of agents and even sought alliances with organized gangs in those regions to launch a terror attack against or kidnap South Korean citizens in retaliation for a series of high-profile defections of North Koreans. According to a source on Sunday, the Thae Yong-ho case seems to have added fuel to the fire. Various signs point to moves to harm South Korean nationals having increased since Seoul confirmed last week that the diplomat has arrived in the country. Accordingly, safety alerts have issued by Seoul, particularly among South Koreans living in China and those traveling to North Korea-China border areas.

25. North Korea calls diplomat defector 'human scum'

The New York Times, Cho Sang Hun, 2016 08 21

Seoul - North Korea said Saturday that a diplomat in its London embassy who recently defected to South Korea had fled rather than face punishment for various crimes, calling him "human scum." The statement, from the official Korean Central News Agency, was North Korea's first reaction to the defection of Thae Yong Ho, its most senior official to defect in almost two decades. The defection of Thae, who was the No. 2 diplomat in the North's embassy in London, was announced by South Korea on Wednesday. The North Korean statement said that Thae, whom it did not identify by name, had been ordered in June to return from Britain to Pyongyang, the North's capital, because he had embezzled state funds, sold official secrets and sexually assaulted a minor. The statement offered no evidence for those accusations.

26. Japan to train personnel to counter cyberattacks on infrastructure

Kyodo News, 2016 08 21

Tokyo - The Japanese government will set up an institute during the next fiscal year to train specialists to counter cyberattacks on electricity distribution and other important infrastructure systems, a government source said Sunday. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's government plans to allocate funds for the program in an extra budget soon to be compiled as it seeks to prevent a large-scale blackout during the Tokyo Olympics and Paralympics in 2020 or leaks of sensitive information on power plant designs, the source said.

27. 3 Filipino sympathizers of IS killed in Philippines

Associated Press, 2016 08 21

Manila - Philippine forces have killed three suspected sympathizers of the Islamic State group but failed to capture their leader in a clash in the country's south, an army official said Sunday. Troops seized two rifles and an IS-style black flag of the slain militants, who belonged to a small armed group called the Ansar Al Khilafah Philippines, following Saturday's clash near Maasim town in Sarangani province, said army Maj. Gen. Rafael Valencia. A militant was captured by the troops prior to the fighting near Maasim, Valencia said. Military officials said the militants, led by their leader, Mohammad Jaafar Sabiwang Maguid, were spotted in a hinterland by villagers, who notified the troops.

28. Indian forces fire at Kashmir protesters, killing 1

The Associated Press, Aijaz Hussain, 2016 08 21

Srinagar - One young man was killed and dozens wounded in Indian-controlled Kashmir on Sunday as government forces fired shotguns and tear gas at protesters demanding an end to Indian rule in the disputed Himalayan region. The man was hit by a tear gas shell in his chest during clashes between rock-throwing protesters and government troops in Srinagar, the region's main city, said a police officer who spoke on condition of anonymity in keeping with department policy. The man died later at a hospital. At least 70 civilians, including four women, were injured during several clashes in the northern areas of Sopore, Baramulla and Ganderbal that erupted as government forces tried to prevent the villagers from stopping protest rallies, the officer said. Troops fired tear gas and pellet guns at rock-throwing protesters, he said. A security lockdown and protest strikes continued for the 44th straight day Sunday, with tens of thousands of Indian armed police and paramilitary soldiers in full riot gear patrolling the tense region. The killing of a popular rebel commander on July 8 sparked some of Kashmir's largest protests against Indian rule in recent years.

29. Gunmen in Egypt kill informer, soldier at checkpoint north of Cairo

Reuters, 2016 08 21

Cairo - Gunmen killed an informer and a soldier and injured five other people, including two civilians, in an attack at a police checkpoint in the province of Menoufia north of Cairo, the director of the ambulance services said on Sunday. Security forces are searching for the men in that area, about 80 km (50 miles) north of Cairo, one security source said. Egypt's government is facing an insurgency that has killed hundreds of soldiers and policemen, mostly in northern Sinai, since mid-2013, when then-army chief Abdel Fattah al-Sisi ousted Islamist President Mohamed Mursi. ISIS's Egyptian affiliate, which calls itself Sinai Province, mainly operates out of the northern Sinai Peninsula, which borders Israel, the Gaza Strip and the Suez Canal.

30. Morocco king urges diaspora to reject Islamist extremism

BBC News, 2016 08 21

Morocco and its king have positioned themselves as key voices in the fight against jihadism. The King of Morocco, Mohammed VI, has called on Moroccans living abroad, many of them in Europe, to defend a tolerant form of Islam and reject extremism. It was his first address to the five million Moroccans in the diaspora since the recent attacks in Europe by Islamist militants. European citizens of Moroccan origin were implicated in some attacks. Condemning the murder of innocent people, the king singled out the killing of a priest in France. Two followers of so-called Islamic State (IS) slit the throat of Father Jacques Hamel, 84, during Mass at his church in a suburb of Rouen. "Killing a priest is forbidden by religion," King Mohammed said in his speech on Saturday evening. "Murdering him inside a church is unforgivable madness, for he is a human being and a religious man - even if he is not a Muslim."

31. Al-Shabab militants kill at least 10 in Somalia bombings

Agence France Presse, 2016 08 21

Galkayo - A pair of suicide car bomb attacks killed at least 10 people at a local government headquarters in Somalia on Sunday. The militant al-Shabab group claimed responsibility for the attack, which occurred in the town of Galkayo, in the semi-autonomous Puntland region. "We have confirmed 10 people dead, including civilians and security forces," said Ali Ahmed, a police officer. At least 15 more were injured. Witnesses and local residents described hearing two loud blasts in quick succession followed by heavy gunfire. "There were two huge bombs," said local resident Halima Ismail. "The first one was a truck bomb, followed a minute or so (later) by another car bomb. My brother was injured at the scene."

33. Baghdad authorities clear site of deadly mall bombing

The Associated Press, Qassim Abdul-Zahra, 2016 08 21

Baghdad - Traffic began to file through central Baghdad's busy Karradah street on Sunday for the first time in nearly two months. After the July 3 attack that killed close to 300 people, the street was sealed off and within days the shells of the charred buildings around the scene of the blast were covered in death notices. For weeks after the attack, grieving families and loved ones gathered at the site to light candles in the evenings, others marched in protests. Local Baghdad authorities began to sweep all of that away Saturday after a group of local officials visited the site. By Sunday morning the streets were almost entirely cleared. "Today we must return to our normal lives and work," said Silwan Walid, a 29-year-old perfume shop owner who works on the street. Walid said watching construction equipment haul off broken glass and charred debris gave him hope for the future. "Now we feel like life can return to normal" again and we can go back to providing our families with a decent living," he said, referring to his shop that has been unable to reopen while the site was blocked off.

34. Iran May Start Production of Supersonic Cruise Missiles in Near Future – Defense Minister Sputnik News Service, 2016 08 21

Moscow - Tehran has made great progress in the field of maritime cruise missiles' development and can begin producing models with supersonic speed in the near future, Iranian Defense Minister Hossein Dehghan said Sunday. "We have succeeded in changing the strategic systems of cruise missiles and increasing the power of their engines and ranges," Dehghan said, adding that the supersonic speed may be achieved soon, as quoted by the Press TV broadcaster.

35. DM Mentions Wide Stride in Iran's Arms Development Fars News Agency, 2016 08 21

Tehran - Iranian Defense Minister Brigadier General Hossein Dehghan announced the country's plans to supply the Army with home-made torpedoes and the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) forces with modern speedboats that cruise at a speed of over 60 knots per hour. "We have taken good steps in the production of subsurface vessels and torpedoes and this year, we will deliver the first batch of torpedoes to the Army forces," Dehghan said, addressing a ceremony to unveil the home-made turbojet in Tehran on Sunday. He said that the production of the turbojet will enable Iran to build 20 helicopters annually. Noting that Iran has also built speedboats which can cruise at a speed of over 60 knots per hour and have been equipped with missiles, General Dehghan said that the IRGC Navy will be supplied with the speedboats this year. He also said that the country's capacity to produce light weapons has now increased to 500,000 from 24,000 three years ago. His remarks came after Commander of the IRGC Navy Rear Admiral Ali Fadavi declared in May that the IRGC has done all the necessary tests and will soon

36. More Enemies of the Kremlin End Up Dead The New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 08 21

Moscow - From a certain perspective, certainly the Kremlin's, Vladimir Kara-Murza's behavior in Washington could be seen as treasonous, a brazen betrayal of his homeland. In a series of public meetings on Capitol Hill, Mr. Kara-Murza, a leader in the Russian opposition, urged American lawmakers to expand economic sanctions against the Russian government under a law known as the Magnitsky Act. That would hasten political change in Russia, he argued. Back in Moscow a month later, in May 2015, the changes Mr. Kara-Murza detected were going on in his own body. Midway through a meeting with fellow dissidents, beads of sweat inexplicably dotted his forehead. His stomach churned. "It all went so fast," he recalled. "In the space of about 20 minutes, I went from feeling completely normal to having a rapid heart rate, really high blood pressure, to sweating and vomiting all over the place, and then I lost consciousness." He had ingested a poison, doctors told him after he emerged from a weeklong coma, though they could find no identifiable trace of it. While Mr. Kara-Murza survived, few others in his position have proved as lucky. He said he was certain he had been the target of a security service poisoning. Used extensively in the Soviet era, political murders are again playing a prominent role in the Kremlin's foreign policy, the most brutal instrument in an expanding repertoire of intimidation tactics intended to silence or otherwise intimidate critics at home and abroad. Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, has made no secret of his ambition to restore his country to what he sees as its rightful place among the world's leading nations. He has invested considerable money and energy into building an image of a strong and morally superior Russia, in sharp contrast with what he portrays as weak, decadent and disorderly Western democracies.

38. ISIL uses child bomber in attack that killed 51 in SE Turkey

Istanbul - At least 51 people were killed and 69 others were wounded in a suicide attack at a wedding ceremony late on Aug. 20 in southeastern Turkey, the Gaziantep Governor's Office has said, with the president saying the perpetrator was a child suicide bomber likely from the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL). "There are strong indications that the attack was carried out by ISIL. A suicide bomber aged between 12 and 14 blew himself up. We know that ISIL has been trying to gain ground in Gaziantep for a while now," President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan told journalists in a press briefing in Istanbul on Aug. 21. The terror attack took place in the Beybahçe neighborhood of the Şahinbey district of Gaziantep province, according to a statement by the governor's office. After its initial inspections at the scene, police said they found pieces of a suicide vest. The bride and the groom were also wounded in the attack on a street wedding, mostly attended by people from the eastern provinces of Siirt and Van. The suicide bomber reportedly joined the crowd disguising himself as a guest before blowing himself up. Funerals were started to be held on Aug. 21. President Erdoğan condemned the attack in a statement, adding that "the place where terror comes from doesn't make any difference for us."

39. Erdoğan blames Isis for suspected suicide attack at wedding in Gaziantep

The Guardian, Constanze Letsch, 2016 08 21

Istanbul - At least 50 people have been killed and nearly 100 wounded in a suspected suicide bomb attack on an outdoor wedding celebration in Gaziantep, Turkish authorities have said. The Turkish president, Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, harshly condemned the attack on Saturday night, which he said had been carried out by a child of between 12 and 14 years old and was likely to have been ordered by Islamic State. Nazım Daştan, a local journalist, said the scene was one of devastation. "There were so many dead people. There were body parts. A wedding really is the last place that one would expect an attack on – it's horrifying. It seems clear that this was yet another Isis attack in Gaziantep," he said. Photographs taken after the explosion showed several bodies covered with white sheets as a crowd gathered nearby. Mehmet Taşcıoğlu, a local journalist, said the blast at about 10.50pm in the Şahinbey district could be heard in many parts of the city. Speaking on television, Şimşek said: "This was a barbaric attack. It appears to be a suicide attack. All terror groups, the PKK, Daesh, the [Gülen movement] are targeting Turkey. But God willing, we will overcome.” There has been a string of deadly attacks in Turkey in the past year that were either blamed on Isis or claimed by the outlawed Kurdistan Workers’ party (PKK) and its radical offshoot, the Kurdistan Freedom Hawks. In June, suspected Isis militants attacked Atatürk airport in Istanbul, killing 44 people. The latest incident comes a month after a military coup attempt blamed by the Turkish government on a network linked to the US-based cleric Fethullah Gülen. The death toll was raised early on Sunday from 22 to 30 before the state-run Anadolu news agency reported that the number had reached 50, with 94 wounded.

40. Erdogan: ISIS likely behind attack that killed 50 people at wedding
CNN, Ralph Ellis and Isil Sariyuce, 2016 08 21

Istanbul, Turkey - The Turkish President declared ISIS as the "likely perpetrator" of an attack that killed 50 people at a wedding in the nation's southeast. The death toll from the Gaziantep attack rose to 50 early Sunday, according to the local governor's office. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan said there is "no difference" between three opponents of his government: terror group ISIS, which is based in neighboring Syria; the outlawed Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK); and FETO, the network of US-based cleric Fethullah Gulen, state-run Anadolu news agency reported Sunday. Erdogan accuses Gulen of being behind a recent coup attempt. He has denied the accusation. No group has claimed responsibility for the attack, which also injured 94 others. The blast occurred in the city of Gaziantep, about 95 kilometers (60 miles) north of the war-torn Syrian city of Aleppo. The agency added that the wedding celebration took place on a street, which is common in southern Turkey. Video of the aftermath shows hundreds of people in the darkened street as rescue workers lift victims into ambulances. Orhan Akin, Gaziantep bureau chief for the Ihlas News Agency, told CNN Turk that he saw "at least 20 ambulances carrying injured people."

41. Biden, Turkish PM to discuss Syria, extradition of Gülen
Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 08 21

Istanbul - U.S. Vice President Joe Biden and Turkish Prime Minister Binali Yıldırım will discuss issues regarding Syria and the possible extradition of U.S.-based Islamic preacher Fethullah Gülen during Biden’s visit to Turkey, Yıldırım has said. “Our relations with the U.S. are medium sugar now. Biden is coming to Turkey to make the coffee sugary,” Yıldırım told foreign correspondents in Istanbul on Aug. 20, drawing an analogy between bilateral relations with the U.S. and Turkish coffee. “The U.S. is our strategic ally. Every family experiences problems. There are ones who want to ruin our relationship. We need to stop Gülen from being a problem,” he added. Biden is scheduled to visit Turkey on Aug. 24, which came after Turkish officials’ repeated their requests for the extradition of Gülen. Noting that Turkey had sent 84 files before the failed July 15 takeover and four after it to the U.S. for the extradition of Gülen, Yıldırım said he should be arrested in light of the mutual deal between Washington and Ankara on the extradition of criminals.

42. Turkey restructures intelligence after coup attempt
Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 08 21

Istanbul - The National Intelligence Agency (MİT) will be restructured in the wake of the failed July 15 coup attempt, believed to have been masterminded by the Fetullahist Terror Organization (FETÖ), Turkish Prime Minister Binali Yıldırım has said. “We are exerting new efforts regarding MİT. Due to the developing communications technologies and world conditions, intelligence agencies should be renewed. For instance, Sept. 11, 2001, was a milestone for the U.S. They reconstructed their intel agencies after that date,” he told foreign correspondents in a meeting in Istanbul, adding that the domestic intelligence should be strengthened and that preventive intelligence was “very significant.”

43. US ambassador to Turkey condemns ‘barbaric’ attack in Gaziantep
Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 08 21

Istanbul - The top U.S. diplomat in Ankara has strongly condemned the terrorist attack late on Aug. 20 in the southeastern Anatolian province of Gaziantep, in which at least 50 people were killed and dozens more wounded. Calling the attack "barbaric," U.S. Ambassador to Turkey John Bass voiced Washington's determination for resuming its solidarity with Turkey in the joint fight against terrorism. "We condemn the barbaric attack on innocent civilians last night in Gaziantep," said a written statement by Bass posted Aug. 21 on the official Twitter account of the U.S. Embassy to Turkey, @USEmbassyTurkey. "We stand by our ally Turkey and pledge to continue to work closely together to defeat the common threat of terrorism," Bass said, concluding his brief statement.

1. Tory public safety critic warns Liberals not to mess with spy agency's new power to disrupt threats|

Ottawa Citizen, Ian MacLeod, 2016 09 02

Ottawa - It would be a serious mistake for the Liberals to tamper with the security service's new power to actively disrupt threats to national security, Tory public safety critic Erin O'Toole said Friday as documents surfaced offering a glimpse of the spy agency's plan to safeguard the power from abuse. "In this environment of radicalized people, this is exactly why the disruption power is so important. Intelligence agencies could intervene over time as these risks potentially develop," he said. His comments come as the Liberal government prepares to launch public consultations on the creation of what it calls a new national security framework. Details remain vague, but it appears to be the centrepiece of the government's promised overhaul of the "problematic elements" of the controversial Bill C-51 national security law enacted by the Conservative government in June 2015. One of the most dramatic provisions of what's now known as the Anti-terrorism Act of 2015, gives the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) the power to carry out "threat reduction activities" (TRA) against suspected breaches of national security. If those activities could break the law or violate Charter of Rights and Freedoms rights, the agency must get a Federal Court warrant authorizing the operation and granting it impunity for law-breaking in the name of national security. The TRA provision has fundamentally changed the agency's role from strict intelligence gathering to a more kinetic posture, able to "take reasonable and proportional measures," to physically obstruct suspected threats and plots, in Canada or globally. CSIS was created in 1984, replacing the disgraced and disbanded RCMP Security Service after revelations of illegal activities targeting suspected Front de libération du Québec extremists and possible radicals infiltrating the Parti Québécois. As a result, CSIS's prime mandate had been limited to collecting, analyzing and reporting security intelligence to government and allies. The new threat reduction mandate puts it on an operational footing much closer to that of the old security service. And that worries some in the intelligence community.

2. Intelligence beats heavy-handed laws when dealing with terror

CBC News, 2016 09 03

Opinion: As the Liberal government conducts national consultations on the state of cyber security in Canada, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has passed a resolution to call for the ability to unlock digital evidence on electronic devices. They cite the reliance on encryption by terrorists as a major barrier for law enforcement, which needs more tools to do their jobs properly. This proposal comes at a time when the federal government is supposed to be consulting with experts on how to evaluate Canada's security apparatus, all in order to reform Canada's Anti-terrorism Act, or Bill C-51. Yet the threat of terrorism, as displayed in cities such as Orlando and Nice, have helped delay the reform process, while more recent incidents, such as the killing of would-be jihadist Aaron Driver in Ontario, have further called into question the urge to scale back Canada's security legislation. C-51, controversial anti-terrorism bill, is now law. So, what changes? The climate of fear that continues to be cultivated by high-profile national and international incidents seems to distract from the actual need to have a more details-oriented debate on the nitty-gritties of Canadian national security. Each example of terrorism is treated as yet another sign that only more laws, surveillance and policing will help the situation. This tendency has existed for the past 15 years, and there's a good case to be made for a change in the national security paradigm. That the FBI was instrumental in foiling Driver's attempt to detonate an improvised explosive device in Strathroy, Ont., earlier this month has caused many to question the robustness of Canada's security laws. The 24-year-old was a vocal online supporter of ISIS, militants fighting to establish an Islamist state, which prompted authorities to limit his movement and activities with a peace bond. An analysis conducted by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service in 2010-11, called "A Study of Radicalization: the Making of Islamist Extremists in Canada Today," concluded that mainstream mosques and Muslim community centres are usually not where troubled individuals become indoctrinated. 3. RC hack nearly brought agency 'back to the buggy'

The Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 09 03

Ottawa - Upon discovering that it had been hacked by China, the Canadian government's scientific-research body did digital damage control on an enormous scale. Firing up its vintage fax machines, it jettisoned scores of computer servers, bought its staff hundreds of new laptops and drew up a list of about 20,000 corporate partners in Canada whose secrets risked being collateral damage. Records newly released to The Globe and Mail reveal these and other details about the extensive fallout from this nightmare at the National Research Council. The hack of the NRC was highlighted in July, 2014, when the then-Conservative government blamed China, making it the first and only cyberespionage campaign that Canada has ever pinned on a specific state adversary. While hacks of government departments occur relatively routinely, the NRC could be considered a more valuable target than most. For decades, it has been routing tax dollars to fund cutting-edge research in agriculture, engineering and computer science. Placing bets on Canadian companies helps the NRC work to ensure future prosperity, and its staff gets a glimpse of emerging technologies and proprietary business plans. That's why the Canadian government was alarmed when federal officials announced two years ago that they had "detected and confirmed a cyberintrusion" within the NRC by "a highly sophisticated Chinese state-sponsored actor." But while prime minister Stephen Harper's government took the unprecedented step of allowing officials to make the controversy public, it remains unknown how or when Chinese hackers first infiltrated the NRC's computer systems, or what drew them to it in the first place.

4. Security issues still absent from Trudeau's China visit

The National Post, Marie-Danielle Smith, 2016 09 03

Ottawa - As basketball with Yao Ming, Montreal smoked meat and a promotional event for Manulife-Sinochem kept Prime Minister Justin Trudeau busy Friday, questions remain about his strategic vision for China, with some suggesting a military presence in the Asia-Pacific region would give Canada more teeth. During this second, commercially focused leg of the trip, Trudeau and ministers Chrystia Freeland and Bill Morneau have been expanding Canada's financial and economic ties to China with photo ops aplenty. But regional security issues at the forefront of the international agenda - and likely to be discussed at the Group of 20 summit in Hangzhou Sunday and Monday - still haven't come up. Some are highlighting what they see as Canada's responsibility to be strong, clear and overt about China's behaviour in the South China Sea, one of the world's major trade routes. China has long claimed a majority of the sea, which also borders Vietnam, Taiwan, the Philippines, Brunei and Malaysia. But international boundaries established by the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, based on distance from shorelines, were upheld by an international appeals court in The Hague this July. The U.S. navy has been patrolling international waters in the area. It has recently been pressuring another Canadian ally, Australia, to do the same. But Canada could send a strong message to its western partners by mobilizing its navy to have more presence in the region, too, suggested David Mulroney, Canada's ambassador to China from 2009 to 2012.

5. Toews: airport snooping on hold pending privacy review

The National Post, Ian MacCloed, 2016 09 03

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Vic Toews has ordered officials to halt the planned electronic eavesdropping on air travellers' conversations until a full privacy review is completed. "We have heard concerns from Canadians regarding the privacy impact of this practice," Public Safety spokeswoman Julie Carmichael said in written statement Tuesday. "Minister Toews has directed the CBSA to halt audio monitoring until a privacy impact assessment can be submitted, and recommendations from the privacy commissioner can be reviewed by the government." The move comes one day after Toews, responding to opposition questions Monday, defended the planned audio surveillance of air travellers and airport employees at Ottawa Macdonald-Cartier International Airport. Similar audio-video equipment has been operating at other Canadian airports and ports of entry for "many years," according to the CBSA, which wouldn't identify the locations.

6. Terror suspect legally owned assault rifle

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 09 03

Toronto - A Toronto man arrested in April due to concerns he might engage in terrorism was the registered owner of an AR-15 type assault rifle, according to details disclosed at an Ontario court hearing Friday. How Kadir Abdul was able to legally own a restricted weapon remains unclear. The RCMP and Toronto police declined to comment. Police have not been able to locate his Windham Weaponry semi-automatic rifle. Five months ago the 27-year-old was detained in the eastern Turkish city of Adana on suspicion he was trying to enter Syria. He was returned to Toronto and is the subject of a terrorism peace bond that restricts him from communicating with Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. In the Ontario Court of Justice, prosecutor Matthew Giovinazzo revealed that after Abdul left for Istanbul on March 23, police executed a search warrant at the apartment he shared with his family in an attempt to find his assault rifle. They did not find it, but Abdul's father, Mohammad Uddin, told investigators after his son's departure he had broken the restricted weapon into pieces and thrown them down the apartment garbage chute. Uddin also said he had destroyed his son's firearm possession and acquisition licence. He was charged with two firearms offences on May 19, including failing to report "having destroyed a restricted firearm." On Friday, Uddin, 57, pleaded guilty through a Bengali interpreter.

7. Detained Morsi aide returns to Canada

The Canadian Press, Diana Mehta, 2016 09 03

Ottawa - The family of a Toronto-area resident who had been detained in Egypt without charge for three years says the man has returned to Canada. Khaled Al-Qazzaz, a permanent resident of Canada and a University of Toronto engineering graduate, was once an aide to Egypt's ousted president, Mohammed Morsi. He was arrested alongside the former leader in July 2013, when the Egyptian military removed Morsi from office. After an ordeal that lasted three years, Al-Qazzaz was abruptly cleared to return to Canada last month and landed in Toronto on Aug. 14, his brother-in-law said. "He's overwhelmed with joy and emotion, and with finally the opportunity to start fresh, to have a complete family again," said Ahmad Attia. "It's still becoming a reality for us." Al-Qazzaz was never charged, nor did Egyptian authorities explain exactly why they had arrested him.

8. Montreal plane spotters have fun as well as boosting airport security

The Canadian Press, Morgan Lowrie, 2016 09 03

Montreal - Perched on a ladder with his camera, a scanner tuned to the control tower on the ground beside him, Jean-Charles Hubert doesn't miss much at Montreal's Pierre Elliott Trudeau airport. Every week, rain or shine, the 41-year-old can be found at the airport with his fellow plane-spotters _ a group of aviation enthusiasts with a passion for photographing aircraft. "It's a bit like a drug," said Hubert, wearing a blue ball cap bearing the group's name _ the 55th Avenue Spotters, named for one of the roads that runs by the airport. "I keep telling myself I'm not going to come, but then I find myself back here." The group's dedicated presence can even be a boon for security, as far as the airport is concerned. Hubert says he and some of the other spotters make a point of calling airport security if they notice anything unusual, such as a hole in the fence or suspicious human behaviour. Some other members of the group have had that role somewhat formalized by the airport authorities, who created an "airport watch" program in 2009 that is modelled after similar programs in Ottawa and Toronto. Christiane Beaulieu, the Montreal airport's vice-president of communications, says basic training, uniforms and a special phone number to call are provided to the watch's 46 members.

9. Civil service parrots Trudeau's propaganda

The Edmonton Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 09 03

Column: Back in 2011, federal bureaucrats took issue with using the phrase "Harper government" to describe the previous administration in official government news releases. Apparently, that was too partisan for the gentle souls in Canada's civil service. These same bureaucrats, however, had no problem parroting Justin Trudeau's favourite partisan talking point when announcing the delivery of a Liberal campaign promise. A recent government of Canada news release about the Trudeau government's peacekeeping plan contained blatantly partisan language. "Canada is back, and that includes its peace missions," read the news release, written by supposedly non-partisan civil servants at Global Affairs Canada. That wasn't a quote from a Liberal cabinet minister, which are listed in a separate section of the release, attributed to them. Rather, it was tucked into the news portion of the bulletin. It's one thing for Liberal politicians to say "Canada is back," gloating that their party is back in power.

10. Missions can be bureaucratic, abusive and buck-passing. they can also be effective

National Post, Richard Warnica, 2016 09 03

Analysis: Jacob Kathman takes a Moneyball approach to political science. He studies huge data sets on things like civilian deaths in civil war and international military intervention. As a political scientist at the State University of New York in Buffalo, Kathman has spent most of the past decade using that big data to puzzle out issues tied to global peace and security. But he keeps coming back to one question: Does peacekeeping work? It turns out to be remarkably hard to figure out. That's partially because researchers can't seem to agree on what "work" should mean. Does success in UN peacekeeping mean ending war? Sustaining peace? Reducing attacks on civilians? Is it about fostering stable government, fighting terrorists or protecting human rights? Maybe it means just not making things worse? Like a lot of big data analysts, Kathman speaks about his own work with boundless enthusiasm but also endless caveats. He hedges and qualifies, and always makes the listener aware of the limits of what he can know. Still, in his own cautious way, he's pretty sure he has an answer. "The general consensus," he said in a recent interview, "is, for the most part, peacekeeping seems to improve the situation on the ground, generally speaking." In other words, yes, peacekeeping does work. At least according to the kind of analysis Kathman and his colleagues perform. What they've done over several studies is look at UN troop and police deployments, month by month, all over the world for many decades. What they've found is that, despite some high-profile failures, peacekeeping does tend to improve things on the ground. "In terms of reducing violence, maintaining stability, improving progress toward democracy and economic stability, peacekeeping appears to be a pretty positive way forward for many war-torn countries," Kathman said.

11. Row on tarmac an awkward G20 start for U.S., China

Reuters, 2016 09 03

Washington - A Chinese official confronted U.S. President Barack Obama's national security adviser on the tarmac on Saturday prompting the Secret Service to intervene, an unusual altercation as China implements strict controls ahead of a big summit. The stakes are high for China to pull off a trouble-free G20 summit of the world's top economies, its highest profile event of the year, as it looks to cement its global standing and avoid acrimony over a long list of tensions with Washington. Shortly after Obama's plane landed in the eastern city of Hangzhou, a Chinese official attempted to prevent his national security adviser Susan Rice from walking to the motorcade as she crossed a media rope line, speaking angrily to her before a Secret Service agent stepped between the two. Rice responded but her comments were inaudible to reporters standing underneath the wing of Air Force One. It was unclear if the official, whose name was not immediately clear, knew that Rice was a senior official and not a reporter.

12. Obama urges China to stop flexing muscles over South China Sea

Reuters, 2016 09 03

Washington - China needs to be a more responsible power as it gains global influence and avoid flexing its muscles in disputes with smaller countries over issues like the South China Sea, US President Barack Obama told CNN in an interview to be aired on Sunday. Obama, who meets with President Xi Jinping at a G20 summit next week in China, told CNN the United States supports the peaceful rise of China but that Beijing had to recognize that "with increasing power comes increasing responsibilities," according to excerpts released on Friday. "If you sign a treaty that calls for international arbitration around maritime issues, the fact that you're bigger than the Philippines or Vietnam or other countries ... is not a reason for you to go around and flex your muscles," Obama said. "You've got to abide by international law." China, a signatory to the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, recently lost an arbitration dispute over the South China Sea. A court in the Hague found China had no historic title over the waters of the South China Sea and had infringed on the rights of the Philippines. Beijing has rejected the ruling.

13. F.B.I. Files on Email Inquiry Show Grilling on Clinton's Judgment

The New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, 2016 09 03

Washington - F.B.I. officials questioned Hillary Clinton extensively about her judgment in using her private email system to discuss classified drone strikes and in allowing aides to destroy large numbers of emails, before ultimately deciding she should not face criminal charges, according to investigative documents released Friday. The documents provided a number of new details about Mrs. Clinton's private server, including what appeared to be a frantic effort by a computer specialist to delete an archive of her emails even after a congressional committee had requested they be preserved. In a 3½-hour interview with the Justice Department's top counterintelligence officials on July 2, Mrs. Clinton defended her handling of the private email system by repeatedly saying she had deferred to the judgment of her aides, an F.B.I. summary of the interview showed. Mrs. Clinton's use of the private server has shadowed her presidential campaign for a year and a half. And the newly disclosed records, while largely reinforcing what had already been known about the F.B.I. investigation, provided Republicans more ammunition to attack the Democratic nominee's judgment and honesty as she heads into the final, post-Labor Day phase of the campaign. Among the other key findings in the F.B.I. documents: – Mrs. Clinton regarded emails containing classified discussions about planned drone strikes as "routine." – She said she was either unaware of or misunderstood some classification procedures. – Colin L. Powell, a former secretary of state, had advised her to "be very careful" in how she used email. The F.B.I. documents show that an unnamed computer specialist deleted the archive of Mrs. Clinton's emails weeks after the existence of the private server became public in March 2015.

14. F.B.I. Email Inquiry Reveals Some of Secretary's Habits

The New York Times, Michael S. Schmidt, 2016 09 03

Washington - Documents released by the F.B.I. on Friday revealed new details about the Justice Department's yearlong investigation into Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server and whether she and her aides mishandled classified information. Among the documents was an 11-page summary of an interview F.B.I. agents conducted with Mrs. Clinton on July 2. Two days later, the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, said the bureau had recommended to the Justice Department that neither Mrs. Clinton nor her aides should be charged with a crime. Here are six highlights from those documents: According to the F.B.I., in December 2014 a top aide to Mrs. Clinton told the company that housed her server to delete an archive of emails from her account. The company, Platte River Networks, apparently never followed those instructions. On March 2, 2015, The New York Times reported that Mrs. Clinton had exclusively used a personal email account when she was secretary of state. Two days later, the congressional committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, and Mrs. Clinton's response to them, told the technology firms associated with the email account that they had to retain "all relevant documents" related to its inquiry. Three weeks later, a Platte River employee realized he had not deleted the emails as instructed. The employee said he then used a special program called BleachBit to delete the files. The F.B.I. said Mrs. Clinton was unaware of the deletions. The F.B.I. said it was later able to find some of the emails, but did not say how many emails were deleted, or whether they were included in the 60,000 emails that Mrs. Clinton said she sent and received while secretary of state from 2009 to 2013.

15. Phone Spying Is Made Easy. Choose a Plan.

The New York Times, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 09 03

San Francisco - Want to invisibly spy on 10 iPhone owners without their knowledge? Gather their every keystroke, sound, message and location? That will cost you $650,000, plus a $500,000 setup fee with an Israeli outfit called the NSO Group. You can spy on more people if you would like -- just check out the company's price list. The NSO Group is one of a number of companies that sell surveillance tools that can capture all the activity on a smartphone, like a user's location and personal contacts. These tools can even turn the phone into a secret recording device. Since its founding six years ago, the NSO Group has kept a low profile. But last month, security researchers caught its spyware trying to gain access to the iPhone of a human rights activist in the United Arab Emirates. They also discovered a second target, a Mexican journalist who wrote about corruption in the Mexican government. Now, internal NSO Group emails, contracts and commercial proposals obtained by The New York Times offer insight into how companies in this secretive digital surveillance industry operate. The emails and documents were provided by two people who have had dealings with the NSO Group but would not be named for fear of reprisals. The company is one of dozens of digital spying outfits that track everything a target does on a smartphone. They aggressively market their services to governments and law enforcement agencies around the world. The industry argues that this spying is necessary to track terrorists, kidnappers and drug lords. The NSO Group's corporate mission statement is "Make the world a safe place."

16. Microsoft's Legal Challenge to Government Secrecy Wins Dozens of Supporters

The New York Times, Nick Wingfield, 2016 09 03

Seattle - Dozens of allies threw their weight behind Microsoft on Friday in a case that challenges law enforcement's use of secrecy orders to cloak its pursuit of digital communications in investigations. Amazon, Google, Snapchat, Salesforce and several others filed a brief on Friday in support of Microsoft in its case against the United States Justice Department, while Apple, Mozilla and others made their own filing. Civil liberties groups and media organizations like Fox News, National Public Radio and The Washington Post submitted their own briefs. Microsoft was also backed by a collection of law professors and a group of former United States attorneys who worked in the Western district of Washington, where Microsoft filed its federal lawsuit in April. Microsoft's effort to rally support is part of a growing resistance by technology companies to government attempts to snoop on the electronic communications of their customers. Revelations by Edward J. Snowden, the former United States government contractor, about the extent of electronic surveillance by spy agencies have rattled technology companies, which worry that trust in their products is being undermined. In a statement, Brad Smith, Microsoft's president and chief legal officer, said the company was grateful for the support from what it expected to total 80 signatories on multiple briefs by the end of the day. He noted the diversity of backgrounds of the signatories, saying, "it's not every day that Fox News and the A.C.L.U. are on the same side of an issue."

17. Think tank at GWU hires former al-Qaeda recruiter

The Washington Post, Susan Svrluga, 2016 09 03

Washington - A former Islamist extremist who supported al-Qaeda and exhorted others to follow Osama bin Laden has joined George Washington University as a research fellow. Jesse Morton, who was born in Pennsylvania and said he became a Muslim at age 20 after reading "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" while in prison for a drug offense, argues that he can offer an insider's perspective on Islamist radicalization - and how to counter that threat. Morton is the first former extremist in the United States to join an academic program, said Lorenzo Vidino, director of GWU's Program on Extremism, although he said there are some working in similar capacities in Europe. Vidino pointed to the ways law enforcement works with former gang members to infiltrate criminal networks. "This is the first time it's been done with a jihadist," he said. Morton offered something unique: experience as a recruiter for al-Qaeda. And a master's degree from Columbia University. That combination of an insider's perspective, intellectual curiosity and analytic ability makes him invaluable, Vidino said. "It's an unusual hire," he said - one that the university undertook only after months of research, including interviews with law enforcement and intelligence sources and even an attempt to trick Morton with another former extremist to see if he was telling them the truth. "Healthy skepticism is fair," Vidino said. "He has said it's up to him to prove he's truly reformed."

18. Illinois man arrested on Terrorism charges

Associated Press, 2016 09 03

Chicago - Police in downstate Madison County said they may have prevented a terrorist attack. Keaun Cook, 18, is accused of conspiring with several other people to carry out that attack. Police arrested the southern Illinois man who they allege communicated with an unspecified terrorist group to plan an attack on at least one location. He was arrested Wednesday on preliminary charges of providing material support for terrorism and making a terrorist threat. "In terms of making a terrorist threat, he expressed his intention that such a terrorist act would occur, but we stopped an event that could've caused a very, very serious situation," said Tom Gibbons, Madison County State's Attorney.

19. Royal Marine appears in court accused of stashing bomb gear and weapons in NI and England

Belfast Telegraph, Rachael Burnett, 2016 09 03

London - A royal Marine has appeared in court charged with Northern Ireland-linked terror offences. Ciaran Maxwell (30), of Exminster, Devon, is accused of stashing explosives and weapons in purpose-built caches in England and Northern Ireland. Maxwell also allegedly compiled a library of terrorism documents, including instructions on how to make explosives and tactics used by terrorist organisations.

He appeared in custody at Westminster Magistrates' Court yesterday. Maxwell, wearing a grey tracksuit and flanked by two plainclothed officers in the dock, stood up to confirm his details in a Northern Irish accent. He has not yet entered any plea to the charges against him and was remanded into police custody. The case was adjourned until Monday at Westminster Magistrates' Court to give the police more time to investigate. It is alleged that between January 1, 2011, and August 24, 2016, Maxwell manufactured explosive substances and constructed explosive devices. He is accused of carrying out research resulting in the creation of a library of documents likely to be useful to someone committing or preparing an act of terrorism — specifically information regarding "the manufacture of explosive substances, the construction of explosive devices and tactics used by terrorist organisations". Maxwell was arrested on August 24 by officers from the Metropolitan Police Service's counter-terrorism command, supported by Avon and Somerset and Devon and Cornwall Police. The charges come as part of an investigation involving the Security Service (MI5), the PSNI and the South West Counter-Terrorism Unit, as well as Scotland Yard's counter-terrorism unit. The Marine, originally from Larne in Co Antrim, was taken to a West Country police station in Somerset before being transferred to a London police station last Thursday and questioned on suspicion of being involved in the preparation for acts of terrorism under Section Five of the Terrorism Act.

20. Public offered £1.5m to tackle radicalism

The Daily Telegraph, 2016 09 03

London - A £1.5 million fund to fight terrorism at a local level has been started by the Home Office, with an offer of up to £100,000 to groups or individuals for projects to prevent radicalisation in their communities. Members of the public have been asked to submit project ideas which will "prevent vulnerable people from being drawn into terrorism". The Office for Security and Counter Terrorism will judge the best entries. The brief reads: "The aim of this competition is to develop innovative solutions for understanding and preventing radicalisation and support for terrorism. "Successful projects should produce an outcome, resource or new technology that builds understanding and prevention of radicalisation and support for terrorism."

21. Army's failure to recruit a risk to security, say experts

The Daily Telegraph, Ben Farmer, 2016 09 03

London – The number of regular soldiers in the Army has fallen below 80,000, as it struggles to recruit, figures show. Troop numbers are now below the target of 82,000 imposed by defence cuts, which sought to downsize the Army. The fall in the number of servicemen is despite millions of pounds spent on recruiting campaigns. Budget cuts had already left the Army at its smallest size since the Napoleonic Wars. Low unemployment, a lack of operations and poor morale after years of cutbacks are all harming recruitment, sources said. The Army must sign up 8,000 to 10,000 soldiers a year, but recruitment is at around 90 per cent of what is needed, one officer told The Daily Telegraph. The shortfall means the Army would struggle to respond to a crisis, former officers warned last night. The latest personnel figures released by the Ministry of Defence show that the Army had 79,590 trained regular soldiers in July and the figure is expected to fall further. The RAF and Royal Navy are each short of hundreds of service personnel. Charles Heyman, editor of The Armed Forces of the United Kingdom, and a former infantry officer, said: "It is part of a trend and the Army is going to find it difficult to catch up quickly." He said an outsourced recruiting contract with the services firm Capita did not have the appeal of in-house recruiting using serving soldiers.

22. Officer 'saw man planting bomb on car'

The Daily Mirror, Alan Erwin, 2016 09 03

London – A police woman woke to discover a man planting explosives under her fellow officer-husband's car in an alleged bid to kill him, the High Court heard yesterday. A judge was told the would-be bomber fled after she hammered on the bedroom window at their home in Eglinton, Co Derry, on June 18 last year. Prosecutors claimed they have evidence Sean McVeigh, 35, was the man spotted crouching down at the target's vehicle. The accused, from Victoria Street in Lurgan, Co Armagh, faces charges of attempted murder and possessing explosives with intent to endanger life.

23. Queensland police access social justice advocate's personal file 1,400 times
Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Kym Agius, 2016 09 03

London - A social justice advocate has had her personal file accessed by Queensland police 1,400 times since 2008, which she says is an abuse of privacy. The database, where her file was accessed, is a secure online tool capturing administrative and intelligence information, which police access during the course of their work, such as when checking a speeding motorist. Queensland Council for Civil Liberties advocate Renee Eaves, who does not have a criminal record, submitted a Right to Information (RTI) request in to see how many times her Queensland Police Records and Information Management Exchange (QPRIME) file had been accessed. She was startled to see it had been checked 1,400 from 2008 to May. Ms Eaves said officers are supposed to give a reason each time they access a personal file, but she was not given any insight into the 1,400 cases.

24. Qantas wants student to pay for protest
Australian Associated Press, 2016 09 03

Melbourne - Qantas wants a Melbourne university student found guilty of an in-flight protest against an asylum seeker's deportation to pay the airline more than $3000 for losses linked to flight delays. Jasmine Pilbrow, 22, was found guilty of interference with a crew member of an aircraft at the Broadmeadows Magistrates Court on Friday. Qantas security manager Michael Van Der Velde told the court the student's actions in 2015 had cost the airline $3429 linked to flight delays and the jet fuel it had to use in the air to make up for lost time. Pilbrow, who represented herself on Friday, does not dispute she refused to sit down during a Melbourne to Darwin flight unless a Tamil man, who was being deported to Sri Lanka, was allowed to leave the Qantas plane, on February 2, 2015. After telling cabin crew she would not sit down, Australian Federal Police agents boarded the flight and the 25-year-old Tamil detainee was removed.

25. PM's stance on China worries experts
The Australian Financial Review, Aaron Patrick, 2016 09 03

Canberra - The government's top intelligence experts are concerned Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull isn't taking their warnings about the security threat posed by China seriously enough and the former banker is relying on advice from outside experts. Despite vetoing a Chinese bid for Sydney's electricity network this month, Mr Turnbull and some other cabinet ministers are reluctant to act on or receive warnings that China is engaging in spying on an "industrial scale" and that business secrets are among its top targets, three sources with senior contacts in the security services said. "It is far more ambitious and better resourced than ever before," said Paul Monk, an intelligence and foreign affairs expert who headed China analysis for the Defence Intelligence Agency. "It's notorious with politicians that they find intelligence to be a new thing when they go into politics. It's things they would prefer not to know or suggest actions that can be embarrassing." Mr Turnbull, who flies this weekend to Hangzhou, near Shanghai, for a Group of 20 leaders summit, has a history of pro-Chinese comments but has taken a tougher approach in public since he became prime minister. A senior government source denied Mr Turnbull wasn't listening to advice from the intelligence and security services and said people outside the government would not know what was happening in his office. Security experts say China has a well-resourced effort that uses cyber-espionage and human agents to steal Australian commercial secrets and obtain sensitive government information.

26. India expected to offer Afghanistan fresh military aid

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 09 03

Kabul - New Delhi may offer Kabul fresh defence assistance during President Ashraf Ghani's visit to India next month, a leading newspaper reported on Saturday. Prime Minister Narendra Modi, who will host Ghani, could extend additional defense support to the war-torn country in addition to the four attack helicopters that were supplied recently. The Times of India said Delhi was handed an updated weapons list, including a request for additional helicopters, heavy vehicles and spares. A significant part of the request will be met.

27. US forces move to Shurab base from Lashkargah's Bost Airport

Pajhwok Afghan News, Zainulalh Stanakzai, 2016 09 03

Lashkargah - A group of US forces who have been stationed in Bost Airport in southern Helmand province have returned back to Shurab Base situated 60 kilometres from Lashkargah, the provincial capital, a reliable source said on Saturday. A security official who wished to go unnamed told Pajhwok Afghan News the US forces vacated the Bost Air port and returned to their base last night. According to the source the US forces have pledged to continue support to Afghan Security forces and perform its tasks based on a schedule. Bashir Ahmad Shakir, a provincial council member, said the presence and absence of foreign forces would not have any impact on security situation. Foreigners should help equip the Afghan forces and enable them to ensure law and order in the best possible way, he added. He doubted foreign forces intentions saying some district felt to Taliban despite the foreign forces were present in Helmand. He said residents of Lashkargah were ready to serve in the ranks of security forces but he regretted officials concerned paid no attention for recruitment of professional individuals. Attaullah Afghan, provincial council secretary, said US forces could operate in Lashkargah from Shurab base any time there was a need for an operation.

28. Pakistan Suicide Bombing Kills at Least 11 at Court Compound

The New York Times, Ismail Khan, 2016 09 03

Peshawar - A suicide bomber killed at least 11 people at a district court in northwestern Pakistan on Friday morning, a senior police officer said. The bomber attacked the compound of the district court in the city of Mardan, throwing a hand grenade, opening fire at the main gate and then entering before detonating his explosive vest, said the police officer, Ijaz Khan. Twenty people were wounded, he said. "The bomber managed to get seven or eight meters inside the compound, but the police engaged him, prompting him to trigger his suicide vest," Mr. Khan said by telephone. The dead included four lawyers and two police officers, he said. The president of the district bar association, Amir Hussain, said the toll would have been much higher had the bomber reached a part of the compound where lawyers assemble.

“The bomber was stopped a few meters inside the main gate,” Mr. Hussain said. “He couldn’t reach the main sitting area.” It was the second mass attack in recent weeks that appeared to target lawyers. More than 70 people, mostly lawyers, were killed last month in an attack on a hospital in the city of Quetta, in Baluchistan Province, where lawyers had gathered after the president of Baluchistan’s bar association was shot and killed.

31. Controversial police general tapped to become spy chief

The Jakarta Post, 2016 09 03

Jakarta - It appears that President Joko "Jokowi" Widodo could no longer avoid the pressure of having to make a quick decision regarding the career of controversial police general Com. Gen. Budi Gunawan. It took Jokowi one year before he decided to name Budi the deputy national police chief after he declined to inaugurate him in the chief's position in February 2015 over allegations that he was involved in a graft case. Facing pressure for Budi to take over as National Police chief when Gen. Badrodin Haiti retired in July, Jokowi again resisted and instead appointed Budi's junior, Gen. Tito Karnavian. When Jokowi decided to undertake another Cabinet reshuffle in July, speculation was rife that Budi would be given a ministerial position, but the prediction did not come to pass. Jokowi finally relented and on Friday he officially nominated the senior police general to head the National Intelligence Agency (BIN), replacing current BIN chief Sutiyoso.

32. Explosion in Philippines leaves 12 dead, 24 injured

The Associated Press, 2016 09 03

Davao, Philippines -- An explosion killed at least 12 people and wounded at least 24 at a night market in President Rodrigo Duterte's hometown in the southern Philippines, a region under a heightened security alert because of a military offensive against Abu Sayyaf militants, officials said. Regional military commander Lt.-Gen. Rey Leonardo Guerrero said it was not clear what caused the explosion at a massage section of the market, which was cordoned off by police bomb experts and investigators. Police Chief Superintendent Manuel Gaerlan said witnesses gave contrasting accounts, with some saying a cooking gas tank exploded while others suggested it may have been some kind of an explosive. Police set up checkpoints in key roads leading to the city, a regional gateway about 980 kilometres south of Manila. TV footage showed plastic chairs strewn about at the scene of the blast, where witnesses said the bodies of some of the dead lay scattered a few hours after the explosion. Police forces in the capital, Manila, went on full alert at midnight following the deadly blast.

33. Philippine President Extends Troops' Powers After Deadly Explosion

The New York Times, Felipe Villamor, 2016 09 03

Manila - President Rodrigo Duterte declared a "state of lawlessness" in the southern Mindanao region on Saturday after a powerful blast ripped through a crowded night market in the city of Davao on Friday, killing at least 14 people and wounding more than 60. Mr. Duterte said he was not declaring martial law in the region but rather giving the military additional powers to carry out some police operations, like patrolling in urban areas and setting up checkpoints. "There is a crisis in this country involving drugs, extrajudicial killings, and there seems to be an environment of lawlessness, lawless violence," he said. The country is facing "extraordinary times" that require strong measures, he added. The extremist group Abu Sayyaf claimed responsibility for the blast, according to The Associated Press, but Mr. Duterte said investigators were also looking at other possible suspects, including drug syndicates.

34. India asks int'l community to redouble efforts to fight terror

Press Trust of India, Yoshita Singh, 2016 09 03

United Nations - India has asked the world community to "redouble" the efforts to fight the growing threat of terrorism by expediting the adoption of an international convention on terrorism, saying the UN members must recognise the "graveness" of its threat. "As one of the oldest victims of terrorism in the world, India urges the UN and Members of the UN to recognise the graveness of this threat and commit to redouble our efforts in a practical and sustained manner to fight this scourge of world peace," senior official in the Indian Mission to the UN Srinivas Prasad said here. "A commitment to the signing of the proposed and much discussed Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT) - a global compact on terrorism - would be an important step forward," he said, according to prepared remarks, posted on the mission's website.

35. N. Korea claims its submarines are being tracked by the U.S. Navy

Yonhap English News, 2016 09 03

Seoul - North Korea claimed Saturday that its submarines have been tracked by U.S. Navy since last year. In an interview with the North's Korean Central News Agency, a spokesman for the country's foreign ministry said there have been reports that U.S. nuclear-powered submarines have been secretly following the North's subs. "The U.S. military is neither confirming nor denying the reports, but the reports say it is an undeniable fact that the U.S. is tracking our submarines and gathering information," the official was quoted as saying. The unidentified spokesman also claimed that the U.S. Navy has been operating its submarines in waters around the Korean Peninsula to keep an eye on China and Russia.

36. Report: Missing U.S. Student Alive in N. Korea Working as Kim Jong Un's Tutor

Reuters, 2016 09 03

Washington - A new report claims a 24-year-old American student who disappeared 12 years ago is actually living in North Korea and working as Kim Jong Un's English tutor. An article posted by Yahoo Japan on Thursday claims that David Sneddon, a student at Brigham Young University, was abducted and taken to Pyongyang in August 2004, when he went missing during a hiking trip in southwestern China. In addition to alleging that Sneddon has become Kim Jong Un's tutor, the report also claims Sneddon now has a wife and two children. Sneddon's American wife, Kathleen Sneddon, said she was skeptical of the report, but that "he's probably teaching English. That's the most likely thing to use him for." State Department spokesman John Kirby dismissed the report, saying U.S. authorities had seen "no verifiable evidence" that the claims in the report were true. (Full Report)

Agence France Presse, 2016 09 03

Analyse: Reconnaissable à ses lunettes et sa barbe orange vif, teintée au henné, Abdulqadir Mumin, Somalien de naissance, a été présenté cette semaine par les Etats-Unis comme le chef de l'organisation État islamique (EI) en Afrique de l'Est. Le parcours d'Abdulqadir (ou Abdiqadir) Mumin, un homme d'âge mûr, est celui d'un prêcheur radical passé par la Suède, la Grande-Bretagne puis la Somalie où, après plusieurs années dans les rangs des islamistes radicaux shebab affiliés à Al-Qaïda, il a fait allégeance à l'EI. Un pari risqué et incertain selon les observateurs, d'autant que le leader des shebab, Ahmed Diriye, avait réaffirmé son allégeance à Al-Qaïda lorsqu'il avait pris la tête du mouvement en 2014. Mumin est né dans la région semi-autonome du Puntland (nord-est), à une date indéterminée, et a vécu en Suède avant de s'installer en Angleterre où il acquiert la nationalité britannique. A Londres et Leicester, il se forge au début des années 2000 une réputation de prêcheur enflammé et vindicatif, tant dans les mosquées radicales que sur des vidéos postées en ligne. Surveillé par les renseignements britanniques, Mumin aurait alors côtoyé Mohamed Emwazi, un des bourreaux de l'EI plus connu sous le surnom de « Jihadi John », ainsi que Michael Adebolajo, un des deux meurtriers du soldat Lee Rigby, dans les rues de Londres en mai 2013.

39. UN council in S. Sudan to press govt to cooperate or face arms embargo

Reuters, 2016 09 03

Juba - The United Nations Security Council, acting on concerns South Sudan could again fall back into full-scale civil war, arrived in the country on Friday to demand that President Salva Kiir's government stop obstructing UN peacekeepers and cooperate on the deployment of 4,000 more foreign troops or possibly face an arms embargo. The 15-member council agreed last month to consider an arms embargo on South Sudan, the world's newest nation, if UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon reports next Thursday that Kiir's government has not stepped up its efforts to work with the world body. "It would be premature to assess whether the level of cooperation is sufficient, but ... it is extremely important for us to convey to the government of South Sudan that time is of the essence," US Ambassador Samantha Power told reporters. The council is due to meet with Kiir and his ministers over the weekend. "The international community is extremely frustrated with the obstruction of UN peacekeeping operations that has gone on for too long," said Power, who, along with Senegal, is co-leading the three-day Security Council visit.

41. Iran Strongly Condemns Suicide Attacks in Pakistan

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 03

Foreign Ministry Spokesman Bahram Qassem condemned the attacks, and extended his condolences to the Pakistani government and people on the death of their beloved ones. He underlined the necessity for campaign against extremism and terrorism through collective efforts, and said, "This region and the world cannot overcome this principled problem of the current era without confronting the root causes of extremism and those who spread violence and Takfiri thoughts." Militants in Northwest Pakistan killed 12 people in two attacks, on a court building in the city of Mardan and a Christian slum in Peshawar.

42. Longtime Uzbekistan Leader Dies

The Wall Street Journal, Nathan Hodge, 2016 09 03

Moscow - Uzbek President Islam Karimov, who ushered in his nation's independence following the collapse of the Soviet Union and ruled it with an iron hand for more than 25 years, died Friday following a stroke in the capital Tashkent. He was 78. Mr. Karimov leaves behind a legacy of isolation, underinvestment and one-man rule. During his tenure as president, he imprisoned opponents, eliminated political competition and clamped down on the local press. His country's abysmal human-rights record drew international condemnation. As the only leader Uzbeks have known in their quarter-century of independence, he leaves an indelible imprint on Central Asia's most populous nation. "Current-day Uzbekistan is a creation of Karimov -- and his charisma, his foibles and personal phobias," said Arkady Dubnov, a Central Asia expert who met and interviewed the president. Prime Minister Shavkat Mirziyoev has been charged with organizing the funeral for the Uzbek leader, whose death was announced Friday on Uzbek state TV. The country's constitution calls for the chair of the upper house of parliament to preside over a transition. Frederick Starr, an expert on Central Asia, said he expected Mr. Karimov may have paved the way for a managed succession.

43. Putin calls DNC hack public service, denies Russia's involvement

Fox News, 2016 09 03

Moscow - Russian President Vladimir Putin said Thursday that the hack of the Democratic National Committee's emails was a public service, but denied that Moscow played any part in the cyberattack. Security experts have suggested that Russian-backed cyber militias were behind the cyberattacks on top Democratic Party groups and the possible breach of Clinton Foundation computers. But Putin wondered why it mattered who was behind the hacks. "Listen, does it even matter who hacked this data?" he said in an interview with Bloomberg News. "The important thing is the content that was given to the public." U.S. officials have pointed to the Russian government as the possible culprit of the attacks on DNC servers earlier this year that led to WikiLeaks published 20,000 DNC documents prior to the Democratic National Convention. The leaks showed that party officials leaned favorably toward Hillary Clinton over Bernie Sanders and led to Debbie Wasserman Schultz stepping down as the chairwoman of the Democratic National Committee.

44. Lebanon indicts Syria intel officers over 2013 blast

Agence France Presse, 2016 09 03

Beirut - Lebanon on Friday indicted two Syrian intelligence officers it accused of involvement in a deadly 2013 double bomb blast in the city of Tripoli, a judicial source said. The double bombing killed 45 people, and a series of indictments have already been handed down against Lebanese and Syrians accused of involvement. The indictment names Captain Mohamed Ali Ali, an official in the Palestine branch of Syria's intelligence services, and Nasser Jouban, an official in Syria's political security branch. The two men, neither of whom is in custody, are accused of helping to prepare the attack, placing explosives in cars and assigning a Lebanese cell to carry out the bombing, which also wounded hundreds. The attacks targeted two Sunni mosques in Tripoli, which has frequently experienced tensions between Sunnis and Alawites who belong to the same religious minority as Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and tend to support his government. The indictment alleges the attacks also involved other high-ranking Syrian officials, who are accused of directing Ali and Jouban to organize them.

46. Palestinians Clash With Own Security Forces as Elections Stir Deep Unease

The New York Times, Peter Baker, 2016 09 03

Nablus, West Bank - The brother of the dead man sat in a plastic chair, smoking cigarettes and drinking coffee as mourners approached to pay respects. On the wall was a poster of the slain man, the latest Palestinian to meet an untimely, violent end. But this man, Ahmed Halawa, was not killed in a clash with the hated Israeli military. A Palestinian police officer accused of plotting the murder of two other officers, Mr. Halawa was beaten to death while in the custody of Palestinian security forces. "We're living under Israeli occupation," said the brother, Abdullah Halawa, "but to be honest with you we've never seen anything like this from the Israeli soldiers." Not that anyone in Nablus, the second-largest city in the occupied West Bank, has grown fond of the Israelis, but Mr. Halawa's death underscored the internal divisions tearing at Palestinian society with the approach of municipal elections next month. It came after weeks of violence between the Palestinian authorities and what they call outlaw groups, touching off a wave of unrest marked by stone throwing, tear gas and a raucous funeral procession for Mr. Halawa of thousands of people marching through the streets this week. The riots and protests reflect the challenge for Palestinian security forces to maintain order in West Bank cities under the full control of the Palestinian Authority amid disenchantment with the authority and its leader, President Mahmoud Abbas.

48. I Didn't Plot Turkey's Coup

The New York Times, Henri J Barkey, 2016 09 03

Commentary: On the night of July 15, elements of the Turkish military attempted a coup. It was a poorly organized effort that was defeated by a combination of people power, loyal units and serendipity. What made this failed effort remarkable was the putschists' extreme brutality against civilians who resisted or happened to be in their way. Some 240 people were killed. I was in Turkey at the time, leading a workshop on Buyukada, an island that is a 45-minute ferry ride from Istanbul. The workshop, which had been planned months earlier in conjunction with an Istanbul-based think tank, brought a small number of experts together to discuss Iran's relations with its neighbors. Academic gatherings like these are important for my work, but I suspect most people would have thought it was pretty dull. Some people in Turkey, however, saw something far more nefarious. They thought I was behind the mutiny. Soon after the coup was defeated, my colleagues and I became the targets of sensationalist conspiracy theories promulgated by Turkey's pro-government press. The accusations ranged from organizing the coup on behalf of the C.I.A. to setting up communication links for the plotters and, most implausibly, bringing a convicted murderer from California into Turkey to engage in evil deeds. The coup attempt appears to have been carried out by a hodgepodge coalition of officers: some loyal to Fethullah Gulen, a reclusive cleric who lives in Pennsylvania and was once an ally of the ruling party but is now its fiercest enemy, alongside strict secularists and some other opportunists who probably knew they would soon be dismissed from the military. (Note: Henri J. Barkey is the director of the Middle East program at the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars.)

49. Turkish tanks cross into Syria in 'new phase' against IS

The Associated Press, Zeynep Bilginsoy, 2016 09 03

Istanbul - Turkish tanks have crossed into Syria to the west of a frontier town seized from the Islamic State group last week, in a "new phase" of an operation aimed at sealing off the last stretch of border controlled by the extremists. The private Dogan news agency reported at least 20 tanks and five armoured personnel carriers crossed at the Turkish border town of Elbeyli, across from the Syrian town of al-Rai. The new incursion is unfolding about 55 kilometres (34 miles) west of Jarablus, where Turkish forces first crossed into Syria ten days ago. The tanks entered from the Turkish border village of Elbeyli and linked up with Turkish-backed Syrian rebels at al-Rai, who are participating in the operation, dubbed Euphrates Shield. The official Anadolu News Agency said that "with this new phase of the operation, the Azaz-Jarablus line is expected to be cleared of terror elements." Turkish-backed Syrian rebels meanwhile said they had captured three more villages to the west of Jarablus from the Islamic State group, bringing them to 21 kilometres (13 miles) from those positioned at al-Rai. The gap is the last remaining stretch of the Syrian border under IS control.

50. Le risque d'attentats en hausse en France, prévient François Molins

Radio France Internationale, 2016 09 03

Paris - Le risque d'attentat va se renforcer, en France avec l'affaiblissement de l'organisation Etat islamique, selon le procureur de la République de Paris. Dans une interview au quotidien Le Monde, François Molins délivre un diagnostic peu optimiste sur la situation sécuritaire dans l'Hexagone. François Molins donne un premier constat alarmant. Plus l'organisation Etat islamique s'affaiblit, plus il est probable que des attentats soient commis ici, en Europe. « Quand les organisations terroristes sont en difficulté sur zone, explique le magistrat, elles recherchent l'occasion de commettre des attaques à l'extérieur ». Avec l'affaiblissement de Daech, le procureur de Paris craint le retour massif des combattants français et de leurs familles. Deux mille ressortissants de l'Hexagone ont rejoint les rangs jihadistes, sont en transit ou souhaitent se rendre en Syrie, estime François Molins.

51. Les confessions d'un maître de l'espionnage français (Canada)

Le Monde, 2016 09 03

Bernard Barbier, l'ancien chef de la direction technique de la DGSE, a levé le voile sur plusieurs secrets d'Etat lors d'une conférence dans son ancienne école d'ingénieurs. C'est une intrusion inespérée dans un monde interdit aux regards extérieurs, celui du renseignement et des guerres secrètes. Face aux élèves de l'école d'ingénieurs CentraleSupélec, dont il est issu, Bernard Barbier, l'un des personnages les plus importants de l'espionnage français des dix dernières années, a levé le voile sur des mystères qu'on pensait insolubles. Au cours de cette causerie, il a ainsi fait oeuvre de transparence sur certaines des principales affaires d'espionnage récentes ayant touché la France. Il a brisé des tabous, notamment en relatant l'attaque chinoise sur Areva et en confirmant la responsabilité de la France derrière une attaque informatique mondiale détectée par les services canadiens. Espionnage et cybersécurité, Bernard Barbier reçu par Symposium Centrale Supélec: M.Barbier, qui fut de 2006 à 2014 l'homologue du directeur de l'Agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) américaine, en tant que chef de la direction technique de la Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE), a commencé sa carrière au Commissariat à l'énergie atomique (CEA). Au sein de la DGSE, il obtient, en 2008, une enveloppe de 500 millions d'euros et 800 nouveaux postes pour l'une des plus formidables révolutions du renseignement français: créer un système de collecte massive de données replaçant la France dans la course à l'espionnage moderne. De façon surprenante, le contenu de son intervention, faite en juin sur le campus de l'école à Châtenay-Malabry (Hauts-de-Seine) et dont nous avons pu consulter l'enregistrement filmé, n'a eu aucun écho public. En revanche, le milieu du renseignement et sa principale figure, Bernard Bajolet, le chef de la DGSE, ont eu tout l'été pour s'offusquer de ces déclarations qui montrent, sans doute, que les vrais secrets ne sont peut-être pas là où l'on croit. Extraits choisis. La vérité sur l'attaque informatique contre l'Elysée en 2012: A ce jour, il ne s'agissait que de soupçons. Les Américains auraient pu jouer un rôle dans le piratage, découvert entre les deux tours de l'élection présidentielle, en mai 2012, des ordinateurs des collaborateurs du chef de l'Etat français, alors Nicolas Sarkozy. Une note interne de la NSA, dévoilée par Le Monde à l'automne 2013 et préparant la visite, le 12 avril 2013, de deux hauts responsables français, dont M. Barbier, venus demander des comptes aux Américains, orientait plutôt les soupçons vers les services secrets israéliens... Babar ou la fin d'un secret d'Etat: En 2013, Le Monde publie une note dévoilée par Edward Snowden révélant que les services secrets canadiens suspectent leurs homologues français d'être derrière une vaste opération de piratage informatique lancée en 2009. Si l'attaque vise une demi-douzaine d'institutions iraniennes liées au programme nucléaire de ce pays, elle cible également le Canada, l'Espagne, la Grèce, la Norvège, la Côte d'Ivoire, l'Algérie et même certains objectifs en France. Sur ses auteurs, les Canadiens restaient flous: « Nous estimons, avec un degré modéré de certitude, qu'il s'agit d'une opération sur des réseaux informatiques soutenue par un Etat et mise en oeuvre par une agence française de renseignement.» Du côté français, silence absolu. Paris admet s'être doté de capacités défensives, mais dément toute activité offensive, un tabou. Jusqu'au récit de M. Barbier.

52. Le piratage de l'Elysée en 2012 venait bien des Etats-unis (Canada)

Lefigaro.fr avec Reuters, 2016 09 03

Paris -Les Etats-Unis sont bien à l'origine d'une attaque informatique contre l'Elysée au printemps 2012, a déclaré un ancien responsable des services secrets français. Dans une conférence donnée en juin devant les élèves de l'école d'ingénieurs CentraleSupélec, dont LeMonde.fr diffuse un enregistrement samedi, Bernard Barbier reconnaît également la responsabilité de la France derrière une autre attaque informatique détectée par les services canadiens en 2009. Cet ancien chef de la direction technique de la Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE) raconte qu'il a reçu un appel à l'aide du responsable de la sécurité informatique de l'Elysée en mai 2012, entre les deux tours de la présidentielle, à la suite d'un piratage d'ordinateurs de collaborateurs du chef de l'Etat, alors Nicolas Sarkozy. "On a vu qu'il y avait un 'malware' (logiciel malveillant) qui avait une signature identique à celui que nous avons identifié lors d'une attaque contre la Communauté européenne en 2010. Il n'y avait que les Américains et les Russes qui avaient pu faire cette première opération", a-t-il dit. "En 2012, nous avions davantage de moyens et de puissance techniques pour travailler sur les métadonnées. J'en suis venu à la conclusion que cela ne pouvait être que les Etats-Unis", ajoute-t-il en précisant que le logiciel en question avait été infiltré lors de connexions sur Facebook. Et il ajoute : "Vous êtes quand même bons." L'ancien responsable de la DGSE reconnaît que les services français ont commencé à faire du piratage informatique dès 1992 et qu'ils sont responsables d'une vaste opération lancée en 2009, comme le soupçonnait le Canada dans une note dévoilée en 2013 par le lanceur d'alerte américain Edward Snowden. Les cibles étaient alors des institutions iraniennes liées au programme nucléaire de la République islamique mais aussi plusieurs pays, dont le Canada, et des objectifs en France. "Les Canadiens ont fait du 'reverse' sur un malware qu'ils avaient détecté. Ils ont retrouvé le programmeur qui avait surnommé son malware 'Babar' et avait signé 'Titi'. Ils en ont conclu qu'il était français. Et effectivement, c'était un Français", dit-il.

53. German Intelligence Service Accused of 'Systematically' Violating Constitution

Sputnik News Service, 2016 09 03

Moscow - President of the German Federal Intelligence Agency (BND) Gerhard Schindler stands at the former monitoring base of the National Security Agency (NSA) in Bad Aibling, south of Munich, June 6, 2014. The confidential report, dated March 2016, was brought to attention by public broadcasters NDR and WDR on Thursday evening. The 60-page study was carried out by Federal Data Protection Commissioner Andrea Voßhoff, who is responsible for ensuring that government agencies do not violate German citizens' rights when using their personal data. "The BND systematically lifted and used personal data without a legal basis to do so," wrote the commissioner. Voßhoff named a total of 12 violations of the law in seven spheres of activity, including obstruction of her own work. "The BND massively and illegally blocked my ability to oversee it — a comprehensive and efficient oversight on my part was therefore not possible. These are serious breaches of the law." According to the report, the commissioner was blocked from checking so-called selectors — the lists of the key concepts, which identify information such as phone numbers and email addresses used by the BND for targeted surveillance. Voßhoff also called for shutting down large parts of the BND's data base in Bad Aibling, Bavaria. "According to law these databases must be immediately deleted. They must not be used anymore," the document said.

54. Thousands of Kurds demonstrate in Cologne, Germany

The Associated Press, 2016 09 03

Cologne - Thousands of Kurds, including many carrying flags with the image of jailed PKK leader Abdullah Ocalan, demonstrated in the German city of Cologne Saturday against the Turkish government's policies. Organizers said the demonstration was aimed in part at protesting against Turkey's military intervention in northern Syria and what they call the "dictatorial" behaviour of Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. They argued that Ocalan, who has been in prison in Turkey since 1999, should be recognized as a "legitimate negotiating partner." Cologne police put more than 1,000 officers in place. City police chief Juergen Mathies told news agency dpa that pictures of Ocalan were allowed but demonstrators would not be allowed to show symbols of the banned PKK, or Kurdistan Workers' Party. Turnout at Saturday's event was estimated at close to 30,000, and there were no reports of significant trouble. A month ago, up to 40,000 people rallied at the same site to denounce the attempted military coup in Turkey and show support for Erdogan.

55. Italian teenagers to be given money to stay away from terrorism

Associated Press, 2016 09 03

Rome - A cultural initiative which would offer money to Italian teenagers in an effort to combat terrorism, is due to be rolled out by the Italian government. The program will see 18-year-olds be given a "culture bonus" voucher of €500 ($730 Australian) to spend at Italy's theatres, concerts and museums. More than half a million young people will be eligible for the program, which will allow them to visit cultural institutions for free or at reduced cost using a specially-developed smartphone app called 18app.it, Time magazine reported. The plan was announced in the wake of the Paris terror attacks last year, as part of a "cultural battle" against extremist ideology. According to the Financial Times, Italian Prime Minister Matteo Renzi said he would match the €1 billion allocated to security and defence with spending on cultural programs. "They image terror, we answer with culture. They destroy statues, we love art. They destroy books, we are the country of libraries." Tommaso Nannicini, the junior minister heading the scheme has said it's "a reminder of how crucial culture is, both for personal enrichment and for strengthening the social fabric of the country," the Telegraph reported.

CSIS in the News/Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. Canada's CIA Had No Policy for Collecting and Using Massive Amounts of Data

Motherboard, Jordan Pearson, 2016 10 01

Ottawa- The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), the country's CIA equivalent, used large datasets to track and identify persons of interest without a policy to guide their collection, retention, or use, according to a new report from Canada's intelligence watchdog. CSIS is tasked with tracking terror suspects within and outside of Canada, and the investigation was undertaken in the context of new, and incredibly broad, powers bestowed upon the spy agency by the controversial Bill C-51. Canada has recently ramped up its efforts to identify people connected to pro-terror ideologies. In August, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) arrested 24-year-old Ottawa man Tevis Gonyou-McLean who was later released on a peace bond that restricts his movement, communication, and online activities. The RCMP's national security unit frequently receives intelligence from CSIS. A report published on Thursday by the civilian Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) notes that CSIS uses large databases to find out more information about suspects, develop leads, and even to "identify previously unknown individuals of interest by linking together types of information which have mirrored threat behaviour." The Communications Security Establishment, CSIS' sister organization and Canada's answer to the NSA in the US, stopped sharing metadata with foreign spying partners under similar circumstances last year when an internal review concluded that the agency had handled data improperly. The new report also suggests that CSIS employed overly generous interpretations of the law in order to collect more data than it was supposed to.

2. Les bains de foule expliquent les coûts importants des visites royales

La Presse Canadienne, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Les bains de foule si caractéristiques des visites royales au Canada, comme celle qu'effectuent ces jours-ci le duc et la duchesse de Cambridge accompagnés de leurs enfants, expliquent en bonne partie leurs coûts de plusieurs millions de dollars. Il faudra attendre un certain moment après la conclusion, samedi, de la présente visite de huit jours du prince William et de sa femme Kate Middleton pour en évaluer les coûts, mais la facture devrait s'apparenter à celle du précédent séjour de neuf jours, en 2011, qui s'était élevée à plus de 2,2 millions $. La visite en 2011 avait coûté 1,2 million $ au ministère du Patrimoine canadien _ ce qui ne comprend pas les frais encourus par les gouvernements provinciaux et territoriaux _, et un peu plus d'un million de dollars à la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. Selon le rapport des coûts de la GRC obtenu grâce à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information, le montant total pour le corps policier se chiffre à 1 055 521,91 $, et les dépenses uniques les plus élevées concernent les "heures supplémentaires" ou les "tâches supplémentaires". Comme l'explique Michel Juneau-Katsuya, expert dans les domaines de l'espionnage et du terrorisme ayant travaillé au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), la GRC a la responsabilité de la sécurité en sol canadien, et les services de la famille royale ne sont présents qu'en soutien et ne peuvent pas être armés.

3. Quebec men among 'first wave' of Canadians to join jihadist groups

The Toronto Star, Gabrielle Duhaine & Vincent Larouche, 2016 10 01

Montreal - They are the ones who blazed the path. In 2012, a handful of young men from Quebec left the country for Turkey after having prepared as if they were heading to war. Four years later, police are still trying to establish what really happened during their trip. Some are suspected of having taken part in a kidnapping in Syria. Others were suspected of having fought alongside Islamists. They are the subject of a La Presse investigation into what appears to be the first wave of Canadian foreign fighters. They appeared to be playing war. At a firing range in a suburb of Montreal in 2012, a half-dozen boys, on the cusp of adulthood, were undergoing weapons training. The group did not go unnoticed. They were young and clearly not hunters. They didn't have the equipment. They were wearing running shoes despite the snow. They weren't particularly comfortable with their weapons. In between burst of gunshots, they stopped to pray, according to one person who frequented the range, who did not wish to be identified for fear of reprisals. "Even if their behaviour did not fit in, they didn't much care. They liked to show that they were different," the man said. At least one of the boys wore plastic gloves and ski goggles while he shot, a tactic sometimes employed by those who fear that traces of gunpowder might be detected on their hands or face as they try to pass through airport security gates. The young men were part of a small group of Quebecers whose speech and extreme Islamist ideas were already worrying anti-terror authorities. RCMP agents regularly visited the firing range where they trained. A few months later, they were among the first Canadians to have left for Turkey, apparently with the intention of getting to Syria and joining the ranks of jihadist groups. Experts speak of them as "the first wave."

Radio Canada International, Marc Montgomery, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Many very serious questions are being raised about a mobile phone "selfie" in which a Canadian man suspected of involvement with middle-eastern terrorists, took a photo standing beside Prime Minister Trudeau. The incident took place in 2015 at a Montreal public transit station following a media interview. The Canadian leader was walking through a crowd in Montreal answering some impromptu questions, and allowing bystanders to take photos with him. The man in question is one of four Quebecers suspected of involvement with a 2012 terrorist kidnapping in Syria of two American journalists. Quoted in the Toronto Star and Lapresse a former terrorism investigator with the Sûreté du Québec (Quebec provincial police), who has also worked with the RCMP's Integrated National Security Enforcement Team said "We have a prime minister who is very open. But a guy like this should not have been able to get so close. I don't want to blame the work that was done, but it shows that there is no surveillance on this individual, that the people around the prime minister were not warned". A CBC investigation found the man in question and four others in this particular group, were part of a larger group of nine whose names also appear repeatedly on the logbooks of a shooting range in 2012. This occurred shortly before some are thought to have left for Syria, including the man in the photo. Two of the group are thought to still be in the middle east. The federal police (RCMP) have not answered journalists questions on the matter saying there is an ongoing investigation.

5. Raped as children, terror twins reveal life story from behind bars

The Ottawa Citizen, Gary Dimmock, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - In a series of jailhouse interviews with Ottawa's terror twins, Ashton and Carlos Larmond, the would-be jihadis have detailed their life story — from a bleak childhood scarred by rape, poverty and domestic abuse, to their drug dealing days in Vanier, to the time, in their early 20s, when they found Islam. The brothers were interviewed separately in April 2015 by Mark Marsolais, an advocate for aboriginal offenders who was documenting the history of the Islamic extremists, who identify as Algonquin. The interviews were done with the intention of using their at-times-desperate story to bolster their chances to win bail, which they never received. The Muslim converts' guilty pleas precluded trial, and with it, a public examination of the lives of the drug-dealing brothers and their dark and rapid descent into radicalization. Ashton, the "director" of an Ottawa terror cluster, was sentenced to 17 years for instructing a person to carry out a terrorist activity. His twin brother, Carlos, who converted to Islamic extremism at his brother's urging, was sentenced to seven years for attempting to leave Canada to carry out a terrorist activity. Carlos, 25, was arrested as he was boarding a January 2014 flight overseas with the hopes of fighting for ISIL, the jihadist movement that aspires to establish an Islamic caliphate across parts of Iraq and Syria. Ashton had been recruiting because his own plans to join ISIL had been scuttled after his passport was revoked. The RCMP case against the twins was anchored in wiretap evidence that captured their extremist plans and many hateful conversations about them wanting to kill infidels.

6. Two Royal Canadian Navy ships return to Halifax after Arctic surveying mission

The Canadian Press, 2016 10 01

Halifax - Two Royal Canadian Navy ships arrived back in Halifax today after assisting with hydrographic surveying in the Canadian Arctic over the summer months. HMCS Shawinigan and HMCS Moncton were also conducting sovereignty and surveillance patrols. The commanding officer of the two vessels says the navy crews worked alongside staff with the Canadian Hydrographic Service, Parks Canada, the Canadian Coast Guard and the Arctic Research Foundation during the seven-week deployment. HMCS Moncton conducted 544 linear nautical miles of survey in Hudson's Bay, and visited the town of Rankin Inlet, Nunavut on Aug. 29.

7. Dernier rempart de justice ?

Le Journal (Barreau du Québec), Marc-André Séguin, 2016 10 01

Montreal - Quoi faire lorsque la preuve retenue contre un individu est si sensible et sujette à la sécurité nationale qu'elle ne peut lui être fournie ? Me François Dadour nous reçoit dans son bureau ensoleillé offrant une vue splendide du Vieux-Montréal où on ne le trouve généralement que les vendredis. Pourquoi ? C'est que la majorité des mandats qu'il reçoit exigent une cote de sécurité et se réalisent dans la région d'Ottawa, dans des lieux de travail tenus secrets et loin des fenêtres, et où les téléphones sont proscrits pour assurer la sécurité nationale... Me Dadour est l'un des 22 avocats admis au Programme des avocats spéciaux du Canada. Son travail : défendre les intérêts du résident permanent ou de l'étranger qui fait l'objet d'un certificat de sécurité ou d'autres mesures sous le régime de la Loi sur l'immigration et la protection des réfugiés (LIPR), lors de toute audience tenue en l'absence de cette personne ou de son avocat. Indépendants du gouvernement et issus du secteur privé, les avocats spéciaux sont autorisés à avoir accès à des documents extrêmement confidentiels, le tout dans un contexte très encadré. Un avocat spécial peut être nommé non seulement dans les cas où un certificat de sécurité est délivré, mais également dans le cadre d'autres instances de la Commission de l'immigration et du statut de réfugié, par exemple, une enquête, un contrôle de la détention, un contrôle judiciaire ou un appel devant la Section d'appel de l'immigration, si le ministre demande l'interdiction de la divulgation de renseignements et autres éléments de preuve. L'existence toute récente de ce type d'avocat marque une évolution juridique et culturelle d'importance au pays. « Les gouvernements se nourrissent d'informations sensibles, explique Me Dadour. Mais quand l'information devient l'objet d'une procédure judiciaire, on passe de l'univers du renseignement à celui de la preuve. Comme l'a soulevé la Cour suprême, si on refuse l'accès à cette preuve, cela peut créer des difficultés pour les personnes visées par un certificat de sécurité délivré sur la foi de renseignements sensibles et confidentiels. »

8. The 'Disruption'

Ottawa Citizen. James Bagnall and David Pugliese, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - "We acknowledge that this announcement will raise many questions and concerns with respect to transportation, family issues, and other personal considerations." A June 2011 briefing note for Fonberg summed up part of the problem: the Carling site was a "relatively remote location." Only one in five of DND's employees live in the west end of Ottawa. Vice-Admiral Mark Norman, whose office is overseeing the relocation project, acknowledged in a recent interview that employees in the city's east end, including himself, face a long commute and other difficulties getting to work at the newly named Carling Campus. "If you're in Orléans like I am, this appears to be a bit daunting." Will a long daily commute be enough to send civilian public servants looking for new jobs elsewhere in the federal government? DND doesn't know. "While impacts for retention have been considered," a February report produced by DND auditors warned, that "information has not been formally or comprehensively gathered to support informed decision making and to address risks to employee retention. "No formal departmental survey has been conducted to determine employees' concerns with the Carling Campus move or their willingness to move." Information has been gathered anecdotally or through informal discussions, the auditors added. The department says it is planning to reinforce security policies and procedures for employees who will be moving to the Carling Campus. Spokeswoman Lt.-Cmdr. Diane Grover said the VoIP systems have undergone a security review, including consultations with officials from the country's electronic spy agency, the Communications Security Establishment. "Required controls as well as security best practices are being applied in the implementation of VoIP at Carling Campus," Grover noted in an email. Despite potential issues with the high-tech strategy, the new site will give DND more physical security because it relocates many of the organization's downtown offices, now in commercially owned buildings, behind a guarded perimeter and away from public roadways. "A controlled access perimeter will be completed this fall," Grover said of the Carling Avenue site. "Entry will be strictly controlled through several guard houses and pedestrian access points. "Further, work spaces within the campus will be designated appropriately, reflecting the nature of the work that is conducted in those spaces, as well as the security clearance requirements of anyone wishing to enter those areas," she added.

9. Améliorer la communication entre frontières

Le Journal De Montreal, Valérie Gonthier, 2016 10 01

Montreal - Des policiers de la Sûreté du Québec ont récemment suivi une formation avec leurs collègues du Vermont afin d'améliorer leurs techniques de communication pour contrer les menaces terroristes. «L'exercice visait à améliorer la fluidité du renseignement entre les agences du Vermont et celles du Québec. Ça permet aussi d'améliorer notre réseau de contacts. Parce que, lorsque quelque chose survient, on a souvent peu de temps pour réagir», a indiqué Sophie Gougeon, lieutenant responsable du Bureau des relations internationales de la SQ. À la SQ, huit personnes, dont des analystes et des agents de renseignements, s'y sont rendues. Ils ont notamment participé à différents scénarios conçus par le Homeland Security (service de renseignements américain). Chaque fois, les participants devaient s'entendre sur la façon de procéder afin de partager l'information entre chaque corps de police. «On regardait ensemble ce qu'on ferait normalement si on recevait telle ou telle information. Est-ce qu'on la place dans une banque de données? Est-ce qu'on écrit un rapport?» dit-elle. Parmi les scénarios, il y en avait un d'un individu qui se rendait dans une quincaillerie pour acheter une grande quantité de fertilisant. Puisqu'il s'agit d'un produit connu pour être utilisé afin de fabriquer des bombes artisanales, le commerçant avait contacté la police.

10. Mali: le Canada planifie son soutien aux opérations françaises

45eNord.ca, Nicolas Laffont, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Le ministère de la Défense nationale a indiqué à 45eNord.ca dans un courriel que même si ce n'est pas encore finalisé «les Forces armées canadiennes travaillent actuellement sur des plans pour assurer la continuité du transport aérien soutien stratégique aux efforts antiterroristes français dans la région du Sahel. Comme ce fut le cas avec la récente contribution des FAC en 2015, les avions de transport aérien seront probablement utilisés pour le transport de troupes et de matériel français». De septembre à décembre 2015, les Forces armées canadiennes ont appuyé le gouvernement de la France dans le cadre de l'opération BARKHANE, l'opération française de lutte contre le terrorisme dans la région du Sahel en Afrique, dans trois missions de transport aérien à l'aide d'un CC-177 Globemaster III. Les FAC ont transporté le personnel et l'équipement militaire français de la France à destination de deux endroits dans la région du Sahel en Afrique: N'Djamena, au Tchad et Niamey, au Niger. Le premier vol a eu lieu le 28 septembre 2015, le second, le 24 novembre 2015 et le troisième, le 12 décembre 2015 – pour une cargaison totale de personnel et d'équipement militaire de 79.700 kg. Les Forces armées canadiennes ont également appuyé l'opération précédente du gouvernement français, l'opération SERVAL. Le 14 janvier 2013, le gouvernement du Canada avait ainsi annoncé que la France avait demandé l'aide du Canada pour intervenir au Mali et que le Canada allait fournir un aéronef de transport lourd CC-177 Globemaster III pour aider au transport de l'équipement français au Mali. Entre janvier et mars 2013, les FAC ont effectué 48 vols transportant environ 1 618 600 kilogrammes (3 560 920 livres) en cargaison.

11. Canada hopes to warm chilly Arctic relations

National Post, Marie-Danielle Smith, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - In its first major statement on the Arctic, the Trudeau government has moved away from the more confrontational approach that dominated Conservative policy, with Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion putting Russia at the centre of Canada's northern policy. A rapprochement between the two countries is expected on the northern front, despite concerns over Russian actions in the Middle East and Ukraine, not to mention friction over the North Pole. Pamela Goldsmith-Jones, Dion's parliamentary secretary, outlined the new approach at a Carleton University/Centre for International Governance Innovation event Thursday. "Between us we control three-quarters of the north," she said in a speech written by Dion. Canada "wishes to be rational," so working with Russia in the Arctic is "eminently sensible." CIGI fellow John Higginbotham, who helped organize the event, said he was pleased and surprised by the statement. "It touched all the right bases, the importance of Russia in the Arctic, the importance of co-operation, while not diminishing at all Canada's very strong position on Ukraine and Syria, our support for NATO, the requirement for deterrence," he said.

12. 'Critical' for DND staff to do mandatory Phoenix training

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Thousands of civilian employees at the Defence Department have until next week to complete mandatory training on the controversial Phoenix pay system. The training is critical to minimize errors affecting the problem-plagued federal government system, noted a message sent to all department workers and obtained by the Ottawa Citizen. Phoenix pay system foul-ups have left thousands of Canada's public servants unpaid. But senior federal officials have countered that many of the issues with the pay system are not technical, but linked to employees failing to properly fill out work-related information. "It is critical that you complete the mandatory training to minimize errors that will lead to pay issues," the Department of National Defence message pointed out. "Training can help both employees and managers overcome the challenges associated with the transition to the new system." The training must be completed by Oct. 7 and involves a one-hour course that can be completed online. "The majority of employees who have taken the self-paced course have indicated that the training was beneficial to ensuring that their information was entered correctly," the message said. Once training is completed, the employee must provide a training co-ordinator with a copy of a certificate of completion. There was no indication what the consequences of failing to complete the course are. DND employees have been taking the training voluntarily, but as many as 30 per cent of the 24,900 workers have yet to complete the course. "The October 7th deadline reflects the fact that resolving pay issues is a top priority for the department," DND spokeswoman Jessica Lamirande said in an email response to the Citizen.

13. Le combat de Jonathan Pitre continue

Le Droit, Martin Brunette, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Jonathan Pitre, le jeune adolescent de Russell atteint d'une rare maladie de la peau appelée l'épidermolyse bulleuse, poursuit sa lutte, cette fois aux États-Unis. Il en est maintenant rendu au 38^e jour d'un traitement expérimental à l'Université du Minnesota. Il y a été admis le 23 août dernier afin de subir plusieurs séances de chimiothérapie, de la radiothérapie et une greffe de moelle osseuse, le tout dans l'espoir de fortifier sa peau et diminuer la douleur quotidienne causée par ses plaies. Jonathan est actuellement en convalescence. Les médecins espèrent que ses globules blancs proliféreront à la suite de la greffe de moelle osseuse qu'il a reçue de sa mère Tina Boileau, le 8 septembre dernier. «Donc, au moins, on voit un signe positif. Plus les globules blancs se multiplient, plus on voit que la greffe a bien pris», a commenté sa mère lorsque jointe par LeDroit. Par contre, les traitements n'ont pas été sans effets secondaires pour Jonathan. «C'est la partie qui a été la plus difficile pour lui. Il était très nauséeux. C'est un peu comme s'il avait attrapé la pire grippe de sa vie».

14. Monsef shouldn't be above the law

The Ottawa Sun, Candice Malcom, 2016 10 01

Column: As you've probably heard by now, Maryam Monsef was born in Iran — not Afghanistan. After being praised as the ultimate refugee success story, Canada's first cabinet minister from Afghanistan, we learned last week that the story she had presented was not accurate. Monsef claims that she never knew the true story about where she was born and how she spent the first decade of her life. It was only after a media investigation and questions from a journalist that she asked her mother and was told the truth. But the journalist, Robert Fife of the Globe and Mail, was acting upon a tip. Somebody else knew the truth, and reached out to members of the national media to encourage a probe. Once the truth was revealed, other political figures in Monsef's hometown of Peterborough, Ontario, came forward to reveal that they, too, had heard similar stories. The question then becomes: if rumours were spinning around Peterborough about Monsef's life story, and if anonymous tipsters were encouraging journalists to investigate, how is it that Monsef herself was the last to know?

15. Turkey's Gulen crackdown hits Canada

The Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - The schism between the Erdogan government and opponents is reflected in ugly confrontations in this country. A crackdown on Gulen followers in Turkey has spilled into Canada, creating a deep divide in the Turkish community in this country. A delegation from Turkey recently visited Canada to urge the closing of the Nile Academy, a private Toronto school that follows the teachings of Fethullah Gulen, a 75-year-old preacher whom Turkish officials accuse of masterminding an attempted coup d'état on July 15. Enrolment at the school has plummeted – down to 300 students from 500. Efforts in Canada by Turkish authorities and supporters of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan have made life miserable for Gulen followers here, many say. They have been made unwelcome in mosques and restaurants frequented by Turkish-Canadians, and they have been cursed and protested against by fellow citizens. In Turkey, hundreds of Gulen schools have been shut down, and thousands of people have been rounded up, dismissed from positions in the military, police, judiciary and other government offices. The arrests include two Canadians with dual citizenship who are still being held in Turkey.

16. Bribe revealed in U.S. corruption case

The Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York, 2016 10 01

Johannesburg - The cellphone message from the Israeli businessman was blunt and vulgar: The Canadian mining company must be “screwed and finished totally,” he told an associate as they negotiated a massive bribe to Congolese court officials to guarantee that the Canadian company would lose control of its copper mine. Within hours of that 2008 message, the businessman and his associate had arranged a bribe of $500,000 (U.S.) to judges and other officials in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, according to court documents released in a U.S. corruption case. A day later, the Israeli businessman obtained assurances that Congolese officials would ensure the Canadian company would lose its court fight against a local takeover of the copper mine, the U.S. documents say. Then, a week later, the Israeli won majority control of the company and the valuable asset. The documents were released on Thursday in the settlement of a corruption case against Och-Ziff Capital Management, a U.S. hedge fund that manages $39-billion. Och-Ziff agreed to pay $412million in criminal and civil penalties, one of the biggest payments ever approved under the U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. The U.S. documents show the hedge fund paid more than $100-million in bribes to officials in Congo, Libya, Chad, Niger and Guinea - including Congolese President Joseph Kabila - to gain corrupt influence and mining assets.

17. Les emplois permanents se font plus rares

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 10 01

Ottawa - Le gouvernement fédéral réduit ses dépenses en personnel en ayant de plus en plus recours à des employés occasionnels et à des étudiants. Dans le rapport sur les dépenses des trois premiers mois de 2016-2017, le directeur parlementaire du budget Jean-Denis Fréchette constate également que les autres coûts de fonctionnement, incluant les contrats de service professionnel et frais de transport, ont augmenté de plus de 585 millions $, en hausse de plus 18 %. La baisse des dépenses en personnel a atteint 120 millions $, en diminution de 1,3 %. Elle n'est pas attribuable à une réduction du nombre de fonctionnaires, puisque leur nombre total n'a pratiquement pas changé de 2014 à 2015. L'effectif total est ainsi resté stable à 257000, après avoir connu un sommet de 283000 en 2010, selon les chiffres du Secrétariat du Conseil du Trésor. « Cette stabilisation récente du nombre d'employés reflète une diminution du nombre de postes à temps plein au profit d'un nombre accru de postes occasionnels ou de durée déterminée », peut-on lire dans le rapport. Ainsi, au cours de la période du 31 mars 2014 au 31 mars 2015, le nombre d'employés à durée déterminée a augmenté de 9,3 %, les occasionnels de 8,3 %, et les étudiants de 6 %. Pendant ce temps, le nombre d'employés permanents a baissé de 1,8 %.

18. Extremist Imam Tests F.B.I. and the Law's Limits

The New York Times, Scott Shane, 2016 10 01

Washington - For more than a decade, Suleiman Anwar Bengharsa has served as a Muslim cleric in Maryland, working as a prison chaplain and as an imam at mosques in Annapolis and outside Baltimore. He gave a two-week course in 2011 on Islamic teachings on marriage at the Islamic Society of Baltimore, where President Obama made a much-publicized visit this year. But in the last two years, Imam Bengharsa's public pronouncements have taken a dark turn. On Facebook, he has openly endorsed the Islamic State, posted gruesome videos showing ISIS fighters beheading and burning alive their enemies and praised terrorist attacks overseas. The "Islamic Jurisprudence Center" website he set up last year has condemned American mosques as un-Islamic and declared that homosexual acts should be punished by death. That is not all. An affidavit filed in federal court by the F.B.I. says that Imam Bengharsa, 59, supplied $1,300 in June 2015 to a Detroit man who used it to expand his arsenal of firearms and grenades. The man, Sebastian Gregerson, 29, a Muslim convert who sometimes calls himself Abdurrahman Bin Mikaayl, was arrested in late July and indicted on explosives charges. Nearly a year ago, in fact, the F.B.I. said in a court filing -- accidentally and temporarily made public in an online database -- that agents suspected the two men were plotting terrorism. "Based on the totality of the aforementioned information and evidence, there is reason to believe that Bengharsa and Gregerson are engaged in discussions and preparations for some violent act on behalf of" the Islamic State, an agent wrote.

19. FBI files reveal how Clinton server was created in K Street lab

Fox News, Catherine Herridge & Pamela K. Browne, 2016 10 01

Washington - If Hillary Clinton's 'homebrew' server ever got the Mary Shelley treatment, IT specialist Bryan Pagliano would make a fine Dr. Frankenstein – FBI documents reveal new details about how he painstakingly created the machine over a series of months while working in a room along Washington's storied K Street. According to files released last Friday evening, Pagliano worked to design and build the now-infamous server inside a room once used as part of Clinton's campaign headquarters. On the street known as Washington's power corridor, Pagliano even used computer remnants from Clinton's failed 2008 presidential bid, where he had worked as an IT specialist. The story of how the server came into existence became clearer thanks to witness interviews known as 302s. Though they were highly redacted, the bureau files include new details Pagliano revealed in a June 24 interview with the FBI. In that interview, Pagliano said it was longtime Clinton Foundation aide Justin Cooper who asked him to build the server "in the fall of 2008" and that Pagliano completed the work in early 2009. (Pages 155, 163) After the server's completion in the makeshift lab on K Street, Pagliano stated that he "rented a minivan and drove to Chappaqua New York to install the email server in the Clinton residence." Pagliano and Cooper were separately interviewed by the FBI five times during the bureau's investigation into Clinton's use of private server and private email for government business while secretary of state. According to the reviewed documents, Pagliano was interviewed first on Dec. 22, 2015 and again six months later on June 21, 2016. Cooper was interviewed three times -- once in 2015 and twice in 2016 -- and appeared before Congress. Pagliano was one of five people who received limited immunity from the Justice Department, has taken the Fifth and refused to testify before Congress.

20. Freer rein for law enforcement hackers

The Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima & Rachel Weiner, 2016 10 01

Washington - When the FBI searched Andrew Workman's computer, they say they found pornographic videos of girls as young as 3 years old. A federal judge in Colorado ruled in September that the computer hack that helped the bureau uncover the videos should never have been allowed. Why? The search warrant permitting the hack was issued by a magistrate judge in Virginia - outside the judicial district in which Workman lived - and in an apparent violation of federal criminal rules. But a shift in federal rules set to go into effect in December says that a judge in one district can approve a warrant to hack computers outside that district in cases in which the computers' locations are shielded. The change would aid the government in its sweeping national investigation into child pornography on the "dark Web," a universe of sites that are off Google's radar, where pedophiles using special technology can operate in anonymity. The government contends that the change - which was approved by the Supreme Court in April and will go forward unless Congress opposes it - is necessary to clear up a loophole created by technology. Because investigators cannot know in advance where a target computer is physically located if a suspect is using tools to mask his or her location, it is impossible to seek a search warrant in the district in which the target is located, officials say. They add that the change does not create any new authority and would still require a showing of probable cause before a warrant is issued.

21. U.S. Keeps Pressure On Russia Over Syria

The Wall Street Journal, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 10 02

Washington - The U.S. is still pursuing talks with Moscow on the Syria crisis, officials said Friday, days after Secretary of State John Kerry threatened to shut them down over a massive Syrian and Russian military offensive in Aleppo. State Department spokesman Mark Toner said Friday that the diplomatic process is difficult to pursue in the midst of the carnage, but said the Obama administration didn't want to "definitively close the door yet." Mr. Toner described the diplomatic process as "on life support, but it's not flat-lined yet" and said the U.S. could walk away in hours or days. The two powers agreed early in September on a cease-fire and military cooperation plan, but the deal fell apart after about a week. Mr. Kerry spoke to his Russian counterpart, Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, for the third time in three days on Friday. The discussion took place as Mr. Kerry was traveling back from Israel, where he had attended the funeral of Israeli statesman Shimon Peres along with President Barack Obama and other senior U.S. officials.

22. At Shimon Peres Funeral, a Lineup of U.S. and Israeli Leaders Who Tangled

The New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 10 01

Washington - When Bill Clinton took his place on Friday at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem for the state funeral of Shimon Peres, he was part of a tangled tableau: leaders from Israel and the United States who came together to mourn a giant of peace but who nurture their own political feuds and rivalries, stretching back two decades. Standing close to the former president was Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, whom Mr. Clinton energetically tried to defeat when he challenged Mr. Peres for the prime minister post in 1996. Nearby was President Obama, whom Mr. Netanyahu not so subtly tried to oust in 2012 by signaling his support for Mitt Romney, Mr. Obama's Republican opponent. Hillary Clinton was absent, though she met Mr. Netanyahu on Sunday in New York. She has not had to deal with him putting his thumb on the electoral scales, even if he did meet with Donald J. Trump for 80 minutes at his office in Trump Tower before seeing her. "Believe me, he's not a happy camper," Mr. Trump said of the Israeli leader the next day during his debate with Mrs. Clinton. It was the only time Mr. Netanyahu's name came up in the debate, however, and Mr. Trump's characterization seemed at odds with the reassuring message about the two presidential candidates that Mr. Netanyahu brought back to Israel.

23. Congress Has Itself to Blame for 9/11 Bill

The New York Times, 2016 10 01

Editorial: Congress seems determined to set a new standard for craven incompetence. Less than 24 hours after the Senate and House delivered a stinging rebuke to President Obama by overriding his veto of a bill that would let the Sept. 11 families sue Saudi Arabia, Republican leaders raised the possibility of a do-over. On Thursday the Senate majority leader, Mitch McConnell, said that "nobody had really focused on the potential downside in terms of our international relationships, and I think it was just a ball dropped." It's rare to hear such a baldfaced admission of gross ineptitude. But instead of putting the responsibility entirely where it belongs -- on Congress -- Mr. McConnell went on absurdly to blame Mr. Obama for failing to communicate the potential consequences of the bill. In fact, Mr. Obama, the national security agencies, the Saudi government, retired diplomats, the European Union and big corporations had all bombarded Congress with warnings. Yet lawmakers ignored all of them in a rush to pass the legislation and then, this week, override Mr. Obama's veto by a large bipartisan vote. The new law would allow families of the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks to sue Saudi Arabia for any role it had in the terrorist operation. It would do that by expanding an exception to sovereign immunity, the legal principle that protects foreign countries and their diplomats from lawsuits in the American legal system.

24. 2 Men Who Found Bomb in Chelsea Are Identified as Airline Security Guards

The New York Times, Nour Youssef, 2016 10 01

Cairo - Two men who found a travel bag containing a bomb on a Manhattan street last month — and then walked off with the bag but left the bomb — were not just employees of EgyptAir but in-flight security officers for the carrier, two officials at the airline said on Friday. Surveillance footage showed two men finding the bag on West 27th Street on the evening of Sept. 17, soon after a bomb exploded on West 23rd Street, injuring 31 people and triggering terrorism fears across the region. In the video, the men were seen pulling from the travel bag a white plastic bag that contained a pressure cooker connected to wires and a mobile phone. They left the white bag on the sidewalk and walked away with the travel bag. The bomb did not explode, and investigators have said that the men may have inadvertently disabled the device. The two men, identified as Hassan Ali and Abou Bakr Radwan, had flown to New York from here, serving as unarmed security guards on the flight, the officials said. The bag they found contained one of several homemade bombs that prosecutors say were planted that day in New York and New Jersey by Ahmad Khan Rahami, an Afghan-born American citizen.

25. Pentagon operatives, moonlighting in Texas

The Washington Post, Craig Whitlock, 2016 10 01

Washington - Even among the colorful pantheon of Texas lawmen, Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West has seized his share of the limelight. In his 16-year career patrolling the West Texas outback, he has busted crooner Willie Nelson for pot, accused the Mexican army of invading U.S. territory and repeatedly ripped the federal government on television over border security. Less well known are the country sheriff's strange connections to a rogue Navy intelligence office at the Pentagon that has been under criminal investigation for the past three years. The former director of the intelligence unit, David W. Landersman, a civilian, is facing federal conspiracy charges for allegedly orchestrating a mysterious scheme to equip Navy commandos with hundreds of untraceable AK-47 rifle silencers. A new wrinkle in the case, however, has recently emerged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va., where prosecutors have suggested that Navy officials from the intelligence unit also sought to funnel military equipment to rural Hudspeth County and set up a secret training base near the Mexican border. Even more unusual: Two of Landersman's former subordinates have testified that when they were not working full time on intelligence matters at the Pentagon, they moonlighted 1,600 miles away as reserve deputy sheriffs in Hudspeth County, a desolate, Connecticut-size jurisdiction east of El Paso.

26. Plaintiffs Move on Saudi 9/11 Claims

The Wall Street Journal, Jess Bravin, 2016 10 01

Washington - Lawyers for Sept. 11 victim families with legal claims pending in court said Friday they are moving quickly to take advantage of a new law exposing Saudi Arabia to potential liability for the 2001 terror attacks. James Kreindler, whose New York firm represents hundreds of victims' families, said attorneys would soon file papers at the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York seeking to reinstate Saudi Arabia as a defendant in lawsuits filed shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks and consolidated in the New York-based federal court. "If we haven't done it by today, we'll do it Monday," Mr. Kreindler said. Congress enacted the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act on Wednesday, overriding President Barack Obama's veto, to expose foreign governments to lawsuits over allegations that their officials supported terrorist acts on U.S. soil. Litigation over the Sept. 11 attacks has been under way for nearly 15 years. But Saudi Arabia, which has denied culpability, had blocked claims by asserting sovereign immunity, a legal doctrine that protects governments from being sued against their will.

27. U.S., ASEAN navies to drill in hopes of improving surveillance capacity

Kyodo News, 2016 10 01

Honolulu - The United States Pacific Command will conduct a joint exercise with the navies of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations to assist the 10-member group in strengthening its surveillance capabilities, U.S. Defense Secretary Ashton Carter said Friday. Carter unveiled the plan during a meeting with ASEAN defense ministers in Hawaii as China continues unilateral construction and militarization of island outposts in the disputed South China Sea. It was the first gathering of the U.S. and ASEAN defense ministers since an arbitration ruling in July that invalidated China's claims to almost the whole of the South China Sea. The Pentagon chief and his ASEAN counterparts agreed to step up information sharing and to hold talks next year on maritime security involving the U.S. Navy and coast guard authorities, as well as ASEAN. In an effort to deepen U.S. engagement in Southeast Asia, Washington will in 2017 invite ASEAN defense ministers to a U.S. military base in Florida for talks to beef up surveillance activities by ASEAN.

28. The propaganda effect; China's push into hollywood fuels fears of 'soft power' influence

The New York Times, Edward Wong, 2016 10 01

Washington - Movie theatres and studios are rarely the focus of geopolitical conflict. But 16 members of the United States Congress are raising this question: Should foreign acquisition of these kinds of U.S. companies be subject to special scrutiny? In a recent letter, those politicians cited the case of Dalian Wanda Group, the Chinese conglomerate that in January bought Legendary Entertainment, one of Hollywood's biggest production companies, for as much as US$3.5 billion. In 2012, Wanda bought AMC Theaters, the large U.S. chain, for US$2.6 billion. "Should the definition of national security be broadened to address concerns about propaganda and control of the media and 'soft power' institutions?" the representatives said in the letter, which was dated Sept. 15 and addressed to Gene L. Dodaro, comptroller general. Dodaro is the head of the Government Accountability Office, and the aim of the letter was to urge that office to consider whether the government process to review foreign investment in the United States needs to be expanded. The process is overseen by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, an interagency group that is supervised by the Treasury Department.

29. Hackers targeted voter registration systems in 20 states

Engadget Blog, 2016 10 01

Washington - With the US presidential election just over a month away, a Homeland Security official says voter registration systems in 20 states were the targets of hackers. The Associated Press reports that an official from the department confirmed the activity over the the last few months and explained that it hasn't been determined if the threats were domestic or foreign. ABC News reported this week that Russian hackers targeted the systems of 20 states and successfully infiltrated four. This news follows an FBI warning in August that hackers outside of the US took aim at systems in Illinois and Arizona. While it's important to note that these attacks are on the voter registration systems and not the actual voting systems themselves, it's still a major concern heading into the election. There are already concerns that foreign hackers may try to influence the results of the process and the FBI has said it's looking into Russian hackers that may try to do so.

30. Drive to shake up UK's terror laws for benefit of victims is launched (Canada)

Belfast Telegraph, Rebecca Black, 2016 10 01

London - London-based law firm McCue & Partners is behind the initiative, acting on behalf of Northern Ireland-based group Innocent Victims United. The group said it was seeking to raise £25,000 to bring about "much-needed and long-overdue change to the law to allow UK victims and survivors of terrorism to bring terrorists and their supporters to justice". "Too often, the State fails, is unable or chooses not to do so," the campaigners said in a statement. "The laws of other countries provide their victims with such essential support. It's time the UK did too." The campaigners also claimed that the UK falls "far behind other Western countries, such as the USA and Canada, in providing adequate access to justice to UK citizens who are victims and survivors of terrorism".

31. Cyber crime unit opens amid surge in online attacks

The Daily Telegraph, 2016 10 01

London – Britain's first national centre for combating cyber criminals will open next week, amid rapid growth in the number of online attacks. Terrorists, hackers and online gangs will be targeted by intelligence experts at the new National Cyber Security Centre in Victoria, central London. A team of around 700 people will help to advance the Government's war against cyber crime. The threat is growing, with 200 major incidents a month, double the rate last year. The centre will be led by Ciaran Martin, formerly the director general for cyber security at GCHQ. At a cyber security conference in Washington DC earlier this month, Mr Martin outlined plans to create a firewall that could protect government agencies and internet users against cyber attacks. He said Britain was facing twice as many "national security level cyber incidents" as this time last year. Mr Martin said that the centre would help make the UK "the safest place to live and do business online".

32. UK must protect EU crime prevention links, NCA says

The Guardian, Jamie Grierson, 2016 10 01

London - National Crime Agency urges Brexit negotiators not to jeopardise cross-border measures, such as European arrest warrant Law enforcement chiefs have urged the government to ensure cross-border crime prevention measures are not jeopardised by Brexit negotiations, it has emerged. The director general and deputy director general of the National Crime Agency said they had asked ministers to protect Britain's arrangements with Europe, including use of the European arrest warrant and membership of Europol, amid concerns about the impact of leaving the union. Membership of the EU gives the NCA and UK police forces access to tools which allow them to share intelligence quickly and efficiently with European counterparts. Lynne Owens, the NCA's director general, said at a briefing on Friday that the agency had approached the Home Office and Brexit department to raise its concerns. "We've been describing what we need to be in place post-Brexit. We're absolutely clear the policy decisions are not for us but we need to be spelling out the operational case," she said. Europol, the EU's law enforcement agency, helps member states fight serious international crime and terrorism. Before the referendum, former security chiefs, including the former head of MI5 Lady Manningham-Buller, and the former head of MI6 Sir John Sawers, said that voting remain was in the best interests of the country's security.

33. In Vote, Colombians Weigh Peace Against Rebels' Wrongs

The Wall Street Journal, Kejal Vyas, 2016 10 01

Monteria, Colombia - During a wave of terror in the 1990s here in northern Colombia's cattle country, rancher Alberto Munoz's brother was slain after refusing to make extortion payments to Marxist guerrillas targeting farmers. But Mr. Munoz said that on Sunday he will reluctantly vote for the peace accord President Juan Manuel Santos signed with his brother's tormenters, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC. Polls show a majority of Colombians will approve the 297-page deal in the referendum vote. But like Mr. Munoz, many remain wary of the FARC and are irritated by what they see as substantial benefits the rebels will enjoy under the peace accord. "All of us are going into this with a lot of uncertainty," Mr. Munoz, 60, said at a livestock auction in a swath of ranchland where landowners were at the epicenter of a fierce war between rebels and paramilitary groups. "I don't want future generations to live what we lived through," he said. While the deal ends half a century of conflict, it also paves the way for the guerrilla group to disarm and convert into a political party with 10 guaranteed seats in congress. It allows the FARC's leadership to avoid jail time and grants stipends to demobilized combatants, concessions that have roiled sentiments in this politically polarized country.

34. Out of the jungle

The Washington Post, Nick Miroff, 2016 10 01

Washington - "Do you want to see my gun?" Yurluey Mendoza asked about 90 minutes into our conversation. Now we were getting somewhere. This was the guerrilla equivalent of being invited inside for coffee. We were in the rebel-controlled hinterlands for what was billed as the final gathering of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or the FARC. On Sunday, Colombian voters will decide whether to accept a peace deal with the FARC, whose members have waged the longest-running insurgency in the Western Hemisphere. The rebels were meeting last week to discuss the accord and figure out their future after 52 years at war. Many, like Yurluey, are preparing to reenter the modern world. They have spent years roaming Colombia's mountains and forests, bathing in creeks and sleeping in crude campsites. Talking to Yurluey was like meeting someone who had stepped out of a time machine. She has never used the Internet, never seen the ocean, never been to the movies or ridden a bicycle. She was also clearly not used to answering questions. "Why me?" Yurluey asked. "Why did you pick me?" I told her I wanted to talk to someone who had spent their whole life fighting in the jungle. Not one of the younger soldiers. Someone closer to my age (39). She glowered. "You think I'm that old?" Yurluey, the nom de guerre by which all her rebel "comrades" know her, joined the FARC at age 14, "about 20 years ago," she said.

35. 5 Special Force troops dead in Farah airstrike

Pajhwok Afghan News, Mohammad Humayon Zahin, 2016 10 01

Farah City - Five Afghan Special Force personnel have been killed three wounded in an US airstrike in Bala Boluk district of western Farah province, an official said on Saturday. Syed Mohammad, the town's administrative chief, told Pajhwok Afghan News the incident occurred in the Kansak locality late on Friday. He said the US fighter jets conducted air raids on militants in the area when members of Special Force Unit were also attacked. One personnel from quick response force was also injured in the air raid. But Abdul Basir, the resident of locality, claimed seven Special Forces have been killed in the attack. Meanwhile, Mohammad Nasir Mahdavi, the governor's spokesman, rejected the killing of Special Forces in the US airstrike and said clearing operation was underway in the area.

36. Karzai to mujahideen: Denounce both US, Russia Air strikes

Pajhwok Afghan News, Navid Ahmad Barakzai, 2016 10 01

Kabul - Former president Hamid Karzai on Friday called on jihadi leaders to condemn civilian killings in US airstrikes just like they denounced Soviet bombardment of non-combatants. Speaking at a gathering on the fifth death anniversary of ex-president Burhanuddin Rabbani in Kabul, Karzai recalled his offer of the High Peace Council (HPC) chairmanship to the Jamiat-i-Islami leader. In reply, the former president said, Rabbani accepted the offer on condition that he would lay down his life for the sake of peace in the conflict-devastated country. "I'm following the same path that Rabbani had chosen for himself. I don't care even if I'm taunted and disrespected while pursuing the goal of peace," he declared after some Jamiat-i-Islami members shouted "death to Karzai".

37. China should make Singapore pay over South China Sea dispute, says PLA adviser

The Straits Times, 2016 10 01

Hong Kong - Beijing should impose sanctions and retaliate against Singapore to make the Republic "pay the price for seriously damaging China's interests", an influential Chinese defence adviser reportedly told state radio. The remarks by Professor Jin Yanan, director of the strategic research institute at the PLA's National Defence University, is the latest salvo from by China over a recent war of words over the South China Sea territorial spat. The row erupted after the Global Times, a Chinese newspaper known for its often nationalistic reporting, claimed that Singapore insisted on adding contents that endorsed the Philippines' South China Sea arbitration case against China in the final document of the Summit of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) in Venezuela last month. The report prompted Singapore's Ambassador to China Stanley Loh to issue a written rebuttal, saying Singapore did not raise the South China Sea or the tribunal ruling in Manila's favour at the NAM Summit. But Jin, in an interview with state-owned China National Radio on Thursday, accused Singapore of taking an active role in turning the South China Sea dispute into an international issue in recent years, South China Morning Post reported on Saturday (Oct 1).

38. Beijing stands firm against anti-missile shield

South China Morning Post, Laura Zhou, 2016 10 01

Beijing - South Korea's announcement yesterday of the final site of a US-built antiballistic missile system drew firm opposition in Beijing and a vow to take "necessary measures" to counter the shield. Analysts said Beijing's opposition to the deployment was unlikely to waver. South Korea's defence ministry said the Terminal High Altitude Area Defence system, or THAAD, would be located at a golf course 18km north of the Seongju county centre by next year. The initial plan was to set up the system at the Seongsan anti-aircraft missile base in Seongju, 296km southeast of Seoul. But the move was met with strong protests by residents over potential health risks that the THAAD radar system posed. In Beijing, foreign ministry spokesman Geng Shuang said THAAD's deployment on the Korean peninsula would not "resolve security issues ... nor will it help realise denuclearisation and maintain peace and stability on the Korean peninsula".

39. N. Korea appears to be building larger ballistic missile submarine: 38 North

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 01

Washington - Recent satellite imagery indicates that North Korea may be building a new submarine larger than its current ballistic missile submarine, a U.S. website monitoring the North said Friday. "Commercial satellite imagery strongly suggests that a naval construction program is underway at North Korea's Sinpo South Shipyard, possibly to build a new submarine," 38 North said in a report based on analysis of imagery of the North's Sinpo Shipyard. The imagery shows an approximately 10-meter-in-diameter circular component outside the facility's recently renovated fabrication hall, which may be intended as a construction-jig or as a component for the pressure hull of a new submarine, 38 North said.

40. Duterte, Citing Hitler, Says He Wants to Kill 3 Million Addicts in Philippines

The New York Times, Felipe Villamor, 2016 10 01

Manila - President Rodrigo Duterte said Friday that he would like to kill millions of drug addicts in the Philippines, defying international criticism of his country's bloody war on narcotics and escalating his brutal rhetoric with a reference to the Holocaust. "Hitler massacred three million Jews," Mr. Duterte said after returning to the Philippines from a trip to Vietnam, understating the toll cited by historians, which is six million. "Now there is three million, there's three million drug addicts. There are. I'd be happy to slaughter them." Killing that number of drug users would "finish the problem of my country and save the next generation from perdition," he said. Since Mr. Duterte took office in June promising a grisly campaign against crime and drugs, the Philippines has seen a surge in killings of drug suspects. Philippine officials have counted about 3,000 deaths during the crackdown, about a third at the hands of the police. The police spokesman Dionardo Carlos said on Friday that the police had been overstating the number killed by the police. He said that the correct number was 1,120, not about 1,500, which the police had given earlier. He did not explain why the number had been revised.

41. Police, army conduct 24/7 checkpoint operations in Maguindanao-Sultan Kudarat border

Philippines News Agency, 2016 10 01

Esperanza - Police and Army authorities here have taken measures to prevent the transport of improvised bombs, unlicensed guns and illegal drugs by putting up 24/7 checkpoints along the Sultan Kudarat-Maguindanao highway. Chief Insp. Bryan Bernardino, Esperanza town police chief, and 1Lt. Jano Reyes, commanding officer of the 57th Infantry Battalion Alpha Company, led the inspection of all types of vehicles on a rotation basis to ensure the 24/7 checkpoint operation in Barangay Saliao, Esperanza, Sultan Kudarat. Bernardino said in a statement that the move was in response to the directive of Philippine National Police Chief Dir. Gen. Ronald dela Rosa. The 24/7 checkpoint operation also aims to monitor the movement of Private Armed Groups (PAGs), criminal groups, guns for hire, terrorists of the Abu Sayyaf Group and Bangsamoro Islamic Freedom Fighters (BIFF), and kidnap-for-ransom gangs at the borders of Sultan Kudarat and Maguindanao.

42. IAEA condemns N.K. nuke program, demands concrete steps for denuclearization

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 01

Seoul - The U.N. nuclear watchdog has adopted a resolution, condemning North Korea's nuclear weapons program "in the strongest terms" and demanding Pyongyang take "concrete steps" toward denuclearization, the foreign ministry in Seoul said Saturday. The International Atomic Energy Agency adopted the resolution unanimously as it wrapped up its general conference in Vienna, according to the ministry. The weeklong meeting ended Friday (local time). "The latest resolution pointed out the North's resumption of reprocessing activities this year and condemned the North's continued nuclear activities in a stronger manner than last year," the ministry said in a press release. The IAEA and its members reaffirmed their stance that they will not tolerate the North owning nuclear weapons, while strongly deploring its persistent pursuit of weapons of mass destruction.

43. South Korea Investigates Deaths of 3 Chinese Fishermen in Crackdown

The New York Times, Choe Sang Hun, 2016 10 01

Seoul - South Korean Coast Guard officials said on Friday that they were investigating the deaths of three Chinese fishermen whose boat caught fire during a crackdown on illegal fishing. The unlicensed fishing boat with 17 crew members on board was stopped on suspicion of poaching in waters off South Korea's southwestern coast on Thursday, a statement from the coast guard said. When the crew members locked themselves in a steering cabin to resist an attempt to search the vessel and question them, coast guard officers threw flashbang grenades into the cabin, the statement said. The grenades are nonlethal devices that produce a blinding flash of light and loud sound. The boat soon caught fire. Although the officers rescued 14 fishermen, they later found the other three dead, apparently from inhaling toxic fumes from the fire. The coast guard said autopsies were planned to determine the causes of their deaths. It was also investigating what had caused the fire. Officials in South Korea have long complained about the growing numbers of Chinese boats that they say are venturing farther from their increasingly barren home waters to poach near South Korea.

44. Pakistan, India Spar Over Kashmir Attack

The Wall Street Journal, Niharika Mandhana, 2016 10 01

New Delhi - Pakistan Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif on Friday postponed a regional summit and accused India of "unprovoked firing," a day after New Delhi carried out what it called "surgical strikes" against militants in Pakistan-controlled territory. Tensions between the two nuclear-armed rivals remained high, as they continued to dispute what occurred Thursday along the so-called line of control separating India- and Pakistan-governed parts of the disputed Kashmir region. India said its army along the de facto border with Pakistan was on alert, while it evacuated thousands of border villages for the second consecutive day. Army officials said they increased surveillance to thwart attempts by militants to carry out retaliatory attacks. Officials in New Delhi have said Indian soldiers on Thursday crossed about a mile into Pakistan's side and killed militants waiting to enter India to launch attacks. The incursion, the government said, was in response to a militant attack on Sept. 18 that killed 19 soldiers, which New Delhi blamed on Pakistan. Islamabad, meanwhile, has called India's account a "fabrication," saying the armed forces of both countries exchanged cross-border fire, a regular occurrence along this highly militarized frontier. After meeting with his cabinet Friday, Mr. Sharif said the country was ready "to counter any aggressive Indian designs."

45. Indian army chief reviews security situation in Indian-controlled Kashmir

Xinhua News Agency, Jit Kumar, 2016 10 01

New Delhi - Indian Army Chief General Dalbir Singh on Saturday visited Indian-controlled Kashmir to review the security situation along the border and the Line of Control (LoC). It was Singh's first visit to the disputed territory after the Indian army on Thursday claimed to have carried out "surgical strikes" across the LoC in Pakistan-controlled Kashmir and eliminated multiple terror launch pads. His visit came after India claimed that Pakistan violated ceasefire and targeted its posts along the LoC in the northern state's Akhnoor town. However, there have been no reports of any casualty or damage to properties.

46. Over 70% terrorists using cyber space: PMO Cyber Coordinator

Kashmir Images, 2016 10 01

New Delhi - Over 70 percent of terrorists and terror groups across the globe are using various cyber medium tools to spread the evil of terrorism and further their goals, Gulshan Rai, the National Cyber Security Coordinator in the Prime Ministers Office (PMO) has said. Speaking at the India Conference on Cyber Security & Internet Governance organised by Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi, Rai said 70-75 percent of terrorists are using tools like voice over internet telecom, social media and even encryption to spread the menace of terrorism and further their goals. He said that post the controversy surrounding whistle-blower Edward Snowden, users and nations have become worried about the security of their data and are now using various encryption techniques and policies that has led to interruptions in seamless flow of data and information. Former Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) employee Snowden copied and leaked classified information from the National Security Agency (NSA) in 2013 without prior authorisation.

47. Somali police: Car bomb kills 2 at restaurant in Mogadishu

Associated Press, 2016 10 01

Mogadishu - A Somali police officer says a car bomb blew up at the entrance of a restaurant in the Somali capital of Mogadishu, killing two people. Capt. Mohamed Hussein said the blast Saturday occurred at the Blue Sky restaurant close to the presidential palace. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the bombing but the Islamic extremist group of al-Shabab often carries out such attacks. Al-Shabab, al-Qaida's East African affiliate, is fighting to impose a strict version of Islam in this Horn of Africa nation. Despite losing a lot of ground in recent years, the extremist group continues to carry out lethal attacks in many parts of the country, especially in the capital. Recent attacks have focused on the capital's hotel industry, which is reemerging from decades of conflict.

49. Iran says new attack drone modeled on captured US aircraft

Associated Press Newswires, 2016 10 01

Tehran - Iran's Revolutionary Guard has built a new attack drone which is similar to a U.S. unmanned aerial vehicle captured five years ago, Iranian media reported Saturday. The semi-official Tasnim news agency says the "Saegheh" (Thunderbolt) drone is similar to the RQ-170 Sentinel spy drone. Iran's state-run Press TV says the long-range drone can carry four precision-guided bombs. Neither report gave figures for the drone's range. Iran claimed to have shot down an RQ-170 drone used by the Central Intelligence Agency in December 2011 and broadcast footage of the recovered aircraft. It also claims to have captured three American ScanEagle drones. Iran said last year that it had successfully tested its replica of the RQ-170.

50. Iran Using Threat of US Regional Build-Up as Opportunity

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 01

Tehran - Secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council (SNSC) Ali Shamkhani underlined that Iran has turned the threat posed by the US presence in the region into an opportunity. "The reverse engineering power, updating (the military products) and turning the US booties into indigenous and Iran-made products by the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) Aerospace Force shows Iran's capability to turn the threat of the US illegitimate presence in the region into an opportunity to increase its power and capabilities," Shamkhani said while visiting an exhibition of the IRGC Aerospace Force's products in Tehran on Saturday. He stressed that Iran's home-made state-of-the-art military equipment, including missiles with different ranges, new generation of drones and different vessels, have created such a capacity and power for the country that no wise enemy even dares to think of aggression against Iran. Military observers believe that the reverse manufacturing of the US RQ-170 spying drone, which was captured in 2011 by the IRGC Aerospace Force, has been a major blow to the US government. The Iranian version of the RQ-170 drone was manufactured through reverse engineering of the US drone, which was tracked and hunted down in Iran late in 2011, and has been equipped by the IRGC with bombing capability. Back in October 2013, Commander of the IRGC Aerospace Force Brigadier General Amir Ali Hajizadeh said Iran moved as much as 35 years ahead in building drone engines by reverse engineering of the US drone.

51. Iran Unveils New Drone with Pinpoint Striking Power

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 01

Tehran - Iran's latest drone product was unveiled on Saturday in a ceremony in the presence of Commander of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) Aerospace Force Brigadier General Amir Ali Hajizadeh. "The drone, Saeqeh (Thunderbolt) is Iran's latest pilotless plane from Simorgh (Phoenix) class and enjoys the capability to simultaneously strike at four targets with smart bombs equipped with pinpoint and precision striking capability at long distances," Hajizadeh said, addressing the ceremony in Tehran today. Noting that Iran is now standing among the first four world states in developing drones, he said, "The Americans are on par with us in certain (drone building) fields, including production of stealth and bomber drones, and actually, the Americans are trying to stay on par with us in this section." General Hajizadeh announced in March that Iran has decided to call its own version of the US Sentinel spy drone RQ-170 "Simorgh".

52. Russia doubles down in Syria

The Washington Post, Liz Sly, 2016 10 01

Beirut - In the year since Russia began conducting airstrikes in support of the Syrian government, the intervention has worked to secure two of the most important Russian objectives. No longer is President Bashar al-Assad's hold on power in Damascus seriously challenged by the five-year-old rebellion against his rule. Russia's role as a regional and global power, a vital player in any effort to resolve the Syrian war, has also been assured. A third key goal remains elusive. The military support to Assad has not yet proved sufficient either to defeat the anti-Assad rebellion or to force a settlement on Russian terms. But there is no suggestion yet that Russia is finding itself in the "quagmire" President Obama predicted would ensue when the intervention first got underway a year ago, nor is Moscow showing any sign of tiring of the military engagement. Rather, Russia now appears to be doubling down on its military support for Assad, with the violence escalating and no end in sight. Negotiations with the United States for a cease-fire have collapsed amid angry recriminations, casting into doubt whether cooperation between Moscow and Washington on Syria can work to provide a way out of the conflict.

53. Russia warns against US attack on Syrian forces

The Associated Press, 2016 10 01

Moscow - Russia has warned the United States against carrying out any attacks on Syrian government forces, saying it would have repercussions across the Middle East. Russian news agencies quoted Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Maria Zakharova as saying that a U.S. intervention against the Syrian army "will lead to terrible, tectonic consequences not only on the territory of this country but also in the region on the whole." She says regime change in Syria would create a vacuum that would be "quickly filled" by "terrorists of all stripes."

54. Ukrainian military shell Donetsk Republic – authorities

TASS World Service, 2016 10 01

Moscow - Units of the Ukrainian military over the past 24 hours 178 times opened fire on territory of the self-proclaimed Donetsk People's Republic (DPR), the republic's command said on Saturday. "From September 15, DPR units have been observing fully the ceasefire regime unlike the Ukrainian side, which over the past day 178 times opened fire on the DPR, including 83 times with use of the artillery, tanks and mortars," the Donetsk News Agency quoted the defense authority's representative. Members of the Contact Group for the settlement of the situation in the east of Ukraine at a meeting in Minsk on April 29 agreed on a complete ceasefire in Donbass starting from midnight on April 30. It was the eighth ceasefire agreement since the autumn of 2014. Kiev's security forces in the people's militia responsibility zone have been repeatedly violating the truce, opening fire from mortars and tank weapons, which had to be withdrawn in accordance with the Minsk agreements.

55. Polish Defense Minister Accuses Russia of Inventing Islamic Terrorism

Sputnik News Service, 2016 10 01

Kiev - Antoni Macierewicz, the Defense Minister of Poland, was set to be a headline speaker at the September 29 opening of the eighth annual Center for European Policy Analysis (CEPA) forum in Washington DC. He canceled his visit, ostensibly due to a government meeting in Warsaw, but was permitted to present his speech in the form of a letter read by a ministry aide. According to the text of Macierewicz's letter, pro-democratic aspirations in Ukraine were met with "brutal intervention" in 2014 on the part of Russia, which the minister described as a "clash of civilizations." The idea that the nuances of modern international relations can be explained as a clash of civilizations was touted in 1993 by US political scientist Samuel P. Huntington, and has been roundly debunked in academic circles as too simplistic. "The Western aspirations of the Ukrainian people were confronted with brutal force and eastern dictatorship. If we are seeing social turmoil in Western Europe associated with the wave of terrorism and the migration crisis — this is also a civilization clash," according to the letter. Macierewicz further linked the former Soviet Union's support of socialist movements in Europe during the Cold War era to contemporary Islamic terrorism.

56. Unknown gunmen kill intelligence colonel in Yemen's Aden

Xinhua News Agency, 2016 10 01

Aden - Unidentified gunmen killed an intelligence colonel in Yemen's port city Aden on Friday, a day after the Islamic State (IS) group claimed responsibility for assassinating a police officer in the country's temporary capital. The gunmen traveling in a vehicle opened fire at the intelligence Colonel Ali Muqbil, as he was on his way going to Friday prayers in Aden's neighborhood of Mansoura, a security official said on condition of anonymity. Witnesses confirmed to Xinhua that the masked gunmen fired a barrage of bullets that hit different parts of the intelligence colonel body and he died immediately at the scene. The attack is the latest targeting senior security and intelligence officials in Aden, where the Saudi-backed government has temporarily based itself.

57. Kerry's Frustration Over U.S. Policy on Syria Boils to Surface in Recording

The New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 10 01

Beirut - Secretary of State John Kerry was clearly exasperated, not least at his own government. Over and over, he complained that his diplomatic efforts on Syria had not been backed by a serious threat of American military force. He bemoaned Russia's continued bombing of civilians, its seeming disregard of international law, and his inability to stop it. But then Mr. Kerry did something that astonished the Syrian civilians at the table: He suggested that they participate in elections with President Bashar al-Assad, five years after President Obama demanded that the Syrian leader at the heart of the war step down. "So you think the only solution is for somebody to come in and get rid of Assad?" Mr. Kerry asked the group, according to a recording of the meeting obtained by The New York Times. "Who's that going to be?" he asked. "Who's going to do that?" A woman in the group responded bluntly. "Three years ago, I would say: you," the woman, Marcell Shehwaro, told Mr. Kerry. "But right now, I don't know." The meeting, which took place on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly in New York last week, provides a searing glimpse into Mr. Kerry's frustration with the Syrian crisis -- and the depths of despair and anger that Syrians who oppose their government feel about America's inability, or unwillingness, to end the war.

58. Over 100 Children Were Killed in Week of Aleppo Attacks, W.H.O. Says

The New York Times, Hwaida Saad, 2016 10 01

Beirut - An array of groups allied with the Syrian government pressed an assault on rebel-held eastern Aleppo on Friday, as the World Health Organization said heavy bombardment of the area by Russia and Syria had killed 338 people in the last week, including more than 100 children. With more of the city's already limited hospitals destroyed in the latest offensive, Dr. Richard Brennan, the organization's director of emergency response, told reporters that many of the 846 people wounded were expected to die for lack of treatment. That includes 261 children, he said. There were competing claims about the success of the government's offensive on Friday, with the government saying its fighters had captured more territory in northern parts of the city and penetrated the center of Aleppo, where they were clashing with the rebels. Rebel commanders denied the reports, however, saying government forces had not made any progress since capturing the Handarat refugee camp north of the city on Thursday. International monitoring groups have accused Russia and Syria of bombing civilian targets, like hospitals, schools and basic infrastructure, without regard to the safety of the civilian population of 250,000 in eastern Aleppo. On Friday, the rebels said the government bombed the main water plant that supplies the area.

60. Turkey finalizes military training base in Somalia Anadolu Agency, 2016 10 01

Mogadishu - Turkey has finished its first military base in Somalia and will help train the country's army to fight the deadly al-Shabaab terror group, a senior Turkish source told Anadolu Agency on Oct. 1. A Turkish military attache speaking on condition of anonymity said the U.N.-backed base will be operational by the start of 2017. About 200 Turkish officers will be deployed to the facility in Mogadishu -the Somali capital - to deliver the first stage of training to over 10,000 Somali National Army troops and others soldiers from across Africa, he confirmed. 1. Canadians back Africa mission but wary of dangers, poll shows

The Toronto Star, Bruce Campion, 2016 10 16

Ottawa - A slim majority of Canadians back Ottawa's plan to dispatch troops on a peace mission to Africa but are wary about the potential dangers, a new poll shows. A Forum survey reveals that 56 per cent of Canadians support the Liberal government's plan to send up to 600 soldiers to a hotspot in Africa. The pending mission-which is still taking shape - is especially popular among Liberals (68 per cent) and New Democrats (56 per cent) but less so among Conservatives (41 per cent). Almost a third of Canadians (31 per cent) disapprove of the mission. But when survey respondents were reminded that Canadian soldiers could come under fire on their new mission, support drops off with only 44 per cent indicating support. Disapproval of the mission also rises, with 39 per cent voicing opposition. As Prime Minister Justin Trudeau this week marks the one-year anniversary of the election that swept his Liberals to power, the military deployment to Africa is one decision that looms large. But Trudeau can cheer the fact that he has a residual of goodwill among voters. After a year in office, Canadian voters are showing little signs of buyers' remorse as the Liberal government continues to enjoy strong support, the poll reveals. Close to half of voters gave passing grades to the Liberals' first year, with 20 per cent rating it as "excellent" and another 27 per cent saying it was "good," the Forum survey shows.

2A). Toronto man jailed in Cuba for flying drone, questioned about U.S. spy connections

CTVNews, Jeff Lagerquist, 2016 10 16

Toronto - A Toronto photo enthusiast says he spent nearly two weeks in a small dark cell after he was arrested for flying a camera-equipped drone in Havana's Plaza de la Revolucion -- a mistake he thinks led his Cuban captors to believe he may be a spy for the U.S. government. "They would ask me questions like, 'When was the last time I met with President Obama? Do I talk to him regularly on the phone?'" Chris Hughes told CTV Toronto. Hughes says his drone was checked by customs officials upon entering the country in late September. He spent two days capturing spectacular overhead views of the Cuban capital without incident. That changed on the third day when he flew his drone above Revolution Square - a tourist destination made famous by Fidel Castro's political rallies and home to a memorial for Che Guevara. Police allegedly approached Hughes moments into the flight. "That was the beginning of the nightmare that took 13 days of my life," he says. At that point, he thought losing his $2,000 drone was the worst that could happen. The gravity of the situation started to set in when Hughes says he was questioned for 13 hours by police, driven to collect his possessions, and locked in a dark seven-foot by seven-foot cell at a detention facility. "No lawyer. No judge. No translator. No opportunity to defend myself," says Hughes.

2. Des Forces armées aimées, mais méconnues

La Presse, Jean-Thomas Leveille, 2016 10 16

Ottawa - Les Forces armées canadiennes sont aimées, mais largement méconnues par la population du pays. Une enquête menée en juin pour le compte du ministère de la Défense nationale, dont La Presse a obtenu copie, révèle que 90 % des répondants ont une opinion favorable ou très favorable des Forces, mais près d'une personne sur deux reconnaît ne pas bien les connaître. Et vous, connaissez-vous bien les Forces armées canadiennes ? La marine, l'aviation et l'armée de terre canadiennes comptent 68 000 militaires réguliers, 27 000 réservistes et 24 300 employés civils. Les membres des Forces sont très appréciés de la population canadienne : 59 % des répondants à l'enquête ont indiqué en avoir une opinion très favorable et 31 % ont répondu en avoir une opinion plutôt favorable, pour un total de 90 % d'opinions positives. En revanche, les Canadiens ont une opinion plus ambivalente des Forces armées canadiennes en tant qu'organisation : le taux de répondants estimant qu'elle est une source de fierté chute à 70 %, et seuls 27 % des répondants verraient d'un oeil très favorable qu'un jeune de leur entourage s'y enrôle. Environ 1100 membres des Forces armées canadiennes sont actuellement déployés dans le monde, dont plus de la moitié dans le cadre de l'opération Impact, qui constitue la contribution canadienne à la Force de stabilisation au Moyen-Orient qui lutte contre le groupe terroriste État islamique. Le terrorisme est d'ailleurs perçu comme la principale menace planant sur les Canadiens et le Canada, indique l'enquête : 40 % des répondants ayant répondu « terrorisme » et 19 % « État islamique ». Les États-Unis et les politiques américaines ont été identifiés comme la principale menace par 6 % des répondants.

3. In Somalia, U.S. Escalates a Shadow War

The New York Times, Staff Writers, 2016 10 16

Washington - The Obama administration has intensified a clandestine war in Somalia over the past year, using Special Operations troops, airstrikes, private contractors and African allies in an escalating campaign against Islamist militants in the anarchic Horn of Africa nation. Hundreds of American troops now rotate through makeshift bases in Somalia, the largest military presence since the United States pulled out of the country after the “Black Hawk Down” battle in 1993. The Somalia campaign, as it is described by American and African officials and international monitors of the Somali conflict, is partly designed to avoid repeating that debacle, which led to the deaths of 18 American soldiers. But it carries enormous risks — including more American casualties, botched airstrikes that kill civilians and the potential for the United States to be drawn even more deeply into a troubled country that so far has stymied all efforts to fix it. The Somalia campaign is a blueprint for warfare that President Obama has embraced and will pass along to his successor. It is a model the United States now employs across the Middle East and North Africa — from Syria to Libya — despite the president’s stated aversion to American “boots on the ground” in the world’s war zones. This year alone, the United States has carried out airstrikes in seven countries and conducted Special Operations missions in many more. American officials said the White House had quietly broadened the president’s authority for the use of force in Somalia by allowing airstrikes to protect American and African troops as they combat fighters from the Shabab, a Somali-based militant group that has proclaimed allegiance to Al Qaeda. In its public announcements, the Pentagon sometimes characterizes the operations as “self-defense strikes,” though some analysts have said this rationale has become a self-fulfilling prophecy. It is only because American forces are now being deployed on the front lines in Somalia that they face imminent threats from the Shabab.

3B) Trump pledges strong U.S. ties with India if elected president

Reuters, Steve Holland, 2016 10 16

Edison, NJ - U.S. Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump pledged that the United States and India would be "best friends" if he is elected and that he would boost intelligence sharing with India in the battle against Islamic militants. Trump spoke at an event sponsored by the Republican Hindu Coalition to raise money for victims of terrorism. It featured Bollywood-style performers who danced in colorful, traditional costumes. "If I'm elected president, the Indian and Hindu community will have a true friend in the White House, that I can guarantee you," said Trump, who noted that as a real estate developer he has two "massive developments" in India. Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi has developed a friendly relationship with President Barack Obama, a Democrat who wants Trump's opponent, Hillary Clinton, to win the Nov. 8 election. "We will defeat radical Islamic terrorism when I'm president. We will stand shoulder to shoulder with India in sharing intelligence and keeping our people safe mutually," said Trump.

4. Biden hints at US cyber revenge on Russia

The Financial Times, 2016 10 16

Washington - US vice-president Joe Biden has suggested the Obama administration may launch a retaliatory cyber strike against Russia in response to what Washington believes to be interference by Moscow in this year's election. In an interview with NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday morning, Mr Biden said that "we're sending a message" to Russian President Vladimir Putin about the election-related hacking. "He'll know it." "We have the capacity to do it. It will be at the time of our choosing, and under the circumstances that have the greatest impact," he told NBC. This week the White House said the US would respond in a "proportional" way to the attempt to interfere in the election and that sanctions and covert action were under consideration. Mr Biden's interview is the clearest hint that the administration will seek to use its own offensive cyber capabilities to retaliate. Asked if the public would ever find out about the nature of the US response, he said: "Hope not." "Their capacity to fundamentally alter the election is not what people think," Mr Biden said. "And I tell you what, to the extent that they do we will be proportional in what we do." The fact Mr Biden is talking so cryptically about US retaliation underlines one of the main difficulties the administration faces in mounting a response. One of the objectives would be to deter Russia or any other country from attempting to use cyber attacks to undermine US elections, yet the deterrent impact of any operation would be limited if it were kept completely secret. Edward Snowden, the former National Security Agency contractor now exiled in Moscow, poked fun at this contradiction, noting on Twitter: "I get the feeling nobody told Joe Biden what 'covert operation' means."

5. Syria talks mired in differing methods

The Washington Post, Carol Morello, 2016 10 16

Lausanne, Switzerland - Talks in Switzerland on stemming the bloodshed in Syria resulted in no breakthrough Saturday, but the discussions did yield a decision to keep seeking ways to achieve a truce and resume negotiations. Secretary of State John F. Kerry, who called the meeting with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and diplomats from seven Middle Eastern countries, characterized the gathering that lasted more than four hours as a brainstorming session that brought some new ideas to the table. However, he declined to specify what those ideas were. No date was set for another meeting of the foreign ministers who took part, but their staffs are expected to continue talking together about possible approaches. Kerry said the diplomats agreed unanimously on the desired outcome: a reduction in fighting, particularly in the besieged city of Aleppo, and an eventual return to U.N.-mediated negotiations in Geneva between the Syrian government and the opposition. "The fights are really over the methods of getting to it," Kerry told reporters. Lavrov offered a similar account of Saturday's meeting to Russian media. "There are some ideas that we discussed today, in a circle of pretty powerful countries, that might affect the situation," he said, as quoted by Russian news agencies.

6. New Syria Talks End Quickly, Giving Little Hope to a Beleaguered Aleppo

The New York Times, Nick Cumming-Bruce, 2016 10 16

Lausanne, Switzerland - Talks among the United States, Russia and critical Middle East states aimed at brokering a new pause in Syria's war broke up after a few hours on Saturday without signs of progress, or a break in the Syrian government's ferocious assault on rebel-held parts of the city of Aleppo. Secretary of State John Kerry began the talks in the Swiss lakeside city of Lausanne, meeting one-on-one with his Russian counterpart, Sergey V. Lavrov. Their 40-minute encounter, described as "businesslike" by a State Department spokesman, John Kirby, came 12 days after Washington suspended bilateral contacts with Moscow and called for a war crimes investigation into Russian actions in Syria. Mr. Kerry and Mr. Lavrov then headed into talks with the foreign ministers from regional powers involved in the conflict, including Iran, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, along with the United Nations mediator, Staffan de Mistura. The diplomats left about four hours later with terse comments that gave away nothing of substance. Before the talks began, both sides had played down prospects of a breakthrough. Mr. Kerry, who was expected to leave Sunday for talks in London with the foreign ministers of Britain, France and Germany, told reporters that discussions with Russia and the Middle East states would resume on Monday. Mr. Lavrov went into the talks saying he would focus on fulfilling an earlier agreement that called for separating Western-backed rebels in Syria from hard-line jihadist groups like the Al Qaeda-linked Nusra Front, which now calls itself the Levant Conquest Front. He emerged from the meetings saying only that the parties had discussed "some ideas" and had agreed to meet in coming days, "expecting certain agreements which would help promote" a settlement, the Itar-Tass news agency reported.

7. The fight for Mosul will test U.S. tactics against Islamic State

The Washington Post, Missy Ryan, 2016 10 16

Washington - When Iraqi forces roll toward the city of Mosul this month, local leaders will have an opportunity to close a painful chapter that began more than two years ago, when retreating army units abandoned the city to the Islamic State. The moment will also mark the culmination of two years of U.S. efforts to build a reliable local fighting force and present a key test of the Obama administration's strategy for defeating the Islamic State, also known as ISIS. The operation in the northern city, where at least a million civilians remain, is expected to be a complicated and potentially lengthy fight as Iraqi troops contend with thick, militant defenses that include improved explosives, mines, tunnels and trenches. "ISIS is going to fight harder for Mosul than it has for other places, because it's a crown jewel," said Jessica Lewis McFate, a scholar at the Institute for the Study of War. The stakes are high not just for Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi, looking for a win that would shore up his political standing, but also for President Obama, who is seeking to deliver a battlefield win in the waning days of his presidency. For the U.S. military, victory in Mosul would be an affirmation of its incrementally expanding role in Iraq, where commanders have overseen a gradual troop buildup and added new elements to the U.S. mission, including lower-level advising and use of attack helicopters that may expose U.S. troops to greater risk. It would also validate the administration's decision to allow militants to dominate Mosul for two years, rather than pushing for an earlier offensive or asking the Iraqi government to permit an American combat role while foreign advisers scrambled to train local units.

8. Biden Hints at U.S. Response to Russia for Cyberattacks Related to Election

The New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 10 16

Washington - Since the Obama administration formally accused Russia about a week ago of trying to interfere in the election, there has been intense speculation about whether President Obama has ordered the National Security Agency to conduct a retaliatory cyberstrike. The strongest hint so far has come from Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr., who either revealed American plans for a strike or engaged in one of the better bits of psychological warfare in recent times. Taping an interview for NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. Biden was asked whether the United States was preparing to send a message to the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin. Days before, the American intelligence agencies and the Department of Homeland Security declared that the Russian leadership was responsible for attacks on the Democratic National Committee and the leaking of stolen emails. "We're sending a message," Mr. Biden told Chuck Todd, the show's host. "We have the capacity to do it." "He'll know it," Mr. Biden added. "And it will be at the time of our choosing. And under the circumstances that have the greatest impact." Later, after Mr. Biden said he was not concerned that Russia could "fundamentally alter the election," Mr. Todd asked whether the American public would know if the message to Mr. Putin had been sent.

9. Putin Syria and why Moscow has gone war-crazy

New Yorker, Joshua Yaffa, 2016 10 16

Commentary: A viewer of Russian television this week could be forgiven for thinking that the end of the world was imminent, and that it would arrive in the form of grand superpower war with the United States, culminating in a suicidal exchange of nuclear weapons. On one day alone, three separate test firings of intercontinental ballistic missiles were broadcast on state media: two by submarine, one from a launch pad in the Far East. Last weekend, NTV, a channel under effective state control, aired a segment on emergency preparedness that included a tour of a Cold War-era bomb shelter, fortified in case of atomic war, and a mention of the municipal loudspeakers that will sound upon the arrival of "Hour X." On Sunday, Dmitry Kiselev, the most bombastic and colorful of Kremlin propagandists, warned on his weekly newsmagazine show that "impudent behavior" toward Russia may have "nuclear" consequences. Grievances against the West and predictions of militaristic doom are not new in Russia—they have run through all sixteen years of Vladimir Putin's rule. But they took on a heightened intensity in early 2014, after Russia's intervention in Ukraine and the U.S. sanctions that followed. Suddenly the question of war was in the air in Moscow. If nothing else, the spectre of a conflict with Washington served as retroactive justification for the Kremlin's policies, and a ready-made excuse for why the Russian economy had sunk into recession. At home, Russia's ostracization was spun as a sign of its righteousness. The war in Syria, however, was supposed to offer Russia a chance to rehabilitate its image and re-start relations with the United States. Last year, Putin travelled to New York, where he addressed the United Nations and called for "a genuinely broad international coalition" to fight the Islamic State.

10. Kansas Terrorists Wanted Anti-Muslim Attack to End in "Bloodbath"

Slate.com, Daniel Politi, 2016 10 16

Wichita - They called themselves the "Crusaders" and had a clear purpose: launch an attack against Muslims that would lead to a "bloodbath." With any luck that would help spark a religious war. But their plans were thwarted as three Kansas men were arrested on Friday for planning an attack on a Garden City, Kansas apartment complex filled with Somali immigrants that is also home to a mosque. They planned to carry out the attack one day after the November election. "They discussed obtaining four vehicles, filling them with explosives and parking them at the four corners of the apartment complex to create a large explosion," the Department of Justice said. "They chose the target location based on their hatred of these groups, their perception that these groups represent a threat to American society, a desire to inspire other militia groups, and a desire to 'wake people up,'" according to the criminal complaint. Around 120 people live and worship in the apartment complex they planned to attack. The three men — Curtis Allen and Gavin Wright, both 49, and Patrick Eugene Stein, 47 — were charged in federal court with domestic terrorism following an eight-month investigation by the FBI that included a confidential informant. But police didn't move to make the arrests until Allen's girlfriend went to authorities after he allegedly hit her during an argument. She apparently showed authorities a large stash of weapons and said Allen was watching lots of videos on how to make explosives.

11. Chinese link as smart meters spook GCHQ

The Sunday Times, Jon Ungoed-Thomas, 2016 10 16

London - Chinese electronic companies are manufacturing smart meters to install in millions of Britain's homes despite warnings by the intelligence agency GCHQ that the technology poses a potential threat to national security. Two of China's biggest electronics companies — one controlled by the Beijing government — are providing some of the meters and software for the £11bn programme to install the technology in almost every home in the UK by 2020. One has already signed a deal with one of the "big six" energy companies and the other has been on an official list for trials. The vetting of the Chinese manufacturers is set to be among the first tasks of the National Cyber Security Centre (NCSC), which opened in London earlier this month. Nigel Inkster, a former director of operations and intelligence at MI6, said it was important the role of any Chinese firm was subject to a proper risk assessment. "A Chinese corporation is always going to have to do what the state tells it when the crunch comes, although these corporations really do want to be proper international corporations and operate on this basis," he said. Experts have expressed concern that the meters — which communicate wirelessly with energy companies — feature a switch that can be used to remotely turn off power, potentially blacking out homes and risking dangerous electricity surges at power stations. Meters made by Holley Metering UK, whose parent company is Chinese, and Kaifa Technology UK, which is controlled by the state-owned China Electronics Corporation, are being tested by one of the main government contractors for the UK project. It was reported earlier this year that GCHQ had intervened in the project to ensure the encryption keys for the meters could not be broken. All key products for the meter rollout will undergo product assurance by the NCSC. The Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy said the smart system was secure and it had been designed by cyber-security experts to prevent the possibility of hacking. Security officials say the Chinese meters will not be subject to any more stringent testing, but would need to meet robust security standards to protect the national grid.

12. Jailed jihadists 'aided' capture of warder

The Sunday Times, Richard Kerbaj, 2016 10 16

London – Two of the Islamist terrorists behind the liquid bomb plot to blow up planes as they crossed the Atlantic are suspected of helping to orchestrate the abduction of a guard at one of Britain's top security prisons. Internal documents from the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) identify Assad Sarwar and Tanvir Hussain as playing a "supportive" role in the plan to take Richard Thompson hostage at Full Sutton prison in East Yorkshire in May 2013. Fellow inmates Feroz Khan, Fuad Awale and David Watson, who were each serving life sentences for murder, seized Thompson four days after the murder of Fusilier Lee Rigby in Woolwich, southeast London, by two Muslim extremists. A threat was made to kill the officer unless Roshonara Choudhry, an Islamist jailed for the attempted murder of Labour MP Stephen Timms in 2010, and Abu Qatada, a firebrand cleric who was in custody in the UK at the time but later extradited to Jordan, were released. At one point, Awale pointed a sharp weapon at Thompson's throat and said: "Stop struggling, I've killed two people [before]. I'll kill you."

13. Home Office gives visas to IS supporters

The Sunday Mirror, Gethin Chamberlain, 2016 10 16

London – A group which defended Isis executioner Jihadi John has been licensed by the Home Office to bring foreign workers into the UK. Advocacy organisation CAGE can sponsor full working visas, which run for up to three years, despite Tory pledges to crack down on immigration. The group sparked outrage last year by claiming mass beheader Jihadi John - unmasked as Kuwaiti-born Briton Mohammed Emwazi

- was a "beautiful young man who wouldn't hurt a fly". London-based CAGE is one of 30,000 companies and organisations licensed by the Government to bring in overseas workers to fill jobs. A recent addition to the official register is the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification, aka controversial religious cult the Moonies. Last week Home Secretary Amber Rudd found herself at the centre of a storm after announcing plans to crack down on immigration and had to backtrack on threats to make companies list the number of foreign workers they employed.

14. Webcam blackmail terror (Canada)

The Sunday Mirror, Jilly Beattie, 2016 10 16

London – The PSNI is investigating 100 webcam blackmail attempts and say cyberstalking is increasing in Northern Ireland. The crime usually involves people being persuaded to take off their clothes in front of their webcam. But the blackmailer only tells them they have been recorded after the event and threatens to post the video online or reveal details to people known to the victim unless they pay a fee. PSNI cyber crime officers are dealing with new webcam blackmail cases "every week". A spokesman said: "Cyberstalking is becoming a prevalent issue. So far there have been 100 webcam blackmails reported." Parents were warned a Canadian pervert pretended to be a teenage girl to target thousands of boys. The money demanded is usually a substantial amount and increases with the level of intimacy revealed by the victim, many of whom have been enticed into performing intimate acts. A spokesman for Get Safe Online said there is no guarantee once the blackmail demand is met there will not be further demands, or that the criminal will not post the video anyway.

15. Turnbull drawn into Brandis brawl

The Age, Michaela Whitbourn, 2016 10 16

Canberra - Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has been drawn into a deepening row between the country's two most senior lawyers after he was asked to confirm the government's chief legal adviser ticked off on a controversial bill allowing terrorists to be held in jail beyond their sentence. Labor wrote to Mr Turnbull late on Sunday seeking his assurance the opinion of Solicitor-General Justin Gleeson, SC, was sought on the bill, which the government had hoped to pass through Parliament before the end of the year. Mr Gleeson is locked in a public brawl with Attorney-General George Brandis over a legally binding directive Senator Brandis issued before the July 2 election, which prevents ministers seeking Mr Gleeson's advice without the written approval of the Attorney-General. Legal experts have expressed concern the directive may result in the Solicitor-General, who provides independent advice, being "frozen out" of advising the government and allow the Attorney-General to "shop around" for opinions regarded as politically convenient. Shadow attorney-general Mark Dreyfus said in the letter to Mr Turnbull that he considered it of "great importance to know whether Mr Gleeson has been offered the opportunity to advise on this bill".

He stated that the security forces continue their offensives against insurgents in parts of the province. "Security forces have launched several military operations on Sunday night in Lashkargah [city] where over 88 militants were killed and many villages were cleared of Taliban," he added.

17. 94 ASG terrorists neutralized so far in ongoing gov't offensive

Agence France Presse, 2016 10 16

Manila - An estimated 94 Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG) terrorists were "neutralized" since the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) started its offensive against the brigands in Basilan and Sulu last August. "In view of President Rodrigo Duterte's resolve to neutralize the Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG), the AFP embarked on 579 massive focused military operations 426 of which were meant to end the atrocity and notoriety of these bandits and allied terrorist groups," AFP chief-of-staff Gen. Ricardo Visaya said. The government offensive started last Aug. 25 shortly after the bandits beheaded 18-year-old Patrick Almodavar due to the victim's failure to pay the PHP1 million ransom. The operations led to 54 armed engagements resulting to the neutralization of 94 ASG bandits of which 56 were killed, 21 surrendered, and 17 captured, he added. Key ASG leaders Nelson Muktadil, Braun Muktadil, and sub-leader Mohammad Said were among the terrorists killed and, with bodies recovered in intense combat and ensuing search and retrieval operations.

18. Issue of N.K. overseas workers could be included in new U.N. resolution: sources

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 16

Seoul - The issue of North Korea's overseas workers, who are believed to work in dismal conditions, might be included in a human rights resolution by the United Nations in December for the first time, sources said Sunday. South Korea, the United States and Japan are said to be working together to mention in the resolution their dire working conditions, such as long working hours and restrictions on their physical movement. On top of human rights violations, another concern is that part of the money they send back home is suspected to flow into the regime to develop weapons of mass destruction (WMD), including its nuclear program. Last month, Willy Fautre from Human Rights Without Borders estimated around 50,000 North Koreans work in 16 countries that annually send US$1.2-2.3 billion back home. Another estimate said there are more than 100,000 North Koreans working overseas.

19. Japanese abductee possibly hospitalized in Pyongyang

Kyodo News, 2016 10 16

Seoul - A Japanese woman believed to have been kidnapped by North Korea decades ago has been admitted to a Red Cross hospital in the capital Pyongyang, a support group for relatives of South Korean abductees revealed Saturday. Kyoko Matsumoto is possibly suffering from severe vision impairment and complications arising from gout, according to the head of the support group, Choi Seong Ryong, citing a source versed in the situation in Pyongyang. Details of her life in North Korea since her abduction were also revealed. Matsumoto, from Yonago, Tottori Prefecture, was 29 at the time of her disappearance in 1977. According to Choi, the State Security Department, the North's secret police organization, is supervising Matsumoto's affairs. In July 2013, South Korea's National Intelligence Service released an analysis that said Matsumoto was in 2011 relocated from the northeastern city of Chongjin, where she had lived for several years, to the North Korean capital.

20. North Korean Missile Tested Again but Fails, South Says

The New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 10 16

Seoul - North Korea launched an intermediate-range ballistic missile, but the test failed as the projectile exploded shortly after liftoff, the South Korean military said on Sunday. The North's Hwasong-10 missile, also known as the Musudan, took off at 12:33 p.m. on Saturday near an airfield in the northwestern city of Kusong, the South said in a statement. The test was the first involving the Hwasong-10 since North Korea successfully launched the same missile in June. North Korea has had a spotty record with Hwasong-10 test flights. The June launch was the first successful test after five failures. The projectile flew about 250 miles over the sea between North Korea and Japan, reaching an altitude of 878 miles. That test alarmed the United States and its allies in the region. Their defense officials said the missile's launch at a sharp angle prevented it from falling too close to Japan but still demonstrated its potential to reach an estimated range of more than 2,000 miles. The Hwasong-10 is the North's only tested missile with a range long enough to reach American military bases in Guam in the Pacific, and in South Korea and Japan. After the June test, the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-un, boasted that his country had the capability to strike those bases. But the failure on Saturday indicated that North Korea has yet to perfect its Hwasong-10 system.

21. Abu man nabbed in Zamboanga Sibugay

The Philippine Star, Roel Pareño, 2016 10 16

Zamboanga City - Government security forces arrested an alleged member of the Abu Sayyaf bandit group during an operation in Imelda, Zamboanga Sibugay on Friday. Marajol Taulani, alias Joel Gonzaga, was said to be a top drug trafficker and wanted for mass murder, according to Superintendent Rogelio Alabata, spokesman for the Police Regional Office 9. Taulani was arrested by a joint team of the police intelligence operatives, Zamboanga Sibugay police and troopers of the Army's 44th Infantry Battalion at around 4 p.m. in Barangay Poblacion. Alabata said Taulani faces seven arrest warrants for kidnapping with serious illegal detention issued by Basilan Judge Leo Jay Principe. He said Taulani was among the bandits tagged in the kidnapping of 15 farm workers in Barangay Tairan, Lantawan in 2001.

22. India's PM urges BRICS to unite efforts in anti-terror fight

TASS World Service, 2016 10 16

Mumbai - Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi has called on the BRICS countries (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa) to unite efforts in the fight against terrorism. Speaking at the plenary session of the BRICS summit, Modi said: "In the world we inhabit today, security and counter-terrorism cooperation are essential. Its reach is now global. It has grown more lethal and adept at the use of technology." "Our response to terrorism must, therefore, be nothing less than comprehensive. And, we need to act both individually and collectively," the prime minister stressed.

23. Ceasefire, Separation of Terrorist Groups Main Pivots of Lausanne Talks

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 16

Tehran - Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister for Arab and African Affairs Hossein Jaber Ansari announced that Tehran and other countries which participated in the Lausanne Saturday meeting on Syria mainly focused on ceasefire and separation of terrorists from the so-called moderate groups. "The talks were specially focused on the recent ceasefire agreement between the US and Russia and its violation and the main elements which violated it, that is discerning the terrorist groups, specially al-Nusra (currently known as Fatah al-Sham Front) and the ISIL from other Syrian groups," Jaber Ansari said on Sunday after the Iran, the US, Russia, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Turkey held a meeting on Syria. Noting that sending humanitarian aid to the people in Aleppo and other parts of Syria was another issue discussed in the Lausanne meeting, he said, "Less talks were held on the political aspects of the crisis in Syria and the country's future but it was generally agreed that talks would continue among the negotiating sides as soon as possible." Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Ryabkov cautioned earlier this month that the US is not keen to fight the Al-Nusra Front terrorist group (that has recently changed name to Fatah Al-Sham Front) in Syria.

24. Syrian rebels seize symbolically important Dabiq from Islamic State

Reuters News, 2016 10 16

Beirut - Syrian rebels backed by Turkey captured the symbolically important village of Dabiq in northwestern Syria from Islamic State early on Sunday after clashes, Ahmed Osman, head of the Sultan Murad rebel group and a war monitor said. The rebels also captured Dabiq's neighbouring village of Soran, Osman and the Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said. Dabiq is named in an apocalyptic Islamic prophesy as the site of a final battle between Muslims and infidels. (Full Report)

25. Iraqi army drops leaflets over Mosul in preparation for offensive

Reuters News, 2016 10 16

Baghdad - The Iraqi army dropped tens of thousands of leaflets over Mosul before dawn on Sunday, warning residents that an offensive to recapture their city from Islamic State was in its final stages of preparation, according to a military statement in Baghdad. The leaflets carried several messages, one of them assuring the population that advancing army units and air strikes "will not target civilians" and another telling them to avoid known locations of Islamic State militants. The assault on Mosul, the last city still under control of the ultra-hardline Islamic State in Iraq, could begin this month, according to Iraqi government and military officials. Islamic State fighters are dug in, expected to fight hard and have a history of forcing civilians to stay in harm's way during previous battles to defend territory. Reflecting the authorities' concerns over a mass exodus that would complicate the offensive, the leaflets told residents "to stay at home and not to believe rumours spread by Daesh" to cause panic, referring to Islamic State by its Arabic acronym.

26. Putin to Kremlin journalists: US is watching you

Moscow - Russian President Vladimir Putin has told journalists in the Russian press corps that they are possibly being watched by American intelligence agencies. Putin made the comments Sunday in

27. All talks participants agreed Syrians must decide own future: Russia

Reuters News, 2016 10 16

Moscow - Russia said all participants in talks in Lausanne had agreed Syrians should decide their own future through inclusive dialogue and that the country should remain whole and secular, after the meeting ended without a breakthrough. Russia's Foreign Ministry said on Sunday that in order for a U.S.-Russian ceasefire agreement to succeed and to facilitate humanitarian aid deliveries, Syria's moderate opposition must separate from Jabhat Fatah al Sham, previously known as the Nusra Front, and other "terrorist groups" affiliated with it. "At the same time, it should be understood that operations against terrorists of Islamic State and the Nusra Front will be continued," the ministry said. Saturday's talks, convened by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry in the Swiss city, failed to agree on a common strategy with Russia to end the conflict in Syria, now in its sixth year. Kerry hosted Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and seven foreign ministers from the region - from Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Qatar, Jordan and Egypt - weeks after the collapse of a painstakingly crafted U.S.-Russian ceasefire plan that many saw as the last hope for peace this year.

28. Saudi replaces Iraq envoy who riled Shi'ite militias

Reuters, 2016 10 16

Doha - Saudi Arabia on Sunday replaced its envoy to Iraq whose comments about Iranian involvement in Iraqi affairs led to diplomatic tension with Baghdad. Thamer al-Sabhan in 2015 became the first Saudi ambassador to be posted to Iraq since the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait - an appointment which was seen as heralding closer cooperation in the fight against Islamic State militants in Iraq, Syria and Saudi Arabia. But in August Iraq asked Riyadh to replace Sabhan after his comments about Iranian involvement in Iraqi affairs and the alleged persecution of Sunni Muslims angered local Shi'ite Muslim politicians and militia leaders. Sabhan was appointed minister for Arab Gulf Affairs, a newly created position, according to state news agency SPA.

29. U.S.-backed, Saudi-led coalition found responsible for Yemen funeral attack that killed more than 100

Washington Post, Sudarsan Raghavan, 2016 10 16

Cairo - A Saudi Arabia-led investigation into an airstrike last week on a Yemeni funeral has concluded that Saudi-led coalition jets "wrongly" bombed the ceremony, killing more than 100 people, after receiving faulty information and not following proper procedures. In a statement Saturday, the Joint Incidents Assessment Team based in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, said that "a party affiliated" with the chief of staff of Yemen's president, Abed Rabbo Mansour Hadi, "wrongly passed information that there was a gathering of" armed rebel Houthi leaders in the Yemeni capital, Sanaa, on Oct. 8. The party, the investigators said, "insisted that the location be targeted immediately as a legitimate military target." But the coalition's air operations center ordered the attack "without obtaining approval from the Coalition command to support legitimacy and without following the Coalition command's precautionary measures to ensure that the location is not a civilian one that may not be targeted," the statement said. A coalition aircraft then "carried out the mission."

30. Saudi-Led Coalition Says It Bombed Yemen Funeral Based on False Information

The New York Times, Ben Hubbard, 2016 10 16

Beirut - A Saudi-led military coalition involved in Yemen's war acknowledged on Saturday that one of its jets carried out an attack on a funeral this month in the Yemeni capital, Sana, that killed more than 100 people and wounded hundreds of others. The strikes, which hit Sana's fanciest reception hall while the prominent family of a rebel official was receiving condolences, were delivered on the basis of "false information," provided by Yemeni officials, that indicated the presence of armed rebel leaders at the site, according to a statement given by a coalition investigative body and published by the Saudi state news agency. The attack was one of the deadliest of Yemen's war and led the United States to announce "an immediate review" of its support for the Saudi-led coalition that is bombing Yemen's rebels. It has also led to renewed calls from human rights organizations and some American lawmakers for the United States to halt or delay weapons sales to Saudi Arabia and its allies. Human Rights Watch, in a report on the attack, called it "an apparent war crime" and "unlawfully disproportionate." Yemeni medical officials said after the attack that more than 100 people had been killed, while the United Nations put the death toll at more than 140. Secretary of State John Kerry said on Saturday that Houthi rebels in Yemen had released two United States citizens as part of an arrangement that including airlifts of Yemenis wounded in the funeral attack, The Associated Press reported. Mr. Kerry did not identify the Americans.

31. US Navy investigates possible missile fire from Yemen

The Associated Press, Jon Gambrell, 2016 10 16

Dubai - The U.S. Navy on Sunday began investigating a possible overnight missile attack from Yemen on a group of American warships in the Red Sea amid uncertainty about what transpired. The Red Sea and the nearby strategic Bab el-Mandeb strait, a crucial chokepoint for international shipping and crude oil, has been the scene of what the U.S. describes as at least two missile attacks from rebel-held territory in Yemen. American forces have fired back once with Tomahawk missiles, destroying mobile radar positions in the first shots fired by the U.S. in anger in the stalemated conflict. In the latest incident, a group of American warships in the Red Sea on Saturday night "had indications of a possible inbound missile threat and deployed appropriate defensive measures," said Capt. Paula Dunn, a spokeswoman for U.S. Navy Forces Central Command. She said in a statement that all ships and sailors were safe, without elaborating. An American defence official told The Associated Press on Sunday that one of the ships saw on radar what sailors believed to be missiles being fired on it out of Yemen at night. The official spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss details of the incident not yet made public.

32. Les contrôles en Suisse réduisent les allers-retours de djihadistes

Agence Télégraphique Suisse, 2016 10 16

Les aspirants suisses au djihad sont beaucoup moins nombreux à tenter de rejoindre l'Etat islamique (EI). L'organisation a perdu en éclat et l'intensification des contrôles fait ses preuves, assure le directeur du service de renseignement Markus Seiler. Depuis six mois, presque plus personne ne tente de rallier l'EI depuis la Suisse, précise M. Seiler dans une interview aux journaux alémaniques Landbote et Berner Zeitung parue samedi. Les contrôles, qui ont été renforcés, rendent aujourd'hui plus difficile le voyage vers les régions de crise, poursuit-il. "L'EI a bien perdu en éclat, mais nous ne constatons pas non plus de retours au pays pour autant", selon le chef du service de renseignement (SRC). Ce dernier demeure toutefois attentif à l'éventuelle arrivée de suspects, souligne-t-il. D'après Markus Seiler, le SRC dénombre toujours 77 personnes ayant quitté la Suisse pour les zones de conflit au Moyen-Orient avec comme motif le djihad. Une vingtaine d'entre elles ont perdu la vie, dont 14 décès confirmés. M. Seiler ne sous-estime pas le risque de trouver des djihadistes parmi les réfugiés accueillis en Suisse. Les terroristes ne s'infiltreraient habituellement pas de cette manière, mais il peut toujours y avoir des exceptions. Le Secrétariat d'Etat aux migrations (SEM) a fourni des milliers de noms au SRC, qui a procédé à des contrôles.

33. Menaces d'attentat: un couple de jeunes radicalisés mis en examen et écroué

Agence France Presse, 2016 10 16

Paris - Un jeune homme de 21 ans et sa petite amie mineure de 17 ans ont été mis en examen à Paris et écroués, soupçonnés de vouloir commettre une attaque jihadiste en France, a-t-on appris samedi de source judiciaire. Présentés vendredi à un juge antiterroriste, ils ont été mis en examen pour association de malfaiteurs terroriste criminelle et placés en détention provisoire. Les investigations ont mis en évidence des liens avec Rachid Kassim, un propagandiste du groupe Etat islamique soupçonné de téléguider des attentats en France depuis la zone irako-syrienne, via la messagerie cryptée Telegram. La section antiterroriste du parquet de Paris avait ouvert au début du mois une enquête sur ce couple sans emploi. La Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) était en possession de renseignements évoquant des suspicions de passage à l'acte, selon une source proche de l'enquête. Le couple, converti à l'islam, a été interpellé mardi à Noisy-le-Sec (Seine-Saint-Denis), en banlieue parisienne. Devant les enquêteurs, la jeune fille, enceinte de son compagnon, a expliqué qu'elle ne pouvait pas passer à l'acte du fait de sa grossesse, a expliqué la même source. Elle s'était convertie à l'âge de 15 ans, sous l'influence de son petit ami.

34. EU leaders to hold talks on Russian political meddling

The Financial Times, Arthur Beesley, 2016 10 16

Brussels - EU leaders are to discuss covert Russian funding of far-right and fringe parties in Europe in light of intelligence findings that show that Moscow is interfering in European domestic politics. Amid deteriorating relations with President Vladimir Putin over Russia's bombing of Syria, concerns that the Kremlin is meddling in national politics in Europe will be discussed at this week's EU summit in Brussels. The EU debate on Russia, scheduled months ago, comes a fortnight after Washington accused Moscow of interfering in the US presidential election by directing cyber attacks on American politicians and parties. Citing growing anxiety in Europe about Russian financial support for far-right and populist movements, senior EU diplomats told the FT that the intelligence agencies of "several" countries had stepped up scrutiny of possible links with Moscow. For security and political reasons, intelligence findings are not centrally shared between European member states. But a senior diplomat involved in preparations for the talks in Brussels said there was evidence in some cases to substantiate suspicions of Russian involvement. "It's a serious concern. It becomes an existential concern," the diplomat said. "It's all about situational awareness. We don't have the tools to look centrally." EU leaders will discuss all aspects of Europe's relationship with Russia at a private dinner on Thursday, the part of their regular two-day summit meetings traditionally reserved for the most sensitive discussions.

35. Syrian bombing suspect in Germany spoke to ISIS about attack plans

Reuters, 2016 10 16

Berlin - A Syrian refugee arrested on suspicion of planning a major attack in Berlin spoke to a member of ISIS in Syria by telephone about a possible target a day before German police discovered explosives in his apartment, a newspaper reported on Saturday. Jaber Albakr was detained on Monday, two days after police discovered about 1.5 kg of explosives in his apartment. He was found dead in prison on Wednesday. Authorities said he had committed suicide. Germany's Welt am Sonntag (WamS) cited investigation sources as saying US intelligence had provided a tip-off about Albakr after tapping several phone calls between him and an ISIS member in Syria. During the calls, 22-year-old Albakr spoke about his attack plans, the newspaper said. In a call on Oct. 7, Albakr told his contact that 2 kg of explosives were ready and he named a possible target, saying a "big airport in Berlin" was "better than trains", WamS reported. In July, the militant group claimed responsibility for two attacks in the German state of Bavaria - one on a train near Wuerzburg and the other at a music festival in Ansbach that wounded 20 people. WamS said federal prosecutors investigating the case assumed that Albakr wanted to make a vest packed with explosives for an attack.

36. German bomb plotter 'was in Syria two months ago'

The Local.de, 2016 10 16

Berlin - A bomb plot suspect found hanged in his cell in Germany was in Syria two months earlier with a group of Islamists, his brother said in an interview published Saturday. The suspect, Jaber al-Bakr, arrived in Germany from Syria in 2015 and gained refugee status, but returned to Syria earlier this year, his brother Alaa al-Bakr told the German daily Die Welt. "The last time that we spoke was two months ago, he was in Idlib (northwest Syria). He told me then that he was very angry and sad because of the war," he told the paper from his house in the Damascus region. He said his brother, 22, was involved in "humanitarian aid" with the hardline Islamist Ahrar al-Sham rebel group in Syria, a rival to the Islamic State (IS) group. Jaber al-Bakr may have joined IS, although he believed the group "did not represent Islam," Alaa al-Bakr said. He said his brother was radicalised in Germany and may have been influenced by a Muslim leader or a mosque in Berlin or near Berlin. He also told Die Welt he did not believe his brother committed suicide in prison. "I'm sure it was the police who killed him," he said. Jaber al-Bakr was arrested in the city of Leipzig late on Sunday after a manhunt that began some 48 hours earlier when police raided his apartment and found explosives.

37. Islamic State flag is legal in Sweden, prosecutor rules

The Local.se, 2016 10 16

Stockholm - A Swedish prosecutor has ruled that the ISIS flag does not constitute hate speech and is therefore legal under Swedish law. Prosecutor Gisela Sjövall announced last week that she would not prosecute a 23-year-old man who had posted the black ISIS flag on his Facebook page in June. Police in Laholm, a town on Sweden's west coast, had launched a criminal investigation into the man, who comes originally from Syria, on suspicion of committing "hate speech". "Put simply, one can say that he is expressing contempt for "all others", and not against a specific ethnic group," Sjövall told Sweden's SVT broadcaster. She said that while the swastika had now come to symbolise a hatred for Jews, the same could not yet be said of the IS flag. "Up until now, we haven't come to that point," she told the local Hallandsposten newspaper. "That could change in ten years." According to Sweden's hate speech laws, for an image or statement to represent "incitement to hatred", it needs to threaten or disparage a group of persons in connection to race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religious belief or sexual orientation.

38. Suspected suicide bomber kills three police in southern Turkey-sources

Reuters News, 2016 10 16

Istanbul - A suspected suicide bomber killed three police officers and wounded at least eight people in the southern Turkish city of Gaziantep on Sunday during a police raid on what was thought to be an Islamic State safehouse, security sources and medics said. Police pursued a vehicle believed to be carrying explosives to the house, where a group of Syrian nationals were thought to be sheltering, and raided it, the security sources said. Gaziantep lies around 40 km (25 miles) from the Syrian border. Four of those wounded were Syrians while some of the others were police officers, hospital sources said.

39. Killing of Migrant Forces France to Confront Treatment of Chinese

The New York Times, Martin De Bourmont, 2016 10 16

Aubersbilliers, France - A Chinese tailor, Zhang Chaolin, emigrated to France with his wife and two sons in 2006 in search of a better life. They settled in Aubervilliers, a working-class suburb of Paris, where a decade of striving finally put that life within reach. His sons, now in their 20s, work and have their own families. Last year, the younger son had his first child, making Mr. Zhang a grandfather. But those dreams of stability came to an abrupt end this year under a pleasant August sun. A group of young men, barely old enough to drive, assaulted Mr. Zhang, who was 49, as he walked in Aubervilliers with two friends he had known since childhood. Shouting racist slurs, the youths took a small bag from one of the men, and savagely beat them, leaving Mr. Zhang and his friends crumpled and bloodied on the sidewalk. The bag contained only candy and cigarettes. Mr. Zhang died five days later. The death was the culmination of months, even years, of racial tensions in Paris and its suburbs that intensified this summer, fueled by long-held stereotypes of the Chinese as weak yet unusually successful residents of economically disadvantaged, immigrant-heavy suburbs. Often the tensions stem from rivalries between immigrant groups themselves. While the death surprised few Franco-Asians, it did reveal a volatile racial landscape in France that is far more complex than the country's French majority and large Muslim minority, whose struggle for integration has received the most attention.

40. Turkish backed Syrian opposition captures Dabiq from IS

The Associated Press, Philip Issa, 2016 10 16

Beirut - Turkish-backed Syrian opposition forces have captured the symbolically significant town of Dabiq from the Islamic State group, the factions said Sunday morning. A commander of the Syrian opposition Hamza Brigade said Islamic State fighters put up "minimal" resistance to defend the northern Syrian town before withdrawing in the direction of the much larger IS-held town of al-Bab to the south. Saif Abu Bakr said some 2,000 opposition fighters pushed into Dabiq with tank and artillery support from the Turkish army. The commander said the extremists left the town heavily mined. Both Turkish and international coalition warplanes conducted airstrikes on Dabiq and nearby Arshak, the Turkish state-run Anadolu news agency reported.

1. Some of Canada's terrorism response has gone too far

Ottawa Citizen, Scott Reid, 2016 10 22

OpEd: Two years ago Parliament Hill was stormed by a gunman - and since then we've done too much about it. I apologize if that sounds glib or disrespectful. Certainly, that's not the intention. I'm among the many Canadians who will take time this weekend to remember Cpl. Nathan Cirillo's senseless murder. I'll think of his son, who has been growing up without a father. I'll recall Kevin Vickers' heroism and wonder about the lingering effects that must come from taking a man's life - even in defence of other lives. And I'll consider the many changes in Hill security that have been implemented since the day that gunfire rang through halls that should never be filled with anything more menacing than debate. But I'll also think about the mistakes that were made in the shadow of that attack - the way in which our federal government ignored wise counsel from many quarters and dangerously rebalanced the framework governing national security. Bill C-51 was introduced a mere three months after Michael Zehaf-Bibeau launched his lone-wolf assault - and, in that still highly charged atmosphere, the new measures drew immediate scrutiny. Every single privacy commissioner in the country expressed their disapproval. More than 100 law professors urged a rethink of the bill's approach on everything from the criminalization of legitimate expression to a more interventionist mandate for CSIS. Four former prime ministers - Conservatives and Liberals - argued for strengthened oversight to check state power. All to little effect. Bill C-51, after some amendments, was passed into law in June 2015 - accompanied by a frustrating argument over whether or not to label the attack on Parliament Hill an act of terrorism, as though that would make anyone less dead or more secure.

2. Progress made on security, civil rights

Ottawa Citizen, Michel Picard, 2016 10 22

Letter to the Editor Re: Security and our civil rights, Oct. 21.

I would like to respectfully respond to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association's recent op-ed on security and rights to clarify several points that could cause confusion. This is especially important while the government is consulting on Canada's national security framework. I have hosted eight such town halls that fostered broad, powerful debate from diverse perspectives. Many more are to come. These consultations are about more than the flawed Bill C-51. They are an opportunity for Canadians decide what is required to best guarantee their safety and, at the same time, protect their rights and freedom. Our government is committed to ensuring all Canadian Security and Intelligence Service warrants respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a commitment that was, in fact, reaffirmed on page two of the consultation Green Paper. The O'Connor Inquiry recommendations (in the case of Maher Arar) have been implemented, including the proper consideration of human rights issues before information is shared. A recent evaluation by CSIS's review body found this informationsharing is being managed appropriately. And the RCMP's review body is currently reviewing its procedures. (Note: Michel Picard is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Safety)

3. Terrorism investigations tax RCMP's ability to fight Canada's organized crime

The Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 10 22

Ottawa - The number of RCMP wiretaps on organized-crime groups is plummeting sharply as the force shifts its detectives to the fight against terrorism, according to statistics analyzed by The Globe and Mail.

In its federal policing role, the RCMP essentially has two major business lines - chasing mobsters and chasing terrorists. The priority the Mounties give to each of the two files has always been an issue, but the balance clearly shifted after the attack on Parliament Hill two years ago. The RCMP has moved hundreds of officers from organized-crime probes to terrorism investigations in a bid to track suspected sympathizers of the Islamic State. This may come at a cost to other important RCMP missions, such as stopping human trafficking, getting guns off the street and curbing trade in illicit drugs such as fentanyl. A spokeswoman for the police force does not dispute that a significant shift has taken place. "The decrease in RCMP wiretap applications for serious and organized-crime investigations in the past year can partially be attributed to the shifting of a number of federal-policing resources to national-security criminal investigations," Corporal Annie Delisle said in an e-mailed response to Globe questions. Her e-mail added that the RCMP "prioritizes its investigations based on threat and risk to public safety and remains committed to fighting organized crime."

4. Legacy of terror

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Potter, 2016 10 22

OpEd: It was two years ago today that Michael Zehaf-Bibeau drove up to the National War Memorial, hopped out, then ran over and shot ceremonial guardsman Cpl. Nathan Cirillo in the back. Zehaf-Bibeau then stormed Parliament Hill, and died cowering behind a pillar in Centre Block. Shocking as the attack was, it would be a stretch to say that anyone in the parliamentary precinct was all that surprised. Just one month earlier, a spokesman for ISIL named Abu Muhammad al-Adnani had called on its supporters to target Canadian civilians, along with Americans, Australians, French and other members of the U.S.-led alliance that was forming to defeat the radical Islamist group. Since Zehaf-Bibeau's mad dash came only two days after Martin Couture-Rouleau rammed his car into two members of the Canadian military in a parking lot, killing Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent, it was hard not to conclude that some sort of organized, ISIL-inspired terrorist plot was underway. But when the dust settled, it was clear there was no real connection between the two killings. Perhaps they were both vaguely inspired by ISIL's call to action. We still have no idea how Zehaf-Bibeau became radicalized and what finally motivated him to act. That winter the authorities successfully disrupted a "terror cluster" in Ottawa, and this past August an ISIL sympathizer named Aaron Driver was killed by the RCMP in Strathroy, Ont., while on the verge of committing a terrorist act. But, truth be told, over the past two years there has been very little to indicate that there is any sustained or growing terrorist threat in Canada. What little there is tends to be of the lone-wolf variety: oneoff attempts by social outcasts who have latched on to a pidgin Islam as a vehicle for their alienation.

5. Keeping canada's parliament safe

Ottawa Citizen, Ian Macleod, 2016 10 22

Ottawa - Michael Zehaf-Bibeau should not have been able to get into his car after gunning down Cpl. Nathan Cirillo at the National War Memorial. He should not have been able to drive a short distance along Wellington Street. He shouldn't have gotten past the Parliament Hill gate openly carrying a rifle. He shouldn't have been able to hijack an idling ministerial car. He shouldn't have gotten into Centre Block and he sure shouldn't have gotten down the Hall of Honour and to within 40 metres of the prime minister attending a caucus meeting. Ironically, Stephen Harper and Tory MPs that morning had been discussing legislating new anti-terrorism powers, what would soon become Bill C-51. The failure to stop an amateur terrorist, armed with an old leveraction rifle, a handful of bullets and a knife, was stunning. Once in the Hall of Honour, Zehaf-Bibeau was quickly felled by some of the 56 bullets fired by police and parliamentary guards. Their actions were exemplary, even heroic. But the archaic and disjointed system under which they operated created a dangerous opportunity Zehaf-Bibeau unwittingly exploited. Parliament Hill doesn't look much different today. Tourists pose for photos by the Centennial Flame, antiabortion crusaders, gay marriage protesters, school kids, yogis and Falun Gong pamphleteers are out in force.

6. Trudeau shakes up top ranks with more young blood

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 10 22

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau shook up the senior ranks of Canada's public service with another sweep of promotions for younger executives who are poised to take over as the leaders of the next decade. The latest round of appointments reflects Privy Council Clerk Michael Wernick's push to rejuvenate the top ranks of the bureaucracy with a better mix of youth and experience. The prime minister is responsible for all senior appointments but they are typically made on the advice of the clerk. Wernick has said managing a "generational turnover" is his top priority as the last wave of baby boomers, who dominated the face and character of public service for decades, retires. In speeches, he has exhorted the baby boomers to "move on" and make way for the next generation of leaders. Friday's shakeup included three promotions into the ranks of deputy minister and three assistant deputy ministers into associate deputy minister jobs. All are about age 50 - either in their late 40s or early 50s - positioning them for the top posts over the decade. Last year, the average age of deputy ministers was about age 58. As one senior bureaucrat said, "It looks like 50 is the new 60." The public service has aged over the years, including its senior executives compared to the 1970s and '80s when the public service grew rapidly and it wasn't unusual for executives to get their first deputy appointments in their 40s.

7. N. Korean defector speaks out to change her country

Ottawa Citizen, Paula McCooney, 2016 10 22

Ottawa - North Korean defectors Audrey Park and her mother have endured unimaginable hardship - whether it was being forced to subsist on a diet of corn and bugs, working in a labour camp or leaving family behind to make a harrowing winter trek across the Gobi Desert. It was all for the chance at a better life. Now, Park is determined to ensure future generations are not subjected to the same human rights violations existing under her country's communist rule. Park, 27, has been chosen as this year's intern for the HanVoice Pioneers Project. HanVoice is a nonprofit organization advocating for North Korean human rights and refugees. The internship aims to empower and give a voice to defectors through a training and advocacy program. Park, who is interning in Ottawa, will speak at a HanVoice benefit concert at the Canadian Museum of Nature at 6 p.m. on Tuesday to engage the local community about the ongoing plight of North Koreans. Project director Veronica Kim said her organization was moved by Park's story.

8. Tunisia goes from Arab Spring to Daesh springboard

Toronto Star, Michelle Shephard, 2016 10 22

Tunis, Tunisia - The mere mention of Syria elicits pained expressions among those living in El Mourouj, a densely populated suburb about a 20-minute drive from Tunis. We came earlier this year to one neighbourhood, where stray cats outnumber cars on the sunny streets, armed with only a few names of young Tunisians who had left for Syria. Within minutes, we were introduced to their families and embarking on a walking tour of the departed. Fawzai Zeitouni received a call two months before our visit that her teenage son Hamza had been killed. As she showed us the last photo of him, a tear fell on to the phone screen. "We don't understand. All the mothers just say, 'We went to sleep and woke up and our children were gone.'" "To some she is lucky - she knows the fate of her son. For others there is only the hope that their loved ones will return, and there is fear that they will return, brainwashed and trained by Daesh. It is hard for most Westerners to comprehend the number of young people here in this country of about 11 million, who have joined the call to jihad in Syria, Iraq or Libya. They come from Tunisia's "Generation 9/11 (www.thestar.com)," those who grew up in the shadow of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but who came of age during the demonstrations of the Arab Spring. Tunisia was the birthplace of those protests that spread across the Middle East and North Africa, starting with outrage over the selfimmolation of a desperate Tunisian fruit dealer. The country is the only Arab Spring “success” story amid unyielding bloodshed in Syria, Yemen, Libya and political upheaval in Egypt and Bahrain. This is the country whose young people won a Nobel Peace Prize, and it is often called the “democratic model” for the region. Ask security analysts, community workers, relatives and political commentators here if the main cause of high recruitment of Tunisians are religious, economic, revolutionary, political, or personal and most would answer: “Yes.” But the external factors that drive young Tunisians to join Daesh or other violent extremist groups are not the same as in Canada, Europe or the Middle East. Here, in the fading light of the revolution, when change didn’t come fast enough, extremist groups shone bright. In May, Canada’s global affairs minister, Stéphane Dion, travelled to Tunis. “The Tunisians weren’t shy about pleading for assistance,” said one official who knew details of the meetings. The economy was the main topic of discussion. Canada pledged support and announced a three-year, $4 million security partnership for “battling terrorism.” According to Global Affairs spokesperson Jocelyn Sweet, Canada has also allocated $5.3 million to aid Tunisian women in “taking up leadership roles.” Marie-Claude Bibeau, minister of international development and la Francophonie, is reviewing Canada’s international assistance, which Sweet said “will establish Canada’s priorities for development assistance in the coming years.” (Note: Michelle Shephard, the Star’s national security correspondent and author, travelled to a half-dozen countries and interviewed foreign fighters, security experts, policy makers and religious leaders for this year’s series. Her stories about “Generation 9/11” explore the issues of Daesh’s foreign fighters and how Canada and the world should respond. The series concludes this weekend.)

9. Canada's loneliest hero

The National Post, John Ivison, 2016 10 22

Analysis: There are days when it’s hard to be a hero. Just ask Curtis Barrett. Two years ago, the RCMP corporal shot Michael Zehaf-Bibeau in the head in Parliament’s Hall of Honour, just minutes after the 32-year-old Zehaf-Bibeau had fired three bullets into the back of Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, an unarmed member of the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders of Canada, who was posted at the National War Memorial in Ottawa. An Ontario Provincial Police report into the terror attack on Parliament Hill on Oct. 22, 2014, concluded that Zehaf-Bibeau “presented a serious and imminent threat to the lives of all persons inside Centre Block,” including Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the entire Conservative caucus meeting in the Reading Room, just off the Hall of Honour. The report concluded that the House of Commons’ former sergeant-at-arms, Kevin Vickers, and Barrett “fired their weapons and neutralized the threat.” But while Vickers was hailed as a hero by the nation and appointed Canada’s ambassador to Ireland, Barrett’s contribution was buried, redacted and generally forgotten, leading him into a downward spiral of posttraumatic stress. After two years, the RCMP has finally recognized the valour of Barrett, and the three other officers who walked into gunfire that day - he will receive the Star of Courage from the Governor-General at a ceremony next Friday. But Barrett’s story is a cautionary tale about how this country treats those of its sons and daughters who put themselves at great peril to keep the rest of us safe. On the morning of Oct. 22, 2014, Curtis Barrett, a robust 34-year-old from Labrador City, N.L., was posted at the Vehicle Screening facility at the foot of Parliament Hill, where he worked as an explosives detection officer. The former Canadian Forces combat engineer was on a break when he overheard a female officer announce on the radio: “There’s a man. He’s got a gun.” Barrett and an RCMP colleague climbed into a marked cruiser and headed toward the Peace Tower.

10. Waterloo startup focuses on security for the quantum age

Waterloo Region Record, Terry Pender, 2016 10 22

Waterloo - A small startup in Waterloo is working on a problem that touches everyone using the Internet for buying, selling and banking — securing sensitive data against attacks from quantum computers. Isara Corp. , based in the Quantum Valley Investments building, went public about a month ago with the first in a suite of planned software products that it says will protect data in existing computers from hackers using quantum computers. The startup's sole focus is quantum-safe cryptography. It is not only e-commerce that is threatened by the next generation of computers, but also sensitive government communications, says Scott Totzke, Isara's chief executive officer. There is now a consensus among some of the biggest players in technology, including Google, Amazon and Microsoft, that quantum computers will be a commercial reality by 2026. Using the properties of subatomic particles to process and store information, they will be able to quickly break current methods of encryption. Everything from credit card numbers, bank accounts, personal records, health files, tax records, corporate data and top-secret messages exchanged by spy agencies are all vulnerable to hackers using quantum computers, Totzke says. With the threat increasing, some government agencies have started talking about quantum safe cryptography. Last year, the National Security Agency (NSA) in the United States said it would transition its computers to quantum-resistant algorithms "in the not too distant future." The NSA's Canadian counterpart is the Ottawa-based Communications Security Establishment. Last month, Greta Bossenmaier, head of the agency, said cryptologists there are racing to find ways to protect information from quantum hackers. Isara is part the quantum technology ecosystem supported and funded by Mike Lazaridis, co-founder of Research In Motion, now BlackBerry. Lazaridis and Fregin founded Quantum Valley Investments in 2013. It has invested in several startups that are working out of its building on Westmount Road North. So far, only two have come out of stealth mode — Cognitive Systems and Isara.

11. Treat Muslims as partners in our security

Ottawa Citizen, 2016 10 22

Editorial: I have always approached the debates we've had since Sept. 11, 2001, about national security and protecting rights and freedoms with some nervousness and trepidation. I'm a Canadian Muslim of Pakistani descent. There are more than one million Muslims in Canada, and we have often felt unfairly targeted by security agencies and stigmatized as part of these security debates. We have been seen as part of the problem rather than as part of the solution. Too often, our community has not been part of the discussions when it comes to designing a national security framework that both keeps Canadians safe, and protects our fundamental rights and freedoms. Those of us who have chosen to come to Canada and make this our home did so for both the security that all Canadians take for granted and the rights and freedoms that all Canadians cherish. Many of us fled countries where personal liberties are severely limited or even nonexistent, and where violence and conflict are daily facts of life. Yet, too often, we've been treated with suspicion and mistrust. It's as if security agencies took a racial profiling approach to national security, rather than trying to work with the community. That needs to change. We need to bring a community policing approach to national security.

12. WikiLeaks est-il à la solde du Kremlin ?

Analyse: À en croire l'entourage de la candidate démocrate à l'élection présidentielle américaine, l'affaire ne fait aucun doute: WikiLeaks tente, de concert avec le Kremlin, de déstabiliser la campagne de Hillary Clinton afin de favoriser l'élection de son rival républicain, Donald Trump. Le porte-parole de l'ex-secrétaire d'État, Brian Fallon, s'en est pris directement à l'organisation de Julian Assange la semaine dernière en tweetant qu'elle se comportait en «outil de propagande du gouvernement russe» visant à favoriser la «marionnette» de Moscou. «Le fait de distiller des mensonges n'améliore en rien votre crédibilité», a rétorqué en ligne un responsable non identifié du compte Twitter de WikiLeaks. Au coeur du litige figure une série de courriels publiés par WikiLeaks au cours des derniers mois. Un premier lot témoignant de comportements hostiles de la direction du Parti démocrate envers le sénateur Bernie Sanders, qui était opposé à Mme Clinton, a d'abord été dévoilé en juillet à la veille de la convention de la formation. Des courriels tirés du compte du directeur de campagne de la femme politique, John Podesta, ont ensuite été mis en ligne progressivement sur une période de dix jours dans la période précédant le troisième débat. Dans un avis publié le 7 octobre, le département de la Sécurité intérieure des États-Unis s'est dit «raisonnablement certain» (confident) que la Russie était «directement responsable» des cyberattaques prenant pour cible le camp démocrate. Ses responsables ont ajouté que la divulgation de courriels piratés par l'entremise de WikiLeaks et d'autres sites comme DCLeaks.com était conforme aux «méthodes et motivations» de Moscou et visait à déstabiliser l'élection américaine.

13. We haven't let fear turn us into a colder country - and that's a good thing

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Macdougall, 2016 10 22

Comment: What words to describe the feeling as you watch, helplessly from across an ocean, as a terrorist storms your former place of work and threatens your former colleagues, including the prime minister of Canada? “Surreal” and “impotent” are the best I’ve come up with in the two years since Michael Zehaf-Bibeau launched his slapdash assault on Parliament. Oddly, “grateful” is another. Grateful, because it could have been worse. Much worse. Had he timed his jihadi gauntlet a little earlier in the day, Zehaf-Bibeau would have found MPs and staffers clogging the Hall of Honour he went on to strafe. Had I still be in function, I would have been right there, chatting up journalists post-caucus before dodging bullets. Instead, I watched on Twitter from London as friends in Ottawa became trapped on the set of a real-life horror film. Here, social media was as much blessing as curse; it was the first platform to erupt with the news, but it was also the first to falsely suggest that as many as three gunmen were roaming Ottawa’s streets. For a while, it didn’t feel as though anyone knew what was going on, just like nobody ever knows what’s going on in the first hours of a news event, only that we now all feel compelled to broadcast our lack of knowledge in the rush to fill an information void that can’t be sated.

14. Le monde à la merci des hackers?

Le Soleil, Jean-François Cliché, 2016 10 22

Ottawa - Mine de rien, il y a pas mal de pirates informatiques qui ont ajouté de très, très gros trophées de chasse à leur collection récemment... Les courriels de Hillary Clinton. Ceux du directeur de la CIA, John Brennan, l'an dernier. Cet été, un serveur du Comité national du Parti démocrate a été complètement éventé. Il y a deux semaines, ce fut au tour du directeur de campagne de Mme Clinton, John Podesta, de voir sa correspondance électronique atterrir sur le site WikiLeaks. Quand on pense aux secrets d'État que des gens si hauts placés peuvent échanger, la liste a quelque chose de totalement irréel. Mais comment cela est-il possible? Comment l'entourage immédiat d'une potentielle présidente des États-Unis et le patron de l'espionnage américain peuvent-ils être à ce point vulnérables? Sont-ils mal conseillés, négligents, ou les pirates sont-ils tout simplement impossibles à arrêter? Il y a sans doute un peu des deux, disent tous les experts auxquels Le Soleil a soumis la question. «La plus grande vulnérabilité de tout système d'information, c'est toujours le facteur humain, que ce soit accidentel ou volontaire», dit Marc-André Léger, qui enseigne la sécurité informatique à l'Université de Sherbrooke. Ainsi, il a été démontré que Mme Clinton avait utilisé un compte personnel et un serveur privé et fort mal sécurisé à sa résidence lorsqu'elle était secrétaire d'État afin d'envoyer ses courriels, dont certains contenaient des documents sensibles. Les règles du gouvernement stipulent pourtant que seuls des serveurs gouvernementaux et dûment sécurisés peuvent être utilisés. Mais il a aussi été révélé en début d'année que beaucoup de hauts placés américains, tant dans le gouvernement Obama que dans l'administration républicaine précédente, ont des comportements semblables. Mais il n'y a pas que des erreurs humaines dans ces histoires de piratage, poursuit M. Léger, «un ordinateur impossible à hacker, ça n'existe pas. [...] Tout ordinateur branché à Internet peut être piraté. C'est une question de mettre l'énergie et le temps qu'il faut pour entrer dans le système».

15. Digital doors should be secure

Times Colonist, 2016 10 22

Editorial: In the legislative building and in other government offices, security officials go around after business hours to make sure everything is locked and secure. In the business of running the government, it would be unthinkable to leave doors ajar and filing cabinets open. That same diligence has not always been applied to government-owned electronic devices that store and allow access to a wide array of sensitive information. As the provincial government rolls out its strategy concerning mobile devices, it should seek ways to keep up with technological change, rather than playing catch-up. Two independent watchdogs released companion reports Tuesday saying there's a risk that government information could fall into the wrong hands because of slack security measures regarding tablets, smartphones and other mobile equipment. Government safeguards have failed to keep pace with rapid advances in technology, say auditor general Carol Bellringer and acting information and privacy commissioner Drew McArthur. The two watchdogs audited five ministries and the office of the chief information officer. These are some of their findings: No central record is kept of mobile devices with access to government information. "You can't protect what you don't know about," said Bellringer.

16. N. Korea will be huge problem for next U.S. president: ex-top CIA official Yonhap English News, 2016 10 22

Washington - North Korea will be a huge problem for the next U.S. president as it is perfecting capabilities to fly nuclear-armed missiles to the continental U.S., a former top intelligence official has warned. Jami Miscik, a former deputy director for intelligence at CIA, made the remark in an interview with the Fortune magazine, noting that the U.S. is not paying enough attention to the issue of North Korea, according to the report. "The president-elect is going to face a problem with North Korea that none of his or her predecessors have faced. It is well on the way to becoming not just a nuclear power, but a power that is able to deliver a nuclear missile," she was quoted as saying. The remark is the latest in a series of warnings in the U.S. of the seriousness of the North Korea problem in the wake of Pyongyang's fifth nuclear test last month. That blast, together with ceaseless missile tests, sparked genuine fears that Pyongyang is making real progress in developing nuclear missiles.

17. Pentagon chief in Iraq to see commanders, assess Mosul fight The Associated Press, Lolita C. Baldor, 2016 10 22

Baghdad - U.S. Defence Secretary Ash Carter arrived in Iraq on Saturday to meet with his commanders and assess the progress in the opening days of the operation to retake the northern city of Mosul from Islamic State militants. His visit comes two days after a U.S. service member was killed outside Mosul, underscoring the risk that American troops are taking as they advise Iraqi forces in the fight. The trip also follows meetings that Carter held with Turkish leaders on Friday, when he announced "an agreement in principle" for Turkey to play a role in the Mosul battle, and that friction between Turkey and Iraq can be worked out. Carter, who already has been to Iraq twice this year, has overseen the steady increase in the number of U.S. forces deployed to the fight and the growth of America's effort to train and advise Iraqi troops. In his two earlier visits, Carter announced White House decisions to increase the U.S. troop level there. There were no expectations he would do that again. Instead, he planned to meet with Iraqi leaders and military commanders to determine how the fight was going and whether any changes, increased resources or other assistance were needed.

18. New Weapons Used in Attack on the Internet The New York Times, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 10 22

San Francisco - Major websites were inaccessible to people across wide swaths of the United States on Friday after a company that manages crucial parts of the internet's infrastructure said it was under attack. Users reported sporadic problems reaching several websites, including Twitter, Netflix, Spotify, Airbnb, Reddit, Etsy, SoundCloud and The New York Times. The company, Dyn, whose servers monitor and reroute internet traffic, said it began experiencing what security experts called a distributed denial-of-service attack just after 7 a.m. Reports that many sites were inaccessible started on the East Coast, but spread westward in three waves as the day wore on and into the evening. And in a troubling development, the attack appears to have relied on hundreds of thousands of internet-connected devices like cameras, baby monitors and home routers that have been infected -- without their owners' knowledge -- with software that allows hackers to command them to flood a target with overwhelming traffic. A spokeswoman said the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security were looking into the incident and all potential causes, including criminal activity and a nation-state attack. Kyle York, Dyn's chief strategist, said his company and others that host the core parts of the internet's infrastructure were targets for a growing number of more powerful attacks.

19. Homeland Security struggles to detain rising numbers of undocumented people

The Wall Street Journal, Devlin Barrett, 2016 10 22

Washington - Homeland Security officials are quietly scrambling to find 5,000 more prison and jail beds to handle a record number of undocumented immigrants being detained in the U.S., according to officials familiar with the discussions. Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson met Tuesday with senior leaders at the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency and the Customs and Border Protection agency -- both of which are in his department -- so officials could review their plans to handle thousands more people expected to cross the border with Mexico in coming weeks, the officials said. ICE is holding more than 40,000 people in detention centers -- more than it has ever had in custody before -- and has warned budget officials that it needs a quick infusion of $136 million more just to keep running detention centers until early December, according to internal Department of Homeland Security documents and officials. A spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security declined to comment on internal agency discussions. The agency is "committed to continuing to ensure that individuals are detained in a safe, secure and humane manner in line with our detention standards and our values as a nation," she said.

20. Theft by former NSA worker much worse than thought, prosecutors allege

Christian Science Monitor, Zhai Yun Tan, 2016 10 22

Washington - A former National Security Agency contractor accused of stealing hoards of top secret government information is set to face more serious charges than previously announced, with prosecutors hoping to prevent him from being released on bail. According to the federal prosecutors' court filing on Thursday, Harold T. Martin III committed a theft that was "breathtaking in its longevity and scale," stealing enough material to fill up to 200 laptop computers, according to the Associated Press. The information includes "specific operational plans against a known enemy of the United States," and handwritten notes with explanations that the government says is intended for an "audience outside of the Intelligence Community." "Given the nature of his offenses and knowledge of national secrets, he presents tremendous value to any foreign power that may wish to shelter him within or outside of the United States," prosecutors said. Prosecutors argue that Mr. Martin should not be released on bail because he is "a risk to the nation and to the physical safety of others," The Washington Post reports.

21. A WikiLeaks Lesson for Mrs. Clinton

The New York Times, 2016 10 22

Editorial: The consensus by United States intelligence agencies is that the WikiLeaks dump of emails from the account of John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, was the result of a hack by Russia in an effort to influence the presidential election. The leaks are continuing, so it's impossible to say whether anything truly damaging to Mrs. Clinton will emerge. Some of the purloined exchanges consist of routine and often boring campaign planning, while others seem embarrassing or cynical, as when Clinton aides debate accepting campaign cash from foreign government lobbyists, and one writes: "Take the money!!" None of the emails, at least so far, seem particularly harmful to Mrs. Clinton, although some suggest that her closest aides have the same concerns that weigh on many Americans -- that she can be thin-skinned and secretive. As Neera Tanden, one of Mrs. Clinton's closest advisers, put it in the emails, "She always sees herself bending to 'their' will when she hands over information." This is partly because of the endless investigations the Clintons' political enemies have pursued over the years. But that sort of scrutiny will surely intensify if she becomes president. Mrs. Clinton will only stir up her Republican critics by appearing secretive; she has a much better chance of shutting them down, as she did in her Benghazi hearing, with a dogged determination to show she has nothing to hide.

22. Philippines 'Separation' from U.S. Jilts Hillary Clinton, Too

The New York Times, Mark Landler, 2016 10 22

Washington - When the Philippines appeared to jilt its old ally the United States in favor of China this week, it repudiated not only President Obama and his "pivot" to Asia, but also Hillary Clinton, who made reaching out to the region her signature project as his secretary of state. The White House on Friday said it was troubled by the statements made by President Rodrigo Duterte during a visit to Beijing, in which he announced a "separation" of the Philippines from the United States, a treaty ally, and said it was "time to say goodbye, my friend." More than anything, the administration appears baffled by Mr. Duterte. He is a flamboyant figure, given to volcanic outbursts. On Friday, his own trade minister tried to pull back much of what his boss had said. "I've dubbed that person the Filipino Mike Pence," joked the White House press secretary, Josh Earnest, suggesting that Mr. Duterte was a Filipino Donald J. Trump. Later in the day, Mr. Duterte himself insisted that by "separation" he meant only that the Philippines planned to be more independent of the United States.

23. Man Who Took Trove of N.S.A. Data Has Court Date

The New York Times, Scott Shane, 2016 10 22

Baltimore - The intelligence contractor accused in the largest-ever breach of classified information was portrayed by his lawyer in court on Friday as a patriot and a dedicated worker who became compulsive about taking work home. An unlocked garden shed, stuffed with more classified documents than the contractor, Harold T. Martin III, could ever read, might be a symptom of a mental disorder, the lawyer said. Mr. Martin, a rotund man with glasses whose striped gray jail garb stood out in an ornate federal courtroom here, sat silently during his first public appearance as his lawyer, James Wyda, argued that he should be released while awaiting trial. The prosecution, opposing the request, described Mr. Martin, 51, in starkly different terms: as a serial lawbreaker of staggering audacity. Over two decades as a contractor for the National Security Agency and other government units, it said, he took home masses of secrets in full knowledge that it was illegal to do so. And, the prosecution added, there is no way to be certain what he has done with the information, or whether he might be hiding more.

24. Ex-NSA contractor deemed flight risk in theft case

The Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 10 22

Baltimore - A federal judge found Friday that a former National Security Agency contractor accused of carrying out what is thought to be the largest theft of classified secrets in U.S. history posed a flight risk and ordered that he continue to be held in jail. U.S. Magistrate Judge A. David Copperthite ruled that Harold T. Martin III should not be released pending trial, despite the impassioned arguments of his defense attorney that the computer technology expert is a patriot who intended no harm to his country and suffered from a "compulsive disorder" that led him to steal classified material over a 20-year period. Defense attorney James Wyda conceded that Martin took the material, but he stressed that "there's no evidence that Hal shared this information with anyone" or that he intended to pass it to a foreign government. "There is nothing to indicate that Hal Martin is a traitor," Wyda told the judge, as Martin, a heavyset man wearing gray-striped jail garb, sat quietly at the defense table. "What we see is an individual who is a collector." He told the court that his client is not like Edward Snowden, the former NSA contractor who gave classified material on U.S. surveillance programs to journalists, or Aldrich Ames, a onetime CIA officer who was recruited by the Soviet Union and betrayed agents working for the United States. Wyda portrayed Martin, 51, as a "voracious learner committed to being excellent at his work" who gathered information to improve his knowledge. "What began as an effort to be better at his job," Wyda said, became over the years a compulsion. "Frankly," he said, "the mental health component is the only explanation."

25. Census plan for Middle Easterners raises concerns

The Washington Post, Tara Bahrapour, 2016 10 22

Washington - For the first time in four decades, the federal government is poised to add a new ethnic category to the U.S. census form, adding a box for people of Middle Eastern and North African descent. Details are still being negotiated, but as the form is currently envisioned, people would be able to check the new box in addition to race identifiers, such as "white" or "black." Within the new category, they would also be able to specify national origins, such as Saudi or Israeli, and ethnic affiliations, such as Berber or Kurdish. The new form would go to Congress for final approval in 2018 in time for the 2020 Census. The move comes after more than 30 years of lobbying, but also at a time of rising Islamophobia and calls by Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump to ban people from Muslim lands. Some are questioning whether the new designation could lead to profiling or otherwise put them in danger. The proposed addition would create a race and ethnicity category called MENA for people with roots in the Middle East and North Africa. It has been championed by organizations representing Arab Americans and others with roots in the geographical swath from Iran to Morocco, who complain of being ignored in the decennial count. The region comprises a jumble of ethnic and racial categories, including people who identify as white or black, Arab or Aryan.

26. Part of Clinton campaign headquarters evacuated over suspicious white powder

Fox News, 2016 10 22

Washington - One floor of Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton's national campaign headquarters was evacuated Friday evening after a white powdery substance caused a security scare. The New York Police Department said the substance was discovered in an envelope opened by two interns at Clinton's Manhattan office at around 5:30 p.m. It was then taken to the 11th floor of her Brooklyn headquarters. The New York Post reported that emergency services ordered the floor to be evacuated after four people were exposed to the substance.

27. Major New Court Ruling Says "Even The President" Can't Declare Torture Lawful

The Intercept, Alex Emmons, 2016 10 22

Washington – In a robust ruling in favor of Abu Ghraib detainees, an appellate court ruled Friday that torture is such a clear violation of the law that it is "beyond the power of even the president to declare such conduct lawful." The ruling from a unanimous panel of judges on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reinstates a lawsuit against a military contractor for its role in the torture of four men at the notorious prison in Iraq. Last June, a district court ruled that a "cloud of ambiguity" surrounds the definition of torture, and that despite anti-torture laws, the decision to torture was a "political question" that could not be judged by courts. That ruling echoed the widely discredited legal theories of the Bush administration, which argued that the war on terror gave the president the inherent authority to indefinitely detain and torture terror suspects, and conduct mass surveillance on Americans' international communications. But the Fourth Circuit soundly rejected that theory, saying that the United States has clear laws against torturing detainees that apply to the executive branch. "While executive officers can do are the military reasonableness of conduct amounting to torture, it is beyond the power of even the president to declare such conduct lawful," wrote appellate Judge Barbara Keenan, writing for the unanimous panel.

28. Russian warships sail through English Channel

The Washington Post, Andrew Roth, 2016 10 22

London - In scenes that haven't been common since the end of the Cold War, Russian warships sailed through the English Channel early Friday in a theatrical display of Russian military might. Britain dispatched two of its own warships to carefully monitor the Russian flotilla, which included the aircraft carrier Admiral Kuznetsov, as it sailed by, reportedly en route to the eastern Mediterranean to aid in the war in Syria. The aircraft carrier can hold as many as 40 planes, and it is suspected that they will be used in the bombing campaign in Aleppo. Given Russia's fierce bombardment of that city, many Western military officials see the ships' course as a slow-moving harbinger of bloodshed to come in Syria. NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg warned the Kremlin on Thursday not to take any step that would escalate the violence. "We are concerned that the Russian carrier group will support military operations in Syria in ways which will increase humanitarian and human suffering," Stoltenberg said.

29. Lawmaker raises fears about Russian satellites

The Washington Post, Christian Davenport, 2016 10 22

Washington - In a letter to the Pentagon on Friday, Rep. Duncan D. Hunter said he was concerned that a contract to provide Internet service to deployed soldiers could allow the use of Russian satellites, jeopardizing troops' privacy and security. Previous service at bases' Internet cafes had "stringent security measures," Hunter wrote to Army Lt. Gen. Alan Lynn, the head of the Defense Information Systems Agency (DISA). But he said he is worried that the "contracting arrangement creates unnecessary security risks, given that our deployed warfighters could be exposed to transmitting their personal information over unprotected networks that are controlled by foreign and potentially hostile entities." In an interview, Hunter (R-Calif.), who served three tours as a Marine, said: "This is one of the dumbest things we could do. Why give the Russians the ability to basically spy on American military personnel when there are so many other options?" A DISA spokesman said the agency could not discuss the provisions of the contract or which companies may have submitted offers.

30. GCHQ using cyber attacks on Isil to aid battle to take Mosul

London - GCHQ is using cyber warfare for the first time against Isil militants as part of the campaign to retake Mosul, the Defence Secretary has said. The cyber attacks are understood to have targeted the communications of Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant to disrupt co-ordination in the Iraqi city. Sir Michael Fallon told a conference organised by the Royal United Services Institute, a think tank on cyber warfare: "We are conducting military operations against Daesh [Isil] as part of the international coalition, and I can confirm that we are using offensive cyber for the first time in this campaign."

31. Police uncover Tube bomb plot

London - A terror plot targeting the London Underground has been uncovered after police found what they believe to be a bomb on a Tube train. A 19-year-old man was Tasered and arrested by counter-terrorism officers yesterday following the discovery of the device aboard a train outside the O2 centre in south London on Thursday. Last night it emerged that security officials had already contacted the Ministry of Defence to warn military personnel and that the threat level for transport in the capital had been raised to "severe". The MoD told troops before the arrest: "It remains possible that the perpetrator may attempt to place further devices." British Transport Police confirmed it had increased security and would be stepping up patrols. The incident and subsequent arrest came 11 years after the 7/7 bombings when the London Underground was targeted in a terror attack that killed 52 passengers. Details of the suspected plot emerged in a memo sent to serving military personnel that forwarded a warning from the security agency that gives terrorism alerts. It said the Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre "has raised the threat level for transport in London to severe: an attack is highly likely".

32. Cybercrime costs us £11bn

London - Online fraudsters stole £10.9bn in the UK last year - equivalent to a £210 loss for everyone over the age of 16 - official figures show. But in reality, the loss may be even greater. Get Safe Online, the government-backed cyber safety initiative, suggested actual cybercrime victims saw an average loss of £523. However, this is those who reported the fraud to the national cybercrime and fraud reporting service, Action Fraud. In a survey by Get Safe Online 39pc said they were a victim of cybercrime but did not report it. In the past 12 months, those living in Kent lost more than £4bn as a result of cybercrime - by far the highest amount stolen, according to Action Fraud.

33. Jihadists should be jailed: security chief

The Age, Daniel Flitton & Deborah Snow, 2016 10 22

Canberra - Australian jihadists attempting to return home as battle erupts around the Islamic State stronghold of Mosul should be locked up if they return, or placed under the "closest monitoring we can arrange" according to former army chief Peter Leahy. "It is a significant concern," said the former general, who now directs the National Security Institute at Canberra University. "It looks as though ISIS will fall in Iraq, and more than 100 or so Aussies are there right now fighting alongside them. We are potentially going to see more young jihadists here, plotting and attempting to carry out attacks. So our security agencies are going to have to be on high alert." Where Australian nationals fighting abroad alongside IS have dual passports, they should have their Australian passports "ripped off them" he said. "If that's not possible we should put them in jail, or else under the closest monitoring that we can arrange, 24 hours a day for a very long time." Mosul in northern Iraq and Raqqa in Syria are believed to be the bases for many of up to 30,000 recruits said to have flocked to the battlefield from across the world.

34. Man charged over explosive device

Australian Associated Press, 2016 10 22

Adelaide - A man has been charged over the discovery of a homemade explosive device and a homemade firearm which forced the evacuation of a shopping centre in Adelaide's north. The 39-year-old was spoken to by patrols outside the Elizabeth Shopping Centre on Saturday afternoon and a search of his backpack uncovered the two items. The explosive device was immediately isolated near an external loading bay and the area cordoned off. Bomb squad officers were called in and a controlled detonation was performed. Police said the circumstances of the incident were still being investigated but officers had ruled out the possibility of terrorist attack. No person was directly threatened and no one was injured.

Pajhwok Afghan News, Yousuf Zarifi, 2016 10 22

Jalalabad - Five uprising members were killed in a NATO drone strike in Pachiragam district of eastern Nangarhar province on Saturday, an official said. Attaullah Khogyani, the governor's spokesman, confirmed the strike to Pajhwok Afghan News in Koz-Pachir village before noon but he had no information about the identities of those killed. But a security official, who wished to go unnamed, said the drone strike hit check post of uprising forces and killed five people, including the post commander. NATO and US forces spokesman in Kabul Brig. Gen. Charles H. Cleveland confirmed US forces conducted one counter-terrorism strike in Pachiragam district.

36. Chinese hackers targeted US aircraft carrier

Financial Times, Jeevan Vasagar and Geoff Dyer, 2016 10 22

Washington - Chinese hackers targeted foreign government personnel who visited a US aircraft carrier the day before a contentious international court ruling on the South China Sea, according to a US cyber security company. The China-based group created an infected document impersonating an official message addressed to officials visiting the USS Ronald Reagan, a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier which conducted patrols of the South China Sea in July. The suspect document is dated July 11, the day before a tribunal in The Hague ruled against China's expansive claims in the region. The targets of the attack were delegates from a foreign government due to visit the aircraft carrier that day. The document contained Enfal malware, which can be used to copy information from an infected computer or download further computer viruses.

37. China, Philippines to exercise self-restraint in S. China Sea

Kyodo News, Takuya Karube, 2016 10 22

Beijing - China and the Philippines said Friday they have agreed to practice self-restraint in the South China Sea and have regular discussions on a bilateral basis in addressing maritime issues. In a joint statement issued a day after their presidents held talks in Beijing, the two countries said they have agreed to seek measures "to increase mutual trust and confidence and to exercise self-restraint in the conduct of activities in the South China Sea that would complicate or escalate disputes and affect peace and stability." To that end, the statement said, "In addition to and without prejudice to other mechanisms, a bilateral consultation mechanism can be useful, which will meet regularly on current and other issues of concern to either side on the South China Sea." As Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte suggested ahead of a meeting with his Chinese counterpart Xi Jinping, an international arbitration tribunal's mid-July ruling that invalidated Beijing's sweeping claims in the disputed sea was not mentioned in the document.

38. Philippines bags $18.9 billion in deals from China

Manila - For agreeing to return to the negotiating table to settle a dispute in the South China Sea, the Philippines is getting US$9 billion (S$12.6 billion) in soft loans from China, part of the US$13.5 billion in deals signed during President Duterte's visit to Beijing this week. Encouraged by the apparent success of his trip, Duterte announced his "separation" from the US on Thursday, declaring it had "lost," and he had realigned with China. Addressing a group of Chinese and Filipino businessmen after his talks with Chinese President Xi Jinping, Duterte said relations with the US had reached "checkmate." "The US has lost now," Duterte said. "I've realigned myself in your ideological flow and maybe I will also go to Russia to talk to (President Vladimir) Putin and tell him that there are three of us against the world-China, Philippines and Russia. It's the only way," he said. "With that, in this venue, your honours, I announce my separation from the US, both in military, not in social, both in military (and) economics," he remarked. "I have separated from them. Hence, I will be dependent on you for all time. But do not worry. We will also help as you help us."

39. N. Korean diplomats meet with ex-U.S. officials in Malaysia

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 22

Kuala Lumpur - A North Korean delegation led by its deputy foreign minister held talks with former government officials of the United States here for a second day on Saturday to discuss pending issues such as the North's nuclear and missile tests. The U.S.-North Korea contact, although it is informal or unofficial, came after North Korea conducted its fifth and most powerful nuclear test in September, just eight months after its previous nuke test. "I came here through Beijing," the North's deputy ambassador to the United Nations Jang Il-hun told Yonhap News Agency. As for topics discussed during the dialogue, he said the two sides talked about several "pending issues and each other's thoughts on them." Asked whether there was an offer from the U.S. to stop its nuclear and missile tests, he fell short of clarifying, but said, "hopely moving forward."

40. Blinken to visit S. Korea, Japan next week for talks on N. Korea

Yonhap News, 2016 10 22

Washington - U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Antony Blinken will visit South Korea and Japan next week for discussions on strategies to deal with North Korea, the State Department said Friday. Blinken will first be in Tokyo on October 26-27 for trilateral talks with South Korea's First Vice Foreign Minister Lim Sung-nam and Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shinsuke Sugiyama, the department said in a statement. The fifth round of deputy-level trilateral consultations will focus on our cooperation on a range of regional security and global issues, including our coordinated response to the threat posed by the North's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, the department said. Blinken will then visit Seoul on Oct. 28-29 for talks with Deputy National Security Advisor Cho Tae-yong about North Korea policy, the department said.

41. 66 countries submit implementation reports on N.K. sanctions: report

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 22

Seoul - One third of United Nations member states have submitted their implementation reports on the latest set of international sanctions adopted against North Korea, a news report said Saturday. The Voice of America report said 66 countries have submitted their own implementation reports since the U.N. Security Council adopted Resolution 2270 in March to punish the North for its nuclear and ballistic missile tests early this year. It cited an e-mail from the Spanish mission to the U.N., which currently chairs a U.N. panel on North Korea sanctions. The sanctions, the toughest yet to be adopted against North Korea by the U.N., include mandatory inspections of all cargo going into and out of the North.

42. Outlawed Moro armed group harasses North Cotabato village, torches homes

Philippines News Agency, 2016 10 22

Midsayad - Outlawed Bangsamoro Islamic Freedom Fighters (BIFF) torched six houses in a remote village here after they failed to overrun a paramilitary base Thursday night, the Army here said. The burning of houses and series of loud explosions in Barangay Polomoguen caused panic among residents, according to Lt. Col. Markton Abo. Abo, 6th Infantry Division spokesperson, said the houses were unoccupied when torched since the villagers move to nearby villages at night and return at day time to farm. Villagers claimed that they have been seeing BIFF men massing in the borders of North Cotabato and Maguindanao. For fear of possible hostilities, the villagers decided to leave home at night.

43. Four 'terrorists' involved in sectarian killings arrested in raids

The News International, 2016 10 22

Mumbai - Anti-terrorism police arrested four alleged terrorists of banned militant outfits on Friday, who were said to be involved in sectarian killings and attacks on law enforcers. The four men, identified as Hafiz Noor alias Noor Ghausia, Zikeria alias Maviya, Muzaffar Ashiq alias Kajee alias Hussaini alias Khalid and Moiz, were taken into custody during raids conducted in Korangi, Bilal Colony and Orangi areas. Weapons and suicide vests were also seized during the raids carried out by personnel of the Counter Terrorism Department's (CTD) Operations-II, said a statement, adding that the arrests were made on the basis of a tip-off about the presence of terrorists in those areas. During a search of hideouts, the police found a suicide vest, three 30-bore pistols, two cellphones, four hand grenades, 70 bullets of a 30-bore pistol and Rs12,600. The statement said the suspects received training in Afghanistan, carried out attacks on law enforcers and killed people belonging to the Shia community.

BBC Monitoring Africa, 2016 10 22

Washington - US and Ethiopian spies were executed in the town of Saakow as hundreds of onlookers assembled at the execution ground. Abdullahi Ahmed Abdirahman, nicknamed Nabadon Yarow, worked for US troops stationed in Ballidoogle airfield in Lower Shabelle region. An Al-Shabab judge said that Nabadon Yarow, 51, worked for the US, having been behind the killing of many members of the Wanlaweyn district administration in Lower Shabelle. He was also behind US attacks in the villages of Baladul Amin and Jameo in Lower Shabelle. He worked with the US for 10 months and was paid 600 dollars every month. Mohamed Salad Kahiye, 31, a member of the Somali government intelligence agency, was among the executed men.

45. South Africa to Withdraw From International Criminal Court

The New York Times, Sewell Chan and Marlise Simons, 2016 10 22

Johannesburg - South Africa became on Friday the second African country to announce that it planned to leave the International Criminal Court, a decision that campaigners for international justice say could lead to a devastating exodus from the embattled institution. The move came three days after after Burundi's president signed a decree making his country the first to withdraw from the court, which had planned to investigate political violence that followed the president's decision last year to pursue a third term. "There is a real chance that there will now be large-scale African withdrawals," said David L. Bosco, an associate professor of international studies at Indiana University who has written a book on the court. "The Burundi decision was easy to dismiss as a government seeking to avoid direct scrutiny; South Africa's is much more significant. The African Union has been a forum for anti-I.C.C. sentiment, and countries like Kenya and Uganda may now seek to capitalize on the momentum." Henry Oryem Okello, a Ugandan minister, told The Associated Press on Friday that his country was "undecided" about whether to remain in the court, and that the “hot issue” of African participation might be taken up at an African Union summit meeting in January.

46. Burkina Faso 'foils coup plot by forces loyal to Compaore'

BBC News, 2016 10 22

At least 10 of the plotters had been arrested, but the top suspects were still on the run, the minister said. The coup was to have been staged on 8 October, with an attack on the presidential palace, he added. Forces loyal to the ex-president staged a coup in September 2015, but surrendered a week later after protests and opposition from top generals. French-educated banker Roch Marc Kaboré was elected president in November, ending a turbulent period since Mr Compaore's overthrow in a popular uprising in 2014. The latest coup plotters had also planned to attack a prison to free those held over last year's coup, Interior Minister Simon Compaore said at a press conference in the capital, Ouagadougou. Gen Gilbert Diendere, the head of Blaise Comapore's presidential guard, was detained for seizing power in September 2015.

47. Iraq pushes into town near Mosul after IS assault on Kirkuk

The Associated Press, Qassim Abdul-Zahra And Emad Matti, 2016 10 22

Bartella, Iraq - Iraqi forces pushed into a town near the Islamic State-held city of Mosul on Saturday after a wave of militant attacks in and around the northern city of Kirkuk set off more than 24 hours of heavy clashes, with ongoing skirmishes in some areas. U.S. Defence Secretary Ash Carter meanwhile arrived in Baghdad on an unannounced visit to meet with Iraqi commanders to discuss the offensive to retake Mosul, which the U.S. is supporting with airstrikes and advisers on the ground. The Iraqi army said the 9th Division has pushed into the town of Hamdaniyah, also known as Qaraqosh and Bakhdida, and raised the flag over its central government compound, but the troops were likely still facing resistance in and around the town. Similar past announcements have often proved premature. Two officers from the 9th Division confirmed troops had captured the government compound and raised the flag over it. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to release the information. The town is around 20 kilometres (12 miles) from Mosul. Iraqi forces launched a wide-scale offensive earlier this week aimed at retaking Mosul, the country's second largest city, which fell to IS in 2014.

48. Iran's Top Security Official: West Delaying Defeat of Terrorists in Iraq, Syria

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 22

Tehran - Secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council (SNSC) Ali Shamkhani blasted the Western sponsors of the terrorist groups for postponing their defeat in Iraq and Syria on different pretexts. "Foreign patrons of terrorist groups in Iraq and Syria have turned to politicking to save the outfits from a looming defeat in the Arab countries," Shamkhani said on Friday. He reiterated that the terrorists are declining towards their defeat in Iraq and Syria and thus their supporters have engaged in attempts to delay their defeat through political gambits. "After their worn-out plans were exposed, the terrorists' backers are seeking new approaches to change the course of their recurrent defeats," Shamkhani said, warning regional states and nations to be watchful of such efforts.

49. Iraqi army drives Islamic State from Christian region near Mosul

Reuters, 2016 10 22

Qayyara, Iraq - Iraqi army troops on Saturday stormed into a Christian region that has been under Islamic State control since 2014 as part of U.S.-backed operations to clear the entrances to Mosul, the militants' last major city stronghold in Iraq. The advance took place as U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter arrived on a visit to Baghdad to meet Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi and assess the campaign that started on Monday with air and ground support from the U.S-led coalition. A military statement said Iraqi units entered the center of Qaraqosh, a mainly Christian town about 20 kms (13 miles) southeast of Mosul, and were carrying out mop-up operations across the town. Further action was under way to seize a neighboring Christian village, Karamless, also known as Karemlash in the Syriac language. The region's population fled in the summer of 2014, when Islamic State swept in. Earlier this week, Iraqi special units also captured Bartella, a Christian village north of Qaraqosh.

50. Flee Their City or Stay? For Mosul Residents, Both Choices Seem Bleak

The New York Times, Tim Arango, 2016 10 22

Jadaa, Iraq - The first thing Musar Abid did when he escaped the Islamic State this week was grab a razor. "I shaved this morning," he said, smiling and pointing to his cheeks, smooth for the first time since jihadist enforcers began requiring long beards two years ago. "I became a young man again." When Iraqi federal policemen taking part in the offensive to reclaim Mosul from the terrorist group approached his village, Mr. Abid, 41, was elated to see them coming. For Mr. Abid, escape was an imperative -- he had informed the Iraqi police about conditions in the city, he said. "All of the world knows what life was like under Daesh," he said, using the Arabic acronym for the Islamic State, which is also known as ISIS or ISIL. But there are a million or more other civilians still in the city, and as they begin taking up the decision of whether to flee or stay, they face increasing hazards. Aid groups and international agencies are racing to prepare the possibility that the trickle of civilians fleeing Mosul, like Mr. Abid, will soon become a flood. Aid workers fear that as the fight moves to urban centers, it could force the sudden displacement of hundreds of thousands of people, and they are stockpiling gas masks in case the Islamic State turns to chemical attacks. And despite the relief civilians are expressing as they flee the jihadists, the risk is considerable.

51. ISIS Fighters in Iraq Attack Kirkuk, Diverting Attention From Mosul

The New York Times, Tim Arango, 2016 10 22

Erbil, Iraq - Facing a broad offensive from Iraqi and Kurdish troops, the Islamic State has defended villages around Mosul with its signature tactics of suicide car attacks and roadside bombs. But on Friday morning, militants attacked the strategic oil city of Kirkuk, far to the east, in the manner of a conventional army. Dozens of uniformed Islamic State fighters, some of whom were believed to be part of sleeper cells and others who drove into the city in vehicles, assaulted Kirkuk, setting off gun battles for hours in the heart of the city that lasted from dawn and into the night. Imams shut down all mosques in the city, canceling Friday Prayers, as the city was turned into an urban battle zone that was livestreamed for much of the day by Kurdish news outlets. The battle scenes and the sound of automatic gunfire inside the city were reminiscent of the Islamic State's brazen march across northern Iraq two years ago, when Mosul and other cities were first seized by the group. The group's sudden counterattack on Friday also involved multiple suicide attacks on police positions inside the city, and gunmen later took up positions in a mosque, a school, a hotel, and on top of other buildings. The government quickly instituted a curfew, ordering civilians to shelter indoors.

52. Russian Carrier Is Bound for Syria, Flexing Muscle but Risking Malfunction

The New York Times, Meil MacFarquhar, 2016 10 22

Moscow - The Admiral Kuznetsov, Russia's lone, rather geriatric aircraft carrier, steamed through the English Channel toward the Mediterranean Sea on Friday in the Kremlin's latest attempt to reassert its lost superpower status. Belching thick black smoke, the Soviet-era warship, previously known more as a threat to its crew than anything else, led a battle group of eight vessels, including an oceangoing tug that traditionally accompanies the carrier, which has a reputation for breaking down. The flotilla is expected to deploy off Syria in late October to bolster the military operations propping up President Bashar al-Assad, Russia's main Arab ally. If the 15 warplanes on board the Admiral Kuznetsov join the bombardment of Syria, the carrier will have its first active combat role since it was launched 34 years ago as part of a last gasp by the fading Soviet Union to challenge American naval power. That is seemingly the intent of the carrier's current mission — the latest move by President Vladimir V. Putin to flex Russian military muscle abroad and project power anywhere in the world by dispatching a floating air base. "It is part of Russia signaling that it is back on the world stage, that it is once again a maritime power," said Magnus Nordenman, the director of the trans-Atlantic security initiative at the Atlantic Council, a think tank in Washington.

53. Barred From U.N. Work, Russian Contractors Are Back, Airdropping Aid in Syria
New York Times, Somini Sengupta, 2016 10 22

United Nations - Amid the diplomatic storm over the war, the has paid millions of dollars to the owners of a private Russian airline company who were barred from doing business with the organization 10 years ago over bribery charges. Their Moscow-based company, , is the only authorized civilian provider of airdropped humanitarian aid in the conflict. And the sole place it flies in Syria is over a government-held town that has no other way to receive food. The owners, Nikolai Ustimenko and his son Pavel Ustimenko, were entangled in a financial scandal with the United Nations nearly 10 years ago, when an internal inquiry recommended no further dealings with them. The story of how the Ustimenkos came to be the providers of the only airdropped humanitarian relief service in Syria is a mix of politics, profit motive and United Nations bureaucracy. It offers a window into the way Syrian officials and their Russian allies have used the aid machinery of the United Nations, even as the organization's top officials have accused Syria's government of breaking international humanitarian law.

54. Aleppo Is a 'Slaughterhouse,' Says U.N. Official Seeking War Crimes Inquiry
The New York Times, Nick Cumming-Bruce & Anne Barnard, 2016 10 22

Geneva - The top United Nations human rights official on Friday called the weekslong bombardment and siege of rebel-held parts of Aleppo "crimes of historic proportions" that had turned the ancient Syrian city into a "slaughterhouse." As a "humanitarian pause" in attacks, declared unilaterally by Russia, entered a second day — and as the besieged rebel-held eastern side of the city had a respite from the Syrian and Russian airstrikes that have devastated the area — the United Nations official, Zeid Ra'ad al-Hussein, called for a war crimes investigation. The comments by Mr. al-Hussein, the high commissioner for human rights, came in a videotaped statement at the opening of a special session of the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva. The 47-member council later adopted, 24 to 7, a resolution that called for an immediate end to the bombing of Aleppo. The resolution also asked the United Nations commission of inquiry monitoring human rights in Syria to investigate events in the city, identifying those responsible for war crimes and other violations. Sixteen council members abstained.

55. Allemagne: procès d'une adolescente liée au groupe EI

Radio France Internationale, 2016 10 22

Berlin - Enfant déjà, elle était une star salafiste. Des vidéos la montrent à sept ans, un voile sur la tête, en train de réciter le Coran. Cette fille d'un Allemand converti à l'islam et d'une Marocaine très croyante grandit dans les milieux salafistes où elle rencontre ceux qui vont contribuer à sa radicalisation. C'est en novembre 2015 qu'elle aurait fait allégeance à l'organisation Etat islamique. Elle se félicite des attentats de Paris. En janvier dernier, elle prend l'avion pour la Turquie afin de gagner la Syrie et le jihad comme son frère. Elle est arrêtée à Istanbul ; sa mère la ramène en Allemagne. C'est en février qu'elle attaque des policiers à la gare de Hanovre. Un policier est gravement blessé à la gorge avec un couteau. Une opération commanditée par l'organisation Etat islamique d'après les enquêteurs, même si l'EI ne l'a pas revendiquée.

56. Le Conseil constitutionnel dit non à la surveillance de masse sans contrôle

Le Monde, Jean-Baptiste Jacquin, 2016 10 22

Paris - C'est un petit article de loi en vigueur depuis vingt-cinq ans que le Conseil constitutionnel a censuré dans une décision rendue vendredi 21 octobre. Cet article permettait tout bonnement aux services de renseignement de procéder sans le moindre contrôle à la surveillance de communications par voie hertzienne. Les gardiens de la Constitution le déclarent contraire à l'article 2 de la Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen de 1789 en portant « une atteinte manifestement disproportionnée au droit au respect de la vie privée et au secret des correspondances ». Ils le déclarent inconstitutionnel et demandent au législateur d'élaborer un nouveau texte d'ici au 31 décembre 2017. Au nom de « la défense des intérêts nationaux », les pouvoirs publics pouvaient ainsi surveiller les déplacements de sous-marins étrangers ou les mouvements de troupes sur un théâtre d'opération, mais également des communications par téléphone mobile entre particuliers, des échanges par Wi-Fi ou Bluetooth. Rebaptisé article L. 811-5 dans la loi renseignement de juillet 2015, cet article permettait aux services de renseignement de s'affranchir des contrôles que cette loi imposait, en précisant, par exemple, que la surveillance de particuliers ne peut être autorisée par le premier ministre qu'après avis de la Commission nationale de contrôle des techniques de renseignement (CNCTR). C'est en invoquant cette disposition particulièrement floue que Bernard Squarcini, l'ancien patron de la Direction centrale du renseignement intérieur (DCRI), avait pris la liberté de procéder à des écoutes dans l'affaire des fadettes du Monde . Lors du débat sur la loi renseignement de 2015, quelques mois après les attentats contre Charlie Hebdo et l'Hyper Cacher, personne ne semblait s'être intéressé à cet article introduit par la loi de 1991 sur le secret des correspondances. Cette dernière avait elle-même été votée après le scandale des écoutes de l'Élysée où François Mitterrand avait fait écouter des personnalités, dont le journaliste du Monde Edwy Plenel.

57. Renseignement : veto sur les surveillances hertziennes

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 10 22

Paris - Taillée sur mesure pour permettre aux services de capter des informations en utilisant des moyens spéciaux en toute légalité dans un cadre administratif, la loi renseignement concoctée par Jean-Jacques Urvoas - quand ce dernier était encore président de la commission des lois de l'Assemblée nationale - est fondée sur le sacro-saint principe de proportionnalité entre ce que peuvent faire les espions et les garde-fous censés encadrer leurs intrusives missions. C'est justement en se fondant sur cette notion centrale d'équilibre que le Conseil constitutionnel a censuré vendredi un article de cette loi votée six mois après les attentats de janvier 2015 au motif que la « surveillance et le contrôle » des communications hertziennes portent « une atteinte manifestement disproportionnée au droit au respect de la vie privée et au secret des correspondances » prévu à l'article 2 de la Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen de 1789. Les Sages du Palais-Royal étaient saisis depuis le printemps dernier d'une question prioritaire de constitutionnalité (QPC) déposée par trois associations, dont French Data Network et La Quadrature du Net, à l'origine de la procédure.

58. La rédaction face à l'iconographie terroriste

Le Monde, F. No., 2016 10 22

Analyse: « Le traitement du terrorisme dans Le Monde : quelle visibilité donner aux auteurs d'actes terroristes (photos, textes...)? Où mettre le curseur dans ce que nous publions et ce que nous refusons de publier? » : tel était, mardi 20 septembre, le sujet du comité de rédaction auquel, comme le veut la tradition, le conseil de gérance de la Société des rédacteurs du Monde (SRM) conviait l'ensemble de la rédaction. Ce comité de rédaction, précisait le conseil de la SRM, « est apparu souhaitable à la suite de l'éditorial de Jérôme Fenoglio "Résister à la stratégie de la haine", paru dans Le Monde (daté 28 juillet) . Le même jour, était-il rappelé, le directeur du Monde avait adressé un courriel au personnel de la Société éditrice du Monde dans lequel il précisait sa position. « Je vous confirme, écrivait alors Jérôme Fenoglio , que je souhaite que l'on ne publie plus, sur tous nos supports, des photographies de terroristes que nous pouvions faire paraître dans un passé encore récent. Cette demande porte principalement sur des images tirées de leur vie quotidienne ou sur celles, souvent prises par eux-mêmes, précédant leur passage à l'acte. » Au cours du comité de rédaction qui eut donc lieu, vacances estivales obligent, deux mois plus tard, plusieurs journalistes ont exprimé leur désaccord avec cette prise de position. Leurs commentaires ou critiques, résumés ici de manière très succincte sous forme de citations, portaient pour l'essentiel sur cinq points : 1. « Le journalisme, c'est du pragmatisme permanent. » Edicter des règles, c'est « prendre le risque de mettre en avant nos contradictions . « La compassion n'aide pas à la compréhension. » Il faut « se méfier des injonctions de bienveillance, tant de la part des lecteurs que dans les commentaires » publiés au bas des articles, sur le site du Monde . 2. « Ne pas montrer, c'est s'interdire de regarder et de comprendre ce qui se passe. » Avec ce corollaire : il importe de toujours veiller à « la concordance » entre l'article et la photo qui l'accompagne. Une photo doit être publiée « uniquement si elle a une valeur informative . « Puisqu'on ne publie pas des photos transmises par les services de communication des entreprises, pourquoi faudrait-il publier des photos diffusées par Daech? »

59. Norwegian ISIS fighter 'murdered two-year-old stepson'

The Local.no, 2016 10 22

Olso - A Norwegian Islamist fighting in Syria murdered the two-year-old son of a rival, after marrying the man's ex-wife, journalist Åsne Seierstad has claimed in her new book, Two Sisters. According to Seierstad, Bastian Vasquez killed the son of Arfan Bhatti, a leading figure in the Norwegian Islamist group Profetens Ummah, after the boy came to Syria with his mother to engage in Jihad. Vasquez was then executed by ISIS for the crime. The sensational new claim about the Chilean-Norwegian Islamist, who before his death last year was believed to be one of the most senior European figures in the Islamic State hierarchy, is a side-story to Seierstad's investigation into the two teenage sisters who went from Norway to Syria in 2013. According to the book, the boy's mother Aisha Shezadi, was first married to Bhatti, but then went voluntarily to Syria where she became Vasquez's second wife. Before his death, Vasquez presented some of ISIS's most disturbing propaganda videos. In one, he first shows a group of captives imprisoned in a building, and then shows the building being blown up as he laughs and praises Allah. After the videos were published, Vasquez was charged under Norway's anti-terror laws. Bhatti as a teenager was a member of Oslo's Young Guns gang, and in 2006 was charged for firing shots at the Oslo Synagogue and the Israeli and US embassies. He resurfaced as an Islamist in 2012. Åsne Seierstad is most famous internationally for the Bookseller of Kabul, which she published in 2002, but is also known in Norway for her book on the mass killer Anders Breivik, and her reports from Iraq and Chechnya.

60. Bavarian agency increases surveillance of anti-government extremists

Deutsche Presse-Agentur, 2016 10 22

Munich - Authorities in the German state of Bavaria are due to increase surveillance of anti-government extremists following a deadly shooting last Wednesday, the head of the state's intelligence agency has told dpa. The shooting, which saw a 49-year-old fire at four policemen, killing one, took place in the small town of Georgensgmünd near Nuremberg. "Surveillance of the Reich Citizens' Movement was already intensified in the last months, but now we will increase it again," Burkhard Koerner, the head of Bavaria's Office for the Protection of the Constitution, said. "In this scene there are people who become increasingly radicalised and their irritation at the state of things can grow into real hatred of the state," Koerner said. "That's why I have said it many times in the last months: it may not all be extremism, but there are people involved here who are dangerous." Koerner's agency says that 30 to 40 members of the Reich Citizens' Movement are also part of the state's right-wing extremist scene, but the total number of people in the movement remains unknown. "We particularly want to look at how many people involved have gun licences," Koerner said.

61. Belgian shopping mall evacuated after man fires rifle in store

Reuters News, 2016 10 22

Brussels - A Belgian shopping centre was evacuated on Saturday after a man opened fire with a Kalashnikov rifle in a store in Chatelaineau, 50 km (35 miles) south of Brussels, Belgian media reported. Police escorted dozens of shoppers out of the Cora mall after assailants burst into the store on Saturday morning in an apparent robbery attempt, national news agency Belga reported. There were conflicting reports on the number of assailants, with RTL News citing the police commissioner as saying several gunmen were inside the store. Local paper La Gazette cited unnamed sources saying there were three. "Shots were fired with a Kalashnikov," Mayor Daniel Vanderlick told RTL.

62. A role for Turkey in Mosul fight?

The Washington Post, Thomas Gibbons-Neff, 2016 10 22

Ankara, Turkey - Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter said during a visit here Friday that Turkey should have a role in the campaign to retake the Iraqi city of Mosul from the Islamic State, a move that could put the United States at odds with Iraq as officials in Baghdad become increasingly hostile to any Turkish presence in their country. "There's an agreement there in principle, but now we have to work down to practicalities," Carter told reporters before departing for the United Arab Emirates. Earlier in the day he met with Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, Prime Minister Binali Yildirim and Defense Minister Fikri Isik to discuss Turkey's role in the fight against the Islamic State. Carter's suggestion came after Iraqi Prime Haider al-Abadi and Erdogan traded barbs over a contingent of roughly 500 Turkish troops, stationed north of Mosul, who have been training Kurdish peshmerga fighters and Arab militias since last year. The Iraqi government has said the Turkish garrison is unauthorized and has demanded that those forces leave. Recent protests in Baghdad called the Turkish presence an "occupation" force, according to an Associated Press report.

63. NATO Adds New Chief of Intelligence

The Wall Street Journal, Julian E. Barnes, 2016 10 22

Brussels - The North Atlantic Treaty Organization appointed its first intelligence chief, a post designed to help the alliance improve information sharing and counterterrorism coordination. Officials said Friday that alliance Secretary-General Jens Stoltenberg was appointing longtime German diplomat Arndt Freytag von Loringhoven as assistant secretary-general for intelligence and security. Mr. von Loringhoven served as vice president of Germany's Federal Intelligence Service from 2007 to 2010. Officials have said the post will focus initially on improving intelligence sharing on Russia's military buildup, as well as addressing duplication in civilian and military intelligence efforts. The new post could also help improve counterterrorism intelligence sharing -- pushing NATO into an area often left to bilateral cooperation.

CSIS in the News/Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. New anti-terrorism bill abandons Liberal call for real-time parliamentary ‘oversight’ into CSIS operations

Ottawa Citizen Online, Ian McLeod, 2016 10 30

Ottawa - The cornerstone of the Liberals’ promised national security reforms — parliamentary “oversight” of federal spy activities — would not allow lawmakers to scrutinize the most potentially troubling of those actions until after they’re completed, if at all. The criticism is one of several expected to be voiced this week over Bill C-22, which will set up a committee of MPs and senators to monitor the country’s spooks. The panel — whose members will have to pass security checks — is intended to police the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and 16 other federal entities with national security responsibilities, many of which now operate without independent scrutiny. Its mandate also extends to examining the “legislative, regulatory, policy, administrative and financial framework for national security and intelligence.” The Commons public safety committee begins public hearings on the bill Tuesday. While national security experts praise C-22 for seeking to make spies more accountable, the New Democratic Party is expected to call for at least five significant amendments, starting with the removal of eight exemptions the government can claim to deny committee requests for information. They include the seemingly vast category of “special operational information,” which critics call a “catch-all” standard to block disclosure. Ministers also can prevent the committee from reviewing any information that “would be injurious to national security.”

2. Raised in Senegal, radicalized in Canada

Toronto Star, Allan Woods, 2016 10 30

Toronto - As the child of a Senegalese diplomat, Assane Kamara was accustomed to finding his place in unfamiliar lands. In his 24 years, he had lived in Ivory Coast, Haiti, Dominican Republic and Madagascar. But his privileged upbringing veered off course in 2014, prompting his worried mother to launch a search for her son, and leading her from the family home in Dakar, the Senegalese capital, to Friday prayers in an Edmonton mosque. As she forced him to return home, a member of the Kamara family said that the questions swirled. What had become of the young man sent for an education at Quebec’s Université de Sherbrooke? Why had he cut contact with his family and moved to western Canada? And who were the devout Canadian Muslims he now counted as his closest friends? In the months following the intervention, three of those friends - Samir Halilovic, Zakria Habibi and Youssef Sakhir - would flee Canada to try and join Daesh, the Islamic terror group in Syria and Iraq. Today, Kamara sits in a Dakar jail facing terrorism charges that were laid in February 2016, based on allegations he had planned to join a jihadist group, Henry Boumy Ciss, a spokesperson for Senegal’s National Police, told the Star. It was Kamara’s mother who asked police to investigate, Boumy Ciss said. The charges against Kamara have not been tested in court. His Senegalese lawyer did not respond to repeated requests for comment for this story, which is based on interviews with police, friends and family of Kamara and those of his Canadian acquaintances. Under questioning by Senegalese police, Kamara is alleged to have identified Halilovic, Habibi and Sakhir as people with whom he had ties in Sherbrooke, Boumy Ciss said.

3. Extremism ‘motivated by jihadist beliefs’ top source of Canadian terrorism since 2010, study says

The National Post Online, Stewart Bell, 2016 10 30

Toronto - Religious extremism has become the top motive for Canadian terrorism, replacing environmentalism, according to an academic study prepared for Public Safety Canada. While environmentalist causes were the main driver of Canadian terrorist incidents in the 1990s and 2000s, religious motives have taken over the lead since 2010, the study found. Between 2010 and 2015, 29 per cent of terrorist incidents were religiously motivated while 7 per cent were categorized as "anarchist," and 3 per cent were "supremacist." The motives for 61% were unknown. All "religious" terrorism dating back to 2001 was "motivated by jihadist beliefs," said the March 2016 study, obtained by the National Post under the Access to Information Act. The Canadian Network for Research on Terrorism, Security and Society conducted the study for the government for officials preparing the 2016 Public Report on the Terrorist Threat to Canada. "Since their emergence in the 1980s, environmentalist-motivated incidents have been slowly increasing as a proportion of overall terrorist activity," said the study. "This trend shifted, however, in 2010-2015, when religious attacks emerged as the most prominent type of terrorism, along with pockets of anarchist and supremacist activity." The 2010 Ottawa plot to conduct bombings for al-Qaida, the 2013 plot to attack a Toronto-bound passenger train and the 2014 killings of Canadian Forces members by ISIL-inspired terrorists all occurred during that time frame.

4. Canadians in dark over voter data use - Commons committee says it will study whether parties need rules to protect public's privacy

The Toronto Star, 2016 10 30

Ottawa - As Parliament considers peering into political parties' collection and use of sensitive personal information about citizens, those parties are busy developing more powerful and sophisticated tools to track voter data. Canada has virtually no rules governing how political parties collect, use and share information about voters they meet on the doorstep, hear from on issues, or observe on social media. In fact, Canadians are largely in the dark about what kinds of information parties collect and how they use it. But a House of Commons committee plans to study whether parties should have some basic rules for collecting - and protecting - private information like political beliefs, financial information, family makeup and contact information from millions of citizens. Daniel Blaikie, the New Democrat MP who suggested the study, said multiple witnesses brought the issue to the Access to Information and Ethics committee during a review of the Privacy Act this year. "Part of (the concern) is just that it is just something where there isn't a lot known," Blaikie said in an interview Thursday. "Witnesses had expressed a lack of knowledge of where exactly (the data) goes," Blaikie said. "So the idea was really just to get a better idea, if there was going to be regulation, where would you put it and how would it work." How much of an appetite Parliament has to debate the issue, however, remains to be seen. All three major parties have a strong interest in keeping secret the specifics of their data operations.

5. Justice Dept. Warned F.B.I. About Timing

The New York Times, Matt Apuzzo, 2016 10 30

Washington - The day before the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, sent a letter to Congress announcing that new evidence had been discovered that might be related to the completed Hillary Clinton email investigation, the Justice Department strongly discouraged the step and told him that he would be breaking with longstanding policy, three law enforcement officials said on Saturday. Senior Justice Department officials did not move to stop him from sending the letter, officials said, but they did everything short of it, pointing to policies against talking about current criminal investigations or being seen as meddling in elections. That Mr. Comey moved ahead despite those protestations underscores the unusual nature of Friday's revelations, which added a dramatic twist to the final days of the presidential campaign. His action reignited a firestorm that Mrs. Clinton believed she had put behind her when the F.B.I. decided in July not to charge anyone in the investigation into the handling of classified information on her private email server. Mr. Comey's letter did not reopen that inquiry, even as he promised to review the new information, which was discovered in an unrelated investigation into the disgraced former congressman Anthony D. Weiner.

6. James Comey broke with Loretta Lynch and Justice Department tradition

The New Yorker, Jane Mayer, 2016 10 30

Washington - On Friday, James Comey, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, acting independently of Attorney General Loretta Lynch, sent a letter to Congress saying that the F.B.I. had discovered e-mails that were potentially relevant to the investigation of Hillary Clinton's private server. Coming less than two weeks before the Presidential election, Comey's decision to make public new evidence that may raise additional legal questions about Clinton was contrary to the views of the Attorney General, according to a well-informed Administration official. Lynch expressed her preference that Comey follow the department's longstanding practice of not commenting on ongoing investigations, and not taking any action that could influence the outcome of an election, but he said that he felt compelled to do otherwise. Comey's decision is a striking break with the policies of the Department of Justice, according to current and former federal legal officials. Comey, who is a Republican appointee of President Obama, has a reputation for integrity and independence, but his latest action is stirring an extraordinary level of concern among legal authorities, who see it as potentially affecting the outcome of the Presidential and congressional elections. "You don't do this," one former senior Justice Department official exclaimed. "It's aberrational. It violates decades of practice." The reason, according to the former official, who asked not to be identified because of ongoing cases involving the department, "is because it impugns the integrity and reputation of the candidate, even though there's no finding by a court, or in this instance even an indictment." Traditionally, the Justice Department has advised prosecutors and law enforcement to avoid any appearance of meddling in the outcome of elections, even if it means holding off on pressing cases. One former senior official recalled that Janet Reno, the Attorney General under Bill Clinton, "completely shut down" the prosecution of a politically sensitive criminal target prior to an election. "She was adamant—anything that could influence the election had to go dark," the former official said.

7. N.S.A. Appears to Have Missed 'Big Red Flags' in Suspect's Behavior

The New York Times, Scott Shane, 2016 10 30

Washington - Year after year, both in his messy personal life and his brazen theft of classified documents from the National Security Agency, Harold T. Martin III put to the test the government's costly system for protecting secrets. And year after year, the system failed. Mr. Martin got and kept a top-secret security clearance despite a record that included drinking problems, a drunken-driving arrest, two divorces, unpaid tax bills, a charge of computer harassment and a bizarre episode in which he posed as a police officer in a traffic dispute. Under clearance rules, such events should have triggered closer scrutiny by the security agencies where he worked as a contractor. Yet even after extensive leaks by Pfc. Bradley Manning in 2010 and Edward Snowden in 2013 prompted new layers of safeguards, Mr. Martin was able to walk out of the N.S.A. with highly classified material, adding it to the jumbled piles in his house, shed and car. A federal judge in Baltimore ruled on Friday that Mr. Martin, 51, must remain jailed on charges of stealing government documents and mishandling classified information over two decades. Prosecutors say they will add new charges under the Espionage Act. Mr. Martin, whose arrest in August was disclosed by The New York Times this month, has admitted to taking the material but denies giving secrets to anyone else.

8. WikiLeaks Lays Bare a Clinton Insider's Emphatic Cheers and Jeers

The New York Times, Nicholas Confessore & Steve Eder, 2016 10 30

Washington - In one note, Neera Tanden grouched that whoever had let Hillary Clinton use a private email address for her State Department correspondence should be "drawn and quartered." In another, she called for Mrs. Clinton to stop stalling on whether she opposed the Keystone pipeline, worrying that "dodging another issue" would hurt her in the Democratic primaries. And when Mrs. Clinton's team dallied over whether to publicly criticize David Brock, a longtime ally, for demanding Senator Bernie Sanders's medical records, Ms. Tanden was blunt. "Hillary. God," Ms. Tanden wrote. "Her instincts are suboptimal." Ms. Tanden, 46, a longtime policy adviser to Mrs. Clinton, is well known on Twitter and cable news for her peppery defenses of Mrs. Clinton and her sarcastic takedowns of Mrs. Clinton's perceived adversaries. But her private communications with some of Mrs. Clinton's campaign aides, stolen from campaign chairman John D. Podesta and published over the last month by the activist group WikiLeaks, have revealed another side. In a sphere encrusted with suck-ups, soothers, and self-puffery, Ms. Tanden has emerged as a loyal but insistent straight-talker and acute assessor of Mrs. Clinton's stubbornness and weaknesses.

9. The next president and the Middle East

The Washington Post, 2016 10 30

Editorial: The self-defeating passivity of President Obama's policies in the Middle East may have reached its apotheosis earlier this month at a National Security Council meeting that he chaired. On the table were options for responding to the bloody and criminal assault on the Syrian city of Aleppo, including grounding the Syrian air force with missile or air strikes, or supplying more advanced weapons to CIA-backed rebels. In the end, Mr. Obama chose neither to approve nor reject the measures; instead, he decided not to decide. History will record that as 250,000 people and their homes and hospitals were subjected to systematic bombing with white phosphorus and bunker-busters, and hundreds of children were reported killed, this U.S. president was unable even to affirmatively choose not to respond. The political exhaustion evident in that episode extends to U.S. policy throughout the Middle East. Although U.S. air and special forces are backing an Iraq-led offensive to recapture the Iraqi city of Mosul from the Islamic State, the administration has declined to arbitrate the crucial question of how the city - and Iraq - will be secured and governed after the battle is over. It is doing next to nothing to end the civil wars in Libya and Yemen, and its only strategy for Syria is the discredited figment that Russia and Iran will support a political transition that strips the Bashar al-Assad regime of power.

10. Children put in care after Met's extremist hunt

The Sunday Times, Richard Kerbaj, 2016 10 30

London - Up to 50 families have been taken to the family courts by counterterrorism police and in some cases children who were feared to be at risk of being radicalised have been removed from their parents, one of Britain's most senior officers has revealed. In an interview with The Sunday Times, Mark Rowley, assistant commissioner for specialist operations at the Metropolitan police and head of national counterterrorism policing, said it illustrated the scale of the threat of homegrown Islamic extremism. "The most extreme cases that end up ... with children being made wards of courts or care proceedings is real tricky stuff because we've never had to deal with national security issues before in a family court ... We had never done [a case] before 2015 but ... the fact that it's [now] into 40 or 50 cases is illustrative of the scale of the problem," he said. "Now we're seeing young children and teenagers who have been influenced by propaganda and who need support. Sometimes, frankly, their parents are part of the problem and sometimes it's happening despite their parents' best efforts — there's both types of examples out there." Some of the cases involved infants and young teenagers who had been made wards of court after their parents tried to take them to Syria to join terrorist groups. Rowley said one couple had been arrested at Luton airport last week on suspicion of trying to fly with their five children to Syria. "The mother and father have got some very unsavoury associates but there are five children who were going to probably end up somewhere like Raqqa [in Syria] or Mosul [in Iraq] and that would have been awful for them," he said. More than 700 British people have travelled to Syria and Iraq to join groups such as Isis since 2014, although the rate has been falling.

11. The spy who couldn't spell: how the biggest heist in the history of US espionage was foiled

The Guardian, 2016 10 26

London - The classrooms and hallways of Farmingdale High in Long Island were deserted on the morning of Saturday 19 August 2001, when a van pulled into the school's parking lot. Turning off the engine, the driver – a tall man in his late 30s – stepped out into the warm summer sun. He cast a sweeping gaze upon the institution he had graduated from two decades earlier. Whatever nostalgia he might have felt for his old school was tinged with bitterness. It was here that he had suffered some of life's early humiliations: taunted by classmates for his apparent dimwittedness; held in low esteem by his teachers. If they remembered him at all, they would remember him as the boy who had difficulty reading. The boy who was so bad with spellings. His bearish frame may have protected him from physical bullying, but combined with his severe dyslexia and his social awkwardness, it had also cemented his image as a dolt. That image had stuck with him, despite a successful career in US intelligence, where he had been given access to some of the country's most valued secrets. Being underestimated – by family, classmates and colleagues – had been the theme of his life, a curse he had borne silently since childhood. But for the mission he had now embarked upon, it was a blessing. None of his co-workers or managers in the intelligence community could have imagined that he of all people was capable of masterminding a complex espionage plot. From the parking lot, he walked to the edge of the school grounds. Squeezing through a hole in the barbed wire fence next to the handball courts, he stepped into a wooded area that separated the nearby highway from the school perimeter. Walking a few yards, he stopped by a tree and dug a hole in the ground. He took a laminated list of phone numbers out of his pocket and buried it there before walking back to his van, confident that nobody had seen him. He had already pulled off what was then the biggest heist of classified information in the history of American espionage. In just a few days, he hoped to execute the final step of a meticulous plan to exchange those secrets for millions of dollars. If he succeeded, he would have enough money to pay off the mortgages of his brothers and sisters, settle his personal debts and secure the financial future of his children.

12. MI6 snub for Boris Johnson and David Davis: Intelligence services are 'wary' of giving information about Brexit to the Cabinet members

The Daily Mail On Sunday, 2016 10 30

London - They are two of the most outspoken Cabinet Ministers – so perhaps it is not surprising that Britain's spooks are wary of Brexit Secretary David Davis and Foreign Secretary Boris Johnson. Senior Whitehall sources say information obtained by the intelligence services about the Brexit negotiation strategies being plotted by the French and German governments is being kept from Mr Davis and Mr Johnson in case they blurt it out – or foreign intelligence services intercept their calls. Instead, they claim, the details are being restricted to Prime Minister Theresa May, her No 10 officials and senior civil servants. It is the latest indication of splits in the Government over the Brexit process and comes just days after it was revealed that Mr Davis had been warned by his permanent secretary, Oliver Robbins, that he should expect other EU member states to spy on his activities. Last night, spokesmen for Mr Davis and Mr Johnson denied information was being hidden from Cabinet Ministers.

13. Why do we still accept that governments collect and snoop on our data?

The Guardian, Scarlet Kim, 2016 10 30

Comment: In recent weeks, the Hollywood film about Edward Snowden and the movement to pardon the NSA whistleblower have renewed worldwide attention on the scope and substance of government surveillance programs. In the United States, however, the debate has often been a narrow one, focused on the rights of Americans under domestic law but mostly blind to the privacy rights of millions of others affected by this surveillance. Indeed, just last week, a British court held that British intelligence agencies acted unlawfully by concealing bulk spying programs from the public for over a decade. Soon, in a lawsuit brought by Privacy International, the ACLU and eight other organizations, the influential European court of human rights will also weigh in on surveillance programs revealed by Snowden, and the result could have implications far beyond Europe. Although the debate in the US has led to some piecemeal reforms – including the USA Freedom Act and modest policy changes – many of the most intrusive government surveillance programs remain largely intact. These include programs conducted not just by the NSA, but also by its close partner in the United Kingdom, called the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), with whom the NSA swaps vast sets of private data. This bulk surveillance violates rights to privacy and freedom of expression – rights that are guaranteed not only under US domestic law, but also under international human rights law. That latter legal framework speaks a universal language, enumerating fundamental rights that every person enjoys by virtue of our common humanity.

14. China, Aust look to fight financial crime

Australian Associated Press, 2016 10 30

Canberra - Money laundering, terrorism and cybercrime are on the agenda for Justice Minister Michael Keenan as he visits China over the coming week. The cabinet minister will meet counterparts in Beijing, Guangzhou and Shenzhen for a series of talks aimed at strengthening law enforcement ties and combating transnational crime. He will also learn how China has been countering violent extremism and preventing radicalisation with its counter-terrorism laws. "It is more important than ever that we, as an international community, continue to work together to combat the threat from extremists whilst rejecting those who seek to impose their world view on others through intimidation and violence," Mr Keenan told AAP in a statement.

15. Boat asylum seeker ban 'cruel': advocate

Australian Associated Press, 2016 10 30

Melbourne - Laws that would permanently ban asylum seekers entering Australia, if they arrived by boat, are "deliberately cruel to innocent people", human rights advocates say. Human Rights Law Centre's director of legal advocacy, Daniel Webb, says the proposal would terrify people already living in the community and rip families apart. "Those who are already here rebuilding their lives in our communities must be allowed to stay," he told reporters in Melbourne on Sunday. "Those who've spent three years on a painful road to nowhere on Nauru and Manus should be brought back to safety in Australia." People who need protection shouldn't be punished for seeking help, Mr Webb said. "We need to open up safe pathways to protection, rather than just closing unsafe ways," he said.

16. Taliban mortar kill 7 a family in Baghlan province of Afghanistan

Khaama Press, 2016 10 30

Kabul - A mortar fired by the Taliban militants left at least 7 members of a family dead in northern Baghlan province of Afghanistan, local officials said. The incident took place in Baghlan-e-Markazi district after the mortar round hit a residential house. The district administrative chief Gawhar Khan Baburi said the incident took place earlier today, leaving 7 civilians dead, including a women and four children. He said another minor girl was also wounded in the attack but did not say anything about her health condition. The Taliban militants group has not commented regarding the incident so far. Taliban insurgents are actively operating in a number of the remote districts of Baghlan province including in Baghlan-e-Markazi and frequently carry out insurgency activities.

17. Al-Qaeda leader targeted in Afghanistan kept low profile but worried spies

The Washington Post, Wesley Morgan, 2016 10 30

Kabul - When Army Capt. Hugh Miller heard a group of police officers trading stories about a militant called Farouq al-Qahtani at their base in Afghanistan's Konar province one day four years ago, he didn't know what all the fuss was about. "I don't think I even sent a report up about it," Miller, who was deployed as a combat adviser at the time, said in a recent interview. "I didn't know the guy was a big deal." Qahtani, a Saudi native with a Qatari passport whose real name was Nayef Salam Muhammad Ujaym al-Hababi, was targeted on Oct. 23 in an airstrike in Konar's remote Helgal valley, the Pentagon announced Wednesday. Little-known outside counterterrorism circles, he was indeed a big deal: Though only in his mid-30s, Qahtani was thought to be the senior al-Qaeda operative remaining in Afghanistan at a time when many of the group's bigwigs had decamped for Syria, and U.S. government documents suggest he may have been involved in plotting attacks abroad. Konar and neighboring Nuristan, which blend together in the jagged 12,000-foot mountains that Qahtani has frequented for the past six years, have been the scene of some of the costliest and most publicized episodes of the American war in Afghanistan: Operation Red Wings, where 19 Special Operations members were killed; the many firefights in the infamous Korengal valley, where the documentary "Restrepo" was filmed; the battles of Wanat and Ganjgal, which led to both acrimonious investigations and high-profile awards for combat heroism. Among the trove of documents that JSOC operators took from the Abbottabad compound were letters between bin Laden and al-Qaeda's operations chief at the time, Atiyah Abd al-Rahman. In one of these, Rahman wrote to bin Laden about efforts that were underway to relocate some al-Qaeda operatives from Pakistan's tribal areas, where the CIA's drone campaign was taking a heavy toll, to Konar and Nuristan

18. Philippines Arrests Four More Suspects in Davao City Bombing

Bloomberg News, Ian C Sayson, 2016 10 29

Manila - Four more suspects in last month's deadly bombing in Davao City were arrested Saturday in a joint operation of the Philippines' military, police and national intelligence agency, the Army's office of public affairs said. The suspects were caught in different locations in the southern city of Cotabato, where three terrorists allegedly behind the Davao blast were arrested on Oct. 4, the Army said in an e-mail. The four were members of the Dawla Islamiya Fi Cotabato-Maute Group.

19. Philippine Mayor Accused of Drug Links by Duterte Is Killed by Police

The New York Times, Richard C. Paddock & Felipe Villamor, 2016 10 29

Manila - After President Rodrigo Duterte publicly named him as a drug suspect last summer, the mayor of a small Philippine town said he was not worried. "If you are not guilty, why should you be afraid?" the mayor, Samsudin Dimaukom, told The New York Times in August. On Friday, he and nine other men were shot dead at a highway police checkpoint, in what the police described as an antidrug operation. Mr. Dimaukom and his companions are among about 2,000 people who have been killed in Mr. Duterte's campaign against drugs since he took office on June 30. The bloody campaign has been criticized by foreign governments, including the United States, as well as by the United Nations and international human rights groups.

20. U.S. diplomat handling missile defense meets Seoul officials over N.K. nukes
Yonhap News, 2016 10 29

Seoul - Frank Rose, a senior U.S. diplomat handling missile defense issues, held talks with South Korean officials Friday to discuss how to respond to North Korea's nuclear and missile threats, Seoul officials said. Rose, assistant secretary of state for arms control, verification and compliance, met with Yoo Jeh-seung, the South Korean deputy defense minister for policy, to discuss Seoul-Washington cooperation against North Korea's threats, they said. The U.S. diplomat arrived in Seoul earlier in the day for a two-day stay as one of the legs of his trip to Asia and the Middle East on Oct. 25-Nov. 7. He visited Japan before arriving in South Korea. Rose is known to have discussed the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) issue, according to a government source.

21. 2 militants killed, 8 soldiers wounded in clashes with Islamic fighters in southern Philippines
Xinhua News Agency, 2016 10 30

Manila - The Philippine military said Sunday that two militants were killed and eight soldiers wounded in fightings between troops and Abu Sayyaf rebels in the southern Philippine province of Sulu. Army Maj. Filemon Tan, spokesman for the Philippine armed forces, said in a statement that two Abu Sayyaf fighters were killed in a brief firefight in Indanan, a town in Sulu on Sunday morning, bringing the total number of dead Abu Sayyaf fighters to 38 since the new government launched a renewed offensive against the criminal group in July. Tan said that eight soldiers were wounded in another clash that broke out in Patikul town, also in Sulu. He said the military could not say whether there were militants killed in the incident, saying there are still sporadic fighting until around 3 p.m. Sunday. The military used artillery and attack helicopters in both clashes in a bid to trap the militants, he said. In the Indanan clash where two militants were killed, Tan said the military recovered an M16 assault rifle, an M203 grenade launcher and an improvised explosive device.

22. Samajwadi Party MP's aide arrested for passing crucial documents
Financial Express, 2016 10 30

New Delhi - The crime branch of the Delhi Police, which is probing the spy ring that has led to Pakistan High Commission has arrested a personal assistant of Samajwadi Party Rajya Sabha MP Munavvar Saleem for passing crucial documents to Pakistan mission staffers. According to the police, Farhat played an important role in the in espionage and provided documents to mission staffers which included Mehmood Akhtar, whom the government declared persona non grata and ordered to leave the country. He was caught receiving classified papers last Wednesday. A Delhi court on Saturday sent Farhat to ten day police custody. Speaking to reporters Munavvar Saleem, said he was not aware of such activities of his personal assistant and will extend all cooperations to probing agencies. Adding that Farhat had also worked with four MPs before him, Munavvar Saleem said he would write to the Rajya Sabha secretariat to take away all facilities given to Farhat. Samajwadi Party spokesperson Deepak Mishra said in Lucknow that Munavvar Saleem belongs to Madhya Pradesh and his PA had no connection with the party. Farhat's is the fourth arrest in the case. Police have already arrested Maulana Ramzan and Subhash Jangir, who are from Nagaur in Rajasthan, for passing some documents to Akhtar. Another accused Shoaib, was held in Jodhpur and brought to Delhi.

23. Car explodes in eastern Libya, killing activist, 5 others

The Associated Press, 2016 10 30

Benghazi - A car exploded in the eastern city of Benghazi late Saturday, killing six people including a political activist close to a powerful general fighting Islamic extremists, officials said. The explosion rocked the downtown Benghazi district of al-Kesh which is lined with busy cafes. The blast killed activist Mohammed Bougages, who was sitting in a cafe, and five others, officials said. At least 10 others were wounded, some of whom were in critical condition. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak to the press. Bougages was a political activist and the fiery host of a daily talk show called "Frankly," which is aired on state TV. He was an outspoken supporter of General Khalifa Hifter, who has led a campaign against Islamic extremists in Benghazi since 2014.

24. Kurds, Iraqis benefits from vast network of spies within ISIS' ranks

Fox News, 2016 10 30

Northern Iraq - As a powerful coalition of forces converges on Mosul in what promises to be a fierce battle to retake ISIS' Iraqi stronghold, some players inside the black-clad jihadist army are delivering many of the most damaging blows. Beleaguered and disenfranchised ISIS fighters, cultivated for months by the Kurds, are secretly working with their adversaries, supplying key intelligence on the terror group's positioning inside Iraq's second-largest city and its battle strategy for the surrounding region. "I will give you more money for information," one senior Kurdish intelligence and security leader recently stated calmly over his cell phone from a safe house in Kirkuk, as the city outside exploded with sniper fire and suicide bombers in a recent attack aimed at diverting coalition forces from Mosul. "But remember that if you lie, if you give me wrong information, we will find you wherever you are and we will get you." The official was talking to one of his sources within the ranks of ISIS, piecing together information on where ISIS cells may strike next. The furtive conversation witnessed by FoxNews.com was no anomaly, and Kurds, in particular, are making use of agents behind enemy lines.

25. Leader's Top Aide: Iran Ready to Mediate between Turkey, Iraq

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 30

Tehran - Iranian Supreme Leader's top aide Ali Akbar Velayati announced his country's preparedness to mediate between Turkey and Iraq to prevent ignition of a new war in the region. "Iran is ready to mediate between Turkey and Iraq to prevent war," Velayati said in an interview with the Iraqi Rudaw news channel on Sunday. He also warned that Ankara's intervention in Iraq and Syria would endanger Turkey's growing economy. Tensions between Turkey and Iraq appear to be at boiling point after the Iraqi prime minister condemned Ankara's participation in retaking the ISIL-held city of Mosul. The Turkish president had previously told the Iraqi prime minister "to know his limits". "We will liberate our land through the determination of our men and not by video calls," Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi tweeted earlier this month. The mocking message was an apparent reference to Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan's appearance via a nationally broadcast video call to a TV reporter amid a failed coup attempt in July. Earlier in October, Erdogan said that Turkish forces must take part in the much-anticipated operation to retake the Iraqi city of Mosul, currently held by the ISIL terrorists. The Turkish leader then drove his point home in even stronger terms.

26. Iranian FM Underlines Unconditional Global Fight against Terrorism

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 30

Tehran - Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif stressed that all the world states are required to contribute to international efforts to annihilate the terrorist groups without any precondition. "We believe that the entire world should fight against terrorism without any condition," Zarif told reporters in Tehran on Sunday on the sidelines of a joint forum of the Iranian military attaches in other states and the country's defense and police officials. Elaborating on the recent visit by EU foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini to Tehran, he said that during her meetings, the Iranian officials underlined the necessity for fight against terrorism. Noting that Mogherini had come to Iran to exchange views, and not negotiate, on Syria, he said that the Iranian officials have briefed her about the country's views on the way of attaining a political solution, which should be based on trusting and respecting the Syrian people's demand.

27. Seeking Clues to ISIS Strategy in Corpses and Cellphones Left in Kirkuk

The New York Times, Michael Gordon, 2016 10 30

Kirkuk, Iraq — Eighty-four bodies of Islamic State fighters were piled high at the Kirkuk hospital morgue, as the pathologists went through the gruesome work of gathering intelligence on the group's sudden counterattack on the city. One by one, the corpses were removed from black body bags so fingerprints and DNA could be preserved. If no relatives come forward to claim the remains, the bodies are to be burned. A local counterterrorism unit, meanwhile, is mining the fighters' cellphones for data and trying to find any residents who might have been on the calls. They are trying to divine whether the city is still at risk of infiltration or another assault. "What they did to us inside Kirkuk was by far the worst we have ever seen," said Polad Talabani, the commander of the Kurdish counterterrorism force, which was summoned from nearby Sulaimaniya to help put down the assault that drove deep into the city's heart before dawn on Oct. 21. Beyond the militants, 116 people were killed in the fighting, including 43 police officers, 33 pesh merga and other security force personnel, and 21 civilians, among them several Iranian technicians who worked at a nearby power plant, officials said. Around 265 people were wounded.

28. Tal Afar, West of Mosul, Becomes Center of Battle for Influence in Ira

The New York Times, Tim Arango, 2016 10 30

Erbil, - Iraq — The city of Tal Afar, a weather-beaten former Ottoman military outpost not far from Mosul that has a mostly ethnic Turkmen population and has been home to a corps of Islamic State leaders, on Saturday became the focus of a growing struggle for influence in northern Iraq between Turkey and Iran. That is because Iraq's Shiite militias, some of which receive support from Iran, began on Saturday to move west of Mosul, a trajectory that would essentially cut off Islamic State fighters in Tal Afar from their bases in Syria. The Shiite militias' move toward Tal Afar could also draw Turkey deeper into the already complex battlefield around Mosul. As the two-week-old campaign to reclaim Mosul, Iraq's second largest city, from the Islamic State grinds on in outlying villages, the role of the Shiite militias, controversial because of their history of abuse toward the Sunni population, was part of a delicate set of negotiations involving the Iraqi government and the American-led coalition. Iraq's prime minister, Haider al-Abadi, agreed to allow the militias a secondary role of sealing off the desert areas west of Mosul, but not entering the city itself.

29. War pushes Yemen to partition, thwarting peace efforts

Reuters News, 2016 10 30

Dubai - Yemen has endured thousands of air strikes and the deaths of more than 10,000 people in a 19-month war that has also unleashed hunger on the desperately poor country - but its biggest challenge may be yet to come. The conflict has led to Yemen's de facto partition, with rival armies and institutions in the north and south, and could mean the map of the Middle East will have to be redrawn. A three-day truce to allow in more humanitarian aid and prepare a political settlement collapsed last week, reflecting deadlocked efforts to end the stalemated war. But behind the combatants' disagreements over how to share power, Yemen's future as a unified state appears increasingly in doubt. Such a possibility appeared remote when a coalition of Arab states began launching air strikes in March 2015 to restore to power President Abd Rabbu Mansour al-Hadi, driven from the capital, Sanaa, by the Iranian-allied Houthi movement in 2014. It seems less fanciful now. The Houthis' rise to power in the north has provoked a revival of southern separatism, a movement that sees the fracturing of state power as its moment to break away. At the same time, the south and its major city, Aden, serve as a base for the internationally recognised government, which is trying to take back national control even as it manages an uneasy alliance with the secessionists.

30. Syrians' Stark Choice: 'Doom' or the Green Bus

The New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 10 30

Beirut - The lime-green buses once ferried Syrians to school, work and dates at Damascus cafes. Now they pull up at moments of defeat, when rebel fighters and civilians, besieged and bombarded, give up their territory to government forces and board the vehicles en route to an uncertain future. The buses, once a benign, even beloved feature of the urban landscape, have become a signature of the Syrian government's starve-or-surrender strategy. In recent days, government warplanes dropped fliers on the rebel-held districts of Aleppo, offering a stark choice to the estimated 250,000 people trapped in that strategic city: "doom," represented by a photo of a bloody body, or "redemption," in the form of a green bus. Images of the buses are everywhere: on state television reports and pro-government websites celebrating the evacuations, and on opposition videos mourning what they call deportations. Women and children, or fighters with guns, peer from their windows. They cry, chant defiantly or stare into space as they leave areas that have long symbolized revolt against President Bashar al-Assad, like the recently emptied Damascus suburb of Daraya.

31. IS claims responsibility for fatal stabbing in Hamburg

Reuters News, 2016 10 30

Berlin - A follower of Islamic State was responsible for a stabbing attack on two youths in the German city of Hamburg two weeks ago, the militant group's Amaq news agency said on Sunday. In the incident, the unknown perpetrator attacked a young couple sitting under a bridge at the Alster river in downtown

Hamburg. He stabbed the 16-year-old man repeatedly from behind and kicked his 15-year-old female companion into the river. The stabbing victim died of his injuries shortly afterwards in hospital while the young woman managed to escape. "A soldier of the Islamic State stabbed two individuals in Hamburg city on the 16th of this month," Amaq said. "He carried out the operation in response to calls to target the citizens of coalition countries." A police spokeswoman in Hamburg declined to comment on Islamic State's claim and only referred to an earlier statement the police issued shortly after the attack.

32. Swedish national recruiting for ISIS in India

DNA News, Azaan Javaid, 2016 10 30

Stockholm - A Swedish national has emerged as the main recruiter of Subahani Haja Moideen, a Tamil Nadu resident who was arrested by the National Investigation agency (NIA) on terror charges earlier this month. The 31-year-old was arrested in October this year, almost a year after he returned home from Mosul in Iraq, where he had been a part of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS). According to intelligence sources, Moideen, during interrogation, said an ISIS fighter—who goes by the nom de guerre of Abu-Hafz-Al-Swedi—was his main contact person and helped him make the journey from India to Raqqa in Syria. Sources in the investigative agency said the NIA is likely to contact Swedish authorities to seek information on Swedi, as his name has cropped up for the first time during the course of their crackdown on alleged ISIS sympathisers in India. Officials said the NIA is ascertaining whether or not Swedi is in touch with other Indian nationals as well. Moideen, a resident of Tamil Nadu's Tirunelveli, had left his home in 2015, after selling a piece of land he owned and boarded a flight from Chennai to Turkey. Swedi seems to have directed Moideen to meet some of his ISIS contacts in Istanbul and, after laying low in a safe house, the 31-year-old made his journey to Raqqa along with men who had come from other countries like Pakistan, Morocco and Russia.

1. Spies in new glass houses: Ottawa's electronic espionage agency budget blows past CSIS, tops $600 million

Ottawa Citizen, Ian MacLeod, 2016 11 10

Ottawa - The federal government is spending more than half a billion dollars on its electronic spying service this year, six times its pre-9/11 budget and a reflection of how the Internet has morphed into a juicy intelligence target. The Communications Security Establishment, or CSE, is to receive $605.6 million, according to supplementary estimates tabled in Parliament. That's $22 million more than originally planned, much of it carried over from CSE's 2015-16 budget. In 2000, by comparison, the agency's annual spending stood at $97 million. What's more, the looming U.S. presidency of Donald Trump is already prompting leading national security experts Wesley Wark and Craig Forcese to suggest Canada consider enhancing its foreign intelligence capacity to be better able to resist "the gravitational pull of the U.S. alliance relationship" should it move in "an unpalatable direction," says Forcese. With more than 2,000 employees, the CSE's chief mandate is intercepting, decoding and analyzing the electronic signals emanating from adversarial foreign nations and overseas threat actors. Much of the work takes place at the agency's new $1.1-billion, 775,000-square-foot east Ottawa headquarters, a display of the importance government places on the service, which reports to the minister of national defence. The raw eavesdropping data is turned into intelligence and shared with the federal cabinet, government departments and ECHELON, the signals intelligence surveillance program of Canada, the U.S., Britain, Australia and New Zealand, the so-called Five Eyes alliance. Their main preoccupation is counter-terrorism, though Russian expansionism is rekindling targeting not seen since the end of the Cold War. Though the CSE received no new powers under the 2015 Anti-terrorism Act (formerly Bill C-51), its mandate includes providing electronic spying assistance to other security agencies and law enforcement. Security intelligence experts suspect much of whatever assistance CSE renders is for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, or CSIS, Canada's human spy service. (CSIS funding is pegged at $593.9 million for 2016-17.) While counter-terrorism is a clear priority for CSE, so too is the Internet, said Robinson. "With CSE — it's grown so much more than CSIS has — it's the arrival of the Internet and the decision of the signals intelligence world, the Five Eyes, to take that on as an intelligence target." Earlier this year, the independent watchdog agency monitoring the legality of CSE activities disclosed the agency had for years been unlawfully sharing with the Five Eyes metadata associated with Canadians' private communications. The practice was halted in 2014. The 11-member Office of the Communications Security Establishment Commissioner operates on $2.2 million in annual funding and is headed by Jean-Pierre Plouffe, a former military and Quebec court judge. William Galbraith, its executive director, said current funding is sufficient and that the office is considering adding another full-time review expert to the eight now employed.

2. No laws, no consequences: Canada's spies are spying on us

Ricochet Media, Andrew Mitrovica, 2016 11 12

Comment: Fact one: Since its birth in 1984, only one CSIS officer has ever been charged with a crime. That was in 1998. The veteran intelligence officer wriggled off the RCMP's hook when the charges he was facing were inexplicably withdrawn by the Crown on the eve of his trial. This means that in the 32 years that Canada's spy service has been spying, only one of the tens of thousands of members of that civilian agency has been accused of breaking the law. As I see it, there are two explanations. The first is that CSIS was and is populated by saints who always — cross their hearts and hope to die — obey the law in defending Canada's national security. The other, more plausible explanation, is that the men and women, but mostly men, from top to bottom at CSIS know they're above the rule of law and immune from the rod, including, apparently, the Criminal Code the rest of us must abide by. If anyone doubted that a culture of impunity is endemic at CSIS, then they're either naïve or have already discarded last week's news from the Federal Court. A judge found that for the past 10 years, the spy service illegally accessed the personal information — known as metadata — of an untold number of people who weren't the subject of a national security probe. CSIS has been operating a covert, criminal enterprise that didn't target terrorists or foreign spies, but the very Canadians it's supposed to "protect." "Ultimately, the rule of law must prevail," Justice Simon Noel wrote. "Without it, the actions of people and institutions cannot be trusted to accurately reflect the purpose they were entrusted to fulfil." Stripped of the stock euphemisms, Justice Noel told Canadians that CSIS has been operating a covert, criminal enterprise that didn't target terrorists or foreign spies, but the very Canadians it's supposed to "protect." In 2012, CSIS admitted in an affidavit that it had indeed been tapping Galati's calls with two men it considered security risks. To my knowledge, no one inside CSIS was held to account. Look, CSIS officers are so confident that they're immune from accountability that they pilfer the sensitive information of other CSIS officers.

3. La GRC a-t-elle espionné des journalistes?

Radio-Canada Nouvelles, Brigitte Bureau, 2016 11 10

Ottawa - Quand l'histoire de la surveillance des journalistes par la police de Montréal (SPVM) et la Sûreté du Québec a éclaté, des journalistes de la colline du Parlement à Ottawa ont tendu leur micro sous le nez du Commissaire de la GRC et du gouvernement Trudeau pour savoir si la GRC avait elle-aussi déjà espionné des journalistes. Sur un ton qui se voulait rassurant, le Commissaire de la GRC, Bob Paulson, le premier ministre, Justin Trudeau, et le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, ont tous répondu que ça ne se faisait pas actuellement. « Mais allez-vous vérifier les cinq dernières années? » a lancé un journaliste au ministre Goodale. Ce à quoi le ministre a répondu:« Regardez, l'enjeu c'est ce qui se passe maintenant et je peux vous assurer que ce type d'activité ne se produit pas maintenant. Je ne suis pas au courant de choses qui se sont passées quand on ne formait pas le gouvernement du Canada. » Face à cette absence de réponses, nous avons demandé directement à la GRC si, par le passé, elle avait fait de la surveillance des journalistes, qu'il s'agisse de surveillance des relevés des appels téléphoniques ou de surveillance physique (filature) ou autre. Le NPD réclame une enquête publique pour déterminer dans quelle mesure des journalistes auraient pu faire l'objet de surveillance par la GRC et le SCRS Le député Matthew Dubé, porte-parole néo-démocrate en matière de sécurité publique, soutient que le public a besoin d'être rassuré. De son côté, le gouvernement Trudeau se contente de dire qu'il est prêt à revoir la directive ministérielle de 2003 et d'étudier la question dans le cadre de sa consultation sur la sécurité nationale.

4. A little privacy, please: Keeping prying eyes out

Vancouver Sun, Tom Sandborn, 2016 11 12

Comment: Big Brother is Watching You was the ominous slogan of the all-seeing authoritarian state George Orwell imagined in his dystopian novel Nineteen Eighty-Four. Turns out the British author was not pessimistic enough. In 2016, not only is Big Brother watching us, he is collecting our email messages and metadata, listening to our phone calls, and sharing our secrets with security agencies in other countries. Meanwhile, businesses capture details about our interests every time we go online, and a new generation of cyber criminals is eager to steal our identities to open up our bank accounts. And the burgeoning world of social media is teaching the young that privacy is so 20th century, and neither important nor possible in the brave new age of Facebook. If, nonetheless, you remain attached to quaint and antique notions of privacy, and if you would just as soon some hacker in a boiler room in Ukraine or a basement in Surrey doesn't end up with your credit card numbers and identifying details, Your Right to Privacy, a slim volume from Self-Counsel Press, is a must-read. In 2014, over 17 million Americans were victims of identity theft, and during that same year, more than 25,000 Canadians were victims of identity fraud and identity theft. Research by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives' Asad Ismi and a lawsuit filed by the B.C. Civil Liberties Association suggest Communications Security Establishment Canada is reading emails to and from a number of Canadians and gathering metadata - information such as the time sent, source and addressee - on email, text and phone communications for what we can assume is an even larger number. We don't know just how large the number of Canadians is who have had their privacy invaded by government snoops, because the government refuses to divulge the numbers. We do know, however, thanks to the BCCLA (where, full disclosure, I serve on the board of directors), that the CSEC is spending over $1 billion in taxpayer dollars to build the most expensive public building in Canadian history, a spies' palace devoted to eroding the privacy of the same taxpayers who are paying the construction costs. (Note: Tom Sandborn lives and works in Vancouver. He assumes everything he says online and on the phone is on the public record through the miracle of cyber-spying. He welcomes your feedback and tips at tos65@telus.net.)

5. Vers un Canada plus militaire

La Presse, Jean-Thomas Léveillé, 2016 11 12

Chronique: Avec Donald Trump à la Maison-Blanche, la pression sera forte pour qu'Ottawa s'implique davantage sur le plan militaire, croient plusieurs anciens ambassadeurs canadiens. En revanche, bien des pays pourraient se tourner vers le Canada dans l'espoir de faire valoir une vision plus «libérale» des grands enjeux internationaux. «Les États-Unis sont la seule superpuissance qui voudrait que ses deux voisins soient plus puissants militairement qu'ils ne le sont!», s'exclame Raymond Chrétien. Washington a toujours voulu «plus de Canada sur le plan militaire» et l'arrivée de Donald Trump à la Maison-Blanche va inévitablement rendre la «pression plus forte» en ce sens, croit le célèbre diplomate canadien, qui a été l'ambassadeur du Canada aux États-Unis et au Mexique, mais aussi en France, en Belgique et au Zaïre (aujourd'hui la République démocratique du Congo). Évidemment, «si monsieur Trump voulait se lancer dans une aventure militaire avec laquelle on n'est pas d'accord», le gouvernement de Justin Trudeau «pourrait s'y opposer», assure Raymond Chrétien. L'ancien premier ministre Jean Chrétien, son oncle, l'avait notamment fait avec George W. Bush au cours de l'invasion de l'Irak, en 2003. «Mais quand il y a de la pression des États-Unis, on étudie leurs demandes avec beaucoup de soin», dit Raymond Chrétien, ancien diplomate canadien. Une partie de la communauté internationale pourrait espérer que le Canada puisse faire contrepoids face aux États-Unis de Donald Trump, mais «personne» ne peut «vraiment contrebalancer les États-Unis», croit Paul Heinbecker, ancien ambassadeur du Canada aux Nations unies et en Allemagne.

6. 'No current plans' to increase Canada immigration department staff in wake of U.S. election

Global News, Erika Tucker, 2016 11 12

Ottawa - A spokesperson for Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada told Global News Friday there are no plans to increase department staffing levels in the wake of the U.S. election results. A CBC report cited sources who said “high level meetings took place this week” with immigration officials, who were reportedly “accelerating” a plan to cope with a possible spike in Mexican migrants, given Donald Trump was elected south of the border. She said the immigration levels plan establishes the number of immigrants expected to be admitted to Canada within each year. It predicts between 280,000 and 320,000 new permanent residents will immigrate to the country in 2017 in total, but doesn't break down the numbers by country. Canadian citizenship is the next step after permanent residency. An executive with the Calgary Mexican Canadian Cultural Society doesn't expect to see an influx in applications to the country. “I don't really see that being the case in Canada,” Carlos Rios said. “Too far away, too cold...too cold—that's the main thing.” Trump's campaign platform included building a wall between the U.S. and Mexico, along with deporting illegal residents and undocumented workers.

7. Canada still committed to NATO, despite Trump's threats: Harjit Sajjan

The Canadian Press, 2016 11 12

Vancouver - The federal defence minister says Canada's commitment to NATO remains unwavering after comments on the campaign trail from U.S. president-elect Donald Trump put the future of the military alliance into question. Harjit Sajjan says he wants to reassure Canadian allies that the federal government will do its part to support the decades-old defence institution, which he says plays a significant role in global security. Trump has said that under his presidency the United States wouldn't necessarily come to the defence of a NATO ally under attack — one of the treaty's cornerstone tenets — though he has yet to clarify his position since winning the election. Sajjan says Canada and the United States enjoy a solid and wonderful defence relationship, which he doesn't expect to change under the incoming administration.

8. Expect pressure from U.S. to boost spending

National Post, Matthew Fisher, 2016 11 12

Column: Canada and the United States recalled one of the many ties that bind them Friday at Remembrance Day memorials in Washington and the Canadian Cross of Sacrifice at Arlington National Cemetery. The first ceremony remembered Capt. Joseph Benjamin Noil, an African-Canadian from Liverpool, N.S., who was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for in 1872 saving an American sailor who was drowning at sea. The memorials recalling the sacrifices shared by Canada and the U.S. in two world wars, Korea, Afghanistan and Iraq were particularly poignant, coming only three days after the election of the next American president, who has a remarkably different world view than does Canada's prime minister. Everyone knows the dynamic between presidentelect Donald Trump and Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is bound to be lesser than that between Trudeau and Barack Obama. Nobody is quite sure yet how awkward it might be. Obama willingly shared centre stage with Trudeau. Trump is a one-man band and one-man brand, his ego such that he has long regarded himself as the only superstar. It is unlikely he will allow anyone to hog his limelight, especially a young leader whose shtick consists mostly of being cool, socially and culturally sensitive and so 21st century.

9. Tough talk, less clout

Toronto Star, 2016 11 12

Editorial: Donald Trump talks tough. He complains that the United States is "very weak" and vows to "Make America Great Again." He wants to go back to a lost time, decades ago, when "we were not pushed around, we were respected by everybody." It sounds like a prescription for American assertiveness, even aggression. But it's just as likely that the United States under Trump will end up being a less engaged presence around the world. His rise may be a sign of American weakness, not strength. It's not clear what exactly Trump's foreign policy - to the extent he has one - amounts to. It's made even more complicated by the fact that he promises to be deliberately "unpredictable." Keeping your enemies guessing is part of his art-of-the-deal negotiating strategy. The problem is it keeps your friends guessing as well. What is clear is that the people who voted for Trump want him to focus on fixing domestic problems. They care about nation-building at home, not in messy foreign hot spots. They want a stronger economy, more jobs and investment in their own communities - not in Syria or Afghanistan. So it's no surprise that Trump has called into question international arrangements that depend on the U.S. backstopping allies in both Europe and Asia, and picking up much of the cost. In Europe, he's said NATO is "obsolete and extremely expensive" and questioned whether the U.S. would come to its allies' defence unless he was satisfied they had paid their full share of the bill. No wonder NATO members close to Russia - like Ukraine and the Baltic states - are trembling at the prospect of being cut loose.

10. Canada still committed to NATO despite President-elect Donald Trump

The Canadian Press, 2016 11 12

Ottawa - The federal defence minister says Canada's commitment to NATO remains unwavering after comments on the campaign trail from U.S. president-elect Donald Trump put the future of the military alliance into question. Harjit Sajjan said on Friday he wants to reassure Canadian allies that the federal government will do its part to support the decades-old defence institution, which he says continues to play a significant role in safeguarding global security. Trump has said that under his presidency the United States wouldn't necessarily come to the defence of a NATO ally under attack, which is one of the treaty's cornerstone tenets. He has yet to clarify his position since winning Tuesday's election. Sajjan said Canada and the United States enjoy a close relationship, which he doesn't expect to change under the new administration.

11. Canadian peacekeepers will serve in high-risk areas, Sajjan says

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 11 11

Ottawa - Canadian troops headed to Africa will operate in dangerous territory where peacekeepers have been killed, Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan says. In an exclusive interview with the Star from Vancouver, Sajjan said Canada has committed to a three-year deployment that will be reassessed each year to ensure it has an "enduring" impact. It will be spread among a number of unspecified African countries; have a major focus on training and increasing "capacity" of the host nation's as well as other countries' troops; and build on existing social, economic and deradicalization programs on the ground. "These missions, all of them, have the level of risk where peacekeepers have been hurt, they have been killed. And we've been looking at the risk factor in a very serious way," said Sajjan. Asked about his approach to deploying Canadian forces to conduct counter-insurgency operations - something the previous Conservative government was keen to avoid in Africa when it turned down requests to deploy soldiers to Congo and Mali - Sajjan said, "Some of it is going to be the reduction of radicalization in certain areas; in other parts it will be developing the capacity of the host nation." Just back from Mali, which hosts the deadliest United Nations mission in the world right now, Sajjan says it's clear there are risks there.

12. Trudeau-Trump will be no 'bromance' - our country will have to work for this Analysis: This week's election result surprised most Canadians, but now we need to prepare for a Trump administration. The kind of "bromance" Prime Minister Justin Trudeau developed with U.S. President Barack Obama is unlikely to be repeated. Nevertheless, Mr. Trudeau needs to personally lead Canadian efforts to exercise, as he once put it, "effective influence" in Donald Trump's Washington in order to advance Canadian objectives. Premiers and legislators have to help. Our political leadership needs to reach out to Mr. Trump's transition team and to Republican and Democratic leadership in Congress and in the states. Business and labour leaders need to step up with their counterparts to underline the shared value of our "strong integrated economies." Security: Mr. Trump expects North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies to pull their weight. The message on burden-sharing is not new, although Mr. Trump delivers it in his characteristic blunt fashion. We need to look anew at the defence review, especially the pace and scope of our fighter-jet replacement and fleet renewal. Reaching the NATO spending target is important. U.S. national security leadership will confirm that co-operation between our military, security and intelligence services is excellent. We are also contributing to the campaign against the Islamic State, putting boots on the ground in Latvia and reinvigorating Canadian peace operations.

The Globe and Mail, Colin Robertson, 2016 11 11

13. Stalemate in PS talks has both sides in tough spot

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 11

Ottawa - The Liberal government and largest federal union walked away from a marathon collective bargaining session with no deal and their backs against the wall. The Public Service Alliance of Canada pulled the plug Thursday on contract negotiations after 10 days of talks and called for a mediator to help sort out their differences. The latest breakdown leaves the union facing the prospect of a possible strike against a popular prime minister and the government struggling to fulfil its promise of a more respectful relationship with its employees while being fiscally responsible. At stake in these talks is a relationship the government and 18 unions have been trying to rebuild since Prime Minister Justin Trudeau made an election promise to restore bargaining “fairness” and respect for Canada’s public servants they argue were trampled by a decade of Conservative rule. “Both want the relationship to work. They are tired of the stress of fighting all the time and threat of legislation. It has taken its toll, and they do need a better way of working with each that is respectful and responsible,” said Ron Cochrane, the former cochair of the joint union management National Joint Council. “The last thing the union wants to do is strike, but if they are pushed into the corner, there may not be too many alternatives.”

14. I was set up, says piazza

Postmedia News, Paul Cherry, 2016 11 12

Ottawa - Antony Piazza says he was more surprised than anyone to learn he had all the materials required to assemble a detonator hidden inside the handle of his carry-on suitcase as he was about to board a flight at Pierre Elliott Trudeau International Airport. The 74-year-old is testifying in his own defence in the trial where he is charged with four counts related to his arrest, on Oct. 27, 2013, which caused security to close down part of the airport in suburban Dorval, sparking the cancellation of a dozen flights. The materials were discovered at an airport security check point where Piazza’s carry-on suitcase was X-rayed. On Friday, Piazza told Quebec Court Judge Thierry Nadon that he has been waiting more than three years to tell his side of the story that made headlines across Canada. Piazza said he was so surprised to see a police officer pull the materials out of one of the two telescopic arms attached to the handle of his suitcase that he actually pointed out that the officer had yet to notice material sticking out of the other arm. In one arm the Montreal police officer found bullets. The other extendable arm contained a disposable pen, a wire, material commonly used for match heads and the blades for a utility knife. Earlier in the trial, an expert testified the materials could be assembled to make a homemade detonator. “I was shocked. I didn’t know what was going on,” Piazza said while he watched a video that recorded the moment when the police officer unscrewed the top of the handle and separated it from the telescopic bars. Later in the same video, Piazza is shown being led away by police. He said he was taken to a room where he was detained and questioned. “There were many police officers coming in and out (of the room). I answered everything they asked me,” he said. “I had nothing to hide.” Piazza said he is “99.9 per cent suspicious” that the materials were placed in his suitcase by a man he visited in Spain during a previous trip in the spring of 2013. The man, a former friend of Piazza’s from Montreal, owed Piazza money from a $40,000 investment in real estate and the trip to collect his money did not go well. He said he believes the items were inserted while he left the carry-on suitcase at the man’s house while he made an additional two-day trip to England. Defence lawyer Charles Benmouyal began the day by submitting an admission - a fact agreed upon by both sides in the case - referring to how the man in Spain was convicted of a crime in that country in 2009. According to the document Benmouyal submitted, the Spanish man, identified as Afshin Amani, was convicted of driving without a license and to having falsified public documents.

15. Man charged in explosives-related incident at Montreal airport says he was set up

The Canadian Press, Sidhartha Banerjee, 2016 11 12

Montreal - A Montreal man on trial for trying to board an airplane with explosives-related materials in his suitcase told a judge Friday he strongly believes he was set up. Antony Piazza, an Iranian-born Canadian citizen, is facing four charges stemming from the Montreal airport bomb scare on Oct. 27, 2013. Piazza, 74, told the court he believes an acquaintance in Spain with whom he had a falling-out over money earlier that year inserted the items into his carry-on suitcase. "I have 99.9 per cent suspicion that these things have been placed by him in my bag because no one else has access to my bag," Piazza testified. Piazza said the luggage had been left at the man's home in Spain during the 2013 trip as he made a side trip to England. The smaller cabin luggage was placed in his empty, larger suitcase for the trip home. It was the only instance the baggage was out of his possession. The arrest came a few months later as he attempted to leave Montreal for Los Angeles. The retired businessman was eager to testify in his own defence Friday. "I've been waiting three years and 16 days for this moment," Piazza told Quebec court Judge Thierry Nadon.

16. Canadian casino says it was hacked, data was stolen

Reuters, Alastair Sharp, 2016 11 12

Toronto - A major Canadian casino has been hit by a cyber attack in which sensitive customer, employee and vendor data was stolen, its management said on Thursday, warning there is a risk the information will be published. The Casino Rama Resort in Ontario said the hacker claimed to have stolen financial reports, patron credit inquiries, collection and debt information, payroll and other data in an intrusion it first became aware of on Friday. It said the hacker claims the employee data included social insurance numbers and dated back to 2004, with some other stolen data dating back to 2007. The casino sits on the Rama First Nation about two-hours drive north of Toronto and has about 3 million visitors a year. Its day-to-day operations are run by CHC Casinos Canada Limited, an indirect subsidiary of Penn National Gaming Inc, under license from the province's gaming operator. Penn National did not immediately respond to a request for comment. The breach is at least the second time this year that a casino that sits on aboriginal land has fallen victim to a hack, following a breach at the River Cree Resort and Casino in Alberta in March.

17. Casino Rama cyberattack prompts $50M class-action lawsuit

The Canadian Press, 2016 11 12

Ottawa - Class-action lawyers wasted little time Friday in jumping on word of a cyberattack on an Ontario casino in which sensitive information was stolen. The lawyers announced plans for a proposed lawsuit that would seek $50 million in damages from Casino Rama north of Toronto, and began asking possible victims to sign on. "The class action will be commenced on behalf of employees, customers and vendors of the Casino Rama Resort whose confidential information was compromised by the privacy breach," the lawyers said. "The proposed representative plaintiffs in the lawsuit are customers who gave the resort their confidential information, including financial information." Stolen data included dates of birth, SIN numbers. The statement of claim would be filed in Superior Court on Monday given the Remembrance Day holiday on Friday, said lawyer Ted Charney, one of the lawyers involved. On Thursday, Casino Rama Resort in Rama, Ont., warned its customers, vendors as well as current and former staff to keep an eye on their bank accounts, credit cards and other financial information. The casino said it had "recently" discovered becoming the victim of a cyberattack that resulted in the large-scale data theft.

18. Canada's current military operations abroad

CTV News, Jackie Dunham, 2016 11 12

Ottawa - Maj. Lonnie Campbell remembers when he was 19 years old and a new member of the Canadian Armed Forces Reserves in Calgary, Alta. in 1987. He had signed up for the Forces because he had pride in his country and he wanted the chance to serve it. He also wanted to follow in the footsteps of his family members before him. Campbell's grandfathers and great uncles served in the Second World War and his father was in the Royal Canadian Airforce. During a phone interview from the Drawsko Pomorskie Training Area in northwestern Poland on Nov. 3, Campbell, 49, recalled a memorable experience when a First World War veteran came to speak to the reservists soon after he had first joined. The former soldier, Sgt. Wally Bennett of the 10th Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force, gave an inspirational speech about a particularly costly and famous battle during the war – the Second Battle of Ypres in April 1915. The veteran told them about the use of poison gas by the German forces and how the Canadians counter-attacked and defended the Allied line against subsequent gas assaults. Thirty years later, the topic of remembrance has become more personal for Campbell. The experienced soldier has been a member of the Canadian Armed Forces (CAF) for almost 30 years. During that time he has served on numerous operations in the Balkans, Afghanistan and now in Poland where he commands the Land Task Force for Rotation 6 of Operation Reassurance. He completed two tours in Afghanistan from 2005 to 2006 and in 2008 with the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. It was there that Campbell, like many other CAF members, witnessed the true cost of war.

19. Canadians making a difference against ISIS in Iraq

The Toronto Star, Gavin John, 2016 11 12

Bishaq, Iraq - You don't have to go far back in history to remember a Canadian soldier fighting for freedom overseas. In fact, all you have to go back is 24 hours in Iraq. While Canadians prepare to pay their respects this Remembrance Day to veterans who gave the ultimate sacrifice, Canadian Forces are making a meaningful impact today in the battle against the Islamic State in Iraq. On the outskirts of Bishaqa, Iraqi Kurdish soldiers — the Peshmerga — sit around and discuss the recent operation to liberate the town. When Canada is brought up there is nothing but praise. When the actions of Canadian Special Forces is mentioned, smiles come over the faces of the soldiers. They place their hands over their hearts as a sign of gratitude. While officially on a "consult and advise" mission, as the official statements from the Kurds and Department of National Defence both state, the Canadian Forces are more than capable of defending themselves and their allies if threatened.

20. Canadian firms warned new administration could make it hard to do business in Iran

The Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 11 11

Ottawa - Canadian companies operating in Iran, or considering sales after an easing of sanctions against Tehran this year, are being warned by trade experts that a Donald Trump presidency could kill their ability to do business there. This is one of many areas where the Republican president-elect's policies will have economic repercussions for Canada. Airplane maker Bombardier Inc., for instance, is chasing deals in Iran, a country on the hunt for hundreds of commercial aircraft after Tehran agreed to give up parts of its nuclear program in exchange for a scaling back of sanctions. Mr. Trump was hostile to the nuclear pact that Barack Obama and other world leaders signed with Iran in 2015 and at different points during his presidential campaign, he threatened to dismantle the deal or demand it be so aggressively enforced that Tehran might walk away from it. His running mate, Mike Pence, speaking in October, vowed the deal would be "ripped up" after consultation with American allies. Canada lifted some sanctions against Iran in early 2016, a move that followed a rollback of punitive measures by European countries and the United States, as well. This came after the United Nations confirmed Tehran was complying with the 2015 accord aimed at curbing Iran's ambitions for nuclear weapons. Sanctions experts caution that fallout from a Trump-led effort to undo the Iranian nuclear deal could very well lead to Washington imposing new economic and trade sanctions against Iran.

21. Négociations: l'AFPC demande la médiation

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 11 11

Ottawa -Après un blitz de dix jours de négociations, l'Alliance de la fonction publique du Canada (AFPC) vient de demander l'intervention d'un médiateur, en vue d'une reprise des pourparlers dans deux semaines. « Les négociations se sont poursuivies pendant 10 jours. Nous avons réalisé des progrès, mais certaines questions fondamentales liées au respect des fonctionnaires et à l'amélioration des services publics ne sont toujours pas résolues », a indiqué la présidente nationale de l'AFPC, Robyn Benson, dans un communiqué jeudi. Le syndicat avait accepté de retourner négocier après avoir eu l'engagement qu'un nouveau mandat avait été accordé aux équipes du Conseil du Trésor par le gouvernement Trudeau. L'AFPC n'a voulu donner de détails ni sur les enjeux qui achoppent toujours, ni sur la nouvelle offre salariale ou encore la nouvelle proposition sur les congés de maladie. Mais la présidente syndicale a souligné que les offres n'arrivaient pas à la hauteur des promesses faites aux fonctionnaires par le gouvernement libéral.

22. Terrorisme en Afrique: le Canada à la recherche d'un «appui optimal»

La Presse, Jean Thomas Leveille, 2016 11 11

Ottawa - Le Canada s'inquiète de la présence de groupes terroristes en Afrique, dont les milices islamistes shebab, responsables d'exactions contre les populations en Somalie et qui font des incursions au Kenya et en Éthiopie, mais aussi Boko Haram, au Nigeria, et la multitude de groupes présents dans le Sahel. De passage aujourd'hui en Éthiopie, où se trouve le siège de l'Union africaine, le ministre canadien des Affaires étrangères Stéphane Dion annoncera des investissements totalisant près de 1 million de dollars en lien avec la lutte contre l'extrémisme violent dans sept pays africains, ainsi qu'au Centre africain d'études et de recherches sur le terrorisme. Hier, au Kenya, le ministre Dion a annoncé un investissement de 2,38 millions pour la lutte contre le terrorisme, la prévention de la radicalisation, l'amélioration de la sécurité frontalière et la gestion de l'immigration. Lundi, au Nigeria, il avait rappelé que le Canada avait versé depuis de début de l'année 8 millions à différentes organisations, dont la Croix-Rouge, qui viennent en aide aux populations touchées par l'insurrection de Boko Haram dans le nord-est du pays. Outre ces annonces, « le principal objectif de mon voyage, c'est de bien comprendre comment le Canada pourrait avoir un appui optimal » dans les pays qu'il souhaite aider, a indiqué Stéphane Dion en entrevue téléphonique avec La Presse.

23. There are ways of bringing airport screening times back to Earth

Calgary Herald, Colin Kenny, 2016 11 11

Column: If you've flown anywhere in Canada recently, you will have noticed that wait times are getting worse. Since 2013, the length of screening times has deteriorated so badly that the Canadian Airport Council referred to security screening services as a being in a state of "crisis." Not only are we waiting more, we are paying more. And getting less service. According to the World Economic Forum, Canadians pay some of the highest air travel prices in the world. One part is a fee for the so-called Air Traveller's Security Charge. The security charge was introduced after 9/11 by the Chretien government to fund air transport security and the newly minted Canadian Air Transport Security Authority. Instead of improving security, it has turned into a major cash grab by the Finance Department. Since 2011, the security authority's budget has declined, even though revenue has steadily increased. From 2010 to 2013, $260 million was siphoned away from airport screening into the consolidated revenue fund. While it's annoying to wait in long lines, more important is the security risk these lines pose. A new wave of terrorist attacks on airports in Moscow, Brussels and Istanbul have all occurred between the sidewalk and the security inspection line. Instead of viewing screening lines as an annoyance, officials should see these lengthening queues as a soft spot for terrorists. Another problem with airport security highlighted in David Emerson's 2015 review of the Transportation Act, is the strange restrictions faced by the Canadian Air Transport Security Authority. Essentially, it has no control over security screening policy. This has led directly to poor service and long wait times. Emerson recommends adopting the U.S. model, wherein a single "agency has responsibility for both regulatory oversight and operations." (Note: Liberal Senator Colin Kenny is former chair of the Senate committee on national security and defence.)

24. Politics sabotaged Shared Services before the department got off the ground

Ottawa Citizen, James Bagnall, 2016 11 12

Analysis Liseanne Forand really didn't know what to expect. On Aug. 4, 2011, she was making her way on foot to Phase 3 of the Gatineau office complex known as Place du Portage. A career bureaucrat, Forand had, the day before, been appointed president of Shared Services Canada - a new federal department that would manage the government's email, data centres and telecommunications. Her mandate - representing about one-third of the federal government's $5-billion-a-year technology services budget - was brehtaking in its scope and complexity. She was to simultaneously streamline and modernize the government's electronic backbone, and keep the old gear running. Sixty-three email systems would be collapsed into one. More than 500 data centres were to be decommissioned, to be replaced by a mere handful. Fifty telecommunications networks connecting 3,500 federal buildings were to be upgraded. Forand was to do this with staff cobbled together from 43 different departments. But on this day, she had no office, and the paperwork had been approved for just 1,200 of an eventual 6,000 employees. As she entered Phase 3, she was surprised, seemingly touched, to see that a small army of government workers had gathered in the main foyer to greet her. After introductions, she was escorted to the 17th floor. There, Forand found a temporary office. She sat down and began making lists of things to do. As Forand tapped out her notes, Public Services minister Rona Ambrose and Treasury Board president Tony Clement were in the National Press Theatre, directly across from Parliament's venerable West Block. Ambrose said she and Clement were there to introduce "new measures that will improve the efficiency of information technology services." Shared Services would lead this effort, Ambrose said, and generate "substantial savings" through economies of scale. It was up to Forand to flesh out a strategy that had little substance at launch. Not that a more detailed plan would have mattered. What Forand didn't realize was that the seeds of failure were already being sown. Prime Minister Stephen Harper was preparing a governmentwide spending strategy that would hobble Shared Services before it could even get going.

25. Le monde n'est pas un épisode de «Homeland»...

La Presse, Agnès Gruda, 2016 11 12

Chronique: Quelques jours avant le 8 novembre, le guide suprême iranien, Ali Khamenei, a vanté publiquement la franchise de Donald Trump, ce candidat qui ne craint pas de dire ce qu'il pense. Pas comme ces démocrates qui «coupent les têtes avec du coton» - proverbe iranien évoquant la prétendue hypocrisie du parti de Hillary Clinton. Oui, vous avez bien lu. Le leader de l'aile ultraconservatrice à Téhéran s'est montré favorable au candidat républicain, même si celui-ci considère l'Iran comme le mal incarné et veut déchirer le traité nucléaire qui a levé les sanctions économiques infligées aux Iraniens. Pendant ce temps, l'aile modérée du régime, incarnée par le président Hassan Rohani, favorisait l'élection d'Hillary Clinton. En brandissant ses menaces contre Téhéran, Donald Trump vise un régime qu'il perçoit comme radical et dangereux. Pourquoi donc les dirigeants iraniens les plus radicaux se réjouissent-ils de sa victoire? En gros, parce que le monde n'est pas un épisode de Homeland. Il n'est pas divisé en deux, entre gentils et méchants. Ali Khamenei et sa clique avaient au moins trois bonnes raisons de miser sur Donald Trump, explique Houchang Hassan Yari, politologue au Collège militaire royal du Canada. D'abord, parce que le discours anti-establishment de Donald Trump confirme la propagande iranienne, qui décrit Washington comme la capitale d'un système politique pourri. Ensuite, parce que l'accord nucléaire a renforcé la position du président Rohani et que son éventuelle abrogation jouerait en faveur des conservateurs. Enfin, parce que les prises de position de Donald Trump sont susceptibles de jouer contre l'ennemi juré de Téhéran, l'Arabie saoudite. Ne serait-ce que sur le terrain syrien, où le président désigné s'est montré favorable à Moscou et à Bachar al-Assad - deux alliés de l'Iran. En haussant le ton face à un Iran diabolisé, Donald Trump risque en réalité d'aider sa faction la plus fanatique. Bienvenue au royaume des paradoxes et de la grande complexité, où le président Trump est entré avec la légendaire délicatesse d'un éléphant dans un magasin de porcelaine.

26. Trump Eyeing Senator Kelly Ayotte for Pentagon Chief

Sputnik News Service, 2016 11 12

Moscow - According to The Washington Post newspaper citing sources, Ayotte is regarded as knowledgeable and competent. Other candidates for the post include retired Army Lt. Gen. Joseph Kellogg, former Defense Intelligence Agency director Gen. Mike Flynn and Senator Jeff Sessions. Trump secured an unexpected victory in the presidential election on Tuesday with 290 electoral votes against his rival Hillary Clinton's 232. His inauguration will be held on January 20, 2017. Earlier this week, media reports emerged claiming that advisers to Trump have suggested the possibility that JPMorgan Chase CEO Jamie Dimon could serve as treasury secretary in the new administration.

27. Protester shot during Portland's 4th round of anti-Trump demonstrations

Oregonlive, Jim Ryan, 2016 11 12

Portland - The fourth round of mass demonstrations in Portland against Donald Trump's election came to a violent end early Saturday morning when someone shot a protester on the Morrison Bridge. Police said the protester, who wasn't publicly identified, suffered injuries that don't threaten his life. The shooter left the area, likely in a car, Portland police said in a news release. The protest, which started early Friday evening, appeared to be in its final stages as demonstrators marched across the bridge from east to west shortly before 1 a.m. Saturday. Protesters had marched around the city throughout the night, and police in riot gear used less-than-lethal force such as tear gas and flash-bang grenades during standoffs to clear them from certain areas. Shawna Hall, a North Plains resident who was filming the protests, said she witnessed the shooting and circumstances beforehand. Protesters were walking west on the Morrison Bridge, and she said some of them were blocking eastbound lanes. Hall, 28, said the car carrying the gunman navigated around other vehicles and stopped on the bridge. She said a rear passenger exited the car and pulled a gun. There was a non-physical confrontation between car occupants and protesters, Hall said, and protesters told the occupants to leave. Another passenger ushered the gunman into the car. The car traveled about 100 feet east on the bridge, Hall said, and was stopped by protesters. Some were yelling at the car, she said.

28. Trump now has access to nation's most valuable intelligence

Fox News, Catherine Herridge, 2016 11 12

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump will now have access to the most authoritative and highly classified intelligence produced by the U.S. government, Fox News has learned. Two intelligence sources confirmed that the President's Daily Brief, or PDB, is now available to Trump – after the White House, before Tuesday's election, had directed that the winner have full access to the material, to ensure a smooth transition. The sources told Fox News they do not anticipate the briefings will begin until next week at the earliest. The PDB is like a highly classified newspaper for the president, and now the president-elect. It is significantly different than the information provided in briefings for candidates; those briefings act as primers to help bring candidates up to speed on topics like China, Iran and the Islamic State. Candidates have been free to request additional briefs on topics of personal interest, and those supplemental briefings were made available to the other candidate. The PDB is a focused intelligence product, and has a very high threshold for intelligence to be included. Fox News has also learned that, because the briefing itself must be done in a secure facility, the White House has a dedicated transition space nearby that can be used by the president-elect to receive the PDB. If Trump were to receive the brief in New York City, the president-elect would need to travel to a secure federal facility, such as the FBI office.

29. Donald Trump Likely to End Aid for Rebels Fighting Syrian Government

Washington - President-elect Donald J. Trump said Friday that he was likely to abandon the American effort to support "moderate" opposition groups in Syria who are battling the government of President Bashar al-Assad, saying "we have no idea who these people are." In an interview with The Wall Street Journal that dealt largely with economic issues, including his willingness to retain parts of the Affordable Care Act, he repeated a position he took often during his campaign: that the United States should focus on defeating the Islamic State, and find common ground with the Syrians and their Russian backers. "I've had an opposite view of many people regarding Syria," Mr. Trump told The Journal. "My attitude was you're fighting Syria, Syria is fighting ISIS, and you have to get rid of ISIS. Russia is now totally aligned with Syria, and now you have Iran, which is becoming powerful, because of us, is aligned with Syria." His comments suggest that once Mr. Trump begins overseeing both the public support for the opposition groups, and a far larger covert effort run by the Central Intelligence Agency, he may wind down or abandon the effort. But there are in fact two wars going on simultaneously in Syria. One is against the Islamic State, in which the United States is supporting 30,000 Syrian-Kurdish and Syrian-Arab fighters, who last weekend announced they were opening a new phase of the battle, beginning to encircle the ISIS capital in Raqqa. There are roughly 300 United States Special Operations forces on the ground assisting these militia.

30. In Libya, U.S. lays plans to hunt down escaped Islamic State fighters

The Washington Post, Adam Entous & Missy Ryan, 2016 11 11

Washington - The Pentagon has tracked scores of Islamic State militants escaping fierce fighting in Libya's coastal city of Sirte and has begun laying the groundwork for expanded air attacks to follow and kill them, part of a final push by the Obama administration to blunt multiplying militant threats across the broader Middle East. Intelligence from surveillance aircraft flying over Sirte and areas south of the city allowed the U.S. military's Africa Command to track up to several hundred militants who U.S. officials now fear could be preparing to mount a counterattack on allied Libyan forces. The president's counterterrorism advisers are eager for Africa Command to pursue militants who have fled the coastal city but say military planners have more "homework" to do collecting and analyzing U.S. intelligence on their new encampments to ensure that U.S. strikes won't inadvertently kill civilians. "These guys are fleeing the fighting. There aren't too many of them," said one U.S. senior official who, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss operations. "Why wouldn't you want to pick them off?" The Libya expansion comes amid a series of military escalations the White House has directed in recent months, from targeting leaders of al-Qaeda's affiliate in Syria to launching major campaigns against Islamic State strongholds in Syria and Iraq. The Pentagon has also expanded operations in Somalia, Yemen and Afghanistan in a bid to beat back resurgent militant threats.

31. Tajik Officer, Trained in U.S., Appears to Rise in Islamic State Ranks

The New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 11 12

Moscow - In a propaganda video released last year, an Islamic State militant wearing a black bandanna and cradling a sniper rifle made the usual grim threats against the United States. Now, there may be a new twist to his warnings. The militant, Gulmurod Khalimov, a former police commander from Tajikistan, boasted of his extensive American military training -- truthfully, it turns out. But some news accounts say he was subsequently promoted to military commander of the Islamic State. "I was in America three times," Mr. Khalimov said in the video, which appeared online last year. "God willing, I will come with this weapon to your cities, to your homes, and we will kill you." That prospect remains highly unlikely. But there is no doubt that as he rose in the ranks of a special police force in Tajikistan, a former Soviet republic, Mr. Khalimov received extensive taxpayer-funded military training from the United States to help counter drug-running and extremism along the border with Afghanistan. Now, Mr. Khalimov appears to have become the second senior commander of the Islamic State, the terrorist group he defected to last year, to have benefited from American military training provided to former Soviet states.

32. In the Middle East, Another Conflict: What to Make of the Election of Trump

The New York Times, Ben Hubbard, 2016 11 12

Beirut - Crossing from Syria into Lebanon on Tuesday night proved to be a parable for the diametrically opposed ways the world sees the election of Donald J. Trump. At the passport counter, a Syrian officer's face lit up when he saw an American traveler. "Congratulations on your new president!" he exclaimed, giving an energetic thumbs up. Mr. Trump, he said, would be "good for Syria." He echoed many supporters of Syria's president, Bashar al-Assad, who pronounced themselves delighted with the president-elect, believing he would change course, abandon support for Mr. Assad's opponents in the Syrian civil war and embrace Damascus and its ally, Moscow. In the Middle East, as elsewhere around the world, Mr. Trump's surprise victory shocked many people. But a new occupant of the Oval Office could lead to a significant reordering of American engagement in a complex region. Saudi Arabia, for example, hopes Mr. Trump will take a hard line on Iran. Egypt sees a man it can do business with who will not quibble about human rights. As commander in chief, Mr. Trump will have to navigate many of the same problems that President Obama has struggled with, from the collapse of state structures to raging civil wars to jihadist groups that cause tremendous violence.

33. Bombing Suspect Appears in Court on Terror Charges

The New York Times, Benjamin Weiser & Adam Goldman, 2016 11 11

Washington - Ahmad Khan Rahami, the man accused of carrying out bombings in New York City and New Jersey in September, appeared for the first time in court in Manhattan on Thursday, with his lawyer expressing concern about whether his health problems could be addressed adequately in the jail where he is being held. Mr. Rahami was arraigned in New Jersey last month on charges related to the attempted murder of police officers who captured him in Linden, N.J., on Sept. 19. Afterward, he recovered from gunshot wounds at University Hospital in Newark, where his arraignment on the New Jersey charges was held via a video conference from his hospital bed. He was later moved to Trenton State Prison, where he was held in a medical unit before he was brought to Manhattan on Thursday. Preet Bharara, the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, said that Mr. Rahami "was brought today to Manhattan to face terrorism charges." "Rahami will now face justice in a federal courthouse just blocks south of where he allegedly planted his bombs," Mr. Bharara added. Mr. Rahami, 28, whose surname has also been spelled Rahimi, limped noticeably as he was led into the courtroom in United States District Court to face the federal charges related to the bombings.

34. Donald Trump May Select an Architect of Bush's Torture Program to Run CIA

The Intercept, Lee Fang, 2016 11 12

Washington - Donald Trump may select Jose Rodriguez, one of the primary architects of the George W. Bush torture program, to run the Central Intelligence Agency, according to a law firm with close ties to Trump. Rodriguez, the former director of the National Clandestine Service, helped developed the CIA black sites, secret prisons operated in foreign countries where interrogators used a range of torture tactics, including the use of "waterboarding," the simulated drowning technique once used by the Khmer Rouge and Nazi agents to glean information from detainees. At least 136 individuals were detained and tortured by the CIA. Interrogation tactics also included forced nudity, sleep deprivation while being vertically shackled, and confinement in a small box. Rodriguez is unapologetic about his role in the program, telling 60 Minutes that "we did the right thing for the right reason," even if it meant "going to the border of legality." The suggestion that Rodriguez may head the CIA was made in a post-election prediction document published by Dentons, a law and lobbying firm where Trump confidant Newt Gingrich serves as a senior advisor. Dentons was also retained by Make American Number 1, one of the primary Super PACs supporting Trump's candidacy. Dentons's Public Policy and Regulation team, the division that employs Gingrich, published the prediction document. The firm did not respond to a request for comment. Rodriguez not only crafted the Bush torture program, but played a key role in the cover up. Following revelations of the effort, Rodriguez worked directly to get rid of the evidence and destroyed 92 video tapes revealing the waterboarding of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who was waterboarded 183 times.

35. How Two Russian Defectors Helped the FBI Nab European Mobsters Then Wound up Stranded in Oregon

Newsweek, Bryan Denson, 2016 11 12

Analysis: As an intelligence officer in Russia's Federal Security Service, Jan Neumann knew the weight of a loaded Makarov 9 mm. When he later worked for a Moscow bank that laundered money for the mob, he also knew the weight of $1 million packed into bricks. But on a spring night in 2008, as he headed home to his wife, he could scarcely comprehend the weight of his impending troubles. Jan had just walked out of a meeting with a shady bank partner, who explained that the mob and its government associates were after him; he had learned too much about their double-dealing and greed. The partner offered a few ways out. Option one called for Jan to "be an officer," Russian slang for putting a bullet in his own skull. Option two: He could wait for someone to do it for him. Option three: He could run like hell. When Jan reached his top-floor apartment in a swanky section of downtown Moscow, he delivered the news to his wife, Victorya. She was a problem solver who spoke five languages and had gone through the same training academy as her husband in the government's security service, better known as the FSB. She quickly worked out the details of their escape. The couple hurriedly packed clothes, jewelry, cellphones, laptops and about $15,000 in cash. Jan then called two friends, both high-ranking FSB officers, and told them of his plans to flee. One would later hand him a dossier on corrupt officials at Lubyanka Square, the FSB's headquarters. Jan also downloaded an electronic file on several government-affiliated banks, a rare glimpse inside the criminal Cerberus of financial big shots, mobsters and FSB officers. The Neumanns drove half the night to see a friend, then switched cars and headed back to Moscow. Victorya booked three flights set to depart from airports around the city—decoys to confuse pursuers. In the final hours before their departure, Victorya purchased tickets for the flight they intended to board, bound for Frankfurt, with a connecting flight to the Dominican Republic, a Caribbean nation that requires no visas. Jan and Victorya landed at Puerto Plata Airport and took a car to the north-shore town of Cabarete, where they paid cash for a beachfront rental. Using aliases, they deposited their money in a local bank, stashed their Russian passports and marriage certificate in a safe deposit box and bought new cellphones. For a few weeks, they kitesurfed with European expats, worked on their tans and feasted on pescado frito and rum cocktails, blending into the tropical scenery like the island's ubiquitous color-changing lizards. At night, they devised a plan to start fresh in a new country. Their first step: to expose deep and dangerous secrets about the one they had left behind.

36. EX MI6 Boss: Nuclear War More Likely Under Trump

Daily Mail, Dan Martin, 2016 11 12

London - Donald Trump's unpredictable temperament has made nuclear war more likely, the former head of MI6 warned last night. John Sawers said the president-elect's 'fierce' reactions when he feels he has been insulted could prove dangerous. The world has become far more perilous over the past few years, he said, with an increased threat of a nuclear clash between the US and China or Russia. Sir John told BBC Radio 4 that Barack Obama must take some blame for the increased nuclear threat because his administration did not bolster relations with Russia. But he added: 'I don't think Donald Trump quite yet knows what the pressures will be on him when he becomes president. 'We've seen that when he feels slighted, when he feels criticised, he reacts quite fiercely. If you translate that into global affairs it could have consequences which are dangerous for everyone. Where temperament comes in is how you manage relations with foreign leaders and how you manage a crisis; a fast-moving crisis where you need to take decisions with only partial information.' Three former British generals and an admiral warned this week that Mr Trump risked war with Russia if he abandoned Nato. The billionaire tycoon has cast doubt on the alliance, accusing European members of not pulling their weight.

37. Concerns raised over Trump accessing global surveillance network

The Guardian, Ewen MacAskill, 2016 11 12

London - Privacy supporters criticise Obama for failing to change legislation following Edward Snowden's NSA revelations. Privacy and human rights campaigners have expressed fears over the prospect of Donald Trump gaining access to the vast global US and UK surveillance network. They criticised Barack Obama's administration for being too complacent in the wake of the 2013 revelations by the NSA whistleblower, Edward Snowden, and making only modest concessions to privacy concerns rather than carrying out major legislative changes. The concern comes after Snowden dismissed fears for his own safety if Trump, who called him "a spy who has caused great damage in the US", was to strike a deal with Vladimir Putin to have him extradited. Snowden, wanted by the US on charges under the espionage act, found asylum in Russia in 2013 but his visa is due to expire in July next year. Privacy and human rights campaigners in the US and UK say a Trump presidency will tip the balance between surveillance and privacy decisively towards the former. The UK surveillance agency GCHQ is so tied up with America's NSA, often doing work on its behalf, it could find itself facing a series of ethical dilemmas. On the campaign trail, Trump made an ambiguous remark about wishing he had access to surveillance powers.

38. 'Black Swan' Exercise to Give Trump's Team Practice for Security Crisis

ABC News, Alexander Mallin, 2016 11 12

Washington - Donald Trump's transition team is getting a helping hand from the Obama administration on national security matters. The administration is giving the president-elect and a select few of his top advisers sensitive intelligence briefings. And, in addition, Trump and his team will take part in two so-called 'black swan' exercises that simulate a domestic or national security emergency. The exercises are intended to help an incoming administration learn how to manage a crisis in real time in case there is some kind of global or domestic emergency in the first days of a Trump presidency. A black swan exercise would, for example, ensure that a fledgling Trump administration knows how to activate the proper federal agencies to maintain stability. According to a briefing book from the nonpartisan Center for Presidential Transition, in 2008 the Bush administration hosted two black swan exercises for then president-elect Obama's national security team. Janet Napolitano, then the incoming Department of Homeland Security secretary, said the first exercise, done in a federal office building in Washington, D.C., simulated an event in which multiple bombs were detonated in different locations across the United States.

39. 'Fearful' national security officials prepare for major shift in US policy

The Guardian, Spencer Ackerman, 2016 11 12

Washington - A US intelligence officer operating in a dangerous part of the world prepared this week for Donald Trump's presidency by making a pact with a colleague: they resolved to disobey any order to commit torture. The two officers' pledge reflects a wider debate within the national security bureaucracy, as some officials – concerned by Trump's authoritarian inclinations – debate whether to quit in protest at his electoral victory or to remain at their post in the hope of checking impulses they consider dangerous. During his election campaign, the president-elect mooted a string of controversial measures, any one of which would signify a major shift in US policy: reviving the use of torture, targeting the families of terrorism suspects, mass deportations, a ban on Muslims entering the US, expanding domestic surveillance, the indefinite detention of American terror suspects, bombing "the shit" out of the Islamic State. Officials in the US military, intelligence services, diplomatic corps and federal law enforcement have told the Guardian that Trump's suggestions represent such a departure from the norms of American governance that they are contemplating internal resistance or a career change.

40. Le président Juan Manuel Santos juge que le Nobel de la Paix va lui servir à renégocier l'accord avec les FARC

Le Monde, Marie Delcas, 2016 11 12

Bogota - Au pouvoir depuis 2010, le président colombien, Juan Manuel Santos (centre droit), a fait de la paix avec la guérilla des Forces armées révolutionnaires de Colombie (FARC) la priorité de son gouvernement. Son ambition de mettre fin à un conflit armé vieux d'un demi-siècle lui a valu le prix Nobel de la paix, début octobre. Mais l'accord de paix signé avec la guérilla a été rejeté par une très courte majorité d'électeurs, lors du référendum du 2 octobre. A La Havane, les négociateurs du gouvernement et ceux des FARC tentent d'élaborer un nouveau texte. Le gouvernement d'Obama a soutenu le processus de paix et promis une aide financière pour l'après-conflit. Craignez-vous que Donald Trump remette en question ce soutien? La Colombie a toujours été un allié stratégique et un partenaire privilégié des Etats-Unis. Nous avons entretenu de bonnes relations avec les démocrates et les - républicains, et nous espérons qu'il continuera d'en être ainsi. Il a fallu quatre ans de difficiles négociations pour parvenir à un accord avec les FARC. Qu'avez-vous ressenti le 2 octobre au soir, en apprenant que les électeurs l'avaient refusé? Je ne m'y attendais pas et je dois avouer que cela a d'abord été un choc. Mais j'ai choisi d'écouter Winston Churchill : " L'optimiste voit dans chaque difficulté une opportunité. " Au soir du référendum, j'ai compris que la victoire du non pouvait nous offrir la chance unique d'unir le pays. J'ai donc appelé les détracteurs de l'accord de paix à un grand dialogue national pour pouvoir renégocier le texte avec les FARC et construire un large consensus. Et, le vendredi suivant, quand vous avez été réveillé à l'aube pour apprendre que vous aviez reçu le prix Nobel de la paix?

41. Au Venezuela, l'armée donne de la voix

Le Monde.fr, Paulo A. Paranagua, 2016 11 12

Caaracas - Alors que le gouvernement et l'opposition doivent se réunir samedi pour trouver une solution à la crise politique, le rôle des militaires dans ce dialogue politique fait débat. «La trêve est finie», a annoncé Jesus «Chuo» Torrealba, porte-parole de la Table de l'unité démocratique (MUD), la coalition de l'opposition de centre-gauche vénézuélienne, à la veille de la deuxième réunion de dialogue avec le gouvernement chaviste, vendredi 11 novembre à Caracas. A la télévision, le président Nicolas Maduro fustigeait les opposants, tandis que le numéro deux du régime, le capitaine Diosdado Cabello, faisait la même chose à Medellin: «Nous allons vers davantage de révolution», a-t-il promis aux partisans de l'ancien président Hugo Chavez (1999-2013). Ainsi, les deux camps semblent vouloir négocier sous la pression de la rue. Les tractations s'annoncent laborieuses et les résultats incertains. Levée après 23 heures, la réunion devait reprendre samedi. «Il n'y a pas au Venezuela aujourd'hui de force politique capable d'imposer son hégémonie», a tweeté le général Miguel Rodriguez Torres, l'ancien ministre de l'intérieur, responsable de la brutale répression des protestations de 2014, qui avait causé la mort de 43 personnes. Ce faucon chaviste devenu colombe prône désormais «deux ans de gouvernement de consensus pour appliquer un programme minimum en matière d'économie et de sécurité publique, et pour organiser des élections générales». Aucune figure du pouvoir n'ose s'attaquer à cet ancien chef du renseignement militaire, qui a sans doute gardé des dossiers. Toutefois, ses propos sont commentés avec intérêt sur le forum Aporrea, dont le directeur compte parmi les chavistes dissidents. «Dans le cas d'un gouvernement de transition, Rodriguez Torres pourrait être un nom acceptable pour le chavisme et pour l'opposition», estime le démocrate-chrétien Ramon Guillermo Aveledo, ancien président de la Chambre des députés et artisan de l'union de l'opposition.

42. Defence reveals new home for Australian Cyber Security Centre

iTNews (Australia), 2016 11 12

Canberra - The federal Defence department is planning to spend $39 million moving the Australian Cyber Security Centre out of its existing home in ASIO's Canberra headquarters and down the road to the Brindabella Business Park. The federal government announced its intention to relocate the ACSC out from the Ben Chifley Building in an effort to make it more accessible to businesses and other government workers. The ACSC, launched in 2014, houses 260 cyber security experts from across Defence, the Attorney-General's Department, ASIO, the AFP and the Australian Crime Commission, and acts as an information sharing hub for government and the private sector. But an expansion of its operations - prompted by the promise of personnel boosts for cyber security in the government's April national cyber security strategy - has meant the ACSC will outgrow its current premises, Defence said in a submission to a parliamentary inquiry scrutinising its plans. Moving the centre is also intended to address criticisms about access to the centre inside the high-security ASIO building. "While most of the current space is operating at close to full occupancy, some areas are underutilised due to the difficulties associated with obtaining the appropriate clearances," Defence said. "This has resulted in some inefficiencies arising from areas unable to be fully collocated due to the nature of the fit-out and the allocation of workspaces.

43. Turnbull bolsters alliance with US

Courier Mail, Renee Viellaris, 2016 11 12

Canberra – Malcolm Turnbull has extracted an in-principle pledge from Donald Trump to preserve a US military presence in the Asia-Pacific region to keep Australia safe. One of the first world leaders to speak to the president-elect, Mr Turnbull (inset) strongly pushed Australia's security and trade agenda, spoke of the enduring co-operation between the two countries and was receptive to Mr Trump wanting to expand discussions on the fight against terrorism in the Middle East. In a "very warm" 15-minute chat with Mr Trump yesterday, the Prime Minister revealed he and the "deal maker" had bonded over their business backgrounds and their not-dissimilar entry into politics. Opposition Leader Bill Shorten warned Mr Trump during a speech in Question Time that Labor would refuse to stay silent if he continued to mock, ridicule and disrespect. The Left and the Right of politics in Australia yesterday further retreated into their ideological positions, with Labor urging the nation to reject hate and far-right Conservatives emboldened to rubbish "politically-correct do-gooders".

44. 4 dead, 14 wounded in explosion on Bagram Airfield

Pajhwok Afghan News, Farid Tanha, 2016 11 12

Charikar - At least four people were killed and 14 others wounded in a huge explosion on the Bagram Airfield, the main US military base, in central Parwan province on Saturday, officials said. The Bagram district's administrative chief, Abdul Shakoor Qudusi, told Pajhwok Afghan News the blast took place at 5:30am. He said three people were killed and 13 others wounded in the explosion. But the US military put the toll at four dead and 14 wounded. "To the family and friends of those who lost their lives today, we share your loss and our thoughts are with you," the Resolute Support mission commander said. In a statement, Gen. John Nicholson, "We offer you our deepest condolences. For the family and friends of those wounded in today's attack, let me assure you they are receiving the best care possible, and we will keep them in our thoughts today."

Mullah Nayeb and Mawolavi Muhab, two Taliban local commanders, were also killed in the operations.

46. Unclear direction of Trump policy poses uncertainty, possible danger to Asia-Pacific region, says expert

South China Morning Post, Catherine Wong, 2016 11 12

Beijing - Some of America's foreign policy elite are "unprepared" for Donald Trump's win and the lack of any clear understanding over the next US president's policy direction could pose great uncertainty and danger to the Asia-Pacific region, warns a veteran Washington expert on maritime and Southeast Asia politics. The victory of the real estate tycoon and political outsider on Tuesday sent shock waves not only through the political establishment in Washington, but also nations around the world - in particular America's Asia-Pacific allies who have been nervously looking for clues about what a Trump presidency would mean for the region. Gregory B. Poling, director of the Asia Maritime Transparency Initiative and a fellow at the Southeast Asia Programme at the Centre for Strategic and International Studies, said even the foreign policy elite in Washington were in the dark. "The foreign policy community is wildly unprepared for the Trump victory ..." said Poling "... and is, for the most part, completely divorced from any decision-making going on in the Trump campaign." During the campaign trail, the US president-elect often attacked the foreign policy decisions made by the administration of the outgoing President Barack Obama and his opponent Hillary Clinton, who was a former secretary of state. Will Asia disappear from the US radar under Trump? However, Trump had so far spoken very little about his views on Asia, except for his constant barrage of allegations that China had stolen American jobs, pledges to launch a trade war with Beijing, and complaints that nations, including China and Japan, had taken advantage of the United States.

47. Russian State Duma ratifies China-Russia anti-terrorism agreement

Xinhua News Agency, 2016 11 12

Moscow - The Russian State Duma, or the lower house of parliament, ratified an agreement on Friday between China and Russia on cooperation in fighting against terrorism, separatism and extremism. Russian President Vladimir Putin submitted the agreement to the State Duma for parliamentary ratification on Sept. 28. The agreement, signed in Beijing on Sept. 27, 2010, is aimed at developing bilateral cooperation in combating terrorism, separatism and extremism by taking joint measures to prevent and stop terrorist attacks. The two countries will exchange information in fighting criminal activities of terrorists and extremists, hold regular meetings and consultations, and work together to prevent and suppress crimes in the border regions between China and Russia.

Kyodo News, 2016 11 12

Naha - Four China Coast Guard vessels entered Japanese waters around the disputed Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea on Saturday, the Japan Coast Guard said. The ships were spotted in the territorial waters around the group of uninhabited islets in the morning, the first intrusion since Sunday. The islands are controlled by Japan and claimed by China which calls them Diaoyu.

48. A protectionist U.S. under Trump would give Beijing opening to benefit from trade

The Wall Street Journal, Mark Magnier and Chuin-Wei Yap, 2016 11 12

Beijing - The prospect of a more protectionist and inwardly focused America under Donald Trump opens room for China to widen its global economic clout. As the proposed 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement, which excludes China, looks unlikely to materialize under a Trump administration, China is pushing rival trade pacts. Meanwhile, its state-owned companies are making inroads abroad and multibillion-dollar ambitions to expand investment and trade along the Silk Road have drawn interest from some 100 countries and funding from the Beijing-led Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank. The Obama administration has warned that failure of the TPP, which had underpinned the U.S. "pivot" to Asia, could result in China winning trade advantages at the expense of the U.S. Republican and Democratic leaders in Congress have told the White House they won't advance it in the election's aftermath. Australian Foreign Minister Julie Bishop said this week a TPP collapse "would leave a vacuum in trade deals which most certainly will be filled by others," and that Australia would seek deals wherever it can. Ms. Bishop mentioned the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership, which is expected to be concluded in coming months and would lower or eliminate tariffs among Pacific countries that include China but not the U.S. Separately, China said it would seek support for a Beijing-led free-trade area in the Asia-Pacific during a leaders' summit in Peru next week. "Trump's election is a bit of a dial back on globalization," said Hong Kong University of Science and Technology professor Li Xi. That could give China "the opportunity to expand its influence," he said.

49. Seoul, Tokyo to tentatively sign intelligence-sharing pact on Monday: source

Yonhap English News, 2016 11 12

Seoul - South Korea on Monday will tentatively sign a bilateral pact with Japan about sharing military intelligence on North Korea despite strong objections from opposition parties, a government source said. The two sides last week reopened negotiations in Tokyo after a botched attempt four years ago. They initiated the pact in 2012, but Seoul suspended signing it, as opposition parties and civic groups claimed the deal was arranged too hastily and in secret. "South Korea and Japan will hold a third round of working-level talks for the signing of the General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA) in Tokyo on Monday," the source said on Saturday. They will "tentatively sign the agreement during the talks." The South Korean defense ministry announced on Friday that the tentative signing will come early next week without specifying the date. The two countries made a draft of the agreement in the past two rounds of working-level talks held respectively in Tokyo on Nov. 1 and Seoul on Nov. 9. Seoul's defense ministry has asked the Ministry of Government Legislation (MOLEG) to review the agreed terms through the foreign ministry.

50. Alleged Abu Sayyaf members hijack Vietnamese ship

The Philippine Star, Roel Pareño and Jaime Laude, 2016 11 12

Zamboanga City - At least 10 suspected Abu Sayyaf bandits hijacked a Vietnam-registered cargo vessel and kidnapped its captain and five other officers off Basilan yesterday morning. One of the crew of M/V Royal 16 identified as Dham Yan Trong, an electrician, was shot and wounded by the gunmen, Jerome Cayabyab, commander of the Philippine Coast Guard (PCG) Zamboanga station, said. Cayabyab said Trong was transported to a local hospital by M/V Lorcon (Lorenzo Container) Ilo-ilo, which provided assistance to the Vietnamese ship. Trong was accompanied to the hospital by Lei Ninh Khao, a fourth engineer of M/V Royal. Khao told authorities that the gunmen shot Trong when he ran as they were about to seize him. Cayabyab said M/V Royal was passing near Sibago Island, Mohammad Ajul in Lamitan, Basilan when 10 armed men on a speed boat intercepted the vessel around 6 a.m.

51. 4 more members of 'violent' gang with LTTE link held in Lanka

Press Trust of India, 2016 11 11

Colombo - Four members of a group believed to be backed by LTTE and inspired by south Indian films have been arrested and today remanded to police custody in Sri Lanka for their involvement in violence in the Tamil-dominated Jaffna. Six members of the sword-wielding Aava group were arrested last week for their violent acts against people in Jaffna. Of the latest arrested members, one was said to be a military man, but military spokesman Brigadier Roshan Seneviratne denied that any person linked to the Sri Lankan military was among those arrested. Acts of violence have recently increased in Jaffna suburbs like Manipay, Kopay and Chunnakam by the group. It is believed that the group was being backed by some politicians and former members of the LTTE. The group is also said to be drawing inspiration from south Indian movies.

52. Moro clan war claims 2 lives in Maguindanao

Philippines News Agency, 2016 11 12

Korondal City - Clan wars involving Moro rebels left two persons dead in Maguindanao, the military here said Friday. Colonel Cirilito Sobejana, commander of the 601st Infantry Brigade, said the clash occurred Thursday in Sitio Damabago, Barangay Barurao, Sultan sa Barongis, Maguindanao involving Moro families identified with the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF). He identified the protagonists as Commander Murato and his nephew, Commander Jaypee, both belonging to MILF 105th base command. Both sides have suffered one fatality, the Army said. "A long standing family feud has been brewing for so decades and it erupted Thursday," Sobejana said. "It was a case of land dispute, both are claiming ownership of a vast track of lands in the village." However, local officials said the claimants could not present legal documents legitimizing ownership of the lands. Sobejana said the military is keeping a safe distance and did not involve themselves in recognition of an existing ceasefire agreement between the national government and MILF.

55. All sides should stay committed to nuclear deal: Russian envoy

Tehran Times, Ali Kushki, 2016 11 12

Tehran – Against a backdrop of Donald Trump’s election as U.S. president, the Russian Ambassador to Tehran has underscored that all sides to the deal should keep their side of the bargain. “We hope commitments in the JCPOA are implemented and hope all sides, including the U.S., remains committed (to the deal),” Levan Dzhagaryan told the Tehran Times on Thursday on the sidelines of the 22nd international press exhibition in Tehran. Championed by the outgoing Obama administration, the deal granted Iran sanctions reliefs in exchange for it scaling down its nuclear program. On Tuesday, Republican U.S. presidential candidate Donald Trump won a race against Democrat Hillary Clinton, becoming the 45th U.S. president.

56. Once-Tolerant Mosul Laments Society's Unraveling

The New York Times, Tim Arango, 2016 11 12

Erbil, Iraq -- More than two years ago, a Christian farmer in his 70s named Mosa Zachariah fled his village near Mosul with, as he put it, only the pants he was wearing. He left behind his house, "tons of wheat" and a BMW. But now that his town, an early target of the Iraqi security forces as they advance on Mosul itself, has been cleared of the Islamic State forces, it is not jubilation he feels, but fear of what awaits him if he tries to return. He wistfully talked about his city's diversity as something completely unattainable now. "In that time, the Muslims and Christians were like brothers," he said. Musab Juma, a Shiite who used to live in the Mosul area, said he would not be going back, either. He relocated to Najaf, in southern Iraq, where he has a food stall and has decorated his home with old photos and antiques from his hometown. Yazidis and Kurds and Shabaks, other minorities that were once vital pieces of Mosul's human tapestry, have moved on, too. And many Sunni Arabs, who make up most of Mosul's population, say they will never go home again, even if that is where their parents and grandparents are buried.

57. Iraqi forces see hardest fight yet against ISIS

The Washington Post, Loveday Morris, 2016 11 11

Mosul, Iraq - Since pushing into Mosul a week ago, Iraqi commanders say their forces have been shaken by some of the most complex fighting they have ever encountered in battles against the Islamic State. It is a bitter fight: street to street, house to house, with the presence of civilians slowing the advancing forces. Car bombs - the militants' main weapon - scream out of garages and straight into advancing military convoys. "If there were no civilians, we'd just burn it all," said Maj. Gen. Sami al-Aridhi, a counterterrorism commander. He was forced to temporarily pause operations in his sector Monday because too many families were clogging the street. "I couldn't bomb with artillery or tanks, or heavy weapons. I said, 'We can't do anything.'" Mosul is the most populous city held by the militants, with an estimated 1 million people still living there. Iraqi forces have been closing in from the north and south but have broken into the city only on the eastern front, beginning a slow grind through densely populated neighborhoods. It's a long, hard slog to the Tigris River that carves through the center of Mosul - and then a whole new battle awaits on the other side. Commanders expressed confidence that they eventually will prevail, but they are less optimistic that they will meet Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi's pledge to have the city under control by the end of the year.

58. ISIS Is Massacring Mosul Civilians as Troops Advance , U.N . Says

The New York Times, Nick Cumming Bruce, 2016 11 12

Geneva - Islamic State militants have summarily killed scores of civilians in the Iraqi city of Mosul in recent days, sometimes using children as executioners, and have also used chemical agents against Iraqi and Kurdish troops, United Nations officials said on Friday. Video posted by the militants on Wednesday showed four children, who appear to be 10 to 14 years old, shooting four civilians accused of disloyalty at a location near the Tigris River, said Ravina Shamdasani, a spokeswoman for the United Nations human rights office in Geneva. The video release identified one of the children as Russian, another as coming from Uzbekistan and two as Iraqis. United Nations investigators had not identified the time of the killings, citing the surge in executions by Islamic State courts and fighters in and around Mosul in recent weeks and the brutal training the militants have forced on children in the parts of Iraq and Syria they control. "They are showing they are still in business," Ms. Shamdasani said of the Islamic State, also known as ISIS, ISIL and Daesh. In one massacre, militants were said to have summarily shot 40 civilians in Mosul, dressing them in orange clothes adorned with words, marked in red, labeling them "traitors and agents of the I.S.F.," the abbreviation for Iraqi Security Forces, Ms. Shamdasani said. Afterward, the militants strung up the bodies of their victims from electricity poles around the city — a practice the Islamic State long used to strike fear into those who live in the group's strongholds.

59. Russia detains IS-linked suspects plotting terror attacks

Xinhua News Agency, 2016 11 12

Moscow – Russia's Federal Security Service (FSB) said Saturday that it has detained a group of terrorists on suspicion of plotting attacks in the capital city of Moscow and Russia's second largest city of St. Petersburg. With the help of counterparts from Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan, 10 people, some from Central Asia, who were planning high-profile attacks in Moscow and St. Petersburg, were detained in Saturday's special operations, the FSB said in a statement. Improvised explosive devices stuffed with shrapnel, firearms, as well as remote control and communication devices have been found from them, it added.

60. Russie: une cyberattaque d'envergure vise cinq grandes banques du pays

Radio France Internationale, 2016 11 12

Moscou - Plusieurs grandes banques de Russie sont visées par une cyberattaque d'envergure. L'attaque a été lancée mardi 8 novembre et se poursuivait jeudi. Avec notre correspondante à Moscou, Muriel Pomponne C'est sans doute la plus importante attaque informatique subie par les banques russes. Les sites de cinq des plus importantes institutions financières de Russie ont été visés. Le plus gros établissement du pays, la banque publique Sberbank, a précisé avoir été ciblé et avoir réussi à neutraliser l'attaque sans perturbation sur ses activités. Mais la Sberbank affirme avoir déjà été touchée 68 fois par ce genre d'attaques depuis le début de l'année.

61. Russia Prepares to Block LinkedIn

The New York Times, Mark Scott, 2016 11 12

Moscow - LinkedIn, the social networking site for professionals that will soon be bought by Microsoft, is to be blocked in Russia after a local court ruled on Thursday that it had breached the country's data protection rules, a sign of growing tensions for American tech companies operating in the country. The case in the Moscow city courts arose at a time of debate in Washington over how the United States might retaliate for what American security officials said was the Russian government's hacking of emails from the Democratic National Committee and other digital interference in the presidential election. Russia has a history of increasing regulatory pressure on businesses in political disputes. The case began in August, before Donald J. Trump's victory in Tuesday's presidential election, and there is currently no connection between the LinkedIn case and the hacking scandal. The country's push to gain greater control over its internet users is one of a number of attempts by governments worldwide to dictate how people use digital services. From China's blocking of whole swaths of the internet to Europe's efforts to regulate what can and cannot be viewed online, different regions and countries are in a battle with companies and other governments to decide how the internet will expand. Russia imposed its ban -- a rare occasion of LinkedIn being blocked in a country -- after lawmakers passed new rules last year that required any personal digital data on Russian citizens collected by companies to be stored within the country. Officials said the rules were aimed at protecting people's online privacy from hackers, but critics have claimed the legislation could allow Russian authorities to force companies -- both local and international -- to hand over sensitive information about their users.

62. Russian Officials Were in Contact With Trump Allies, Diplomat Says

The New York Times, Ivan Nechepurenko, 2016 11 11

Moscow - The Russian government maintained contacts with members of Donald J. Trump's "immediate entourage" during the American presidential campaign, one of Russia's top diplomats said Thursday. "There were contacts," Sergei A. Ryabkov, the deputy foreign minister, was quoted as saying by the Interfax news agency. "We continue to do this and have been doing this work during the election campaign," he said. Mr. Ryabkov said officials in the Russian Foreign Ministry were familiar with many of the people he described as Mr. Trump's entourage. "I cannot say that all, but a number of them maintained contacts with Russian representatives," Mr. Ryabkov said. Later, the Foreign Ministry in Moscow said Mr. Ryabkov had been referring to American politicians and supporters of Mr. Trump, not members of his campaign staff. The contacts were carried out through the Russian ambassador in Washington, who reached out to the senators and other political allies to get a better sense of Mr. Trump's positions on various issues involving Russia. A Trump spokeswoman, Hope Hicks, said Thursday that there had been no meeting between campaign staff members and Russian government officials during the campaign. "We are not aware of any campaign representatives that were in touch with any foreign entities before yesterday, when Mr. Trump spoke with many world leaders," Ms. Hicks, said. "Those discussions were congratulatory and forward looking."

63. Al-Qaeda affiliate in Syria targeted

The Washington Post, Adam Entous, 2016 11 12

Damascus -President Obama has ordered the Pentagon to find and kill the leaders of an al-Qaeda-linked group in Syria that the administration had largely ignored until now and that has been in the vanguard of the fight against the Syrian government, U.S. officials said. The decision to deploy more drones and intelligence assets against the militant group formerly known as Jabhat al-Nusra reflects Obama's concern that it is turning parts of Syria into a new base of operations for al-Qaeda on Europe's southern doorstep, the officials said. The move underlines the extent to which Obama has come to prioritize the counterterrorism mission in Syria over efforts to pressure President Bashar al-Assad to step aside, as al-Nusra is among the most effective forces battling the Syrian government. That shift is likely to accelerate once President-elect Donald Trump takes office. Trump has said he will be even more aggressive in going after militants than Obama, a stance that could lead to the expansion of the campaign against al-Nusra, possibly in direct cooperation with Moscow. The group now calls itself Jabhat Fatah al-Sham - or Front for the Conquest of Syria - and says it has broken with al-Qaeda, an assertion discounted by U.S. officials.

64. Comment les terroristes des attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles se sont infiltrés en Europe

Le Monde.fr, Soren Seelow, 2016 11 12

Paris - Abdelhamid Abaaoud est le premier kamikaze à avoir pris la route des migrants, dès août 2015, alors qu'on le croyait en Syrie. Son ami Salah Abdeslam ira ensuite chercher dix de ses complices en voiture. L'enquête sur les attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles révèle chaque jour un peu plus comment cette cellule terroriste mise sur pied à Rakka, en Syrie, a su tirer profit de la crise migratoire pour se reconstituer au sein de l'espace Schengen. Sous de fausses identités, la plupart des kamikazes ont suivi la route des Balkans jusqu'en Hongrie, plate-forme de transit des réfugiés, avant de rejoindre Bruxelles, base opérationnelle des terroristes. Dans une étude sur la fabrication de cette cellule, publiée jeudi 10 novembre par la revue américaine spécialisée Sentinel, le Centre d'analyse du terrorisme (CAT), dirigé par Jean-Charles Brisard, retrace très précisément le cheminement de ces terroristes à travers l'Europe. Une mine d'informations tirées de documents judiciaires et obtenues auprès de services de renseignement étrangers, que Le Monde a pu recouper. L'un de ces renseignements constitue un rebondissement majeur dans l'enquête: selon une note des services antiterroristes hongrois obtenue par le CAT, et dont Le Monde a pris connaissance, le premier kamikaze à avoir pénétré l'espace Schengen, dès le 1er août 2015, est Abdelhamid Abaaoud, futur coordinateur des attentats du 13 novembre 2015. Les enquêteurs ignoraient jusqu'ici quand et comment il s'était infiltré en Europe.

65. Berlin Isis suspect 'spied on Brandenburg Gate for attack'

The Local.de, 2016 11 12

Berlin - A 19-year-old Isis suspect was spying major Berlin landmarks as targets for attack, according to a court document released on Thursday. A 19-year-old Syrian man, currently under arrest, spied on the Brandenburg Gate, the German parliament (Bundestag) building and Alexanderplatz with Berlin's iconic TV Tower, according to a document published on Thursday by Germany's highest court, the Federal Court of Justice (BGH). The court had released the document to announce a decision to extend an investigation into the man by three months. According to the document, the suspect had fallen in with Isis in 2013 and undergone military training with them. In 2015 he travelled to Germany with his brother-in-law at the behest of his parents and arrived in August of that year as an asylum seeker. He stayed in touch with Isis through his smartphone, the court document says.

66. Defence minister to Trump: NATO is no business deal

The Local.de, 2016 11 11

Berlin - German Defence Minister Ursula von der Leyen sent a warning to US president-elect Donald Trump on Thursday, saying he needed to show loyalty to the NATO alliance. "What his advisors will hopefully tell him, and what he will hopefully learn, is that NATO is not a business," von der Leyen told broadcaster ZDF on Thursday evening. She explained that rather, Trump must acknowledge that NATO is a community of shared values. "This is not something where someone can say: 'The past does not matter to me. The values that we champion together do not matter to me, but rather I am looking at how much money I can get out of this and if I can make a good deal,'" von der Leyen continued. "That is not how you govern a country and that is also not the principle of NATO." Throughout his election campaign, Trump was critical of the NATO military alliance, arguing that countries besides the US needed to pull more weight. He also stated once that he would not defend NATO's Baltic member states against a Russian invasion unless they had "fulfilled their obligations to us".

67. Armed drones kill six PKK militants in northern Iraq

Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 11 12

Istanbul - Six outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) militants were killed on Nov. 12 in armed drone strikes in northern Iraq, the Turkish Armed Forces has announced. Two PKK militants were killed in Nirva Seytu mountain and another four were killed in Aşuş mountain in drone strikes in northern Iraq between 7:00 a.m. and 7:20 a.m., the military said. In addition, Turkish warplanes also conducted an air operation in the Zap region in northern Iraq on Nov. 12, killing another three PKK militants.

68. Renseignement, prison, police... Ce qui a été fait depuis ces attaques

Le Figaro, Gonzalès, Paule & Comevin, Christophe, 2016 11 12

Paris - Le gouvernement s'y est repris à plusieurs fois avant de proposer, avec l'aide du Sénat, un dispositif légal renforcé. La loi du 13 novembre 2014 a introduit l'interdiction de sortie du territoire et créé le délit de préparation individuelle d'une entreprise terroriste. La répression des faits d'apologie et de provocation au terrorisme a été durcie et de nouveaux outils administratifs permettent de bloquer ou de déréférencer des sites Internet. La loi du 3 juin 2016 entérine le renforcement de la lutte contre le trafic d'armes, la lutte contre le blanchiment d'argent, le renforcement du renseignement pénitentiaire et des pouvoirs d'enquête pour les magistrats, ainsi que l'usage des armes facilité pour les forces de l'ordre. Les enquêteurs pourront aussi utiliser les Imsi-catchers, permettant le recueil des données sur de larges zones d'écoutes. De plus, une retenue administrative de quatre heures est prévue lors des contrôles d'identité par la police. Enfin, la loi du 21 juillet 2016 prévoit un alourdissement des peines encourues pour les infractions criminelles d'association de malfaiteurs en relation avec une entreprise terroriste et monte le curseur à vingt ans, trente ans et jusqu'à la perpétuité. Les étrangers condamnés se verront imposer une interdiction automatique de territoire. Les personnes condamnées pour terrorisme seront non seulement exclues du bénéfice des crédits automatiques de réduction de peine, mais également privées de la suspension et du fractionnement des peines, du placement à l'extérieur et de la semi-liberté. La durée totale de détention provisoire pour les mineurs est portée à deux ans et à trois ans pour les majeurs. Face aux deux campagnes d'attentats perpétrés en 2015, Beauvau a musclé la riposte. Dans le cadre du renforcement des services de renseignement, 500 agents supplémentaires sont appelés à étoffer la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) d'ici à fin 2017, en plus des 432 déjà prévus. « Des analystes techniques, des informaticiens, des linguistes sont notamment recrutés pour renforcer ses capacités d'analyse, de détection et de prévention des risques terroristes », a annoncé Bernard Cazeneuve, qui a par ailleurs alloué 500 postes de plus - 350 policiers et 150 gendarmes - au Service central du renseignement territorial (SCRT), tandis que 100 recrues vont rejoindre la Direction du renseignement de la Préfecture de police.

69. La cellule qui traque la menace

Corse-Matin, Romain Capdepon, 2016 11 12

Paris - Il a fallu batailler ferme pour avoir accès à ce qui est la réunion hebdomadaire la plus sensible du préfet de police des Bouches-du-Rhône Laurent Nuñez. C'est que la douzaine de personnes assise autour de la grande table, et qui constitue le Groupe d'évaluation départemental (GED), estime, sans doute à juste titre, que la discrétion est d'or. La confidentialité de ces cas, potentielles menaces pour la sûreté de l'État, aussi. Alors le préfet, qui mène la danse du passage en revue des individus signalés comme en voie de radicalisation ou ayant déjà passé le Rubicon, mettra, en notre présence, des numéros sur les noms, taira les communes dans lesquelles ils vivent. Chaque semaine, une bonne vingtaine de signalements sont estimés crédibles, plus ou moins alarmants, pour un quart exprimé par des proches ou des particuliers sur le numéro vert national (0800 005 696), un bon nombre aussi par les différentes institutions du département et l'Éducation nationale... Rien ne peut être laissé au hasard, chaque information ou décision est évoquée à haute voix, répétée. Le moindre oubli, le moindre aspect pris trop à la légère pourrait engendrer le pire dans un département dont, selon nos sources, quelques dizaines d'habitants sont actuellement sur les théâtres de guerre, et dont une bonne dizaine y a trouvé la mort ces dernières années.

Sans compter que les BdR sont l'un des huit départements français abritant le plus de profils à surveiller avec 619 individus "à risques" sur les 15 000 individus que recense le Fichier des signalements pour la prévention de la radicalisation à caractère terroriste (FSPRT). Alors autour du préfet Nuñez, on trouve les personnes les mieux renseignées de la zone sur la problématique : cabinet du préfet de Région, cellule Radicalisation de la préfecture de police, Renseignement Intérieur, Renseignement Territorial, Police judiciaire, gendarmerie, Parquet, services pénitentiaires... Chacun d'entre eux a étudié les profils sur la table en ce lundi.

CSIS in the News/Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. You should be worried about Canada's Anti-terrorism Act

CBC News, Mersiha Gadzo, 2016 11 13

OpEd: When Canada's national police force is found guilty of fabricating terrorist attacks and its security intelligence has a reputation for complicity in the torture of innocent citizens, one would think the next logical step would be to hold those responsible to account. Yet with the draconian Bill C-51, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service has been granted sweeping powers to act as a secret police force. Instead of only collecting intelligence, CSIS can now disrupt what they perceive to be a security threat, violating laws and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms if they find it necessary. The anti-terrorism act is dangerous legislation because it legalizes misconduct and allows the violation of civil liberties while Canadians are not made any safer. The B.C. Supreme Court overturned the terrorist convictions of John Nuttall and Amandy Korody last summer, ruling that the RCMP entrapped the couple, coaxing them into planning to blow up the B.C. legislature. The RCMP spent nearly $1 million imagining different scenarios, involving 240 police officers to realize their fabrication. On Canada Day in 2013, the RCMP and CSIS reportedly saved Canadians by disrupting their own fake plot and informed the media that Nuttall and Korody were self-radicalized, inspired by al-Qaeda. Nuttall's and Korody's overturned convictions might have turned out differently if Bill C-51 had been implemented at the time with the offence of "advocating or promoting the commission of terrorism offences in general" (regardless of whether you actually meant it or whether you were led on in an illegal sting operation). This broad and vague speech crime is worrisome, since we've already seen individuals flagged simply for espousing views that differ from the government's official narrative. Anti-war activist Ken Stone caught the attention of CSIS after visiting Iran and writing a 2012 op-ed for the Hamilton Spectator titled "Harper is wrong in demonizing Iran." Stone said CSIS agents showed up at his house unannounced in an attempt to intimidate him. In a Toronto Star op-ed, lawyer Faisal Kutty listed a sample of his clients and what they were flagged for, including "an engineering student searching, wait for this, engineering journals; hugging someone at an Eid gathering when this is part of the festive rituals; and attending lectures about rights." The 2008 Iacobucci report found CSIS and the RCMP complicit in the torture of innocent Canadians in foreign prisons. Canadian authorities made up accusations that Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad Elmaati and Muayyed Nureddin were terrorists and provided questions to the interrogators. The confessions obtained under torture were used to justify search warrants. CSIS labelled Almalki a potential member of al-Qaeda, but after following him, an RCMP case officer admitted in a memo, "O Division Task Force are presently finding it difficult to establish anything on him other than the fact that he is an Arab running around." (Note: Mersiha Gadzo is a multimedia journalist currently based in Sarajevo.)

2. Judge's CSIS revelations shocking

The Toronto Star, 2016 11 13

Letter to the Editor: Justice Simon Noel's finding of illegal practices by Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) against private interests, without judicial oversight, is shocking. Also shocking are CSIS director Michael Coulombe's comments that attempt to draw a rational, defensible line between his agencies illegal practices and the law. Most shocking is the apparent lack of any remedy, by the justice, that would act as a deterrent against future similar acts by CSIS, only an acknowledgement of CSIS's illegal behaviour and a questioning, by the justice, of the efficacy of bringing future contempt of court proceedings. This is the thin edge of the wedge where resisting accountability today leads to the allowance of even more objectionable behaviour in the future. Robert G. Moore, Toronto

3. Judge's CSIS revelations shocking

The Toronto Star, 2016 11 13

Letter to the Editor: The CSIS, a major government spy agency, has been caught (again) spying on many thousands or millions of innocent Canadian citizens for at least 10 years and never informed judges or the courts what it was doing - and still doing? Other government agencies, like the super-secretive Communications Security Establishment (CSE) and the RCMP, have also spied on civilians for years but are not mentioned in this article. Also, Quebec's provincial police were recently found to be spying on several journalists - so much for "freedom of the press" and "the principle of privacy" in Canada. Government spying on civilians, including journalists, is a very serious violation of our Charter rights. Orwell was right; so is Edward Snowden. You've been alerted and warned. Don Weitz, Toronto

4. Donald Trump may force Canada to reconsider defence spending: Former Trudeau advisor Global News, Amy Minsky, 2016 11 13

Ottawa - Canada might have to boost defence spending once President-elect Donald Trump takes office in the new year. Throughout his campaign, Trump called on the United States' NATO allies to pony up, telling voters that with him the Oval Office, the U.S. wouldn't necessarily come to the defence of a NATO ally under attack – effectively threatening one of the treaty's cornerstone. Through Trump called into question some fundamentals of American foreign policy – including trade and alliance commitments – not everyone believes the president-elect will toss agreements that have underpinned a largely stable, open international system for decades. "I'm not convinced Donald Trump is going to throw away NATO or tear up NAFTA, but we're in a moment of uncertainty now where all of America's partners are wondering ... how those will those very significant changes that he was setting out in broad terms in his campaign be translated into specific policy," said Roland Paris, who holds the research chair in international security and governance at the University of Ottawa and was once foreign policy advisor to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. "Canada has an interest in nudging the United States back into thinking about NATO as an alliance and not thinking about it in instrumental terms, as a way of extracting residences," Paris told The West Block's Tom Clark, highlighting the stabilizing effects the treaty has had on Europe – both politically and security-wise – for almost 70 years. Through NATO, Canada committed to spend two per cent of GDP on defence, but only spends about half of that.

5. Terrorisme et radicalisation: la religion pas si importante Le Quotidien, Louis Tremblay, 2016 11 13

Québec - Voilà des éléments qui ressortent des études menées par les chercheurs universitaires qui tentent de comprendre les mécanismes qui transforment des jeunes sans histoire en individus radicalisés et, dans certains cas plus isolés, en terroristes qui vont passer à l'action. La spécialiste de la question et professeure au département de science politique de l'Université Laval, Aurélie Campana, était de passage à l'UQAC mercredi dans le cadre des conférences du Centre interuniversitaire d'études sur les lettres, les arts et la tradition (CÉLAT) en compagnie de l'ex-leader du Mouvement des Québécois de souche, Maxime Fiset, aujourd'hui sur le chemin de la déradicalisation. La chercheuse a profité de sa présentation pour déboulonner plusieurs mythes associés au monde des terrorismes et des radicalismes. Le principal étant selon cette dernière que «nous devons cesser de dire que nous sommes devant des phénomènes nouveaux puisque ces phénomènes ont existé dans le passé», insiste Mme Campana. Le recours à la terreur comme arme a été relevé pendant la Révolution française et s'est développé et raffiné depuis ce temps jusqu'à nos jours avec le déploiement sur les médias sociaux de stratégies efficaces de recrutement. La chercheuse Aurélie Campana et l'ex-leader de la Fédération des Québécois de souche Maxime Fiset ont expliqué aux étudiants de l'UQAC les rouages de la radicalisation et les motivations qui amènent des jeunes à suivre ce chemin jusqu'à poser des gestes de violence dans l'objectif de terroriser des groupes spécifiques dans la société. «Qu'on ne pense pas au jeune devant son ordinateur qui intègre des pages de concepts ou d'argumentaires. On présente souvent au jeune l'histoire d'un arabe français qui s'appelle Mohamed et qui a de la difficulté à se trouver un travail en raison de son nom», précise la chercheuse. Le genre d'histoire qu'un jeune Français peut facilement assimiler à sa réalité et qui l'amène à enclencher le processus de radicalisation.

6. Donald Trump may force Canada to reconsider defence spending: Former Trudeau advisor Global News, Amy Minsky, 2016 11 13

Ottawa - Canada might have to boost defence spending once President-elect Donald Trump takes office in the new year. Throughout his campaign, Trump called on the United States' NATO allies to pony up, telling voters that with him the Oval Office, the U.S. wouldn't necessarily come to the defence of a NATO ally under attack – effectively threatening one of the treaty's cornerstone. Through Trump called into question some fundamentals of American foreign policy – including trade and alliance commitments – not everyone believes the president-elect will toss agreements that have underpinned a largely stable, open international system for decades. “I'm not convinced Donald Trump is going to throw away NATO or tear up NAFTA, but we're in a moment of uncertainty now where all of America's partners are wondering ... how those will those very significant changes that he was setting out in broad terms in his campaign be translated into specific policy,” said Roland Paris, who holds the research chair in international security and governance at the University of Ottawa and was once foreign policy advisor to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. “Canada has an interest in nudging the United States back into thinking about NATO as an alliance and not thinking about it in instrumental terms, as a way of extracting residences,” Paris told The West Block's Tom Clark, highlighting the stabilizing effects the treaty has had on Europe – both politically and security-wise – for almost 70 years. Through NATO, Canada committed to spend two per cent of GDP on defence, but only spends about half of that.

8. Trump's world: Are we heading toward a new US security doctrine?

Al Arabiya, 2016 11 13

Washington - If Trump's victory in the presidential election has taken most American political experts and observers by surprise, it was even more of an unexpected turn for the global security community. The reactionary security agenda defended by the then Candidate Trump during the campaign gathered very little support from intelligence and defense leadership in Washington even within the Republican ranks. Instead, 50 of the country's most senior Republican national security officials had officially signed a letter back in August in which they declared that Donald Trump lacked the character, values and experience" to be president and would put at risk (the American) national security and well-being." This antagonistic attitude from top defense and intelligence services explains the difficulties Donald Trump faces to constitute his cabinet in matters of security. As insider talks seem to send former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani to the position of Attorney General, questions remain as to whom will head American foreign policy and intelligence services. A few days after his elections, President-elect Donald Trump is scrambling to put together a team of senior officials to run the government's sprawling intelligence and homeland security bureaucracy.

9. 3 slain troops worked for CIA in Jordan

The Washington Post, Thomas Gibbons-Neff & Joby Warrick, 2016 11 13

Washington - The three Army Special Forces soldiers killed at a Jordanian military base this month were working for a CIA program to train moderate Syrian fighters when they were shot at a checkpoint under still-unclear circumstances, U.S. officials said. The Nov. 4 attack is thought to be the deadliest single incident involving a CIA team since December 2009, when seven officers and contractors were killed in a suicide bombing in Khost, Afghanistan. The three soldiers - all members of the 5th Special Forces Group based at Fort Campbell, Ky. - were killed by a Jordanian soldier at an entry control point to Prince Faisal Air Base near Jafr, in the southern desert about 150 miles south of the capital, Amman, according to the officials. The shooter also was wounded in what was described by U.S. and Middle Eastern sources as an exchange of gunfire. The soldiers, identified as Staff Sgt. Matthew Lewellen, Staff Sgt. Kevin McEnroe and Staff Sgt. James Moriarty, were among about 2,000 U.S. troops working in Jordan while participating in the U.S.-led campaign fighting the Islamic State. Some of the troops have been assigned to mobile artillery units along the Jordanian border while others assist CIA-led training programs for Syrian opposition fighters. The CIA declined to comment on the shooting incident or on the soldiers' possible role in agency programs. What prompted the shooting remained unclear, as U.S. and Jordanian officials have painted different narratives of the incident. The FBI is investigating the possibility of a terrorist attack, but it has not discounted the possibility that the deaths could have been the result of a mistake at the gate, said a U.S. defense official who, like others, spoke on the condition of anonymity because an investigation into the incident is ongoing.

10. Where Even Nightmares Are Classified: Psychiatric Care at Guantánamo

Analysis: Every day when Lt. Cmdr. Shay Rosecrans crossed into the military detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, she tucked her medical school class ring into her bra, covered the name on her uniform with tape and hid her necklace under her T-shirt, especially if she was wearing a cross. She tried to block out thoughts of her 4-year-old daughter. Dr. Rosecrans, a Navy psychiatrist, had been warned not to speak about her family or display anything personal, clues that might allow a terrorism suspect to identify her. Patients called her "torture bitch," spat at her co-workers and shouted death threats, she said.

One hurled a cup of urine, feces and other fluids at a psychologist working with her. Even interviewing prisoners to assess their mental health set off recriminations and claims that she was torturing them. “What would your Jesus think?” they demanded. Dr. Rosecrans, now retired from the Navy, led one of the mental health teams assigned to care for detainees at the island prison over the past 15 years. Some prisoners had arrived disturbed — traumatized adolescents hauled in from the battlefield, unstable adults who disrupted the cellblocks. Others, facing years of indefinite confinement, struggled with despair. Then there were prisoners who had developed symptoms including hallucinations, nightmares, anxiety or depression after undergoing brutal interrogations at the hands of Americans who were advised by other health personnel. At Guantánamo, a willful blindness to the consequences emerged. Those equipped to diagnose, document and treat the effects — psychiatrists, psychologists and mental health teams — were often unaware of what had happened. Dozens of men who underwent agonizing treatment in secret C.I.A. prisons or at Guantánamo were left with psychological problems that persisted for years, despite government lawyers’ assurances that the practices did not constitute torture and would cause no lasting harm, The New York Times has reported.

11. Hillary Clinton Blames F.B.I. Director for Election Loss

The New York Times, Amy Chozick, 2016 11 13

Washington - Hillary Clinton on Saturday cast blame for her surprise election loss on the announcement by the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, days before the election that he had revived the inquiry into her use of a private email server. In her most extensive remarks since she conceded the race to Donald J. Trump early Wednesday, Mrs. Clinton told donors on a 30-minute conference call that Mr. Comey’s decision to send a letter to Congress about the inquiry 11 days before Election Day had thrust the controversy back into the news and had prevented her from ending the campaign with an optimistic closing argument. “There are lots of reasons why an election like this is not successful,” Mrs. Clinton said, according to a donor who relayed the remarks. But, she added, “our analysis is that Comey’s letter raising doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum.” Mrs. Clinton said a second letter from Mr. Comey, clearing her once again, which came two days before Election Day, had been even more damaging. In that letter, Mr. Comey said an examination of a new trove of emails, which had been found on the computer of Anthony D. Weiner, the estranged husband of one of her top aides, had not caused him to change his earlier conclusion that Mrs. Clinton should face no charges over her handling of classified information. Her campaign said the seemingly positive outcome had only hurt it with voters who did not trust Mrs. Clinton and were receptive to Mr. Trump’s claims of a “rigged system.” In particular, white suburban women who had been on the fence were reminded of the email imbroglio and broke decidedly in Mr. Trump’s favor, aides said.

12. The Danger of Going Soft on Russia

The New York Times, 2016 11 13

Editorial: Among the first world leaders to congratulate President-elect Donald Trump was Vladimir Putin. And why shouldn't he? Just when relations between Russia and the West are at their most precarious point since the Cold War, Mr. Trump has been Russia's defender and the beneficiary of Moscow's efforts to influence the presidential campaign. At times he has seemed almost intoxicated by the Russian president, praising Mr. Putin's firmness and insisting that the two could resolve any differences if they met. Meanwhile, he has shown little concern that Russia poses a major strategic challenge. Few experts believe that Russia wants war with the West, but many worry that Mr. Putin's aggressive behavior as he tries to revive Russian greatness (thus masking problems at home) could result in the kind of dangerous miscalculations that often lead to armed conflict. Russia's hacking of the Democratic National Committee and the Clinton campaign to interfere in the election was brazen. Even worse were actions that threatened human life and global stability, like Mr. Putin's airstrikes against civilians in Syria, his positioning of nuclear-capable weaponry near Poland and the Baltic States, his annexation of Crimea and the war he waged in eastern Ukraine. He violated the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty by producing a ground-launched cruise missile and canceled a 16-year-old accord on reducing stockpiles of weapons-grade plutonium.

13. The pain of U.S. families linked unwillingly to terror

The Washington Post, Fatima Bhojani, 2016 11 13

Washington - When Farhiyo Mohamed's eldest son was convicted on charges of supporting the Islamic State, her world was upended. It wasn't just that her son was headed to prison; her support system evaporated. Longtime friends in her tightly knit Somali community in Minneapolis stopped visiting, afraid they might be tainted by association. "You call your friend, and your friend says, 'Don't call me because the FBI is following you,'" said Mohamed, a 40-year-old mother of five who escaped war in her home country, survived years in a Kenyan refugee camp and immigrated to the United States in 2003. Her face had been plastered on the local news. One day this summer, during the height of her son's trial, she was yelled at and called a "Muslim terrorist" during a trip to the post office. On a recent weekend in Reisterstown, Md., Mohamed learned she was not alone. About 60 Muslim Americans whose family members had also been convicted of terrorism charges were gathered at a yearly retreat to share their stories. For many of them, the group has become the only support system they have. In the decade following 9/11, as an increasing number of terrorism prosecutions cropped up around the country, civil liberties lawyers and activists noticed the need to support Muslim families with members who were targets of counterterrorism investigations. They created a group called the National Coalition to Protect Civil Freedoms and, in 2012, held their first conference.

14. China may be surprised to find Trump just as unpredictable as U.S. has

The Washington Post, Simon Denyer, 2016 11 13

Beijing - China's nationalist press could barely contain its glee this week. Under President Donald Trump, argued the tabloid Global Times, the United States will embrace isolationism, stop projecting its strategic might and shrink its global influence. Meanwhile, the United States' Asian allies, the paper gloated, fear being cast aside. A cartoon showed the Chinese leaders' archrival, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, sweating profusely as a slot machine came up with a Trump jackpot. But the glee could be short-lived, and the Chinese government's impressions of Trump - as a pragmatist who will make business deals with China but play down geopolitics; as an isolationist who will pull back from the Asia-Pacific region; as a realist who won't bug them about human rights - could end up being seriously misguided. "They are expecting that they are going to be able to work with this guy," said Paul Haenle, director of the Carnegie-Tsinghua Center in Beijing. "But the big risk here is that the Chinese have come to one conclusion, and the reality may be very different." It is far too soon to know what is in Trump's mind, or whom he will appoint to his foreign policy and national security team. But early signs are that he may take a significantly more hawkish line toward China than Beijing expects.

15. Inside the mind of Trump's national security guru

CNN News, Peter Bergen, 2016 11 13

Analysis: One is the son of a multimillionaire real estate developer from New York City who avoided service in Vietnam and whose experience and knowledge of the military and the national security realm are close to zero. The other is a retired three-star general -- one of nine children who grew up in a small house in Middletown, Rhode Island. He went on to run intelligence for the US Joint Special Operations Command, which includes SEAL Team 6 and Delta Force. Later he commanded the Defense Intelligence Agency, the US military's overall intelligence organization. But riding on a wave of ultranationalistic rhetoric, Donald Trump and his top adviser on national security, retired US Army Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, have now catapulted from political outsiders to the White House. On Friday, Trump appointed Flynn as one of five vice chairs of his transition team. NBC reports that Flynn is being considered as either Trump's national security advisor or secretary of defense. The latter position would require a waiver to allow a former military officer to assume a Cabinet position. Understandably, a request for a comment from Flynn about what his future role in the Trump presidency might be did not yield a response. Flynn's advice to the President-elect is all the more important because he is the only person on Trump's team with any significant experience in America's post-9/11 wars that continue to grind on in Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, Pakistan, Somalia, Syria and Yemen.

16. Charity told to distance itself from extremism

The Sunday Telegraph, Camilla Turner, 2016 11 13

London – A leading Islamic charity which penned an open letter criticising The Sunday Telegraph's reports about its extreme speakers and filed numerous complaints to the press regulator has been warned by the Charity Commission it must distance itself from individuals who condone "violent extremism and acts of terrorism". Islamic Education and Research Academy (iERA) was investigated by the charities watchdog amid allegations that its leaders promote anti-Semitism and have called for homosexuals and female adulterers to be stoned to death. The inquiry, which lasted almost three years, concluded that trustees must do more to prevent associating with organisations and individuals who "encourage or support terrorism and/or extremist views". The Charity Commission also criticised iERA over its partnership with Islamic University Online, an organisation founded by Dr Bilal Philips, who was banned from the UK for his extremist views in 2010. The watchdog said it first became concerned about iERA after reports surfaced in March 2013 that the organisation had imposed gender segregation at an event held on a university campus, forcing women to sit at the back of the room. A former aide to Barack Obama, who was due to speak at the debate, walked out in protest and University College London later banned the charity as a consequence. The Commission launched a full inquiry the following year after noting a number of "regulatory issues" over its organisation of events and how it chooses speakers and preachers for them. The watchdog said the inquiry included assessing allegations raised in a dossier of evidence on iERA, compiled by the Council of Ex-Muslims of Britain (CEMB), an organisation set up to combat Islamist extremism.

17. Tesco hackers used mobiles to launder haul

The Sunday Times, Aimee Donnellan & Simon Duke, 2016 11 13

London – The criminals behind the Tesco Bank cyber-heist went on a spending spree in shops in the US and Brazil to launder their ill-gotten gains, The Sunday Times can reveal. The thieves used data stolen from the British lender to set up contactless payment accounts on smartphones, sources said. In a co-ordinated raid last weekend, they bought thousands of low-priced goods from stores, swiping their mobile phones at the tills. Many of the fraudulent transactions are understood to have been made in American electricals retailer Best Buy. The gang took £2.5m from 9,000 Tesco Bank customers before the lender detected suspicious activity and froze all online payments. The revelations will turn up the pressure on the supermarket's banking division, whose reputation has been damaged by the raid. Cyber-security experts said the lender should have acted more quickly to stop the flood of payments to overseas stores. It has contacted the National Cyber Security Centre, a wing of spy agency GCHQ, to help with its investigation into the attack — the costliest yet on a British bank's IT systems.

18. McCartney asks police to probe MI5 'bugging'

The Sunday Times, John Mooney, 2016 11 13

London – Raymond McCartney a Sinn Fein MLA, has asked the Police Service of Northern Ireland to investigate the alleged bugging of his home in 2002 by the army and MI5. McCartney, who lives in Derry, has been unable to locate an eavesdropping device which he believed was planted in his home. Its existence was exposed when an operations log book was accidentally left on the kitchen table by a "ghost team" comprised of army surveillance officers and an MI5 technician, who is said to have disarmed the alarm system on McCartney's house. The request by the former IRA hunger striker follows the publication of Charlie One, a book by a former army intelligence officer who used the pseudonym Sean Hartnett and revealed details about classified surveillance operations in Northern Ireland. Hartnett was a member of North Det, a military unit based in Shackleton Barracks in Ballykelly that spied on republicans by breaking into their homes and cars. In his book, Hartnett says he was involved in the covert operation to bug McCartney's home at the behest of MI5, which is in charge of gathering information on republicans in Northern Ireland. Hartnett claimed he listened to private conversations and heard people searching for the device, which he believes remains hidden to this day. McCartney's brother Andrew was also targeted by the security services. In 2005, workmen renovating his home in Derry found a transmitter in a kitchen ceiling cavity. The device had two aerials, batteries and a microphone.

19. Colombia Reaches New Peace Deal With Rebels

The New York Times, Nicholas Casey, 2016 11 13

Bogota - The Colombian government and the nation's main rebel group said on Saturday that they had reached a "new final accord" to end their longstanding conflict, potentially reviving a deal that was rejected last month in a referendum. The changes to the agreement with the rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or the FARC, were announced in Havana and addressed a range of topics — such as where rebels would be confined after disarming and how courts might address drug trafficking offenses — that negotiators said had troubled voters. The agreement also appeared to withdraw a promise of guaranteed seats for rebels in Congress — one key demand of those who said the rebels would be unfairly rewarded with political positions. In a televised address, President Juan Manuel Santos emphasized the need to ratify the agreement quickly, saying time was running out. "The cease-fire is fragile," he said. "The uncertainty generates fears and increases the risks to throw this immense effort overboard." However, it was unclear whether the changes would placate voters who had sunk the deal by a thin margin, many on the grounds that it was too lenient on the rebels. After the vote, critics said they wanted rebel leaders to face prison sentences — a demand that seemed nearly impossible to meet after the first agreement had been signed.

20. Malcolm Turnbull, Peter Dutton announce refugee resettlement deal with US

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, 2016 11 13

Canberra - The United States and Australia have agreed to a one-off refugee resettlement deal for people on Manus Island and Nauru, Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull confirms. The United States and Australia have agreed to a one-off refugee resettlement deal for people on Manus Island and Nauru. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull confirmed the agreement this morning, following a year of negotiations. Speaking in Canberra alongside Immigration Minister Peter Dutton, Mr Turnbull said the deal would only apply to those currently on Nauru and Manus Island and not to any new asylum seeker boat arrivals. "It is a one-off agreement — it will not be repeated," he said. Authorities hope to begin moving people to the United States by early next year.

21. U.S., in Deal With Australia, Agrees to Take Some Refugees

The New York Times, Michelle Innis, 2016 11 13

Sydney, Australia - The Australian government said Sunday that it had reached a one-time agreement in which the United States would take in refugees who had been banished to a detention center on the tiny impoverished Pacific island nation of Nauru. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull and the immigration minister, Peter Dutton, said the government would first resettle refugee women, children and families. Refugees held at another offshore processing center, Manus Island, a province of Papua New Guinea, may also be considered for resettlement in the United States. Asylum seekers who have not been granted refugee status should return home, Mr. Turnbull said. Mr. Turnbull would not say how many of the refugees, who were granted that status by the United Nations, would be resettled in the United States. "U.S. authorities will conduct their own assessment of refugees and decide which people are resettled in the U.S.," he said in a written statement. About 410 men, women and children are held on Nauru, and 823 men are held on Manus Island. Some are from Iran, Afghanistan, Vietnam and Malaysia. At a news conference in Canberra, the capital, Mr. Turnbull said, "This agreement has been struck after months and months of very careful planning." Officials from the United States Department of Homeland Security will arrive within days to begin carefully screening refugees for resettlement, he said. "The process will be an orderly one," he added. "We are not setting timelines."

22. 3 Pakistani terrorists arrested before joining ISIS in Afghanistan

Khaama Press, 2016 11 13

Kabul - A group of three Pakistani terrorists were arrested before they join the loyalists of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) terrorist group in Afghanistan. The Afghan Intelligence, National Directorate of Security (NDS), said the three individuals were arrested from eastern Kunar province. NDS further added that the detained individuals were identified as Sher Wali famous as Hanifa son of Fatah, Hamza son of Adul Rahim, and Noor Hamid Jan son of Hazrat Ali. According to NDS, the three suspects are originally residents of Jandul village in Bajaur and were arrested from Asadabad city, the provincial capital of Kunar.

23. 2 US troops, as many contractors dead in Bagram attack

Pajhwok Afghan News, Javid Hamim Kakar, 2016 11 13

Kabul - Two US soldiers and as many contractors were killed and 16 others wounded in Saturday's suicide attack on the Bagram Airfield in central Parwan province. The Pentagon said in a statement on Sunday among the dead were two US civilians, A Polish soldier also sustained slight injuries in the explosion. US Defence Minister Ash Carter expressed deep concern over the attack and ordered investigation. He said such acts would not deter the American mission in Afghanistan. A day earlier, the US military put the toll at four dead and 14 wounded. "To the family and friends of those who lost their lives today, we share your loss and our thoughts are with you," the Resolute Support mission commander said. In a statement, Gen. John Nicholson, "We offer you our deepest condolences. For the family and friends of those wounded in today's attack, let me assure you they are receiving the best care possible, and we will keep them in our thoughts today."

24. Bomber Kills 4 Americans at Base in Afghanistan

The New York Times Fahim Abed & Rod Nordland, 2016 11 13

Kabul - A suicide bomber managed to sneak onto the main American military base in Afghanistan on Saturday and kill four Americans, according to American and Afghan officials. The attacker entered on foot hidden among a group of workers reporting for duty at Bagram Air Base early in the morning, said Abdul Wahid Sediqi, spokesman for the governor of Parwan Province, where the military base and airfield are. Once inside the base, the attacker detonated explosives, Mr. Sediqi said. The blast killed two American service members and two American contractors working on the base, Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter said in a statement on Saturday morning. The explosion also wounded 16 American service members and a Polish soldier serving with the NATO coalition forces, the statement said. A Taliban spokesman, Zabihullah Mujahid, claimed responsibility for the attack on the militants' behalf and said it had killed a large number of American soldiers. The Taliban often give inflated casualty figures after an attack. Mr. Sediqi said that the suicide attacker "was able to pass from the first check post at the gate of the base and enter the base."

25. Terrorist bombing at Sufi shrine in Pakistan kills dozens

New York Times, Salman Masood, 2016 11 13

Islamabad - A powerful bomb blast ripped through a Sufi shrine Saturday evening in southwestern Pakistan, killing at least 52 people and wounding at least 100 others, officials said. The bombing, believed to have been carried out by a suicide attacker, occurred in the Khuzdar district of the restive province of Baluchistan. Hundreds of worshippers were inside the shrine of the Sufi saint Shah Bilal Noorani, and dozens were performing a devotional "dhamal" dance when the bomber struck. "Every day, around sunset, there is a dhamal here, and there are large numbers of people who come for this," Nawaz Ali, the shrine's custodian, was quoted as saying by local media outlets. The Taliban and other extremist Sunni groups have attacked Sufi shrines and gatherings in recent years. The Sufi tradition offers a tolerant version of Islam that is spurned by extremists like the Taliban. The Islamic State claimed responsibility for Saturday's attack, according to a statement released to the local media. But some Pakistani officials were skeptical of the Islamic State's claim. On Friday, paramilitary troops reported that they had killed a key leader of the Jundullah, a Pakistani anti-Shiite militant group, in a shootout in Baluchistan. Police officials believe that the shrine bombing could be an act of retaliation for that killing. The shrine is in a remote region, and the Pakistani military said at least 150 soldiers, four medical teams and 45 ambulances were being sent to respond to the emergency. "Evacuation through aircraft is not possible since there is no landing strip in the area," said Lt. Gen. Asim Saleem Bajwa, the chief military spokesman. Bajwa said the military would try to evacuate the wounded with helicopters.

26. Cybersecurity bill to rank agencies by data sensitivity

Taipei Times, Lee Hsin-fang, 2016 11 13

Beijing - A new draft cybersecurity bill that aims to protect sensitive government information is to rank government agencies on a three-tier system according to the data they handle, sources said. A total of 123 key government institutions, including the Presidential Office, the National Security Council, the Executive Yuan, the Ministry of National Defense and the National Security Bureau, have been identified by the Executive Yuan as tier-A organizations in terms of information security interests, a source who declined to be named said. The institutions would be required to conform to semiannual inspections, as well as conduct cyberattack response drills at least once a year. While relations between China and Taiwan seemingly thawed during former president Ma Ying-jeou's tenure, former premier Simon Chang had previously acknowledged that attacks on Taiwan's computer systems by Chinese hackers were still frequent at that time. The Democratic Progressive Party resolved to upgrade computer security measures at government organizations after it took power in May and learned of the frequency of cyberattacks, sources said.

28. Japan, South Korea to hold defense intelligence talks Monday in Tokyo

Kyodo News, 2016 11 13

Tokyo - Japan and South Korea will hold a third working-level meeting Monday in Tokyo to discuss signing a bilateral agreement on sharing military intelligence, Japan's foreign and defense ministries said Sunday. The South Korea media have reported the two countries plan to approve the deal Monday in a move to better cope with North Korea's military threats. The General Security of Military Information Agreement is aimed at facilitating the exchange of military intelligence while preventing such information from falling into the hands of other countries. In 2012, Japan and South Korea were ready to sign the agreement, but Seoul declined to do so at the last minute due to domestic opposition related to negative sentiments regarding Japan's colonial rule of the Korean Peninsula before and during World War II.

29. Japan conducts defense drill to fight illegal entry of armed fishermen

Kyodo News, 2016 11 13

Toyko - Japan's Self-Defense Forces, coast guard and police have conducted their first joint drill to cope with an illegal entry of armed fishermen on a remote island, a government source said Saturday, amid tension with China over a group of islands in the East China Sea. The exercise was held on an island in Kagoshima Prefecture Friday as Chinese government vessels repeatedly entered Japan's territorial waters around the Japanese controlled Senkaku Islands, claimed by China which calls them Diaoyu, in Okinawa Prefecture south of Kagoshima, with the Japan Coast Guard reporting the latest breach Saturday. The source said the drill, aimed at increasing the coordination and capability of the police, the coast guard and SDF, did not assume any specific country or place. The three parties examined their collaboration based on a scenario that armed fishermen illegally landed on the island -- a situation defined as a so-called "gray zone" incident that is short of an organized, premeditated attack of force by another country but poses a threat of violating Japan's sovereignty. The exercise could trigger protest from China as it came after Beijing agreed in September with Japan to accelerate discussions for an early introduction of a maritime and aerial communication mechanism designed to avoid accidental clashes in the East China Sea. According to the source, dozens of troops from each organ participated in the undisclosed drill held on the island of Eniyabanare on the Amami islands chain in Kagoshima, mobilizing a helicopter and patrol vessel.

30. 2 soldiers killed, several injured in renewed clashes in Myanmar western state

Yangon - Two soldiers have been killed and several others injured in renewed clashes in Myanmar's western Rakhine state, as the government troops conducted the clearance operation, the military-run Myawaddy News reported Sunday. The government troops were ambushed by about 60 attackers armed with guns, knives and spears near Mayintaung village on Saturday, and the bodies of six attackers were claimed along with some weapons after the skirmish. In the area clearance operation near Pwintphyuchang village, the government troops arrested 36 men believed to be the attackers who set fire to the village, said the report. When approaching another village of Gwason in search of the attackers, the government troops were shot by about 500 armed men, the report said. The government troops were outnumbered by the attackers until two helicopters of the Air Force fired on the attackers, forcing them to retreat. In another incident on the same day, a convoy of border guard force in Kyikanpyin of Maungtaw was ambushed at Baily Bridge by violent attackers near Maunghnama village where the bridge was exploded, with no one being injured but a vehicle damaged.

31. Military heightens readiness after N.K. leader's border unit visits

Yonhap English News, 2016 11 13

Seoul - South Korea will ramp up its readiness against possible provocations by North Korea ahead of the sixth anniversary of the North's shelling of a western border island in 2010, military officials said Sunday. As North Korean leader Kim Jong-un recently visited front-line units near the border with the South, Seoul's Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) does not rule out the possibility of a shelling by the North against the South's Yeonpyeongdo Island or other northern border islands in the West Sea. The North's artillery bombardment of Yeonpyeongdo took place on Nov. 23, 2010, resulting in four deaths. "Just before the 2010 shelling, the North Korean leadership paid a visit to artillery units stationed on islands near the western sea border (with the South). The then North Korean leader Kim Jong-il was accompanied by his son Jong-un," a JCS official said in a text message sent to reporters. In the same year, North Korea also sank a South Korean warship that resulted in the deaths of 46 sailors. This year, the military has closely watched North Korea's artillery units' activities in the border areas as they have noticeably enhanced their presence by placing 122 mm multiple rocket launchers there, the JCS said. In an article carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency (KCNA), Pyongyang said, "(Kim) inspected the outpost on Kali Islet and the defense detachment on Jangjae Islet in the West Sea.

32. Sayyaf bombs DPWH warehouse in Basilan

The Manila Times, Julmunir I. Jannaral, 2016 11 13

Cotabato - Suspected Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG) bandits bombed a warehouse of the Department of Public Works and Highways of the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (DPWH-ARMM) in Isabela City, Basilan. Sources from the Police Regional Office-ARMM at Camp Pendatun in Parang town, Maguindanao indicated that the bomb that exploded Thursday night just outside the warehouse of Basilan District Engineering Office (DEO) in Barangay Aguada in Isabela City. The bomb was set off from a distance using a mobile phone. Supt. Jerome Afuyog, chief of the Isabela municipal police office, said investigators are gathering information to determine the identities of the bombers. Afuyog said no one was reported hurt in the powerful explosion but it caused panic among the villagers residing nearby. The provincial government of Basilan said the incident was preceded by two attempts in the last 12 months to set off powerful improvised explosive devices (IEDs) near the residence of DPWH District Engineering chief Soler Undug. Regional Gov. Mujiv Hataman said he had asked the Army's 104th Brigade based in Isabela City to help the police identify the culprits in Thursday night's IED attack. The attack came about a month after thousands of displaced Yakan villagers were brought back by local officials to their farming villages in Basilan's hostile Albarka town, which the military recently liberated from control of the Abu Sayyaf. The ARMM government is implementing about P100 million worth of infrastructure projects in Albarka to generate livelihood opportunities for local residents.

33. Indian official says scrapping high-value currency notes means to curb terrorism

Xinhua News Agency, Jit Kumar, 2016 11 13

New Delhi - Indian Home Minister Rajnath Singh on Saturday urged all countries to unite against terrorism, saying the demonetisation of currency notes of higher denominations was a long-term move to curb it. "The biggest threat to the world is posed by terrorism. The entire world will have to unite against it. The government's move to scrap high-value currency notes will go a long way in curbing it," Singh said at an event in the northern state of Uttar Pradesh's capital Lucknow. Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi on Tuesday announced to scrap currency notes of 500 and 1,000 rupees (7.50 U.S. dollars and 15 U.S. dollars) respectively.

34. Iran ballistic missiles also 'produced in Iraq, Syria'

Al Arabiya English, 2016 11 13

Tehran - Hussein Sheikh al-Islam, the advisor to the Iranian foreign affairs minister, said Iranian missiles are not only manufactured in Syria but in other countries in the region as well. He said Iran expanded its missiles' production outside its borders due to the "increasing Israeli threats in the region." Although he did not reveal much about the production Iranian missiles, he said Iraq is one of the countries where ballistic missiles are produced. His statements come two days after the Iranian chief of staff said that manufacturing ballistic missiles has been carried out in Aleppo during the past years.

35. Iraq says IS driven from town near famed ancient ruins

The Associated Press, Susannah George And Sinan Salaheddin, 2016 11 13

Mosul, Iraq - The Iraqi army said Sunday that troops have driven Islamic State militants out of the town of Nimrud, south of Mosul, near the site of famed ancient Assyrian ruins that were reportedly destroyed by the extremists. Iraq's special forces meanwhile battled militants in the city of Mosul itself, where they struggled to advance against waves of suicide car bombs. Troops are converging from several fronts on Mosul, Iraq's second-largest city and the biggest urban area under IS control, as part of an offensive launched last month. The special forces have advanced the furthest so far, and hold a handful of districts on the city's eastern edge. The commander of the Mosul operation said troops took Nimrud, some 19 miles (30 kilometres) to the south, after heavy fighting. It was unclear if they had liberated the nearby 13th-century B.C. archaeological site. "The 9th division of the Iraqi army has liberated the town of Nimrud completely and raised the Iraqi flag over its buildings after the enemy suffered heavy casualties," Lt. Gen. Abdul-Amir Raheed Yar Allah said in a statement. The late 1980s discovery of treasures in Nimrud's royal tombs was one of the 20th century's most significant archaeological finds. The government said militants, who captured the site in June 2014, destroyed it the following year using heavy military vehicles.

President Hassan Rouhani officially launched the first phases of the Yadavaran and North Azadegan fields as well as the the North Yaran field, which are shared with neighbouring Iraq, the Iranian oil ministry's news agency SHANA reported. Yadavaran will have a production of up to 115,000 bpd in its first phase and North Azadegan's output is 75,000 bpd, SHANA said.

37. Three Reported Killed as Daesh Attacks Iraqi Village With Shells of Chlorine

Sputnik News Service, 2016 11 13

Moscow - According to Al-Sumaria television channel, the terrorists fired at the village over 15 mortar shells containing chemical chlorine. "The IS fired [on Saturday] a village... in Al-Shirqat District with more than 15 mortar shells, some of those containing toxic chemical chlorine... As a result of firing three people were killed, two were wounded, among them women and children. Material damage was done, as well," a source told Al-Sumaria television channel. On Friday, Human Rights Watch (HRW) said that Daesh militants had used chemicals in at least three attacks on the Iraqi town of Qayyarah some 37 miles south of Mosul, which led to a number of civilian injuries.

38. Putin, Trump have similar positions on some issues - parliament speaker

TASS World Service, 2016 11 13

Moscow -Speaker of Russia's State Duma Vyacheslav Volodin says the Donald Trump's position in fighting terrorism, in structuring of effective Russian-U.S. relations and in defending national interests is similar to the position of Russia's President Vladimir Putin. "Exactly what he (Trump - TASS) said, has been said by our president," the speaker said in an interview with the NTV television channel on Sunday. "Our president speaks about fighting terrorism, our president speaks about defeating interests of this country, though minding interests of other countries. Our president has been speaking about bringing closer the positions." "There are quite many point of intersection of the kind, and very many similar positions of Putin and Trump," he continued. "Time will show whether Trump will follow the statements he made." "It is really complicated to be speaking about it now, but anyway Trump has opportunities for that," he added. The U.S. president-elect has worldview approaches to "structuring effective and respectful relations" are also very close to Russia, he continued. "Like, of course, to us is quite close his position of a person who loves his country and defends its interests."

39. Syrian government texts east Aleppo residents to leave

Al-Jazeera News, 2016 11 13

Damascus - The Syrian government has sent text messages to residents and rebels in eastern Aleppo telling them to leave the area within 24 hours. Government forces said that they were preparing a major offensive to push opposition fighters out of the besieged eastern half of the city. "To the armed people in the neighbourhoods of east Aleppo, we are giving you 24 hours only to decide if you are leaving. Your leadership abroad is incapable of getting you out. Whoever wants to stay alive must drop his weapons and we will secure his safety. After the 24 hours is up we will implement a strategic attack using highly sophisticated weapons," the messages read. "The opposition leadership that stays in hotels and castles enjoying a luxurious life doesn't care about the poor Syrian citizens in east Aleppo. They are using you for their personal benefit. We are giving you, the sick and the wounded, 24 hours to exit if you want." The move comes as Russia continues to build its naval presence off the coast of Syria, and as major Russian aircraft carriers arrive off the coast. "This could be an all-out assault in the next 24 hours," Al Jazeera's Osama Bin Javid, reporting from Gaziantep on the Turkish-Syrian border, said.

40. Au top niveau contre les cyberattaques

Sud Ouest, 2016 11 13

Paris - Depuis avril, les dirigeants de deux entreprises palloises ont dû déboursier plusieurs milliers d'euros pour récupérer quelques unes de leurs données informatiques cruciales. Elles avaient été cryptées par un " hacker ", un pirate. Ces exemples sont loin d'être isolés, mais peu sont dévoilés sur la place publique. Les cyberattaques deviennent un fléau. Elles ont augmenté de 66 % depuis 2009. Et les PME en sont la cible à 77 % selon le Syntec, le syndicat de l'ingénierie et des services informatiques. Car, ces dernières font trop souvent des économies sur leur système de protection. Alors que, parfois, quelques milliers d'euros suffisent. " Au risque de voir leur activité paralysée et de ne pas pouvoir s'en relever ", souligne l'expert Laurent Oudot. Cet ancien de la DGSE (Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure) a créé, en 2010, la société Teltris, avec une ex-collègue, Elena Poincet, pour aider les entreprises à se protéger de la cybercriminalité. Ses clients sont de grands noms du Cac 40, à l'image de Michelin ou Vallourec. Si son siège social est à Paris, l'essentiel de ses salariés, six sur huit, sont à Pessac, à la cité de la photonique, où il a installé son centre de recherche et développement. De jeunes " cracks " qui sont tous des diplômés de l'Enseirb-Matmeca, la prestigieuse école publique d'ingénieurs en informatique de Bordeaux. Dont est lui-même issu Laurent Oudot. Selon lui, " nous avons tout l'écosystème ici pour créer, demain, un pôle cybersécurité à la pointe au niveau mondial ".

41. De Molenbeek à Paris: un an après, la traque des jihadistes se poursuit

Radio France Internationale, 2016 11 13

Paris - Molenbeek, commune belge réputée pour être la base arrière du jihadisme en Europe. Les journalistes du monde entier s'y étaient rendus il y a un an : c'est de là que sont originaires plusieurs kamikazes des attentats de Paris et Bruxelles. C'est ici que Salah Abdeslam, seul survivant parmi les terroristes du 13-Novembre, a été arrêté. Les autorités belges ont promis il y a un an d'agir contre le radicalisme à Molenbeek, de démanteler les cellules jihadistes. Chasses à l'homme, sirènes de police, crépitements des appareils photo des journalistes... La commune de Molenbeek a été au coeur des opérations anti-terroristes ces derniers mois. Les autorités ont mis en oeuvre un plan de déradicalisation et certains habitants notent des changements. « Je vois qu'il y a plus de surveillance, raconte un homme. Ça change un peu. La surveillance, la police et tout ça... C'est bien. Molenbeek a-t-elle guéri ses plaies ? Depuis un an, une centaine de lieux, mosquées, associations ou cafés considérés comme liés au radicalisme, ont été fermés et une cinquantaine d'individus ont également été placés sous surveillance. Le ministre de l'Intérieur avait promis de nettoyer Molenbeek. « Après les attentats j'ai demandé un renfort de police pour des actions notamment contre les trafics de drogue, de faux papiers, d'armes, la traite des êtres humains. Et c'est vrai que nous avons, pendant ces six mois, obtenu des résultats par la fermeture d'un certain nombre d'établissements » confirme Françoise Schepmans, bourgmestre de la commune. Symboliquement, Molenbeek a aussi inauguré mardi dernier un monument en hommage à toutes les victimes des attentats. Une sculpture intitulée La flamme de l'espoir.

42. France demands release of French journalist arrested in Turkey

Reuters News, 2016 11 13

Paris - France has demanded that Turkey release a French journalist arrested there on Friday, as a crackdown on the media after an attempted coup this year continues to draw international criticism. Olivier Bertrand, who works for French news website lesjours.fr, was arrested while reporting in the town of Gaziantep, just north of Turkey's border with Syria. "What is happening is shocking and completely unacceptable. France demands the release of this journalist," French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault told Europe 1 radio on Sunday. "We are in permanent contact with him (Bertrand) via our embassy. We are doing everything we can to get him released," he added. Turkey has detained tens of thousands of people over alleged links with Fethullah Gulen, a cleric living in the United States who is accused of masterminding the abortive putsch - something he denies. The EU official in charge of relations with Turkey said earlier this month that Turkey's quest to join the bloc would probably fail unless it reversed its clamp-down on civil rights, press freedoms and the judiciary. France expressed "serious concern" this month at Turkey's arrest of Kurdish lawmakers.

CSIS in the News/Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. Coming clean on 'going dark'

iPolitics.ca, Andrew Clement, 2016 12 10

OpEd: The security/surveillance agencies of the Five Eyes intelligence alliance have long complained about intelligence targets 'going dark', as the communications they seek to intercept migrate to the digital plane. The RCMP is only the most recent agency to make the argument. Pointing to vivid cases of suspected terrorists, drug gangs and child abusers operating beyond the law, it is attempting to persuade a skeptical public that it needs more powers to capture and use the data it says it requires to keep us all safe. But the RCMP and its partner agencies — the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and Communication Security Establishment (CSE) — are much less forthcoming about the ways in which going digital has provided them with far more data about the movements, affiliations and intimate activities of Canadians that they ever had before. The key to their already greatly expanded surveillance capabilities is the generation of extraordinary volumes of fine-grained 'metadata'. These agencies say very little specific about their metadata practices — and even when they do, they often mislead rather than enlighten. When the lid is occasionally lifted, what we see can be disturbing. Last month, a Federal Court judge ruled that CSIS acted illegally by indefinitely storing information about people not suspected of criminal wrongdoing. The timing was significant, as it coincided with hearings by a Commons committee on the controversial Bill C-51. Sadly, this violation of laws intended to protect Canadians' rights by the very agencies charged with protecting them was not an isolated event. Last June, we learned that CSE — CSIS' sister agency entrusted with signals intelligence — had been sharing Canadians' metadata without authorization. For years, CSE 'inadvertently' handed over telephone logs and internet exchanges to intelligence allies such as the United States. In 2014, then head of CSE John Forster was called before a Senate Committee to account for a CBC report that said Canadians passing through airports were being tracked through the interception of their wi-fi signals. Forster insisted that individuals were identifiable as part of CSE's "normal global [internet metadata] collection" — a much wider and more troubling dragnet operation. Unfortunately, the Senate Committee missed an invaluable opportunity to dig further and help Canadians understand better how they were under mass surveillance by their government. CSE officially states that "metadata ... is contextual and does not expose the content of emails, phone calls or text messages." In March, current CSE chief Greta Bossenmaier reiterated this distinction while publicly defending the role that metadata plays in CSE's operations: "It is the context but not the content of a communication. Context, not content." But it's very difficult to square this definition with the agency's continued use of XKEYSCORE and related technologies of interception and analysis. In this era of digital networking, the legal distinction between metadata and communication content is untenable. Instead of pretending that there is a clear difference — apparently so that CSE and CSIS can continue covertly accessing data on millions of Canadians — these agencies should come clean on what they actually do with our data. (Note: Andrew Clement is a professor emeritus in the Faculty of Information, University of Toronto. His area of research covers the social implications of information and communications technology and digital surveillance.)

2. RCMP paid for info from civilian source during Habib investigation

The Montreal Gazette, Jesse Feith, 2016 12 10

Montreal - While investigating Ismael Habib in late 2015, the RCMP was paying a Montreal clothing store owner who was well-connected in the Muslim community to feed them information. The man was described as a practising Salafist, meaning he followed a strict interpretation of Islam. He operates a second-hand clothing store on Jean-Talon St. Montreal's Muslim community gravitated around the store, an RCMP officer testified at Habib's trial on Friday. The officer said the man, in his mid-40s, acted as a mentor to young Muslims in the city and was used to build trust between Habib and the undercover RCMP agents investigating him. Habib is on trial for trying to leave Canada to commit terrorist acts abroad and giving false information to obtain a passport. An undercover operation by the RCMP led Habib to believe he was moving up the ranks of an underground crime ring capable of obtaining falsified passports and getting people out of the country from the Port of Montreal. The RCMP investigation, named Projet Solaire, is still ongoing and targeting other Quebecers believed to have travelled to Syria, it was heard in court on Friday. During cross-examination, defence lawyer Charles Montpetit questioned the RCMP officer in charge on why the force had continued running Habib through undercover scenarios when it seemed as though it had already gathered enough information on him. The officer said the undercover agents needed to get to a point where they could confront Habib with evidence and get him to explain it.

2. RCMP terror investigation not over yet, Crown reveals at Ismael Habib trial CBC News, Kate McKenna, 2016 12 10

Montreal - Project Solaire — an RCMP operation investigating young Quebec men who travelled to Syria — is ongoing, Crown prosecutor Lyne Décarie revealed as the Crown's final witness was being cross-examined at the trial of Ismael Habib Friday. Habib, who is charged with attempting to leave Canada to commit acts of terrorism and trying to obtain a passport by providing false information, is the first to be charged as a result of the investigation. Habib was arrested in Gatineau, Que., in February 2016 on unrelated charges. After being denied bail on those charges, he was charged with the terrorism-related offence. It's unclear who else is being targeted by the operation. Décarie acknowledged the investigation continues during the cross-examination of Crown witness James Parent, an RCMP officer tasked with creating and orchestrating 22 undercover scenarios in Habib's investigation. When defence lawyer Charles Montpetit asked about the scope of Project Solaire, Décarie intervened, saying there are limits to what the witness could say because the investigation is still underway. In response to another question, Parent clarified that Habib had been under police surveillance since Oct. 27, 2014. He testified that police began investigating him in 2013. The court heard earlier in the trial that he had been put on an RCMP watch list around that time. Habib travelled overseas in late 2013. In a Mr. Big-style sting, he confessed he spent three months in Syria during that trip, and said he wanted to go back to Syria to fight with ISIS.

3. Quebec terror trial adjourned until Jan. 23 for confession arguments The Canadian Press, Sidhartha Banerjee, 2016 12 10

Montreal - The Crown rested its case Friday at the trial of a Quebecer charged with attempting to leave the country to participate in the activities of a terrorist group. Ismael Habib, 29, is also charged with giving false information in order to obtain a passport. The trial was adjourned until Jan. 23, when lawyers will debate the admissibility of a confession by Habib extracted by an undercover police officer last February when Habib said he intended to join Islamic State in Syria. Habib's lawyer, Charles Montpetit, has suggested it was obtained in a Mr. Big-type operation where officers pose as criminals to obtain confessions. Canada's highest court ruled in 2014 such operations are acceptable under very strict conditions, but tend to produce unreliable evidence. The RCMP scenario for Habib involved reeling him into a fictitious crime organization specializing in counterfeit passports and a fake human-smuggling ring. On Friday, the Mountie who designed the elaborate scenarios was the final prosecution witness as he provided details from behind a divider about a civilian source used to reel in Habib. The RCMP handler, under cross-examination by Habib's lawyer, described the source, a Muslim man in his 40s who was paid per piece of information. The source is a practising Salafist — an ultra conservative branch of Islam — who operated a second-hand clothing store where many members of the Muslim community gravitated.

4. Délicate mission d'infiltration de la GRC

La Presse, Vincent Larouche, 2016 12 10

Montreal - La Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) a révélé hier qu'un «mentor» salafiste autour duquel gravitaient plusieurs fondamentalistes religieux montréalais ces dernières années était en fait un de ses espions, chargé d'une délicate mission d'infiltration secrète liée à la sécurité nationale. C'est un enquêteur qui a dévoilé le rôle clé de cet «agent civil d'infiltration» au cours de son témoignage au procès pour terrorisme du Montréalais Ismaël Habib. L'agent d'infiltration, un homme dans la quarantaine, était un commerçant de l'avenue Jean-Talon et un authentique partisan du salafisme, cette vision rigoriste de l'islam qui prône une lecture littérale du Coran et un retour aux pratiques de l'époque du prophète Mahomet. Ce qui ne l'empêchait pas d'aider la police dans sa lutte contre le terrorisme. Celui qui a seulement été désigné par le prénom «Lyes» devant la cour tenait une boutique de vêtements où se réunissaient plusieurs personnes. Il avait fait de la prison pour violence conjugale et avait acquis un statut de «mentor» auprès de certains jeunes de la communauté musulmane. À un certain moment, il a commencé à être payé par la GRC pour son travail dans le cadre de l'enquête sur Ismaël Habib, qui fréquentait assidûment sa boutique, a expliqué à la cour l'enquêteur responsable des scénarios d'infiltration mis sur pied par la police fédérale pour piéger le jeune homme. «M. Lyes nous aidait à rapporter des informations, mais n'était pas directement lié à la création de nos scénarios», a expliqué l'enquêteur dans son témoignage. Le vendeur de vêtements rencontrait ses contrôleurs policiers chaque semaine, fournissait les informations demandées et un bilan de ses contacts avec Habib, puis recevait sa paye.

5. Blood on our hands: Canada's links to torture

iPolitics.ca, Tim McSorley, 2016 12 10

Comment: Saturday, December 10, is Human Rights Day. It's also the anniversary of an ongoing stain on Canada's human rights record. Fourteen years ago, Mohamed Harkat, an Algerian refugee to Canada, was arrested outside his home under a government security certificate on allegations of having ties to terrorism. Despite never being charged, and never being shown the evidence against him, Harkat has faced solitary confinement, the strictest bail conditions in Canadian history and lives under the constant threat of deportation to Algeria — where he would certainly be imprisoned and likely tortured. We like to believe that Canada stands above torture. And while the practice is banned in Canada, our international human rights obligations means that we must oppose torture everywhere. That includes never deporting someone to a situation where they could face torture. Sadly, Canada has a history of complicity in sending Canadians to torture abroad: The U.S. government whisked Maher Arar away to Jordan, and then Syria, where he was tortured. Canadian officials were complicit in his rendition and turned a blind eye to his torture. In 2007, after the two year O'Connor Inquiry, he received an official apology from the Canadian government, plus a $10.5 million settlement and $1 million in legal fees. While no apology or settlement can undo the horrors of torture, other Canadians haven't even received that much. A follow-up to the O'Connor Inquiry, the Iacobucci Inquiry, found that Canadian agents and officials played an indirect role in the arrest and torture of three other Canadians: Ahmad El Maati in Egypt, and Abdullah Almalki and Muayyed Nureddin in Syria. This included problematic sharing of information with foreign spy agencies, providing insufficient consular support, and officials ignoring allegations of torture.

The Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - Communications intercepted by U.S. and British spy agencies led to the arrest of the first al-Qaeda-inspired terrorist caught in Canada, according to a newly leaked document. The memo, circulated within the U.S. National Security Agency more than a decade ago, provides a rare and detailed look at the world of intelligence-sharing. In early 2004, a cell of British terrorists was caught scheming to explode a bomb in London. After Scotland Yard launched "Operation Crevice" to round up the conspirators, Canadian police simultaneously moved to arrest an Ottawa software engineer. Momin Khawaja had helped build detonators for the conspirators. The suspects, including Mr. Khawaja, were twentysomething Westerners whose families had hailed from Pakistan. They had travelled to a terrorist training camp in that country and emerged from it wanting to bomb Britain for its role in the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan. Evidence included discussion of close co-operation between British and Canadian police. But prosecutors glossed over how "signals intelligence" (or sigint) captured long before the bust had laid a foundation for detectives. The details are revealed in a document flowing from Edward Snowden, the fugitive former American contractor who took volumes of files from the NSA in 2013 to leak them to the media. The Intercept, a news site, has extensive access to the Snowden archive. It has started publishing memos that circulated within the NSA "signals intelligence directorate" in the early 2000s. The April, 19, 2004 NSA memo titled "SIGINT contribution to Operation Crevice" reads as follows: "Since March 2003, the U.K.'s Security Service and police had been investigating an AQ (al-Qa'ida) support network based in the U.K. with links to a senior AQ operational planner in Pakistan." The memo goes on to describe a British mastermind who had wanted to "mount an attack in the U.K. using a large improvised explosive device" and his "Pakistan-based contact [who] was attempting to obtain nuclear material for use in the device." The leaked memo says the NSA and its British counterpart, known as GCHQ, worked quickly to map out the conspirators' communications before providing investigative leads to Pakistani, British and Canadian agencies. "Call records analysis and reporting expanded Security Service's network knowledge and helped to identify new telephone numbers of key targets in the U.K.," it says. "C2C (computer-to-computer) analysis provided new leads on a Canada-based individual within the network." A Canadian agency called the Communications Security Establishment is a close NSA and GCHQ ally, but the Operation Crevice memo makes no mention of it. At that time, the Canadian agency was beginning to get secret authorizations from cabinet ministers to expand its powers.

7. Has terror suspect been de-radicalized?

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - During the 14 years that he has been a terror suspect, Mohamed Harkat has put down roots in Ottawa. Although branded by the federal government an al-Qaida terrorist - an opinion upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada - Harkat has managed to establish relationships with relatives, friends and neighbours, many of whom have submitted letters of support as he campaigns to remain in the country. A federal official known as the minister's delegate must now decide whether those letters are evidence that Harkat has been de-radicalized, or whether he still poses a threat to Canadians. The Algeria-born Harkat, who works as a custodian at a church, has lived under court-ordered conditions in the Heron Gate area since he was released on bail more than a decade ago. The letters offer a rare glimpse into his life. "My uncle gave me my first driving lessons: He was very patient. He has also helped me with my school projects," wrote Harkat's 16-year-old niece, Gabrielle, in one of 70 letters sent to Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, and shared with the Citizen. "I have learned that he can fix just about anything," wrote Carleton University emerita professor Elizabeth Whitmore, who has known Harkat for 12 years. She said he has repaired her car, radio and jacket zipper, among other things: "I find him completely reliable, highly motivated, a hard worker and very efficient." Ayesha Adhami of Toronto has often stayed with the Harkats and enjoyed his cooking. "One small thing that has given him a sliver of pleasure over the years: being allowed in his own back yard to share his mastery over a summer grill," she wrote. Rosalie Reynolds of Ottawa said she has been impressed by Harkat's equanimity during the past decade. "I have never known him to show anger about what he has suffered. Sadness, dismay, and puzzlement - but never fury." The report was prepared by Anne-Marie Charbonneau, manager of the agency's danger assessments section. If Harkat is not removed, she warned, he would be free to resume contact with members of the Islamic extremist network. "Mr. Harkat's presence constitutes a real threat to the security of Canada and Canadians, as well as the security of other nations and their citizens," she concluded. Harkat's wife of 16 years, Sophie, insisted in an interview that her husband has never posed a threat to Canadians. She called him an integral part of their neighbourhood. In May 2014, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the government's revised security certificate regime and affirmed Judge Simon Noël's decision that found Harkat to be an active member of the al-Qaida terrorist network. Noël declared Harkat a member of the terrorist network and linked him to a number of Islamic extremists, including Saudi-born Ibn Khattab, Canadian Ahmed Said Khadr and Abu Zubaydah. Noël also found that Harkat offered assistance to two Islamic extremists who travelled to Canada.

8. Trudeau must face facts on Iranian regime

The Toronto Sun, Candice Malcom, 2016 12 10

Column: The Trudeau government is quietly working to strike a deal with the Islamic Republic of Iran. After becoming Prime Minister, Trudeau lifted virtually all economic sanctions against Iran. During the UN General Assembly meeting in September, Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion met with regime officials to discuss the status of Canada-Iran relations. Then, just last month, two Iranian MPs in the Trudeau government hosted an invitation-only roundtable with members of the Iranian community in Toronto. The event was held to discuss re-opening diplomatic ties – but was criticized for being stacked with pro-regime voices. So, why should Canada reengage with the world's number one state-sponsor of terrorism? The Harper government cut diplomatic ties with Iran in 2012, following Great Britain's decision to do the same after the UK embassy in Tehran was raided and ransacked. There was, and continues to be, fear for the safety of Westerners in Iran, since the regime routinely kidnaps visitors and uses them as pawns in government negotiations. Besides the safety of our diplomats, there are many other reasons why Canada cut ties with Iran. Its elite military unit – the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corp – is listed as a terrorist entity under Canada's Criminal Code. Iran openly funds and trains other terrorist groups, including Hamas, Hezbollah and the Taliban. Iran has maniacal nuclear ambitions. It wants the capacity to build a nuclear weapon, which it once claimed would be used to “wipe Israel off the map.”

9. Canadian government tests automated border crossing

Washington Post, Pete Norman, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - First there were automated drive-through carwashes. Then automated drive-through banks. Now, the Canadian government is experimenting with an automated drive-through border crossing. While the fate of the wall along the U.S.-Mexico border promised by President-elect Donald Trump remains uncertain, Canada is carrying out a pilot project with an opposite aim: to use the latest technology to ease the flow of traffic across the United States' northern frontier. If you drive into the province of Quebec via the crossing at Morses Line, Vt., after 4 p.m. on any day, no live Canadian customs agent will stop and interrogate you. Instead, a gate opens and you drive into a large, garage-like building. There, under the gaze of several TV cameras, you are invited by a customs officer to insert your passport or other border ID into a document reader and are asked the usual questions put to visitors seeking to enter Canada. The customs officer addressing you over a microphone is located at a service center operated by the Canadian Border Services Agency in Hamilton, Ont. "So far, it's going very well. We've seen an increase in the use of the border crossing," said Dominique McNeely, a spokesman for the agency. The experiment's budget is $16 million, most of which has been spent on the new building and its high-tech equipment. The year-long pilot program ends in a couple of months, at which time it will be decided whether to expand it to include other small crossings. A total of 117 crossings dot the U.S.-Canada border. The bulk of the traffic uses a dozen crossings near big Canadian cities, but there are many secondary crossings, like Morses Line, that mostly serve local populations whose economic and family ties across the frontier date back generations.

10. New counter-radicalization office head could be named before Christmas

iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connoly, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - The list of candidates to lead the government's new Office of Community Outreach and Counter-Radicalization is down to the final two, and an announcement naming the new head could be made before Christmas. "It's down to a shortlist of two and they're both excellent," said Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale in a scrum with reporters outside of the House of Commons public safety committee, where he spoke on supplementary estimates. "It's very hard to make the choice. I'm hoping to make the announcement, if not before Christmas, then very early in the new year of this individual." The creation of the new office, aimed at supporting community efforts to tackle radicalization, formed part of the Liberals' 2015 campaign platform. In the 2016 budget, the Trudeau government earmarked $35 million over five years for the new office, with $3 million of that coming in its first year and ongoing funding of $10 million a year after that. But while the pledge earned praise from researchers and community advocates working on the front lines of counter-radicalization, few details have been made public about how the office will actually operate. Goodale shed some light on that before the committee Wednesday evening, saying that the government has been and will continue to deliver funding to counter-radicalization projects through an arm of the office called the Community Resilience Fund; a federal contribution to the recent UNESCO conference on radicalization held in Montreal this fall was the first grant approval through the fund. Of the four applications, Lorne Dawson, co-head of the Canadian Network for Research on Terrorism, Security and Society (TSAS), is involved in two. One of those is a proposal to extend the research currently being done by TSAS into the radicalization of foreign fighters and their families. The other is for a project Dawson is part of that aims to create a "systematic evaluation and test of risk assessment tools for terrorist radicalization," he said. A September iPolitics feature highlighted the difficulties the new office will face in figuring out which community groups and researchers to partner with and in letting experts take the lead while also demanding accountability.

11. Has terror suspect been de-radicalized?

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 12 10

OpEd: During the 14 years that he has been a terror suspect, Mohamed Harkat has put down roots in Ottawa. Although branded by the federal government an al-Qaida terrorist - an opinion upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada - Harkat has managed to establish relationships with relatives, friends and neighbours, many of whom have submitted letters of support as he campaigns to remain in the country. A federal official known as the minister's delegate must now decide whether those letters are evidence that Harkat has been de-radicalized, or whether he still poses a threat to Canadians. The Algeria-born Harkat, who works as a custodian at a church, has lived under court-ordered conditions in the Heron Gate area since he was released on bail more than a decade ago. The letters offer a rare glimpse into his life. "My uncle gave me my first driving lessons: He was very patient. He has also helped me with my school projects," wrote Harkat's 16-year-old niece, Gabrielle, in one of 70 letters sent to Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, and shared with the Citizen. "I have learned that he can fix just about anything," wrote Carleton University emerita professor Elizabeth Whitmore, who has known Harkat for 12 years. She said he has repaired her car, radio and jacket zipper, among other things: "I find him completely reliable, highly motivated, a hard worker and very efficient." Ayesha Adhami of Toronto has often stayed with the Harkats and enjoyed his cooking. "One small thing that has given him a sliver of pleasure over the years: being allowed in his own back yard to share his mastery over a summer grill," she wrote.

12. Feds, union near deal for 5% hike over 4 years

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - The federal government and the union representing professionals working in the public service wound up three days of contract talks early Friday morning with what some say are the makings of a tentative deal that could boost salaries by five per cent over four years. The Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, which had publicly resolved to have a contract deal by the end of the year, appears to have broken the logjam that has dogged negotiations for more than two years. Union and Treasury Board negotiators met until early Friday morning, when they wrapped up discussions for three of the union's bargaining groups. Two other groups return to bargaining today for another session. The government and 18 unions have been negotiating for months but spinning their wheels on two big issues - money and sick leave. The unions signed a solidarity pact vowing not to make concessions on the existing sick leave regime. PIPSC refused to comment with negotiations still underway but sources say the latest wage offer is a 1.25 per cent a year increase over four years. PIPSC is the second largest federal union with nearly 60,000 members representing professionals from scientists and auditors to nurses and computer and IT specialists.

13. Terror Scanning Database For Social Media Raises More Questions than Answers

Motherboard Blog, Sarah Jeong, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - On Monday, Facebook, Microsoft, Twitter, and YouTube announced a new partnership to create a "shared industry database" that identifies "content that promotes terrorism." Each company will use the database to find "violent terrorist imagery or terrorist recruitment videos or images" on their platforms, and remove the content according to their own policies. The exact technology involved isn't new. The newly announced partnership is likely modeled after what companies already do with child pornography. But the application of this technology to "terrorist content" raises many questions. Who is going to decide whether something promotes terrorism or not? Is a technology that fights child porn appropriate for addressing this particular problem? And most troubling of all—is there even a problem to be solved? Four tech companies may have just signed onto developing a more robust censorship and surveillance system based on a narrative of online radicalization that isn't well-supported by empirical evidence. Many companies—for example, Verizon, which runs an online backup service for customers' files—use a database maintained by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) to find child pornography. If they find a match, service providers notify the NCMEC Cyber Tipline, which then passes on that information to law enforcement. The database doesn't contain images themselves, but rather, hashes—digital fingerprints that identify a file. This means that service providers can scan their servers without "looking" at anyone's files. Thanks to PhotoDNA, a technology donated by Microsoft, the hashes are made using biometric information inside the photos and videos, meaning that cropping or resizing the files won't necessarily change the hash value being used. Neither of these specific upsides to the hash identification system seem to apply to "terrorist content," since the partnership appears to be aimed at publicly posted social media. (I asked Facebook via email whether the hash identification system would be applied to private messages between users, but did not hear back from the company). Furthermore, the companies have stated in their press release that a person on the other end will be looking at the content before taking it down. The press release implies, but does not explicitly say, that matching hits will not be provided to government officials, the way that hits for child pornography are. Indeed, one of the useful things about the child pornography hash identification database is that it's managed by a single entity with specific knowledge and experience in the content at issue—that is, NCMEC. The industry database for "terrorist content" that's being proposed will be composed of hashes added by each platform, as they remove content as consistent with their own policies.

14. What happened to Canada's support of democratic rights?

The Globe and Mail, David Mulroney, 2016 12 10

OpEd: These are not good days for democracy in Hong Kong, an unhappy fact that was recently reconfirmed by no less of an authority than Chris Patten, the city's last British governor. In a recent speech, Mr. Patten lamented the slow pace of democratic development since the city's 1997 handover to China. Back then, it was widely hoped that China's acceptance of the one country, two systems formula would allow for the steady evolution of democratic institutions in Hong Kong. The idea was that the city would continue to serve as a separate and self-contained test bed of reforms, some of which could be applied, carefully and selectively, by China itself. But what happened instead was that ruling elites in Hong Kong began second-guessing their own authority, and routinely turned to Beijing for decisions that should have been trusted to Hong Kong institutions. An increasingly powerful China needed little encouragement. It systematically reduced Hong Kong's autonomy, without much comment from the city's supposed international friends such as Britain and Canada. Mr. Patten was particularly scathing in his commentary about independence advocates, whose campaign, he said, "dilutes support for democracy." This was interpreted as criticism of two lawmakers, supporters of independence, who have been forced to vacate their seats. The duo had refused to take the official oath of office, substituting wording that could be considered offensive to China. Their actions sparked legal intervention by China's government even before Hong Kong's own courts could consider the issue. The reverse is true for that fortunate minority among Hong Kong's seven million residents who also happen to be Canadian citizens. The recently-introduced Bill C-33, which amends the Canada Elections Act, would offer the right to vote to all Canadians residing overseas, as long as they have lived in Canada at some point. It eliminates a previous provision that restricted voting rights to expatriates who had been absent for fewer than five years. The bill is big news in Hong Kong, where a Canadian community of roughly 300,000 includes emigrants to Canada who have since returned, and Canadian-born expats lured by Hong Kong's low-tax, business friendly environment.

15. Canada has turned into a can't-do nation as surging activism strains economic growth

National Post, Claudia Cattaneo, Geoffrey Morgan And Jesse Snyder, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau had barely finished delivering his statement approving the Trans Mountain and Line 3 pipelines, and rejecting Northern Gateway on Nov. 29 when anti-pipeline activists erupted on Twitter. Anti-pipeline activists from these and other groups had devoted years of campaigning to stop all three projects through regulatory, political and legal means, before adopting a more "in your face" approach, in the vein of the ongoing uprising against the now stalled Dakota Access Pipeline in the United States, and in the tradition of the famous War in the Woods two decades ago against logging on Vancouver Island's Clayoquot Sound. Resistance to infrastructure projects has become the norm in Canada's resource sectors. As part of a fourmonth investigation, the Financial Post identified 35 projects worth $129 billion in direct investment - mostly private money - that are struggling to move forward or have been sidelined altogether because of opposition from environmental, aboriginal and/or community groups. The downside is adding up: slower growth, lower Canadian oil prices, investment chill, less control over domestic resources, overreliance on the U.S. market, regulatory gridlock. A $100-billion loss in direct investment is no drop in the bucket. It means an additional loss in value (roughly equivalent to the rate of return on the investment) of at least $8 billion to $12 billion a year for the life of the resource projects, generally 40 years, or $320 billion to $480 billion, estimated Jennifer Winter, energy economics professor at the University of Calgary's School of Public Policy. Bitumen pipelines from Alberta have dominated the headlines, but other projects have also come under attack, including the Muskrat Falls hydroelectric project in Newfoundland, a uranium mine in Quebec, a wind power project in Ontario, liquefied natural gas development in B.C. and fracking in New Brunswick. The list goes on.

16. Négociations entre l'IPFPC et le gouvernement fédéral

Le Presse, Paul Gaboury, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - Après trois journées de négociations intensives, l'Institut professionnel de la fonction publique du Canada (IPFPC) a conclu une entente pour certains groupes de travailleurs du gouvernement fédéral. « Après trois longues journées d'intenses négociations, nous avons conclu une entente pour les groupes SH (Services de santé), RE (Recherche) et AV (Vérification, commerce et achat). Aujourd'hui (vendredi), le groupe SP (Sciences appliquées et examens des brevets) est à la table pour tenter de conclure une entente », a indiqué la présidente de l'Institut professionnel, Debi Daviau. Selon la leader syndicale, des « progrès importants » ont été réalisés relativement à la plupart des enjeux normatifs, dont l'intégrité scientifique, la sous-traitance, le réaménagement des effectifs et les congés de maladie. En fin de semaine, le Comité stratégique des négociations tiendra une téléconférence pour étudier les propositions de l'employeur et déterminer si ces offres seront présentées aux membres.

17. Fintech as a Force for Social Good

Financial Post. Adam Nanjee, 2016 12 10

Ottawa - For enterprises concerned about network security, identity verification has become a top-of-mind issue in an era of ubiquitous cyber-crime. But for millions around the world with no valid identification, standard computer access and identity authentication measures such as passwords pose a formidable barrier to not just public services, but also to the formal economy and traditional financial institutions. When BioConnect, a Toronto-based biometric firm, launched seven years ago, its goal "was to solve the big problem of identity" posed by entities like banks that require customers to provide traditional paper documents to open accounts, explains vice president of strategic marketing and global alliances Bianca Lopes. She cites two telling statistics: according to CISCO, there are now 50 billion digitally connected devices globally, but there are also 2.5 billion human beings who are not considered people because they don't have ID. "These people can't enter the system," says Lopes. BioConnect's technology suite allows the firm's customers to use a range of biometric identifiers - facial expressions, iris patterns, even cardiac rhythms - to identify users. Lopes sees the technology as key to providing mobile banking services in developing countries where many people have a smart phone but no physical way of connecting to a financial institution. "The technology allows these systems to see these people, so they can become part of the economy," she adds. For Canada's rapidly globalizing financial technology (fintech) sector, such stories reveal the ways in which these mobile technologies produce both new revenue streams and social dividends.

18. Russian Hackers Acted to Aid Trump, U.S. Says

The New York Times, David E. Sanger & Scott Shane, 2016 12 10

Washington - American intelligence agencies have concluded with "high confidence" that Russia acted covertly in the latter stages of the presidential campaign to harm Hillary Clinton's chances and promote Donald J. Trump, according to senior administration officials. They based that conclusion, in part, on another finding -- which they say was also reached with high confidence -- that the Russians hacked the Republican National Committee's computer systems in addition to their attacks on Democratic organizations, but did not release whatever information they gleaned from the Republican networks. In the months before the election, it was largely documents from Democratic Party systems that were leaked to the public. Intelligence agencies have concluded that the Russians gave the Democrats' documents to WikiLeaks. Republicans have a different explanation for why no documents from their networks were ever released. Over the past several months, officials from the Republican committee have consistently said that their networks were not compromised, asserting that only the accounts of individual Republicans were attacked. On Friday, a senior committee official said he had no comment. It is possible that in hacking into the Republican committee, Russian agents were simply hedging their bets. The attack took place in the spring, the senior officials said, about the same time that a group of hackers believed to be linked to the G.R.U., Russia's military intelligence agency, stole the emails of senior officials of the Democratic National Committee. Intelligence agencies believe that the Republican committee hack was carried out by the same Russians who penetrated the Democratic committee and other Democratic groups. The finding about the Republican committee is expected to be included in a detailed report of "lessons learned" that Mr. Obama has ordered intelligence agencies to assemble before he leaves office on Jan. 20. That report is intended, in part, to create a comprehensive history of the Russian effort to influence the election, and to solidify the intelligence findings before Mr. Trump is sworn in. Intelligence officials and private cybersecurity companies believe that the Democratic National Committee was hacked by two different Russian cyberunits. One, called "Cozy Bear" or "A.P.T. 29" by some Western security experts, is believed to have spent months inside the D.N.C. computer network, as well as other government and political institutions, but never made public any of the documents it took. (A.P.T. stands for "Advanced Persistent Threat," which usually describes a sophisticated state-sponsored cyberintruder.)

19. Donald Trump's Military Government

The New York Times, Gordon Adams, 2016 12 10

OpEd: A new president, swept into office on a tide of fake news and media manipulation, surrounds himself with generals: his adviser on foreign policy, the defense minister, his minister of the interior and the further possible appointments of foreign minister and intelligence director. If this happened in a third world country, the United States, as a global promoter of democracy, would warn against it. America has frequently urged the militaries of other countries to stand down and stay in barracks. The United States supports civilian control; the military's job should be to provide military advice, not make policy and govern. Yet these admonitions do not now seem to apply at home. Having roundly criticized generals during the campaign, President-elect Donald J. Trump is now surrounding himself with them. The issue is not about getting good military advice to the president. The 1986 Goldwater-Nichols Act made the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff the principal military adviser to the president for that purpose. The president regularly listens to uniformed officers in the Situation Room and the Pentagon. As much as Americans like and respect their generals, civilian control of the military has nothing to do with the personal merits or otherwise of particular flag officers. They may be smart (David H. Petraeus), bold (James N. Mattis), temperamental (Michael T. Flynn) or quietly competent (John F. Kelly). There is not just one kind of general. The larger principle goes back to the founding of the republic: Civilians should oversee the military, and the president is the commander in chief. The founders worried about the influence that a military with excessive power could have on America's young democracy. Putting military officers in charge of the entire architecture of national security reinforces the trend toward militarizing policy and risks cementing in place "the military-industrial complex" that President Dwight D. Eisenhower warned of. To borrow the psychologist Abraham H. Maslow's words, if all the men around President Trump are hammers, the temptation will be "to treat everything as if it were a nail."

20. Pentagon To Show Trump Tougher Options

The Wall Street Journal, Gordon Lubold and Julian E. Barnes, 2016 12 10

Washington - The Pentagon is drawing up proposals to offer to the Trump administration designed to intensify the U.S. campaign against Islamic State, including reducing White House oversight of operational decisions and moving some tactical authority back to the Pentagon, U.S. military and congressional officials say. The options are being assembled in anticipation of demands by Donald Trump and his team, who have called for a tougher military campaign against the extremist group. Military officials said they are considering presenting options on a number of fronts. They are likely to include easing restrictions on the precise number of American troops needed to carry out a particular mission, and relaxing rules that set the level of Washington review needed before an operation or airstrike may be conducted, officials said. The potential recommendations aren't likely to fundamentally change the U.S. strategy for fighting Islamic State, which relies on indigenous forces and relatively few American advisers. But they open prospects for the new administration to return more battlefield decision-making to the military, officials said. Military officials familiar with the internal discussions at the Pentagon said officers aren't taking advocacy positions on issues, but are prepared to answer the questions the new administration will have and make proposals as requested. "Once the new administration is in place, we will offer recommendations going forward, should the new administration wish to amend those assumptions or the current approach," a military official said. White House officials said they approve all requests for operations they receive. For example, about 18 months ago, the White House loosened a restriction requiring that an airstrike cause no collateral civilian casualties. In that instance, the change expanded to 10 the number of civilians who could be potentially killed by accident if the value of the target was deemed high enough, military officials said. "As Secretary [Ash] Carter has said repeatedly, every time he and General Dunford have asked the president for more capability in the fight against ISIL, he has agreed to that request," said deputy Pentagon press secretary Gordon Trowbridge.

21. The Torture Report Must Be Saved

The New York Times, Carl Levin & Jay Rockefeller, 2016 12 10

OpEd: In President Obama's final national security speech on Tuesday, he spoke about the importance of staying true to our values, of not returning to torture, and of transparency. Now, in his remaining time in office, he has an opportunity to take action to advance these goals and to do something of great importance for the public's understanding of our history. He has the ability to protect the Senate Intelligence Committee's full 6,700-page report on torture from being lost, perhaps forever. Given President-elect Donald J. Trump's unconscionable campaign pledge to "bring back waterboarding" and "a hell of a lot worse" -- acts that would be illegal if carried out -- President Obama's leadership on this issue has never been more important. Drawing on our decades of work in the Senate and our chairmanships of the Armed Services and Intelligence Committees, we are calling on President Obama to preserve the full torture report as a matter of profound public interest. We are not asking him to necessarily agree with all of the report's findings, though we certainly hope he does, but we are asking him to protect it as an important piece of history. The president could do this simply by allowing departments and agencies that already possess the document to enter it as a federal record, making it much more difficult for a future administration to erase. This simple but consequential action is something that President Obama can do now, and it is something that he can do unilaterally. (Note: Carl Levin served in the United States Senate from 1979 until 2015 and was chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Jay Rockefeller served in the Senate from 1985 until 2015 and was chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.)

22. Obama orders review of election season hacking

The Associated Press, Kathleen Hennessey, 2016 12 10

Washington - President Barack Obama's order to intelligence officials for a full-scale review of campaign-season cyberattacks met with a cool reception from President-elect Donald Trump, whose transition team said it's "time to move on." Trump has been repeatedly dismissive of the intelligence community's determination that Russia sought through hacking to disrupt the U.S. election, and Obama's new initiative was similarly brushed off at Trump Tower. Trump's transition office issued a statement reflecting the deep divisions that emerged between his campaign and the intelligence agencies over Russian meddling. "These are the same people that said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction," the statement said. "The election ended a long time ago in one of the biggest Electoral College victories in history. It's now time to move on and 'Make America Great Again.'" The investigation ordered by Obama will be a "deep dive" into a possible pattern of increased "malicious cyber activity" timed to the campaign season, White House spokesman Eric Schultz said Friday, including the email hacks that rattled the presidential campaign. It will look at the tactics, targets, key actors and the U.S. government's response to the recent email hacks, as well as incidents reported in past elections, he said. The White House said it would make portions of the report public and would brief lawmakers and relevant state officials on the findings. It emphasized the report would not focus solely on Russian operations or hacks involving Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta and Democratic National Committee accounts. Schultz stressed officials would be reviewing incidents going back to the 2008 presidential campaign, when the campaigns of Sen. John McCain and Obama were breached by hackers. Intelligence officials have said Obama and Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney were targets of Chinese cyberattacks four years later.

23. Trump's generals see world as good vs. evil

The Washington Post, Greg Miller & Greg Jaffe, 2016 12 10

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump is assembling a national security team dominated by retired generals who share a deep distrust of Iran and have characterized the threat of militant Islam in far more dire terms than Obama administration officials and intelligence assessments. The trio of ex-generals represents an emerging core of the Trump administration that is at odds with President Obama's efforts to convince the American public that - 15 years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks - terrorism continues to pose a persistent threat to the nation, but not an existential one. The generals' views also cut against the grain of U.S. policies seeking to empower moderates in Iran and of U.S. intelligence assessments that terrorism no longer stands alone atop the rankings of global security threats now crowded by concerns about cyberattacks and renewed aggression by China and Russia. Their views, though far from uniform, have been heavily influenced over the past 15 years by intensely personal battlefield losses, the country's waning attention to the wars and an up-close view of a ruthless enemy. Those experiences could lead retired Gens. Michael T. Flynn, James N. Mattis and John F. Kelly to urge caution in Trump administration debates about the use of force. But former colleagues and experts said the generals are also more likely, by virtue of their training and experience, to see malign intent or view the world as a struggle between good and evil.

24. CIA: Russia favored Trump

The Washington Post, Greg Miller & Adam Entous, 2016 12 10

Washington - The CIA has concluded in a secret assessment that Russia intervened in the 2016 election to help Donald Trump win the presidency, rather than just to undermine confidence in the U.S. electoral system, according to officials briefed on the matter. Intelligence agencies have identified individuals with connections to the Russian government who provided WikiLeaks with thousands of hacked emails from the Democratic National Committee and others, including Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, according to U.S. officials. Those officials described the individuals as actors known to the intelligence community and part of a wider Russian operation to boost Trump and hurt Clinton's chances. "It is the assessment of the intelligence community that Russia's goal here was to favor one candidate over the other, to help Trump get elected," said a senior U.S. official briefed on an intelligence presentation made to U.S. senators. "That's the consensus view." The Obama administration has been debating for months how to respond to the alleged Russian intrusions, with White House officials concerned about escalating tensions with Moscow and being accused of trying to boost Clinton's campaign. In September, during a secret briefing for congressional leaders, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) voiced doubts about the veracity of the intelligence, according to officials present. The Trump transition team dismissed the findings in a short statement issued Friday evening. "These are the same people that said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. The election ended a long time ago in one of the biggest Electoral College victories in history. It's now time to move on and 'Make America Great Again,'" the statement read. Trump has consistently dismissed the intelligence community's findings about Russian hacking.

25. CIA says Russia intervened to help Trump win White House

Reuters News, 2016 12 10

Washington - The CIA has concluded that Russia intervened in the 2016 election to help President-elect Donald Trump win the White House, and not just to undermine confidence in the U.S. electoral system, a senior U.S. official said on Friday. U.S. intelligence agencies have assessed that as the 2016 presidential campaign drew on, Russian government officials devoted increasing attention to assisting Donald Trump's effort to win the election, the U.S. official familiar with the finding told Reuters on Friday night on condition of anonymity. Citing U.S. officials briefed on the matter, the Washington Post reported on Friday that intelligence agencies had identified individuals with connections to the Russian government who provided thousands of hacked emails from the Democratic National Committee and others, including the chairman of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, to WikiLeaks. U.S. President Barack Obama ordered intelligence agencies to review cyber attacks and foreign intervention into the 2016 election and deliver a report before he leaves office on Jan. 20, the White House said on Friday. Obama's homeland security adviser, Lisa Monaco, told reporters the report's results would be shared with lawmakers and others. "The president has directed the intelligence community to conduct a full review of what happened during the 2016 election process ... and to capture lessons learned from that and to report to a range of stakeholders, to include the Congress," she said during an event hosted by the Christian Science Monitor. As summer turned to fall, Russian hackers turned almost all their attention to the Democrats. Virtually all the emails they released publicly were potentially damaging to Clinton and the Democrats, the official told Reuters.

26. President Orders Study Of Election Hacking

The Wall Street Journal, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 12 10

Washington - President Barack Obama has instructed U.S. intelligence agencies to investigate hacking activity aimed at meddling in the 2016 election, one of his top security advisers said Friday. U.S. intelligence and homeland-security officials have blamed Russia for intrusions, including the theft of emails from the Democratic National Committee and Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton's campaign staff, other hacking and fabricated news stories. The administration was short on details about what the report would cover, and it wasn't immediately clear how it would differ from the investigations that intelligence agencies, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Homeland Security Department have already conducted. That work led to a rare public statement in October that the hacks were authorized by "Russia's senior-most officials" and were "intended to interfere with the U.S. election process." Lisa Monaco, Mr. Obama's homeland-security adviser, said intelligence officials will deliver a report to the president, which will be distributed to Congress and others, before he leaves office next month. It was unclear whether the report would ever be made public. White House spokesman Eric Schultz said the report will "dig into" a pattern of malicious cyberactivity around the 2016 election, as well as other election cycles, and assess U.S. defensive capabilities.

27. Trump breaks with Obama, intel agencies on election hacking

Politico.com, 2016 12 10

Washington - In an extraordinary rebuke of the intelligence agencies he will soon lead as president, Donald Trump broke with his predecessor on Friday and rejected the conclusion that Russia had sought to help him by meddling in the U.S. election. "These are the same people that said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction," the Trump transition team said in a unsigned press release. "The election ended a long time ago in one of the biggest Electoral College victories in history. It's now time to move on and "Make America Great Again." The Trump team's highly unusual statement came after the White House revealed that President Barack Obama has ordered a "deep dive" into the cyberattacks that plagued this year's election -- and news reports suggested that some agencies had already reached conclusions that Trump might find uncomfortable. Obama has asked the intelligence community to deliver its final report before he leaves office, raising the prospect that agencies may conclude that a foreign power successfully altered the trajectory of the Nov. 8 election just days before Trump's inauguration. The review will put the spate of hacks — which officials have blamed on Russia — "in a greater context" by framing them against the "malicious cyber activity" that may have occurred around the edges of the 2008 and 2012 president elections, White House spokesman Eric Schultz said during Friday's briefing. "This will be a review that is broad and deep at the same time," he added. The Washington Post reported on Friday evening that the CIA had determined in a secret assessment that the Russian government had interfered in this year's election not just to rattle confidence in the system but specifically to help elect Trump, whose fiery response came just hours later. In an interview days earlier with Time magazine, Trump flatly rejected intelligence agencies' preliminary finding that Russia had hacked Democrats' computer and email systems to influence the election. "I don't believe it. I don't believe they interfered," he said. Asked directly if those conclusions were motivated by partisan politics, he replied: "I think so."

28. Trump's Military 'Junta'

The Wall Street Journal, 2016 12 10

Editorial: To hear the media these days, you'd think Donald Trump is about to turn the U.S. into a banana republic, where all life is controlled by the "generals." As Time's headline quavered this week: "The Creeping Militarization of Donald Trump's Cabinet." The junta watch began with the appointment of retired three-star Michael Flynn to be national security adviser -- though Gen. Flynn was an early Trump supporter and mooted as a possible running mate. The grumblings really got going with the selection of retired four-star Marine Gen. James Mattis to run the Defense Department: A general to run the military, whatever happened to civilian control? The press's nerves finally snapped when Mr. Trump proposed another retired Marine four-star, John Kelly, to run the Homeland Security Department. The President-elect couldn't slip this cabal past the Washington Post: "Trump hires a third general, raising concerns about heavy military influence." Sorry to break the mood, but a military coup is the last thing that worries us about the Trump era. The case for the Trump generals has much to do with the reasons he was elected. Toward the top of those voter concerns is that Washington "doesn't work." One big reason Washington no longer works is because the bureaucracies inside its various departments have grown too big to succeed.

29. GCHQ spybase worker hanged himself after he was arrested over 'unproven allegations' and suspended from his top secret role, inquest hears

The Daily Mail, Isobel Frodsham, 2016 12 10

London - A GCHQ spybase worker hanged himself after being arrested by police and then suspended from his top secret work, an inquest heard yesterday. Tim Masling, 57, of Cheltenham, died on July 1 this year, three weeks after his arrest and suspension from the intelligence organisation. During an inquest held at Gloucester Coroners Court, his family said the allegation which led to his arrest has never been proved and they are sure he would still be alive if his GCHQ bosses had been more supportive. The coroner, Katy Skerrett, recorded a conclusion of suicide. Mr Masling was arrested on June 16 for reasons which have not been made public. After his release, he tried to arrange a meeting with his employers 'to put his side of the story across', but one was not arranged, his wife, Deborah, said during the inquest. He then went to work on June 19 but found his pass wasn't working. Mr Masling was informed by a GCHQ security guard that after a meeting on the Friday with a member of security, he was told he had been banned from the site. 'In fact, Tim had never had such a meeting and had not been told that', Mrs Masling said. On Monday, June 20, her husband rang GCHQ in the morning to try to find out what was going on, who were 'very apologetic'.

30. GCHQ spied on former colonies & African leaders, including UK allies – Snowden leaks

RT News, 2016 12 10

London - Britain's electronic spy agency listened in on businessmen, government departments and politicians, including heads of state closely allied to the UK, according to the latest Snowden leaks. The documents, first seen by French Newspaper Le Monde, are likely to cause severe diplomatic issues between the UK and, for example, Kenya, whose President Mwai Kibaki was named in the leaks alongside his senior advisers. The files show a snapshot of UK operations between 2009 and 2010.

GCHQ has told Le Monde it does not comment on intelligence matters but that all its operations were necessary and proportionate, and complied with the European Convention on Human Rights. Kenya, a former colony, hosts a permanent UK base and thousands of troops rotate through it every year to be trained in warfare in arid environments. As well as intercepting Kibaki's communications, the UK also spied on then Kenyan Prime Minister Raila Odinga. Other victims of UK espionage include roving businessmen from Ivory Coast, Gabon, Tunisia, Mali and Congo and members of the military, intelligence community and former and current statesman from a number of counties, including Angola.

31. British spy chief says Islamic State plotting attacks as Russia makes 'desert' of Syria

Reuters, Guy Faulconbridge, 2016 12 10

London - Islamic State militants are using turmoil sown by Russian President Vladimir Putin's bombing in Syria to plot attacks against the United Kingdom and her allies, Britain's foreign intelligence chief said on Thursday. In his first major public speech since winning the top job at the Secret Intelligence Service in 2014, MI6 chief Alex Younger said Russia and Bashar al-Assad were hindering the defeat of militants by attempting to make a "desert" out of Syria. "As I speak, the highly organised external attack planning structures within Daesh (IS), even as they face military threat, are plotting ways to project violence against the UK and our allies without ever having to leave Syria," Younger said at MI6's Vauxhall Cross headquarters in central London. Younger cast Putin's intervention on the side of President Assad as a crude tactical ploy that aligned Russia with the minority Alawites whose members are viewed with suspicion among the majority Sunnis. "In defining as a terrorist anyone who opposes a brutal government, they alienate precisely that group that has to be on side if the extremists are to be defeated," he said. "Russia and the Syrian regime seek to make a desert and call it peace." Syria's civil war, which began in 2011, has become a theatre for competing global powers, with Russia and Iran supporting Assad, and the United States, Gulf Arab and European powers such as Britain backing rebels who want to depose him.

32. We should be proud of our new anti-terror Act

The Daily Telegraph, Jonathan Evans, 2016 12 10

OpEd: Our police and intelligence agencies now have the powers they need to keep us safe in uncertain times. Last week the Investigatory Powers Bill was granted Royal Assent. The new Act updates our surveillance laws and provides powers to enable our intelligence agencies and police to fight crime and terrorism. The previous tangle of laws has been swept away and a single, consistent and transparent new surveillance framework has been introduced. As terrorists, paedophiles and other criminals move their activities on to the internet, it is vital that those who protect us from these threats can operate there as effectively as they can in the nondigital world, and that they have the right legal structure to do so. The sort of terrorist attacks that we have seen in Paris, Brussels and Nice could just as easily happen here in Britain. In 2005 they did. There is a daily battle by MI5, the other security agencies, the police and our allies to prevent more attacks. Andrew Parker, the Director General of MI5, has recently stated that as many as 12 attacks have been prevented here in the past three-and-a-half years. To stand a chance of succeeding in this struggle it is essential that those who work on our behalf have the tools to do the job. Today those tools include access to bulk data sets that throw light on where a suspect has been, with whom, and the people they are in contact with - vital elements in identifying a potential attacker before they can act. One of the reasons that the UK has been relatively successful in containing the terrorist threat in recent years is that we were ahead of the curve in investing in, and legislating for, technical capabilities to identify and keep track of suspects. We need to maintain this edge over our enemies - they are innovative and flexible in their approach and we need to be the same. Some other European countries have not updated their laws and made these investments. They are more vulnerable as a result. At the end of a process that started way back in 2011, Parliament has chosen to provide our police and intelligence agencies with the powers they need to keep us safe in an uncertain and changing world. It was right to do so. (Note: Lord Evans of Weardale was Director General of the Security Service, MI5, from 2007-2013)

33. Prepare for cyberspace Pearl Harbor, warn experts

The Times of London, Deborah Haynes, 2016 12 10

London - The potential for a "cyberspace Pearl Harbor" is growing as countries such as North Korea, Iran and Russia test the boundaries of internet warfare, security experts said last night. Britain, the United States and their allies are also building and testing cyberweapons but, unlike with conventional arsenals, no one knows for sure what damage their adversaries can inflict with computer codes that their cyberwarriors have written. Adding to the opaqueness of cyberwarfare, there are no international rules or principles governing the way that countries should behave in cyberspace, other than the overriding belief among western powers that all actions should adhere to international law. The absence of agreement on when a cyberattack becomes an act of war has empowered nations to fire cyberweapons at each other in tit-for-tat skirmishes that only come to public attention when something too big to hide happens. "It is not quite conflict. It is not quite war," a former senior western intelligence official said. "It is the exchanges of fire across the border. It is really not helpful." North Korean hackers, who are among the best in the world, recently used software to steal secrets from the South Korean military unit responsible for fending off cyberattacks, a major embarrassment for South Korea. Iran, or "state-affiliated groups", apparently targeted the computers of an agency that runs Saudi Arabia's airports last month, wreaking havoc.

34. Man linked to Sikh terror wins right to stay in UK

Belfast Telegraph, John Aston, 2016 12 10

London – An Indian national once involved in Sikh terrorist activities has won a High Court battle to become a permanent resident in the UK. Lawyers for the Home Secretary argued against the move on grounds including that it would "run contrary to the need to show the world that the UK would not accept terrorists". But Mr Justice Collins, sitting in London, said that approach was "not only unreasonable", but contrary to Government policy in such cases. The judge also ruled that the man, known only as MS, from Leicester, might be entitled to damages because of restraints placed on his movements.

35. We'll enjoy extra clout with Trump

The Australian, Greg Sheridan, 2016 12 10

Canberra - Australia has a historic opportunity to influence the administration of US president-elect Donald Trump. Far from the surprise election of Trump being a moment when we turn away from the US, it offers us a chance to potentially exercise greater influence, in our own interests and in the interests of the US and of the Asian region, than ever before. It would be an act of folly to pass this opportunity up. Not only that, a number of Trump's most senior national security appointments, especially retired general Jim Mattis as defence secretary, are clearly superior to the occupants of these positions in the second Obama administration and closer to Australia in their experience and their thinking. Trump's administration will engage in intensified strategic competition with China, as his fascinating phone conversation with Taiwan's President Tsai Ing-wen suggests. But Hillary Clinton as president would also have engaged in much tougher strategic competition with China. For a time, Mattis, a Marine general, was the US commander in Afghanistan. He wrote a private letter to Duncan Lewis, now the director general of ASIO but then the commander of the Special Air Service. In this letter, Mattis told Lewis what he thinks of Australian soldiers: "We Marines would happily storm hell itself with your troops on our right flank." Exactly the same sort of connection would exist with David Petraeus, who is a leading contender to become secretary of state. Petraeus has been a private dinner guest at the home of the Prime Minister and comes to Australia for such events as the Kokoda Dialogue in Canberra.

36. Australia approves sale of the country's largest private landholding to Chinese joint venture
People's Daily Online, 2016 12 10

Canberra - Australian Treasurer Scott Morrison has given approval for the sale of the country's largest private landholding, the Kidman estate, to mining magnate Gina Rinehart's joint venture with Chinese developer Shanghai CRED. The approval of the bid was announced on Friday to Australian Outback Beef, which is 67% owned by Rinehart's Hancock Beef and the rest owned by Shanghai CRED. Kidman is one of Australia's largest beef producers. The landholding has 10 cattle ranches, a bull breeding stud, and a feed lot covering 101,411 sq. km (39,155 sq. miles) across South Australia, Western Australia, Northern Territory, and Queensland in Australia. The largest Kidman station, Anna Creek in South Australia, and its outstation The Peake, will be bought by the Williams family, a local farming family with adjoining properties. The rest will be sold to the joint venture. The sale of the estate, encompassing about 1.3% of Australian land, had been halted several times in the past 18 months. Previous Chinese-led bids were blocked by the Australian government due to national security concerns. The Kidman estate was originally offered for sale in April 2015. The Australian-owned Hancock will control the board and day-to-day operation of the business, which will remain incorporated and headquartered in South Australia. With the sale of Anna Creek and The Peake, Kidman's Australian ownership increases from 66.1% to 74.7%. Some of the farms are close to a government weapons-testing range at Woomera.

37. Gunmen kill counterterrorism police officer in Pakistan
The Associated Press, 2016 12 10

Peshawar - Pakistani police say gunmen have shot and killed a counterterrorism police officer and wounded his young son in the northwestern city of Peshawar. Senior police officer Tahir Khan says Riazul Islam was returning home with the son Saturday evening after prayers in a suburban mosque when gunmen fired several shots and escaped on a motorcycle. Khan said the officer died on the way to the hospital while his son remains in critical condition. Islam had survived two bomb attacks in the past three years, one of which severely wounded him.

38. US aid to Pakistan conditioned to action against Haqqani Network
Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 10 12

Kabul - The US Congress has conditioned $400 million of its $900 million aid to Pakistan to action against the Haqqani terrorist network which had been widely accused of killing most of the US and Afghan security forces in Afghanistan, a media report said on Saturday. Pakistan had been often urged by Kabul and Washington to dismantle the Haqqani Network and target all terrorist groups on its soil that posed threat to regional and global security. According to times of India, the 2017 National Defence Authorisation Act (NDAA) imposes four conditions on Pakistan to be eligible for $400 million of the $900 million of the Coalition Support Fund (CSF). The defence secretary also needs to certify that Pakistan actively coordinates with Afghanistan to restrict the movement of militants, such as the Haqqani network, along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border; and finally that Pakistan has shown progress in arresting and prosecuting Haqqani network senior leaders and mid-level operatives. The United States has once again expressed its concern "safe havens" Afghan Taliban groups, including the Haqqani network, are enjoying on Pakistan's soil.

39. Drone strike on Isil's Tunisia terror backer

The Daily Telegraph, Ben Farmer, 2016 12 10

London – A senior French jihadist linked to the massacre of 30 British holidaymakers in Tunisia last year has been targeted in an American drone strike in Isil's capital. Boubaker Hakim was believed to have been in contact with the terror cell which launched the June 2015 attack on a beachfront hotel and helped "enable" the deadly shooting spree, CNN reported. Western intelligence agencies are trying to determine if he was killed when his car was hit in the Syrian city of Raqqa late last month. A senior British terrorism source said Hakim was connected to the Tunisian cell via an intermediary in Libya. Thirty-eight people, 30 of them British, were shot dead when Seifeddine Rezgui opened fire at a hotel in the popular resort of Sousse. The same cell linked to Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (Isil) also carried out a deadly attack on the Bardo museum in Tunis in March 2015.

40. Egypt denies rift with Saudi, drift toward Iran

Reuters News, 2016 12 10

Manama - Egypt's Foreign Minister Sameh Shukri on Saturday hailed a "special relationship" with Saudi Arabia, denying reports that the two powerful Arab nations had fallen out after Egypt expressed support for the Russian intervention in Syria. Egypt voted in favour of a Russian-backed U.N. resolution on Syria in October that excluded calls to stop bombing Aleppo, which Saudi Arabia strongly opposed. The kingdom informed Egypt last month that shipments of oil products expected under a $23 billion aid deal had been halted indefinitely, but Shukri denied the nations were at loggerheads and said any disagreements had been exaggerated. "Let me reassure you that from Egypt's perspective we have a very clear vision as to the fundamental nature of that relationship ... Arab national security depends on the cohesion and understanding that exists between Saudi Arabia and Egypt." "The sensitivity that exists in ... what may be perceived as divergence of views or differences of opinion might be escalated in the press to take dimensions that go beyond the inherent special relationship," Shukri said at the Manama Dialogue conference on Middle East security in Bahrain.

41. Car bomb kills 2 policemen at checkpoint near Somali capital

Reuters News, Abdi Sheikh, 2016 12 10

Mogadishu - A car bomb killed at least two policemen when it exploded at a checkpoint near the Somali capital Mogadishu on Saturday, police and militants fighting to topple the government said. "A blast took place at the Siinkadheer checkpoint," Police Major Nur Farah told Reuters. The area lies some 15 km (9 miles) northwest of Mogadishu. The militant group al Shabaab, which wants to impose its strict interpretation of Islam, said its fighters carried out the attack. "A suicide car bomb rammed into the checkpoint. We targeted security forces who inspect cars heading towards Mogadishu," Sheikh Abdiasis Abu Musab, the group's military operations spokesman, said. Somalia is still battling an Islamist insurgency while it seeks to rebuild after more than two decades of conflict and chaos that have left the nation in tatters. It is holding a vote at polling centres across the country over several weeks for a new parliament. Some 14,000 people representing Somalia's federal states have been chosen to pick the 275 lawmakers. Those members of parliament will choose a new president.

42. Egyptian court rejects appeal by Islamist militant Adel Habara over death sentence

Reuters News, 2016 12 10

Cairo - Egypt's Court of Cassation rejected an appeal made by prominent Islamist militant Adel Habara over his death sentence, judicial sources said on Saturday. Habara has been convicted in 2014 of killing 25 army conscripts in North Sinai in August 2013, near the border with Israel. Egypt's President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi is facing an Islamist insurgency based in the Sinai Peninsula adjoining Israel and the Gaza Strip. Violence there intensified after Sisi, as army chief, engineered the overthrow of Islamist president Mohamed Mursi in mid-2013. (Full Report)

43. Kenya: 'Establish Commission of Inquiry into violations by security agencies'

Pan African News Agency, 2016 12 10

Nairobi - Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta should urgently establish a commission of inquiry to investigate reports of extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, torture and ill-treatment of detainees by the security forces. This is the demand of eight Kenyan and international human rights organizations in a letter to the president on Saturday as the world marks International Human Rights Day, according to a statement by Amnesty International, a human rights watchdog. It said human rights organizations and media outlets had found credible evidence that units of the Kenyan security forces, including Kenya Police Service, the Kenya Defence Forces (KDF), the Kenya Wildlife Service, (KWS), the National Intelligence Service (NIS), had killed, disappeared and tortured people suspected of being terrorists or criminals. Justice for such cases had been inconsistent and victims were often left without avenues for redress, they said. The Kenyan president has a responsibility to ensure that all government forces respect national and international human rights law and adhere to due process," said Otsieno Namwaya, Africa researcher at Human Rights Watch. Victims of killings and disappearances by security agencies deserve answers and a commission of inquiry is a critical first step."

44. China flies nuclear-capable bomber in South China Sea after Trump Taiwan call, US officials say

Fox News, Lucas Tomlinson , 2016 12 10

Washington - China flew a long-range nuclear-capable bomber outside China for the first time since President-elect Donald Trump spoke with the president of Taiwan, two US officials told Fox News. The dramatic show of force was meant to send a message to the new administration, according to the officials. Even more concerning for the Pentagon, China has been seen by American intelligence satellites preparing to ship more advanced surface-to-air missiles to its contested islands in the South China Sea. Trump's call with Taiwan's President Tsai ling-wen broke decades- long protocol after American leaders stopped communicating directly with the Taiwan president in 1979, when diplomatic ties were severed and the United States shifted to a new "one-China" policy. China protested Trump's call with President Tsai.

42. Tibetan monk self-immolates in China: group

Associated Press, Christopher Bodeen, 2016 12 10

Beijing - A Tibetan Buddhist monk has set himself on fire in western China in what appeared to be the latest such radical protest against Beijing's rule, a U.S. government-backed radio station and rights monitoring group said. The unidentified monk set himself alight on a road outside the town of Machu in a traditionally Tibetan area of Gansu province at around 7 p.m. Thursday, Radio Free Asia and London-based Free Tibet reported. Police who arrived shortly afterward took the monk away and there was no immediate word on his condition, they said. A man who answered the phone at a regional police station hung up immediately after the caller asked for information. Calls to other government offices rang unanswered. While information from the isolated area is incomplete, the incident is believed to bring to at least 146 the number of Tibetans who have self-immolated in recent years, about 125 of whom have died, according to monitoring groups. Eyewitnesses have been quoted as saying that many of those who self-immolated cried out for Tibetan independence or prayed for the return of the Dalai Lama. Tibet's Buddhist leader fled Tibet in 1959 amid an abortive uprising against Chinese forces who had occupied the Himalayan region a decade earlier.

43. Tsai says 'resolute' on S. China Sea territorial claim

The China Post, Stephanie Chao, 2016 12 10

Taipei, Taiwan - The government will be "resolute" in safeguarding its territorial claims in the South China Sea, President Tsai Ing-wen said Friday. Tsai made the statement during the opening of an exhibition held to mark the 70th anniversary of the Republic of China regaining control over the South China Sea's Taiping Island. The president said Taiwan would continue to protect its maritime navigation and overfly rights in the disputed region. The government would do so on the basis of international law and international maritime law, and with an emphasis on peace, human rights, ecological preservation and sustainability, she said. The exhibition, titled "Sustainable Governance and Enduring Peace: An Exhibition Commemorating the 70th Anniversary of the Recovery of the South China Sea Islands," runs until Dec. 19 at Academia Historica (國史館). Academia Historica is organizing the event in conjunction with the Interior Ministry. The exhibition examines the history, strategic location and sustainable development of Taiping, through a collection of historical documents, artifacts, photographs and videos. After the ceremony, Tsai was given a tour of the exhibition, viewing displays including fresh produce grown on Taiping. Arable land is a key U.N. criterion for a body of land to be considered an island rather than a rock. Taiping's agricultural output is often cited by the government when rebutting a Hague ruling in July that declared the land to a rock formation.

44. Taiwan says China air force conducts long-range drills

Reuters News, 2016 12 10

Taipei - Chinese military aircraft on Saturday flew over waterways near Taiwan as part of long-range exercises, Taiwan said, the first such flights since a telephone call between Taiwan's leader and U.S. President-elect Donald Trump irked China. China claims self-ruled Taiwan as its own and has never renounced the use of force to take back what it deems a wayward province. Trump's call with Taiwan President Tsai Ing-wen on Dec. 2 was the first between a U.S. president-elect or president and a Taiwan leader since President Jimmy Carter switched diplomatic recognition to China from Taiwan in 1979. China lodged a diplomatic protest over the call and blamed Taiwan for what it called a "petty" move. But there was no indication the exercise by its military aircraft on Saturday was a response to the telephone call. The Chinese jets flew north to south and entered the Miyako Strait around Japan's southern islands as well as the Bashi Channel south of Taiwan, but did not enter Taiwan's air defence identification zone, Taiwan's defence ministry said in a statement.

45. Malaysia police kill key Abu Sayyaf militant in shootout

Agence France Presse, 2016 12 10

Manila - Malaysian security forces have killed a key member of a Philippine Islamist militant group in a shootout in waters off Sabah in Borneo, the Philippine military said Saturday. Abu Sayyaf leader, Abraham Hamid, had led the kidnapping of several foreigners from a tourist resort in the volatile southern Philippines last year, two of whom were later beheaded. "The death of Hamid is a big blow to the (Abu Sayyaf) as it neutralised one of the notorious bandits and will degrade their capability for spotting and kidnapping victims in the future," said regional military spokesman Major Filemon Tan. Two other militants were killed alongside Hamid in the shootout with Malaysian police in Lahad Datu in eastern Sabah, he said.

46. Abu Sayyaf kidnapping squad leader among men killed in shootout with Malaysian police: Philippines (Canada)

The Straits Times, Raul Dancel, 2016 12 10

Manila - Malaysia's security forces have dealt a serious blow to the notorious Abu Sayyaf group by killing the leader of a squad that has been snatching tourists, fishermen, and sailors in waters off Sabah and the Philippines' Sulu archipelago, Philippine officials said on Saturday (Dec 10). Abraham Hamid, the alleged kingpin, were among the three men killed by police officers from Malaysia's Tiger Platoon in a shootout on Thursday (Dec 8) evening off Sabah's Semporna town, the officials said. "The death of Hamis is a big blow to the (Abu Sayyaf), as it neutralised one of the notorious bandits' leader and will degrade their capability for spotting and kidnapping victims in the future," Major Filemon Tan, spokesman of the Western Mindanao Command, said in a report. The other two slain were Hamid's men, said Major Tan, without identifying the men. He said Hamid led bandits that snatched two Canadians, a Norwegian and a Filipina from a high-end resort in Samal island, Davao province, 980km south of the capital Manila, in September last year (2015). The Canadians - Mr Robert Hall, 50, and Mr John Ridsdel, 68 - were beheaded in April and June (2016).

47. Indonesia police arrest three people suspected of plotting attack in Jakarta with high-explosive "rice-cooker" bomb

The Straits Times, Arlina Arshad, 2016 12 10

Jakarta - Indonesian police on Saturday (Dec 10) arrested three people suspected to be plotting an attack in the capital with a high-explosive "rice-cooker" bomb. "Two men and a woman are undergoing intensive investigation to get further information on the network and the possibility of other explosives," National Police spokesman Boy Rafli Amar told TVOne news channel in a live broadcast. The trio were nabbed in a raid on a rented house on Saturday in Bintara Jaya area in Bekasi, outside Jakarta. "It is still being investigated. What's clear, the information we can convey is, their target is a vital object," he added. Police have also found a bomb made up of "high-explosive" materials contained in a rice cooker, adding: "The casing is a rice cooker. The content is dangerous."

48. PM calls for vigilance to counter potential N.K. attacks after impeachment

Yonhap English News, 2016 12 10

Seoul - Prime Minister Hwang Kyo-ahn on Saturday instructed the military to step up vigilance against threats or any attempt to instigate national division from North Korea, his office said. The direction comes a day after the parliament impeached President Park Geun-hye for her alleged involvement in a high-profile corruption scandal. Hwang took over as acting president while the Constitutional Court has 180 days to determine whether to endorse the impeachment or not. "After the National Assembly voted in favor of the impeachment plan yesterday, the government is carrying out all measures necessary to prevent any government vacuum and ease the people's anxiety," Hwang said during an emergency meeting of major Cabinet ministers at the main government building in Seoul.

49. Pentagon expects 'policy consistency' in S. Korea after presidential impeachment

Yonhap English News, 2016 12 10

Washington - The U.S. Defense Department said Friday that it expects "policy consistency and continuity" on various issues with South Korea in the wake of the impeachment of President Park Geun-hye. Pentagon spokesman Cmdr. Gary Ross gave the comment in response to a question from Yonhap News Agency whether the impeachment could have any impact on the planned deployment of the THAAD missile defense system to the South. "We look forward to working with Prime Minister Hwang in his new capacity as acting President of the ROK. We expect policy consistency and continuity across a range of fronts, including DPRK, other regional issues, and international economics and trade," Ross said, referring to Prime Minister Hwang Kyo-ahn.

50. India security officials suspect man of joining IS

BBC Monitoring South Asia, 2016 12 10

Mumbai - A 28-year-old man from Mumbra in neighbouring Thane district has allegedly joined banned terror organization ISIS [Islamic State], according to the Anti-Terrorist Squad (ATS). Tabrej Noor Mohammad Tambe, who had left the country to visit Egypt and Libya, has joined ISIS and a complaint in this connection has been lodged at Kalachowki unit of the ATS by this brother, Mumbai ATS chief Atul Kulkarni told PTI on Friday [9 December]. Tabrej is believed to have joined ISIS with one of his friends Ali who is from Saudi Arabia. Tabrej was in contact with Ali since last few years as both had worked together in Riyadh, the officer said. ATS has registered an offence under sections of 16,18,18 (B), 20,38,39 of Unlawful Activities Prevention Act (UAPA). Further investigation is underway.

51. Army chief gets intelligence briefing at ISI HQ

Mumbai - Chief of Army Staff General Qamar Javed Bajwa Friday visited Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) headquarters where he was received by Lt-Gen Rizwan Akhtar, Inter-Services Public Relations said in a statement. "COAS was given a detailed briefing on the internal and external security situation of the country and ISI's role towards strengthening of national security including its efforts in countering terrorism," read a statement. "Gen Qamar Bajwa expressed his complete satisfaction and lauded the contributions and sacrifices of officers and men of premier intelligence agency towards strengthening of national defence and security."

52. Iran, Norway Opt for Broadening Mutual Cooperation

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 10

Tehran - Iranian Ambassador to Norway Mohammad Hassan Habibollahzadeh and Norwegian King Harald V in a meeting in Oslo on Friday underlined the need for expanding bilateral ties. During the meeting in the Norwegian capital today, Habibollahzadeh and King Harald V explored avenues for bolstering and reinvigorating mutual cooperation. During the meeting, Habibollahzadeh proposed a cooperation framework for broadening of bilateral ties between Iran and Norway in political and economic fields, and said, "Tehran is ready to further develop ties with Oslo." In early October, Norwegian Foreign Minister Borge Brende announced that Oslo has opened a one-billion-dollar credit line to help the Norwegian companies with export of their commodities to Iran. "About $400 million dollars of that credit line ($1 billion has been used to export the modern technologies to Iran," Brende said in a meeting with Iranian Economy Minister Ali Tayyebnia in Washington.

53. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister, Jordanian Ambassador Discuss Middle East Agenda

Sputnik News Service, 2016 12 10

Moscow - The statement added that the meeting was held at Majali's request. "During the talks, there was an exchange of opinions on actual issues of regional agenda taking a special attention to the situation around Syria and the state of affairs in the Israeli-Palestinian settlement," the statement said. The so-called Arab Spring protests shook the Middle East in 2011. In Syria, the protests resulted in clashes between the government forces and opposition. Since then, the Middle Eastern country has been mired in a war, which involves Syrian army, numerous opposition factions, as well as terrorist groups, and which has resulted in hundreds of thousands of casualties. International community, including Russia and Jordan have undertaken a number of steps to settle the conflict.

54. Hundreds of men fleeing rebel-held Aleppo have vanished, U.N. official says

The Washington Post, Louisa Loveluck & Karen DeYoung, 2016 12 10

Beirut - Hundreds of men have disappeared after fleeing rebel-held districts in the Syrian city of Aleppo, the United Nations said Friday, amid allegations that armed groups on both sides have abducted and even killed civilians who tried to leave. Tens of thousands of people have flooded out of eastern Aleppo since forces loyal to President Bashar al-Assad began a final push to retake the city. Rebel fighters appeared to have reinforced the front line of their shrunken enclave Friday, putting up their strongest fight in weeks. But an official with the armed opposition, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said their numbers were badly depleted. In Paris, Secretary of State John F. Kerry said U.S. and Russian teams would meet Saturday in Geneva in an effort to "save the city of Aleppo" and discuss a plan to safely evacuate civilians and rebel fighters. "We are close; we're not there yet," Kerry said of urgent talks this week with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov. "Tomorrow, I will have the team from America, at President Obama's direction, to be in Geneva with the Russians and we will, I hope, come to some kind of arrangement where we can see how civilians may be protected and what can happen with the armed opposition."

55. Aleppo Residents Scramble for Safety as Some Panic at Government Advance

The New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 12 10

Beirut - Hundreds of Syrian men who escaped rebel-held areas of eastern Aleppo to reach government-controlled parts of the city are missing, United Nations officials said on Friday, adding that they had received reports of government reprisals, including numerous arrests and several cases of summary killings of suspected supporters of the opposition. At the same time, the officials said, some rebel groups have prevented civilians from leaving and even killed or kidnapped those who demanded that insurgents leave their neighborhoods. The United Nations reports largely reflect what residents of East Aleppo have told The New York Times in recent days as Syrian government forces retook control of most of the city. Several have said family members were detained, arrested or conscripted after crossing into government-held areas, and one resident recounted how rebels in the Bustan al-Qasr neighborhood stopped people from leaving. Other residents, however, said rebels had helped them cross the front lines or warned them not to go at certain times or in certain places because of the danger. Rebel groups inside east Aleppo are fragmented and do not always act in concert. As government forces continued to advance on Friday, panic was growing among those still trapped inside, who either could not make their way out or were afraid to enter government territory.

56. Chaos and Desperation as Thousands Flee Aleppo Amid Government Advance

More than 10,500 people have left rebel-held areas in the last 24 hours, Russian officials said on Friday, nearly half of them children, while others have moved deeper into the rebel-held district under intense bombardment.

57. Un Québécois à Alep-Ouest

La Presse, Michèle Ouimet, 2016 12 10

Alep - Jules Gauthier a un visage poupin et des cheveux en bataille. Même s'il n'a que 24 ans, il est allé trois fois en Syrie. Il s'est promené dans les territoires contrôlés par le régime de Bachar al-Assad : Damas, Tartous, Lattaquié, Homs, Alep-Ouest. Je l'ai rencontré lundi matin dans un café du Mile End. Il neigeait à plein ciel. Il a pris un chocolat chaud. Du haut de ses 24 ans, Jules Gauthier a du caractère. « Ne parle pas de moi, mais plutôt d'Alep », m'a-t-il demandé à quelques reprises d'un ton ferme. Il a une connaissance fine de cette guerre extrêmement complexe. D'un côté, Bachar al-Assad, qui a succédé à son père Hafez, dirige la Syrie d'une main de fer depuis 16 ans. Aidé par les Russes, il pilonne sauvagement ses opposants sans se soucier des civils. De l'autre côté, les rebelles dominés par des djihadistes, le groupe État islamique en tête et, notamment, Fatch al-Cham. Eux non plus ne font pas dans la dentelle et ne s'embarrassent pas des civils. Le pays est à feu et à sang : 300 000 morts depuis le début de la guerre civile en mars 2011 ; plus de la moitié des 21 millions d'habitants ont été déplacés ou ont quitté le pays. Au milieu de cette folie meurtrière, Jules Gauthier, à peine entré dans l'âge adulte, avec ses deux appareils photo et son iPhone. Il n'est jamais allé du côté des rebelles, car les dangers d'enlèvement sont trop élevés. En 2013, alors qu'il étudiait à Beyrouth, il a rencontré un groupuscule chrétien français qui fournit des vêtements et des jouets aux Syriens. Il leur a demandé s'il pouvait les accompagner à Damas. « Bien sûr », lui a-t-on répondu.

58. Suicide bomber kills 23 in southern Yemeni city of Ad'en

The Associated Press, Ahmed Al-Haj, 2016 12 10

Sana'a - Yemeni officials say a suicide bomber has blown himself up inside an army base in the southern city of Aden, killing 23 soldiers. They say the bomber detonated his explosives amid hundreds of soldiers lining up to collect their salaries in the Solban army base. They say at least 30 soldiers have been wounded. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack, which bore the hallmarks of al-Qaida. The terror network's branch in Yemen is thought to be the world's most active. It is known to have a presence in Aden, where a loose coalition between troops loyal to the internationally recognized government, local militias and jihadi groups is in control. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to brief the media.

59. French government seeks extension of state of emergency

The Associated Press, Philippe Sotto, 2016 12 10

Paris - French Prime Minister Bernard Cazeneuve says 17 attacks have been thwarted in the country so far this year and he is asking Parliament to extend the state of emergency until July 15. Speaking after an extraordinary cabinet meeting, Cazeneuve said Saturday that Parliament will vote on the bill next week. He said the extension for seven more months is "absolutely necessary" to ensure the highest possible level of protection in the country in the context of next spring's presidential and general elections. Cazeneuve said the electoral period with multiple political meetings and gatherings may increase the risk of attacks by "those who want to strike our democratic values and republican principles at the heart." The newly appointed prime minister said the "terrorist threat" remains "at a particularly high level" in France and neighbouring European countries. The threat _ he described as an "imminent peril" _ is still closely linked to the actions of the Islamic State group, he said. Cazeneuve said the state of emergency has "fully proven its effectiveness" with 4,194 house searches leading to 517 suspects arrested, 434 kept in custody and almost 600 firearms seized, including 77 "weapons of war," over the last year in France. Among those arrested 420 had links with "terrorist networks," he added.

60. Archives Snowden : quand DGSE et DGSI étalaient leur rivalité

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 10

Paris - Les services français ont parfois préféré travailler avec les Britanniques et les Américains plutôt qu'entre eux. Dans l'ombre de la stratégie antiterroriste française se joue une autre guerre. Loin des déclarations gouvernementales assurant que l'ensemble de la communauté du renseignement unit ses forces, la rivalité historique entre les deux principaux services français, la Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE) et la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) n'a, en réalité, jamais cessé. Au point de privilégier parfois les liens avec des services étrangers à la coopération entre directions françaises du renseignement. " Les cousins ", comme ils s'appellent eux-mêmes, se jalourent depuis un siècle. Mais depuis 2008, début du programme d'investissement massif de la France dans la création d'une plate-forme nationale de renseignement technique gérée par la DGSE et mutualisée aux principaux services secrets français, la DGSI (qui s'appelait jusqu'en 2014 la Direction centrale du renseignement intérieur, DCRI), n'a eu de cesse de vouloir s'émanciper de la DGSE dans son utilisation des moyens techniques du renseignement. Dépendante techniquement, la DGSI l'était aussi sur le plan humain : que pouvaient faire ses policiers face aux ingénieurs X-Télécoms de la direction technique de la DGSE? L'actuel patron de la DGSI, Patrick Calvar, a milité auprès des parlementaires comme du gouvernement pour finir par obtenir les moyens de diversifier ses recrutements, notamment en direction des ingénieurs ou d'informaticiens. En 2015 et début 2016, ces querelles de territoires apparaissaient toujours lors du suivi des suspects par la DGSE et la DGSI. Ces deux services, malgré les alertes de l'autorité de contrôle des interceptions administratives, " branchaient " ou " débranchaient " des cibles dans le plus grand désordre, sans que l'information circule. Une note de la NSA qui annonce la visite " le 18 juin 2013, de 9 heures à 14 heures " de Bernard Bajolet, nommé à la tête de la DGSE en avril 2013, illustre la volonté du renseignement extérieur d'interdire à la DCRI tout contact avec la NSA. Il est précisé qu'il souhaite rencontrer les principaux responsables de la NSA et évoquer son statut de " senior sigint ". En janvier 2014, M. Bajolet enfonçait le clou dans un texte paru dans la Revue Défense nationale rappelant à qui voulait l'entendre que " la DGSE assure le rôle de chef de file national (senior sigint) en matière renseignement électronique ". Car la DCRI a noué, comme la DGSE, d'étroites relations bilatérales avec des services étrangers, notamment le GCHQ. Celles-ci sont régulièrement évoquées dans la lettre d'information interne du GCHQ, dénommée " Frenet ", frappée d'un très haut niveau de classification, " Top -Secret Strap 1 ", et consacrée aux relations avec les services secrets alliés. " C'est regrettable " Plusieurs lettres du GCHQ en 2009 et début 2010 se félicitent des " échanges avec la DGSE ". La direction technique de la DGSE, dit que le GCHQ est " très désireuse de démontrer son savoir-faire " et note qu'elle " regrette parfois que l'on n'aille pas plus loin " . Il faut donc, mentionne l'un de ces lettres internes, faire en sorte de " répondre techniquement aux attentes de la DGSE " .

61. Révélations Snowden : otages et rançons, le double jeu des alliés de la France

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 12 10

La France ne compte pas que sur elle-même pour libérer ses ressortissants des mains de ravisseurs à l'étranger. Elle s'appuie souvent sur les États-Unis et le Royaume-Uni. Mais de nouveaux documents extraits par Le Monde, en collaboration avec le site The Intercept , des archives de l'ex-contractuel de l'Agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) américaine Edward Snowden confiées à Glenn Greenwald et Laura Poitras, montrent que cette coopération n'est pas aussi loyale qu'on pourrait le croire, malgré la sensibilité du sujet. Si la NSA et son homologue britannique, le Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), aident les services secrets français à libérer leurs otages – comme l'attestent une dizaine de pièces que Le Monde a pu consulter –, une note interne démontre que, dans le même temps, ces mêmes alliés espionnent la France pour la contraindre à arrêter de payer des rançons. Cette révélation apparaît dans une lettre d'information interne des 27 et 29 mars 2009, diffusée au sein des services secrets techniques britanniques, dénommée Frelnet. Frappée d'un très haut niveau de classification, « top secret strap 1 », elle rend compte de l'actualité des relations du GCHQ avec les services secrets partenaires, comme ceux de la France. Au chapitre « Nouvelles orientations » de ce document, on peut ainsi lire : « Récentes contributions dignes d'intérêt venant de pays de pays tiers (France et Allemagne), opportunité d'utiliser du renseignement à des fins diplomatiques (empêcher le paiement de rançons pour libérer des otages) ». On ignore si ces renseignements ont été collectés lors des collaborations avec la France ou l'Allemagne pour libérer les otages ou grâce à un espionnage plus large. La France n'est pas pour autant considérée comme un ennemi. Dans d'autres lettres internes du GCHQ, comme celles du 23 juin et du 25 août 2009, les Britanniques se félicitent de leur efficacité dans la libération d'un otage français, Antoine Falsaperla. Enlevé le 23 mai 2009 au Pakistan, il est libéré trois mois plus tard. Les services secrets français (Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure, DGSE) ont demandé l'intervention du GCHQ pour des interceptions et des géolocalisations. Cette aide a permis de savoir qui étaient les ravisseurs, « des trafiquants de drogue plutôt que des talibans », indique la note du 23 juin 2009.

62. Attentat déjoué en région parisienne : un sixième suspect mis en examen et écroué

Le Figaro.fr, 2016 12 10

Paris - Un homme de 31 ans a été mis en examen et écroué samedi dans le cadre de l'enquête sur l'attentat déjoué en région parisienne. Le suspect a été mis en examen pour "association de malfaiteurs terroriste criminelle" et "acquisition, détention, transport, offre ou cession d'armes", en lien avec une entreprise terroriste. Pour rappel, 5 personnes avaient été arrêtées à Strasbourg et Marseille dans cette affaire. Les mis en cause avaient indiqué qu'une attaque était planifiée pour le début du mois de décembre en région parisienne. Interpellé mardi par les policiers de la direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI), le suspect a été transféré vendredi au palais de justice de Paris après trois jours de garde à vue. Son ADN a été repéré sur un pistolet retrouvé lors des précédentes perquisitions menées à Strasbourg, selon une source proche de l'enquête. Il est soupçonné d'"avoir fourni les armes" au réseau, selon cette source. Selon le procureur Molins, le passage à l'acte du groupe strasbourgeois était prévu le 1er décembre, "sans que l'on puisse déterminer à ce stade la cible précise choisie". L'exploitation des téléphones et ordinateurs retrouvés lors des perquisitions a révélé des recherches sur internet sur une dizaine de sites en région parisienne tels que le 36 quai des Orfèvres, siège de la police judiciaire, le marché de Noël des Champs-Élysées, Disneyland Paris, ainsi que plusieurs lieux de cultes. En garde à vue, un des suspects avait également évoqué le siège de la PJ parisienne, mais aussi celui de la DGSI à Levallois-Perret (Hauts-de-Seine).

63. Dutch Politician Is Convicted of Inciting Discrimination, but Not Punished

The New York Times, Nina Siegal, 2016 12 10

Amsterdam - Geert Wilders, the far-right politician who is seen as a likely contender to become prime minister when Dutch voters go to the polls next year, was convicted on Friday of inciting discrimination and of insulting a group for saying that the Netherlands would be safer with fewer Moroccans. The three-member judiciary panel found that Mr. Wilders, the leader of the Party for Freedom, violated Dutch law with his remarks on March 19, 2014, but it elected not to convict him of inciting hatred, and it imposed no punishment, rejecting the prosecutors' request to fine him 5,000 euros, or about $5,300. Mr. Wilders was found to have violated laws on inciting discrimination and group offense when he led a crowd at a political rally around the time of municipal elections in The Hague in chanting, "Fewer, fewer" to the question "Do you want more or fewer Moroccans in this city and in the Netherlands?" The court, however, said that Mr. Wilders was not guilty of hate-speech charges in connection with comments he made about Moroccans in a nationally broadcast TV program recorded at a public market a week before the rally. The effect of the verdict on Mr. Wilders and on his party's chances when the Dutch elections are held in March is unclear, but the trial seems to have improved his party's standing, rather than diminishing it, among voters. If the Party for Freedom wins the most seats in the elections, Mr. Wilders could become prime minister, and he would then have to form a coalition government with other willing parties.

64. News Coverage of Refugee's Arrest Divides Germany

The New York Times, Melissa Eddy, 2016 12 10

Berlin - When a 19-year-old medical student was found raped and drowned in the university city of Freiburg in October, it was seen as a sad and awful crime, but a local one. Beyond a few tabloids, the story failed to make national headlines. But when the Freiburg police announced last Saturday that they had arrested an Afghan refugee for the crime, reaction was swift and bitter. The Facebook page of Freiburg's local newspaper was flooded with comments about "Rapefugees," suggesting that "such cases require special SHOWERS to be set up again." Some national news organizations picked up the news of the arrest of the suspect, an Afghan teenager who arrived in Germany last year without his family. The mass-circulation Bild newspaper ran it under the headline "How Do We Handle This Truth?" But only after Chancellor Angela Merkel and members of her cabinet weighed in on the fierce debate over that question did the country's leading public broadcaster, ARD, pick up the story, which it had originally judged did not meet the threshold for national news. Over the past week, citizens, politicians and journalists have wrestled with the reality that to the German public, it seems that a crime committed by a migrant is of national interest and importance, while a similar one committed by a German is, perhaps, not. ARD's earlier decision not to report on the crime set off further anger and accusations that the country's "liberal media elite" were intent on protecting migrants, going so far as to underreport or even cover up their crimes. The differing views have revealed deep rifts in German society between those who support Ms. Merkel's decision to welcome some one million migrants and those who view the newcomers, who are mostly Muslim, as a threat to the country's stability and security.

65. IS terror suspect arrested

The Sun, Kieran Dineen, 2016 12 10

Amsterdam - Dutch police have detained a 30-year-old man on terrorism charges after finding a Kalashnikov rifle, two full ammunition clips and a painting featuring an IS flag at his home. The suspect, a Dutch national, was seized by a special arrest team in Rotterdam on Wednesday following a tip-off from intelligence. The man appeared before a judge yesterday and was ordered to be held for two more weeks. Officers searching the man's home also uncovered four boxes of highly explosive illegal fireworks, mobile telephones and €1,600 in cash. Wim de Bruin, a spokesman for the National Prosecutor's Office, said the nature of the threat the man allegedly posed was still unclear.

66. Europeans Debate Nuclear Self-Defense after Trump Win

Der Spiegel, Staff Writer, 2016 12 10

Analysis: The issue is so secret that it isn't even listed on any daily agenda at NATO headquarters. When military officials and diplomats speak about it in Brussels, they meet privately and in very small groups -- sometimes only with two or three people at a time. There is a reason why signs are displayed in the headquarters reading, "no classified conversation." And this issue is extremely sensitive. The alliance wants to avoid a public discussion at any cost. Such a debate, one diplomat warns, could trigger an "avalanche." The foundations of the trans-Atlantic security architecture would be endangered if this "Pandora's box" were to be opened. The discussion surrounds nuclear deterrent. For decades, the final line of defense for Europe against possible Russian aggression has been provided by the American nuclear arsenal. But since Donald Trump's election as the 45th president of the United States, officials in Berlin and Brussels are no longer certain that Washington will continue to hold a protective hand over Europe. It isn't yet clear what foreign policy course the new administration will take -- that is, if it takes one at all. It could be that Trump will run US foreign policy under the same principle with which he operates his corporate empire: a maximum level of unpredictability. With his disparaging statements during the campaign about NATO being "obsolete," Trump has already created doubts about the Americans' loyalty to the alliance. Consequently, Europe has begun preparing for a future in which it is likely to have to pick up a much greater share of the costs for its security.

1. Les mille yeux du cinema

Le Devoir, François Lévesque, 2016 12 17

" Big Brother vous regarde. " Dès que l'on pense au roman 1984 de George Orwell, paru en 1949, cette phrase devenue iconique est la première qui s'impose à l'esprit. Relevant initialement de la dystopie, l'action, une partie du moins, a graduellement migré vers l'anticipation, puis, force est de le constater, vers la réalité, passage dont a témoigné avec acuité le cinéma au gré des époques. Et pas nécessairement dans le registre attendu. En effet, on tend d'emblée à associer l'hypersurveillance dépeinte dans 1984 à la science-fiction. Certes, le désir malsain de savoir ce qui se passe chez le voisin est vieux comme le monde, la différence étant que, chez Orwell, l'intimité individuelle est épiée en permanence par l'État. Entité quasi omnisciente, Big Brother est une création qui fut longtemps reléguée audit genre, à raison. Le roman d'Orwell y fut d'ailleurs adapté souvent : deux fois pour la télévision, en 1954 et en 1965, et deux fois pour le cinéma, en 1956 et, oui, en 1984, plus fameusement. Et c'est sans compter la satire Brazil, de Terry Gilliam, qui pige ouvertement dans l'univers orwellien, à l'instar du plus sérieux V pour vendetta. Or, au cinéma, la notion de surveillance n'a jamais été aussi déstabilisante que lorsque présentée dans un contexte réaliste. Un contexte dans lequel on peut se projeter, auquel on peut s'identifier. On en prit la pleine mesure entre 2002 et 2016 dans les thrillers d'espionnage à grand déploiement de la saga Jason Bourne, où Matt Damon, agent secret amnésique, est pourchassé par la CIA (Agence centrale de renseignement) au moyen de satellites, bien sûr, mais aussi d'une pléthore de nouveaux dispositifs de géolocalisation, le nouveau maître mot, les avancées en informatique et en télécommunication voguant de conserve comme jamais auparavant. Avec les téléphones et les voitures, pour ne nommer que ces deux incontournables de la vie quotidienne, il est facile pour les autorités de surveiller la population. Cet état de fait n'est d'ailleurs plus vraiment un enjeu en soi au cinéma, mais plutôt un simple levier dramatique, voire un bruit de fond. En cette ère de hantise terroriste, les gouvernements, par l'intermédiaire d'agences comme le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité ou la tentaculaire NSA (Agence nationale de la sécurité), plus au sud, ont le beau jeu. Lorsqu'ils surviennent, des scandales de surveillance illégale choquent, mais n'étonnent guère, en partie parce que le cinéma, mais aussi la télévision, y a préparé les gens. Le principe même de télé-réalité, justement, repose sur le renoncement des participants à leur vie privée, dont ils font un spectacle.

2. Canada's military too vulnerable to cyber attacks: documents

Globalnews.ca, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - The Department of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces are looking to improve their ability to defend against cyber attacks, with newly released documents suggesting the current system remains woefully inadequate. DND/CAF published a request for "industry feedback" on Friday morning, stating that the Canadian military wants to develop a new system "that will enable a reliable, near-real-time analysis of its Information Technology Infrastructure (ITI) to detect and identify malicious activities and then provide decision aids and tools" to defend against those attacks. The initiative has been dubbed the "Defensive Cyber Operations Decision Support Project" and it's expected to set taxpayers back between $50 and $99 million. Friday's documents were released less than a month after the department's main webpage was hacked. Canadians trying to learn about career opportunities with the military at forces.ca instead found themselves staring at the landing page of the Chinese central government's official web portal. Details of the upgrade plan made public on Friday describe the project as a "complex multi-year requirement" that is still in its infancy. The final delivery date is slated for 2024. On top of that, the current defence system lacks the ability to compare what the technicians are seeing to existing intelligence reports, or to other information that could help them decide how to respond. The fundamental problem, according to the department, is that DND's cyber defences "mainly focused on yesterday's problem while combating today's adversaries."

3. Man who killed soldier Patrice Vincent wanted more victims: Quebec coroner

Global News, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - A coroner says a Quebec man who killed a Canadian Forces warrant officer in 2014 wanted more victims. Patrice Vincent, 53, was killed in the parking lot of a shopping mall in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu when Martin Couture-Rouleau plowed into him and a fellow soldier, who survived. Couture-Rouleau had known jihadist sympathies. Coroner Andre Dandavino's report contains excerpts from a conversation Couture-Rouleau had with a 911 operator just minutes after Vincent's death.

4. Canadian Links to Extremist Networks in Bangladesh

The Diplomat (Tokyo, Japan), Genevieve Zingg, 2016 12 17

Analysis: Violent Islamic extremism has been an increasingly visible threat in Bangladesh over the last two years, reaching a critical juncture when the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) claimed responsibility for the Dhaka attack of July 2016. The terror attack on the Holey Artisan Bakery in the capital's diplomatic quarters, which left 24 non-Muslims and foreign nationals dead after a six-hour hostage situation, was reportedly carried out by local networks affiliated with ISIS. Though it remains unclear whether the perpetrators received material support from the terror group or operated independently, new evidence has emerged confirming that the plan was brought to ISIS for approval and advice prior to being carried out. On December 1, Reuters reported that the Bangladeshi authorities are in possession of communications between the architect of the attack and Abu Terek Mohammad Tajuddin Kausar, an ISIS militant born in Bangladesh but living in Australia. Kausar explicitly approved the attack and advised the five radicals to target non-Muslim foreigners and expatriates. In the wake of a series of killings targeting atheist bloggers, religious minorities, and prominent LGBT activists throughout 2014 and 2015, Bangladesh's political leaders vehemently denied any ISIS presence in the country. The brutal attacks, often committed with machetes, were downplayed as a string of unrelated and isolated domestic incidents attributed to small, relatively unsophisticated local terrorist groups. However, the coordination of the Dhaka attack, its high death toll, and the confirmation of the Islamic States' role in its planning all indicate a concerning new development in the country's terrorist activity. In addition to raising national security concerns, the existence of active ISIS cells in Bangladesh has exposed significant transnational terror links to Canada. Investigations conducted in the aftermath of the attack have identified at least three terrorist suspects with ties to Canada. 5. Peace bond target denies terror links

The National Post, Douglas Quan & Stewart Bell, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - The latest target of Canada's terrorism peace bond system insisted he has no connection to extremist violence and turned up at a B.C. police station to complain about press coverage of his case. "I throw your newspaper in the garbage," Khalid Ahmad Ibrahim, 39, told a reporter at the door of a New Westminster, B.C. apartment. "There is no terrorism," he added. The RCMP told the provincial court on Dec. 8 there were "reasonable and probable grounds to believe ... that Khalid Ahmad Ibrahim may commit a terrorism offence." He was released on $1,000 bail and must adhere to 25 bail conditions, including not accessing or viewing any materials related to a terrorist group. He was due back in court Dec. 20. Peace bonds are not a criminal charge but rather impose conditions on the conduct of those subjected to them. Police have been using them to control suspected violent extremists. On Thursday, an Ontario judge imposed 17 peace bond conditions on a Windsor man, Mohammed El Shaer, after the Crown argued he had twice visited ISIL territory in Syria. Meanwhile in Ottawa, Tevis Gonyou-McLean, arrested on an ISIL-related peace bond in August and released on bail, was arrested once again on Tuesday for six alleged violations of his bail conditions. He was to appear in court Friday at 1:30 p.m.

6. One quarter of Canadian online traffic vulnerable to NSA sweeps: researchers iPolitic.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - A large amount of Canadian internet traffic is being routed through the United States, leaving it vulnerable to collection and probing by the National Security Agency. And most Canadians have no idea of how exposed they are to American data sweeps, say the researchers behind a new tool that aims to show Canadians what path their internet traffic takes to connect to the websites they want to visit. In a new online project launched Thursday, researchers from the University of Toronto and York University have partnered with Open Media to create a tool to show the paths Canadians' internet data take when they access websites or send online communications. While past estimates have suggested roughly 90 per cent of Canadian internet traffic is routed through the United States — particularly in cases where a Canadian visits an American or foreign website — the new data gathered so far by the researchers build on that and suggest that even when both the origin and destination of the traffic are in Canada, there's still a one-in-four chance it goes through the U.S. "I think most Canadians would be really surprised to learn that quite so much of our internet traffic, even our domestic Canada-to-Canada traffic, actually ends up being routed through the U.S.," said David Christopher, spokesperson for Open Media.

7. Cheaper alternative for Canada.ca project ignored, sources say
Ottawa Citizen, Vito Pilioci, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - The federal government could have employed a simple framework for its massive Canada.ca web renewal project, making it much cheaper than the large corporate Adobe contract it signed, several sources familiar with the project say. The web renewal initiative, which aims to move all of the government's disparate department websites into a single Canada.ca domain, has been plagued with budget overruns and delays. Today, fewer than 10 federal departments are in the process of moving to the new website. The project intended to see as many as 90 departments move to Canada.ca by 2017. The government awarded Adobe a $1.95-million contract in March 2015 to provide services that would allow it to merge its various departmental websites under the Canada.ca banner. The value of that contract has since ballooned to more than $9.2 million. Another solution that was passed over, according to insiders, could have resulted in a more cost-effective approach. Government employees even created a demonstration website that mimics the look, colour scheme and layout of the Canada.ca webpage to prove the technology could work. However, according to sources, the open-source option wasn't even considered by Services Canada when it was tasked with revamping the federal government's presence online. Only commercial offerings were looked at. The Request for Proposals document, released on Oct. 16, 2014, notified businesses of the government's intentions so they could bid on the project and stated: "Canada has a requirement for a commercially available fully hosted Managed Web Service." The government's handling of the Phoenix pay system and the rollout of new email addresses and technical services by Shared Services Canada have also come under fire in recent months for having technical issues, being over budget and behind schedule.

8. Single mom gets Phoenix-related claims approved after going public
CBC.CA News, 2016 12 16

Ottawa - The single mom feared she would not be able to put presents under the tree for her two children after getting caught up in the Phoenix pay system fiasco. But two days after the public servant's story aired on CBC News, the government agreed to give her nearly $1,000 to cover most of the out-of-pocket expenses she racked up while being paid improperly. "Everything's going to be great," a relieved Lavallee said in a phone interview. "I'll be able to finish buying gifts for my kids this weekend." Lavallee first went weeks without pay, and was then underpaid for months, after returning to work from a maternity leave in April. Despite receiving emergency salary advances, she says it wasn't enough to cover her bills, including her mortgage. - Bonuses for Phoenix executives still under review, department insists - 10,000 cases remain in Phoenix pay problem backlog, cost could rise over $50M At the same time, Lavallee was in the process of separating from her husband. She had arranged to buy him out of his half of the family home, but due to the financial instability caused by Phoenix, she says she had to abandon that plan.

9. Bonuses for Phoenix executives still under review, department insists

CBC News, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - Public Services and Procurement Canada insisted Friday that bonuses for executives responsible for the Phoenix pay system remain under review and have not been approved, after a department official said some involved in the project would get the incentive pay. The official, speaking on background Friday, told CBC News that performance pay had been approved for some executives involved with the troubled payroll system. But the department's media relations manager, Me'Shel Gulliver Bélanger, later contacted CBC News to apologize for any confusion and stressed that bonuses for the top decision-makers responsible for Phoenix were still under review. In a statement sent to CBC News earlier this week, spokesman Nicolas Boucher said, "a decision was made by Deputy Minister Marie Lemay to process some PSPC executives' performance pay on Nov. 23, 2016." "The amount of money given to executives will be posted on [the Treasury Board Secretariat's] website in the future." The department did not say at the time how many executives were approved for performance pay. Gulliver Bélanger said Friday she couldn't confirm that those receiving bonuses had no involvement with Phoenix.

10. Canada's military too vulnerable to cyber attacks: documents

Global News, Monique Scotti, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - The Department of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces are looking to improve their ability to defend against cyber attacks, with newly released documents suggesting the current system remains woefully inadequate. DND/CAF published a request for "industry feedback" on Friday morning, stating that the Canadian military wants to develop a new system "that will enable a reliable, near-real-time analysis of its Information Technology Infrastructure (ITI) to detect and identify malicious activities and then provide decision aids and tools" to defend against those attacks. The initiative has been dubbed the "Defensive Cyber Operations Decision Support Project" and it's expected to set taxpayers back between $50 and $99 million. Friday's documents were released less than a month after the department's main webpage was hacked. Canadians trying to learn about career opportunities with the military at forces.ca instead found themselves staring at the landing page of the Chinese central government's official web portal. Details of the upgrade plan made public on Friday describe the project as a "complex multi-year requirement" that is still in its infancy. The final delivery date is slated for 2024. The sensors used to detect cyber attacks are "not sufficient," they go on to say, and when they do come across malicious attempts to compromise the department's computer systems, "analysts must manually piece the data together to understand the extent of the breach and its operational impacts." On top of that, the current defence system lacks the ability to compare what the technicians are seeing to existing intelligence reports, or to other information that could help them decide how to respond.

11. Permanent protection for police HQ remains 2 years away

CBC News, 2016 12 17

Winnipeg - Winnipeg's new police headquarters may be stuck with temporary protection against drive-up vehicle attacks for another two years, according to a plan to replace concrete slabs with a more permanent and more esthetically pleasing alternative. A city plan to improve downtown streetscaping calls for permanent bollards to replace temporary Jersey barriers — upright concrete slabs — around the police headquarters by 2019. That will be four years after the city disclosed the police headquarters has no protection against drive-up vehicle attacks and requires the installation of bollards — upright barriers made of concrete and steel — at a cost of up to $1.9 million. In 2015, the city installed Jersey barriers around the police headquarters as a temporary measure until money for bollards could be secured. Earlier this year, Supt. Scot Halley said the police service hopes to work with the city's public works department as well as planning, property and development to see whether the security measures could be combined with other downtown projects. A city search for a consulting firm capable of designing downtown streetscaping improvements and bike corridors suggests the city plans on doing just that, by incorporating bollards into a protected bike lane on Garry Street and new pavement around the headquarters.

12. Assailant in Quebec hit-and-run attack was intent on killing other soldiers, coroner's report reveals

CBC News, Kamila Hinkson, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - A newly released Quebec coroner's report into the death of Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent has revealed his assailant told authorities he wouldn't turn himself in case he got the chance to kill another soldier. Martin Couture-Rouleau, who the RCMP has described as "radicalized," hit Vincent and a male colleague with his vehicle in the parking lot of a commercial plaza in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que., two years ago. Vincent was critically injured and later died in hospital and his colleague sustained non-life-threatening injuries. Patrice Vincent, soldier killed in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, was close to retirement. Following the hit-and-run, local police spotted the vehicle and a high-speed chase ensued. During that chase, Couture-Rouleau called 911 and took responsibility for the hit-and-run. He informed the dispatcher to "alert Canada, the governor and everyone who is responsible for the army" to leave the coalition fighting against ISIS. He was asked to turn himself in. He refused, saying he "might cross paths with another one of your soldiers" and "I'll kill them." "I'm not on the phone to discuss with you, I'm on the phone with you to give you a message," he told the 911 dispatcher.

13. Martin Couture-Rouleau voulait tuer d'autres militaires

TVA Nouvelles, 2016 12 17

Montréal - Le rapport du coroner sur la mort du soldat Patrice Vincent, victime d'un attentat en octobre 2014 à Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, a été rendu public ce matin. On y apprend que Martin Couture-Rouleau, l'homme qui a délibérément foncé sur deux militaires avec sa voiture ce jour-là, avait l'intention de tuer d'autres militaires. C'est du moins ce qui ressort de l'analyse faite par le coroner André-H. Dandavino qui se base entre autres sur l'appel que Couture-Rouleau a lui-même fait au 9-1-1 après avoir posé son geste. «À 11h40, [Martin Couture-Rouleau] appelle le 9-1-1 s'identifie en disant qu'il vient de frapper un soldat et qu'il est pris en chasse par la police et d'avertir le Canada, le gouverneur, pis tous ceux-là qui sont en responsables avec l'armée, de débarquer de la coalition entre l'État islamique», peut-on lire dans le rapport.

14. Quebec coroner says man who killed Forces soldier in 2014 wanted more victims

CTV News, 2016 12 17

Montreal - The Quebec man who killed a Canadian Forces warrant officer in 2014 wanted more victims, according to a coroner's report. Patrice Vincent, 53, was killed in the parking lot of a shopping mall in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu when Martin Couture-Rouleau plowed into him and a fellow soldier, who survived. Couture-Rouleau had known jihadist sympathies. Coroner Andre Dandavino's report, completed Dec. 10, contains excerpts from a conversation Couture-Rouleau had with a 911 operator just minutes after Vincent's death. The report says Couture-Rouleau called 911 and said he was not going to surrender because he might run into another soldier and that he would kill him.

15. Yahoo Lawsuit: Canadian Customers Want To Sue In $50-Million Class Action

The Huffington Post, 2016 12 17

Toronto - Yahoo is now facing a proposed class action on behalf of Canadians whose personal information may have been stolen, according to a notice of action filed Friday. The $50-million claim would take in Canadians whose user account information was stolen or whose email accounts were accessed in recent years. According to the notice, the representative plaintiff, Natalia Karasik, of Barrie, Ont., received a letter from Yahoo on Thursday informing her that her information was part of a hack of its servers _ in 2013. Karasik, who could not immediately be reached, was unaware of the breach until she received the letter, the notice of action filed in Ontario Superior Court states. She has used email to chat about a wide range of personal information, including financial and health information, according to the notice. "She's been using her Yahoo email account as her exclusive email system," lawyer Ted Charney said in an interview. "So, essentially, she's at risk for someone having access to all of her emails and everything she's done with her email account for a couple of years." Yahoo, based in Sunnyvale, Calif., did not immediately respond to a request for comment. Hackers used 'forged cookie files' In September, the company sent a mass email to users to inform them that their account information had been stolen from its network in a cyberattack in late 2014. The information included email addresses, telephone numbers, dates of birth, passwords and security questions. The company said at least 500 million user accounts were affected.

16. The best defense...

Vice News, Justin Ling, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - The Canadian Armed Forces is finally upping its game in the realm of cybersecurity — bolstering its shields against nation-state actors like Russia and China, malicious hacker groups, and “insider threats” that may be looking to follow in Edward Snowden’s footsteps. In a pair of documents published Friday, the Canadian military is asking industry to submit ideas on how they can assess and respond to cyber threats in real-time. Under the Defensive Cyber Operations Decision Project, which will ultimately culminate in a plan that will be submitted to the federal government, the Department of National Defense will be looking at capabilities that will allow the military to “operate effectively in cyberspace on government-authorized military missions, to support our federal partners in national cyber security efforts, and to work with international allies,” according to a departmental spokesperson. Cyber defense is obviously top-of mind right now, as the American intelligence community stands behind the fact that the results of the presidential election were directly affected by Russian hacking, and with revelations that Russia had targeted the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Canada is no stranger to state-based hacking. A VICE News report revealed earlier this year that Canada faces 25 sophisticated attacks per day, likely launched by state-backed hackers. Canadian intelligence-watchers have, for years, noted an uptick in domestic activity amongst Canadian military intelligence units — which, traditionally, do not run national intelligence-gathering. This journalist reported in 2014 that military counter-intelligence kept tabs on Indigenous protesters, perhaps countering their own mandate. More recently, the Ottawa Citizen reported that military intelligence conscripted the Communication Security Establishment to track a Canadian within the country. The Communication Security Establishment, the signals intelligence agency that works hand-in-hand with the American NSA, does not appear to be covered by this cyber defense strategy. That agency does not have authority to do surveillance inside Canada, unless specifically mandated to by another department.

17. Death stalks workers at Canadian mine in Colombia

Toronto Star, James Bargent, 2016 12 17

Segovia, Colombia - It is nine in the evening and there is a knock on the door of Andres Bedoya's house. He opens the door to find a skinny teenager. The youth raises a revolver to Bedoya's head and fires. Bedoya had no enemies, no debts and no links to the armed groups that plague this part of northern Colombia. His only crime was to work in the mines of Canadian mining giant Gran Colombia Gold. Bedoya was the first to die in a terror campaign waged in Segovia late last year by Colombia's most powerful criminal group, a paramilitary mafia known as the Urabenos. Their target was the riches produced in Gran Colombia's mines. But it was ordinary miners who paid the price in blood. One year on and the teenage assassin who carried out the attacks is beginning a 23-year prison sentence, after confessing his crimes in a recent trial. But the workers in Gran Colombia's mines continue to pay - now in the form of money extorted from their meagre earnings. The Toronto-registered company is Colombia's largest underground gold and silver producer. But in Segovia, Gran Colombia does little actual mining. After arriving in the region in 2010, the company cut costs by laying off most of its directly employed workforce then rehiring them through subcontracting companies. Today, about 65 per cent of production in Segovia is through Damasa, a business group of five mining companies all owned and run by one man, Julio Erazo. Damasa miners who spoke to the Star on condition of anonymity complained of low pay, a lack of proper safety equipment and unstable short-term contracts that are terminated if they complain. The attacks were accompanied by Urabenos threats distributed around town by unseen hands and circulated around social media networks. Their message was stark: every one of the 1,500-plus Gran Colombia contractors working for Erazo was a "military objective." Extortion was not the paramilitaries' only interest in Gran Colombia's mines. There were also their gangs of machuqueros - mine robbers. Machuqueros dig narrow mud tunnels into the company mines, then spend weeks at a time underground, stealing gold ore and processing it in their own rudimentary portable mills. Erazo stopped the extortion payments then cleared his mines of machuqueros when the Urabenos drove his former AUC comrades out of the region and took over their business.

18. How Trudeau Can Get Back On Track In 2017

The Toronto Star, 2016 12 17

Editorial: The beginning of 2016 was marked by a rare optimism about the new government in Ottawa. As we approach year's end, we are seeing the first signs of that optimism's fragility. Liberal support remains strong, but some recent polls suggest mounting criticism may well be having an impact. There's been much to applaud in the Liberal government's first year: the restoration of the long-form census and unmuzzling of government scientists, major infrastructure investments that will stimulate the economy and make our cities more livable, the modest expansion of the Canada Pension Plan, real movement on climate policy and the introduction of the Canada Child Benefit, which promises to raise tens of thousand of children out of poverty, among other accomplishments. But in recent months, a series of stumbles has rekindled questions about the government's seriousness, which is to say both its sincerity and its gravity. Here are five areas Trudeau and his team should focus on to restore confidence that they are the government they promised to be. Cash-for-access: Every time Justin Trudeau or one of his cabinet ministers hobnobs with the rich and powerful in exchange for a $1,500 contribution to the Liberal Party, the government gives the unseemly impression of preferential access. Yet Trudeau persists in his unwise and incoherent justifications. Security law: The Conservatives were committed to expanding the security state with no apparent regard for civil liberties. Those, like us, who hoped the Trudeau government would correct the balance have been sorely disappointed. The Liberals, who supported the Tories' overreaching anti-terror bill, C-51, while in opposition, promised to amend the "most problematic" elements of the legislation once in office and ensure it conforms with the Charter. More than a year later, the law remains untouched, including aspects that represent a clear threat to privacy, as well as freedom of speech and security of the person. Instead, the Liberals seem keen on introducing yet more intrusive powers. To frame its ongoing public consultation on security issues, the government released a discussion paper that dedicates far more space to the case for protecting the powers granted by C-51 and providing new ones than to the risks such powers pose. In 2017, Trudeau should do as he promised and rein in a security apparatus whose reach continues to grow unencumbered by crucial new oversight or protections against abuse.

19. Bombardier's mysterious Russian middleman

The Globe and Mail, Mark MacKinnon, 2016 12 17

Ottawa - It was a clear and chilly afternoon in Moscow - March 18, 2014 - when Russian President Vladimir Putin signed the documents to formally annex the Crimean Peninsula away from Ukraine. Frustrated Western governments soon began rolling out the only response they could agree on to Mr. Putin's brazen redrawing of Europe's borders: economic sanctions. Over the next two days, the United States would designate 27 individuals who would be denied travel to the U.S. and have their financial assets in the U.S. frozen. In the Treasury Department news release announcing the sanctions, one of the longest sections was devoted to Vladimir Yakunin, then the head of the massive, state-controlled Russian Railways. "Yakunin is being designated because of his official position in the Russian government, but he is also a close confidant of Putin," it read in part. That same week, the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper - always keen to confront Mr. Putin and show his support to the large Ukrainian-Canadian diaspora - announced an even longer list of 32 individuals considered close to the Kremlin who would be banned from travelling to Canada and have their assets in the country frozen. But there was one striking omission: Mr. Yakunin, one of Mr. Putin's oldest and most trusted associates. Before Mr. Putin's rise to the presidency, the two men owned neighbouring dachas - Russian country homes - on the shores of Lake Komsomolsk, near Mr. Putin's native St. Petersburg. As head of Russian Railways, Mr. Yakunin developed a close relationship with key figures at Canada's flagship transportation company, Bombardier Inc. During his decade-long tenure at the head of the state railway monopoly - an entity that moves almost a billion passengers a year, and which took in revenue of $31 billion (U.S.) in 2015 - Mr. Yakunin's name became synonymous not only with the Kremlin inner circle, but with allegations of high-level corruption in Mr. Putin's Russia. He resigned as head of Russian Railways in 2015, several months after a series of media reports alleged Mr. Yakunin had funnelled contracts worth billions of dollars to his close business associates, using shell companies to disguise the ultimate beneficiaries.

20. Trump national security pick Monica Crowley repeatedly pushed conspiracy theory about Clinton aide

CNN, 2016 12 17

Washington - Fox News analyst Monica Crowley, Donald Trump's pick to be senior director of strategic communications for the National Security Council, repeatedly pushed an unfounded conspiracy theory that claimed Hillary Clinton's aide Huma Abedin has ties to Islamic extremists. The claim, which circulated among far-right websites, has been labeled as false and unfounded by fact-checkers from the Washington Post, Politifact, and Snopes. Claims Abedin was tied to the Muslim Brotherhood are based on flimsy connections tying together people and events from decades ago. Crowley made the charge in radio appearances, columns, and on Fox News over the years, a CNN KFile review found. The claims have also been strongly rebutted by high profile Republicans. Former House Speaker John Boehner called the accusations "pretty dangerous" and then-House Intelligence Committee Chairman Mike Rogers called Abedin an "American patriot." The allegations received a passionate rebuke from Republican Sen. John McCain on the Senate floor. Still, Crowley pushed it repeatedly. An email seeking comment sent to a Trump transition spokesperson, Trump national security adviser Michael Flynn, and Crowley was not immediately returned. In a 2013 exchange on Fox News's "Hannity," Crowley responded to another panelist who claimed ties between Abedin and the Muslim brotherhood by saying, "That's the real Huma Abedin story. It's not about Weiner's Weiner. It's about Huma Abedin and her ties to Islamic extremists."

21. U.S. Demands Return of Drone Seized by Chinese Warship

The New York Times, Helene Cooper, 2016 12 17

Washington - The Pentagon on Friday demanded the return of an underwater drone that was seized by China as an American crew was moving in to retrieve it. The episode threatens to increase tensions in a region already fraught with great-power rivalries. A Chinese warship had been shadowing the Bowditch, a United States naval vessel, in the international waters of the South China Sea when the Chinese launched a small boat and snatched the unmanned underwater vehicle, the Pentagon said. Ignoring radio demands from the Americans to return the drone, the Chinese ship sailed off. The episode set off one of the tensest standoffs between Beijing and Washington in 15 years and occurred a day after the Chinese signaled that they had installed weapons along a string of disputed islands in the South China Sea. The seizure of the drone brought a formal protest from the United States at a time when China is extending claims over the South China Sea and is watching the United States — and its incoming president — with wariness. The episode did not have the life-or-death drama of the April 2001 midair collision between a Chinese fighter jet and a Navy surveillance plane that forced the Americans to make an emergency landing on Chinese territory. Acknowledging the odd nature of Chinese sailors seizing the drone close to its American mother ship, one official here likened it to watching a thief steal a wallet in broad daylight.

22. What Was James Comey Thinking?

Esquire Magazine, Tim Weiner, 2016 12 13

Analysis: As the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, James B. Comey gave a speech to every new prosecutor he hired. Founded in 1789, the Southern District is the most prestigious post in the Justice Department outside Washington. Wall Street titans and crooked politicians go down to the federal courthouse in lower Manhattan, they go on trial, and they go to prison. The power of a prosecutor is awesome, as Comey well knew. (There's a reason that the statue of Justice holds a sword along with a scale.) He told the young hotshot lawyers who were joining his team that when they stood up in court and proclaimed, "'I represent the United States of America,' people believe the next thing you say." He said this trust flowed from a reservoir filled by their predecessors over the ages. It imposed on them a duty to use their power with wisdom—to "do the right thing" in the name of the law and the Constitution. When Comey took command of the Southern District in early 2002, Ground Zero was a war zone ten blocks away. For two years he served as a point man in George W. Bush's counterterrorism campaign, and in late 2003 the president appointed him deputy attorney general of the United States. Comey recited the essence of the speech he gave his new prosecutors at his Senate confirmation hearings. Three months later, the strength of his principles was tested severely. In an epic confrontation over the National Security Agency's program of warrantless wiretapping, Comey stared down the president inside the White House. He said no to his commander in chief. Comey's reputation for integrity and independence led Barack Obama to make him the seventh FBI director in the nation's history. He was sworn in on September 4, 2013. Three years later, the man known as the straightest of straight shooters shot himself in the foot. The ricocheting bullet scarred his reputation, wounded the American body politic, and lodged in the heart of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. On July 5, 2016, Comey sent an email from the J. Edgar Hoover Building in Washington to every FBI agent in the world. "I am about to walk downstairs to deliver a statement to the media about our investigation of Secretary Clinton's use of a personal email server during her time as Secretary of State," he said. He was going to "provide more detail about our process" than was usual, and he was doing so to satisfy the public's interest. "The confidence of the American people in the FBI is a precious thing," Comey said. "Folks outside the FBI may disagree about the result, but I don't want there to be any doubt that this was done in an apolitical and professional way and that our conclusion is honestly held, carefully considered, and ours alone."

23. Trump accuses China of stealing US Navy drone

Fox News, 2016 12 17

Washington - Donald Trump weighed in Saturday on China's controversial seizure of a U.S. Navy drone in international waters with a tweet that accused the Chinese of stealing it and ripping "it out of water." The President-elect sent the tweet around 7:30 a.m. Saturday. It read: "China steals United States Navy research drone in international waters - rips it out of water and takes it to China in unpresidential [sic] act." Trump appears to have meant unprecedented. He later corrected the misspelling. China seizure of the drone in the South China Sea is seen by some observers as one of the most significant disputes being the U.S. and China in years. It follows Trump's post-election call with the president of Taiwan. Earlier Saturday China said that its military was in contact with its American counterparts on "appropriately handling" the seizure of the U.S. Navy unmanned underwater glider. The one-sentence comment by the foreign ministry offered no details on what discussions were underway or why China on Thursday seized the drone, which, according to the Pentagon, was being operated by civilian contractors to conduct oceanic research. The U.S. said it issued a formal diplomatic complaint over the seizure and demanded the drone's return. "According to (our) understanding, the U.S. and Chinese sides are working on appropriately handling this matter through channels between the two militaries," the foreign ministry said in its statement, which was faxed to The Associated Press. China's defense ministry did not immediately respond to questions on the issue.

24. Pentagon: China seized naval drone

The Washington Post, Missy Ryan & Dan Lamothe, 2016 12 17

Washington - A Chinese naval ship seized an underwater naval drone that was being used by the U.S. Navy to test water conditions in the South China Sea, the Pentagon said Friday. Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman, said the incident occurred Dec. 15 in international waters in the South China Sea, about 50 nautical miles northwest of the Philippine area of Subic Bay. The USNS Bowditch, an oceanographic survey vessel with a mostly civilian crew, was in the process of recovering two unmanned ocean gliders, which are used to collect information about water conditions that can help U.S. vessels operate. A Chinese ship, a Dalang III-class submarine rescue vessel, approached the area, coming within about 500 yards of the Bowditch before dropping a small boat in the water. It seized one of the gliders and brought it aboard, Davis said. The Bowditch contacted the Chinese ship and asked for the glider to be returned. Officials aboard the Chinese ship acknowledged the radio communication, Davis said, but stated that they were returning to normal operations. The ship then left the area. "We would like it back, and we would like this not to happen again," Davis said, referring to the underwater drone. The incident occurred around 1:45 p.m. local time, the Navy said. A defense official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter on the record, said the United States has sent an official diplomatic communication to the Chinese government "demanding the return of our stuff." There was no immediate response from Beijing, the official said.

25. Saudis Rethink Investing In U.S. --- After terror bill, Trump victory, kingdom halts spending, mulls listing Aramco elsewhere

The Wall Street Journal, Justin Scheck, Maureen Farrell and Brody Mullins, 2016 12 17

Washington - Saudi Arabia is re-evaluating its multibillion-dollar U.S. financial strategy because of shifts in the American political landscape, including whether to go elsewhere with the public stock debut of its state oil company, according to people involved in the planning. Two events -- the recent passage of legislation that could allow U.S. terror victims to sue Saudi Arabia and the election of Donald Trump, a vocal supporter of the bill -- prompted the reassessment by senior Saudi officials and outside advisers, people involved in the discussions said. Saudi Arabia's sovereign-wealth fund has paused its U.S. investments until they can figure out the implications of the bill and the new direction of the White House, said a person familiar with the fund's decision making. The initial public offering of Saudi Arabian Oil Co., the world's biggest oil producer better known as Aramco, tentatively set for next year or 2018, could raise more than $100 billion in proceeds and rank as the largest in IPO history. The prospect has set banks scrambling for a deal that could bring $1 billion in fees. While Saudi officials haven't decided where to list the shares, bankers say the New York Stock Exchange is the best place to debut such a large offering. The government has been meeting with officials from numerous exchanges, including London, people familiar with the process said. Saudi officials and investors are also looking at how they will invest money from the kingdom's massive Public Investment Fund. Saudi officials have indicated they are effectively turning the sovereign-wealth fund into a war chest for non-oil investments abroad -- a coffer that would expand with proceeds from the Aramco IPO. A spokesman for the fund declined to comment on the terror legislation's passage and how the fund is reacting to it. Saudi Aramco and NYSE declined to comment on the prospect of the IPO being held outside the U.S.

26. U.S. to China: Return Our Sea Drone

The Wall Street Journal, Paul Sonne and Gordon Lubold, 2016 12 17

Washington - China seized a U.S. Navy underwater drone in the South China Sea and the Pentagon demanded it back, raising a new point of tension between U.S. and Chinese military forces in the disputed waters as relations between the countries enter uncharted territory. "It's ours, it was clearly marked, we want it back, and we don't want this to happen again," said Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman. The incident on Thursday occurred days after President-elect Donald J. Trump raised China's ire by suggesting his administration could abandon a bedrock agreement on Taiwan's status that has kept peace in the area for decades. Mr. Trump's suggestion that the U.S. would maintain its position on Taiwan only if China makes concessions to American interests came after he broke decades of diplomatic protocol by accepting a phone call from Taiwan's president, hitting one of Beijing's most sensitive issues. It also came as a Washington-based think tank reported China had installed anti-aircraft weapons and other small arms on all seven of its reclaimed islands in the South China Sea, where China has laid claim to a vast swath of maritime territory, to the dismay of neighbors and U.S. officials. China's Defense Ministry said on its website Thursday that any reef construction was mainly for civil use, and that any military facilities "are mainly for defense and self-defense, which is appropriate and legal." In the latest incident, the U.S. Naval Ship Bowditch, which has a civilian commander, was retrieving two underwater drones about 50 nautical miles northwest of Subic Bay in the Philippines. It was being shadowed by a Chinese ship, a Dalang 3, a typical occurrence when U.S. ships navigate those waters, Navy and defense officials say.

27. Reward for details on ISIS leader soars

The Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 12 17

Washington - The U.S. government has more than doubled, to $25 million, its reward offered for information on the whereabouts of Islamic State leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, placing him in a category whose only other occupant is Ayman al-Zawahiri, the leader of al-Qaeda. Since an initial $10 million was first offered in 2011 by the State Department-administered Rewards for Justice program, the Islamic State has seized control of large portions of Syria and Iraq and "gained the allegiance of jihadist groups and radicalized individuals around the world, and has inspired attacks in the United States," according to a U.S. "Wanted" poster. The increased reward does not come with any indication that U.S. intelligence has a firm idea of where Baghdadi is located. The last confirmed sighting of him was in the Iraqi city of Mosul in the summer of 2014, shortly after Islamic State militants occupied the city. Since then, he has released several audiotapes exhorting his troops to fight on, and U.S. officials have variously indicated he is believed to be hiding in Mosul, or in the Islamic State-occupied city of Raqqa, Syria. U.S.-aided Iraqi troops have gained back much of the territory lost to the militants and are in the midst of a massive offensive to retake Mosul. In Syria, the picture is mixed, with U.S. Special Operations forces guiding recruited Syrian fighters now encircling Raqqa, while the militants this week retook the city of Palmyra, where they were ousted by Syrian troops and Russian airstrikes last year.

28. Departing U.N. Leader Evasive on Possible Run for President of South Korea

The New York Times, Somini Sengupta, 2016 12 17

United Nations - Will he or won't he run for president of South Korea? That was a question Ban Ki-moon faced on Friday at the last news conference of his 10-year tenure as secretary general of the United Nations. First, he punted. "I still have 15 days to go," he said. Then he said he would go home in January, speak to friends and advisers, and "really consider seriously" his prospects. His comments were the closest he has come to saying he is considering a bid to enter the political fray since the current president, Park Geun-hye, was suspended last week after the parliament voted to impeach her, putting the political future of his native country in turmoil. Enormous uncertainty still shrouds Mr. Ban's political prospects. New elections have not been scheduled, pending a decision by South Korea's Constitutional Court on whether to remove Ms. Park permanently. If there are new elections, Mr. Ban must determine what political party he will align with, should he make a presidential bid. If Mr. Ban were to be defeated in a presidential election, his legacy as the chief of the United Nations might be weakened. As for his victories and losses over the course of the last 10 years, Mr. Ban singled out two crises.

29. Obama Suggests Putin Had Role in Election Hacking

The Wall Street Journal, Peter Nicholas & Carol E. Lee, 2016 12 17

Washington - President Barack Obama on Friday implicated Russian President Vladimir Putin in cyberattacks designed to hurt Democrats in last month's election, and he promised a "methodical" retaliation. Mr. Obama said the U.S. intelligence he has seen "gives me great confidence" that Russia hacked the Democratic National Committee and the email account of Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, John Podesta. Asked if he believes the Russian leader authorized the attacks, he said, "not much happens in Russia without Vladimir Putin." "This happened at the highest levels of the Russian government," Mr. Obama said at a news conference. "I will let you make that determination as to whether there are high-level Russian officials who go off rogue and decide to tamper with the U.S. election process without Vladimir Putin knowing about it." The president's naming of Mr. Putin and his promised response escalates the public debate over cyberespionage's effect on the campaign. Lawmakers of both parties are also vowing investigations. The confrontation could fuel growing tension between the White House and President-elect Donald Trump, who has raised skepticism about Russia's role in the hacks and who Democrats argue benefited from the stolen, leaked emails. Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov on Friday said of the Obama administration's accusation that the U.S. "should either stop talking about it or finally produce some evidence; otherwise it looks highly unseemly," according to Russian state news agencies.

30. Obama Says He Told Putin: 'Cut It Out' on Hacking

The New York Times, Mark Landler and David E Sanger, 2016 12 17

Washington - President Obama said for the first time on Friday that he had held back before Election Day from retaliating against Russia for meddling in the presidential race for fear of inciting further hacking "that could hamper vote counting." But he said he was weighing a mix of public and covert actions against the Russians in his last 34 days in office, actions that would increase "the costs for them." Mr. Obama said he was committed to sending the Kremlin a message that "we can do stuff to you," but without setting off an escalating cyberconflict. "There have been folks out there who suggest somehow if we went out there and made big announcements and thumped our chests about a bunch of stuff, that somehow it would potentially spook the Russians," he said. "I think it doesn't read the thought process in Russia very well." The president did not reveal what steps he was considering if he decided to retaliate against the Russians and suggested that some of the options, if they were carried out, could remain secret. "Some of it we will do in a way that they will know, but not everybody will," he said. Mr. Obama made his comments at an annual end-of-year news conference, one tinged with melancholy at the impending end of his presidency, foreboding about the changes that could follow President-elect Donald J. Trump into office next month, and uneasiness about the role Russia played in the political earthquake that has resulted from his election. The president spoke hours after Hillary Clinton, addressing campaign donors in New York, bluntly accused President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia of orchestrating the hacks against her campaign and the Democratic National Committee "to undermine our democracy," as part of a "personal beef against me."

31. U.S. to release second blacklist of N. Korean human rights violators

Yonhap English News, 2016 12 17

Washington - The United States will soon release a second list of North Korean officials and entities to be sanctioned for their involvement in human rights violations, a senior state department official said Friday. Scott Busby, deputy assistant secretary for democracy, human rights and labor, made the remark during a seminar held by the non-governmental Committee for Human Rights in North Korea (HRNK) in Washington D.C., saying they are at the stage of trimming the list. In October, Busby said they were working on the list with a hope of releasing it in December. The U.S. imposed sanctions on North Korean leader Kim Jong-un, and other senior officials, for human rights abuses in July. It was the first time the U.S. had imposed direct sanctions against the North Korean leader, and the designation also marked the first U.S. sanctions on Pyongyang over its human rights abuses. Referring to the second list to be released, Busby said it is a strong and clear message to those responsible for human rights violations that they will be held accountable, whether they be high-ranking officials or guards working at prison camps.

32. U.S. Leads Effort to Destroy ISIS-held Russian Weapons

The Wall Street Journal, Ben Kesling and Gordon Lubold, 2016 12 17

Washington - American military personnel in Syria are working to find and destroy advanced Russian weaponry seized by Islamic State extremist fighters when the militants retook the city of Palmyra less than a week ago from Moscow-supported Syrian-regime forces. On Thursday, U.S.-led coalition aircraft destroyed a total of 14 tanks, artillery systems and an air defense artillery battery, according to a senior military official. Pentagon officials said Islamic State seized equipment including an SA-3 surface-to-air missile system, which uses Russian-designed missiles intended to destroy aircraft flying at altitudes up to approximately 16,000 feet. The officials said American aircraft typically have systems that can deflect such munitions. "We will not allow [Islamic State] to maintain capabilities that threaten Coalition or partner forces," said Col. John Dorrian, a spokesman for the coalition in Baghdad. The Pentagon said the equipment was seized from the Tiyas military airfield by Islamic State forces as they advanced on Palmyra.

33. U.S. Destroys 14 Tanks at ISIS-Held Base in Syria

The New York Times, Eric Schmitt, 2016 12 17

Washington - American-led airstrikes have destroyed 14 Syrian Army tanks at a military base in central Syria that, just days earlier, had been captured by Islamic State fighters, the United States military said on Friday. The strikes against the group of Russian-made T-72 battle tanks on Thursday near Palmyra came one day after senior American officers in the region warned their Syrian and Russian counterparts that United States warplanes would destroy the tanks and other heavy weaponry at the base rather than risk the Islamic State using them against American allies in the area. An American air attack planned for Wednesday had been called off because of bad weather. When the skies cleared on Thursday, allied planes destroyed the tanks, three artillery systems and a number of buildings and vehicles that Islamic State militants were using, the American military command in Baghdad said in a statement. Lt. Gen. Stephen Townsend, the top American commander in Iraq, had warned on Wednesday that the heavy weaponry would be destroyed after the Islamic State, also called ISIS or ISIL, seized the base last weekend from Syrian troops and their Russian advisers. "We will not allow ISIL to maintain capabilities that threaten coalition or partner forces,” Col. John Dorrian, General Townsend’s spokesman, said in the military’s statement.

34. Russia’s Hacks Followed Years of Paranoia Toward Hillary Clinton

The New York Times, Max Fisher, 2016 12 17

Washington - Russia’s unprecedented intervention in the United States election came amid more than United States-Russia tension and Donald J. Trump’s praise of Vladimir V. Putin, the Russian president. It also coincided with a growing belief, in Moscow, that Russia faced an imminent threat in Hillary Clinton’s candidacy. Mrs. Clinton is viewed in Moscow as innately hostile to Russia. Widely held conspiracy theories portray her as seeking to foment unrest that will return Russia to the chaos and depression of the 1990s. Even many government technocrats view her with suspicion that at times verges on paranoia. She referred to these views at an event on Thursday, telling donors that Mr. Putin’s “personal beef” with her had driven Russia’s intervention in the American election. Mark Galeotti, a Russia expert at the Institute of International Relations, based in Prague, said the Kremlin was consumed by something more urgent than petty revenge: self-preservation. “It’s not just they didn’t like Clinton, but they actually thought that she represented a threat,” he said, describing Russia’s actions as a matter of “policy, not pique.” No one factor can fully explain Russia’s decision to hack and pass on Democratic emails, analysts say, and intelligence agencies appear divided on assessing Russian motives. But, in Moscow, fear of Mrs. Clinton has loomed as large or larger than any warmth for Mr. Trump. Mr. Putin accused Mrs. Clinton of instigating protests against him in late 2011.

35. How to Really Punish Russia for Hacking

The Daily Beast, James Lewis, 2016 12 17

Analysis: After much hand-wringing, the Obama administration admitted that the Russian government interfered with the presidential election. (It was not a 400-pound hacker, unless that hacker lives in Moscow.) It’s true that people often question attribution, but the critics were wrong on Sony and they are wrong now. It was the Russians. What the U.S. worries about when it comes to responding to cyberattacks, once attribution has been determined, is the risk of escalating conflict or damaging other important equities. One reason for Obama’s delay in addressing the hacking was a desire not to appear to be interfering in the election—which seemed like a safe calculation back when the White House thought Clinton was certain to win. There was also the pious hope—don’t laugh—for a peace deal with Moscow on Syria. The Obama administration’s response options were ready in August. So why only act now? The most likely reason is domestic politics (and maybe a final realization of the futility of negotiating over Syria). The goal is to hem in the new administration on Russia. If President Obama imposes sanctions, President Trump will have to take action to lift them, complicating his relations with the Hill and the nominating process. This muddles what should be a straightforward story, since one essential lesson for cybersecurity is that unpunished acts are seen as a green light by an attacker. The Russians calculated that they could manipulate the U.S. without punishment. So far, they have been right. They have succeeded beyond their greatest hopes. There is no reason for them to stop of their own accord and the likelihood of further Russian action is high if the U.S. does not take action in response. The administration is considering an “all tools of government” approach. The agencies involved are CIA, NSA, Cyber Command, Treasury, and the Department of Justice. The most likely public action will be to use the cybersecurity sanctions announced in April 2015, accompanied by some kind of covert response involving either interference with Russian attack servers or, perhaps, leaks of documents detailing Russian corruption.

36. A Dangerous Choice for Ambassador to Israel

The New York Times, 2016 12 17

Editorial: In appointing David Friedman as the next ambassador to Israel, Donald Trump voiced a desire to “strive for peace in the Middle East.” Unfortunately, his chosen representative would be far more likely to provoke conflict in Israel and the occupied territories, heighten regional tensions and undermine American leadership. Mr. Friedman, a bankruptcy lawyer who has represented the president-elect in matters involving Atlantic City casinos, has no diplomatic experience, unlike nearly every American ambassador who has served in this most sensitive of posts. That might not be quite so alarming if he didn't also hold extremist views that are radically at odds with American policy and with the views of most Americans. Mr. Friedman has doubted the need for a two-state solution, under which Israelis and Palestinians could live side by side in peace. Ignoring international law and decades of policy under Republican and Democratic administrations, he has endorsed continued Israeli settlement of occupied territory in the West Bank, which Israel captured from Jordan during the 1967 war. Mr. Friedman has gone so far as to endorse even the annexation of some of that land, where Palestinians hope to build a state of their own. There are other reasons to question Mr. Friedman's fitness for the post. He has accused President Obama of anti-Semitism, absurdly, and called supporters of J Street — a liberal American Jewish organization that has lobbied for a two-state solution and the Iran nuclear deal — “far worse than kapos — Jews who turned in their fellow Jews in the Nazi death camps.” American ambassadors to Israel traditionally maintain close contacts with American Jews, as well as Israeli officials, but Mr. Friedman reportedly told a closed-door forum in Washington earlier this month that he would refuse to meet with J Street, effectively ostracizing a significant part of the community.

37. Trump and Putin, in the Barn

The New York Times Gail Collins, 2016 12 17

Column: I was raised in an era when we spent a lot of time worrying about Russia. That was because of Communism, which was such an obsession in my Catholic school that the countries on the map were colored red (Communist controlled), pink (leaning Communist) or green (safe -- for now). Only the United States and Ireland were green. For those of us who spent our childhoods getting drilled on how to be prepared to die for our faith in the event of a Communist takeover, it was a relief when the Soviet Union broke up and nobody felt obliged to worry about Moscow any more. But now things are getting scary. Vladimir Putin invaded Ukraine, bombed the hell out of Aleppo, tried to interfere with our election. He's just the kind of person Sister Mary Ingrid warned us about. But Donald Trump adores him. You can't get into the Trump cabinet unless you think Putin is a great guy. The bromance seems to have started in 2013, when Trump was preparing to go to Moscow for the Miss Universe Pageant. He wondered -- via a tweet, naturally -- whether Putin would be going there, too: "If so, will he become my new best friend?" Do you think Putin will be going to The Miss Universe Pageant in November in Moscow - if so, will he become my new best friend? -- Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) June 19, 2013 Sometime later, at a conservative conference, Trump described how "great" the Russians had treated him: "Putin even sent me a present, a beautiful present with a beautiful note." What do you think it was? A gun? Putin had given the president of Egypt an AK-47. But the owner of a beauty pageant would probably get some nesting dolls, or a nice selection of teas.

38. FBI agrees with CIA that Russia aimed to help Trump win

The Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima & Adam Entous, 2016 12 17

Washington - FBI Director James B. Comey and Director of National Intelligence James R. Clapper Jr. are in agreement with a CIA assessment that Russia intervened in the 2016 election in part to help Donald Trump win the White House, officials disclosed Friday, as President Obama issued a public warning to Moscow that it could face retaliation. New revelations about Comey's position could put to rest suggestions by some lawmakers that the CIA and the FBI weren't on the same page on Russian President Vladimir Putin's intentions. Russia has denied being behind the cyber-intrusions, which targeted the Democratic National Committee and the private emails of Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, John Podesta. Trump, in turn, has repeatedly said he doubts the veracity of U.S. intelligence blaming Moscow for the hacks. "I think it's ridiculous," Trump said in an interview with "Fox News Sunday," his first Sunday news-show appearance since the Nov. 8 election. "I think it's just another excuse. I don't believe it. ... No, I don't believe it at all." At a "thank you" event Thursday night with some of her top campaign donors and fundraisers, Clinton said she believed Russian-backed hackers went after her campaign because of a personal grudge that Putin had against her. Putin had blamed Clinton for fomenting mass protests in Russia after disputed 2011 parliamentary elections that challenged his rule. Putin said Clinton, then secretary of state, had "sent a signal" to protesters by labeling the elections "neither free nor fair." The positions of Comey and Clapper were revealed in a message that CIA Director John Brennan sent to the agency's workforce Friday. "Earlier this week, I met separately with FBI [Director] James Comey and DNI Jim Clapper, and there is strong consensus among us on the scope, nature, and intent of Russian interference in our presidential election," Brennan said, according to U.S. officials who have seen the message.

39. Corbyn linked to lobbyists behind Istanbul bombers

The Times of London, Hannah Lucinda Smith, 2016 12 17

London - Jeremy Corbyn and some of his closest Labour allies are linked to a network of campaign groups lobbying for the Kurdish terrorist group that killed 44 people in Istanbul last weekend, The Times can reveal. Mr Corbyn and Kate Osamor, the shadow international development secretary, are patrons of the Peace in Kurdistan campaign, part of a web of UK-based groups linked to the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK). Unison, a Labour-affiliated union, is also linked to the campaigns. The PKK, a separatist militia with Marxist leanings, has been fighting an insurgency against the Turkish state since the early 1980s. It has been listed as a proscribed terrorist organisation in the UK since 2001, partly due to its involvement in European drugtrafficking networks. The PKK called off a ceasefire 17 months ago and has since been locked in a struggle with Turkish security forces in towns in the east of the country. Amnesty International estimates that the conflict has killed more than 2,300 people and displaced up to 500,000.

40. Cambridge spy forum splits over Moscow

The Times of London, George Sandeman, 2016 12 17

London - A former head of MI6 is among a group of intelligence experts who have stepped down from their roles at a Cambridge University forum over fears of Kremlin influence. Sir Richard Dearlove, the former head of the Secret Intelligence Service, was one of several academics who convened the Cambridge Intelligence Seminar — a forum that brings together former practitioners and researchers of western spycraft. Stefan Halper, a senior foreign policy adviser who served in the White House during three Republican presidencies, and Peter Martland, a leading espionage historian, have joined Sir Richard in relinquishing their positions because of concerns regarding what they believe to be a Kremlin-backed operation to compromise the group, according to the Financial Times. The Cambridge Intelligence Seminar was established by Christopher Andrew, the official historian of MI5 and former chairman of the history faculty at the university. Recent guests at its discussions include Mike Flynn, Donald Trump's choice as US national security adviser. Sir Simon Fraser, who recently retired as permanent undersecretary at the Foreign Office, has also been to a meeting of the group, which holds seminars at Corpus Christi college.

41. Ex-MI6 boss 'leaves Cambridge over Russia'

The Daily Telegraph, Lydia Willgress, 2016 12 17

London – The former head of MI6 is one of three intelligence experts who have cut ties with Cambridge spy seminars amid claims about Russian funding. Sir Richard Dearlove, who was head of the British secret service for five years from 1999, is believed to have resigned as convener of the Cambridge Intelligence Seminar (CIS), alongside Stefan Halper, a former policy adviser at the White House, and historian Peter Martland. Mr Halper reportedly said his decision to step down was due to "unacceptable Russian influence" on the group, which holds Friday seminars at Corpus Christi college. It comes after suspicions were raised that a new digital publishing house, Veruscript, which will help cover some CIS costs, may be linked to Russian intelligence services, the Financial Times reported. But some academics hit back, saying the claims were "absurd". Sir Richard and Mr Martland did not comment.

42. US, Australia urged to get tough on Beijing over South China Sea

Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Andrew Greene, 2016 12 17

Canberra - China has gained "effective control" over the South China Sea and is using "psychological warfare" in its quest for territorial expansion, according to a new study which urges the United States and allies to do more to push back. The joint Australian and US report concludes current policies have failed to strongly challenge Beijing's "adventurism" and suggests options for the new Trump administration to help free up the strategic waterways. According to the Washington-based Centre for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, China has "by far the largest military, coastguard, and maritime militia presence in the region — they are deploying strong surveillance, anti-air, anti-shipping, and strike forces onto the artificial islands they occupy — and they are actively intimidating other parties in the area". Report author and former senior Australian Defence Department official Ross Babbage argues the Federal Government must take stronger action in response. "Our northern approaches are becoming much more questionable," Professor Babbage told the ABC. "Ever since the Second World War we've assumed the United States and its close allies have really dominated the maritime environment — I'm afraid that's really no longer the case." The report, titled Countering China's Adventurism in the South China Sea, also details how China is conducting "psychological warfare" on the United States and its allies to undermine the willpower of so-called "decision-making elites".

43. Neighbour's concerns over alleged extremist

The Advertiser, Elizabeth Henson, 2016 12 17

Canberra - Secret and intimate details of Adelaide's terror suspect have emerged, with a former neighbour saying she considered his "ramblings" so "alarming" that she wanted him on a national security watch list. The woman was talking about her personal dealings with the 50-year-old man charged on Thursday with advocating terrorism by filming demonstrations on how to kill Jews. Police will allege the man posted a number of videos on social media – some with him using a chainsaw and a knife – urging those in international conflict zones to commit terrorist acts. The neighbour said that once about six years ago, she noticed the accused loitering in front of her house and then found a two-page typed letter, signed: "Yours faithfully, (his name) – International Private Investigator", in her letterbox. She was so worried about the contents – which contained references to Mossad, the Iraqi war, ex-US president George Bush and September 11 – she sent the letter to Croyden MP Michael Atkinson. "I just said I think he should be put on some national security watch list," she said. But she said she didn't hear back from his office. In a detailed manifesto written by the accused, he described growing up in a Palestinian family in Israel to moving to Australia and calling himself an "exiled" Arab Israeli.

44. Blunder hits security of NZ spy base

The New Zealand Herald, David Fisher, 2016 12 17

Wellington - Details of the construction of the top secret spy base at Tangimoana were filed with Archives New Zealand with no security rating, allowing the contents of the file to be copied. The Archives NZ file which contains the details has now had access restricted for 100 years after the Weekend Herald told the Government Communications Security Bureau it had a copy. The construction file included details about the security system protecting the spy base. The Weekend Herald came across the file and other GCSB information while reviewing files about the security services held by Archives NZ, the national repository for public records. Built in the early 1980s, Tangimoana, 30km west of Palmerston North, was a signals link for Western powers during the Cold War. While the building report and details are 35 years old, the emergence of GCSB secrets in a publicly accessible archive goes against every security instruction under which the GCSB operates. There are few records available about the bureau in Archives NZ and almost all are restricted for at least 70 years. Air Marshal Sir Bruce Ferguson - former Chief of Defence Force and GCSB director - said the bureau's security procedures meant it had to consider the possibility an adversary could jigsaw information together and expose secrets. A GCSB spokeswoman said there was concern the documents could be matched with other information. A GCSB spokeswoman said: "We have requested that Archives New Zealand restrict access to the documents. This means the GCSB will consider whether or not to release on a case-by-case basis. "

45. 5 women workers of Kandahar airport gunned down

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 12 17

Kandahar City - Five women and their driver were killed in an armed attack in the capital of southern Kandahar province on Saturday, officials said. Officials said the women worked in the security section of the airport's civil terminal. The mini-bus they traveling in to their office came under attack at around 7am. Samim Khpalwak, the governor's spokesman, told Pajhwok Afghan News the incident took place in Khwaja Manda locality of the 4th police district. He called the attack a terrorist act, saying it was unclear who was involved. Police spokesman Zia Durrani said investigations into the incident had been launched but no one had been arrested yet. Initial investigations show two persons involved in the attack managed to flee. Meanwhile, a doctor at Mirwais Hospital confirmed receiving the bodies of five women and a man from the shooting site. He said the victims were hit in their heads and other body parts.

46. The Boy. The Ambassador. The Deadly Encounter on the Road.

The New York Times, Helene Cooper, 2016 12 17

Mokong, Cameroon - All life travels the ribbon of asphalt that cuts through this remote village. The women carrying their onions to market atop their heads step aside when a car approaches. The occasional stray cow ambles down the center, chased by local herders. The men with logs balance jerkily, while an entire family wobbles precariously by on one bicycle. And children -- so many children -- dart across the pavement, keeping an eye on the cattle while kicking soccer balls back and forth. So the villagers gathered to watch when an armored convoy of American officials, led by Samantha Power, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, came bulleting down the road that links cities in Cameroon's Far North. They pointed at the gleaming white sport utility vehicles and marveled at the truck carrying Cameroonian "B.I.R." special forces -- fierce men with AK-47s, flak jackets and helmets. They peered at the American Navy SEALs guarding the 14-car motorcade, automatic weapons in their arms and bandannas covering their faces. Six-year-old Toussaint Birwe was one of the curious. Sturdy and serious with deep-set eyes, he was always scrambling across the road, between his grandparents' house and the market where he would sweet-talk his idol, 18-year-old Aboubakar Oumarou, into buying him candy. Abou was at school, so Toussaint was alone as he skipped alongside the road. As the first three vehicles passed that day in April, traveling about 45 miles an hour through the village at 10:46 a.m., a roar sounded above. Toussaint's eyes shifted upward to the helicopter that suddenly appeared. Two more S.U.V.s whizzed by, then Toussaint ran onto the asphalt, pointing at the sky. He didn't see the sixth S.U.V. bearing down on him.

47. China says it's 'appropriately handling' U.S. Navy drone issue

The Associated Pres, Christopher Bodeen, 2016 12 17

Beijing - China said Saturday that its military seized a U.S. Navy unmanned underwater glider in the South China Sea to ensure the "safe navigation of passing ships," in one of the most serious incidents between the two militaries in years. The Chinese navy on Thursday seized the drone, which the Pentagon said was being operated by civilian contractors to conduct oceanic research. The U.S. said it issued a formal diplomatic complaint over the seizure and demanded the drone's return. Chinese Defence Ministry spokesman Yang Yujun issued a statement late Saturday saying that a Chinese navy lifeboat discovered an unknown device in the South China Sea on Thursday. "In order to prevent this device from posing a danger to the safe navigation of passing ships and personnel, the Chinese lifeboat adopted a professional and responsible attitude in investigating and verifying the device," Yang said. The statement said that after verifying that the device was an American unmanned submerged device, "China decided to transfer it to the U.S. through appropriate means." The statement also accused the U.S. of long deploying ships "in China's presence" to conduct "military surveying." "China is resolutely opposed to this and requests the U.S. stop such activities," it said. "China will continue to maintain vigilance against the relevant U.S. activities and will take necessary measures to deal with them." Earlier Saturday, China's foreign ministry said the country's military was in contact with its American counterparts on "appropriately handling" the incident, though it offered no details on what discussions were underway. The drone was seized while collecting unclassified scientific data about 92 kilometres (57 miles) northwest of Subic Bay near the Philippines in the South China Sea, which China claims virtually in its entirety, Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman, said Friday.

48. China's veto over Syrian truce resolution aims to restore faith in humanitarianism

People's Daily Online, 2016 12 17

Beijing - China and Russia recently vetoed a UN Security Council draft resolution that calls for a seven-day humanitarian truce in Syria's Aleppo. Some media accused China of "being anti-humanitarian" and someone even pointed an accusing finger at China. The draft resolution tackles a temporary ceasefire in Aleppo in order to clear ways for humanitarian aid. It seems like a reasonable choice to demand ceasefire at first sight, but such "humanitarian aid" loses all its meaning when putting in the context of current Syrian situation. After the turmoil broke out Aleppo, which the second largest city in Syria, the rebels occupied the city and created a large number of refugees. In the past, not a single Western country raised humanitarian draft decisions. They only started calling for humanitarian aid after the government forces fought back in Aleppo. After Russia intervened in the Syrian crisis in September last year, the Western world used widening humanitarian access as excuses to seek compromises from Russia and Syria. Rightly after Syrian military announced that they have taken most parts of the urban areas and the battle would be soon ended, the Western countries jumped out to preach the urgency of the "humanitarian issue." The time they chose is pretty "interesting."

49. Spy agency produced documents detailing alleged surveillance of justices: sources

Yonhap English News, 2016 12 17

Seoul - A media executive's bombshell allegation about the state surveillance of senior judicial officials was based on documents written by South Korea's top spy agency, government sources said Friday. Cho Han-gyu, former president of the local daily Segye Ilbo, claimed during a parliamentary panel on Thursday that the Park Geun-hye administration carried out illegal surveillance of senior judicial officials including Supreme Court chief justice Yang Seung-tae. On Friday, the presidential office denied the allegations as groundless. The sources, however, said the documents revealed by Cho carried watermarks used at only a limited number of state organizations, including the National Intelligence Service. The testimony came during the parliamentary hearing on corruption involving President Park Geun-hye and her confidante Choi Soon-sil.

50. Japan, Russia Fail to Resolve Dispute Over Ownership of Four Islands

The Wall Street Journal, Mitsuru Obe, 2016 12 17

Toyko - Japan and Russia concluded a two-day summit on a territorial dispute by announcing bilateral economic deals worth 300 billion yen ($2.5 billion), but the countries failed to achieve the breakthrough Tokyo had sought. The deals, in sectors such as energy, health care and transport, are part of a push by Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe to soften Moscow's continued resistance to Tokyo's claims on four islands to Japan's north that are administered by Russia. The plans fall far short of recent pledges made by Mr. Abe for a deal on ownership of the islands, which were seized from Japan by the Soviet Union at the end of World War II and are now considered by Russia to be an integral part of its territory.

51. Putin's visit to Japan results in $1 billion investment fund

The Washington Post, Anna Fifield, 2016 12 17

Tokyo - Japan and Russia will create a $1 billion fund to invest in joint energy and infrastructure projects over the next five years, the leaders of the two countries said Friday in Tokyo. The announcement came at the end of meetings that looked cozy but fell well short of Japanese expectations. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe had been hoping for progress on a territorial dispute that prevented the two countries from signing a peace treaty at the end of World War II, but instead he had to settle for giving money to Russia for economic projects. "It would be naive to think we can solve this problem in an hour, but there is no doubt that we need to look for a solution," Russian President Vladimir Putin said during a news conference with Abe at the end of two relatively short meetings Thursday night and Friday. The Japanese prime minister said both sides needed to be flexible. "We need to work toward a breakthrough so that we don't disappoint the next generation," said Abe, who addressed his counterpart by his first name, a surprisingly informal gesture in Japan. It was the two leaders' 16th meeting since both returned to office in 2012, and there was a clear camaraderie between them.

52. Japan, S. Korea swap intelligence on N. Korea threats for 1st time

Kyodo News, 2016 12 17

Seoul - Japan and South Korea on Friday exchanged information on North Korea's nuclear and missile programs for the first time since they inked a military intelligence-sharing pact last month, the latter's Defense Ministry announced. A ministry spokesman said the direct exchange of classified information, made on the basis of the General Security of Military Information Agreement signed on Nov. 23, took place at a meeting in Seoul of the two countries' defense officials. During the Defense Trilateral Talks held in Seoul later in the day, South Korean, Japanese and U.S. officials agreed to strengthen cooperation and steadily implement sanctions based on U.N. resolutions adopted after Pyongyang's fifth nuclear test in September. Yonhap News Agency reported that they also agreed to continue with their missile warning exercises held in June and November to improve their combined capabilities to detect and trace North Korean missiles, of which more than 20 have been launched this year alone. The meeting was attended by Yoo Jeh-seung, South Korea's deputy defense minister for policy, Satoshi Maeda, director general for defense policy at Japan's Defense Ministry, and Kelly Magsamen, assistant secretary of state of defense for Asian and Pacific security affairs at the Pentagon.

53. Meeting Between Japan and Russia Ends With Stalemate on Disputed Islands

The New York Times, Motoko Rich, 2016 12 17

Tokyo - Japanese news media gave breathless coverage to President Vladimir V. Putin's two-day visit to Japan this week, training television cameras throughout Thursday afternoon on the airport in Yamaguchi prefecture where the Russian leader arrived more than two hours late. Schoolchildren in Nagato, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's hometown, ate borscht and piroshki in honor of Mr. Putin's trip to hot spring baths there. In Tokyo on Friday, Kodokan, the premiere judo school, received Mr. Putin, a black belt, for a demonstration and a meeting with Olympic medalists. But in the end, the talks between the officials yielded little, other than expanding on some business deals that had already been announced and a commitment to continue discussions about economic cooperation on four islands that both countries claim are rightfully theirs. The dispute over those islands — which Russia calls the southern Kurile Islands and Japan calls the Northern Territories — has prevented Japan and Russia from signing a peace treaty ending World War II. "We should not be bound by past negotiations," Mr. Abe said at a joint news conference in Tokyo on Friday at which he repeatedly referred to Mr. Putin by his first name, striking an unusual note in formal Japan. He added: "It is necessary to draw a new blueprint for the four northern islands in which Japanese and Russian people can live together and build a win-win relationship." Mr. Putin talked mostly of broader economic initiatives between the countries, including an investment fund for projects in Russia of 100 billion yen, about $845 million, set up by the Russian Direct Investment Fund and the Japan Bank for International Cooperation, which is controlled by the Japanese government.

54. 'He is the leader in every sense of the word'

The Washington Post, Anna Fifield, 2016 12 17

[Seoul - Kim Jong Un stood on the stage in front of stylized portraits of his father and grandfather, men he wasn't supposed to be strong enough or cunning enough to succeed, lauding the "thrilling explosion" of the most recent nuclear test and the "leap forward in all sectors of the national economy." His Western-style suit, his haircut, his glasses, even his gravelly voice were all reminiscent of his grandfather, Kim Il Sung, the founder and "eternal president" of North Korea, who, to this day, is associated with strength and prosperity. In front of him in the huge hall were 3,467 delegates, called in May to the first congress of the ruling Workers' Party since 1980, before Kim Jong Un was even born. Among them were hard-nosed party stalwarts, the sort who had been expected by some analysts to turn against the inexperienced upstart when he first rose to the top. But there they were: men in military uniforms covered to the waist in medals, cheering party officials, scientists, the editor of the party newspaper, anti-Japanese revolutionary war veterans, field laborers. It was Kim's moment. It was his way of saying, "I'm in charge here." And these were the people who were keeping him in power: the North Korean loyalists who, like Kim, have a vested interest in keeping the world's most repressive regime intact. Their support is enabling Kim to celebrate his fifth anniversary as the leader of North Korea on Saturday, propelling the communist monarchy into its 71st year. The Kim family has ruled the country through fear and favors since the end of World War II, when Kim Il Sung was chosen by Joseph Stalin to run it as a Soviet client state. His son, Kim Jong Il, continued the family rule for 17 years, until his death five years ago Saturday at age 69. The founder's grandson, Kim Jong Un, was then anointed as the Great Successor in a country where the Kim family is deified and its supporters live large, while the remaining 20-odd million North Koreans struggle to feed their families and heat their shabby homes.

55. N. Korea holds service on 5th anniversary of ex-leader's death

Kyodo News, 2016 12 17

Pyongyang - North Korea held a memorial service on Saturday on the fifth anniversary of the death of its second leader Kim Jong Il, with a senior official calling for the same level of allegiance to be shown to the current regime under his son. North Korea's incumbent leader Kim Jong Un and thousands of officials attended the service outside the Kumsusan Palace of the Sun in Pyongyang, where the embalmed bodies of the state's two previous leaders -- his grandfather and father -- lie in state. Choe Ryong Hae, a vice chairman of the ruling Workers' Party of Korea, delivered an address in which he praised Kim Jong Il's contributions to the country, such as turning it into a "nuclear power," and urged that all continue to be loyal to the third leader and the ruling party. Kim Jong Un, whose father died of a heart attack on Dec. 17, 2011 at age 69, made no remarks during the service. North Korea's main official newspaper Rodong Sinmun ran an editorial covering its entire front page, in which it hailed the second leader's "revolutionary exploits" before and during his 17-year-rule. The editorial also lauded Kim Jong Un's leadership, which it said led North Korea to "solidify the status of a powerful nuclear state" by repelling "unprecedented sanctions and pressures" from the international community.

56. 'I Cannot Lie,' Rodrigo Duterte Says, Confirming He Did Kill People as Mayor

The New York Times, Russell Goldman, 2016 12 17

Manila - President Rodrigo Duterte of the Philippines confirmed on Friday that he had personally pulled the trigger and killed three people as mayor of Davao City, doubling down on boastful comments he made this week, which loyalists had tried to deny. "I killed about three of them because there were three of them," Mr. Duterte told reporters at a news conference in Manila, the capital. "I don't really know how many bullets from my gun went inside their bodies." "It happened. I cannot lie about it," he said in English. The remarks followed comments he made on Monday, when he told business leaders that as mayor, he had patrolled the streets on a motorcycle and killed criminal suspects in order to set an example to his police officers. "And I'd go around in Davao with a motorcycle, with a big bike around, and I would just patrol the streets, looking for trouble, also," he said on Monday. "I was really looking for a confrontation, so I could kill." Philippine officials loyal to the president have tried to soften his earlier remarks, saying Mr. Duterte has a tendency to exaggerate. "The president always resorts to hyperbole — he always exaggerates just to put his message across," Vitaliano Aguirre II, the justice minister, said on Wednesday.

57. Manila receives offer to help hunt down wanted Singaporean terrorist

The Straits Times, 2016 12 17

Manila - Singapore has offered to help in hunting down a Singaporean who is considered one of the most wanted terrorists in the region. Philippine Foreign Minister Perfecto Yasay told Manila-based reporters in Singapore yesterday that Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong was given the terrorist's name, but he declined to disclose the name and further details. Security officials had previously tagged just one Singaporean, Abdullah Ali, also known as Muawiyah, as among the senior leaders of the Jakarta-based Jemaah Islamiah. The group has been training Islamist militants in the war-torn southern island group of Mindanao in the Philippines. Muawiyah was said to have fled to the Philippines with Malaysian terrorist Zulkifli bin Hir, alias Marwan, who was killed in a police raid in January last year.

58. Myanmar 'Callous' Toward Anti-Rohingya Violence, U.N. Says

The New York Times, Nick Cumming-Bruce, 2016 12 17

Geneva - The top human rights official for the United Nations condemned the Myanmar government's handling of violence in Muslim areas bordering Bangladesh on Friday, saying it risked creating a breeding ground for violent extremism. Zeid Ra'ad al-Hussein, the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, described the government's approach to the crisis as "shortsighted, counterproductive and even callous." He warned that the fallout from the surge in violence was spilling into the region. His comments provided the sharpest response yet from the United Nations to reports of brutal reprisals by the army against the Rohingya, a Muslim community in Myanmar's Rakhine State, after insurgents attacked border posts in early October, killing nine police officers. Moreover, it reflects deepening frustration and impatience at the way Myanmar's de facto leader, the democracy activist Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, has brushed off the mounting evidence of military atrocities and allowed international agencies insufficient access to the area either to assess what has occurred or to provide humanitarian aid to the affected population. The United Nations refugee agency estimates that 30,000 Rohingya Muslims have been forced from their homes as troops, on occasion backed by helicopter gunships, have swept through parts of Rakhine, reportedly burning and looting villages, summarily shooting local residents and raping women.

59. Indonesian terror cells switch tactics with women recruits

The Straits Times, Francis Chan, 2016 12 17

Central Java - Indonesian militant cells are now recruiting women to mount terror attacks, said national police chief Tito Karnavian. The top cop's warning came after anti-terror police commandos arrested a fourth woman this week on suspicion of terrorism. Investigations are under way to determine if she is linked to a new terrorist cell behind a plot to bomb the presidential palace in Jakarta last Sunday. "Yes, it is a new mode of operation," said General Tito, when asked about the threat that has emerged in recent days. He said that militants make use of women to carry out attacks because, unlike men, they appear less suspicious. "Indeed, there was a plot to use a 'rice-cooker' bomb (for an attack), and the bomb was to be detonated by a woman." His comments followed reports that a 34-year-old Indonesian woman was nabbed by the Detachment 88 (Densus 88) counter-terrorism unit on Thursday in Purworejo, Central Java. Purworejo police chief Satrio Wibowo told the Antara state news agency that Ika Puspitasari was arrested at a mosque near her home. "The suspected terrorist and evidence have been sent to Jakarta for further investigations," he said, adding that Densus 88 officers had also seized a passport, mobile phone and books from her home. According to local news reports, Ika had returned to Purworejo about two months ago.

60. India, Tajikistan to step up anti-terror, defence cooperation

Press Trust of India, 2016 12 17

New Delhi - Stating that they live in an extended neighbourhood that continues to face multiple security challenges, India and Tajikistan today decided to strengthen defence cooperation and inked a pact to share financial intelligence to counter money laundering and financing of terrorism. The pact was among three signed by the two countries after comprehensive talks between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Tajik President Emomali Rahmon on strategic issues including threats posed by radicalisation and extremism, trade and investments. "We assessed the broad progress achieved under different pillars of our bilateral engagement, including our partnership in defence and security. "India and Tajikistan live in an extended neighbourhood that continues to face multiple security challenges and threats. The threat from terrorism endangers not just our two countries. It casts a long shadow of violence and instability over the entire region," Modi said at a joint press meet with Rahmon. Combating terrorism has, therefore, been an important area of cooperative engagement between the two countries, the PM said. "We appreciate Tajikistan's role in the Central Asian region as a mainstay against forces of extremism, radicalism, and terrorism. President Rahmon and I agreed today to strengthen action on this front based on mutually agreed priorities," he said.

61. Iran Calls for P5+1 Meeting over US Sanctions Extension

Fars News Agency, 2016 12 17

Tehran - Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif, in a letter to EU Foreign Policy chief Federica Mogherini on Saturday, called for a joint commission on Iran nuclear deal, known as the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), to convene to address the US breach of the deal. Zarif said the Islamic Republic remained committed to all its obligations under the nuclear agreement, known as the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), which was signed between Iran and the 5+1 Group of powers last year. He stressed that all sides needed to fulfill their commitments stipulated in the deal as the JCPOA was a multilateral agreement. He noted that the United States kept renegeing on its obligations under the nuclear agreement and called on the EU foreign policy chief to make the necessary preparations for the JCPOA joint commission meeting. The US Senate voted to extend the Iran Sanctions Act (ISA) for another 10 years on December 1. The sanctions law, which would authorize the US president to re-impose sanctions on Iran, was first adopted in 1996 to punish investments in the Islamic Republic over its nuclear program and its support for anti-Israeli resistance groups. US President Barack Obama on Wednesday declined to sign the bill renewing the existing sanctions against Iran, but allowed the legislation to become law. Iranian President Hassan Rouhani on Tuesday ordered the country's nuclear agency to start plans to produce nuclear fuel and propulsion systems for ships and submarines in response to the violation of the Vienna deal by Washington.

62. The Mullahs' Syrian Airlift Gets a Boost

The Wall Street Journal, Sohrab Ahmari, 2016 12 17

Tehran - Iran's flagship carrier, Iran Air, agreed this month to purchase 80 passenger jets from Boeing Co. The $16.6 billion sale exemplifies the ethical and strategic hazards of President Obama's signature foreign-policy legacy -- the Iranian nuclear deal. News of the sale came as the Syrian regime closed in on the last rebel positions in Aleppo. The United Nations reports that Bashar Assad's forces are executing civilians in their homes and on the streets. At the Security Council on Tuesday, Samantha Power, America's U.N. ambassador, raged at Syria and its Russian and Iranian patrons. "Are you truly incapable of shame?" she asked. She went on to compare the killing fields of Aleppo with ethnic cleansing in Rwanda and Srebrenica. Moving stuff. But since Ayatollah Khamenei and Vladimir Putin don't bend to stirring American oratory, the speech only served to highlight the Obama administration's capacity for self-serving moralism. Ms. Power, for one, apparently can't see how she now resembles the diplomats she pilloried in her book "A Problem From Hell: America and the Age of Genocide." She is still playing the idealist in the age of the disappearing red line. The White House response to the Syrian crisis has been worse than inaction. With the nuclear deal -- the altar on which Mr. Obama sacrificed Syria and America's traditional Middle East alliances -- Washington is actively lending power and prestige to the butchers of Aleppo. Take the Boeing sale. Under Mr. Obama's nuclear deal, the U.S. authorized the "transfer to Iran of commercial passenger aircraft for exclusively civil aviation end-use." Some Iranian airlines, such as Mahan Air, remain sanctioned by the U.S. Treasury even after the deal. But Iran Air was de-sanctioned, notwithstanding Treasury's determination in 2011 that it provides "material support and services" to the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps, or IRGC.

63. Material used in bomb attack in Kayseri is similar to Istanbul attacks: Deputy PM
Hurriyet Daily News, 2016 12 17

Ankara - The materials used in a car bomb attack on a bus carrying off-duty military personnel in the central Turkish city of Kayseri on Dec.17 were similar to those used in a twin bombing last week in Istanbul, Deputy Prime Minister Numan Kurtulmuş said. Kurtulmus made the comment in an interview with broadcaster NTV. All signs so far indicate that the outlawed Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK) was behind a deadly bombing on a bus carrying Turkish soldiers that left at least 13 dead and dozens wounded, Kurtulmuş said.

64. Assad's Lesson From Aleppo: Force Works, With Few Consequences
The New York Times, Ben Hubbard, 2016 12 17

Beirut - For months, the bodies have been piling up in eastern Aleppo as the buildings have come down, pulverized by Syrian and Russian jets, burying residents who could not flee in avalanches of bricks and mortar. And now it is almost over, not because diplomats reached a deal in Geneva, but because President Bashar al-Assad of Syria and his foreign allies have won the city. Cold, hungry and scarred by the deaths of loved ones, tens of thousands of civilians and fighters are awaiting buses to take them from their homes to uncertain futures. It is not the first victory that Mr. Assad has secured with overwhelming force in the Syrian conflict. But his subjugation of eastern Aleppo has echoed across the Middle East and beyond, rattling alliances, proving the effectiveness of violence and highlighting the reluctance of many countries, perhaps most notably the United States, to get involved. President Obama, on Friday at his final news conference of the year, acknowledged that the nearly six-year-old war in Syria had been among the hardest issues he has faced, and that the world was “united in horror” at the butchery in Aleppo. But Mr. Obama — who came into office committed to reducing America’s military entanglements in the Middle East — also defended his decision not to intervene more forcefully. To do otherwise, he said, would have required the United States to be “all in and willing to take over Syria.”

65. Aleppo Evacuation Halted Amid Confusion and Concerns About Killings
The New York Times, Anne Barnard & Ben Hubbard, 2016 12 17

Beirut - The evacuation of residents from the last rebel-held section in the devastated Syrian city of Aleppo broke down on Friday with thousands of people still trapped inside, as concern escalated about their fate. The breakdown — a day after Syrian government buses and ambulances had begun taking people out of the besieged area — came as Russia claimed, incorrectly, that all civilians wishing to leave had already been evacuated and that only “irreconcilable” fighters remained, further raising fears among those still trapped. Tensions came to a head on Friday afternoon, when a convoy of hundreds of evacuees was detained and turned back by pro-government militiamen. They blocked the way, according to rebel and pro-government fighters, because insurgents in Idlib Province, farther north, were blocking an evacuation of civilians from two villages besieged by rebels. There were also multiple accounts that the pro-government militiamen shot dead several passengers in the convoy, detained at least six and took telephones, laptops and documents from others, before sending the rest back into the rebel enclave. Those accounts could not immediately be independently confirmed. The government’s recapture of Aleppo, once Syria’s commercial epicenter, after a prolonged siege by Syrian forces aided by their Russian allies has been exalted by President Bashar al-Assad of Syria as a turning point in the nearly six-year-old war. But the images of death, suffering and destruction have shocked the world.

66. Many accusations, but few arrests, in Israel fires
The Washington Post, William Booth & Ruth Eglash, 2016 12 17

Haifa, Israel - The wildfires that swept across Israel and the West Bank last month were the worst in a decade, a torch lit in a tinderbox. The scary conflagrations caused millions of dollars in damage, destroyed hundreds of homes and sent tens of thousands of people fleeing in panic through the black smoke. As fierce winds ripped across the rainless land, Israeli leaders took to social media and stood before television cameras to condemn what they called a new campaign of "pyro-terrorism." Palestinian terrorists, they said, were burning out the Jews. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his cabinet members charged that Israeli Arabs and Palestinians were setting the fires - and then dancing in celebration. But in the weeks since then, only a handful of Palestinians have been arrested. Arab Israeli leaders say Netanyahu and others are guilty of incitement: Instead of bringing the nation together, they sought scapegoats. On Twitter, hashtags such as "Israel is burning" and "Tel Aviv is burning" appeared. From Kuwait's Grand Mosque, Sheikh Mishary al-Afasy Rashid posted, "All the best to the fire." Israel's domestic security service, Shin Bet, and the police asserted that half the 40 major fires, and hundreds of smaller burns, were started intentionally.

67. Russia says Aleppo evacuation is over, but others say more want to leave

The Washington Post, Hugh Naylor and Andrew Roth , 2016 12 17

Beirut - The dramatic evacuation of Syrian civilians and rebels from besieged eastern Aleppo was thrown into chaos Friday as Russia signaled that the convoys were ending even as thousands of people waited to be ferried to safer ground. Opposition fighters remaining in the embattled city, meanwhile, remanned positions in preparation for a possible renewal of battles amid reports that Syrian-allied militiamen seized and possibly killed some civilians trying to flee before the window to escape closed. The situation was further clouded when Turkey, which brokered the evacuation effort with Russia, insisted that the convoys from Aleppo have not ended despite Moscow's announcement. "There are a lot of people who want to leave," Turkish Foreign Minister Mevlut Cavusoglu told reporters in Ankara. In Washington, President Obama, citing international organizations, said "tens of thousands" of civilians are "still trapped" in Aleppo, despite Russian and Syrian claims to the contrary. At a White House news conference, he warned that the regime of President Bashar al-Assad "cannot slaughter its way to legitimacy."

68. France-Confusion autour d'une opération anti-ETA

Reuters, 2016 12 17

Bordeaux - Cinq personnes ont été arrêtées et des armes et explosifs saisis vendredi soir près de Bayonne (Pyrénées-Atlantiques), dans une opération conjointe de la police française et de la Garde civile espagnole, sur laquelle plane une grande confusion. Contrairement à ce qui avait été dit dans un premier temps de source proche de l'enquête, l'ancien président de la Ligue des Droits de l'Homme, Michel Tubiana ne fait pas partie des personnes interpellées. Le ministre de l'Intérieur, Bruno Le Roux, parle dans un communiqué de "cinq individus en relation avec l'organisation terroriste ETA" et d'un "nouveau coup dur" porté à celle-ci. Ces cinq personnes, en garde à vue à la prison de Bayonne où elles sont interrogées par des agents de la sous-direction anti-terroriste de la police (SDAT) et de la direction de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI), appartiennent à la société civile, précise-t-on de source judiciaire. Il s'agit notamment du dirigeant du mouvement écologiste basque Bizi, Jean-Noël Etcheverry, et de celui de la chambre d'agriculture du Pays Basque, une structure militante locale, Michel Berhocoirigoin. 70. Many soldiers killed in an attack in Kayseri

Radio France International, 2016 12 17

Istanbul - At least 13 soldiers were killed and 48 people injured in a car bomb explosion Saturday morning in Kayseri, central Turkey. With our correspondent in Istanbul , Alexander Billet A car bomb exploded outside the campus of a university in Kayseri, a major industrial city of Anatolia. 71. Germany arrests Turk for spying on Kurds

The Local.de, 2016 12 17

Berlin - A Turkish national suspected of spying on Ankara's behalf on the large Kurdish community in Germany has been arrested in the city of Hamburg, the German federal prosecutor's office said Friday. The 31-year-old is suspected of having gathered, "on behalf of the Turkish secret service, information on the places of residence, personal data and political activity of Kurds living in Germany, as well as on Kurdish organisations", it said. The suspect appeared before a judge and remanded in custody Friday, a day after he was detained, it added. The Turkish authorities' 30-year conflict with Kurdish rebels has escalated since a fragile ceasefire collapsed last year. On Sunday, 44 people were killed in an attack in Istanbul that was claimed by Kurdish militants. Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has accused Germany of being one of the world's worst countries for harbouring "terrorists", saying Berlin had not responded to requests to hand over suspects from the failed July coup.

72. Taliban leader tries (and fails) to get asylum in Germany

The Local.de, 2016 12 17

Frankfurt - A few weeks ago an Afghan man flew into Frankfurt Airport with his family and applied for asylum. An investigation revealed he was in fact a senior member of the Taliban, Spiegel reports. The man flew to Germany from Riyadh, the capital of Saudi Arabia and tried to pass through customs on a fake passport. But when federal police realized he wasn't who he said he was, the man applied for asylum for himself and his family. When the Federal Office for Migration and Refugees (BAMF) checked his identity they realized he was none other than Abdul Rauf Mohammed, health minister when the fundamentalist Taliban ruled Afghanistan in the 1990s. This isn't the first time that Mohammed, who reportedly met Osama bin Laden on several occasions, has arrived in Europe seeking asylum. In the year 2000 he travelled to Norway with his family where he obtained asylum after claiming he had come into conflict with other members of the Taliban leadership. At the time he also said he was critical of the regime in Kabul. But in 2014 he was kicked out of the Scandinavian country on suspicion of trying to radicalize Muslim youth there. In Germany he faced a similar fate. After forbidding him from leaving Frankfurt Airport, BAMF rejected his application and sent him back to Saudi Arabia. From there he reportedly travelled on to Afghanistan.

73. Germany Investigates if Boy, 12, Planted Bomb at Christmas Market

The New York Times, Melissa Eddy, 2016 12 17

Berlin - The authorities are investigating whether a 12-year-old boy made a bomb and planted it at a traditional Christmas market in his hometown in southwestern Germany. News of the bomb plot was reported on Friday by Focus, a newsmagazine, and quickly dominated airwaves and social media, raising fresh concerns over the potential threats from young people lured by Islamist extremists and radicalized using technology like cellphones. Just this year, three attacks in Germany have been carried out by young people who had claimed to be motivated by the Islamic State; two of the attackers died, and they injured several people but did not kill any. The boy, identified only as an Iraqi-German of Ludwigshafen, has been placed under the protection of local youth services, officials said on Friday. German law does not allow minors under the age of 14 to be charged with crimes, which would leave investigators to widen their focus on the boy's friends, family and acquaintances, while seeking to protect the boy. A spokesman for German federal prosecutors declined on Friday to provide any details about the case, other than to confirm discovery of the device. "We are investigating a nail bomb that was found in Ludwigshafen," said the spokesman, Stefan Biehl. Eva Lohse, the mayor of Ludwigshafen, a small city in the state of Rhineland-Palatinate, said that city representatives met on Friday with state security officials to discuss the case. "The 12-year-old who is accused of plotting a bomb attack in Ludwigshafen is in a secure place, so that he does not pose any danger," the mayor said, declining to comment further.

74. Suicide bomber in Istanbul attack identified

Hurriyet News, 2016 12 17

Istanbul - Police identified on Dec. 16 one of the perpetrators of the bomb attack in Istanbul which killed 44 people and injured dozens of others, state-run Anadolu Agency has reported. Istanbul police said the suicide bomber was Burak Yavuz, a 20-year-old man from Turkey's southeastern province of Şanlıurfa. On Dec. 10 at around 10.30 p.m., a car bomb went off outside a football stadium in Istanbul's Beşiktaş district, two hours after the end of a Turkish League football match. Seconds later, a suicide bomb attack occurred in Maçka Park in the same neighborhood.

75. Services secrets français : sous Sarkozy, les grandes manoeuvres

Le Point.fr, Jean Guisnel et Olivia Recasens, 2016 12 17

Paris - La réforme du renseignement intérieur voulue par le président n'a pas été guidée par une vision stratégique, mais par un esprit de vengeance. Devenu président en 2007, Nicolas Sarkozy n'a pas manqué d'agir rapidement en matière de renseignement extérieur. Il faut dire qu'il a trouvé en arrivant un plan mis au point de longue date pour réformer ce secteur. Celui d'une équipe d'experts, réunis en 1995 au Secrétariat général de la défense nationale (SGDN) par le préfet et ancien directeur de la DST, Rémy Pautrat. Autour de lui, Jean-Louis Gergorin (Groupe Lagardère), Philippe Marland (préfet), Bernard Norlain (général), Michel Foucher (géographe), Bernard Esambert (ingénieur des Mines), Xavier de Lussy (contre-amiral). Quatre lacunes sévères du renseignement français ont été identifiées : une « excessive auto-orientation des services », une « coordination limitée aux temps de crise et incapable d'anticipation », une « insuffisante prise en compte du renseignement ouvert », et la « faiblesse relative des moyens techniques de recueil », qui conduit à une « activité trop réduite d'intrusion dans les systèmes de traitement de l'information ». C'est l'ossature de la réforme du renseignement que le candidat Édouard Balladur souhaite mettre en place après son entrée à l'Élysée. Mais le vainqueur, Jacques Chirac, n'en voudra pas. En 2007, Nicolas Sarkozy ressort donc le plan d'action des cartons et crée, en 2008, un Conseil national du renseignement (CNR), confié à un « coordonnateur ». Ce sera le diplomate Bernard Bajolet, clé de voûte d'une organisation nouvelle inspirée par un objectif exclusif : éviter des attentats sur le sol français. Alors que le quinquennat Sarkozy est marqué par une baisse considérable des effectifs militaires, les services de renseignement extérieur (DGSE et DRM) voient croître leurs moyens humains et matériels. En juin 2008, Sarkozy annonce que les services français vont s'engager dans la « lutte informatique offensive ». Si cette ambition a été confirmée par son successeur, l'une des idées maîtresses qui la sous-tendaient, le rapprochement des appareils de défense extérieure et de sécurité intérieure, connaît encore aujourd'hui de grosses difficultés de mise au point. Les ex-RG qui n'ont pas eu la chance d'intégrer la DCRI sont excommuniés de la communauté française du Renseignement, rejetés sur les terres de la sécurité publique dans une improbable « Sous-direction de l'information générale ». Laquelle se retrouve avec un tiers seulement des effectifs, des équipes qui ont éclaté, des hommes qui se sentent « déclassés », des fichiers détruits et des erreurs de casting dans certaines nominations. Installée à Levallois, la DCRI est devenue une forteresse, même vis-à-vis de ses antennes locales. C'est ainsi que les huiles de la Direction centrale envisageront de recruter Mohammed Merah contre l'avis de leurs agents à Toulouse, qui le jugent beaucoup trop instable. Les faits leur donneront malheureusement raison.

Canada's national security oversight is among the weakest in the world: former human rights advocate

An opinion piece by Steven Zhou, Toronto writer and human rights advocate, states, "There doesn't seem to be much that Canada's intelligence and spy agencies can't do these days-and that includes breaking the law. While much of world remains anxious about the future of a Donald Trump presidency, Canadians should refocus their attention back home, and they should start with the country's bloated national security state. Experience shows that most of a country's establishment systems have likely transcended partisan lines and will remain immune to changes in political personality. National security seems to be one of these categories and its pervasive entrenchment within post-9/11 democracies has been demonstrated both in and outside of American borders. The Canadian security apparatus is a good example of how partisan changes usually have minimal impact on the larger system. There is no Canadian Edward Snowden to shed light on the extensive surveillance and policing machinations of CSIS or the Communication Security Establishment (CSE)... A federal court made national news last week by rebuking CSIS for essentially hiding a giant database full of private information belonging to law-abiding Canadians who pose no threat to public safety. Its watchdog group, the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), had previously asked CSIS to disclose the existence and full capabilities of this database to the courts, but the spy agency refused and kept things secret for a whole decade. The revelation has been an embarrassment for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, who's been conducting a national consultation on how to reform Canada's security regimes. When asked why CSIS kept the database a secret from the courts, agency director Michel Coulombe simply said that he had no good explanation... There's precisely one person, the CSE Commissioner Jean-Pierre Plouffe, who's supposed to overlook the entire slew of intelligence-related activities that are carried out by the agency on a regular basis... Minister Goodale has promised swift action, but until those words actually manifest themselves into serious institutional change, then Canada will still remain the country with perhaps the weakest national security oversight in the Western world." Why it's hard to draw a line between Edward Snowden and the Paris attacks

In a pair of public appearances this week, CIA Director John O. Brennan made clear that he blames leaks by former intelligence contractor Edward Snowden for enabling terrorists to evade detection. "Because of a number of unauthorized disclosures, and a lot of hand-wringing over the government's role in the effort to try to uncover these terrorists," Brennan said, the CIA and others agencies have lost use of critical tools needed "to find these terrorists." Brennan's assertion has become a refrain in the two years since Snowden exposed details about a range of U.S. surveillance programs. And former CIA director R. James Woolsey went further, saying on Sunday, "I think Snowden has blood on his hands from these killings in France." Washington Post (Hamilton Spectator)

CSIS suspends some bulk data mining programs pending new guidelines

Canada's domestic spy service has halted its "bulk collection" of data after criticisms were raised within government about the lawfulness of such techniques.

A watchdog agency's new report about the Canadian Security Intelligence Service speaks of littleknown CSIS data-mining programs, and of how some have recently been suspended because of a lack of clear rules and guidelines surrounding them.

CSIS is said to have wanted to leverage big pools of data "to identify previously unknown individuals of interest by linking together types of information that have mirrored threat behaviour," according to the report. But after concerns raised in the report, "CSIS agreed to halt ingesting bulk data sets pending" new rules.

These findings are from the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), the watchdog agency that tabled its annual report in Parliament on Thursday.

The cryptic discussion of CSIS's "data management and exploitation activities" is intriguing on several levels. Talk of spies "ingesting" data in "bulk" has had connotations of intelligence officials indiscriminately amassing citizens' telecommunications records. Yet CSIS officers, who work to track terrorists within Canada, are generally understood to handle cases one wiretapping warrant at a time. This makes them more like conventional police detectives than the foreignfocused signals-intelligence - or "sigint" - spies who deal in volume.

On Thursday, a CSIS spokeswoman said the agency engages in a different kind of "bulk." "The collection referred to in the SIRC report is not the same collection that is sometimes done by sigint agencies," said Tahera Mufti.

She said what was at issue was CSIS collecting "data sets like maps, foreign telephone directories and airport codes." She did not explain how such data pools would help CSIS track terrorists.

The fundamental critique of SIRC, which won't speak to what kind of data it is referring to, is that CSIS has been amassing records at rates that may push past the parameters of federal law. Under its 1984 act, the spy agency can only collect information that is "strictly necessary" to preserve national security.

SIRC says the spy agency it watches keeps two kinds of records. "Referential" data sets are less inherently sensitive, and acquired through publicly available means. This probably means CSIS is buying material from "Big Data" brokers who routinely sell similar material to corporations.

But CSIS also independently acquires "non-referential" data.

SIRC regards such records as relatively intrusive "as they contain bulk information on a wide variety of individuals," the report says. "However, these can only be retained if they are assessed as being relevant to an ongoing, mandated investigation."

If CSIS wants to dredge up any data in bulk, SIRC says there needs to be compelling reasons.

"If there is no reasonable alternative to bulk collection, CSIS needs to provide an objective assessment of how closely connected the bulk information is to intelligence of value," reads the report.

This week, the federal Privacy Commissioner called for Parliament to pass new laws after finding Canada's other intelligence agency had been careless with records about the logged telecommunications of Canadians.

Communications Security Establishment (CSE), a foreign-focused "sigint" agency, says that whenever it collects Canadians' telecommunications trails, it does so only "incidentally." That's because it is pursuing foreign records in enormous volumes.

While CSIS and CSE have vastly different mandates, they also have adjacent headquarters. They can team up if a Federal Court judge endorses a joint operation.

In 2013, the former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden leaked documents to the media about the bulk collection of American citizens' telecommunications trails.

One revealing record showed CSE's and CSIS's U.S. counterparts teamed up to acquire Americans' phone bills, thanks to sweeping warrants signed in secret courts.

The United States "targets the communications of everyone. It ingests them by default," Mr. Snowden said.

OTTAWA -- The Communications Security Establishment is refusing to release the number of privacy breaches the agency has logged since 2007.

Documents obtained by the Star state the intelligence and cyber defence agency has maintained a central database for certain privacy violations since 2007. These breaches are categorized as minor "procedural errors" or more serious "privacy incidents," and reviewed by the CSE Commissioner's office every year.

"In these files, CSE records any incidents it identifies that put at risk the privacy of a Canadian in a manner that runs counter to (or is not provided in) its operational policies," says a September 2014 letter from former CSE chief John Forster to a senior Treasury Board official.

The Star requested just the number of breaches - no details about what actually transpired or the Canadian personal information involved - but was told the agency could not comply due to "operational security concerns."

"Releasing the number of (breaches) would provide insight into CSE's capacity to conduct operations, the extent of its capabilities, the degree to which partner organizations benefit from sharing and the reach of the programs," wrote spokesperson Ryan Foreman in an email last week.

CSE is one of Canada's most technologically sophisticated agencies, responsible for collecting foreign intelligence and protecting Canadian networks from cyber attacks. It is forbidden to use its surveillance tactics against Canadian citizens, except under specific circumstances.

But disclosures from U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden have aroused suspicion about CSE's tools and tactics as part of the Five Eyes alliance that also includes the U.S., U.K., Australia and New Zealand.

Documents tabled in Parliament last month show CSE logged 13 privacy and information breaches in 2015, affecting at least 630 individuals. The agency did not report any of the privacy breaches to the federal privacy commissioner, as CSE determined that there was "no significant risk" to the individuals involved.

CSE further refused to report the activities that led to the breaches.

The Star reported Sunday that the agency has been in a year-long debate with the Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien's office over how much information CSE is required to report about privacy breaches. A government-wide regulation requires all serious breaches to be reported to the privacy watchdog, but a "discussion" about how best to do that has been dragging on since at least January 2015.

On Monday, NDP foreign affairs critic Hélène Lavergère asked Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan to explain why CSE is resisting turning information over to Therrien's office.

"CSE has proactively worked with the commissioner on all aspects, and they do have a good working relationship," said Sajjan, who is responsible for the intelligence agency. "CSE abides by Canadian law, including the Privacy Act."

Wesley Wark, a professor at the University of Ottawa specializing in security and intelligence matters, said reviewing CSE's privacy breaches has typically fallen to the CSE commissioner, rather than the privacy watchdog.

"Really, the protection of privacy role, in terms of external review, has de facto been given to the CSE commissioner," Wark said in an interview last week.

The 12-person team at CSE Commissioner Jean-Pierre Plouffe's office is mandated to ensure that CSE complies with Canadian law.

Service de police de la Ville de Montréal - SPVM

Le SPVM dément les informations parues dans la Presse, ce matin.

Tout d'abord, soyez assurés que le SPVM a toujours pris au sérieux et respecté la liberté de Presse. Dans le cas qui est à l'origine du présent débat, je tiens à vous rappeler qu'il s'agit d'une enquête criminelle sur des policiers spécialistes en enquêtes dont 2 furent accusés de :

- Abus de confiance
- Fabrication de faux documents
- Entrave à la justice
- Parjure

Le SPVM a bel et bien mis sous écoute ses policiers qui faisaient l'objet de l'enquête, mais aucune autre personne mis à part ces policiers n'a fait l'objet d'écoute électronique. Bien sûr, toute personne ayant communiqué avec les policiers concernés a pu être entendue dans les conversations. Nous avons pris des mesures supplémentaires de protection conformément aux enseignements de la cour suprême, dans l'éventualité que des journalistes communiquent avec les policiers concernés et celles-ci figurent dans l'autorisation judiciaire dument validée par un mandataire du directeur des poursuites pénales et criminelles et autorisée par un juge de la cour du Québec.

Ces modalités restrictives tiennent compte du statut particulier des journalistes et de la liberté de presse.

De plus, dès lundi matin, nous ferons une demande écrite à la cour afin de devancer les procédures judiciaires sur la levée des scellés, prévues pour le 24 novembre prochain, afin de démontrer notre transparence.

Je tiens à dire haut et fort que nous avons agi en toute légalité et en proportionnalité des gestes et faits reprochés à nos policiers.

Le SPVM nie la mise sur écoute de Patrick Lagacé et Vincent Larouche

Radio Canada

2016-11-05, 19h35 ET

Le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) affirme que le chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé et le journaliste Vincent Larouche, de La Presse, n'ont pas été mis sur écoute électronique.

Dans un communiqué, le chef du SPVM, Philippe Pichet, admet avoir « mis sur écoute ses policiers qui faisaient l'objet de l'enquête », mais soutient qu'« aucune autre personne mis à part ces policiers n'a fait l'objet d'écoute électronique ».

Le SPVM convient toutefois que toute personne ayant communiqué avec les policiers concernés a pu être entendue dans les conversations.

Selon nos informations, la police a bel et bien obtenu un mandat pour placer sur écoute Patrick Lagacé et Vincent Larouche. Ce dernier rebondissement soulève des questions sur l'honnêteté du chef du SPVM, croient les deux journalistes.

Une déclaration sous serment et une autorisation judiciaire donnaient plus de détails sur la surveillance des deux journalistes. Le mandat - que Radio-Canada a pu consulter - qui visait une quinzaine de personnes, majoritairement des policiers, a été signé en mai dernier par le juge Marc Bisson. Il avait jugé que les communications privées des deux journalistes pouvaient être interceptées.

Plus tôt cette semaine, le chef du SPVM, Philippe Pichet, avait pourtant affirmé que la police s'était contentée d'obtenir le droit de fouiller les relevés téléphoniques et de géolocaliser M. Lagacé.

En entrevue sur les ondes de Radio-Canada, Patrick Lagacé n'a pas caché son irritation envers la direction du SPVM.

Le chroniqueur croit qu'il y a une « chasse aux sources au SPVM » qui rend « tout le monde paranoïaque ». « Les policiers de la base trouvent complètement ridicule que des ressources immenses en termes d'enquêtes criminelles aient été demandées pour l'enquête sur Vincent et moi », a-t-il soutenu. « Il y a des enquêtes qui ne se font pas avec les ressources nécessaires pour de véritables crimes. Ça, ça déprime les policiers de la base. »

Vincent Larouche a abondé dans le même sens, rappelant que les méthodes de gestion du chef de police ne faisaient pas l'unanimité au sein de ses troupes. « Je pense que cette direction-là, et on le sait depuis longtemps, est contestée à l'interne. Cette décision d'enquêter, de partir à la chasse aux sources et d'interdire à tout le monde de s'exprimer, de parler de quoi que ce soit à l'interne [...] ce n'est pas les policiers de la base qui sont d'accord avec ça. »

Des critiques à l'égard de Philippe Pichet ont également été formulées samedi par le chef de l'opposition officielle à l'Assemblée nationale, Jean-François Lisée. Ce dernier demande au gouvernement Couillard de suspendre le directeur du SPVM le temps que la commission d'enquête fasse la lumière sur cette affaire. « Cette démonstration qui vient d'être faite montre que la vérité n'a pas été dite et s'ajoute à un dossier qui est déjà trop lourd », a-t-il déclaré.

Le parti d'opposition officielle à l'Hôtel de Ville, Projet Montréal, demande, lui aussi, que M. Pichet soit suspendu le temps qu'une enquête soit faite pour faire la lumière dans ce dossier. « Il y a une contradiction flagrante entre ce que M. Pichet a affirmé aux médias et ce que La Presse a révélé ce matin. Soit que M. Pichet a menti, soit qu'il a perdu le contrôle de son organisation. D'une manière ou d'une autre, il est imputable », affirme le conseiller du parti, Alex Norris.

Il dénonce également « l'improvisation totale » du maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre. « Son premier réflexe a été de défendre M. Pichet becs et ongles. Sous pression, il a mandaté la commission de la Sécurité publique de tenir une séance à huis clos, ce qui est complètement inadéquat pour [garder] la confiance du public. Ensuite, il a fait une demande totalement farfelue que le bureau de l'inspecteur général (BIG) fasse enquête, alors qu'on sait que ce n'est pas dans son mandat de surveiller les opérations policières. C'est complètement à côté de la track! », croit M. Norris.

Le journaliste André Cédilot, qui a lui-même été visé par un mandat de surveillance de la SQ, a lui aussi commenté les révélations de samedi matin. « [...] Un mandat d'écoute électronique a été demandé. Qu'on l'ait fait ou pas, le directeur de police a menti dans ses conférences de presse cette semaine. Et moi, je pense qu'il n'a plus la confiance du public. Il devrait démissionner ou, du moins, être congédié », a-t-il déclaré en entrevue.

Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Martin Coiteux, a réagi samedi après-midi sur Twitter, en affirmant être en contact avec le maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre, qui a, lui, indiqué qu'il ne réagirait pas samedi aux nouveaux rebondissements.

« Tout au long de la journée, nous avons échangé sur cette situation qui me préoccupe au plus haut point. Devant les nouveaux éléments rapportés par le journal La Presse ce matin, les autorités du Service de police de Montréal et la Ville de Montréal doivent faire preuve de la plus grande transparence dans ce dossier et poser des gestes afin de restaurer la confiance des Montréalais envers leurs institutions », a écrit M. Coiteux dans un tweet.

Vincent Larouche s'est dit « étonné de la nature du reportage » qui l'a conduit à être placé sur la liste d'écoute des services policiers de la Ville de Montréal.

« J'ai écrit un article sur les patrouilleurs en première ligne qui ont porté plainte contre leur commandant pour entrave à la justice. Je ne peux pas penser à un dossier qui était plus d'intérêt public en termes de gérance de la police [...] Il me semble que c'était naturel qu'on essaie d'expliquer au public ce qui se passait. »

Le journaliste d'enquête a dit ne pas comprendre ce qui pouvait « justifier une mise sur écoute » à la suite de la publication de ce dossier, « qui devait être public dès le départ ».

Ces révélations de surveillance de journalistes ont également suscité de vives réactions au sein des médias de la province et ont même attiré l'attention de la presse internationale, ainsi que celle du lanceur d'alerte américain exilé en Russie, Edward Snowden.

Quelques jours plus tard, une autre affaire de surveillance de journaliste a ébranlé le monde médiatique au Québec. On apprenait qu'en 2013 la Sûreté du Québec avait obtenu des mandats pour mettre la main sur le registre des appels entrants et sortants des téléphones de six journalistes, dont Marie-Maude Denis, Isabelle Richer et Alain Gravel, de l'émission Enquête.

Anonymous Vows to Keep Leaking Canadian Spy Secrets Over Police Shooting

VICE News
Justin Ling
Jul 28, 13h40 ET

A chapter of the hacktivist group Anonymous released a document they say exposes the Canadian government's signals intelligence infrastructure, and they're planning to continue leaking the memos until police arrest the officers responsible for the death of a protester in British Columbia.

The document details previously secret details of Canada's spying operations abroad and suggests its spy agency is active in many more foreign stations than it has publicly acknowledged, "many of which are located in developing countries and/or unstable environments."

VICE News was unable to independently verify the document, purportedly from the treasury board, but spoke to three government employees who, while raising questions about specific aspects of the document, acknowledged that it may very well be real.

A video statement released in conjunction with the secret document also claims the leakers have evidence that Ottawa spied on the American government and that Washington retaliated with a promise to kill the Keystone pipeline proposal — a dramatic revelation, if true.

The Anonymous pressure tactic began after the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) killed James McIntyre at a demonstration regarding a proposed dam project earlier in July.

Video of the aftermath shows police standing several feet from McIntyre, still wearing Anonymous' signature Guy Fawkes mask, as he slumps over, blood pouring down the sidewalk.

"According to the police, officers were responding to a report of a male causing a disturbance at a public information session," reads a statement from the Independent Investigations Office of BC, which has been tasked with investigating the police shooting. "Upon arrival, police encountered a masked individual outside, believed to be connected to the complaint. A confrontation occurred and the male affected person was shot."

Officers said McIntyre approached them in an "aggressive manner," and that a knife was found in his possession after he was shot. They did not, however, confirm that he was the person responsible for the disturbance, nor that he was brandishing the knife at the time of the shooting.

"We repeat our insistence upon the immediate arrest of the RCMP killers of James McIntyre," an Anonymous Video statement accompanying the newly released document demands. "Unless and until that happens, we will be releasing stunning secrets at irregular intervals."

The document posted by the group on Monday evening purports to show a funding request from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) to upgrade its security technology at foreign bases.

The office of Steven Blaney, the minister of public safety, would not confirm one way or the other whether the documents are real.

"We do not comment on leaked documents and we continue to monitor this situation closely," said Jeremy Laurin, a spokesperson for the minister.

If they are genuine, however, this vigilante group just published classified details of how CSIS deals with data collected on its foreign bases. Prior to this week, the Canadian public only knew that there were four bases — located in London, Paris, Washington, and Afghanistan — but little else.

According to the February 2014 memo, there are actually 25 bureaus, staffed by 70 employees, who treat 22,500 "messages" per year, although "this figure does not included [sic] the high volume of extreme sensitive traffic from the Washington station."

It recommends a $20 million (CAD) investment in upgrading CSIS' infrastructure.

"Currently, the Service uses inefficient and labor-intensive data-processing and analysis systems to process and report intelligence information obtained at its foreign stations," the document reads. According to the memo, much of the infrastructure dates back to the 1980s and that its slow speed and outdated systems could "jeopardize the the security of its personnel collecting the intelligence."

After the upgrade, CSIS should be able to share intelligence in "real time," the memo predicts.

The upgrade project would begin at two of CSIS' foreign stations, the memo says, and would later be expanded to all 25 bureaus.

The memo also sheds some light on the type of data that is being transmitted. "The Service reports to and advises the government on national security issues and potential threats. To do this, the Service relies on intelligence reporting from a number of foreign stations."

A part of the upgrade would be with an aim of "increased information security requirements to address recent unlawful disclosures of classified material (i.e. Delisle, Snowden)."

Snowden, of course, refers to whistleblower Edward Snowden, while the other name references Jeffrey Delisle, a Canadian naval officer who was caught passing military intelligence to the Russian government who later pled guilty to espionage charges.

The memo concludes that if one member of the Five Eyes partnership (Canada, Great Britain, America, New Zealand and Australia) is the source of a leak, it would have "significant impacts on how sensitive material is handled and protected by all Five Eyes members."

Some details of CSIS' work in its foreign stations, and the challenges of its technology infrastructure, has already been made public.

According to a 2008-2009 report from the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), which monitors the spy agency, "traditionally, the primary function of each [foreign] station was to liaise with CSIS's foreign partners and to conduct immigration screening... Today, however, CSIS stations take on larger roles in these operations."

A 2013/2014 report notes "a security concern with respect to the protection of a communications network" during its review of one of its stations, recommending that the hardware be upgraded to address the security flaw.

If CSIS is, in fact, upgrading hardware capacity at these foreign stations, it would coincide with a massive new expansion in the spy agency's mandate. Until this year, the service was primarily a domestic surveillance body, with only a small amount of its work occurring overseas — at least, so far as they would acknowledge publicly.

Last year, Stephen Harper's government introduced bill C-44, which changed the agency's mandate to authorize it to work internationally, even if it ignores the laws of the country it is operating within.

Months later, Harper's government introduced bill C-51, the controversial anti-terrorism bill that would facilitate mass-information sharing amongst agencies — specifically, between CSIS and its signals intelligence counterpart, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE).

The Anonymous video released on Monday also identified that surveillance legislation as a motivator for its campaign.

While the subject matter included in the memo appears legitimate, the appearance of the document led to some skepticism.

VICE News reached out to an employee of the Treasury Board Secretariat, the department responsible for receiving funding applications such as this one, and he had misgivings about the appearance of the document. The bureaucrat spoke on a condition of anonymity, as he was not authorized to speak to the media.

He noted minor discrepancies — the use of "Treasury Board of Canada" and "Public Safety Canada" in the memo, as opposed to the departments' official titles of "Treasury Board Secretariat" and "Department of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness," and a lack of French translation included in the document. But, he admitted that it could simply be that the document was a draft, and had not been formally edited.

Other government employees who spoke to VICE News indicated that, generally, the memo appears legitimate.

Strangely, a paragraph and a footnote in the document are redacted and marked "not applicable." It's unclear what reason Anonymous would have to withhold anything from the leaked documents.

In the video released with the document, a screenshot of the document flashes on-screen, except the document is almost entirely redacted. That raises the possibility that the leaker may have obtained the document under the Access to Information Act, and subsequently managed to remove the black bars that obscured the memo. That would explain why Anonymous was only able to obtain a draft version of the memo — any final recommendation sent to cabinet would be completely exempt from the access to information law.

In style and tactics, the faction leading the #CCleaks blackmailing campaign appears different than the main Anonymous chapter that has run several other high-profile campaigns in Canada.

Most recently, #OpCyberPrivacy was created to launch DDOS attacks on government systems to raise awareness about C-51 and to publicly disclose significant security flaws in the Canadian government's web services.

When questioned about the difference in tactics, one Anonymous member representing #OpCyberPrivacy, who operates under the pseudonym Bio, told VICE News that: "the only difference between us is methodology, leaking databases we access is non conducive to the end result of respected privacy in this nation and abroad."

Bio, however, indicated that these tactics were a meaningful form of civil disobedience. "Both #OpCyberPrivacy and #CCleaks are involved in direct digital actions as activism", adding "as far as I can tell these secrets need to be told, and for that I salute them."

Even amongst the Anonymous activists seeking justice for McIntyre, there appears to be multiple factions at work on this issue. One OpAnonDown Twitter account, and its corresponding website, initially made no mention of the leak.

The documents were released by @OpAnonDown, which vowed to keep publishing documents later this week.

"Day off tomorrow. See you around on Wednesday," the account tweeted.

The video released with the document makes more claims about records that have yet to be released.

"[Harper] and the Canadian Security Establishment were attempting to spy on their Five Eyes partners in the US," the video statement released with the document says. "Obama's top intelligence officials were furious when they caught CSE in the act. They vowed to kill off Harper's number one priority, the KXL pipeline."

Alleging that it actively spied on the American government — something generally forbidden by the Five Eyes spying partnership — would be a significant revelation, if it turns out to be true.

Canadian spywatcher's Snowden remark 'highly inappropriate,' Goodale says

Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale has rebuked a Canadian spywatcher for publicly suggesting Edward Snowden "should be shot."

"That remark strikes me as highly inappropriate," the minister told reporters in Ottawa on Thursday.

He was not the only person offended. From Russia, the famous fugitive American at the centre of the comment also found it disturbing.

"Canadian spy, charged with keeping spies from breaking the law, wants man dead for showing spies broke law," read a Tweet from Mr. Snowden on his verified account. He then added wryly, "Bonus: he's mad he was recorded."

On Wednesday, The Globe reported that Michael Doucet, a former Canadian intelligence analyst, gave a 90-minute talk to a small audience at Toronto's Ryerson University in which he made several off-the-cuff remarks. He later said he did not think his talk was being recorded.

When a member of the audience asked Mr. Doucet what Mr. Snowden's fate would have been had he been Canadian and leaked intelligence secrets, he replied: "Do you want my opinion on that? Do you really want it? I'll give it to you. If Edward Snowden had worked for CSIS and did what he did, he should be shot."

This comment was surprising because Mr. Doucet is executive director of a government watchdog agency, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. SIRC reviews the highly classified operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and its officials rarely make unscripted remarks in public.

Mr. Doucet quickly added that he was merely being provocative, and would like Mr. Snowden to face trial.

In 2013, Mr. Snowden was a security-cleared contractor who fled the United States with volumes of U.S. government documents. He leaked them to select journalists who wrote articles about their contents, including secret spy programs of questionable legality.

Mr. Snowden has lived in Russia for the past 3 1/2 years and would face charges under the Espionage Act should he return to the United States. Supporters consider him a principled whistle-blower, and have been pushing for outgoing President Barack Obama to pardon him.

The Snowden leaks have woken the world up to the fact that the U.S. National Security Agency and its allies in a partnership known as the Five Eyes – Canada, Britain, Australia and New Zealand – have been collecting, pooling and analyzing global telecommunications traffic on a massive, constant and indiscriminate basis.

As a result of the Snowden revelations, the U.S. government gave up some potentially unlawful surveillance. For example, U.S. federal agents had been secretly requisitioning Americans' phone records in bulk from phone companies.

Over the years, The Globe has written about several Snowden documents pertaining to Canada.

A leaked presentation about the capabilities of powerful analytical software known as Olympia showed that, in 2012, Canadian analysts dissected telecommunications traffic related to Brazil's Ministry of Mines and Energy. They winnowed flows of global data down to specific Brazilian devices that were earmarked to be hacked at a later point.

After that leak, many Canadians expressed surprise that the federal government would apparently engage in economically driven espionage against a friendly nation.

The Snowden leaks also showed that an allied agency did similar topographical data analysis against Canadian corporations.

NSA documents suggested U.S. spies had mapped out traffic flows associated with a major Canadian bank and a telecommunications company. The reasons were never made explicit, but the mapping raised questions about whether the Five Eyes countries actually make good on their supposed gentlemen's agreement to refrain from spying on each other.

Communications intercepted by U.S. and British spy agencies led to the arrest of the first al-Qaeda-inspired terrorist caught in Canada, according to a newly leaked document.

The memo, circulated within the U.S. National Security Agency more than a decade ago, provides a rare and detailed look at the world of intelligence-sharing.

In early 2004, a cell of British terrorists was caught scheming to explode a bomb in London. After Scotland Yard launched "Operation Crevice" to round up the conspirators, Canadian police simultaneously moved to arrest an Ottawa software engineer.

Momin Khawaja had helped build detonators for the conspirators. The suspects, including Mr. Khawaja, were twentysomething Westerners whose families had hailed from Pakistan. They had travelled to a terrorist training camp in that country and emerged from it wanting to bomb Britain for its role in the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Evidence included discussion of close co-operation between British and Canadian police. But prosecutors glossed over how "signals intelligence" (or sigint) captured long before the bust had laid a foundation for detectives.

The details are revealed in a document flowing from Edward Snowden, the fugitive former American contractor who took volumes of files from the NSA in 2013 to leak them to the media.

The Intercept, a news site, has extensive access to the Snowden archive. It has started publishing memos that circulated within the NSA "signals intelligence directorate" in the early 2000s.

The April, 19, 2004 NSA memo titled "SIGINT contribution to Operation Crevice" reads as follows:

"Since March 2003, the U.K.'s Security Service and police had been investigating an AQ (al-Qa'ida) support network based in the U.K. with links to a senior AQ operational planner in Pakistan."

The memo goes on to describe a British mastermind who had wanted to "mount an attack in the U.K. using a large improvised explosive device" and his "Pakistan-based contact [who] was attempting to obtain nuclear material for use in the device."

The eventual evidence at trials was that the British police who unfurled the plot discovered a storage shed containing a large bomb made of ammonium-nitrate, an explosive substance sold commercially as a fertilizer. No evidence of any capability to make a nuclear-material "dirty bomb" surfaced in any courtroom, although some British media have reported that spies had caught wind of terrorists talking about that possibility.

The leaked memo says the NSA and its British counterpart, known as GCHQ, worked quickly to map out the conspirators' communications before providing investigative leads to Pakistani, British and Canadian agencies.

"Call records analysis and reporting expanded Security Service's network knowledge and helped to identify new telephone numbers of key targets in the U.K.," it says. "C2C (computer-to-computer) analysis provided new leads on a Canada-based individual within the network."

This was an allusion to Mr. Khawaja, who lived with his parents and whose day job was fixing computers for Canada's Foreign Affairs department.

Mr. Khawaja became the first terrorist to be arrested, tried and convicted under the Anti-Terrorism Act that Parliament passed in 2001. He is serving a life sentence.

The leaked NSA memo, which is to be officially declassified in 2032, says that "well over 100 Sigint reports were issued on Operation Crevice." Most came from GCHQ but "the NSA reporting contributed significant pieces to the jigsaw."

A Canadian agency called the Communications Security Establishment is a close NSA and GCHQ ally, but the Operation Crevice memo makes no mention of it. At that time, the Canadian agency was beginning to get secret authorizations from cabinet ministers to expand its powers.

Canada spy agency stops sharing intelligence with international partners

Guardian UK
January 28, 2016, 16h00 ET

Canada's ultra-secret eavesdropping agency has stopped sharing intelligence with international partners after revealing it had illegally collected Canadians' metadata in sweeps of foreign communications.

In a report to parliament, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) said on Thursday the breach was unintentional and had been discovered internally in 2013.

A CSE official blamed a software flaw that resulted in sharing of metadata, used to identify, manage or route communications over networks that could identify Canadians.

The agency said the likelihood of this leading to any abuses was "low".

But as a precaution, the CSE suspended its sharing of metadata with its Five Eyes intelligence partners – Australia, Britain, New Zealand and the United States – until it finds a fix to the problem.

Canadian defense minister Harjit Sajjan said he was satisfied that any data that had already been shared with the intelligence alliance before the software glitch was discovered "did not contain names or enough information on its own to identify individuals".

He also said he accepted an investigation's conclusion that the breach of Canadian privacy and national security laws was "unintentional".

It was unclear what, if any, impact the metadata sharing stoppage has had on Five Eyes intelligence gathering.

Public safety minister Ralph Goodale said Canada's allies have been "very supportive" while the CSE told AFP it continues to have "strong and collaborative relationships" with its allies in other areas.

In another report also released on Thursday, Canada's spy agency watchdog raised concerns about efforts by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) to counter "insider threats".

The Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) said it identified "a number of deficiencies" in the way CSIS prevents and investigates classified document leaks, following the high-profile leaks by Edward Snowden in the United States and the 2012 arrest of Canadian navy officer Jeffrey Paul Delisle for selling state secrets to Russia.

It highlighted "one situation in particular [in which] SIRC found that CSIS had failed to give a case the appropriate level of attention and to take follow-up action," but provided no details.

CSIS rejected its recommendations, it noted.

SIRC also raised a potential legal concern with respect to CSIS's use of paid al-Qaida or Taliban informants, saying it was in conflict with United Nations al-Qaida and Taliban Regulations that prohibit association with or funding of these two jihadist groups.

The release of both reports was delayed by October's legislative elections, and comes as the new Liberal government undertakes a complete review of Canada's security intelligence framework.

CSE Broke Privacy Laws With Metadata Sharing, Watchdog Says

Huffington Post
January 28, 2016 11:22 am EST

OTTAWA — A federal watchdog says Canada's electronic spy agency broke privacy laws by sharing information about Canadians with foreign partners.

In his annual report, Jean-Pierre Plouffe says the Communications Security Establishment passed along the information — known as metadata — to counterparts in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand.

Metadata is information associated with a communication — such as a telephone number or email address — but not the message itself.

The Ottawa-based CSE uses highly advanced technology to intercept, sort and analyze foreign communications for information of intelligence interest to the federal government.

Documents leaked in 2013 by former American spy contractor Edward Snowden revealed the U.S. National Security Agency — a close CSE ally — had quietly obtained access to a huge volume of emails, chat logs and other information from major Internet companies, as well as massive amounts of data about telephone calls.

As a result, civil libertarians, privacy advocates and opposition politicians demanded assurances the CSE was not using its extraordinary powers to snoop on Canadians.

Title: CSE IS CONDUCTING MASS SURVEILLANCE OF THE INTERNET ON A GLOBAL SCALE

Word count: 420

DAVID COMMON (CBC-R): Canada's electronic spy agency is conducting mass surveillance of the Internet on a global scale. Documents first obtained by U.S. whistle-blower Edward Snowden show Canada's communication Security Establishment is filtering millions of daily downloads from file-sharing sites looking for extremists.

Is filtering looking for Dave Seglins has our report.

DAVE SEGLINS (CBC reporter): It's called Project Levitation. Canada is watching 102 Internet file-sharing sites. According to spy agency documents, they're sifting through 10 to 15 million uploads and downloads every day. They're looking for people sharing extremist propaganda and training manuals.

GLENN GREENWALD (Journalist, The Intercept): It's really the first time that a story has been reported that involves the CSEC as the lead agency in a program of pure mass surveillance.

DAVE SEGLINS: Glenn Greenwald is a journalist with the U.S. news site The Intercept. He obtained these documents from Edward Snowden and says Canada is using huge databases shared among its allies to build profiles of people downloading suspicious material.

GLENN GREENWALD: They cannot only monitor you into the future, but they can go increasingly into the past and find your Google searches, find your emails, find your chats, find the files that you've uploaded, your Facebook activity. A whole array of Internet activity that you've engaged in.

DAVE SEGLINS: Now Ron Diebert, Director of Citizen Lab, a technology think tank at the University of Toronto, says the goal of stopping terrorists is good, but how much intelligence is being gathered and at what cost?

RON DIEBERT (Director of Citizen Lab, University of Toronto): Is it okay in the pursuit of radical extremists and defending Canadians from possible harm that the government sets up a giant digital x-ray machine over everything that we do? Because that's effectively where we're headed right now.

DAVE SEGLINS: CSEC says it's all within its legal mandate to find foreign terrorists. The agency says it's not targeting Canadians and any Canadian incidentally caught up in the surveillance, well, they have measures in place to protect their privacy.

Dave Seglins, CBC News, Toronto.

Goodale making no quick calls about online police powers

Claire Wahlen

November 26 2015, 17:47 ET

Following RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson chilling warning that his police force cannot protect Canadians from cyber crimes, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale seemed unwilling to wade into the questions Paulson raised about Canada's legal framework.

"He and I have not had the chance to have that conversation yet and I'm looking forward to hearing the elaboration of his views," Goodale told reporters at the Securetech conference in Ottawa.

"This issue has presented difficulties in the past, very high profile ones, that obviously we're quite serious about," he added, not giving any extra air to the debate that has divided security buffs from privacy advocates.

"I just need to have that conversation with the commissioner."

Paulson made the argument Tuesday that as it currently stands, the legal framework in Canada is slowing down police efforts to enforce Canadian laws online.

"Fundamentally, ladies and gentlemen, it's hard to keep people safe on the Internet right now. The best advice we can give people is, 'Don't go (on the Internet),' which is not really working, or 'If you go, be really, really, really careful,'" Paulson told the conference.

"And if something bad happens, hopefully we'll be able to help you, but there's no guarantee."

Privacy concerns, some critics charge, have slowed police agencies down by unnecessarily demanding warrants for certain information created online. These critics argue that metadata should be readily available, including subscriber data from telecoms, a practice the Supreme Court put a plug in with the 2014 Spencer decision.

That decision came shortly after it was discovered that in 2011, nine companies were asked by law enforcement and government agencies to voluntarily hand over their customers' personal information a total of 1.2 million times.

"I'm all for warrantless access to subscriber info," said Paulson. "If I had to get a judge on the phone every time I wanted to run a licence plate when I was doing my policing, there wouldn't have been much policing getting done."

Paulson wasn't alone in advocating for broader police powers online. Former CSIS assistant director of intelligence Ray Boisvert spoke to the conference Wednesday and argued that in the "post-Snowden hysteria," privacy advocates are bringing about restrictions that not only protect lone actor attackers but often facilitate their self-radicalization.

"The challenge around the post-Snowden era is that we're going to see a lot more of this [lone actors] because it makes it difficult to find conspiracy type individuals. The advantage to the lone attacker is extremely important, because as the name implies they can construct, plan, theorize, even self-radicalize and all until they're ready to act," said Boisvert.

Despite the commissioners cautions, internal RCMP documents looking into the affects of the Spencer ruling show no "significant negative effects" on operations.

The government however has made cyber security a priority in the publicly released ministerial mandate letters, with several departments committed to a multi-departmental review into cyber security for critical infrastructure.

Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale will host the U.K.'s terrorism legislation watchdog and members of its Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) next week in Ottawa for a meeting that will include discussion about the government's new national security committee of parliamentarians.

The meeting will come as Parliament resumes from its summer sitting and is expected to dive into debate on Bill C-22, which was tabled on June 16 and announced the framework for the government's nine-member committee of appointed parliamentarians who will "review and scrutinize" the activities of national security agencies.

The committee brings Canada more in-line with other G7 countries' democratic review and oversight bodies, including congressional intelligence committees in the US.

It won't be the first time Goodale sits down with the eight British committee members — back in January, he spent three days in the U.K. and France holding meetings with counterterrorism partners including the ISC.

Goodale's office at the time described the trip as an opportunity for the minister to meet with his foreign counterparts on security issues ranging from how best to create a parliamentary oversight committee to how to tackle radicalization and security.

David Anderson, the U.K.'s Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation, will also be taking part in the meeting with Goodale and the ISC.

Anderson, who has been described by the U.K.'s The Guardian newspaper as "one of the most informed voices in the public debate over surveillance since revelations made by former CIA employee Edward Snowden," is stepping down from his post in February 2017 after serving two three-year terms in the office.

Last month, he tabled a report to the U.K. parliament that said allowing bulk data collection by British spy agencies was "vital in preventing terrorist attacks," a move that drew the ire of some privacy groups in the country who argued the report didn't do enough to present "hard evidence" that the bulk collection was needed.

Following a speech in Ottawa last month at the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police conference, Goodale told reporters he wants to see a greater public debate about the balance between privacy and security, particularly with regards to the use of encryption.

His comments came after the police chiefs passed a resolution calling for a law that would force Canadians to hand over their electronic passwords with a judge's consent, with the head of the association stressing that criminals' increasing use of encryption means police needs more tools to keep up.

It's not clear how long Anderson or the ISC will be in Ottawa or if they are holding meetings with other parliamentarians or organizations while in town.

iPolitics has reached out to both parties to request further details.

Whistleblower Edward Snowden to keynote Toronto conference

The man that says he lives on the Internet will be the showcase speaker at SecTor, a Toronto-based security conference this year.

Edward Snowden, the former CIA employee and government contractor that leaked classified documents about a mass surveillance operation run by the National Security Administration (NSA), will be appearing at the conference via a video link from Russia, where he's been living under asylum since 2013. SecTor will be Snowden's first and only commercial conference appearance in North America this year, conference organizers say.

"Edward Snowden is not only one of the biggest names in cybersecurity, but his unique situation and cybersecurity experiences also make him one of the most important and influential," said SecTor co-founder Brian Bourne in an email announcement. It's important to have him "appear in front of the Canadian IT community, so we engage and inspire today's security professionals and don't fall behind."

Snowden has been said to make his living off of speaking fees since fleeing the U.S. and leaking state secrets. Snowden's lawyer Ben Wizner once told the New York Times the fees can sometimes exceed $10,000 per appearance.

Snowden has also made appearances at conferences and gallery events via telepresence robot BeamPro, essentially a raised iPad on two wheels. He first used the robot at a TED talk in 2014.

Beyond NSA's clandestine mass surveillance operations that were leaked by Snowden, Canada's Communications Security Establishment (CSE) has also been the subject of some of his classified leaks. He's also said that Canada's intelligence gathering operations have the "weakest oversight" among western nations.

A Hollywood movie, directed by Oliver Stone and titled Snowden, is based the whistleblower's life and focuses on his choice to reveal state secrets.

SecTor begins in Toronto Oct. 17.

Déclaration du ministre de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile à propos du lancement de l'Échange canadien de menaces cybernétiques

L'honorable Ralph Goodale, ministre canadien de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile, a fait la déclaration suivante au sujet du nouvel Échange canadien de menaces cybernétiques (ECMC), un centre de cybersécurité à but non lucratif : « Le cyberspace génère des avantages extraordinaires pour la qualité de vie des Canadiens et notre prospérité nationale. Nous avons tous le devoir de protéger ces avantages contre les menaces cybernétiques. L'un de nos meilleurs moyens de défense est notre capacité à travailler ensemble et à échanger de l'information sur les menaces cybernétiques actuelles et futures, les techniques de défense et les autres pratiques exemplaires. Voilà pourquoi le gouvernement du Canada accueille favorablement la création de l'ECMC par le secteur privé. Cette nouvelle organisation favorisera la collaboration entre le secteur public et le secteur privé au Canada et nous aidera à déceler, à prévenir et à atténuer les risques cybernétiques plus efficacement. Nous serons heureux de travailler avec l'ECMC et ses membres pour assurer la sécurité du Canada et de ses citoyens. » Sécurité publique Canada

Statement from the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness on the launch of the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange

The Honourable Ralph Goodale, Canada's Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, made the following statement regarding the launch of the new Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange (CCTX), a not-for-profit cyber security hub: Cyberspace provides tremendous benefits to the quality of life of Canadians and to our national prosperity. We all share in the responsibility to protect those benefits from online threats. One of our best defences is our ability to work together and share information on existing and emerging cyber security threats, defensive techniques and other best practices. For this reason, the Government of Canada welcomes the private sector initiative to create the CCTX. It will facilitate collaboration amongst public and private sectors in Canada and will help us to identify, prevent and mitigate cyber risks more effectively. We look forward to working with the CCTX and its members to keep Canada and Canadians safe and secure. Public Safety Canada

Print & Online Media / Presse écrite et en ligne

From November 1, 2015 to April 18, 2016, media coverage of cyber security as a general topic was significant, with mentions in 310 English language articles and 69 French language articles. The bulk of articles discussed cyber threats affecting the private sector. However, the Cyber Security consultation and review received a light amount of coverage. The tone of coverage was neutral. Articles featured comments supporting the government's proposal to conduct a review and consultation on Canada's Cyber Security strategy. Stakeholders noted the need to update Canada's critical infrastructure and cyber security infrastructure.

Key issues:

- Media noted that in his mandate letter, Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, Ralph Goodale, was asked to lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and critical infrastructure from cyber threats, in collaboration with other departments. At the Conference of Defence Associations Institute's Ottawa conference on February 18, Minister Goodale stated that the review of the cyber security policy will be comprehensive.
- The Cyber security review will focus on two threats: the increase in sexual exploitation over the Internet and national security.
- Nine major Canadian companies, along with the Canadian Council of Chief Executives, announced the formation of the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange (CCTX), a non-profit organization that will allow firms to share information amongst themselves, government and research institutes about cyber-attacks.
- Budget 2016: The Communications Security Establishment, is expecting a net increase of $59.5 million "in support" of its mandate. Specifically, CSE expects to spend the money to increase its "capacity to address cyber threats and advancements in technology." Media note the bulk of money for domestic cyber security will be directed at Shared Services. Budget 2016 allocates $77.4 million over five years, starting this year, for Shared Services to update its cyber security network, patch existing problems and make sure government networks are protected from cyber threats, malicious software and unauthorized access.
- Alberta's auditor general criticized Alberta Energy for failing to assess the performance of its oil and gas royalty reduction programs and not assessing the potential impacts of a cyber-attack on the industry.

- Patrick Boucher, the acting director general responsible for critical infrastructure, said Canada works closely with its Five Eyes partners - the U.S., U.K., Australia and New Zealand - to address transnational threats.
- Media reported Canada and the U.S. are vulnerable to an electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attack.
- President Barack Obama and PM Justin Trudeau agreed to increase critical infrastructure security and information sharing on cyber security with the private sector.
- Over a two month period, Canada faced 25 attacks from sophisticated malware designed to target its critical infrastructure. Power plants, electrical grids, aviation software a variety of government-run systems were facing assault from Advanced Persistent Threat (APT) technology, likely dispatched by foreign governments both hostile and friendly.
- The World Economic Forum has listed cyber security as one of the greatest threats to business around the world
- In the private sector, media report on the lack of awareness among non-technical employees. Additionally, reports note companies are concerned about cyber security.
- According to the US Department of Homeland Security, the energy sector faces more cyber-attacks than any other industry.
- Stakeholders: Wesley Wark, a Canadian expert on issues relating to intelligence, national security and terrorism, stated that instead of spending time on a review of cyber security, what the government requires is "fresh thinking on a much larger scale about its national security capabilities and strategy". Gabe Rottman, a policy advisor at the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington: like Canada, the United States has a complicated network of government entities trying to handle cyber security threats.

Tech Threat

Computer programs designed to snoop through retailers' point-of-sale (POS) systems for sensitive customer information or to encrypt files so that criminals can extort money are among the cyber threats Canadian businesses face. But a major hurdle to overcoming such threats, suggest information technology security experts, is a lack of awareness among non-technical employees. While very few threat reports focus on or cover Canada, the data available indicates that the most prominent IT security threat here is the OpenCandy toolbar, Natasha Hellenberg, senior threat researcher for Tokyo-based vendor Trend Micro Incorporated, suggests in a blog post. Users are tricked into installing this onto their machine, which is then used to also download malware onto it, says Ottawa-based Hellenberg ()One hurdle to gathering Canadian statistics for malware attacks on businesses, McCloskey advises, is the fact that it is tough to get people to come clean on their level of incidents. The federal government recently made some announcements with respect to facilitating some judgment-free sharing of incident information across industries. For example, the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre (CCIRC) shares technical information on threats, vulnerabilities, risks and incidents with its partners to enhance collective understanding of cyber threats and incidents, and help ensure organizations have the information required to make informed decisions, Public Safety Canada reports on its website. Organizations can report cyber incidents to the [federal government] through CCIRC, adds a spokesperson for the federal department. Canadian Underwriter (2016-03-31)

This one chart explains why cybersecurity is so important

New hacking threats have emerged in the past two years, and with it has come an large increase in worldwide concern about cybersecurity. In 2014, 69% of executives expressed concerned about cyber threats, including a lack of data security, according to a PricewaterhouseCoopers survey. In 2015, an updated survey increased that number to 86%, so it's clear that the desire for better cybersecurity is not going away anytime soon. In the infographic below, John Greenough of BI Intelligence, Business Insider's premium research service, explains what cybersecurity is, what the investment will be, the top types of attacks, and the ways enterprises are protecting themselves. Multi-layered approach key to tackling cyber risks: Willis Towers Watson

Taking a multi-dimensional approach as opposed to relying on a sub-set of actions is needed to tackle the growing cyber security risk, Dominic Casserley, president and deputy chief executive officer of Willis Towers Watson, suggested in a recent speech at the Commonwealth Club of California in San Francisco. Casserley urged organizations in the public, private and social sectors to adopt an integrated plan for building cyber security as a package, rather than relying on a sub-set of actions in response to growing cyber threats, notes a statement issued Thursday by global advisory, broking and solutions company Willis Towers Watson. Téléphone intelligent - Protection des données ou sécurité nationale?

La cybersécurité touche aussi la téléphonie mobile, quoi qu'en pensent leurs usagers

Longtemps à la traîne, la sécurité des données des téléphones mobiles devient un enjeu majeur pour les entreprises et les consommateurs, mais la lutte contre le terrorisme complique l'équation. "Pour une très grande majorité des utilisateurs, les questions de sécurité peuvent supposer un frein à un usage plus poussé des technologies", explique Stéphane Geyres, responsable activités conseil et service en cybersécurité chez Accenture. Avec le développement des services sur mobiles, comme l'accès aux données bancaires, les utilisateurs s'interrogent de plus en plus sur la sécurité qu'ils peuvent en attendre. Pour autant, paradoxalement, cette question n'est pas au centre de leurs préoccupations lors de l'achat d'un nouveau modèle. Le Devoir, B4 (2016-02-25)

Spy agency unlawfully shared metadata for years

The unlawful sharing by Canada's electronic spy agency of metadata involving Canadians' communications went on for years before the practice was suspended in 2014, parliamentarians learned Monday. The disclosure by Jean-Pierre Plouffe, head of the small, independent agency that monitors the legality of Communications Security Establishment (CSE) operations, means vast amounts of unprotected data were shared with Canada's "Five Eyes" intelligence partners in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Plouffe, testifying before the Senate's National Security Committee, was asked by Senate Opposition Leader Claude Carignan how many Canadians were affected by the privacy breach. "Given the number of years which this happened, and given the fact this is a systemic issue, it was difficult to establish the volume and the number of people affected," replied Plouffe. "Hundreds of thousands?" asked Carignan. "It is impossible to know the exact figure," said Plouffe. Metadata is information used by computer systems to identify, describe, manage or route communications across networks. It can include Internet protocol addresses, phone numbers and the time of a transmission or the location of a device. The data is vital to the CSE's collection of foreign electronic signals to detect and defend against cyber-threats to Canadian networks and terrorist threats to national security. While metadata does not reveal the content of the communications, it can expose information about the user. CSE computer software is supposed to "minimize" such information - removing potentially revealing details - before it is shared with foreign partners. Instead, reams of unminimized metadata flowed to a U.S.-based Five Eyes metadata sharing point for years. The spy agency first discovered the problem in late 2013 and suspended the practice in early 2014 until a technical fix could be found. It has yet to resume the metadata sharing, Plouffe said Monday. The CSE notified Plouffe's Office of the Communications Security Establishment Commissioner soon after discovering the problem. Plouffe went public in his annual report, released in January, and sanctioned the agency for breaking the law - the first such rebuke in the agency's long history. Survey: Majority of Energy Sector Companies Can't Track Cyber-Threats

According to the US Department of Homeland Security, the energy sector faces more cyber-attacks than any other industry, and attacks on industrial control system networks are on the rise. If successful, these energy sector cyber-attacks could have a dramatic physical impact. But, two-thirds of IT staff in the energy, utilities and oil and gas industries say they have no visibility into the physical ramifications at stake. Info Security Magazine (2016-02-05)

Protecting Canada

While Canada and the U.S. are vulnerable to an electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attack that has the potential to destabilize our power grid, water systems, food supply chain and more, the solution is relatively simple. But first the issue needs to become a priority for Canadian politicians. Part 1 of this two-part feature explained former CIA analyst Dr. Peter Pry's attempts to educate policymakers and the military on the need to protect our electrical grid. If an enemy detonated a nuclear missile above the skies of North America, it could take out our grid for months. Countries like North Korea and various terrorist groups have shown they can launch EMP missiles. "This is a bigger threat than the classic nuclear war we talk about," Pry explained during a recent visit to Toronto. "It will kill a lot more people. One bomb will basically end your civilization () In the mandate letter sent to Ralph Goodale, minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau instructs him to "lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and our critical infrastructure from cyber-threats." This review could be the beginning of the answer, but neither the minister's office nor department would confirm EMP is a priority. The Internet's Wild West

Hijacking "smart" toasters and refrigerators and hacking corporate ventilation systems are among the new threats envisioned by cybersecurity experts as an increasing array of items are connected to the Internet. The Internet of Things, a movement that seeks to control everything from factory equipment to traffic lights and household appliances through the web, creates vast opportunities for improved efficiency and convenience. But unless companies address the emerging cybersecurity risks, the Internet of Things (or IoT) will fail, said Stephen Pattison, the vice-president of public affairs at ARM Holdings, the U.K. semiconductor company. "We ain't seen nothing yet," Pattison said, speaking on a panel at the recent Security Innovation Network's U.S./U.K. Global Cybersecurity Innovation Summit in London. Canada Discovers It's Under Attack by Dozens of State-Sponsored Hackers

Over a two month period, Canada faced 25 attacks from sophisticated malware designed to target its critical infrastructure. Power plants, electrical grids, aviation software a variety of government-run systems were facing assault from Advanced Persistent Threat (APT) technology, likely dispatched by foreign governments both hostile and friendly. In access to information documents, obtained by VICE News, Public Safety Canada describes these "Advanced Persistent Threat" groups as "sophisticated threat actors with significant resources who pursue objectives over an extended period of time and attempt to maintain presence on the targeted network" and are most likely "a nation state" given the "level of intent and capabilities of these actors". APT attacks, in other words, are hacks designed to surreptitiously gain backdoor access to a system in order to lay dormant for long periods of time, usually undetected, to collect data. There were 25 incidents involving "hosts affected with APT-related malware," according to reports obtained from the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre (CCIRC), the federal agency tasked with keeping tabs on cyber threats to the public and private sector. All of the threats came from "the Information and Communications Technologies (ICT) sector," with connections to Canada's major public infrastructure. Critical infrastructure, which is increasingly automated and online, entails public systems like the electrical grid, nuclear power plants, water filtration stations and financial institutions. It's been said that, should hackers successfully leverage one of those exploitations, it could result in a "Cyber Pearl Harbor." A report from the country's main intelligence service, the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS), says the threat posed by these hacks are "very real" and that they could "affect water supply, energy and utilities, manufacturing, Internet communications technology or even gravely affect institutions such as schools and hospitals." Public Safety Canada remained tight lipped when asked about any Canadian critical infrastructure being exploited by hackers in the employ of hostile nations. "While we do not comment on specific or potential threats against Canadian critical infrastructure interests, I can say that the CCIRC is focused on protecting vital systems outside of the federal government, including critical infrastructure, against cyber incidents," said Mylène Croteau, a spokesperson for Public Safety Canada. Beefing up our cyber defences

In an opinion piece, lawyers Imran Ahmad, Marlon Hylton and Bernice Karn, members of Cassels Brock Blackwell LLP's cyber-security practice write, "With cyber attacks steadily increasing in sophistication, frequency and magnitude, we must ask ourselves whether Canada is ready to meet the challenge these threats pose to our economy, national security and the overall wellbeing of Canadians. Unfortunately, when compared to the United States, the United Kingdom or Germany, Canada is clearly lagging in terms of cyber readiness (...) Nevertheless, last month alone, several positive developments within the public and private sectors signalled a real effort to move the yardsticks on Canada's cyber preparedness. The first was Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's mandate to his minister of public safety to lead a review of existing measures to protect critical infrastructure - utilities, transportation, financial sector, telecommunications, etc. - from cyber threats. Shortly thereafter, the Canadian Council of Chief Executives announced that it was establishing the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange, a member-funded, not-for-profit organization focused on helping Canadian businesses and consumers protect themselves against cyber-attacks." The category finds itself ranked fairly high, above food crises, interstate conflict, terrorist attacks and spread of infection diseases but below climate change, fiscal crises and mass migration. Why CIOs should pay attention to the difference in U.S. and Canadian cyber threats

When it comes to cyber threats, the U.S. and Canada are very different, according to Trend Micro threat researcher Natasha Hellberg, and that should affect how CIOs manage security. These influence how threat actors here behave," she said in her post(<http://blog.trendmicro.com/trendlabs-security-intelligence/what-about-canada-eh-the-canadian-threat-landscape/>) on the TrendLabs Security Intelligence blog, What About Canada, Eh? - The Canadian Threat Landscape. The post was a supplement to Trend Micro's report, North American Underground: The Glass Tank, which examined cybercrime on both sides of the border. "In the report we find that Canadian threat trends are related but different from those in the United States," noted Christopher Budd, global threat communications at Trend. Must see: The government doesn't want you to click here

Warnings against clickbait and phishing permeate Canadian spy agency's cyber defence reports.

Government of Canada users should avoid clicking on suspicious or catchy articles or email links, warns a Canadian spy agency in its Cyber Defence Report for the first quarter of 2015. "Clickbait," it explains, "are websites or online articles designed to drive visitor traffic by containing catchy sensationalist headlines like 'must see' or 'unbelievable' and are distributed over social media and online ads." They want to exploit curiosity, the Communications Security Establishment warns-to "drive web traffic and generate advertising revenue" or to "launch exploits against systems that visit a seeded website." Though the former sounds like the behaviour of any modern news organization, it's the latter that concerns Canada's government. Luring users through email links, or phishing, is one of the ways that hackers can attempt to compromise systems or access classified data. Embassy (2016-01-13)

Cybersecurity focus increases in Canada, U.S. and U.K.

Over the past week, major initiatives have been launched in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom focused on enhancing cybersecurity. In Canada last week, the Canadian Council of Chief Executives and a group of leading Canadian companies recently announced plans for an independent, not-for-profit organization, the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange (CCTX), to help Canadian businesses and consumers guard against cyber attacks. Launching in 2016, the CCTX will work to share information about cyber threats and vulnerabilities among businesses, government and research institutions. It will provide its members and the general public with analysis of cybersecurity issues and act as a point of contact for cyber information-sharing organizations in other countries. New threat intelligence sharing site to open for all Canadian firms

Canadian CISOs are about to get help in defending attacks through something few other nations have - a national cyber threat information exchange for small, medium and large enterprises from all sectors. The Canadian Council of Chief Executives announced this morning that it and a group of major corporations including banks and telcos some of whom have their own private threat sharing networks are behind the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange (CCTX) to help businesses and consumers stay ahead of cyber attacks. The idea is to really start sharing information on a very big scale so all participants will be able to access intelligence and threat information from their partners and use this information to protect their systems much better, said Benoit Dupont, national scientific director of the Montreal-based SERENE-RISC cybersecurity information exchange and a board member of CCTX. The founding members are: Air Canada, Bell Canada, Canadian National Railway Company, HydroOne, Manulife, Royal Bank of Canada, Telus, TD Bank Group and TransCanada Corporation. The non-profit exchange will be up and running in the first quarter of next year, although all of its capabilities won't be available until the end of the year. A search for an executive director starts today. Large companies (and the definition of large hasn't been settled yet) will be charged $50,000 a year, mid-size firms $20,000 and small firms $5,000. IT.World.Canada (2015-12-11)

Canadian companies have a big new ally in the fight against cyber crime

Businesses in Canada will soon have a new network to guard against cyber crime, which is costing them more than $3 billion a year. Nine major Canadian companies, including the big telcos and some of the Big Five banks, along with the Canadian Council of Chief Executives on Friday announced they are forming the Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange (CCTX), a non-profit organization that will allow firms to share information amongst themselves, government and research institutes about cyber attacks. Overall, it's a very positive initiative, said Saj Nair, a partner and cybersecurity consulting leader at PwC Canada. It will make (Canadian businesses) more resilient. The effect of cyber crime on Canadian GDP is lower than in the U.S. (0.17 per cent versus 0.64 per cent), but the reason for this gap may be underreporting and a lack of data, according to a Fraser Institute report. The lack of data is because companies do not want to admit that they were victim to a hack, particularly because of the perceived liability, said Ray Boisvert, president of I-Sec Integrated Strategies and a former assistant director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. Canada 'failing' in fight against cybercrime, hacking

Canada is lagging behind the U.S., Britain and other countries in defending citizens and businesses against malicious hackers and cyber-criminals, say numerous groups involved in trying to police the internet. "We're failing, we're falling behind," warns Katherine Thompson of the Canadian Advanced Technology Alliance, one of Canada's largest private-sector high-tech advocacy groups. "We cannot continue down the path that we're on right now," she told CBC News. "We just went through a very long federal election where not one of the major party leaders discussed cyber-security." Since 2010, Public Safety Canada has spent $245 million on defending government computer networks, safeguarding critical infrastructure and educating the public. It has also earmarked $142 million over the next five years to tackle cyber-threats particularly against critical infrastructure. But leaders in Canada's policing, IT and cyber-security sectors say the federal strategy is focused primarily on national security threats and does little to combat the dramatic growth in email scams, online extortion and breaches at corporate computer networks. Canadians are also largely in the dark about the scope of cybercrimes given the country has no central agency to track online scams and malicious electronic attacks. What's more, there are no federal laws to force companies to disclose hacks, security breaches, thefts of data or money so the general public has incomplete knowledge of which companies have been compromised. Cyber threats to critical infrastructure on the minister of public safety's radar

On November 13, 2015, as part of the new Canadian Prime Minister's commitment to an open and transparent government, ministerial mandate letters were made public. These letters outline a broad framework for what ministers are expected to accomplish, including specific policy objectives and challenges to be addressed. While they are not intended to be an exhaustive list of all files that a Minister needs to address, they provide insight in terms of the government's overall priorities for the ministry. The ministerial letter issued to the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness (the Minister) lists several priorities, most notably: Lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and our critical infrastructure from cyber-threats, in collaboration with the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Innovation, Science and Economic Development, the Minister of Infrastructure and Communities, the Minister of Public Services and Procurement, and the President of the Treasury Board. Recognizing cyber threats in the context of ensuring the security of Canada's critical infrastructures is an important step. The Minister will be able to build upon the existing Public Safety's Action Plan for Critical Infrastructure (2014-2017) which outlines the government's cyber strategy to protecting critical infrastructures. Russell said directors and senior executives including the chief executive must be involved, and urged investment dealers to scrutinize their internal defences and technical controls, as well as any third-party vendors with access to their systems. This means the firm must undertake due diligence of third party vendors, to ensure it covers all system entry points to reduce the ways in which cybercriminals can access a firm's systems, the letter said. Trudeau government putting new emphasis on cybersecurity

The neglected federal cybersecurity file made a surprising appearance in several of the ministerial mandate letters publicly released last week, buried under hot-topic campaign promises like the Syrian refugee project and the legalization of marijuana. Observers say it's a good sign that Canada is starting to take the threat of cybercrime more seriously. "There's a lack of a strategy and a lack of clarity of who in the government is responsible for what," said former CSIS assistant director of intelligence Ray Boisvert, who has criticized the Canadian government in the past for not doing enough to protect Canada's critical infrastructure from cyberattacks. "We (Canada) are a little complacent and in a sort of 'stand by and watch others' mode - which I think is globally a problem - and unlike other defence issues there's no hiding under the U.S. umbrella, because cyber touches everyone, everywhere," said Boisvert. "There are no walls or barriers of isolation for Canada, no hiding behind our three oceans." The planned review of cybersecurity, which covers seven federal departments, will assess Canada's critical infrastructure against cyber threats. There's no word yet on when the review might take place or how much it might cost. Ron Deibert, director of the Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs, said Canada's approach to cybersecurity has been too "top-down, state-driven (and) militaristic" and needs a complete rethink. "We've been putting military and intelligence organizations at the top and see the world through the lens of a kind of competitive militaristic view of what cybersecurity means, when in fact I think we need to take an entirely different approach that puts more emphasis on a civilian understanding of securing cyberspace," said Deibert. The promise of a review comes not long after the previous government committed in a budget to new legislation and programs and tens of millions of dollars in funding for the framework. Spy agency wants industry help on cyber security

Canada's electronic spy agency has identified holes in the way the country secures government information-and wants private industry to help fill them. The Communications Security Establishment of Canada is introducing a new "medium" security level for the electronic storage and transmission of sensitive government information, it announced at this year's Government Technology Exhibition and Conference in Ottawa. John Turnbull, the director general of CSEC's Cyber Protection Branch, told industry groups Oct. 21 that there is "an awful lot" of over-classified information within the Canadian government. For now, the government only operates with two levels of assurance. Basic assurance secures most of the government's daily operations, while much more robust high assurance secures classified information. This includes military, security and intelligence activities. () There are big costs associated with administering security clearances and physically renovating buildings to be more secure. CSEC has develops infrastructure to protect information and gathers foreign intelligence about cyber threats. Within CSEC is a Cyber Threat Evaluation Centre that handles cyber threat incident reports. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service analyzes and investigates security threats writ large. And the Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigate cyber crimes. CSE chief says federal departments need to "get on" Shared Services' cyber defences

Despite recent news that the RCMP and Department of National Defence are having problems with Shared Services Canada, the head of the country's cyber defence agency says the platform is a "key part" of Canada's cyber operations and more departments need to get on board. CBC News reported last week that it had obtained documents showing that investigations were jeopardized and the public put at risk because of Shared Services' disorganization. It also said senior DND staff were annoyed by Shared Services and said the department caused "significant inefficiency at every level," - from service delivery to procuring resources. Despite that, Greta Bossenmaier, chief of the Communications Security Establishment, told members of the Senate's national security committee on Monday afternoon that, despite the challenges, the department is a critical part of the agency's broader strategy for keeping Government of Canada networks secure - and more agencies need to use it to its full capabilities (...). One of the key tasks outlined for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale in his mandate letter is the creation of a cyber review that will assess how well Canada is doing in preparing for cyber attacks on things like critical infrastructure, and what it can do better. No date for that review is set but Sajjan's defence policy review, scheduled to be ready by the end of the year, is also expected to include a cyber component. iPolitics (2016-03-21)

Cyber security review still in early stages, Senate told

Public Safety officials say they're still trying to figure out the scope of a review into protecting critical infrastructure from cyber attacks. Speaking before a Senate committee on national defence Monday, Monik Beauregard said that the department is under a tight timeline to review its efforts and get a report to cabinet. But Beauregard said the department is still trying to figure out how wide or narrow the review will be. "At this point, we're all looking at the scope of the reviews and thinking about how to carry it out," Beauregard told senators Monday evening. In his mandate from the prime minister, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale was asked to lead the review into critical infrastructure protection, in co-ordination with five of his cabinet colleagues. "Critical infrastructure" has a broad definition, but is typically thought of as systems, networks, facilities and assets essential to public safety, national security and economic interests of Canada. That includes everything from bridges to roads, but also data centres, financial networks and natural resources projects. Toronto Star, A6 (2016-03-08)

Trudeau government targets cyber threats

With Internet-based child sex-ploitation crimes skyrocketing, the Trudeau government intends to launch a "credible and comprehensive" review this spring of cybersecurity threats in Canada. Officials with Public Safety Canada said Thursday that while the details of that review are still being hammered out by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, a review will determine how Canada can best deal with everything from online predators to digital jihadists. Kathy Thompson, assistant deputy minister in charge of the Community Safety and Countering Crime Branch at Public Safety Canada, said that while the crime rate continues to decline across the country, "there are some exceptions. One of those exceptions is child sexual exploitation over the Internet - that is going up exponentially, year over year." Thompson made her remarks at the House of Commons Public Safety and National Security Committee, where MPs are looking for topics their group can zero in on during the current parliamentary session. Crippling Attack

Imagine a North America in a permanent blackout - no electricity, transportation, banking. All modern machinery stopped leading to the collapse of civilization. And it's not a science fiction story - it's the reality of what could happen with an electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attack. While both Canada and the United States are currently vulnerable to an electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attack that has the potential to destabilize our power grid, water systems, food supply chain and more, the solution is relatively simple. But first the issue needs to become a priority for Canadian politicians. The challenge is the issue doesn't appear to be a priority in Canada. Representatives from CSIS, the RCMP and Public Safety Canada all confirm that attacks to what's called "critical infrastructure" are concerns of theirs, but it appears no recent reports specifically mention EMP. It's unclear to what degree government experts are studying the issue. In the mandate letter sent to Ralph Goodale, minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau instructs him to "lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and our critical infrastructure from cyber-threats." This review could be the beginning of the answer, but neither the minister's office nor the department would confirm if EMP was a priority. Canada: Cyber Threats To Critical Infrastructure On The Minister Of Public Safety's Radar

On November 13, 2015, as part of the new Canadian Prime Minister's commitment to an open and transparent government, ministerial mandate letters were made public. These letters outline a broad framework for what ministers are expected to accomplish, including specific policy objectives and challenges to be addressed. While they are not intended to be an exhaustive list of all files that a Minister needs to address, they provide insight in terms of the government's overall priorities for the ministry. The ministerial letter issued to the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness (the "Minister") lists several priorities, most notably: "Lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and our critical infrastructure from cyber-threats, in collaboration with the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Innovation, Science and Economic Development, the Minister of Infrastructure and Communities, the Minister of Public Services and Procurement, and the President of the Treasury Board." Recognizing cyber threats in the context of ensuring the security of Canada's critical infrastructures is an important step. Cassels Brock (Mondaq.com) (2016-01-08)

Trudeau's instincts have not served him well

An opinion piece by Wesley Wark, visiting professor at the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs at the University of Ottawa and an expert on international intelligence and security states, "Justin Trudeau has proudly proclaimed that "Canada is back" as a constructive partner in global affairs. The first test of that proud and no doubt heartfelt claim has come from an unexpected and horrific event. The night of carnage in Paris, and the fear of what might come next, will force the new Liberal government to pay more attention to security policy than they intended. They have some difficult decisions to face. Our hearts and sympathies go out to the French people. But our ability to help is limited. With only a small overseas intelligence capacity, Canada is not in much of a position to offer security assistance to France in its efforts to understand current Islamic State plotting. The question of Canada's foreign intelligence needs has, in the aftermath of this fresh round of attacks in Paris, raised its head once again. Instead of spending time on a promised review of cyber security, what the new government requires is fresh thinking on a much larger scale about its national security capabilities and strategy." UNB can help make New Brunswick a global locus for cyber security

Every day, headlines surrounding cybersecurity become grimmer, from attacks against power plants to hacks that can disable SUVs, to the loss of personal records in massive data breaches affecting retailers, hospitals, governments, universities and more. Credible entities put the global cost of cyber attacks at $400 billion last year, and predict losses exceeding $2.1 trillion by 2020. Global spending on cyber security reflects this growing threat, with the cyber-security industry expected to grow to more than $170 billion by 2020 from $75 billion today. New Brunswick, as a pioneer in the 1990s and early 2000s in Internet and later broadband Internet adoption, is poised once again to be a global leader in cyber security. The strong partnership between the University of New Brunswick and IBM helped lay the foundation for the company's announcement this week that it is growing its workforce in this province. (...) UNB has the potential to lead across several areas of cybersecurity, including the fast-growing area of Internet of Things and the need to protect critical infrastructure thanks to our collaborative partnership with Siemens Canada and NB Power in the Smart Grid Innovation Network. Royalty reduction, cyber security flagged

Alberta Energy taken to task in latest report by auditor general

Alberta's auditor general criticized Alberta Energy on Wednesday for failing to assess the performance of its oil and gas royalty reduction programs and not assessing the potential impacts of a cyber attack on the industry. With the first of 15 recommendations in his February report, Merwan Saher called on the ministry to annually evaluate and report on whether the ministry's royalty reduction programs meet their objectives. He also urged the department to assess the threat and impact of attacks on the industrial control systems used to operate oil and gas infrastructure. (...) His concerns are even greater in the oil and gas sector. While Alberta Justice has assessed a low risk of a cyber attack against about 50 critical oil and gas sites in Alberta, no one has calculated the impact if such an attack did occur. "We were unable to obtain any documentation from any provincial government entity to show that an assessment of the possible risks and impacts from an attack on unsecured (industrial control systems) was completed," said the auditor general. International collaboration

It wasn't all play for Trudeau and Obama

It wasn't all parties and elbow-rubbing as Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and U.S. President Barack Obama announced a plethora of new agreements and policies Thursday in Washington. Here's what you need to know: (...) The leaders agreed to beef up critical infrastructure security and information sharing on cyber-security with the private sector. They said they will work to get more regional partners involved in the G7 24/7 Network, which connects national police agencies to fight cyber crime. The countries will work even closer on the world stage to advance a variety of objectives. The leaders promised to help Haiti and Ukraine stand on their own two feet, push for better access to electricity and education for girls in Africa, and work outside the UN to fight nuclear proliferation. They also both committed to doing more on UN peacekeeping and the refugee crisis. Money was pledged to help dozens of countries prevent and respond to the threat of infectious disease. Obama says upgrading U.S. cybersecurity is complex, long-term job

President Barack Obama said on Wednesday the United States is not as organized as it needs to be to step up its protections against cyber threats, and that making improvements would be a complex task lasting well beyond his time in office. Obama made his comments after meeting in the Oval Office with two advisers who will lead a new commission tasked with making recommendations by the end of the year on a long-term plan for cybersecurity upgrades. Les réseaux djihadistes communiquent avec un arsenal toujours plus perfectionné

De l'adresse cachée au jeu en ligne, les réseaux djihadistes utilisent de mieux en mieux les ressources d'internet pour recruter et communiquer, entraînant les services de sécurité dans une course-poursuite technologique pour les localiser et décrypter leurs messages. Peut-on agir impunément sur le web en restant anonyme ? Pas complètement, même si, selon des experts réunis au Forum international de la cybersécurité (FIC) à Lille, dans le nord de la France, les méthodes des cellules terroristes sont désormais les mêmes que celles des hackers. Pour rester discret sur internet, il faut d'abord se procurer une adresse IP (l'identification de l'appareil) exotique. Et, explique à l'AFP Thierry Karsenti chez l'éditeur d'antivirus israélien Check Point, ne jamais surfer depuis chez soi, en profitant au maximum du wifi public. Il faut ensuite utiliser des flux anonymisés, comme le réseau TOR. Et crypter ses communications. AFP (Journal de Montréal) (2016-01-25)

Lutte contre le terrorisme

Mercredi, lors d'une réunion spéciale de l'ONU, des responsables antiterroristes du Canada et de France ont manifesté leur exaspération. Les ordinateurs et téléphones qu'ils saisissent auprès de suspects sont maintenant impossibles à faire parler. Contacts, historique d'appels, messages reçus et envoyés : l'information se trouve bel et bien dans la mémoire de l'appareil... mais ils ne peuvent la lire. Oliver Bilodeau, chercheur en cybersécurité pour la firme montréalaise GoSecure, croit que les forces antiterroristes se butent bel et bien à un mur. « Il n'y a aucune porte dérobée, il n'y a aucun accès que pourraient utiliser les autorités », dit-il. C'est que les iPhone, téléphones Android et BlackBerry de nouvelle génération ne se contentent plus d'essayer d'établir des communications sécurisées. Ils encryptent les données contenues sur le téléphone lui-même. La Presse+ (2015-12-18)

La Chine va-t-elle stopper ses cyberattaques?

Le directeur de l'agence nationale de sécurité (NSA) des États-Unis affirme que rien n'assure pour l'instant que la Chine va arrêter de parrainer des cyberattaques menées contre des entreprises privées. Le président américain Barack Obama et son homologue chinois Xi Jinping se sont entendus, en septembre, pour ne pas voler en ligne des secrets ou des renseignements commerciaux confidentiels ou soutenir de telles pratiques. L'accord s'applique uniquement aux attaques informatiques lancées avec le consentement des gouvernements contre des entreprises. Au Forum sur la sécurité internationale à Halifax, l'amiral Michael Rogers, qui est à la tête du United States Cyber Command en plus de diriger la NSA, a confié, samedi, avoir été surpris que le gouvernement chinois accepte de signer cet accord. Mais quelques semaines après la conclusion de l'entente, la compagnie californienne CrowdStrike, qui est spécialisée dans la cybersécurité, a rapporté avoir détecté au moins sept attaques en ligne menées par la Chine contre des entreprises technologiques et pharmaceutiques américaines. Feds punt DND procurement cash to 2022, acknowledge delays

The Liberal government gave Department of National Defence the propellor shaft in this year's budget, punting money earmarked for procurement into the future and essentially acknowledging what defence industry experts have been suggesting that major projects like the CF-18 replacements and shipbuilding are going to take longer than initially thought. Overall, when it comes to security issues Budget 2016 focuses internationally on providing targeted aid for those on the frontlines of conflict and crises, and domestically on strengthening existing law enforcement and cyber security resources. BOOSTING SHARED SERVICES. While there is no new funding specifically for agencies like CSIS and the CSE, the bulk of money for domestic cyber security will be funnelled through Shared Services. The former Conservative government created the department in 2012. It is responsible for managing the government's networks and systems, such as email. Budget 2016 allocates $77.4 million over five years, starting this year, for Shared Services to update its cyber security network, patch existing problems and make sure government networks are protected from cyber threats, malicious software and unauthorized access. As well, Shared Services will also get $383.3 million over the next two fiscal years to transform the government's information technology systems, data centres and communication networks. That decision comes on the heels of an Auditor General report that suggested Shared Services was having problems maintaining and improving government IT services. COUNTER-RADICALIZATION OFFICE. On that front, the Liberals ticked off an election promise by announcing funding for the creation of an Office of the Community Outreach and Counter-Radicalization Coordinator. That office will be responsible for coordinating national counter-radicalization initiatives and assessing what works and what doesn't as various municipalities and provinces implement their own efforts. The office will get $35 million over five years, with $10 million each year after that. iPolitics (2016-03-22)

Spy agencies expect more funding in government's upcoming budget CSIS, CSE forecast additional $95 million from Ottawa to address security mandate

Canada's spies are expecting a budget boost when the Liberals table their first fiscal plan next month, documents released Tuesday show. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) have estimated an additional $95 million for intelligence and cyberdefence operations next year. The figures were released in the government's main estimates document, a best-guess scenario for departments and agencies released a month before the Liberals table their first budget. CSIS expects to see an additional $35.5 million "in support of Canada's national security and the safety of Canadians." A breakdown of CSIS budget - grouped vaguely into "intelligence" and "security screening" - shows most of the increase will go to intelligence operations. CSE, the electronic spying and cyberdefence agency, is expecting a net increase of $59.5 million "in support" of its mandate. Specifically, CSE expects to spend the money to increase its "capacity to address cyber threats and advancements in technology." Together, the two spy agencies estimate they'll spend $1.2 billion in 2016-17, a slight increase compared with the 2015-16 estimates of $1.075 billion. CSE spokeswoman Lauri Sullivan said in a statement that the funding will go to addressing several "key vulnerabilities" in government networks, as well as moving forward with the national Cyber Security Strategy. "CSE's mandate, including our unique skills in areas like cyber defence, are critical in advancing Canada's national security priorities," Sullivan wrote. Toronto Star, A12 (2016-02-24)

Why it's hard to draw a line between Edward Snowden and the Paris attacks

In a pair of public appearances this week, CIA Director John O. Brennan made clear that he blames leaks by former intelligence contractor Edward Snowden for enabling terrorists to evade detection. "Because of a number of unauthorized disclosures, and a lot of hand-wringing over the government's role in the effort to try to uncover these terrorists," Brennan said, the CIA and others agencies have lost use of critical tools needed "to find these terrorists." Brennan's assertion has become a refrain in the two years since Snowden exposed details about a range of U.S. surveillance programs. And former CIA director R. James Woolsey went further, saying on Sunday, "I think Snowden has blood on his hands from these killings in France." Washington Post (Hamilton Spectator)

Alleged plotter remains shadowy figure

Much about Abdelhamid Abaaoud's path to armed Islamic radicalism remains mysterious. In the words of Koen Geens, the Belgian justice minister, he mutated from a student at an upscale Brussels school into "an extremely professional commando," one seemingly able to slip across borders at will, someone who openly mocked the inability of Western law enforcement agencies to catch him. On Wednesday, the fate of the son of an immigrant shopkeeper from Morocco remained unclear. Police raided a suburban Paris apartment where they believed he was hiding. The siege ended with two deaths and seven arrests but no definitive information on Abaaoud, who French authorities have called the mastermind of the violence that killed at least 129 in Paris last week. The wanted jihadi's own father believes prison - where he served time for petty crimes - changed him for the worse. After his son got out, Omar Abaaoud noticed "signs of radicalization," the elder Abaaoud's lawyer, Nathalie Gallant, told RTBF broadcasting Wednesday. If so, that would fit the pattern of a number of jihadis who were radicalized in prison. * Le cerveau des attaques mort ?

L'Europe nageait en pleine confusion hier, alors que tous s'interrogeaient à savoir si le présumé «cerveau» derrière les attentats de Paris était bel et bien mort lors de l'assaut de sept heures à Saint-Denis. «Le présumé chef des attentats de Paris (Abdelhamid Abaaoud) a été tué hier lors de l'assaut de la police française, ont affirmé deux hauts responsables des autorités européennes», a écrit le Washington Post hier. Mais aucun autre média ni les autorités françaises n'ont confirmé cette information, ce qui a soulevé plusieurs questionnements dans la population. L'opération a été «extrêmement difficile » en raison de «l'usage de fusils d'assaut, de tirs de sniper et d'une grande offensive d'explosifs», a lancé le procureur de Paris, François Molins. L'opération qui a duré sept heures visait bel et bien le présumé «cerveau» des attentats de vendredi. Au moins deux personnes sont mortes, dont une kamikaze qui «a activé son gilet explosif au début de l'assaut», a précisé la police qui n'a pas confirmé les noms. De plus, huit personnes ont été placées en garde à vue après l'opération, mais ni Abaaoud, ni Salah Abdeslam, l'un des suspects des attaques toujours en fuite, ne figurent parmi elles. Une information qui laisse donc croire qu'Abaaoud serait le deuxième mort. AIR FRANCE FLIGHT DIVERTED

Passengers aboard Air France Flight 055 didn't learn that a bomb threat was the reason their Paris-bound flight was being diverted to Halifax until after they landed Tuesday night. Genevieve Lapeyre, a pediatric anesthesiologist from Geneva, was flying back to Europe after a meeting in Washington, D.C. She is half-Swiss and half-French, and planned a three-day layover in Paris. The terrorist attacks Friday gave her a strong wish to be in the city. (...) None of the passengers panicked, but they felt something odd was going on, she said. At one point, she wondered if there had been another attack against Paris and the aircraft couldn't go there. After the Boeing 777 touched down at about 10:15 p.m., she soon realized there was something happening regarding her flight. "I saw the firemen and everything, and I said, 'OK, there is something else.'" Lapeyre said the pilot seemed to be trying to control his emotions. "He said, 'Don't worry.' He was too much trying to reassure us." On the tarmac, passengers were told to grab their belongings and get off the plane, which they did quickly. However, they were then housed for about 30 minutes in a bus parked alongside the aircraft, which some considered dangerous, she said. Halifax RCMP spokesman Cpl. Greg Church said 262 passengers and crew got off the jet within 15 minutes of landing, which is when officers began checking for explosives; none were found. The jet was declared explosives-free at 4:28 a.m. Wednesday. The passengers were taken to a secure area to pass through customs. 'Like A War Zone'

2 Dead, 8 in custody after paris police launch a massive early-morning raid against a suspected terror cell located in a reinforced apartment When Tagara Traoré, a former revolutionary soldier in his native Burkina Faso, was jolted awake by a boom early Wednesday, his "military reflex" kicked in. "You get up quickly and either hide or try to get out," he said. In socked feet and wearing the sweatpants he was sleeping in, he grabbed his key and ran out the door of his fourthstorey apartment, only to find a battalion of police rushing up the stairs, headlamps glaring. "I started sensing tear gas that was coming up the stairwell. I thought the building was on fire," he said. "The police told me, 'Go down, down, down!' There were so many they had to move aside to let me out." It was 4:20 a.m., and he had been caught in the middle of a massive anti-terror operation that quickly became a protracted gun battle between police and terror suspects. A woman in the targeted apartment in the Paris suburb of Saint-Denis, identified by French media as a native of nearby Clichy, was one of the dead. Initial reports said she killed herself by detonating an explosive vest, but the French prosecutor's office later said the "point needs to be verified by an analysis of the body and human remains." At least one other suspect in the apartment was killed and eight people were taken into custody. Five police officers suffered minor injuries, and a police dog - Diesel, a Belgian shepherd - was killed by the terrorists, according to the national police. Paris prosecutor François Molin said the targeted apartment had a fortified door that withstood initial police attempts to break in and gave the terrorists time to mobilize and return fire. Prochaine station, la guerre

Il devait être 4h20 quand Fares s'est mis à crier. «Maman! Maman! La guerre commence! Il y a des bombes!» Fares a 7 ans. De grands yeux noisette dans lesquels on lit l'effroi. «Il ne sait même pas c'est quoi, la guerre», me dit sa mère Souhila, 38 ans. Souhila, elle, sait. Elle est née en Algérie... J'étais dans l'avion quand l'assaut antiterroriste a été donné à Saint-Denis, dans la banlieue nord de Paris, non loin du Stade de France. Dès que l'avion s'est posé, des cellulaires de passagers ont sonné. «C'est la pagaille à Saint-Denis.» La «pagaille», le mot est faible. C'est Fares qui avait raison. Ça ressemblait plus à une guerre. Rue Corbillon, à l'angle de la rue de la République, au moins deux personnes ont été tuées, dont une femme kamikaze qui a activé sa ceinture d'explosifs. Un commando, lourdement armé, qui semblait prêt à passer à l'acte, a été démantelé. Pendant une heure, les habitants du quartier ont entendu des tirs nourris. Le bruit était si fort que certains ont cru qu'il y avait un bombardement. Il y a eu au moins 5000 munitions tirées par la police. Un immeuble éventré, criblé de balles. Des voisins terrorisés. Comme si on était à Gaza et non en banlieue parisienne. L'assaut a duré sept heures, durant lesquelles le quartier a été bouclé, le métro, fermé, les écoles aussi. Des résidents ont été évacués. Les riverains ont été sommés de ne pas sortir de chez eux. Une fois l'assaut terminé, j'ai pu prendre le métro pour la guerre. La Presse, A4/Front

 Paris attacks: Extremists may strike next with chemical, biological weapons, French PM says

With France still reeling from last week's deadly attacks in Paris, Prime Minister Manuel Valls warned Thursday that Islamic extremists might at some point use chemical or biological weapons, and urged lawmakers to extend a national state of emergency by three months. "Terrorism hit France not because of what it is doing in Iraq and Syria ... but for what it is," Valls told the lower house of Parliament. He added, "We know that there could also be a risk of chemical or biological weapons." Valls did not say there was a specific threat involving such weapons. The French Interior Ministry and Paris prosecutor's office, meanwhile, said it still remains unclear whether the suspected mastermind of last week's attacks, in which 129 people were killed and hundreds of others wounded, has been killed or is still at large. Officials said authorities are working on determining whether 27-year-old Belgian Abdelhamid Abaaoud was among those killed in a chaotic and bloody raid on an apartment in the Paris suburb of Saint-Denis on Wednesday.  Belgium vows crackdown on terrorists, boost security spending

Belgium's prime minister on Thursday called for changes to the country's constitution to combat extremists, and promised hundreds of millions of euros to boost the security forces. Addressing the federal parliament as security forces were conducting raids around the capital Brussels, Charles Michel pledged to use changes to the constitution to extend preventive detention times for suspects from 24 hours to 72 hours. He also affirmed that Belgium would move forward alone on a system of airline passenger information sharing that European Union nations have been incapable of agreeing in four years.  EU to tighten anti-terror laws

The European Commission, the EU's executive arm, will expand its anti-terrorist legislation early next year to target fighters like those involved in the Paris attacks. The new measures will widen the range of actions punishable under the legislation to include travelling for the purpose of carrying out a terrorist act, facilitating travel or receiving training to carry out an attack. In a direct response to the Paris killings, EU citizens who travel outside the bloc and then return to carry out attacks will be considered as foreign fighters, and those helping their movement will also face prosecution. The bloc's Migration, Home Affairs and Citizenship Commissioner, Dimitris Avramopoulos, told a news conference Wednesday that the Commission would have proposals ready by the end of November and wants to see them enacted "within the first two months of the next year."  Killer's passport fueling fear of refugees

After the bombs and Kalashnikov fire of the Paris attacks, a mere document - a passport - found near the body of an attacker is generating a new wave of dread throughout Europe and beyond. But whether the document ended up there by chance, or was part of an elaborate plot to sow panic, is not clear. Regardless of the answer, the passport has played into the Islamic State group's hands by raising concerns that militants may be marching alongside the thousands of asylum seekers flowing into Europe. That possibility is redefining the debate over immigration in Europe and even the United States, and prompting a backlash against Muslim refugees. The far-right French leader Marine Le Pen called for an immediate end to the flow of migrants into France, while across the Atlantic about half of U.S. governors are taking steps to prevent absorbing Syrian refugees in their states, citing the passport. "This terrorist attack will clearly change Europe's refugee policies and how the arrivals in Europe are treated," said Konrad Pedziwiatr, a sociologist and expert on Islam in Europe at the Krakow University of Economics. "Already the open-door policy (in Germany and Sweden) of welcoming refugees was going to be reformed because the inflow is so significant that countries cannot cope with the numbers," he said. "What the Paris attacks add to this difficult situation is the additional element of fear." A passport bearing the name of Ahmad Al Mohammad, 25, was found near one of the suicide bombers who blew himself up outside the Stade de France football stadium. It indicates that he entered Greece from Turkey on Oct. 3 and later passed through Serbia and Croatia, getting registered in every new country. The passport's authenticity has not been determined, but fingerprints of the attacker match those taken by Greece and Serbia. The other attackers who have been identified so far are all European citizens. The oddness that a passport - an intact one - was found near a man who blew himself up is creating suspicions that it is part of a plan by the Islamic State to create a backlash against the refugees. "I have never heard of terrorists carrying passports with them," Pedziwiatr said. Associated Press (Whig-Standard, B5, Telegraph-Journal, Times & Transcript)

 ISIS is slowly killing the European experiment

As neighbours and allies declare solidarity with France, few are facing up to the inevitable: the fact that fallout from Friday's terrorist attack in Paris will stall - perhaps even reverse - the political integration of Europe. The discovery that most of the terrorists identified so far were Muslims born in France, using neighbouring Belgium as a base, will add volume to loud demands for an end to the open-border policy among the 28 members of the European Union. Pressure to terminate what is known as the Schengen Area - a pillar of the EU political integration project, along with the now-debased euro and attempts to unify foreign and defence policies - has been building as about a million refugees from the Middle East and North Africa have flooded into Europe (...) While ISIS has taken responsibility for the outrage and was, at the very least, the inspiration for it, the Paris killings were, like almost every other terrorist attack in Canada, the United States and Europe in the last 14 years, a home-grown affair. Neither Canada nor the U.S. is immune to the popular suspicion that the floods of Syrian and Iraqi refugees are an easy route for ISIS to plant terrorists in target countries. The governors of over half the 50 states in the U.S. have said they will not participate in settling Syrian refugees. And the new government of Prime Minister Justin

Trudeau is facing growing pressure from both the public and provincial governments - on whom much of the responsibility for resettling refugees will fall - to rethink his campaign pledge to allow 25,000 Syrian migrants into Canada by the end of the year. iPolitics

 French expats still feel sting an ocean away

Juliette Elchinger was home in Montreal on Friday evening when her Twitter feed lit up with news of the terrorist assaults in Paris. "I went into a state of shock," the native Parisian said. "I just started to shake and cry." Five days later, the 19-year-old was still struggling to make sense of the violence visited on her cherished city. She stood on Wednesday surrounded by knots of other students and staff at the University of Montreal, some holding hands and wiping tears off stricken faces, for a sombre gathering of commemoration. In the days since the shocking attacks took the lives of 129 people, Ms. Elchinger has attended solidarity marches and commemorations, monitored news from Paris obsessively and joined other members of Montreal's large expatriate French community. Some have connections to the tragedy; Ms. Elchinger's best friend lost a professor, who was slain at the Bataclan theatre along with 88 others who had attended a rock concert there. For the expats, separation from events back home has fed feelings of loss and helplessness, along with a deepened call to their French identity. Globe and Mail, A9

 Free world solidarity after Paris

An editorial states, "There aren't a lot of game-changing moments in international affairs, says Peter Van Praagh. But the ISIS terrorist attacks on Paris last weekend, like the 9-11 attacks on New York and Washington in 2001, fall into that rare category. It is, he says, one of those "events that turn things." It has acutely heightened the public sense of "how vulnerable open societies are." But it has also produced, he believes, "a fundamental solidarity and common understanding that something has to be done to address it." "We are all affected now," the security specialist told our editorial board on Wednesday, after arriving in Nova Scotia to chair, for the seventh time, the annual Halifax International Security Forum. The forum will bring 300 delegates from 60 democratic countries to the city this weekend to brainstorm the complex angles of peace and security - military, political, economic, educational and cultural. The group ranges from four-star generals to ministers to aid organizations, journalists and scholars. Their agenda runs the gamut from building new anti-terror alliances to cutting off the financing of terrorism through drug and human trafficking. There was plenty of evidence in Halifax and elsewhere this week to show security issues now touch us all." Chronicle-Herald, A6

 Hollande faces the enemy from within

The streets of Paris are no strangers to mass bloodshed. The City of Light has borne witness to more than its share of extreme violence over the centuries. The worst of it has not been perpetrated by a foreign army. The enemy has most often come from within. From the Wars of Religion, through the Revolution and the Reign of Terror, to the Paris Commune, the French often worked through their differences in the bloodiest ways possible. Since the 1960s, Paris has been a repeated target of terrorists, often French citizens or immigrants, aggrieving in some way France's unresolved colonial past in North Africa or its mandates in the Middle East. The inspiration for the most recent attacks may have come from Iraq or Syria, but their perpetrators came from the Paris suburbs. The January assaults on the satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo and a kosher supermarket were conducted by French-born radicalized Muslims. Most of those involved in Friday's sickening attacks on cafés and a concert hall appear to have had similar backgrounds. "We know, and it's cruel to say it, it was French people who killed French people on Friday," President François Hollande said in a speech for the ages. "There are, living on our soil, individuals who move from delinquency to radicalization and then to terrorist criminality." Globe and Mail

Dans la foulée de la série d'attentats à Paris, le président français François Hollande a encouragé ses compatriotes à «défier les terroristes» en continuant de vivre normalement, en fréquentant les cafés, les musées, et les stades sans tomber dans la crainte et la xénophobie. Les terroristes prennent la vie des innocents, mais ils veulent aussi suspendre celle des autres, a soutenu le président, mercredi, lors d'un discours télévisé devant les maires de partout au pays. Il estime que les Français ont le «devoir» de poursuivre leurs activités normales. Il a martelé que la vie «devait reprendre pleinement», ajoutant que la sécurité serait resserrée dans les lieux publics. Le président français a assuré que la France resterait un pays «de liberté, de mouvement, de culture» qui ne «pliera pas à la peur». François Hollande s'est engagé à travailler avec ses alliés pour détruire le groupe armé État islamique, qui a revendiqué la responsabilité des attaques dans la capitale française qui ont fait 129 morts et 368 blessés. Dans une allocution prononcée quelques heures après une opération antiterroriste de la police en banlieue de Paris, le président a réitéré que la France était «en guerre avec les terroristes», mais il a aussi appelé les Français à la retenue. Jokers, terrorists and why we'll always have Paris

Canadians do not live in a police state. But as at least one person who is alleged to have donned a Joker mask and threatened to kill an Arab a week recently discovered, we do live in a state that has police. And it seems those cops know their way around the internet. Yesterday afternoon, less than 48 hours after the appearance of a video depicting an individual wearing the mask, citing the Paris massacres and claiming the killings would begin next week, a 24-year-old man was arraigned at the Montreal courthouse in connection with the incident. ISIS aggressively pursuing development of chemical weapons: U.S. official

The Islamic State group is aggressively pursuing development of chemical weapons, setting up a branch dedicated to research and experiments with the help of scientists from Iraq, Syria and elsewhere in the region, according to Iraqi and U.S. intelligence officials. Their quest raises an alarming scenario for the West, given the determination to strike major cities that the group showed with its bloody attack last week in Paris. On Thursday, French Prime Minister Manuel Valls warned that Islamic extremists might at some point use chemical or biological weapons. "Terrorism hit France not because of what it is doing in Iraq and Syria ... but for what it is," Valls told the lower house of Parliament. "We know that there could also be a risk of chemical or biological weapons," he added, though he did not talk of a specific threat. U.S. intelligence officials don't believe IS has the capability to develop sophisticated weapons like nerve gas that are most suited for a terrorist attack on a civilian target. So far the group has used mustard gas on the battlefield in Iraq and Syria. Associated Press (Global News)

Who is Abdelhamid Abaaoud, suspected ringleader of the Paris terror attack?

The suspected ringleader of the Paris attacks has been on the counterterrorism radar for some time and was targeted in French airstrikes on Syria last month, a French counterterrorism source told CNN. Abdelhamid Abaaoud, in his late 20s, is believed to be close to ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, and is probably the link between the senior ISIS leadership and ISIS operatives in Europe, European counterterrorism officials have said. Authorities raided a building Paris suburb of Saint-Denis that is linked to Abaaoud. French police on Wednesday were trying to determine if Abaaoud had been in the apartment, or if he is even still alive. Investigators were using DNA to analyze the body parts found in the Saint-Denis building where a female suspect first blew herself up, then French forces used powerful munitions to combat others, which led to one floor of the building collapsing. French military forces carried out airstrikes in October targeting an ISIS training camp for foreign fighters in Raqqa, Syria, in an effort to kill Abaaoud, the French counterterrorism source said. CNN

No need to raise threat level: Goodale

There's no reason to raise Canada's threat level, even in the wake of the deadly attacks in Paris last week, says Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. The minister appeared at a news conference — flanked by key security officials — to assure Canadians that authorities are being especially vigilant and doing everything possible to keep the public safe. The threat level has remained at "medium" since October 2014. Canadian Security Intelligence Service director Michel Coulombe and RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson said they had found no Canadian links to the assaults in France by militants from the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant that killed some 129 people and wounded hundreds of others. Officials also stressed that the thousands of refugees Canada has agreed to accept from strife-torn Syria would undergo thorough security checks. Goodale urged people to be alert following the Paris attacks, but said Canada is basically safe and peaceful. The minister said now is not the time for what he called "vigilante retribution" — a reference to a deliberately set fire at an Ontario mosque and an assault against a veiled woman in Toronto. "Now more than ever is a time for all of us to support our fellow citizens. We need to demonstrate to each other and to the world our values of diversity and inclusion," Goodale said. "Canadians will stand together and face these times with skill, with resolve, courage and fortitude. Terrorists will not change our values or the quality of Canadian life." In the days ahead we will continue to take every possible step to keep Canadians safe, and do so "in a way that respects our national character," he said. Canadian Press (Hamilton Spectator, City News, CFRA, MacLean's, CBC News); La Presse Canadienne (La Presse)

Paris attacks raise travel jitters among some Canadians

Some Canadians are thinking twice about travelling abroad for now, as last week's attacks in Paris and other recent incidents have raised fears among travellers and people working in the travel industry. Despite assurances from authorities that it's safe to travel, Friday's attacks in Paris, Thursday's twin bombings in Beirut and the recent bombing of a Russian passenger plane have prompted some to cancel or reschedule their trips (...) But Anthony Roman, an aviation security expert and former commercial pilot based in New York, said he doesn't think passengers or airline crews should change their travel plans. "From a geopolitical or counterterror point of view, I think it's a mistake," he said. "This is what ISIS is looking for. It's looking to disrupt the West, disrupt the transportation system, disrupt individuals' lives (...)" Canada's Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said on Wednesday that there's no reason to raise the country's threat level, as authorities are being extra vigilant and doing everything they can to keep Canadians safe. UPDATE - Paris attacks: RCMP investigating whether voice on ISIS recording is Canadian

The RCMP is examining whether the voice on an audio recording attributed to ISIS and released in the wake of the Paris attacks belongs to a Canadian. ISIS released audio statements in English and Arabic on Saturday, claiming responsibility for the co-ordinated Paris attacks Friday that claimed 129 lives. Const. Annie Delisle, a spokeswoman for the RCMP, confirmed to CBC News on Wednesday that the police force is aware of media reports about the apparently Canadian voice, "and are following up." On Monday, CBC News asked three linguistics specialists to analyze the recording, and all said the voice has some distinctly Canadian speech patterns. Security experts and the linguists say the voice on the audio recording has telltale inflections and characteristics of Canadian English. "The fellow on it sounded to me like he was ... Canadian, and probably specifically from Ontario," Erik Thomas, a linguistics professor at the University of North Carolina, told CBC News. Suspected architect of Paris attacks is dead, according to two senior intelligence officials

A massive police raid Wednesday killed the suspected ringleader of the Paris attacks during a blitz-style sweep, two senior European intelligence officials said, after investigators followed leads that the fugitive militant was holed up north of the French capital and could be plotting another wave of violence. More than 100 police and soldiers stormed the building during a seven-hour siege that left two dead including the suspected overseer of the Paris bloodshed, Abdelhamid Abaaoud, who had once boasted he could slip easily between Europe and the Islamic State strongholds in Syria. The confirmation was made after forensic experts combed through the aftermath — blown-out windows, floors collapsed by explosions — presumably seeking DNA and other evidence. The intelligence officials spoke on condition of anonymity before announcements from authorities. The death of the Belgian extremist Abaaoud closed one major dragnet in the international search for suspects from Friday's carnage that killed at least 129 people and wounded 350 others. At least one other suspect believed closed linked to the Paris attacks remains at large. But it raised other worrisome questions, including the apparent ability of Abaaoud to evade intelligence agencies while traveling through Europe and whether other possible Islamic State cells could be seeking to strike again. Suspected Paris attack mastermind, now targeted in police operation, bragged about movements

The presumed mastermind of last week's devastating attacks in Paris once bragged about being so slippery he could move undetected between Syria and Belgium, his home country. On Wednesday he was targeted in a police operation in Paris. Explosions and gunfire rang out as French police stormed a building in the Paris suburb of Saint-Denis where Abdelhamid Abaaoud was believed to be hiding, a senior police official told The Associated Press. Authorities said a woman blew herself up and a man was killed. Seven people were arrested. Police did not identify them. The official was not authorized to be publicly named according to police rules, but is informed about the operation. On Monday, French authorities identified Abaaoud, the child of Moroccan immigrants who grew up in the Belgian capital's multiethnic Molenbeek neighbourhood, as the presumed mastermind of last Friday's attacks that killed 129 people and wounded over 350. He also is believed to have links to earlier attacks that were thwarted: one against a Paris-bound high-speed train that was foiled by three young Americans in August, and the other against a church in the French capital's suburbs. Paris attacks: 2 killed as police target alleged plotter Abdelhamid Abaaoud

A woman suicide bomber blew herself up and another militant died on Wednesday when police raided an apartment in the Paris suburb of Saint-Denis seeking suspects in last week's attacks in the French capital. Three sources told Reuters the raid stopped a jihadist cell that had been planning an attack on Paris's business district, La Defense, after co-ordinated bombings and shootings killed 129 across the city. Officials said police had been hunting Abdelhamid Abaaoud, a Belgian Islamist militant accused of being the ringleader of the Nov. 13 carnage, but more than nine hours after the launch of the pre-dawn raid it was still unclear if they had found him. Seven people were arrested in the operation, which started with a barrage of gunfire, including three people who were pulled from the apartment, officials said. "It is impossible to tell you who was arrested. We are in the process of verifying that. Everything will be done to determine who is who," Paris prosecutor François Molins said at the end of the operation. Defence Minister Sajjan on fear of ISIS after Paris attacks

Defence Minister Harjit S. Sajjan, an ex-soldier who confidently declared prior to the Paris terror attacks that Canadians shouldn't fear ISIS, said Wednesday he wasn't trying to suggest Canada is immune from that kind of carnage. The B.C. minister said he was only trying to send both a reassuring signal to the public and a defiant one to an organization that is increasingly spreading its terror web outside Iraq and Syria. "I want to give confidence to the Canadian population that we have some phenomenal capabilities" in terms of military, police and intelligence resources working to prevent an attack, the rookie MP for Vancouver South said in an interview. He also didn't want to give "ISIS that satisfaction that we fear them, and that we're going to change our way of life because of them." No one can guarantee Canada won't face a Paris-like assault, he said. But "if an attack does occur we have the resources and people in place to be able to deal with it." Sajjan cited his experience in Afghanistan, where Canada lost 158 soldiers between 2002-2011. Some days there were casualties as a result of Taliban ambushes and roadside bombs. "Were we afraid of the Taliban? No. One day we would take a hit, but we would be out patrolling again the next day." Postmedia Network (Vancouver Sun) (2015-11-18)

Two Suspects Sold Bar in Brussels Not Long Before Paris Attacks

Two suspects in the Paris attacks sold the bar they owned in Brussels six weeks before the onslaught, according to public records seen by The Wall Street Journal, and it was shut down shortly after the sale over concern drugs had been sold and consumed there. Brahim Abdeslam, who blew himself up outside the stadium in Paris, and his brother Salah—the subject of an international arrest warrant issued by Belgium because of suspicions he rented the car used in the attack—sold their stakes in the Les Beguines bar on Sept. 30, according to public documents. The records show they transferred ownership of the bar to a person based in a Belgian town on the French border. The documents didn't say how much it was sold for. Paris restaurants defy terrorism in the most French way possible

Paris is on edge once again today, after police launched a predawn raid against suspected terrorists involved in last week's attacks. Two suspects have been killed and several others have been arrested, but for a few fleeting hours last night, it seemed as if normalcy was within reach. On Tuesday, Parisians flocked to local restaurants and bars in a uniquely French display of solidarity. It was all part of a social media campaign called #TousAuBistrot ("everyone to the bar"). Led by the restaurant reviews site Le Fooding, the campaign called on Parisians to spend their Tuesday evening at bars, restaurants, and cafe terraces around the city, as an act of defiance against terrorists who directly targeted a cornerstone of French culture Friday night. Among the six sites attacked last week were five restaurants and bars in the city's trendy 10th and 11th arrondissements. The attacks left 129 dead and 352 injured. The Verge (2015-11-18)

Anonymous Publishes Three Guides To Teach You "How To Hack" And Fight ISIS

The war between the hackers and terrorists is escalating quickly in the wake of the recent Paris attacks. In the short time frame of past two days, Anonymous hacktivist group has declared an open war on ISIS. In response, ISIS was quick to retaliate and called Anonymous 'idiots' who just know how to 'hack email and Twitter accounts'. In another development, Anonymous has released a series of guides urging the people to take part in their biggest ever operation called #OpParis. The guides include how-to instructions that tell the ways to hack the ISIS-affiliated websites and social media accounts. The rivalry of ISIS and Anonymous dates back to the Charlie Hebdo massacre in January. Anonymous has continued its attacks on ISIS and already exposed more than a thousand Twitter accounts. To train and bring the newer generation of hacktivists, Anonymous has released three how-to guides. These guides were posted on an IRC channel and Anonymous encouraged everyone to join this war against ISIS regardless of their computer skills. FossBytes (2015-11-18)

Overview / Vue d'ensemble

- Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale announced on June 16 the tabling of "An Act to establish the National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians" to create a multi-party Parliamentary committee to oversee national security activities.
- The legislation outlines how a security-cleared committee of seven MPs and two senators would review the activities of national security agencies, with no more than four members from the party forming the government. The committee would have wide authority to "scrutinize any national security matter", with the Public Safety Minister having authority to stop any review that could jeopardize national security.
- Media coverage was fairly significant at the time of the announcement with articles appearing across online and print media, as well as television coverage of Ministers Goodale and Leblanc making the announcement. Minister Goodale was also interviewed by CTV News' Power and Politics. Tone of coverage was neutral in most news items and no opinion pieces appeared on the day of the announcement. Coverage dropped significantly over the course of the day.

Special committee of MPs, senators would monitor intelligence agencies

The Liberal government is moving to create a multi-party committee of parliamentarians — bound forever to secrecy — to serve as another set of eyes on federal intelligence activities. Legislation tabled Thursday would authorize the security-cleared committee of seven MPs and two senators to scrutinize the intelligence work of more than a dozen agencies. A maximum of four MPs from the governing party could be members. The goal is to ensure security and intelligence organizations are effective while protecting Canadian values, rights and freedoms, said Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, who called it the most important Liberal promise on national security. All of Canada's major allies — including the United States, Britain and France — have such committees. "We have studied what those other countries do," Goodale told a news conference, adding Canada has learned from the examples — both good and bad. The Canadian committee would have a high degree of independence, power to delve into any national security matter and access to classified government information. However, ministers could withhold information from the members if handing it over would harm national security... On paper at least, the proposed committee is a stronger body than the equivalents in Australia and Britain, said Craig Forcese, a law professor at the University of Ottawa who specializes in national security. However, Forcese has concerns about the government's ability to veto the committee's plans, limit its ability to see secret materials and redact its reports. Overall, the legislation is "a very good bill" that would create a long overdue role for parliamentarians, said Wesley Wark, an intelligence historian who also teaches at the University of Ottawa. However, Wark added, the real test will be finding the right members, setting up a secretariat to support the committee, actually doing good work, earning the trust of the security and intelligence community and "finding ways to really inform the Canadian public about sensitive intelligence and security issues." Canadian Press (Metro News)

New spy watchdog will have power to examine 'any activity, any operation': Goodale

Sweeping powers to scrutinize "any issue, any activity, any operation" will be granted to a new committee of parliamentarians to watch over federal spying and other clandestine security and intelligence activities, the government has announced. The long-promised Bill C-22, tabled in the Commons Thursday, proposes creation of an unprecedented "national security and intelligence committee of parliamentarians" to hold to greater account the nation's two chief spy services and at least 15 other departments and agencies with national security responsibilities. The move fulfils a major Liberal election promise to increase parliamentary scrutiny of national security operations to offset the expansive and controversial counterterrorism powers under the Anti-terrorism Act of 2015, formerly Bill C-51, to investigate, detain, arrest, silence or otherwise thwart individuals suspected as threats to the security of Canada. The all-party committee of nine MPs and two Senators, to be chosen by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and supported by a small secretariat, would be sworn to permanent secrecy and handed a broad mandate to probe, mainly ex post facto, any and all national security activities to gauge whether they are effective, efficient and legal. Its primary investigative tool would be a statutory power to access many of the nation's most guarded secrets. "They are going to have the ability to look at any issue, any activity, any operation, any document in the government of Canada that relates to security and intelligence matters," Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale told reporters after the bill's unveiling. "They will be able to ask questions and conduct inquiries and satisfy themselves that two important objectives are being met: to make sure our security and intelligence agencies are being effective in keeping Canadians safe and to make sure they are safeguarding the rights and freedoms of Canadians."... Goodale responded to that concern: "If the minister believes that a particular examination at a particular point in time will be injurious to national security then the minister has to give reasons. It's not just a capricious judgment. "If this committee makes it known in the public domain that they are unhappy with what they have seen and that there is something in the security intelligence operations that they believe is unfolding in an improper way, putting that comment in the public domain will, quite frankly, set off alarm bells right across the country and it will then be incumbent upon the prime minister to explain himself or herself to Canadians. This puts an extraordinary public discipline on the process."... But Conservative MP and public safety critic Erin O'Toole said that is one of several flaws. "It's basically a PMO extension with a whole range of exclusions" for the government to deny it access to needed top-secret information. "This should report to Parliament. They're also making it very easy for a lot of ministries and agencies to avoid sharing information with this committee," he said. Current review of the national security apparatus and the handling of public complaints is now siloed within three small watchdog agencies, led by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), which conducts after-the-fact reviews of the operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the country's human spy service. There is no independent oversight or review of the Canada Border Services Agency, which has a dual intelligence and law-enforcement role, and several other arms of government with national security duties. Depending on how transparent a government chooses to be, sending controversial national security issues to a secret committee could effectively launder executive decisions by purposely routing them to the committee to limit or eliminate further public exposure, say some experts. It also could potentially hamper the opposition's ability to critique government. National Post

Bill to create spy oversight committee introduced in House of Commons

A nine-member, multi-party committee of parliamentarians would oversee federal intelligence activities under a long-anticipated bill tabled Thursday. The legislation would authorize a security-cleared committee of seven MPs and two senators to scrutinize the intelligence work of more than a dozen agencies. A maximum of four MPs from the governing party could be members. The goal is to ensure security and intelligence organizations are effective while protecting Canadian values, rights and freedoms, said Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. All of Canada's major allies — including the United States, Britain and France — have such committees. "We have studied what those other committees do," Goodale told a news conference, adding Canada has learned from the examples — both good and bad. The Canadian committee would have power to delve into any national security matter. However, ministers could withhold information from the members if handing it over would harm national security. Liberals to create new committee to oversee Canadian security agencies

Canada's new committee of parliamentarians overseeing national-security operations will be made up of seven MPs and two senators. The legislative oversight committee overseeing agencies like the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the RCMP will have wide-ranging authorities to "scrutinize any national security matter," the federal government announced on Thursday, after legislation to create the committee was tabled. However, the minister of public safety "would have the authority to stop such a review if it would be injurious to national security," the government said. Public Safety Minister Ralph

Goodale told reporters on Wednesday that everyone on the permanent committee will swear an oath of secrecy. The committee was inspired by a number of foreign models, especially the nine-member Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament in Britain. Mr. Goodale added that he does not want a system like the one in the U.S. Congress, which is prone to leaks. "[Members of the committee] will have to swear an oath with respect to the information that they obtain, and violation of that oath is a criminal offence and a breach of trust," he said. "Illegally, improperly divulging information that is contrary to the national security of Canada is a serious criminal offence." The committee will have "extraordinary authority to examine all of the security and intelligence operations of the government of Canada," with access to classified information from agencies such as CSIS and the RCMP, Mr. Goodale said. Liberals propose joint oversight committee on national security

The federal government today introduced new legislation to create a joint committee to oversee national security matters, one of three public safety-related bills the Liberals are tabling this week. "This new oversight committee would allow members of the Senate and the House of Commons to scrutinize how departments and agencies across the government of Canada - with national security and intelligence responsibilities - are operating and report to Parliament on their findings and their recommendations, Government House leader Dominic LeBlanc said in Ottawa on Thursday. The nine-member committee would be made up of seven MPs and two senators who would have the clearance to delve into all matters of national security. LeBlanc served notice on Wednesday that he would table the bill, titled "An Act to establish the National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians and to make consequential amendments to certain Acts." The Liberals campaigned on a promise to create a committee tasked with overseeing all of Canada's national security agencies. CBC News

National security committee bill tabled

The government's long-awaited all-party national security committee should be up and running by fall, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said Thursday after tabling the bill creating the intelligence review body. The formation of a committee of legislators to review intelligence activities was a key demand of opponents of the Harper government's security legislation, C-51. All of Canada's major allies, including the United States, Britain and France, have such committees. While the government will have the power to shut down the committee's reviews, withhold information and review committee reports, Goodale says it will still be able to hold governments to account. "We have written the legislation to withstand the test of time and if some future hypothetical prime minister were in the process of abusing his or her powers, this committee would be in a position to say very loudly to Canadians, 'something that shouldn't be happening is going on and you ought to be concerned,'" Goodale said in a press conference. "If that eventually happens at some time in future, this committee would be extraordinarily valuable." The new legislation will create a nine-member joint committee that includes two members appointed from the Senate and seven members from the House of Commons. The appointments will be made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the prime minister and no more than four of the members from the House of Commons can be from the governing party. The committee will have a mandate to scrutinize activities, including ongoing operations, by any of the 17 government departments and agencies that deal with national security, including the RCMP, CBSA, CSIS, CSE and others such as the Department of Foreign Affairs. iPolitics

Canada to give MPs oversight of security, intelligence agencies

Canada will set up a committee of legislators to oversee security and intelligence agencies and ensure their work does not infringe upon civil liberties, a top official said on Thursday. The Liberal government is acting in the wake of global concerns about the reach of security agencies. Former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden leaked details about mass surveillance by British and U.S. spies in 2013. "We need to make sure our security and intelligence agencies are doing everything that is necessary and appropriate to keep Canadians safe and ... are conducting themselves in a way that safeguards the rights and freedoms of Canadians," said Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. Canada is the only one of the so-called Five Eyes intelligence-sharing network to lack such a parliamentary review committee. The other members are Britain, the United States, Australia and New Zealand. Most Canadian agencies have small individual review bodies, which critics complain are impotent and can only look at old cases. Goodale told reporters the new nine-person committee would have robust powers to probe any file it wanted, including active ones. Reuters (UK Daily Mail)

Ottawa crée un comité parlementaire sur la sécurité nationale et le renseignement

Le gouvernement libéral de Justin Trudeau a déposé jeudi un projet de loi qui donnera naissance à un comité de parlementaires chargé de veiller à la sécurité du pays et de protéger les droits des Canadiens. Le leader du gouvernement à la Chambre des communes, Dominic LeBlanc, et le ministre de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile, Ralph Goodale, en ont fait l'annonce à Ottawa, en précisant que ce comité jouira d'un « vaste mandat ». « Ce nouveau comité de surveillance permettra à des membres du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes d'examiner comment fonctionnent les ministères et les agences de l'ensemble du gouvernement canadien dotés de responsabilités touchant à la sécurité nationale et au renseignement », a affirmé Dominic LeBlanc. C'est donc dire que la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) ou encore le Centre de sécurité des télécommunications seront dans la ligne de mire du comité. What do you think about the proposed security oversight committee?

The Liberal government is tabling multiple public safety-related bills this week, including the bill "An Act to establish the National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians" tabled on Thursday. The bill proposes a joint oversight committee, composed of seven MPs and two senators, which will have the ability to "scrutinize" any national security matters. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, who helped draft the bill, stated the goal of the committee would be to help ensure Canada's security and intelligence agencies are protecting Canadians and to protect Canadians rights and freedoms. Un nouveau comité à Ottawa pour surveiller toutes les activités de renseignement

C'est finalement un comité formé de neuf parlementaires de toutes allégeances qui surveillera les différentes agences fédérales impliquées de près ou de loin dans le renseignement et la sécurité nationale. En vertu du projet de loi déposé jeudi aux Communes par le leader du gouvernement, Dominic LeBlanc, le comité sera composé de sept députés, dont quatre du parti ministériel, et de deux sénateurs. Ces parlementaires pourront discrètement scruter le travail d'une quinzaine d'agences et ministères concernés. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a indiqué jeudi en point de presse à Ottawa que son gouvernement souhaite ainsi s'assurer que toutes ces organisations sont efficaces, mais aussi qu'elles respectent les valeurs fondamentales, les droits et les libertés des Canadiens. De tels comités existent déjà chez les principaux alliés du Canada - dont les États-Unis, la France et le Royaume-Uni - et le ministre Goodale a indiqué que son gouvernement s'était inspiré de ce qui se fait ailleurs dans le monde. Un projet de loi fédéral pour créer un comité chargé de surveiller les espions canadiens

Le gouvernement Trudeau a déposé un projet de loi, aux Communes jeudi, pour créer un comité parlementaire chargé de surveiller les opérations des espions canadiens. Cette mesure législative se veut une réponse des libéraux de Justin Trudeau à la controversée loi 51 antiterroriste adoptée par le gouvernement Harper. Ce comité aura à s'assurer « que les organismes responsables de la sécurité et du renseignement sont en mesure de protéger efficacement les Canadiens » indique le gouvernement. Ce comité multipartite sera formé de représentants des Communes et du Sénat et aurait un mandat pangouvernemental ainsi qu'un accès spécial à des renseignements « hautement classifiés », afin de pouvoir examiner les opérations de sécurité nationale et relatives au renseignements. Attacks shift perception of C-51 - Desire to weaken anti-terror laws diminishing

An opinion piece states "In the general election campaign, the Liberals were vocal about repealing the 'problematic elements' of the Conservative government's anti-terror legislation. In the wake of the carnage in Paris last November, and now in Orlando, Fla., it is fair to say there is much less enthusiasm to overturn many of its provisions, particularly those that allow the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to disrupt potential terrorist activity. Ralph Goodale, the public safety minister, will introduce a bill creating an all-party committee of parliamentarians to provide oversight to the expanded national security apparatus before the House of Commons rises this summer, as the Ottawa Citizen's Ian MacLeod reported this month. The government will also review all appeals by Canadians to the no-fly list and create a counter-radicalization office to work in vulnerable communities, as promised in the election platform... Goodale has further said he intends to engage in public consultations on the entire national security framework over the summer, to look at areas where the current legislation might be improved. But, after the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant-inspired outrages in Paris and Orlando, there does not seem to be an appetite to roll back the substantive parts of the bill that allow CSIS to use loosely defined disruptive 'measures,' or attempt to raise the threshold for preventive detention... Public outrage may yet be ignited when the first annual report covering the new legislation is released by CSIS's watchdog, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. As security expert Wesley Wark pointed out, if the report suggests CSIS has been abusing its new powers, or if the CSE commissioner claims the organization has not been complying with Canadian law in collecting metadata, the public's concern about rights may trump fears about security. But for now, public sentiment appears to be governed by a sense that all that protects them from a disaffected Omar Mateen-type figure is a vigilant security service, standing on guard..." Overview / Vue d'ensemble

- On January 28 2016, the annual reports of both the Commissioner of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) and the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) were tabled.
- The CSE Commissioner's report revealed that the CSE had breached privacy rules by sharing personal information on Canadians (via metadata) with its Five Eyes security partners. As a result, metadata sharing is now under suspension.
- The SIRC report highlighted lapses in CSIS' screening of federal public servants for potential spies or people with divided loyalties, as well as multiple instances of CSIS obtaining confidential taxpayer information from the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) without proper authorization.
- Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale and Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan held a press conference following the tabling of those reports wherein Minister Sajjan clarified that the metadata shared "did not contain names or enough information on its own to identify individuals," while Minister Goodale emphasized that there would be a full review of Canada's security agencies through a cabinet committee.
- Coverage was extensive across media platforms, with numerous domestic and international outlets reporting on the reports' findings, as well as the response from Ministers Goodale and Sajjan.
- Tone of coverage was mostly neutral, with some negativity due to the nature of the reports' findings. However, most reports were counterbalanced by noting the steps the government plans to take to prevent further incidents. Some outlets were more negative in their reporting (ex. Vice News)

Statement / Déclaration

Déclaration du directeur du SCRS sur le rapport annuel du CSARS

Aujourd'hui, le ministre de la Sécurité publique, l'honorable Ralph Goodale, a déposé à la Chambre des communes le rapport annuel du Comité de surveillance des activités de renseignement de sécurité (CSARS), intitulé Vers de nouveaux horizons : Préparer le terrain du changement dans la surveillance des activités de renseignement de sécurité. Par la suite, le directeur du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), M. Michel Coulombe, a fait la déclaration suivante. « Au SCRS, nous avons toujours maintenu que le rapport annuel du CSARS jouait un rôle important, en ce sens qu'il permet au Parlement, ainsi qu'aux Canadiens, d'avoir un aperçu de nos activités. Nous avons établi une relation productive avec le CSARS, dont les examens contribuent à une culture axée sur une amélioration et un apprentissage constants. Nous voyons d'un bon œil le processus d'examen et estimons qu'il nous a aidés à nous parfaire. Je suis heureux de mentionner que, encore une fois cette année, le CSARS a conclu que le SCRS ne contrevenait ni à la Loi sur le SCRS ni aux instructions du ministre et que ses activités étaient raisonnables et nécessaires. Les constatations et les recommandations du CSARS constituent une source de commentaires utiles pour les membres de la haute direction du SCRS et influent donc souvent sur nos politiques et nos pratiques. Le SCRS a accueilli la majorité des recommandations formulées par le CSARS cette année et y a donné suite. Que ce soit au pays ou à l'étranger, le SCRS respecte la Loi sur le SCRS : tout ce qu'il fait pour assurer la sécurité du Canada est conforme aux lois et aux valeurs canadiennes. » Déclaration/ Statement

Canada's electronic spy agency broke privacy law by sharing info: watchdog

A federal watchdog says Canada's electronic spy agency broke privacy laws by sharing information about Canadians with foreign partners. In his annual report, Jean-Pierre Plouffe says the Communications

Security Establishment passed along the information known as metadata to counterparts in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Metadata is information associated with a communication such as a telephone number or email address but not the message itself. The Ottawa-based CSE uses highly advanced technology to intercept, sort and analyze foreign communications for information of intelligence interest to the federal government. Documents leaked in 2013 by former American spy contractor Edward Snowden revealed the U.S. National Security Agency a close CSE ally had quietly obtained access to a huge volume of emails, chat logs and other information from major Internet companies, as well as massive amounts of data about telephone calls. As a result, civil libertarians, privacy advocates and opposition politicians demanded assurances the CSE was not using its extraordinary powers to snoop on Canadians. Watchdogs report lapses in CSIS, CSE intelligence practices

Both of Canada's spy agencies took serious hits to their credibility Thursday in a pair of reports that slammed the Communications Security Establishment for breaking the law and sharing Canadians' metadata, and slapped the Canadian Security Intelligence Service with an accusation that it is not adequately dealing with insider threats. A review by the Security Intelligence Review Committee, the board tasked with after-the-fact review of CSIS's activities, suggested that the domestic spy agency had significant shortfalls in how it assesses insider threats and tracks and investigates breaches of secure information. The report flagged multiple issues with how CSIS conducts internal investigations, particularly that employees are insufficiently trained to conduct investigations into the breach of secure information and how to conduct sensitive investigations, and stressed that there is a haphazard application of how the agency tracks who accesses sensitive information. But since modern intelligence agencies are less siloed than those in the past, that could be a big problem, said one former spy. iPolitics

Electronic spy agency stops sharing information with partners over privacy concerns

Canada's electronic spy agency breached privacy rules by sharing certain types of information with its Five Eyes partners, a federal watchdog says. In his annual report released Thursday, Jean-Pierre Plouffe said the Communications Security Establishment passed on certain types of metadata containing Canadian identity information to counterparts in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand, which make up the Five Eyes network. The report says that information contained in the metadata was not being minimized properly before it was shared. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said Thursday that the new government is undertaking a complete review of Canada's security intelligence framework, which will include the creation of a parliamentary mechanism to keep spy agencies in check. He said the objective is to keep Canadians safe while protecting their privacy. CTV News

CSIS repeatedly obtained confidential taxpayer data without warrants, watchdog says

Canada's spy agency CSIS improperly obtained taxpayer information from the Canada Revenue Agency without a warrant. And it happened more than once. That's according to the annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), the independent office that oversees the activities of CSIS. The report, tabled Thursday morning in the House of Commons, outlines how, during an application for a warrant from the federal court, a judge raised questions about a regional CSIS intelligence officer's access to confidential taxpayer information. In August 2014, Canadian Security Intelligence Service director Michel Coulombe asked SIRC to investigate, after determining that the officer accessed the information improperly. Coulombe asked SIRC to figure out what happened and make recommendations about how to stop employees from doing it again. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale released a statement Thursday in response to the tabling of the SIRC report. "We believe more can be done to strengthen scrutiny, and the government is currently developing legislation that will strengthen our system of accountability for national security." CBC News

CSIS obtained taxpayer info from Canada Revenue Agency without warrant

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service repeatedly obtained taxpayer information from the Canada Revenue Agency without presenting a court-approved warrant for the data. That revelation was among several concerns raised in the latest annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which monitors CSIS compliance with law and policy. The report tabled Thursday said the spy service must do more to ensure insiders don't pilfer secret material. It also urged CSIS to inform the Federal Court how it uses metadata — the telltale digital trails that accompany messages and phone calls — collected from cyberspace. The findings came the same day the watchdog over the Communications Security Establishment, Canada's electronic spy agency, found the CSE had improperly shared metadata about Canadians with key foreign allies. The reports prompted the NDP to express concern about erosion of civil liberties. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale stressed the Liberal government was embarking on a comprehensive review of Canada's national security and intelligence framework with the twin aims of effective security and respect for rights. CSE did not protect Canadians' metadata: Commissioner's report

The Communications Security Establishment, the nations' cyber intelligence agency, did not protect Canadians' metadata before sharing it with allies and there needs to be a new ministerial directive clarifying exactly how the agency can use Canadians' metadata, CSE Commissioner Jean-Pierre Plouffe says in his annual report to Parliament. "I found that the metadata ministerial directive lacks clarity regarding the sharing of certain types of metadata with Five Eyes partners, as well as other aspects of CSE's metadata activities," Plouffe writes in his 2014-2015 report on the agency's activities. Metadata consists of information used to identify a communication such as a phone number, internet protocol address or email. It does not include the content of the communication itself. Among the concerns noted in the report are that the current directive "does not define certain key terms," fails to differentiate between terms with similar but different concepts, and "lacks specificity" regarding how privacy provisions apply to certain metadata processes. Plouffe recommends that CSE "seek an updated ministerial directive that provides clear guidance related to the collection, use and disclosure of metadata in a foreign signals intelligence context." Senior CSE officials held a briefing after the release of the report and stressed that it would have taken significant analysis to identify any of the information that was accidentally provided with specific Canadians - but did not say such connections could not be made. CSE is prohibited from targeting its activities at Canadians but as the officials noted, it does collect information on threats targeting Canadians from abroad and that may incidentally lead to the collection of information about Canadians. The official would not comment on accusations that this kind of activity could be interpreted as mass collection without a specific target. The news comes at the same time of a report by the Security Information Review Committee, the review body for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) iPolitics

Le Canada a suspendu le partage de métadonnées avec ses alliés du Five Eyes

Le Canada a temporairement cessé de partager des métadonnées avec les services de sécurité de cinq pays alliés après avoir découvert que ces informations n'étaient pas bien protégées avant partage. La nouvelle provient du rapport annuel du Commissaire du Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST). Selon le commissaire Jean-Pierre Plouffe, le CST a constaté que des métadonnées n'avaient pas bien été « minimisées » pour éviter qu'elles permettent d'identifier un particulier ou une organisation canadienne. Le CST a donc suspendu le partage de ce type d'information avec ses partenaires de la « Collectivité des cinq » (ou Five Eyes, en anglais) - soit les États-Unis, le Royaume-Uni, l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande. Spy watchdog says Ottawa not properly policing 'insider threats'

Canada's watchdog for domestic spies is complaining that the Canadian government is not being kept abreast of "insider threats." The Security Intelligence Review Committee said in an annual report released Thursday that it has found problems with the way the Canadian Security Intelligence Service screens the federal bureaucracy for potential spies and people with divided loyalties. The watchdog said that it launched a probe that "revealed a number of deficiencies, and in one situation in particular, SIRC found that CSIS had failed to give a case the appropriate level of attention and to take follow-up action." The most famous "insider threat" Canada has lately faced comes from the case of former Canadian Forces naval sublieutenant Jeffrey Delisle. In 2013, he was criminally convicted of selling Canadian, U.S., and U.K. military secrets to Russia's military spy service. CSIS is a secretive domestic intelligence agency that is best known for trying to track terrorism suspects in Canada. But it also plays other important security roles. Globe and Mail

Vie privée: l'agence d'espionnage électronique du Canada a enfreint les lois

L'agence d'espionnage électronique du Canada a enfreint les lois sur la protection à la vie privée en recueillant des renseignements sur les Canadiens et en les partageant à ses partenaires étrangers. C'est ce que révèle le commissaire du Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST), Jean-Pierre Plouffe, dans un rapport annuel déposé aux Communes jeudi. Certains types de métadonnées n'ont ainsi pas été «adéquatement protégées» avant d'être transmises aux pays du Groupe des cinq, c'est-à-dire les États-Unis, la Grande-Bretagne, l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande. L'incident est survenu à la fin de l'année 2013 et, depuis 2014, le CST a suspendu le partage de ses métadonnées avec ses partenaires, jusqu'à ce que le commissaire se dise «entièrement satisfait de l'efficacité des systèmes et des mesures mises en place» pour corriger la situation. La loi interdit à cette agence fédérale de viser des Canadiens ou toute personne se trouvant au Canada. Journal de Montréal

Canadian Spies Get Spanked Again For Sharing Citizens' Data With the NSA

They won't tell us what it means, but the Canadian government has confirmed that its spy agencies have a real problem with mass-collecting its citizens' metadata. They won't say how many Canadians were affected, what processes led to the mass-spying, how much information was shared with international intelligence agencies like the NSA, or even how they define "metadata." But they're confident everything will be okay. After news broke that untold number of Canadians had their private information collected by a top-secret intelligence agency, Minister of National Defence Harjit Singh Sajjan told reporters even he didn't know how far it went. "We can't give you the actual number because, the way I was informed, by us actually trying to dig into that answer itself, we will be actually violating the law on digging up that type of information," Sajjan said. Two heavily-scrubbed reports released Thursday, looking into activities of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) in the 2014-2015 fiscal year. Canada Temporarily Halts Sharing Spy Data

Canada said Thursday it halted sharing certain intelligence data with its western allies until it has addressed a privacy breach discovered by one of its own spy agencies. The ban on sharing certain data with members of the so-called Five Eyes -- an intelligence alliance including the U.S., the U.K., Australia, New Zealand and Canada -- will remain in place until technology is upgraded and Ottawa is assured Canadians' privacy will be protected, Defense Minister Harjit Sajjan said. The breach involved so-called metadata collected by the Communications Security Establishment—a Canadian agency akin to the National Security Agency in the U.S. Metadata is information used to identify, describe, manage or route a communication but doesn't include its content. The CSE discovered as far back as 2014 that the information it was collecting and sharing didn't properly protect the identity of Canadians. It decided at that time to stop sharing the information. The breach was made public Thursday in a report on the agency's activities (...) Ralph Goodale, Canada's Public Safety Minister, said the Liberal government, which took power in November, would review Canada's national-security regime. Canada spy agency stops sharing intelligence with international partners

Canada's ultra-secret eavesdropping agency has stopped sharing intelligence with international partners after revealing it had illegally collected Canadians' metadata in sweeps of foreign communications. In a report to parliament, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) said on Thursday the breach was unintentional and had been discovered internally in 2013. A CSE official blamed a software flaw that resulted in sharing of metadata, used to identify, manage or route communications over networks that could identify Canadians. The agency said the likelihood of this leading to any abuses was "low (...)" It was unclear what, if any, impact the metadata sharing stoppage has had on Five Eyes intelligence gathering. Public safety minister Ralph Goodale said Canada's allies have been "very supportive" while the CSE told AFP it continues to have "strong and collaborative relationships" with its allies in other areas. Les agents de renseignements auraient obtenu ces données de l'Agence du revenu du Canada (ARC)

Top court embraces anti-terror laws

What politicians think about the new anti-terrorism law in an election year is almost completely irrelevant. Because, put simply, it is an election year. Stephen Harper and his Conservatives are competitive again, because their approach to the security file is closely aligned to what the electorate want. Polls taken in the past week suggest that up to 70% of Canadians support the international coalition fighting ISIS. Thomas Mulcair and his New Democrats oppose military action, much in the way the NDP have opposed many other past decisions to deploy Canadian troops. It is consistent with their values, and it is arguably popular with their core vote. Justin Trudeau and his Liberals, meanwhile, initially adopted the NDP position - opposing any combat role against ISIS. Having seen how unpopular that is with Canadians, Trudeau and his caucus are now in a quiet retreat. What does it all signify? Mostly, nothing. It's an election year. Our politicians are more preoccupied with the coming electoral battle in Canada than they are with the military battle currently underway in the Middle East. Political rhetoric is situational: nothing new there. But what of the Supreme Court, which almost certainly will be called upon to determine the constitutionality of the new anti-terror legislative measures? Will they side with the Conservatives, or with civil libertarians? A scan of some past high court rulings provides us with some hints about which way the Supremes might go. QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, Edmonton Sun, Calgary Sun, Winnipeg Sun, Ottawa Sun)

Snowden urges caution over Ottawa's proposed security law

Edward Snowden, the fugitive American who leaked state secrets, wants Canadians to know that anti-terrorism laws are easy to pass but very hard to undo. "We saw on Friday the Prime Minister of Canada proposed a new law," Mr. Snowden told a teenaged Toronto audience via an Internet link on Monday night. He told the high school students that they should "always be extraordinarily cautious" and press for answers, whenever governments rely on "fear and panic" to set up powers that can be exercised in secret. On Friday, the Conservative government introduced legislation that would empower Canadian authorities to "disrupt" suspected terrorist threats and remove extremist posts from the Internet. At the same time, Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been resisting calls to step up scrutiny of Canada's spy agencies. Mr. Snowden was speaking to a crowd of more than 1,000 students at Toronto's Upper Canada College via a Google Hangouts link from his exile in Russia. Imam: Preventing radicalism key to fighting terrorism

Canadians must work harder to prevent young people from becoming radicalized instead of simply dealing with the aftermath, says an Ottawa imam. There is little talk of steering vulnerable people away from extremism, Zijad Delic told the Senate national security committee Monday. Instead, the focus is on trying to deradicalize them after the fact. Political leaders, social services, teachers and others need to "find ways of tackling" the lure of extremism, Delic said. Last fall, the RCMP said it had 63 active security investigations on 90 suspected extremists who intended to join fights abroad or who had returned to Canada. The federal government has since introduced two bills aimed at reinforcing or expanding the ability of Canadian security agencies to investigate and deter terrorist threats. Legislation tabled on Friday would give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service powers to actively disrupt threats, not just collect information about them. It would also make it easier for police to control the movements of terror suspects and to detain them longer without warrant. (...) In the House of Commons, Liberal MP Ralph Goodale noted key allies have robust parliamentary oversight of their intelligence services - something he said Canada needs. Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney said the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which reports to Parliament, keeps an eye on CSIS. Threat Disruption / Perturbation des menaces

Terror bill sparks muted criticism

Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the federal Conservatives may be spoiling for a fight with their political opponents over new tough-on-terrorism legislation but, for the most part, New Democrats and Liberals remained muted Monday in their criticism of new anti-terror laws. Only Elizabeth May, the Green Party MP and leader, voiced serious concerns about Bill C-51, the anti-terrorism legislation unveiled Friday by Harper. "I have problems with the powers and the sweeping vague definitions," May said on Twitter. Among other things, the proposed law would give a new mandate to Canada's spy service, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), to "disrupt" terrorist activity in Canada using a broad range of powers if the spies get a judicial warrant. But the legislation does not provide any new oversight powers for the spy agency. Oversight of CSIS would continue to rest with the Security Intelligence Review Committee, a group of civilians appointed by the government of the day. New Democrats and Liberals want additional oversight of CSIS through a body made up of parliamentarians. (...) The Conservatives, though, didn't seem to want to accept the opposition's olive branch and were in attack mode. "Under the leadership of this government, we put forward the Combating Terrorism Act more than a year ago with no support from the NDP," Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney told the House of Commons. Anti-terror bill needs closer look

The most significant expansion in the surveillance powers of the Canadian state in recent years has crept in on cat's paws. The opposition parties, who found themselves offside from public opinion when they voted against the mission in Iraq, have been muted in their response to the anti-terror legislation brought in by the government last Friday. There have been no press releases and neither party led off on the issue when they had the opportunity to hold the government to account during Question Period on Monday. The Liberal party signaled its consent even before reading the draft legislation. Justin Trudeau, the Liberal leader, said he would be focused on oversights and safeguards Tom Mulcair, the NDP leader, has given the legislation a pass, despite saying rights have to be respected. Both parties appear to have been cowed by the Prime Minister's pre-emptive strike when the bill was released at a campaign-style event outside Toronto, where he dismissed questions about freedoms being surrendered, in favour of security considerations. MacKay once backed spy oversight now rejected by Tories

One of the Conservative cabinet ministers responsible for Ottawa's new anti-terrorism legislation once advocated parliamentary oversight of Canada's spy agencies, which the government now rejects as unnecessary even as it expands the powers of this country's national security apparatus. Justice Minister Peter MacKay stood beside Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week when the government unveiled a bill that would give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service new authority to disrupt terror plots and lengthen the number of days individuals can be held on suspicion they may commit terror acts. As deputy leader of the Conservative Party in 2005, Mr. MacKay argued forcefully for giving MPs and senators a role in overseeing Canadian spies. "When you talk about a credible oversight body, I would suggest ... that a parliamentary body is going to have more credibility because of its independence and because of the fact that there is also parliamentary accountability that will be brought to bear," Mr. MacKay said in October of that year. "To that end, I suggest that it would also cause a little bit more diligence on the part of the security agents themselves, just knowing that this oversight body was in place." Asked to comment Monday, Mr. MacKay said circumstances have altered his opinion. "A great deal has changed since 2005 with respect to international security and the terrorism threat facing Canada. Parliament itself has become a target of terrorism," he stated. Globe and Mail, A1

Security agencies need parliamentary oversight

An opinion piece re: "Canada needs to watch the watchers," Jan. 30. states "In asserting that 14 federal security agencies, including CSIS, are in need of greater oversight, Senator Colin Kenny has the right to be considered both expert and authoritative. I served from 1986-98 as assistant inspector general of CSIS within an independent agency reporting to the solicitor general on whether that "spy agency" was keeping the minister appropriately informed and observing applicable laws and policies. As the senator notes, this agency was recently abolished in favour of exclusive oversight by the Security Intelligence Review Committee. I can attest to the evident competence and lofty motivations of the CSIS personnel I knew, as well as those of their RCMP and CSEC colleagues. I could also describe the sort of misdeeds and mishaps that expert external review sometimes bring to light. Wait! No I can't do that - since I am bound by law and oath not to do so. I can, however, say that the time has come to establish some form of multiparty parliamentary oversight for the federal security community, as has already been done in allied countries. Equally, we need a professional system of expert independent oversight that covers all relevant agencies. Not that all abuses will be caught. But many will and many others will be deterred. I won't address the latest security legislation introduced by the government, which piles on edgy new powers. But I am alarmed at the possibility of terror-mongering in this pre-election period. Suffice it to say that this legislation provides even more reason for urgent reform of the oversight regime." Times Colonist, A11

Tories' anti-terror bill undermines values it's meant to protect

An editorial states, "When a prime minister announces one of the most draconian anti-terrorism bills in his nation's history - and does this not in the national legislature, but at an election-type campaign stop in a riding his party hopes to hold in a looming election - Canadians should be worried about the democratic stability of the country. In introducing this new legislation, Prime Minister Stephen Harper again said that "we are at war with the Islamic State" - language U.S. President Barack Obama has explicitly warned against on the grounds that it will likely lead to overreaction. But overreaction, it seems, is exactly what Harper is hoping for. He appears to be trying to raise the level of fear in order to railroad through measures that will violate the very democratic values they are purportedly meant to protect. [...] It is well documented that CSIS watchdog SIRC, with its limited reporting function, has not been able to provide effective oversight of the powers that CSIS currently has, let alone the vastly expanded proposed powers. Add to that the additional reach the bill would give to other organizations such as the Canadian Border Security Agency, and the need for an overarching Parliamentary oversight body could hardly be starker. The UK and the U.S. both have such a body to watch over and rein in their respective security apparatuses." (...) This law is so bad one has to wonder about the true motives behind it. The fact that the prime minister and Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney have repeatedly (and bewilderingly) rejected calls to introduce an obviously needed guarantee of Parliamentary oversight of these new powers suggests a potential profoundly immoral political strategy. Did the government deliberately structure the proposed law to be unpalatable even to a largely sympathetic opposition? After all, that would allow the Tories to label their opponents "soft on terror" in the run-up to an election." Toronto Star

Terror could be rare winning issue for Conservatives in Quebec: Hébert

The last time Canada's intelligence service had the kind of operational anti-terrorism mandate Stephen Harper's government is looking to confer on CSIS was in the wake of the kidnapping of a British diplomat and a Quebec minister at the time of the 1970 October crisis. Then as now the country's intelligence gatherers were enabled to not only identify potential threats but also to disrupt them. That mandate bred a culture of casual disregard for civil liberties and the rule of law within the country's security service. The abuse occurred not exclusively but essentially in Quebec. Agents spied on the duly elected sovereigntist government of René Lévesque (as well as on NDP icon Tommy Douglas). They staged a break-in to steal the membership list of the PQ. They stole dynamite and committed arson. After a royal commission shed light on those acts in the early '80s, CSIS was set up as a civilian operation separate from the RCMP. An oversight committee was created to watch the spies — a setup that would remain unchanged under the government's latest anti-terrorism plan. The committee has been operating under a cloud since Arthur Porter — one of Harper's appointees to the select group — ended up on the most-wanted list of Quebec's anti-corruption unit. Given that checkered history one might expect Quebec to be the ground zero of resistance to Bill C-51. But so far members of the province's political class are falling over themselves to let someone else lead the way to the barricades. Toronto Star

Preventing radicalization a key in terrorism fight, imam tells senators

Canadians must work harder to prevent young people from becoming radicalized instead of simply dealing with the aftermath, says an Ottawa imam. There is little talk of steering vulnerable people away from extremism, Zijad Delic told the Senate national security committee Monday. Instead, the focus is on trying to deradicalize them after the fact. Opposition MPs and civil liberties advocates expressed concern Monday the bill did not boost oversight of Canada's spy agency — concerns the Conservative government quickly dismissed. Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney repeated his view that the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which reports to Parliament, has the expertise to keep an eye on CSIS. Imam Hamza Chaoui denies accusations of Mayors Ménard, Coderre

Imam Hamza Chaoui is responding for the first time since Montreal city officials announced he will not be given an operating permit to open an Islamic Community Centre called the Ashabeb Centre. On Saturday, Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre, alongside Mercier-Hochelaga-Maisonneuve Mayor Réal Ménard, announced they would not grant an operational permit to the community centre, saying it was an issue of public safety. "I categorically refute allegations of Mayors Ménard and Coderre," writes Chaoui on his Facebook page. "I'm not an 'agent of radicalization.' I've never included hatred or violence against a group in my preaching or my classes." He says he encourages young people to integrate harmoniously into Quebec society. CBC News; Canadian Press (The Gazette)

Le dénonciateur américain en exil Edward Snowden a profité d'une allocution par vidéoconférence avec des élèves torontois, hier soir, pour mettre les Canadiens en garde contre le projet de loi C-51 du gouvernement Harper. L'agence d'espionnage canadienne verrait ses pouvoirs considérablement accrus, grâce à la nouvelle législation. Les partis d'opposition à Ottawa demandent une plus grande supervision. De son côté, M. Snowden dit que les droits des citoyens sont de plus en plus brimés par les gouvernements occidentaux. Edward Snowden est un ex-consultant de l'Agence de sécurité nationale aux États-Unis qui vit en exil en Russie depuis qu'il a révélé des détails secrets sur des programmes d'écoute électronique américains. Loi antiterroriste: l'opposition sur ses gardes

L'opposition critique timidement le projet de loi antiterroriste C-51, se concentrant sur les doléances entourant le manque de « crédibilité » des mécanismes de surveillance de l'agence d'espionnage canadienne qui verrait ses pouvoirs considérablement accrus en vertu de la législation. Le chef néo-démocrate Thomas Mulcair estime que le Comité de surveillance des activités de renseignement de sécurité (CSARS), qui est en charge superviser le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), n'est pas à la hauteur de la tâche. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, qui parraine le projet de loi, s'est énergiquement porté à la défense du CSARS, alléguant que ce dernier était une référence mondiale. « On a un modèle canadien exceptionnel, un organisme qui existe depuis 30 ans, qui assure la continuité en matière de rapport et de surveillance (du SCRS), qui a une expertise, un savoir-faire, une crédibilité qui est reconnue à travers le monde », a-t-il rétorqué aux libéraux. Le cabinet de M. Blaney a indiqué lundi, que le ministre avait complètement fermé la porte à l'idée de mettre sur pied un comité de surveillance composé d'élus. NDP, Liberals want tougher oversight of anti-terror measures

Federal New Democrats and Liberals are demanding that the government increase oversight for Canada's main spy agency, but otherwise they're holding their cards close to their chests when it comes to the government's proposed anti-terrorism legislation. Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Friday that Canadians understand "their freedoms and security more often than not go hand in hand," while Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney over the weekend described the notion of additional oversight as "red tape." "If we are going to be giving increased and enhanced powers (to CSIS), the public has a right to better oversight," NDP leader Tom Mulcair said Monday. "Why does the minister call that red tape? Does he consider protecting Canadians' rights red tape?" Harper was not in the House of Commons Monday to reply, but Blaney said CSIS's activities are already reviewed by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), whose membership is appointed by the prime minister. It reports to Parliament annually. "The security intelligence review committee will cover all activities that CSIS will be mandated by this Parliament to accomplish," Blaney told the House of Commons. "SIRC is an established, well-recognized, expert committee that has the knowledge to do intelligence security." Ottawa Citizen; Toronto Star; CTV News

Tories spoiling for fight that's not happening on terror law

Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the federal Conservatives may be spoiling for a fight with their political opponents over new tough-on-terrorism legislation but, for the most part, New Democrats and Liberals remained muted Monday in their criticism of new anti-terror laws. "Under the leadership of this government, we put forward the Combating Terrorism Act more than a year ago with no support from the NDP," Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney told the House of Commons. "We are ready to revoke passports. We are ready to take action like removing dual citizenship to protect Canadians.

There is no support from the NDP. We are standing up to protect Canadians. " QMI Agency (Sun News Network)

Harper got spy powers right, but civilian oversight very wrong

An opinion piece by Bob Rae states, "Sometimes Stephen Harper is his own worst enemy. Recent events in Europe should bring home to all of us that there are indeed people in the midst of democratic, multiracial societies who are ready and willing to kill others in the pursuit of their religious and political beliefs. They are terrorists. They plot and communicate with others of a similar mind, and with similar intentions. They receive encouragement, and sometimes even instructions, from foreign entities and governments. Canada is not somehow magically aloof from these realities. Our large cities are the home of millions of people from all over the world. There is no foreign conflict that does not have a direct influence on the lives and feelings of many Canadian citizens and, indeed, there are events and proposals in Canada itself to which some in Canada are strongly and irrevocably opposed. Whether these feelings give rise to a direct threat to the lives of their fellow Canadians is a matter of fact and evidence. But it would be simply foolish to argue that such threats could never happen here." The Globe and Mail

Tories intent on politicizing what should be a non-partisan issue — the safety of Canadians

An opinion piece states, "The most significant expansion in the surveillance powers of the Canadian state in recent years has crept in on cat's paws. The opposition parties, who found themselves offside from public opinion when they voted against the mission in Iraq, have been muted in their response to the anti-terror legislation brought in by the government last Friday... There are also concerns about the expansion in powers for CSIS, Canada's spy agency, that some argue are unnecessary and pose a grave threat to democratic freedom... But CSIS does not have a spotless reputation when it comes to telling judges everything they need to know. Federal Court Justice Richard Mosley was extremely critical of the agency in a case still being appealed by the government, after it failed to reveal it was relying on foreign allies to spy on Canadians abroad. Judge Mosley called this a "deliberate decision to keep the court in the dark about the scope and extent of foreign collection efforts." ... " National Post

Harper takes liberties with our protection

An opinion piece states, "... And so a government that after nine years in power had failed to protect even Parliament now claims it will save all of us from terrorist threats. How will that happen? With serious infringements on our democratic rights – and from a government that's hard to take seriously..." 24 Hours Vancouver

Anti-terrorism bill 'more about politics than public safety,' says civil liberties lawyer

Anti-terrorism legislation Prime Minister Stephen Harper unveiled last week gives the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service sweeping new powers that would allow the spy agency to use any undefined measure other than the use of lethal force, perversion of justice or "violating the sexual integrity" of an individual in a new role empowering it to disrupt national security threats, but one of Canada's most prominent civil liberties and human rights lawyers says it's "more about politics than public safety." The three limitations, along with the stipulation a judge's warrant would be required before CSIS agents could take measures that would violate Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are the only defined limits to CSIS operations under new provisions that expand its role from surveillance, security investigations and counter-espionage to a mandate to "disrupt" suspected terror plots in the planning stages, lawyer Paul Champ told The Hill Times. Mr. Champ pointed to a new section Bill C-51, the Anti-Terrorism Act, would add to the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service Act placed as an example of what he says are changes that give "sweeping" new powers to CSIS, and new criminal law powers to police agencies, as part of the government's response to two killings last October Mr. Harper (Calgary Southwest, Alta.) has branded as Jihadist attacks within Canada. As part of a package of beefed-up powers for CSIS, including lower evidence thresholds to obtain judicial warrants and detain suspects or enforce police control over the movement and freedom of suspects to prevent "likely" terrorism attempts, the bill would allow CSIS to take undefined "measures" to disrupt suspected terrorism plans if agents have "reasonable grounds to believe" that a "particular activity" constitutes a threat to Canada. Worrying new powers for CSIS

An editorial states "2006, when the O'Connor inquiry delivered its report about the rendition and torture of Maher Arar, many Canadians shook their heads and wondered how our intelligence and security agencies got to be in such a mess. In 2008, when the Iacobucci inquiry delivered its report into the detention and torture of Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad Abou-Elmaati and Muayyed Nureddin, we wondered again how the actions of the people charged to keep us safe could be, in the words of the report, so "deficient in the circumstances." In 2010, the Supreme Court found that in the Omar Khadr case, Canadian officials "actively participated" in a process that "offends the most basic Canadian standards." This is the history of the last 14 years, and this is the backdrop against which we must judge the government's proposal to give CSIS more powers. Our police, foreign-affairs and intelligence agencies have done good work in this same period, and have uncovered and foiled real, dangerous plots. But they have also demonstrated a pattern of poor communication, reliance on bad information and disregard for the both the law and basic decency. Are we Canadians satisfied that these problems have been solved, and that we have sufficient oversight in place to give CSIS more powers to act on the information it collects?" Ottawa Citizen

Four reasons Harper's new anti-terrorist legislation will alarm you

An opinion piece states... "We may not be sure yet how CSIS might use its new and expanded powers, but one thing is certain: if the government has its way, there will be no Parliamentary oversight commensurate with the new danger of abuse by the spy (now to become, in effect, the secret police) agency. The Minister of Public Security, Steven Blaney, says the existing body that keeps an eye on CSIS, the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), is all we need. Experts in the field are not convinced. SIRC only has three politically appointed members and a small staff. It may formally report to Parliament annually, but it operates under the direct supervision not of Parliament but of the Minister of Public Security. In the words of SIRC itself, "ministerial direction" guides its work. In other words, the Minister who is responsible for CSIS also directs the small and poorly resourced Committee that, very notionally, oversees and supervises CSIS's work. With that kind of institutional arrangement, taken together with the added powers the Harper government wants to give CSIS, we could say, to paraphrase Winston Churchill: "Some oversight; some supervision!" Clark calls for balance on C-51 debate

B.C. Premier Christy Clark has entered the debate over the federal anti-terrorism bill, calling attention to the potential dangers of government overreach but stopping short of criticizing the legislation directly. Asked about Bill C-51 this week, the Premier said there is a need to balance the protection of personal freedoms with matters of national security. Bill C-51 - which would give Canada's spy agency sweeping powers, criminalize the promotion of terrorism and grant RCMP the power of preventative arrests - has come under fire since it was tabled five weeks ago. On Saturday, a nationwide "day of action" is planned in protest of the legislation, with events in every province. Globe and Mail, S3 (2015-03-14)

C-51 - Dérapages politiques

Une pièce d'opinion déclare, « Plus le débat sur le projet de loi C-51 avance, plus les intentions du gouvernement de Stephen Harper transparaissent. Pour justifier ses mesures antiterroristes, il invite dans le débat d'étranges alliés, le plus inattendu étant Hitler. Tous les amalgames sont bons pour alimenter le sentiment d'insécurité des Canadiens. Les conservateurs de Stephen Harper ne font rien sans calculs politiques. Les mesures contenues dans ce projet de loi et la communication qu'ils en font depuis un mois correspondent à une stratégie réfléchie que la référence à deux événements permet de mieux comprendre... Pour justifier l'octroi de pouvoirs si abusifs en regard des droits et libertés, le gouvernement n'a aucune retenue. La semaine dernière, il a rendu publique la vidéo où Michael Zehaf-Bibeau justifie son attentat au parlement, question de raviver la tension vécue par les députés le 22 octobre avant qu'ils ne commencent l'étude du C-51 en comité parlementaire. En ouvrant mardi l'étude du projet de loi, le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, en rajoutait en invitant Hitler dans le débat. Évoquant la nécessité de pouvoirs pour combattre les propos haineux, il affirmait que " l'Holocauste n'a pas commencé dans les chambres à gaz, il a commencé avec des mots "... La façon dont le gouvernement conservateur mène ce débat sert le parti, mais pas le pays. A Steven Blaney, et à tous ses collègues, il faut rappeler que oui, il faut faire attention aux mots. Il est tellement facile de glisser dans la propagande et la démagogie. Il y a eu ces derniers jours beaucoup trop de dérapages. Il faut s'en inquiéter. » Le Devoir, B4 (2015-03-14)

C-51 va-t-il trop loin?

Une pièce d'opinion déclare, « Le grand chef des Premières nations canadiennes, Perry Bellegarde craint qu'il serait trop facile de qualifier de terrorisme la défense de leurs droits, tant en matière de protection de l'environnement que des traités touchant à leurs droits territoriaux. Les Canadiens veulent que le gouvernement du Canada soit en mesure de déjouer des complots terroristes qui menaceraient la sécurité publique. Sur ce point, à peu près personne ne conteste cette responsabilité du gouvernement fédéral. Là où la dissension se manifeste c'est sur le plan des moyens à prendre pour y arriver. Comme on a pu le constater depuis quelques jours, les porte-parole du gouvernement sont prêts à dire à peu près n'importe quoi pour enfoncer leur message: le ministre de la Sécurité publique du Canada, Steven Blaney est allé jusqu'à comparer la menace terroriste qui nous guette à l'Holocauste. Ce faisant, il verse dans l'exagération. Le projet de loi C-51 n'est pas exempt d'exagération sur les moyens que le gouvernement fédéral veut se donner pour atteindre l'objectif légitime de contrer le terrorisme... » L'Acadie-Nouvelle, 23 (2015-03-14)

Protests against Bill C-51 to be staged across the province

It's certainly got people fired up. Bridgewater, Annapolis Royal, Sydney, Antigonish and Halifax will join over 40 other towns and cities across Canada hosting protests against the Conservatives' Bill C-51 on Saturday. Chronicle-Herald, A13 (2015-03-14)

Privacy protection under threat by Bill C-51

An opinion piece states, "As witnesses line up to warn about the dangers associated with Bill C-51, Canada's anti-terrorism bill, it is increasingly clear that the proposed legislation is an unprecedented undermining of Canadian privacy protection. Much of the focus on the bill has related to oversight: the government implausibly claims that it increases oversight (it does not), the Liberals disappointingly say they support the bill but would like better oversight and much of the NDP criticism has also centred on oversight. Yet with respect to privacy and Bill C-51, lack of oversight is only a part of the problem. The privacy-related concerns stem from Bill C-51's Security of Canada Information Sharing Act (SCISA), a bill within the bill that goes further than sharing information related to terrorist activity. It does so in three steps..." Toronto Star, B2 (2015-03-14)

Canadians should heed Edward Snowden's warning

An opinion piece states, "I suspect that history will one day be very kind to whistleblower Edward Snowden. Yesterday's traitor is gradually becoming tomorrow's patriot as he slowly unmask the "secret surveillance state" growing around us. In fact, there is already talk of him being able to return to the U.S. at some point. But it may be here in Canada where he will be owed a special debt. Just as Canadians appeared to be sleepwalking towards accepting a dangerous government-sponsored "anti-terrorism act" that would undermine human rights and the rule of law, the debate has appeared to turn in recent days. Government ministers are now more on the defensive. Critics of the proposed legislation are regaining their voice. And Snowden himself has intervened..." Toronto Star, WD3 (2015-03-14)

Vote for us or the terrorists will get you

An opinion piece states, "First we had Canada's New Government. Then we had Strong and Stable Government. Now we have the Be Very Afraid Government. As even casual observers of the news will know, it's all fear, all the time in Ottawa these days. The political premise is slightly disturbing - that terror and crime can be tackled as another marketing challenge, complete with labels, postcard surveys, and mind-numbing repetition of slogans. The potential payoff, presumably, is the re-election of the Conservative "brand." ... Toronto Star, IN2 (2015-03-14)

Who will police Canada's spies?

An opinion piece states, "Last month, three teenage girls flew from London to Istanbul, en route to Raqqa, headquarters of Islamic State, also known as ISIL or ISIS, to begin new lives as "jihadi brides." Turkish intelligence says the man who smuggled them across the border was a Canadian agent, Mohammed al-Rashid, a Syrian dentist who fled to Jordan to escape the civil war. The Turks say after al-Rashid came to the attention of the Canadian embassy in Amman, the Canadians brought him to Canada, offered him the hope of citizenship and set him to work smuggling foreigners into the clutches of the homicidal maniacs of ISIS. By their count, al-Rashid has helped 140 Britons get to ISIS, all the while reporting to someone named "Matt" at the Canadian embassy, where the ambassador is Bruno Saccmani, former head of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's bodyguards. The Canadian government, of course, won't say whether any of this is true... The same government that put him in charge of SIRC is now seeking to massively expand the powers of our spies with Bill C-51, with no improved oversight. The law will give spies licence to engage in a wide variety of threat-disruption activities against any threat to Canada's security, requiring warrants only when they believe their activities would break the law..." Bill turns CSIS into secret police

An opinion piece states, "Bill C-51, fast-tracked concurrently through the House of Commons and a compliant Senate, is only now being understood by many people and groups. Unfortunately, the governed have views about potential problems with the Canada's new anti-terrorism bill that will never be heard in Parliament..." Winnipeg Free Press, A17 (2015-03-14)

And the survey says... ? - Poorly designed politically biased surveys hurt democracy

An opinion piece states, "... Survey questions are everywhere these days, which is why I initially didn't think much of it Monday night when I saw a question in the corner of a flyer sent to my house by my Conservative member of Parliament, Lawrence Toet. But once I read the question, which asked constituents if they "agree... (that) we must take additional action to protect Canada from terrorism" or "disagree (because) terrorists are victims too." A box where you could fill in your name, address, phone number and email was also helpfully provided. I thought it would be a teachable moment to demonstrate just how loaded, self-serving and poorly crafted some survey questions can be... First of all, no one should be under any illusion that these types of survey questions are designed to actually measure what people in Elmwood-Transcona or anywhere else think about terrorism or Bill C-51, the proposed Anti-Terrorism Act just introduced by the Conservatives. If this was a sincere effort to engage community attitudes, Toet and his colleagues would publicly release the results and use them to justify their controversial anti-terror measures..." Blurred lines and fear tactics

An opinion piece states, "Xenophobia is an intense or irrational dislike or fear of people from other countries. Islam is the religious faith of Muslims. Islamophobia is an irrational fear of Islam and the Muslim people based on their links to Islamic extremists who use terrorism to advance their interests. Muslims are particularly vulnerable because they are a visible minority easily identified by religion and dress. Defining terrorism is more difficult. In Canada, section 83.01 of the Criminal Code defines terrorism as an act committed "in whole or in part for a political, religious or ideological purpose, objective or cause" with the intention of intimidating the public . . . with regard to its security, including its economic security." Activities recognized as criminal within this context include death and bodily harm with the use of violence; significant property damage and interference or disruption of essential services, facilities or systems. Following January's Charlie Hebdo massacre in Paris, Prime Minister Stephen Harper warned that the "international jihadist movement" had declared war on Canada. By the end of January, he was declaring war on the jihadists with his Anti-Terrorism Act. In early February, less than two weeks after the PM introduced Bill C-51, the RCMP received a tip that four people were plotting a Valentine's Day mass shooting in the Halifax Shopping Centre. Two people were subsequently charged with conspiracy to commit murder, not terrorism. The reason according to Justice Minister Peter McKay is that the conspiracy was not "culturally motivated." ... " Times & Transcript, A13 (2015-03-14)

Terror bill 'Orwellian'

Thousands gathered in the heart of Toronto Saturday to protest the federal government's new anti-terrorism bill -- legislation many demonstrators said would turn Canada into an "Orwellian" state under an intrusive, totalitarian government. It's believed as many as 4,000 people braved Saturday's cold and rain to stand in Nathan Phillips Square outside City Hall and denounce the Conservative's Bill C-51, a piece of legislation that would expand the powers of Canada's spy agency and give the RCMP increased powers of arrest when it comes to the prevention of terrorism and the promotion of it. The office of Canada's Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness was quick to respond. You can't shut us up, thousands warn MPs

Thousands of Canadians came together to loudly denounce the Conservative government's proposed anti-terror legislation in dozens of rallies held across the country on Saturday. The Conservative government introduced the wide-ranging bill in January. It would give police much broader powers and allow them to detain terror suspects, as well as give new powers to Canada's spy agency. Organizers of the nationwide protest say the bill would infringe upon Canadians' civil liberties and right to privacy, especially online. Bill C-51 'Day of Action' protests denounce new policing powers

Protests are underway across Canada against the government's proposed anti-terrorism legislation, which would give police much broader powers and allow them to detain terror suspects and give new powers to Canada's spy agency. NDP leader Tom Mulcair joined hundreds in Montreal in a march through the city. One protester held up a poster saying "C-51 is an act of terror," while others carried red "Stop Harper" signs. The protest was expected to end in front of the riding office of Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau. Trudeau has said his caucus will vote in favour of the bill. Dubbed "Defend our Freedom," organizers say Bill C-51 is dangerous, reckless and unacceptable. In a statement to CBC News on Saturday afternoon, a spokesman for Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney said the government "rejects the argument that every time we talk about security, our freedoms are threatened." "Canadians understand that their freedom and security go hand in hand [and] expect us to protect both, and there are safeguards in this legislation to do exactly that," added Jeremy Laurin. In Toronto, hundreds gathered at city hall to speak out against the proposed legislation, with many holding signs, chanting and drumming in protest of the bill. Loi antiterroriste : une farce démocratique

Il n'aura pas fallu grand-temps, jeudi, pour se rendre compte que les travaux du comité parlementaire étudiant le projet de loi antiterroriste C-51 seraient un simulacre de consultations. Presque chaque témoin qui avait une critique à formuler s'est fait faire la leçon, a vu ses motivations mises en doute ou s'est fait égratigner par des insinuations malveillantes par les députés conservateurs. Les députés conservateurs n'étaient pas là et n'y seront pas au cours des prochaines séances pour mieux comprendre le projet de loi, en déceler les lacunes et les corriger. Leur seul rôle est de défendre C-51 coûte que coûte, et de répéter les justifications et explications du ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney. Mardi, le ministre Blaney et son collègue à la Justice, Peter Mackay, témoignaient en compagnie du commissaire de la GRC et du grand patron du SCRS — les seuls à avoir deux heures pour s'expliquer. Malgré cela, les membres de l'opposition ont concentré leurs tirs sur les ministres qu'ils peuvent interroger presque tous les jours aux Communes, et ils n'ont pas eu une seule question pour le directeur du SCRS, un homme qu'ils voient rarement. Ils n'ont même pas pensé lui demander à quoi pourraient ressembler les mesures illégales de perturbation de la menace que le projet C-51 leur permettra d'utiliser. Les conservateurs, eux, ne se sont pas privés de sa présence et lui ont lancé de nombreuses questions complaisantes. L'Actualité (2015-03-14)

Ex-watchdog, Tory MP criticizes Conservatives' proposed anti-terror legislation

The Harper government has been getting an earful of criticism about bill C-51, its so-called anti-terror legislation, including from a high profile Conservative. HOWE ROOM: Privacy officer concerned about bill C-51

Add Nova Scotia's freedom of information and protection of privacy review officer, Catherine Tully, to the growing list of people concerned about the federal government's proposed bill C-51. Tully and 11 of her provincial counterparts from across the country recently authored a letter outlining their concerns to the federal standing committee on public safety and national security, now hearing debate on the bill. In an interview last week, Tully said she has concerns that the impacts "on the privacy of ordinary Canadians of this bill are really quite profound," and she agreed with her colleagues across the country that they needed to speak up to highlight their worries. Chief among those concerns for Tully is that the bill, which the federal government is pitching as necessary to fight terrorism, permits the broad collection and sharing of personal information and "it's without appropriate oversight." - Media coverage today regarding Bill C-51 continued to be moderate, while the tone of coverage was much less balanced in comparison to yesterday and was generally negative. Of note:
 - In a letter to media, Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Minister Steven Blaney wrote to clarify some perceived misconceptions about the bill. According to the Minister, "Following the introduction of the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2015, many Canadians have voiced their opinions on this important piece of legislation. Bill C-51 will protect our rights and freedoms by providing better tools to confront the twin challenges of our time: radicalization and terrorism."
 - Pam Palmater, a Mi'kmaq lawyer, stated that the controversial legislation targets aboriginal people's way of life and their right to protest.
 - The Canadian Civil Liberties Association expressed concern that the Security of Canada Information Sharing Act would allow information that has no relevance to terrorism to be shared amongst security agencies in Canada as well as shared with foreign agencies.
 - In a press release, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers expressed concern over Bill C-51. Specifically, the union is concerned over the lack of civilian oversight, the breadth of information sharing that will be allowed under the legislation, and that ordinary citizens could be wrongly identified as terrorists.
 - Canadian Bar Association President Michele Hollins expressed concern over the portion of Bill C-51 that would grant a judge the authority to allow CSIS officers to undertake in actions that could breach the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Hollins stated that this is "extremely troubling."

Postal Workers Concerned about Bill C-51

The union representing 51,000 postal workers is adding its voice to the growing chorus of concerns over Bill C-51, the federal government's sweeping national security bill. "The Canadian Union of Postal Workers knows what it is like to experience out-of-control state surveillance," said Denis Lemelin, National President of CUPW, referring to the lengthy history of CUPW being spied upon by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and the RCMP. Bill C-51 would give CSIS even broader powers to invade the privacy of Canadians in the name of combatting terrorism. Similar concerns over the bill's overly sweeping reach will be raised by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Hassan Yussuff, who appears today before the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Public Safety and National Security (SECU). The first duty of government is citizens' safety

In a letter, Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Minister Steven Blaney states, "Following the introduction of the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2015, many Canadians have voiced their opinions on this important piece of legislation. Bill C-51 will protect our rights and freedoms by providing better tools to confront the twin challenges of our time: radicalization and terrorism. As Canada's minister of public safety, I want to ensure the debate over C-51 is based on facts and not the alarmist mythology advanced by some critics of the bill, including the Liberals, the NDP and certain academics. The first duty of any government is the safety its citizens. We must not fail in that duty." The Hamilton Spectator, A13

Anti-terror bill targets aboriginals: Lawyer

A Mi'kmaq lawyer fighting against the government's anti-terror bill asked members of a Commons committee Tuesday to compare the number of Canadians who have died on home soil in terror attacks to the number of missing and murdered aboriginal women. Pam Palmater, who holds a chair in indigenous governance at Toronto's Ryerson University, said the controversial legislation targets aboriginal people's way of life and their right to protest. She said C-51 "captures everything under Idle No More" and could put aboriginal people in jail. She said she's also concerned about a section of the bill that would outlaw terrorist propaganda and could be used against First Nations people. "All we have left are our thoughts, and our private thoughts will now be criminalized," Palmater told MPs. (...) In response, Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Minister Steven Blaney pointed to a section of the bill saying it does not apply to "lawful advocacy, protest, dissent and artistic expression." QMI Agency (The Kingston Whig Standard, B1, Edmonton Sun)

Anti-terror bill about suppression, say critics

The federal government's omnibus security bill would hand extremists what they want by shackling civil liberties, a prominent aboriginal lawyer and activist says. There is no way to fix the legislation, which "makes us all suspects," said Pamela Palmater, chair in indigenous governance at Toronto's Ryerson University. "The terrorists will have won," Palmater said during a meeting of the House of Commons public safety committee, which is hearing more than 50 witnesses on the bill. The Conservatives brought in the 62-page bill following the murders of two Canadian soldiers just days apart last October by men whose motives were rooted in extremist thinking. The legislation would give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service the ability to actively disrupt terror plots, make it easier for police to limit the movements of a suspect, expand no-fly list powers, crack down on extremist propaganda and dismantle barriers to exchanging security-related information. Neither the new disruptive powers nor the information-sharing provisions apply to "lawful" advocacy, protest and dissent, but some critics say these elements of the bill could be used against aboriginal and environmental activists who protest outside the letter of the law. Anti-terror law designed to boost oilsands

A B.C. aboriginal leader told the parliamentary committee studying the federal government's proposed anti-terror legislation that Bill C-51 was designed mainly to disrupt opposition to expansion of Alberta's oilsands industry. "We're absolutely convinced this is less about jihadi terrorism in this country and more about facilitating and promoting the tripling of the output of the tarsands," Grand Chief Stewart Phillip, president of the Union of B.C. Indian Chiefs, told MPs. "We're gravely concerned." Phillip is one of several critics to argue that the bill could open the door to government security agencies targeting environmentalists and First Nations activists opposing pipeline expansion to the B.C. coast. (...) In the House of Commons Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney dismissed NDP accusations that the legislation is targeting First Nations protesters. Canadian Press (Times Colonist, A6, The Vancouver Sun)

Threat is relentless and global

A Toronto police officer working on the front lines of counter-terrorism gave parliamentarians an unsettling glimpse Tuesday of the threat the country faces. Insp. Steve Irwin began with the former case of the Toronto 18, in which several people were convicted for plotting to bomb major public and government sites in and around Toronto. Their aim was to provoke Canada's military withdrawal from Afghanistan. "That was generated locally," Insp. Irwin told a Commons committee studying the government's proposed antiterror legislation, Bill C-51. It "was inspired by individuals in a small group." A decade later, Islamic Jihad is a relentless, sophisticated and global phenomenon propelled by the Internet. "People from all over the world are inspiring and teaching and providing for how to beat our [security] systems [and] how to speak and not break the [hate] laws and ultimately lure mostly young, vulnerable people" into joining Islamists' holy war against Canada and the West. The new legislation proposes to make it a crime to knowingly advocate or promote the commission of a terrorist offence, however general. It's a needed change, Insp. Irwin told MPs. "Unfortunately, the [current Criminal Code laws] are too restrictive for those who are clever enough or counselled sufficiently to skirt divulging criminal intent" when publicly inciting hatred. Postmedia News (National Post, A6, Ottawa Citizen)

Anti-terrorism bill needs rigid safeguards

An opinion piece states, "When I first visited Beaumont, Alta., on the southeastern outskirts of Edmonton, it had a population of just over 2,000 and a distinctly Franco-Albertan character. The beautiful brick Catholic church of St. Vital (now close to 100 years old) kept watch over the surrounding prairie from its perch atop the "beautiful hill." Twenty-five years later, the formerly quaint French farming town is a booming bedroom community of nearly 16,000. But as vanilla and suburban as Beaumont might seem, it is also on the frontlines of the war on terror. A week ago, the RCMP's Integrated National Security Enforcement Team arrested a 17-year-old resident and charged him with trying to leave the country to join ISIS and plotting to commit "murder in circumstances that constitute terrorist activity." If the threat of terrorism in Canada has spread as far as Beaumont, then the threat literally is everywhere." C-51 must include more oversight, anti-radicalization efforts, NDP says

As the House public safety committee prepares to wrap up witness testimony on the government's proposed anti-terror bill on Thursday, the New Democrats are getting set to propose amendments that would boost oversight powers and do more to combat radicalization. The motion, which stands in the name of NDP house leader Peter Julian and could be debated in the House as early as Thursday, would allow the committee to consider amendments in two specific areas: to "ensure that the government works with Canadian communities to counter radicalization" and "enhance oversight of Canadian security and intelligence agencies." The legislation goes to clause-by-clause review next week. Without such authorization, any amendments that go beyond the current scope of the bill would likely be deemed out of order during the review. Liberal spokeswoman Kate Purchase says her party backs the bid to broaden the parameters, but without Conservative support, it will likely be defeated. It's still not clear whether the government is open to changing the bill — or, for that matter, what amendments will be put forward by opposition members next week. Liberal public safety critic Wayne Easter and rights and freedoms critic Irwin Cotler will present their party's proposed changes on Thursday. Earlier today, CBA president Michele Hollins told CBC News Network host Heather Hiscox the group is particularly concerned over the proposed provision to allow CSIS agents to ask the federal court to sign off on activities that could breach the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Meanwhile, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has added its name to the lengthening list of those worried at what they describe as the "overly sweeping reach" of the bill. The union "knows what it is like to experience out-of-control state surveillance," Denis Lemelin said in a press release sent out on Wednesday morning. CBC News

Disregard of Charter in anti-terror bill 'untenable': CBA

The Canadian Bar Association is recommending nearly two-dozen changes to the federal government's proposed anti-terrorism legislation, to strike more of a balance between security and individual liberties. The suggestions are outlined in a report issued today in advance of an appearance by representatives of the CBA before the House of Commons committee on Public Safety and National Security. Many of the concerns raised in the report involve the greater state powers outlined in bill C-51, without a similar increase in oversight, as well as the broad and often vague language used in the proposed legislation. Federal Election: Ottawa's anti-terrorism bill misses the mark

A letter to the editor submitted by the Green Party of Canada states, "Canadians should be deeply concerned about Bill C-51, the federal government's new anti-terrorism bill, says Kootenay-Columbia Green Party candidate Bill Green. The hastily-drafted legislation proposed by the Conservative government, which is also supported by the federal Liberal Party, completely misses the mark about the major threats to the security of Canadians. 'The risk of death or injury by a terrorist bomb or bullet is much smaller than the risks on our roads and highways, from disease from environmental pollution, and the long-term security risk posed by climate change,' says Green. Provisions in Bill C-51 could lead the country back to the uneasy days of the FLQ crisis in the 1970's when more than 450 Canadians were wrongfully imprisoned and later had to be compensated by the government. The bill could lead to innocent Canadians being jailed for doing nothing more than joining a protest march, Green says.

Information privacy at threat by Bill C-51

Bill C-51, known as the anti-terrorism bill, has drawn criticism for provisions that many feel are excessive and open to abuse. One of these provisions allows government agencies to share information about Canadians for reasons of national security. Associate Professor Hasan Cavusoglu of the Management Information Systems Division at the UBC Sauder School of Business weighs in on the privacy risks for Canadians. UBC News

Bill C-51: First Nation chief worries 'lives will be lost'

A chief, who once went to jail for defending his First Nation's traditional territory during a mining dispute in northern Ontario, says he has grave concerns about Bill C-51. Kitchenuhmaykoosib Inninuwug Chief Donny Morris sent a letter to his MP, Natural Resources Greg Rickford, asking him to withdraw support for the proposed anti-terrorism law. Morris and six others from Kitchenuhmaykoosib went to jail in 2008 after peacefully protesting mining activity near Big Trout Lake, about 600 kilometres north of Thunder Bay, Ont. He's worried that under Bill C-51 the consequences for Indigenous activists will be much worse. "I take this to my heart," Morris said. "Because I know it will happen. It happened to us. We got sentenced. We got sent to jail, what's going to stop an officer from taking that next step." That next step, in Morris' mind, is First Nations people being shot by police during land-based disputes. CBC News

C-51 has sparked a much-needed conversation about security and rights

An opinion piece states, "The best thing that might come out of Bill C-51, the government's proposed new anti-terrorism legislation, will not be the bill itself, certainly not if it passes through the House of Commons and Senate un-amended. The best thing might be an affirmation that Canadians care about finding the right balance between security and democratic rights, including privacy rights. Achieving that balance is no easy matter, given the complexity and pace of change of security threats, and the modern Pandora's box of surveillance capabilities represented by what officials benignly define as the security "toolkit." High levels of official secrecy hamper the debate. Some 14 years after the Sept. 11 attacks and the original passage of Canada's first anti-terrorism legislation, we now are busy adding layers to what has become a dense legal foundation, compounding the problem of knowing whether our laws protect us or might imperil us. It is, simply, hard to know what security and intelligence agencies might need to meet threats, hard to know how newly-minted capabilities might actually be used in the future, and hard to know what their impact on rights and freedoms might actually be. Maybe the impact will be less than feared and the security-rights balance that we worked so hard to create after 9/11 will be fine. Maybe not. Because of the unknowns, there have been many calls for matching new powers with catch-up provisions for strengthened accountability. Concerns on this front have been expressed, in an unprecedented way, by four former prime ministers; Canada has even been called out by none other than Edward Snowden, the NSA whistleblower, as having one of the weakest intelligence oversight systems in the Western world. Strengthened accountability may well be our best bet to ensure that new security powers are balanced against rights protections." The Globe and Mail

Le SCRS partage des renseignements au-delà du réseau des "Five Eyes"

Un document interne du Service canadien de renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) révèle la présence d'un système d'échange de renseignements sur l'implication de présumés extrémistes à l'étranger avec divers partenaires, qui va au-delà du réseau habituel des "Five Eyes". Le Canada partage déjà des informations avec quatre autres pays -- les États-Unis, le Royaume-Uni, l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande -- mais il a aussi conclu des partenariats "non traditionnels" sur cet enjeu. La note interne, intitulée "S'attaquer à la menace du déplacement des terroristes", a été obtenue par La Presse canadienne en vertu de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information. Plusieurs données ont été caviardées dans le document de cinq pages. Selon la note interne, le SCRS doit disposer "prioritairement" d'informations sur ce phénomène. "Obtenir les informations pertinentes sur cette menace pour conseiller le gouvernement nécessite des enquêtes approfondies au pays et à l'étranger, étant donné les éléments nationaux et internationaux qu'elles comportent", a-t-on écrit. Le SCRS a cependant remarqué que les alliés habituels du Canada avaient plutôt renforcé leurs ressources déjà existantes, au lieu de créer des liens avec d'autres pays. Le Canada, quant à lui, ferait face à des "défis opérationnels et à des pressions sur les ressources" causés par des facteurs ayant été censurés dans le document... Les événements survenus en octobre ont amené le gouvernement Harper à proposer un nouveau projet de loi antiterroriste afin de mieux cibler les présumés extrémistes qui vont se battre à l'étranger. Les nouvelles mesures permettraient aussi de déléguer de nouveaux pouvoirs au SCRS pour qu'il puisse obtenir un mandat afin d'enquêter dans d'autres pays. Intelligence agencies need oversight

A former CIA spy's eyes widen when he hears that, in Canada, the political opposition doesn't get to see national-security intelligence files. "You're kidding me," says John Kiriakou, who is under house arrest in Virginia after a two-year prison stay for revealing information about his former employer. "That's shocking to me. It seems to block any chance of a national consensus on an issue that I think would be very serious. There has to be oversight." Kiriakou made the remarks during an interview in which he described an internal controversy within the CIA over the arrest and rendition of Canadian Maher Arar to be tortured in a Syrian prison. Many colleagues protested, arguing that they were punishing an innocent man, he said. The CIA's role in the 2002-03 affair has never been publicly scrutinized. The fallout in Canada included a public inquiry and a $10-million government payout to Arar. A major recommendation from the inquiry was an overhaul of the model used to scrutinize intelligence work. A decade later, that recommendation from the Arar inquiry has never been implemented - even as the Canadian government prepares to provide intelligence agencies with more power in its new anti-terror bill. Soaring cost of terror fight hits RCMP

The RCMP has been forced to shuffle more cash and officers into terrorism investigations as Ottawa's financial contribution has remained static over the last decade, documents show. The Mounties diverted $22.9 million from other operations to the Integrated National Security Enforcement Teams (INSETs) in 2013-14... The Star made multiple interview requests to the RCMP for comment, which weren't returned. The Star also requested an interview with Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney's office. In reply, a spokesperson for Blaney said the government has increased security agencies budgets since coming to power - and took a shot at the opposition for voting against Conservative budgets. "Despite the Liberal and NDP's votes against these increases, our government will continue to ensure that our national security agencies have the resources they need to keep Canadians safe," wrote Jean-Christophe de la Rue, in a three-sentence statement. But Liberal finance critic Ralph Goodale said the RCMP's numbers contradicts the Conservatives' "rhetoric" around public safety and national security issues. "Despite what the government has been saying about the increasing risks to national security and the increasing importance of our security agencies, the official budget has flatlined at $10 million for more than a decade," Goodale, whose office obtained the documents, said in an interview. "So the RCMP has had to find the extra $20 (million) to $25 million (a year) from its own internal resources." The figures were released as the majority Conservatives continue to push through Bill C-51, the controversial anti-terrorism legislation that gives police-like powers to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. One question that has been largely ignored in the heated debate around C-51 is how CSIS's new powers will work in areas of the RCMP's current jurisdiction. Toronto Star, A1 (2015-04-09)

Ottawa police will guard the guards

There is a Latin phrase that reads: Quis custodiet ipsos custodes? - translated as "Who will guard the guards themselves?" On Thursday, that question was answered, at least for the ceremonial guards who stand watch daily over the iconic National War Memorial. The federal government has contracted the Ottawa Police Service to guard the two sentries stationed below the monument and in front of the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. The Department of National Defence is paying the Ottawa police an estimated $425,000 for uniformed officers to protect the sentries beginning this week and running until mid-November. The contract follows the attack last fall in which Michael Zehaf Bibeau shot and killed honour guard Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, of Hamilton, at the memorial. Terror bill losing support: Poll

Most Canadians oppose the Conservatives' proposed anti-terror legislation, according to a Forum Research poll released this week. The poll found 56% of Canadians, most of them younger and less wealthy, disapprove of Bill C-51. Forty-two percent believe the bill, if passed, will have a "negative effect" on their lives, while one-quarter think the effects will be positive. QMI Agency (Ottawa Sun, 5) (2015-04-11)

ISIS radicals change tactics

As social media giants crack down on the Islamic State's drive to attract fighters and followers, the extremist group is nimbly adapting to leave such efforts in the dust. Supporters are increasingly moving to smaller platforms such as Kik or surespot just as Twitter, Tumblr and YouTube are becoming better at taking down radical content. Western governments are intensifying efforts to respond to Islamic State's call, as 4,000 of their citizens, including 550 women, have travelled to Syria since 2012, according to figures from King's College London and the Soufan Group. In Canada, the proposed anti-terror bill C-51 would allow police to seize Internet material considered terrorist propaganda. The U.S. State Department is expanding a unit tasked with countering the Islamic State's messages, the New York Times reported. Toronto Star, WD7 (2015-04-11)

What's really terrifying about anti-terrorism

An opinion piece states, "Why are so many Canadians anxious about the Canadian government's proposed "Anti-Terrorism Act"? Can't they get a grip? Yes, more Canadians die from lightning than from terrorism. Yes, the government is about to give its controversial security and intelligence agencies a blank cheque to operate without effective accountability. And yes, as whistleblower Edward Snowden said last month to a Ryerson University audience, "Canadian intelligence has one of the weakest oversight frameworks of any western intelligence agency in the world." So what's the problem? If our own domestic agencies try to sell innocent fellow Canadians down the river - remember the case of Canadian Maher Arar, who spent a year being beaten and tortured in Syria on the basis of false information provided to the American CIA by Canada - there are apparently still individual agents within the CIA who will try to protect our interests..." Atwood critical of Bill C-51

Renowned Canadian author Margaret Atwood added her voice to a growing chorus opposing the federal government's anti-terrorism bill. All Canadians should be concerned about Bill C-51 - "it's not only about where you live, but what you had for breakfast," said Atwood, who spoke at Red Deer College Monday as part of its Perspectives: Canada in the World series. The new bill, introduced in January by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, would grant greater powers to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and allow federal institutions to access all information government departments have on any Canadian. There are concerns this could curtail internationally-guaranteed human rights such as liberty, privacy and freedom of expression. "You are more likely to die in a hospital from a super bug than be blown up in a terrorist attack. Where is the research money for super bugs?" Atwood said, to enthusiastic applause from the audience. Red Deer Advocate, A1, A2 (2015-04-07)

An opinion piece states, "Canada is ready to extend its fight against the Islamic State (ISIS) into Syria, carrying on a war that'll cost about half-a-billion taxpayer dollars by early next year. Prime Minister Stephen Harper is following up on his promise that Canada won't "stand on the sidelines" when it comes to the fight against Muslim extremism... The public language in support of this two-front "war on terror" has given rise to a new kind of militarism in Canada. It's characterized by a political rhetoric that galvanizes support for itself not only by pointing to a foreign enemy, but also by emphasizing the need to root out the enemy's ideological supporters on Canadian soil. This latter emphasis has, at the hands of the Tories, become a way to depict dissent against government policy as support for Muslim terrorism. Support for terrorism. Take the debate around Bill C-51 (the "Anti-terrorism Act"), the Conservative's proposal on how to fight domestic terrorism. The bill is making its way through the legislative process with limited debate and examination, despite containing provisions that will, according to a chorus of critics, forever change the landscape of Canadian national security. Its supporters emphasize the imminent nature of an ill-defined terrorism threat, keeping in mind that security issues will likely occupy the minds of voters in the upcoming fall election..." It pays to pay attention

An opinion piece states, "Like most people I have been hearing a lot about Bill C-51 lately, and like most people I only have a passing understanding of what it actually contains. The more you read about it though, the more you realize everyone should know everything about this bill before it is most likely approved this summer. Essentially what it comes down to is an attempt by the government to extend Canada's anti-terror laws due to increased threats of terrorism. On paper, that sounds like a necessary measure. We all want to be safe and it is the government's job to keep everyone as secure as possible. The trouble is how we go about implementing the safety measures..." Meridian Booster (2015-04-07)

Bill C-51 Is More Unpopular than Ever

As Stephen Harper's controversial anti-terrorism bill clips through Parliament, en route to becoming law by the summer, public opposition is threatening to take wind out of the prime minister's sails. Of the Canadians who are aware of C-51, 56 percent oppose the bill while just 33 percent endorse it, according to a Forum Research poll provided exclusively to VICE News. That's an 11-point swing over Forum's last poll, which was conducted for VICE two weeks prior, when only a bare majority of those who were aware of the bill opposed it. The news gets worse for Harper, as one of the biggest drops in support for the bill is amongst his own kind. Of those who said they support the Conservative Party, 72 percent support Bill C-51—that's a nine point drop since Forum asked earlier in March. Meanwhile, 13 percent say they disapprove of the bill. The poll was conducted after marathon committee hearings took place, in which the Conservative majority shot down hundreds of amendments to the bill. Vice News (2015-04-09)

Ex-spy watchdog Plunkett calls CSIS civilian review 'a joke'

Eva Plunkett is not prone to hyperbole. The former inspector-general for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service – the public servant who was, once upon a time, the Public Safety minister's eyes and ears inside Canada's spy agency — chooses her words very carefully. Plunkett spent nearly a decade as IG before Stephen Harper shuttered the office in 2012 because she was doing too good a job — routinely issuing reports that diplomatically raised the alarm about CSIS's questionable conduct. She took the work seriously. So when Plunkett says that the government's civilian oversight body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, is a "joke" — take it to the bank. She knows what she's talking about. And nobody knows better how vacuous the assurances offered by Prime Minister Harper and Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney about the draconian powers CSIS is getting under Bill C-51 truly are. iPolitics (2015-04-10)

Last word on C-51

I wasn't going to write another word on Harper's Bill C-51, because all seemed to me to have been said. 1) It's an appalling Bill, creating an unaccountable political police with wide powers—a piece of legislation clearly designed to stamp out civil dissent; and 2) With a few cosmetic changes, it's already a done deal. But a formidable new expert has now been heard from, and any waverers need to listen. Before getting to that, though, here's a brief resume of the proposed Conservative amendments to C-51 as reported in the media. Removing the word "lawful" from the Bill seemingly clarifies that acts of peaceful civil disobedience, trespass, and (in Montreal) exercising the former right of free assembly to protest government austerity, will not be considered "terrorist" acts. The Bill will now emphasize that CSIS has no power to make arrests. Information-sharing will be restricted, but we don't yet know to what degree. Rabble.ca (2015-04-11)

Indigenous Bar Association Concerned over C-51

The Indigenous Bar Association shares this message today to give voice to its deep concerns with Bill C-51 for all Canadians and for Indigenous peoples in particular. The IBA is a national association comprised of Indigenous (First Nations, Inuit and Metis) lawyers, legal academics, articling clerks and law students, including graduate and post-graduate law students. The IBA is a not-for-profit federal corporation mandated, amongst other things, to promote the advancement of legal and social justice for Indigenous peoples in Canada, as well as the reform of laws and policies affecting Indigenous peoples. Our concerns with Bill C-51, even given its proposed amendments, are manifold. We share the concerns given voice by many other groups, including that if passed into law, Bill C-51 would: Unduly privilege economic interests over social, political and legal interests; Dramatically mobilize Canada's security and surveillance apparatuses without protecting the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians. On the contrary, the erosion of Canadian civil and political rights appears as the condition that allows for the vast expansion in the state's powers of security and surveillance; Serve to criminalize dissent. Worse, it would serve to move claims that have always been contemplated under Canadian law within the discourse of criminality into the discourse of terror; Allow for the mass violation of the privacy rights of Canadians via increased powers of state surveillance and information sharing programs and protocols; Expose lawfully acting Canadians to a risk of arbitrary detention by state security agents. As a more general matter, the Bill as drafted is intentionally so overly-broad and ambiguous in its scope as to seriously challenge the current government's commitment to the principle of legality. Yet that principle is one which lies at the heart of Canadian constitutionalism. Bill C-51 fundamentally misrepresents the necessary balance between freedom and security. Overview / Vue d'ensemble

- Media coverage regarding the forthcoming anti-terrorism legislation continued to receive a moderate amount of media coverage and generally remained balanced. However, of note was an opinion piece written by Wesley Wark who was slightly critical in his assessments. Wark states that, in his opinion, the federal government has “over-sold” the upcoming legislation “both in terms of scale and legislative overhaul” and that the legislation will most likely be a “fine-tuning” of already established legal powers.
- According to comments made by Jason Kenney, Minister of Employment and Social Development, one objective of the upcoming bill will be to diminish the incitement of terrorism while not diminishing the legitimate expression of political or religious views. During the evening, the Canadian Press reported that the upcoming legislation will create a new Criminal Code provision making it a crime to encourage someone to carry out a terrorist attack.
- Global News reported this evening that one component of the upcoming legislation will allow police to detain an individual suspected of terrorist activity for a longer period of time without having to lay a charge.
- In an interview today, Canada’s Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien stated that he would like to see enhanced transparency and oversight provisions incorporated into Friday’s anti-terrorism legislation. Mr. Therrien also stated that he is concerned about the potential for information to be shared of non-suspects.
- On the topic of the forthcoming legislation, Liberal Public Safety Critic Wayne Easter stated that the Liberal party remains “very open to what the government will propose” though will only support the bill if it contains additional oversight provisions for security agencies.

Feds outline more details of upcoming anti-terror bill

Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney assures the government's new terror bill expected Friday will be in "full compliance with Canadian law." The bill is expected to include provisions to allow "preventative arrests" and criminalize the "promotion of terror" -- measures law enforcement has indicated would help detain potential terrorists before a crime is actually committed. Asked to explain how the government will criminalize the promotion of terrorism, Blaney said the Criminal Code already contains provisions on "supporting hatred or violence." "It is really criminal to incite terror, to support terrorism or to encourage to use violence to achieve your means," Blaney said. Liberal public safety critic Wayne Easter says it's worth examining whether Canada actually needs new laws or whether it could simply make use of what already exists. "One key question is why have current laws not been utilized to the full extent we think they ought to be," Easter told reporters Tuesday, following a meeting of the House public safety committee. Limits on free speech are risky business

An opinion piece states, "When the Harper Conservative government introduces its anti-terror legislation later this week, it will walk a fine line. The legislation is needed, because the threat of terror, especially homegrown terror, is all too real, as we have seen first hand. Most of the omnibus anti-terror bill builds on existing frameworks, giving police and security officials expanded powers and making it easier to share information - including about all citizens, not just those suspected of terror links. But there is new ground here as well, and that's what we should be watching. A key feature of the new law is a measure that draws a line between free expression and endorsing terrorism. Simply put, people who verbally promote or glorify terrorism could be charged under the act. It's easy to see how this will work in extreme cases, for example, where someone praises terror attacks like the ones that happened in Canada last year. But what about in more subjective cases? Any time we limit free speech, even for a good reason, we need to tread carefully. This is no exception." Hamilton Spectator, A10

Conservatives looking to detain suspected terrorists longer without charge

The Conservative government is considering changes to Canada's anti-terror laws, that would allow the police to detain a suspected terrorist for a longer period for time without charges. Sources tell Global News the change is expected to be part of the Conservative government's overhaul of anti-terror laws, expected to be announced this Friday. Currently, if police believe someone is planning to commit a terrorist act, they can arrest the individual without laying a charge. Officers then have 72 hours to come up with sufficient evidence, otherwise the suspect must be released. The new rules under consideration would allow police to appear before a judge and seek two additional 48-hour extensions, allowing them more time to continue their investigation. Global News

New Conservative anti terror bill needs to walk a fine line, Kenney says

There's a fine line between legitimate religious expression and inciting terrorism, says Conservative cabinet minister Jason Kenney. It's that line the government will be walking - carefully - in its new anti-terrorism bill, expected to be unveiled Friday. The bill is the government's long-awaited legislative response to two attacks carried out on Canadian soldiers last fall by men believed to have been influenced by radical Islam - attacks the government considers acts of terrorism. Though police already have the power to go after those suspecting of being on the verge of committing terrorist attacks, the new bill is partially aimed at stopping the seeds of those attacks from germinating altogether. "Our objective is not to diminish legitimate expression of political or religious views, but rather incitement to terrorism - and there is a fine line there that the legislation will try to draw," Kenney said in an interview Tuesday. "Obviously there are some malevolent religious influences that can add to the process of radicalization towards violent extremism, and we have to be extremely mindful of that." How to effectively combat radicalization is a struggle facing governments and security agencies the world over. The RCMP is currently rolling out its own strategy, which includes working more closely with community groups in order to identify and divert people who may be susceptible to extreme views that could eventually lead to violence. Une loi criminalisera la promotion du terrorisme

Le gouvernement fédéral déposera vendredi une loi qui rendrait criminelle l'incitation à commettre des attaques terroristes. Selon les informations obtenues par La Presse Canadienne, le gouvernement prévoit créer une nouvelle disposition dans le Code criminel pour punir les extrémistes qui encourageraient les autres à perpétrer des attentats terroristes. Selon une source gouvernementale, les attaques du mois d'octobre au pays ont prouvé qu'une telle mesure était nécessaire. La nouvelle clause ne s'appliquerait toutefois pas à la simple apologie du terrorisme. Par exemple, une personne qui publierait sur Internet des images d'une explosion ne serait pas arrêtée. Mais si ladite vidéo appelait à mener une attaque semblable au Canada, il s'agirait là d'un acte criminel. La Presse Canadienne (Journal Métro); Canadian Press (Times Colonist)

Les vidéos menaçant le Canada deviendront criminelles

Dans ses démarches pour renforcer les lois pour contrer la menace terroriste au pays, le gouvernement Harper va rendre criminelles la publication et la propagation de vidéos où le Canada est identifié comme cible. Une vidéo comme celle où l'on voit le djihadiste canadien John Maguire en appeler aux armes contre le Canada sera maintenant spécifiquement visée par le droit criminel. Parmi les mesures qui seront présentées vendredi pour contrer la promotion du terrorisme, une publication comme celle d'une vidéo où l'on demande de perpétrer des attaques au Canada en général, soit une forme d'encouragement actif, serait désormais visée par le droit pénal. Une source conservatrice indique que, selon les mesures actuelles, il est impossible d'accuser un individu si la nature des attaques n'est pas précise. TVA Nouvelles

Federal government's new terror law concerns privacy watchdog

Canada's privacy watchdog is expressing early concerns about information sharing provisions expected in the Conservatives' new anti-terror laws, as Prime Minister Stephen Harper meets with Toronto police chiefs to win support for the new measures. Daniel Therrien said he's been briefed on the government's new anti-terror bill, to be tabled in Parliament on Friday, and will be closely watching the wording of provisions aimed at increasing information sharing among government agencies. "Information sharing regarding whom? Regarding people who are suspected of terrorist activities, or the sharing of information about other Canadians who are not suspected of anything in order to identify a national security threat," Therrien said. "Travellers crossing the border, ordinary Canadians crossing the border. Will there be greater information sharing about them from the border agency to the secret service?" Toronto Star

Liberals say they're open to upcoming Tory terror bill

The Liberals say they will only support the government's upcoming terror bill if it includes oversight mechanisms for security agencies. Despite the government's caginess on its contents, information leaked to media indicates it will broadly expand police surveillance powers. It will also outlaw the nebulous-sounding "promotion of terror." The bill is expected to be tabled Friday. Speaking earlier this week following a meeting of the House public safety committee, Liberal public safety critic Wayne Easter said those laws already exist - from preventative arrests and peace bonds to outlawing anyone who's gone abroad to participate in terrorism from trying to return. On Wednesday, Easter said the Liberals remain "very open to what the government will propose." But the Liberals have a "serious caveat on this bill," he said, "and that is that there needs to be proper oversight of security agencies." Without it, Easter said privacy rights could too easily be breached. Sun News Network

Wesley Wark: The anti-terrorism legislation has likely been oversold

An opinion piece states, "The Canadian government has been beating the drum about the need for new counter-terrorism powers since the October, 2014 terror attacks in Quebec and Ottawa. A legislative package is finally scheduled to be tabled in Parliament on Friday. The substance of this new legislation has been subject to some intermittent and generalized remarks by our political leaders, reaching a slight crescendo in recent days, and by wider media speculation. To no one's surprise, there have been no substantive leaks. This is not the style of the Harper government. The closer we get to the birth date, the more hinting there has been from ministers. This can be seen as a calculated effort to prepare the ground for what is bound to be an intense political debate in Parliament about the merits of any extension to Canada's significant suite of anti-terror laws, originally passed in 2001. The broad lineaments of that debate are already clear, even without sight of the new proposals... Prediction is always a hostage to fortune, especially on the eve of the unveiling of the legislation itself. But let me make some "reasonable" predictions about the anti-terror legislation in terms of what it will and won't contain, and the historical baggage of some of its contents." Ottawa Citizen

Lutte au terrorisme: les policiers et les espions n'ont pas assez de ressources, selon le NPD

Alors que le gouvernement conservateur continue de dire que les policiers et agents du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) ont besoin de plus de pouvoirs pour stopper les terroristes, l'opposition est d'avis que les policiers et les espions ont seulement besoin de plus de moyens. «On a entendu parler de policiers qui savaient qu'il y avait des individus qui se radicalisaient, mais ils n'avaient pas les ressources nécessaires pour effectuer de la surveillance», a expliqué Rosane Doré-Lefebvre, porte-parole du NPD en matière de sécurité publique. L'opposition demande plus d'argent pour le SCRS et la GRC, au moment où le gouvernement peine à équilibrer son budget. Alors que certains s'inquiètent des ressources allouées aux agents de renseignements, le réseau Global a mis la main sur les frais de déplacement du directeur du SCRS, Michel Coulombe. «Ça n'a pas de bon sens que les voyages du directeur du SCRS coûtent plus cher que ceux du ministre. Une chambre d'hôtel à 750 $ la nuit, c'est un peu exagéré», s'est indignée Mme Doré-Lefebvre en Chambre. Le président du Conseil du trésor, Tony Clement, a déjà demandé une révision des dépenses du directeur du SCRS. Journal de Montréal

Anti-terrorism bill built around an attack that still raises questions

Was Michael Zehaf-Bibeau a terrorist or not? Canadians still don't really know. In the three months since the attack on the National War Memorial and Parliament Hill, government leaders have repeatedly declared Zehaf-Bibeau to be a violent jihadist. Prime Minister Stephen Harper mentioned it again during a campaign-style speech in Orléans on Sunday. "Jihadist terrorism is not a future possibility, it is a present reality," he said, referring to October's attacks in both Ottawa and Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que. "Violent jihadism is not simply a danger somewhere else. It seeks to harm us here, through horrific acts like ... shooting a soldier from behind as he stands guard at a war memorial." Yet politicians and police have tendered no clear evidence to underpin their claims. On Friday, the question becomes more important. The Conservatives are to table anti-terrorism legislation directly inspired by the events of Oct. 22. Harper has said the new laws will increase the state's powers to monitor, arrest and detain suspected terrorists. Knowing whether Zehaf-Bibeau, 32, was a terrorist driven by Islamist rage would help in understanding whether the proposed new laws are necessary or wise – or, as the opposition NDP charges, whether the legislation is more about political opportunism in an election year. Laïcité: Drainville interpelle Couillard

Bernard Drainville a indiqué mardi que le premier ministre devrait condamner et combattre le fondamentalisme de toutes les religions avec des lois et des outils comme des balises pour la laïcité de l'État. «Il ne faut pas reculer sur la protection de la liberté de religion, mais ce que je dis c'est que l'intégrisme religieux qui veut imposer sa loi religieuse, sur des lois votées démocratiquement dans des parlements, ça n'est pas acceptable, a-t-il dit. Tu ne peux pas dire, comme premier ministre du Québec: ça fait partie des choix personnels. Ça et baisser les bras, ça et renoncer, ça et dire: finalement, je l'accepte, il n'y a pas grand-chose à faire avec ça. 'Come on M. Couillard, come on', vous êtes premier ministre, tenez-vous debout.» Les porte-paroles du Parti libéral du Canada et du Nouveau Parti démocratique en matière de sécurité publique s'opposent à l'idée des conservateurs d'imposer la prison à vie à des criminels sans qu'ils ne puissent réclamer de libération conditionnelle. Ils ont peur que cette mesure aggrave l'état des criminels et mette en danger le personnel des prisons. Ils prônent donc la réhabilitation des détenus, même ceux reconnus coupables de meurtres en série et d'agressions sexuelles sur des enfants. Le gouvernement présentera vendredi une nouvelle mesure dans sa politique antiterroriste. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, assure que les libertés civiles seront respectées même si les conservateurs légifèrent pour contrer la promotion du terrorisme. CSE tracks millions of downloads daily: Snowden documents

Canada's electronic spy agency sifts through millions of videos and documents downloaded online every day by people around the world, as part of a sweeping bid to find extremist plots and suspects, CBC News has learned. Details of the Communications Security Establishment project dubbed "Levitation" are revealed in a document obtained by U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden and recently released to CBC News. Under Levitation, analysts with the electronic eavesdropping service can access information on about 10 to 15 million uploads and downloads of files from free websites each day, the document says. "Every single thing that you do - in this case uploading/downloading files to these sites - that act is being archived, collected and analyzed," says Ron Deibert, director of the University of Toronto-based internet security think-tank Citizen Lab, who reviewed the document. In the document, a PowerPoint presentation written in 2012, the CSE analyst who wrote it jokes about being overloaded with innocuous files such as episodes of the musical TV series Glee in their hunt for terrorists. CBC analyzed the document in collaboration with the U.S. news website The Intercept, which obtained it from Snowden. The presentation provides a rare glimpse into Canada's cyber-sleuthing capabilities and its use of its spy partners' immense databases to track the online traffic of millions of people around the world, including Canadians. That glimpse may be of even greater interest now that the Harper government plans to introduce new legislation increasing the powers of Canada's security agencies. CBC News

Montreal teen allegedly committed robbery to help terrorist group

A Montreal teenager facing two terrorism-related charges linked to a robbery will have a trial date set next month. The 15-year-old appeared Wednesday in youth court, where his lawyer was granted a request to postpone proceedings until Feb. 16. Federal prosecutors allege he committed a robbery for the benefit of an unspecified terrorist organization. Authorities also say the adolescent is charged with planning to leave Canada to participate in the activities of a terrorist group abroad. The Harper government is about to introduce new laws which the prime minister says are designed to help authorities stop planned attacks and prevent terrorists from travelling and recruiting others. Overview / Vue d'ensemble

The lifting of a publication ban on a Montreal trial garnered moderate amount of print media coverage during the monitoring period. Articles were positive in tone with regards to the ability to report the details of the case.

On June 10, Superior Court Justice André Vincent lifted a publication ban on the court proceedings, regarding Salvatore Montagna's murder, revealing a web of criminal activity and state-of-the-art surveillance technology. Justice Vincent rejected requests from both the Crown and the defense to extend the publication bans, and ordered that nearly all the information shall become public. Media also reported that the RCMP had warrants to intercept the BlackBerry PIN-to-PIN encrypted messages sent from the seven men accused of murder.

Mob violence, cutting-edge technology - The lifting of a publication ban on a Montreal murder trial exposes web of criminal activity and state-of-the-art surveillance

The morning that Salvatore Montagna, one-time boss of the Bonanno crime family, was shot three times and died on a snowy river bank outside Montreal, his archenemy Raynald Desjardins was having breakfast elsewhere in town with his daughter and chatting about her wedding photo album. Shortly after the killing, Mr. Desjardins sent a terse BlackBerry message to his associate, Vittorio Mirarchi: "Done." "Perfect," came the reply. Police who were wiretapping Mr. Desjardins's mobile phones immediately suspected he was behind the 2011 murder. The next evening - Nov. 25, 2011 - an RCMP sergeant arrived outside Mr. Desjardins's house with a portable device that tracked cellular signals and tried to identify what other mobile phones were inside. It was part of a 16-month surveillance operation that led police to charge Mr. Desjardins and seven others in connection with the murder of Mr. Montagna. Globe and Mail, A4; Journal de Montréal (2016-06-11)

Secret messages behind a mob hit - Texts revealed in Montagna case after judge partially lifts ban

In the months before he was gunned down in cold blood, Mafioso Salvatore Montagna was being hunted by a team of people who knew almost every move he made while he was being betrayed by a cloned smartphone. The detail is one of many contained in the evidence gathered in the wake of Montagna's murder, on Nov. 24, 2011, that had been subject to a publication ban for years until Superior Court Justice André Vincent partially lifted the order during a hearing at the Laval courthouse Friday. Montagna was the upstart within the Mafia in Montreal, arriving in 2009 after being deported from the United States. He apparently chose to reside here to take advantage of the fact that Vito Rizzuto, the longtime leader of the Mafia in Montreal, was serving a 10-year sentence in the U.S., and the organization that bore his family's name was weakened in his absence. What Montagna likely did not factor into his plans was that just months after he arrived in Montreal, Raynald Desjardins, 62, was freed of conditions imposed by the Parole Board of Canada, after serving jail time, that had prevented him from re-taking his high stature among Montreal's mobsters. Desjardins was sentenced to 15 years in 1994 for plotting to smuggle cocaine into Canada. Montreal Gazette, A10 (2016-06-11)

Canadian Cops Lose Fight to Keep Details of Their High-Tech Surveillance Powers Secret

Federal police in Canada may have lost the battle, but won the war, when it comes to keeping secret their ability to track cellphones, intercept messages, and decrypt messages sent by BlackBerry phones. VICE News and Motherboard first reported in April that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) had obtained BlackBerry's global encryption key, and had used it to read millions of messages sent between seven men accused of murder, and a litany of other alleged mobsters who are accused of drug trafficking, kidnapping, and arson. Since then, we have fought to keep this information in the public domain. But since then, Crown prosecutors have been fighting to put the genie back in the bottle, asserting that a vague, open-ended publication ban would forbid media from reporting the details of a case that, by the RCMP's own admission, involved the largest use ever of PIN to PIN interception technique in a major North American investigation. On Friday, a judge in Laval, Quebec, rejected requests from both the Crown and the defense to extend the publication bans, and ordered that nearly all the information shall become public. The Crown, faced with representatives from the media filing to have the information rendered public, eventually retreated, and asked for only sections of the documents to be kept secret. That the Crown was even seeking to extend the publication ban even after securing convictions is something "we don't normally see," said lawyer Christian Leblanc, who represented VICE and other media's push back against the government's efforts to suppress this information. The RCMP Surveilled Thousands of Innocent Canadians for a Decade

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been using mass surveillance devices known as IMSI catchers, in public, for a decade. In that time, the police have indiscriminately surveilled potentially thousands of Canadians without their knowledge, and stored that information for later use. Motherboard and VICE News obtained more than 3,000 pages of court documents that were produced as part of a case centering around a 2010 RCMP drug bust that unveiled a Montreal mafia slaying, codenamed Project Clemenza. Thanks to these documents, Canadians are finally getting a peek into the RCMP's use of mobile device identifiers—the police's term for IMSI catchers. On Friday, some of the men who pleaded guilty in the case that sprang from Clemenza are being sentenced in a Quebec court. Motherboard (2016-06-10)

Mafia montréalaise: le meurtre d'un aspirant parrain décrypté

Le caïd Raynald Desjardins et sept complices ont illégalement espionné un aspirant parrain de la mafia montréalaise tout en orchestrant son meurtre, à l'automne 2011. Ils ignoraient toutefois que leurs propres communications étaient interceptées à leur insu par la police. Le Journal peut maintenant révéler publiquement la preuve amassée lors de cette enquête historique, menée par la Sûreté du Québec et la Gendarmerie royale du Canada, qui a permis d'élucider l'assassinat de Salvatore Montagna, abattu à Charlemagne, le 24 novembre 2011. RCMP's BlackBerry-cracking methods could be revealed in Quebec court

A Quebec court could today pull back the curtain on secretive police techniques, including how the RCMP intercepted BlackBerry text messages to prove a murder conspiracy plot, as a judge considers whether to lift a publication ban in a case involving the Montreal Mafia. The case stems from Project Clemenza, a police operation that resulted in scores of organized crime arrests in 2014. At the time, police announced they had intercepted more than one million BlackBerry messages tied to allegations of drug trafficking, kidnapping, arson, weapons and other violent offences. () Chief Supt. Jeff Adam, who oversees the RCMP's Technical Investigations Services, declined to discuss with CBC News the specific methods used. But given rapid changes in technology and public concern in the post-Snowden era, as mobile developers move toward more secure "end-to-end" encryption, he says investigators are finding their jobs increasingly difficult. "What we're seeing now is the best evidence of people conspiring to commit a crime is lost to us. And that's what we call 'going dark,'" Adam said. CBC News (2016-06-10)

Whistleblower Edward Snowden says spying on reporters is a 'radical attack on the free press'

Montreal Gazette

2016-11-02, 22:17 ET

To some, whistleblower Edward Snowden is a traitor. To others, he's a hero.

Whichever way you see him, Snowden – a former CIA employee and contractor for the National Security Agency (NSA) who is responsible for the largest national security breach in U.S. history – is a pivotal figure in any debate pertaining to the issue of government surveillance.

He is one of the most wanted fugitives in the world after leaking thousands of classified NSA documents to a few journalists in 2013. His disclosures revealed, among other things, that U.S. telecommunications companies were providing the NSA with virtually all their customers' phone records and that the NSA has a tool to search nearly everything a user does on the Internet.

So Snowden's talk at McGill University Wednesday night, as the city is in an uproar over police spying on La Presse reporter Patrick Lagacé and possibly much more widespread spying as well, was timely and promised to ignite an already fierce debate on authorities overstepping their bounds and cyber spying on their own citizens.

Students lined up across the length of the campus to see him and McGill officials had to scramble to set up overflow rooms. When Snowden's giant image finally showed up on the screen, almost 90 minutes late, he was greeted with thunderous applause.

Here's what Snowden had to say, from his hideout in Russia, on some important issues:

Montreal spying scandal: "The story about Montreal police spying on a journalist for the reason of uncovering sources is a radical attack on the free press," he said. "It unsettles me. It's a threat to the traditional model of our democracy." Now, he said, local police can decide that if they don't like a certain reporter, they can ask a judge to monitor their phones. It used to be such measures were reserved for real criminal threats; now they have been repurposed to monitor journalists.

The Internet age and surveillance: We're all being watched and that's what drove Snowden to be a whistleblower. Months before he leaked the classified documents, he heard the head of the NSA outright lie, under oath, about the use of surveillance techniques. "Surveillance technologies have outpaced democratic controls," he said. Surveillance used to be too expensive to use much. Now, he said, one guy at the NSA can track with extreme precision a large number of people. "It's become technologically and financially feasible to track people."

Intelligence agencies and authorities: How do we trust intelligence agencies and officials to operate fairly? We can't, he said. Governments should establish judicial bodies with independent prosecutorial discretion to monitor these agencies and to prosecute any illegalities. "The only thing that will ensure they play fairly is the threat of criminal sanctions," said Snowden. They need to be held accountable. And the law has been failing as a guarantor of our rights, he said.

The U.S. election: He's very disappointed that the United States is going through an entire election cycle which has focused on the personalities of the candidates – with no mention of the Constitution. In any case, people should be cautious about putting all their hopes on any one political figure because they rarely deliver what they promise, Snowden said. "You can't rely on others to do the things we must do ourselves," he said. "If you want a better country, you're going to have to build it yourself."

Snowden said that while he gets a lot of attention when it comes to surveillance issues, he considers himself the least important part of the story.

Anyone who is thinking of him or his future is missing the bigger story: "What is happening to all of us."

Casualties of war on terror continue to be hounded by Canada's spies - Despite court victories and long-promised amendments to C-51, agencies that work in the shadows like CSIS and the RCMP still wield extraordinary powers over our privacy rights

As the Trudeau government considers long-promised amendments to the Harper regime's notorious C-51 "anti-terror" legislation, Canadians have been invited to participate in an online consultation ahead of 2017 parliamentary hearings.

This complex policy area includes everything from financing terrorism and "investigative capabilities in a digital world" to "domestic national security information sharing" and "procedures for listing terrorist entities," topics not normally the focus of dinner-table conversation.

But it's more than familiar territory to Mahmoud Jaballah, a former Scarborough school principal who's spent most of the past two decades jailed without charge or under house arrest. Held under Canada's secretive security certificate regime – a Kafkaesque procedure that allows Ottawa to indefinitely detain non-citizens and conduct secret hearings based on undisclosed national security allegations – he was finally cleared in May when Federal Court Judge Dolores Hansen declared the case against him "unreasonable."

In dismissing the case, Hansen also concluded that the government had failed to establish any "serious question of general importance," closing the door to any reconsideration of her verdict.

It was Jaballah's second victory against allegations linking him to Al-Jihad, an Egyptian-based terror group, that had dogged him since he was first arrested in 1999. He was held for seven months at that time, and the dismissal of his certificate later that year was only the second such case to win at the Federal Court.

But he was arrested again in August 2001 when spy agency CSIS offered a new interpretation of a case already dismissed as not credible. The Egyptian refugee, a survivor of the torture chambers of former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak, spent the next 15 years fighting the security certificate process, which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in 2007. The government responded by modifying the process to allow security-cleared lawyers some access to the secret hearings.

This past summer, in addition to connecting with his 10 grandchildren via cellphone selfies and text messaging, which he'd previously been prohibited from accessing, Jaballah booked the family trip he had dreamed of for 20 years. Following a flight out of Pearson Airport, they enjoyed a week-long road trip through Alberta and British Columbia.

"The Rocky Mountains were amazing," he recently enthused, though he was constantly worried about running into moose and other wildlife on the highways. "Canada is a beautiful country. It was good to see some of it finally."

But when the family showed up at the Calgary airport for their return flight home, Jaballah was pulled aside, held for secondary questioning and refused boarding.

"Why do they let me go but they don't let me come back?" he recalls asking airline staff, who simply shrugged and said they had no answers.

He pressed for information, after which he was shown a standardized, one-paragraph form faxed from Ottawa referencing the Secure Air Travel Act (Canada's no-fly list). Consistent with the secretive nature of the program, no reasons were listed. He was forced to head to car rentals and make the 40-hour drive home.

It was a chilling reminder for Jaballah that – despite his court victories and the change in government – agencies that work in the shadows (like CSIS and the RCMP) continue to wield extraordinary powers that affect the privacy rights and liberty of everyone in the country.

While much national discussion and protest erupted when C-51 was first introduced, the Liberals have been slow to revisit some of the new powers granted to spies to “disrupt” perceived security threats. Nor have they addressed fears of taking part in an online survey, since the ability to track IP addresses might bring Mounties to the door of those who express controversial opinions.

Despite those concerns, anyone viewing Snowden, Oliver Stone's new movie about the chilling surveillance documents revealed by the former U.S. National Security Agency contractor, may nonetheless be heading online to express their opinions about bulk collection of emails and cellphone conversations.

Indeed, Canada's own Communications Security Establishment was found in 2014 to have collected massive amounts of such data at airports, cafés and a variety of other WiFi locations, and that agency's review body last July noted a 26-fold increase in intercepted communications. CSIS, too, was recently called on the carpet for engaging in bulk data collection without specific guidelines, and last month suspended the practice pending development of new rules.

On the long drive home from Calgary, Jaballah wondered if such mass surveillance practices may have led to his sudden appearance on the no-fly list. “I try to live normal life, but then I wondered: are they still listening? Did they see the texts I sent that I travelled safely? Did they see the pictures I sent from Alberta?”

When he eventually arrived home, he had to deal with other bad news. Federal lawyers had filed a motion seeking to have his victorious court decision overturned. The Federal Court of Appeal rejected that motion last week, calling the case “closed.” However, Jaballah still must fight against the no-fly listing, which, under C-51, operates via a secretive process almost exactly like that of the security certificate regime.

The residue of cases like Jaballah's provides a potent reminder that, intimidating as C-51's new provisions may be, they often build on pre-existing security measures already wielded mostly against Muslims for the past 15 years.

Jaballah was part of a group known as the Secret Trial Five, all Muslim men subjected to lengthy detention under security certificates. Two are still battling in the courts.

But even winning a case does not stop the hounding by Canada's spies.

Hassan Almrei, a Syrian refugee held almost a decade, largely in solitary confinement, had a court victory in 2009. This did nothing, however, to advance his long-standing application for permanent residence, which remains unresolved to this day. And in a wired world, no amount of cleansing on Google can erase the search hits that remind potential employers of having once been considered a security threat.

Adil Charkaoui, who was freed from his security certificate in 2009 and has since become a Canadian citizen, says that years of anonymous “leaks” to Quebec newspapers and unfounded allegations attempting to tie him to terror threats dog him constantly, making him feel less secure than when he wore a GPS bracelet under house arrest.

The remaining two secret trial certificates – Toronto's Mohammad Mahjoub and Ottawa's Mohamed Harkat – were upheld by the Federal Court and, in the latter's case, by the Supreme Court of Canada, which held an extremely rare secret session as part of its deliberations.

Both men face legal battles to determine whether Canada can deport them to the substantial likelihood of torture in their birth countries (Egypt and Algeria).

Harkat is hoping to forestall that protracted litigation by asking Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale to find that “it is not contrary to the national interest” to allow him to stay. A campaign in support of that request has drawn more than 1,500 support letters, including from Naomi Klein, Stephen Lewis and the Prime Minister's brother, Alexandre Trudeau, who helped bail Harkat out of jail in 2006.

While these cases are often viewed as a response to 9/11, they're certainly not confined to the past. Their precedents instead reflect a future that, even if C-51 were to be repealed, remains troubling.

Liberals map swift overhaul of anti-terror law

October 21, 2015, 17:15 ET
Ottawa Citizen, By: Ian MacLeod

The controversial security bill rammed through Parliament by the Conservative government in the spring is expected to be overhauled without delay by the new Liberal government, say party officials and other sources.

Proposed legislation to add new measures and repeal some existing parts of the law, now known as the Anti-terrorism Act of 2015, or C-51, is already being drafted and is to be tabled early in the new parliamentary session. Consultations with the public and various experts are planned before the replacement legislation is put to a final House vote.

The bill was brought in by the Conservatives after the killings in October 2014 of Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent in Saint-Jean-Sur-Richelieu and Cpl. Nathan Cirillo in Ottawa by lone-wolf extremists.

A key feature of the replacement legislation is expected to be the creation of a multi-party, joint House of Commons-Senate committee, sworn to secrecy and reporting to the prime minister and through him to Parliament. It would have a full-time staff, access to the necessary secret information and be tasked with strategic oversight of every government department and agency with national security responsibilities, according to a source familiar with the content.

Early reaction is positive, but with a note of caution.

"It would be a new departure for the Canadian Parliament and what would be a very difficult task," said Wesley Wark, a security and intelligence historian and scholar at the University of Ottawa.

"I'm glad we've arrived at this moment, it's something that should have been done in Canada a long time ago. (But) it would be important to be cautious about expectations around the early performance of such a committee."

Canadian parliamentarians currently have no access to confidential and high-level information about national security institutions and policies – unlike politicians in the United States, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, and some other NATO nations.

Public opinion polling shows many Canadians want a tighter watch over spy agencies and other federal intelligence gatherers, commensurate with their extended powers under C-51.

A day after the Oct. 22, 2014 terror attack on the National War Memorial and Parliament Hill, Prime Minister Stephen Harper told the Commons that an existing government initiative to strengthen laws dealing with the surveillance, detention and arrest of national security suspects would be "expedited." Two months later, he unveiled Bill C-51, which the Conservative government used as the centrepiece of a security narrative on protecting Canadians from the Islamic State and its followers.

The omnibus bill, made law in June, dramatically expanded the mandate and powers of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), criminalized promoting and advocating terrorism, and required airlines to help stop extremists from flying to overseas battle zones.

It also allowed more than 100 departments and federal agencies to begin sharing Canadians' personal information more easily and made it simpler for police to arrest and detain individuals without charge as suspected national security threats, among other measures.

Five days after Harper unveiled C-51 on Jan. 30, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau surprised many by agreeing to support it. But at the same time, Trudeau said his party would demand – unsuccessfully as it turned out – that the Tory government amend some provisions. Failing that, Trudeau said a Liberal government would make changes once in power.

The Liberal plan for a parliamentary oversight committee is fashioned on a failed 2014 Senate bill introduced by senators Grant Mitchell, Roméo Dallaire and Hugh Segal.

It called for a body to review “the legislative, regulatory, policy and administrative framework for national security and intelligence in Canada, and activities of federal departments and agencies in relation to intelligence and national security.”

The Liberals say a three-year automatic review, or sunset clause, of the entire Anti-terrorism Act of 2015 act would be added.

As well, they want to narrow some of the “overly broad” definitions of what constitutes a threat to national security, including defining “terrorist propaganda” more clearly.

Current oversight and review is chiefly the responsibility of the Security Review Intelligence Committee (SIRC), which conducts after-the-fact reviews of the operations of CSIS, the country's human spy service.

The activities of the electronic spy service, the Communications Security Establishment, are reviewed by a watchdog known as the Office of the Communications Security Establishment Commissioner (OCSEC). Increasingly, in the era of the Edward Snowden leaks on U.S. spying, CSE's domestic cyber-spying activities are raising privacy and legal concerns, though the agency has never been charged with law-breaking.

There is no independent oversight or review of the Canada Border Services Agency, which has a dual intelligence and law-enforcement role. Nor is there dedicated, independent monitoring of the intelligence arms of the RCMP, Citizenship and Immigration Canada, the Privy Council Office, Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development, and the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada.

Wark believes a parliamentary committee would be best suited to a broad mandate looking at the security intelligence community in all its moving parts.

“It's going to have to maintain a strategic level look at that community and its functions. It could be matched with organizations like SIRC and the CSE commissioner who have a much more focused review mandate. (They) could both feed into the work of a parliamentary committee.”

Trudeau Government Reassures Canadians Who Are Worried Terrorists Will Hide Among Refugees, Vice Canada

By Tamara Khandaker
Vice Canada

Since terrorist attacks claimed 132 lives in Paris on Friday, discussion surrounding the newly elected Liberal government's pledge to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees into Canada by January 1 has shifted from concern over logistics to alarm over security.

At a press conference on Saturday, interim Conservative Party leader Rona Ambrose questioned whether or not the government could properly vet the flood of refugees expected to arrive in the coming months, noting that each day, 500 Syrians would have to be screened.

"The goal of supporting refugees from the region of Iraq and Syria is a very important goal for all Canadians. We are very compassionate people," Ambrose told reporters. "But Canadians are asking the question — can we do it this quickly, in a secure way? And I think that's an appropriate question."

A petition calling on the government to suspend its plan, started by a Quebec City resident on Saturday, has been circulating online. By Monday evening, it had collected 63,000 signatures.

"The safety of Canadians and the future generation should be the government's priority," wrote one commenter. "I understand that the refugees need help, but settle the problem at the source instead of overcrowding the country and taking on the risk of welcoming terrorists."

Resettlement organizations, experts, and public safety minister Ralph Goodale, however, are assuring Canadians that there's no need for alarm, which comes after word spread that one of the attackers travelled to Europe through Greece using a fake Syrian passport, later found lying near his body.

Speaking with Global News, Goodale said none of the victims or attackers in Paris had any ties to Canada, and that the influx of Syrian refugees expected to arrive in Canada isn't directly comparable to over 800,000 who've reached Europe in the past year.

"Ours is a planned process that will be more orderly, more controlled," he said. "Can you guarantee 100% perfection? Is it absolutely foolproof? Nothing in life is 100% but we're going to make sure that all of our security protocols and rules are properly followed."

Details for the resettlement plan are expected to be released in the coming days, but Immigration Minister John McCallum revealed last week that commercial and military planes, as well as ships, are being considered methods of transport refugees, and that military bases might be used for temporary housing.

Currently, the UNHRC determines which candidates are ideal for resettlement—according to former Immigration and Refugee Board Chair Peter Showler, the less than 5 percent who are selected go through further vetting by UN officials.

Peter Goodspeed of Lifeline Syria, which has been working to recruit, train and assist sponsor groups in the Greater Toronto Area says at this stage the UNHCR "automatically go to the most vulnerable and least likely to create a security problem."

"If you're looking at widows, orphans, older parents, people with Canadian ties already, it's all pretty well reduced risk," says Goodspeed. "Those are the people the UNHCR funnels towards the Canadian diplomats."

Those who make the cut must then undergo more screening—the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and the Canadian Border Services Agency are among the security agencies involved in the process.

"The security screening has to be done thoroughly and carefully, but it's possible to do that in an expeditious and efficient manner," Showler told VICE News in an interview, stressing that Canadians should be careful to not misinterpret what happened in Paris.

"That massive refugee flow has been chaotic, there have been no security screens on it," he said.

He added that officials on the ground will know who who poses a security risk, especially since many of the refugees from Lebanon, Turkey and Jordan fled Syria in the last four years and are already registered with the UNHRC.

"We know where they are and what they've been suffering for the past four years," said Showler.

"I desperately hope the ones who take this quite horrific incident in Paris and try and inflate it into something it's not, I hope they are not successful," says Showler. "I hope that common sense, level-headedness, and generosity will prevail."

Radicalisation - Flot d'appels au Centre de prévention de Montréal, Le Devoir

Le Devoir

Actualités, mardi 17 novembre 2015, p. A2

Au moins dix cas sont qualifiés de préoccupants

Isabelle Paré

Dans la foulée des attentats de Paris, une cinquantaine d'appels à l'aide provenant de familles craignant qu'un proche ne passe de la parole aux gestes a été notée au Centre

de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence de Montréal (CPRMV), dont dix cas jugés " assez préoccupants " pour nécessiter une intervention directe.

Le ressac de la vague de violence qui a frappé la Ville Lumière n'a pas tardé à résonner de ce côté-ci de l'Atlantique. Selon le directeur du CPRMV, Herman Okomba-Debarice, la ligne téléphonique de l'organisme accessible 24 heures sur 24 n'a pas dérogé au cours du week-end dernier, prise d'assaut par des familles, mais aussi des enseignants, des travailleurs sociaux et d'autres personnes alertées par le comportement inquiétant d'un proche.

Selon ce dernier, dans dix appels reçus, les cas rapportés étaient assez préoccupants pour que le CPRMV enclenche une intervention immédiate de travailleurs sociaux ou de psychologues. " Depuis notre création en mars dernier, sur 368 appels, 6 cas ont été jugés assez sérieux pour être transmis à la police et 90 autres ont nécessité une intervention sociale ", a précisé le directeur.

Selon cet ex-policier du SPVM, dont le Centre promeut une approche psychosociale auprès des personnes radicales prônant la violence, le carnage de Paris a fait naître un sentiment de culpabilité chez les familles ou les proches qui minimisaient jusqu'à maintenant les comportements troublants de membres de leur entourage. " Les gens osent aller chercher de l'aide et savent que notre objectif n'est pas de judiciaireiser si ce n'est pas nécessaire. À chaque intervention, notre personnel se rend sur place pour juger s'il y a un enjeu de sécurité pour la personne ou pour la communauté ", affirme-t-il.

En à peine huit mois d'existence, le centre affirme que les besoins sont croissants et qu'au moins une vingtaine de dossiers requérant un suivi sérieux sont toujours ouverts. " Il faut un suivi très serré et une longue exposition pour dépister le changement de comportement chez un individu. La plupart des cas ne requièrent pas une prise en charge par la police ", explique le directeur du CPRMV.

Une mouvance inquiétante

En sus des jeunes qui succombent aux sirènes du djihadisme, une autre tendance se dessine actuellement, déplore M. Okomba-Debarice. Celle de jeunes qui souhaitent rejoindre la Syrie, mais cette fois pour combattre le groupe État islamique aux côtés des forces kurdes.

La glorification de soldats, notamment de l'ex-tireur d'élite des Forces armées canadiennes, Waly, combattant volontaire qui se met en scène dans ses propres vidéos relayées sur le Web - - présenté comme un sauveur aux heures de grande écoute par certains médias -- aurait amené une dizaine de jeunes à vouloir prendre les armes et jouer les justiciers, au péril de leur vie. " Pour moi, c'est aussi de la radicalisation dangereuse. Ces jeunes croient se battre pour la bonne cause, mais ils sont souvent vulnérables ou traversent une mauvaise période. L'armée est payée et formée pour faire ça, ce n'est pas un jeu ", dénonce le directeur du CPRMV, qui lancera dimanche des outils sur le Web pour aider les familles et l'entourage d'individus à risque de radicalisation violente.

Plus d'un an après les attentats menés sur le Parlement d'Ottawa et à Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, plusieurs experts consultés estiment que les mesures concrètes mises en place depuis pour prévenir la radicalisation sur le terrain sont insuffisantes. Après la création CPRMV en mars, un plan d'action contre la radicalisation a été dévoilé en juin par Québec, mais les intervenants disposent de bien peu de moyens pour cerner l'ampleur du problème. " Plusieurs organismes travaillent là-dessus, mais en silo, sans trop de concertations. Je crois qu'il y a eu une sensibilisation réelle à l'enjeu de la radicalisation, mais l'articulation efficace des actions reste à faire ", affirme David Morin, codirecteur de l'Observatoire sur la radicalisation (OSR) à l'Université de Sherbrooke.

Si la police réussit à neutraliser des radicaux déjà embrigadés, il manque des moyens pour empêcher des jeunes à risque de verser dans l'idéologie sanguinaire. " On reçoit une multitude d'appels de milieux scolaires qui n'ont ni l'argent ni la formation pour ce faire. Quand on frappe à la porte des ministères à ce sujet, ça répond absent ", déplore-t-il.

" Je crois qu'il y a eu une sensibilisation réelle à l'enjeu de la radicalisation, mais l'articulation efficace des actions reste à faire "

Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall and other politicians are expressing reservations about plan to take in refugees Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall is calling on Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to suspend his plan to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees to Canada before the end of the year, revealing a growing unease among this country's leaders in the wake of the terrorist attacks in Paris.

Some politicians are concerned about Mr. Trudeau's marquee election pledge to vastly increase the speed and scale of Canada's intake of refugees.

The mayors of Toronto, Quebec City and Montreal have all expressed reservations about Mr. Trudeau's timeline, and the premiers of B.C. and Quebec have stressed that security must be considered.

But Mr. Wall has come out strongest against the plan.

In a letter to Mr. Trudeau Monday, Mr. Wall wrote that he is "concerned" that swiftly bringing large numbers of asylum seekers into the country "could severely undermine the refugee screening process."

"The recent attacks in Paris are a grim reminder of the death and destruction even a small number of malevolent individuals can inflict upon a peaceful country and its citizens," he wrote. "Surely, we do not want to be date-driven or numbers-driven in an endeavour that may affect the safety of our citizens and the security of our country."

Speaking to reporters in Regina, Mr. Wall also pronounced himself in favour of continuing Canada's bombing campaign against the Islamic State, which Mr. Trudeau has promised to end.

"As a citizen, I would rather they continue the air strikes. I would rather Canada continue the fight. That's Canada's history, that's our tradition. When tyranny threatens freedom-loving people anywhere, Canada has responded, yes, with a humane response. But Canada also fights," he said.

The Paris attacks Friday, for which the Islamic State claimed responsibility, left at least 129 people dead. There has been no solid proof any of the terrorists were refugees, but a passport found near the body of one of the perpetrators appeared to belong to someone who had come from Syria via Greece.

There is little Mr. Wall or his fellow critics can do to stop Mr. Trudeau's plan. But how he manages their unease could be the first major test of the Prime Minister's promised new era of co-operative federalism.

In Quebec, an online petition calling for Ottawa to suspend its plan has picked up more than 61,500 signatures.

Quebec City Mayor Régis Labeaume urged Ottawa to pause in the face of public worries over the refugees. "Rushing can lead to chaotic situations," he said Monday. The mayor of Montreal, Denis Coderre, said Canada should "stay the course" on refugees, "but we don't necessarily have to have 25,000 in 45 days."

Toronto Mayor John Tory said he is still in favour of "having some of these people come to Canada," but described Mr. Trudeau's plan to bring a large number in with such a tight timeline as a "political promise."

"These things have to be done properly and thoroughly and carefully. I think everybody would expect that," he said. "Political promises should be secondary at all times to making sure that we do things in the best way and in the right way for the Canadian people."

Mr. Trudeau's government signalled Monday it will not delay the Syrian refugee effort.

In an interview with The Globe and Mail, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said refugees can be brought to Canada without jeopardizing the country's security. "We're taking all factors into account," he repeated twice when asked whether extra screening is required after the Paris attacks.

Mr. Goodale said this country is better situated than Europe to carefully select those to allow entry.

"We have the advantage of being able to plan the process, which we are trying to do.

Whereas they [Europeans] were dealing with spontaneous, adhoc, unexpected chaos," he said.

Both Ontario and Alberta said they would do their part to implement Mr. Trudeau's plan.

Ontario Health Minister Eric Hoskins said Monday the province will stick to its commitment to bring in 10,000 Syrian refugees. He added that he trusts the federal government to do the proper security checks. Asked whether the Paris attacks changed the government's thinking on refugees, he said, "Not at all, and I don't think it changes the public's resolve, either."

Alberta Premier Rachel Notley said her province is prepared to help settle as many as 3,000 refugees. "We need to move forward on the basis of humanity, not on the basis of fear," she said in Edmonton.

Quebec Premier Philippe Couillard walked a fine line. He reiterated his province's commitment to taking in more than 5,700 refugees – with the proviso that Ottawa carry out security checks on them first. Mr. Couillard, who has been vocal in defending the refugees as victims of terrorism themselves, said Ottawa's security checks are essential, but shouldn't be used as an excuse to block the refugees from coming.

"Concerns over security must not become an alibi or justification to say 'no' to refugees," he said on Monday.

British Columbia Premier Christy Clark said she could understand both sides of the argument.

"I don't know whether or not that [25,000] number is the right one. I just know that Canadians want to know that the security processes are working well," she said. "Having said that, I understand that urgency that people are feeling about inviting these people who are from one of the worst, war-torn regions in the world, who are facing the kind of violence every day that unfolded in Paris."

U.S. will improve sharing intel with France French to receive information close to level given U.K., Chicago Tribune (Canada)

By Brian Bennett, Tribune Washington Bureau Tribune Washington Bureau's W.J. Hennigan and Timothy M. Phelps contributed.

Chicago Tribune

The White House has agreed to streamline sharing of intelligence and operational military information to French authorities, one of several efforts aimed at countering the Islamic State group in the wake of the deadly Paris attacks, even as U.S. and European officials warned they are racing to keep up with the threat.

President Barack Obama announced the agreement Monday at the G-20 summit in Antalya, Turkey, telling reporters the new arrangement "will allow our personnel to pass threat information, including on (Islamic State), to our French partners even more quickly and more often."

Obama did not provide details, but officials said France will gain access to communications intercepts and other raw intelligence at a level close to that provided to America's English-speaking allies: Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

British Prime Minister David Cameron announced separately that his government plans to boost its spying capability by recruiting 1,900 more intelligence officers for MI5, the domestic security outfit; MI6, the foreign spy agency; and GCHQ, which conducts electronic surveillance.

In Washington, CIA Director John Brennan said he is seeking to strengthen intelligence sharing with Russia about counterterrorism, especially on the Islamic State group.

He told a Washington think tank that he had spoken to his Russian counterpart in recent weeks in a new push to stop militants from the Caucasus from heading to Syria and Iraq.

Attorney General Loretta Lynch told a news conference that the Justice Department will "ramp up our defenses" in the United States, although she provided no new details.

The FBI has said it has open investigations in every state on U.S. citizens allegedly communicating with militants overseas, considering trips to Syria, or possibly planning terrorist attacks on U.S. soil.

Several dozen Americans have been arrested on charges of providing material support to Islamic State militants in the last year.

The moves come as U.S. and allied intelligence and law enforcement services scramble to piece together the Paris plot, which left at least 129 dead and hundreds injured, and to determine if Islamic State has other violent plots in the pipeline.

Speaking at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies, Brennan said European intelligence agencies are overwhelmed by the need to identify and monitor potential terrorism suspects.

He also warned of a black market in military assault rifles like those used in Friday's massacre in Paris. Criminal networks in Europe have obtained Kalashnikovs and other weapons looted from armories "that were overrun in the 1990s in Eastern Europe" after the fall of the Soviet bloc, Brennan said.

The biggest threat appears from the thousands of Europeans who have joined militant groups in Iraq and Syria in the last few years. Officials fear they could come back and launch terrorist attacks in their home countries, just as several of the suspects in the Paris attacks reportedly did.

British officials claim to have disrupted seven terrorist plots in the last year, and an estimated 700 British nationals have gone to fight in Syria and Iraq. French intelligence services say about 1,800 French citizens have gone since 2011.

More than 2,000 Russians are thought to have joined the conflict as well.

"The sheer number of fighters that have gone over and traveled to Syria and Iraq is unprecedented in jihadist battlefields in the modern era," said Seth Jones, a former U.S. counterterrorism official now with the Rand Corp.

Adding to the challenge, militants have increased their use of encrypted text messaging apps on cellphones in recent months, creating new blind spots for U.S. and European security services trying to disrupt potential plots.

French and British intelligence agencies have "pretty intrusive" domestic surveillance, tapping phones and monitoring neighborhoods, Jones said.

But security services in Belgium are less aggressive, which may explain why the Paris attacks appear to have been staged there, he said.

A purported Islamic State video posted on the Internet on Monday warned that more attacks are coming in Europe, and threatened to launch an attack in Washington.

A militant on the video says "as we struck France in the center of its abode in Paris, then we swear that we will strike America at its center in Washington."

Encrypted Messaging Apps Face New Scrutiny Over Possible Role in Attacks, New York Times

By DAVID E. SANGER and NICOLE PERLROTH; David E. Sanger reported from Washington, and Nicole Perlroth from San Francisco.

The New York Times

Foreign, Tuesday, November 17, 2015, p. A 12

WASHINGTON -- American and French officials say there is still no definitive evidence to back up their presumption that the terrorists who massacred 129 people in Paris used new, difficult-to-crack encryption technologies to organize the plot.

But in interviews, Obama administration officials say the Islamic State has used a range of encryption technologies over the past year and a half, many of which defy cracking by the National Security Agency. Other encryption technologies, the officials hint, are less secure than terrorist and criminal groups may believe, and clearly they want to keep those adversaries guessing which ones the N.S.A. has pierced.

Some of the most powerful technologies are free, easily available encryption apps with names like Signal, Wickr and Telegram, which encode mobile messages from cellphones. Islamic State militants used Telegram two weeks ago to claim responsibility for the crash of the Russian jet in the Sinai Peninsula that killed 224 people, and used it again last week, in Arabic, English and French, to broadcast responsibility for the Paris carnage. It is not yet clear whether they also used Telegram's secret-messaging service to encrypt their private conversations.

Nonetheless, such "end-to-end" encryption technology is now so widespread that the attack has revived vitriolic arguments between American intelligence officials and Silicon Valley. Only weeks ago, the matter appeared settled, at least temporarily, with a decision by President Obama that it would be fruitless for the government to try to compel the technology companies to provide the keys to protected conversations and data.

Apple has already made encryption technology a standard part of its iMessage service, and Apple's chief executive, Timothy D. Cook, has been among the most vocal in defending a technology for which the keys to decode messages are held not by his company but by the users at each end of the conversation.

Any other approach, Mr. Cook has argued to Mr. Obama, would undercut Apple customers' confidence that the most precious data they keep in their phones is safe from garden-variety cybercriminals as well as sophisticated nation states that could gain access to keys via hacking, or lawfully through court order. Mr. Cook argues that investigators have ways to obtain crucial clues from the available "metadata" about who is talking to whom by phone, from information in the Internet cloud -- or, security experts have said, by hacking a target's device.

But the speed of the encryption wave has touched off alarm among law enforcement and intelligence officials, who say it significantly increases the chances that they will miss evidence of an impending attack. Prime Minister David Cameron of Britain threatened late last year to ban such technologies, although he soon backed down. France is threatening to insist on access -- and if the French do, so will China, many fear, raising questions about whether the same technology used to crack terrorists' communications will be used to crack dissidents' as well.

"I think this is going to open an entire new debate about security versus privacy," said Michael Morell, a former deputy director of the C.I.A., whose book this year, "The Great War of Our Time," traced the efforts, and failures, in tracking terror plots.

"We have, in a sense, had a public debate" on encryption, he said over the weekend on CBS News's "Face the Nation." "That debate was defined by Edward Snowden," the former National Security Agency contractor who revealed much about the agency's efforts to break encryption. Now, he said, a new argument will be "defined by what happened in Paris."

It is also possible the Paris attackers conducted much of their planning face to face, particularly since several lived in the same Brussels neighborhood. But if there was a command center in Syria or elsewhere, some form of communications would have been required.

Just before the Paris attacks, Belgian officials said Islamic State terrorists had been hiding their communication using online gaming tools like Sony's PlayStation 4 to mask their chatter under that of millions of online video war game players who invoke the same language of violent, religious extremists.

Jan Jambon, Belgium's federal home affairs minister, told a public audience last week that "PlayStation 4 is even more difficult to keep track of than WhatsApp," a popular messaging system owned by Facebook.

But if that was the case, it would undermine the argument that end-to-end encryption allowed the Paris terrorism plot to go undetected. While PlayStation and Xbox deploy encryption to protect customers' personal data like credit card information, it leaves their communications open to government interception in ways that WhatsApp and iMessage do not.

So far, Mr. Obama has been reluctant to insist on a back door into the systems. He rejected the argument of the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, that the United States should require any company that provides encrypted software and hardware to engineer a way for the government, armed with a court order, to get access. That decision came after a year of study led by the White House counterterrorism adviser, Lisa Monaco, and the head of the White House cybersecurity office, Michael Daniel.

The White House ultimately adopted a view put forth by 14 of the world's top cryptographers and computer security experts who wrote, in a white paper, that weakening the encryption of American technology sold by companies like Apple, Google and Facebook would only render confidential data and critical infrastructure more vulnerable to criminals and national adversaries, and push terrorists to adopt encrypted services sold overseas. As a result, when companies like Apple and Facebook are issued court orders to help governments monitor their customers' messages, all they can do is turn over a stream of unintelligible code.

That has inflamed law enforcement officials like Mr. Comey and William J. Bratton, the New York City police commissioner, who told "Face the Nation" on Sunday that encrypting communications in this way had made it impossible for officials to collect warnings on terrorist attacks.

"We, in many respects, have gone blind as a result of the commercialization and the selling of these devices that cannot be accessed either by the manufacturer or, more importantly, by us in law enforcement, even equipped with search warrants and judicial authority," Mr. Bratton said.

Security experts counter that such arguments ignore the fact that even end-to-end encrypted technology leaves a trail of metadata behind that can be used to parse who is talking to whom, when and where. "Encryption is really good at making it difficult to hide the content of communications, but not good at hiding the presence of communications," said Matt Blaze, a computer security expert at the University of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Blaze also noted that the authorities can still read communications if they hack into the target's device, or what security experts call "the end point."

"All the encryption in the world doesn't help if the end point that holds the keys are compromised," Mr. Blaze said. "So this idea that encryption make terrorists' communications go completely dark has a pretty big asterisk next to it."

Even if Apple and others in the United States were compelled to weaken the encryption in their services, American authorities still would have had no judicial authority over Telegram, the Berlin-based messaging service, recently used by Islamic State terrorists to broadcast their communiqués.

After Paris Attacks, C.I.A. Director Rekindles Debate Over Surveillance, New York Times (Canada)

By SCOTT SHANE
17 November 2015
New York Times

WASHINGTON — In response to the Paris attacks, a top American intelligence official on Monday renewed a debate on government surveillance and privacy, denouncing "hand-wringing" over intrusive spying and leaks of classified information that he said had made it harder to identify terrorists.

John O. Brennan, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, appeared to be speaking in part about the National Security Agency's mass surveillance of phone and Internet communications that were disclosed by Edward J. Snowden in 2013. Those disclosures prompted sharp criticism and new restrictions on electronic spying both in the United States and in Europe.

Mr. Brennan also seemed to be pushing back against complaints from privacy advocates in light of a growing threat from the Islamic State against Western countries, exemplified by the gun and bomb assaults in Paris that killed 129 people on Friday night.

"In the past several years, because of a number of unauthorized disclosures, and a lot of hand-wringing over the government's role in the effort to try to uncover these terrorists, there have been some policy and legal and other actions that have been taken that make our ability collectively, internationally, to find these terrorists much more challenging," Mr. Brennan said after a speech at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington research organization.

The C.I.A. director, who was responding to questions about the Paris attacks, also suggested that the classified documents on N.S.A. programs given to journalists by Mr. Snowden, a former N.S.A. contractor now living in Russia, had taught terrorists how to hide from the authorities.

"There has been an increase in the operational security of a number of operatives of these terrorist networks as they have gone to school on what it is that they need to do in order to keep their activities concealed from the authorities," an apparent reference to both the use of encryption and the avoidance of electronic communications altogether by plotters. He spoke of "intentional" gaps in surveillance and complained about what he called the "misrepresentation" of intelligence programs.

Mr. Brennan's remarks, and the emotional public response to the massacre in France, reignited a debate that began after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks over just how far the government should go in invading individuals' privacy in the hunt for terrorist plots. Civil libertarians expressed concern that the Paris attacks might prompt a rush to more intrusive spying, on phone calls and Internet messages generally or possibly on Muslims specifically.

"As far as I know, there's no evidence the French lacked some kind of surveillance authority that would have made a difference," said Jameel Jaffer, deputy legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "When we've invested new powers in the government in response to events like the Paris attacks, they have often been abused."

While most counterterrorism experts believe the United States is safer from jihadist attacks than Europe, Mr. Brennan was one of a number of officials and commentators who have cited the Paris attacks as a reason to step up surveillance and other security measures in the United States and Europe. On Sunday, Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who serves on the House Intelligence and Homeland Security Committees, called for increased surveillance specifically of Muslims, which Mr. Brennan did not.

"This shows the absolute need to have top surveillance, to stop criticizing the N.S.A.," Mr. King said on Fox News Sunday. "We have to put political correctness aside," he added. "We have to have surveillance in the Muslim communities. That's where the threat is coming from."

Farhana Khera, executive director of Muslim Advocates, a legal and civil rights group, said it made no sense to target all Muslims.

"I think all Americans want to be kept safe from violence of any kind," she said. "But we know that blanket surveillance of people based on religion and race doesn't work."

Based on arrests of Islamic State supporters in the United States in recent years, Ms. Khera said "the common thread is not that they are Muslims but that they are lonely, vulnerable young people." In some cases, she said, they are not from Muslim families but "have become Muslim online" after exposure to propaganda from the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL.

Many security experts believe that the United States is at far lesser risk than Europe for a large-scale jihadist attack directed from Syria for two reasons. First, flights into the United States and controls at the Mexican and Canadian borders make it much harder for would-be attackers to reach American soil. Second, the Muslim community in the United States is smaller proportionally and is widely seen as better integrated and more prosperous than in France and some other European countries.

How Islamic State Teaches Tech Savvy to Evade Detection, Wall Street Journal

Paris attacks raise possibility that extremists have found ways around western surveillance

By Margaret Coker, Sam Schechner and Alexis Flynn

The Wall Street Journal

Terror groups have for years waged a technical battle with Western intelligence services that have sought to constrain them through a web of electronic surveillance.

The Paris attacks, apparently planned under the noses of French and Belgian authorities, raise the possibility that Islamic State adherents have found ways around the dragnet.

French authorities say two of the attackers knew each other in prison, but it isn't clear how the group communicated in plotting and coordinating the Friday attacks. Intelligence services have monitored communications from one terror suspect, Belgian Islamist Abdelhamid Abaaoud, between Syria and alleged associates in Belgium and Morocco.

Low-tech methods exist for communicating off law enforcement's radar including passing written notes or relaying messages through friends or relatives.

But law-enforcement agencies also have long warned that encrypted platforms built for gaming or other commercial purposes to safeguard privacy are being used by would-be terrorists to communicate.

Islamic State, for its part, has built a tech-savvy division of commanders who issue tutorials to sympathizers about the most secure and least expensive ways of communicating.

The bloodshed in Paris will likely exacerbate a tense debate between governments that want inside access to those encrypted tools and tech companies that say are trying to protect customer data and are wary of government overreach.

Mike Morell, the former deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said terrorists' ability to use encrypted communication is a huge problem.

"I think this is going to open an entire new debate about security versus privacy," he told CBS television on Sunday.

Two top U.S. intelligence officials, CIA Director John Brennan and Robert Cardillo, director of the National Geospatial Intelligence Agency, said Monday that terror groups have "gone to school" on U.S. spying practices and learned ways to evade detection. Mr. Brennan blasted efforts to curb surveillance while Mr. Cardillo said agencies needed to adapt and find new ways to gather intelligence.

For more than a year, governments in Europe have pushed for companies such as Google, Facebook and Twitter to build "back doors" that allow law enforcement access into their encrypted tools.

Tech companies and security experts have resisted that push, which gained steam in Europe following the January attacks in Paris against the satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo.

Security experts say inserting back doors would weaken the encryption and undermine trust in the Internet.

Islamic State is among the most technologically sophisticated extremist groups. Its advice to followers includes an eight-minute video released last year in Arabic that discusses the surveillance capabilities of hostile governments and how phones can be tracked. Bulletins also include advice about brands of electronic equipment that appear vulnerable.

In January, a follower known online as al-Khabir al-Taqni, who identifies himself as a "technical expert," provided would-be fighters with a list of what he determined were the safest encrypted communications systems available.

"Through this, we can break one of the strongest weapons of the Crusader governments in spying on and tracking the mujahedeen and targeting them with aircraft," the author said, referring to the U.S.-led coalition fighting Islamic State.

The missive, authenticated by the SITE Intelligence Group which monitors and tracks radical groups online, ranked 33 applications as unsafe, moderately safe, safe, and safest.

Soon after the list was published, Islamic State started moving official communications from Twitter to Telegram Messenger, which received the second-highest safety rating from the Islamic State tech team.

That included the group's claim of responsibility for the Paris attacks as well as the Oct. 31 Russian airline crash in Egypt.

Islamic State also has urged its followers to make use of the app's capability to host encrypted group chats.

A spokesman for Telegram didn't respond to requests to comment. Pavel Durov, the app's founder who also created the Russian social network VKontakte, criticized recent calls by the Russian government to ban Telegram.

"I propose we ban words," Mr. Durov wrote in a sarcastic VKontakte post. "There is information that terrorists use them to communicate."

U.K. prosecutors convicted a British teen this year in part because police had access to his Telegram chats.

The boy, inspired by Islamic State, admitted to communicating with an Australian teenager and encouraging him to attack ceremonies commemorating military veterans.

He was convicted on one terrorism charge. Police and prosecutors have declined to comment about how they accessed those communications.

Telegram was among the first apps that explicitly catered to privacy enthusiasts in the wake of reports in 2013 alleging widespread surveillance by U.S. intelligence. A similar U.S.-based app called Wickr received the highest safety recommendation in the Islamic State tech guide. Wickr didn't respond to a request to comment.

European law-enforcement officials have also expressed concern about gaming consoles, which also allow players to communicate with each other via the Internet.

Belgium's Interior Minister Jan Jambon told a conference in Brussels last week that Sony Corp.'s PlayStation was a concern, calling it one of the most difficult platforms for governments to intercept.

He didn't say whether Belgium has investigations that include monitoring of gamers or game consoles. A spokeswoman in Brussels didn't return calls seeking comment.

In May, an Austrian court convicted a 14-year-old boy of downloading bomb-making instructions onto his PlayStation console, according to local media reports.

It is unclear whether governments have approached Sony for access to customer data. Sony said in a statement it works with local authorities as appropriate. "We take our responsibilities to protect our users extremely seriously and we urge our users and partners to report activities that may be offensive, suspicious or illegal. When we identify or are notified of such conduct, we are committed to taking appropriate actions in conjunction with the appropriate authorities," it said.

Paris Attacks Suspect Was Monitored by Western Allies Seeking to Kill Him, Wall Street Journal

Islamic State operative couldn't be located in the weeks before plot was carried out

An Islamic State operative suspected of helping plan the Paris attacks had been monitored in Syria by Western allies seeking to kill him in an airstrike, but they couldn't locate him in the weeks before the plot was carried out, two Western security officials said.

The operative, a Belgian citizen named Abdelhamid Abaaoud, was convicted in absentia in Brussels earlier this year of recruiting jihadists, was suspected of masterminding a foiled plot to behead police officers, escaped to Syria and was profiled in Islamic State's online magazine mocking European authorities for their failure to catch him. A year ago, video emerged of him in Syria, smiling as he drove a truck dragging the dead bodies of Islamic State's opponents tied to the bumper.

Mr. Abaaoud is one of two people who have emerged at the center of a probe into the attacks that killed 129 people on Friday. Both are at large. French and Belgian authorities are also searching for a 26-year-old petty criminal named Salah Abdeslam, who they say rented a car used in the attacks on Friday and is suspected of driving some of the suicide bombers through Paris.

On Monday, dozens of masked Belgian police stormed a house in a predominantly Muslim district in Brussels in their hunt for Mr. Abdeslam.

French prosecutors said police had stopped Mr. Abdeslam and two other men on their way to Brussels just hours after the Friday massacre. But a roadside background check failed to show that Mr. Abdeslam had rented a car in Belgium that was found outside the Bataclan night club, the site of one of the attacks, and police let him go.

The two men long resided a few blocks from each other in Brussels' Molenbeek district, where police conducted the raid Monday, and spent time in the same prison, according to a Belgian official. "It is certain that they knew each other," the official said.

Mr. Abaaoud—who escaped to Syria in January after Belgian police foiled another terrorist plot authorities say he masterminded—had been under surveillance there as part of an effort to track down and kill Islamic State militants believed to be directly involved in recruiting Westerners for the militant group, according to the officials.

Officials had no knowledge of the Paris plot when they sought to have Mr. Abaaoud killed by airstrike, and don't know whether the killing of Mr. Abaaoud would have prevented the attacks in the French capital. The plotters may have been able to act independently or, in Mr. Abaaoud's absence, another Islamic State militant could have stepped in, they said.

Growing evidence that Islamic State operatives were able to plot the attacks from abroad—mobilizing a group of seven suicide bombers to carry them out, including one of Mr. Abdeslam's brothers—suggests the extremist group has gained an unprecedented level of ability to coordinate a large-scale operation and hit Europe.

The emerging details about the plotters and their ability to elude authorities also have exposed the lack of cross-border coordination among European security officials.

Islamic State's use of Belgium as a staging ground for the assault on Paris helped the militants to go undetected as they prepared their attack, European officials said.

As French and Belgian investigators sought to comprehend how Islamic State could have built a large terror cell in the heart of Europe, featuring the two men and others involved in the attacks, authorities scrambled to tighten the net on extremists.

French President François Hollande proposed extending France's state of national emergency in the wake of the attacks for three months and called for international cooperation from Russia and the U.S. as he vowed to step up airstrikes against terrorist bastions.

"They fight us because France is a country of freedom," he said. "Our democracy has beaten far greater adversaries."

On Monday, French authorities also carried out raids in several cities amid fears that more attackers might strike. People familiar with the probe said investigators were anxious to identify and neutralize whoever made the explosive vests the attackers used to blow up themselves at France's largest sports arena, a concert hall and a restaurant.

In Belgium, a judge ordered two people, who were detained in Brussels, to remain held for allegedly providing support to the Paris attackers. Another brother of Mr. Abdeslam was also detained by police for questioning over the weekend but later let go.

"We didn't think for one second that one of my brothers was linked to this attack," said the brother, Mohamed Abdeslam, as he stood in front of his home near the Molenbeek town hall. "He grew up here, he studied here," Mr. Abdeslam said of his brother Salah. "He was a completely normal boy."

A Belgian official said Salah Abdeslam tried to go to Syria this year but was sent back by Turkish authorities. The Belgian government investigated him when he returned and concluded he didn't pose a risk.

Despite his effort to go to Syria, authorities didn't view him as a terror threat, the official said. "The investigation showed no signs of him actively going to terrorism," he said.

Police viewed Mr. Abaaoud as a much more dangerous man.

In July, Mr. Abaaoud, who is known in Belgium for having taken his 13-year-old brother with him to Syria in 2014, was sentenced to 20 years in prison in absentia by a Brussels court earlier this year on terrorism charges and for recruiting jihadists. Belgian courts don't appoint lawyers when defendants are tried in absentia.

Raised in Belgium, he returned to Europe from Syria at some point under the radar of authorities with the aim of beheading Belgian police officers, officials say. Police foiled the plot in January, and in a shootout, killed two other suspected accomplices in the eastern Belgian town of Verviers. Officials believe Mr. Abaaoud escaped to Syria that same month.

In a purported interview with Mr. Abaaoud in February, Islamic State's online magazine quoted the Belgian national of Moroccan descent mocking European law enforcement authorities.

"My name and picture were all over the news yet I was able to stay in their homeland, plan operations against them, and leave safely when doing so became necessary," he was quoted as saying.

According to a Western intelligence official, intelligence services have monitored Mr. Abaaoud's communications from Syria to associates in Europe, but weren't always sure whether it was the Islamic State operative or his teenage brother on the line. That complicated any plans to kill him with an airstrike, the official said.

After the planned attacks on Belgian police were thwarted, a core group of French-speaking Belgians in Syria started to plan and recruit for attacks on public places—including on a concert hall—in France, Spain, the Netherlands and the U.K., the official said.

The information comes from interrogations of French members of Islamic State who were arrested by Turkish police after leaving Syria and were extradited to France, the official said. The French militants said Mr. Abaaoud was leading plans to carry out attacks, the official said.

A surge in the number of such radicals traveling between France and Syria and other conflict zones has also hindered France's surveillance effort. The number of people on France's security watch list has reached 8,000, compared with about 5,000 three years ago. Officials say it is impossible to track even a fraction of these people full-time.

One radical on the watch list was Omar Ismail Mostefai, a Frenchman who authorities say was part of a trio that attacked the Bataclan concert hall on Friday, killing 89 people, before detonating their suicide vests. The militant had been on a watch list for radicalization since 2010. Mr. Mostefai is believed to have later traveled to Syria, raising suspicions he fought alongside Islamic State. French officials declined to say whether Mr. Mostefai was monitored when he returned home in the spring of 2014.

On Monday, a senior Turkish official said Ankara had identified Mr. Mostefai as a terrorism suspect and twice notified French authorities to no avail.

"The case of Omar Ismail Mostefai clearly establishes that intelligence sharing and effective communication are crucial to counterterrorism efforts," the Turkish official said.

Mr. Mostefai traveled to Turkey in 2013 and was flagged to French authorities as recently as June, the Turkish official said. There is no record of the 29-year-old French national leaving Turkey.

French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius said he was unaware of Turkey's warnings about Mr. Mostefai. "As far as information and intelligence are concerned, we really should exchange and share much more," Mr. Fabius said at a news conference on the sidelines of the Group of 20 summit in Antalya on Turkey's Mediterranean coast.

Samy Amimour, another Frenchman who investigators say took part in the Bataclan attack, had been facing an international arrest warrant for failing to check in with police on a regular basis. Mr. Amimour was required to report to police after prosecutors placed him under investigation in 2012 for attempting to travel to Yemen, a country rife with jihadist activity. He later traveled to Syria.

Earlier this month, German border police caught a Montenegrin man apparently heading for Paris with machine guns, hand grenades and explosives in his car, an arrest that Germany's interior minister said could be linked to the attacks in Paris. German authorities said they had notified the French of the arrest at the time.

Militants have long hopped across the Continent's national borders without facing internal border checks. But Friday's attacks showed that even Europe's external borders are dangerously porous, particularly as the region copes with the influx of refugees from Syria and elsewhere.

A fake Syrian passport was enough to secure one suicide bomber's passage into Europe via Greece, officials say, allowing him to reach the Stade de France on Friday night and detonate an explosive vest lined with bolts.

Comment lutter contre la radicalisation? Des mesures chocs sont annoncées, Tribune de Genève (Canada)

Jean-Noël Cuénod Paris

Tribune de Genève

Evenement, mardi 17 novembre 2015, p. 4

L'heure du contre-djihadisme a sonné en France. Devant les parlementaires réunis en Congrès à Versailles, le président François Hollande a évoqué les mesures pour lutter contre les foyers de radicalisation présents dans l'Hexagone. La veille, son prédécesseur Nicolas Sarkozy avait émis ses propositions. Au sein de la majorité socialiste comme dans l'opposition de droite, les idées circulent.

Déchéance de nationalité

Certaines ne semblent guère contestées pour le moment. Ainsi, le président Hollande a annoncé un changement législatif pour faciliter la déchéance de la nationalité française pour les auteurs d'actes terroristes. Cette déchéance ne peut concerner que les binationaux. On ne peut pas retirer son passeport à un citoyen 100% Français car ce serait le rendre apatride, ce qui est contraire au Code civil. Actuellement, la déchéance de nationalité ne peut s'appliquer qu'aux binationaux naturalisés depuis moins de dix ans. Par conséquent, ne sont pas concernés les double-nationaux qui ont été naturalisés il y a plus longtemps ou ceux qui sont nés en France. Cela va changer. Hier devant le Congrès, François Hollande s'est montré fort clair sur ce point: « Nous devons pouvoir déchoir de sa nationalité française un individu condamné pour une atteinte aux intérêts fondamentaux de la nation ou un acte de terrorisme, même s'il est né Français, dès lors qu'il bénéficie d'une autre nationalité. » Jadis, la gauche aurait tordu le nez devant une telle proposition. Mais nous vivons désormais dans un autre monde. De même, le président français veut « interdire à un binational de revenir sur le sol français, sauf à ce qu'il se soumette à un dispositif de contrôle, comme le font les Britanniques. »

Expulsion des imams toxiques

En outre, l'expulsion des imams toxiques et autres prêcheurs de haine d'origine étrangère sera prononcée manu militari. Mais l'actuel cadre juridique le permet déjà. Depuis 2012, 40 prédicateurs ont été boutés hors de France. Le mouvement risque de s'accélérer ces prochains jours.

Suspects assignés à résidence

En revanche, la proposition émise dimanche soir par Nicolas Sarkozy, le patron du parti Les Républicains, suscite plus de controverses. Rappelons que l'ancien président de la République veut assigner à résidence avec pose de bracelet électronique les éléments figurant sur la fiche S. Elle fait partie d'un plus vaste fichier, celui des personnes recherchées. Cette fiche S - pour « sûreté » - consigne tous les éléments de renseignements sur des personnes susceptibles de tomber dans le terrorisme. Mais il ne s'agit pas d'un élément de preuve, simplement d'un outil pour enrichir le renseignement intérieur. Combien y a-t-il de suspects fichés S? Les chiffres varient selon les interlocuteurs. Sarkozy en dénombre 11 500 et Valls, 10 500.

Si cette fiche S retient autant l'attention des politiciens, c'est parce que le premier terroriste identifié, Omar Ismaïl Mostefaï, y était inscrit depuis 2010. Les renseignements à son propos étaient d'ailleurs plutôt vagues et consistaient à souligner sa fréquentation d'une mosquée. L'idée est donc simple: si Mostefaï se trouvait en résidence surveillée avec un bracelet électronique, il n'aurait pas pu participer à l'attentat.

Un peu trop simple, l'idée, selon le député socialiste Jean-Jacques Urvoas, président de la Commission des lois de l'Assemblée nationale et auteur de la récente loi de renseignement qui a considérablement renforcé les moyens de surveillance policière. La proposition de Nicolas Sarkozy de poser un bracelet électronique à tous les suspects fichés S ne rencontre pas son assentiment, loin de là, comme il s'en est expliqué à l'AFP. Le but de la fiche S n'est pas d'arrêter un individu - c'est le domaine du mandat d'arrêt - mais d'engranger des informations sur son compte, évidemment sans qu'il puisse se rendre compte qu'il est surveillé! Or, si on lui pose un bracelet électronique, la récolte de renseignements s'arrêtera là.

Tout sécuritaire

Si sur le plan du renforcement des personnels de sécurité (8500 postes seront créés en deux ans) et militaires (maintien des effectifs jusqu'en 2019 et activation des réservistes avec, dans le viseur, une garde nationale), le président Hollande paraît convaincant. En revanche, il reste muet sur la création de centres de contre-radicalisation comme il en existe au Canada, en Scandinavie ou en Grande-Bretagne.

Or, depuis des années, l'anthropologue française Dounia Bouzar fait le siège des autorités pour que de tels centres soient installés dans l'Hexagone. De guerre lasse, elle a elle-même fondé le Centre de prévention contre les dérives sectaires liées à l'islam (CPDSI). Son objectif est de définir les étapes de l'endoctrinement afin de le prévenir et d'aider les familles concernées. Apparemment, les autorités françaises mettent le paquet sur la répression, ce qui est logique, mais délaissent un élément tout aussi essentiel, la prévention.

Les frappes françaises en Syrie début octobre visaient notamment le commanditaire présumé des attentats

Quel était le degré de connaissance des autorités françaises de la préparation des attaques du 13 novembre à Paris et à Saint-Denis? La France paraît disposer de moyens pour reconstituer le fil d'actions meurtrières qui viennent de frapper sa population et ses intérêts. Mais semble désarmée pour les anticiper. Une question d'autant plus délicate que des éléments apparus ces derniers jours, dont la précision fait encore débat, attestent l'existence d'une crainte réelle d'attentat ces derniers mois.

Tout d'abord, il semble bien y avoir un lien entre le bombardement, dans la nuit du 8 au 9 octobre, d'un camp de l'Etat islamique près de Rakka, en Syrie, et la préparation d'une attaque visant spécifiquement la France. Le ministère de la défense avait alors assuré, au lendemain de cette frappe, que ce centre d'entraînement constituait " une menace " pour la France et l'Europe et hébergeait des " combattants étrangers, dont probablement des Français et des francophones ". Il assurait cependant ne pas connaître l'identité des personnes visées.

En réalité, comme l'avait alors indiqué Le Monde , l'ensemble de l'opération avait été pensée autour d'un Français, Salim Benghalem, 35 ans, originaire de Cachan (Val-de-Marne), " responsable de l'accueil des francophones au sein l'Etat islamique " et d'au moins deux autres cadres de l'organisation, dont un Belge. Ce dernier était Abdelhamid Abaaoud. Un lien direct a été établi entre cet individu originaire de Molenbeek, près de Bruxelles, parti combattre en Syrie, et plusieurs projets terroristes en France et en Europe, dont celui ayant meurtri la capitale française vendredi 13 novembre.

" Plusieurs attaques avortées " Selon nos informations, la France a - en grande partie sur la base de renseignement technique et humain provenant des services secrets américains - considéré que des personnes étaient entraînées pour frapper le sol français. Selon une source issue de la communauté du renseignement, la CIA aurait collecté des " bribes d'informations " , parfois codées, puis de plus en plus claires sur l'imminence d'une menace venant précisément de ce groupe de francophones de l'Etat islamique.

Le fruit de ces interceptions entre la Syrie et la Belgique ou la France aurait été, ensuite, communiqué à la DGSE. Le 27 octobre, Bernard Bajolet, qui dirige les services secrets extérieurs français (DGSE), s'exprimant lors d'un colloque organisé par la CIA à l'université américaine George-Washington, rappelait que " la France devait faire face à des actions terroristes planifiées et commanditées de l'étranger ou par des djihadistes français de retour dans leur pays ". Il ajoutait, " ce dernier mois, nous avons fait avorter plusieurs attaques sur notre sol, cela ne signifie pas que nous serons tout le temps capables de parer à toutes " .

Tributaires des forces américaines en matière de renseignement mais aussi en ce qui concerne le timing et la localisation des frappes aériennes en Syrie et en Irak, les Français ont dû, d'après certaines sources, repousser de " deux semaines " la frappe prévue sur le camp où étaient susceptibles de se trouver Benghalem et Abaaoud. " On peut en effet se demander si les auteurs de ce massacre sont partis entre-temps mais rien ne permet de le dire " , lâche un cadre français du renseignement. Trois jours après la frappe du 8 octobre, Salim Benghalem avait fait savoir qu'il était en effet visé mais qu'il n'avait pas été touché.

Chargé du renseignement au sein de nos frontières, la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSi) reçoit chaque jour, une grande quantité d'informations émanant des services de renseignement étrangers comme de ses propres antennes territoriales. L'enjeu porte sur la capacité à analyser la grande quantité de renseignement obtenus par des moyens techniques. Des notes de synthèses sont ensuite transmises à la justice antiterroriste dont l'un des membres a admis au Monde que " des bouts d'informations pouvaient laisser entendre qu'un acte majeur allait se produire sur notre territoire " tout en ajoutant, " mais de là à dire que le Bataclan, le Stade de France et les rues du 11e arrondissement allaient être attaqués, il y a un pas " .

Pour certains des enquêteurs, les attaques du 13 novembre à Paris ont mis en évidence les lourdeurs causées par des logiques nationales en matière de lutte antiterroriste. " Deux choses nous ont lourdement handicapés, commente l'un d'entre eux, on n'avait jamais pensé qu'une opération partirait de Bruxelles pour attaquer un quartier parisien et si les services belges nous avaient juste dit que Abaaoud était un très proche ami de Salah Abdeslam, un pilier des attaques du 13 novembre, cela nous aurait aidés. "

Parmi les signaux d'alerte reçus par la France figure également, selon l'agence Associated Press (AP), une note de renseignement transmis par les Irakiens via les forces américaines à la tête de la coalition réunie pour lutter contre l'Etat islamique en Syrie et en Irak à laquelle appartient la France.

" Cellule dormante " Si ce document ne fournit pas de détails, AP assure, néanmoins, que les autorités françaises ont été avisées par d'autres moyens de l'imminence des attaques par des assaillants entraînés à Rakka s'appuyant sur une " cellule dormante " déjà présente en France. Selon la source d'AP issue du renseignement irakien, " 24 personnes auraient été impliquées dans les opérations, dont 19 pour les attaques elles-mêmes et 5 pour la logistique et la planification " . Aucune source française n'a confirmé ces affirmations.

Selon un diplomate français en poste à Ankara, la Turquie a fait savoir, lundi 16 novembre, qu'elle avait mis en garde la France " au moins à deux reprises depuis début 2015 " sur les déplacements d'Ismaël Omar Mostefai, un des kamikazes de la salle du Bataclan entré sur le territoire turc en 2013, et sur ses liens avec quatre djihadistes recherchés par les services français. D'après l'AFP qui cite un responsable turc, " la France n'a jamais répondu " et n'a transmis de demande " qu'après les attaques de Paris " .

Interrogé par Le Monde , un des responsables du renseignement français a assuré que " des efforts substantiels ont été réalisés en matière de coopération entre services français depuis les événements de Charlie Hebdo mais ce que l'on n'a peut-être pas vu, c'est que la menace a muté, l'Etat islamique fait désormais de la politique étrangère avec des attentats et ne se contente plus d'encourager de loin des initiatives désordonnées " . Pour sa part, la DGSE a indiqué qu'elle " ne s'exprimait pas sur ses relations avec ses alliés " .

This Is ISIS's New Favorite App for Secret Messages, The Daily Beast

The terror group is pushing a new way to communicate quietly after the Paris attacks. It's called Telegram.

In the wake of the Paris terrorist attacks, ISIS is encouraging its followers to use a popular chat application that can make text messages effectively invisible to government spies.

A day after claiming responsibility for the attack, ISIS posted a message on one of its Web sites—which had been moved to the so-called Dark Web—encouraging its followers to download the app, called Telegram, which also allows users to set their message to self-destruct after a certain period of time.

Telegram and similar apps have been vexing intelligence and security officials, who say they have prevented the U.S. from locating and tracking ISIS militants in Iraq and Syria.

Telegram in particular has been adopted by a lot more people than ISIS—as of a year ago, the company claimed more than 50 million users sending 1 billion messages per day.

Somewhere in that mix are an unknown number of jihadists, and, ISIS hopes, more to come. Of course, there could also be drug dealers, gangsters, and other assorted criminals. But apps such as Telegram are coming in for particular scrutiny by intelligence officials for their potential role in facilitating attacks. ISIS issued its claim of responsibility for the attacks via Telegram.

CIA Director John Brennan wasted no time Monday in highlighting the threat that he thinks such technologies pose when placed in terrorists' hands.

“There are a lot of technological capabilities that are available right now that make it exceptionally difficult, both technically as well as legally, for intelligence and security services to have the insight they need to uncover” terrorist activities, Brennan said at a security conference in Washington, without mentioning any technologies by name.

Brennan linked one of the worst terrorist attacks in Europe to the profusion of 21st century technologies that, he said, are being abused in such a way that “20th century laws cannot effectively deal with [them].”

By tying the emergence of apps like Telegram to the threat posed by ISIS, and the Paris attacks in particular, Brennan may have opened a new front in the government's efforts to reign in technology that, while it can significantly protect personal privacy, is nevertheless an obstacle to surveillance.

“I do think this is a time for particularly Europe, as well as here in the United States, for us to take a look and see whether or not there have been some inadvertent or intentional gaps that have been created in the ability of intelligence and security services to protect the people that they are asked to serve,” Brennan said.

FBI Director James Comey had been trying for several months to push some legislative or regulatory solution for what he saw as the risk of “going dark,” if the bureau and other agencies that conduct electronic surveillance cannot easily decrypt text messages, emails, and other communications used by criminals.

Comey and his Justice Department colleagues had effectively stood down from that quest. But the Paris attacks may have revived the effort. Brennan is the most senior U.S. official since the assault to speak publicly about the issue.

Terrorists use of ubiquitous and highly-secure technologies demonstrates that they have studied American intelligence operations and exploited leaks about government surveillance techniques, Brennan said.

“There has been a significant increase in the operational security of a number of these operatives and terrorist networks as they have gone to school on what it is that they need to do in order to keep their activities concealed from the authorities,” he said.
