sécurité(SCRS).Il faut espérer que le gouvernement Trudeau mettra autant d'effort à obtenir celle d'Homa Hoodfar, cette anthropologue de l'Université Concordia détenue depuis maintenant plus de cent jours dans la tristement célèbre prison d'Evin, à Téhéran. Accusée de " collaborer avec un gouvernement hostile " et de " se livrer à des activités féministes ", cette dame d'origine iranienne, possédant la double nationalité canadienne et irlandaise, a été arrêtée sur ordre des Gardiens de la révolution le 6 juin dernier à Téhéran où elle se trouvait pour des raisons familiales en même temps que pour poursuivre ses recherches sur la condition de la femme dans le monde musulman dans le contexte spécifique des élections législatives qui étaient sur le point de se tenir en Iran. La dame âgée de 65 ans et à la santé fragile est, depuis, détenue en isolement.

2. Ottawa complice de la torture de Canadiens en Syrie

Ottawa - De 2001 à 2004, des Canadiens ont été emprisonnés et torturés en Syrie avec la complicité des autorités canadiennes, relèvent des documents secrets obtenus par Radio-Canada. À la suite des attentats du 11 septembre 2001, le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) et de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) voulaient trouver les cellules d'Al-Qaïda au pays. Elles ont alors commencé à suspecter trois Canadiens de confession musulmane de faire partie de la nébuleuse terroriste. Lors de trois différents voyages en Syrie, Abdhullah Almalki, Ahmad Elmaati et Muayyed Nureddin seront arrêtés et torturés. Quelque 18 000 documents du SCRS et de la GRC obtenus par Radio-Canada et CBC révèlent des exemples de violation des droits de la personne et de complicité du gouvernement dans des cas de torture. C'est le cas de l'homme d'affaires Abdullah Almalki, qui sera placé sous surveillance au pays et à l'étranger sans preuve solide. Deux ans de torture Dans les années 1990, Abdullah Almalki travaillait pour une ONG canadienne en Afghanistan dirigée par un homme lié à Oussama ben Laden.

3. The tale of two wrongfully imprisoned Canadians in China

Toronto Star, Thomas Walkom, 2016 09 19

Column: The federal government has successfully extricated one Canadian from a Chinese prison. Another remains. Amidst the euphoria surrounding Kevin Garratt's release, the fate of Huseyin Celil, a Burlington imam who used to make his living delivering pizzas in the Hamilton region, has almost been forgotten. Garratt, an evangelical Christian from British Columbia, was in jail for two years. Celil, a 47-year-old Muslim from Ontario, has been in prison for 10. Successive Conservative and Liberal governments have pressed for the release of both. Garratt's case, however, was always more likely to meet with success. First, unlike Celil, Garratt is not a dual national. Beijing does not recognize dual nationality and has consistently refused to accept Ottawa's assertion that Chinese-borne Celil, who obtained his Canadian citizenship in 2005, is indeed Canadian. For that reason, it has refused to let Canadian consular officials see Celil and has insisted, whenever the topic comes up between the two countries, that his case is none of Ottawa's business. Second, unlike Garratt, Celil has run afoul of the Chinese state before. A member of the country's Islamic Uighur minority, Celil was jailed in the mid-'90s for allegedly undertaking illegal political activities in his home province of Xinjiang. Ottawa did apparently send Michel Coulobme, who heads the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, to China to convince Beijing that Garratt was not a spy. It's not clear why they would have believed Canada's spymaster on this particular topic, but maybe they did. More to the point, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has made encouraging noises about opening up Canada and its resources even more to China. That's the kind of thing Beijing likes to hear. Whatever the reason, Canada's efforts worked for Garratt. Let's hope Trudeau has enough goodies up his sleeve to spring the other wrongfully imprisoned Canadian too.

4. The Torture Files: Documents show CSIS and RCMP's role in post- 9/11 torture of 3 Canadians in Syria

CBC News, Nazim Baksh and Terence McKenna, 2016 09 19

Thousands of pages of secret files obtained by CBC reveal how Canada's police and intelligence service not only knew three Canadians were being tortured in Syrian jails in a post-Sept. 11 crackdown, but co-operated with Syrian officials in their interrogations. The files also show a Canadian ambassador helped deliver questions the RCMP and CSIS wanted put to the Canadians imprisoned in Syria, a country with a dismal human rights record. The revelations are featured in "The Torture Files," a joint investigation by The National and the fifth estate that airs this week. Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad Elmaati and Muayyed Nureddin were never arrested in Canada for suspected terror offences, but to this day there is a cloud of suspicion hanging over them. Ten years ago, they each filed $100-million lawsuits against the government. Maher Arar, another Canadian arrested and tortured in Syria in the wake of al-Qaeda's deadly attacks on New York and Washington, received an apology and a $10.5-million settlement from the federal government in 2007. Lawyers representing Almalki, Elmaati and Nureddin fought and eventually won a lengthy court battle with the RCMP and CSIS to gain access to thousands of heavily redacted files, amounting to hundreds of thousands of pages. They consist of internal memos, briefing notes from field agents to their superiors, inter-agency communications, emails, reports and even a memo that shows at least one senior RCMP case officer might have had serious doubts about the evidence Almalki was engaged in anything nefarious. CBC News obtained exclusive access to some 18,000 pages, which the trio's lawyers plan to use when the long-anticipated civil trials begin early next year.

5. Canada's threats from state hackers

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 19

Editorial: Someone is trying to break into the systems that serve as the Internet's skeleton and central nervous system. The increasingly sophisticated attacks often bear the hallmarks of state sponsorship, with many experts fingering China and Russia. It's likely a matter of time before they succeed. How long will it take for hostile nations to turn their attention to the West's intelligence documents, the electrical grid and the political system? Oh, wait: they already have. Given recent headlines have focused on either American (the Democratic National Committee, former U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell) or international targets (the World Anti-Doping Agency), it's easy to forget data protection is a serious Canadian problem as well. Canada is in the midst of a defence policy review, which may end up mostly focusing on the things we have argued about forever, like which new fighter jets to buy. But war and security threats are moving from the physical world to cyberspace. There are new dangers to be considered and planned for. The former head of the Communications Security Establishment, the electronic spy agency, recently argued in a Canadian Global Affairs Institute policy paper that the military should have the authority to go on the cyber offensive. The online world is a different place from 2010, the last time our cybersecurity policy was revamped, says John Adams. He says it would be "neglectful beyond belief" to not arm Canada adequately to safeguard the national interest - and political, economic and social institutions - in "a new kind of war."

6. Combien de temps Omar Khadr devra-t-il encore attendre des excuses?

Le Devoir, Nathalie Drouin, 2016 09 19

Opinion - Nathalie Drouin - Présidente et fondatrice de l'association pour la défense d'Omar Khadr (pouromarkhadr.com) Omar Khadr a 30 ans aujourd'hui lundi. Combien d'années devra-t-il patienter encore avant que notre gouvernement ne lui offre enfin des excuses officielles assorties d'une compensation pour les fautes commises à son endroit et qui l'ont privé de ses droits les plus élémentaires ? Nous avons une dette collective envers ce jeune homme, un citoyen canadien à part entière que l'on a laissé croupir à Guantánamo pendant 10 ans et qui a subi des sévices, abandons et dénis de justice à répétition depuis 15 ans, à l'encontre des conventions de droit internationales dont notre pays est signataire. L'histoire d'Omar est une véritable disgrâce pour le Canada qui se targue d'être le champion des droits de la personne et, surtout, des droits des enfants. Voici un rappel des faits en 15 points : - Omar Khadr est né à Toronto, le 19 septembre 1986. À 15 ans, son père le laisse dans un camp en Afghanistan avec la promesse de revenir le chercher. Il ne l'a jamais fait. - Peu après, le camp est bombardé par l'armée américaine. Omar est le seul survivant. - Pendant l'attaque, il est atteint par deux tirs qui lui infligent de graves blessures au dos, faisant éclater son épaule demeurée partiellement paralysée. Les éclats d'obus lui font perdre l'usage d'un oeil et limitent sa vision dans l'autre.

La Presse canadienne, Alexandre Robillard, 2016 09 19

Saguenay - Le candidat à la direction du Parti québécois Jean-François Lisée a refusé de s'excuser, dimanche, à la suite d'une attaque sur les réseaux sociaux qui a mené son adversaire Alexandre Cloutier à contacter la police. M. Lisée a reconnu qu'il avait toutefois retiré de son fil Twitter ses propos dans lesquels il montrait que les positions de M. Cloutier sur la laïcité plaisaient à un groupe dont le porte-parole est l'imam controversé Adil Charkaoui. «Je l'ai retiré par amitié pour Alexandre», a-t-il dit dans un point de presse. Les quatre candidats à la direction du PQ étaient réunis à Saguenay, dimanche, pour un débat dont les thèmes portaient principalement sur la souveraineté. Après les échanges, au cégep de Jonquière, M. Lisée a affirmé que la journée de campagne de vendredi avait été mauvaise pour l'équipe de M. Cloutier et la sienne. «Je pense que la journée de vendredi est une journée qu'on voudrait effacer de l'histoire du Parti québécois, c'est tout ce que j'ai à dire là-dessus», a-t-il dit. M. Lisée a estimé que les torts étaient partagés dans l'escalade qui a mené au message reliant M. Cloutier à M. Charkaoui, qui est soupçonné d'avoir été associé à la radicalisation de jeunes à Montréal.

8. Ex-bureaucrat sues CBC over boat-tax story

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 09 19

Ottawa - A former top bureaucrat is suing the CBC for $800,000 over a story that alleged he used a "racket" to avoid paying $105,000 in sales taxes and duties on his 47-foot sailing boat, court documents show. François Guimont, who recently retired as Canada's deputy minister of public safety, was featured in an investigative story in March that focused on luxury boats sold at Canadian marinas near the U.S. border, in the binational Lake Champlain area. The CBC's flagship French-language investigative program, called Enquête, revealed that many of the boats are officially exported to the United States, meaning no Canadian tax is imposed by the sellers. The program also alleged that American authorities don't impose taxes or duties, because they are told the boats are only in the United States on a temporary basis, to be stored in Canada for the winter. CBC journalist Marie-Maude Denis, who broke Quebec's construction scandal, referred in her story to the example of the Elysium, owned by Mr. Guimont. Asked on the television show whether he had paid sales taxes and other duties on his sailboat, Mr. Guimont answered that he "did exactly" what officials at Marina Gosselin asked him to do. He added that it would be up to the marina to explain its procedures.

9. Got a warrant?

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 19

Editorial: Technology affects law, and law affects technology, because they both change over the years. But the fundamental principles underlying our laws and our rights remain constants, even as technology advances. Some police forces and security agencies appear to be tempted to think that new techniques and devices bring to the world something entirely new, with no connection at all to the older ways of doing law or respecting rights. Consider how some agencies have apparently been gaining access to information on smartphones, without first seeking judicial authorization. Some agencies have acquired and used devices known as "international mobile subscriber identity" catchers, or IMSI. These can discover much about the owners of the phones. Entities with access to cellphone towers can mop up huge quantities of other people's communications. And masses of data from one group can "trick" other masses of data into handing them over.

10. Lisée won't apologize for tweet

Montreal Gazette, Philip Authier, 2016 09 19

Montreal - Parti Québécois leadership candidate Jean-François Lisée has refused to apologize for linking his main rival to controversial Islamic activist Adil Charkaoui in a tweet. Nevertheless, Lisée insisted the fact he removed the item he tweeted from the Internet is proof of his esteem for the candidate, Alexandre Cloutier. As for the ferocious feud it sparked and even threats against Cloutier from people who believed the connection to be real, Lisée said it was a day of the campaign he "would rather forget." "I am not asking for apologies, I am offering none, I am turning the page," Lisée told reporters at a news conference following an all candidate's debate - the fourth in the race - here in Quebec's nationalist heartland. Lisée balked when asked whether he went too far and twisted for his own purposes a Charkaoui Facebook comment to the effect Cloutier seems more open to newcomers than he does. "All the facts are available on the Facebook sites of each candidate," he said. "I am not going back into this issue. I want to talk about other things." The party in question, Cloutier, was not impressed.

12. Tax changes, security on Commons to-do list

Ottawa Citizen, Kady O'Malley, 2016 09 19

Column: It may not provide spectators with the full parliamentary pageantry of a speech from the throne, but there's always at least a bit of that back-at-school energy in the air as the House prepares to reopen for business after the summer recess - an occasion that, for the record, should never be referred to as the start of a "new session" unless immediately preceded by either a general election or a prorogation. Here's a rundown on how the various parties are hoping to spend the 12 ½ sitting weeks between now and the Christmas break. 1. Wrapping up legislative loose ends. For a government about to round the corner on its first year in office, it's time - past time, some might argue - to start ticking some of the more contentious initiatives off the Commons to-do list. Among the items still languishing on the order paper: Broadening the Canadian Human Rights Act to cover gender identity and expression; Rolling back the previous government's bid to force labour unions to publicly disclose detailed financial records; Formally establishing the income tax changes brought in as part of the inaugural budget; Setting up a special parliamentary committee to oversee national security operations.

13. Tell the truth about 'stingrays'

Toronto Star, 2016 09 19

Editorial: When the warden of Warkworth Institution in Campbellford, Ont., wanted to investigate reports of contraband in his prison, he wrote a memo to Correctional Services Canada asking the agency to provide a so-called IMSI catcher. The surveillance tool, sometimes called a stingray, records data from the cellphones of all those nearby. The prisoners would be surveilled, but because the tool is indiscriminate, so, too, would guards and visitors. The warden's memo, which came to light late last year, was the first apparent public confirmation of what privacy experts had long alleged: the government is collecting data from the cellphones of Canadians without their knowledge. Since the Warkworth revelation, several other instances of stingray use have been brought to public notice in court documents and media reports. Yet Ottawa will not say how frequently these invasive tools are being employed or what rules govern their use. Meanwhile, many police forces, including the Toronto Police Service, and other government agencies continue to deny they use them at all, even in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

14. Unpaid civil servant now overpaid after suing government, Global Affairs claims

CBC News, Ashley Burke, 2016 09 19

A contract worker in Ottawa is at the centre of a messy legal battle after becoming the first person to sue the federal government over the Phoenix payroll fiasco affecting thousands of public servants. Darrel Delisle, a former casual worker with Global Affairs Canada, filed a lawsuit for $24,000 after he struggled to get paid for three months during the roll out of the government's new Phoenix pay system. In a statement of defence, Global Affairs admitted it did owe Delisle money but that it overpaid him since the lawsuit was filed -- and that Delisle now owes his former employer more than $14,000. Since February, more than 80,000 workers have struggled to be properly paid -- some being paid too little, some being paid too much and some not being paid at all. According to court documents, Delisle made many attempts to get paid -- including 635 calls to the pay centre, sending emails, setting up meetings with superiors, and filing a labour complaint, which was ultimately rejected. Delisle left his government contract early, on June 24, to take another job, according to his statement of claim. On July 14, he filed his lawsuit in Ontario's small claims court, arguing he wasn't paid properly and suffered losses during the roll out of Phoenix.

15. Authorities probe ties between blasts, devices in 2 states

Associated Press, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - Authorities questioned several people early Monday as they worked to determine whether there was a connection between explosive devices found over the weekend in two states: an explosion in a Manhattan neighborhood, an unexploded pressure cooker device blocks away, a pipe bomb blast at a Jersey shore town and five explosive devices at a New Jersey train station. On Sunday night, FBI agents in Brooklyn stopped "a vehicle of interest" in the investigation of the Manhattan explosion, according to FBI spokeswoman Kelly Langmesser. No one has been charged with any crime, and the investigation is continuing, Langmesser said. On Sunday, a federal law enforcement official said the Chelsea bomb contained a residue of Tannerite, an explosive often used for target practice that can be picked up in many sporting goods stores. The discovery of Tannerite may be important as authorities probe whether the two New York City devices and the pipe bomb at the Jersey shore are connected.

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - A bomb that injured 29 people on Saturday in the Chelsea neighborhood of Manhattan, and another that failed to detonate, were filled with shrapnel and made with pressure cookers, flip phones and Christmas lights to set off a powerful explosive compound, law enforcement officials said on Sunday. Both bombs appeared designed to create maximum chaos and fatalities. They also provided a trove of clues. Late Sunday night, two law enforcement officials said that investigators stopped a car on the Belt Parkway near the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge and took five people to an F.B.I. office in Manhattan for questioning in the bombing investigation. One of the officials said that all or most of them may have been from the same family and that they may have been on their way to the airport. The F.B.I. confirmed in a statement that agents and police detectives had stopped "a vehicle of interest in the investigation into Saturday's bombing in Manhattan and that no one has been charged with any crime." Earlier, two senior law enforcement officials said there was a "person of interest" in the bombing, but it was unclear if that person had been identified. The person had been seen on surveillance footage. Tensions in the region, already high, escalated later Sunday night when, according to a law enforcement official, pipe bombs were found near the train station in Elizabeth, N.J. The mayor, J. Christian Bollwage, confirmed that a suspicious package containing "wires and a pipe" had been found by two men in the city, and said that the F.B.I. and the New Jersey State Police had been called in to investigate after a drone found that the item could be a bomb.

17. Device Explodes in New Jersey, 5 People Questioned in New York Bombing Investigation

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

Elizabeth N.J. - A backpack that appeared to contain pipe bombs exploded early Monday as a police robot examined it near a New Jersey train station. Mayor Chris Bollwage told reporters the bomb squad robot was "cutting into the device when it exploded" in the city of Elizabeth. A spokesman for Bollwage had earlier described the blast as a controlled detonation. The explosion occurred shortly before 1 a.m. ET Monday. It was the second in New Jersey since Saturday morning and followed a bombing Saturday night in Manhattan that injured 29 people. At around 6 a.m. ET, officials familiar with the investigation confirmed to NBC News that heavily armed FBI agents spotted at a fried chicken restaurant in Elizabeth were involved in the tri-state bombs probe. Several law enforcement officials told NBC News that they are concerned that an active terrorism cell with multiple players could be at work in the New York-New Jersey area. Multiple senior law enforcement officials told NBC News that the suspicious device discovered Sunday night in Elizabeth looked similar in appearance to the one that exploded Saturday morning in Seaside Park, N.J.

18. Explosion à New York Après la panique, l'agacement

La Presse+, Richard Hétu, 2016 09 19

New York - « C'est dommage, mais c'est plus un inconvénient qu'autre chose », s'entendent pour dire des résidents de Chelsea. Comme son grand frère situé dans Greenwich Village, le restaurant végétalien By Chloe, logé dans la 22e Rue, connaît un grand succès depuis son ouverture, en juin. Aussi était-il bondé, samedi soir, lorsqu'une bombe a explosé à un pâté de maisons de là. Et les caméras de surveillance de l'établissement ont capté sur le vif la réaction des clients. « On voit la secousse et la peur des gens au moment de l'explosion », a raconté Erik Diamond, directeur régional de la jeune chaîne de restaurants, après avoir visionné les enregistrements des caméras de surveillance. « Certains se précipitent à l'extérieur pour voir ce qui se passe. D'autres sont cloués sur place. C'était un moment de panique. Je pense que les New-Yorkais ne sont pas prêts à un autre événement comme celui d'il y a 15 ans. » M. Diamond se tenait au milieu d'une 6e Avenue fermée à la circulation lorsqu'il a tenu ces propos, hier matin. Au-delà des barricades policières, des enquêteurs locaux et fédéraux s'affairaient dans la 23e Rue, entre les 6e et 7e Avenues, autour de la poubelle déchiquetée par l'explosion qui a fait 29 blessés (tous avaient quitté l'hôpital en fin de matinée hier). Et malgré le bouclage d'une partie de Chelsea, le moment de panique capté par les caméras du restaurant By Chloe avait été remplacé par une réaction où se mêlaient chez plusieurs habitants du quartier le fatalisme et le stoïcisme. « C'est dommage, mais c'est plus un inconvénient qu'autre chose », a déclaré Debra Noll, avocate qui vit dans un immeuble situé en face de l'endroit où l'explosion est survenue. « Personne n'a été tué, c'est tout ce qui compte. » « Je ne me sens pas moins en sécurité aujourd'hui qu'hier », a ajouté cette New-Yorkaise, qui n'était pas chez elle au moment de la déflagration. « J'ai l'impression de vivre dans une ville très sûre. Parfois, de telles choses arrivent, et cette fois-ci, l'efficacité n'était pas au rendez-vous. »

19. Family identifies attacker behind 'potential act of terrorism' in St. Cloud

Minneapolis Star Tribune, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

St. Cloud - In a few bloody minutes, a man rampaged through a St. Cloud shopping mall Saturday evening, stabbing nine people before being fatally shot by an off-duty police officer. The violence is being investigated as terrorism, federal authorities said. None of the nine victims, seven men and two women who ranged in age from 15 to 53, was killed in the attack. In a media briefing after midnight Sunday, St. Cloud Police Chief William Anderson said an off-duty officer from another jurisdiction confronted and shot the suspect Saturday night inside Crossroads Center mall. He said the man -- dressed in a private security uniform -- reportedly asked at least one victim whether they were Muslim before assaulting them, and referred to Allah during the attacks. "We are currently investigating this as a potential act of terrorism," said the FBI's Richard Thornton, speaking at a news conference at police headquarters early Sunday afternoon. Thornton did not link the attack to a specific terror group. Roughly 12 hours after the stabbings, a news agency said to speak for ISIL went to Twitter to claim credit for the mall violence. "The executor of the stabbing attacks in Minnesota yesterday was a soldier of the Islamic State and carried out the operation in response to the citizens of countries belonging to the crusader coalition," the posting by the AMAQ news agency read. While law enforcement has not disclosed the suspect's name, his father identified him as Dahir A. Adan, 22. Interviewed Sunday through a translator at his apartment in St. Cloud, Ahmed Adan said his son was born in Kenya but grew up in the United States. Other family members said Dahir Adan was beginning his third year as a student at St. Cloud State University. Police told Ahmed Adan about 9 p.m. Saturday that his son had died at the mall, he said. He had "no suspicion" of his son being involved in any terrorist activity, he added. Police raided the apartment on St. Germain Street on Sunday morning and seized photos and other materials, Ahmed Adan said.

CNN.com, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - The intense investigation into the weekend bomb blasts in New York and New Jersey is leading authorities to signs of a possible terror cell in those two states, law enforcement officials told CNN Monday. The ongoing investigation, which includes two bombs in New York City and devices in two cities in New Jersey, has given authorities leads on specific people who are urgently being sought. Also on Monday morning, a federal law enforcement official said BBs and ball bearings were among the pieces of metal that appeared to be packed into both pressure cooker bombs in New York. One of those devices exploded on 23rd Street, but the fact that it was partly under a metal trash container may have diminished the force of the blast. The latest developments came just hours after a backpack containing multiple bombs was found Sunday night near an Elizabeth, New Jersey, train station, according to the FBI and the city's mayor. There is no indication yet that the latest incident in Elizabeth is connected to the bombing in a New York City neighborhood Saturday night that injured 29 people and the explosion from a garbage can near a charity run in Seaside Park, New Jersey. In that incident, investigators discovered three pipe-bomb-type devices wired together. Only one exploded, and no one was injured.

21. Palestinian proud of 'terrorist' label

Washington Post, Hazem Balousha, William Booth,, 2016 09 19

Gaza City - Fathi Hammad said that he is pleased to be named a "global terrorist" by the United States. On Friday, the State Department branded the senior Hamas leader a "specially designated global terrorist." That is a rarefied list of international enemies belonging to organizations such as al-Qaeda, Boko Haram, Hezbollah, the Taliban, the Jewish Kahane group, Algerian Salafists, the Islamic State and Hamas, among others. On Saturday, Hammad told The Washington Post: "The decision only makes me more confident about my path. The threat of killing or arrest? It doesn't freak me out, not at all. I am looking forward to it." Hammad said, "I feel proud that I managed to anger America." Then he added, "I don't know why they picked me." The United States charged that Hammad, 55, a former interior minister for the Hamas government in the Gaza Strip, coordinated terrorist cells. No evidence was presented. The designation also said that Hammad is a director of Al-Aqsa TV, "which is a primary Hamas media outlet with programs designed to recruit children to become Hamas armed fighters and suicide bombers upon reaching adulthood." Why the State Department decided to name Hammad as a global terrorist now is unclear. It is well known that Hammad founded the TV station, but it went on the air soon after Hamas, an Islamist militant group, took control of the coastal enclave in 2007.

22. Embassies report rise in alleged hate crimes in UK since Brexit vote

The Guardian (London), Matthew Weaver, Sandra Laville, 2016 09 19

London - European embassies in Britain have logged dozens of incidents of suspected hate crime and abuse against their citizens since the vote to leave the European Union, according to figures obtained by the Guardian. The vast majority of xenophobic incidents involved citizens from eastern European countries, with more attacks against Poles than all the other nationalities put together, the survey of EU embassies in London revealed. The Polish consular service in London, Manchester and Edinburgh has logged 31 incidents of reported hate crime since 23 June, including eight attacks in the past three weeks. They include the killing of Arkadiusz Józwik in Harlow, in an apparently unprovoked attack that is being treated by police as a possible hate crime. Five 15-year-old boys and one 16-year-old boy, all from Harlow, were arrested on suspicion of murdering Józwik and bailed until 7 October pending further inquiries. A second Polish man survived the attack. The Guardian contacted the London embassies of all 27 EU member states. Of the 17 embassies that replied, almost half reported a rise in incidents of xenophobic abuse in the 12 weeks since the EU referendum. Between them, there were 60 incidents logged, including shots fired at a Lithuanian home in Lurgan, Northern Ireland, this month, an arson attack on a Romanian shop in Norwich in July and a break-in at a home in Nottingham in the immediate aftermath of the vote when a Latvian family were called "fucking immigrants" and told to leave the UK.

23. Nato has no plan if Russia invades, warns ex-general

London Times, Deborah Haynes, 2016 09 19

London - Britain and its Nato allies have no effective plan for defending Europe from a Russian attack because of splits within the military alliance, a recently retired military chief said last night. Russia could deploy tens of thousands of troops into Nato territory within 48 hours, backed by warplanes and ships, whereas it would take Nato months to do the same, General Sir Richard Barrons said. As a result, some land and control of airspace and territorial waters could be lost before Nato's 28 member states had even agreed how to respond, the former chief of Joint Forces Command warned. The North Atlantic Council, the political decision making body of Nato, has the power to authorise the supreme allied commander Europe, Nato's top military officer, to draw up plans and training to prepare the alliance to respond to an attack. But this work had stopped after the Cold War because the threat had gone away. Sir Richard said that there was no appetite for a revival even following the invasion of Ukraine and evidence that Russia has invested in new equipment specifically designed to outmatch Nato.

24. Intelligence agencies to be reviewed New era Security reshaping plan (Canada)

Canberra Times, David Wroe, 2016 09 18

Canberra - The Turnbull government is set to embark on a major independent review of the nation's intelligence agencies as Australia faces an unprecedented array of security challenges ranging from terrorism to the rise of China and cyber-spying. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull's department has confirmed that it is putting in place arrangements for the first major intelligence review since 2011 and the third since the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the US, which prompted a reshaping of intelligence efforts in Australia and among its allies. The review is expected to tackle the unprecedented need for the nation's six intelligence agencies to balance immediate security intelligence requirements to combat terrorism including "lone wolves" with longer-term considerations about geo-strategic changes flowing from the shift in power and wealth to the Indo-Pacific region. A spokeswoman for the Department of Prime Minister and Cabinet, which is setting up the review, told Fairfax Media: "We are working through a proposal for a periodic review and the details involved. It is expected that these considerations will take at least several weeks." It will be headed by a senior retired intelligence official. Sources have raised the name of Allan Gyngell, who led the Office of National Assessments - the agency that collates intelligence into briefings for the Prime Minister and the national security committee of cabinet - from 2009 until 2013. Dr Blaxland, a senior fellow at the Australian National University's Strategic and Defence Studies Centre, said cyber security was a major organisational challenge because intelligence agencies needed to co-operate on capabilities that were usually top secret with a wide range of organisations including other government departments and critical industries. Australia's intelligence community is made up of ASIO, ONA, foreign intelligence outfit ASIS, the Defence Intelligence Organisation, the Australian Geospatial Organisation and the Australian Signals Directorate. Australia's international intelligence co-operation will also likely be scrutinised in the review. The "five-eyes" arrangement in which Australia shares intelligence with the US, Britain, Canada and New Zealand is considered by insiders more vital than ever with each country constrained by resources amid a growing workload. Co-operation with regional democracies such as Japan and South Korea has also grown strongly in recent years.

25. Major intelligence shake up on the way

Australian Associated Press, 2016 09 18

The move has been prompted by what the Sydney Morning Herald describes as "an unprecedented array of security challenges ranging from terrorism to the rise of China and cyber-spying". Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull's department has confirmed it is preparing for what will be Australia's first significant intelligence review in five years and the third since the September 11 attacks in the US, the paper says.

26. War on terror: Australia and the West facing potent new threats via social media

Daily Telegraph (Australia), Staff Writer, 2016 09 18

Canberra - Foreign States were launching covert social media attacks against governments, including Australia, using malicious gossip and misinformation to manipulate political opinion in what former ASIO chief has claimed was a new and potent cyber threat. The warning comes as Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull and US President Barack Obama prepare to meet in Washington this week for the first cyber security and cyber terrorism summit between Australia and the US. In an exclusive interview with The Daily Telegraph before leaving for the UN meeting in New York, Mr Turnbull said governments were not moving as quickly as their enemies in cyberspace. The Federal Government's former director general of security (and ASIO) David Irvine last week raised the spectre of "cyber influencing" as a new threat to governments. Now the chair of the Australian Cyber Security Research Institute, Mr Irvine said while the intelligence and security response to terrorism was well advanced, governments were playing "catch up" in dealing with cyber terrorism, espionage and sabotage.

28. Pakistan rejects India's allegations of involvement in terrorist attack in held Kashmir

Pakistan Dawn, Syed Sammer Abbas, 2016 09 19

Islamabad - Pakistan on Sunday rejected Indian allegations regarding involvement in terrorist attack on brigade headquarters in Uri area of the Indian-held Kashmir (IHK). "Pointing fingers at Pakistan has become a traditional tendency of India after each terrorist attack," Foreign Office spokesperson Nafees Zakaria told DawnNews. "In the past many Indians were involved in the terrorist acts for which India had blamed Pakistan," he asserted. Commenting on India's Home Minister Rajnath Singh's statement declaring Pakistan a terrorist state, Zakaria said "India is trying to divert world's attention from the human rights violations being committed in occupied Kashmir". "The whole world is looking at the Indian atrocities in India-held Kashmir and UN Human Rights Commissioner has also offered to send fact finding mission to Kashmir which India has rejected," the spokesperson added.

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 09 19

Washington - As Pakistan prepares to highlight the current situation in India-held Kashmir at the UN General Assembly and India plans to counter it by raising the Baloch issue, the United States has made it clear that it will not back either side. "What we have said -- nothing is changed about our view that we want to see India and Pakistan work this out bilaterally," said State Department spokesman John Kirby when asked to define the US policy on Kashmir. The US was one of the co-sponsors of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 47 that calls for "a free and impartial plebiscite" in Jammu and Kashmir on the question of its accession to India or Pakistan. But since then, it has slightly changed its position and for the past several decades calls for bilateral talks between the two countries for resolving this dispute. Belgium, Canada, China, Colombia and Britain were the other sponsors of the resolution that the UN Security Council adopted at its 286th meeting on April 21, 1948.

31. Tunisia Extends State of Emergency

Asharq Al-Awsat, Al-munji al-Saaidani, 2016 09 19

Tunisia - Tunisia announced on Saturday that a state of emergency, in force since a deadly attack on the presidential guard last November, will be extended by one month. The announcement was made hours after PM Yousef al-Shahid declared the exemption of duties of several officials in Jandouba and Farnana areas following protests in the areas. The protests occurred over a week after a young man set himself on fire in front of Farnana municipality building. A statement said that after consulting the premier and head of the national assembly, President Beji Caid Essebsi decided that the measure would be extended from September 19 for a month. The law allows authorities to ban strikes and meetings that might "provoke or maintain disorder", to temporarily close theaters and bars, and to "take every measure to secure control of the press and all types of publications". The incident in Farnana ignited several movements demanding job opportunities and infrastructure maintenance.

33. 'Cyber terrorism could be next nuclear weapon'

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 09 19

Seoul - In 1945, two nuclear bombs decimated the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, ending World War II and forever changing the scope of modern warfare. Lim Jong-in, a professor at the graduate school of information security at Korea University, said he believes that cyberattacks are the next big threat to humanity. "In the 1950s, the international society reached a consensus on nuclear weapons and saw the birth of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Now, we have cyber weapons that present such threats," Lim, formerly a special advisor to President Park Geun-hye, told The Korea Herald on Friday, the day of North Korea's fifth nuclear test. While not yet perceived as critical as a nuclear program, he emphasized cyber terrorism is extremely dangerous in a society that is growing more connected. "If there is an attack on the society's critical infrastructure, it can potentially be as devastating as a nuclear weapon. The international community needs a set of discussions that will bring binding organizations to this issue, a 'cyber IAEA' if you will." Pyongyang itself, currently going rogue with its internationally-condemned nuclear program, has proven this point with repeated hacking attacks on its southern neighbor. In 2014, the Korea Hydro & Nuclear Power Co. came under what is believed to be an attack from North Korean hackers. Prosecutors said last month that the information of high-ranking officials and members of research institutes on Pyongyang may have been stolen by North Korean hackers.

Manila Times, Al Jacinto and Fernan Marasigan, 2016 09 19

Manila - Abu Sayyaf bandits on Sunday freed three Indonesian tugboat crew members in Sulu, a day after they released a Norwegian captive. Indonesian sailors Teo Kopong, Lorenz Koten and Emmanuel, who were kidnapped in July in Sabah, were handed over, along with Norwegian hostage Kjartan Sekkingstad, to Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) founder Nur Misuari, who was said to have "assisted" in their release and provided shelter. The kidnappers were reportedly paid P30 million in ransom following negotiations with former Indonesian army general Kivlan Zein. No other details surrounding the negotiations were available, but the release of the hostages came after the Abu Sayyaf freed Sekkingstad for a P30-million ransom payment. Two Canadians taken hostage at the same time, John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, were later beheaded by the group after a ransom demand of about P300 million ($6.5 million) was not met.

Manila - A Norwegian man freed after almost a year held by the Abu Sayyaf terror group said he and his fellow captives, two of whom were beheaded, were treated like slaves and that he was regularly threatened with execution. Kjartan Sekkingstad was one of four people seized by the extremists at a resort he ran on Samal Island in the southern Philippines. Two of his fellow captives, Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, were decapitated this year. A Philippine woman, Marites Flor, was freed in June. "I am very happy to be alive and free," Mr. Sekkingstad told reporters following a meeting with President Rodrigo Duterte and Norwegian Embassy officials in Davao City. "It's a wonderful feeling." The two Canadians were killed after Ottawa refused to pay millions of dollars in ransom to the extremists, who have sworn allegiance to Islamic State, have earlier links to al Qaeda and have carried out bombings, assassinations and kidnappings for ransom that have often ended in hostages' deaths.

Moscow - President Vladimir Putin's ruling party easily outdistanced its rivals in parliamentary elections Sunday, but it was a lackluster victory that suggested the Russian leader's brand may be growing stale. United Russia, the pro-Kremlin behemoth an opposition leader once dubbed the "party of crooks and thieves," won less than 45% of the vote for 450 seats in the State Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, according to preliminary results announced by the Central Election Committee on Sunday night. No other party came close. The nationalist Liberal Democratic Party of Russia and the Communists competed for the second spot with 18% and 17% of the vote, respectively. Still, it was United Russia's lowest result in 15 years -- and came in an election with turnout of less than 40% of eligible voters. 46. Iran Can't Whitewash Its Record of Terror

Op-ed - Ronald Reagan was fond of quoting John Adams, who famously said: "Facts are stubborn things." So when Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif made public pronouncements about fighting extremism, the facts show that his comments are ironic at best and little more than insincere propaganda. The fact is that Iran is the leading state-sponsor of terrorism, with government officials directly responsible for numerous terrorist attacks since 1979. These include suicide bombings of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut and the Marine barracks at Beirut International Airport; the bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia in 1996; attacks against more than a dozen embassies in Iran, including those of Britain, the U.S. and Saudi Arabia; and the assassination of diplomats around the world, to name a few examples. Nor can one get around the fact that Iran uses terrorism to advance its aggressive policies. Iran cannot talk about fighting extremism while its leaders, Quds Force and Revolutionary Guard continue to fund, train, arm and facilitate acts of terrorism. If Iran wants to demonstrate sincerity in contributing to the global war on terrorism, it could have begun by handing over al Qaeda leaders who have enjoyed sanctuary in Iran. These have included Osama bin Laden's son, Saad, and al Qaeda's chief of operations, Saif al-Adel, along with numerous other operatives guilty of attacks against Saudi Arabia, the U.S. and other targets. It is a fact that Saif al-Adel placed a call from Iran in May 2003 giving orders for the Riyadh bombings that claimed more than 30 lives, including eight Americans. Yet he still benefits from Iranian protection. Iran could also stop funding terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah, whose secretary-general recently boasted that his organization gets 100% of its funding from Iran. Iran could stop producing and distributing improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, which have killed or injured thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. And Iran could halt supplying weapons to terrorists and sectarian militias in the region who seek to replace legitimate governments with Iranian puppets.

We can respond threats with threats when we have such a high defensive power," General Hashemi told FNA. "Today, our missile industries have advanced to the extent that we can reciprocate any kind of threat with a (similar) threat," he added. Stressing the strong enmity between the US and Iran, General Hashemi said, "In its assessments, the US has concluded that it cannot confront us." The World Vision organization, which operates in 100 countries and employs 46,000 people, fell victim to a complex Hamas takeover scheme, a senior Shin Bet source said, adding that Hamas's armed wing stole $7.2 million a year from the budget, which was supposed to pay for food,

Washington - The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) warned that JASTA bill, if approved by the Congress, will have severe consequences and will be used by lobbying organizations that promotes Islamophobia. Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act (JASTA) is a measure that would allow 9/11 attack survivors and relatives of terror victims to pursue cases in federal court against foreign governments and demand compensation if such governments are proven to bear some responsibility for attacks on U.S. soil. Thus, JASTA would allow the victims and their families to sue Saudi Arabia in U.S. federal court for its alleged role in indirectly financing the attacks. 52. Moscow says U.S. strikes threaten truce plan

Beirut - Moscow stepped up its war of words with Washington Sunday, saying airstrikes by a U.S.-led coalition on the Syrian army threatened the implementation of a U.S.-Russian cessation of hostilities plan for Syria and bordered on connivance with Daesh (ISIS). The diplomatic row heated up on the last day of a seven-day cessation of hostilities marred by a surge of violence as warplanes hit the strategic northern city of Aleppo for the first time since the truce came into effect. The Russian Defense Ministry said Saturday that U.S. jets had killed more than 60 Syrian soldiers in the eastern Syrian city of Deir al-Zor in four airstrikes by two F-16 and two A-10 fighter jets coming from the direction of Iraq. Syria's U.N. to a report by Kaspersky Lab experts, the app has been downloaded more than 500,000 times, with at least 6,000 successful infections. Kaspersky Lab has reported the Trojan to Google and the app has been removed from Google Play. The trojan includes some interesting features that help it to bypass detection. For example, it doesn't start as soon as the victim launches the app. Instead, it waits for the user to install or uninstall another app, and then checks to see whether that app runs on a real device or on a virtual machine.

54. Washington Suggests 72-Hour Ceasefire in Yemen as Iran Continues Arming Rebels Asharq Al-Awsat, Arafat Madabesh and Saeed al-Abyad, 2016 09 19

Aden, Jeddah - Washington has made a proposal for a 72-hour ceasefire in Yemen with a possibility of extension, during a two-day visit by a U.S. high-ranking official to Muscat. Asharq Al-Awsat learned from Yemeni and U.S. diplomatic and political sources that U.S. Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Thomas Shannon paid a visit to Oman on September 8 and 9, and held talks with a delegation of rebels to discuss the points that Secretary of State John Kerry had initiated in Jeddah. A source at the U.S. Embassy in Yemen told Asharq Al-Awsat that the new points in the U.S. position was the proposal to hold a 72-hour ceasefire. A spokesperson at the U.S. Department of State told Asharq Al-Awsat: "The proposal is a tool that would provide all Yemeni parties the chance to reach a complete and permanent agreement."

56. Germany's intelligence agency illegally gathered data Irish Times, Derek Scally, 2016 09 19

Berlin - Germany's foreign intelligence agency (BND) illegally collected and stored masses of data from innocent German citizens who were unwittingly dragged into mass surveillance dragnets. A leaked, classified report by the Federal Data Protection Commission (FDPC) found that, for every BND targeted surveillance operation, the intelligence agency was sucking up and storing data of 15 citizens not part of any investigation. "These infringements of constitutional rights are conducted without any legal basis and thus harm the constitutional right of informational self-determination of [innocent] people," the FDPC report adds. Among the BND's activities, exposed by leaks by whistleblower Edward Snowden, were 18 serious breaches of German fundamental law, according to the leaked FDPC report, and 12 formal complaints.

58. Turkish Authorities Arrest 28 ISIS Fighters
Asharq Al-Awsat, Saeed Abdelrazek, 2016 09 19

Ankara - Turkish security forces arrested four people on the basis of intelligence information that stated that the terrorist organisation ISIS is planning to target the British and German embassies in Ankara. However, sources at the Turkish Ministry of Interior confirmed that it has not found conclusive evidence that the detainees have links to terrorist groups. The sources said that the information stated that ISIS is planning to carry out an act of terrorism targeting the German and British embassies during the period 13 -17 September/ This led the General Directorate of Security in Turkey to begin to monitor this issue in cooperation with the relevant agencies belonging to the two countries, and this resulted in the arrest of three people in Ankara and one in Istanbul ahead of Eid Al-Adha. The sources also said that the detainees continue to be investigated but that the results of the investigation did not provide conclusive evidence of their links to terrorist groups.

1. Homa Hoodfar - Remuer ciel et terre

Le Devoir, Guy Taillefer, 2016 09 19

Editorial - Ottawa a remué ciel et terre pour obtenir la libération de Kevin Garratt, ce Canadien rentré jeudi dernier au pays après avoir été emprisonné pendant deux ans en Chine sous des accusations d'espionnage pour le compte du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité(SCRS).Il faut espérer que le gouvernement Trudeau mettra autant d'effort à obtenir celle d'Homa Hoodfar, cette anthropologue de l'Université Concordia détenue depuis maintenant plus de cent jours dans la tristement célèbre prison d'Evin, à Téhéran. Accusée de " collaborer avec un gouvernement hostile " et de " se livrer à des activités féministes ", cette dame d'origine iranienne, possédant la double nationalité canadienne et irlandaise, a été arrêtée sur ordre des Gardiens de la révolution le 6 juin dernier à Téhéran où elle se trouvait pour des raisons familiales en même temps que pour poursuivre ses recherches sur la condition de la femme dans le monde musulman dans le contexte spécifique des élections législatives qui étaient sur le point de se tenir en Iran. La dame âgée de 65 ans et à la santé fragile est, depuis, détenue en isolement.

2. Ottawa complice de la torture de Canadiens en Syrie

Ottawa - De 2001 à 2004, des Canadiens ont été emprisonnés et torturés en Syrie avec la complicité des autorités canadiennes, relèvent des documents secrets obtenus par Radio-Canada. À la suite des attentats du 11 septembre 2001, le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) et de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) voulaient trouver les cellules d'Al-Qaïda au pays. Elles ont alors commencé à suspecter trois Canadiens de confession musulmane de faire partie de la nébuleuse terroriste. Lors de trois différents voyages en Syrie, Abdhullah Almalki, Ahmad Elmaati et Muayyed Nureddin seront arrêtés et torturés. Quelque 18 000 documents du SCRS et de la GRC obtenus par Radio-Canada et CBC révèlent des exemples de violation des droits de la personne et de complicité du gouvernement dans des cas de torture. C'est le cas de l'homme d'affaires Abdullah Almalki, qui sera placé sous surveillance au pays et à l'étranger sans preuve solide. Deux ans de torture Dans les années 1990, Abdullah Almalki travaillait pour une ONG canadienne en Afghanistan dirigée par un homme lié à Oussama ben Laden.

3. The tale of two wrongfully imprisoned Canadians in China

Toronto Star, Thomas Walkom, 2016 09 19

Column: The federal government has successfully extricated one Canadian from a Chinese prison. Another remains. Amidst the euphoria surrounding Kevin Garratt's release, the fate of Huseyin Celil, a Burlington imam who used to make his living delivering pizzas in the Hamilton region, has almost been forgotten. Garratt, an evangelical Christian from British Columbia, was in jail for two years. Celil, a 47-year-old Muslim from Ontario, has been in prison for 10. Successive Conservative and Liberal governments have pressed for the release of both. Garratt's case, however, was always more likely to meet with success. First, unlike Celil, Garratt is not a dual national. Beijing does not recognize dual nationality and has consistently refused to accept Ottawa's assertion that Chinese-borne Celil, who obtained his Canadian citizenship in 2005, is indeed Canadian. For that reason, it has refused to let Canadian consular officials see Celil and has insisted, whenever the topic comes up between the two countries, that his case is none of Ottawa's business. Second, unlike Garratt, Celil has run afoul of the Chinese state before. A member of the country's Islamic Uighur minority, Celil was jailed in the mid-'90s for allegedly undertaking illegal political activities in his home province of Xinjiang. Ottawa did apparently send Michel Couombe, who heads the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, to China to convince Beijing that Garratt was not a spy. It's not clear why they would have believed Canada's spymaster on this particular topic, but maybe they did. More to the point, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has made encouraging noises about opening up Canada and its resources even more to China. That's the kind of thing Beijing likes to hear. Whatever the reason, Canada's efforts worked for Garratt. Let's hope Trudeau has enough goodies up his sleeve to spring the other wrongfully imprisoned Canadian too.

4. The Torture Files: Documents show CSIS and RCMP's role in post- 9/11 torture of 3 Canadians in Syria

CBC News, Nazim Baksh and Terence McKenna, 2016 09 19

Thousands of pages of secret files obtained by CBC reveal how Canada's police and intelligence service not only knew three Canadians were being tortured in Syrian jails in a post-Sept. 11 crackdown, but co-operated with Syrian officials in their interrogations. The files also show a Canadian ambassador helped deliver questions the RCMP and CSIS wanted put to the Canadians imprisoned in Syria, a country with a dismal human rights record. The revelations are featured in "The Torture Files," a joint investigation by The National and the fifth estate that airs this week. Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad Elmaati and Muayyed Nureddin were never arrested in Canada for suspected terror offences, but to this day there is a cloud of suspicion hanging over them. Ten years ago, they each filed $100-million lawsuits against the government. Maher Arar, another Canadian arrested and tortured in Syria in the wake of al-Qaeda's deadly attacks on New York and Washington, received an apology and a $10.5-million settlement from the federal government in 2007. Lawyers representing Almalki, Elmaati and Nureddin fought and eventually won a lengthy court battle with the RCMP and CSIS to gain access to thousands of heavily redacted files, amounting to hundreds of thousands of pages. They consist of internal memos, briefing notes from field agents to their superiors, inter-agency communications, emails, reports and even a memo that shows at least one senior RCMP case officer might have had serious doubts about the evidence Almalki was engaged in anything nefarious. CBC News obtained exclusive access to some 18,000 pages, which the trio's lawyers plan to use when the long-anticipated civil trials begin early next year.

5. Canada's threats from state hackers

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 19

Editorial: Someone is trying to break into the systems that serve as the Internet's skeleton and central nervous system. The increasingly sophisticated attacks often bear the hallmarks of state sponsorship, with many experts fingering China and Russia. It's likely a matter of time before they succeed. How long will it take for hostile nations to turn their attention to the West's intelligence documents, the electrical grid and the political system? Oh, wait: they already have. Given recent headlines have focused on either American (the Democratic National Committee, former U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell) or international targets (the World Anti-Doping Agency), it's easy to forget data protection is a serious Canadian problem as well. Canada is in the midst of a defence policy review, which may end up mostly focusing on the things we have argued about forever, like which new fighter jets to buy. But war and security threats are moving from the physical world to cyberspace. There are new dangers to be considered and planned for. The former head of the Communications Security Establishment, the electronic spy agency, recently argued in a Canadian Global Affairs Institute policy paper that the military should have the authority to go on the cyber offensive. The online world is a different place from 2010, the last time our cybersecurity policy was revamped, says John Adams. He says it would be "neglectful beyond belief" to not arm Canada adequately to safeguard the national interest - and political, economic and social institutions - in "a new kind of war."

6. Combien de temps Omar Khadr devra-t-il encore attendre des excuses?

Le Devoir, Nathalie Drouin, 2016 09 19

Opinion - Nathalie Drouin - Présidente et fondatrice de l'association pour la défense d'Omar Khadr (pouromarkhadr.com) Omar Khadr a 30 ans aujourd'hui lundi. Combien d'années devra-t-il patienter encore avant que notre gouvernement ne lui offre enfin des excuses officielles assorties d'une compensation pour les fautes commises à son endroit et qui l'ont privé de ses droits les plus élémentaires ? Nous avons une dette collective envers ce jeune homme, un citoyen canadien à part entière que l'on a laissé croupir à Guantánamo pendant 10 ans et qui a subi des sévices, abandons et dénis de justice à répétition depuis 15 ans, à l'encontre des conventions de droit internationales dont notre pays est signataire. L'histoire d'Omar est une véritable disgrâce pour le Canada qui se targue d'être le champion des droits de la personne et, surtout, des droits des enfants. Voici un rappel des faits en 15 points : - Omar Khadr est né à Toronto, le 19 septembre 1986. À 15 ans, son père le laisse dans un camp en Afghanistan avec la promesse de revenir le chercher. Il ne l'a jamais fait. - Peu après, le camp est bombardé par l'armée américaine. Omar est le seul survivant. - Pendant l'attaque, il est atteint par deux tirs qui lui infligent de graves blessures au dos, faisant éclater son épaule demeurée partiellement paralysée. Les éclats d'obus lui font perdre l'usage d'un oeil et limitent sa vision dans l'autre.

La Presse canadienne, Alexandre Robillard, 2016 09 19

Saguenay - Le candidat à la direction du Parti québécois Jean-François Lisée a refusé de s'excuser, dimanche, à la suite d'une attaque sur les réseaux sociaux qui a mené son adversaire Alexandre Cloutier à contacter la police. M. Lisée a reconnu qu'il avait toutefois retiré de son fil Twitter ses propos dans lesquels il montrait que les positions de M. Cloutier sur la laïcité plaisaient à un groupe dont le porte-parole est l'imam controversé Adil Charkaoui. «Je l'ai retiré par amitié pour Alexandre», a-t-il dit dans un point de presse. Les quatre candidats à la direction du PQ étaient réunis à Saguenay, dimanche, pour un débat dont les thèmes portaient principalement sur la souveraineté. Après les échanges, au cégep de Jonquière, M. Lisée a affirmé que la journée de campagne de vendredi avait été mauvaise pour l'équipe de M. Cloutier et la sienne. «Je pense que la journée de vendredi est une journée qu'on voudrait effacer de l'histoire du Parti québécois, c'est tout ce que j'ai à dire là-dessus», a-t-il dit. M. Lisée a estimé que les torts étaient partagés dans l'escalade qui a mené au message reliant M. Cloutier à M. Charkaoui, qui est soupçonné d'avoir été associé à la radicalisation de jeunes à Montréal.

8. Ex-bureaucrat sues CBC over boat-tax story

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 09 19

Ottawa - A former top bureaucrat is suing the CBC for $800,000 over a story that alleged he used a "racket" to avoid paying $105,000 in sales taxes and duties on his 47-foot sailing boat, court documents show. François Guimont, who recently retired as Canada's deputy minister of public safety, was featured in an investigative story in March that focused on luxury boats sold at Canadian marinas near the U.S. border, in the binational Lake Champlain area. The CBC's flagship French-language investigative program, called Enquête, revealed that many of the boats are officially exported to the United States, meaning no Canadian tax is imposed by the sellers. The program also alleged that American authorities don't impose taxes or duties, because they are told the boats are only in the United States on a temporary basis, to be stored in Canada for the winter. CBC journalist Marie-Maude Denis, who broke Quebec's construction scandal, referred in her story to the example of the Elysium, owned by Mr. Guimont. Asked on the television show whether he had paid sales taxes and other duties on his sailboat, Mr. Guimont answered that he "did exactly" what officials at Marina Gosselin asked him to do. He added that it would be up to the marina to explain its procedures.

9. Got a warrant?

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 19

Editorial: Technology affects law, and law affects technology, because they both change over the years. But the fundamental principles underlying our laws and our rights remain constants, even as technology advances. Some police forces and security agencies appear to be tempted to think that new techniques and devices bring to the world something entirely new, with no connection at all to the older ways of doing law or respecting rights. Consider how some agencies have apparently been gaining access to information on smartphones, without first seeking judicial authorization. Some agencies have acquired and used devices known as "international mobile subscriber identity" catchers, or IMSI. These can discover much about the owners of the phones. Entities with access to cellphone towers can mop up huge quantities of other people's communications. And masses of data from one group can "trick" other masses of data into handing them over.

10. Lisée won't apologize for tweet

Montreal - Parti Québécois leadership candidate Jean-François Lisée has refused to apologize for linking his main rival to controversial Islamic activist Adil Charkaoui in a tweet. Nevertheless, Lisée insisted the fact he removed the item he tweeted from the Internet is proof of his esteem for the candidate, Alexandre Cloutier. As for the ferocious feud it sparked and even threats against Cloutier from people who believed the connection to be real, Lisée said it was a day of the campaign he "would rather forget." "I am not asking for apologies, I am offering none, I am turning the page," Lisée told reporters at a news conference following an all candidate's debate - the fourth in the race - here in Quebec's nationalist heartland. Lisée balked when asked whether he went too far and twisted for his own purposes a Charkaoui Facebook comment to the effect Cloutier seems more open to newcomers than he does. "All the facts are available on the Facebook sites of each candidate," he said. "I am not going back into this issue. I want to talk about other things." The party in question, Cloutier, was not impressed.

Le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) a reçu un appel des pompiers vers 3 h 30 hier matin pour un incendie qui s'est déclaré au 3390 boulevard Crémazie, à proximité de l'intersection avec la 13e Avenue, dans l'arrondissement de Villeray- Saint-Michel-Parc-Extension. «Un objet aurait été lancé à travers la fenêtre de la porte et, sur place, on a repéré une forte odeur de produit inflammable, possiblement de l'essence», a détaillé le porte-parole du SPVM. Les dégâts semblent mineurs, car les pompiers sont rapidement intervenus. Aucun suspect ni témoin n'a été entendu et l'enquête a été transférée à la section des incendies criminels du SPVM.

12. Tax changes, security on Commons to-do list

Ottawa Citizen, Kady O'Malley, 2016 09 19

Column: It may not provide spectators with the full parliamentary pageantry of a speech from the throne, but there's always at least a bit of that back-at-school energy in the air as the House prepares to reopen for business after the summer recess - an occasion that, for the record, should never be referred to as the start of a "new session" unless immediately preceded by either a general election or a prorogation. Here's a rundown on how the various parties are hoping to spend the 12 ½ sitting weeks between now and the Christmas break. 1. Wrapping up legislative loose ends. For a government about to round the corner on its first year in office, it's time - past time, some might argue - to start ticking some of the more contentious initiatives off the Commons to-do list. Among the items still languishing on the order paper: Broadening the Canadian Human Rights Act to cover gender identity and expression; Rolling back the previous government's bid to force labour unions to publicly disclose detailed financial records; Formally establishing the income tax changes brought in as part of the inaugural budget; Setting up a special parliamentary committee to oversee national security operations.

13. Tell the truth about 'stingrays'

Toronto Star, 2016 09 19

Editorial: When the warden of Warkworth Institution in Campbellford, Ont., wanted to investigate reports of contraband in his prison, he wrote a memo to Correctional Services Canada asking the agency to provide a so-called IMSI catcher. The surveillance tool, sometimes called a stingray, records data from the cellphones of all those nearby. The prisoners would be surveilled, but because the tool is indiscriminate, so, too, would guards and visitors. The warden's memo, which came to light late last year, was the first apparent public confirmation of what privacy experts had long alleged: the government is collecting data from the cellphones of Canadians without their knowledge. Since the Warkworth revelation, several other instances of stingray use have been brought to public notice in court documents and media reports. Yet Ottawa will not say how frequently these invasive tools are being employed or what rules govern their use. Meanwhile, many police forces, including the Toronto Police Service, and other government agencies continue to deny they use them at all, even in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

14. Unpaid civil servant now overpaid after suing government, Global Affairs claims

CBC News, Ashley Burke, 2016 09 19

A contract worker in Ottawa is at the centre of a messy legal battle after becoming the first person to sue the federal government over the Phoenix payroll fiasco affecting thousands of public servants. Darrel Delisle, a former casual worker with Global Affairs Canada, filed a lawsuit for $24,000 after he struggled to get paid for three months during the roll out of the government's new Phoenix pay system. In a statement of defence, Global Affairs admitted it did owe Delisle money but that it overpaid him since the lawsuit was filed -- and that Delisle now owes his former employer more than $14,000. Since February, more than 80,000 workers have struggled to be properly paid -- some being paid too little, some being paid too much and some not being paid at all. According to court documents, Delisle made many attempts to get paid -- including 635 calls to the pay centre, sending emails, setting up meetings with superiors, and filing a labour complaint, which was ultimately rejected. Delisle left his government contract early, on June 24, to take another job, according to his statement of claim. On July 14, he filed his lawsuit in Ontario's small claims court, arguing he wasn't paid properly and suffered losses during the roll out of Phoenix.

15. Authorities probe ties between blasts, devices in 2 states

Associated Press, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - Authorities questioned several people early Monday as they worked to determine whether there was a connection between explosive devices found over the weekend in two states: an explosion in a Manhattan neighborhood, an unexploded pressure cooker device blocks away, a pipe bomb blast at a Jersey shore town and five explosive devices at a New Jersey train station. On Sunday night, FBI agents in Brooklyn stopped "a vehicle of interest" in the investigation of the Manhattan explosion, according to FBI spokeswoman Kelly Langmesser. No one has been charged with any crime, and the investigation is continuing, Langmesser said. On Sunday, a federal law enforcement official said the Chelsea bomb contained a residue of Tannerite, an explosive often used for target practice that can be picked up in many sporting goods stores. The discovery of Tannerite may be important as authorities probe whether the two New York City devices and the pipe bomb at the Jersey shore are connected.

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - A bomb that injured 29 people on Saturday in the Chelsea neighborhood of Manhattan, and another that failed to detonate, were filled with shrapnel and made with pressure cookers, flip phones and Christmas lights to set off a powerful explosive compound, law enforcement officials said on Sunday. Both bombs appeared designed to create maximum chaos and fatalities. They also provided a trove of clues. Late Sunday night, two law enforcement officials said that investigators stopped a car on the Belt Parkway near the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge and took five people to an F.B.I. office in Manhattan for questioning in the bombing investigation. One of the officials said that all or most of them may have been from the same family and that they may have been on their way to the airport. The F.B.I. confirmed in a statement that agents and police detectives had stopped "a vehicle of interest in the investigation into Saturday's bombing in Manhattan and that no one has been charged with any crime." Earlier, two senior law enforcement officials said there was a "person of interest" in the bombing, but it was unclear if that person had been identified. The person had been seen on surveillance footage. Tensions in the region, already high, escalated later Sunday night when, according to a law enforcement official, pipe bombs were found near the train station in Elizabeth, N.J. The mayor, J. Christian Bollwage, confirmed that a suspicious package containing "wires and a pipe" had been found by two men in the city, and said that the F.B.I. and the New Jersey State Police had been called in to investigate after a drone found that the item could be a bomb.

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

Elizabeth N.J. - A backpack that appeared to contain pipe bombs exploded early Monday as a police robot examined it near a New Jersey train station. Mayor Chris Bollwage told reporters the bomb squad robot was "cutting into the device when it exploded" in the city of Elizabeth. A spokesman for Bollwage had earlier described the blast as a controlled detonation. The explosion occurred shortly before 1 a.m. ET Monday. It was the second in New Jersey since Saturday morning and followed a bombing Saturday night in Manhattan that injured 29 people. At around 6 a.m. ET, officials familiar with the investigation confirmed to NBC News that heavily armed FBI agents spotted at a fried chicken restaurant in Elizabeth were involved in the tri-state bombs probe. Several law enforcement officials told NBC News that they are concerned that an active terrorism cell with multiple players could be at work in the New York-New Jersey area. Multiple senior law enforcement officials told NBC News that the suspicious device discovered Sunday night in Elizabeth looked similar in appearance to the one that exploded Saturday morning in Seaside Park, N.J.

18. Explosion à New York Après la panique, l'agacement

La Presse+, Richard Hétu, 2016 09 19

New York - « C'est dommage, mais c'est plus un inconvéient qu'autre chose », s'entendent pour dire des résidants de Chelsea. Comme son grand frère situé dans Greenwich Village, le restaurant végétalien By Chloe, logé dans la 22e Rue, connaît un grand succès depuis son ouverture, en juin. Aussi était-il bondé, samedi soir, lorsqu'une bombe a explosé à un pâté de maisons de là. Et les caméras de surveillance de l'établissement ont capté sur le vif la réaction des clients. « On voit la secousse et la peur des gens au moment de l'explosion », a raconté Erik Diamond, directeur régional de la jeune chaîne de restaurants, après avoir visionné les enregistrements des caméras de surveillance. « Certains se précipitent à l'extérieur pour voir ce qui se passe. D'autres sont cloués sur place. C'était un moment de panique. Je pense que les New-Yorkais ne sont pas prêts à un autre événement comme celui d'il y a 15 ans. » M. Diamond se tenait au milieu d'une 6e Avenue fermée à la circulation lorsqu'il a tenu ces propos, hier matin. Au-delà des barricades policières, des enquêteurs locaux et fédéraux s'affairaient dans la 23e Rue, entre les 6e et 7e Avenues, autour de la poubelle déchiquetée par l'explosion qui a fait 29 blessés (tous avaient quitté l'hôpital en fin de matinée hier). Et malgré le bouclage d'une partie de Chelsea, le moment de panique capté par les caméras du restaurant By Chloe avait été remplacé par une réaction où se mêlaient chez plusieurs habitants du quartier le fatalisme et le stoïcisme. « C'est dommage, mais c'est plus un inconvéient qu'autre chose », a déclaré Debra Noll, avocate qui vit dans un immeuble situé en face de l'endroit où l'explosion est survenue. « Personne n'a été tué, c'est tout ce qui compte. » « Je ne me sens pas moins en sécurité aujourd'hui qu'hier », a ajouté cette New-Yorkaise, qui n'était pas chez elle au moment de la déflagration. « J'ai l'impression de vivre dans une ville très sûre. Parfois, de telles choses arrivent, et cette fois-ci, l'efficacité n'était pas au rendez-vous. »

19. Family identifies attacker behind 'potential act of terrorism' in St. Cloud

Minneapolis Star Tribune, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

St. Cloud - In a few bloody minutes, a man rampaged through a St. Cloud shopping mall Saturday evening, stabbing nine people before being fatally shot by an off-duty police officer. The violence is being investigated as terrorism, federal authorities said. None of the nine victims, seven men and two women who ranged in age from 15 to 53, was killed in the attack. In a media briefing after midnight Sunday, St. Cloud Police Chief William Anderson said an off-duty officer from another jurisdiction confronted and shot the suspect Saturday night inside Crossroads Center mall. He said the man -- dressed in a private security uniform -- reportedly asked at least one victim whether they were Muslim before assaulting them, and referred to Allah during the attacks. "We are currently investigating this as a potential act of terrorism," said the FBI's Richard Thornton, speaking at a news conference at police headquarters early Sunday afternoon. Thornton did not link the attack to a specific terror group. Roughly 12 hours after the stabbings, a news agency said to speak for ISIL went to Twitter to claim credit for the mall violence. "The executor of the stabbing attacks in Minnesota yesterday was a soldier of the Islamic State and carried out the operation in response to the citizens of countries belonging to the crusader coalition," the posting by the AMAQ news agency read. While law enforcement has not disclosed the suspect's name, his father identified him as Dahir A. Adan, 22. Interviewed Sunday through a translator at his apartment in St. Cloud, Ahmed Adan said his son was born in Kenya but grew up in the United States. Other family members said Dahir Adan was beginning his third year as a student at St. Cloud State University. Police told Ahmed Adan about 9 p.m. Saturday that his son had died at the mall, he said. He had "no suspicion" of his son being involved in any terrorist activity, he added. Police raided the apartment on St. Germain Street on Sunday morning and seized photos and other materials, Ahmed Adan said.

CNN.com, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 19

New York - The intense investigation into the weekend bomb blasts in New York and New Jersey is leading authorities to signs of a possible terror cell in those two states, law enforcement officials told CNN Monday. The ongoing investigation, which includes two bombs in New York City and devices in two cities in New Jersey, has given authorities leads on specific people who are urgently being sought. Also on Monday morning, a federal law enforcement official said BBs and ball bearings were among the pieces of metal that appeared to be packed into both pressure cooker bombs in New York. One of those devices exploded on 23rd Street, but the fact that it was partly under a metal trash container may have diminished the force of the blast. The latest developments came just hours after a backpack containing multiple bombs was found Sunday night near an Elizabeth, New Jersey, train station, according to the FBI and the city's mayor. There is no indication yet that the latest incident in Elizabeth is connected to the bombing in a New York City neighborhood Saturday night that injured 29 people and the explosion from a garbage can near a charity run in Seaside Park, New Jersey. In that incident, investigators discovered three pipe-bomb-type devices wired together. Only one exploded, and no one was injured.

21. Palestinian proud of 'terrorist' label

Washington Post, Hazem Balousha, William Booth,, 2016 09 19

Gaza City - Fathi Hammad said that he is pleased to be named a "global terrorist" by the United States. On Friday, the State Department branded the senior Hamas leader a "specially designated global terrorist." That is a rarefied list of international enemies belonging to organizations such as al-Qaeda, Boko Haram, Hezbollah, the Taliban, the Jewish Kahane group, Algerian Salafists, the Islamic State and Hamas, among others. On Saturday, Hammad told The Washington Post: "The decision only makes me more confident about my path. The threat of killing or arrest? It doesn't freak me out, not at all. I am looking forward to it." Hammad said, "I feel proud that I managed to anger America." Then he added, "I don't know why they picked me." The United States charged that Hammad, 55, a former interior minister for the Hamas government in the Gaza Strip, coordinated terrorist cells. No evidence was presented. The designation also said that Hammad is a director of Al-Aqsa TV, "which is a primary Hamas media outlet with programs designed to recruit children to become Hamas armed fighters and suicide bombers upon reaching adulthood." Why the State Department decided to name Hammad as a global terrorist now is unclear. It is well known that Hammad founded the TV station, but it went on the air soon after Hamas, an Islamist militant group, took control of the coastal enclave in 2007.

22. Embassies report rise in alleged hate crimes in UK since Brexit vote

The Guardian (London), Matthew Weaver, Sandra Laville, 2016 09 19

London - European embassies in Britain have logged dozens of incidents of suspected hate crime and abuse against their citizens since the vote to leave the European Union, according to figures obtained by the Guardian. The vast majority of xenophobic incidents involved citizens from eastern European countries, with more attacks against Poles than all the other nationalities put together, the survey of EU embassies in London revealed. The Polish consular service in London, Manchester and Edinburgh has logged 31 incidents of reported hate crime since 23 June, including eight attacks in the past three weeks. They include the killing of Arkadiusz Józwik in Harlow, in an apparently unprovoked attack that is being treated by police as a possible hate crime. Five 15-year-old boys and one 16-year-old boy, all from Harlow, were arrested on suspicion of murdering Józwik and bailed until 7 October pending further inquiries. A second Polish man survived the attack. The Guardian contacted the London embassies of all 27 EU member states. Of the 17 embassies that replied, almost half reported a rise in incidents of xenophobic abuse in the 12 weeks since the EU referendum. Between them, there were 60 incidents logged, including shots fired at a Lithuanian home in Lurgan, Northern Ireland, this month, an arson attack on a Romanian shop in Norwich in July and a break-in at a home in Nottingham in the immediate aftermath of the vote when a Latvian family were called "fucking immigrants" and told to leave the UK.

23. Nato has no plan if Russia invades, warns ex-general

London Times, Deborah Haynes, 2016 09 19

London - Britain and its Nato allies have no effective plan for defending Europe from a Russian attack because of splits within the military alliance, a recently retired military chief said last night. Russia could deploy tens of thousands of troops into Nato territory within 48 hours, backed by warplanes and ships, whereas it would take Nato months to do the same, General Sir Richard Barrons said. As a result, some land and control of airspace and territorial waters could be lost before Nato's 28 member states had even agreed how to respond, the former chief of Joint Forces Command warned. The North Atlantic Council, the political decision making body of Nato, has the power to authorise the supreme allied commander Europe, Nato's top military officer, to draw up plans and training to prepare the alliance to respond to an attack. But this work had stopped after the Cold War because the threat had gone away. Sir Richard said that there was no appetite for a revival even following the invasion of Ukraine and evidence that Russia has invested in new equipment specifically designed to outmatch Nato.

24. Intelligence agencies to be reviewed New era Security reshaping plan (Canada)

Canberra Times, David Wroe, 2016 09 18

Canberra - The Turnbull government is set to embark on a major independent review of the nation's intelligence agencies as Australia faces an unprecedented array of security challenges ranging from terrorism to the rise of China and cyber-spying. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull's department has confirmed that it is putting in place arrangements for the first major intelligence review since 2011 and the third since the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the US, which prompted a reshaping of intelligence efforts in Australia and among its allies. The review is expected to tackle the unprecedented need for the nation's six intelligence agencies to balance immediate security intelligence requirements to combat terrorism including "lone wolves" with longer-term considerations about geo-strategic changes flowing from the shift in power and wealth to the Indo-Pacific region. A spokeswoman for the Department of Prime Minister and Cabinet, which is setting up the review, told Fairfax Media: "We are working through a proposal for a periodic review and the details involved. It is expected that these considerations will take at least several weeks." It will be headed by a senior retired intelligence official. Sources have raised the name of Allan Gyngell, who led the Office of National Assessments - the agency that collates intelligence into briefings for the Prime Minister and the national security committee of cabinet - from 2009 until 2013. Dr Blaxland, a senior fellow at the Australian National University's Strategic and Defence Studies Centre, said cyber security was a major organisational challenge because intelligence agencies needed to co-operate on capabilities that were usually top secret with a wide range of organisations including other government departments and critical industries. Australia's intelligence community is made up of ASIO, ONA, foreign intelligence outfit ASIS, the Defence Intelligence Organisation, the Australian Geospatial Organisation and the Australian Signals Directorate. Australia's international intelligence co-operation will also likely be scrutinised in the review. The "five-eyes" arrangement in which Australia shares intelligence with the US, Britain, Canada and New Zealand is considered by insiders more vital than ever with each country constrained by resources amid a growing workload. Co-operation with regional democracies such as Japan and South Korea has also grown strongly in recent years.

The move has been prompted by what the Sydney Morning Herald describes as "an unprecedented array of security challenges ranging from terrorism to the rise of China and cyber-spying". Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull's department has confirmed it is preparing for what will be Australia's first significant intelligence review in five years and the third since the September 11 attacks in the US, the paper says.

26. War on terror: Australia and the West facing potent new threats via social media

Daily Telegraph (Australia), Staff Writer, 2016 09 18

Canberra - Foreign States were launching covert social media attacks against governments, including Australia, using malicious gossip and misinformation to manipulate political opinion in what former ASIO chief has claimed was a new and potent cyber threat. The warning comes as Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull and US President Barack Obama prepare to meet in Washington this week for the first cyber security and cyber terrorism summit between Australia and the US. In an exclusive interview with The Daily Telegraph before leaving for the UN meeting in New York, Mr Turnbull said governments were not moving as quickly as their enemies in cyberspace. The Federal Government's former director general of security (and ASIO) David Irvine last week raised the spectre of "cyber influencing" as a new threat to governments. Now the chair of the Australian Cyber Security Research Institute, Mr Irvine said while the intelligence and security response to terrorism was well advanced, governments were playing "catch up" in dealing with cyber terrorism, espionage and sabotage.

Pakistan Dawn, Syed Sammer Abbas, 2016 09 19

Islamabad - Pakistan on Sunday rejected Indian allegations regarding involvement in terrorist attack on brigade headquarters in Uri area of the Indian-held Kashmir (IHK). "Pointing fingers at Pakistan has become a traditional tendency of India after each terrorist attack," Foreign Office spokesperson Nafees Zakaria told DawnNews. "In the past many Indians were involved in the terrorist acts for which India had blamed Pakistan," he asserted. Commenting on India's Home Minister Rajnath Singh's statement declaring Pakistan a terrorist state, Zakaria said "India is trying to divert world's attention from the human rights violations being committed in occupied Kashmir". "The whole world is looking at the Indian atrocities in India-held Kashmir and UN Human Rights Commissioner has also offered to send fact finding mission to Kashmir which India has rejected," the spokesperson added.

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 09 19

Washington - As Pakistan prepares to highlight the current situation in India-held Kashmir at the UN General Assembly and India plans to counter it by raising the Baloch issue, the United States has made it clear that it will not back either side. "What we have said -- nothing is changed about our view that we want to see India and Pakistan work this out bilaterally," said State Department spokesman John Kirby when asked to define the US policy on Kashmir. The US was one of the co-sponsors of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 47 that calls for "a free and impartial plebiscite" in Jammu and Kashmir on the question of its accession to India or Pakistan. But since then, it has slightly changed its position and for the past several decades calls for bilateral talks between the two countries for resolving this dispute. Belgium, Canada, China, Colombia and Britain were the other sponsors of the resolution that the UN Security Council adopted at its 286th meeting on April 21, 1948.

Tunisia - Tunisia announced on Saturday that a state of emergency, in force since a deadly attack on the presidential guard last November, will be extended by one month. The announcement was made hours after PM Yousef al-Shahid declared the exemption of duties of several officials in Jandouba and Farnana areas following protests in the areas. The protests occurred over a week after a young man set himself on fire in front of Farnana municipality building. A statement said that after consulting the premier and head of the national assembly, President Beji Caid Essebsi decided that the measure would be extended from September 19 for a month. The law allows authorities to ban strikes and meetings that might "provoke or maintain disorder", to temporarily close theaters and bars, and to "take every measure to secure control of the press and all types of publications". The incident in Farnana ignited several movements demanding job opportunities and infrastructure maintenance.

Korea Herald, Yoon Min-sik, 2016 09 19

Seoul - In 1945, two nuclear bombs decimated the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, ending World War II and forever changing the scope of modern warfare. Lim Jong-in, a professor at the graduate school of information security at Korea University, said he believes that cyberattacks are the next big threat to humanity. "In the 1950s, the international society reached a consensus on nuclear weapons and saw the birth of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Now, we have cyber weapons that present such threats," Lim, formerly a special advisor to President Park Geun-hye, told The Korea Herald on Friday, the day of North Korea's fifth nuclear test. While not yet perceived as critical as a nuclear program, he emphasized cyber terrorism is extremely dangerous in a society that is growing more connected. "If there is an attack on the society's critical infrastructure, it can potentially be as devastating as a nuclear weapon. The international community needs a set of discussions that will bring binding organizations to this issue, a 'cyber IAEA' if you will." Pyongyang itself, currently going rogue with its internationally-condemned nuclear program, has proven this point with repeated hacking attacks on its southern neighbor. In 2014, the Korea Hydro & Nuclear Power Co. came under what is believed to be an attack from North Korean hackers. Prosecutors said last month that the information of high-ranking officials and members of research institutes on Pyongyang may have been stolen by North Korean hackers.

Manila - Abu Sayyaf bandits on Sunday freed three Indonesian tugboat crew members in Sulu, a day after they released a Norwegian captive. Indonesian sailors Teo Kopong, Lorenz Koten and Emmanuel, who were kidnapped in July in Sabah, were handed over, along with Norwegian hostage Kjartan Sekkingstad, to Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) founder Nur Misuari, who was said to have "assisted" in their release and provided shelter. The kidnappers were reportedly paid P30 million in ransom following negotiations with former Indonesian army general Kivlan Zein. No other details surrounding the negotiations were available, but the release of the hostages came after the Abu Sayyaf freed Sekkingstad for a P30-million ransom payment. Two Canadians taken hostage at the same time, John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, were later beheaded by the group after a ransom demand of about P300 million ($6.5 million) was not met.

Manila - A Norwegian man freed after almost a year held by the Abu Sayyaf terror group said he and his fellow captives, two of whom were beheaded, were treated like slaves and that he was regularly threatened with execution. Kjartan Sekkingstad was one of four people seized by the extremists at a resort he ran on Samal Island in the southern Philippines. Two of his fellow captives, Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, were decapitated this year. A Philippine woman, Marites Flor, was freed in June. United Russia, the pro-Kremlin behemoth an opposition leader once dubbed the "party of crooks and thieves," won less than 45% of the vote for 450 seats in the State Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, according to preliminary results announced by the Central Election Committee on Sunday night. No other party came close. The nationalist Liberal Democratic Party of Russia and the Communists competed for the second spot with 18% and 17% of the vote, respectively. Still, it was United Russia's lowest result in 15 years -- and came in an election with turnout of less than 40% of eligible voters. 46. Iran Can't Whitewash Its Record of Terror

Op-ed - Ronald Reagan was fond of quoting John Adams, who famously said: "Facts are stubborn things." So when Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif made public pronouncements about fighting extremism, the facts show that his comments are ironic at best and little more than insincere propaganda. The fact is that Iran is the leading state-sponsor of terrorism, with government officials directly responsible for numerous terrorist attacks since 1979. These include suicide bombings of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut and the Marine barracks at Beirut International Airport; the bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia in 1996; attacks against more than a dozen embassies in Iran, including those of Britain, the U.S. and Saudi Arabia; and the assassination of diplomats around the world, to name a few examples. Nor can one get around the fact that Iran uses terrorism to advance its aggressive policies. Iran cannot talk about fighting extremism while its leaders, Quds Force and Revolutionary Guard continue to fund, train, arm and facilitate acts of terrorism. If Iran wants to demonstrate sincerity in contributing to the global war on terrorism, it could have begun by handing over al Qaeda leaders who have enjoyed sanctuary in Iran. These have included Osama bin Laden's son, Saad, and al Qaeda's chief of operations, Saif al-Adel, along with numerous other operatives guilty of attacks against Saudi Arabia, the U.S. and other targets. It is a fact that Saif al-Adel placed a call from Iran in May 2003 giving orders for the Riyadh bombings that claimed more than 30 lives, including eight Americans. Yet he still benefits from Iranian protection. Iran could also stop funding terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah, whose secretary-general recently boasted that his organization gets 100% of its funding from Iran. Iran could stop producing and distributing improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, which have killed or injured thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. And Iran could halt supplying weapons to terrorists and sectarian militias in the region who seek to replace legitimate governments with Iranian puppets.

47. Iranian Missiles Capable of Responding All Threats

Tehran - Senior Military Advisor to the Iranian Leader Brigadier General Seyed Hessam Hashemi underlined the high precision-striking power of country's missiles, and said Tehran enjoys the capability to reciprocate any kind threat. "The enemies have always been threatening us and their threats have not decreased but increased every day and if the enemy comes to the conclusion that we have grown weak, it will certainly attack us. We can respond threats with threats when we have such a high defensive power," General Hashemi told FNA. "Today, our missile industries have advanced to the extent that we can reciprocate any kind of threat with a (similar) threat," he added. Stressing the strong enmity between the US and Iran, General Hashemi said, "In its assessments, the US has concluded that it cannot confront us." In relevant remarks in August, Iranian Defense Minister Brigadier General Hossein Dehqan underlined that his country sees no limit for the range of the ballistic missiles that it is developing.

48. ISIL's Spies Fleeing Hawija for Mosul After Payroll Exposure

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 19

Tehran - ISIL's spies and informants have fled the city of Hawija in the Southwestern part of Kirkuk province after their payrolls were exposed, local sources disclosed on Saturday. The ISIL spies fled Hawija for the city of Mosul after their payrolls were compromised, the sources said, reminding that the information and intel fed by spies and informants to the ISIL has resulted in the execution of a large number of residents of Hawija city, "which has caused deep worries among these informants". The revelation comes two weeks after unknown people stole an important archive of ISIL which contained important intelligence about the terrorist group's activities in different fields. The recent advances of the Iraqi forces against the ISIL in Kirkuk province have left no choice for the ISIL terrorists and their families but to flock to Mosul in Nineveh province to find safer shelters.

49. 54 terror suspects arrested during Haj

Saudi Gazette, Staff Report, 2016 09 19

Riyadh - The security authorities arrested 54 terror suspects between Dhul Hijjah 1 and Dhul Hijjah 9. The terror suspects included 30 Saudis, 13 Bahrainis, and the rest from seven different nationalities. One of them was a citizen of Brunei. The Brunei national is the first man from the southeast Asian country to be apprehended on charges of terrorism. The security sources did not identify the man but said he was arrested in Riyadh without any resistance. They said the accused is being investigated to verify his involvement in terror operations that took place in the Kingdom or if he had any connections with or had supported terrorist organizations in the country. Saudi officers kept eyes on every route and gathering spot. An "eye" which never closes formed the heart of the command and control center located in Mina, said Col. Saad Al-Dosari, its planning chief. More than 5,000 cameras were installed in the entire Makkah sector covering a radius of around 10 kilometers around its Grand Mosque.

50. Australian MP: It's beyond the pale if Hamas used our money to build tunnels

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, 2016 09 19

Jerusalem - "If Australian money was spent on building [Hamas attack] tunnels, that is beyond the pale," Australian MP Michael Danby said Sunday with reference to the recent World Vision scandal at a Jerusalem Press Club and NGO Monitor-sponsored event. The Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) announced in August that Hamas had infiltrated World Vision and redirected tens of millions of dollars - 60 percent - of the organization's budget to its "military" wing. The World Vision organization, which operates in 100 countries and employs 46,000 people, fell victim to a complex Hamas takeover scheme, a senior Shin Bet source said, adding that Hamas's armed wing stole $7.2 million a year from the budget, which was supposed to pay for food, humanitarian assistance, and aid programs for disabled children, and channeled the funds to buy weapons, build attack tunnels and direct toward other preparations for war with Israel.

51. JASTA serves Islamophobic organizations

Asharq Al-Awsat, Maaz al-Amri, 2016 09 19

Washington - The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) warned that JASTA bill, if approved by the Congress, will have severe consequences and will be used by lobbying organizations that promotes Islamophobia. Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act (JASTA) is a measure that would allow 9/11 attack survivors and relatives of terror victims to pursue cases in federal court against foreign governments and demand compensation if such governments are proven to bear some responsibility for attacks on U.S. soil. Thus, JASTA would allow the victims and their families to sue Saudi Arabia in U.S. federal court for its alleged role in indirectly financing the attacks. Nihad Awad, executive director and founder of CAIR, told Asharq Al-Awsat that JASTA will allow the continuation of harassments against the Islamic community. He added that after this bill, terrorism will continue to be joint with Islam.

52. Moscow says U.S. strikes threaten truce plan

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 09 19

Beirut - Moscow stepped up its war of words with Washington Sunday, saying airstrikes by a U.S.-led coalition on the Syrian army threatened the implementation of a U.S.-Russian cessation of hostilities plan for Syria and bordered on connivance with Daesh (ISIS). The diplomatic row heated up on the last day of a seven-day cessation of hostilities marred by a surge of violence as warplanes hit the strategic northern city of Aleppo for the first time since the truce came into effect. The Russian Defense Ministry said Saturday that U.S. jets had killed more than 60 Syrian soldiers in the eastern Syrian city of Deir al-Zor in four airstrikes by two F-16 and two A-10 fighter jets coming from the direction of Iraq. Syria's U.N. Ambassador Bashar Jaafari charged that U.S.-led strikes were aimed at torpedoing the cessation deal, but France's foreign minister, speaking in New York, placed the main blame for truce violations on the government of President Bashar Assad.

53. Warning! Your 'Pokemon Go' app may be spying on you

Khaleej Times, Staff Report, 2016 09 19

Dubai - A new app based on the Pokemon Go game available on the Google Play store can seize root access rights of Android smartphones and display unsolicited ads. The app, 'Guide for Pokemon Go', has the capability of uploading the details of the device and the user, such as country, language, device model and software version, to its command server discreetly. The app then silently installs and uninstalls other apps and displays unsolicited ads to the user. According to a report by Kaspersky Lab experts, the app has been downloaded more than 500,000 times, with at least 6,000 successful infections. Kaspersky Lab has reported the Trojan to Google and the app has been removed from Google Play. The trojan includes some interesting features that help it to bypass detection. For example, it doesn't start as soon as the victim launches the app. Instead, it waits for the user to install or uninstall another app, and then checks to see whether that app runs on a real device or on a virtual machine.

54. Washington Suggests 72-Hour Ceasefire in Yemen as Iran Continues Arming Rebels Asharq Al-Awsat, Arafat Madabesh and Saeed al-Abyad, 2016 09 19

Aden, Jeddah - Washington has made a proposal for a 72-hour ceasefire in Yemen with a possibility of extension, during a two-day visit by a U.S. high-ranking official to Muscat. Asharq Al-Awsat learned from Yemeni and U.S. diplomatic and political sources that U.S. Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Thomas Shannon paid a visit to Oman on September 8 and 9, and held talks with a delegation of rebels to discuss the points that Secretary of State John Kerry had initiated in Jeddah. A source at the U.S. Embassy in Yemen told Asharq Al-Awsat that the new points in the U.S. position was the proposal to hold a 72-hour ceasefire. A spokesperson at the U.S. Department of State told Asharq Al-Awsat: "The proposal is a tool that would provide all Yemeni parties the chance to reach a complete and permanent agreement."

A leaked, classified report by the Federal Data Protection Commission (FDPC) found that, for every BND targeted surveillance operation, the intelligence agency was sucking up and storing data of 15 citizens not part of any investigation. "These infringements of constitutional rights are conducted without any legal basis and thus harm the constitutional right of informational self-determination of [innocent] people," the FDPC report adds. Ankara - Turkish security forces arrested four people on the basis of intelligence information that stated that the terrorist organisation ISIS is planning to target the British and German embassies in Ankara. However, sources at the Turkish Ministry of Interior confirmed that it has not found conclusive evidence that the detainees have links to terrorist groups. The sources said that the information stated that ISIS is planning to carry out an act of terrorism targeting the German and British embassies during the period 13 -17 September/ This led the General Directorate of Security in Turkey to begin to monitor this issue in cooperation with the relevant agencies belonging to the two countries, and this resulted in the arrest of three people in Ankara and one in Istanbul ahead of Eid Al-Adha. The sources also said that the detainees continue to be investigated but that the results of the investigation did not provide conclusive evidence of their links to terrorist groups.

1. Canada needs to rethink hostage policy

The Hill Times, Gar Pardy, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - Last Saturday, Norwegian Kjartan Sekkingstad was freed by Abu Sayyaf after nearly a year of captivity in the southern Philippines. A ransom was paid but by who remains vague. Mr.

Sekkingstad was kidnapped on Sept. 21, 2015 along with Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall and Filipino Marites Flor. Ms. Flor was released earlier this year. As well, several Indonesians have been freed. Media reports differ on whether a ransom was paid. A Dutch citizen remains in captivity. He was kidnapped in 2012. Mr. Ridsdel was beheaded in April when the demanded ransom was not paid. Following a public announcement by the prime minister that no ransom would be paid, Mr. Hall was beheaded in June. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau in making his statement on the non-payment of ransoms to rescue kidnapped Canadians followed the lead of other leaders. Indeed, it was reported that before making his statement the PM consulted the then-British prime minister, David Cameron. Given Mr. Cameron's recent history and reflecting his political judgment, this was the equivalent of consulting Neville Chamberlain on Europe's future in 1938. However, the actions of governments behind the scenes are just the opposite: ransoms are paid, or facilitated, or paid by others, or negotiations are prolonged, all with an aim of obtaining the release of the kidnapped victims. Justice Frank Iacobucci in a Feb. 23, 2010 supplement of his October 2008 report on the actions of Canadian officials in relation to Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad Abou-Elmaati, and Muayyed Nureddin, wrote: "Several witnesses from both CSIS and the RCMP, told the inquiry that it was not the responsibility of intelligence or law enforcement officials to be concerned about the human rights of a Canadian detainee, which were for [the foreign ministry] alone to consider. This approach, is not, in my opinion, satisfactory." It should be noted that it took almost a year a half before Justice Iacobucci received permission to publish his view on this matter. There is nothing to suggest that either CSIS or the RCMP have changed their views on this matter.

2. Chinese agents enter Canada on tourist visas to coerce return of fugitive expats

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe and Robert Fife, 2016 09 21

Ottawa and Beijing - China's security services have been sending undercover agents into Canada on tourist visas to strong-arm expatriates to return home, including some suspected of corruption and other criminal activities. The secret Chinese visits have raised concern among lawyers and prompted investigations by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the RCMP, even as the Trudeau government begins negotiations for an extradition treaty with China. According to an insider briefed on China's secret-agent operation, the Chinese moved to tactics that include threats and intimidation because they were were "ticked off" at Canada for "not being willing to send people back the instant they asked" and for dragging its feet on an extradition treaty. "Nobody has been caught and nobody has been taken to court," the insider said. The revelation comes as Chinese Premier Li Keqiang arrives in Ottawa on Wednesday for talks with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. The two leaders are expected to discuss the extradition treaty between China and Canada. Formal talks on the extradition treaty were approved in Beijing on Sept. 12 between a top Communist Party official and Daniel Jean, national security adviser to Mr. Trudeau. A day later, a Chinese court ordered the deportation to Canada of jailed Canadian missionary Kevin Garratt. Toronto refugee and immigration lawyer Lorne Waldman told The Globe and Mail some of his Chinese clients in Canada have received cellphone messages from Chinese security officials threatening them and their families if they do not return home. One client suspected that people watching him "might be from the Chinese government," he said. Mr. Waldman said he has worked with at least six people sought by China as fugitives. In the past year, two of them and the family of a third have been approached by CSIS agents who "asked them whether or not they had suffered harassment at the hands of those Chinese officials in Canada ... in relation to their return to China, or made any threats directed toward them." The most recent such meeting took place this summer when "the officers told my clients that CSIS was investigating whether or not this type of harassment is occurring," he said.

3. A lesson in hard Chinese bargaining

Globe and Mail, Campbell Clark, 2016 09 21

Column: Quid pro quo? In one sense, it might not matter whether Justin Trudeau's government made a deal to start talks with Beijing on an extradition treaty in exchange for the release of a Canadian imprisoned on trumped-up spy charges. If it looks like a bargain was struck, it's likely to foster negative consequences, whether or not there was a real swap. And the whole case seems to offer Canada a hard lesson in hard Chinese bargaining. Kevin Garratt, a Canadian missionary who lived in China for decades before being scooped up two years ago and detained on spy allegations, was let go last week. It was just after the Prime Minister went to China, and just before the visit to Ottawa of Chinese Premier Li Keqiang, who arrives Wednesday. But other things were going on. The Prime Minister's national security adviser, Daniel Jean, was in Beijing for talks Sept. 12, and the two governments agreed to start discussions on an extradition treaty - something the Chinese have sought for years. The next day, a Chinese court convicted Mr. Garratt, gave him bail and ordered him to leave the country. The Canadian government insists there were no concessions exchanged. There are China experts, such as Brock University professor Charles Burton, who argue it smells like a quid pro quo - but there's no proof. But in this case, appearances matter. It's bad if foreign governments believe it is what it looks like - that Ottawa will make concessions to release a Canadian jailed on phony charges. It's bad if the Chinese think so, too. And it's possible they don't know for sure. Some former diplomats think it's unlikely senior Chinese officials would ever make the quid pro quo explicit.

4. Anti-immigration group denies part in racist posters

Edmonton - After racist posters targeting people in turbans were posted around the University of Alberta campus Monday, an anti-immigration group whose website address on the bottom of the signs has denied any involvement in the hateful campaign. "We wish to inform our supporters that we strongly condemn this flyer, and permission was not sought from our board for this to be circulated," read a statement posted on the Immigration Watch Canada website. "We strongly believe in dissecting the immigration issue with constructive arguments, supported by irrefutable facts. We do not support flyers taking on a strictly vulgar and emotionally-charged narrative." Posters that read "f--your turban" on top of the image of a man wearing a turban sparked outrage from students and administrators at the university. Campus security removed the offensive posters. Along the bottom, the poster read "if you are so obsessed with your third-world culture, go the f--back to where you came from," above the website address for Immigration Watch Canada. According to their website, Immigration Watch Canada is an "organization of Canadians who believe that immigration has to serve the interests of its own citizens," and advocates for dramatically reducing immigration into Canada. This latest condemnation comes after the World Sikh Organization of Canada Alberta chapter vicepresident Tejinder Singh Sidhu called the posters, "a pathetic attempt at drawing the spotlight to deplorable views that have been rejected in Canada." University president David Turpin has also said University of Alberta Protective Services is working to identify the person behind the posters.

5. A time to nurture co-operation

Globe and Mail, Li Keqiang, 2016 09 21

Op-ed: I am delighted to be coming today to Canada, the beautiful land of maples. Earlier this month, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau made a visit to China, during which the two sides reached extensive common understanding on the development of China-Canada relations. My visit to Canada at a short interval of three weeks is to inaugurate the new annual dialogue between our heads of government and further promote mutual understanding and mutually beneficial co-operation between our countries to secure fresh progress for the China-Canada strategic partnership. As an ancient poem goes, distance cannot divide true friends who feel close even when thousands of miles apart. Though separated by the vast Pacific Ocean, our two peoples enjoy a deep bond of amity and goodwill. As early as the latter half of the 19th century, tens of thousands of Chinese workers came to Canada to help build the Canadian Pacific Railway, which linked the country's east and west and contributed to Canada's economic and social development. In the 1930s, Norman Bethune, a Canadian doctor, devoted himself to the Chinese people's struggle against Japanese aggression and made the ultimate sacrifice. In the 1970s, defying all odds, the older generation of Chinese and Canadian leaders made the bold and visionary decision to open the door of relations between our countries, making Canada one of the first Western countries to establish diplomatic ties with New China. All these episodes remain fresh in the memory of many Chinese and Canadians. Note: Li Keqiang is Chinese Premier.

6. Bahrain using Canadian software to stifle dissent: report

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 09 21

Toronto - A new report from The Citizen Lab alleges that Canadian-made software is - once again - being used by a repressive Mideast state to keep its citizens from learning about news, religion and politics. The kingdom of Bahrain this summer starting using Web-filtering software from Netsweeper Inc. as a means of keeping a lid on dissent, the report said. It added that the Sunni-dominated monarchy is going so far as to use the software to deny Bahrain's majority Shia citizens access to basic information about their religion and religious leaders. The Citizen Lab, a group of civil-minded technological researchers at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs, last year released similar findings about Netsweeper software being used in Yemen, where religious strife has led to ongoing civil war. It has also previously documented the Ontario company's software being used in Pakistan and Somalia. Typically Netsweeper sells its products to large firms which purchase it to keep computer viruses out of corporate networks or curb employees' access to porn and gambling sites. Selling such software so that it can be used across an entire country can be controversial, however, especially if it ends up being tweaked to police morality and dissent. The Citizen Lab alleges this is what has happened in Bahrain, an island-nation monarchy strategically located between two much larger regional rivals, Iran and Saudi Arabia, which are now stoking sectarian tensions across the Middle East.

7. Canada's Trudeau sidesteps questions on extraditions to China

Reuters, David Ljunggren, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau sidestepped questions on Tuesday on the sensitive topic of possible extraditions to China, saying Canada would stick to high standards when deciding whether to return Chinese citizens. A statement posted on Trudeau's website said his national security adviser went to Beijing last week and agreed to start talks about an extradition treaty as part of a security dialogue. China, which wants the return of officials suspected of corruption who it says are hiding in Canada, has long pressed for such a treaty. Some Western countries are reluctant to sign extradition deals with China, partly out of concern about the integrity of its judicial system and treatment of prisoners. Some people convicted of corruption face the death penalty. Canada refuses to send people to countries without assurances they will not be executed. "Extradition is certainly one of the things the Chinese have indicated they want to talk about," Trudeau told a televised news conference at the United Nations. "As everyone knows, Canada has very high standards in terms of extradition treaties in accordance with our values. But we're happy to have a high-level security dialogue," he said. News of the Beijing meeting revived speculation Ottawa had made concessions to secure the return of Kevin Garratt, a Canadian citizen convicted of spying, whom China deported last week. Canadian officials insist there was no deal. Garratt's release was widely seen as a triumph for Trudeau, who visited Beijing earlier this month in a bid to seal closer economic ties. Chinese Premier Li Keqiang arrives in Canada on Wednesday for the start of a three-day trip.

8. Canada Agrees to Treaty Talks With China on Extradition

New York Times, Dan Levin, 2016 09 21

Unidentified placeline - Canada has agreed to negotiate a bilateral extradition treaty with China, breaking with a longstanding opposition over concerns about China's lack of due process and other human rights violations, according to a joint communiqué quietly posted on the website of the Canadian prime minister's office. The announcement, which has prompted criticism by human rights advocates, came a day before Beijing deported a Canadian missionary, Kevin Garratt, who had been detained in China on espionage charges for more than two years. The government of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau last week denied that it had made any concessions for Mr. Garratt's release, though the timing has led many to believe the deportation was part of a deal that will also grant the Chinese authorities an official role in identifying Chinese nationals who entered Canada illegally. China has long wanted bilateral extradition treaties with Western nations that it claims have become havens for corrupt officials who have fled. Beijing has increased diplomatic pressure in recent years amid a series of anti-corruption campaigns led by President Xi Jinping, which critics say are more about settling political scores and bolstering public loyalty for the governing Communist Party than ending endemic graft. The United States, Britain and New Zealand have refused to negotiate such treaties, and Australia has not ratified one that it signed with China in 2007, largely over concerns including the systemic use of torture to extract confessions, show trials and the imposition of the death penalty for noncapital crimes. The agreement was signed on Sept. 12 by Daniel Jean, the Canadian national security adviser, and Wang Yongqing, secretary general of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission of the Chinese Communist Party. It established short-term objectives that include allowing both countries to share the ill-gotten financial assets of suspected Chinese fugitives in Canada and completing negotiations on a one-year pilot project "where Chinese experts will be invited to assist in the verification of the identity of inadmissible persons from mainland China" to prepare for their repatriation.

9. Dual citizens' new passport requirements extended

Toronto - In the wake of a public outcry, Ottawa has extended the grace period of its new travel requirement for Canadian dual citizens. The federal government was to demand all air travellers who are citizens of Canada and another country be required to carry a Canadian passport as of Sept. 30. However, many travellers complained they were blindsided by the new measures and would not be able to acquire a Canadian passport in time for their immediate travels. On Tuesday, Immigration Minister John McCallum announced the implementation date would be postponed until Nov. 10. "In consultation with airline partners, we're taking further steps to minimize any travel disruption," he said. "We're extending the leniency period and doing another major information blitz . . . to encourage affected travellers to plan ahead and get the necessary travel documents." Currently, Canadians with dual citizenship can use the passport of the other country to enter Canada by air if they can provide proof of residency in Canada, such as a driver's licence or a Canadian citizenship card.

10. Federal Liberals spending millions on overtime for communications staff, documents reveal

Ottawa - The federal government is spending millions of dollars on overtime for communications staff as it looks to get out its messaging to Canadians, with the largest tabs in the departments of Environment, Finance, Global Affairs, Defence, and the Privy Council Office. Seven staffers produce videos for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's YouTube channel at a cost of tens of thousands of dollars, according to new documents tabled in the House of Commons. Between early November 2015 and early June 2016, the Liberal government spent nearly $2.3 million on overtime for communication staff, according to the information tabled in response to a question from Conservative MP Larry Miller. One of the largest was for Environment and Climate Change Canada - $235,538 - mainly because of the United Nations climate conference in Paris in December and the government's pan-Canadian climate strategy. "Communications staff have been key players in the government of Canada's efforts to engage Canadians, and stakeholders, such as youth and Indigenous people, in a discussion about how Canada should fight climate change, supporting the minister at high profile events such as the signing of the Paris climate change agreement, launch of an expert panel to conduct a review of environmental assessment processes, first ministers' meetings and a federal/provincial/territorial environment ministers' meeting," Environment Minister Catherine McKenna said in a written response.

11. Inside Beijing's anti-corruption efforts

Globe and Mail, Craig Offman, 2016 09 21

Operation Skynet involves country persuading friendly states to extradite alleged financial criminals as part of Xi's graft crackdown Using code names such as Fox Hunt and Skynet, China has been urging its trade partners to extradite officials it believes are guilty of economic crimes. The effort is critical to the legitimacy of President Xi Jinping, who has promised to rein in the country's pervasive graft issue, but critics also suspect it is part of his broader effort to purge enemies and consolidate power. As The Globe and Mail revealed Tuesday, Canada and China are formally in discussions to complete an extradition treaty that would make Canada a signatory, joining Australia, France and other democracies. Compliance will likely have benefits: bolstering trade and furthering diplomacy. "China likes to use trade to favour countries who are being nice to them, and when they are not nice, they are punished," said Shaun Rein, founder of China Market Research Group. In that respect, he said, Ottawa is being savvy by engaging in discussions with Beijing. But many international law experts and diplomats warn that Skynet is fraught with many tripwires, beginning with China's opaque - if not brutal - legal system in which the charges originate.

12. Justin Trudeau's Message to U.N.: 'We're Canada and We're Here to Help'

New York Times, Ian Austen, 2016 09 21

The United Nations - As Prime Minister Justin Trudeau of Canada made his first address to the United Nations General Assembly on Tuesday, he spoke before not only an enthusiastic audience, but one whose agenda largely mirrored his own. Two hallmarks of Mr. Trudeau's government since it took power 10 months ago have been admitting Syrian refugees and promising action on climate change. While he raised both of those issues in his speech on Tuesday, Mr. Trudeau also used the occasion to underscore another two of his favorite themes: optimism and internationalism. "We need to focus on what brings us together, not what divides us," Mr. Trudeau said. "For Canada that means re-engaging in global affairs." Later, after acknowledging Canada's relatively limited role on the world stage, Mr. Trudeau pledged to work with other countries on migrants, the environment and economic disparity. "We're Canadian and we're here to help," he said. Specific announcements were absent from Mr. Trudeau's speech, which was greeted with cheers and flashing cellphones. Instead, he used much of his time to challenge other politicians for, in his view, exploiting anxiety.

13. Justin Trudeau s'adresse aux Canadiens depuis New York

Le Devoir, Hélène Buzzetti, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - «Le Canada est de retour», avait lancé en octobre 2015 un Justin Trudeau nouvellement élu premier ministre à l'attention de la planète. Pourtant, à l'occasion de son premier passage dans l'enceinte suprême de la communauté internationale mardi, le premier ministre Trudeau s'est adressé d'abord aux Canadiens. De sa tribune onusienne, il a repris ses grands thèmes électoraux, insistant sur l'importance d'élargir la classe moyenne, d'investir dans les infrastructures et de chérir la diversité, tout en réitérant le désir du Canada de se « ré-engager » dans les affaires mondiales. «Il y a exactement un an aujourd'hui, le Canada était en plein milieu d'une longue campagne électorale âprement disputée. 78 jours sur la route. Et je peux vous assurer qu'au Canada, on a assez de routes pour rouler 78 jours!» a lancé d'entrée de jeu M. Trudeau alors qu'il s'adressait à la 71e Assemblée générale de l'ONU, à New York. M. Trudeau a rappelé que, pendant cette campagne, il avait rencontré des jeunes, des aînés, des parents et des travailleurs qui éprouvaient de la difficulté à réaliser leurs rêves, à joindre les deux bouts. Il en a tiré la conclusion que «des Canadiens croient encore au progrès. Ou du moins, que le progrès est possible. Mais cet optimisme est mêlé de beaucoup d'inquiétude. » Le premier ministre a soutenu que le rôle d'un leader était de calmer ces inquiétudes, et non de les exploiter. « Pour apaiser les inquiétudes des gens, nous devons créer une croissance économique qui est largement partagée, parce qu'un monde qui est juste est un monde en paix. » Il a répété son intention d'investir dans les infrastructures pour bâtir une économie « qui fonctionne pour tout le monde, pas seulement le 1% des plus riches». Même le dossier des réfugiés a été enrobé du discours sur la classe moyenne si chère à M. Trudeau. «Voyez-vous, les réfugiés sont des gens qui ont les mêmes espoirs et les mêmes rêves que nos citoyens. [...] Et savez-vous où vit la classe moyenne de Syrie? Elle vit dans des camps de réfugiés en Turquie, au Liban et en Jordanie. Elle se déplace à travers l'Europe à la recherche d'un endroit où s'enraciner, retourner ses enfants à l'école, trouver du travail et devenir des citoyens productifs. »

14. Liberals consider sending peacekeepers to monitor peace in Colombia

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - The Liberal government is considering whether to send unarmed observers to help monitor Colombia's historic peace agreement. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan's office confirmed Tuesday that Colombia is one of the options being considered as the government decides where to deploy upwards of 600 Canadian peacekeepers. Most of the other possible missions are in Africa. Sources say Canadian officials have been in contact with the UN looking for more information about the observer mission in Colombia, including potential security hazards. The Colombian government and Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, the guerrilla group widely known as FARC, agreed to a peace agreement last month, ending 50 years of fighting. Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, who will commit $25 million to UN- led conflict mediation, negotiation and reconstruction efforts on Wednesday, is scheduled to attend a ceremony on Sept. 26 in which the two sides will sign the deal. Colombians will then vote on the agreement in a plebiscite on Oct. 2. If all goes as expected, the United Nations will begin deploying 450 unarmed observers to around 40 locations around Colombia soon after to begin monitoring implementation of the agreement. The one-year monitoring mission would involve ensuring both sides adhere to the peace deal as FARC forces turn over their weapons and begin the process of reintegration into Colombian society.

15. Pannes des systèmes informatiques Phénix s'éteint pendant quatre heures

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - Plusieurs systèmes informatiques du gouvernement fédéral, incluant le système de paye Phénix, ont connu une panne généralisée entre 6 h 30 et 10 h 45, mardi. Le versement de la paye des employés fédéraux a pu être effectué «avec succès» malgré tout, selon les autorités fédérales. Pour l'instant, il est difficile d'identifier la cause exacte de cette panne, qui a touché plusieurs systèmes du gouvernement fédéral en même temps, incluant le controversé système de paye Phénix. «Sachez que nous avons confirmé que la paye a été effectuée avec succès pour tous les employés de l'ARC (NDLR: Agence de revenu du Canada) et, par conséquent, nous ne prévoyons pas d'incidence sur la paye de demain (mercredi)», a-t-on indiqué dans cet avis aux employés fédéraux. Il a été impossible de connaître la liste de l'ensemble des systèmes qui ont pu être touchés par cette panne généralisée. Mais les autorités ont écarté la possibilité de piratage. Des travaux d'entretien des systèmes réalisés pendant la fin de semaine dernière pourraient être en cause. À la Chambre des communes, la ministre des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement, Judy Foote, a dû répondre encore une fois aux critiques de l'opposition au sujet de Phénix, mais elle n'a pas donné de détails précis sur la panne.

16. Phoenix shutdown won't affect payday

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - The four-hour shutdown of the troubled Phoenix pay system won't have an impact on whether Canada's public servants get paid on Wednesday. Public Services officials said the shutdown won't interfere with the expected payments of those public servants who are 'scheduled' to be paid. Officials at Public Services and Procurement Canada have been given regular updates on Phoenix repairs on paydays and another one is planned for Wednesday. On the last payday, two weeks ago, 293,915 people were paid. Phoenix, however, didn't pay 59 people who were previously paid and another 335 new cases of people who were not paid after they left the public service or went or returned from leave. Tuesday's outage, however, threw the spotlight on the Public Services and Procurement Canada's two most troublesome technology projects - Phoenix and Shared Services Canada. Shared Services Canada was doing maintenance on the weekend to back up data, which resulted in a storage space problem that shut down the applications for both the pay and pension systems.

17. Prepare for threat of quantum computing to encrypted data, Canadian conference told It World Canada, Howard Solomon, 2016 09 21

Toronto-- The race to create new cryptographic standards before super-fast quantum computers are built that can rip apart data protected by existing encryption methods isn't going fast enough, two senior Canadian officials have warned a security conference. "I think we are already behind," Scott Jones, deputy chief of IT security at the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), responsible for securing federal information systems, told the fourth annual international workshop on quantum-safe cryptography in Toronto on Monday. Quantum computing - or more accurately, computers that use quantum mechanics - is not a dream, Jones and others told the conference of business executives, crypto academics, IT companies and government officials. One prediction is there's a one in seven chance that by 2026 a quantum computer will exist that can break RSA-2048 encryption. It may take longer -- or, if there's an advance, shorter. "Quantum represents a fundamental change and challenge to encryption for all of us," Jones said, noting that encrypted transactions are the backbone of security and trust on the Internet. His comments were backed by David Sabourin, CSE's manager of cryptographic security, who said that if the 2026 prediction is right "we're in trouble." Speaking on a panel of government experts, Sabourin noted the U.S.-based National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) will close its call for proposed new and more quantum-secure public key encryption algorithms next year.

18. Trudeau welcomes Chinese Premier Li Keqiang warmly but cautiously CBC News, Sasa Petricic, 2016 09 21

Analysis: When the official plane touches down in Ottawa today, it will mark the first visit of a Chinese leader to Canada since 2010. A lot has changed in the relationship between the two countries since then. Premier Li Keqiang arrives with more economic clout, his country a real dragon. Depending on how you measure it, China now has the biggest or the second biggest economy in the world. China's GDP has almost doubled in the past six years, despite a recent slowdown. Canada's approach to China has also evolved. In 2006, a newly elected Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada would not sell out human rights for the "almighty dollar," and he boycotted the opening ceremonies of the 2008 Beijing Olympics over that issue. His views changed later, but the relationship was never a warm one. PM cautious about trade talks In contrast, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has already declared that Beijing-Ottawa relations -- especially economic links -- must be "updated and re-energized." On both sides of the Pacific, his recent official visit to China has been described as the revival of a lapsed friendship. While there, both leaders -- Trudeau and Li -- said it might even make sense to discuss a free-trade agreement. They will certainly talk trade this week. "So seize the day and seize the moment," says Victor Zhikai Gao, a former official in China's foreign ministry.

19. Who should shoulder the blame for Phoenix fiasco?

CBC News Ottawa, Staff reporter, 2016 09 21

Ottawa - While thousands of public servants await proper payment for their government jobs, IBM has already made more than $140 million and counting on the Phoenix payroll system it was hired to design and implement. High-level government managers blame a lack of training for the glitch-riddled system, but some observers wonder how much responsibility IBM should shoulder. "One of my favourite quotes is good IT is expensive and bad IT is even more expensive," said Alex Beraskow, a management consultant with 30 years experience, both implementing and reviewing huge, multi-million dollar IT projects for the Canadian government. The company was tasked with creating a new PeopleSoft-based payroll system for the government's more than 100 departments and agencies. To date, more than 80,000 government workers have experienced months of pay problems: from underpayment to overpayment, to no payment at all. IBM says issues are with implementation. For its part, IBM Canada has stated: "The vast majority of the issues in this implementation are process and data issues, not technical system issues." Beraskow said in cases like these, the truth is usually complicated.

20. 2 Ex-Spies and Donald Trump

New York Times, Thomas L. Friedman, 2016 09 21

Column - When it comes to assessing the presidential race, I prefer to listen to the spies. They tend to be brutally unsentimental, see through the nonsense and cut to the cold, hard bottom line. And right now, two of the world's foremost former spymasters are sending uncoded messages about what it will mean for America and the Western alliance if Donald Trump is elected president. Ladies and gentlemen, I introduce former C.I.A. Director Robert Gates and his longtime nemesis and former K.G.B. agent, President Vladimir Putin of Russia. Putin is voting Trump. Gates is not. In an essay in The Wall Street Journal, Gates, who also was defense secretary for George W. Bush and Barack Obama, criticized both Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump for failing to take the threat posed by Putin's Russia seriously. But Trump, Gates added, has gone places with Putin no would-be American president should: "Mr. Trump's expressions of admiration for the man and his authoritarian regime are naïve and irresponsible." Yes, Clinton has her own credibility issues on national security, Gates explained, but "Donald Trump is in a league of his own. admire Gates for speaking out. Not enough attention has been paid to the national security implications of a Trump presidency. I'm certain you'd see U.S. military officers and government officials quitting if Trump ordered them to torture captured terrorists, go house to house to evict illegal immigrants, start trade wars with China and Mexico or ban Muslims. Trump the chaos primary candidate became the chaos presidential nominee, and you can bet he'd be a chaos president. Being unpredictable as a leader is fine, if you know where you're going and it is a tool to get you there by keeping foes off balance. But being unpredictable because you have no discipline; because you think issues like ISIS are just a manhood test; because you have not studied the issues so anything can come out of your mouth; and because you don't realize that when we tell countries like Japan or South Korea or our NATO allies that we might not protect them from Russia or China, they will go get their own nukes and make the world even less stable -- well, that kind of unpredictability is how alliances get broken, messes get made and wars get started. That's why Putin is licking his chops.

21. Ahmad Khan Rahami's YouTube Account Listed Jihad Videos, Complaint Says

New York Times, Christopher Mele, 2016 09 21

New York - The man who the police say planted bombs in New York and New Jersey had a YouTube account that listed his favorite videos, two of which related to jihad, according to a criminal complaint filed in Federal District Court in New York on Tuesday. The man, Ahmad Khan Rahami, had the account under the user name yaafghankid786, the complaint filed by Peter F. Licata, a special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint Terrorism Task Force, said. One of the videos is labeled "jihad nasheed ya shahid," a reference to a martyr's anthem, the complaint said. Another video, "best jihad nasheed," is nearly three minutes long and includes subtitles as images of battles on a desert appear. The subtitles read in part: "Our sanctuaries would not have been desecrated had the lions surrounded them. The filthiest of bandits have attacked us. So where are the swords? They have forgotten we are defiant ones who defend like lions. We are those who built our forts out of skulls."

22. A New Terror-Alert System

The New Yorker, Benjamin Wallace-Wells, 2016 09 20

Comment - Just before 8 A.M. on Monday morning, New Yorkers got a message on their mobile phones: "WANTED: Ahmad Khan Rahami, 28-yr-old male. See media for pic. Call 9-1-1 if seen." The news came through the same emergency-alert system, with its disorienting buzz, that government agencies use to send news of a flood, and so it suggested some uncanny Pynchonian transference, in which terrorism had become as mundane and as universally affecting as the atmosphere. By eleven-thirty, the alert had made a "significant contribution," as Mayor Bill de Blasio put it at a lunchtime news conference, to the capture of Rahami, who was found sleeping in the doorway of a bar in his home town of Linden, New Jersey. The alert, de Blasio said, had an "extraordinary effect." His new police commissioner, James O'Neill, called it the "future." That text, more compressed than a tweet, did not contain much information. The wording "See media for pic" was an acknowledgement that the news was already universal, and its effect was likely to nudge commuters over to Google. That Rahami's name is Islamic likely provoked some dark imaginings about what he might be connected to, beyond First American Fried Chicken, his parents' restaurant in Elizabeth, and what his actions might represent. But the alert also suggested a new role for its recipients, as temporary auxiliary police. "Remain vigilant," de Blasio said at the news conference, even after Rahami had been captured, and then in almost the same breath the Mayor said that he'd got a call from President Obama, who had praised New Yorkers for remaining calm amid the crisis. Perhaps there is no contradiction in these sentiments, and universal vigilance is now a feature not just of an emergency but also of more ordinary days when everyone is going about their business.

23. Attack Suspect Carried Writings Endorsing Jihad

New York Times, Marc Santora, Adam Goldman, 2016 09 21

New York - The man who the authorities say set off powerful bombs in Manhattan and on the Jersey Shore over the weekend planned the attacks for months, conducted a dry run just days before unleashing his assault and took inspiration from "Brother Osama bin Laden" and other international terrorists, according to a criminal complaint filed in federal court on Tuesday. The man, Ahmad Khan Rahami, 28, was charged with several crimes, including use of weapons of mass destruction and bombing a place of public use, and the criminal complaint against him outlines how close the attacks came to causing death and even more destruction. The bomb in Manhattan's Chelsea neighborhood on Saturday night was powerful enough to vault a heavy steel Dumpster more than 120 feet through the air, according to the complaint. Windows shattered 400 feet from where the explosion went off, and pieces of the bomb were recovered 650 feet away. Among the 31 victims -- two more than first reported -- one had to have multiple ball bearings removed from her body as well as bits of metal from an ear and wood shards from her neck, the complaint says. The charges came on a day when it was revealed that Mr. Rahami's father told the authorities two years ago that he feared his son was a terrorist, prompting a review by the Federal Bureau of Investigation that did not find any basis for a fuller inquiry. The complaint says Mr. Rahami was motivated by an extremist Islamic ideology that he recorded in a notebook he had with him when he was shot and wounded by the police in Linden, N.J., on Monday morning before being then taken into custody.

24. Cellphone Bombs: The New American Terror

The Daily Beast, David Axe, 2016 09 20

Washington - Ahmad Khan Rahami the 28-year-old suspect in the twin bombings in New York City and New Jersey that injured dozens of people this weekend, apparently used cellphones to detonate his homemade bombs. That should worry authorities. It's not hard to convert a cellphone into a remote trigger for an improvised explosive device. But it is hard--and illegal in most cases--to jam cell signals without inflicting extensive collateral damage that could be even worse than the harm a small IED might cause. "Jamming technology generally does not discriminate between desirable and undesirable communications" is how the Federal Communications Commission put it in a fact sheet (PDF). "Use of cell phone jammers poses an unacceptable risk to public safety."

25. Minnesota Knife Attacker Had Only Infrequent, Minor Brushes With the Police

New York Times, Mitch Smith, Matt Furber, 2016 09 21

St. Cloud - Nearly eight years before Dahir Adan was shot dead by an off-duty police officer and accused of stabbing 10 people at a mall, the police stormed into his family's apartment here to break up a fight between two of his brothers. "We could hear a lot of screaming and yelling and all in a Somali language," a St. Cloud officer wrote in his 2008 report on the episode. The encounter ended with an officer tackling one brother and threatening to use a Taser, the report says, and another brother claiming he had been whipped with a belt and nearly stabbed with a fork by his sibling. When the mayhem subsided, the police asked Mr. Adan, who was just 12 at the time and apparently not involved in the fight, to help interpret for his father. But the officer wrote, "It was not a good translation, nor do I think he understood very well." That long-ago episode provides a lens on Mr. Adan's infrequent and benign encounters with law enforcement until Saturday's rampage. Chief William Blair Anderson of the St. Cloud police said that no evidence had been found linking Mr. Adan, who was 20, to terrorist groups, even after multiple searches.

26. No Single Profile for 'Lone Wolf' Attacker

New York - Amid the anxiety prompted by last weekend's terror attacks, security experts are vexed by a recurring question: How can latent mass murderers with no formal connection to faraway terror groups be caught before they act? Hints may surface as investigators splice together the biographies of Ahmad Khan Rahami, who sowed homemade bombs in New York City and New Jersey, and Dahir Adan, who went on a stabbing spree in a Minnesota shopping mall before he was shot dead by an off-duty police officer. But experts are concluding that for attacks committed by such sole assailants, known as "lone wolves," there is no all-encompassing explanation. "Fundamentally, the quest for a single answer for the reason for terror is pretty doomed -- it's like trying to answer the question of why there is crime," said J.M. Berger, a fellow with George Washington University's Program on Extremism.

27. Preparing for North Korea's Inevitable Collapse

Column - Let's be honest. The world would be a better place if a revolutionary tribunal in the near future sent North Korea's Kim Jong-un and his henchmen to the gallows. Kim's subjects are so malnourished that North Koreans are notably shorter than their South Korean cousins. The state's gulags are so large, you can see them from space. Survivors of those camps have testified that fellow prisoners withered away from starvation. North Korea's nukes are the Kim family's insurance policy. Since the Clinton administration, the U.S. and the international community have been willing to extend the life of the regime in exchange for (ultimately broken) promises about its reactors and enrichment facilities. And while the U.S. has also placed sanctions on North Korea at times, in the end the goal of U.S. policy has been regime preservation. Secretary of State John Kerry summed up this approach earlier this month. "We have made overture after overture to the dictator of North Korea," he said, after the regime's fifth nuclear test. "We have made it very clear to him that we're prepared to talk about peace, about peace on the peninsula, about food assistance, about normal relationship with the world, about a nonaggression pact -- I mean a host of different ingredients -- if he will simply acknowledge he is prepared to come to the table and talk about denuclearization and his responsibilities to the world -- not to us, to the whole world." The problem with this approach is that it's a sucker's bet. If Kim "will simply acknowledge" he's ready to talk, the international community will lavish him with material support and unearned recognition. A far better use of American diplomacy is to quietly push China and South Korea to begin planning with the U.S. for the day the North Korean regime falls. It's a long shot. General Thomas acknowledged last week that there are no channels between the U.S. and China on special operations. And the U.S. has good reasons to mistrust China, an aggressive cyber adversary that is unilaterally claiming territory through militarized artificial islands. What's more, China and North Korea share an ideological attachment as two of the five remaining communist states on the planet. That said, North Korea is a time bomb for China as well as for the U.S.

28. Snowden should not be pardoned: Top U.S. intelligence official

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 09 21

Washington - The nation's top intelligence official said Tuesday that he could never agree with a decision to pardon Edward Snowden. Snowden was an National Security Agency contract employee when he took more than a million documents and leaked them to journalists who revealed massive domestic surveillance programs begun in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. The programs collected the telephone metadata records of millions of Americans and examined emails from overseas. "I could understand what he did, if ... what he exposed was limited to domestic surveillance. ... But he exposed so much else that had absolutely nothing to do with domestic surveillance, where he has damaged our capability against foreign threats. He has taken away capabilities that were used to protect our troops in Afghanistan," Director of National Intelligence James Clapper said. "I don't think I could concur in offering him a pardon."

29. Snowden--Ultimate Insider Threat Missed by NSA Security

Washington Free Beacon, Bill Gertz, 2016 09 20

Column - Security officials today use the politically correct term "insider threat" to describe what were once called traitors, and no one was more aggressive in pursuing them than counterintelligence types at the National Security Agency. Thus many intelligence officials saw more than a tinge of irony in NSA contractor Edward Snowden making off with 1.5 million highly classified NSA intelligence documents in May 2013 and handing them over to several anti-American journalists who seemed more interested in inflicting as much damage as possible on America's premier electronic spying and code-breaking agency than exposing alleged wrongdoing. Until Snowden, the NSA had a reputation as one of the intelligence organizations most dedicated to protecting secrets. But the case exposed gaping holes at the agency, and a House intelligence report says gaps persist years after Snowden fled the country and holed up in Moscow.

30. State Department adds al Qaeda front group in Syria to terror designation list

Long War Journal, Thomas Joscelyn, 2016 09 21

Washington - The State Department announced today that Jund al Aqsa, an al Qaeda front group in Syria, has been added to the US government's list of specially designated global terrorist organizations. State notes that Jund al Aqsa "primarily operates in Idlib and Hama provinces" and was responsible for the February 2014 "massacre in the village of Maan in central Hama province, killing 40 civilians." Jund al Aqsa was established in 2012 as a "subunit" of Al Nusra Front, al Qaeda's official branch in Syria, but "split" from Nusra and "now carries out operations independently." Despite operating on its own, Jund al Aqsa "is still openly aligned with" Nusra. Indeed, the jihadist organization routinely participates in battles alongside Nusra. Two Jund al Aqsa suicide bombers helped pave the way for a Nusra-led offensive in Idlib province in March 2015. In addition, a contingent of Jund al Aqsa leaders reportedly joined Nusra in February.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 21

Washington - Russian President Vladimir Putin is likely to run for re-election in 2018 and may impose tougher authoritarian rule to curb unrest over the slumping economy, the CIA's top Russia analyst said on Tuesday. The rare public comments by Peter Clement, head of the CIA unit that watches Russia, shed light on how some senior U.S. intelligence officials view Putin and where he is taking his country as he prepares an expected run for a fourth presidential term in 2018. Most intelligence analysts think Putin will run again, as he indicated three years ago, said Clement. "But he's got to be thinking now, 'What happens between now and 2018?'" Clement spoke at a George Washington University conference a day after the pro-Putin United Russia party won a lower house majority in parliamentary polls seen as a likely springboard for a Putin re-election bid. The veteran Kremlin watcher said he had seen some "indicators" of where the former Soviet intelligence officer is likely taking Russia. These included a recent news report of a possible "major restructuring" of Russia's intelligence services in which the civilian domestic and foreign intelligence agencies would merge into a single organization dominated by the domestic agency, the Federal Security Service, he said. "What I see there is the potential tightening up of society," said Clement, adding that he thinks Putin "genuinely, genuinely fears instability and disorder."

London Times, Francis Elliott, 2016 09 21

London - In her first meeting with President Rouhani of Iran, Theresa May has demanded information on the fate of a British mother detained in his country. Mrs May raised the case of Nazanin Zaghari-Ratcliffe, who has dual nationality and was arrested at Tehran airport in April while trying to return from a family holiday with her two-year-old daughter. The charity worker is reported to have been jailed for five years on a spying charge after a secret trial, but British officials say that has not been confirmed. Richard Ratcliffe, her British husband, has been lobbying for her release at the UN general assembly in New York. Ms Zaghari-Ratcliffe is one of at least six westerners with dual nationality to be detained since a deal on Iran's nuclear programme was signed in January. She is the first, however, to be sentenced. The couple's daughter, Gabriella, had her British passport confiscated and is being looked after in Iran by her grandparents. Mr Ratcliffe has been advised not to travel to Iran for fear that he could also be arrested. Ms Zaghari-Ratcliffe has told her husband that her only respite in prison is sleep, when she can dream of her daughter.

35. Generation jihad threat looms

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 09 21

Sydney - The potential return of dozens of Australian children from Islamic State-controlled Syria and Iraq has prompted state and federal authorities to workshop how they will reintegrate a generation of battle-scarred children back into community life. With Western governments increasingly confident they have Islamic State in retreat, Australian authorities have begun war-gaming how to handle a potential influx of hardened jihadists driven out of Syria and northern Iraq. About 110 Australians are thought to be fighting in Syria and Iraq. While the threat that returning foreign fighters pose to communities has long been known, a new challenge emerging is how to deal with children who have been exposed to the violence of the Syrian war, perhaps for years on end. Security authorities believe that since the war began in 2011, dozens of Australian children have become embroiled in the conflict through the actions of their Australian parents. Some, like the children of Sydney terrorist Khaled Sharrouf, were taken into the war zone by their parents; others were born there, either to Australian women who travelled to the Middle East as jihadist brides or to Australian men who have impregnated local women, some by raping them. Sexual violence against women is commonplace in Islamic State-controlled territory. In December 2014, another Sydney terrorist, Mohamed Elomar, attempted to "sell" captured women from Iraq's Yazidi community via Twitter. "Anyone interested got 1 of 7 yehzidi slave girls for sale," Elomar wrote. "$2500 each ... don't worry brothers she won't dissappoint (sic) you." According to witnesses who escaped from Elomar's Raqqa home, which he shared with his friend Sharrouf, Elomar was suspected of raping or threatening to rape enslaved Yazidi women. Elomar was killed last year in a drone attack in Raqqa. He had fathered a child to Sharrouf's eldest daughter.

Ils étaient tous employés à la réfection de la piste d'atterrissage de l'aéroport de la petite ville située à la frontière algérienne. À Rome où on a l'habitude de traiter ce genre d'affaires, y compris les précédents enlèvements d'Italiens en Libye, on a tout de suite adopté une attitude de prudence. « Nous travaillons avec le maximum de réserve, compte tenu de la délicatesse de la situation », a-t-on indiqué à la Farnesina, le ministère des Affaires étrangères. Le maire de Ghat, Qumani Saleh craint seulement que les négociations pour la libération de ces otages ne soient rendues compliquées par la situation politique en Libye.

39. Three abducted, three freed in Libya (Canada)

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 09 21

Benghazi - Libyan authorities said Tuesday that they were searching for two Italians and a Canadian abducted at gunpoint near the Algerian border, while another official said three North Koreans kidnapped more than a year ago have been freed from Islamic State militants. Libya slid into chaos after the 2011 uprising that toppled and killed longtime dictator Moammar Gaddafi. Much of the country is ruled by a patchwork of militias, and Islamist militants also have gained a foothold. The Italians and the Canadian were abducted at gunpoint Monday on the highway between Ghat and Ubari, in the southwest desert, according to the Ghat municipal council. Global Affairs Canada spokesman Michael O'Shaughnessy said, "We are aware of the troubling yet unconfirmed report of the abduction of a Canadian citizen in Libya. We are diligently pursuing all appropriate channels." Hassan Osman Eissa of the Ghat municipal council said the abductors are known to local authorities and have carried out carjackings and robberies in the past. He said local security forces are searching for them and raiding suspected hideouts. He said the abductors left the foreigners' Libyan driver behind after handcuffing him.

40. FARC's last hurrah? Guerrilla group parties --and plots political future

Miami Herald, Jim Wyss, 2016 09 21

Llanos de Yari, Colombia - In the middle of what was once a sweeping and empty savannah, Colombia's FARC guerrillas have erected a virtual city matching their political ambitions. With massive tents, batteries of bathrooms, bunk beds, jungle camps and generators, the site is meant to house almost 1,000 troops, journalists and hangers-on. The complex, thrown up over the last month, is the headquarters of the 10th Conference of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia and the site where the 52-year-old guerrilla group is expected to vote on Friday to approve a historic peace deal. But it's also a symbol of the group's muscle -- moving both machinery and the masses -- as it prepares to lay down its arms and enter politics. The site has a communications antenna (though it rarely worked), a full catering service -- selling tequila and vodka -- and even its own gas station. During the opening of the meeting over the weekend, the FARC's maximum commander, Timoleón Jiménez, addressed his troops from a stage worthy of any halftime show and said the bloodshed was ending but the struggle for the fate of the country would continue. "Contrary to what our critics say, the [FARC] is far from being an exclusively military organization ruled by the whims of ambitious commanders," he said, as massive screens broadcast his image. "If something has characterized us since our birth it is, precisely, our rigorously political nature founded on the broadest of democracies."

41. Venezuela accuses US of spying on Non-Aligned summit

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 09 21

Caracas - Venezuela accused the United States on Tuesday of spying on a Non-Aligned Movement summit it recently hosted, saying Venezuelan fighter jets had intercepted a US surveillance plane and forced it to turn back. President Nicolas Maduro's latest beef with Washington comes after Venezuela hosted leaders from the 120-member group on the Caribbean island of Margarita last weekend, a meeting that featured numerous jabs at US foreign policy. "We know a military aircraft carried out flight patterns 130 nautical miles from Margarita island, collecting information, carrying out intelligence operations on the summit," said Defense Minister Vladimir Padrino Lopez. Foreign Minister Delcy Rodriguez said Venezuela would present a formal protest.

42. Canada looks to expand trade ties with China prior to Li's visit

China Daily, Paul Welitzkin, 2016 09 21

New York - Before beginning his trip to China in August, Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau said he wanted to develop deeper economic ties with Canada's second-largest trading partner and the world's second-largest economy. When he returned, Trudeau brought with him 56 deals worth more than C$1.2 billion (US$910.1 million) that were announced or signed. And when Trudeau meets with Chinese Premier Li Keqiang on his official visit to Canada, the two countries are expected to seek a closer relationship in several areas, especially trade. Trudeau's father Pierre Trudeau was prime minister when Canada formally established relations with Beijing in 1970. Now China is Canada's second-largest single-country trading partner after the US. Observers in Canada see expanding trade in areas ranging from food and high-tech to Canadian corporate "know-how" in various fields and upscale products that will appeal to China's growing middle class. Iris Jin, senior program manager at the Asia Pacific Foundation (APF) in Canada, said Canada needs to build its "brand" in China. "Canada is strong in many fields, including good quality food and high technology. But we need to promote that brand in China," she wrote. Canadian exports to China are mainly resource based, agricultural products, oil, wood and food, said Jin. "While trying to increase our exports of these products, Canada should also be expanding exports in manufacturing and services where we have strong expertise and competitiveness," she said.

43. China's corruption crackdown ruffles international feathers (Canada)

Globe and Mail, Affan Chowdhry, 2016 09 21

As part of China's anti-corruption drive, its authorities have actively pursued alleged white-collar criminals far beyond its borders - and the response has not always been welcome. Last summer, the Obama administration sent a stern warning to the Chinese government to stop covert activity on American soil. Chinese secret agents are reportedly entering the United States on tourist and trade visas and then proceeding to pressure expatriates to return to China and face charges, according to The New York Times. Without extradition agreements with the United States, Canada and New Zealand - top destinations for fleeing Chinese economic fugitives - a zealous Chinese government keen to show its public that it is cracking down on corruption is taking an aggressive approach. Diplomatic dust-ups have also taken place between China and Australia over the presence of Chinese secret agents. A 2007 extradition treaty has yet to be ratified by Australia. The anti-graft mission is a cornerstone of President Xi Jinping's rule. In 2013, he vowed to hunt down what he called "tigers" and "flies" - a vow to go after the country's most powerful leadership and its most minor bureaucrats. Operation Fox Hunt, launched in 2014, saw the return of 700 suspected economic fugitives, and Operation Skynet, the renamed global operation in 2015, netted 857, according to China's public-security ministry. The names, photos and charges against the 100 most-wanted were published in Chinese newspapers last year.

44. China hints at harsher line on N Korean nukes (Canada)

China Daily, Catherine Wong and Laura Zhou, 2016 09 21

New York and Beijing - Premier Li Keqiang has told US President Barack Obama that Beijing supports closer cooperation in the UN Security Council and in enforcement efforts to halt North Korea's nuclear programme. This could be a signal Beijing will support tougher sanctions on North Korea after its fifth nuclear test, with China increasingly irked by Pyongyang's behaviour and its consequences - a decision by Seoul to deploy a US anti-missile system. North Korea announced its biggest nuclear test earlier this month, and claimed that it had mastered the ability to mount a warhead on a ballistic missile. Yesterday, North Korean leader Kim Jong-un supervised a ground test of a new rocket engine for launching satellites, the North's official KCNA news agency reported. During the meeting between Li and Obama on the sidelines of the annual UN General Assembly session in New York yesterday, "both leaders condemned North Korea's September 9 nuclear test and resolved to strengthen coordination in achieving the denuclearisation of the Korean peninsula", a White House statement said. Li also reiterated during his talk with Obama his government's opposition to the deployment of a US-developed missile shield in South Korea, and called on all parties to refrain from any activities that might escalate tensions in the region. Li is expected to give a speech in the US today to present China's stance on global governance and peace and development, before leaving for Canada and Cuba as part of a three-nation trip.

45. Chinese Firm Suspected of Aiding North Korea

New York Times, Jane Perlez, Chris Buckley, 2016 09 21

Beijing - The police in northeastern China have announced a criminal investigation into a Chinese conglomerate that does extensive trade with North Korea, which researchers in South Korea and the United States say included materials that can be used in the production of nuclear weapons. The Public Security Department of Liaoning Province said on a government website last week that the Hongxiang conglomerate, based in Dandong, a major trading center with North Korea, was suspected of "serious economic crimes." "During their work, the Liaoning public security authorities discovered that for a long time the Dandong Hongxiang Industrial Development Company Ltd. and a relevant responsible individual engaged in suspected grave economic crimes during trading activities," the department said. The police did not specify whether the company's prominent chairwoman, Ma Xiaohong, was under investigation, nor did it say whether the company was the object of scrutiny for its North Korean business, which makes up the bulk of its trade. The action was compelled by two recent visits to Beijing by officials from the Justice Department to warn the Chinese of the illegal activities of the Dandong company, according to an American law enforcement official who asked not to be identified before a pending announcement of charges against the company by the United States.

46. India successfully test fires long range surface-to-air missile

Press Trust of India, 2016 09 21

Balasore - In a bid to galvanize its air defence capabilities, India on Tuesday successfully test fired a new, long range surface-to-air missile jointly developed with Israel from a defence base off Odisha coast. The long range missile, a product of a joint venture between India and Israel, was test launched from a mobile launcher at the Integrated Test Range (ITR) in Chandipur near here at around 10.13 hours, a DRDO official said. The trial was successful and some more rounds of test are expected to be conducted shortly, the DRDO scientist said. "Apart from the missile, the system includes a Multi Functional Surveillance and Threat Alert Radar (MF STAR) for detection, tracking and guidance of the missile," the official said, adding the missile along with MF-STAR would provide the users the capability to neutralize any aerial threats.

47. N. Korea threatens nuclear strike against THAAD in S. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 21

Seoul - Apparently playing into fears held by some South Koreans, North Korea's state media said Wednesday that a new U.S. air missile defense system to be deployed in South Korea will become a primary target of the North's nuclear strikes. In a signed commentary, the North's Korean Central News Agency (KCNA) claimed the plan to deploy the United States' Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) system in South Korea was only part of U.S. efforts to dominate the world. "If THAAD is deployed in South Korea, it will be exposed to nuclear strikes here and there as the primary target," it said. The decision to introduce the new U.S. missile defense system here came in the wake of a nuclear test by the communist North in January, followed by a series of military provocations that included ballistic missile launches. Pyongyang again conducted a nuclear test, the fifth of its kind, earlier this month. The North Korean threat of nuclear strikes came amid a series of protest rallies by residents in Seongju, the likely site of the new missile defense system located some 300 kilometers southeast of Seoul, who have insisted the deployment of the new radar-based defense system will only make their town a target of North Korean attacks.

48. North Korea Says It Has Tested a New Long-Range Rocket Engine

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 09 21

Seoul - North Korea said Tuesday that it had conducted the ground test of a new long-range rocket engine used to put a satellite into orbit, an effort long considered by Washington and the United Nations Security Council to be a cover for developing an intercontinental ballistic missile. The announcement followed the North's nuclear test on Sept. 9. The United States and its allies are calling for the Security Council to adopt a new resolution to enforce tougher sanctions to punish the North for the latest nuclear test, its fifth since 2006. In the past, such sanctions have usually prompted the North to respond with provocations, like another nuclear test or a rocket launch to place a satellite into orbit. North Korea last launched a carrier rocket in February, a month after its fourth nuclear test, to place its Kwangmyongsong, or Shining Star, satellite into orbit. (The country also launched a rudimentary satellite in 2012.) Analysts have said the North may launch another satellite in time for the Oct. 10 anniversary of the ruling Workers' Party, using that as a signal to the outside world that it was pushing ahead with its long-range missile program despite sanctions. At home, such a launch is used to boost Kim Jong-un's leadership.

49. Recovery of fugitives' illegal assets is focus of new initiative (Canada)

China Daily, Zhang Yan, 2016 09 21

In a new focus in the hunt for corrupt officials who have fled overseas, police will not only bring fugitives back to China to face justice, but will also emphasize recovering their ill-gotten assets, the Ministry of Public Security said. While the previous priority was collecting evidence in overseas manhunts, the recovery of assets acquired illegally in China will be a new anti-corruption initiative in the coming months, said a senior official at the ministry who requested anonymity. As part of the new initiative, public security authorities will work closely with People's Bank of China, particularly the division that cracks down on money laundering, the official said. In addition, authorities will enhance communication and conduct joint investigations with other countries on a case-by-case basis in an attempt to repatriate more corrupt officials so they can stand trial. They also will share intelligence with their counterparts in those countries to locate, freeze and recover the ill-gotten assets, he said last week. In recent years, the United States, Canada, Australia and Singapore have become popular destinations for corrupt Chinese officials, due to a lack of bilateral extradition treaties and differences in laws, the ministry has said.

Un brillant physicien britannique d'origine italienne disparaît brusquement pendant ses vacances... pour réapparaître, cinq ans plus tard, en URSS. A-t-il été enlevé? Était-il un espion? Était-ce par conviction communiste? Son confrère physicien Frank Close mène l'enquête sur ce mystère qui hante le domaine depuis plus d'un demi-siècle. Il faut dire que le "disparu", Bruno Pontecorvo, mort en 1993 à l'âge de 80 ans, est une sommité. Il a marqué de son empreinte la physique nucléaire et la physique des particules. Avant-guerre, avec l'équipe d'Enrico Fermi en Italie, il montre l'intérêt des neutrons lents pour réaliser des réactions de fission et décrit la marche à suivre pour y parvenir. Exilé en France, puis aux États-Unis, il devient expert en détecteurs de toutes sortes pour identifier les processus radioactifs. Puis il se passionne pour les neutrinos et, derrière le rideau de fer, notamment, il échafaude des théories qui se révéleront justes au sujet de ces étranges particules, sans charge électrique et quasi sans masse. Drôle d'ambiance dans les labos De l'avis de plusieurs spécialistes, il aurait mérité un prix Nobel, qui lui a sans doute échappé à cause de son isolement soviétique durant la guerre froide. Son parcours d'Italie en France, puis aux États-Unis et au Canada, et enfin au Royaume-Uni et en URSS, suit de près les progrès du développement de la bombe atomique.

53. Dozens dead as bombs rain down on Aleppo

Now Lebanon, Albin Szakola, 2016 09 21

Beirut - Dozens of civilians have been killed in Aleppo amid an intense barrage of aerial strikes unleashed shortly after Syria's military said the US-Russia brokered cessation-of-hostilities had come to an end. Warplanes on Monday night struck targets in and around Syria's beleaguered second city, which is split between regime and rebel forces, with activists blaming both Russia and the Bashar al-Assad government for the deadly raids. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights reported that at least 38 people were killed in the strikes, but cautioned that the death toll was expected to mount as dozens were wounded and a number of people were still buried under rubble. The monitoring NGO tracking developments in the war-torn country did not specify whether Russian or Syrian jets conducted the strikes, saying only that "warplanes" had hit at least six different targets around Aleppo, including a Syrian Arab Red Crescent (SARC) aid convoy parked at one of the organizations warehouses.

The court, chaired by Brig. Gen. Khalil Ibrahim, found Ahmad Dakhakhni guilty of "belonging to an armed group and for possessing and manufacturing explosive material with the aim of carrying out terrorist acts." The ruling was handed down at midnight Monday. Dakhakhni was convicted. The sheikh was indicted and charged alongside eight others in 2014. The group allegedly intended to carry out terrorist acts on Lebanese soil. He was arrested in 2013 after his sons, Abdul-Latif and Mohammad, accidentally detonated a homemade bomb in Daraya, a small mountain town in the region of Iqlim al-Kharroub in the Chouf. 56. La conversion d'un hooligan israélien à la coexistence avec les Arabes

Le Figaro, Cyrille Louis, 2016 09 21

Jérusalem - Ancien neri d'extrême droite, David Mizrahi est devenu un symbole de la tolérance dans un pays hanté par des décennies de défiance entre Juifs et Arabes. La métamorphose du supporter ultra du Beitar Jérusalem a commencé dans une usine d'emballage de dattes, où il s'est engagé en faveur des droits des employés palestiniens. Une douceur inattendue flotte dans le regard de David Mizrahi. L'ancien neri d'extrême droite qui, il y a deux ans encore, entonnait des chants haineux dans les tribunes du Beitar Jérusalem, n'a plus vraiment le profil de l'emploi. Pantalon turquoise, chemise rayée et mocassins de cuir, il raconte sa « nouvelle vie » d'une voix fébrile et chargée d'émotion. Après une décennie passée dans les rangs d'un club de supporters réputé pour son racisme antiarabe et son ultraviolence, « Dudi » en a brusquement claqué la porte à l'automne 2014. « J'ai eu une révélation », sourit-il, comme pour s'excuser de ce récit aux accents de conte de fées. Le jeune homme, décidé à racheter ses erreurs, consacre désormais l'essentiel de son temps à prêcher la tolérance et à défendre la coexistence entre Juifs et Arabes. « Je me suis débarrassé de mes préjugés », a-t-il annoncé fin août sur son compte Facebook, déchaînant soudain la curiosité des médias. Un parcours emblématique Car Dudi Mizrahi, s'il n'a que 27 ans, n'est pas tout à fait un inconnu. Le public israélien a découvert son visage mat et sa calvitie naissante un jour de décembre 2013, lorsque la deuxième chaîne de télévision a diffusé un reportage sidérant sur sa rencontre avec un joueur arabe du club de Bnei Sakhnine.

None of its confidence-building measures have been achieved, and the much-publicised "national ceasefire", which went into effect on September 12, has also been shattered with 300 alleged violations over the past eight days. Throughout Syria, violence has surged in the past 48 hours as warring factions return to the trenches -- glad to see the end of an agreement reached on their behalf by the two powers, although none of them were officially consulted. On Monday night, the Syrian Army issued an official statement announcing the end of the truce orchestrated by the US and Russia, in direct response to a coalition air strike on the city of Deir Al Zor along the Euphrates River on Saturday, which led to the killing of at least 60 government troops.

61. " La piste de prisons réservées aux radicalisés est sans issue "

Le Monde, Jean-Baptiste Jacquin, 2016 09 21

Paris - L'un des chantiers sur lequel vous comptez avancer d'ici aux élections concerne le renseignement pénitentiaire. Qu'aurez-vous le temps de faire? Un directeur des services pénitentiaires a été nommé le 12 septembre pour préfigurer ce qui va être le Bureau du renseignement pénitentiaire. Sa mission est de bâtir la doctrine d'ici à la fin de l'année. Il doit construire l'unité centrale et va s'appuyer sur les ressources de la communauté du renseignement. La qualité des éléments produits par le renseignement pénitentiaire est déjà en hausse depuis la rentrée. Les rails sont posés. 186 personnes sont budgétairement affectées au renseignement, mais c'est la capacité d'analyse qu'il faut renforcer. Face à la menace du terrorisme islamiste, faut-il regrouper ou isoler les détenus radicalisés? Quand, il y a deux ans, le directeur de Fresnes a prosaïquement procédé à un regroupement et créé ce qui allait devenir les " unités dédiées ", c'était d'abord dans un souci d'ordre public parce qu'il craignait que la présence de détenus radicalisés faisant du prosélytisme dans des coursives provoque des troubles. Ensuite, un deuxième objectif est apparu, celui de la prévention de la radicalisation. Porter une appréciation sur la pertinence de ces expérimentations nécessite donc d'évaluer les deux aspects, et il est encore trop tôt pour porter un jugement définitif sur les moyens engagés pour enclencher une " déradicalisation ".

63. Encrypted messaging apps need backdoors, says top Dutch spook

ars Technica (UK), Jennifer Baker, 2016 09 21

London - Backdoor access to encrypted communications has been demanded by Netherlands' spy chief Rob Bertholee--a view that differs from the government's official position. In an interview with local daily De Volkskrant at the weekend, Bertholee--head of the General Intelligence and Security Service of the Netherlands (AIVD)--said that terrorists are using encrypted chat applications such as Telegram, WhatsApp, and Signal, and argued that those services made it extremely difficult for authorities to prevent terrorist attacks. At the beginning of the year, the Dutch government adopted a strong stance against "any restriction in the development, availability, or use of cryptography" in an official paper. It said that weakening encryption products with backdoors for law enforcement would leave systems vulnerable to criminals, terrorists, and foreign intelligence services. However, Bertholee said he wants to have access to "the communications of those who pose a threat." "Will people who value privacy over anything else continue to pursue their goal with the same enthusiasm after they have fallen victim to a terrorist attack? You should ask yourself how much security you are prepared to sacrifice for privacy," he said.

65. The aftermath of Turkey's failed coup threatens its ties with Western allies

Washington Post, Michael Birnbaum, Karen DeYoung, 2016 09 21

Istanbul - More than two months after a rump military group and its backers tried to overthrow the elected government of Turkey -- bombing the parliament, sending tanks into the streets, and only narrowly failing in an attempt to kidnap the president -- the Turkish government last week sent Washington its first evidence that an elderly cleric living in rural Pennsylvania was the mastermind of the coup attempt. If the information persuades the Justice Department, a federal court will then decide whether to accede to Turkey's demand that Fethullah Gulen, a Turkish imam who has resided under self-imposed exile in the United States for nearly two decades, be sent home to face charges. Should Justice or the court be unconvinced, or the process take too long, U.S. relations with the West's most important Muslim-majority ally are likely to be hit new lows. Already, a surge of Turkish anger about reactions of its NATO allies in Europe and the United States to the failed insurrection has challenged alliance trust and ties. Even as Turkish authorities express incredulity that President Obama has not taken action against Gulen, they have faced widespread Western condemnation for a vast purge of suspected coup plotters in the government and beyond. "Turkey has not seen the support it expected from its Western friends and allies," Omer Celik, Turkey's European Union affairs minister, said in an interview. "They were not standing by us." Last month, in what was widely seen as an attempt to broaden Turkey's options, President Recep Tayyip Erdogan jetted to Moscow and patched up a lengthy estrangement with Russia.

66. US should 'not harbor a terrorist like' Gülen, Erdogan says

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 09 20

New York - The United States should "not harbor a terrorist" like the U.S.-based Islamic preacher Fethullah Gülen, who is believed to have orchestrated the failed coup attempt of July 15, Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan told Reuters in an interview on Sept. 19, adding that his activities should be banned around the world. "If the U.S. is our strategic ally and our NATO partner ... then they should not let a terrorist like Gülen run his organization," Erdogan said in an interview on the sidelines of an annual gathering of world leaders at the United Nations, adding that Washington had "no excuse" for keeping Gülen. Erdogan also commented on the three-month state of emergency declared in Turkey after the failed seizure of power, saying it could be extended if necessary. "It can be extended for three months or one month or even more ... Gülen's people have infiltrated everywhere ... we will continue to identify and arrest the plotters ... extending the state of emergency will help this process," he said.

1. Leadership race is a march to irrelevance

Globe and Mail, Yves Boivert, 2016 09 23

Comment: The Parti Québécois is very busy these days, choosing a new captain next month and reshuffling the chairs on the deck. Meanwhile, yet another study points to a fatal demographic iceberg. Generation Y - more culturally diverse, more international, less worried about language issues - could hardly care less about the party's independence project. Such is the conclusion of the study done by political scientists Valérie-Anne Mahéo of Université de Montréal and Éric Bélanger of McGill University. The findings of their study (titled Is the Parti Québécois bound to disappear?) are in line with sociological analysis of the past 10 years. The party of René Lévesque is steadily declining as the baby boom generation wanes. In the seven general elections from 1994 to 2014, the PQ's support fell from 44 per cent to 25 per cent. Projecting current demographic and political trends, the two researchers put an expiry date on the party: 2034. They may be wrong. It could come much more quickly, judging by the current leadership race, arguably the most disastrous the party has ever known. The sudden departure of Pierre Karl Péladeau caught the PQ by surprise. For the first time in eight leadership races, no obvious candidate was in sight. From the start, the young, Cambridge-educated lawyer Alexandre Cloutier was the favourite. After having been one of the inspirers of the so-called charter of Quebec values who supported it publicly, Mr. Lisée then disavowed it and came up with a new "moderate" and subtle version. Mr. Cloutier said it was too radical. Then, in a particularly cheap shot last week, Mr. Lisée said the controversial Muslim preacher Adil Charkaoui "supported" Mr. Cloutier. (Mr. Charkaoui was once targeted by CSIS as an alQaeda sympathizer in Canada.) Mr. Cloutier was not amused, and had to receive extra police protection, under the advice of the Sûreté du Québec. Mr. Lisée then "retracted" his declaration, but refused to apologize.

2. Maryam Monsef, Canada's first Afghan cabinet minister, says she was born in Iran

Canadian Press, Bruce Cheadle, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - A longtime refugee advocate says stories such as that of Liberal MP Maryam Monsef are not uncommon as families fleeing war and violence reconstruct their past in a new land. Monsef, widely touted as Canada's first Afghan-born cabinet minister, caused a stir in the capital Thursday when she issued a statement saying she only recently learned from her mother that she was in fact born in Iran. The 31-year-old minister of democratic institutions says she and her two sisters never held Iranian citizenship and were always considered Afghan citizens, but she was not born in Herat, Afghanistan, "as I was led to believe for my whole life." "It's fair to say I have experienced a range of emotions over the past few days as I have tried to understand this with my family," said the statement. Monsef said she's learned she was actually born 200 kilometres from the Afghan border in Mashhad, Iran, in 1984. The revelation -- initially disclosed Thursday by the Globe and Mail newspaper -- prompted NDP immigration critic Jenny Kwan to question what she called the "troubling" Liberal cabinet vetting process. But Janet Dench, the executive director of the Canadian Council for Refugees, told The Canadian Press that after years of refugee work, "I really don't understand the significance." "To me it's like, 'Oh, she was born in a different month than she thought she was.' Why is this so exciting for us all?" And the Privy Council Office, the bureaucracy supporting cabinet, said potential ministers face "a rigorous vetting process" using information from the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the Canada Revenue Agency and a bankruptcy and solvency check. "The same process is in place for all members of cabinet in this government and has been in place for a number of years," said PCO spokesman Raymond Rivet. As Liberal minister MaryAnn Mihychuk described the process Thursday, "for me they went through even my sock drawer, so it was pretty comprehensive from my point of view." U.S. President Barack Obama, in an address to Parliament earlier this year, made a point of noting Monsef's Afghan heritage as a sign of Canada's inclusiveness.

3. Ottawa a autorisé l'utilisation de dispositifs d'espionnage des communications

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles (site web) avec CBC, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - Le ministère de la Sécurité publique du Canada a maintes fois autorisé l'utilisation par le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) et la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) de dispositifs pour espionner les communications des Canadiens, révèlent des documents obtenus par CBC. Ceux-ci sont lourdement caviardés et ne permettent pas d'identifier les fabricants ou les dispositifs en question. On y apprend ainsi que le ministère a approuvé des demandes de la GRC, du SCRS et du ministère de la Défense nationale pour qu'ils accordent plus d'une douzaine de licences à une société anonyme afin de posséder, fabriquer ou vendre des dispositifs « utilisés principalement pour l'interception des communications ». Les licences, d'une durée d'un et deux ans, ont été émises à partir de 2015 et, dans certains cas, s'étendent jusqu'en 2018. Elles ont été accordées en vertu de l'article 191 du Code criminel, qui interdit l'utilisation de technologie pour l'interception clandestine de communications privées, à moins que l'autorisation soit donnée par le ministère de la Sécurité publique. La GRC a refusé de divulguer la nature de ces licences. Le SCRS n'a pas voulu commenter la nouvelle.

4. 'These people are psychopaths': accused paper terrorist

Global News, Reid Fiest, 2016 09 23

Edmonton - Allen Boisjoli is responding to news that he is Canada's first accused "paper terrorist." He denies he's a Freeman on the Land and addressed the precedent-setting charge of intimidation laid by the Edmonton Police Service Wednesday in an email to Global News. "These people are psychopaths and they have no consequences for abusing their vested authority," Boisjoli wrote. "They've been trying to label me as a Freeman so that they can detract from the very real issues I bring up." It all stems from a May 2015 traffic stop near Edmonton for speeding. Boisjoli, from Vegreville, Alta. recorded the exchange with the Peace Officer and posted it online. "Do you have a reason for speeding today?" the officer asked Boisjoli in the video. He replied that he didn't know speeding was a crime. "Well it's against the law," the officer said. "I beg to differ," Boisjoli replied. The Edmonton Police Service says the Vegreville man fought the ticket and later tried to file a $225,000 lien against the officer. That danger is why Ron Usher of The Society of Notaries Public of B.C. has sent warnings to members not to notarize documents written by Freeman. "It's a concern. We've coached our notaries in British Columbia very carefully on this. Call 911." But Freeman say they do not preach violence. Rob Menard is the founder of the World Freeman Society and says they're only fighting for their rights.

5. Accord de libre-échange Canada-Chine Les leaders entament les discussions

La Presse canadienne, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - Le premier ministre Justin Trudeau a annoncé jeudi que le Canada et la Chine avaient entamé des discussions préliminaires en vue d'un éventuel accord de libre-échange entre les deux pays. M. Trudeau a également déclaré que le Canada et la Chine en étaient venus à une entente visant à régler le conflit sur les exportations canadiennes de canola. «Nous avons décidé de commencer les discussions exploratoires en vue d'un possible accord de libre-échange entre le Canada et la Chine», a annoncé M. Trudeau à sa sortie d'une rencontre d'une heure et demie avec le premier ministre chinois, Li Keqiang, à Ottawa. Debout aux côtés du premier ministre Li, M. Trudeau a affirmé que le plein potentiel de la relation commerciale entre les deux pays était encore «inexploité», et qu'un éventuel accord de libre-échange se traduirait par la création d'emplois au Canada. Le mois dernier, lors de la visite du premier ministre canadien en Chine, son homologue Li avait annoncé que les deux pays procédaient à une «étude de faisabilité» sur un éventuel accord de libre-échange. L'ambassadeur du Canada avait aussitôt soutenu que cette annonce était prématurée à cause d'enjeux majeurs touchant les conditions de travail, l'environnement et les sociétés d'État chinoises.

6. As countries strengthen economic ties, bilateral deal could be next step

Financial Post, Damon Van Der Linde, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - With the resolution of key trade disputes, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and China's Premier Li Keqiang signalled deepening economic ties between the two countries, opening the door to the possibility of a free-trade agreement. At a joint news conference in Ottawa on Thursday, the two leaders said they aim to double trade by 2025 and had resolved longstanding issues of access for Canadian beef and canola to China, while several companies signed commercial deals. They also announced talks aimed at an eventual free trade agreement. Both leaders also addressed the rockier issues with the relationship, including China's human rights record - it is one of a few countries that has the death penalty - and domestic opposition to a proposed extradition treaty. "I look forward to continuing the discussions on challenging issues, but also on all the opportunities that we know there are to create benefits for citizens of both our countries," Trudeau said. HSBC Canada chief economist David Watt said China has been looking to create closer ties with the West as it undergoes a massive reform process. There had been some reluctance, however, from Canada due to the challenges of adapting to the rapidly changing Chinese market. "I don't want to say this is a thaw. I would just say we're going to explore the one missing element of our relationship with China, which is potential free trade," said Watt. "It's not necessarily going to be easy. We also have some degree of uncertainty in Canada over what sort of a relationship we want to have with China." China is Canada's third largest trade partner, behind the U.S. and the EU. Economic activity between the two countries grew at a year-over-year increase of more than 10 per cent in 2015, reaching $85.8 billion in two-way merchandise trade.

7. Beijing-Ottawa pact helps asset recovery

Global Times, Xu Hong, 2016 09 23

Op-ed: During Chinese Premier Li Keqiang's visit to Canada, foreign ministers of both sides signed an Agreement between China and Canada on Sharing and Return of Forfeited Assets on Thursday. This is China's first special agreement on asset recovery, marking a major progress in China's international judicial cooperation. The new agreement has supplemented and specified the Treaty between China and Canada on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters in relation to locating and transferring criminal proceeds. The agreement stipulates that assets should be returned to legitimate owners if confirmed. If the source of the criminal proceeds cannot be identified, the country seizing and holding the assets shall share the assets with the other country. The proportion of the assets to be shared will vary based on the extent of the cooperation given by the other country. The new agreement can serve as a practical guidebook for legal enforcements of both countries to recover, return and share criminal proceeds. It will reinforce China and Canada's concerted actions to fight cross-border assets recovery, and mark a milestone for the Sino-Canadian cooperation in law enforcement. Note: The author is Director-General of the Department of Treaty and Law in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China.

8. Canada: La ministre présentée comme une réfugiée afghane découvre qu'elle est née en Iran (Canada)

20 Minutes (Site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - Elle était présentée comme la première ministre d'origine afghane au Canada. Mais ce n'est pas tout à fait vrai. Maryam Monsef, ministre des Institutions démocratiques du gouvernement Trudeau, a avoué jeudi qu'elle était en réalité née en Iran. A l'origine de ces révélations, un article du quotidien Globe and Mail, qui dévoile le véritable lieu de naissance de la ministre. Ses parents réfugiés en Iran Celle-ci a expliqué alors que sa mère était à l'origine du malentendu pour ne lui avoir jamais dit, ni à ses deux soeurs, qu'elles étaient nées en Iran quand ses parents s'y étaient réfugiés. Maryam Monsef, 31 ans, raconte avoir interrogé sa mère après qu'un journaliste du Globe and Mail l'a contactée dans le cadre d'une enquête sur les conditions de son arrivée au Canada, en 1996. Sa mère « ne croyait pas que c'était significatif » « Mes soeurs et moi avons demandé à notre mère pourquoi elle ne nous avait jamais dit que nous étions nées en Iran », a-t-elle précisé. « Elle nous a répondu qu'elle ne croyait pas que c'était significatif. Nous étions citoyennes afghanes, et puisque nées de parents afghans, en vertu de la loi iranienne, nous ne serions pas considérées comme citoyennes iraniennes, malgré le fait que nous y soyons nées. » Maryam Monsef a expliqué qu'on lui avait laissé entendre durant toute sa vie qu'elle était née à Hérat, en Afghanistan, mais qu'elle était, en fait, née à Mashad, en Iran, à 200 km de la frontière afghane.

9. Canada Must Correct Its Wrongs And Apologize To Three Torture Victims

The Huffington Post Canada, Monia Mazigh, 2016 09 23

Comment: While Prime Minister Justin Trudeau was at the United Nations delivering a speech to the UN delegates on how "[t]here is an appetite for Canada's approach and Canada's solutions, promoting diversity as a strength. ... Canada has a narrative the world needs -- we're happy to share," it seems that he has forgotten that at home there is another narrative that won't be easily erased from the history records: Canada's role in torture. Indeed the case of the three Canadian citizens: Abdullah Almalki, Ahmad El Maati and Muayyed Nureddin, resurfaced this week in the media bringing back again the dark side of Canadian complicity with regimes that routinely use torture and forced disappearance in their so-called "war on terror." It was already public information that these men were tortured in Syria and in Egypt. Former Supreme Court of Canada, justice Frank Iacobucci, concluded in 2012 that the three men were tortured abroad and that Canadian officials contributed indirectly to their torture. But what the CBC News revelations brought into light are new facts that are definitely even more disturbing. Instead of asking for the release of the Canadian men, Canada's ambassador to Damascus, Franco Pillarella, used his extensive connection with Syrian intelligence to provide questions about Almalki to his Syrian tormentors. Pillarella, who was never held accountable for his actions, lived in a world of denial: "He said he was aware of widespread allegations of torture in Syria, but unless a person witnessed it 'one cannot say for a certainty that this is what would happen.'" At that time, we considered this initiative to be promising, a first step in the right direction. Unfortunately, almost ten months later, this news remains dormant and nothing has been done by this government to distance itself from torture. Last but not least, we shouldn't forget the other troubling case of Omar Khadr, who turned 30 years old on Monday.

10. Cozying up to China's dictators

National Post, 2016 09 23

Editorial: Well before he became prime minister, Justin Trudeau raised eyebrows when he revealed "a level of admiration" for China's "basic dictatorship." As Liberal leader in 2013, he told an audience his admiration stemmed from Beijing's ability to "turn their economy around on a dime and say, ' we need to go green fastest ... we need to start investing in solar.' " He suggested that then prime minister Stephen Harper "must dream about of having a dictatorship that he can do everything he wanted." Whether Harper did entertain such grandiose notions we don't know, but we can now wonder whether Trudeau's view was the flippant offhand comment it appeared to be, or something deeper and more troubling. The arrival of Chinese Premier Li Keqiang in Ottawa Wednesday brought home those concerns. Li is paying a return visit, after Trudeau spent several days meeting top officials in Beijing this month. Trudeau has portrayed the warming of relations with the communist government as an opportunity to strengthen ties and increase cooperation, as well as to promote "opportunities ... to create benefits for citizens of both of our countries." He did not outline what benefits Canada has to gain, but it is clear that China sees many ways to profit from a friendlier relationship than it has previously enjoyed. It already runs an immense trade balance, sending Canada $ 46 billion more in goods and merchandise than it buys in return. It would like still greater access, and has been pushing for a ree- trade agreement. It has already received assurances of Ottawa's willingness to negotiate an extradition treaty, enabling it to demand the return of Chinese citizens who have fled to Canada, despite evidence that Beijing would use that access to hunt down and threaten perceived enemies of the regime.

11. Deux drones observés, de la drogue et des armes trouvées

La Presse+, Daniel Renaud, 2016 09 23

Montréal - C'était le jour des drones jeudi dernier au Centre de détention Rivière-des-Prairies à Montréal. Alors que deux de ces engins volants auraient été observés au-dessus des cours de la prison, les gardiens ont découvert dans un secteur abritant des membres de gangs de rue une quantité relativement importante de stupéfiants et d'inquiétants outils vraisemblablement arrivés par drone, a appris La Presse. Drogue, cellulaires et lames de scie... Après avoir reçu une information ou eu des doutes, les agents correctionnels ont effectué une fouille en soirée dans les 16 cellules d'un secteur où sont détenus majoritairement des individus d'allégeance bleue. Selon des sources, ils ont trouvé plus de 50 grammes de haschisch, une substance s'apparentant à de l'héroïne, six téléphones cellulaires, des lames de scie et un petit appareil électrique multifonctionnel. Quelques heures plus tôt, deux drones auraient été aperçus au-dessus de deux cours de l'établissement, dont un autre secteur où les prévenus sont classés « général ». On ignore toutefois si des objets ont été saisis à la suite de l'observation de ces drones. Grillages réclamés Le président du Syndicat des agents en services correctionnels du Québec, Mathieu Lavoie, n'a pas voulu confirmer les informations recueillies par La Presse. Mais il implore le gouvernement d'agir pour mettre fin aux livraisons, de plus en plus nombreuses, par drones dans les 18 prisons du Québec. « On se rend compte que les projets-pilotes ou les mesures mis en place après les évasions de Québec et de Saint-Jérôme n'ont pas fait cesser ces intrusions », lance M. Lavoie.

12. Engineering giant in pact to develop new Candu reactors in China

Globe and Mail, Bertrand Marotte, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - SNC-Lavalin Group Inc. is closing in on its goal of becoming a major player in China's thriving nuclear-energy industry with an agreement for the development in that country of the next generation of Candu reactors. The Montreal-based global engineering giant said on Thursday it has an agreement in principle for a joint venture with state-owned atomic-power and weapons company China National Nuclear Corp. and manufacturing conglomerate Shanghai Electric Group Co. Ltd. to design, market and build the Advanced Fuel Candu Reactor (AFCR). SNC signed an initial memorandum of understanding with CNNC to pursue power generation, mining and nuclear-related environmental projects around the world more than two years ago. The joint venture to be created - the new company is expected to be registered in China by mid-2017 - is the first between a foreign company and the Chinese nuclear giant involving the development of new technology. The announcement comes amid an official four-day visit to Canada by Chinese Premier Li Keqiang and efforts by the Liberal government of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to strengthen Canada's ties with China.

13. Entrevue avec Mohamed Fahmy Pour un gouvernement qui « se bat pour protéger ses ressortissants »

La Presse+, Laura-Julie Perreault, 2016 09 23

Montréal - Il y a un an, après 438 jours derrière les barreaux en Égypte, le journaliste canadien Mohamed Fahmy était libéré. De passage à Montréal hier pour prononcer un discours à l'Université Concordia, son alma mater, M. Fahmy a répondu aux questions de La Presse. Q Quand vous êtes sorti de prison, vous avez dit que l'ancien premier ministre canadien Stephen Harper vous avait « trahi » et « laissé tomber » et vous avez dénoncé le manque de soutien aux Canadiens qui sont détenus à l'étranger. Pensez-vous que la situation s'est améliorée depuis ? R Oui, c'est le jour et la nuit. Alors que j'étais en prison, Stephen Harper, plutôt que d'user de toute son influence pour intervenir auprès du président égyptien, a délégué ses responsabilités à ses subalternes. Les diplomates canadiens ont fait du super travail, mais ils me disaient qu'ils étaient menottés par Ottawa. On ne peut pas comparer cela à ce que le gouvernement Trudeau fait aujourd'hui. Les faits sont éloquents. Les libéraux ont récemment réussi à faire libérer le Canadien Kevin Garratt en Chine et à ramener au pays Khaled al-Qazzaz, l'ancien bras droit de l'ex-président Mohamed Morsi, avec qui j'ai été emprisonné en Égypte. Ce sont deux grands succès. C'est plus important que jamais d'avoir des gouvernements qui se battent pour protéger leurs ressortissants. À travers le monde, pas juste en Égypte, les pays créent des lois antiterroristes très vagues qui font que tous les Canadiens à l'étranger - et pas seulement les journalistes et les travailleurs humanitaires sur la ligne de front - peuvent être mis en prison et être accusés de terrorisme ou d'espionnage. C'est sans précédent. On le voit avec Homa Hoodfar [la professeure de Concordia détenue en Iran]. Et il n'y a pas de communiqué de presse ou de rhétorique vide qui puisse vous aider à ce moment-là. Vous avez besoin d'une intervention robuste de votre gouvernement et de votre famille. Q Dans le même ordre d'idées, vous défendez un projet de charte qui renforcerait la protection des ressortissants canadiens à l'étranger. Avez-vous une oreille attentive à Ottawa ?

14. Extradition deal on Li's Ottawa agenda

South China Morning Post, Kristin Huang, 2016 09 23

Beijing - Premier Li Keqiang has arrived in Canada for a trip in which he is due to meet its leader Justin Trudeau and expected to press for an extradition treaty between the two countries. More than a quarter of China's 100 most wanted criminals are believed to live in Canada and - Beijing has been keen to expedite their handover. But Ottawa has been reluctant due to human rights concerns. Trudeau sidestepped questions on the issue ahead of Li's arrival on Wednesday, saying Canada would stick to high standards when deciding whether to return Chinese citizens. Beijing and Ottawa agreed to start discussion on a extradition treaty on September 12, one day before the release of Kevin Garratt, a Canadian charged with spying in China and held for two years. Garratt was freed on bail and returned to Vancouver last week after Trudeau raised his case during his official visit to China earlier this month. The release was reportedly a bargaining chip to pressure Ottawa into concessions before negotiations. Christine Duhaime, a Canadian lawyer and certified financial crime specialist, expected progress on the talks, despite concerns over differences in the two judicial systems, particularly over China's use of the death penalty. "This is being initiated by China from what I understand, and both countries appear motivated to have an extradition treaty in place, in particular to address the removal from Canada of what China calls the economic fugitives ... who are in Vancouver," Duhaime said. Charging a person with money laundering would be the fastest way to extradite them, as most countries were required to accelerate such cases, she said.

15. Feds warn of potentially crippling 'insider' cyberthreat to key sectors

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - Federal officials have quietly warned operators of electrical grids, transportation hubs and other key infrastructure of the cyberthreat from insiders who could unleash devastating viruses and cripple systems, internal government notes reveal. Crucial networks that Canadians rely on for everyday needs face a "substantial threat" from rogue employees out to wreak digital havoc, warn the Public Safety Canada briefing notes. "The insider threat is difficult to detect and can cause real damage." No special hacking skills are required, just a portable memory key loaded with a malicious code. As a result, it is important that organizations have the right security protocols and procedures, "for example by limiting access to systems only to those who genuinely need it." The notes, prepared earlier this year for Monik Beauregard, a senior assistant deputy minister at Public Safety Canada, were obtained by The Canadian Press under the Access to Information Act. Beauregard is chairing a panel today on the global implications of the challenges to cybersecurity at an intelligence conference in Ottawa. In addition, Greta Bossenmaier, the head of Canada's electronic spy agency, the Communications Security Establishment, plans to discuss the various cyberchallenges the country faces.

16. Go slow on extradition

Editorial: Human rights experts and others are right to be alarmed that Canada has agreed to start talks towards an extradition treaty with China. Such an agreement runs the risk of making Canada complicit in the worst aspects of China's inconsistent, politicized and often brutal judicial system. At the moment, all the Trudeau government has agreed to is to begin negotiations about extradition. There's no known timetable for the talks, no guarantee they will be successful, and most of all no clear idea exactly what such an agreement might look like. With that in mind, it's encouraging that Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has issued a public assurance that Canada won't lose sight of its legal values - such as opposition to coerced confessions and overly harsh punishment, especially the death penalty. "Canada has extremely high standards on extradition treaties," he said on Tuesday. "And that continues." Good to hear.

But the government's eagerness to establish what it calls "consistent" relations with China, after the "hot and cold" approach of the Harper years, is raising justifiable concern that Ottawa might go too far in accommodating Beijing on this delicate issue. There are very good reasons why countries such as Canada, the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand don't have extradition treaties with China. All these countries prize judicial independence and the rule of law, and aren't prepared to turn Chinese citizens accused of economic or political crimes over to the vagaries of that country's legal system. But the Chinese government has become much more insistent on this front. For the past two years it has been running a campaign code-named Operation Fox Hunt to track down Chinese citizens around the world that it accuses of corruption and other economic crimes.

17. How Canada should engage China on human rights

Toronto Star, Wenran Jiang, 2016 09 23

Opinion: With Chinese Premier Li Keqiang's visit to Canada closely following Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's first official trip to China, human rights issues have once again come to command much attention on the discussion of Canada's relations with China. While raising human-rights concerns with the Chinese government is important to Canada as a vocal proponent of freedom of expression and rule of law on the global stage, we must do so in a sober evaluation of the historical context, Chinese realities and Canada's capabilities and limitations. First, we need to look at the historical progress China has made in improving human rights in all aspects. When Pierre Trudeau's government recognized the People's Republic of China in 1970, most Chinese were living in poverty, the violent Cultural Revolution was going on and the country was a totalitarian state. Today, China has lifted 700 million of its citizens out of poverty, contributing 70 per cent to the UN's global poverty elimination targets. Chinese people today enjoy unprecedented freedom in all areas, including a wide range of political and social rights. Yes, China remains a one-party state. Attempts to overthrow the government are met with an iron fist. The state controls the press and censors the media and communications. Google, Facebook and other websites are blocked. But the country also has the largest number of internet users on Earth and WeChat, the Chinese version of Twitter, Facebook and FaceTime combined, has more than 700 million users. It is impossible to exercise effective censorship over fast-growing open technologies and social media. No wonder Mr. Harper's cabinet struggled to get its China policy right for a decade. A key element in Prime Minister Trudeau's resetting of Canada-China relations is not to treat the two issues as a trade-off, or something needing a balance. For those who insist that trade with China must come with human rights conditions, they should be reminded that Canada did not reconsider NAFTA when the United States violated international law in invading other countries, conducting torture in secret CIA facilities around the world, or illegally monitoring hundreds of millions of people globally. Third, we need to accept the reality that no external forces can impose human-rights changes in China. The improvement in human rights, rule of law and democracy in China is ultimately a fight by the Chinese citizens themselves. And our efforts in this area should be limited.

18. Justin Trudeau L'"idiot utile" de l'islamisme (Canada)

Marianne (site web), Alain Léauthier, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - A force de multiplier les gestes de soutien à la communauté musulmane de son pays, et malgré des mises en garde, le Premier ministre canadien s'est pris les pieds dans le tapis. L'anti-Trump, ou du moins son double inversé, n'est pas américain mais canadien, et même le premier des Canadiens : Justin Trudeau, 44 ans, dirige le pays depuis la victoire du Parti libéral aux élections fédérales du 4 novembre dernier. L'un dit se méfier des immigrés, et tout particulièrement des musulmans, l'autre ne passe guère une journée sans vanter leur apport à la «communauté nationale» et multiplie les visites enthousiastes dans leurs mosquées, y compris les plus radicales. Le magnat de l'immobilier veut édifier un mur pour, dit-il, protéger son pays de «l'invasion mexicaine». Son cadet de vingt-six ans promet de faire tomber toutes les barrières supposées diviser «allogènes» et «autochtones». Trump incarne pour certains le vieux monde moisi, étriqué, replié sur des nostalgies d'un autre temps, et Trudeau, à l'inverse, une modernité scintillante, la main tendue vers l'autre, la jeunesse connectée et supertolérante. Il est des Canadiens que ravit cette comparaison, a priori guère flatteuse pour le candidat républicain à la Maison-Blanche, et les autorisant, pensent-ils, à contempler avec hauteur le puissant voisin dont ils aiment tant se démarquer. Ceux-là ont les yeux de Chimène pour le «chum» (pote) Trudeau, et adorent ainsi le voir figurer en superhéros aux côtés d'Iron Man dans un comics (publié uniquement en anglais...) de Marvel, la franchise nord-américaine de BD, vêtu d'un Marcel décoré d'une énorme feuille d'érable. Les médias, eux, en redemandent, car ils ont trouvé en lui le «bon client» si recherché, showman aussi prometteur que le fut son père. La succession s'annonçait pourtant redoutable : Premier ministre libéral à deux reprises et pendant plus de quinze ans, intellectuel vibrionnant, fort en thème et en mondanités, aussi capable de tenir tête aux puissants que de traverser la Chine à vélo, ami de Castro et marié à une jet-setteuse portée sur les rockers et les acteurs, Pierre Elliott Trudeau domina longtemps de la tête et des pieds la vie politique canadienne.

19. Lisée a « échoué » aux tests

Journal de Montréal, Geneviève Lajoie, 2016 09 23

Montréal - C'était « irresponsable » d'associer son adversaire Alexandre Cloutier à Charkaoui, estime Gilles Duceppe L'ex-chef bloquiste Gilles Duceppe estime que Jean-François Lisée n'est pas digne d'être chef du Parti québécois (PQ). Analyste politique sur la chaîne anglophone CTV, l'ancien leader souverainiste précise qu'il ne fait campagne pour aucun des candidats à la succession de Pierre Karl Péladeau. Mais selon lui, une chose est claire: Jean-François Lisée s'est disqualifié du poste de chef péquiste en associant son rival Alexandre Cloutier et l'imam Adil Charkaoui. «Il y a des qualités essentielles pour être chef, c'est d'être responsable, faire preuve de dignité et avoir un bon jugement. Alors pour moi, M. Lisée, en associant Charkaoui à Cloutier, a manqué à ces trois devoirs, il a échoué à ces trois tests-là, clairement», lance-t-il, en entrevue avec notre Bureau parlementaire.

20. Promotion d'un groupe contre « l'islam radical » : un cadre de Saguenay rappelé à l'ordre

Saguenay - Le chef aux opérations du service des incendies de la Ville de Saguenay, Éric Lemay, est l'un des cofondateurs du groupe contre « l'islam radical » La Meute. L'employé-cadre a discuté de ses convictions sur son lieu de travail auprès de ses subalternes pompiers. Son employeur, la Ville de Saguenay, l'a sommé de mettre fin à ses activités politiques dans le cadre de ses fonctions. Le groupe La Meute a également été formé par un vétéran des Forces armées canadiennes l'an dernier. Le groupe controversé, qui gagne en popularité par l'entremise d'une page Facebook confidentielle, lutte contre « l'islam radical ». Éric Lemay, alias Eric Yamel, a toujours voulu conserver son anonymat. Dans la vidéo d'une entrevue réalisée en mars 2016 sur les ondes de Radio X et publiée sur Facebook par un membre de La Meute, il explique sa vision. « On a un certain malaise avec l'immigration massive comme elle se fait présentement. Massive et rapide, sans filtration qui se fait. Les gens débarquent et ont leur passeport canadien presque automatiquement, C'est ni plus ni moins des votes achetés », dit-il. Éric Lemay avoue alors espérer recruter 100 000 membres rapidement pour que La Meute ait un rôle politique au Québec. « On n'est pas sexiste on n'est pas islamophobe on n'est pas raciste. [...] Si tu partages la même idéologie que nous, les mêmes valeurs que nous, tu es le bienvenu dans La Meute. Notre combat est en deux volets : on est contre l'islam radical et le procharia ».

Vancouver Sun, Sam Cooper, 2016 09 23

Vancouver - The U.S. government has named a little-known Vancouver financial company as a "significant transnational criminal organization" that it alleges has worked for 20 years with "direct mailer" scammers to launder hundreds of millions of dollars defrauded from millions of vulnerable victims. In a news conference on Thursday, U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch named PacNet, a company with offices in a building in downtown Vancouver, as a financial linchpin in global money laundering. PacNet was the payment processor - a sort of banking system middleman - that allowed global criminals to deposit cheques scammed from mostly elderly victims, Lynch alleged. "The schemes involve a complicated web of actors located across the world," she said. And in a stunning financial order that points to Vancouver's growing reputation as a hub for global money laundering, the U.S. government put PacNet on an international short list of about seven organizations that includes several of the world's most dangerous criminal cartels, including Las Zetas from Mexico and the Camorra from Italy. The U.S. government says Las Zetas, for example, is an organization involved in drug trafficking, prostitution and arms dealing, and is "the most technologically advanced, sophisticated, vicious, ruthlessly violent and dangerous cartel operating in Mexico." The executive notice, which freezes financial transactions, names 12 people, including several Metro Vancouver residents, and a number of PacNet-associated firms with links to a network of cities and countries including Vancouver, Ottawa, Italy, India, Ireland, Tokyo, Brazil, Chile, and the U.S. The notice also grounds a PacNet airline the U.S. government alleges was used to deliver bulk shipments of criminal cash in Europe. Christine Duhaime, a Vancouver lawyer who specializes in antimoney laundering law, said she believes PacNet is the first B.C. company to make the select list of international criminal groups facing sanctions by a U.S. president's executive order. "The shocking thing is the U.S. government has linked some people in Vancouver in this list to the worst criminal gangs in history," she said.

22. 'In-Betweeners' Are Part of a Rich Recruiting Pool for Jihadists

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 22

Washington - They were young men caught between cultures, sons of immigrant families, feeling lost or rejected -- and angry about American-led wars. Online they encountered the silver-tongued recruiters of Al Qaeda and the Islamic State, who said their first loyalty should be not to their nation but to Islam. Then they plotted sensational violence. In the weekend bombings in New York and New Jersey and stabbings at a mall in Minnesota, the accused perpetrators fit the same rough pattern as in previous attacks at the Boston Marathon in 2013; in San Bernardino, Calif., in 2015, and in Orlando, Fla., in June, as well as in the terrorist assaults in Paris and Brussels. A rich recruiting pool for Al Qaeda and the Islamic State includes what psychologists call "in-betweeners," young adults whose identities have not yet solidified. Their uncertainty makes them vulnerable, said J. Reid Meloy, a forensic psychologist and clinical professor at the University of California, San Diego. "It allows the individual to attach his identity to something that is larger and inflates his sense of himself," he said. The uncomfortable in-between status can be especially acute for those with recent immigrant roots. Living in two cultures at once is very enriching for most people but very unsettling for others, said Lorenzo Vidino, the director of the Program on Extremism at George Washington University. For some Muslim immigrants, he said, "You have a message at home that's very conservative, and a completely different message from the society around you when you're growing up."

23. 'Keep an Eye on Him,' Ahmad Khan Rahami's Father Says He Told F.B.I.

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 22

New York - Two years ago, the father of the man accused of carrying out bombings last weekend in New York and New Jersey explicitly warned federal agents about his son's interest in terrorist organizations like Al Qaeda and his fascination with jihadist music, poetry and videos, according to the father. In an interview with The New York Times on Wednesday night, Mohammad Rahami, whose son Ahmad has been charged with using weapons of mass destruction and setting off explosions in public spaces, recounted his interactions with the Federal Bureau of Investigation after he raised concerns about his son. Mr. Rahami's contact with the authorities started in August 2014, when the local police were called to the family's home after a domestic dispute during which Ahmad stabbed his brother, according to court records. Mr. Rahami said that during the course of the investigation, the F.B.I. became involved and he told agents from the bureau everything he knew about his son's activities. "I told the F.B.I. to keep an eye on him," he said. "They said, 'Is he a terrorist?' I said: 'I don't know. I can't guarantee you 100 percent if he is a terrorist. I don't know which groups he is in. I can't tell you.'" In the interview, he spoke about his son's admiration of Anwar al-Awlaki, once Al Qaeda's leading propagandist, who is also popular with the Islamic State's followers, and how he watched Mr. Awlaki's videos, but it was unclear if he mentioned Mr. Awlaki's name to the agents.

24. Email Hack Details Movements of Clinton, Biden and Michelle Obama

New York Times, Michael D. Shear, Matthew Rosenberg, 2016 09 23

Washington - Hackers on Thursday posted hundreds of emails from a young Democratic operative that contained documents detailing the minute-by-minute schedules and precise movements of the vice president, the first lady and Hillary Clinton during recent campaign fundraisers and official political events. The emails included names and cellphone numbers of numerous Secret Service agents, spreadsheets with the names and Social Security numbers of campaign donors, and PowerPoint presentations showing step-by-step directions for where officials like Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. should walk when they arrived at events. The hackers who posted the emails also distributed what they claimed was a scanned image of the information page from Michelle Obama's passport, though the authenticity of the image could not be verified. The emails were stolen from the personal Gmail account of the Democratic operative, Ian Mellul. They reveal how widely White House officials, Clinton campaign operatives and Secret Service agents have exchanged detailed and sensitive information with people using personal email accounts. There is no indication that Mr. Mellul, 22, who was in effect working as a freelancer when the White House or the Clinton campaign needed help, did anything wrong, and government officials declined to talk about the use of the private account.

25. Key lawmakers accuse Russia of campaign to disrupt U.S. election

Washington Post, Greg Miller, 2016 09 23

Washington - Two senior Democratic lawmakers with access to classified intelligence on Thursday accused Russia of "making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election," a charge that appeared aimed at putting pressure on the Obama administration to confront Moscow. The jointly issued statement from Sen. Dianne Feinstein and Rep. Adam B. Schiff -- Californians who are the ranking Democrats on the Senate and House intelligence committees, respectively -- described recent cyber penetrations of the Democratic National Committee and other U.S. political entities as intrusions that were likely directed by Russian President Vladimir Putin. "At the least, this effort is intended to sow doubt about the security of our election and may well be intended to influence the outcomes," the statement said. "We believe that orders for the Russian intelligence agencies to conduct such actions could come only from very senior levels of the Russian government." Feinstein and Schiff said they reached their conclusion "based on briefings we have received" from U.S. intelligence agencies.

26. L'auteur de l'attentat de New York est un djihadiste

Le Monde, Stéphane Lauer, 2016 09 23

New York - Ahmad Khan Rahami se référait à des leaders d'Al-Qaida et de l'EI dans un journal retrouvé lors de son arrestation. Après avoir longuement hésité, les autorités américaines n'ont désormais plus de doute sur le caractère djihadiste des attentats de New York et du New Jersey, perpétrés samedi 17 septembre. Leur auteur, Ahmad Khan Rahami, a été mis en examen, mardi 20 septembre, de dix chefs d'inculpation, notamment usage d'armes de destruction massive et attentat à la bombe dans un lieu public. L'explosion qui a eu lieu à Chelsea, dans le sud de Manhattan, a fait trente et un blessés. Les treize pages que compte la plainte criminelle révèlent que les motivations de cet Américain de 28 ans, d'origine afghane, trouvent leur ressort dans l'idéologie islamiste. Le document fait largement référence à un journal manuscrit que le suspect portait sur lui au moment de son arrestation, lundi matin, à Linden (New Jersey). Il y fait notamment l'éloge d'Oussama Ben Laden et affirme qu'il veut mourir en martyr. " Vous - le gouvernement américain - continuez vos massacres contre les moudjahidin, que ce soit en Afghanistan, en Irak, en Syrie, en Palestine ", écrit-il. Cette rhétorique n'est pas sans rappeler celle des frères Tsarnaev, les auteurs de l'attentat du marathon de Boston en 2013, qu'ils avaient justifié en représailles aux interventions militaires américaines.

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 09 23

San Francisco - A U.S. investigation into a leak of hacking tools used by the National Security Agency is focusing on a theory that one of its operatives carelessly left them available on a remote computer and Russian hackers found them, four people with direct knowledge of the probe told Reuters. The tools, which enable hackers to exploit software flaws in computer and communications systems from vendors such as Cisco Systems and Fortinet Inc, were dumped onto public websites last month by a group calling itself Shadow Brokers. The public release of the tools coincided with U.S. officials saying they had concluded that Russia or its proxies were responsible for hacking political party organizations in the run-up to the Nov. 8 presidential election. On Thursday, lawmakers accused Russia of being responsible. Various explanations have been floated by officials in Washington as to how the tools were stolen. Some feared it was the work of a leaker similar to former agency contractor Edward Snowden, while others suspected the Russians might have hacked into NSA headquarters in Fort Meade, Maryland. But officials heading the FBI-led investigation now discount both of those scenarios, the people said in separate interviews.

28. The New York bombing shows the enduring influence of long-dead terrorists

The Independent (UK), Mubaraz Ahmed, 2016 09 23

Op-ed - As the FBI continues its investigation into New York and New Jersey bombing suspect Ahmad Khan Rahami, and a picture has begun to emerge - about his background, his travels, his past and his eventual radicalisation - some of the details are worrying. While there has been much attention placed on Rahami's trips to Afghanistan and Pakistan and his encounters with local law enforcement officials in a New Jersey restaurant, one detail the investigators have uncovered points to the extent of the global jihadi phenomenon. Investigators discovered that Rahami was inspired by the ideas of none other than Anwar al-Awlaki, a US-born leading propagandist and recruiter for al-Qaeda who was killed in a US drone strike in September 2011. Awlaki's links to numerous terrorist plots are well documented and his influence on potential jihadis from beyond the grave has also been noted. Rahami wrote in a journal he was carrying at the time of his arrest that he was looking for "guidance" and answers, and ended up becoming acquainted with Awlaki's ideas. His admission of searching for "guidance" demonstrates that it was Rahami who was seeking ideas, and that the attempt to address the gap in his knowledge was subsequently filled by extremism. Every one of us searches for answers throughout our lives. However, in the 21st century, Muslims are increasingly asking questions about Islam online rather than at the mosque or through other religious institutions. The starting point for almost all enquiries about matters of faith is the internet search engine. Five years since Awlaki was killed, the ideology he espoused continues to proliferate online. Supposedly mainstream Islamic websites - sites purporting to present genuine Islamic content - are in fact hosting lectures, videos and publications from leading jihadi ideologues. This terrifying content is hiding in plain sight on websites that may, at first glance, seem to be quite ordinary, providing free access to the Quran or Hadith. Our research found there are almost 20,000 web searches each month for Anwar al-Awlaki - a demonstration of his continued influence. Note: Mubaraz Ahmed is an analyst for the Centre on Religion and Geopolitics at the Tony Blair Faith Foundation.

29. Yahoo hit in world's biggest data breach

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 23

Washington - Yahoo on Thursday reported the largest data breach in history - affecting at least 500 million user accounts - months after first detecting signs of an intrusion that the company blamed on "state-sponsored" hackers. The Web giant called on customers to change their passwords and institute other protective measures, but the largest fallout could be for Yahoo itself. The long-faltering company this summer agreed to sell its core business for $4.8 billion to telecommunications giant Verizon in a deal now clouded by news of the massive breach. Verizon said it learned of the incident only "within the last two days." The timeline highlighted a predicament created by hacks: Companies often take months or even years to report suspicions of breaches - if they report them publicly at all - holding the information back from customers, business partners and even potential new owners of a company. "The dark cloud this casts will be very long and will likely impact the merger agreement," Jeff Kagan, a Georgia-based telecommunications industry analyst, said in an email. "We'll just have to wait and see what happens next." Yahoo learned of the incident in July, the same month it announced its deal with Verizon, a person familiar with the matter said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to freely discuss the issue.

30. Sa Majesté recrute près d'un millier de James Bond

Le Figaro, Florentin Collomp, 2016 09 23

Londres - Le MI6 va augmenter ses effectifs de plus de 30 % d'ici à quatre ans pour s'adapter à la prolifération de la menace djihadiste en ligne. Alex Younger, le chef du MI6, en est convaincu : la lutte contre le terrorisme islamiste sera le combat de toute sa vie. Âgé de 53 ans, le patron depuis deux ans du célèbre service secret de Sa Majesté estime que le renseignement doit s'adapter à la menace protéiforme, sous peine d'être balayé par l'ennemi. Selon lui, les terroristes sont devenus des maîtres dans l'art d'exploiter les possibilités infinies d'Internet et des outils technologiques. « La révolution de l'information modifie fondamentalement l'environnement dans lequel nous opérons. Cela signifie que nous devons changer complètement nos façons de travailler », a-t-il déclaré cette semaine, lors d'une conférence organisée par la CIA à Washington. C'est pourquoi le Secret Intelligence Service, nom officiel du MI6, va recruter environ 800 nouveaux agents dans les quatre ans à venir, soit une hausse de plus de 30 % de ses effectifs. Il se taillera donc la part du lion d'un effort budgétaire annoncé par le gouvernement au lendemain des attentats de Paris en 2015. Un mouvement généralisé dans les pays occidentaux pour s'adapter à la menace islamiste croissante. Avec aujourd'hui 12 700 agents répartis dans trois agences distinctes, le Royaume-Uni dispose du plus puissant appareil en Europe, devant la France et l'Allemagne. Le MI6 emploie 2 500 personnes, le MI5, concentré sur la sécurité intérieure, 4 000, et le GCHQ (Government Communications Headquarters), l'organisme spécialisé dans la surveillance électronique, plus de 6 000 personnes. À cela s'ajoute la branche antiterroriste de la police.

32. MH370 ship 'most likely spying'

The Australian, Ean Higgins, 2016 09 23

Canberra - The Chinese government ship hailed by Transport Minister Darren Chester for searching for Malaysia Airlines Flight MH370 has probably spent more time spying on Australian military activity, according to security experts. The Australian revealed earlier this month that the Chinese search and rescue vessel Dong Hai Jiu 101 has hardly performed any actual search operations in the seven months since it first came to Fremantle in February. An analysis by The Australian of weekly operational bulletins by the federal government's Joint Agency Co-ordination Centre has determined that the vessel's sonar imaging "towfish" has in fact been in the water looking for the downed aircraft for only 17 to 30 days. The ship's captain gave up trying to search altogether early last month, with the JACC reporting that the ship would "remain at anchor off Fremantle until weather conditions improve". The Dong Hai Jiu 101 is a major component of China's $20 million contribution to the $180m effort to find the Boeing 777, which disappeared on a scheduled flight from Kuala Lumpur to Beijing on March 8, 2014, with 239 people on board, ending up in the southern Indian Ocean according to satellite tracking data. Yahoo's confirmation of a serious hack has put the spotlight on Australia's lack of regulation forcing businesses to tell victims their information has been stolen. The that occurred in 2014, with hackers accessing data from at least 500 million users. Yahoo believes they may have been state sponsored attacks, capturing names, email address, birth dates, and scrambled passwords, along with encrypted or unencrypted security questions and answers that could help hackers break into victims' other online accounts. In Australia, there are no laws that force companies that have been breached (or inadvertently disclosed information) to notify the affected customers. Maiduguri - The Boko Haram crisis still rages, but it has not managed to sustain the level of global outrage that spiked when nearly 300 schoolgirls were kidnapped in 2014 in the village of Chibok, in Borno State's south. The seven-year-old conflict has produced nonstop new and horrible chapters. Burned villages. Beheadings. Rapes of women and young girls. Military corruption and killings of innocents. Child suicide bombers. Rescued victims, even infants, who are jailed by the military for weeks or months. And now a widespread food and malnutrition crisis. The horrors have been reported by The New York Times and other news outlets. Humanitarian assistance is on the ground, but the United Nations cannot raise even a quarter of the amount of money it says it needs to help combat the problems. Despite the continuing tragedy, the world appears to have moved on to other terrible events. 39. En Afrique, Daech se heurte à al-Qaida

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 09 23

Mombasa, Kenya du Sud - En grande difficulté en Libye, l'État islamique ne parvient pas à exercer une influence déterminante sur Boko Haram au Nigeria. Son rival, al-Qaida, reste en revanche bien implanté dans le Sahel et dans la Corne de l'Afrique. Afrique Il y a dix jours, trois femmes s'infiltraient dans le commissariat central dans Mombasa, le grand port du Kenya du Sud. Les militantes parvenaient à poignarder un policier, à mettre le feu à une partie du bâtiment, avant d'être abattues. Peu après, Amaq, l'organe de communication de l'État islamique (EI), revendiquait cet attentat, assurant que les djihadistes avaient obéi à leur ordre. Ce raid, s'il reste très flou, est le premier jamais revendiqué par Daech au Kenya et l'un des premiers en Afrique subsaharienne. Dans la foulée, un groupe baptisé Jahba East Africa annonçait son affiliation au calife al-Baghdadi. Dans son communiqué, la nouvelle organisation s'en prend directement à al-Qaida et à sa filiale somalienne, al-Chebab, et se montre menaçante pour tous ceux qui ne plieraient pas. Cette offensive du mouvement irako-syrien vers l'Afrique était attendue. Menacé dans ses fiefs irako-syriens, l'EI, qui se rêve en seul et unique tenant du djihadisme mondial, cherche à étendre son emprise vers un continent où la communauté musulmane est nombreuse et bien des États sont très faibles. Mais la mouvance se heurte à sa soeur ennemie, al-Qaida, dont la présence et l'emprise africaines sont anciennes. L'attractivité de l'EI, son activisme sur les réseaux sociaux et ses films aussi ultraviolents que léchés n'ont certes pas laissé indifférents les radicaux africains.

40. Mauritania says dismantled jihadist cell had no IS link

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 09 23

Nouakchott - Mauritania denied Thursday that a suspected jihadist cell uncovered by the authorities had pledged allegiance to the Islamic State group (IS), after its members appeared in court accused of targeting a recent Arab League summit. Government spokesman Mohamed Lemine Ould Cheikh said the group were "amateurs" and denied a formal link with IS central command during a news conference. "This group was made up of 10 amateurs who were planning activities in support of a terrorist group," Ould Cheikh said, insisting there was no IS cell in Mauritania. However a judicial source, speaking to AFP on Wednesday when the group appeared before a prosecuting magistrate, painted a different picture of what it said were 10 men "apprehended just before the Arab (League) summit which took place on July 24." They had intended to "terrify" Arab leaders by raising the IS black flag and scrawling graffiti on buildings to assert the presence of the group in the Mauritanian capital.

41. Terrorisme : « L'Algérie n'est pas à l'abri d'un coup d'éclat »

Jeune Afrique, Farid Alilat, 2016 09 22

Alger - Pour Akram Khariief, journaliste spécialisé dans les questions de défense, le pays peut être la cible de terroristes infiltrés, mais la vigilance de l'armée rendra difficile toute attaque d'envergure. Jeune Afrique?: Combien de jihadistes algériens combattent en Libye?? Akram Khariief : Il n'y a pas de chiffres officiels, mais j'estime leur nombre à 200, répartis entre différentes factions, dont l'État islamique [EI]. Beaucoup de jihadistes d'Aqmi [Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique] ont quitté l'Algérie pour la Libye et la Tunisie. Certains ont rejoint la brigade Oqba Ibn Nafi, d'autres ont plus tard intégré l'EI. Il y a également des combattants algériens dans la milice tripolitaine Fajr Libya, mais ils sont moins nombreux. Peuvent-ils s'infiltrer en Algérie?? Certainement, mais pas en masse ni avec des équipements lourds, donc sans grandes conséquences sur le climat sécuritaire en Algérie. En revanche, il est à craindre un coup d'éclat comme une attaque sur un site pétrolier ou une petite ville. Cela dit, la vigilance de l'armée rendra difficile toute tentative d'attaque d'envergure.

42. Une juge dénonce les pressions du régime Kabila

Le Monde, Christophe Châtelot, 2016 09 23

Brazzaville,RDC - Chantale Ramazani Wazuri explique avoir été sommée de condamner l'opposant congolais Moïse Katumbi Si un jour Moïse Katumbi, l'ancien gouverneur de la province congolaise du Katanga, est autorisé à se présenter à la présidentielle, il le devra en partie à une magistrate de province : Chantale Ramazani Wazuri, présidente des juges de paix de Lubumbashi-Kamalondo, dont la " mission " devait pourtant consister à signer son arrêt de mort politique. Son fait d'armes est plutôt rare pour la justice congolaise : elle a dénoncé les pressions exercées sur elle par les plus hautes autorités de l'Etat - la présidence de la République démocratique du Congo (RDC), le puissant chef de l'Agence nationale du renseignement (ANR), le ministère. " On m'a forcée à condamner Moïse Katumbi, pour lui interdire de se présenter à l'élection présidentielle. C'est terrible ", raconte timidement cette femme d'une quarantaine d'années. L'histoire, pourtant, ne commence pas si mal pour Chantale Ramazani Wazuri. Auparavant juge à Kinshasa, elle est promue, en mars, à la tête du " tribunal de paix " de Lubumbashi, avec trente-quatre juges sous sa juridiction pour des dossiers passibles de six mois à six ans de prison. A priori, ce ne sont pas les affaires du siècle.

Agence France-Presse, Staff report, 2016 09 23

El Diamante, Colombia - Colombia's FARC rebels will keep Timoleon "Timochenko" Jimenez as their leader when they relaunch as a political party under a historic peace deal, a commander said Thursday. "There's no doubt that Timochenko will be confirmed" as head of the organization that replaces the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) under the peace process, commander Carlos Antonio Lozada told AFP. Jimenez, 57, whose real name is Rodrigo Londono, has worked to guide the FARC toward a negotiated end to the conflict since becoming their commander in chief in 2011.

44. Venezuelan opposition split on how to respond to latest blow against recall

Fox News Latino, Staff report, 2016 09 23

Caracas - A day after Venezuela's Electoral Board practically blocked any chance of a presidential recall before the end of the year, opposition lawmakers were struggling to come to a consensus on what step to take next. Early Thursday, the coalition that unites them, the Democratic Unity Table (MUD), convened an emergency "permanent session" until a decision was made, but as hours went by the 20-plus parties involved seemed split in a hopeless deadlock. One side believes a referendum is the only viable way to stand up to the socialist government of Nicolas Maduro, which holds total control over the military and the judicial branch of power. Other segments think a vote to recall the president no longer makes sense because a 2017 referendum - and an eventual win - would allow the vice president to finish Maduro's term and remain at the helm of country until 2019. "Complex times are coming and citizens are not yet aware of the Pandora box that has just been opened," political analyst Oswaldo Ramirez told Fox News Latino.

45. Army strengthens operational readiness along LoC, fine-tunes contingency plans

Times of India, Rajat Pandit, 2016 09 23

New Delhi - The Army continues to steadily upgrade its "operational readiness" all along the 778-km Line of Control, with redeployment of troops and some "forward movement" of ammunition and fuel dumps, even as it "refines" a variety of contingency plans in conjunction with the IAF. The Army+ has made a series of presentations to Prime Minister Narendra Modi, including one in its military operation directorate with detailed maps and sand-models on Tuesday night. "There have been other top- level meetings over the last two days, including with national security adviser Ajit Doval, to discuss the operational situation along the LoC as well as the military options available to turn the heat up+ on Pakistan," said a source. Though "retributive covert or overt strikes" on terror- training camps and other targets in Pakistan are on the table, sources said they will only be undertaken with "cold calculation" with clear objectives in mind if diplomatic measures do not get desired results.

46. China, Canada agree to strengthen economic, trade ties

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 23

Ottawa - Chinese Premier Li Keqiang said here Thursday that China and Canada have agreed to strengthen their ties in economic, trade and other fields, and to begin exploratory talks for a potential free trade agreement. Li, who is on an official visit to the North American nation, made the remarks when meeting journalists together with his Canadian counterpart Justin Trudeau. "We have reached many new consensuses in economic and trade area," said Li, adding that China is willing to import frozen beef from Canada and the two sides have reached an agreement on Canada's canola exports to China. Li also said that the two sides discussed cooperation in finance, tourism, law enforcement, as well as between their local governments. "The exchange of visits within one month showed that China- Canada relations are entering a new stage," said Li who referred to Trudeau's recent official visit to China, adding that "it's rare in the bilateral ties, and conforms to the interests of both countries as well as the expectations of the international community." Li arrived in Ottawa on Wednesday. His visit to Canada is the first by a Chinese premier in 13 years.

47. China Working to Keep Foreign Reporters on a Short Leash, Report Says

New York Times, Ian Johnson, 2016 09 23

Beijing - China has tightened restrictions on foreign journalists since Xi Jinping became the country's leader four years ago, complicating efforts to parse Beijing's thinking at a time when its slowing economy and growing global ambitions are making it increasingly important to the world. A report released on Thursday by PEN America, a writers' group based in New York, tries to quantify how difficult it has become for journalists to get the facts out of China. Its conclusion: The estimated 700 foreign journalists in China from 50 countries "face more restrictions now than at any other time in recent history." The report also highlighted several instances of what it said were foreign media companies compromising editorial standards to do business in China. The group surveyed more than three dozen journalists, as well as local Chinese employees of foreign outlets, experts, media groups and others to compile the 76-page report. PEN America has often addressed freedom of expression in China, usually concerning Chinese writers. Its executive director, Suzanne Nossel, said in an interview that it was also important to highlight challenges faced by foreigners trying to report on China. "Of course, we can't compare this to the pressures felt by Chinese writers," Ms. Nossel said. "But we are dependent on the critical link that foreign correspondents play. They are an important piece of the puzzle of understanding China."

48. EU court moved to drop LTTE from terrorist list

Colombo Page, News Desk, 2016 09 23

Colombo - A top EU lawyer on Thursday argued that Sri Lanka's terrorist group Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) should be removed from the European Union's list of terrorist organizations because procedural mistakes invalidated the decision to include them in the list. The European Union imposed travel bans and asset freezes against the LTTE under 2001 rules. The group subsequently contested being kept on the terror list. The General Court of the European Union, on 16th October 2014, on procedural grounds annulled the European Council measures maintaining the LTTE on the black list but allowed measures to keep their assets frozen. The European Court of Justice said a decision by the European Council to place the LTTE on a list of terrorist organizations had been based on factual imputations derived from the press and the internet and not on acts examined and confirmed in decisions of competent authorities as required by law.

49. Malaysia deports three foreigners with terror links

Strait Times, Shannon Teoh, 2016 09 23

Kuala Lumpur - The growing threat of terror in the region was underlined again yesterday as Malaysia revealed that it had detained one of its citizens and deported three foreigners with links to militant groups. This follows the arrest last month of three Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) operatives for plotting attacks on the country's Independence Day celebrations. In all, 240 suspected terrorists have been detained in Malaysia since late 2013. Inspector-General of Police Khalid Abu Bakar said yesterday that among those arrested by the Bukit Aman Special Branch Counter Terrorism Division was a 37-year-old Bangladeshi who owned an eatery in Kuala Lumpur. He was allegedly smuggling weapons for an international terrorist group. Interpol had placed a Red Notice - the rough equivalent of an international arrest warrant - out for him.

New Strait Times, Roy Goh, 2016 09 23

New York - One of two Malaysian Guantanamo detainees may be transferred to a prison back home to be de-radicalised, Deputy Prime Minister Datuk Seri Ahmad Zahid Hamidi said. The US authorities believe Mohamad Bashir Lap is ready to be sent back, Zahid said, but pointed out that a mechanism needs to be sorted out by a High Level Committee chaired by him before that happens. Zahid was told of this by Ambassador Lee Wolowsky, who is the US Special Envoy for the Guantanamo Closure, in a meeting on the sidelines of the ongoing 71st United Nations General Assembly here on Wednesday. Imprisoned with another Malaysian, Mohd Farik Amin, at the detention camp since 2006, Bashir is still deemed a threat to the US according to results of an assessment made by its Department of Defence Periodic Review Board on Sept 15.

53. Taiwan 'double agent' gets 18 years for spying for China

Agence France-Presse, Staff reporter, 2016 09 23

A Taiwanese court has sentenced a former intelligence officer to 18 years in prison for reportedly working as a double agent and spying for China as relations worsen with Beijing. Major Wang Tsung-wu was sentenced Thursday by Taiwan's High Court on convictions of engaging in espionage as well as violating national intelligence and security laws. The court provided no further details, citing national security restrictions. Local media reported how Wang was allegedly turned by China when he was sent there as an undercover agent for Taiwan's Military Intelligence Bureau around 20 years ago. He spied for Beijing for more than a decade, reports said. Wang was recruited by China in 1995 and leaked confidential information before he retired in 2005. He also recruited retired colonel Lin Han in 2013 to help collect intelligence, according to Hong Kong-based Apple Daily. Lin had travelled to Singapore and Malaysia to meet with Chinese intelligence and passed on information about the identities of the Taiwan bureau's officers and their missions, Taipei-based Liberty Times reported. Wang was paid around $96,000 while Lin received about $76,000 for the information they passed, it added. Lin received a six-year jail term for violating national intelligence law, the High Court said. Both men can appeal the ruling.

56. Blazes at Iran petrochemical plants raise suspicions of cyberattack

Associated Press, 2016 09 23

Dubai - A series of fires at Iranian petrochemical plants and facilities have raised suspicions about hacking potentially playing a role, with authorities saying that "viruses had contaminated" equipment at several of the affected complexes. Iran officially insists the six known blazes over the span of three months weren't the result of a cyberattack. However, the government acknowledgment of supposedly protected facilities being infected points to the possibility of a concerted effort to target Iranian infrastructure in the years after the Stuxnet virus disrupted thousands of centrifuges at a uranium enrichment facility. Among the worst of the fires was a massive, days-long inferno in July at the Bou Ali Sina Petrochemical Complex in Iran's southwestern province of Khuzestan. Insurance officials later estimated the damage at some $67 million.

Tehran - Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces said Wednesday that Iran's defense capabilities are intended to establish security both inside and outside the country. In an annual military parade marking the anniversary of Iraq's war against Iran on September 22 1980, Major General Mohammad Hossein Bagheri said Iran's enemies fear its military power. He also described Iran as a peace-seeking country that had never started a war. Elsewhere in his remarks, the top military official said that the $38 billion aid deal that Israel and the U.S. clinched makes Iran more determined to ramp up its military. Earlier this month, the United States and Israel signed a massive military aid deal under which the U.S. will provide Israel's military with $38 billion during the next 10 years. The top commander added that Iran is able to respond very quickly and decisively to any threats imposed on the country by its enemies.

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 23

Rousseifh, Jordanie - Le prédicateur palestino-jordanien, figure du salafisme djihadiste et compagnon de route d'Al-Qaida, réprouve les méthodes de l'EI tout en espérant récupérer ses adeptes. Un large sourire se dessine sur le visage d'Abou Mohamed Al-Maqdisi lorsqu'il nous accueille dans son appartement familial qui surplombe Rousseifeh, une ville défavorisée dans la banlieue nord d'Amman, en Jordanie. Imposant de stature, l'homme ne fait pas ses 57 ans. Sa longue barbe éparse et quelques rides sur le front peinent à le vieillir. Le regard est franc, rieur même. Sa famille partie à l'occasion des fêtes de l'Aïd Al-kebir, c'est lui qui sert le café traditionnel à la cardamome, les gâteaux aux dattes faits par son épouse et les chocolats - «suisses» précise-t-il -, avant de se rasseoir. Son mètre quatre-vingt-dix enfoncé dans le canapé fleuri du salon, l'ordinateur toujours posé sur les genoux, il accueille les visiteurs avec un plaisir non feint. L'homme s'excuse de ne pas pouvoir poursuivre la conversation en anglais. «Les rares occasions de pratiquer étaient les visites du Comité international de la Croix-Rouge en prison», raconte-t-il. Son ton enjoué en ferait presque oublier les ambiguïtés du personnage. Des centaines de disciples Depuis qu'il a été libéré début 2015, le prédicateur palestino-jordanien vit quasiment reclus au milieu de ses livres de religion et des souvenirs rapportés par ses disciples du Yémen, d'Irak et de Tchétchénie. Quand il n'est pas en prison, où il a passé quinze des vingt-trois dernières années, il reçoit presque sans discontinuer. Son voisin et acolyte, Abou Qatada Al-Filistini, l'ancien représentant en Europe d'Oussama Ben Laden, vient lui rendre visite presque chaque jour. Les heures passent et sa pensée se déroule, acérée, souvent complexe, parfois équivoque, dans un flot ininterrompu d'anecdotes et de confidences.

Sidon - The Lebanese Army captured Palestinian Imad Yassin Thursday, a suspected local Daesh (ISIS) emir and one of the most wanted terrorists in the Palestinian refugee camp of Ain al-Hilweh, and in the process thwarted a wave of imminent attacks. Yassin, who is believed to be Daesh's emir in the camp, was caught in an operation led by Special Forces. He was captured in the Tawari neighborhood, the very heart of the Islamists' stronghold. "As a result of precise monitoring and an exceptional operation, a force belonging to the intelligence directorate managed this morning ... to arrest Imad Yassin," an Army statement read. "Before being captured, Yassin, who is wanted on several arrest warrants, was in the process of carrying out several terrorist bombings against Army points, tourism facilities, commercial centers, popular gatherings, and residential areas in many Lebanese areas."

60. Despite initial woes, new Israeli spy satellite beams back first pictures

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 09 23

Jerusalem - The Ofek-11 reconnaissance satellite launched earlier this month sent its first images down to Israeli engineers on Thursday, dispelling fears that the craft, which experienced issues after launch, would not be able to function at all, the Defense Ministry said. At 5:10 p.m., engineers turned on the satellite's "payload" and downloaded the first images from the spacecraft, according to a ministry statement. Shortly after the launch earlier this month, the team operating the satellite discovered it was "not functioning exactly the way we expected," Doron Ofer, CEO of the Israel Aerospace Industries' Space Division, said at the time. Since then "dozens of engineers have been working to stabilize the satellite and its systems," the ministry said. According to the ministry, that work paid off. "The Ofek-11 satellite will provide operational outputs," the ministry said.

61. New Lebanese passports raise privacy questions

Now Lebanon, Alex Rowell, 2016 09 23

Beirut - A major upgrade introduced last month to the Lebanese passport has been praised by officials as a modernizing step that will bring Lebanon in line with international passport norms and enhance national security. The so-called 'biometric' passports, already in use in over 100 countries worldwide, contain an electronic chip on which biological data such as fingerprint scans are stored, making them more difficult to forge than the comparatively low-tech paper-only predecessor. At the same time, given the general weakness and corruption entrenched in the Lebanese state, the politicization of its security agencies, and the paucity of individual privacy and digital rights legislation, the program has also raised concerns among local activists that such intimately personal data could fall into unwanted hands - be they those of hackers, domestic political factions or foreign governments.

62. Top EU court advisor: Drop Hamas from bloc's terror blacklist

Jerusalem Post, Herb Keinon, 2016 09 23

Jerusalem - The European Union appears on its way to declaring that Hamas is not a terrorist organization. An advocate-general at the European Court of Justice, whose advice is usually followed by judges, recommended on Thursday that they reject an appeal by the Council of Europe against the lower EU court's decisions in late 2014 to remove both Hamas and the Tamil Tigers of Sri Lanka from the sanctions list due to flawed procedures. Advocate-General Eleanor Sharpston said that the EU governments should independently present evidence on attacks perpetrated by the groups, and that information from outside countries such as the US was not sufficient. "The council cannot rely on facts and evidence found in press articles and information from the Internet," The Wall Street Journal quoted Sharpston as saying. Sharpston's comments reflected a December 2014 order by the European bloc's second-highest tribunal to strike Hamas and the Tamil Tigers from the EU's list of designated terrorist organizations.

63. Why Netanyahu is smiling

Globe and Mail, Michael Bell, 2016 09 23

Comment: Despite the chaos pervasive in the Middle East, the position of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his rightwing partners has never been stronger. Iran aside, he has much reason to be satisfied. The integration of the West Bank into Israel, the key ambition of the Prime Minister's coalition, is unimpeded. Within Israel there are few real challenges to his rule. Centrists and leftists, who almost carried the day under the leadership of Ehud Barak and Ehud Olmert, have become distinct minorities. The Labour Party is a shadow of its former self; the peace camp seems on its last legs. The Palestinian Authority under Mahmoud Abbas is powerless. Some 1,000 new Israeli settlements are slated for the West Bank and the security barrier is to be expanded. There is nothing the PA, Fatah, or Hamas can do, although Palestinian radicals have the ability to disrupt the lives of Israeli citizens, as they continue to do in the so-called "intifada of the knives." Scheduled Palestinian municipal elections have been "postponed," allegedly because of Hamas/Fatah rivalry. Soundings when the campaign was in full swing suggested that voters were likely to support village and tribal candidates, focusing on local issues, rather than Palestinian nationalism whose leadership is regarded as ineffective and corrupt. Despite persistent criticism by U.S. administrations, particularly that of President Barack Obama, the Israeli-U.S. relationship has not been weakened. The situation would be more favourable for Mr. Netanyahu with Hillary Clinton. Earlier this month, an agreement was signed between the Obama administration and Israel committing the United States to delivering $38-billion (U.S.) in military aid. This is reinforced by far-reaching intelligence and security co-operation. (Note: Michael Bell teaches at Carleton University. He has been four times a Canadian ambassador in the Middle East.)

Marianne (site web), Martine Gozlan, 2016 09 23

Montréal - La journaliste et essayiste Djemila Benhabib, Prix international de la laïcité, est traînée en justice par les islamistes. Un procès symbole qui s'ouvre à Montréal le 26 septembre. Les prétoires aussi sont des champs de bataille. Précédant, provoquant et prolongeant le terrorisme, une nuée d'avocailleons s'affaire depuis vingt ans, d'Orient en Occident, à traquer le moindre zeste et geste de liberté. Faut-il rappeler que, longtemps avant d'être massacrée, l'équipe de Charlie Hebdo avait été poursuivie par la Mosquée de Paris et l'Union des organisations islamiques de France ? Djemila Benhabib, qui publia naguère un salutaire Ma vie à contre-Coran et appelle au sursaut laïque dans Après Charlie (H&O éditions), n'a rien oublié. Ni nos amis assassinés, ni son pays natal, l'Algérie, laboratoire du totalitarisme islamique dans les années 90. Elle avait mis un océan entre elle et la terreur, mais la terreur nous rattrape toujours. Le 26 septembre, l'indomptable essayiste passe donc en procès au Canada, poursuivie par l'association Les Ecoles musulmanes de Montréal. Une affaire qui remonte à 2012. Djemila Benhabib avait osé, dans une interview, se dire scandalisée par des méthodes pédagogiques qu'elle a elle-même subies, enfant, en Algérie. «J'ai dénoncé le fait qu'on fait réciter à des petits enfants des versets coraniques appelant à l'extermination des mécréants. A leur âge, on m'ordonnait de répéter des phrases entières réclamant la destruction des juifs et la lapidation des femmes adultères. Je me suis également insurgée contre le port du voile imposé à des fillettes de moins de 9 ans. L'école qui me poursuit est l'établissement islamique le plus important du Québec...» Créées en 1985 à l'instigation d'un Pakistanais qui voulait importer le «modèle» du «Pays des purs», Les Ecoles musulmanes accueillent toutes les sessions du Conseil de la charia. Cet organisme, comme son nom l'indique, vise à influencer toutes les institutions afin que le droit musulman soit pris en compte dans le droit québécois. Djemila Benhabib se bat sans relâche contre l'offensive obscurantiste, laquelle s'enfonçe pourtant, comme un coin d'acier, dans la mollesse du multiculturalisme nord-américain.

Paris - La journaliste a rencontré les agents féminins des services secrets français. Et découvert qu'elles y jouent un rôle croissant, sur le terrain comme derrière leur ordinateur. Grand reporter à Madame Figaro, Dalila Kerchouche publie Espionnes. Doubles vies sous haute tension (Flammarion, septembre 2016). Elle a eu l'idée originale d'enquêter sur ces femmes qui cultivent le secret pour mieux percer ceux des terroristes et des délinquants de haut vol. LE FIGARO. - Vous avez interviewé une cinquantaine de femmes dans des services de renseignements aussi divers que la DGSI (Sécurité intérieure), la DGSE (Sécurité extérieure), les Douanes, etc. Quel est leur principal moteur? Dalila KERCHOUCHE. - Le patriotisme. Leur métier exige de tels sacrifices, c'est un sacerdoce ! Parmi elles, se trouvent beaucoup de filles ou petites-filles de militaires, policiers ou résistants. Cette défense des valeurs républicaines, elles l'ont chevillée au corps, doublée de l'idée d'offrir un monde meilleur à leurs enfants, au point de paraître naïves parfois. La palette des métiers qu'exercent ces femmes est très large. Certaines sont des agents sur le terrain, d'autres « espionnent » depuis leur bureau, d'autres encore mènent des interrogatoires. Lesquelles vous ont le plus marquée ? Beaucoup ! Parmi elles, Camillia, une fille des cités, Franco-Marocaine de 37 ans, une des rares arabisantes de son service au SCRT (Service central du renseignement territorial, les ex-RG). Elle infiltre les réseaux djihadistes, surveille les mosquées salafistes, évalue la dangerosité des radicaux. Des profils comme celui de Camillia, capable de se fondre dans le paysage, ne sont pas si fréquents ?

66. Europe Legal Official Says Two Groups Should Be Pulled From Terror List

Wall Street Journal, Gabriele Steinhauser, 2016 09 23

Brussels - An adviser to the European Union's top court said Hamas and the Tamil Tigers should be taken off the EU's terror list because the bloc's governments followed the wrong procedures when including the two groups. The opinion of the European Court of Justice's advocate general isn't binding on the court's judges. However, if confirmed, it would mark a key point in a drawn-out court battle between the Palestinian and Sri Lankan groups and EU governments. Depending on the detailed argument of the judges, EU governments might then still have an opportunity to place both Hamas and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, as the group is formally known, back on the list. In 2014, the EU's second-highest court ordered both Hamas and the Tamil Tigers to be struck off the bloc's terror list in two separate decisions.

Ce ressortissant algérien de 42 ans s'était enfui du domicile où il était assigné à résidence, à Evron en Mayenne (ouest de la France). Il a été arrêté par un groupe d'intervention de la police vaudoise alors qu'il s'était présenté mercredi dans un centre d'enregistrement et de procédure à Vallorbe, dans le canton de Vaud, pour y déposer une demande d'asile, précise la police vaudoise dans un communiqué. Merouane Benahmed a été placé en détention en vue de son extradition, a-t-elle précisé. "Entendu par le ministère public central vaudois, il s'est opposé à la procédure simplifiée d'extradition. C'est donc la procédure ordinaire qui s'appliquera", a-t-elle ajouté.

68. Les mineurs au coeur de la stratégie de Daech

Le Figaro, Christophe Cornevin, 2016 09 23

Paris - Quatre adolescents en lien avec l'État islamique viennent d'être arrêtés. Selon nos informations, près de 2 000 mineurs sont signalés radicalisés en France. Brillant élève et joueur de tennis émérite, ce lycéen venait de souffler ses 15 bougies le 9 septembre. Interpellé cinq jours après dans le XXe arrondissement de Paris par la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) appuyée par des hommes du Raid, ce cadet du djihadisme a été mis en examen pour association de malfaiteurs terroriste en vue de commettre des crimes. Apparu dans le viseur des services de renseignements à la fleur de l'âge, cet Égyptien d'origine est soupçonné d'avoir ciblé des attaques au nom de Daech, avant d'y renoncer. C'est le quatrième adolescent à tomber en une semaine dans les filets de l'antiterrorisme. Tous étaient sous l'emprise de Rachid Kassim, propagandiste virulent de Daech soupçonné de téléguider via la messagerie cryptée Telegram des attentats en France depuis la zone irako-syrienne. Le premier, un mineur de 15 ans mis en examen et écroué, projetait une attaque djihadiste en France. Arrêté à Rueil-Malmaison (Hauts-de-Seine), il avait lui aussi été repéré sur Telegram en lien avec Rachid Kassim. À la stupeur de son entourage, un apprenti djihadiste lui aussi âgé de 15 ans était à son tour appréhendé dans le XIIIe arrondissement.

69. Sécurité Retour sur le terrorisme en France "La propagande de Daech est très efficace"

Marianne (site web), Frédéric Ploquin et Alexis Lacroix, 2016 09 23

Paris - Les revers militaires de l'EI n'entament pas, hélas !, sa capacité à recruter et à frapper sur notre sol, grâce à des modes de communication très performants. Analyse d'une menace d'extrême intensité. Marianne : Que nous apprennent les caractéristiques des tueurs de Nice et de Saint-Etienne-du-Rouvray ? Ressemblent-ils aux tueurs du Bataclan et de Charlie Hebdo ? Alain Bauer : En fait, il n'y a plus de profil type. Jusqu'en 1995 et Khaled Kelkal, l'essentiel de ce qui était qualifié comme terroriste (et qui relève plus de l'expérimentation évolutive que de la science exacte) provenait d'un milieu politiquement militant utilisant la violence comme mode de revendication après avoir échoué par d'autres méthodes plus pacifiques. C'était la politique par d'autres moyens. Kelkal est d'abord un délinquant qui passe au terrorisme. Il ouvre une série dont il est un prototype et dont le suivant serait Mohamed Merah, dix-sept ans plus tard. Pendant cette période, ce qu'on croit devoir appeler Al-Qaida génère un hyperterrorisme à partir des unités de combat formées par l'Occident contre les Soviétiques en Afghanistan et qui se révoltent contre leurs créateurs après le départ des troupes russes. Depuis, le terrorisme a muté et offre une diversité de profils allant du militant en mission au malade mental utilisant les arguments à la mode pour justifier leurs actes. Si le terrorisme d'Etat est presque silencieux, on assiste à la poussée d'une multiplicité d'acteurs qui brisent tous les profils traditionnels.

70. Sur les réseaux sociaux, Daech se fait plus discret

Le Figaro, Fanny Lauzier, 2016 09 23

Paris - La maîtrise des réseaux sociaux et des codes du divertissement permet à Daech de recruter des djihadistes de plus en plus jeunes. Facebook, Twitter, Instagram ou encore Snapchat... Depuis deux ans, l'État islamique avait pignon sur rue sur les réseaux sociaux préférés des adolescents. Des forums d'initiés, la propagande de l'organisation terroriste s'était largement déplacée, en 2014, sur les canaux de transmission habituels de la webculture. Pour recruter le plus largement possible, les partisans de Daech ont utilisé tous les codes d'Internet, étant eux-mêmes, pour beaucoup, des « digital natives ». « Ils ont autour de 25 ans et sont eux-mêmes usagers de ces réseaux », explique David Thomson, journaliste spécialiste du djihadisme. Daech s'était largement approprié les symboles de la culture Web : ici, une photo de combattant armé d'une kalachnikov câlinant un chaton, là, des selfies de soldats s'immortalisent à bord de tanks ou autour de la piscine d'un hôtel abandonné en Syrie... Mais l'âge d'or de la communication de l'EI touche peut-être à sa fin. « Depuis quelques mois, on note que Daech est de moins en moins présent sur Twitter. La phase d'euphorie est clairement passée », constate David Thomson. Depuis la promulgation de la loi Urvoas, le 3 juin dernier, les sympathisants de Daech qui vivent en France sont plus vigilants. En effet, toute consultation « habituelle » de sites Internet ou réseaux sociaux faisant l'apologie d'actes terroristes est désormais punie par la loi.

71. Terror Threat Remains High 6 Months After Brussels Attacks

Voice of America, Marthe van der Wolf, 2016 09 22

Brussels - Six months after the attack on the Brussels airport and a metro station, survivor Pauline Graystone says she and her family are okay. "The first few days were a mix of disbelief, adrenaline, feeling hyperactive and numb. And certainly not able to concentrate on anything much. And later on, a general feeling to be determined not to let it stop us getting on with life. Still now I occasionally have a strong feeling of how lucky we were, and how others were not." Images of Graystone lying on the ground with her husband while protecting her daughter were shared around the world. She and her family were standing by a check-in desk when terrorists detonated two bombs at the Zaventem airport. A third bomb exploded later at a metro station close to European Union buildings. A Belgian parliamentary committee investigating the March attacks is expected to conclude its study by the end of 2016. A mid-term report released in August focused on emergency services and made several recommendations about improving communication lines and including terror responses to all emergency plans. Committee chairman Patrick Dewael says no lives could have been spared even if communication had been faster.

72. Un islamiste du GIA algérien, arrêté à Vallorbe en Suisse

France 3 - Régions (site web) avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 23

Vallorbe, Suisse - "Hier (jeudi, ndlr), le ressortissant algérien Merouane Benahmed a été arrêté à Vallorbe", dans le canton de Vaud, a précisé à l'AFP un porte-parole de l'OFJ, Folco Galli. AFP L'ex-membre du Groupe islamique armé (GIA) algérien, Merouane Benahmed, recherché depuis deux semaines par la police française, a été arrêté jeudi en Suisse, a annoncé l'Office fédéral suisse de la Justice (OFJ). Cet homme de 43 ans, assigné à résidence à Evron dans l'ouest de la France, ne s'était pas présenté le 8 septembre à la gendarmerie pour l'un de ses quatre pointages quotidiens. "Aujourd'hui (jeudi, ndlr), le ressortissant algérien Merouane Benahmed a été arrêté à Vallorbe", dans le canton de Vaud, a précisé à l'AFP un porte-parole de l'OFJ, Folco Galli. "Il s'était présenté le 21 septembre au Centre d'enregistrement et de procédure de Vallorbe en Suisse pour y déposer une demande d'asile", a expliqué ensuite la police cantonale vaudoise dans un autre communiqué. Ce sont les gendarmes du groupe d'intervention de la police cantonale vaudoise qui ont procédé à son interpellation jeudi vers 15h00 (13H00GMT), précise la police. "Entendu par le ministère public central vaudois (procureur, ndlr), M. Benahmed a été placé en détention", a indiqué la police vaudoise. Il s'est opposé à la procédure simplifiée d'extradition vers la France, toujours selon la police vaudoise, donc c'est la procédure dite ordinaire qui s'appliquera. Concrètement, cela signifie que la Suisse va devoir désormais demander aux autorités françaises d'envoyer à Berne une demande formelle d'extradition, a détaillé Folco Galli.

1. National electronic intelligence agency executive calls for 'rational debate' on encryption

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 09 26

Ottawa - Canadians are being encouraged to ask more questions about the security of their electronic devices from an unlikely source: an executive at the country's electronic intelligence agency. Scott Jones, the deputy director of IT security at the Communications Security

Establishment, said Canadians need to start taking a greater interest in how their electronic devices protect personal information. "We should be asking when we go and buy the stuff we have at home, OK, tell me how it's being protected," Jones said in an interview. "If it's my cellphone, does it have encryption if I lose it? Can somebody just read the data off of it or not? We need to start asking questions like that ... We need to start helping each other, and helping citizens, helping businesses, helping the government when we're buying these products they need to be secure by default." It may surprise some to hear an employee at CSE counselling Canadians to protect their private information. The agency, which has largely operated in secret since its creation at the end of the Second World War, was thrust into the spotlight after U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden's disclosures. CSE is part of the Five Eyes alliance, which includes security agencies in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. Snowden's disclosures drew back the curtain on mass surveillance programs used by those countries, including programs that scooped up their own citizens' communications. Jones' comments also come as law enforcement agencies in the U.S. and Canada are forcefully arguing for limiting citizens' ability to secure their information through encryption programs -- calling for so-called "backdoors" that would let authorities decode the data. While police and intelligence agencies argue about whether citizens should have access to strong encryption, the federal government, on the other hand, is trying to improve its own electronic defences. Known as "Part B" of CSE's mandate, cyber-defence operations require the agency to work with a host of other federal departments to try and protect government information -- including Canadians' personal information. For serious cyberattacks, the response could include the RCMP, CSIS, Public Safety, Shared Services Canada, even Global Affairs and the Privy Council Office.

2. The CSIS spy who co-founded Heritage Front neo-Nazi group . . . and shares the story behind the stories

Toronto Star, Dale Brazao, 2016 09 26

Column: Find the fence. Follow the fence. Find the spy. That's not terribly sexy work in the world of investigative journalism, but it is, in this stranger-than-fiction episode, the truth of how, in 1995, I tracked down Grant Bristow, a government agent who had infiltrated the Canadian neo-Nazi group, the Heritage Front. Bristow was now in hiding after allegations surfaced that the CSIS mole had instigated and funded many of the criminal acts he was supposed to be monitoring. He co-founded the hate-mongering Heritage Front and allegedly drew up lists of targets for the group, encouraging its members to spy on and harass prominent Jewish leaders, all while on the government payroll. After he was outed, the government took its spy in from the cold and hid him, allegedly for his protection. Finding Bristow had become an obsession among the ultracompetitive Toronto media. Now, courtesy of a source, I had a photograph of the disgraced spy, sitting in the backyard of his new house somewhere in Canada. Beside him, by a pinkish-white stucco post, a pair of crutches to one side. If I could find that fence, I could find Bristow. I had worked on the Bristow case for months, chasing multiple, fruitless sightings. I had compiled quite a bit of information on Bristow's time inside the Heritage Front, even his visit to Libya as a guest of Moammar Gadhafi, but I had drawn a complete blank as to his current whereabouts. Then came the lucky break. A man walked into the Star newsroom carrying photographs of Bristow, his wife and son, which he claimed had been taken at their new hideout, somewhere out west, possibly Calgary or Edmonton. CSIS had given Bristow a new identity, a new home and two brand-new cars, he said.

3. Canada confirms citizen kidnapped in Libya, seeks more information

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Toronto - Canada confirmed on Sunday it has become aware of a citizen taken hostage in Libya and is "diligently pursuing all appropriate channels to obtain more information." Libyan authorities said last week a Canadian and two Italians had been kidnapped in the country's southwestern desert, possibly by a criminal gang. The Canadian government then called the matter "unconfirmed." On Sunday, Global Affairs Canada, the country's foreign department, called the kidnapping "troubling," but declined to provide more details. "The Government of Canada will not comment or release any information which may compromise ongoing efforts to secure their release or endanger the safety of Canadian citizens," a spokeswoman said in an email. The three victims, who were working on airport projects, were abducted between the towns of Ghat and Tahala, near the border with Algeria, early last Monday, according to Ghat's mayor Gomani Mohamad Saleh. It is not immediately clear who was responsible or what the hostages' current circumstances are. Numerous criminal and armed groups are active in Libya's vast southern desert, and al Qaeda-linked Islamist militants have long had a presence across the border between Libya and Algeria. 4. Canada says new border accord with China will speed deportations

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

An agreement signed between Canada's border agency and China will result in the faster deportation of Chinese citizens deemed inadmissible by Canadian authorities, a Liberal government spokesman said on Sunday. The deal will allow Chinese officials to travel to Canada to interview Chinese citizens considered inadmissible, with the aim of verifying their identities and documents, said Scott Bardsley, press secretary to Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. Bardsley said the verification process could otherwise take a long time and had often delayed deportations. According to Canada's immigration department, those deemed inadmissible include people with criminal records, serious health or financial issues or who have lied on their visa applications. The agreement, a one-year pilot program, was part of law enforcement accords signed during Premier Li Keqiang's Canadian visit last week. The border agency agreement, which will not be in place immediately, is similar to one China has with the European Union, and officials from both countries will revisit the matter in November, said Bardsley.

5. Canadian among Libyan hostages

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Ottawa has confirmed that a Canadian is among three people taken hostage in Libya earlier this week. In a statement Sunday, Global Affairs spokesman Michael O'Shaughnessy says the Canadian government is "diligently pursuing all appropriate channels to obtain more information about this troubling incident." He says the government will not comment further or release any information that may compromise efforts to secure the hostages' release or endanger the safety of Canadian citizens. The other two people taken hostage are Italians. According to The Guardian, the president of the Italian Senate's defense commission, Nicola Latorre, urged "much prudence in this phase, both because we still don't have the elements to pinpoint the precise matrix of the kidnappers and also to not negatively influence the course of events." Earlier in the week, a Libyan official said authorities were investigating the abduction of three foreigners working for a maintenance company near the border with Algeria. Hassan Osman Eissa from the Ghat municipal council told The Associated Press on Thursday that the abductors are not al-Qaida members, as some reports stated, but rather "a local group of outlaws." The three foreigners were held at gunpoint Monday along the highway linking the southwestern cities of Ghat and Ubari.

6. Colombian-Canadian helps pave long path to peace deal

Globe and Mail, Stephanie Nolen, 2016 09 26

When Frank Pearl watches Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos and Rodrigo (Timochenko) Londono, the leader of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), sign a peace agreement Monday in Cartagena, it will be the culmination of more than seven years of work to cultivate hope over the suspicion and anger sown from half a century of war. It was Mr. Pearl, a Colombian-Canadian, who was tasked with sending the first secret messages from the government to the infamous guerrilla organization in an effort to try to start a peace process. It has consumed his life, through clandestine meetings in tiny country towns and four years of marathon negotiating sessions in Havana. With the signing, the FARC ceases to exist as an armed movement and becomes a political party. Its estimated 17,000 fighters are to collect at a handful of points in the country, turn over their weapons, and begin a process of integration and job training. The FARC will send members to guaranteed seats in Congress, while a series of special courts will decide on reparations from those found guilty of crimes against humanity, after they fully disclose to a truth commission. The FARC has pledged to end its involvement in narco-trafficking, a business it currently controls in Colombia. The government agrees in the Havana Accord to carry out an aggressive campaign of rural development and reform land distribution, to address some of the inequities that the FARC says drove it to take up arms 52 years ago.

7. Dion's stance confusing: critics

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 09 26

Ottawa - Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion sowed confusion and showcased cracks in Liberal ranks when he angrily denied recently that negotiations are under way on an extradition treaty with China, critics say. One federal official said that Mr. Dion was simply flustered about semantics when he denied the launch of talks: "Preliminary discussions are a precursor to negotiations and those discussions have only just begun." Still, another senior Liberal added, "I'm not clear what [Mr. Dion] was trying to say." In a telephone interview with The Globe and Mail on Friday, Mr. Dion insisted there are no negotiations in the works that could see Canada return Chinese fugitives accused of economic crimes. "Your paper should check the facts. There is no negotiation. To write like pretending it is, it is wrong. Stop that please," Mr. Dion said. When asked what kinds of specific guarantees the Canadian government would demand with a formal Chinese extradition treaty, Mr. Dion again became testy. "We never extradite people to countries who have the death penalty. Your question is unfair because never the government of Canada would do such a thing. And why you are implying that is beyond me. That's my answer to your question." However, Canada has returned more than 1,400 Chinese nationals since 2009, most of whom were involved in illegal immigration. In addition, Canada has an extradition treaty with the United States, although Ottawa insists on receiving assurances that people will not face the death penalty if they are sent back to face the American justice system.

8. DND, military get free pass for use of Ashley Madison

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 09 26

Ottawa - Military personnel and Defence Department employees who may have used government computers to access the Ashley Madison infidelity dating service cannot be punished since rules allow using such equipment to "communicate" with friends - even if it involves an illicit romance, according to documents obtained by the Ottawa Citizen. Last year hackers posted personal data of users of the Ashley Madison website which offers a service for those looking to have extramarital affairs. More than 180 email addresses of Department of National Defence and Canadian Forces personnel were included, sending federal officials scrambling to figure out how to respond, show the documents obtained through the Access to Information law. But DND security and information technology staff were in a dilemma over whether they could punish those using government computers to conduct extramarital affairs. The department's rules say unauthorized use of equipment included anything bringing discredit to the DND and the military. But the same policy also had a section allowing the use of federal computers for "communicating with family, friends and other persons, for other than official use." In addition, since the Ashley Madison site did not send verification emails, the accounts might not belong to actual users of the service.

9. Economic fugitives pressed to return to China face uncertain futures

Globe and Mail, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 09 26

Vancouver - Alex Ning remembers the feeling of despair when a man he had helped represent returned to China to face embezzlement charges. Mr. Ning, a Vancouver-area immigration consultant, said Gao Shan "couldn't stand the pressure" after his father, brother and brother-in-law were detained by Chinese authorities for aiding and abetting. It was Mr. Ning's first case in which China sought the return of an economic fugitive. Today, Mr. Ning says he is helping about 30 others who are in the same situation as Mr. Gao. Mr. Ning said about half have been visited by Chinese authorities on Canadian soil. The other half, he said, have been pressed to return to China over the phone or online. The Globe and Mail reported last week that China's security services have been sending undercover agents into Canada on tourist visas to strong-arm expatriates to return home, including some suspected of corruption and other criminal activities. And with the Canadian government recently agreeing to negotiate an extradition treaty with China, representatives for some who have returned to the country in recent years to face criminal charges are criticizing the move - and noting there can be unpleasant surprises for those who go back.

11. Too much talking, cellphone use, during federal 'lockdown' exercise, report says

CBC News, Dean Beeby, 2016 09 26

Ottawa - A "lockdown" exercise designed to test whether federal workers know what to do if a gunman ever stormed their Ottawa office building was marred by too much talking, too many ringing cellphones and too many hiding spots that were too visible. "Employees at all levels were heard talking while they were hiding," says an internal report on the March 30, 2016, exercise. "Remind employees to stay quiet to prevent the aggressor from knowing where they are hiding." Real-life lockdown of Oct. 22, 2014 The fake "lockdown" was conducted this spring just a few blocks from Parliament Hill, where a real gunman had stormed the Centre Block and started shooting on Oct. 22, 2014. The gunman died in a shootout, after killing a soldier at the National War Memorial and injuring a House of Commons guard. The 2014 incident triggered lockdowns of dozens of downtown office buildings for most of the day, and exposed some security problems. The recent exercise, carried out on 11 floors of the C.D. Howe Building, was led by Industry Canada, but also involved staff from the House of Commons, the auditor general, the Canadian Space Agency, Shared Services Canada, and a tribunals support agency. Eleven other departments sent observers. It was billed as the first- ever "lockdown" exercise involving ordinary office workers. Other such tests had previously involved only employees of security agencies, such as the RCMP. An April 2016 final report on the "Pilot Lockdown Exercise" was obtained by CBC News under the Access to Information Act.

12. Wanted: A strong hand to guide the UN

Globe and Mail, Derek Burney and Fen Osler Hampson, 2016 09 26

Op-ed: Canada has been focused, of late, on its prospects for a seat on the United Nations Security Council in 2021. But a more immediate and more important UN issue is the selection of a successor to Secretary- General Ban Ki-moon, a choice that could have a great impact on the world body's relevance and performance. Competence, dynamism and decisiveness are not high among the criteria for selection, unfortunately. The candidate, who is chosen by the 15-member Security Council in a series of complicated secret ballots, will be voted on by the full 193-member General Assembly (likely in October) and take up the position in January. In view of the ingrained rigidity among the three most significant council players - the United States, China and Russia - the lowest common denominator usually prevails in the selection, leaving the institution with little real scope for boldness or reform. The track record of the UN and its various agencies has been spotty - the burgeoning refugee crisis and flawed peacekeeping efforts being the most disturbing examples of late. World leaders adopted a lofty declaration on the refugee issue last week, at the start of this year's assembly session, but it is non-binding with no specific numbers for resettlement nor for additional funding. Mr. Ban's plaintive call for a 10- per-cent annual reduction of the more than 65 million displaced people around the world fell on deaf ears. Fewer than 1 per cent of the total refugee population may be resettled this year, while the UN refugee commission struggles to manage the flood with less than 50 per cent of the necessary funding at its disposal. Note: Derek Burney was Canada's ambassador to the United States, 1989-1993. Fen Osler Hampson is Chancellor's Professor at Carleton University in Ottawa.

13. A Style Guide for the Federal Employee

Column - In 2017, shortly after the next president is inaugurated, thousands of newly appointed federal officials will struggle with the same existential question: What do I wear to my first day of work? I understand their anxiety, having languished over wardrobe during eight years of federal service and pondered the fashion choices of my male colleagues during the interminable meetings that are the hallmark of government work. It's hard to point to a solid "real world" professional competency that I learned during those years of meetings and memo writing, but one skill I developed is an uncanny ability to tell you where any man in the national security community works based on his apparel. But first, to understand the fashion choices these professionals make, you must understand the culture--and keep in mind that not every employee falls into these stereotyped camps. (I'm also leaving a thorough assessment of female fashion to other writers more qualified.) The best-dressed men in national security are from the Treasury and Justice Departments. As more young people are drawn to public service, these two institutions compete with New York for top law- and business- school grads. Those grads, for their part, embrace public service, but make clear to their colleagues that they could be on Wall Street or at a white- shoe law firm (Note: Nobody actually wears white shoes) if they really wanted. For the young lawyer, that means nicely tailored, conservative, dark suits. The Treasury Department is more freewheeling, with flashy suits, distinctive (but never flamboyant) socks, and monk-strap shoes (literally the only place in the government where people wear monk-strap shoes). To understand the FBI's style, you need to understand that agents think of themselves as something of a cross between a detective and a spy. Suits are sharper than those worn by The Wire's McNulty but still oversized so that a pistol can be easily concealed. Haircuts are short but stylish. FBI agents also love men's hardware, such as cufflinks, tie clips, lapel pins--little flashes of bling that make the detective into an agent. The split personality of the intelligence community is on full display in its fashion. The analysts--the office guys who make sense of the fire hose of information flowing into the government--come in two forms. There are those who spend hours in windowless buildings, living on gummy bears, and Monster energy drinks, while they listen to wire taps or stare at drone footage. They dress accordingly: old khakis, short-sleeve dress shirts, scuffed loafers. And then there are the young men in a hurry, the executive briefer analysts. They walk quickly through the halls of CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia, with their carefully pressed, slightly oversized--but never offensive--Jos. A. Bank suits and shirts, ready to jump into a black car at any moment and run downtown to brief a deputy assistant undersecretary of strategic initiatives. After all, a serendipitous moment of face time for a smart (and well-dressed) young man could launch an illustrious career. Today's spy, on the other hand, is no longer the Roger Moore-type 007. He has been forged in the war zones of Iraq and Afghanistan or a dusty capital in North Africa, chasing terrorists and dodging kidnappings. The modern spy sports a substantial beard, tactical pants, and wrap-around ballistic shades conducive to a last-minute embed with some mujahideen or an SUV ride through the Sahara. Or just to make clear that they are not analysts.

14. Behind the scenes, Pentagon's top brass explores Islamic ideology's ties to terror Washington Times, Rowan Scarborough, 2016 09 26

Washington - U.S. Special Operations Command has privately pressed the staff of the nation's highest-ranking military officer to include in his upcoming National Military Strategy a discussion of the Sunni Muslim ideology underpinning the brutality of the Islamic State group and al Qaeda. Thus, behind the scenes, the Pentagon's top brass have entered a debate coursing through the presidential campaign: how to define an enemy the U.S. military has been fighting for 15 years. The National Military Strategy, authored by the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, is one of the most important guidances issued to global combatant commanders. It prioritizes threats to the nation and how to blunt them. The 2015 public version does not mention Islamic ideology. It lists terrorists under the ambiguous category of "violent extremist organizations" and singles out al Qaeda and the Islamic State group. Marine Corps Gen. Joseph F. Dunford took the chairmanship of the Joint Chiefs of Staff two months later and is now preparing his first National Military Strategy.

15. Federal Officials Draw Al-Qaeda Links To Alleged New York Bomber

BuzzFeed News, Ali Watkins, 2016 09 26

Washington - The Department of Homeland Security has determined alleged New York City bomber Ahmad Khan Rahami was likely influenced by al-Qaeda, according to an internal law enforcement document obtained by BuzzFeed News. A seven-page packet put together by Department of Homeland Security's Office of Bombing Prevention contains a spreadsheet comparing the four attempted bombing incidents in New Jersey and New York to several issues of Inspire magazine, al-Qaeda's in-house publication that contains instructions on bomb-making. According to the document, each one of the explosive devices -- allegedly planted by Rahami in Seaside Park, New Jersey, New York City, and a train station in Elizabeth, New Jersey -- was completely different from the others. Two of the attempted bombings involved pipe bombs and two were pressure cookers. Some used modified Christmas tree lights and cell phones, while one of the pressure cooker bombs used a binary explosive -- or two different chemicals that, alone, are not dangerous, but will ignite when combined. While each of the bombs were different, though, all included elements detailed in Inspire.

16. If You Knew Putin Like We Know Putin...

The Daily Beast, Michael Weiss, 2016 09 26

New York - Russia has come to occupy an outsize role in U.S. foreign policy and the forthcoming U.S. presidential election, and who knows more about the Bear than the Baltic States--Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania? They were devoured by the Soviet Union on the eve of World War II, liberated with the collapse of Communism, and have been threatened constantly, in ways big and small, as Russian President Vladimir Putin sets about trying to build anew a Russian Empire. So we sat down earlier this week to talk about all this with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves and Lithuanian Foreign Minister Linas Linkevicius, who kindly took a break from the United Nations General Assembly to drop by The Daily Beast offices in Manhattan. On allegations that Russian intelligence was behind the hacking of the Democratic National Committee and fears that it may try to interfere with the U.S. election as well: Ilves: We [Estonia] were attacked in 2007. It was a very sophisticated cyber attack, but it did happen and it had a profound economic impact for a very short time. There is no element of schadenfreude now that the U.S. is going through the same, but there is a thinking that runs, "OK, now maybe you get it?" You don't have to have a massive thing happen. ... You screw one election, one state, maybe one district, clearly hacked and you undermine faith in the entire election. That's all you need to do. Frankly, I am surprised by the lack of a call for a political response in Washington. Until you do call it out, there's nothing there. You have to publicly draw a line in the sand.

17. The real danger in Trump's public response to his secret security briefings

Reuters, David Wise, 2016 09 26

Comment - Presidential nominees are not supposed to talk about the intelligence briefings they receive as part of their race for the White House. The secret information is supposed to help them fully prepare for the presidency -- not to be discussed publicly on the campaign trail. During the NBC Commander-in-Chief Forum earlier this month, Matt Lauer of the Today show asked Republican nominee Donald Trump whether anything in the briefings caused him "shock or alarm." "Yes, there was one thing that shocked me," Trump replied, "and it just seems to me that what they said -- President Obama, Hillary Clinton and [Secretary of State] John Kerry, who is another total disaster -- did exactly the opposite." Trump elaborated on the briefing sessions: "I have (sic) pretty good with the body language. And I could tell they [the briefers] were not happy. Our leaders did not follow what they were recommending." There were several immediate problems with Trump's answer. First, on the most basic level, he did not explain what he meant by "body language." Did the intelligence professionals squirm? Wiggle? Did they grimace or smirk? Raise an eyebrow? Most important, however, the briefers are intelligence analysts whose job does not include recommending anything. Note: David Wise writes frequently about intelligence. His most recent book is Tiger Trap: America's Secret Spy War with China. His other books include Spy: The Inside Story of How the FBI's Robert Hanssen Betrayed America.

18. Wash. attack carries 5 murder counts ; FBI says it has no evidence that points to terrorism

USA Today, Steph Solis, Trevor Hughes, 2016 09 26

Seattle - The man accused of fatally shooting five people at a mall in Burlington, Wash., was held without bond Sunday and faces five counts of first-degree murder, according to jail records. The suspect, Arcan Cetin, 20, of Oak Harbor, Wash., was arrested Saturday night in Oak Harbor, about 29 miles southwest of Burlington, after a manhunt that lasted more than 20 hours. Cetin had not been formally charged in connection with the killings Friday night at Macy's inside the mall. Tips from the public helped police arrest Cetin after officials distributed photos of the suspect. The suspect, who immigrated from Turkey with his family, "is a legal, permanent resident of the United States," said Lt. Chris Cammock of the Mount Vernon Police Department. No evidence pointed to terrorism, Michael Knutson, assistant special agent in charge of the Seattle FBI, said at a news conference late Saturday. Authorities suspect Cetin was the only gunman. The motive for the shooting that killed four women and a man remained unclear.

19. Ecuador pushes for end to Assange embassy stand-off

London Times, James Hider, 2016 09 26

Quito - Ecuador has expressed hopes that Julian Assange's four- year refuge in its London embassy may be coming to an end. Guillaume Long, the foreign minister, said he hoped that the interrogation of Mr Assange by Swedish and Ecuadorean officials next month would draw a line under the confinement of the WikiLeaks founder. "We hope that the interview can put an end to what is a pretty bad situation for Mr Assange," he said. The Australian hacker took refuge in the Ecuador embassy in 2012 to avoid extradition to Sweden on allegations of rape and sexual assault, fearing that Sweden could in turn hand him over to the US, which wants to prosecute him for one of the biggest dumps of confidential diplomatic cables in history. Under a new arrangement announced this month, two Swedish prosecutors will interview Mr Assange in the presence of an Ecuadorean official on October 17. Mr Long said that, whatever the outcome of the questioning, his country would extend its hospitality if needed, although he said that years of living inside the embassy, with no access to outside space, had taken its toll on Mr Assange, 45. "I've been to visit him on several occasions and I see a deterioration," he said. "He does not have much access to light. He has no access whatsoever to exterior space. There is no internal patio. There is no fresh air.

20. 'Ship was searching not spying'

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 09 26

Canberra - China has strongly denied that its ship involved in the search for the missing Malaysia Airlines jet, Flight MH370 has used its time in local waters to spy on Australia. The Australian reported last week warnings from security experts that the Dong Hai Jiu 101 had done little searching but had probably used the opportunity to spy on Australian military activity. In a letter to the editor, the spokesman for China's embassy in Canberra said the report distorted the truth. "The facts are China, Australia and various other parties place high importance on the MH370 search mission," the spokesman said. "We have all worked together in good faith and invested enormous manpower and material resources in this endeavour." The spokesman said the vessel was taking part in the search in accordance with an agreement between the Chinese and Australian governments, and under the co-ordination and command of the Australian Transport Safety Bureau. "The underwater search equipment on board is supplied by the American company Phoenix, employed by the ATSB," the spokesman said.

21. ASX told to step up cyber defences

The Australian, Richard Gluyas, 2016 09 26

Canberra - The Australian Securities Exchange should upgrade its readiness for an extreme cyber attack, ensuring by the end of June next year that it can recover its critical clearing and settlement operations within two hours, says the Reserve Bank. The RBA's recommendation is contained in its annual review of the ASX's clearing and settlement facilities. It came at the close of a torrid week for the ASX, which suffered an outage in its equities trading system, ASX Trade, last Monday, due to a hardware failure in the system's main database. The review was completed before the ASX's recent outage. Equities trading is a separate function to clearing and settlement, and ASX chief executive Dominic Stevens said from the outset that the breakdown did not stem from a cyber attack. Global regulators, however, are increasingly concerned about the resilience of financial market infrastructure to online threats. The RBA said it had adopted a guidance note published in late June by IOSCO (the International Organisation of Securities Commissions) and CPMI (the Committee on Payments and Market Infrastructures), which recognised that it might take time to meet expectations of a full recovery of critical operations within two hours of a cyber attack. "Consistent with the guidance, the assessment recommends that ASX develop concrete plans to improve its capabilities to meet this requirement by end June 2017," the RBA review said.

22. Aust prepares for return of IS fighters

Australian Associated Press, 2016 09 26

Canberra - Australians returning from fighting with terror groups in Syria could still be placed under terrorist control orders in cases where they can't be prosecuted, Malcolm Turnbull says. The prime minister says foreign fighters returning to Australia following the defeat of Islamic State in Syria and Iraq is a live concern and the government has made a number of changes to security legislation in anticipation. "We are resolutely remorselessly focused on keeping Australians safe and we pay very close attention to the Australians that may seek to return from the conflict zone in Syria," he told reporters in Sydney on Monday. About 110 Australians are thought to be overseas fighting with or supporting groups such as IS, with as many as 65 killed. IS is now facing defeat in Iraq and Syria within the next six months. It's expected some of those who survive will seek to return home, possibly with plans to commit terror attacks. Australian Federal Police deputy commissioner Mike Phelan, who's responsible for national security, says the AFP would prefer to prosecute those returning. "But the practical realities of that are, though, we may not be in a position to prosecute everybody that comes home due to the lack of admissible evidence," he told The Australian.

23. Bankers mull options in wake of $10m Ausgrid approach (Canada)

The Australian, Gretchen Friemann & Bridget Carter, 2016 09 26

Canberra - On the back of the news on Friday that IFM and Australian Super have lobbed an unsolicited approach for Ausgrid, the big question for investment bankers is whether there is another opportunity to trump the domestically-funded $10 billion-plus offer. It is understood the advisory services of Macquarie Capital have been called on to buy the long-term lease of the NSW government's electricity distribution operation. But the question remains as to what the latest situation means for bankers who were recently in Canada to court prospective suitors for the asset. The all- Australian offer comes as the risks surrounding Foreign Investment Review Board approval for Chinese bidders and other foreign parties are perceived to be increasingly challenging. Last year, David Irvine, a former director general of the Australian Secret Intelligence Service -- said to be highly vigilant on matters that may threaten national security -- was appointed to FIRB. In recent months, State Grid bid between $14bn and $16bn for Ausgrid, while Hong Kong's Cheung Kong Infrastructure bid a price north of $12bn. But both offers were blocked by Treasurer Scott Morrison on the basis ownership by either foreign bidder would have posed a risk to national security. On Friday, the state indicated the IFM and Australian Super offer would not need FIRB approval. While IFM and Australian Super are the only two parties named on the transaction, there is scepticism the pair can pull off a $10bn- plus transaction, prompting questions as to whether other backers are involved.

24. Islamic State affiliates 'in Australia's backyard', ASIS spy chief Nick Warner says ABC (Australia), Colin Cosier, 2016 09 26

Canberra - Australia's foreign spy agency chief says Islamic extremism in South-East Asia, particularly in the southern Philippines, is a growing national security concern. Nick Warner, the head of the Australian Secret Intelligence Service (ASIS), is the only agency chief to have spoken publicly in its 60 years of operation. "In Australia's backyard in South- East Asia there are now ISIL affiliates -- in Indonesia , in the southern Philippines," he told a panel discussion in Washington, using another term for the Islamic State (IS) group. "This year there have been four small scale, and pretty hopeless, terrorist attacks, but the willingness is there, the ideology is there." Mr Warner warned the southern Philippines were a particular concern and said extremists looked likely to establish a fully- fledged IS branch there. "That worries me a lot. I can see that acting as a magnate for wannabe jihadists and for returnees out of the caliphate as that is destroyed," he said. Mr Warner said he had no doubt the so-called Islamic State's Middle East caliphate would fail in time. But he warned that it could then be followed by a protracted Sunni insurgency. "And even if the protracted Sunni insurgency doesn't follow, I think the ideology of Al Qaeda and ISIL has spread too far for us to be able destroy it any time soon," he said. Mr Warner was applauded for his response to a question over whether Australia trusted sharing intelligence with the US after the Edward Snowden leaks. "All I will say is I'm amazed still that there's a debate about this in the United States," he said.

25. Russians warned on strikes, says RAF The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 09 26

Canberra - The mystery surrounding last week's attack on a Syrian government position by aircraft from four nations including Australia has deepened with a British officer's claim that the US-led coalition warned the Russians ahead of time that the strike was to take place. The coalition nations rely on the Russians as a conduit for information to their close ally, Syria's Assad government, but the vital information may not have been passed on to the troops on the ground, if they were, in fact, Syrian soldiers. London's The Sunday Times has reported that Britain and its allies told Russia in advance about a planned airstrike which Moscow claims killed 62 Syrian soldiers and injured 100 more. Air Commodore Martin Sampson, of the Royal Air Force, told The Sunday Times Moscow raised no immediate concerns about the planned raids on what the coalition believed were members of the Islamic State terror group. Only when the bombing raid began last Sunday morning near the city of Deir el-Zor did Russian officials contact the coalition to claim that they were killing Syrian government forces, Air Commodore Sampson said. According to the Australian Defence Force, the airstrikes were halted as soon as this information was received. Asked if that meant the Russians deliberately stayed quiet because they knew such a mistake would badly damage the US-led coalition at a pivotal time during a faltering ceasefire, Air Commodore Sampson said: "That would be speculation and I would never suggest that. The Russians came to us with information. When they came to us with concrete information, we acted upon it. We went to them with our information and nothing came back immediately.

26. Spymaster opens up on agency overhaul and Southeast Asia

The Australian, Jacob Atkins, 2016 09 26

Canberra - Australia's overseas spy agency is carrying out a major overhaul of its technology and the way it trains its agents to deal with a surge of Islamic extremism in Southeast Asia. During a rare public appearance in Washington DC last week, Australian Secret Intelligence Service director-general Nick Warner agreed with Malcolm Turnbull's recent assessment that Islamic State was on the wane in Iraq, but voiced his fear that the terror group's allure in our immediate neighbourhood could see the threat from Islamic extremism endure for years. Mr Warner said radical Islamist groups in Southeast Asia constituted a growing threat to Australia's security. "This year there have been four small-scale and pretty hopeless terrorist attacks. But the willingness is there, the ideology is there," he said. One vulnerable area was the southern Philippines, he said. "I have no doubt that in time Mosul will be liberated, in more time Raqqa will be liberated, and in time the caliphate will collapse in on itself," Mr Warner said in a panel discussion at George Washington University, alongside his counterparts from the CIA, Britain's MI6 and Afghanistan's peak intelligence service. "But I think that is likely to be replaced by a protracted Sunni insurgency unless we are all very agile and very clever. "And even if the protracted Sunni insurgency doesn't follow, I think the ideology of al-Qa'ida, the ideology of ISIL, has spread too far, too widely, for us to be able to destroy it any time soon." Islamic State already had an affiliate in the southern Philippines. "And looking at it through open sources, through social media, they seem to be ticking all the boxes to lead to a proclamation of an ISIL branch or province in the southern Philippines," Mr Warner said.

27. Cyber World and Espionage

Hilal, Mudassar Jehangir, 2016 09 26

Undisclosed placeline - To breach the security of servers and steal the data, there exist a lot of ways. Or they (in the case of more individuals) just need to activate a virus inside our phone that you must have erroneously installed, unknowingly, because it was embedded into a free game app that you or your kid downloaded a few days ago. In this case, you will no more be the owner of your phone. I rarely believe in the claims of software and security companies because even the most secure systems are a piece of cake to crack by a smart hacker. This is why even the most secure companies on earth keep paying white hackers for improving the security bugs. A recent example is the USD 200,000 offer from Apple for finding loopholes into its products. Today, security experts believe that cyber wars are imminent, and terrorist organizations will exploit the digital realm to inflict real physical damage.

29. La réélection d'Ali Bongo confirmée au Gabon

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 26

Libreville, Gabon - La Cour constitutionnelle a rejeté les recours de Jean Ping, son rival à la présidentielle La Cour constitutionnelle gabonaise a validé la réélection du président Ali Bongo Ondimba, dans la nuit de vendredi 23 à samedi 24 septembre à Libreville. La Cour avait jusqu'à vendredi pour se prononcer sur le recours déposé par son rival, Jean Ping, contre le résultat de la présidentielle du 27 août, que l'opposition jugeait " frauduleux ". Les chiffres définitifs annoncés dans la nuit creusent par ailleurs, de quelques milliers de voix, la mince avance de M. Bongo sur son rival : élu avec quelque 6 000 suffrages d'écart, le président sortant se voit désormais crédité de 50,66 % des voix, contre 47,24 % pour M. Ping, soit près de 10 000 suffrages (sur 325 000 inscrits). Le 1er septembre, la proclamation de la victoire d'Ali Bongo Ondimba, pour un deuxième septennat, avait immédiatement provoqué des émeutes et des pillages à Libreville, ainsi que dans plusieurs villes de province. Réprimés sans ménagement, ces mouvements avaient abouti à la mort de sept manifestants (un bilan sans doute sous-évalué), et à l'arrestation de plus d'un millier d'entre eux.

Forêt de Sambisa, Nigeria - Le chef du groupe jihadiste nigérian Boko Haram, Abubakar Shekau, a diffusé dans la nuit de samedi à dimanche une nouvelle vidéo dans laquelle il dit aller parfaitement bien, fustigeant des déclarations de l'armée nigériane qui avait annoncé l'avoir grièvement blessé le mois dernier. « Vous avez dit sur les réseaux sociaux m'avoir blessé ou m'avoir tué, lance Shekau dans une vidéo d'une quarantaine de minutes, diffusée sur Youtube. Mais je suis heureux, en bonne santé et en sécurité. Je vais parfaitement bien. » Fin août, l'armée avait affirmé avoir fatalement blessé le chef de Boko Haram dans un raid aérien sur la forêt de Sambisa (nord-est), laissant planer des doutes sur son état de santé ou sa mort potentielle. Shekau, annoncé mort à de nombreuses reprises par les autorités nigérianes, apparaît en bonne santé physique sur cette nouvelle vidéo. Il montre un calendrier islamique à la fin de son apparition, pointant du doigt une date qui correspond au 25 septembre 2016. Les menaces de Shekau s'exprimant tour à tour dans les langues hausa, arabe, anglais et dans des dialectes parlés dans le nord-est du Nigeria, il profère des menaces directes contre le président Muhammadu Buhari, qui a demandé cette semaine l'aide des Nations-Unies pour négocier la libération des lycéennes nigérianes enlevées à Chibok il y a plus de deux ans.

"War is always more costly than peace," he said in an interview with the BBC. Mr Santos and Farc leader Timoleon Jimenez, known as Timochenko, will sign a historic peace deal later on Monday. 33. Santos Sets a Trap for Colombians

Wall Street Journal, Mary Anastasia O'Grady, 2016 09 26

Column - The paradox of Obama foreign policy is that its compromises with enemies of liberty in the interest of peace are leaving the world more violent, polarized and dangerous. This is especially true in Latin America. On Oct. 2, Colombia will hold a plebiscite to ask the nation to approve or reject an Obama-backed agreement between the Colombian government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), designated by the State Department as a foreign terrorist organization. The deal gives the FARC amnesty for its war crimes, which include the recruitment of thousands of child soldiers, massacres of villages, political executions, bombings and kidnappings. Under the agreement, negotiated and signed in Havana, the FARC will also get unelected seats in Congress and special welfare benefits. It will be given dozens of radio stations -- so that it can disseminate its propaganda, a privilege no other political party has. The agreement does not require the FARC to pay any financial reparations to its victims, even though the narco-terrorist kingpins have wealth estimated in the billions. Reparations will be paid by law-abiding citizens via sharp tax increases. The FARC says it will not disarm until it's good and ready to. Meanwhile it will be given weapons and training to enforce the agreement. What could possibly go wrong?

New Delhi - The terror attack at an Army camp in Kashmir's Uri district is only the latest in the long line of attacks on India's western border since the BJP led NDA government came to power. Since May 2014, there have been 23 fidayeen (suicide) attacks along the Pakistan border, most of them in Jammu and Kashmir. In the current year, 65 security personnel, including Army men, lost their lives, the highest in the past six years. Security forces gunned down 26 terrorists on suicide missions this year. In the last two years of the United Progressive Alliance rule, eight fidayeen attacks were reported. The National Investigation Agency (NIA), which has been asked to investigate the Uri terror attack, is examining the leads that point towards Pakistan, a senior official said. Though the Army had said that the attack was carried out by terrorists belonging to the Jaish-e- Mohammad, a Pakistan-based terrorist outfit, senior NIA officials said they were yet to come to a conclusion.

35. China probes North Korea bank suspected of nuclear link - South Korea paper

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Seoul - China is investigating executives of a North Korean bank believed to finance the illicit procurement of arms and materials related to the isolated country's banned nuclear programme, South Korea's JoongAng Daily reported on Monday. China and the United States have agreed to step up cooperation in the U.N. Security Council and in law enforcement channels after North Korea's fifth nuclear test on Sept. 9, the White House said last week. While China is North Korea's sole major ally, it disapproves of its nuclear and missile programmes. The Chinese-U.S. cooperation includes targeting the finances of Liaoning Hongxiang Industrial, a Chinese conglomerate headed by a Communist Party cadre, that the Obama administration thinks has had a role in helping North Korea's nuclear programme, the Wall Street Journal reported at the time. The JoongAng Daily said Chinese authorities were investigating a top official of the Kwangson Banking Corporation at its branch in the Chinese border city of Dandong. The U.S. Treasury designated the bank in 2009 under an order that targets entities supporting North Korea's arms trafficking because of its suspected involvement in procuring "dual-use" technology with both civilian and military application.

37. Japan vows to watch Chinese warplane activity closely

Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Tokyo - Japan's top government spokesman warned China on Monday against expanding its military activity to the skies over disputed East China Sea islands after eight Chinese warplanes flew near the area over the weekend. Chief Cabinet Secretary Yoshihide Suga said that Japan scrambled at least one fighter jet after the planes passed over the Miyako Strait on Sunday, east of the Japanese-controlled Senkaku islands, which China also claims and calls the Diaoyu. The aircraft, believed to be two fighter jets, four bombers and two reconnaissance aircraft, did not violate Japanese airspace during a long-distance roundtrip flight, Suga said, but it was the first time Chinese warplanes had flown that route. Chinese media reports said the flights were part of a routine exercise involving about 40 aircraft. Suga acknowledged that the flights might be part of an exercise, but said that Japan would respond firmly to any violation of Japanese airspace. "The government of Japan continues to watch the Chinese military's activity, which has become expansive and more active, while carrying out our surveillance activity," Suga said. "We are determined to defend our land, territorial waters and the skies."

38. Man arrested for claiming to be IS member to get more attention online

Global Times, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Beijing - A man who claimed to be a member of the Islamic State (IS) jihadist group in an attempt to increase his following on social media has been detained by the police in South China's Guangdong Province, local media reported Saturday. The 25-year-old man surnamed Zhong will be detained by local police in Tangjia, Guangdong for five days for "fabricating false facts and spreading rumors online" in defiance of the Public Security Administration Punishments Law, said the Guangzhou-based news portal ycwb.com. Zhong was taken in for questioning by police after the city's department of public security on September 12 found that he had identified himself on the Tieba online forum as a member of IS, an Islamist group that has seized control of parts of Iraq and Syria and claimed responsibility for terror attacks around the world, said the report. However, the official investigation found that Zhong had been working in Zhuhai since graduating college three years ago and has no record of criminal behavior or overseas travel. Police could find no evidence he had been involved in planning terror attacks or had ever contacted IS. According to police, the post in which he claimed to be a member of IS, which garnered more than 500 views, was simply a way for him to get more attention for his micro blog. Zhong has confessed to the crimes of which he was accused, said ycwb.com.

39. S. Korea, U.S. consulting each other at 'various' levels to deal with N.K.

Seoul - South Korea and the United States are closely consulting each other at "various" levels to deal with any possible situations that may arise in dealing with North Korea, Seoul's top diplomat said Monday. "Going beyond the current situation, we are having consultations at various levels with the United States to deal with other developments with regard to the North," Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se told lawmakers during a parliamentary audit. "We are updating our existing military strategies with in-depth discussions with the U.S. in a way that it can best safeguard our security in the most effective manner," he added. Yun made the remarks when asked how the government will respond if Washington pushes to take a pre-emptive attack to resolve the current nuclear standoff. Critics say that South Korea should be prepared for a policy change in the U.S. against Pyongyang from the current one mostly focused on sanctions and pressure to stepped-up military action. They say that the government should also be ready for a possible shift toward talks with the communist country especially after a new president takes office in Washington early next year. Asked whether Seoul will keep a resumption of the talks with the North off the table, and how it will respond to the U.S. pushing for negotiations with Pyongyang, Seoul's top diplomat did not provide a direct answer but noted that all possible scenarios are under consideration.

40. West fabricates China-Russia spy scandals

Global Times, Staff reporter, 2016 09 26

Editorial: Russian space scientist Vladimir Lapygin was sentenced earlier this month to seven years in prison on charges of state treason, according to Western media outlets. He allegedly provided aerospace technology intelligence to an Asian country, which media outlets claimed is China. According to reports, Lapygin worked for the Central Research Institute of Machine Building under the Roscosmos space agency and taught at Moscow's Bauman State Technical Institute. As top secrets were involved, coverage of this case inevitably has been tinged by speculation. Some Chinese scholars told the Global Times that the Western media is keen on reporting spy cases between China and Russia, often with exaggerated and even fake content. Certain pro-Western forces in both Chinese and Russian society are also keen on finding fault with the Sino-Russian relationship. Scholars point out that there is no reason to make a fuss even if there is espionage between the two countries, as every nation, especially major powers, has a need for intelligence. China and Russia have managed the related affairs well. Espionage is not an obstacle for the two sides to deepen their comprehensive strategic partnership of coordination.

41. Hungary seeks suspect in Budapest bombing

Washington Post, Anthony Faiola, 2016 09 26

Budapest - Hungarian authorities staged a manhunt Sunday for the principal suspect in a bomb attack that seriously wounded two patrol officers late Saturday, with authorities saying the homemade device had been planted in an apparent attempt to target police. The incident comes as countries across Europe are on edge following a series of attacks by suspects linked to or inspired by Islamist extremists, as well as an increasing number of acts of violence carried out by the far-right. National police chief Karoly Papp, however, said investigators had not been able to determine whether Saturday's attack - near an empty storefront on a main artery in Budapest, the capital - was intended as an act of terrorism. The explosion took place several blocks from one of Budapest's main entertainment districts, which was not crowded at the time. The nature of the blast - a device armed with metal projectiles and detonated while two officers were on regular patrol - suggested an intent to strike at the city's police, Papp said. Such an attack would be highly unusual in Hungary. "The target was not one of the injured police officers but the police force" itself, he said. "I would like to make it clear that we will find the perpetrator."

42. Terrorism makes int'l security services cooperation 'possible, necessary' - New Russian intel chief

RT (Russia), Staff report, 2016 09 26

Moscow - Security services of various countries should coordinate their efforts despite all political differences, the newly appointed chief of the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service (SVR), Sergey Naryshkin, told Russian media in an interview. "Cooperation between the intelligence services of various countries is not only possible but necessary," Naryshkin said during the interview with Vesti, adding that he is "convinced" that security officials "can and should" cooperate in countering "specific threats and particularly terrorism" despite all political differences. Russian intelligence is ready to cooperate with the US, British and other western security services, adding that security officials "should work together particularly because they understand the level of threat as well as what needs to be done to counter it better than anyone else," he added.

43. The Coming of the Russian Jihad

War on the Rocks, Leon Aron, 2016 09 25

Analysis - On June 28, three suicide bombers entered the Ataturk Airport in Istanbul, where they killed 45 people and injured 229. Although only one of the terrorist was from Russia (the other two were Uzbek and Kyrgyz), it is almost certain that their last words to one another were in Russian. It is estimated that between 5,000 to 7,000 Russian-speaking jihadists have made Russian the second most popular language of ISIL, after Arabic. That Russian should be the lingua franca of jihadists from the former Soviet territory is surprising. Many, perhaps most, younger Kyrgyz, Tajiks, and Uzbeks (judging by the gastarbeiters from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan) do not know Russian well or even at all. That Russia is becoming widely-spoken is indicative of the explosive internationalization and the vastly expanded recruitment patterns of what might be called the Russian Jihad based in Russia and former Soviet Central Asia. With an estimated 2,400 of its citizens fighting with ISIL, Russia is surpassed only by Tunisia and Saudi Arabia in the number of its nationals in the extremist group's ranks. It is far ahead of the top four European suppliers of ISIL soldiers: France with 1,800 fighters, Britain and Germany with 760 each, and Belgium with 470. Russian language graffiti has been spotted in Darayya, Syria ("We will pray in your palace, Putin! Tatars and Chechens, rise up!"), and there is an Univermag grocery store in the "Russian" district of ISIL's de-facto capital of Raqqa, alongside Russian- language schools and kindergartens. 44. Iran Captures Several ISIL Terrorists Again

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 26

Tehran - Governor General of Semnan Province Mohammad Reza Khabbaz announced on Saturday that the Iranian security forces have recently captured a number of ISIL agents in his province. "Identifying and arresting these operatives of the ISIL shows the vigilance of Iran's security and intelligence forces," Khabbaz said. He reiterated that the ISIL terrorists are trying to make Iran insecure, "but the security and military forces' vigilance will not allow them to achieve their goals". The governor general of the Northern province declined to reveal the exact number of the terrorists captured in his province or the date of arrest. Last week, the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) and intelligence forces captured two terrorists of Pakistani origin in the Southeastern parts of the country with two ready-to-explode bombs. The two terrorists were arrested in Kalegan district of Saravan town in Sistan and Balouchestan province in a surprise attack by the Iranian security forces.

45. IRGC: We will Continue to Support Bahrain, Yemen, Syria

Asharq Al-Awsat, Adel al-Salmi, 2016 09 26

London - Mohsen Rezaei, a former IRGC commander, stated that Iran will not stop supporting Yemen, Bahrain and Syria. Rezaei added during an interview with U.S. newspaper Christian Science Monitor that Iran will not wage a war against Saudi Arabia unlike the propaganda war which will continue as long as Riyadh is adopting the same attitude in the region. This interview coincided with first of its kind statements made by IRGC Quds Force Commander Major General Qassem Soleimani on the ongoing political conflict in Iran, following critics demanding him to cease military intervention in Syria. Rezaei revealed Iran's motives to intervene in the Arab internal affairs, especially in Syria, Yemen, Bahrain and Iraq. In a related matter, Soleimani accused internal parties in Iran of trying to persuade the Iranians that the country is in an international isolation. Soleimani delivered his speech during a conference held on the honor of Iran casualties in the First Gulf War.

46. Russia, Iran, Iraq, Syria Continue to Cooperate in Baghdad Intelligence Center

Fars News Agency, 2016 09 26

Tehran - Commander of the Russian Group of Intelligence Sharing Center in Baghdad rejected some media reports that the center has ended work, and said it continues to operate. "This center is successfully fulfilling its task of intelligence sharing with other countries which are member of the center," General Alexander Smolovy said. Smolovy's remarks came in reaction to allegations by some western and Arab media which claimed that the Baghdad Intelligence Sharing Center has ended operation. "There are of course certain powers who want this center to be closed down, but to no avail," he said. He, meantime, reiterated that other countries willing to join the center are welcome. Smolovy pointed to the terrorists' use of chemical weapons against civilians in the region, and said, "The ISIL terrorists have used this weapon several times in Iraq and Syria.

47. Alumni of Israeli Intelligence Unit Help Arab-Owned Businesses in Israel

The Media Line, Linda Gradstein, 2016 09 26

Tel Aviv - Many of the soldiers in Israel's elite intelligence unit 8200 spent their army careers eavesdropping on conversations in Arabic throughout the Middle East. Today, the alumni of this same unit are working to help Arab citizens of Israel get into the high-tech world. "Some say that 8200 is seen as the part of Israeli intelligence that fights Arabs so why should we work with them?" Nir Lempert, the Chairman of the 8200 Alumni Association told The Media Line. "It's a little bit like the NSA (National Security Agency) in the US helping Russians in the US during the Cold War." As soldiers, Lempert said, they strove to contribute to Israeli society by protecting it from outside enemies. Helping Arab Israeli entrepreneurs is another way to contribute to Israeli society, he says. "Our vision is to take the brand of 8200, with our strong technical experience, and use it to encourage Arab society," he said.

48. Extremism Boils Over in Jordan as Writer Who Insulted Islam Is Killed

New York Times, Rana F. Sweis, Peter Baker, 2016 09 26

Amman - Some of the most extreme elements in Jordan made clear in recent weeks that Nahed Hattar should pay for a provocative cartoon he posted online depicting a bearded man in bed with two women ordering God to bring him cashews and wine. So when Mr. Hattar, 56, a prominent writer from a Christian family, showed up at a court on Sunday to face criminal charges of insulting Islam, at least one man with a gun decided a trial was not enough. As three bullets ripped through the writer in front of the courthouse, Jordan's simmering tensions boiled over. The brazen daylight killing of Mr. Hattar in front of his horrified family was not only the latest example of violence tied to cartoon renderings of Muslim figures, it was also the sort of manifestation of extremism that Jordan's government has struggled to contain in a nation that finds itself under pressure from multiple directions. While presenting itself as a stable outlier in a tumultuous region, Jordan maintains a complicated balancing act of its own, split between traditional tribes, Palestinians, a potent jihadi community and now more than 650,000 refugees from the grinding civil war in Syria. As Jordan strives to stay neutral in Syria and off the Islamic State's radar, the cartoon Mr. Hattar posted on Facebook proved just the sort of lighter fuel to feed the flames.

49. Facebook 'blocks accounts' of Palestinian journalists

Al Jazeera, Sophia Hyatt, 2016 09 26

Gaza - Editors from two Palestinian news publications based in the occupied West Bank say their Facebook accounts were suspended last week and that no reason was provided, alleging their pages may have been censored because of a recent agreement between the US social media giant and the Israeli government aimed at tackling "incitement". Last week, four editors from the Shehab News Agency, which has more than 6.3 million likes on Facebook, and three executives from the Quds News Network, with about 5.1 million likes, reported they could not access their personal accounts. Both agencies cover daily news in the occupied Palestinian territories. Nisreen al-Khatib, a translator and journalist at the Quds News Network, told Al Jazeera that the publication believes the account suspensions were triggered by an agreement between Facebook and Israel earlier this month, in which they agreed to jointly combat what Israeli claims is "incitement" by Palestinians on social media.

Amman, Jordanie - La publication sur la page Facebook du journaliste chrétien, le 12 août, d'un dessin moquant la vision de Dieu et du paradis par les djihadistes de l'EI avait suscité une violente polémique dans le royaume hachémite. L'écrivain polémique jordanien Nahed Hattar a été tué par balles, dimanche 25 septembre, devant un tribunal d'Amman où il était jugé pour avoir publié une caricature considérée comme offensante envers l'islam. Le suspect, un employé du ministère de l'éducation et ancien imam de 49 ans, a été inculpé de meurtre avec préméditation, acte terroriste ayant entraîné la mort et possession illégale d'arme à feu. Lors de son interrogatoire, il a dit avoir planifié son acte seul, sans lien avec un groupe terroriste, après la publication par Nahed Hattar de la caricature. Figure controversée, Nahed Hattar, militant politique et journaliste chrétien de 56 ans, n'en était pas à sa première polémique. Emprisonné par le roi Hussein pour ses écrits critiques contre la monarchie hachémite, il avait survécu à une tentative d'assassinat en 1998. Athéiste revendiqué, pourfendeur de l'islam politique, il était aussi un fervent soutien du président syrien Bachar Al-Assad.

51. Spies in space: The story of Israel's Ofek satellite program

Jerusalem Post, Barbara Opall-Rome, 2016 09 26

Jerusalem - If you're looking for a story that captures Israeli innovation, cunning and can-do chutzpa, think spy satellites. Look to Ofek, the Hebrew word for horizon. It's all there in Israel's military satellite program, the newest of which - Ofek 11 - is struggling to stabilize itself in space after its launch earlier last week. Inserted successfully into orbit by the country's homemade Shavit launcher, the newest and most advanced satellite is likely to soldier on in space, but with limited lifespan and ability to perform its high-resolution spy duties. White-knuckled technicians and program managers toiling around the clock at Israel Aerospace Industries' (IAI) ground control station near Ben-Gurion Airport are still hoping for a favorable ending to the latest chapter still unfolding. But like the chapters that have gone before, Ofek 11 represents the highs and lows of a story driven by strategic need and enhanced by its share of diplomatic intrigue.

52. Women assume more active roles in terror outfits

Arab News, Staff Report, 2016 09 26

Jeddah - The Saudi female detainee, Kholoud Al-Rukaibi, is among the first known women in the history of terrorism to have prepared an explosive belt and pushed one of her children influenced by extremist ideology to try to blow himself up in a suicide attack. This was foiled by law enforcement authorities in the Kingdom. Al-Rukaibi helped Daesh in recruiting her two sons, Hamad and Nassar Al-Mousa, and her brother Nasser Al-Rukaibi, and provided material and logistic support to the group, giving an insight into the evolution of women's role in terrorist organizations. These roles began with simple tasks involving the spread of ideology or simple management jobs and matured to include military and leadership positions. Kholoud Al-Rukaibi was arrested for being part of a terrorist network affiliated with Daesh that had planned to target religious scholars and law enforcement officers in addition to security, military and economic establishments in different locations inside the country.

53. Deux jeunes Niçoises prévoient un attentat

La Nouvelle République des Pyrénées, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 26

Nice - Alors que l'alerte terroriste est « maximale », selon les propos du Premier ministre Manuel Valls, une mineure de 17 ans et une majeure de 19 ans ont été interpellées cette semaine et placées en détention provisoire. Les deux jeunes filles, d'origine niçoise, sont soupçonnées d'avoir voulu commettre une action jihadiste sur le territoire français, « avant d'y renoncer ». Une enquête ouverte par la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI) a permis d'établir leur lien avec Rachid Kassim, propagandiste actif du groupe État islamique (EI), qui lance régulièrement des appels aux meurtres via la messagerie cryptée Telegram depuis la zone irako-syrienne. Les deux jeunes filles sont toutes les deux originaires d'un quartier de la ville proche de l'endroit où Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel, Tunisien de 31 ans radicalisé et auteur des attentats du 14 juillet dernier, avait foncé dans la foule avec un camion, faisant 86 morts et 434 blessés. D'après les premières investigations, aucunes armes n'ont été retrouvées dans leurs domiciles. L'enquête est en cours pour tenter de déterminer quelles actions elles étaient prêtes à commettre, ensemble. Les militaires ciblés Au cours de l'enquête et de l'audition des deux jeunes filles, la mineure de 17 ans, inconnue des services de renseignement, a admis en garde à vue « en vouloir beaucoup aux militaires », une cible récurrente du groupe État islamique. Elle a été mise en examen le 17 septembre à Paris pour association de malfaiteurs terroriste criminelle et écrouée. La jeune majeure de 19 ans était en revanche connue dans le cadre de l'enquête sur la filière djihadiste niçoise organisée par Omar Diaby, considéré comme l'un des premiers recruteurs de combattants français.

Madrid - La police espagnole a arrêté deux Marocains accusés de soutenir le groupe djihadiste Etat islamique (EI) et peut-être aussi de projeter un attentat en Europe, a annoncé aujourd'hui le ministère espagnol de la Défense. L'un des accusés avait voulu rejoindre l'EI en Syrie et s'était rendu à la frontière turco-syrienne pour y rencontrer un membre de l'organisation djihadiste, afin de subir un entraînement avant de regagner l'Europe pour participer à un attentat, a précisé le ministère. Cet homme avait été interpellé par la police turque avant de franchir la frontière syrienne et avait été, après sa libération, expulsé vers l'Espagne où il a poursuivi ses efforts pour rejoindre les rangs de l'EI. L'autre individu arrêté est accusé d'avoir aidé le premier dans ses efforts pour gagner la zone de guerre en Syrie et de l'avoir entraîné après son retour en Espagne, a précisé le ministère de l'Intérieur.

56. Les Suisses approuvent la surveillance électronique par les services secrets but de déjouer les menaces terroristes. La Suisse a répondu massivement "oui". Les électeurs suisses acceptent que les services secrets surveillent leurs communications téléphoniques et activités sur internet pour notamment déjouer les nouvelles menaces terroristes. Selon les résultats définitifs du référendum organisé dimanche 25 septembre, deux tiers (65,5%) des électeurs ont accepté cette nouvelle loi sur le renseignement, un chiffre dépassant largement les prévisions des sondages réalisés pendant la campagne (53-58 %), avec un taux de participation d'environ 43 % (habituel en Suisse). En revanche, ils sont 59,4 % à avoir dit "non" à une hausse des retraites dont le gouvernement avait souligné la charge financière très élevée qu'elle représentait. Ils ont aussi rejeté à 63,6 % une initiative populaire défendue par les Verts qui demandaient une réduction de la consommation des ressources naturelles. Seuls les habitants du canton de Genève l'ont soutenue.

57. Swiss endorse new surveillance powers

BBC News, Staff report, 2016 09 26

London - Swiss voters have given a strong approval to a law on new surveillance powers for the intelligence agencies. The new law would allow the authorities to tap phones, snoop on email and deploy hidden cameras and bugs. It would help Switzerland catch up with other countries, supporters say. Opponents have feared it could erode civil liberties and put Swiss neutrality at risk by requiring closer co-operation with foreign intelligence agencies. Some 65.5% of voters agreed to accept the proposal. It will allow the Federal Intelligence Service and other agencies to put suspects under electronic surveillance if authorised by a court, the defence ministry and the cabinet.

1. CSIS has 'complied' with Bill C-51's anti-terror powers, watchdog committee says
Toronto Star Online, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - The civilian watchdog committee that oversees Canada's spy agency is giving a cautious thumbs-up to CSIS for its exercise of newly acquired anti-terror powers under Bill C-51, the controversial law passed last year that the Liberal government says it will amend. Pierre

Blais, chair of the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), said in an interview that CSIS appears to have used in a responsible manner its warranted and unwarranted powers of threat disruption and information-sharing. Under Bill C-51, passed by the previous Conservative government in 2015, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) was given wide-ranging ability to disrupt or reduce threats to Canada's national security, inside or outside Canada. The only limits on the new power are that CSIS must not cause death or bodily harm, obstruct justice, or violate an individual's sexual integrity. If any steps that CSIS proposes to take might violate Canadians' charter rights, the spy agency is required to go to court to seek a judicial warrant for the activity. In its 2015-16 annual report (www.sirc-csars.gc.ca), tabled Thursday in Parliament, SIRC said CSIS has put in place appropriate policies, procedures, and mandatory training to guide its agents on intervening to disrupt threats - "however this is still a work in progress." The report recommended that CSIS formalize consultation with other affected departments, such as Global Affairs, when threat reduction activity could overlap their areas or raise concerns for their operations. The watchdog examined all 24 instances to date where CSIS acted to disrupt perceived security threats, and said "all complied with the CSIS Act, ministerial direction and operational policies." It reported no judicial warrants were issued, and no applications for such warrants were refused. SIRC said CSIS itself had documented a risk of over-collecting. The report said "a governance framework was drafted two years ago, but that it had not yet been finalized." SIRC's recommendations are non-binding. Yet CSIS director Michel Coulombe issued a written statement saying CSIS is acting to strengthen its rules around such information gathering. SIRC said CSIS uses bulk data sets in many ways, cross-checking it with "information already connected to a potential threat - such as an address, phone number or citizen identification number - and using it to search for 'hits' in the data."

2. CSIS suspends some bulk data mining programs pending new guidelines

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - Canada's domestic spy service has halted its "bulk collection" of data after criticisms were raised within government about the lawfulness of such technique. A watchdog agency's new report about the Canadian Security Intelligence Service speaks of littleknown CSIS data-mining programs, and of how some have recently been suspended because of a lack of clear rules and guidelines surrounding them. CSIS is said to have wanted to leverage big pools of data "to identify previously unknown individuals of interest by linking together types of information that have mirrored threat behaviour," according to the report. But after concerns raised in the report, "CSIS agreed to halt ingesting bulk data sets pending" new rules. These findings are from the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), the watchdog agency that tabled its annual report in Parliament on Thursday. The cryptic discussion of CSIS's "data management and exploitation activities" is intriguing on several levels. Talk of spies "ingesting" data in "bulk" has had connotations of intelligence officials indiscriminately amassing citizens' telecommunications records. Yet CSIS officers, who work to track terrorists within Canada, are generally understood to handle cases one wiretapping warrant at a time. This makes them more like conventional police detectives than the foreign-focused signals-intelligence - or "sigint" - spies who deal in volume. This week, the federal Privacy Commissioner called for Parliament to pass new laws after finding Canada's other intelligence agency had been careless with records about the logged telecommunications of Canadians. Communications Security Establishment (CSE), a foreign-focused "sigint" agency, says that whenever it collects Canadians' telecommunications trails, it does so only "incidentally." That's because it is pursuing foreign records in enormous volumes. While CSIS and CSE have vastly different mandates, they also have adjacent headquarters. They can team up if a Federal Court judge endorses a joint operation. In 2013, the former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden leaked documents to the media about the bulk collection of American citizens' telecommunications trails.

3. Égoprotrait avec Justin Trudeau Enquête Québécois au coeur d'une enquête antiterroriste Troublé, mais pas surpris. Matthew Schrier croit depuis longtemps que les autorités canadiennes ne prennent pas assez au sérieux les crimes dont il a été victime. Surveillance des combattants à l'étranger Le ministère de la Sécurité publique soutient qu'il a les outils pour traiter des cas de Canadiens de retour au pays après avoir pris part à des activités de groupes terroristes. « Le gouvernement dispose d'un certain nombre d'outils pour faire face aux combattants à l'étranger, dont la révocation de passeports, le Programme de protection des passagers et des accusations possibles. Comme l'a souligné le directeur du SCRS [Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité], le nombre total de Canadiens à l'étranger impliqués dans des activités liées à la menace [terroriste] est d'environ 180, avec environ 60 présumés combattants qui sont retournés au Canada. Les organismes canadiens d'application de la loi effectuent le travail difficile de recueillir les preuves nécessaires pour condamner les présumés combattants à l'étranger dans un tribunal pénal canadien », a indiqué Scott Bardsley, porte-parole du ministre de la Sécurité publique Ralph Goodale.

4. Man in Trudeau selfie linked to RCMP terror investigation

CBC.CA, Adrienne Arsenault & Nazim Baksh, 2016 09 30

Toronto - The worries about a suspect in a terror investigation seen posing for a selfie last year with the prime minister go far beyond the anxiety of how he got that close. A joint CBC News/Radio-Canada investigation has learned that the man is one of at least four Quebec men of interest to the RCMP for their alleged connection to the 2012 kidnappings of two Americans in Syria. The man in the selfie, in his mid-20s, is believed to be on a U.S. no-fly list. His home was raided by police as part of a terror investigation a few months before Dec. 18, 2015, when the selfie was taken. The man was part of a crowd of people who took turns posing with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau following a Radio-Canada interview in Montreal. Police have interviewed others in the group and seized electronics and Canadian passports held by some of them. CBC has been in contact with two of the men, who are going about their lives in Quebec.

Sources have indicated that the other two may be overseas, possibly in Syria or Turkey. CBC has repeatedly asked CSIS and the RCMP about the travels and status of the men. Both agencies have declined to provide details. The questions keep piling up about just what they may have done or may still be doing. The names of the men in the group appear repeatedly in logs from a Montreal rifle range. While the RCMP has seized some of the logs, CBC has obtained others. They show repeated entries from up to nine men, in 2012, in the months just before a few of them were thought to have left for Syria, including the man in the selfie. The men appear to all be there at the invitation of another Montreal man known to police.

Ottawa - Le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) a passé au crible une grande quantité de données dans l'espoir de trouver des informations valables avant qu'un organisme fédéral ne déplore l'absence de lignes directrices au sujet de leur collecte, indique un nouveau rapport. Le SCRS avait accepté de ne plus acquérir ces données avant la mise en place d'un cadre régissant ce type de recherche. Dans son rapport annuel déposé au Parlement, jeudi, le Comité de surveillance des activités de renseignement de sécurité (CSARS) écrit que l'agence avait utilisé ces fichiers afin de pouvoir identifier des personnes d'intérêt jusque-là inconnues en raccordant divers renseignements pouvant révéler «un comportement menaçant».

6. Arms deal an act of friendship

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase & Robert Fife, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - Saudi Arabian officials say the controversial $15-billion Canadian deal to supply Riyadh with weaponized armoured vehicles should be seen as a goodwill gesture by the Islamic kingdom to cement its friendship with Canada. They are also denying the authenticity of reports that show older Canadian-made combat vehicles taking part in the Yemeni war - a use for the machines that was not contemplated when Canada sold them to Saudi Arabia to maintain internal security. Saudi Arabia's chief envoy told The Globe and Mail that the General Dynamics LAV contract, personally approved for export by Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion in April, is an act of friendship. "This contract has been given to Canada to improve the relations and enhance the relations," Ambassador Naif Bin Bandar al. Sudairi told The Globe during a media event at the Saudi embassy in Ottawa on Wednesday evening. "So we have to see this contract from this perspective - co-operation." The Saudi declarations of goodwill come as Riyadh's relationship with the United States is under increasing scrutiny. This week, Republicans and Democrats in the House and Senate voted by large margins to override a presidential veto and allow the passage of legislation that permits families of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks to sue Saudi Arabia in U.S. courts for its alleged role in the event.

7. Bon retour, Mme Hoodfar

La Presse+, Rima Elkouri, 2016 09 30

Chronique - Ses proches ont remué ciel et terre pour qu'elle soit libérée. Cent douze jours plus tard, leurs efforts ont porté leurs fruits. La longue saison en enfer était enfin terminée. Souriante, Homa Hoodfar a franchi les portes du terminal international de l'aéroport de Montréal avec ce regard profond qu'ont ceux qui reviennent de loin. Le regard d'une survivante enfin libre. Devant une haie de journalistes, des proches de la professeure canado-iranienne, libérée après près de quatre mois de détention en Iran, l'ont accueillie avec des fleurs et des cris de joie. Sa nièce Amanda Ghahremani ne lui lâchait pas la main. Comme si elle n'arrivait toujours pas à croire que sa tante Homa était bel et bien là à ses côtés. Libre. Souriante. Vivante. Debout. La scène magnifique donnait des frissons. Joie et soulagement se lisaient dans les étreintes et les regards embués de ses amis et de ses proches qui l'attendaient avec impatience. Ils avaient craint le pire depuis ce jour de juin où la professeure montréalaise, en voyage en Iran, avait été jetée en prison à la suite d'accusations sans fondements. Ils ont remué ciel et terre pour qu'elle soit libérée. Cent douze jours plus tard, leurs efforts ont porté leurs fruits. La longue saison en enfer était enfin terminée. Et ils avaient peine à y croire.

8. Canadiens détenus à l'étranger Du bruit... mais pas trop

La Presse+, Alexandre Sirois, 2016 09 30

Editorial - « Le Canada a été honteusement silencieux devant la parodie de justice qui a mené à la détention de son citoyen. » La célèbre avocate Amal Clooney, femme de l'acteur vedette George Clooney, n'a pas mâché ses mots l'an dernier à l'égard du gouvernement canadien de Stephen Harper. Elle lui reprochait de ne pas s'être impliqué assez vigoureusement pour obtenir la libération de son client, le journaliste Mohamed Fahmy. Accusé d'avoir répandu des fausses nouvelles, ce reporter canado-égyptien a vécu un véritable calvaire. Il a été enfermé pendant 438 jours dans une prison égyptienne pour avoir, en fait, exercé son métier. Mohamed Fahmy fait campagne ces jours-ci avec Amnistie internationale pour qu'aucun autre citoyen canadien ne connaisse le même sort que lui. Ils veulent éviter que le Canada ne soit à nouveau trop silencieux dans le cas de certains Canadiens « victimes de violations des droits de la personne à l'étranger », alors que dans d'autres cas, Ottawa fait du bruit et se démène. On constate d'autant plus que cette discrimination existe depuis le retour au Canada - enfin ! - de la Montréalaise Homa Hoodfar. Dans son cas, le gouvernement semble avoir trimé dur pour qu'elle soit libérée. Et c'est tant mieux !

9. Des départs suspects dès 2012

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine; Vincent Larouche, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - Ils ont l'air de jouer à la guerre. Nous sommes en 2012, dans un champ de tir en banlieue de Montréal. Une demi-douzaine de garçons, à l'aube de l'âge adulte, s'entraînent au maniement des armes à feu. Le groupe ne passe pas inaperçu. Les jeunes ne sont visiblement pas des chasseurs. Ils n'ont pas d'équipement, tirant en chaussures sport dans la neige. Ils ne sont pas particulièrement habiles avec leurs armes. Entre les salves de balles, ils s'arrêtent pour prier, raconte un habitué de l'endroit, qui n'a pas souhaité parler publiquement par crainte de représailles. « Même s'ils ont un comportement qui ne cadre pas avec le groupe, ils s'en foutent. Ils aiment montrer qu'ils sont à part », raconte l'homme. Au moins un des garçons porte des gants de caoutchouc et des lunettes de ski quand il tire. Une tactique parfois utilisée par ceux qui prévoient bientôt franchir un point de contrôle dans un aéroport et qui craignent que des traces de poudre ne restent sur leurs mains ou sur leur visage. Les jeunes font partie d'une petite cellule de Québécois dont le discours et les idées islamistes extrémistes inquiètent déjà à l'époque les autorités antiterroristes. Des agents de la GRC visitent d'ailleurs régulièrement le champ de tir où ils s'entraînent. Dans quelques mois, ils seront parmi les premiers Canadiens à partir vers la Turquie apparemment avec l'intention de gagner la Syrie pour grossir les rangs des djihadistes. Des experts parlent d'eux comme de la « première vague ». Comme un service militaire « Ceux qui sont partis en 2011-2012, du Québec ou d'ailleurs, c'était juste pour prendre part au djihad, comme ceux qui sont partis faire le djihad en Afghanistan, en Bosnie, en Tchétchénie. C'était comme le service militaire : on fait ça puis on rentre à la maison », explique Hicham Tiflati, ancien employé du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence, aujourd'hui membre d'un groupe de recherche sur la radicalisation au féminin à l'Université McGill.

10. Held in notorious Iranian prison for months, Montrealer Homa Hoodfar says it is 'wonderful' to be back home

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 09 30

Montreal - After 112 days in Iran's notorious Evin prison, Concordia University Professor Homa Hoodfar finally touched down in Montreal Thursday morning, welcomed by friends, family and other supporters who worked tirelessly for her release. "I want to say it's wonderful to be home," Hoodfar told reporters at Trudeau Airport. "I've had a bitter seven months, and the detention has left me weak and tired." Hoodfar thanked the Trudeau government as well as the Omani government for helping secure her release, and extending their generous hospitality since Monday to help her recover. She also thanked students and colleagues, "and especially civil society, human rights (advocates) and feminists who campaigned and mobilized for my freedom." The most difficult part of her detention was not being able to communicate with loved ones, knowing they were very worried, she said. After months of blackout, and even her lawyer being fired, she said she didn't even know what was happening when she was told to get ready at 8 a.m. Monday. "I didn't feel I would be released until I was on the jet. In Iran, nothing is complete until it is complete." Now that she's back in Montreal, she said it's wonderful to be in a secure place. Sitting in her cell in Iran, she said she thought of the beautiful Montreal summer that she was missing.

11. Il prend un égoportrait avec Trudeau malgré des soupçons de terrorisme

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles (site web), Gaétan Pouliot avec Karine Bastien et Sonia Desmarais, 2016 09 29

Ottawa - Un jeune homme membre d'un groupe soupçonné d'actes terroristes a pu prendre un égoportrait avec le premier ministre Justin Trudeau, sans être inquiété par les gardes de sécurité. Deux mois après avoir remporté les élections, le premier ministre canadien accordait une entrevue à Radio-Canada à la Place des Arts, au centre-ville de Montréal. En plus de répondre aux questions du journaliste Patrice Roy, il discute avec le public et prend un bain de foule. C'est à ce moment qu'un jeune homme prend un égoportrait avec Justin Trudeau, qu'il publiera ensuite sur son compte Facebook. Une enquête de Radio-Canada a démontré que cet homme est lié à un groupe de Québécois qui intéressent la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) pour une histoire d'enlèvement en Syrie. Aucune accusation n'a été portée contre lui. C'est pour cela que nous avons masqué son visage sur la photo et que nous ne l'identifions pas. Nous savons cependant que sa résidence avait été perquisitionnée par les policiers dans une affaire de terrorisme quelques mois plus tôt. En 2012, le groupe de Québécois s'entraînait par ailleurs dans un centre de tir de la région de Montréal. Au moins quatre de ces hommes sont soupçonnés d'actes terroristes en lien avec l'enlèvement et l'extorsion de fonds subie par deux Américains pris en otage par le Front al-Nosra, branche syrienne de l'organisation terroriste Al- Qaïda.

12. Military will bolster French counterterror operation

Canadian Press, Lee Bethiaume, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - As the Liberal government contemplates which United Nations peacekeeping mission to join, the Canadian military is gearing up to support a major French counterterrorism operation in northern Africa. Defence officials say planning is underway for Canada to send military transport aircraft to help France in its fight against Islamic militant groups in five countries: Mauritania, Mali, Burkina Faso, Niger and Chad. About 3,000 heavily armed French troops have been hunting al Qaeda-linked fighters in the region, called the Sahel, since August 2014. Code-named Operation Barkhane, the mission has also been recently tasked with supporting UN peacekeepers in Mali if required. National Defence spokesman Daniel Le Bouthillier said plans have not been finalized, but Canadian transport planes are expected to move French troops and equipment into the region. Canadian military aircraft carried nearly 40 tonnes of equipment between France and Africa with three different flights last year.

13. Pick a side on anti-terror law

Toronto Star, 2016 09 30

Editorial: Living in the digital age and amid expanding security powers, privacy can often seem like a lost cause. But the erosion, while real, is not inevitable. It is a choice. And even as Ottawa undertakes its public consultation on security issues, it is a choice the Trudeau government seems not to want to confront publicly. That's the most striking takeaway from a new report by privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien, which warns once again of the "unprecedented" threat to privacy posed by Canada's badly flawed anti-terror law, known as C-51, and of the Liberal government's failure to mitigate those threats or even fully acknowledge them. In particular, Therrien argues the government is falling short in its application of a part of the law that grants Ottawa new powers to share Canadians' personal information among departments. Under C-51, such sharing is allowed whenever information is deemed relevant to activity that "undermines the security of Canada." Critics, including Therrien, have said the legislation's wording is overly broad and opens the door for departments and agencies to share personal information of people suspected of no crime. Given the Trudeau government's oft-stated commitment to striking a balance between security and civil liberties, one would hope these powers would be wielded carefully. Yet Therrien's office found that while the new rules had been invoked often - 110 times over six months - only two of the 17 departments involved had conducted "privacy impact assessments," routine reports used to ensure new policies don't violate Canadians' rights.

14. Sticking to his guns

Toronto Star, Vincent Larouche & Gabrelle Duchaine, 2016 09 30

Montreal -- A young Montreal man suspected of having gone to Syria and adhering to "extremist Islamist" ideologies was able to keep his firearms licence for years and to legally purchase semi-automatic rifles while he was the subject of a terrorism investigation by the RCMP, a La Presse investigation has found. The case of Samy Nefkha-Bahri raises numerous questions about the control of firearms in Canada and the communication between police forces. The police believe that the man went to Syria to participate in terrorist activities in 2012. Nefkha-Bahri said, rather, that he left Canada "because he was sick of the surveillance." "I was literally being recorded everywhere I went," he said in an interview. Before his departure, a judge authorized a search warrant for his parents' home as well as a wiretap on the telephone line. To obtain authorization for the search warrant, the police had to demonstrate that they had serious reasons to believe that their target was involved in terrorism. It would still take 21/ years for author2 ities to revoke his right to own weapons, in January 2015. The Montrealer has not been charged with any terrorism offences. Last year, he was charged with intimidating a Crown prosecutor assigned to a terrorism case. A publication ban prevents reporting of any details in that case. He is awaiting trial. He has attempted to contest the revocation of his firearms licence before the courts. It's a question of principle because he feels that he has been treated unjustly, according to his lawyer, Kaven Morasse. He maintains that he is non-violent, never intended to use his guns for malicious purposes and never encouraged or supported a terrorist group. Nefkha-Bahri appeared on the RCMP radar around 2012, according to several sources close to the case, who are not authorized to speak publicly. He was part of the same wave of departures that year as the young man who was photographed in December 2015 with Justin Trudeau. At the time, his speech was judged to be radical and his marked interest for firearms caught the attention of the authorities. He obtained his firearms licence without any restrictions in January 2012, at the age of 23, according to judicial documents at the Montreal courthouse viewed by La Presse.

15. Terrorisme - Un suspect armé vaut mieux qu'une enquête avortée, selon des experts

Marie Vastel, Marie Vastel, 2016 09 30

Ottawa - Un citoyen soupçonné de terrorisme par les autorités devrait-il pouvoir conserver ses armes à feu ? L'opposition scande que non. Mais les experts précisent que le bien d'une enquête peut justifier de ne pas intervenir pour éviter d'alerter l'individu. La nouvelle en a fait sourciller plusieurs : un jeune Montréalais soupçonné d'être allé en Syrie et d'adhérer à des idéologies " extrémistes islamistes " a pu conserver son permis de possession d'armes à feu pendant deux ans et demi et même s'acheter deux nouvelles armes entre-temps, révélait La Presse jeudi. Le jeune homme ne fait pas l'objet d'accusations, mais la GRC a obtenu en 2012 un permis de perquisition et d'écoute téléphonique. Son permis d'armes à feu a été révoqué début 2015. " À partir du moment où on a une enquête qui est ouverte, on devrait pouvoir restreindre les permis d'acquisition d'armes à feu. Et selon le résultat de l'enquête, on peut le redonner par après ", a réagi le conservateur Pierre Paul-Hus. " C'est inacceptable ", a renchéri le bloquiste Luc Thériault. Acte volontaire La Gendarmerie royale n'a pas précisé quelles étaient les règles en vertu desquelles le contrôleur des armes à feu d'une province pouvait révoquer le permis de possession d'armes à feu d'un citoyen. La Loi fédérale sur les armes à feu stipule que le contrôleur peut le faire " pour toute raison valable ", notamment après une condamnation pour une infraction criminelle.

16. Yes, please, to real metadata legislation

Globe and Mail, 2016 09 30

Editorial: Metadata is not something metaphysical. As Daniel Therrien, the Privacy Commissioner of Canada, rightly says, "We generate metadata constantly." Like an envelope, this outer shell of any electronic communication - a phone log, a time stamp, an e-mail address or an IP address - can reveal a lot. Mr. Therrien is particularly worried about the Communications Security Establishment, the Canadian member of the intelligence alliance called the Five Eyes; the other four eyes are the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. As long ago as 2008, the Five Eyes dealt well with metadata. But then something went wrong with the CSE's "filtering technique" - that is, separating the metadata attached to the private communications of Canadians from that of the foreigners the CSE is mandated to monitor. In 2013, the CSE realized that Canadians were getting scooped up in its metadata trawling. The CSE maintains that the risk to privacy is minimal. If that is so, why did the Five Eyes design the the filtering technique in the first place? Was it really superfluous? CSE officials themselves acknowledged to the Privacy Commissioner's office that the CSE had improperly shared large amounts of metadata. This could undermine the public's confidence, and the various governments' too, that the Five Eyes will never, ever spy on each others' citizens. Mr. Therrien pointed to the work of three computer scientists at Stanford University that was published this year. They argue that people's supposedly innocuous metadata are often every bit as revealing as the types of evidence that police present when they apply for search warrants.

17. Angered by 9/11 Victims Law, Saudis Rethink U.S. Alliance

New York Times, Ben Hubbard, 2016 09 30

Riyadh - Throughout President Obama's time in the White House, Saudi Arabia and its allies in the Persian Gulf have watched with dismay as the kingdom's decades-old alliance with the United States seemed to be slipping. Then came the overwhelming congressional support for Jasta, or the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act, which will allow relatives of those killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to sue Saudi Arabia for any suspected role in the plot. That was all the proof many Saudis needed that the alliance that has underpinned the regional order for decades was fraying -- perhaps irreparably. "Jasta is a wake up call for the Saudis, that it is time to revisit the concept of the alliance with the United States," said Khalid al-Dakhil, a Saudi political sociologist and writer. Saudis responded to the passage of the bill, after both houses of Congress voted on Wednesday to override Mr. Obama's veto, with a mix of anger and disappointment, while many have already begun thinking about how their country will need to adjust.

18. Cyber-experts: New Md. voting system is at risk

Washington Post, Josh Hicks, 2016 09 30

Washington - Cybersecurity experts are warning that Maryland's online absentee-ballot system is dangerously vulnerable to tampering and privacy invasions, both growing concerns in a year when hackers have breached the Democratic National Committee and attempted to access boards of elections in at least two states. The system allows voters who request an absentee ballot to receive the form by email and send back a printed hard copy, with their votes marked by hand or with a new online tool that allows users to mark the document with the click of a mouse or the touch of a keyboard, then print it for mail delivery. Until this year, in large part because of security concerns, the latter option was available only to people with disabilities. Critics say it is easy for impostors to use stolen credentials to request absentee ballots or for cyberthieves to hack in and retrieve data about who is requesting ballots or details of votes that were cast online. All registered voters in Maryland are allowed to request an absentee ballot, regardless of whether they will be away from their polling station on Election Day. With less than six weeks before Election Day, officials say they have taken steps to safeguard their online system, which was required as part of a 2013 law designed to increase voter participation and make voting more accessible. The board voted 4 to 1 on Sept. 14 to certify broad use of the online marking tool. "The issue of electronic- ballot delivery is resolved," Nikki Charlson, deputy administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, said Thursday. "The General Assembly has made its policy decision, and without a repeal of the statute, it is what it is."

19. FBI partly blames Snowden for reduction in email, phone surveillance

Washington Times, Andrea Noble, 2016 09 30

Washington - The FBI's use of a surveillance statute to collect Americans' phone and email records has declined since details about the program were leaked by Edward Snowden in 2013, a watchdog report has found. The FBI's use of Section 215 of the Patriot Act to obtain "business records" as part of national security investigations peaked in 2012, with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court approving 212 orders seeking records, according to a report released Thursday by the Justice Department's inspector general's office. The program was publicly disclosed in June 2013 after the former National Security Agency contractor leaked information to the press. That year, the number of orders authorized by the court dropped to 179. The number of orders approved by the court has continued to decrease annually, with 142 orders approved in 2015. The program allowed authorities to collect information about clients from service providers, such as email or phone records -- including the numbers, times and durations of calls. Outcry over the program after Mr. Snowden's revelations led to reform the surveillance program. When Congress renewed the USA Freedom Act last year, it blocked bulk collection and storage of data. A deputy chief within the FBI's National Security Division partly blamed Mr. Snowden's disclosures for the decrease in use of the provision.

20. Hackers Target Election Systems in 20 States

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 09 30

New York - There have been hacking attempts on election systems in more than 20 states -- far more than had been previously acknowledged -- a senior Department of Homeland Security official told NBC News on Thursday. The "attempted intrusions" targeted online systems like registration databases, and not the actual voting or tabulation machines that will be used on Election Day and are not tied to the Internet. The DHS official described much of the activity as "people poking at the systems to see if they are vulnerable." "We are absolutely concerned," the DHS official said. "The concern is the ability to cause confusion and chaos." Meanwhile, intelligence officials tell NBC News there is now "no doubt" the Russian government is trying to influence the election. In recent days, U.S. officials tell NBC News, American spy agencies have determined that the Russian government was behind the leaks of Democratic National Committee emails to Wikileaks and others -- and that the goal was to undermine confidence in the American presidential election.

21. How Russia Wants to Undermine the U.S. Election (Canada)

Time Magazine, Massimo Calabresi, 2016 09 29

New York - The leaders of the U.S. government, including the President and his top national-security advisers, face an unprecedented dilemma. Since the spring, U.S. intelligence and law-enforcement agencies have seen mounting evidence of an active Russian influence operation targeting the 2016 presidential election. It is very unlikely the Russians could sway the actual vote count, because our election infrastructure is decentralized and voting machines are not accessible from the Internet. But they can sow disruption and instability up to, and on, Election Day, more than a dozen senior U.S. officials tell TIME, undermining faith in the result and in democracy itself. The question, debated at multiple meetings at the White House, is how aggressively to respond to the Russian operation. Publicly naming and shaming the Russians and describing what the intelligence community knows about their activities would help Americans understand and respond prudently to any disruptions that might take place between now and the close of the polls. Senior Justice Department officials have argued in favor of calling out the Russians, and that position has been echoed forcefully outside of government by lawmakers and former top national-security officials from both political parties. Unfortunately, it's not that simple. The President and several of his closest national-security advisers are concerned about the danger of a confrontation in the new and ungoverned world of cyberspace, and they argue that while the U.S. has powerful offensive and defensive capabilities there, an escalating confrontation carries significant risks. National Security Council officials warn that our critical infrastructure—including the electricity grid, transportation sector and energy networks—is vulnerable to first strikes; others say attacks on private companies, stock exchanges and the media could affect the economy. Senior intelligence officials even worry about Russia exposing U.S. espionage operations in retaliation. And while U.S. officials have "high confidence" that Russia is behind what they describe as a major influence operation, senior U.S. officials tell TIME, their evidence would not yet stand up in court. And so with five weeks to go, the White House is, for now, letting events unfold. (Vladimir)Putin has shown little sign of stopping, even when meddling is discovered. In April, the DNC suspected it had been hacked and called in the cyberforensics firm CrowdStrike, which was co-founded in 2011 by Alperovitch and employs a number of former government cybersecurity experts. CrowdStrike was familiar with Fancy Bear: it had previously found the group's hacks in Canada, Japan and the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

22. Lawmakers Aim to Narrow Terror-Victims Bill

Wall Street Journal, Kristina Peterson, Carol E. Lee, 2016 09 30

Washington - Leading lawmakers said Thursday they were working on ways to mitigate possible unintended consequences of legislation letting Americans sue foreign governments over terrorist attacks, just one day after both the House and Senate soundly overrode President Barack Obama's veto of the bill. Some lawmakers expressed buyer's remorse over the legislation, which would enable victims of the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks and their families to sue Saudi Arabia, worrying that the bill could spark reciprocal lawsuits and put Americans abroad in the legal crosshairs of foreign governments. "It appears as if there may be some unintended ramifications," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) told reporters Thursday. "I do think it's worth further discussing." The president vetoed the bill last Friday, arguing it did little to deter future terrorist attacks and could endanger U.S. intelligence officials and diplomats abroad by eroding sovereign immunity, the centuries-old legal doctrine that generally protects national governments, including the U.S., from being sued against their will. Mr. Obama said Wednesday night that Congress had made a "mistake" in overriding his veto for the first time in his presidency.

23. Russia steps up trolling attacks on the West, U.S. intel report finds

Yahoo News, Michael Isikoff, 2016 09 29

New York - A new U.S. intelligence report says the Russian government is conducting a wide-ranging and "opportunistic" campaign to expand its political influence in Europe by deploying Internet "trolls and other cyber actors" to challenge pro-Western journalists and spread pro-Kremlin messages in social media forums. Yahoo News obtained a declassified summary of the report, which also describes the role of two state-owned media outlets, RT and Sputnik, in what some experts say is an increasingly aggressive "information warfare" campaign. According to the report, the outlets promote Russia's political aims with programming targeted to "activist" audiences including "far-right and far-left elements of European society." It adds that the RT channel gives "disproportionate coverage and airtime to the European Parliament's more extreme factions." The report, by the office of Director of National Intelligence James Clapper, was originally requested by congressional intelligence committees late last year. The panels also asked for a separate report on Russia's use of political assassination. Classified versions of both documents were delivered by Clapper's office to Capitol Hill in July. Michael Weiss, editor of the Interpreter, an online publication that tracks the Russian media (and that is funded by Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty), said he was personally targeted by Russian trolls after he published an article exposing a frequent RT commentator on Germany as the editor of a neo-Nazi magazine. "They've been on a campaign to destroy my career," said Weiss. He's found himself attacked on social media forums as a "neocon Zionist propagandist," he said. A pro-Russian troll even dug into his wife's Facebook account to retrieve old photos, he said. Another tactic of the trolls is to inject blatantly false stories into the media, forcing public officials in Europe and the U.S. to respond, according to Weiss and other experts.

24. Trump draws supremacists out of hiding

Los Angeles Times, Lisa Mascaró, 2016 09 30

Los Angeles - David Duke worked the Louisiana gun show like a preacher pursuing souls, cornering potential voters as they picked over firearms and ammo. The robes are gone and the rhetoric is softer than during his grand wizard days. But Duke has not shed his relentless proselytizing for the white race, even though voters have repeatedly rejected the former Ku Klux Klan leader's attempts to regain public office. Duke is undeterred. As he sees it, this is the moment. After last running for election in 1999, he's back with a long-shot bid for Louisiana's open U.S. Senate seat. And his reason for optimism is clear: Donald Trump. "I love it," said Duke, 66, tearing into a chicken garlic pizza at a nearby restaurant later. "The fact that Donald Trump's doing so well, it proves that I'm winning. I am winning." Stormfront, already one of the oldest and largest white nationalist websites, reported a 600% increase in readership since President Obama's election, and now has more than 1 in 5 threads devoted to Trump. It reportedly had to upgrade its servers recently because of the increased traffic. "Before Trump, our identity ideas, national ideas -- they had no place to go," said Richard Spencer, president of the National Policy Institute, a white nationalist think tank based in Arlington, Va.

25. U.S. Military Is Building a $100 Million Drone Base in Africa

The Intercept, Nick Turse, 2016 09 29

Washington - From high above, Agadez almost blends into the cocoa-colored wasteland that surrounds it. Only when you descend farther can you make out a city that curves around an airfield before fading into the desert. Once a nexus for camel caravans hauling tea and salt across the Sahara, Agadez is now a West African paradise for people smugglers and a way station for refugees and migrants intent on reaching Europe's shores by any means necessary. Africans fleeing unrest and poverty are not, however, the only foreigners making their way to this town in the center of Niger. U.S. military documents reveal new information about an American drone base under construction on the outskirts of the city. The long-planned project -- considered the most important U.S. military construction effort in Africa, according to formerly secret files obtained by The Intercept through the Freedom of Information Act -- is slated to cost $100 million, and is just one of a number of recent American military initiatives in the impoverished nation. The base is the latest sign, experts say, of an ever-increasing emphasis on counterterrorism operations in the north and west of the continent. As the only country in the region willing to allow a U.S. base for MQ-9 Reapers -- a newer, larger, and potentially more lethal model than the venerable Predator drone -- Niger has positioned itself to be the key regional hub for U.S. military operations, with Agadez serving as the premier outpost for launching intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance missions against a plethora of terror groups.

26. The danger was worth it, says IRA infiltrator

London Times, Sean O'Neill, 2016 09 30

Dublin - An FBI spy who infiltrated the Real IRA said he felt vindicated now that a £1.6 million ruling against the alleged perpetrators of the Omagh bombing has been upheld by the European Court of Human Rights. David Rupert, an American businessman who worked on behalf of the FBI, said that yesterday's ECHR decision showed that "the truth shall overcome". He was reacting to the court's rejection of an attempt by Michael McKevitt and Liam Campbell, two convicted Real IRA members, to overturn the landmark civil ruling that found them and two others responsible for the Omagh bombing that killed 29 people in August 1998. Mr Rupert, who is of Native American descent, became involved in Irish republicanism through an Irish-American girlfriend. He was then approached by the FBI to infiltrate the Real IRA in exchange for direct payments and tax write-offs. Now living on the east coast of the US, he said there was nothing wrong with receiving large amounts of money for the high-risk role he played.

27. A terrorism expert says jihadist fighters who are off the radar are the real...

Radio New Zealand News, 2016 09 30

Wellington - A terrorism expert says jihadist fighters who are off the radar are the real risk to New Zealand. A would-be Islamic State fighter, Amin Mohamad, was arrested in 2013 while boarding a plane at Brisbane airport bound for Turkey on a trip organised by an IS recruiter. Because of time already served he will be released next year and will likely be deported to New Zealand, where he has spent most of his life. His lawyer says he poses no security threat.

28. Roy Courts ISIS Bullet

Courier Mail, Matthew Killoran, 2016 09 30

Canberra - Former minister Wyatt Roy has come close to being killed by ISIS in Iraq and made himself a "lucrative" target for kidnappers during a trip to the country last month. His sojourn to the war-torn country - a strict no-travel zone - saw him flirting with the law and the Opposition has branded him a "cowboy" living out his "boyhood fantasies". Even his former colleagues have condemned Mr Roy's act, with Foreign Minister Julie Bishop describing it as "irresponsible". "He has placed himself at risk of physical harm and capture, and acted in defiance of Government advice," Ms Bishop said. "Mr Roy did not seek, nor did he receive, assistance from the Australian Government for his travel to Iraq. "The Government does not endorse or approve of Mr Roy's actions, and strongly urges other Australians to follow the official advice of 'do not travel to Iraq.'" Mr Roy has revealed he was caught up in a firefight between ISIS fighters and Kurdish Peshmerga forces in Iraq, while travelling near the town of Sinjar, two hours west of the prohibited area of Mosul. The 26-year-old Queenslander, ousted from Longman at the July election, said he went to the region to "visit and see for myself" but was caught up in a battle when the ISIS fighters launched an assault on Domez, near Sinjar, last Thursday. "The danger of a 50-cal bullet, or if they had bigger RPGs, or a mortar round, hitting us was pretty serious so we had to stay where we were," Mr Roy told SBS.

29. 'Butcher of Kabul' signs pact with Afghan president and calls for peace

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 09 30

Kabul - Notorious Afghan warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar called for peace as he appeared by video to sign a deal with president Ashraf Ghani on Thursday, marking a symbolic victory in Kabul's struggle to revive talks with the Taliban. The deal paves the way for Hekmatyar, who heads the now largely dormant Hezb-i-Islami militant group but has been in hiding for years, to make a potential political comeback despite a history of war crimes. But analysts have said it represents a practical success in Afghanistan's 15-year bid to negotiate peace with militant groups, and comes as a boost for president Ashraf Ghani ahead of a development aid conference in Brussels next week. "Now is the time for the Taliban to think about whether they want to continue the war or come for peace," Mr Ghani said as he signed the deal at the presidential palace in Kabul.

The channel said two Afghan soldiers were in Missouri and a third came from Georgia's Fort Gordon. (Full Report).

31. Grass-roots movement grows in Afghanistan

Los Angeles Times, Shashank Bengali, 2016 09 30

Kabul - Two years after assuming power, Afghanistan's flailing, U.S.-brokered unity government is facing a growing challenge from the biggest grass-roots protest movement since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Calling themselves the Enlightening, members of the Hazara ethnic minority have mobilized several mass demonstrations against what they say is systematic discrimination by President Ashraf Ghani's government. They want more economic development and a greater share of positions in the Cabinet, ambassador corps and military. Organizers called off a protest planned for this week in Kabul and agreed to begin talks with the government, averting a possibly tense showdown as the government marks its second anniversary Thursday. With security in Kabul increasingly fragile, United Nations and civil society representatives persuaded Enlightening leaders to cancel. "Given the security challenges, we can't reach our goals only by continuing protests," said Sultan Haidari, 36, an activist in Kabul. "There are ways to achieve our demands through talks.... I think more protests will be the last option."

32. Pakistan captures one Indian soldier at LoC, several others killed

Pakistan Dawn, Abrar Haider, 2016 09 30

Muzaffarabad - An Indian soldier has been captured by the Pakistan army, while Indian soldiers have also been killed in the episode of firing across the Line of Control, it emerged Thursday. Confusion over the capture of the soldier persists as neither Indian nor Pakistani officials are issuing any official statements on the matter, as yet. An Indian army official based in New Delhi said, "It is confirmed one soldier from 37 Rashtriya Rifles with weapons has inadvertently crossed over to the Pakistan side of the Line of Control". Avoiding connecting the capture to today's firing incident, he said such incidents of people including civilians crossing the frontier by mistake have happened in the past from both sides. Building a case in favour of India, he added that those who strayed are returned. "Pakistan has been informed [of the soldier's crossing] through the DGMO on hotline," ANI News quoted Indian Army sources as saying.

33. Bongo nomme un premier ministre, Ping parle de coup d'État

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 09 30

Libreville, Gabon - Continuant d'agir à la hussarde, le président gabonais Ali Bongo a annoncé mercredi la nomination d'un nouveau premier ministre, Emmanuel Isozot Ndonget. Ancien ministre des Affaires étrangères, l'homme a la réputation d'être posé, plutôt calme, et correspond donc à la volonté affichée des autorités gabonaises d'apaiser les choses. Jeudi, le nouveau premier ministre s'est contenté d'assurer qu'il formerait son gouvernement dimanche. « Le gouvernement sera important pour savoir si l'ouverture est réelle. Mais plus que tout ce sont les nominations dans le cabinet présidentiel qui compteront », insiste un diplomate. Le candidat battu, Jean Ping, silencieux depuis dimanche, a pris la parole pour repousser toute idée de dialogue avec un pouvoir issu « d'un coup d'État politico-militaire ». En panne de stratégie, l'opposition a appelé à une journée ville morte le 6 octobre.

36. Farc accord is no done deal as Colombians prepare to vote

Financial Times, John Paul Rathbone, 2016 09 29

Barranquilla, Colombia - When the UK voted "Brexit", much of the world felt disbelief. Faced with the prospect of Donald Trump becoming US president, people across the globe have reacted with dread. And as more bombs fall on the besieged Syrian city of Aleppo, many have become so dulled by the horrific onslaught that they no longer know what to feel. So Colombia's peace accord this week provided a rare moment of hope. The agreement, signed by the government and the country's largest Marxist rebel group, brings down the curtain on guerrilla-inspired revolutionary movements in Latin America and runs parallel to hopes of change in communist Cuba. Moreover, if violent Colombia can end its conflict -- the western hemisphere's oldest -- that gives hope that the seemingly endless crisis in neighbouring Venezuela can also be resolved. In a world beset by division and rancour, here -- surely -- is something to feel good about. If only it was so simple. Most Colombians are deeply ambivalent about what the rest of the world so enthusiastically supports. Their feelings will be revealed this Sunday in a national referendum that will either ratify or reject the peace accord -- and the mood before the vote recalls much of the campaigning before the UK's poll on whether to leave the EU.

37. China voices strong opposition to THAAD, vows 'necessary' action

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 30

Beijing - China voiced its strong objection on Friday to South Korea's push to place an advanced U.S. missile defense system on its soil, even vowing to take "necessary" action apparently in response to the Seoul government's decision on the deployment site. "China has made clear its stance on several occasions with regard to THAAD," China's foreign ministry spokesman Geng Shuang said in a regular press briefing. "Its placement on the Korean Peninsula will not resolve security issues of relevant countries, nor will it help realize denuclearization and maintain peace and stability on the peninsula." "(Its deployment) will hurt strategic and security interests of countries and undermine the strategic balance in the region... China firmly opposes it and we will take necessary measures to maintain the strategic balance," he added. In July, South Korea announced it would place the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) system by end-

2017 in the country to counter growing threats from North Korea. China has strongly opposed the plan, saying that it could hurt the country's security interests but Seoul and Washington have assured that the decision is a "self defense" measure whose only target is missiles flying from the North.

38. India conducts 'surgical strikes' in Pakistan-held territory

The National (UAE), Samanth Subramanian, 2016 09 30

New Delhi - India said its troops crossed the Line of Control in Kashmir on Thursday to conduct what it described as "surgical strikes" on suspected terrorist bases in Pakistan-held territory, a claim Islamabad rejected. The incident marked the first time that India has publicly declared a strike across its de facto border with Pakistan, which has been in place since 1972. Lieutenant-General Ranbir Singh said India had "very specific and credible information" that "some terrorist teams had positioned themselves at launch pads" close to the Line of Control on the Pakistani side. The strikes were conducted to prevent infiltration by militants across the Line of Control into Indian-controlled Kashmir. Tensions have been brewing along the Line of Control since militants attacked an Indian army base in the Uri sector of Kashmir two weeks ago, killing 18 soldiers. India has insisted that the militants were armed and sponsored by Pakistan.

40. Park calls S. Korea-U.S. alliance most effective means to rein in N.K. 'fanaticism'

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 09 30

Seoul - South Korean President Park Geun-hye on Friday called her country's alliance with the United States the most effective means to rein in North Korea's "fanaticism," urging the allies' robust readiness to counter Pyongyang's escalating military threats. During a luncheon with senior officials of the U.S. Forces Korea (USFK), Park also portrayed the defiant state's threats as a "dagger to our throats," reiterating the urgency of the growing security challenge from the recalcitrant regime. The North has recently been heightening cross-border tensions with its bellicose rhetoric and provocations, including its fifth and most powerful nuclear test on Sept. 9 and recent ground test of a new rocket engine thought to be designed for an intercontinental ballistic missile. "The most effective means to curb North Korea's fanaticism is the combined defense posture based on the South Korea-U.S. alliance," she said during the luncheon that brought together some 30 attendees, including USFK commander Gen. Vincent K. Brooks. "North Korea's threat is like a dagger to our throats, a serious threat that will one day cause great harm to our peoples if not dealt with urgently," she added, pointing out that the international response to the North's provocations should be "completely different" from that of the past.

41. Philippine army struggles to read Duterte's signal on US

Gulf News, Gilbert P. Felongco, 2016 09 30

Manila - The Philippines' Defence Department has said it will await definitive orders from President Rodrigo Duterte on whether the country would hold joint military exercises solely with US troops. This came amid apparent mixed signals coming from Duterte, and the presidential palace, concerning the joint force readiness drills, which had been going on for more than a decade-and-a-half between the two allies. During a meeting with Filipinos in Vietnam, Duterte said the upcoming joint drills between Filipino soldiers and American troops -- the Philippines Amphibious Landing Exercise (PHIBLEX 33) -- "will be the last." "You are scheduled to hold war games again, which China does not want. I will serve notice to you now that this will be the last military exercise. 42. S. Korea announces new site for U.S. anti-missile system

Kyodo News, Staff reporter, 2016 09 30

Seoul - South Korea on Friday announced a new site for deployment of an advanced U.S. missile defense system, nixing an earlier announced location in the face of local opposition. Under the new plan, the anti-missile battery, known as the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense, will be deployed at the site of a golf course at Mt. Talma in Seongju County. The Defense Ministry said it informed officials of Seongju County and political parties earlier in the day that Lotte Skyhill Country Club is the most optimal site. In July, the United States and South Korea announced their decision to deploy the system at the Seongsan anti-aircraft missile base in the same county to better cope with North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile threats. That announcement immediately sparked strong protests from locals there who said the location was too close to residential areas and raised concerns about health risks from electromagnetic waves emitted by the system's radar. According to Yonhap News Agency, the golf course location could cause problems for the adjacent city of Gimcheon, since the radar would be pointing in the direction of the nearby city. Gimcheon residents have already threatened a "full-scale protest" if the golf course is selected.

43. It's No Cold War, but Putin Relishes His Role as Disrupter

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 09 30

Washington - Escalating airstrikes in Syria. Sophisticated cyberattacks, apparently intended to influence the American election. New evidence of complicity in shooting down a civilian airliner. The behavior of Russia in the last few weeks has echoes of some of the uglier moments of the Cold War, an era of proxy battles that ended in 1991 with the collapse of the Soviet Union. President Obama, fresh from a meeting with President Vladimir V. Putin this month, wondered aloud whether the Russian leader was content living with a "constant, low-grade conflict." His reference was to Ukraine, but he could have been addressing any of the arenas where Mr. Putin has reveled in his new role as the great disrupter of American plans around the globe. "It seems to me we have Mr. Putin's answer," said Richard Haass, the president of the Council on Foreign Relations and the author of a coming book, "A World in Disarray." "He's answered in the affirmative. Low-grade conflict is his thing. And the question is how directly or indirectly we introduce costs." None of these conflicts have, in fact, cost Mr. Putin very much. Cyberpower in particular is tailor-made for a country in Russia's circumstances -- a declining economy with the gross domestic product of Italy. It is dirt cheap, hard to trace to a specific aggressor and perfect for sowing confusion, which may be the limits of Mr. Putin's goals. The bigger question confronting American intelligence officials, though, is whether the Russian president has a grander scheme at work. So far, their conclusion is probably not. Mr. Putin's moves, they argue in background conversations, are largely tactical, intended to bolster his international image at a moment he has plenty of troubles back home.

The NCRI claims that the Iranian headquarters play a vital role alongside Russia in supporting Assad's regime. The Iranian HQ holds intelligence, counter intelligence operations and has millions of dollars that are flown from Tehran, according to NCRI claims. 48. How Shimon Peres Faced Down the Generals and Pacifists to Build Israel's Nuclear Program

Haaretz, Anshel Pfeffer, 2016 09 30

Jerusalem - The Israel Atomic Energy Commission is not an organization known for its public relations skills. However, on Wednesday morning, a few hours after the announcement of Shimon Peres' death, it issued a rare statement. "Shimon Peres' activity has been part of the IAEC's activity since its foundation," it said. "Peres made a significant contribution to the Nuclear Research Center in the Negev and to the foundation of Israel's nuclear policy as a major pillar in ensuring Israel's national security." These few bland sentences hold in them the foundation of Israel's "unclear" nuclear deterrent. It is impossible to exaggerate the role Peres played in every facet of Israel's nuclear development. Veteran journalist Dan Margalit, who in his book "I Saw Them" revealed the details of Peres' involvement, said in a radio interview this week that when no geologists would sign off on the plans for the nuclear reactor near Dimona, Peres signed as the "geologist." Peres rarely spoke of his role in public.

The second charge was leveled

51. Les djihadistes syriens de Fatah al-Cham déchirés par les tensions entre combattants locaux et étrangers

Le Figaro, Georges Malbrunot, 2016 09 30

Alep, Syrie - Début septembre, le chef militaire du mouvement djihadiste Fatah al-Cham était tué lors d'un raid aérien américain dans le village de Kafr Naha près d'Alep dans le nord de la Syrie. Abou Omar Saraqeb assistait à une réunion des leaders de l'ex-Front al-Nosra, la branche syrienne d'al-Qaida, qui a rompu cet été avec la maison mère en Afghanistan. Coïncidence étrange : le numéro un de Fatah al-Cham, Abou Mohammed al- Joulani, était absent du conclave. Saraqeb a probablement été vendu par une taupe. Membre fondateur d'al-Nosra, après avoir combattu les troupes américaines en Irak à partir de 2003, Saraqeb incarnait « les internationalistes » au sein du mouvement, les vieux briscards du djihad, partisans d'une « guerre globale » contre l'Occident. Deux hommes se disputent aujourd'hui sa succession : Abou Hussein al-Ordoni et Abou Mouslem al-Chami. Tous les deux sont syriens. Mais le second, donné favori, est un défenseur de la « syrianisation » du mouvement djihadiste, contrairement à Saraqeb. Depuis son soi-disant détachement d'al-Qaida, des tensions secouent Fatah al-Cham, alimentées par des divergences entre les Syriens et les combattants étrangers - 30 % environ de ses 15 000 membres, dont de nombreux Jordaniens et Saoudiens. Les locaux estiment qu'en « renationalisant » leur guerre contre Bachar el-Assad, ils s'attireront plus facilement les faveurs des pays du Golfe, voire de l'Occident qui refuse de retirer Fatah al-Cham de sa liste noire des organisations terroristes.

52. Tensions Between US and Russia Growing over Syria

The Media Line, Linda Gradstein, 2016 09 30

Tel Aviv - The battle for Aleppo has sparked a sharp exchange between Russian and American officials, as the city itself faces a growing humanitarian crisis. State Department spokesman John Kirby, asked what the implications of a collapse in ties between the US and Russia in Syria would be, answered that "extremists and extremists groups will continue to exploit the vacuums that are there...which will include, no question, attacks against Russian interests, perhaps even Russian cities, and Russia will continue to send troops home in body bags." Russian Defense Ministry spokesman Maj. Gen. Igor Konashenkov reacted sharply, saying they show the US is backing terrorists in Syria. "His words are the most frank confession by the US side so far that the whole "opposition" ostensibly fighting a civil war in Syria is a US-controlled international terrorist alliance," he said in a statement.

53. Why IT spending is top priority for organisations?

Gulf News, Naushad K. Cherrayil, 2016 09 30

Dubai - With a wide array of new cyber threats constantly pushing IT organisations, it is no wonder that IT security is the top spending priority for most organisations worldwide. IT security spending is only a small part of the total IT budget, but it has been steadily growing and will continue to do so. Statistics show that the average share of IT budgets has been growing every year. According to Ponemon Institute, it was 7.5 per cent of their overall IT budgets in 2005 and 10 per cent in last year. In Europe, Middle East and Africa, it is between 8 and 12 per cent of the IT budget on security. Many high-profile companies have been subject to hacker attacks recently and they probably won't be the last. "Organisations are struggling to keep up against cyber threats as cyberattacks are growing in complexity," said Alain Kallas, Middle East managing principal for security and risk consulting at Dell Technologies subsidiary SecureWorks, a provider of intelligence-driven information security solutions.

54. Attentat de Nice: "Quotidien" réfute les versions des autorités

L'Express, Journaliste maison, 2016 09 30

Nice - L'émission Quotidien, dont l'un des journalistes a pu consulter un procès-verbal de la sous-direction anti-terroriste, met en lumière des incohérences dans les versions officielles données par les autorités. Course folle du camion, intervention des policiers, échange de tirs... Que s'est-il passé le soir du 14 juillet à Nice? Deux mois et demi après l'attentat sanglant sur la promenade des Anglais, de nouvelles révélations viendraient contredire les versions avancées par les autorités après l'attaque. C'est l'émission Quotidien qui, jeudi soir, a mis en lumière ces nouveaux éléments par la voix de Azzeddine Ahmed-Chaouch. Sur le plateau, le journaliste explique avoir pu consulter le procès-verbal établi par la sous-direction anti-terroriste de la police judiciaire. Ce document clé de l'enquête, qui s'appuie sur les images de vidéosurveillance, décrit le déroulé des événements minute par minute. "Le camion terroriste cale" La première divergence pointée du doigt concerne les conditions d'arrêt du camion et la neutralisation de son conducteur Mohamed Lahouaiej Bouhlel. "Le dispositif de protection a permis à la police nationale d'intercepter le camion et de mettre un terme à sa course meurtrière", assurait le ministre de l'intérieur Bernard Cazeneuve quelques jours après le drame. Faux, rétorque le journaliste de Quotidien en s'appuyant sur le fameux document. "A 22 heures 35 minutes et 46 secondes, constatons que le camion terroriste cale. Il ne repartira plus. 43 secondes plus tard, les policiers se trouvent derrière le camion. La fusillade dure 1 minute et 15 secondes", indique le rapport.

55. Contre-ingérence économique, le lent réveil de la Suisse

Le Temps (Suisse), Alexis Pfefferlé, 2016 09 30

Opinion - L'année 2016 avait tout pour se parer des atours de l'annus horribilis: piratage de RUAG, explosion des « arnaques au président » visant les PME ou encore départ en série de fleurons de l'économie suisse en des mains étrangères, acquisitions certes légales mais critiquées tant au niveau économique que stratégique. Des efforts politiques épars, conjugués aux hasards malicieux du calendrier, sont pourtant en passe de faire de l'année 2016 une année charnière en matière de sécurité des entreprises et de contre-ingérence économique. Dans les colonnes du Temps, le 4 septembre dernier, Me Shelby du Pasquier détaillait les nouveaux articles 322 octies et novies du Code pénal qui, depuis le 1er juillet 2016, punissent la corruption privée d'une peine maximale de 3 ans de prison ou d'une peine pécuniaire. Réaction à la gigantesque affaire de corruption au sein de la FIFA, ces nouvelles dispositions sont également un nouveau rempart bienvenu contre l'ingérence économique visant les sociétés suisses. En effet, jusqu'alors, l'acquisition induite d'informations de l'entreprise par des tiers corrupteurs pouvait éventuellement trouver une réponse pénale aux termes de l'art. 273 CP (service de renseignement économique) ou par le biais de la loi sur la concurrence déloyale (art. 4a et 23 LCD). Or, dans les deux cas, ce sont des dispositions difficiles à exploiter et pour lesquelles le nombre de condamnations est ridiculement faible. Avec ces nouvelles dispositions, la frêle ligne de démarcation entre infraction pénale et renseignement économique légal se fait plus marquée, de sorte que la saisine des autorités judiciaires s'en trouve facilitée. Cette entrée en vigueur fait également écho à l'entrée en vigueur, un an auparavant, des modifications législatives émanant de l'initiative parlementaire « Réprimer durement la vente de données bancaires », elle aussi produite des scandales successifs de vols de données bancaires. Visant en premier lieu à décourager les Etats étrangers et les lanceurs d'alerte en puissance, ces dispositions ont également eu un impact positif sur les tentatives d'acquiescer illégalement des données bancaires à des fins commerciales, pour le compte de clients suisses ou étrangers. Enfin, la nouvelle loi sur le renseignement, acceptée en référendum le 25 septembre dernier, comprend également comme objectif la protection de la place industrielle, économique et financière suisse (art. 3 let. c LRens). Visant pour l'instant restrictivement les infrastructures critiques, la loi sur le renseignement pourrait néanmoins permettre de sauvegarder d'autres intérêts nationaux importants, sur mandat exprès du Conseil fédéral.

56. Crash du MH17 : la Russie clairement désignée

Le Monde, Jean-Pierre Stroobants, 2016 09 30

La Haye - L'enquête affirme que le missile provenait de Russie et a été tiré depuis un territoire tenu par les prorusses Le missile Buk, qui a abattu le Boeing 777 de la Malaysia Airlines, le 17 juillet 2014, au-dessus du territoire ukrainien, causant la mort des 298 passagers et membres d'équipage, avait été acheminé de Russie, a affirmé, mercredi 28 septembre, le parquet néerlandais. Ce dernier présentait les premiers résultats officiels de l'enquête judiciaire menée par les Pays-Bas et par quatre autres pays (la Malaisie, l'Australie, l'Ukraine et la Belgique) sur le crash du vol MH17 reliant Amsterdam à Kuala Lumpur. Les enquêteurs disent avoir identifié, à ce stade, une centaine de personnes ayant participé activement à la tragédie. Ils n'ont toutefois dévoilé que deux noms. L'un des responsables policiers a indiqué que la suite des investigations - qui devraient se poursuivre jusqu'en 2018 au moins - visera désormais à déterminer les responsabilités, afin que des poursuites puissent être engagées.

57. Le PNR à la belge fait grogner le rail européen

Le Soir (Belgique), Alain Jennotte, 2016 09 30

Bruxelles - Transports Les opérateurs européens contre un fichier d'enregistrement des voyageurs Le « passenger name record » belge incluant les trains internationaux devrait être évoqué en Commission Terrorisme à la mi-octobre. La Deutsche Bahn menacerait de supprimer des ICE vers la Belgique si ce texte est adopté. L'une des mesures prévues par le fédéral dans son programme de lutte contre le terrorisme est la création d'un registre des passagers, pour confronter leurs noms à ceux qui se trouvent dans différentes bases de données de personnes recherchées. Mais la particularité du projet belge est qu'il ne se limite pas aux seuls vols aériens, comme aux Etats-Unis. Le ministre de l'Intérieur, Jan Jambon (N-VA) souhaite l'étendre aux trois autres modes de transports internationaux qui arrivent en Belgique : les bus, les bateaux et les trains. Cette perspective fait réagir viscéralement les opérateurs ferroviaires européens. Dans un courrier adressé au Premier ministre, Charles Michel, ainsi qu'au ministre de l'Intérieur et au ministre des Transports, François Bellot (MR), la communauté européenne des opérateurs du rail (CER) manifeste ses préoccupations. Ce courrier, dont Le Soir a pu prendre connaissance, précise que la sécurité doit être une indiscutable priorité. Mais le lobby des opérateurs du rail ajoute tout aussitôt que le transport par train a des spécificités qui le rendent peu compatible avec le principe même d'un PNR.

59. Members of a European Terror Cell Are Arrested in an International Security Operation

Asharq Al-Awsat, Abdullah Mustafa, 2016 09 30

Brussels - Authorities in Spain, Germany and Belgium arrested five people suspected of belonging to a propaganda cell affiliated to ISIS yesterday in a security operation carried out by international police. At the same time, it was announced in Brussels yesterday that Belgian prosecutors have started investigations into dangers that the Belgian army may be exposed to and that are described as "serious". This comes after an ISIS leader published a number of photos of Belgian soldiers and their names via the Telegram message application in a letter that he said is addressed to "the brothers in Belgium". Belgian media said that the actions of the leader seem like an invitation to carry out terrorist attacks on Belgian soldiers and that security and judicial authorities are dealing with these threats very seriously. The threats are related to Rashid Qasim Al-Faransi who is an ISIS leader and whose name has recently been appearing frequently after the discovery of terrorist plots in France and Belgium.

1. Espionage bill will allow PM to muzzle watchdog, report says

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 10 06

Toronto - Canada's new spy-accountability legislation will create a parliamentary watchdog that prime ministers can keep on a short leash, or even muzzle, a report on the bill by the Library of Parliament says. The Liberal government has said the national-security legislation will create an independent committee of MPs that will have regular briefings from government spy agencies on their activities. However, a report on Bill C-22 suggests the national security and intelligence committee of parliamentarians could end up "in effect, accountable to the Prime Minister alone." The report, done by the nonpartisan Library of Parliament and released this week, is a synopsis of the bill for parliamentarians. Such reports are among the information services the staff of the library provide to MPs and senators. The Library of Parliament's report points out that the bill would allow prime ministers and cabinet to shape, block or censor the committee's work. This hits a decidedly different tone from an essay published this week by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, who said Bill C-22 creates a committee that "will set its own agenda and report when it sees fit." Every democracy has to determine how far legislators should be able to go to act as a check on government spies, who typically work under secret orders from presidents and prime ministers. Canada gives its elected politicians less information about and fewer review powers over the security agencies than most governments do. And, unlike its closest allies, Canada has not cleared any parliamentarians to hear state secrets. Under C-22, that would change. The prime minister would pick nine lawmakers, mostly MPs but up to two senators, who would receive regular briefings on the activities of national security agencies such as the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the Communications Security Establishment. How much the committee members would be able to access state secrets is in question because the legislation would allow cabinet ministers to block reviews of some spy programs and thwart the committee's bids to see sensitive documents.

2. Members of dormant national security roundtable seeking answers

CBC News, Alison Crawford, 2016 10 06

A group of Canadians who advise the federal government on national security issues are in the dark about the future of a 16-member roundtable they were appointed to. Members of the Cross-Cultural Roundtable on Security are supposed to meet in-camera at least twice a year, yet the group hasn't met since October 2014. The roundtable was set up in 2005 to act as a sounding board for cabinet ministers and other high-ranking federal executives on how security matters and government policies affect different ethnic communities. Over the years, it has covered topics such as countering violent extremism, migration and cyber-security. Tories turfed anti-radicalization specialist, but can't prove they investigated him Federal study disputes claim diaspora communities breed extremists Federal security officials meet local Somali-Canadians "I feel I'm in limbo," said Farzana Hassan, a newspaper columnist and past-president of the Canadian Muslim Congress who was appointed to the roundtable in June 2015. "It seemed like a very good fit and I jumped on the idea and I accepted the appointment, but I have not heard anything," she told CBC News. This past spring, Hassan and several other members contacted by CBC received a letter informing them that the government is re-thinking the roundtable's activities and composition. Myrna Lashley, a psychologist, was appointed to the roundtable in 2005 and has been the group's chairperson since 2007. But after receiving the letter in March, Lashley suspects her involvement has come to an end. "Effectively when you get that letter, you have been told 'thank you,'" Lashley said. In the meantime, Lashley is concerned the federal government is not communicating as effectively on national security issues with Canada's ethnically diverse communities, such as Syrian refugees. In the past, Lashley says the group met with and advised ministers of public safety and justice as well as senior executives from the RCMP, CSIS and Canada Border Services Agency on all sorts of issues that could or would affect an array of cultural groups. "We could give them an idea of how different communities might react to something so that they could formulate it in a way that would be acceptable to all Canadians," said Lashley.

3. Security watchdog legislation passes first stage in Commons, opposed by Conservative party

The Hill Times, Tim Naumetz, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - Contentious government legislation crafted to deliver on a Liberal election promise to establish parliamentary oversight over federal intelligence and security agencies passed its first hurdle in the Commons Tuesday. MPs voted 200-81 to send the bill to the Commons Public Safety and National Security Committee for in-depth witness evidence and possible amendments. Coincidentally, the committee only half an hour later held its first meeting under a new study titled Canada's National Security Framework- -but a spokesperson for Government House Leader Bardish Chagger told The Hill Times the security framework review was unrelated to the committee's task on the proposed oversight legislation. It appears, a spokesperson for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said, that the committee will be tasked with an overall review of Canada's national security agencies at the same time it conducts witness hearings on the security oversight bill. The first hour of the committee meeting was in private, and the final hour featured evidence from Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien, who focused a recent report to Parliament on threats to personal privacy under sweeping new security laws passed by the previous Conservative government, and also questioned the new Liberal government's emphasis on problems facing security agencies rather than privacy concerns under the Conservative government's Bill C-51 anti-terrorism legislation. Despite NDP criticism of government control over the committee appointments, and the leeway for cabinet ministers to prevent access to information, human rights lawyer Paul Champ, a vocal critic of the secrecy and vast powers of CSIS to collect information on private citizens, said he believes the committee may offer new avenues to monitor the intelligence agency. Mr. Champ noted the committee would have authority, if allowed, to oversee current activities of security agencies and branches, unlike civilian review agencies. "Here is the big thing about accountability with CSIS, and why frankly, whatever form it takes, I'm glad that there will be a parliamentary committee on this: because CSIS defines its own legal authority, and they are constantly coming up with new legal interpretations that are all secret and internal, where they are trying to constantly push the boundaries of the CSIS Act and their legal authority."

4. Beijing puppets on canadian soil

National Post, Terry Glavin, 2016 10 06

Column: China has got into the thuggish business of throwing its weight around in Canada. As a Canadian journalist working in Canada, Yuli Hu didn't expect the sort of indignity she was forced to endure last weekend, after travelling from Toronto to Montreal to cover the triennial proceedings of the International Civil Aviation Organization, the agency representing 191 UN member states that sets worldwide airline safety standards. Hu had already registered with the ICAO and had been advised to pick up her media accreditation at the organization's Montreal headquarters. But when she arrived, she was pulled aside and told she had to leave because her media credentials were issued by Taiwan's stateowned Central News Agency. "I told them I was Canadian. I brought my passport, as was required," Hu told me. "I don't think it was right for them to reject me." Neither does the Committee to Protect Journalists, and neither does Reporters Without Borders, two prominent international press freedom organizations that have protested the ICAO's conduct. There was not a peep of protest out of the Liberal government in Ottawa, though. In just one of its many recent forays into the thuggish business of throwing its weight around in Canada - the firings and the chill in Canada's Chinese-language media, the intimidation of ethnic Chinese community leaders across the country, the lavish investment in propaganda initiatives - Beijing had insisted that no Taiwanese organization should be permitted to attend the Montreal conference, which wraps up Friday.

5. Biopsy to investigate Pitre's stalled stem-cell transplant

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - Jonathan Pitre has been scheduled for a bone marrow biopsy Thursday so that doctors can better understand the state of his stem-cell transplant, which has yet to produce the desired results. Pitre will have bone marrow drawn from the back of his hip in an operation similar to the one that his mother, Tina Boileau, went through one month ago when she donated the stem cells that were infused into her son's bloodstream. Pitre began to produce white blood cells 10 days ago - a promising sign that the transplant was beginning to work. But since then, his levels have not increased. Doctors at the University of Minnesota Masonic Children's Hospital are now trying to understand why, and whether a second transplant will be necessary. From their clinical trial experience, doctors know that most epidermolysis bullosa patients produce white blood cells two to four weeks after a stem-cell transplant. Sometimes, however, it takes longer for donor cells to become established so it's still possible that they'll engraft in Pitre's bone marrow. Stem cells in the marrow produce most of the body's blood cells. Pitre, 16, suffers from severe epidermolysis bullosa (EB), an incurable, blistering skin disease that complicates every part of his life.

6. Call for rules on armed drones highlights Canadian debate over such weapons

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - Canada has joined dozens of other countries in calling for clearer rules around the sale and use of armed drones, even as the government debates whether the military should acquire such weapons. The U.S. State Department on Wednesday released a joint declaration, signed by

Canada and 44 other countries, laying out five general principles on the export and use of armed unmanned aerial vehicles, or UAVs. They include emphasizing the importance of international law, compliance with existing arms-control laws and transparency about the use of drones. The declaration is expected to be a starting point for establishing clear and definitive rules and standards to govern what is an increasingly common weapon used by militaries around the world. "Our participation in this initiative complements Canada's membership in all four of the export-control regimes and our overall efforts in the legitimate trade in military goods," Global Affairs Canada spokeswoman Jessica Seguin said in a statement. Yet while Canada has added its name to the declaration, it remains unclear if it will actually buy armed drones. This is despite more than a decade of research and calls for such weapons from senior military commanders.

7. China tries to block visits of Canadian diplomats to Tibet, says Dion

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - China has for years tried to block Canadian diplomats from Tibet, banning some of them from visiting aid projects once funded by Canadian taxpayers, says Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion. While China has never denied a request by a high-level diplomat to visit Tibet, Dion says, it has put up roadblocks, including delays in approving travel requests and shadowing Canadians while there. Dion describes the problems in a written response to questions from New Democrat MP Randall Garrison that was recently tabled in the House of Commons. The minister's frank assessment comes as the Liberal government moves to expand trade with China, following Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's first visit to China and a return visit by its premier late this summer. The Montreal-based Canada Tibet Committee suggested the travel restrictions are part of China's ongoing efforts to mask human rights abuses in the region, which it has controlled since the 1950s, when its invading forces drove out Tibet's spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama. "It was refreshingly honest," Garrison said of Dion's unvarnished response. "We have known all along that China was frustrating Canadian access to Tibet, and it was good to see the government admit that."

8. Détention - Homa Hoodfar a été victime de torture psychologique en Iran

Le Devoir, Philippe Orfali avec Geneviève Tremblay, 2016 10 06

Montréal - Homa Hoodfar avait beau être terrorisée dans sa cellule de la prison d'Evin, elle savait qu'elle pourrait, tout au long de sa détention, se raccrocher à une lueur d'espoir : ses geôliers ne feraient pas d'elle une seconde Zahra Khazemi, cette photojournaliste irano-canadienne torturée et violée avant d'être assassinée, dans la même geôle, il y a maintenant 13 ans. " Ils me disaient qu'ils renverraient ma dépouille au Canada. [...] J'étais prête mentalement à passer quelques années en prison, ou, comme ils disaient, peut-être 15 ans ", a relaté la professeure à la retraite de l'Université Concordia, relâchée le 26 septembre dernier après 112 jours de captivité. L'anthropologue était incarcérée dans la section des prisonniers d'opinion, la même que celle où a été détenue Mme Khazemi. On l'a notamment accusée de collaborer avec des gouvernements ennemis. " Ils étaient très intimidants, ils voulaient me faire pleurer. Comme je ne pleurais pas, ils sont allés dans mon iPad. Ils ont fait jouer la musique qui a joué aux obsèques de mon mari. Et là, j'ai pleuré ", a-t-elle expliqué sur les ondes de Radio-Canada et de CBC, mercredi.

9. Encore plus de 43 000 cas à régler

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - Le 31 octobre est toujours la date fixée pour résoudre les cas en arriéré du système de paye Phénix. Alors que le 31 octobre, la date fixée pour régler les cas en arriéré approche à grands pas, plus de la moitié des dossiers de 82000 fonctionnaires fédéraux ne sont toujours pas résolus à la suite des problèmes liés au système de paye Phénix. Sur les 81977 employés fédéraux qui se trouvaient sur cette liste au début du décompte cet été, 38228 ont été réglés. Il reste donc près de 43749 dossiers, soit 53 %, qui doivent passer dans les mains des agents de rémunération. «Nous réalisons des progrès constants. Nous croyons toujours être en mesure d'atteindre l'objectif, soit de régler la liste des cas en arriéré d'ici le 31 octobre», a indiqué mardi Marie Lemay, sous-ministre de Services publics et de Approvisionnement Canada (SPAC). Un total de 46 autres employés n'ont pas été payés cette semaine, mais devraient l'être d'ici la prochaine paye, alors que 173 autres cas liés à de divers congés et des pensions ont été signalés. Dans ces cas, ils ne devraient pas être réglés avant six semaines. Jusqu'à maintenant, on ne connaît pas le nombre total de fonctionnaires qui ont demandé une avance salariale à leur ministère. Cette avance peut aller jusqu'à 60 % du salaire brut. Un peu moins de 300 fonctionnaires ont toutefois fait une demande au moyen du site internet de SPAC.

10. Iranian interrogators 'threatened to send my dead body back to Canada': Homa Hoodfar

CBC News, Susan Ormiston, 2016 10 06

Montreal - Montreal's Homa Hoodfar says members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard psychologically tortured her during dozens of interrogations over the course of 112 brutal days in Tehran's notorious Evin prison. They threatened "they would send my dead body back to Canada," the retired Concordia University professor told CBC News in her first interview since her release on Sept. 26. "I was prepared I might face a few years in prison, or as they said 15 years, maybe I would never be released," she said in a lengthy interview in her second-floor apartment in Montreal. She says the interrogators tried to break her spirit. The worst part, she said, was when they played music from the funeral of her husband, who died in December 2014. They had found the music on Hoodfar's iPad. "One of the techniques they have is to make you cry," she said. "I didn't, so they played the music that was played when my husband's body was removed from here (their Montreal apartment). "That was the most difficult moment I had with them." After 112 days in prison, Hoodfar, 65, was released last Monday and flown to Muscat, Oman. Canada had secured Oman's diplomatic help a week earlier, on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly in New York. Iran's state prosecutor had accused the anthropologist of "dabbling in feminism," but she says that's not a crime so the authorities came up with charges that she collaborated with a hostile government against national security, without any evidence.

She believes she was taken as a pawn in the internal political struggle between the elected government led by President Hassan Rouhani and the country's more conservative, anti-West forces, including the judiciary and the Revolutionary Guard, whose agents first interrogated her.

11. Liberals urged to press Iran on executions of prisoners during Iran-Iraq war

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - A group of Iranian Canadians is calling on the government to add a tough new element to its annual United Nations resolution on Iran's dubious human rights record - an international call for a war crimes investigation. The group, which calls itself Canadian Friends for a Democratic Iran, will make the request later today at press conference on Parliament Hill. The group will present what it says is new evidence that shows complicity in a mass killing of Iraqi prisoners by senior Iranian government officials in 1988 at the end of the Iran-Iraq war. An audio recording from the era surfaced in August that implicates high-level members of the current Iranian regime, including the country's current justice minister, said Shahram Golestaneh, the group's director. Canada has taken the lead each year since 2003 in sponsoring a resolution at the UN condemning Iran's human rights record. That was the year that Iranian-born Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi was tortured and killed in a Tehran prison after she was arrested for photographing a demonstration. Now, Golestaneh's group wants the government to up the ante by asking the UN to launch an investigation into the event as part of that annual resolution. Shahin Gobadi, a Paris-based dissident with the National Council of Resistance of Iran, acknowledged that any such call would likely fall on deaf ears in Tehran and be turned away by the country's leaders.

12. Phoenix troubles won't be fixed by deadline

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - The senior bureaucrat overseeing the federal government's botched payroll system confirmed Wednesday that not all pay problems affecting Canada's public servants will be resolved by the promised Oct. 31 deadline. Marie Lemay, Public Services' deputy minister, insisted the government is on track to clear the backlog of 82,000 cases created by the Phoenix pay system that were sent by 46 federal departments for processing to the pay centre in Miramichi, N.B., by officials' self-imposed Oct. 31 deadline. "We're really on target," she told reporters during a briefing Wednesday. "The next month is a big month, but we believe we are on target. ... We believe we will clear the backlog for the 31st." But the deadline only applies to the 46 departments that were sending their payroll processing to Miramichi, which covers about 191,000 employees and has 550 compensation advisers. Lemay was unable to say what happens to employees facing Phoenix fowlups who work for 55 other departments that manage their own compensation and don't use Miramichi. Employees in those departments have also faced Phoenix glitches since the first rollout that have left them underpaid, overpaid or not paid at all. And it's unclear how many of these cases are outstanding or when their pay problems will be fixed. Debi Daviau, president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service, questions whether the Oct.

31 deadline will be met. She said the department is "playing with numbers." She said most public servants had the impression that all problems would be resolved by Oct. 31 and not just those from 46 departments received before the end of June.

13. RCMP settling hundreds of sexual harassment complaints in costly deal

Globe and Mail, Daniel Leblanc, 2016 10 06

Ottawa - The RCMP is set to announce a major settlement of hundreds of complaints of sexual harassment at a cost of more than $10- million, sources said. Senior federal officials said that RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson hopes that the settlement, as well as a public statement on Thursday, will "turn the page" on the dark chapter in the history of the national police force. Commissioner Paulson took over in 2011 as the RCMP was struggling to deal with hundreds of cases of sexual harassment involving female Mounties who complained of abuse at the hands of colleagues and superiors. In 2013, he said the force suffered from "cultural dysfunction." He will appear alongside Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale and Employment Minister MaryAnn Mihychuk in Ottawa on Thursday to provide the "update on harassment related litigation." Also in attendance will be former Mounties Janet Merlo and Linda Gillis Davidson. Ms. Merlo, who as an officer was based in Nanaimo, B.C., filed a lawsuit on behalf of other complainants, saying she suffered bullying and harassment throughout her career of nearly 20 years.

14. RCMP to settle suits: Sources

National Post, Douglas Quan, 2016 10 06

The RCMP commissioner is expected to issue an apology on Thursday as part of a historic settlement reached with the plaintiffs in two proposed class-action lawsuits alleging systemic gender-based harassment and discrimination within the force, sources say. Any female member who experienced harassment or discrimination will be eligible to apply for damages. Amounts will depend on the injuries, a source said. The potential number of Mounties who could be eligible is in the thousands and compensation could potentially reach as much as $100 million. As part of the settlement, the force will announce new details of how it plans to change its workplace culture. Despite efforts over the years to implement respectful workplace initiatives, ongoing "harassment litigation" has continued to dog the RCMP. Reaching a settlement is a significant event, said Angela Workman-Stark, a former RCMP chief superintendent who played a key role in helping the force address harassment and bullying. "For the women, it's a resolution for them. I think it's an acknowledgment of the issues they brought forward. I think it's great for the organization to move forward and take responsibility. Resolution and recognition is an important piece," said Workman-Stark, who left the force earlier this year. Thursday's announcement will take place at 11 a.m. ET in Ottawa. Bob Paulson, the commissioner, and Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale will be joined by the lead plaintiffs in the proposed class-action lawsuits, Janet Merlo and Linda Gillis Davidson.

15. Saeed Malekpour's story matters too

Toronto Sun, 2016 10 06

Editorial: Actions speak louder than words. And in the case of Saeed Malekpour, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's words are being put to the test. Tuesday was the eighth anniversary of the Canadian permanent resident and Iranian national's arrest in Iran on dubious charges. The web developer came to Canada in 2004 and worked in Richmond Hill, Ontario. He returned to Iran in 2008 to see his ill father and it was then that he was arrested. According to Amnesty International, which is lobbying for his release, Malekpour was originally sentenced to death on charges including "acting against national security by spreading propaganda against the system"; and "insulting and desecrating Islam." He is now sentenced to life in prison on charges of "insulting and desecrating Islam". The charges reportedly relate to his work on writing computer coding that was in turn used by a pornography website, with which Malekpour denies having any involvement. While the Canadian government hasn't so far been successful in securing Malekpour's release, that didn't stop it from speaking up in the past when he was faced with the death penalty.

16. The Canadian Government's Plan to Sell New Spying Powers to Citizens

Motherboard, Jordan Pearson, 2016 10 06

Canada's government is taking a forum for citizens to sound off about its spying powers and flipping it into an opportunity to sell Canadians on new and overbroad police capabilities, according to a new watchdog report. In September, Trudeau's Liberals made good on a promise to open a public consultation on national security and released two documents, a green paper and a background document, explaining the issues at stake to Canadians at a time when the government is ramping up its efforts to thwart domestic terrorists. These included hot topics such as the difficulties police face when dealing with encrypted devices and issues surrounding data retention. However, according to the watchdog report, the government's framing of the issues is selling Canadians on a police power that has been shot down again and again by the courts and the public: warrantless access to subscriber information from telecom companies. "Successive federal governments have sought to legislatively enshrine a state power to access subscriber identification data from telecommunications companies," Citizen Lab researcher Christopher Parsons and Canadian Internet Policy and Public Interest Clinic staff lawyer Tamir Israel write in their report. "Such legislative initiatives would have facilitated access to such data on an indiscriminate basis and without any judicial authorization or control."

Calgary Herald, Eva Ferguson, 2016 10 06

Calgary - Anti-Muslim posters put up at the University of Calgary this week do not contain the language required to pursue a criminal charge under hate propaganda legislation, police say. Students and staff at U of C were enraged Tuesday after 40 posters were discovered on campus, filled with obscenities and directives to Muslims to keep Shariah law, genital mutilations and beheadings in their "7th century" homeland. University president Elizabeth Cannon stressed that campus security would be working with police to check surveillance camera footage and examine the possibility of criminal charges. But according to Sgt. Eric Levesque, hate crimes co-ordinator with the Calgary Police Service, the Crown will not be receiving a recommendation to pursue haterelated charges. "It is very offensive, that's true, but if you remove the bad words, the message itself does not contravene Canada's hate speech laws." Levesque explained that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees freedom of opinion, thought and expression, while reasonable restrictions have been placed on that freedom within the hate propaganda sections of the Criminal Code. However, the criteria for charges under Sections 318 and 319 of the Criminal Code are very stringent and the threshold very high, Levesque added.

18. Woman accused of hate crime

Toronto Sun, Terry Davidson, 2016 10 06

Toronto - Shocking Facebook video out of Hamilton details a white woman attacking a black taxi driver outside his cab and calling him a "n---- -." Officers with Hamilton Police's hate crimes unit have made an arrest and a 33-yearold woman now faces an assault charge. Witness Mubarik Gyenne- Bayere took to Facebook to post the video, which shows the woman in the back of the stopped cab in downtown Hamilton Monday. The video opens with the woman frantically reaching over the front seat of the cab in an attempt to get at the driver. "Hey, you're she yells before getting out and slamming the door. The driver also gets out as the woman walks around the front of the cab to the driver's side. "I'll knock you the f---out, eh!" she yells before striking out at him several times, causing him to stagger backward. At one point, she appears to hit him with her handbag. Det. Paul Corrigan said the woman was "unruly" from the moment the 40-year-old cabbie picked her up, spilling her orange juice inside the car and, in the end, refusing to pay for her ride.

19. Contractor Faces Second Big Spy Scandal

Wall Street Journal, Doug Cameron, Damian Paletta, 2016 10 06

New York - With new charges that one of its contractors mishandled government secrets, Booz Allen Hamilton Holding Corp. is facing its second major personnel scandal in three years. The Justice Department on Wednesday charged Harold Thomas Martin, a Maryland resident, with stealing top-secret documents and unlawfully taking government property. Mr. Martin, a contractor for the National Security Agency, was employed by Booz Allen, according to people familiar with the situation, the same firm that employed Edward Snowden. The NSA is one of the government's most secretive agencies, dealing in espionage and military programs. Two major breaches in three years is a giant setback for the agency, which is still trying to regain trust with the public and businesses about the scope of its operations. But even after Mr. Snowden fled the U.S. with details of secret programs, the NSA and other federal agencies remained reliant on Booz Allen and other contractors to participate in secretive programs. "It's fair to say we rely on contractors for very sensitive work, and they can work side by side with government employees," said Rajesh De, chairman of the cybersecurity practice at law firm Mayer Brown and a former general counsel at the NSA. "A lay person oftentimes couldn't even tell the difference."

20. Half of Chinese Favorable Toward U.S., but Many See a Threat, a Survey Finds

New York Times, Edward Wong, 2016 10 06

Beijing - With tensions between the United States and China on the rise over issues such as the South China Sea and cyberespionage, one might think the citizens of the two nations have an increasingly hostile view of the other. Yet, Chinese have a more favorable view of the United States than they did a year ago, according to the results of a global survey released by the Pew Research Center on Wednesday. They hold that perspective even as many cite the United States as a major threat to China, Pew said. The report also said that although three-quarters of Chinese say their country is playing a larger role in the world than it did a decade ago, most want their government to focus on domestic issues rather than helping other nations. And more than three-quarters say their way of life needs to be protected from foreign influence -- a 13 percentage-point increase from 2002.

21. N.S.A. Contractor Arrested in Possible New Theft of Secrets

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 05

Washington - The F.B.I. secretly arrested a National Security Agency contractor in recent weeks and is investigating whether he stole and disclosed highly classified computer code developed to hack into the networks of foreign governments, according to several senior law enforcement and intelligence officials. The theft raises the embarrassing prospect that for the second time in three years, an insider has managed to steal highly damaging secret information from the N.S.A. In 2013, Edward J. Snowden, who was also a contractor for the agency, took a vast trove of documents that were later passed to journalists, exposing N.S.A. surveillance programs in the United States and abroad. The contractor was identified as Harold T. Martin III, 51, of Glen Burnie, Md., according to a criminal complaint filed in late August. He was charged with theft of government property, and unauthorized removal or retention of classified documents. During an F.B.I. raid of his house, agents seized documents and digital information stored on electronic devices. A large percentage of the materials found in his house and car contained highly classified information. At the time, F.B.I. agents interviewed Mr. Martin, and he initially denied having taken the documents and digital files. The agency later said he had stated that he knew he was not authorized to have the materials. According to the complaint, he told the agency that "he knew what he had done was wrong and that he should not have done it because he knew it was unauthorized." In a brief statement issued on Wednesday, lawyers for Mr. Martin said: "We have not seen any evidence. But what we know is that Hal Martin loves his family and his country."

There is no evidence that he intended to betray his country." Mr. Martin is suspected of taking the highly classified computer code developed by the agency to break into computer systems of adversaries like Russia, China, Iran and North Korea. Two officials said that some of the information the contractor is suspected of taking was dated. (An administration) official said that at the moment it did not look like an espionage case, but added the caveat that it is a continuing investigation.

22. NSA contractor charged with stealing top secret data

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 06

Boston - A federal contractor suspected in the leak of powerful National Security Agency hacking tools has been arrested and charged with stealing classified information from the U.S. government, according to court records and U.S. officials familiar with the case. Harold Thomas Martin III, 51, who did technology work for Booz Allen Hamilton, was charged with theft of government property and unauthorized removal and retention of classified materials, authorities said. According to two U.S. officials familiar with the case, he is suspected of "hoarding" classified materials going back as far as a decade in his house and car, and the recent leak of the hacking tools tipped investigators to what he was doing. Martin was arrested in August after investigators raided his home in Glen Burnie, Md., and found documents and digital information stored on various devices that contained highly classified information, authorities said. The breadth of the harm Martin is alleged to have caused -- and what might have motivated it, if proven -- was not immediately clear, although officials said some of the documents he took home "could be expected to cause exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States." Investigators are probing whether Martin, who had top secret clearance, was responsible for an apparent leak that led to a cache of NSA hacking tools appearing online in August, according to the officials familiar with the case, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. The FBI and NSA are trying to figure out what drove Martin. The FBI's Behavioral Analysis Unit is working on a psychological assessment, officials said. "This definitely is different" from other leak cases, one U.S. official said. "That's why it's taking us awhile to figure it out."

23. NSA has lost some terrorists because of encryption, its top lawyer says

CNBC, Harriet Taylor, 2016 10 05

Cambridge - The NSA has lost some terrorists because of their adoption of strong encryption, but the agency is supportive of the use of the technology, its top lawyer said Wednesday. Glenn Gerstell, general counsel of the National Security Agency, made the comments at the Cambridge Cyber Summit at MIT in Cambridge, Massachusetts. "We are big supporters of encryption," said Gerstell. "Encryption is more of a law enforcement issue." He said the NSA sees ISIS terrorists using end-to-end encryption, and that has prevented the agency from finding out the key information about those bad actors.

24. NSA Thief Worked With Elite Hacker Squad

The Daily Beast, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 06

Washington - The retired Navy officer arrested for allegedly removing highly classified information from the National Security Agency worked with the organization's elite computer hackers, who specialize in using computer code to penetrate the systems of foreign nations, according to a former colleague and the man's online resume. Harold Thomas Martin, III, who goes by Hal, was also enrolled in a PhD program at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. The university has a partnership with the NSA, in which the agency helps develop curriculum for the school and agency employees can take classes there. Martin worked with NSA's Tailored Access Operations unit, sources with knowledge of his background told The Daily Beast. In his LinkedIn resume, Martin says he worked as a "cyber engineering advisor" supporting "various cyber related initiatives" in the Defense Department and intelligence community. Allen was employed by NSA contractor Booz Allen Hamilton. Former intelligence officials, who said they aren't familiar with Martin's case, suggested he may have brought the material home to use as research for his PhD studies. "It's conceivable given what he was working on that he might have used the [classified] material for research," a former official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

25. Obama Admin Hiding Secret Hostage Docs Signed With Iranian Intel Officials

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 10 06

Washington - Key documents relating to the Obama administration's secret negotiations with Iran, including a $1.7 billion cash payment, are being stored at a highly secure site on Capitol Hill, preventing the public and many in Congress from accessing them, according to multiple sources who described the situation to the Washington Free Beacon. The documents are not technically classified but are being kept in a "secure reading space" where the majority of congressional officials cannot access them. Those cleared are forced to relinquish their cellular devices and are barred from taking notes, undermining the ability of staffers to brief their lawmakers on the contents, according to the sources. Sources further disclosed that joint U.S.-Iranian signatures across the three documents add up to a package deal between Washington and Iran's Intelligence Ministry, the country's internal spy agency. Sources familiar with a closed-door January briefing by senior Obama administration officials told the Free Beacon they were informed the United States negotiated with "the Iranian intelligence apparatus."

26. Revealed: The FBI's Secret Methods for Recruiting Informants at the Border

The Intercept, Cora Currier, 2016 10 06

Washington - Think about arriving at the airport from a foreign country. You are tired from a long flight, anxious about your baggage, and thinking about meeting your family in the arrivals area. You may not have seen them in years. Perhaps it is your first time in the United States. Perhaps you do not speak English well. Perhaps you plan to ask for asylum. Perhaps you are coming from a country where interactions with people in uniform generally involve bribery, intimidation, or worse. The FBI and U.S. Customs and Border Protection work closely together to turn these vulnerabilities into opportunities for gathering intelligence, according to government documents obtained by The Intercept. CBP assists the FBI in its efforts to target travelers entering the country as potential informants, feeding the bureau passenger lists and pulling people aside for lengthy interrogations in order to gather intelligence from them on the FBI's behalf, the documents show. In one briefing, CBP bills itself as the "GO TO agency in the Law Enforcement world when it comes to identifying individuals of either source or lead potential." When the FBI wants to find informants that fit a certain profile -- say, men of Pakistani origin between the ages of 18 and 35 -- it has at its fingertips a wealth of data from government agencies like CBP. The FBI gives CBP a list of countries of origin to watch out for among passengers, sometimes specifying other characteristics, such as travel history or age. It also briefs CPB officers on its intelligence requirements. The CBP sifts through its data to provide the bureau with a list of incoming travelers of potential interest. The FBI can then ask CBP to flag people for extra screening, questioning, and follow-up visits. According to the documents, the FBI uses the border questioning as a pretext to approach people it wants to turn informant and inserts itself into the immigration process by instructing agents on how to offer an "immigration relief dangle."

27. The Aspen Institute's Walter Isaacson Interviews Admiral Michael S. Rogers from the Cambridge Cyber Summit Today

CNBC website, Walter Isaacson, 2016 10 05

WALTER ISAACSON: Thank you. Thank you very much, Michael, for being with us today. The latest of these is Yahoo, in which supposedly a lot was just read because they were ordered to do so. I just got a statement from them, an email, saying, no, no it wasn't really that way. We did not open up all of the emails. It was a much narrower complying with orders. Talk to us about the type of things you need to do and have industry cooperate with you, why that's legal and where you think we have to draw the line. ADMIRAL ROGERS: So clearly we have a legal framework in this nation that enables the government under specific -- for specific reasons, under specific conditions, to make a case before a judge in which we're able to show a judge we have reason to believe that there is threat here to the United States associated with specific individuals and a judge grants, simplistically, authority for a specific purpose for a specific period of time to access data. And the court order is then given to the private sector to execute. This is done -- phone records, bank records, this is a long-standing mechanism in our nation for how does the government access information using a lawful mechanism to do that. Cyber and intelligence, in this aspect, is no different then. WALTER ISAACSON: Let me make sure I heard you correctly. That means you couldn't get one that would just blanket look at all emails. ADMIRAL ROGERS: No. I was going to say, that would be illegal. We don't do that, and no court would ever grant us the authority to do that. We have to make a specific case. And what the court grants is specific authority for a specific period of time for a specific purpose. It's not a blanket, A, just everything. WALTER ISAACSON: So we shouldn't believe the stories that we read?

ADMIRAL ROGERS: I've read this real quickly and I thought, well, this is a little speculative.

28. Top CIA officers to face questions about brutal interrogations in civil suit

Washington Post, Greg Miller, 2016 10 06

Washington - Two former high-ranking CIA officials will be compelled to answer questions under oath about the agency's brutal interrogations of terrorism suspects, a federal judge ruled Tuesday as part of a lawsuit brought against former CIA contractors by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ruling would require Jose Rodriguez, who was the head of the CIA's Counterterrorism Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, and John Rizzo, the agency's former acting general counsel, to submit to depositions about a program that used methods widely condemned as torture. "This ruling is a critical step towards accountability, and it charts a way forward for torture victims to get their day in court," ACLU attorney Dror Ladin said in a statement released by the organization after the ruling in federal court in Spokane, Wash. The ACLU is representing three former CIA detainees in a suit against agency contract psychologists, James E. Mitchell and John B. "Bruce" Jessen, who were among the main architects of a program that subjected al-Qaeda suspects to waterboarding, sleep deprivation and other coercive measures.

30. Yahoo Said to Have Aided U.S. Email Surveillance by Adapting Spam Filter

New York Times, Charlie Savage, Nicole Perlroth, 2016 10 06

Washington - A system intended to scan emails for child pornography and spam helped Yahoo satisfy a secret court order requiring it to search for messages containing a computer "signature" tied to the communications of a state-sponsored terrorist organization, several people familiar with the matter said on Wednesday. Two government officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the Justice Department obtained an individualized order from a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court last year. Yahoo was barred from disclosing the matter. To comply, Yahoo customized an existing scanning system for all incoming email traffic, which also looks for malware, according to one of the officials and to a third person familiar with Yahoo's response, who also spoke on the condition of anonymity. With some modifications, the system stored and made available to the Federal Bureau of Investigation a copy of any messages it found that contained the digital signature. The collection is no longer taking place, those two people said. The order was unusual because it involved the systematic scanning of all Yahoo users' emails rather than individual accounts; several other tech companies said they had not encountered such a demand.

31. Islamic militant groups' recruits likely to be well educated, study finds

The Guardian (London), Jason Burke, 2016 10 05

London - Recruits to Islamic militant groups are likely to be well educated and relatively wealthy, with those aspiring to be suicide bombers among the best off, a study by the World Bank has found. The research, based on internal records from the Islamic State group, will reinforce the growing conclusion among specialists that there is no obvious link between poverty or educational levels and radicalisation. The data, leaked by a disaffected former member of Isis in March, includes basic information on 3,803 foreign recruits from all over the Islamic world and Europe who joined the organisation between early 2013 and late 2014, when the flow of volunteers to the organisation reached a peak. Those arriving in Isis-controlled territory were vetted and interviewed. Data on country of residence, citizenship, marital status, skills, educational status, previous extremist experience and knowledge of Islamic law was recorded. The World Bank study found that 69% of recruits reported at least a secondary level education while "15% left school before high school and less than 2% are illiterate".

32. Judge questions excessive cost of stopping jihadists

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 10 06

London - A senior judge yesterday highlighted the "extraordinary level" of state intervention that stopped a teenage boy travelling abroad because of fears that he wanted to fight in Syria. Mr Justice Hayden said that huge resources had been deployed in the case and revealed that he had questioned whether such activity was proportionate. He told the High Court that he was often asked why so much "time, money and effort" was spent in preventing young extremists from joining terror groups in the Middle East and "why not just let them go?" The judge said: "And I myself have wondered whether that was proportionate. But at the end of the day ... they have saved a human life." The judge banned the teenager from travelling abroad last year after a hearing in the family division of the High Court, in which police and social workers raised concerns about him heading to Syria. The teenager, who has joint Libyan and British nationality and cannot be named, was made a ward of court which prevents him leaving England and Wales.

He had an uncle who was held at Guantanamo Bay and three of his brothers had travelled to fight for the group then known as the Nusra Front in Syria. Two died in their teens and a third was wounded.

33. Resurgent al-Qaeda plots deadly attacks against UK and Europe

London Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 06

London - A resurgent al-Qaeda is plotting attacks against Britain with renewed vigour as Islamic State comes under pressure, sources said last night. Sir Michael Fallon, the defence secretary, also told The Times that the terrorist network posed a "very direct threat" to the UK and Europe. Britain is keenly aware of the growing threat posed by al-Qaeda and its affiliates, particularly as Isis faces defeat in Iraq and Syria, a Whitehall source said. "Al-Qaeda has been quietly rebuilding itself," the source said. "They watched Isis become the big kid on the block. Al-Qaeda is biding its time. It will still be there when Isis is done." Sir Michael said that one of the reasons Britain was keeping several hundred troops in Afghanistan was because of al-Qaeda, which has been setting up camps in the south of the country, where British forces were once based. "Al-Qaeda is still alive and kicking in Afghanistan, in Syria, in Yemen and elsewhere," he said. "It has not been finally defeated and we are very conscious of that . . . It is a very direct threat to the UK. Not just the [defence] ministry but the security agencies are very much aware of that."

34. Australia 10th in terrorist activity as nations experience 650pc increase in deaths

The Australian, Joe Kelly, 2016 10 06

Sydney - Terror-related deaths increased by 650 per cent in OECD nations between 2014 and last year in a more difficult and complex security environment aggravated by the rise of Islamic State, with Australia recording the 10th-highest level of national terrorist activity. New research shows an increase in terrorism-related fatalities in the OECD, from 77 deaths in 2014 to 577 deaths last year -- and another 482 deaths in the first seven months of this year -- with the results to be examined today in Canberra by a global terrorism risk insurance conference. The research commissioned by the Australian Reinsurance Pool Corporation reveals there have been more terrorist incidents on Australian soil in 2014-15 than in all the previous 15 years. Conducted by the Institute for Economics and Peace, the analysis shows that more than half the terrorism-related deaths in the OECD since 2014 have been linked with Islamic State and that, last year, 21 of the 34 member nations experienced at least one terrorist attack. Nine other OECD members experienced their highest levels of terrorism since 2000. IEP research fellow Murray Ackman said the "sheer volume of attacks" suggested terrorism was now a "much greater threat to - political stability in OECD countries". The security situation had become more complex.

35. NSW terror suspect to make bail bid

Australian Associated Press, Miranda Forster, 2016 10 06

Sydney - A Sydney terror suspect hopes to be released from custody on bail after avoiding a long jail sentence for refusing to co-operate with the NSW Crime Commission. Alo-Bridget Namoa faced a two-year maximum jail term for failing to answer 31 questions relating to a suspected terror plot at a crime commission examination in February. The 19-year-old was given an eight-month overall sentence, with a four-month non-parole period, in Sydney's Central Local Court on Thursday after Magistrate Beverley Schurr found her offences weren't in "the top range of seriousness". Namoa has been behind bars since February 23 when she was arrested on separate charges of possessing a hunting knife and instructions for making a bomb detonator - both allegedly in connection with assisting her husband Sameh Bayda to commit a terrorist act. Her lawyer Sophie Toomey said the teenager will "absolutely" fight those allegations, and will now be able to apply for bail next week as a result of Thursday's outcome. "She was very, very happy with that sentence," Ms Toomey told reporters outside court. "She has a massive fight ahead of her but this is one step towards the right outcome." Namoa, who is of Tongan heritage, appeared in court by video link from prison and wore a headscarf covering her hair and neck.

36. Spark seeks details on US email scans

New Zealand Herald, Nicholas Jones, 2016 10 06

Wellington - Kiwi telco Spark is seeking clarification from Yahoo as to whether any of its customers had email searched at the behest of United States intelligence agencies. According to an investigation by Reuters, Yahoo last year used a software program to search its customers' incoming email for specific information provided by US intelligence agencies. That happened after the Yahoo complied with a classified US government demand, it was reported. Spark is seeking more information, including whether Spark's Xtra Mail customers could have been affected. Yahoo hosts more than 800,000 accounts on behalf of Spark. "At this time we are still seeking clarification from Yahoo if any Spark Xtra email customers are involved," a spokeswoman told the Herald. Privacy Commissioner John Edwards said Spark was right to be making its own inquiries. "I would be concerned if these kinds of arrangements were occurring without a clear legal authority. But we haven't seen enough in the Reuters report to know the basis of it." Edwards said there was a big difference between an intelligence agency asking a provider to scan all email accounts, and seeking access to a particular communication when there were legitimate law enforcement reasons to do so.

38. Bin Laden's son seeks to revive the family's line in global terror

London Times, Hugh Tomlinson, 2016 10 06

London - In May this year, a recording of a little-known voice was released online, warning that "Jerusalem is a bride and our blood is her dowry". The young man speaking was Hamza bin Laden, son of al-Qaeda's founder Osama bin Laden, and the statement confirmed his family's re-emergence at the forefront of jihadism. Hamza's raised profile underscores al-Qaeda's resurgence as it returns to Afghanistan and bids to regain its former stature. Now believed to be 25, he has released three more statements over the summer to confirm his growing status. He has called for attacks on the US, Britain, France and Israel and vowed to avenge his father's death. Like his father, he demands the overthrow of the Saudi monarchy. In June, he lashed out at Isis with a call for unity among jihadists in Syria, stressing that the conflict could provide a platform for attacks on Israel. Rahimullah Yusufzai, a Peshawar-based journalist and jihadism expert said: "Al-Qaeda is sending a message that it is in for the long haul and will still be around when Isis has disappeared, that it can unite where Isis divides." 45. Thousands of Colombians march to salvage peace deal Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 06

Bogota - Thousands carrying candles and waving white flags and handkerchiefs marched through the capital Wednesday demanding Colombia's political establishment and leftist rebels not give up on a peace deal narrowly rejected by voters. The "March for Peace" was organized on social media by student groups and social movements that were on the losing end in Sunday's national referendum. Many walked silently, while some carried pictures of loved ones among the 220,000 killed during the half-century conflict involving the military, leftist rebels and right-wing militias. "Peace can't be delayed forever," said one demonstrator, Carlos Charry, a 37-year-old sociologist. "It's time everyone understands that we can't keep repeating the same mistakes of the past 52 years." The march came as President Juan Manuel Santos embarked on talks with the opposition to try to save the accord with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia. Earlier in the day Santos met with his predecessor as president, Alvaro Uribe, who led opposition to the deal with the FARC. They talked privately for several hours, announcing only they agreed to form a commission that will begin meeting Thursday to evaluate ways to improve the accord.

46. Bangladesh court clears student of restaurant terror attack involvement (Canada).

Hindustan Times, 2016 10 06

Dhaka - A Bangladeshi court on Wednesday freed a Canadian university student of all charges of involvement in a terror attack on a restaurant in July that left 20 hostages dead. Dhaka's Metropolitan Magistrate Nur Nabi passed the order after counter-terrorism investigator Humayun Kabir appealed for clearing Tahmid Hasib Khan, 22. The ruling ends a formal investigation against the undergraduate student of the University of Toronto. Khan was arrested in August and has been held for interrogation since then even as his family claimed he was innocent and just a victim of the situation. Abdullah Abu, a public prosecutor, said Khan was cleared of suspicion that he was involved in the July 1 siege of the Holey Artisan Bakery in Dhaka's Gulshan diplomatic zone. Seventeen foreigners including an Indian student were among the killed.

47. Bangladeshi student cleared over deadly cafe attack (Canada).

Agence France Presse, 2016 10 06

Dhaka - A Bangladeshi court Wednesday formally exonerated a student at a Canadian university of involvement in a deadly cafe siege, two months after he was arrested and charged over the carnage. Security forces named Tahmid Hasib Khan as a suspect in the weeks following the siege at the upmarket Dhaka cafe in July when Islamist militants killed 22 mostly foreign hostages. Khan's family vehemently protested his innocence, saying he was in the cafe as a customer and was not connected to the five gunmen who hacked and shot to death the hostages in an attack claimed by ISIS. The court formally cleared the 22-year-old Wednesday, three days after he was released on bail when police dropped the charges, Dhaka Metropolitan court public prosecutor Abdullah Abu said. "He (Khan) was exempted as police had not found any evidence against him," Abu told AFP.

48. Bangladesh Siege Is Recalled in a Militant's Words (Canada)

New York Times, Ellen Barry, Maher Sattar, 2016 10 06

New Delhi - An Islamic State publication offered a detailed account of the bloody July 1 siege of a restaurant in Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh, including the use of religious tests to distinguish Muslims from non-Muslims, who would then be killed. The article, which appeared this week and also threatened further attacks in the country, bears the byline of Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury, a militant who was killed with two associates in a police raid in late August. Mr. Chowdhury, a Canadian citizen, had been identified by some analysts as the coordinator of the Islamic State's activities in South Asia but had never been named by the group. It is unusual for the Islamic State to publish the real names of its fighters, said Amarnath Amarasingam, a fellow at George Washington University's Program on Extremism. Mr. Amarasingam said the Islamic State has been eager to "take ownership" of the Dhaka attack, which came at a time of military setbacks in its core territory in the Middle East. "It is a long piece, with a lot of information to go through, so I cannot speak clearly now on things like authenticity," said Sanwar Hossain, additional deputy commissioner of the counterterrorism unit in the Dhaka Metropolitan police. He said that the police also knew Mr. Chowdhury by the kuniya, or nom de guerre, cited in the magazine. "We have known for a while that this is how Tamim Chowdhury was referred to," he said.

BDNews24, Court Correspondent, 2016 10 06

Dhaka - A Dhaka court has cleared Tahmid Hasib Khan of all charges related to the Gulshan cafe attack by Islamist militants, two days after he was granted bail. Tahmid, a Gulshan cafe attack 'hostage', was arrested as a suspect in a case started under Section 54 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, allowing police to arrest suspects without warrants. Former North South University teacher Hasanat Rezaul Karim was also arrested with Tahmid in the same case. Some of the photos of the attack disseminated on social media show Tahmid carrying a gun in company with Hasanat and Rohan Ibn Imtiaz, one of the attackers killed in the commando operation. The family said Tahmid, pursuing studies at a university in Canada, had returned to Bangladesh the day before the attack and had gone to the eatery to meet his friends. Tamim Ahmed Chowdhury, the suspected cafe attack mastermind killed in a raid in Narayanganj later, was also from Canada.

50. N.K. elites' defections point to signs of cracks in regime: Seoul official

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 06

Seoul - A series of high-profile defections by members of the North Korean elite are signs of cracks in the country, but it is too early to say if it could spur the collapse of the regime, a Seoul official said Thursday. This year, more ranking North Korean officials including Thae Yong-ho, a former minister at Pyongyang's embassy in London, defected to South Korea, which some experts view as a sign of instability in the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong-un. An official at Seoul's unification ministry said the trend has yet to be seen as a potential sign that the oppressive regime will implode, but the move is an indication of cracks in the North's leadership. "We see that defections by North Korean elites are clear signs of cracks in the North Korean regime. But it remains to be seen if it could work as a trigger for the regime's collapse," the official said, asking not to be named. He said that regime change is not the goal of South Korea's inter-Korean policy, adding that the government will adhere to President Park Geun-hye's signature policy of building mutual trust for reunification.

"International terrorists' groups, including the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), have been conducting indiscriminate attacks on various locations like stadiums and streets to claim more lives," Hwang said. "Following North Korea's fifth nuclear test and missile provocations, there are also possibilities for Pyongyang to conduct an attack amid the grave security conditions," the prime minister added. Hwang stressed the general public must stay alert and cooperate with the government to better cope with terrorists' provocations.

52. Snowden biopic to illuminate situation of asylum seekers (Canada)

South China Morning Post, Raquel Carvalho, 2016 10 06

Beijing - Oliver Stone's Snowden film, which opens in Hong Kong cinemas today, has raised some concerns about the public exposure that those who sheltered the former US intelligence contractor in Hong Kong in 2013 are facing. "I haven't seen the portrayal ... but am aware of some of the reports of the persons sheltering Mr Snowden," human rights lawyer Mark Daly said. "I think in very general terms it may shed some light on the situation of refugees in Hong Kong but the 'light' may not be welcomed by all," he noted. Daly said that "usually, genuine asylum seekers would not wish to reveal their identities as this could expose them, or their families, to danger if returned to their countries of origin". But he noted: "The issues are complex and perhaps raise further questions and concerns." It emerged last month that Edward Snowden, a former National Security Agency contractor who leaked classified documents detailing the extent of electronic spying by the United States and other governments, took shelter in asylum seekers' homes during his stay in Hong Kong in June 2013. Their identities, including names and photos, appeared in the news over the past weeks. Justice Centre advocacy officer Victoria Wisniewski Otero said although it is hard to predict the impact on the families who sheltered Snowden, the film might highlight the broader situation. Robert Tibbo, one of the lawyers who assisted Snowden in Hong Kong, said there was no option but to reveal the identities of those who sheltered the former US intelligence contractor. "There are exactly eight refugees identified in the media and who are portrayed in the film ... There was no choice about the fact that they existed and sheltered Snowden as it is in the film," he said. Revealing their identities before the film's release also provided an opportunity for them "to have control over their story". According to the Canadian barrister, "the identification of the three refugee families ... will certainly provide greater protection to them".

Dhaka - Police are set to press new charges of hiding information about the barbaric Gulshan cafe attack against Canadian university student Tahmid Hasib Khan as the court cleared the way today. The court also cleared Tahmid and former North South University teacher Hasanat Rezaul Karim of all charges under section 54 of the CrPC. Dhaka metropolitan magistrate Md Nur Nabi passed the order. Another Dhaka court on October 2 has granted bail to Tahmid in the sensational Gulshan cafe attack case. Tahmid, who were seen holding gun and walking along with the terrorists in a couple of pictures taken by a man from a flat adjacent to the bakery, were arrested on August 4. A total of 22 persons were killed by the terrorists in the July 1 attack on an upscale cafe in capital's Gulshan area. Five terrorists were also killed in the Operation Thunderbolt by the army commandos. A cafe worker too lost his life coming between the exchanges of fire. (Full Report).

Tehran - Iran has barred 35 dual nationals, out of a 79 total, from serving in an official capacity presumably for security concerns, an MP quoted Intelligence Minister Mahmoud Alavi as having said, IRIB news agency reported on October 5. "Out of a total of 79 cases looked into, 39 were proved to have dual nationalities or a U.S. Green Card, and dismissed for official posts," Alavi had told members of the Majlis National Security and Foreign Policy Committee, according to Hossein Naqavi Hosseini, the committee spokesman. In August, Iran's Judiciary confirmed the arrest of a "spy" involved in the nuclear negotiations with world powers later on identified as Abdolrasoul Dorri Esfahani, a senior accountant involved in banking-related aspects of the nuclear talks. Dual nationalities grew into a major security debate raised by conservatives in Iran in the past two or three years. The conservatives say dual nationality is one of the major canals for foreigners to infiltrate the Islamic Republic.

Le Monde, Benjamin Barthe, 2016 10 06

Daraya, Syrie - L'intervention russe en Syrie, lancée le 30 septembre 2015, a sauvé le régime Assad. A la tête d'un Etat affaibli, le dictateur sait profiter des faiblesses de ses alliés et de ses adversaires Pour la fête de l'Aïd-el-Kébir, lundi 12 septembre, qui correspondait au lendemain de son 51e anniversaire, Bachar Al-Assad s'est offert un cadeau très personnel : une parade devant les caméras, dans les rues désertes de Daraya. Deux semaines plus tôt, cette banlieue de Damas, haut lieu du soulèvement contre le régime syrien, avait fini par baisser les armes, après quatre années de siège et de bombardement. Sa population avait été évacuée vers des zones sous contrôle gouvernemental, tandis que les combattants étaient transférés par bus vers Idlib, une autre place forte de la rébellion, 300 kilomètres plus au nord. Accompagné d'une vingtaine de fidèles, le président syrien a donc arpenté d'un pas vif les rues de cette ville fantôme, réduite à l'état de squelette par les barils d'explosifs et les bombes incendiaires. Sur fond de musique dramatisante, mais avec le ton faussement candide qu'il affectionne en interview, M. Assad, en costume gris clair et col de chemise ouvert, a réitéré son leitmotiv : " Nous sommes déterminés à reconquérir chaque pouce de la Syrie des mains des terroristes. "

I am on board the Zaytouna, but not as a crew member. My role is as an organiser and the flotilla is expected to reach Gaza early on Wednesday October 5. We all hope that we will break the blockade and celebrate on the shores of Gaza, but in reality, we know that our ships will probably be intercepted by Israeli forces and we will be illegally detained. 59. Le Hezbollah lie la situation au Liban aux crises régionales

L'Orient Le Jour, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 06

Beyrouth - Les discours prononcés hier par des responsables du Hezbollah ont été axés sur l'impossibilité de dissocier le Liban des guerres régionales « menées contre le fondamentalisme ». Rien n'a été dit en revanche sur la présidentielle libanaise, ni même sur la nécessité de relancer le dialogue national, auquel avait pourtant appelé dernièrement le Hezbollah. « Le Liban est au coeur d'une grande crise qui s'identifie à la crise dans la région. Toutes les crises sont corollaires, et la partie qui les gère est une : les États-Unis », a estimé hier le vice-secrétaire général du Hezbollah, cheikh Naïm Kassem, lors d'une veillée de Achoura dans le quartier de Hay el-Sellom. Pour lui, « les agressions américaines contre nos pays » obéiraient à deux objectifs : « Le premier est de rassurer Israël et d'en garantir la sécurité dans la région, le second est de mettre la main sur les ressources pétrolières, monétaires et humaines dans nos pays. » Le numéro deux du Hezbollah a ensuite repris l'accusation traditionnelle du parti contre l'Arabie saoudite, d'être « un petit instrument au service du projet américain ».

On the day of the bombing, Abu Tareq was in the car behind Hariri's, which took the brunt of the blast. Investigators say he was killed instantly. 61. « Fiches S » : Maurey veut une loi

Le Progrès de Fécamp, S. Siret, 2016 10 06

Evreux, France - Hervé Maurey dépose une proposition de loi afin les maires puissent connaître l'identité des fichés S de leur commune. Pas question pour les maires d'avoir connaissance du nom des fichés S vivant dans leur commune. Plusieurs d'entre eux, à l'image de Guy Lefrand , le maire LR d' Evreux , ont pourtant réclamé cette possibilité. En vain. A une autre échelle, le président du département de la Seine-Maritime , Pascal Martin , verrait lui aussi d'un bon oeil le fait de pouvoir connaître l'identité d'éventuels fichés S parmi les 5 500 agents de la collectivité qu'il dirige. Relayée par le sénateur UDI de l'Eure, Hervé Maurey , cette demande n'a pour l'instant obtenu qu'une fin de non-recevoir de la part du gouvernement. Le ministre des Collectivités territoriales, Jean-Michel Baylet , a rappelé la semaine dernière la réglementation existante et évoquer la mise en place d'un groupe de travail avec les élus locaux, ainsi que « l'envoi d'une circulaire au préfet » pour justifier le refus d'accéder à cette demande pourtant « légitime »,selon le sénateur eurois. « Strictement encadré et limité » Pas satisfait de la réponse du ministre, qu'il juge « inadaptée aux préoccupations des élus locaux » , Hervé Maurey avait annoncé qu'il engagerait une initiative parlementaire. C'est chose faite. L'ancien maire de Bernay a déposé une proposition de loi « visant à permettre aux maires de connaître l'identité des personnes fichées S résidant dans leur commune ». « Tous les auteurs d'attentats terroristes commis en France depuis 2015, outre leur profil radicalisé et leur affiliation à l'idéologie islamiste, avaient un point commun : ils faisaient l'objet d'une surveillance au titre du fichier des personnes recherchées, dans la sous-catégorie S » , constate l'élus eurois.

62. 2 Brussels Officers Are Stabbed and a Suspect Is Shot

New York Times, Milan Schreuer, Alissa J. Rubin, 2016 10 06

Brussels - A man wounded two police officers with a knife in Brussels around noon on Wednesday in what the authorities called "a potential terrorist attack." The two officers were attacked on the Boulevard Lambert in the Schaerbeek district, just north of the city center. A third police officer, who came to their aid, was also injured. None of the three had life-threatening injuries. The man suspected of carrying out the assault was shot in the leg. He was identified only as Hicham D., 43, a Belgian citizen. "The provisional results of the investigation indicate that it would be a potential terrorist attack," Eric Van der Sijpt, a spokesman for the federal prosecutor's office, said in a statement. "The investigating judge specializing in terrorism cases will decide later" about the suspect's "further detention." Mr. Van der Sijpt said that Hicham D. was a former soldier and member of the Belgian Armed Forces, but did not say whether he had been cited before in terrorism investigations.

63. Ancien militaire et ex-boxeur professionnel: voici l'homme qui a attaqué trois policiers à Bruxelles

Dernière Heure (Belgique), Gilbert Dupont, 2016 10 06

Bruxelles - La mère d'Hicham Diop, l'homme qui a attaqué trois policiers: "Radicalisé, mon fils ? Il laisse ça aux autres" Ancien militaire, père de six enfants, ex-boxeur professionnel : voici l'homme qui a attaqué les policiers. L'homme de 43 ans qui a porté des coups de couteau hier matin à deux policiers de la zone Nord est Hicham Diop, belge, marié, père de famille nombreuse, ancien boxeur professionnel et ancien militaire à l'armée belge où il avait reçu la formation spécifique de soldat éclaireur voltigeur. En outre, à l'âge de 6 ans, Hicham avait été pris en otage, avec sa mère et un de ses frères, par un forcené. L'homme, un meurtrier sorti de l'asile, avait été abattu par la police. À l'époque, notre confrère Raoul Dewael écrivait dans la Dernière Heure: "Aucun membre de la famille Diop n'a été blessé. Mais il faudra plusieurs jours pour qu'ils se remettent de leurs émotions". Pour Hicham, 37 années n'ont sans doute pas suffi! Aujourd'hui, Diop habite avenue de la Reine à Schaerbeek. En 2011, il a été victime d'un accident grave qui peut également avoir joué un rôle : alors qu'il ramenait ses enfants de l'école, il a été renversé devant chez lui et grièvement blessé par une Audi A8 blindée de la police fédérale qui escortait un transport prioritaire. À sa grande fureur, l'affaire fut classée sans suite par le parquet de Bruxelles. Hicham Diop en a-t-il conçu une rage qui explique sans le justifier l'attentat commis hier contre les policiers ? La question est posée. Qui est Hicham Diop ? Nous rencontrons ses voisins et sa mère. Les voisins décrivent un "homme très gentil, serviable, poli", qui "disait bien bonjour" et qu'on voyait, le matin, "déposer les enfants à l'école dans la Renault Scenic familiale", et, le soir, les "ramener après les cours". Une famille ordinaire. Appréciée. L'homme fréquente la salle de musculation du quartier, souvent accompagné d'un ami qui "lui ressemble comme deux gouttes d'eau qu'on les croirait frères. [...] Hicham, c'est celui des deux qui a toujours une casquette". C'est à l'interpellation du second que nous avons assisté vers 17 h près du domicile de Hicham à Schaerbeek : la police veut vérifier si cet ami inséparable n'a pas eu un rôle actif dans l'attaque des policiers. Était-il au courant ? Quant à Hicham Diop, né en Belgique le 26 avril 1973, il a perdu son père en début d'année, des suites "d'une longue maladie". Il est marié à une infirmière. Le couple, qui a six enfants, a connu l'épreuve douloureuse d'en perdre un.

The suspect, named only as Hicham D, 43, attacked the two officers after they stopped him for a check in the Schaerbeek district of the Belgian capital. One officer was stabbed in the neck and another in the stomach, but neither are in a critical condition. The attacker fled before running into another police patrol which overpowered him, shooting him in the leg. During the struggle the suspect bit the nose of a third police officer. "The provisional results of the investigation indicate that it would be a potential terrorist attack," the federal prosecutor said in a statement. 65. German intelligence faces new cover-up claims in neo-Nazi case

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 10 06

Istanbul - Germany's intelligence services are once again subject to allegations of a cover-up with regards to the neo-Nazi National Socialist Underground (NSU) gang that is implicated in the racist murders of Turks in the country. Lawyers for the family of Mehmet Kubasik, killed by the NSU in 2006, filed a criminal complaint against Lothar Lingen, a senior official in the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BFV), Germany's domestic intelligence agency. Lingen, who was in charge of the BFV's division monitoring the far-right scene, is accused of destroying documents that could have shed light on the NSU's murders. Speaking to Anadolu Agency after filing the complaint against Lingen, Carsten Ilius, lawyer for the family of Kubasik, said new revelations on the case added to suspicions that the BFV destroyed paperwork that might be related to the NSU in 2011. Ilius said documents concerned seven informants in the far-right scene, and they were destroyed in November 2011, right after authorities found out that the gang was responsible for the murders. He said Lingen's statements during the legal process concerning the NSU showed intelligence officials were concerned about facing an inquiry if it was revealed that the BFV did not act though it knew about the neo-Nazi gang thanks to its informants in the far-right scene. Ilius said Lingen's 2014 testimony to prosecutors only came to light after an inquiry by a parliamentary committee investigating the potential cover-up and negligence in the case.

66. Hicham D., un radicalisé issu des rangs de l'armée

Le Soir (Belgique), Louis Colart avec F. De. et P.V., 2016 10 06

Bruxelles - Deux agents de police à Schaerbeek ont été blessés. L'enquête a été confiée au parquet fédéral, qui soupçonne un acte terroriste. Le suspect avait montré des signes de radicalisation avant de quitter l'armée belge en 2009. Acte d'un ex-militaire dépressif en quête de vengeance ou attentat terroriste ? L'auteur de l'agression au couteau sur deux policiers à Schaerbeek ce mercredi a été identifié comme Hicham D., né le 26 avril 1973, de nationalité belge. Sans donner plus de précisions, le porte-parole de l'instance fédérale ajoute que « les résultats provisoires de l'enquête montrent qu'il s'agirait d'un possible attentat terroriste. Le juge d'instruction, spécialisé en matière de terrorisme, décidera ultérieurement de son maintien en détention éventuel ». Des sources proches de l'enquête ont indiqué que le suspect avait été renversé et blessé grièvement en 2011 par un véhicule blindé de la police fédérale. Autre coup dur, le suspect aurait récemment perdu un enfant. Enfin, l'assaillant n'a pas émis de revendication au moment du passage à l'acte. Autant d'informations qui pourraient faire pencher l'enquête vers le geste désespéré d'un homme voulant se venger contre la société. Toutes ces informations n'ont pas été confirmées de source officielle. Une seule chose sûre mercredi soir : une perquisition a été effectuée au domicile du suspect, qui n'a mené à la découverte d'aucune arme ni explosif. Pourtant, le dossier a bien été transmis au parquet fédéral. Pourquoi soupçonner un acte terroriste ? Tout d'abord parce que Hicham D. serait connu de la justice, son nom se retrouverait dans plusieurs anciens dossiers de terrorisme. Il aurait également eu des contacts avec des combattants partis en Syrie, en particulier avec Bassam Ayachi, ont découvert nos confrères du Standaard .

67. La Suisse plus restrictive

Le Temps (Suisse), Sylvia Revello, 2016 10 06

Berne - Expert en droit des médias et des nouvelles technologies, Nicolas Capt analyse l'affaire Yahoo! du point de vue juridique suisse Peut- on envisager un accord similaire à celui de Yahoo! entre les autorités et des fournisseurs suisses? Au-delà du caractère illégal, cette situation me paraît peu probable. Les prérogatives étatiques sont très différentes en Suisse. Dans l'exemple américain, on est face à une surveillance à grande échelle, une sorte de fishing expedition qui ratisse large en espérant obtenir des résultats. Le cadre helvétique est bien plus restrictif, y compris avec la nouvelle loi sur le renseignement, qui pose de nombreux garde-fous. De la part des autorités pénales comme du Service de renseignement de la Confédération (SRC), l'observation des données privées reste limitée et surtout ciblée. La vraie différence réside dans une certaine opacité de la surveillance du SRC qui officie, par principe, hors de toute procédure pénale. La NSA avait-elle vraiment besoin que Yahoo! lui fournisse ses données, connaissant sa puissance de frappe? Il n'est pas absolument certain que la NSA soit capable de procéder seule à une surveillance aussi large. Politiquement parlant, je relève que le scandale est moindre en négociant un accord préalable avec la société plutôt qu'en opérant une attaque informatique contre une entreprise, qui plus est américaine.

68. Les métiers les plus sensibles face au risque de radicalisation

Le Figaro, Anne-Laure Frémont avec Caroline Piquet, 2016 10 06

Paris - Alors qu'Air France a démenti les affirmations du Canard Enchaîné selon lesquelles l'entreprise ferait face à une multiplication des sabotages sur ses appareils, voici un point sur les secteurs les plus exposés aux risques de radicalisation. L'un des kamikazes du Bataclan avait travaillé à la RATP, la régie des transports parisiens. L'attentat de Saint- Quentin-Fallavier, en Isère, lors duquel un homme a décapité son patron et foncé sur une usine, s'est produit sur un site classé Seveso. Un mois après les attentats du 13 novembre, le PDG d'Aéroports de Paris annonçait qu'une quinzaine de salariés travaillant à Roissy et Orly s'étaient vus retirer leur accréditation pour «comportements inquiétants»... Il y a environ 20.000 fichés S en France; des personnes potentiellement menaçantes pour la «sûreté de l'État», parfois soupçonnées de lien avec la mouvance terroriste. Voici les secteurs les plus sensibles.

69. Policiers agressés : le spectre du terrorisme

Le Soir (Belgique), Journaliste maison, 2016 10 06

Bruxelles - L'auteur de l'attaque au couteau avait montré des signes de radicalisation avant de quitter l'armée en 2009. Un homme a agressé au couteau deux policiers, ce mercredi matin à Schaerbeek, le long du boulevard Lambert. L'agresseur, identifié comme Hicham D. (43 ans), n'a émis aucune revendication au moment du passage à l'acte. L'enquête a malgré tout été confiée au parquet fédéral, qui soupçonne « un possible attentat terroriste ». Hicham D. était entré en 2006 ou 2007 dans les rangs de l'armée belge. Il y aurait montré des signes de radicalisation et aurait été considéré comme déserteur en 2009. Son nom se retrouverait dans plusieurs anciens dossiers de terrorisme. Il aurait également eu des contacts avec des combattants partis en Syrie. Plusieurs services fédéraux auraient été informés du profil radicalisé de l'agresseur, mais n'en auraient pas fait part à la police zonale dans le cadre des plates-formes d'échange d'informations.

70. Yahoo investigated by Irish watchdog over email 'scanner'

London Daily Telegraph, Cara McGoogan, 2016 10 06

Dublin - Yahoo is under investigation in Europe over claims that it monitored millions of emails at the request of the US government. The Irish privacy watchdog said it would examine whether Yahoo had broken EU data protection law as a "matter of considerable concern". It had been reported Yahoo had built a tool to scan every email sent or received for certain phrases that could signal criminal activity on behalf of the National Security Agency and FBI. "Arising from media reports, the Office of the Data Protection Commissioner is making enquiries into this matter," said the Dublin-based watchdog. As Yahoo's European headquarters is based in Ireland, the Irish office is responsible for determining whether it complies with laws across the EU. Yahoo last night called reports of its surveillance "misleading". A spokesman said: "The mail scanning described in the article does not exist on our systems. We narrowly interpret every government request for user data to minimise disclosure." (Full report).

1. Garratt makes first public appearance since release

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 10 07

Ottawa - Kevin Garratt, the Canadian missionary held for two years in China on suspicion of spying, spoke publicly for the first time Thursday since his high-profile release, detailing the brutal prison conditions he and his wife dealt with during their ordeal. Reading from a handwritten statement in the House of Commons foyer, Mr. Garratt said the "horrendous" 775-day ordeal for him, his wife and their family passed by in long minutes. Mr. Garratt and his wife, Julia, were initially detained in August, 2014, after living and working as missionaries in China for 30 years. "Julia and I were suddenly taken to a remote compound and held in isolation separately for six months, unjustly interrogated as suspects, accused of espionage and stealing state secrets," Mr. Garratt said, with his wife by his side. After spending six months confined to one room with the lights on 24 hours a day, seven days a week, Ms. Garratt was released on bail in February, 2015, without identification and multiple communications restrictions. Mr. Garratt's situation worsened. Mr. Garratt said his only contact with the outside world during his two years in prison was a 30-minute supervised, monthly visit with a consular worker. His wife experienced the same restrictions during her time in prison. He was suddenly released last month after a massive effort by the Canadian government, its embassy in Beijing and two prime ministers. Canadian Security Intelligence Service Director Michel Coulombe became involved, as well. According to sources, Mr. Coulombe met with Minister of State Security Geng Huichang to explain that Mr. Garratt, a Pentecostal pastor, did not work for CSIS. Mr. Garratt's release came one day after Ottawa agreed to bilateral extradition-treaty talks with China, a long-time demand of the Asian giant. Despite the timing, the government insists Canada made no concessions for Mr. Garratt's return.

2. 'They didn't break me'

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman, 2016 10 07

Montreal - Homa Hoodfar's Iranian captors never succeeded in breaking her spirit -- not when they confined her to a tiny cell without a bathroom, not when they interrogated her for hours on end, not when she endured countless sleepless nights in a brightly lit cell with no pillow. Not through 112 days in Iran's notorious Evin prison, which others, including Montreal photojournalist Zahra Kazemi, had not escaped alive. Not even when they told the 65-year-old Concordia University academic they would keep her locked up for 15 years, until she died, and then ship her home to Montreal in a casket. "They discovered they couldn't intimidate me," Hoodfar said in an interview. If anything, her defiance may have broken her captors. It certainly frustrated them, with interrogations often degenerating into shouting matches as they tried to cajole her into admitting she was an activist and not merely an academic doing research in Iran. "I told them I'm 65, death can happen at any time," she said with a steely glint in her eyes. "I said I've lived my life, I've achieved a lot, I have no children, my husband has passed, my mother has passed, my (siblings) will adjust to living without me. If I am to spend the rest of my life in Evin prison, in the company of intellectuals, it's fine." Dressed in a cheery red jacket and enjoying a summery breeze on the Concordia campus Thursday as she met with a succession of journalists, Hoodfar seemed relaxed as she recounted her ordeal in a country she will never again visit. She was fortunate that after many public and gruesome deaths at Evin prison, including Kazemi's rape and torture in 2003, she believes tactics now involve mainly psychological torture and intimidation. But there is no denying that prison was an often unbearable hardship which required incredible resilience to endure. She faced implacable and hostile interrogators dozens of times. One tactic she employed was to count her blessings, reminding herself often that 20 years ago her imprisonment would have been much harsher.

3. Bangladesh court clears Toronto student of allegations in terror attack

Vice News Canada, Tamara Khandaker, 2016 10 07

Toronto - The Islamic State has for the first time identified Canadian citizen Tamim Chowdhury as its former head of military and covert operations in Bangladesh -- using his real name in print, in an unusual move -- six weeks after he died in a hail of bullets during a shootout with Bangladeshi police. Chowdhury, a relative unknown until this year, gained worldwide notoriety in July as the alleged mastermind of a terrorist attack on a popular Dhaka cafe that left 22 people, mostly foreigners, dead. ISIS immediately claimed responsibility for the attack, but until Tuesday the extremist group had never acknowledged any association with Chowdhury. "I think it's the first time that ISIS has ever used anyone's real name in an official publication," said Amarnath Amarasingam, a fellow at the Center for Cyber and Homeland Security at George Washington University who has written extensively on extremism. Chowdhury was killed in August in one of a series of raids on suspected militant dens in Bangladesh, which has seen dozens of deadly attacks on atheists, secular writers, and religious minorities in the last two years. The latest issue of Rumiya magazine, a newer publication hawked by the militants, includes a fresh account of the Dhaka attack, under Chowdhury's byline. The author profiles each of the six attackers who died in the clash and describes the bloodshed as "just a glimpse, and what is yet to come by the permission of Allah will be worse and far more bitter."

4. Canadian troops more active on front line, commanders say

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 10 07

Toronto - Canadian troops are more active on the front line in Iraq and have engaged in sporadic gunfights with Daesh as local security forces step up offensive operations to reclaim territory from the insurgents, commanders say. Brig.-Gen. Peter Dawe, the deputy commanding officer of the Canadian Special Operations Forces Command, said the deployment of additional troops - due to a Liberal pledge to boost the ground mission - has expanded the Canadian presence "at the forward line with the Kurds in a significant manner." But that has also raised the dangers for Canadians as they spend less time in the classroom and more time in the field in their advise and assist role, overseeing the "execution of operations" by peshmerga troops. "We are more engaged on the line - there should be no doubt about that - and by extension, the risk has increased to our troops simply by virtue of time spent at the line and the work we're doing right now in a more dynamic and fluid environment," Dawe told a briefing Thursday. A sign of that is the fact that Canadian troops have engaged in gunfire with Daesh fighters in recent months to defend themselves, Kurdish forces and protect what he called "non-combatants," Dawe said.

5. Des hélicoptères de Valcartier en appui aux alliés kurdes

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche, 2016 10 07

Ottawa - Alors qu'une grande offensive se prépare pour libérer la ville irakienne de Mossoul du groupe État islamique, des hélicoptères militaires de la base de Valcartier viennent d'être déployés dans la région en appui aux troupes canadiennes et à leurs alliés kurdes, qui font face à un danger accru sur le terrain récemment. C'est ce qu'a expliqué le commandement canadien lors d'une mise à jour sur la mission en Irak, jeudi midi, à Ottawa. Trois hélicoptères Griffon de Valcartier sont déjà arrivés dans la région d'Erbil, au Kurdistan irakien, où les forces spéciales canadiennes poursuivent leur mission d'entraînement et d'assistance aux forces kurdes locales dans leur combat contre l'État islamique (EI). Un quatrième aéronef doit être déployé sous peu. Environ 60 militaires accompagnent les hélicoptères. Ils remplacent un escadron de Griffon ontarien qui était sur place depuis le mois de mai. Sur le terrain, l'objectif demeure toujours de laisser le combat aux troupes kurdes, a répété le commandement canadien. Mais il est arrivé à plusieurs reprises récemment que les soldats canadiens ouvrent le feu pour riposter lorsque des djihadistes les attaquent, attaquent leurs partenaires locaux ou ciblent des civils irakiens sous leurs yeux.

6. Easily spooked?

Globe and Mail, 2016 10 07

Editorial: Ralph Goodale, the Minister of Public Safety, has optimistically declared that the new national security and intelligence committee of Parliament "will set its own agenda and report when it sees fit." Well, maybe. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, and presumably his successors, will appoint all nine members of the committee. An incisive report by the Library of Parliament has pointed out quite a few limits of the committee members' powers under Bill C-22, which will set the rules for the committee. The committee is modelled on Britain's, with seven MPs and two senators. In the United States, things are very different. Because of the constitutional separation of powers, the Senate intelligence committee is not subordinate to the executive branch of government. The Library of Parliament points out that C-22 doesn't grant the broader powers that the British Parliament has enacted for its intelligence committee in the Justice and Security Act in 2013, after some years of satisfactory experience. But that's precisely why we should be patient, even if the Trudeau government has some steely authoritarianism underneath its ostensibly sunny ways. Any new parliamentary committee needs to learn to walk before it runs. As yet, we have no idea who Mr. Trudeau will appoint to this certainly new and supposedly independent committee.

7. Frontière Canada - États-Unis Des touristes armés jusqu'aux dents

Le Droit, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 07

Saint-Jean, Nouveau-Brunswick - Des retraités américains, généralement en provenance du sud des États-Unis, sont nombreux à tenter de traverser la frontière canadienne, au Nouveau-

Brunswick, avec des armes à feu, selon des procureurs fédéraux. Depuis le mois de juin, des incidents du genre se seraient produits au moins une fois par semaine. Cette semaine, le procureur fédéral Peter Thorn a raconté en Cour provinciale, mercredi, que l'histoire s'était répétée deux fois plutôt qu'une, lundi. Robert Ted Yarberry, de l'Arkansas, et David Thomas Falvey, de la Floride, sont arrivés à la frontière, séparément, à quelques heures d'intervalle. Les deux hommes dans la mi-soixantaine étaient des touristes voyageant avec leur femme. Ils ont tous deux dit aux agents frontaliers qu'ils ne transportaient pas d'armes prohibées. M. Yarberry, un enseignant et inspecteur d'habitations à la retraite, a dit à l'agent frontalier qu'il avait laissé son arme à son hôtel de Calais, dans le Maine, pour aller passer une journée au Nouveau- Brunswick. Une fouille de son véhicule a cependant permis aux agents de trouver un pistolet Glock dans un étui, sous son siège.

Ottawa - Le commissaire de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), Bob Paulson, souhaite tourner la page sur un chapitre noir de l'histoire de son organisation en présentant des excuses formelles aux centaines de femmes qui affirment avoir été victimes de harcèlement sexuel, d'intimidation et de discrimination au cours de leur carrière au sein de la GRC. M. Paulson a présenté ses excuses aux victimes hier à Ottawa et a du même souffle confirmé qu'une entente majeure à l'amiable a été conclue entre la GRC et les avocats des plaignantes qui ont intenté un recours collectif pour obtenir réparation et mettre fin au climat malsain au sein de la GRC. En tout, quelque 500 victimes ont joint leur voix à celle de Janet Merlo et de Linda Gillis Davidson, deux ex-membres de la GRC, qui ont chacune intenté un recours collectif il y a quatre ans. Ces femmes, et toutes les autres agentes ou employées de la GRC qui auraient été victimes de harcèlement, auront droit à une compensation qui pourrait atteindre 220 000 $, selon la gravité des événements. En tout, la GRC estime à 100 millions la somme qui pourrait être versée aux différentes victimes.

9. In search of the triggers to radicalization

Globe & Mail, Sheema Khan, 2016 10 07

Comment: Is there any way to pinpoint which factors lead to radicalization of Muslims, or to predict which countries will produce foreign fighters joining groups such as the Islamic State? These are the types of questions researchers such as Chris Meserole and Will McCants of the Brookings Institution have been studying. The two, who first discussed their research in a Foreign Affairs essay last March, have used powerful computational methods to pinpoint factors that strongly correlate with the radicalization of Muslims. They sifted through large amounts of data related to foreign fighters in Syria and socioeconomic parameters, and found that four of the five countries that have the highest foreign-fighter index score - Tunisia, Jordan, Lebanon, Belgium and France - are francophone (i.e., they have, or have had, French as a national language). The researchers also found that the lingua franca is the biggest factor that correlates with radicalization - almost twice as much as youth unemployment and urbanization. At first glance, it seems absurd that French is tied to extremism. However, they postulated that the French language is a proxy for French political culture, commonly known as laïcité, which imposes strict limits on the public expressions of faith.

10. Opinion: Canada respects Muslims, but Islamophobes incite hatred

Saudi Gazette, Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan, 2016 10 07

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau continues reaching out to Canadians, stressing that Canada's strength stems from its diversity and its treating people with respect, equality and inclusion. At least this is his goal, especially with regard to marginalized people, such as the Aboriginals. Trudeau visited the Ottawa Muslim Association mosque at Eid-al-Adha and lauded the contribution of Muslims to Canada. Muslims of Canada originate from all parts of the world and are different in culture, languages, ethnicity, education and professions. They are united by their faith and love for Canada. Trudeau has visited mosques in several cities. His cabinet includes a Muslim woman who came to Canada as a child refugee from Afghanistan. Former prime minister Jean Chretien also visited the Ottawa mosque while former prime minister Stephen Harper avoided Sunni and Shia mosques while patronizing Ahmadi mosques and functions.

11. RCMP boss admits his force 'failed' women

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 10 07

Toronto - The RCMP will settle two massive class-action harassment lawsuits for up to 1,000 female Mounties with a $100-million fund and new promises to change a workplace it now admits was toxic for them. The landmark move comes with a historic admission: The RCMP is a workplace marked by systemic gender-based discrimination, bullying and sexual harassment. It is the first settlement of a systemic workplace harassment claim in Canada, according to the two law firms that negotiated the deal. Janet Merlo, 53, one of the lead plaintiffs, called it "a turning point. I have total faith this is the beginning of a new era. Hopefully a better era." RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson personally made an emotional apology, his voice cracking, to Merlo and Linda Davidson, the two who filed the class actions, and to the hundreds of women he said they "courageously" represented. "To all the women who have been impacted by the force's failure to have protected your experience at work, and on behalf of every leader, supervisor or manager, every commissioner: I stand humbly before you today and solemnly offer our sincere apology," Paulson said. "You came to the RCMP wanting to personally contribute to your community and we failed you. We hurt you. For that, I am truly sorry." The lawsuits, filed separately in British Columbia and Ontario, had not yet been certified and were bogged down after four years of legal wrangling. The logjam was broken last spring when the RCMP asked a former Supreme Court of Canada judge, Michel Bastarache, to advise it on its litigation, Bastarache told the Star.

12. Several Chinese companies willing to export carfentanil: AP investigation

Associated Press, Erika Kinetz & Desmond Butler, 2016 10 07

Washington - For a few thousand dollars, Chinese companies offer to export a powerful chemical that has been killing unsuspecting drug users and is so lethal that it presents a potential terrorism threat, an Associated Press investigation has found. The AP identified 12 Chinese businesses that said they would export the chemical -- a synthetic opioid known as carfentanil -- to the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Belgium and Australia for as little as $2,750 US a kilogram, no questions asked. Carfentanil is the latest scourge in an epidemic of opioid abuse that has killed tens of thousands of people in the United States alone. Dealers have been cutting carfentanil and its weaker cousin, fentanyl, into heroin and other illicit drugs to boost profit margins. Despite the dangers, carfentanil is not a controlled substance in China, where it is manufactured legally and sold openly online. The U.S. government is pressing China to blacklist carfentanil, but Beijing has yet to act, leaving a substance whose lethal qualities have been compared with nerve gas to flow into foreign markets unabated "We can supply carfentanil, for sure," a saleswoman from Jilin Tely Import and Export Co. wrote in broken English in a September email. "And it's one of our hot sales product." China's Ministry of Public Security declined multiple requests for comment from the AP.

13. Someone Has Started a KKK Recruitment Drive in BC

Vice News Canada, Rachel Browne, 2016 10 07

Vancouver - Flyers promoting the Ku Klux Klan found outside dozens of homes in Abbotsford, Mission, and Chilliwack, British Columbia this week are stoking fears about a rise in white supremacy. The flyers, some of which were dropped off in clear plastic bags containing white rice, declare: "Loyal White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan! Yes! White Lives Do Matter!" and "We Must Secure the Existence of Our People & A Future for White Children." They also state a phone number for a "Klan Hotline" with a North Carolina area code and a URL to the KKK recruiting website. According to Global News, it's believed the flyers are being tossed out of a car window in the middle of the night, a recruiting tactic referred to as "Knight Riding" long used by chapters in the US. This week, police in Albany, Georgia reported that similar "recruiting bags" containing a poster and white rice were found at a number of homes. It follows a string of similar deliveries this month in neighbourhoods across the US -- from California to Pennsylvania. Authorities have not been able to determine whether it's part of a concerted national effort. Over the last year, KKK groups across the US have multiplied, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center's report on hate groups. The KKK took root in Canada around the 1920s, especially in Ontario, BC, and Alberta, but the movement had trouble recruiting members and dissolved quickly over the next decade. Other groups and political parties with white supremacist goals would later emerge across the country such as the Heritage Front and World Church of the Creator.

Mercredi, le ministère a confirmé qu'il reste encore plus de la moitié des 82000 dossiers de fonctionnaires à régler et maintient toujours son objectif de traiter les cas toujours en arriéré d'ici le 31 octobre prochain. «C'est clair que le ministère tente de rassurer les gens en faisant ces mises à jour et en donnant des chiffres. Les 82000 cas mentionnés par le ministère représentent le nombre de cas qui se trouvaient sur la liste des arriérés à la fin juin. 15. 3 Arrested in Alleged Bid to Export US Technology to Russia

Washington - A U.S. citizen and two Russian nationals were arrested Thursday on charges relating to the alleged illegal export of sensitive military technology from the United States to Russia, the Justice Department said. The department said Alexey Barysheff of Brooklyn, New York, a naturalized U.S. citizen, was arrested for illegally exporting controlled technology. Russian nationals Dmitrii Aleksandrovich Karpenko and Alexey Krutilin were simultaneously arrested on charges of conspiring with Barysheff, it said. All three were scheduled to appear in court Thursday afternoon. In its complaint, the government alleged the defendants had engaged in a conspiracy to obtain microelectronics from manufacturers and suppliers in the United States and export them to Russia while evading government controls on high-tech exports. The United States restricts the export of items it believes could significantly contribute to the military potential and weapons proliferation of other nations and undermine U.S. national security.

16. Accused Contractor Was on Hacking Team

Wall Street Journal, Damian Paletta, Scott Calvert, 2016 10 07

Washington - Harold "Hal" Martin, the former National Security Agency contractor charged this week with stealing government secrets, spent parts of the past decade on a government hacking team, sought funding for research into post-traumatic stress disorder, and tried to rally internet users to wage digital warfare against computer "commandos." Investigators are still trying to determine why Mr. Martin, a former employee of consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton who worked on projects at the NSA and the Pentagon, took classified documents containing computer-spying tools to his home in Glen Burnie, Md. But as the probe continues, more details of his background are coming into focus. A former academic mentor of Mr. Martin described him as focused, and burdened by a sense that his insights weren't appreciated. Roy Rada, a professor of information systems at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County until he retired in January, said he served as a mentor to Mr. Martin several years ago, and the two worked together for a few months. Mr. Rada, in an email to The Wall Street Journal and two other news organizations, said Mr. Martin, now 51 years old, was "highly motivated" and had served in the Navy in wars in the Middle East. In his government work, Mr. Martin was assigned to a unit that looked for holes in the U.S. intelligence apparatus using a process called "red-teaming," said Rep. C.A. "Dutch" Ruppersberger (D., Md.) in an interview. Mr. Martin passed at least one polygraph test, Mr. Ruppersberger added.

17. Arrest of NSA contractor highlights growing concern over insider threats

Washington Post, Christian Davenport, 2016 10 07

Washington - The arrest of a National Security Agency contractor charged with stealing highly classified material is the latest example of a trend that officials say can be every bit as dangerous as an outside hacker: the insider threat. The federal government has been increasingly concerned about the ability of its own employees and contractors to use their positions to walk away with troves of sensitive information. And it has tried to implement new safeguards to not only better secure important data but also monitor the people with access to it. Fears over insider threats intensified after the breach by former Army Pfc. Chelsea Manning and Edward Snowden, an NSA contractor working for Booz Allen Hamilton. But with the revelation that Harold Thomas Martin III was arrested in August and charged with theft of government property and unauthorized removal and retention of classified materials, there will be even greater scrutiny of how the nation protects its secrets, officials said. The allegations against Martin, 51, of Glen Burnie, Md., suggest "that our counterintelligence abilities are still inadequate," said Steven Aftergood, the director of the Project on Government Secrecy for the Federation of American Scientists, "and that the kinds of precautions that would be necessary to prevent removal of highly classified material are not in place. ... It simply should not be possible to remove information from a classified system without supervision by somebody else. And evidently that kind of supervision was lacking here."

18. Barely half of illegal border crossers caught

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 07

San Diego - Immigration authorities caught just over half of the people who illegally entered the U.S. from Mexico last year, according to a report commissioned by the Department of Homeland Security that offers one of the most detailed assessments of border security ever compiled. The report found that 54 percent of people who entered illegally between border crossings got caught in the 2015 fiscal year. That's much lower than the 81 percent success rate that Homeland Security cited publicly using a different counting method. The 98-page report was completed in May, and Homeland Security officials have declined to release it, despite urging from some members of Congress. The Associated Press obtained a copy from a government official involved in border issues who acted on condition of anonymity because the department has not made the report public.

19. NSA Director Denies Mass Scanning of Yahoo Emails

Boston Herald, Jordan Graham, 2016 10 07

Boston - Top U.S. intelligence officials denied a blockbuster Reuters report claiming Yahoo built special software to scan emails to hundreds of millions of accounts, while a subsequent New York Times report claims the snooping was limited to suspected members of a terrorist organization. "That would be illegal. We don't do that, and no court would ever grant us the authority to do that. We have to make a specific case. And what the court grants is specific authority for a specific period of time for a specific purpose," said Adm. Michael Rogers, director of the National Security Agency, speaking at the Cyber Security Summit at Massachusetts Institute of Technology Oct. 5. "We have a legal framework in this nation that enables the government ... for specific reasons, under specific conditions, to make a case before a judge in which we're able to show a judge we have reason to believe that there is threat here to the United States associated with specific individuals and a judge grants, simplistically, authority for a specific purpose for a specific period of time to access data." On Tuesday, Reuters reported Yahoo had built custom software for the U.S. government that scanned incoming emails to millions of accounts. "I've read this real quickly and I thought, well, this is a little speculative," Rogers said. In a statement, Yahoo called the story "misleading."

20. Officer Is Cleared in the Death of a Mall Attacker in Minnesota

New York Times, Mitch Smith, 2016 10 07

St. Cloud - Dahir Adan, the man accused of stabbing 10 people at a Minnesota mall last month, slashed an electronics store employee and later advanced toward an off-duty police officer even after sustaining gunshot wounds, security footage released on Thursday showed. The release of the videos came as prosecutors cleared the police officer, Jason Falconer, of wrongdoing in the Sept. 17 encounter, and as family members and federal investigators continued to puzzle over whether Mr. Adan had been motivated to act by Islamic extremists. The authorities said Mr. Adan, 20, a Somali refugee who came to the United States as a child, mentioned Allah during the attack at a mall in St. Cloud and asked several victims if they were Muslim before stabbing them. St. Cloud is about 60 miles northwest of Minneapolis. The Islamic State, known as ISIS or ISIL, claimed responsibility for the attack, but even after police searched Mr. Adan's computers and other property, it remained unclear whether he had ties to any terrorist groups. "The totality of Dahir Adan's behavior and the actions suggest he may have been radicalized, either with the influence of others or on his own," said Richard T. Thornton, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office in Minneapolis. Mr. Thornton said that Mr. Adan had recently grown more interested in Islam, began reading the Quran and discussed religion with some relatives. In the months before the attack,

21. Prisons secrètes de la CIA

La Presse+, Marc Thibodeau, 2016 10 07

Non identifié - Coups de bâton, fausse chaise électrique et simulations de noyade Le troublant témoignage d'ex-détenus révèle des techniques de torture inédites Des témoignages recueillis récemment par Human Rights Watch auprès de deux Tunisiens qui ont été parmi les premiers détenus des geôles secrètes de la CIA révèlent l'utilisation de techniques de torture inédites. Un nouveau rapport de l'organisation indique qu'ils ont été frappés longuement avec des bâtons, menacés avec une chaise électrique improvisée et soumis à des « formes variées » de techniques utilisant l'eau qui vont au-delà de celles ayant été rapportées par le passé. Ils affirment également avoir été suspendus pendant des semaines par les poignets dans une position qui les obligeaient à se tenir debout dans le noir, vêtus uniquement d'une couche improvisée qui n'était changée qu'occasionnellement. La divulgation fin 2014 du sommaire du rapport du Sénat américain sur le programme de la CIA, qui avait suscité une vague d'indignation, évoquait des séances de suspension de 48 heures. « On a toujours pensé que la situation réelle dans les prisons secrètes devait être encore plus grave que celle qui était décrite dans le sommaire », indique une juriste responsable des questions de sécurité nationale à Human Rights Watch, Laura Pitter, qui s'est rendue en Tunisie l'été dernier pour rencontrer les deux anciens détenus.

22. Republican Chairman of Wall Street Committee Held Fundraiser With Official From 'Domestic Terrorist' Group

Bloomberg News, Joshua Green, 2016 10 06

New York - Republican Representative Scott Garrett of New Jersey, a seven-term incumbent locked in a close re-election race, headlined an Oct. 1 breakfast organized by an official for an antigovernment group that New Jersey's Office of Homeland Security and Preparedness considers a "domestic terrorist threat." At the breakfast, Garrett hailed the official, Edward Durfee, as an "unsung hero." Durfee is regional coordinator for New Jersey Oath Keepers, a group state officials list as "militia extremists [who] pose a moderate threat to New Jersey." Durfee also co-founded the American Bedrock Foundation, which co-sponsored and collected payments for the Garrett breakfast. "The American Bedrock Foundation is basically the fundraising arm for the Oath Keepers and other pro-Constitution groups," Durfee said in an interview with Bloomberg Businessweek. "That's what our purpose is." Garrett didn't respond to interview requests. In a statement, his campaign manager, Sarah Neibart, said, "Congressman Garrett has no affiliation--personal or political--with any of the organizations mentioned. Any suggestion otherwise is absurd." Durfee also co-founded the breakfast's other sponsor, Bergen County New Jersey for Liberty, a group formed in 2007 to support Ron Paul. Some members of Bergen County New Jersey for Liberty believe the federal government was complicit in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Durfee won't go that far, but says he's skeptical of the government's investigation: "I'm not fully settled with that, with the story that was put out, personally." The group's Meet Up page features pictures of members at a 2010 press conference for Architects and Engineers for 9/11 Truth, an organization that disputes the findings of the federal government's investigation into the causes the Sept. 11 attacks.

23. White House official: Cyberthreats continue to multiply

FCW. com, Sean D. Carberry, 2016 10 07

Washington - A senior White House official said cyberthreats are figuring more prominently in President Barack Obama's daily briefing on intelligence and national security concerns. "What I have found in the three-and-a-half years I have been in this position is that cyberthreats have consumed a greater and greater portion of the piece of the briefing that I do," said Lisa Monaco, assistant to the president for homeland security and counterterrorism. Speaking at the Washington Post Cybersecurity Summit, Monaco said that almost on a daily basis now, she has to brief the president on some variety of cyberthreat. "I've been struck by the breadth of the threats that we're facing, certainly against the U.S. government, against the private sector," she said. Monaco added that cyberthreats are coming from an increasing range of actors --countries such as Russia, China, Iran and North Korea; criminal entities; and individual hackers.

24. Muslim preacher 'who advocated beheadings allowed to lecture in UK'

The Independent (UK), Siobhan Fenton, 2016 10 07

London - A US-based Muslim preacher who allegedly advocated killing gay people is giving a lecture series in London after being allowed to enter the UK. The Home Office has been urged to retract the visa of Hamza Sodagar who is giving the lectures between 3 October and 12 October. Mr Sodagar appeared in an online video recorded in 2010 in which he details ways in which gay people can be "punished" for their sexuality, including being beheaded or thrown off a cliff. Footage shows him apparently telling an audience: "If there's homosexual men, the punishment is one of five things. One, the easiest one maybe, is cut their head off, that's the easiest. The second is, burn them to death. Third, throw them off a cliff. Fourth, tear down the wall on them so they die. Fifth, a combination of the above. "We have a hadith on that. Now, whether someone's going to accept that, that's up to the jurists to read that and understand. There's definitely some of those apply... maybe the combination [fifth option]. These are things which are there." LGBT rights activist Peter Tatchell called on the Home Office to revoke Mr Sodagar's visa. He said: "In a free society, Hamza Sodagar has a right to believe that homosexuality is sinful but not to preach about ways to kill lesbians and gay men. Many people with far less extreme views, who have never advocated violence, have been banned from entering the UK. Calling for death to LGBT people crosses a red line. The Home Office was wrong to grant him a visa and should now revoke it. The cleric should be ordered out of the country."

25. Muslims see Prevent programme as spying scheme, watchdog admits

The Independent (UK), Joseph Watts, 2016 10 07

London - The UK's terror law watchdog has said Muslim communities see the Government's anti-extremism strategy as a "spying programme" and called for it to be overhauled. David Anderson QC claimed many people believe the programme targeted the "practice of Islam" as opposed to the spread of radical beliefs. He urged ministers to conduct an independent review of the scheme, which is designed to help officials spot individuals who are becoming radicalised. Mr Anderson said: "There is a strong feeling in Muslim communities that I visit, that Prevent is, if not a spying programme, at least a programme that is targeted on them. In some cases, it is even felt it is targeted not just at Islamist terrorism or extremism, but at the practise of Islam. People who pray or who wear the veil, for example, are sometimes felt to be under suspicion." He added: "Now, I'm sure those fears are exaggerated, and they are certainly not what the programme is supposed to be about, but the fact is that they are very real. So it is frustrating for me to see a programme whose ideals are so obviously good, falling down on the delivery to the point where it is not trusted in the community where it principally applies." As well as calling for the independent review, which he said should report back to Parliament and the public on the scheme's inner workings, Mr Anderson said there should be more transparency, a better system for judging the scheme's success and a far greater level of contact between the Government and Muslim communities. Speaking to BBC radio, he said: "It is extraordinary to me that there is no dialogue, for example, between the Government and the Muslim council of Britain." Security minister Ben Wallace said that while the Prevent programme is "difficult and challenging work" it is making a positive difference.

26. 'Top-Down' Grid A Gift For Savvy Cyber Attacks

The Australian, Roger Bradbury, 2016 10 07

Commentary: The shutdown of South Australia last week is a near- perfect example of the impact of a cyberattack. A one-day shutdown led to hundreds of millions of dollars in losses to the economy, disruptions to citizens' lives and an unravelling of political, social and economic certainties. Sure, South Australia has peculiarities that made it particularly susceptible to such an event. But the shutdown nevertheless shows in high relief the vulnerability of today's interconnected systems of critical infrastructure. What we saw last week was not just a loss of the electricity network but also the shutdown of the other infrastructure networks: telecommunications, water, sewerage, transport, financial services, the internet and so on. Advanced Western societies have spent the past 30 years refining and interconnecting their critical infrastructure, improving their efficiency but also increasing their vulnerability. We've reached the point where the interconnections are more or less complete, so every critical infrastructure -- energy, water, finance, transport or cyber -- is dependent, to a high degree, on every other. This interdependency means disruptions in one infrastructure quickly spread to all other interconnected systems. And because these infrastructures -- with the exceptions of cyber and transport -- are organised in a top-down hierarchy, it means if the disruptions can spread up to the top of the tree, they can then spread down to the rest of the network. This is what happened in South Australia. Excessively hierarchical networks in key infrastructures enabled -- one may say encouraged -- the collapse of each of those networks. (Note: Roger Bradbury is a professor in the Australian National University's National Security College.)

28. Anti-terror plan for domestic thugs

The Australian, Amos Aikman, 2016 10 07

Canberra - The Northern Territory's top cop wants to deploy "counter-terrorism-like" tactics against violent and alcoholic thugs who repeatedly bash their families, warning that recidivists pose a danger to society at large and tougher measures are needed to control them. While no details have been announced, The Australian understands the proposals would see police apply to courts for "prohibition orders" targeting the nastiest offenders when they leave jail. A person subject to such an order would have to report to police regularly and keep away from certain individuals and areas -- similar to the rules applied to some sex criminals -- and could be sent to prison for up to a further five years if they did not comply. Consideration is also being given to seeking wider legislative reform that would allow police to apply for a prohibitive order against a person not convicted of any crimes, where there is evidence doing so would significantly improve community safety. That person would have to have already been placed on a domestic violence register for a court to agree. NT Commissioner of Police Reece Kershaw said while existing domestic violence orders and other tools were helping to identify offenders, they were not stopping the worst violence. About 1840 DVOs are issued on average each year in the Territory, but there are about 2400 breaches. More than 60 per cent of people with a DVO breach it more than once, and about 20 per cent breach it more than four times.

29. Brothers still operating network, despite suspension after raids

The Australian, Rick Morton, 2016 10 07

Canberra - Sydney brothers Mohammad and Ibrahim Omar, whose childcare empire has been suspended amid a police investigation into whether Islamic State was funded with taxpayer money, are still operating a network of training organisations around Australia. The Australian can reveal that the brothers, whose companies received about $27 million in federal money for childcare, are listed as directors of vocational training outfits, at least one of which has been registered by the federal government. The Omar family daycare business was suspended by the NSW regulator in August and its ability to process federal childcare benefits ceased on August 9, the day the Australian Federal Police raided some of its employees and arrested two men on fraud-related charges. Hussain Dandachi, 26, was charged with dishonestly obtaining money from the commonwealth, causing loss to the commonwealth and falsifying timesheets and other information. Another childcare educator, aged 22, who was involved with Sydney charity Dar al Quran wa Sunnah when it was accused by Lebanese authorities this year of funnelling money to Islamic State, was also charged in the raid with dishonestly obtaining federal money.

30. Report withheld on MH370 'spy ship'

The Australian, Ean Higgins, 2016 10 07

Canberra - Australian government officials have refused to release a document revealing how many days a Chinese government vessel suspected of spying has spent on its official mission looking for Malaysia Airlines Flight MH370. The deputy secretary of the Department of Infrastructure and Regional Development, Judith Zielke, knocked back the Freedom of Information request from The Australian this week on the grounds that to release the document "would cause harm to the Australian government's relationship with other governments". Ms Zielke said she had decided to use the exemption under the FOI Act relating to "documents affecting national security, defence or international relations". As revealed by The Australian last month, security experts believe the Chinese government vessel Dong Hai Jiu 101, which arrived in Fremantle in February officially to join the search for MH370, is mostly probably spending its time gathering intelligence on Australian military activity in what they describe as "target rich" Western Australia. The Perth area is home to the navy's submarine base and Special Air Service regiment, while farther north lie top-secret naval communications and electronic spying joint facilities operated with the US and Britain.

The third and final point of the strategy is to find ways for the promotion of moral and welfare activities of these organisations. 36. Isis and al-Qaida turf wars in Africa may push fragile states to breaking point

The Guardian (London), Jason Burke, 2016 10 06

Analysis - It is a war within a war, fought across thousands of miles of desert, scrub and forest, from the Atlantic seaboard to the Indian Ocean coastline. It pits the Islamic State (Isis), the Iraq and Syria-based group that has expanded deep into Africa since surging to international attention in 2014, against al-Qaida, the veteran extremist group, which has maintained a significant presence in much of the continent in recent years. Both groups and their affiliates are also fighting an array of armies and counter-terrorist agencies: French soldiers, US special forces, British military trainers, as well as the local armies of a dozen states. Last week, it was revealed the US was building a $50m base for drones in Niger, which is at the very centre of the conflict zone. But at the same time, the extremist groups are fighting each other. Such internecine struggles between militant groups may seem esoteric to casual observers. But the eventual result will have an enormous impact on the security of dozens of often fragile states in Africa and, more broadly, on the future of Islamic militancy.

Le Figaro, Thierry Oberlé, 2016 10 07

Rabat - Au Maroc, le roi Mohammed VI doit composer depuis cinq ans avec le gouvernement islamiste du PJD, qui a des chances de remporter de nouveau les élections de vendredi. Il doit aussi surveiller les extrémistes salafistes et les djihadistes revenus du Levant. Cet exercice d'équilibrisme a permis d'éviter un « printemps marocain », mais reste le plus grand défi de son règne. Pour son peuple, il est le « prince des croyants ». Un titre également revendiqué depuis 2014 par Abou Bakr al-Baghdadi, le chef de l'État islamique dont des émules d'origine marocaine ont participé aux attentats de Paris. Descendant du prophète Mahomet, l'Amir el-mouminine se veut le rempart d'un islam tolérant empreint des préceptes de sagesse du soufisme face à la montée de l'islamisme. Mais en son royaume, il doit composer depuis cinq ans avec un premier ministre, Abdelillah Benkirane, leader non dénué de charisme d'un parti monarchiste influencé par les Frères musulmans, le Parti justice et développement (PJD). Il doit aussi, via ses conseillers et sa police, surveiller comme le lait sur le feu les extrémistes salafistes, qu'ils soient djihadistes repentis en quête de respectabilité ou membres de réseaux terroristes de Daech, sans oublier les dizaines de milliers de militants et de sympathisants islamistes radicaux du mouvement Justice et Bienfaisance.

Jeune Afrique, Mathieu Olivier, 2016 10 06

Tazalit, Niger - Un camp de réfugiés a été attaqué jeudi au Niger, à Tazalit, à 180 kilomètres de la frontière avec le Mali, par une quarantaine d'assaillants, selon une source au ministère de l'Intérieur. Une information confirmée par le Haut commissariat aux réfugiés. Le camp de réfugiés maliens de Tazalit, dans la région de Tasara, à 180 kilomètres de la frontière malienne, a été attaqué jeudi 6 octobre à 14 h 22, heure locale, selon nos informations. L'assaut a été confirmé par le Haut commissariat aux réfugiés qui dispose de personnel sur place. Une quarantaine d'assaillants, vraisemblablement d'Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique, ont pris d'assaut l'installation sécurisée par des gardes, des gendarmes et des militaires nigériens. Ceux-ci ont été pris par surprise alors qu'ils déjeunaient. Une source au ministère de l'Intérieur fait état d'un bilan provisoire d'une vingtaine de morts parmi les forces de sécurisation du site. Un seul réfugié aurait été blessé et une ambulance brûlée. La colonne jihadiste, composée de treize véhicules et d'une moto a pris la fuite vers le Nord-Ouest et vers le Mali, en emportant trois autres véhicules.

39. Niger - Au moins 22 soldats morts lors d'une attaque contre un camp de réfugiés

Reuters, Boureima Balima, Benoît Van Overstraeten, 2016 10 07

Niamey - Au moins 22 soldats ont été tués au Niger jeudi dans l'attaque d'un camp de réfugiés maliens par un groupe non identifié, a déclaré le Premier ministre de ce pays d'Afrique de l'Ouest

Brigi Rafini. L'attaque a pris pour cible un camp du village de Tassalit, dans la région de Tahoua, à quelque 525 kilomètres au nord-est de la capitale, Niamey. "Nous avons été informés d'une attaque sur le camp de Tassalit. Pour l'instant, on nous a dit qu'il y avait 22 morts mais ce n'est pas le bilan définitif. Il pourrait s'alourdir", a déclaré Brigi Rafini sur la télévision publique Télé Sahel. Le Premier ministre n'a rien dit au sujet de la possible identité des assaillants ni si des civils avaient été tués ou blessés. Les habitants du camp sont des Maliens qui ont pris la fuite vers le Niger après que des militants islamistes, dont certains sont liés à Al Qaïda, ont conquis le nord du désert malien en 2012. L'intervention militaire de la France dans le cadre de l'opération Serval a repoussé les islamistes début 2013 mais malgré le déploiement des casques bleus de la Minusma, la violence va croissant ces derniers temps. Le mois dernier, le président malien Ibrahim Boubacar Keïta a mis en garde contre la résurgence des groupes islamistes affiliés à Al Qaïda et à l'Etat islamique (EI) dans son pays, profitant des difficultés d'application de l'accord de paix de l'an dernier.

41. Colombian President Santos wins Nobel Peace Prize

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 07

Oslo - Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos won the 2016 Nobel Peace Prize on Friday for his efforts to end a 52-year-old war with Marxist rebels, a surprise choice after Colombians voted against the accord in a referendum. The Norwegian Nobel Committee said Santos had brought one of the longest civil wars in modern history significantly closer to a peaceful solution but there was still a real danger the peace process could come to a halt. "The award should also be seen as a tribute to the Colombian people," committee leader Kaci Kullmann Five said. Voters did not say "No" to peace but to the agreement, she said. The award pointedly excluded FARC guerrilla leader Rodrigo Londono, better known by his nom de guerre Timochenko, who signed the accord with Santos. Santos has promised to revive the peace plan even though Colombians narrowly rejected it in the referendum on Sunday. Many voters believed it was too lenient on the FARC guerrillas.

42. Colombie : sauver la paix Tout ça pour ça !

Editorial - Quatre ans de négociations, un accord de paix historique de 297 pages avec six points principaux en litige enfin réglés... Tout ça vient d'être rejeté par une majorité d'électeurs colombiens. Ils ont, dimanche, dit non à l'entente de paix avec la guérilla marxiste des FARC (les Forces armées révolutionnaires de Colombie). L'objectif, rappelons-le, était d'enfin résoudre un conflit de 52 ans qui a fait quelque 260 000 morts, 45 000 disparus et 6,9 millions de déplacés. Un bilan si tragique qu'on a beau le coucher sur papier, on a tout de même du mal à en prendre la mesure. L'espoir et l'enthousiasme par rapport à cet accord étaient, avec raison, palpables à l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur de ce pays d'Amérique du Sud - Ottawa avait même annoncé l'octroi de 57 millions de dollars « pour l'après-conflit ». Que s'est-il donc passé pour que ces rêves de paix soient douchés en moins de 24 heures ? Les opposants à l'accord, avec à leur tête l'ancien président Alvaro Uribe, le décriaient car ils estimaient qu'un « Oui » était un vote pour l'impunité.

45. Chinese 'wary' about larger global role

South China Morning Post, Nectar Gan, 2016 10 07

Beijing - Most Chinese people recognise the country's growing prominence on the world stage, but have also become more wary of "foreign influence" and potential military conflict over territorial disputes, a survey has found. In the poll published on Wednesday by the US-based Pew Research Centre, three-quarters of respondents in China said they believed the nation was playing a more important role in the world than it was 10 years ago. Only 10 per cent thought otherwise. Over the past decade, China has surpassed Japan to become the world's second-largest economy. It has also become increasingly assertive in foreign affairs and is challenging the geopolitical balance of power in the region. But the country's growing economic might and rising aspirations have also caused some unease among its own people. "Such self-confidence about China's international stature coexists with some degree of anxiety and a general tendency to look inward more than outward," the Pew report said. Though they expressed satisfaction with the nation's presence on the world stage, more than half of the respondents believed the country should focus on its own problems. Only 22 per cent believed China should help other nations.

46. India kills 'three militants in foiled army base attack'

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 10 07

Srinagar - Indian soldiers on Thursday killed three suspected militants who tried to attack an army base in India-controlled Kashmir, officers said, the latest in a wave of attacks that has raised tensions with neighbouring Pakistan. It came as Pakistan's powerful army chief lashed out at India, warning that any act of aggression from New Delhi would not go unpunished. The suspected militants, who were heavily armed and wearing army fatigues, attempted to break through the perimeter of the Indian army base in Kupwara district before dawn but were repelled by soldiers in exchanges of fire, the officers said. "On being challenged, these three terrorists opened indiscriminatory fire on our sentry posts and also onto our living shelters where our jawans (soldiers) were resting," said Colonel Rajiv Saharan, the commanding officer of a counter insurgency unit at Kupwara. "Three Pakistani terrorists were eliminated."

47. Japan on alert amid speculation of N. Korea activity Mon.

Kyodo News, Staff reporter, 2016 10 07

Tokyo - Japan is taking precautions amid concerns North Korea may carry out a further nuclear test or ballistic missile launch Monday to coincide with a significant national anniversary, Japan's top government spokesman said Friday. "The government holds grave concerns, and is expending every effort on information gathering, vigilance and surveillance in coordination with the United States and South Korea," Chief Cabinet Secretary Yoshihide Suga told a press conference. According to South Korean media reports Friday, South Korean and U.S. intelligence agencies have detected increased signs of activity at a missile test site on North Korea's west coast, indicating a long-range missile launch may be imminent. Oct. 10 marks the 71st anniversary of the founding of the country's ruling Workers' Party of Korea. "We can't rule out the possibility of North Korea turning to further provocative behavior with the aim of boosting its national prestige," Defense Minister Tomomi Inada said the same day. North Korea carried out its fifth nuclear test on Sept. 9, and has repeatedly launched ballistic missiles, including in the direction of Japan, in defiance of U.N. Security Council resolutions banning both activities.

48. Myanmar prepared for anti-terrorism attack: official

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 07

Nay Pyi Taw - Myanmar is prepared for possible anti-terrorism attack in the country, Deputy Minister of Home Affairs Maj-Gen Aung Soe told the parliament, official media reported Friday. The readiness includes surveillance of suspected terrorists and specially-trained anti-terrorist combatants. Collaborating with local, regional and international organizations in fight against terrorism, Aung Soe said the government has been working to respond speedily to destructive elements by carrying tasks which include organizing operation missions, deploying specially-trained anti-terrorism combat groups in Nay Pyi Taw, Yangon and Mandalay, and guarding of dignitaries under a special security program. Besides, exchange and collection of terrorist attack information and linking with INTERPOL, ASEANAPOL, neighboring countries and allied organizations and other sources are to be carried out. Moreover, establishing an administration center for national-level emergency cases at Nay Pyi Taw, equipped with advanced technology for use on the central, state and regional levels are also to be conducted.

49. N. Korea shows increased activity at nuclear test site: 38 North

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 07

Washington - North Korea is showing increased activity at its nuclear test site in what could be part of preparations for a new test, a U.S. website monitoring the North said Thursday, amid concern the regime could undertake provocations to mark a key anniversary next week. Commercial satellite imagery taken on Oct. 1 of the Punggye-ri underground test site in the country's northeast "indicates continuing activity at all three tunnel complexes that could be used to conduct a nuclear test," the website 38 North said. Activity at the North Portal, where the communist nation conducted its fifth nuclear test last month, could be for a number of purposes "including collecting post-test data, sealing the portal or preparing for another test," the report said. Satellite imagery shows a large vehicle, possibly a truck, near the portal's entrance, while a large canopy in its parking lot, which has been present for the past two months, remains in place, the report said. No signs of new excavation were seen, but there appear to be boxes or material around the side of the main building, it said. Increased activity was spotted at the South Portal where excavation stopped in 2012, the report said.

50. Nuclear-powered sub review necessary for national security: JCS chief

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 07

Seoul - Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Lee Sun-jin said Friday it is necessary for South Korea to review the possible development of its own nuclear-powered submarines, citing the rising provocations from Pyongyang. "It is necessary to review (building nuclear-powered submarines) along with considerations of military utility, technological capabilities, funds and trends in neighboring countries," Lee said during the regular audit held at the National Assembly. A nuclear-powered submarine can stay submerged and hidden as long as it has fuel and supplies for the crew, making it harder to track compared to conventional diesel-electric subs that usually have to surface to operate a diesel engine to recharge battery banks. Such vessels can be assigned to patrol around North Korean submarine bases without being detected and then trail boats armed with submarine-launched ballistic missiles (SLBMs). If the need arises, the submarines can sink North Korean adversaries before they can launch their missiles.

51. Police holding on to Dhaka cafe 'hostage' Tahmid's passport to stop him from leaving country (Canada).

BDNews24, Liton Haider, 2016 10 07

Dhaka - Police say they have kept the passport of Gulshan cafe 'hostage' Tahmid Hasib Khan to make sure he stays in Bangladesh even though a Dhaka court has cleared him of all charges related to the July 1 attack by Islamist militants. Tahmid was arrested on Aug 3 as a suspect in a case initiated under Section 54 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, allowing police to arrest suspects without warrants, over the attack. On Wednesday, a Dhaka metropolitan magistrate's court cleared him of the charges in the case. But he still remains a suspect as he is accused in an anti-terrorism case filed by police. Tahmid, who is a student at a Canadian university, was released from jail on Sunday after he secured bail. The police counter-terrorism unit chief, Md Monirul Islam, on Thursday told bdnews24.com that the law enforcers had kept Tahmid's passport "so he won't be able to leave the country even if he wants to."

52. Satellite images show activity at North Korea nuclear test site - report

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 10 07

Seoul - An increase in activity at North Korea's nuclear test site could signal preparations for a new test or a collection of data from its last one, a U.S.-based monitoring group said on Friday, citing satellite images. The 38 North group, run by Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, said there was activity at all three tunnel complexes at the Punggye-ri nuclear test site involving a large vehicle and personnel. "One possible reason for this activity is to collect data on the Sept. 9 test although other purposes cannot be ruled out, such as sealing the portal or other preparations related to a new test," the group said, referring to the last nuclear test. The North is believed to be ready for another nuclear test at any time and there has been speculation it could mark the Oct. 10 anniversary of the founding of its Workers' Party with another underground detonation. North Korea conducted its first nuclear test in 2006 and has since then defied U.N. sanctions and rejected international talks to press ahead with the development of the weapons and missiles to carry them, which it says it needs for its defence.

53. T.N. terror suspect was shopping for explosives in Sivakasi: NIA

The Hindu, Special Correspondent, 2016 10 07

New Delhi - A Tamil Nadu resident who was under the watch of security agencies for a year after he returned from Mosul, Iraq where he fought in the war zone for the Islamic State, has been arrested by the National Investigation Agency (NIA) for allegedly conspiring to collect chemical explosives from cracker manufacturers in Tamil Nadu and carry out terror activities in the country. The accused identified as Subahani Haja Moideen (31), a resident of Tirunelveli in Tamil Nadu, was arrested by the NIA on Wednesday in connection with a case related to activities of the banned Islamic State in India. Unlike Maharashtra resident Areeb Majeed, who fled from Syria after he was injured during an attack and was subsequently arrested during his return to India, security agencies did not immediately put Moideen under arrest and decided to keep him under watch instead. The accused was radicalised and recruited in the IS through social media platforms.

54. Russian forces say kill six militants, including IS fighter

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 07

Moscow - Russian security forces on Friday killed six militants in the republic of Ingushetia, including one fighter from Islamic State who had been planning terrorist attacks, the National Anti-Terrorist Committee (NAK) said. Special forces of the FSB security police laid siege to a private house in Ingushetia's capital Nazran, NAK said in a statement. The FSB officers persuaded them to free a child kept in the house, after which the rebels opened fire. Four militants were killed in the shoot-out. Another two rebels were killed in a special operation conducted in a rural area outside Nazran, NAK said. Those killed included a local resident who had fought in Syria and had returned to Ingushetia to resume "terrorist activity in the republic", NAK said, calling the man "an Islamic State emissary".

55. Russia tries old U.S. tactic as Cold War heats up in Syria

Toronto Star, Thomas Walkom, 2016 10 07

Column: The new Cold War is much like the old one. It purports to be about ideology. It is really about national self-interest. In the West, the old Cold War was portrayed as a battle between Communist dictatorship and capitalist freedom. Given that Russia has now embraced capitalism, those categories are no longer quite so neat. As a result, the new Cold War is a little vaguer. It is portrayed as a battle between thuggery and the rule of law - brutality versus niceness. In this scenario, the U.S. and its allies are said to be the nice ones. Russia, personified in its president, Vladimir Putin, is said to represent brutality. The conflict between these two adversaries manifests itself in Ukraine and the Baltic states. But the new Cold War is particularly hot in Syria, where the U.S. and Russia support different sides in the five-year-old civil war. In latter days, Russia and the Syrian government that it supports have come under severe criticism for bombing civilians in rebel-held areas of Aleppo, Syria's largest city. The bombing appears to be aimed at destroying hospitals and other civilian infrastructure. But brutality against civilians, sometimes called total war, is not a new tactic. Students of the American Civil War will recall Gen. William T. Sherman's march to the sea through Georgia in 1864, during which his Union army burned crops, slaughtered livestock and laid waste to the Confederate countryside.

56. Russie : «Depuis l'assassinat d'Anna Politkovskaïa, la situation a empiré»

Le Figaro, Julien Licourt, 2016 10 07

Non identifié - Interview - Il y a 10 ans, le 7 octobre 2006, la journaliste d'investigation était abattue alors qu'elle rentrait chez elle, à Moscou. La russologue Hélène Blanc* fait le point sur l'évolution des libertés politiques et d'expression en Russie. LE FIGARO. - Dix ans après, y a-t-il encore un espoir que la lumière soit faite sur le meurtre d'Anna Politkovskaïa? HÉLÈNE BLANC. - Dans cette affaire, seuls les lampistes ont été jugés. Les commanditaires du meurtre n'ont jamais été retrouvés. Les articles d'Anna Politkovskaïa gênaient beaucoup de monde, que ce soit lorsqu'elle enquêtait sur la Tchétchénie, sur la corruption ou sur diverses affaires liées au Kremlin. Par exemple lorsqu'elle a expliqué comment le pouvoir truquait les élections, au moment du dépouillement, en faisant chanter les présidents de bureau de vote. Ou encore lorsqu'elle a publié un article sur le meneur des preneurs d'otage du théâtre de la Doubrovka, qu'elle a retrouvé après enquête, peu après, comme collaborateur au Kremlin. Avec ce genre d'articles, elle se mettait en danger. On ne sait toujours pas qui a donné l'ordre de l'exécuter. Je remarque tout de même que le commando qui l'a abattue était composé, notamment, de Tchétchènes. Connaissant la personnalité du président de la Tchétchénie, Ramzan Kadirov, dictateur dont le père a été assassiné et qui vit depuis dans l'idée de vengeance, connaissant également ses liens avec Moscou, il n'est pas impossible qu'il ait voulu faire un «cadeau» à Poutine, le jour de son anniversaire, le 7 octobre. Kadirov peut également avoir voulu montrer au Kremlin qu'il était capable de faire encore mieux que l'armée russe. Depuis l'assassinat de la journaliste, les choses ont-elles changé en Russie? Oui, les choses ont changé. En pire.

57. Iran denies US claim over Houthi missile

Press TV, 2016 10 07

Tehran - The Iranian Foreign Ministry's spokesman has denied claims made by a US official that a missile used by Yemen's Houthi Ansarullah fighters to destroy an Emirati military vessel was made by Iran. Bahram Qassem added on Tuesday that the US should take a look at its own heavy dossier concerning the supply of arms and weapons to those attacking civilians in Yemen instead of projecting the blame on others. Qassem noted that the accusation has been made as US planes and weapons have been used and are still being used to kill thousands of Yemeni women and children, and destroy hospitals and schools in Yemen. On Saturday, Yemeni forces targeted and destroyed the Emirati military vessel in a rocket attack near the Red Sea port city of Mokha. Yemen has been under Saudi military strikes since late March 2015. The war was launched in a bid to reinstate Abd Rabbuh Mansur Hadi, who has stepped down as president but is now seeking to grab power by force.

Tehran Times, 2016 10 07

Tehran - The Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps Navy issued an announcement on Wednesday vowing prompt response to any movement by the Saudi military and other fleets near the Iranian territorial waters in the Persian Gulf. The announcement comes right on the heels a drill, starting on Tuesday, by the Royal Saudi Navy Forces in the Persian Gulf, Strait of Hormuz and the Sea of Oman. "The Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps Navy and Iran's Navy are in full preparation to provide stable security in the Persian Gulf and Strait of Hormuz, and will take prompt and proper counteraction to every movement, attempt, and action aimed at destabilizing the Persian Gulf, Strait of Hormuz and the Sea of Oman," read part of the announcement. Over the past five years, Iran and Saudi Arabia, two Middle East archrivals, have been at loggerheads over a list of regional issues, including the backing opposing sides in the Syrian crisis.

59. Army, Palestinians intensify coordination

Lebanon Daily Star, Mohammed Zaatari, 2016 10 07

Sidon - Communication between the Lebanese and Palestinian security forces has intensified following information that the Lebanese Army might be targeted, security sources said Thursday. The Army is still taking precautionary measures around the Palestinian refugee camps of Ain al-Hilweh and Mieh Mieh in Sidon. The heightened security came after the Lebanese Army obtained information that an extremist group in one of the camps could be working to recruit someone to carry out a terrorist act against one of its checkpoints at the entrance of Ain al-Hilweh or Mieh Mieh. Security coordination between the Lebanese and the Palestinians has increased in order to determine the validity of the information, security sources explained. They added that follow-up showed that some of the information was only speculation. But the validity of the rest has yet to be clarified. Sources explained that until its legitimacy can be checked, they must take it seriously and consider the threat to be real.

60. Gazan jihadists issue ultimatum, threaten to escalate violence if demands not met

Jerusalem Post, Yaakov Lappin, Zack Pyzer, 2016 10 07

Jerusalem - A projectile fired from the Gaza Strip struck an open area in the Eshkol region on Thursday, triggering warning sirens and sending residents running for cover. The mortar shell did not cause injuries or damage, the IDF said. Palestinian media said the IDF returned fire into Gaza, possibly using tank shells, though this was not confirmed by press time. Defense Minister Avigdor Liberman said: "We do not seek adventures and no one is pushing for an escalation with Hamas in the Gaza Strip, but we are determined to protect the security of the citizens of the State of Israel and there will be no compromise on this point. "Every incident of fire from the Gaza Strip at the sovereign territory of the State of Israel will be met with a powerful response. Hamas controls Gaza with a strong hand, and when it wants to achieve or to prevent something, it knows how to do so. So they should try harder [to stop] the small groups among them [that reject the truce with Israel]," he said.

61. Hezbollah's drug trail

Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, 2016 10 07

Jerusalem - The Shin Bet and Israel Police's thwarting of Hezbollah's plan to carry out terrorist attacks in the North, including in Haifa, was just another manifestation of the ongoing clandestine war between Israel and the Lebanese Shi'ite organization. It's a war whose trademark is not to leave behind fingerprints. Six people, mostly from one family in the Alawite village of Ghajar on the Golan Heights, were arrested on suspicion of severe security offenses. The village is divided between Israel and Lebanon and is considered by Israeli authorities as a hub for drug smuggling and terrorist activity. In the past, some of its residents were arrested and sentenced to long prison terms for both types of offenses. The unholy world combining drug smuggling, intelligence operations and terrorist plots is neither new nor surprising. The CIA, Britain's MI6, French intelligence and other security agencies around the world have used drug dealers as agents or covers for their operations.

62. Israel charges 7 alleged Hezbollah members

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 10 07

Beirut - Israeli Police charged on Thursday seven alleged Hezbollah members in the occupied border village of Ghajar for allegedly plotting to carry out attacks in Haifa, Israel's third largest city. Israeli media said that the suspects were arrested in September after a joint investigation between the Israeli Intelligence, police and army. Israeli authorities were alerted on July 30 when security agencies discovered explosives in the northern Israeli town of Metula, along the border with Lebanon. The discovery prompted Israeli security agencies to raid several residences in Ghajar over suspicions that they were linked with Hezbollah, Israeli police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said in a video that was circulated online. According to investigators, the group initially intended to target Haifa. It then sought to target a bus stop at a junction near the northern city of Turan, where soldiers gather on Sunday mornings en route to their army bases.

63. The horrors of aleppo

National Post, Samer Attar, 2016 10 07

OpEd: Aleppo is a resilient city, rich in history, older than New York, Paris and London. It is not a city of terrorists. It is a city full of ordinary people living everyday lives, people who want to put food on the table, send their kids to school and keep their families safe, just as anyone else in the world would want for their family. But its streets are literally flowing with blood. How can the world sit idle as the Syrian government, aided by Russia and Iran, brutalizes the people of Aleppo? I saw this carnage for myself when I volunteered in an Aleppo field hospital in July. I was the last American to leave before Syrian government forces encircled and besieged the city. On my first day, I saw a young mother newly paralyzed when a barrel bomb landed on her home. Her family pulled her from the rubble and brought her to the hospital. They were covered in blood and dust. As a last-ditch effort, Aleppo's only neurosurgeon attempted to open her spinal canal to relieve pressure on her spinal cord, but it didn't work. She would never walk again. Next to her was another young mother on life support. A barrel bomb struck her home as well, killing her son and daughter. She had been pregnant, and the blast also killed her fetus. Her husband was working at his shop across the street. When he ran home after the first bombing, a helicopter dropped a second bomb that sent shrapnel into his head. Both father and mother survived, left only with scars and dead children. On it went. The next two weeks were darker and more brutal. I saw human bodies dismembered, burned, crushed, ripped open, cut in half. By my last day I was doing one surgery an hour. Then a driver risked his life to transport a few of us out on the Castello Road, the last supply route into Aleppo.(Note: Samer Attar, a surgeon with Northwestern Medicine in Chicago, is a volunteer with the Syrian American Medical Society and the Aleppo City Medical Council.)

64. With reprisal campaign, Israel looks to put 'strategic' dent in Hamas

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 10 07

Jerusalem - A major Israeli bombing campaign in the Gaza Strip Wednesday targeted strategic Hamas positions seen as important to the group's operations, a military official said, while maintaining that Israel would continue to strike the ruling terror group in response to rocket attacks carried out by other groups in the Palestinian enclave. The strikes, which comprised some two dozen bombings according to some reports, came after a missile fired from Gaza slammed into a street in the Israeli town of Sderot, causing damage and sending three people to the hospital to be treated for anxiety. There were no reports of Palestinian casualties in the Israeli raids. A fringe Salafist group took responsibility for the rocket attack. The army would not specify on record which Hamas sites were hit in the retaliatory strikes. In a statement, the Israel Defense Forces would only say its aircraft targeted "a number of terror installations belonging to the Hamas terror group."

Journal de Montréal, Lise Ravary, 2016 10 07

Opinion - Il n'y a pas d'emploi plus désirable pour un terroriste en devenir que manutentionnaire pour un transporteur aérien. Ces employés ont accès aux appareils, à l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur, aux pistes, au carburant et même aux repas des passagers et de l'équipage. Le journal français Le Canard enchaîné, qui mène des enquêtes aussi audacieuses que béton, révélait récemment la présence de «barbus» parmi le personnel au sol d'air France à Roissy. On aurait trouvé des tags Allah Akhbar sur les trappes de kérosène. Une vidéo des consignes de sécurité aurait été piratée pour n'être disponible qu'en arabe. Sur un vol vers Tel-aviv, quelqu'un aurait remplacé le nom Israël sur la carte électronique par Gaza ou Palestine, selon les versions. VERSIONS DIFFÉRENTES Air France nie, bien entendu, mais admet qu'un employé, un converti, soupçonné d'avoir trafiqué le moteur de relais entre les réacteurs et le poste de pilotage, a fui vers le Yémen. Deux amis auraient trafiqué les toboggans d'évacuation. La meilleure? Un agent de piste aurait refusé de guider un avion parce qu'il était piloté par une femme. Une légende urbaine, rétorque Air France. Ce n'est pourtant pas le genre du Canard. Pourtant, ne peuvent pénétrer dans les zones sensibles que les employés qui ont un badge de sécurité, attribué seulement après une enquête approfondie. Mais ce n'est pas parce qu'on n'a pas d'antécédents judiciaires qu'on n'est pas en train de se bidouiller un avenir de terroriste.

In one trial, a German-Turkish citizen named only as Kerim Marc B. received a jail term of six years and nine months for swearing allegiance to Isis chief Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi and joining the group in combat. The 23-year-old from the western city of Düsseldorf had assumed the nom de guerre Abu Zulfikar and fought in a unit of predominantly Bosnian militants in 2013-14 before he was arrested in Turkey in 2015, the court heard. In another trial, four men were sentenced for supporting a Syrian rebel group the court labelled a "foreign terrorist organisation", the hardline Islamist Ahrar al-Sham.

68. Lutte contre le terrorisme : l'état des lieux de Georges Fenech

La Dépêche du Midi, Romain Gruffaz, 2016 10 07

Aveyron, France - Georges Fenech, député Les Républicains du Rhône, a été invité par son homologue aveyronnais Yves Censi à animer, hier soir, une conférence à propos des moyens mis en oeuvre par l'État pour lutter contre le terrorisme. « Il faut aller au contact des gens, les rencontrer et répondre à leurs questions », a souligné l'ancien juge d'instruction, qui a présidé la commission d'enquête sur les attentats de Paris, à l'issue de laquelle un rapport pointant les erreurs commises, et contenant quarante propositions pour tenter d'y remédier, a été rendu. « La réorganisation du renseignement a été l'un des points centraux, a-t-il expliqué. Le problème est que l'on n'a pas tiré toutes les conséquences de ce qui a été présenté, par les responsables de la DGSI et de la DGSE eux-mêmes, comme "un échec de leurs services". En ce qui nous concerne, nous sommes pour la création d'une agence nationale antiterroriste, sur le modèle du National Counterterrorism Center américain, dont la coordination se ferait au niveau du chef de l'État et non pas du ministre de l'Intérieur, qui n'a pas autorité sur ses homologues. Il faut également accroître la coopération à l'échelle européenne, même si cela nécessite de céder un peu de sa souveraineté. On n'en est qu'aux balbutiements, bien que l'on sente qu'il y a eu une prise de conscience depuis le 13 novembre. Un autre aspect a concerné l'intervention de nos forces d'élite lors de ces attentats d'un genre que l'on ne connaissait pas, avec un terrorisme qui a changé de face. Pourquoi ne répondent-elles pas à un seul commandement unifié ? Il faut mettre en place une nouvelle doctrine, mais également faire des efforts en matière de prévention.

69. Métro, gares, aéroports : les signalements de colis suspects en forte hausse

FranceTv Info (site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 10 07

Paris - Depuis le début de l'état d'urgence, les alertes sont partout plus fréquentes, et les démineurs sans cesse sollicités. Les Français sont plus vigilants depuis la mise en place de l'état d'urgence : le nombre de signalements de colis suspects a fortement augmenté ces derniers mois. La RATP indique à franceinfo qu'elle a enregistré en moyenne sept alertes pour des bagages abandonnés chaque jour en juin 2016. Selon la direction de la régie des transports parisiens, cela représente une augmentation de 60 % du nombre de signalements par rapport à juin 2015. "Le nombre de colis suspects a été multiplié par deux après les attentats de janvier 2015 et a quadruplé après ceux du 13 novembre", explique la RATP. Un tiers de ces alertes concernent des colis suspects sur la ligne A du RER. 20 % de hausse des signalements à la SNCF Un constat similaire est dressé par la SNCF, qui évoque "une hausse significative des signalements de colis suspects depuis le début de l'état d'urgence [en novembre 2015], de l'ordre de 20 %". Du côté des aéroports de Paris, on dénombre 1 850 bagages abandonnés à Roissy en 2015 et 354 à Orly. Soit un total de 2 200 colis suspects, contre 1 600 en moyenne les années précédentes, précise à franceinfo la direction générale de la Sécurité civile, dont dépendent les équipes de déminage. Cette augmentation de 37 % s'explique par "une vigilance accrue des passagers". "Depuis les attentats de 2015, plus personne n'ignore un colis ou un bagage laissé seul", souligne la Direction générale de la sécurité civile (DGSC). La plupart de ces signalements sont toutefois de fausses alertes. Les démineurs n'ont fait exploser que dix colis sur les 2 200 considérés comme suspects en 2015, selon les chiffres de la sécurité civile.

Selon le site du journal britannique The Telegraph, citant des sources des services secrets français, dans le cadre d'une série de tentatives de sabotages qu'aurait subit la compagnie Air France, des membres du personnel du transport aérien français, présumés radicalisés auraient bidouillé les cartes de trajectoires de vol sur un avion en s'attaquant à deux pays, le Maroc et Israël. Ainsi, sur une carte affichée sur les écrans de l'avion, les passagers pouvaient lire un nom bizarre collé sur la carte du Maroc : " Califat" probablement en référence au prétendu califat autoproclamé par les terroristes de daech en Irak. Sur une autre carte, le nom d'Israël a été effacé et remplacé par Gaza. Selon les mêmes sources, Air France serait victime d'une série de tentatives d'attentats dont les coupables ne seraient d'autres que des membres de son personnel navigant et au sol.

Paris - "Je respecte des gens prêts à mourir pour ce en quoi ils croient", a affirmé le polémiste. Une apologie du terrorisme pour des familles de victimes du 13 novembre. Après les propos d'Eric Zemmour, qui a dit "respecter les djihadistes prêts à mourir pour ce en quoi ils croient", des familles de victimes du 13 novembre ont saisi le parquet de Paris par le biais de leur avocate et de l'association SOS Racisme pour apologie du terrorisme. Dans une interview donnée au mensuel "Causeur" en kiosque jeudi, l'écrivain réfute la qualification "d'esprits faibles" des terroristes de Daech que donne le journaliste qui l'interroge, ont relevé "L'Express" et le site Les Crises. "Quelle condescendance ! Moi, je prends l'islam au sérieux, je ne le méprise pas !", poursuit-il, avant de lâcher : "Et je respecte des gens prêts à mourir pour ce en quoi ils croient." Quand le journaliste de "Causeur" lui demande s'il respecte "des gens qui roulent en camion sur des enfants", faisant ainsi référence à l'attentat de Nice, l'ancien journaliste précise : "Pardon de vous chagriner, mais l'Histoire c'est ainsi, des innocents meurent parce qu'ils sont dans le mauvais camp, ou au mauvais endroit au mauvais moment. Et oui, quand les gens agissent parce qu'ils pensent que leurs morts le leur demandent, il y a quelque chose de respectable".

73. Turquie: une suspecte liée au PKK arrêtée après l'attentat contre un poste de police

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 07

Istanbul - Les autorités turques ont arrêté une membre du Parti des travailleurs du Kurdistan (PKK) soupçonnée d'être responsable de l'attentat qui a fait dix blessés jeudi près d'un poste de police à Istanbul, rapporte vendredi la presse. La femme, qui était en possession d'un faux passeport, a été arrêtée avec deux autres personnes dans la province d'Aksaray dans le centre de la Turquie, selon l'agence gouvernementale Anadolu. Au total six suspects ont été arrêtés depuis jeudi dans le cadre de l'enquête, selon les médias. Dix personnes, tous des civils selon les autorités, ont été blessées dans l'explosion d'un motorcycle piégé jeudi dans le quartier de Yenibosna, dans la partie européenne d'Istanbul non loin de l'aéroport international Atatürk.

L'attaque n'a pas été revendiquée. Le PKK, considéré comme une organisation terroriste par Ankara, Washington et l'Union européenne, est engagé depuis 1984 dans une guerre contre l'Etat turc qui a fait plus de 40.000 morts. Après une trêve de deux ans, les combats entre les insurgés et l'armée turque dans le sud- est de la Turquie à majorité kurde ont repris en 2015.

1. 'Follow us,' spy agency tweet urges

Ottawa Citizen, Jon Willing, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - Canada's spy agency developed a new external communications plan and kicked around ideas for its first tweet before stepping out of the cyber-shadows, on Twitter, in July. Internal documents obtained by the Citizen through access to information legislation show how the Canadian Security Intelligence Service spitballed some options for the agency's first tweet, on July 13, before settling on, "Yes, we're on Twitter. Now it's your turn to follow us." It notched more than 1,000 retweets and 1,400 likes. The agency had four options for cheeky tweets ready to roll, according to a Twitter game plan. The three that were left on the cutting room floor were: So, we're on Twitter. #WhatWe-DoWednesday may be a challenge for us. (redacted) Yes (redacted) (redacted) we're (redacted) on (redacted) (redacted) Twitter. #LearningCurve || In honour of Twitter launching 10 years ago this month, we suddenly decided to join. #LateTo-TheParty There was some talk in emails about potentially crowdsourcing recommendations for the first tweet from all CSIS staff. One staffer served up 13 suggestions, including "Terrorists shaken, spies stirred." Names of CSIS staff are redacted in the documents. As reconnaissance, staff checked out the first tweets by the Communications Security Establishment, Central Intelligence Agency in the United States and Government Communications Headquarters in the United Kingdom. The agency higher-ups approved a list of the initial 16 Twitter accounts to follow, which included the Federal Bureau of Investigation, CIA, Canadian Border Services Agency, RCMP and Privy Council clerk Michael Wernick, plus other national and international agencies. CSIS started thinking about exposing more of itself to the public earlier this year. A 16-page social media strategy dated April 2016 set the foundation for the agency's baby steps into the cyber-spotlight. As one might expect, CSIS noted that establishing "complex passwords" was key for its social media accounts. While posting stuff in error was identified as a risk, the social media strategy recommends "multiple sets of eyes" reviewing any content before it goes live. As well, the agency says it will need a "comprehensive exit strategy," with a heads-up to the clerk of the Privy Council, if it decides to close a social media account.

2. Criminals target Canada to launder money

Toronto Star, Angelo Persichilli, 2016 10 11

Opinion: Canada "faces an important domestic and foreign money laundering threat" from criminal organizations that launder billions of dollars in this country. The stiff warning comes from the Financial Action Task Force (FATF), which also sounds an alarm about the threat against "major financial institutions and some unscrupulous real estate lawyers" targeted by criminals involved in laundering money. Canadian authorities should not ignore this warning, which comes from an organization set up by the G7 countries in 1989 to promote policies aimed at protecting the global financial system against money laundering and terrorist financing. Although Canada has devoted a lot of energy to fighting terrorist financing, FATF cautions that not enough has been done to prevent the infiltration of criminals into our country, even though the latter poses bigger economic and social threats than the former. In particular, the organization warns, "the major six financial institutions are the main channels targeted by criminals" and "it is suspected that criminally inclined real estate professionals, notably real estate lawyers, are used to facilitate money laundering." Coincidentally, members of the Italian anti-Mafia Parliamentary Commission were in Ottawa recently where they met with Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson and officials of the justice department. Not much is known about the meetings, but the powerful Calabrian criminal organization known as 'Ndrangheta has strong connections in Canada and Italian authorities are trying to get more co-operation to fight money laundering. According to FATF, quoting estimates from the Canadian

Security Intelligence Service and the RCMP, the total proceeds of crimes in Canada vary between 3 per cent and 5 per cent of our GDP, or about $62 billion (CSIS estimates in 2007). There are no details about terrorist funding because of national security concerns. 3. CSIS, Bill C-51 and Canada's growing metadata collection mess

CBC.CA, Steven Zhou, 2016 10 11

Opinion: Much has been made over whether the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Canada's spy agency, should be armed with broader powers to "disrupt" what it perceives as terrorist plots. A report tabled this month by the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which watches over CSIS's work, notes that while the spy agency hasn't abused its new powers of disruption, its bulk data collection program needs to be scaled back. It's easy to think of CSIS and other spy agencies as shadowy organizations that carry out James Bond-like "missions" involving cool gadgets and high-tech weaponry, but the Snowden leaks, among other revelations, have shown the public that metadata collection (online communications, phone logs and other electronic exchanges that can be intercepted in enormous amounts) now constitutes the state's primary instrument of control. Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien recently called upon legislators (the Liberals in particular) to amend certain aspects of Canada's national security laws in order to address the issue of metadata collection. In particular, Therrien referred to the Communications Security Establishment, which seems to get a lot less public scrutiny than CSIS. The CSE is responsible for collecting massive volumes of foreign communications through "signals-intelligence," (or "sigint"), but also tends to drag up large amounts of Canadian metadata as well, which it isn't supposed to be doing. This is also a point that Jean-Pierre Plouffe, the commissioner who provides oversight for the work the CSE does, has consistently made. Plouffe tabled his annual report earlier in the year and revealed that the CSE illegally and inadvertently shared a large amount of metadata with Canada's "Five Eyes" intelligence allies: the U.K., U.S., New Zealand and Australia. Given the amount of work and data collection that CSIS and the CSE both do, it's hard to see how each agency's mandate should be expanded without a corresponding expansion of the powers of watchdogs who monitor their work. Under Stephen Harper, the Security Intelligence Review Committee wasn't even fully staffed, and for all their promises to reform Canada's national security apparatus, Justin Trudeau's Liberals still haven't released any details about how they want to do that. 4. Admit it, Canada, our troops are fighting and in danger in Iraq

Toronto Star, Thomas Walkom, 2016 10 11

Column: It has always been a myth that Canada's soldiers in Iraq don't do combat. Now the myth is even harder to sustain. On Thursday, a senior general acknowledged that, over the past few months, Canadian special forces operating in northern Iraq have become increasingly involved in front-line skirmishes against Daesh fighters. "The mission has changed," said Brig.-Gen. Peter Dawe. "We are more engaged on the line ... the risk has increased." There are roughly 200 Canadian special forces troops operating in Iraq. Ostensibly, their role is to train Kurdish troops. In military bureaucratese, this is known as an "advise and assist" mission, as opposed to an "advise, assist and accompany" mission - which is what Canadian soldiers did when they were supporting local troops during the Afghan War. Both the current Liberal government and the Conservative one it replaced have gone to great lengths to assure Canadians that Iraq is not another Afghanistan. So these semantic debates over the definition of the word "combat" have taken on great political meaning. The Conservatives used to say shooting in self-defence was not real combat. Under the Liberals, the military brass is engaging in similar linguistic contortions to avoid the dreaded word.

6. Canada's foreign affairs minister met North Korean counterpart in rare exchange

CBC.CA, Nahlah Ayed, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - Weeks before Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's quiet "pull-aside" at the UN laid the groundwork for a Canadian's release from an Iranian prison, Canada's foreign affairs minister was trying his own hand at corridor diplomacy -- with his North Korean counterpart. The subject of the brief meeting between Stéphane Dion and North Korean Foreign Minister Ri Su- Yong -- the highest-level known contact between the two countries in years - - was another Canadian imprisoned abroad. Toronto-area pastor Hyeon Soo Lim was convicted last December in Pyongyang of plotting to overthrow the North Korean government using religious activity and is serving a life sentence in a hard labour prison camp. A family spokesperson has said Canadian officials who last visited him found his health had deteriorated. There is no evidence that the previously undisclosed encounter between Dion and Ri on the margins of a multinational gathering back in July has made the slightest difference in Lim's case. But given the delicate relations between the two countries -- and between North Korea and most of the world -- the encounter is still extraordinary. CBC News learned it happened in Laos during a gathering of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations -- or ASEAN -- which Canada, as a partner, attended. Global Affairs Canada has largely avoided making public any details of any interventions on Lim's behalf, with officials citing the case's best interests.

7. Eyes in sky hit operational turbulence

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - Canada's much-vaunted surveillance planes operating over Iraq were so limited in the information they could collect and share with allies, Canadian military personnel planning CF-18 attacks had to rely on the U.S. for data, according to documents obtained by the Ottawa Citizen. The briefing, produced last year on lessons learned from operations in Iraq in 2014, also pointed out efforts to set up ball hockey facilities and a Tim Hortons for personnel at a base in Kuwait should take a back seat to getting key components of the mission in place. Canada initially contributed special forces, Aurora surveillance aircraft, a refuelling plane and CF-18 fighter jets to the international coalition battling Islamic extremists. The Liberal government withdrew the jets, but expanded the number of special forces and kept the refuelling planes and Auroras on scene. Canadian officers have claimed from the beginning of the mission the upgraded CP-140 Auroras are among the most advanced surveillance aircraft in the world. But the "lessons learned" document, obtained through the Access to Information law, tells a different story. "The CP140 deployed without the organic capability to share their data with coalition partners," it notes. In addition, the software needed to process some CP-140 surveillance data was not available and the aircrews needed "greater experience operating over land." The Aurora is primarily a maritime surveillance plane, but the upgrades allow it to collect data on ground targets.

8. Feds ban new embassies along Sussex Drive after RCMP flags security concerns

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - The federal government is forbidding the construction of new embassies on Ottawa's Sussex Drive following a stark RCMP assessment of the potential for "violent events" in the high-profile neighbourhood. Countries with diplomatic missions already located on the well-known boulevard include the United States, France, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and South Africa. It is also home to Rideau Hall, where the Governor General lives, as well as the prime minister's residence at 24 Sussex. Justin Trudeau and his family are living in a house on the Rideau Hall grounds while federal officials consider badly needed renovations to the traditional address of Canada's leader. Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion was advised of the ban on new embassies in January by Daniel Jean, then his deputy minister, records released under the Access to Information Act show. Jean has since been named national security adviser to the prime minister. "A recently concluded RCMP security assessment advises against any additional foreign embassies being located along Sussex Drive," says Jean's memo to Dion, obtained by The Canadian Press. "As a result, the department will no longer be approving requests by diplomatic missions to acquire land in the affected zone." Canada requires foreign states to obtain its consent before buying property for use as diplomatic chancery offices or official residences.

9. Government ramps up Facebook advertising

Ottawa Citizen, Jason Fekete, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - Rapidly changing how it communicates with Canadians, the federal government is on pace to spend more on Facebook ads in the Liberals' first year in office than it did between 2006 and 2014 combined. The Liberal government spent at least $3.8 million on Facebook ads between November 2015 and June 2016 targeting Canadians and foreigners of various age groups and demographics, and is on pace to spend well over $6 million during Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's first year in office, according to documents tabled in the House of Commons. The data from dozens of departments, agencies and Crown Corporations was tabled in response to a question from Conservative MP Martin Shields. By comparison, the federal government spent $5.8 million on Facebook ads between April 2006 and early June 2014, according to a federal government response to a similar question two years ago. As well, the spending on Facebook ads during the Liberal tenure doesn't include that from CBC/Radio-Canada, which was one of the biggest spenders detailed in the last response. The government declined to release the information this time around, saying it's "competitive information." Government of Canada annual advertising reports show the rapidly changing trend that sees federal departments and agencies looking to contact Canadians more through the Internet. In the 2011-12 fiscal year, just over 10 per cent of federal government media placements purchased through its agency of record were on the Internet (including search and display ads, and paid social media ads). That number more than doubled to over 25 per cent of media placements by 2014-15. (Data for the 2015-16 fiscal year won't be released until January).

10. Homa Hoodfar: I was a pawn in struggle between Iran's two competing states (Canada)

The Guardian (London), Ashifa Kassam, 2016 10 10

Toronto - Long after the interrogations at Iran's notorious Evin prison had ceased for the day, Homa Hoodfar's work would begin. While her cellmates slept, the 65-year-old would lie on the floor, and - using the end of her toothbrush as a makeshift pen - slowly scratch her observations on to the stone walls. Some days she wrote down her thoughts on the dozens of brutal interrogations she had been subjected to. Other days she scrawled snippets from conversations with other prisoners. The Canadian-Iranian professor of social anthropology was arrested in June after nearly three months of interrogations by the Iranian intelligence service. After 112 days in prison, she arrived in Montreal last week - freed on what Iran called "humanitarian grounds" - after Canada enlisted the help of Oman. The research recast the 30 interrogations she was put through while imprisoned. As she sat facing a wall or a one-way mirror while her interrogators screamed and yelled at her, Hoodfar analysed their choice of words. When they hurled threats at her - "They were telling me, 'You'll get 15 years here and we'll send your dead body back to Canada'" - she contemplated the power dynamics at play.

11. Kagame allegations reopen genocide probe

Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York and Judi Rever, 2016 10 11

A confidential 12-page statement by a former close aide of Rwandan President Paul Kagame has sparked the reopening of a formal investigation into one of the greatest mysteries of the 20th century: the assassination that triggered the Rwandan genocide. The document, obtained by The Globe and Mail, accuses Mr. Kagame of direct involvement in the 1994 missile attack that killed former president Juvénal Habyarimana, leading to the genocide in which an estimated 800,000 people died. The sworn statement has been submitted to French investigating magistrates, who have decided to reopen their probe. The decision has provoked fury from Mr. Kagame, who told military and judicial officials on Monday that he is ready for a "showdown" with France, including a freeze in diplomatic relations, if the investigation continues. More than two decades after the assassination, nobody has settled the question of who fired two surface-to-air missiles into the Dassault Falcon 50 private jet that carried Mr. Habyarimana and Burundi president Cyprien Ntaryamira, along with seven other officials and a three-man French crew, as their jet approached Kigali's airport on the night of April 6, 1994, after peace negotiations in Tanzania. Immediately after the assassination, Hutu extremists began slaughtering Hutu moderates and Tutsis in the violence that became known as the Rwandan genocide. Various inquiries have reached different conclusions on whether the assassination was carried out by Hutu extremists or the Tutsi rebel army, led by Mr. Kagame. Canadian general Roméo Dallaire was the commander of a small United Nations peacekeeping force in Rwanda at the time of the genocide. The United Nations force, which also included about a dozen Canadian troops, was credited with saving thousands of lives during the genocide by securing a few places of shelter.

12. Khaled Al-Qazzaz is back in Canada after spending three years as a political detainee, including 11 months in solitary

Toronto Star, Olivia Ward, 2016 10 11

Toronto - When the Arab Spring came to Egypt in 2011, Khaled Al-Qazzaz was full of hope for the country's future. Instead, he and his wife, Sarah Attia, were caught up in a three-year nightmare that left them and their four young children struggling to recover from emotional scars - and Al-Qazzaz from serious physical injuries that may require years of rehabilitation. A Canadian permanent resident and University of Toronto engineering graduate, he was arrested while serving as an aide to Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi, who was ousted in a military-backed coup in July 2013. Now back home in Mississauga, 37-year-old Al-Qazzaz recounted the ordeal that continued even after his release without charge in January 2015. "The hardest parts were when I was separated from my children, not being able to make them feel safe," he said. "And never knowing what was going to happen in the future. I was totally cut off from the outside world." Al-Qazzaz and Attia, a Canadian who was born in North York, met during graduate studies at U of T. Both deeply involved in human rights and social justice issues, they fell in love and married in 2004. On the eve of Egypt's 2011 Tahrir Square revolution they were in Cairo, helping Khaled's ailing father run a chain of private schools. Sarah became a school principal and ran volunteer programs in orphanages and homes for the elderly. "So many new opportunities opened up," Al-Qazzaz said. "What we taught in the schools had more meaning. And with our experiences across cultures, we could bridge the gap between Egyptians and people in other countries." When the first free elections were called in 2012, Al-Qazzaz was excited by the prospect of a new era of democracy and respect for human rights in Egypt.

13. PIPSC past president, executive mired in harassment allegations

Ottawa Citizen, Don Butler, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - A recent tribunal decision has lifted the veil on bitter conflict and allegations of harassment involving a past president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and current members of the union's executive. The Aug. 30 decision by the Public Service Labour Relations and Employment Board dismissed a complaint against PIPSC by Gary Corbett, who led the 57,000-member union from 2009 until his defeat by current president Debi Daviau in 2013. But in concluding that Corbett failed to present sufficient evidence to substantiate his complaint, the board laid bare poisonous relationships at the union's most senior levels. PIPSC declined to comment on the board's decision. Corbett, now 57, was still president in 2013 when Shannon Bittman, one of the union's vicepresidents, filed a harassment complaint against him. According to the board's decision, Corbett believed that Bittman's complaint "was meant to embarrass him" and was part of a "campaign of terror" waged against him to ensure that Daviau was elected president. In response, Corbett filed a cross complaint against Bittman. A few days after the December 2013 election that unseated him, Corbett received a call from Don Burns, another member of the union's executive, the decision recounts. Burns advised Corbett of a second harassment complaint against him by another union vice-president, Shirley Friesen, who, like Bittman, had strongly supported Daviau's candidacy for president. At the board hearing, Corbett testified that Burns told him if he withdrew his complaint against Bittman, the Bittman and Friesen complaints against him would be withdrawn as well.

14. Pitre considers second attempt after stem-cell transplant fails

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 10 11

Ottawa: Jonathan Pitre learned late Monday that his stem cell transplant had failed, which means he must now decide whether to face a second treatment and the resulting hardship. Pitre's mother, Tina Boileau, learned the bad news while her son slept Monday afternoon. She broke it to him late in the day during the bath routine that has often been home to their most difficult conversations. They will now have to decide whether to pursue a second stem cell transplant after what has been the most trying month of Pitre's life. "I have to get Jon on board to do this again," said an emotional Boileau. A Grade 11 student from Russell, Pitre suffers from an incurable, blistering skin disease, epidermolysis bullosa (EB), that complicates every part of his life. Many of those with EB die from an aggressive form of skin cancer in their 20s. Pitre travelled to Minneapolis in August for the stem cell transplant, the only treatment that holds the potential to significantly improve his physical condition and make his disease more manageable. But complications from the treatment, including infection and rejection, can be life-threatening. Pitre underwent the transplant on Sept. 8, and in recent days his white blood cell count had been climbing steadily, raising hope that donor stem cells had started to grow in his bone marrow and produce new blood cells capable of ameliorating his severe skin disease. But a critical question remained unanswered: were the white blood cells in his system the product of the new stem cells or his old ones? The test results came back Monday afternoon, Thanksgiving Day. They were a crashing disappointment.

15. The mysterious Ottawa property at the centre of an international terror lawsuit

Metro News Ottawa, Haley Ritchie, 2016 10 11

Ottawa - Passers-by or vandals curious about the seemingly abandoned property at 2 Robinson Avenue in Sandy Hill might assume it has stood empty for four years because of an ordinary reason, such as developer delays or trouble selling it. Instead, the warehouse-like property in Sandy Hill is in legal limbo - the focus of a complex international court case that ties the building to foreign espionage and 1983 bombings in Beirut. Now the white-brick building stands quiet. From time to time, different-coloured cars occupy the overgrown asphalt driveway, but the lights never seem to be on inside. A break in the fence behind the building encourages graffiti tagging. While the building has been quiet, the international legal battle for its control has not. Since 2012, the state of Iran has been struggling to resist the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act, introduced by the Harper government, in Canadian courts. The act allows victims of violence to seek legal damages from states that fund government-designated terrorist groups. The majority of the plaintiffs involved in the lawsuit, many of whom have lost family to bombings abroad, were awarded large sums in the U.S. The Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act allows them to continue claiming those sums in Canada. The large Sandy Hill property is estimated to be worth close to $3 million, and it's one of the non-diplomatic assets the U.S. victims are seeking. The case has been ongoing for four years, complicated by the lack of diplomatic ties between Iran and Canada. In the latest decision made this past summer, Justice Glenn Hayney ruled in favour of the victims of Hamas and Hezbollah.

16. Could the U.S. election be hacked? ; At national level, no, but experts say it wouldn't take much to sow discord

USA Today, Elizabeth Weise, 2016 10 11

Washington - The impact of Russian hacking on the upcoming presidential election was a topic in Sunday night's debate, raising the question: Is the U.S. election hackable? Experts say at the national level, no. But there could be individual incidents that undermine faith in the system.

There's almost no danger the U.S. presidential election could be affected by hackers. It's simply too decentralized and for the most part too offline to be threatened, according to the head of the FBI and several security experts. "National elections are conducted at the local level by local officials on equipment that they obtained locally," so there's no single point of vulnerability to tampering here, said Pamela Smith, president of Verified Voting, a non-partisan, non-profit organization that advocates for elections accuracy. In testimony before the House Judiciary Committee last month, FBI Director James Comey said that while concern has been rightly focused on the integrity of state voter registration systems, the actual voting process remains "very hard to hack into because it is so clunky and dispersed. It is Mary and Fred putting a machine under the basketball hoop at the gym. These things are not connected to the Internet." Nevertheless, Comey said federal authorities have been counseling state officials to secure their systems, especially voter registration databases, as hackers have continued to "scan" the systems for vulnerabilities.

17. FBI Hacked Computers in Australia as Part of Global Child Porn Sting

Motherboard (Vice Magazine), Joseph Cox, 2016 10 10

New York - In early 2015, the FBI hacked thousands of computers across the world, based on a single, arguably illegal, warrant. Now, Motherboard has learned that as part of the same operation, the FBI also hacked computers in Australia, highlighting how law enforcement agencies are increasingly using malware to remotely search computers outside of their jurisdiction. The case, codenamed Operation Pacifier, revolves around the FBI's investigation into one of the largest ever dark web child pornography sites, called Playpen. When the FBI seized the site in 2015, instead of shutting it down, the agency briefly ran Playpen from a government server in order to deploy a network investigative technique (NIT)--the agency's term for a piece of malware--in an attempt to identify its visitors. The agency's malware used a Tor Browser exploit, and then grabbed a suspected Playpen user's IP address, MAC address, and other technical information. As well as obtaining over 1,000 US IP addresses, and distributing much of this information throughout the FBI and to other US-based law enforcement agencies, the FBI also gave details on suspects overseas to foreign agencies. The Australian Federal Police (AFP) was one of those agencies. During the processing of a Freedom of Information request filed by Motherboard, the AFP said it held a wealth of data on Operation Pacifier, including a large PROMIS case file. PROMIS is the case management tool AFP officers use to catalogue investigations and store intelligence.

18. Hezbollah-linked group laundered drug money through Miami banks

Miami Herald, David Ovalle, 2016 10 11

Miami - Three men suspected of laundering cocaine money for the Colombian cartel have been busted after agents say they illegally moved $500,000 into Miami banks through a series of complicated financial transactions stretching from Australia to Europe. That's not uncommon in Miami, but the trio's background is: They are suspected associates of the Middle Eastern terror group Hezbollah. The main player is Mohammad Ahmad Ammar, 31, who was living in Medellín, Colombia. He was quietly booked into a Miami-Dade jail last week to face state felony money laundering charges in a case that underscores increased law-enforcement scrutiny on the role of Middle Eastern terror groups who use financial networks in Latin America to earn untold millions off drug profits. Along with Ammar, two other Hezbollah associates are facing charges in the same case. One of them is in custody in Paris, while the other is on the lam, possibly in Lebanon or Nigeria.

19. In Russian Hacks of Democrats, a Ghost of the Soviet Past

Newsweek, Jeff Stein, 2016 10 10

Column - Felix Dzerzhinsky must be chortling in his Red Square tomb. Nearly a century ago the first head of the Soviet secret police perfected the art of "disinformation," the clever crafting of false information to sow confusion among the Kremlin's enemies. His heirs have brazenly remounted the technique in an all-out attack on the American political system. It's not been subtle. "We stand for organized terror," Dzerzhinsky famously wrote. "This should be frankly admitted. Terror is an absolute necessity during times of revolution." When the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, Muscovites fed up with decades of repression tore down Dzerzhinsky's monstrous statue in Lubyanka Square, site of the KGB's infamous interrogation tombs, but he's making a comeback in the hearts of the Kremlin. In 2005, a smaller bust of the secret police chief, who died in 1927, was restored in the courtyard of the Moscow police headquarters. Last year, city election officials greenlighted a referendum to restore "Iron Felix," as the 40-foot high hulk was known. Vladimir Putin seems to be a fan-and not shy about it. The Kremlin left its fingerprint on the hack of the Democratic Party's data vaults, investigators say. The person or team of hackers known as Guccifer 2.0 left behind a signature in Cyrillic, "Felix Dzerzhinsky." "If these are indeed the Russians," Nina Khrushcheva, the great-granddaughter of Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev tells Newsweek, "it only suggests that they either want to be caught and laugh at those who think they caught them." It's possible someone else posing as a Russian wants Putin to be blamed for the hack attacks, says Khrushcheva-always a possibility in the murky Internet underworld. But that's not likely, according to the Obama administration, which last week pointed a finger directly at the Kremlin.

20. Md. imam who backs ISIS is at heart of terrorism probe

Washington Post, Justin Jouvenal, 2016 10 10

Washington - Suleiman Anwar Bengharsa once told a court during a custody dispute that he worried his ex-wife's new husband was too close to Islamic radicals under FBI investigation and she might raise their child in an "extremist environment." A little over a decade later, the Maryland man became the thing he once feared. The onetime Commerce Department trade analyst had remade himself into something rare in the United States: a radical imam publicly supporting the Islamic State, also known as ISIS. Bengharsa celebrated ISIS killings and immolations on Facebook and issued a blistering fatwa against feminism through a sharia law center he started in Montgomery County, not far from the nation's capital. He criticized fellow Muslims who assisted authorities in terrorism investigations. The stunning transformation culminated last month when FBI search warrants mistakenly unsealed in a Michigan terrorism case alleged that Bengharsa, 59, provided money to Detroit resident Sebastian Gregerson, who authorities say used it in 2015 to buy weapons. "There is reason to believe Bengharsa and Gregerson are engaged in discussions and preparations for some violent attack on behalf of [ISIS]," an FBI agent concluded in the warrants, first reported by the Detroit News.

21. Pentagon Considers Launching Limited Military Action against Assad

Asharq Al-Awsat, Heba El Koudsy, 2016 10 11

Washington - The Pentagon is considering carrying out limited attacks in Syria that don't drag U.S. President Barack Obama to an embarrassing situation, along with several U.S. security bodies holding meetings since weeks to figure out a solution to the rising crisis in Aleppo amid potential U.S. attacks against the Syrian regime. Officials in the Pentagon and the White House told Asharq al-Awsat newspaper that these airstrikes will not be disclosed and the U.S. won't claim them publicly. Some analysts expressed concerns over the mounting tension between Russia and the U.S. as this might drift the Syrian war and spur a military conflict. However, the Pentagon source seems certain that a U.S. decisive military step can be taken without any risk or real danger. Furthermore, Secretary of State John Kerry on Friday called for a war crimes investigation with the Russian and the Syrian regime, given their continuous attacks on Syrian civilians.

22. Spy fraud

Vice Magazine, Jason Leopold, 2016 10 09

New York - When contractors and employees who work for America's most powerful intelligence agencies get bored at work, they sometimes kill time by viewing pornography on their classified government computers, browsing online dating services, engaging in "sex chats" with minors, and playing games on Facebook. And they charge U.S. taxpayers millions of dollars for it. Between 2013 and 2015, the Intelligence Community's Inspector General, the watchdog entity overseeing 16 federal intelligence agencies, investigated dozens of instances of employee misconduct and crimes based on referrals it received from intelligence agencies. Many of them centered on widespread contracting fraud involving individuals who worked on highly classified intelligence programs for the NSA, the CIA, and the Office of Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) on behalf of well-known contractors such as IBM, Booz Allen Hamilton, Boeing, and General Dynamics. That's according to hundreds of pages of top-secret internal watchdog reports that were declassified and released to VICE News in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit. Experts said this type of misconduct is problematic on multiple levels and can pose a threat to national security. Scott Amey, the general counsel of good government group the Project on Government Oversight, which tracks waste and fraud by government contractors, reviewed the reports for VICE News. "The contractors are primarily to blame, but these records show that intel agencies don't have a handle on the situation, and no one seems to enforce contract requirements," Amey said. He likened the waste uncovered in the reports to an infamous instance of defense contractor excess uncovered during the Reagan administration. "We have stated that time-card fraud is the next $436 hammer, and these records prove that."

23. Apple Watches banned from Cabinet after ministers warned devices could be vulnerable to hacking

London Daily Telegraph, Peter Dominiczak, 2016 10 09

London - Ministers have been barred from wearing Apple Watches during Cabinet meetings amid concerns that they could be hacked by Russian spies, The Telegraph has learned. Under David Cameron, several cabinet ministers wore the smart watches, including Michael Gove, the former Justice Secretary. However, under Theresa May ministers have been barred from wearing them amid concerns that they could be used by hackers as listening devices. Mobile phones have already been barred from the Cabinet because of similar concerns. One source said: "The Russians are trying to hack everything."

24. Hard left are sabotaging anti-extremism plans

London Times, Rachel Sylvester, 2016 10 11

Column - It appeared to be a shocking case of heavy-handed state intervention with an Islamophobic twist. A ten-year-old Muslim boy was visited by police at home after writing that he lived in a "terrorist house" when, according to his family, he meant that he lived in a "terraced house" and was just bad at spelling. The story was widely reported as an example of how the government's counterextremism Prevent strategy was out of control, pitting teachers against pupils and turning communities against each other. Except it wasn't quite as simple as that. The police had in fact made a quite valid response to a series of concerning comments by the boy -- which included a statement that he hated it when his uncle beat him. Prevent was not involved. The terrorist threat is now being exploited, by both left and right, for ideological reasons that have nothing to do with security. On the hard left, there is a concerted attempt to undermine Prevent, which puts a legal duty on teachers and universities to report suspected extremist behaviour to the police. The Stop the War Coalition and the Socialist Workers Party are among its strongest critics, along with the Labour leader Jeremy Corbyn, who has called for the programme to be replaced with a "community-led" initiative.

25. Muslim extremist jailed for raising £3,000 for ISIS-linked terror group 'QUITS job as a Sainsbury's delivery driver after failing to disclose conviction'

Daily Mail (UK), Emma Glanfield, 2016 10 10

London - An extremist jailed for raising thousands of pounds to help an ISIS-linked terror group train jihadis with AK-47s has left his job as a Sainsbury's delivery driver hours after his previous conviction was revealed. Father-of-three Mohammed Shabir Ali, 29, of Tower Hamlets, east London, was jailed for three years in 2012 after raising £3,000 for al-Shabaab training camps in Somalia. Since being freed from jail, he landed himself a job working as a home delivery driver for Sainsbury's - working out of a depot in east London and dropping off online food orders to customers' homes while unsupervised. It is believed he did not disclose his previous conviction when applying for the job. According to Sainsbury's policy, anyone with a previous conviction must declare it on their application form, and if a terrorism-related offence was disclosed that would end the application process instantly. Sainsbury's said it does not comment on individual employees but confirmed Shabir no longer worked for the company and it is understood he quit the firm.

26. Police use snooping devices on phones

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 10 11

London - A string of police forces have secretly purchased surveillance technology that enables large amounts of phone data to be collected from passers-by, it has emerged. At least seven forces in England and Wales are now thought to be using IMSI Catchers that can collect and identify call and message data from mobile phones within a given area. They mimic mobile-phone towers and act as a "dummy", sending out signals that trick devices into automatically trying to connect to them. Police find the Catchers useful to track suspects and uncover their phone activity, but they can capture information from other mobiles within a radius of up to five miles. It is believed that there is no automatic deletion of the gathered material from police systems, meaning that forces could be harvesting information about tens of thousands of members of the public.

27. Australians want tougher terror measures

Australian Associated Press, Staff Writer, 2016 10 11

Canberra - A majority of Australians want the government to do more to prevent terrorist attacks on home soil and are happy to give up some personal freedoms to help the cause, new research shows. But many are concerned that Muslims are being singled out for increased surveillance and monitoring. The Australian National University poll found 71 per cent were worried about the rise of Islamist extremism in Australia while nearly as many felt Muslims shouldn't be subject to additional scrutiny based on their religion. "People are obviously concerned whether it's the faith of Islam that gives rise to these things," co-author Katja Theodorakis told reporters on Monday. "That's something that warrants further study because that could have political ramifications and divisions - and it's not good for social cohesion in a multicultural society." Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, speaking on racism in parliament on Monday, said Islamist terrorists had succeeded in raising levels of anxiety about Muslim immigration. Those concerns are real and should not be dismissed.

28. Security fears keep watch out of cabinet

Sydney Morning Herald, David Wroe, 2016 10 11

Canberra - Malcolm Turnbull may be famed for his love of technology, which has even extended to checking his Apple Watch in the chamber of the House of Representatives. But the Prime Minister is obliged to take it off before cabinet meetings, a government spokesman has confirmed, adhering to a long-standing policy that no communication devices may be taken into the sensitive room. There are rising concern about the threat of device hacking by foreign intelligence agencies or political "hacktivists", with British government ministers reportedly issued an edict not to wear Apple Watches to cabinet meetings because of fears they could be penetrated by Russian spies. "It has long been standard practice, on both sides of politics, that no electronic transmitting devices, including Apple Watches, be allowed in the cabinet room," a spokesman for Cabinet Secretary Arthur Sinodinos said. Visitors to agencies such as ASIO or the Australian Signals Directorate are asked to store any electronic devices in lockers in the foyer out of fear they could be used as listening devices or to insert viruses into the buildings' systems.

The reaffirmation came during a high echelon security meeting held here with Prime Minister Muhammad Nawaz Sharif in the chair. Chief of the Army Staff (COAS) Gen Raheel Sharif and Director General Inter-Services Intelligence (DG ISI) Lt Gen Rizwan Akhtar were among those who attended the meeting. Matters pertaining to national and regional security came under discussion. The meeting expressed concern over the publication of a fabricated news story in daily Dawn (last week) pertaining to security issues purportedly discussed in a meeting of the National Security Committee (NSC).

30. Pak using terror as state policy: Experts

The Pioneer, Rakesh K Singh, 2016 10 11

New Delhi - Soon after the surgical strikes conducted by the Indian special forces inside PoK against the terror launch pads, Pakistan is back to the decades-long tactics of using terror as an instrument of state policy by directing terror affiliates like the AQIS, LeT, and JeM to step up jihadi action in the region, according to security experts. The Al Qaeda in the Indian Subcontinent (AQIS), an affiliate of the Pakistan Army-ISI combine, has released an online appeal asking Muslims in the subcontinent to join jihad and target the countries that supported India in isolating Pakistan over Uri attack in particular and cross-border terror in general. The Pakistani agencies have already directed the Lashkar-e-Tayyeba (LeT) and Jaish-e-Mohammad (JeM) to target vital installations in the Indian hinterland.

National Directorate of Security (NDS) chief Masoom Stanikzai called for a tactical shift while briefing the Wolesi Jirga, lower house of parliament, on the current security situation. Defence Minister Lt. Col. Abdullah Khan Habibi and Interior Minister Taj Mohammad Jahid also informed lawmakers on steps being taken to stabilize the security environment. "The current war here is not a war of Afghans; outsiders are interfering and supporting militants in Afghanistan," Stanikzai alleged, saying the conflict was driven by the interests of foreign countries. "Afghanistan is a victim of its strategic location; we should change our tactics," Stanikzai believed, stressing the need for unity. He asked the people to support their security forces.

Maiduguri - Beyond the tall, concrete walls of a fortified compound, the authorities are holding a special group of detainees: the wives and children of Boko Haram commanders. Guards stand ready at the gate. Curled razor wire lines the walls. Civilian militia members with AK-47s hanging from their shoulders meander about. The 56 women and children held inside have been there for months, after being swept up by the Nigerian military during raids on Boko Haram strongholds. The state governor, who is operating the detention center, considers them all Boko Haram supporters. "We can't just release them into society," Gov. Kashim Shettima said of the women and girls in the compound. "There's been so much brainwashing."

33. Papers Reveal Harsh Rule of ISIS in Libya --- Documents left by militants driven from coastal city detail group's brutal reign

Wall Street Journal, Maria Abi-Habib, 2016 10 11

Sirte - The first page of Abu Bakr's notebook contains Arabic translations of basic English words. It ends with a safety guide for handling explosives: "Be careful." "Don't be afraid." "Keep the triggers away from children." As Islamic State tightened its grip on this Mediterranean city last year, closing schools and restricting social life, it trained hundreds of recruits, many of them foreigners, in the Arabic language, Islam and warfare to help extend its self-declared caliphate to Europe's doorstep, according to documents recently discovered in the group's offices here. Islamic State militants on Monday were under threat of losing the only neighborhood they still control in Sirte, the group's last major bastion in Libya and the largest city Islamic State has ever held outside Iraq and Syria. The notebook of the fighter who took the name Abu Bakr was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal along with some 150 other documents left behind by militants who fled or were killed or captured in battle as Libyan militias backed by U.S. airstrikes moved in recent months to reclaim the city. With the Libyan government's battle for Sirte all but won, the extremists' hopes to extend the caliphate to within 350 miles of Europe have dimmed. Still, the document trove makes clear that Islamic State's nation-building ambitions succeeded, however fleetingly, in Libya as they fell short with the group's other affiliates from Nigeria to Yemen, said Aymenn Jawad al-Tamimi, a researcher at the Middle East Forum, a U.S.-based think tank that focuses on radical groups.

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 10

Bogota - President Juan Manuel Santos has said he will donate almost $1m in Nobel peace prize money to the victims of Colombia's half-century conflict. Santos made the announcement Sunday during a visit with his family and top government officials to an impoverished town in western Colombia where dozens of people were killed while sheltering in a church during an intense battle between leftist rebels and far-right militias. He promised the residents of Bojayá that he would not give up on securing peace with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (Farc) despite voters' rejection of a deal with the guerrillas in a referendum a week ago. More than 96% of residents of Bojaya voted for the peace deal. "You symbolize the suffering of the victims of 52 years of war and are at the center of the solution to this conflict," a visibly moved Santos told the crowd. "The victims have taught me that the capacity to forgive can overcome hatred and rancor."

35. Colombia Revives Stalled Peace Talks With ELN Rebels

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 11

Bogota - Colombia's government and rebels from the National Liberation Army have agreed to revive a stalled peace effort, providing a boost to President Juan Manuel Santos as he tries to recover from voters' shocking rejection of a deal with the much-larger FARC guerrilla group. The rebels and government officials said Monday that formal peace talks would begin Oct. 27 in Ecuador. In a brief statement from Venezuela, whose socialist government is co-sponsoring the peace process, the guerrilla group known as the ELN committed itself to freeing two captives it has been holding for months before the talks begin. Additional unspecified humanitarian actions on both sides would also take place. In March, the ELN and government announced that they would start formal peace negotiations. But the effort never got off the ground after the government demanded the ELN renounce kidnapping and free a prominent politician who turned himself over to the rebels in order to secure his brother's release. Earlier Monday, the group handed over to the International Red Cross a rice farmer, Nelson Alarcon, it had held captive for months. It was the third person freed by the group in an area near Colombia's border with Venezuela in the past two weeks.

36. Report Finds Loose Laws on Data and Surveillance In Latin America

The Intercept, Cora Currier, 2016 10 10

Washington - The laws in many Latin American countries haven't kept pace with the increasing power of surveillance technology, creating the potential for serious abuses, according to a new report from a privacy watchdog. Despite recent revelations of widespread use of spyware capable of infiltrating phones and computers by many governments in the region-- including in some instances, against political opposition and journalists-- not a single Latin American country surveyed in the report has specific laws on the use of such invasive technology. Many countries, including Brazil, Colombia, Chile and Mexico, require companies to log detailed data on their customers and give law enforcement access to the information on demand. Colombia has a ban on encryption, and El Salvador requires communications providers to decrypt traffic at the government's demand. The report, written by researchers for the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation, looked at surveillance laws in 12 countries in Central and South America. It opens with a stark reminder of what is at stake: A history of the collaboration among military dictatorships in Argentina, Chile, Paraguay, Bolivia, Uruguay and Brazil in the 1970s and 80s known as "Operation Condor." Files discovered later documented torture, disappearances, imprisonment and executions, enabled through a regime of informants and surveillance. Many intelligence agencies in the region were formed under these military dictatorships, and even after transitioning to democratic rule, most Latin American countries maintained strong executive branch powers "without well-placed controls or public oversight mechanisms." Given the power vested in many presidents in the region, the report says, "intelligence agencies in Latin America have been powerful tools in presidential politics, specially used to spy on dissident groups, opposition politicians or independent journalists."

37. 11 Militants of JMB Killed in Three Raids in Bangladesh (Canada).

Hindustan Times, 2016 10 11

Dhaka - Bangladeshi security officials on Saturday killed 11 suspected militants of the banned Jamaat-ul-Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB) in three separate raids as the country reinforced its counter-terrorism efforts. Home minister Asaduzzaman Khan Kamal said the operations were carried out at Gazipur near the national capital, and in Tangail district. Acting on a tip-off, teams of the Rapid Action Battalion (RAB) and police's counter-terrorism unit took part in the raids. Kamal said the suspects were members of the outlawed JMB, blamed by the government for attacks across the country. Security officials recovered an AK-47, bullets, bomb-making materials and meat cleavers from a spot in Gazipur. "Akash", a new leader of the splinter group "Neo JMB" was among those killed in the raid at Patartek, Khan said. Officials said Akash became the leader of the Neo JMB after Tamim Chowdhury, a Bangladeshi-origin Canadian, was killed with two accomplices in a similar raid at Narayanganj district in August.

38. Allied navies conduct strike exercise against N.K. nuke facilities

Yonhap English News, 2016 10 11

Seoul - The navies of South Korea and the United States have conducted long-range strike exercises against North Korea's nuclear facilities during an ongoing joint drill as the communist regime escalates its saber-rattling, Seoul's military said Tuesday. In the six-day joint naval maneuvers that will run through Saturday, the allies have applied the concept of "Korea Massive Punishment & Retaliation" (KMPR) to improve striking capabilities of ship-to-ground missiles on top of the usual anti-ship and anti-air exercises, a defense ministry official told Yonhap News Agency. The KMPR operational concept is aimed at decimating parts of Pyongyang, and envisions launching pre-emptive bombing attacks on North Korean leader Kim Jong-un and the country's military leadership if signs of imminent use of nuclear weapons are detected, ministry officials said. "The 'Invincible Spirit' exercise has put a bigger focus on striking North Korea's key nuclear and missile facilities. The change comes after the North's fifth nuclear test last month," the official said.

Manila - The recent arrest of one of the leaders of the Abu Sayyaf group involved in the kidnapping of 21 European tourists in Pulau Sipadan, Sabah, in 2000 will be a key victory for the Philippine government, particularly in deterring future kidnappings. Abdul Latip Talanghati, who has a US$110,000 (RM440,000) reward on his head, was arrested along with his companion, Albashrie Talanghati, in St Barbara district of Zamboanga City. The Abu Sayyaf sub-leader, who has been hiding for 16 years, had evaded military operations in Basilan and Sulu. Found in their possession were a 450g high-explosive bomb, detonating cord and time fuse. The Abu Sayyaf started as a religious youth group in the early 1990s, but later transformed into a bandit movement involved in pirating, kidnapping and extortion. It is one of the most notorious terrorist groups in Southeast Asia, victimising citizens from Taiwan, Japan, Germany, Canada, the United States, Australia, Malaysia and Indonesia.

Seoul - Foreign and defense ministers of South Korea and the United States will mainly discuss pending security issues on the Korean Peninsula at a regular consultation meeting in Washington next week. In the "two-plus-two" meeting with their U.S. counterparts -- Secretary of State John Kerry and Defense Secretary Ashton Carter -- Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se and Defense Minister Han Min-koo plan to discuss a wide range of bilateral, regional and global issues, including North Korea's increasing nuclear and missile threats, the defense and foreign ministries said in a joint statement. "The ministers will ensure the two countries' ironclad alliance against provocations by the North and come up with a Joint Statement after the group meetings," the statement said. As North Korea has escalated its saber-rattling by conducting five nuclear detonations in the past decade and test-firing a series of ballistic missiles, the policymakers are expected to talk about stronger sanctions on the communist regime and an extended deterrence at the gathering slated for Oct. 19 (Washington time), it said. Washington's extended deterrence refers to the U.S.' stated commitment to mobilize all military assets, both nuclear and conventional, to defend its allies in crisis. At stake is how to flesh it out to make sure that it actually works in contingencies, security experts said.

45. Court in Crimea extends arrest of two Ukrainians on allegations of sabotage activities

Interfax, Staff report, 2016 10 11

Simferopol - Simferopol's Kyivsky District Court extended the arrest of Yevhen Panov and Andriy Zakhtei, whom Russian Federal Security Service accuses of preparing sabotage activities at strategically important facilities in Crimea, until December 10, 2016, a source in law enforcement structures told reporters on Oct. 10. "The court extended the period of custody for two months," the source said. The decision was made recently. The same court selected a measure of restriction in the form of two months' imprisonment for Panov and Zakhtei earlier, in mid-August. The Russian Federal Security Service (FSB) said in August that terrorist attacks plotted by Ukrainian intelligence had been averted in Crimea. It was reported that the Russian special services, with assistance from other defense agencies, had prevented several attempts by groups of saboteurs and terrorists to break into Crimea from Ukrainian territory in the early hours of August 7 and 8, during which a Russian serviceman and an FSB officer were killed.

47. Warming Relations in Person, Putin and Erdogan Revive Pipeline Deal

New York Times, Neil MacFarquhar, 2016 10 11

Moscow - Amid increasingly tense relations with the United States over Syria, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia took advantage of a routine meeting in Istanbul on Monday to advance the Kremlin's reconciliation with Turkey, including an agreement to revive a suspended natural-gas pipeline project. The new pipeline, known as the Turkish Stream, would run under the Black Sea to Turkey and then the Greek border, allowing Russian gas to reach Western markets without using Russia's existing export pipelines through Eastern Europe. The pipeline would make it much easier for Russia to cut off gas supplies to neighboring countries like Ukraine without disrupting sales to countries farther west like Italy or Austria. Russia has been trying for years to establish such an export route. Mr. Putin's appearance at an international energy conference was his first visit to Turkey since a crisis in relations between the countries after Turkey's downing of a Russian fighter jet along the border with Syria in November 2015, in which a Russian pilot was killed. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, nominally an ally of the United States in Syria, patched things up with a letter of apology and a trip to St. Petersburg in August. Anna V. Glazova, the head of the Asia and Middle East Center at the Russian Institute of Strategic Studies, noted that Mr. Putin could easily have sent a minister to the Istanbul summit meeting. "This means that he wanted to discuss regional problems with Erdogan face to face," Ms. Glazova said. "This becomes especially important in the context of Russia's current tensions with the U.S."

48. IRGC Aerospace Commander Stresses US, Israel's Direct Role in Saudi Airstrikes on Sana'a

Fars News Agency, 2016 10 11

Tehran - Commander of the Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) Aerospace Force Brigadier General Amir Ali Hajizadeh underlined that Washington and Tel Aviv are directly responsible for Saudi Arabia's recent massacre of over 700 Yemeni people in Sana'a. "Evidence shows that the crime has been conducted under the operational control of the US and Israel," General Hajizadeh said on Monday. He underlined that the continued presence of spy aircraft such as RQ4, MQ1 and MQ9 as well as presence of AWACS and fuel-supply airplanes and large number of fighter jets like F15, F16 and F22 with large-scale air logistic backup all indicate the US's involvement in direct operations against the oppressed Yemeni nation. General Hajizadeh said, "The war targets are identified, command-and-control planning which is quite different from Saudi Arabia's capacities as well as technical and operational capabilities all display that actions are directed and implemented by the US army."

49. IRGC busts terror group backed by US, Israel in western Iran

Press TV, 2016 10 11

Tehran - Iran's Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) forces have dismantled a terrorist group, backed by the United States and the Israeli regime, in the country's west near the border with Iraq, killing all of its members. Commander of IRGC's Ground Force Brigadier General Mohammad Pakpour said the terrorists were arrested in the border areas of the western Iranian province of Kermanshah on Tuesday as they were trying to infiltrate into the country to spread insecurity and conduct acts of terror and sabotage. He said the Iranian intelligence and security forces tracked down the 12-member terrorist group and killed all of them during heavy clashes, adding that three IRGC forces were wounded in the clashes. Pakpour stated that the Iranian security forces also confiscated a large amount of weapons and ammunition from the terrorists.

50. Jerusalem shooting attack serves Hamas goal of igniting West Bank

Jerusalem Post, Yaakov Lappin, 2016 10 11

Jerusalem - Despite the considerable efforts made by security forces in recent weeks to prevent a surge of Palestinian terrorism during the High Holy Days, an east Jerusalem gunman succeeded in obtaining an automatic firearm and going on a murderous shooting spree in the capital, gunning down a woman and a policeman before being killed in return fire. The terrorist took advantage of the ease of movement east Jerusalem residents, who hold Israeli residency, have, as well as the disturbing ease with which firearms can be bought in east Jerusalem. The latest jihadist rampage on Jerusalem's streets will serve Hamas's goal of igniting a wave of violence among Palestinians in the West Bank and east Jerusalem. The Aksa Mosque compound plays a key role in this recruitment and call to violence. Hamas seeks to start a new intifada and use it to burn Israel - and the Palestinian Authority, which it wishes to topple and replace.

51. Shin Bet foils Hamas suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem

Times of Israel, Judah Ari Gross, 2016 10 11

Jerusalem - An East Jerusalem man was indicted Tuesday for planning to carry out a suicide bombing on a bus in the capital, officials said. On September 9, the Shin Bet security service arrested alleged Hamas operative Muhammad Fuaz Ibrahim Julani, a resident of the Shuafat refugee camp, a few days before he planned to carry out his attack, the agency said. Over the past few months, Julani, 22, had been planning to carry out a terror attack on behalf of Hamas, the Shin Bet said. In September, he told an accomplice he planned to carry out the suicide bombing as "this is the way of God," according to the indictment. The Hamas terror group's operatives in the Gaza Strip had been in contact with Julani through the internet in order to plan the bombing and had also encouraged him to recruit other people to carry out attacks, according to the indictment filed against him Tuesday in the Jerusalem District Court.

52. Syrian extremist group pledges allegiance to Al Qaeda-linked militants

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 10 11

Beirut - An extremist group embroiled in infighting with one of the largest Syrian rebel groups yesterday pledged allegiance to Al Qaeda-linked militants in Syria. The move threatens to deepen divisions in the already disparate insurgency. The extremist group Jund Al Aqsa has been battling the powerful Ahrar Al Sham group in northern Syria for days, after Al Sham accused it of ambushing its leaders. The infighting killed several Ahrar Al Sham members and stalled an offensive led by Jund Al Aqsa against government troops in Hama province. Scores of Syrian rebel factions rallied behind Ahrar Al Sham, accusing Jund Al Aqsa of espousing extremist ideologies and seeking to dominate other rebel groups. Rebel factions accused Jund Al Aqsa of serving ISIL, who are at odds with all Syrian insurgents including the Al Qaeda-linked Jabhat Fatah Al Sham. Fatah Al Sham yesterday said Jund Al Aqsa would join its ranks "to stop the bloodshed".

53. 13 novembre : la police belge aurait raté 13 occasions d'arrêter les terroristes

La Tribune (France) avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 11

Bruxelles - Selon des extraits d'un rapport de la "police des polices" belge, publiés samedi dans un journal flamand, la police belge aurait raté pas moins de 13 occasions d'arrêter les tueurs des attentats du 13 novembre, à Paris. C'est l'histoire d'un spectaculaire ratage de la part de la police belge. Selon un rapport confidentiel émanant de la "police des polices" belge, dont des extraits ont été publiés ce samedi par le journal flamand DeTidj, les autorités auraient manqué pas moins de treize occasions de démasquer les auteurs des attentats de Paris du 13 novembre. Avant, donc, qu'ils passent à l'acte. Six occasions ratées par manque de personnel Selon le journal, qui cite le rapport, la police belge était en possession d'écoutes téléphoniques liant des personnes soupçonnées de terrorisme avec Salah Abdeslam, le seul membre encore vivant du commando, dès février 2015. Mais la police, en manque de personnel disponible, n'avait pas donné suite. Sur ces treize occasions manquées, six sont dues à des manques de personnel, souligne le rapport. La police belge avait également ignoré une requête des autorités espagnoles concernant le frère aîné de Salah Abdeslam, Brahim Abdeslam, après qu'il se fut rendu dans la péninsule ibérique en mars 2015. Huit mois après ce voyage, Brahim Abdeslam s'était fait exploser dans un café parisien le soir du massacre. La réponse belge n'est parvenue qu'après les attentats.

L'affaire Squarcini serait "une bombe à retardement", pas tant pour Nicolas Sarkozy que pour Patrick Calvar, l'actuel directeur de la DGSI, selon les informations de Marianne. Ce dernier, qui a déjà été entendu comme simple témoin dans la plus grande discrétion le 29 septembre, serait sous la "menace de poursuites pour complicité de compromission du secret défense", écrit l'hebdomadaire ce lundi matin.

55. Dordogne Vigilance sur la radicalisation

Sud Ouest, Hervé Chassain, 2016 10 11

Périgueux, France - Prévention Le phénomène touche des jeunes embrigadés par Daesh pour partir en Syrie ou en Irak La Dordogne n'est pas à l'écart du monde et le phénomène de radicalisation islamiste a été repéré chez 46 personnes (lire ci-dessous). Il touche beaucoup les jeunes via Internet, que des groupes comme Daesh cherchent à recruter comme chair à canon. De bonnes raisons pour la préfète Anne-Gaëlle Beaudoin-Clerc d'organiser, hier à Périgueux, un séminaire sur ce sujet. " La radicalisation est l'une des composantes du terrorisme et nous devons défendre nos valeurs de liberté, d'égalité, de fraternité et de laïcité. " Dans l'après-midi, près de 300 personnes des services de l'État, du département et du monde associatif ont suivi à l'école de police l'exposé d'un expert de l'agence Bouzar. Suleyman Valsan a présenté des éléments très concrets issus du suivi de 809 jeunes par l'agence créée par l'anthropologue Dounia Bouzar. Dans la soirée, une séance était réservée aux maires de Dordogne.

56. Essonne : Valls et Cazeneuve apportent leur soutien aux policiers agressés

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 10

Essonne, France - Le premier ministre et le ministre de l'Intérieur étaient lundi matin en visite dans les commissariats de l'Essonne pour soutenir les policiers après l'attaque aux cocktails Molotov de quatre d'entre eux samedi, à Viry-Châtillon. Le policier le plus gravement blessé se trouve maintenant dans un «état stationnaire». Deux jours après l'attaque de quatre policiers à Viry-Châtillon (Essonne), le premier ministre, Manuel Valls, et le ministre de l'Intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, se sont rendus lundi matin à Savigny-sur-Orge pour rencontrer des policiers dans les quatre commissariats du département touchés par l'événement (Viry-Châtillon, Athis-Mons, Juvisy et Evry). Un déplacement organisé pour «apporter un message de soutien», a déclaré le chef du gouvernement. Après un entretien à huis clos avec les policiers, Manuel Valls a fait savoir sa «détermination à combattre le crime, cette violence à l'état sauvage». «Ces individus ont voulu tuer vos collègues, je vous l'atteste», a-t-il lancé, avant d'évoquer des «individus qui agissent depuis longtemps malheureusement dans ces quartiers et dans ces villes». Ils seront «appréhendés» et jugés «sévèrement», a-t-il assuré, dénonçant des actes «d'une sauvagerie et d'une violence insupportables».

57. Faut-il limiter la loi sur le renseignement ?

La Provence, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 11

Paris - La loi sur le renseignement permet-elle de surveiller toutes les communications sans fil "sans cadre contraignant" au nom de la sécurité? C'est ce qu'affirment trois associations, qui attaquent aujourd'hui au Conseil constitutionnel un article de la loi votée en juin 2015. Cette loi avait été adoptée six mois après les attentats djihadistes contre l'hebdomadaire satirique Charlie Hebdo et contre le magasin Hyper Cacher. Ce n'est pas la première fois que la Quadrature du Net, le fournisseur d'accès French Data et la Fédération des fournisseurs d'accès à internet (FFDN) dénoncent des "définitions tellement vagues de la défense des intérêts nationaux que tout peut y correspondre". Le Conseil constitutionnel a déjà validé à deux reprises cet été des dispositions contestées, portant sur la surveillance des données de connexion des usagers d'internet (loi de programmation militaire) ainsi que la majeure partie de la loi renseignement, dont le volet sur les "interceptions administratives". Les "sages" de la rue Montpensier vont cette fois examiner une question prioritaire de constitutionnalité (QPC), transmise en juillet par le Conseil d'État, portant sur "la surveillance des transmissions par voie hertzienne". "Nous attaquons un texte qui était passé inaperçu parce qu'il s'agit d'un article qui existe depuis 25 ans mais qui a changé de numéro, devenant dans la loi renseignement l'article L.811-5 du code de la sécurité intérieure", a expliqué Félix Tréguer de la Quadrature du Net.

58. German spy chief says Syrian suspect targeted Berlin airports

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 11

Berlin - The head of Germany's domestic intelligence agency (BfV) said a Syrian suspect arrested on Monday was building a bomb and probably planned to attack one of the airports in Berlin. Hans-Georg Maassen told public broadcaster ARD that intelligence leads had suggested in early September that militant group Islamic State (IS) was planning an attack on Germany's transport infrastructure. Spies managed to track down and identify the suspect in the eastern state of Saxony last Thursday and started a round-the-clock observation, Maassen said. "We found out that he then bought hot glue in a discount shop on the following day. And then we immediately put all measures into place to start a raid because we assumed this can basically be the last missing chemical for him to build a bomb." Maassen told ARD that initial intelligence information pointed to an attack on trains in Germany but it later became clear that he planned to strike a Berlin airport. Jaber Albakr, 22, arrived in Germany in February last year during a migrant influx into the country and was granted temporary asylum four months later. Officials said he had not previously aroused suspicion.

59. L'Allemagne a échappé de peu à un attentat de grande ampleur

Le Soir (Belgique), Christophe Bourdoiseau, 2016 10 11

Berlin - Le jeune Syrien arrêté hier était en contact avec l'Etat islamique Une fois de plus, l'Allemagne a échappé à un attentat islamiste. Mais cette fois, il ne s'agissait pas d'une attaque à la hache comme cet été mais d'une action de grande envergure comme à Paris ou à Bruxelles. Après l'arrestation hier à Leipzig du Syrien de 22 ans en cavale depuis samedi, la police a confirmé que Jaber al-Bakr était en contact avec l'Etat islamique (EI) et qu'il préparait un attentat de grande ampleur. La police a retrouvé dans un appartement de Chemnitz, où il se trouvait la semaine dernière, 1,5 kg de TATP, une substance plus puissante que le TNT, prisée par les djihadistes de l'EI et ayant servi à confectionner les bombes de Paris et de Bruxelles. L'attentat était dans une phase de préparation avancée. « L'explosif devait probablement être introduit dans une ceinture d'explosif dissimulée dans une veste qui était pratiquement prête à l'emploi », a expliqué Jörg Michaelis, le chef de la police judiciaire de Saxe. « Ces préparatifs nous rappellent ceux qui ont conduit aux attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles » , a ajouté Thomas de Maizière, le ministre fédéral de l'Intérieur (CDU). Néanmoins, les cibles visées par le terroriste présumé ne sont toujours pas connues des enquêteurs. « Nous n'avons encore aucun élément », a précisé le parquet fédéral qui s'est saisi de l'enquête. Plusieurs médias allemands ont parlé d'un aéroport berlinois.

60. Pourquoi l'affaire Squarcini inquiète la DGSI (et le sommet de l'Etat)

Marianne2 (site web), Frédéric Ploquin, 2016 10 10

Paris - L'enquête que mènent deux juges d'instruction parisiens, Serge Tournaire et Aude Buresi, autour de Bernard Squarcini est une bombe à retardement. Notamment pour son successeur, Patrick Calvar.- Sipa « Pourquoi les fonctionnaires de la DGSI continuent-ils à vous appeler 'chef' » ? demande un enquêteur de la police des polices à Bernard Squarcini, placé en garde-à-vue pour 48 heures, le 28 septembre dernier. « Ils m'ont toujours appelé chef », réplique l'ancien espion préféré de Nicolas Sarkozy, désormais à la tête de la société privée de conseil en sécurité Kyrnos (le nom que les Grecs anciens donnaient à la Corse). L'enquête que mènent deux juges d'instruction parisiens, Serge Tournaire et Aude Buresi, autour de Bernard Squarcini est une bombe à retardement. Ce n'est pas tant l'ancien président de la République qu'elle fait trembler, mais les actuels dirigeants de la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI), fer de lance de la lutte contre le terrorisme. A commencer par son patron, Patrick Calvar, un homme qui a toujours pris soin de ne s'affilier à aucune écurie politique.

2. We Need A Human Rights-Based Approach To National Security

Huffington Post Canada, Alex Neve, 2016 10 19

Op-ed: Human rights or security? In Canada and around the world the debate rages on; but it is an utterly false debate. We must, finally and firmly, reject the assumption and assertion that more of one necessarily leads to less of the other. There is no security without human rights. A few years ago I was in West Africa with an Amnesty International research team looking into a range of human rights violations associated with counter-terrorism laws and operations in Mauritania. The sister of an army officer who had "disappeared" while in prison summed up perfectly the absurdity of the notion that there is any sort of rights and security trade-off. As she told me, "if they truly want us to feel more secure, they should start by stopping violating our rights." This week the federal government's review of Canada's national security framework has begun in earnest. The House of Commons' Public Safety Committee is holding hearings in five cities from coast to coast. Ministers Goodale and Wilson-Raybould are holding a roundtable in Ottawa with civil society groups. Members of Parliament are conducting town-halls in their ridings. And Canadians in all corners of the country are being encouraged to take part in online consultations. Amnesty International has been researching, reporting and campaigning on the grim human rights toll of unjust national security practices around the world, including in Canada, for decades. We have highlighted that without security, human rights remain precarious. First, say that we mean it. Canada should unapologetically and unequivocally recognize regard for human rights as a foundational pillar to our national security framework. It is not an afterthought. It is where security begins. Second, show that we mean it. It is time to embed effective human rights safeguards in our national security framework. That means explicit reference to national and international human rights provisions in laws such as the CSIS Act. It means incorporating binding obligations to prohibit discrimination, ban torture, ensure fair trials and protect privacy across the full range of Canada's national security laws. Intelligence sharing with foreign agencies can never be allowed to benefit from or contribute to torture in other lands. Terrorism-related offences in Canadian law must robustly protect protest and free expression rights. The new threat reduction powers given to CSIS cannot in any way involve human rights violations and no judge should ever be asked to condone or authorize the contrary. 3. A national security report card

Ottawa Citizen, Wesley Wark, 2016 10 19

Op-ed: The Liberal government, in its first year in power, has enjoyed the benefit of a highly advantageous environment for national security policy-making: a majority in Parliament; ineffective political opposition; no terrorist attacks; a public whose attention is largely elsewhere. The pressure has been off and the government has been able to pursue its agenda at a measured pace. There was one close call, when Aaron Driver, placed under a terrorism peace bond, came very close to slipping the attention of the authorities and conducting some kind of attack using home-made IEDs. A dramatic shootout in August in front of his residence in Strathroy, Ont., ended in his death and the foiling of a plot. There was some fast intelligence and law enforcement work in this outcome, but also a good deal of luck. But even the best of political environments comes with its own challenges. No pressure doesn't mean a government is off the national security hook. The Liberal government has some big election and mandate promises to live up to. Among the promises was a new role for Parliament in scrutinizing intelligence and security matters. The Liberals promised this when still the third party in Parliament and it became one of their main rejoinders to Harper-style national security policy-making. Once in office, the Liberals made an early misstep in appointing a chair to the promised committee well before Parliament had any sight of the legislation to establish such a thing. But the legislation, Bill C-22, to create a National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians, was eventually introduced and is now going through committee hearings, presumably to emerge as law by early 2017. Note: Wesley Wark is a Visiting Professor in the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs at the University of Ottawa. He recently gave invited testimony to the Commons Committee on Public Safety on the National Security Green Paper.

4. Blank passports found in theft ring bust

Winnipeg Free Press, Carol Sanders, 2016 10 19

Winnipeg - Black-market buyers could include human traffickers, terrorists A major investigation by Winnipeg police that recovered hundreds of thousands of dollars in stolen property has raised national security concerns after blank passports were among the items officers found. Tuesday, police announced Project Heavy Metal identified 20 suspects, including nine arrested in Manitoba, who are facing 140 charges related to a theft ring that operated across Western Canada. Calgary and Edmonton police, as well as the RCMP, helped with the investigation, which recovered more than $300,000 worth of goods stolen during break-ins and other thefts. Two RCMP uniforms and police equipment were recovered after a search warrant was executed at a Calgary home in September, Insp. Barry Kostchuk said. Vehicles, camper trailers, snow blowers, lawn-care equipment, new tires, tools, key-cutting machines and electronics were recovered. The most alarming items discovered may be the blank passports and birth certificates. Winnipeg police weren't ready to comment Tuesday about the blank identity documents -- how many were found or if they were taken from government offices or are fakes, such as bogus Canadian passports sold online for less than $200. The theft of genuine blank Canadian passports has opened doors in the past for criminals such as human traffickers and raises concerns about dangerous people being allowed into the country.

5. Businesses must buck surveillance: Snowden

National Post, Claire Brownell, 2016 10 19

Toronto - Resisting government mass surveillance isn't just the right thing to do - it's good for business, whistleblower Edward Snowden told a Toronto cybersecurity conference Tuesday. Speaking via video link to the annual Canadian industry event SecTor, Snowden brought up the recent revelation that Yahoo Inc. had agreed to scan customers' emails for U.S. intelligence. Shortly after, Verizon Communications Inc. asked for a US$1 billion discount on its US$4.8 billion agreement to buy the company, according to a report in the New York Post. "If you collaborate with the government in this regard, far beyond what the law requires, it can actually have a significant, substantial consequence for your valuation," Snowden said. "Yahoo, which is a very powerful, very rich organization, cooperated beyond what was legally required. And it damaged its brand." In 2013, the former government contractor leaked classified documents from the U.S. National Security Agency to journalists. The documents revealed the NSA and the so-called Five Eyes Intelligence Alliance, a group of countries including Canada and the U.S., cooperated to monitor global private communications. Snowden's revelations caused global controversy. Some consider him a traitor who put national security at risk, while others consider him a hero for disclosing a previously secret program and allowing the public to debate its merits. The Snowden leak also revealed government agencies implementing surveillance programs often demand businesses help them. Some businesses, such as Yahoo, agree, while others put up a fight.

6. Chinese billionaires take interest in Canadian clean technology

CBC News, Katie Simpson, 2016 10 19

Canadian clean technology companies could be the next major investment for China's business elite. But cyber-security experts and the opposition are warning that the keen interest from Chinese investors must be treated carefully. "For us at the moment, natural resources is not the top priority," said Wang Chaoyong, the chairman and CEO of ChinaEquity, one of the country's most successful independent venture capital firms. "We are more interested in investing in environment technology, clean tech [and] innovative sectors such as creative industries," Wang said in an interview with CBC News. The investment mogul is part of a delegation from the elite China Entrepreneur Club, which is touring Canada to get a closer look at potential investments. The group, which is often called China's club for billionaires, met with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Tuesday. "Canadian product, brand and innovative design are very popular in China, so we see the synergy between the Canadian product and the Chinese market," Wang said. As the federal government tries to strengthen ties with China, it is also downplaying concerns about investment and security. "There's a well-established Canadian process for dealing with these issues under the Investment Canada Act with all of the appropriate safeguards in place," said Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. "Canada's a country that welcomes foreign direct investment. Obviously, it needs to be a net benefit to Canada and all the security requirements need to be met. The procedure is there already in the law to deal with that," he added. The opposition is warning the government to move slowly and to vet foreign investors carefully, for all sectors. "We should ... do a little due diligence on the history of these individuals, how their billions were acquired, their relationships with state-owned industries in China," said Conservative foreign affairs critic Peter Kent. "Canada is open for business, and should be open for business. But I think we have to be very careful about who is doing the buying and how that purchase will look down the road in terms of the Canadian economy and Canadian security interests."

7. Les coups de fouet contre Raïf Badawi reprendraient sous peu en Arabie saoudite

La Presse canadienne, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 19

Ottawa - La Fondation Raïf-Badawi pour la liberté sonne l'alarme, affirmant que le blogueur saoudien, dont la femme et les enfants sont réfugiés au Québec, subira sous peu de nouveaux coups de fouet, cette fois à l'intérieur de la prison où il est détenu en Arabie saoudite. L'organisme se fie à la même source qui avait prévenu que les 50 premiers coups de fouet auraient lieu le 9 janvier 2015, en public, devant la mosquée de Djeddah. La flagellation a eu lieu ce jour-là, mais les autres séances ont été annulées, car l'état de santé de Raïf Badawi avait été jugé trop fragile. La directrice générale de la fondation, Évelyne Abitbol, estime que la source devrait être fiable puisqu'elle l'a été la dernière fois. Selon elle, si elle n'est pas fiable et que la flagellation n'a pas lieu, ce sera parfait. " Pendant plusieurs mois, bien sûr, les séances de flagellation étaient reportées pour des raisons de santé, et nous n'avions jamais eu d'information [selon laquelle] il aurait été flagellé à nouveau. Et, cette fois-ci, nous avons eu cette information-là. Est-ce qu'elle est valable ou pas ? Nous ne savons pas. " " Mais si jamais ça arrivait et qu'on n'en avait pas parlé, on s'en serait voulu ", a-t-elle expliqué en entrevue. La section québécoise d'Amnistie internationale dit essayer, de son côté, de vérifier de façon indépendante l'information au sujet de la flagellation. La porte-parole de l'organisation, Anne Sainte-Marie, a indiqué qu'une équipe était sur le terrain en Arabie saoudite et effectuait des vérifications. Raïf Badawi est emprisonné depuis juin 2012 pour ses écrits critiquant les dirigeants religieux de l'Arabie saoudite. Il a été condamné à 1000 coups de fouet et à une peine de 10 ans d'emprisonnement. La Fondation Raïf-Badawi pour la liberté demande au gouvernement saoudien que cesse ce traitement, qu'elle qualifie d'indigne et d'inhumain, et que sa citoyenneté saoudienne soit révoquée afin qu'il puisse retrouver sa femme, Ensaf Haidar, et leurs trois enfants, qui vivent à Sherbrooke, au Québec. Le 5 octobre, à Ottawa, Mme Haidar a demandé au premier ministre, Justin Trudeau, d'intervenir personnellement auprès des autorités saoudiennes pour que son mari soit libéré. Cependant, l'Arabie saoudite ne reconnaît pas le gouvernement du Canada comme un interlocuteur dans ce dossier, puisque M. Badawi n'est pas citoyen canadien.

8. Les Montréalais appelés à se prononcer sur C-51

Métro (Montréal), Jeff Yates, 2016 10 19

Montréal - La consultation publique du gouvernement fédéral sur la controversée Loi antiterroriste du Canada, anciennement connue sous le nom de projet de loi C-51, débarquera à Montréal demain soir. Lancée début septembre, cette série de consultations publiques ayant lieu partout au pays a pour but d'informer le gouvernement du premier ministre Justin Trudeau, alors qu'il s'appête à modifier ses politiques en matière de sécurité nationale. Au coeur du débat se trouve la Loi antiterroriste de l'administration de l'ancien premier ministre Stephen Harper, considérée par plusieurs critiques comme une loi omnibus dont certaines dispositions pourraient comporter une atteinte aux droits humains et à la vie privée. En 2015, le commissaire à la vie privée du Canada, Daniel Therrien, avait écrit que «le projet de loi C-51 permettrait aux services de renseignement de recueillir, d'analyser et, potentiellement, de conserver pour toujours l'information personnelle de tous les Canadiens». Il avait ajouté que le projet de loi «allait trop loin», selon lui. Lors des élections de 2015, M. Trudeau avait promis d'abroger «les dispositions problématiques» de la loi. Il s'était notamment engagé à mettre en place des mesures plus efficaces de surveillance des services de renseignement canadiens. Selon David Christopher, de l'organisme Open Media, qui milite pour le respect de la vie privée sur le web, la première consultation à Vancouver lundi a attiré plusieurs participants, et la vaste majorité d'entre eux ont utilisé leur temps de parole pour montrer aux élus leurs inquiétudes quant à la Loi antiterroriste

9. Liberals under fire for clampdown on Iraq mission details

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 10 19

Ottawa - The Liberal government is under fire for a lack of transparency around Canada's mission in Iraq, which entered a critical stage this week with the attack on Mosul. Conservative defence critic James Bezan honed in on the issue during a news conference on Parliament Hill on Tuesday, saying that the military held more briefings and provided more information while the Tories were in power. National Defence provided 12 technical briefings on what Canadian troops were doing in the fight against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant during the first year of the mission, which coincided with the Conservative government's last year in office. Those updates included specific details, such as the number of troops on the ground in northern Iraq as well as how many times those soldiers had called in airstrikes and engaged in firefights with ISIL forces. The military also at one point provided an unprecedented walk-through on a so-called friendly fire incident involving Kurdish peshmerga fighters in March 2015 that killed Sgt. Andrew Doiron and injured three other Canadian soldiers. Yet briefings largely dried up during the mission's second year, which is when the Liberals were in office. The most recent, held two weeks ago, was only the third since the Liberals were elected last October on a promise of greater transparency.

10. Screening at Canadian airports should be faster, smarter, safer

Montreal Gazette, Colin Kenny, 2016 10 19

Op-ed: If you've flown anywhere in Canada recently, you will have noticed that wait times are getting worse. Since 2013, the length of screening times has deteriorated so badly that the Canadian Airport Council referred to security screening services as a being in a state of crisis. Not only are we waiting more, we are paying more. And getting less service. According to the World Economic Forum, Canadians pay some of the highest air travel prices in the world. One part is a fee for the so-called Air Traveller's Security Charge (ATSC). The Air Traveller's Security Charge was introduced after 9/11 by the Chrétien government to fund air transport security and the newly minted Canadian Air Transport Security Authority. Instead of improving security, it has turned into a major cash grab by the Finance Department. Since 2011, the budget of CATSA has declined even though ATSC revenue has steadily increased. From 2010 to 2013, $260 million was siphoned away from airport screening into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. While it's annoying to wait in long lines, more important is the security risk these lines pose. A new wave of terrorist attacks on airports in Moscow, Brussels and Istanbul have all occurred between the sidewalk and the security inspection line. Note: Senator Colin Kenny is former chair of the Senate Committee on National Security and Defence.

11. Snowden says Trudeau afraid to kill anti-terrorism bill

It World Canada, Howard Solomon, 2016 10 19

Toronto - Whistleblower. Hero. Traitor. Patriot. These words and more have been used to describe former cybersecurity contractor Edward Snowden, who in 2013 copied and distributed thousand of documents to reporters and whose stories of Western intelligence agencies -- including Canada's Communications Security Establishment (CSEC) -- shook the world. This morning Snowden told the the annual SecTor cyber security conference in Toronto that Prime Minister Justin Trudeau want to amend the controversial Bill C-51 anti-terrorism law and not repeal it because he "is afraid of being attacked for being soft on terrorism." Speaking by video from Russia, where he fled to avoid prosecution by U.S. authorities, Snowden said the legislation, needs three fixes: First, a judicial body should have oversight over federal intelligence agencies that has the power to prosecute authorities that have broken the law. Second, because intelligence agencies are trading personal information of citizens "like baseball cards" citizens should be told if the data sharing hasn't led to an arrest for criminal activity. And finally, what Snowden called the criminalization of speech through vague definitions of terrorism should be taken out of C -51. A lot of what police call terrorism is the activity of what he called "common criminals" or those who are trying to make a political point but don't constitute a "super criminal threat." He also said that governments are "lazy" for demanding software vendors put backdoors into their systems that can be accessed by law enforcement or intelligence agencies with a warrant. Any backdoor can also be access by a government like China, he said. Since his revelations legislators and intelligence agencies in a number of Western countries -- including Canada have been sensitive to explain what kind of personal information they've been collecting and why, although a number insist they have lawful authority and the need to confront terrorists. While the new Liberal government has issued a consulting paper on new legislation to change the controversial Bill C-51, critics complain the discussion paper frames the debate in terms that give little doubt the government is leaning towards the police. For example, it repeats Canadian police claims that "without specific legislation designed to permit access, law enforcement and national security agencies have had difficulty getting timely and effective access to BSI (basic subscriber information)" since the Supreme Court said they need a search warrant. There are also complaints the proposed intelligence oversight mechanism isn't independent or very powerful.

12. The simple truth is we are at war

National Post, Michael Den Tandt, 2016 10 19

Column: As the pivotal battle of the war with the Islamic State group begins, Canada is deeply implicated, with about 600 soldiers deployed in four countries, more than a quarter of those in ground combat. You wouldn't know it though, unless you dug around. There is no stream of independent dispatches from embedded reporters, as was the rule during the 2002-14 Afghan campaign, because there is no embed program. And the Defence Department has been exceptionally stingy with information. Operational security is a handy excuse. It doesn't justify the level of secrecy. There will be quibbling, as is customary whenever Canada fields soldiers carrying loaded firearms, about whether the troops advising and assisting Kurdish forces in northern Iraq are in combat. It may be in the Liberal government's political interest to assert that, although Canadians have exchanged fire with the enemy - we don't know how often, that's a secret - these have been defensive actions only. The truth is much simpler, as it has been since the Conservative government launched the mission in 2014: Canada is at war. That's what it means to provide intelligence, targeting for airstrikes, refuelling, aerial surveillance and leadership on the ground, at the front.

13. Toronto man detained after flying drone in Cuban square

Toronto Star, Alicja Siekierska, 2016 10 19

Toronto - As Chris Hughes lay in the dark two-by-two-metre cell, with no electricity, a small hole in the wall for a window and just a hole in the ground for a toilet, he wondered if his wife Grace and three young children knew he was still alive. "Nobody knew I was there," he said. "I had disappeared. I thought, my family must think I'm dead." On Sept. 30, a few days before the Canadian man found himself in a Cuban detention centre, Hughes had flown a drone above the Plaza de la Revolucion in Havana. A photographer with a media business in Toronto, Hughes said he had been travelling through the Americas, previously going to Panama and Colombia. He had brought a drone with him, which he used to shoot photos and videos. He said he did not have any issues using it the drone in other countries, and no problems bringing it in through Cuban customs on Sept. 28. But two days later, the drone proved to be a significant problem. Hughes said he and a Cuban friend and tour guide were questioned by police about the drone at the Plaza de la Revolucion, a historic square home to the Cuban administration. The pair was taken to a police station, where Hughes said they were interrogated for around 12 hours. He said he was brought to his rental apartment to pick up his clothes, and then brought to a detention centre, where he would remain for nearly two weeks -- but never charged. Hughes said he was held at what appeared to be an immigration detention centre and was again interviewed by Cuban authorities. Based on the questions, he believes Cuban authorities thought he was a spy.

14. Why it's worth it for Canada to talk to the Russian bear

Globe and Mail, Michael Byers, 2016 10 19

Op-ed: I once met a bear while hiking in the Rocky Mountains. A big bear, who squinted at me and sniffed the air. When I backed away, he followed me, muscles rippling beneath a grizzled hump. With no trees to climb, I began to talk. "Good morning, Mr. Bear," I said, and asked about his health. I commented on the weather, told him of my plans and, after a minute of idle chatter, he shrugged and wandered off the path. I was reminded of this encounter when, last month, Foreign Minister Stéphane Dion announced a shift in foreign policy. From now on, Canada will seek to actively co-operate with Russia in the Arctic. Mr. Dion (<http://news.gc.ca/web/article-en.do?nid=1131189>) justified the change on the basis that, together, Canada and Russia control 75 per cent of the Arctic: "Co-operation with Russia on the full range of Arctic issues is simply in our best interests. ... The North is not a place for military confrontation or buildup." The new policy will likely achieve its stated goal, because the Arctic is a remote, difficult, dangerous and expensive place in which to operate. Russia, battered by low oil prices and sanctions, knows that it cannot afford to militarize the region. 15. America's election is giving the world some serious anxiety

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 10 19

Column - Making predictions three weeks before the U.S. election is risky, but the likeliest bet right now is that the center will hold in American politics and Hillary Clinton will be elected president. That's important for lots of reasons, the biggest of which is that it could begin to stabilize a very unsettled world. To many analysts, Vladimir Putin's Russia has seemed on the march while the United States and its allies are in retreat. The danger of U.S.-Russian conflict was described by Rolf Mowatt-Larssen, a former senior CIA officer, in a recent article. "As a life-long observer of Russia, I have never been as concerned as I am now on the state of Russian-American relations," he wrote. "A dangerous zero sum game pattern has emerged as US and Russia make moves and countermoves that mimic practice during the Cold War." Aggressive Russian actions in Ukraine, Syria and cyberspace have led some analysts to review Cold War texts such as Herman Kahn's classic "On Escalation," which describes a psychology of "escalation dominance" where adversaries take action in the expectation that they will prevail. Some experts argue that Russia is tempted by the perception that the United States has lost its superiority in conventional weapons and its will to use them. But there's more stability in the current U.S.-Russian confrontations than some might think. First, diplomatic conversation between the two countries is nearly continuous. It's easy to make fun of Secretary of State John F. Kerry's tireless (and seemingly fruitless) negotiations with his Russian counterpart, Sergei Lavrov. But these meetings reduce the possibility of accidental conflict. So does the almost daily contact between the U.S. and Russian militaries to "deconflict" potential confrontations over Syria.

CNN.com, Nicole Gaouette, 2016 10 19

Washington - A former head of the CIA said Tuesday that Russian hacking of US political groups is intended to "mess with our heads" and shake confidence in the American electoral system -- rather than influence the outcome on Election Day. Retired Gen. Michael Hayden said that he doesn't believe Russian President Vladimir Putin is trying to sway the election in favor of Republican nominee Donald Trump, but using the hacked information to disrupt the electoral process. "This is too much of a carom shot for Putin to think he knows where that ball's going to end," Hayden said, speaking at the Heritage Foundation in Washington. "I think they're doing this to mess with our heads, to erode confidence in our political process."

17. Ex-F.B.I. Official Acknowledges Role in a New Clinton Email Controversy

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, Steven Lee Myers, 2016 10 19

Washington - A former F.B.I. official at the center of the latest controversy over Hillary Clinton's private emails acknowledged on Tuesday that an offer to swap favors with a State Department counterpart on an email classification issue had originated with him -- until he realized the deal involved Mrs. Clinton and the 2012 attack in Benghazi, Libya. "When I found that out, all bets were off; it wasn't even negotiable," the former F.B.I. official, Brian McCauley, said in a telephone interview. Republicans have seized on the episode to accuse the State Department of trying to protect Mrs. Clinton, but Mr. McCauley's account could undercut those attempts because he said he, not the State Department, had suggested the "quid pro quo." Mr. McCauley recounted in the interview that Patrick F. Kennedy, a senior State Department official, called him in spring 2015 looking for help in getting the F.B.I. to agree not to classify the disputed email. Mr. McCauley said he had agreed to try to help him if Mr. Kennedy would help him get the State Department to restore two spots that the F.B.I. had lost recently in the Baghdad embassy. "I'm the one that threw that out there," Mr. McCauley said of the offer. He said that he was concerned the two vacant posts posed a security risk at the embassy, and that the offer was typical of how federal agencies "help each other and work with each other."

18. Fear of an imminent terrorist attack runs deep around the world

Washington Post, Carol Morello, 2016 10 19

Washington - Fear of an imminent terrorist attack is one of the top concerns of people across the globe, with most expecting extremist groups will acquire weapons of mass destruction, according to a new poll conducted in eight countries. The survey, commissioned by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), showed that many people think their governments are not doing enough to combat violent extremism. And a majority in every country polled, including the United States, overwhelmingly approved all 21 options presented to them -- among them, requiring identification cards for citizens and visitors; rigorous screening of immigrants; bans on incendiary religious speech; and monitoring of phone calls, emails and social media. Although most respondents consider the problem of violent extremism "solvable," the poll underscored the challenges governments face as they confront radicalism at home and abroad. "It shows there is so much fear and anxiety about terrorism and the reach of terrorism groups, people are willing to try just about anything, even give up constitutional protections on free speech, and identity cards, though it's not even clear what that would do," said Shannon Green, head of the CSIS Commission on Countering Violent Extremism. The survey involved about 1,000 respondents in each of eight countries -- the United States, France, Britain, Turkey, Egypt, China, India and Indonesia. An effort was made to balance the responses demographically by age and gender, although in Egypt, four men answered for every woman. It was conducted online, so in some countries the respondents tended to be affluent, urban and better educated. In virtually every country, at least 3 in 4 said they expect a terrorist attack to occur within the next year. China was the outlier, with barely half thinking an imminent attack is likely. The French were the most concerned, with 94 percent calling it very or somewhat likely. In the United States, 89 percent said it was probably coming.

19. Tehran Hands Two Iranian-Americans 10-Year Prison Sentences (Canada)

Wall Street Journal, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 19

Tehran - Iran handed down 10-year sentences to an Iranian-American businessman and his father on allegations they cooperated with what it called a hostile U.S. government, the Iranian judiciary's official news agency said. The sentences for petroleum executive Siamak Namazi, 45, and his 80-year-old father Baquer, a former Unicef official and governor of the western Iranian province of Khuzestan, are the latest sign of a pushback by Iran's hard-line establishment against warming relations between Iran and longtime enemies in the West. In announcing their sentences on Tuesday, the judiciary's Mizan news agency didn't elaborate on the nature of the Namazis' alleged cooperation with the U.S. Babak Namazi, Siamak's brother, called the verdict "beyond comprehension," and said each man had been afforded just one several-hour court session. He decried recent articles in Iranian media depicting them as infiltrators, and voiced concern about Baquer Namazi's heart condition and other ailments. "At his age and in his condition it is highly doubtful that my father will survive any time in prison let alone a 10-year unjust prison sentence," he said. Homa Hoodfar, an Iranian-Canadian professor, was arrested in June and released in September on humanitarian grounds as her health declined. Ms. Hoodfar returned to Canada via Oman.

20. Trump supporters are talking about civil war. Could a loss provide the spark?

Washington Post, Dana Milbank, 2016 10 19

Column from Colorado Springs - We are three weeks from the election, and very close to the edge. Retiree Gerald Miller, a volunteer at Donald Trump's rally here, is confident his man will win on Nov. 8 -- unless there's foul play. Miller, wearing an NRA pin and a tea party cap over his long hair, shares Trump's concern that the election may be "rigged" by the Clinton campaign. "It is enough to skew the election. They can swing it either way," he said, particularly because Hillary Clinton may have "the FBI working for her" in committing the fraud. So what happens if Clinton is declared the winner? "Donald Trump is going to holler fraud if he doesn't win," figured Miller, who is white and says he has PTSD from "racial violence" he suffered in the military. "I think we're on the verge of a civil war, a racial war. This could be the spark that sets it off." I fear Miller may be right. I spent a couple of hours before the rally in this indoor show ring talking to many Trump supporters and found them in states of denial and fury. I didn't find one who expects Trump to lose. To varying degrees, most agreed with Trump that the election process is rigged. And some predicted ominous things if Trump loses -- if not violence, a mass rejection of the legitimacy of the democratic process.

21. U.S. expects Islamic State to wield chemical weapons in Mosul fight

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 19

Washington - The United States expects Islamic State to use crude chemical weapons as it tries to repel an Iraqi-led offensive on the city of Mosul, U.S. officials say, although adding that the group's technical ability to develop such weapons is highly limited. U.S. forces have begun to regularly collect shell fragments to test for possible chemical agents, given Islamic State's use of mustard agent in the months before Monday's launch of the Mosul offensive, one official said. In a previously undisclosed incident, U.S. forces confirmed the presence of a sulfur mustard agent on Islamic State munition fragments on Oct. 5, a second official said. The Islamic State had targeted local forces, not U.S. or coalition troops. "Given ISIL's reprehensible behavior and flagrant disregard for international standards and norms, this event is not surprising," the second official told Reuters, speaking on condition of anonymity, and using an acronym for Islamic State. U.S. officials do not believe Islamic State has been successful so far at developing chemical weapons with particularly lethal effects, meaning that conventional weapons are still the most dangerous threat for advancing Iraqi and Kurdish forces - and any foreign advisers who get close enough.

23. Keeping Britain safe: how GCHQ's new cyber security agency will protect us from hackers

Wired (UK), Matthew Reynolds, 2016 10 18

London - The Doughnut - GCHQ's vast, Cheltenham-based nerve centre - is a building straight from the pages of a spy novel. Its imposing circular walls are surrounded by fences topped with razor wire and multiple vehicle checkpoints. Visitors are seldom allowed inside the building which, Edward Snowden's NSA leaks, is the centre of government mass surveillance in the UK. The intelligence agency's latest spin-off, the National Cyber Security Centre, couldn't look more different. Occupying two floors of a commercial office block in Victoria, London, the NCSC is shedding its parent agency's secretive persona in favour of a more collaborative approach. There's even going to be a Shake Shack on the ground floor. "NCSC as an organisation is going to be open by default," says Ian Levy, the NCSC's technical director. The fledgling agency only opened its doors on October 3, but it's already started its task of keeping the public and the UK's critical national infrastructure safe from cyberattacks launched by states, organised crime gangs and lone-wolf hackers. For Levy, partnerships with the UK's cyber security community will be key to keeping the country safe online. To this end, 20 per cent of the new building has already been set aside for collaborative working. "We don't know what that means yet, but we know that you won't have to have a top secret security clearance to sit there," he says. "You coming to see me in the NCSC will be about as much of a ballache as me coming to see you."

24. Labour peers under fire for backing expansion of surveillance powers

The Guardian (London), Alan Travis, 2016 10 19

London - Privacy campaigners have expressed anger over a vote by 64 Labour peers to back an expansion of state surveillance powers, within hours of a ruling by top judges that the spying agencies unlawfully scooped up personal confidential information on a massive scale for more than a decade. The Labour peers voted with the government to ensure that major new powers are handed to the security services to get access to records tracking every citizen's web use for the past 12 months. The Liberal Democrat attempt to delete the powers to order the collection and storage of the new internet connection records from the investigatory powers bill in the House of Lords was voted down by 75 to 292. It was notable that neither the former Labour home secretary Lord Blunkett nor the new shadow attorney general, and former Liberty director, Lady Chakrabarti, took part in the vote. The 64 Labour peers who voted with the government included frontbench spokespersons, Lady Hayter and Lord Rosser and the party's chief whip, Lord Bassam. The vote came just hours after the ruling by the investigatory powers tribunal, the only court to hear complaints against MI5, MI6 and GCHQ, that the security services had until 2015 secretly and illegally collected huge volumes of confidential data of millions of British citizens without adequate or safeguards.

25. UK's Prevent counter-radicalisation policy 'badly flawed'

The Guardian (London), Ian Cobain, 2016 10 19

London - The British government's key counter-radicalisation policy is badly flawed, potentially counterproductive and risks trampling on the basic rights of young Muslims, a new study has concluded. Following a nine-month examination of the programme known as Prevent, the Open Society Justice Initiative has recommended a major government rethink, particularly on its use in the education and health systems. The US-based NGO studied 17 cases in which individuals had apparently fallen foul of the Prevent programme, or had been referred to a sister programme, called Channel, both of which are intended to prevent individuals from being drawn into terrorism. They included instances in which information was apparently gathered from Muslim primary school children without their parents' consent; Prevent being used to bypass disciplinary processes during the attempted dismissal of a school dinner lady; a 17-year-old referred to the police by his college authorities because he had become more religious; and the cancellation of university conferences on Islamophobia. It is the second time in three months that Prevent has faced criticisms following a major study. In July, another NGO, Rights Watch UK, concluded that the programme stifles free speech.

26. Australian terrorist hands in his notice

The Australian, Mark Schliebs, 2016 10 19

Sydney - The highest-ranking terrorist Australia has produced is now a jihadi without a group, "resigning" to "pursue a number of projects independently". In a corporate-sounding statement released on his official Twitter and Facebook accounts, it is claimed former Sydney man Mostafa Mahamed, better known as Abu Sulayman, resigned from the al-Qa'ida-backed Syrian group Jabhat Fateh al-Sham this month. The "resignation" follows his group claiming to have severed ties to al-Qa'ida in July, and being heavily targeted by Russian and Syrian bombardments in the ravaged city of Aleppo. Mahamed, who al-Qa'ida once sent to negotiate a truce with Islamic State head Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, is also on a US kill list. He resigns at a time jihadist rival Islamic State is suffering big battleground defeats in northern Syria, and Iraqi and Kurdish forces push to retake Mosul. Despite being declared a "specially designated global terrorist" by the US State Department, Mahamed claims to have focused on sharia law and education -- of which he holds a masters -- during his three years in Syria. "On October 1st, 2016, and after much consideration, I officially resigned from Jabhat Fateh al-Sham," the statement released yesterday reads.

27. Fight for Mosul 'will be terrible'

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 10 19

Sydney - The fight to recapture the Iraqi city of Mosul will be "a terrible battle", in which Islamic State is likely to use civilians trapped there as human shields, Malcolm Turnbull has told parliament. After speaking by telephone with his Iraqi counterpart, Haider Al-Abadi, the Prime Minister said taking back Mosul and destroying the Islamic State "caliphate" was a military imperative but it would not be the end of the conflict. Mr Turnbull said Australia would give an additional $10 million to support Mosul's estimated one million civilians as they were freed. That is on top of $60m in such aid provided since 2014 and it would include emergency food, medical assistance, temporary shelter and support to women and girls for reproductive health. Mr Turnbull said defeating Daesh, as Islamic State is known in the Middle East, was critical for Iraq, for the region and for Australia. "Daesh is losing on the battlefield," he said. "Its territory is shrinking, its resources are deteriorating, its numbers are substantially reduced." The terror group's myth of invincibility, part of its recruiting platform, had been shattered but there was more to be done.

Canberra - As the battle for Islamic State's last-remaining stronghold in Iraq heats up, Australia and Indonesia are jointly grappling with the potential consequences of foreign fighters returning from Mosul. Foreign Minister Julie Bishop will discuss counter-terrorism co-operation with her Indonesian counterpart in Bali next week. "It's exceedingly important at present because with the Mosul offensive in Iraq it is likely that foreign terrorist fighters from our region will seek to escape Iraq and come back to Indonesia and Australia," she told reporters in Canberra on Wednesday. Australia is part of a broader coalition supporting Iraqi security forces to reclaim their second largest city which fell to IS in 2014. According to Australia's domestic spy agency there 190 people here actively supporting groups such as IS through recruiting and fundraising efforts. An estimated 110 Australians are still fighting with terrorist groups in Syria and Iraq. Indonesian authorities estimate more than 500 nationals have joined IS in the Middle East. 29. Kids of Aussies exposed to extremism: ASIO

Australian Associated Press, Roje Adaimy, 2016 10 19

Canberra - Up to 70 children of Australians have been exposed to extremist groups in the battlefields of Syria or Iraq, the country's security chief has revealed. Duncan Lewis, director-general of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation, said these children either travelled to the conflict zones with their Australian parents or were born there. He told a Senate committee late on Tuesday night that ASIO is investigating around 190 people in Australia who are actively supporting groups like IS through recruiting, fundraising or wanting to join themselves. That includes about 40 Australians who have returned from Syria or Iraq. "The long-term impact of the returnees will be a security issue for this country's intelligence and law enforcement agencies for many years to come," he said. Mr Lewis confirmed up to 68 Australians are believed to have been killed in the conflicts - 11 of them since May. Around 110 people are still fighting or engaged with terrorist groups in Syria and Iraq. "As ISIL's territory continues to contract, it's expected that many of those Australians who are supporting ISIL in Syria and Iraq will be killed or captured," he said, using another acronym for Islamic State. Mr Lewis warned that action will be taken against anyone who returns to Australia after committing a terrorist attack for the sake of national security. To date, ASIO has recommended the cancellation or refusal of over 190 passports of Australians linked to extremist groups.

30. Radical right-wing groups a threat: ASIO

Australian Associated Press, Staff reporter, 2016 10 19

Melbourne - Reclaim Australia says it has never condoned violence but national intelligence bosses say radical anti-Islamic groups are a growing threat to Australia's security. ASIO director-general Duncan Lewis said Reclaim Australia, in particular, was of interest to intelligence agencies. Authorities charged a member of the right-wing group under federal terror laws for the first time in August for allegedly collecting or making documents to prepare for terrorist acts. Mr Lewis said Reclaim Australia has "offered violence" in the past and expects they will continue to when they confront pro-Islamic groups. "To the extent that there is a possibility of violence, or there is indeed violence being offered, that is of interest to us. That is business for ASIO," he told a Senate committee late on Tuesday night. "It is a real problem and it is something that we're very, very acutely aware of and I have people working that particular issue." But Reclaim Australia said it does not condone violence. "Reclaim has never condoned violence and we never will. Reclaim has worked closely with police at past events to ensure public safety," a statement provided to AAP said. Asked by Greens Senator Nick McKim whether the threat from such groups was growing, Mr Lewis said it had - primarily over the last 18 months.

33. Algerian Extremist Captures Two Italians, Canadian in Southern Libya

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 10 19

Algeria - Two Italians and a Canadian have been kidnapped near the Libyan-Algerian border by an Algerian extremist, according to resources. The resources added that head of tribes in the southern region on the Libyan- Algerian border have been conducting negotiations with the kidnapper so that they can release the Italians and the Canadian safe and sound. The Italian Il Giornale newspaper disclosed Monday that the two abducted Italian nationals in Libya's Ghat are held by an Algerian extremist, Abdullah Balkehil. Belkehil asked for 4 million euros as a ransom to release the two technicians who work for the Libyan branch of Italian firm Contratti internazionali Costruzioni SpA managing maintenance in Libya. The Italian newspaper confirmed that according to Algerian intelligence, the two Italians are still in southern Libya on the borders with Algeria along with the Canadian national, who was kidnapped with them as well.

34. Chibok leader: 100-plus girls unwilling to leave Boko Haram

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 18

Abuja - Nigeria's government is negotiating the release of another 83 of the Chibok schoolgirls taken in a mass abduction two-and-a-half years ago, but more than 100 others appear unwilling to leave their Boko Haram Islamic extremist captors, a community leader said Tuesday. The unwilling girls may have been radicalized by Boko Haram or are ashamed to return home because they were forced to marry extremists and have babies, chairman Pogu Bitrus of the Chibok Development Association told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. Bitrus said the 21 Chibok girls freed last week in the first negotiated release between Nigeria's government and Boko Haram should be educated abroad, because they will probably face stigma in Nigeria. The girls and their parents were reunited Sunday and are expected to meet with Nigeria's President Muhammadu Buhari on Tuesday or Wednesday, Bitrus said. Buhari flew to Germany on an official visit the day of the girls' release. Buhari said Monday that his government is prepared to talk with Boko Haram as long as the extremists agree to involve organizations like the International Committee of the Red Cross, which was an intermediary in last week's release.

35. Did Nigeria Trade Jihadis for the Missing Chibok Girls?

The Daily Beast, Philip Obaji Jr, 2016 10 19

Lagos - For two and a half years, their parents, their fellow citizens and people around the world have been demanding, pleading, begging the terrorists of Boko Haram to "bring back our girls." Indeed, soon after more than 200 young women were kidnapped in the northeastern Nigerian town of Chibok in April 2014, the campaign to win their freedom went viral. Even the first lady of the United States, Michelle Obama, held up the famous hashtag on Twitter: #BringBackOurGirls. But it is only now, after long negotiations--indeed, what some officials are calling "confidence building"- between Nigeria's government and a faction of the terror organization, that we have seen a few of the victims released, and of those 21 girls, as many as 18 reportedly are now mothers. Various media are reporting that the released girls were exchanged for four Boko Haram prisoners in the northeastern town of Banki, close to the border with Cameroon. Nigeria's information minister, Lai Mohammed, denied any such trade was made. "This is not a swap, it is a release [of the hostage women], the product of painstaking negotiations and trust on both sides," Mohammed said. "As soon as the necessary confidence was built on both sides, the parties agreed on the date and the location of the release of the 21 girls."

36. L'établissement abrite des "terroristes" Niger : attaque repoussée d'une prison

Liberté (Algérie), Journaliste maison, 2016 10 18

Niamey - Une attaque visant la prison de Koutoukalé, à 50 km au nord-ouest de Niamey, où sont détenus des "terroristes" a été repoussée, a assuré hier le ministre nigérien de l'Intérieur, Mohamed Bazoum, sur les réseaux sociaux. La prison civile de Koutoukalé a été attaquée à 4h ce matin par des hommes armés. "Mais l'ennemi a été repoussé laissant derrière lui des morts portant des ceintures explosives", selon le ministre. "Des terroristes lourdement armés ont encore attaqué cette prison de haute sécurité. Ils n'ont pas pu s'approcher de la prison en raison de la fusillade qui a éclaté avec les militaires qui la gardent", a indiqué une source sécuritaire. La prison de haute sécurité de Koutoukalé est considérée comme la plus sûre du pays. C'est là que les autorités gardent les détenus les plus dangereux et notamment les éléments des groupes terroristes activant dans la région, notamment Boko Haram. Le 30 octobre 2014, un groupe armé avait attaqué la prison de Ouallam, à 100 km au nord de Niamey, et libéré plusieurs détenus. En juin 2013, la prison civile de Niamey avait été attaquée par un "commando armé", tuant au moins deux gardes pénitentiaires et blessant trois autres.

37. Niger : où en est l'enquête concernant l'attaque contre le camp de réfugiés de Tazalit ?
Jeune Afrique, Mathieu Olivier, 2016 10 18

Tazalit, Niger - L'enquête progresse après l'attaque qui a fait 22 morts - des gendarmes, des militaires et des gardes - dans le camp de Tazalit le 6 octobre dernier en début d'après-midi. Les autorités pointent du doigt des éléments maliens mais aussi des complicités du côté des réfugiés. Les dernières informations recueillies suggèrent que les éléments ayant pris d'assaut le camp le 6 octobre dernier appartiendraient à des communautés proches des groupes armés de la région de Kidal, notamment la Gatia, selon une source locale. La quarantaine d'assaillants serait partie d'une base située à Ilamawan, à 60 kilomètres à l'ouest de la ville de Midal, dans la région de Tahoua, au Niger. Selon un survivant, les assaillants avaient également des complices parmi les réfugiés, tous originaires des environs de Menaka, au Mali. Une figure du camp, un certain Aghali Ringo, fait d'ailleurs partie des suspects, selon une source sécuritaire. Celui-ci était surnommé, au sein de la communauté, « le président des réfugiés ». Il serait actuellement caché dans les environs de la commune de Sehene, dans la région de Menaka.

39. Ecuador Cuts Assange's Link to the Internet
New York Times, Steven Erlanger, David E. Sanger, 2016 10 19

London - Ecuador said Tuesday that it had cut off Julian Assange's access to the internet in his exile in the country's London embassy, making clear that it feared being sucked into an effort to "interfere in electoral processes" in the United States by the activities of the WikiLeaks founder. Ecuador said that it was not evicting Mr. Assange from its embassy, where he sought asylum four years ago. It said that its "temporary restriction" of internet services to Mr. Assange "does not prevent the WikiLeaks organization from carrying out its journalistic activities." But it was clearly intended to keep the embassy from being the control center for that leaking operation. "The government of Ecuador respects the principle of nonintervention in the affairs of other countries," it said in a statement, "and it does not interfere in the electoral processes in support of any candidate in particular." Ecuador's action, experts inside and outside the United States government say, is not likely to slow the flow of leaked emails. Those emails are routed through servers around the globe, and if the United States wanted to shut them down covertly, that presumably would have happened years ago. In fact, American officials have said, turning off the flow of WikiLeaks data is a legally complicated issue, especially if American citizens or American-based firms are involved. The Obama administration, they say, does not want to be accused of suppressing unwelcome speech -- in the manner of the Russians and the Chinese.

40. Russia Returns Militarily to Latin America, Worries Washington's Allies

Asharq Al-Awsat, Mohammed Fahmi, 2016 10 19

Havana - The latest announcement by Russia on concluding a deal with Nicaragua, selling them 50 T-72 tanks, has raised concerns among some regional countries such as Costa Rica and Honduras. The two countries considered this step "unnecessary" as it could change the regional military balance. Minister of Foreign Affairs Manuel Gonzalez said Costa Rica is concerned that a reported delivery of Russian tanks to its neighbor Nicaragua could militarize Central America. For its part, Russia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said that it appreciates Latin America's peaceful environment, confirming that arming Nicaragua does not intend to cause regional imbalance. Moreover, official sources stressed that publishing this kind of news prior to the presidential elections in the country aims at serving the opposition, which strongly opposes re-electing the current president. The Foreign Minister said the region needed more investment in healthcare, technology and infrastructure, rather than in military hardware.

A large number of suspected hideouts were also busted during the search operation, Col Manish added.

Moon has been accused by the ruling bloc of allegedly playing a part in contacting Pyongyang and getting feedback that was reflected in Seoul's decision-making process as revealed in the book. Lee said he can "neither confirm nor deny" that there is evidence that backs up the claims made in the book. Police raids that have killed about 40 suspected Islamist militants; hundreds of suspects detained in police dragnets; and new information on how the attack was financed by local sympathizers. There have also been no reported extremist attacks since shortly after the restaurant killings. The government continued to deny any IS role even after an August raid killed three suspected militants, including a Canadian man of Bangladeshi origin identified on an Islamic State website as the extremist Sunni group's representative in Bangladesh. Authorities deny the man, Tamim Chowdhury, had any IS link, and instead say he was a leader within the banned militant group Jumatul Mujahedeen Bangladesh, or JMB.

Dhaka - Bangladesh police said on Tuesday they had identified three people as the main providers of finance for an attack on a cafe in which 22 people were killed, mostly foreigners. The July attack in Dhaka's diplomatic quarter was claimed by the jihadist group Islamic State and was one of the most brazen in Bangladesh, hit by a spate of killings of liberals and members of religious minorities in the past year. Police identified one of the three as a doctor who left Bangladesh for Syria, who provided 8 million taka ($100,000) to a faction of Jamaat-ul-Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB), known as New JMB, counter-terrorism police chief Monirul Islam said. 45. N. Korea biggest challenge to missile non-proliferation: Seoul

Seoul - North Korea's advancing ballistic missile programs pose the biggest challenge to the international regime for controlling the proliferation of missile technology, a high-ranking South Korean official said Wednesday. "Today, North Korea's ballistic missile program is undoubtedly the biggest challenge" facing the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR), Vice Foreign Minister Lim Sung-nam said in his opening remarks at the 30th MTCR general meeting held in the southern port city of Busan. The MTCR is a multilateral regime for controlling the export of high-end missile technology for which South Korea is the chair country this year. "While MTCR partners have been striving to prevent the proliferation of missile technology, North Korea, as both a procurer and proliferator, challenged the international community by disregarding all norms and warnings," Lim stressed. This year alone Pyongyang fired off 23 rounds of ballistic missiles with significant ranges, the vice minister pointed out. "The city of Busan is already within the range of (the North's) Scud missiles." The country's longer-range missiles can now target the capitals of some MTCR members, Lim pointed out, adding that "This is why we must address this issue squarely bearing in mind the gravity and urgency of the matter."

46. Philippines' Duterte warms up to China

Beijing - Southeast Asian country has become a coveted spot on the chessboard between Washington and Beijing - and the U.S. may be losing The outspoken President of the Philippines declared himself "happy that China is leading the way in Asia" as he prepared to land in Beijing on a four-day visit, the latest sign that one of the closest U.S. allies in Asia is staging a dramatic turn away from Washington. The Philippines wants "to be a part of the greater plans of China about Asia, particularly Southeast Asia," Rodrigo Duterte said in an interview with China's state-run Xinhua News, released on the eve of his visit. He wants to secure for his country the kind of economic largesse China bestows upon impoverished African countries - "the railways and everything," he said. "There are things which China can do to help us economically." Mr. Duterte, who has used coarse language to disparage U.S. President Barack Obama, landed in Beijing to a hero's welcome. He has exercised "pluck and pragmatism," Xinhua said in a glowing commentary Tuesday that promised "a Beijing-Manila détente will be richly rewarding." It was the latest signal that the Philippines has become the most coveted spot on the chessboard between China and the United States - and that, for now, Beijing seems to be winning.

The arrest was carried out in cooperation with the US Federal Bureau of Investigation, Czech police said on their website on Tuesday (Oct 18) evening. 49. As territory shrinks, IS group looks for new money sources

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 19

Washington - As the Islamic State group sees its territory shrink to half its original size and its dreams of a caliphate evaporate, the extremist fighters are losing access to the sources of revenue that once gave them their power, prompting them to turn to extortion, kidnapping or foreign donations like their predecessors, the militant group al-Qaida. The Islamic State group had a unique ability to capitalize on the natural resources of its territory in Iraq and Syria and swiftly implement a system of taxation and governance that allowed it to rule an area that once was the size of Switzerland. As the battle gets underway to retake Mosul, the group's largest stronghold in Iraq, the Islamic State group is being denied access to revenue sources such as oil and gas and cash reserves that once amounted to more than $1 billion in 2014, said Daniel Glaser, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for terrorist financing. With those resources slipping away, the Islamic State group is expected to revert to "traditional methods we see al-Qaida using - whether it's deep-pocket donors, whether it's charities, whether it's NGOs, whether it's criminal activity," Glaser said in a recent discussion at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Al Jazeera, 2016 10 19

Baghdad - Tens of thousands of allied forces continued their advance on Mosul on Tuesday, but their offensive to retake ISIL's last major stronghold in Iraq was slowed down by explosives and booby traps they encountered along the way. With the decisive battle in its second day, Iraqi commanders said that progress was being made as their forces pushed from two main fronts against ISIL, also known as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, or ISIS. The commanders said the operation was going as planned, despite resistance from ISIL fighters who were hitting back with suicide car bomb attacks. "Many villages have already been liberated," said Sabah al-Numan, the spokesman of the elite counter-terrorism service. Al Jazeera's Hoda Abdel-Hamid, reporting from Khazir near the frontline, said the armed forces' advance on Tuesday was "not as formidable" as the previous day, when several villages were secured.

51. If you think Isis is finished, think again

London Times, Roger Boyes, 2016 10 19

Column - Don't expect Stalingrad 2.0. The epic 1943 Russian offensive on the Volga River turned the tide against Hitler -- but a victory over Islamic State in Mosul is unlikely to carry similar historic clout in the war against terror. Rather, the fast-approaching showdown on the Tigris could go horribly wrong, discrediting the supposedly reformed Iraqi army and accelerating a new, even more vicious phase in the evolution of Isis as the world's most high-profile terrorist outfit. Thrashing Isis in Mosul would of course be a prize worth winning. It would dent the group's standing among angry young Muslims, reduce its cash flow, take away its last major urban bastion in Iraq. If the Iraqi army really do win, it will help erase the memory of the shameful mass desertion in 2014. Some of the weapons they left behind are now being used against them. If this were a staff college exercise against a notional, conventional enemy there would be no doubt about the outcome. Calculations on paper, however, understate the resilience of Isis. The jihadist army survived and thrived without controlling swathes of territory. When it realised that it could overrun a third of the country it picked up its swagger and an international brand. Now its commanders have come to realise that it lost some of its rapid mobility and its capacity to surprise by setting up static garrison communities. Its numbers have swollen over the past few years as it created a pseudo-state, but its costs have risen and its revenues have dropped. The former Baathist officers who play such a vital role in formulating Isis strategy will be counselling patience on its leader, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi. If Isis frees itself from administering terrain it will have thousands more men available for hit-and-run operations in Iraq, for the contest in eastern Syria, and for exporting killers to Muslim as well as Christian countries. The caliphate that was once represented by Isis control of Mosul should once again be a spiritual construct, an inspiration for jihadists rather than a place to rent a two-bedroom flat and a sex slave.

52. L'offensive anti-Daech freinée par les bombes humaines

Le Figaro, Thierry Oberlé, 2016 10 19

Mossoul - À Mossoul, face à la supériorité des forces irakiennes, les djihadistes utilisent en masse l'action kamikaze et les tunnels pour échapper aux pilonnages de l'aviation. Bataille de Mossoul Elle est son arme fatale. En Irak, ses combattants n'ont de cesse d'en user. Elle a encore servi dans la bataille du front du Khazir qui a permis lundi aux forces kurdes de progresser de 11 kilomètres et d'être à désormais 18 kilomètres du centre de Mossoul. L'action kamikaze a contribué à asseoir la puissance de l'État islamique. Elle aide aujourd'hui surtout à retarder les échéances. Sur le front du Khazir, l'engagement était, il est vrai, inégal : une cinquantaine de membres de Daech contre un millier d'hommes appuyés par l'aviation de la coalition internationale. Après six heures d'affrontements sporadiques, les combats ont pris fin pour le bataillon de pechmegas du général Zerar Abdullah Kader lorsque l'ultime carré ennemi a surgi d'un tunnel devant le dernier village à conquérir. Ils étaient une vingtaine. Quelques djihadistes avaient réussi à fuir les bourgades des environs et à rejoindre à moto ou en voiture leurs coreligionnaires toujours en vie. Ils voulaient participer au bouquet final du feu d'artifice kamikaze. Sept d'entre eux ont fait sauter leur ceinture d'explosifs en courant vers les Kurdes. Les autres ont été abattus dans les échanges de tirs.

56. Losing Territory, ISIS Keeps Sights on Longer Fight

New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 10 19

Beirut - Islamic State leaders had long promised their followers an apocalyptic battle -- foretold, some believe, by the Prophet Muhammad -- in an otherwise nondescript village they controlled in northern Syria. But the warriors of the self-declared caliphate lost the village, Dabiq, in just a few hours over the weekend as Syrian rebels, backed by Turkey, closed in. To soften the symbolic blow, the Islamic State switched rhetorical gears, declaring that the real Dabiq battle would come some other time. The about-face was part of a larger repositioning as the Islamic State loses ground, not only in Syria but also in Iraq, where forces backed by the United States began a drive on Monday to oust the group from the sprawling and strategically vital city of Mosul. On the defensive in both countries, the group has been making preparations for retrenchment and survival. Hundreds of Islamic State fighters and their families have fled to the group's de facto capital, the northern Syrian city of Raqqa, in recent days, according to several residents of that city who asked not to be named to avoid reprisals. They said that the arrivals had come from Mosul, as well as from areas around Dabiq in the Syrian province of Aleppo, and that they were waiting for the Islamic State authorities to find them housing. The group, also known as ISIS or ISIL, has also been laying the ideological groundwork to maintain its appeal in straitened circumstances. As it suffered on the battlefield in recent months, the group began signaling that a drastic contraction or even a failure of its territorial proto-state would not spell defeat.

Moscow - Russian and Syrian air forces stopped bombing Aleppo on Tuesday ahead of a temporary truce, a move the Kremlin said showed "goodwill" as it faces mounting criticism for backing a brutal regime offensive. It came one day after Russia announced there would be an eight-hour "humanitarian pause" -- from 8am to 4pm on Thursday -- in the battered city. "Strikes in the Aleppo region by the Russian and Syrian air forces are stopping today starting at 10am," Russian defence minister Sergei Shoigu said on Tuesday. "This guarantees the security of civilians' exit through six corridors and prepares the evacuation of the sick and injured from eastern Aleppo," he said, adding that it would also guarantee safe passage for armed rebels to leave eastern Aleppo. The decision was welcomed by the United Nations and the European Union which said the ceasefire needed to be longer to allow the delivery of aid.

Aden - Houthi rebels are pocketing the tax money collected in the provinces they control to fund their war against the government. Civil servants throughout Yemen have not received their September salaries from the central bank and the Houthis have resorted to asking for donations from impoverished residents. The Yemeni government moved the central bank from Houthi-held Sanaa to Aden - which is under government control - late last month, claiming the rebels had been draining the reserves. Bandar Al Shihari, an employee in the administration of Ibb University, says his monthly salary of 50,000 Yemeni riyals (Dh734) is barely enough to support the five members of his family. 61. Belgique: le coup de filet antiterroriste visait l'entourage d'une figure de l'Etat islamique

Bruxelles - Le coup de filet antiterroriste opéré mardi dans le nord de la Belgique visait principalement l'entourage de Hicham Chaïb, une figure de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI), qui était apparu en mars dans une vidéo revendiquant les attentats de Bruxelles, rapportent mercredi plusieurs journaux belges. Quatre personnes ont été inculpées de participation aux activités d'un groupe terroriste après une série de 15 perquisitions et arrestations mardi dans plusieurs villes du nord de la Belgique, dont Anvers, Gand et Deinze, selon le parquet fédéral belge. Parmi les quatre personnes figure Zouhair Chaïb, 29 ans, petit frère de Hicham (35 ans), interpellé à Gand, où il vit, rapporte le quotidien flamand De Standaard, précisant que "la plupart" de 15 arrestations ont concerné "des membres de la famille de Hicham Chaïb", qui compte onze enfants au total. Un troisième frère Chaïb, Mohamed Amin, s'est plaint sur sa page Facebook que le domicile de sa mère, à Deurne, dans la banlieue d'Anvers (nord), ait aussi été perquisitionné, souligne De Standaard. Celle-ci a été emmenée pour audition avant d'être relâchée. Parmi les quatre inculpés, on trouve aussi Soufiane A., qui a combattu dans les rangs de l'EI en Syrie, d'après De Standaard et La Libre Belgique. Ce dernier avait rejoint l'EI en Syrie en avril 2013, mais, gravement blessé dans des combats dans la région d'Alep, était rentré en 2014 en Belgique, et a été interpellé mardi chez lui à Deinze, à proximité de Gand (ouest).

62. Comment les attentats de Paris ont été financés

La Tribune (France), Grégoire Normand, 2016 10 19

Paris - Le budget pour commettre les attentats de Paris et sa région en janvier et novembre 2015 est estimé respectivement à 26.000 euros et 82.000 euros. Le centre d'analyse du terrorisme vient de publier une étude sur les méthodes utilisées par les terroristes pour financer leurs attaques. Les auteurs des attentats de 2015 à Paris et Saint-Denis - qui ont fait 147 victimes - n'ont pas eu besoin d'un budget considérable au regard de l'impact au niveau économique (lien : <http://www.latribune.fr/economie/france/attentats-quel-impact-pour-l-economie-522968.html>), sociétal ou politique de ces attaques. Les auteurs de l'étude soulignent (lien : <http://cat-int.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/10/Financement-des-Attentats-2015.pdf>) d'ailleurs qu'il a suffi de "quelques dizaines de milliers d'euros [...] pour acheter les armes, fabriquer les explosifs, louer les appartements conspiratifs et les véhicules." >> Lire aussi : Attentats : quel impact pour l'économie ? L'arsenal d'Amédée Coulibaly, auteur de l'attaque de l'hyper cacher, a été estimé à 10.000 euros et celui des frères Kouachi, auteurs de l'attaque contre Charlie Hebdo à 9.400 euros. Le reste comprend des équipements comme des talkies-walkies, des gilets pare-balles.

63. Europe should prepare for fresh wave of Isil jihadists fleeing Mosul as Iraqi army moves in, warns EU

London Daily Telegraph, Josie Ensor, 2016 10 18

Erbil, Iraq - Europe must prepare for a fresh influx of Islamic State jihadists fleeing Mosul as the army moves in on their last Iraqi stronghold, the EU's security commissioner has warned. "The retaking of the IS's northern Iraq territory, Mosul, may lead to the return to Europe of violent IS fighters," Julian King said. "This is a very serious threat and we must be prepared to face it." Some 2,500 EU nationals are currently fighting alongside Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (Isil), he added, and that if even a handful return it would pose a "serious threat that we must prepare ourselves for."

64. Intelligence agency warns of ISIL attacks in five Turkish provinces

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 10 18

Ankara - The National Intelligence Agency (MIT) has issued warnings against imminent attacks by the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) in five Turkish provinces. MIT sent a warning to all 81 provinces of Turkey, saying jihadists could launch attacks in Istanbul, the southeastern province of Gaziantep, Ankara, the southern province of Antalya and the western province of Izmir. According to the MIT report, public transport is among ISIL militants' targets, daily Cumhuriyet reported on Oct. 18. The warning dated Oct. 12 and coded "urgent" said the aforementioned five provinces were among the high-risk areas. In the report, the intelligence agency warned the militants could perpetrate an attack on the Eurasia Tunnel, a roadway tunnel that will connect Istanbul's European and Asian sides that is scheduled to open in December. Metros, buses, bridges, airports, bus terminals and sea transport were listed among the ISIL targets in the notice.

65. La justice annule l'interdiction de sortie du territoire d'une jeune salafiste

Le Figaro, Agnès Leclair, 2016 10 19

Paris - Le tribunal administratif de Paris a jugé mardi que le ministère de l'Intérieur avait commis une « erreur d'appréciation » en visant une jeune Rémoise de 19 ans adhérant à la mouvance la plus rigoriste de l'islam. Justice Le difficile distinguo entre salafiste et candidat au djihad arrive devant les tribunaux. Une jeune salafiste de 19 ans a obtenu mardi l'annulation de son interdiction de sortie du territoire. Le tribunal administratif de Paris a donné raison à cette Rémoise convertie que le ministère de l'Intérieur soupçonnait d' « une inclination en faveur du djihad » et de « vellétés de départ vers la Syrie » . Une « erreur d'appréciation » , a jugé le tribunal. Cette jeune fille « exerce une pratique religieuse rigoureuse » , elle « entretient des liens avec la mouvance salafiste » , souligne la décision. Mais ces faits « ne suffisent pas, par eux-mêmes, à justifier de son adhésion et de sa proximité avec le terrorisme islamiste » . Pour justifier cette mesure de police administrative, le ministre de l'Intérieur s'est fondé sur deux « notes blanches » des services de renseignement. Ces dernières pointent que Chloé (pseudonyme qu'elle a choisi) avait fait l'objet d'une signalisation par sa mère, auprès de la plate-forme du Centre national de prévention de la radicalisation en septembre 2015, en raison de sa conversion à l'islam et de sa radicalisation progressive. « Opposée à la violence » Le mois suivant, passeport et téléphone en poche, munie de deux valises de vêtements, la jeune fille - à l'époque mineure - avait fugué. La police l'avait retrouvée en compagnie de salafistes. Gantée, recouverte par un jilbab, un grand voile qui ne laisse apparaître que le centre du visage, Chloé se revendique salafiste, la mouvance la plus rigoriste de l'islam. Mais elle assure rejeter Daech et vouloir partir pour l'Arabie saoudite en vue de s'inscrire à l'université islamique.

66. Le "radicalisé" qui a blessé deux policiers à l'aéroport souffre de troubles mentaux

Nice-Matin, Gui. B., 2016 10 19

Nice - Dimanche dernier, dans le hall du terminal 1 de l'aéroport de Nice-Côte d'Azur, il s'était fait remarquer en insultant, en agressant, puis beaucoup plus grave, en menaçant de mort plusieurs policiers. Leur seul tort: ils étaient intervenus, à la demande des employés du comptoir

Avia Partner, pour calmer un individu qui tenait des propos incohérents tout en se montrant particulièrement agressif. Hier, Rocco M., 32 ans, est apparu, sous bonne escorte, dans le box des prévenus du tribunal présidait par David Hill. Outre les menaces proférées à l'adresse des policiers, il avait également tenu des propos faisant l'apologie du terrorisme. Et par les temps qui courent, autant dire qu'ils ont été plus que pris au sérieux. Rocco s'est présenté à la justice torse nu sous son blouson ouvert. Les mains dans les poches de son bermuda. Le visage émacié et le regard quelque peu "halluciné". Ce résidant de Bendejun a été entendu sur les faits qui n'ont pas manqué de susciter l'émoi dans les salles d'embarquement. Et que le président Hill reprend dans la lecture des incidents: "Je vais tous vous péter la gueule!" "Vous allez entendre parler de moi!" "Je vais mettre une bombe" "Ça va être la guerre!" "On va venir avec les soldats pour égorger vos femmes et vos enfants..."

68. Turkish police kill suspected ISIL suicide bomber

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 19

Ankara - Turkish police shot dead early on Oct. 19 a suspected Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) militant who was believed to be planning a suicide bomb attack in the capital Ankara. A counter terror squad had tracked the suspect to the ninth floor of a building on the outskirts of Ankara, where he was killed in a gunfight at around 3 a.m. after opening fire in response to a police call to surrender. Police found explosive materials at the scene and Gov. Ercan Topaca told reporters there were suspicions that the suspect planned to target public ceremonies in the capital. It said the man was registered in the southeastern province of Diyarbakir and was born in 1992. (Full report).

1. Parry Sound-Muskoka MP Clement public safety critic for official opposition

Huntsville Forester, Paige Phillips, 2016 10 20

Muskoka - Parry Sound Muskoka MP Tony Clement will focus his attention on matters of national security in the new shadow cabinet. On Monday, Oct. 17, Clement announced his appointment as the public safety critic for the official opposition. This comes almost a week after the local MP's announcement that he was bowing out of the Conservative leadership race, citing an unwillingness to "expose my family to any further financial risk at this time." Clement said the position encompasses public safety and emergency preparedness policies. "I'll be dealing with issues like terrorism, cyber security, any natural or other disasters to befall the country and the policies surrounding all those things," said Clement. He further said the role would involve the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and their respective activities on the home front. "I think that these are issues that Parry Sounders and Muskokans care about. They care about feeling secure in their own country, they care about the safety and security of themselves and their neighbours, they want to make sure that the federal government is able to respond to any kind of natural or other disaster," said Clement. "Safety and security issues are very important. If the government gets those wrongs that's a really big problem."

2. Authorities working to determine source of seized blank passports

Winnipeg Free Press, Carol Sanders, 2016 10 20

Winnipeg - Police and federal officials are trying to determine the source of blank Canadian passports uncovered by Project Heavy Metal, a Winnipeg police investigation into a theft ring operating in Western Canada. On Tuesday, Winnipeg police announced they had identified 20 suspects, including nine arrested in Manitoba, who are facing 140 theft-related charges. Calgary and Edmonton police, as well as the RCMP, helped with the investigation, which recovered more than $300,000 worth of goods stolen in break-ins and other thefts. A search warrant executed at a Calgary home in September uncovered two RCMP uniforms, police equipment and a number of blank passports and identity documents, but few details were available. On Wednesday, Winnipeg police said 11 bogus birth certificates and two driver's licences -- all fake, Alberta-issued ones -- were found. Officials haven't yet confirmed whether or not the six blank passports recovered are real or fake. "The passports are part of the ongoing investigation," Winnipeg police spokesman Const. Rob Carver said. Calgary police are working with the federal government on the background and the source of the passports, he said.

3. Coderre comes under fire for recent Iran visit

Montreal Gazette, René Bruemmer, 2016 10 20

Montréal - Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre on Wednesday defended his early October voyage to Iran, saying his meeting with the mayor of Tehran and other numerous official voyages abroad serve as a form of "urban diplomacy" that help to open a channel of dialogue between nations while also bolstering Montreal's economy. "When we meet cities or in countries it does not mean we support everything - to the contrary," Coderre said. "But there is the fact of having a first contact, the fact of having channels of communication that allows us to be in the forefront and send messages, and to have a strategy to grow and improve the planet by working on specific cases. ... We must stop thinking that the empty chair will fix everything." Members of Montreal's Iranian community expressed outrage that Coderre made a trip to meet with Tehran's mayor Baqer Qalibaf and signed an agreement with Tehran in his role as president of Metropolis, an association of global cities. Canada has labelled Iran's regime as a state supporter of terrorism, severing diplomatic ties with the country and closing its embassy in Tehran in 2012. This summer, however, Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister said official talks had begun about resuming ties. While the City of Montreal failed to mention Coderre's trip, the visit garnered headlines in Iran and was then picked up by local media.

4. Government falling behind in clearing Phoenix payroll backlog by Oct. 31 deadline

CBC News, Chloé Fedio, 2016 10 20

Ottawa - The federal government all but confirmed it will not meet its self-imposed Oct. 31 deadline to deal with a backlog of Phoenix payroll issues despite doubling down on the promise just two weeks ago. Marie Lemay, the deputy minister in charge of the file, said the government is "tracking a bit behind," with 30,000 out of more than 80,000 cases still unresolved with less than two weeks to the deadline. Lemay said the "bulk" will be cleared in time but that some of the most complex cases -- those requiring "time-consuming, manual calculations" -- might not. "We're still driving for the 31st. We're going to give it our best shot," she said during a Wednesday afternoon update on the payroll mess. "We continue to make progress but we still have much work to do." When the Phoenix payroll system was introduced across the country, employees began reporting problems. The government acknowledged in July that more than 80,000 public servants had reported trouble with their pay, with the majority being underpaid. Others were overpaid or not paid at all. Some cases "date back several years" and require more research, said Lemay.

5. Government payroll woes likely not fixed by Oct. 31

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 10 20

Ottawa - Public Services and Procurement Canada will likely miss its promised Oct. 31 deadline to clear the backlog of pay problems caused by the federal government's bungled Phoenix payroll system, says the department's top bureaucrat. Deputy Minister Marie Lemay confirmed Wednesday the department will have problems meeting the target because the remaining cases are older and more complicated than the front end of the pile and require more manual inputting and updating of information than originally expected. She said the department is "driving" to clear the backlog but is braced for about 15,000 cases to remain after the deadline. As of Wednesday, the department had resolved the pay problems of about 62 per cent of the people caught in the backlog, which began with 82,000 cases. "We are still driving for the 31st," Lemay said. "We're going to give it our best shot but ... the transactions in there are complex ones, so what we see that might happen is we might be left on the 31st with a number of transactions of the same nature, very complex." The pay centre in Miramichi, N.B., already had a backlog of 40,000 cases when the government decided to go live with the first Phoenix rollout in February. Lemay was unable to say how many of the remaining cases came from that pre-Phoenix backlog.

The Oct. 31 deadline was the date Public Services had hoped to start the transition to what it calls a "steady state," with the bugs worked out and Phoenix running smoothly.

6. Jonathan Pitre to be discharged from Minneapolis hospital Wednesday

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 10 19

Ottawa - Jonathan Pitre is being discharged from the hospital Wednesday to continue his recovery while he awaits a second stem cell transplant. Pitre, 16, will move into an apartment in downtown Minneapolis with his mother, Tina Boileau, who has stayed around-the-clock in her son's hospital room since late August. The discharge plan came together quickly as Pitre's white blood cell count - a key indicator of a functioning immune system - climbed into the low end of the normal range. It is still the subject of significant fluctuations, however, since doctors have stopped infusing him with medication that promotes the growth of white blood cells. A fever that has persisted for several weeks is under control. "Discharge is confirmed," Boileau said in a message late Tuesday. Boileau has decided to stay in Minneapolis while her son awaits a second stem cell transplant to reduce any possibility of a medical setback. The next transplant is scheduled for March 2017. Pitre's risk of infection remains high since his immune system has not fully recovered and his body has vast open sores - the product of his severe, blistering skin disease, epidermolysis bullosa (EB). It means that, even after moving out of hospital, he will have to limit his exposure to people and all sources of infection. He'll likely wear a breathing mask in public. He'll also have to return to the hospital every day to receive medications and to have his recovery monitored.

8. L'objectif du 31 octobre ne sera pas atteint

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 10 20

Ottawa - Encore plus de 31000 cas à régler en lien avec Phénix Même si les équipes travaillent sans relâche, l'objectif du 31 octobre que s'était fixé le gouvernement fédéral pour résoudre les cas problèmes de paye de 82000 fonctionnaires fédéraux liés au système Phénix ne sera pas atteint, selon toute vraisemblance. «Si on se fie au rythme où vont les choses, il pourrait en rester encore 15000, peut-être 10000 cas à régler à cette date. Nous allons quand même tout faire pour y arriver», a indiqué la sous- ministre des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement, Marie Lemay, lors de sa dernière mise à jour dans le dossier Phénix, mercredi. La sous- ministre a admis que le travail pour régler plusieurs dossiers était plus complexe que prévu, et qu'il faudra sans doute «deux à quatre semaines» de plus pour venir à bout de la tâche. «Les agents de rémunération travaillent les soirs, les fins de semaines et pendant les congés», a indiqué Mme Lemay. Les 50 millions $ pour corriger les problèmes restent encore dans la mire malgré tout. Ainsi, plus de 12824 autres dossiers ont été réglés au cours des deux dernières semaines, ce qui porte leur nombre à 51000, ou près de 62 % des 82000 cas qui étaient en arriéré à Miramichi, à la fin juin. Il reste donc près de 31000 autres cas à régler.

9. Public servant wins new probe into discrimination complaint

Ottawa Citizen, Don Butler, 2016 10 20

A Federal Court judge has ordered the Canadian Human Rights Commission to restart its investigation into a discrimination complaint from a public servant diagnosed with Asperger syndrome. Robert Dupuis, who has worked at Statistics Canada since 1990, filed the complaint with the commission in 2011, alleging that his employer had discriminated against him on the basis of his disability. The commission spent 15 months investigating the complaint before dismissing it in October 2015. Its decision noted that Statistics Canada had implemented accommodation measures recommended by Health Canada and had tried to accommodate Dupuis for several years before demoting him. The commission also found that Statistics Canada had made a reasonable offer of settlement to Dupuis during a failed attempt at conciliation. Dupuis sought judicial review by the Federal Court of the commission's decision to dismiss his complaint, alleging that it had treated him unfairly in the investigation process.

10. Snowden: 'Politics of fear' keep Trudeau from repealing Canada anti-terror law

The Guardian (London), Ashifa Kassam, 2016 10 20

Toronto - Edward Snowden has waded into the simmering debate over Canada's controversial anti-terror law, saying that Justin Trudeau was reluctant to repeal the law out of a fear of appearing soft on terror. Speaking to an audience in Toronto on Tuesday, Snowden pointed to a campaign promise by the Canadian prime minister to amend the sweeping legislation, which gives security forces heightened powers to apprehend suspected terrorists and disrupt their activities. "But he's been in office a little while now and we haven't seen that actually come to pass," said Snowden, appearing at the SecTor cybersecurity conference via videolink from Russia. Bill C-51 was introduced in early 2015 by the country's then Conservative government, spawning protests across the country as it became law. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians, including legal scholars, civil liberties groups and pundits from across the political spectrum, spoke out against the law and its perceived attempt to supplant the country's democracy with a creeping police state. Trudeau vowed to amend the "problematic elements" of the law, rather than simply repeal the legislation, noted Snowden. "Because he's afraid of being politically attacked on the basis of being soft on terrorism, regardless of whether or not this law actually helps prevent any terrorist attacks," he said. "This is just the way the politics of fear work."

11. Visite à Téhéran Coderre défend son rôle de diplomate urbain

La Presse+, Pierre-André Normandin, 2016 10 20

Montréal - Le rôle des grandes villes ne se limite plus à entretenir les rues et à ramasser les ordures, mais aussi à jouer un rôle diplomatique sur la scène internationale, selon le maire Denis Coderre. Critiqué à la suite d'un récent voyage à Téhéran, en Iran, le premier magistrat de Montréal s'est défendu en disant profiter de ses déplacements pour « passer des messages », sans préciser les messages qu'il avait passés ni à qui il l'avait fait. « Chaque fois que je me promène, que ce soit à Téhéran [en Iran], à Beyrouth [au Liban] ou à Jérusalem [en Israël] au mois de novembre, autant sur le plan du développement économique, du développement social que du développement durable, on passe des messages. Si on veut faire partie de ceux qui vont faire partie de la solution, on n'a pas à jouer la chaise vide non plus », a-t-il dit hier matin. Il a tenu à assurer que sa présence dans certains pays au ban de la communauté internationale ne devait pas être interprétée comme un appui à ces régimes. « Quand on fait des voyages, on rencontre des villes, ça ne veut pas dire qu'on appuie tout, au contraire. Mais le fait d'avoir une première relation, d'avoir des canaux de communication, ça nous permet de passer des messages et d'avoir une stratégie d'accompagnement pour permettre de grandir et d'améliorer le sort de la planète. »

12. 'Islamic State' Turning Into a Guerrilla Army, Top General Warns

The Daily Beast, Nancy A. Youssef, 2016 10 20

Washington - The capital of the self-proclaimed Islamic State in Iraq is now under assault. But ISIS isn't going anywhere. Instead, the the terror group is beginning to rebrand itself from a "caliphate" to an insurgency, a top U.S. general fighting ISIS said Wednesday. It's much more than a change of name, or even a shift in tactics. It could well mean that there will be no "lasting defeat" of ISIS, even if it loses control of Iraq's second-largest city, despite Secretary of Defense Ash Carter's claim of such a victory just four days ago, when the Iraqi campaign for Mosul began. After two years of either training local forces to fight ISIS or hitting the terror group with airstrikes, U.S. officials believe it still could evolve into the kind of threat that has plagued Iraq since shortly after the 2003 U.S. invasion. An ISIS insurgency could use its foreign fighters to threaten not only Iraq but the West as well. And it likely would fall to nascent Iraqi fighters, who just two years ago ditched their weapons and uniforms in Mosul, to repel ISIS and launch a counterinsurgency. During a briefing with reporters, Army Maj. Gen. Gary Volesky, the commander of U.S.-led coalition ground forces in Iraq, said troops are seeing three- to five-man mortar teams launching intermittent small-arms fire in cities once controlled by ISIS, such as Fallujah and Ramadi. "It's not this organized insurgency that people think of," Volesky said. But "we are seeing these indications... That's what we are preparing the Iraqis for."

13. Hackers Evolve to Serve the Kremlin

Wall Street Journal, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 20

Moscow - With the hacking of Hillary Clinton's campaign and the Democratic National Committee, U.S. officials say Russia has unleashed a strengthened cyberwarfare weapon to sow uncertainty about the U.S. democratic process. In doing so, Russia has transformed state-sponsored hackers known as Fancy Bear and Cozy Bear from internet spies to political tools with the power to target the country's adversaries, U.S. officials and cybersecurity experts say. The attacks are the harder side of parallel campaigns in the Kremlin's English-language media, which broadcast negative news about Western institutions and alliances and focus on issues that demonstrate or stoke instability in the West, such as Brexit. Moscow seeks particularly to weaken the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which has expanded its defense against Russia. "The underlying philosophy of a lot of these attacks is about establishing information as a weapon," said Alexander Klimburg, a cyber expert at the Hague Center for Strategic Studies. "Hacking for them is literally about controlling information." President Vladimir Putin denies Russian involvement in the hacking, but in a way that telegraphs glee about the potential chaos being sown in the U.S. democratic process.

14. Man in terrorist case gets 30 years

Los Angeles Times, Cindy Carcamo, 2016 10 20

Los Angeles - The judge was not sure whether Mahanad Badawi had been actively recruiting for Islamic State. The 24-year-old Anaheim man had been convicted by a federal jury in June of conspiring to help the terrorist group in Iraq and Syria. Badawi had used his debit card to purchase a one-way ticket so that a friend, Nader Elhuzayel, could board a plane to the Middle East to join Islamic State. On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge David O. Carter asked to listen to audiotapes of Badawi in which he seemed to be trying to entice other men from a local mosque. After listening to the recordings, and a five-minute recess, Carter said he was convinced. "I believe you're radicalized. I believe you're a recruiter and I believe you're dangerous," the judge told Badawi, who did not appear to betray emotion. The judge sentenced Badawi to 30 years in prison -- the same sentence Elhuzayel got after being found guilty of the same charge. After the sentencing, Badawi's mother, Samia Suliman, was embraced by family members and friends as she sobbed.

15. Media vulnerable to Election Night cyber attack

Politico, Darren Samuelsohn, Hadas Gold, 2016 10 19

Washington - Despite spending hundreds of millions of dollars on security upgrades, U.S. media organizations have failed to properly protect their newsrooms from cyberattacks on their websites, communications systems and even editing platforms -- opening themselves up to the possibility of a chaos-creating hack around Election Day. In just the past month, BuzzFeed has been vandalized, and both Newsweek and a leading cybersecurity blog were knocked offline after publishing articles that hackers apparently didn't appreciate. Federal law enforcement is investigating multiple attacks on news organizations, and journalists moderating the presidential debates say they've even gotten briefings from the FBI on proper cyber hygiene, prompting them to go back to paper and pens for prep work. "We do a lot of printing out," said Michele Remillard, an executive producer at C-SPAN, the network home to the backup moderator for all the debates. Journalists are seen as especially vulnerable soft targets for hackers. Their computers contain the kinds of notes, story ideas and high-powered contact lists coveted by foreign intelligence services. They also work in an environment that makes them ripe for attack, thanks to professional demands like the need for a constant online presence and inboxes that pop with emails from sources whom they don't always know and which frequently contain the kinds of suspicious links and attachments that can expose their wider newsroom networks. Senior U.S. officials, current and former lawmakers and cybersecurity pros told POLITICO the threat against the media is real -- and they fret the consequences. Specifically, the security community is worried The Associated Press' army of reporters could get hacked and the wire service -- the newsroom that produces the results data on which the entire media world relies -- inadvertently starts releasing manipulated election tallies or that cybercriminals penetrate CNN's internal networks and change Wolf Blitzer's teleprompter.

FCW.com, Sean D. Carberry, 2016 10 20

Washington - For all the concern about zero-day exploits, a senior NSA official said that the high-profile hacks of U.S. networks in the last two years show there are far easier ways for cybercriminals to infiltrate government systems. Speaking at the American Enterprise Institute on Oct. 18, Curtis Dukes, deputy national manager for national security systems at the NSA, said that none of the high-profile government hacks the NSA responded to -- Office of Personnel and Management, the White House, State Department, Department of Defense -- used zero-day exploits. "Basically the adversary took advantage of poorly secured, poorly patched systems," said Dukes. "Once they had that initial foothold they the elevated privileges and then moved to mission objective," which ranged from stealing data to (in the case of the Sony hack) destroying it. "We talk a lot about zero days, we talk about Shadow Brokers, things of that nature, but so far we haven't actually changed the equation for the adversary," said Dukes. "They still can easily attack us [and] achieve mission objective -- I want to actually raise the cost."

17. Politics keeps the U.S. from securing private-sector networks, says former CIA chief Robert Gates

Computerworld, Patrick Thibodeau, 2016 10 19

Orlando - A person who had access to the nation's deepest secrets, Robert Gates, the former CIA chief and U.S. Secretary of Defense from 2006 to 2011, is lot more open in retirement. Gates had the crowd at the Gartner Symposium/ITxpo laughing over his observations about IT and applauding at some of the things he believes in. Gates divided cyber threats into four areas. There is the collection of data for national security purposes, something the U.S. has been doing since the Civil War when it tapped into telegraph lines. The second threat is acquiring information for economic advantage. There are two dozens countries that do this, said Gates. "Until the Chinese really got busy at it, the best in the world probably were the French." But Gates said the U.S. and U.K. do not engage in this type of economic spying. "We do not collect information to advantage our domestic companies," he said. The third area is simple cyber crime, and fourth is cyber as a defensive weapon: Disabling networks, denial of service and other attacks.

18. Trove of Stolen Data Is Said to Include Top-Secret U.S. Hacking Tools

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 20

Washington - Investigators pursuing what they believe to be the largest case of mishandling classified documents in United States history have found that the huge trove of stolen documents in the possession of a National Security Agency contractor included top-secret N.S.A. hacking tools that two months ago were offered for sale on the internet. They have been hunting for electronic clues that could link those cybertools -- computer code posted online for auction by an anonymous group calling itself the Shadow Brokers -- to the home computers of the contractor, Harold T. Martin III, who was arrested in late August on charges of theft of government property and mishandling of classified information. But so far, the investigators have been frustrated in their attempt to prove that Mr. Martin deliberately leaked or sold the hacking tools to the Shadow Brokers or, alternatively, that someone hacked into his computer or otherwise took them without his knowledge. While they have found some forensic clues that he might be the source, the evidence is not conclusive, according to a dozen officials who have been involved in or have been briefed on the investigation. In interviews, officials described how the Martin case has deeply shaken the secret world of intelligence, from the N.S.A.'s sprawling campus at Fort Meade, Md., to the White House. They expressed astonishment that Mr. Martin managed to take home such a vast collection of classified material over at least 16 years, undetected by security officers at his workplaces, including the N.S.A., the Office of the Director of National Intelligence and Pentagon offices. And they are deeply concerned that some of the mountain of material may, by whatever route, have reached hackers or hostile intelligence services.

19. U.S. Urged Ecuador to Act Against WikiLeaks Leader Assange

NBC News, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 20

Washington - Quiet pressure from the U.S. government played a role in Ecuador's decision to block WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange from using the internet at Ecuador's London embassy, U.S. officials told NBC News. "It was a bit of an eviction notice," said a senior intelligence official. Ecuador's government said Tuesday it had partly restricted internet access for Assange, the founder of anti-secrecy group WikiLeaks, who has lived in the South American country's London embassy for more than four years. A source familiar with the situation says the Ecuadoran government has been frustrated with Assange and his presence at the embassy in London for months and has been considering how best to proceed. The action came after U.S. officials conveyed their conclusion that Assange is a willing participant in a Russian intelligence operation to undermine the U.S. presidential election, NBC News has learned. U.S. intelligence officials believe Assange knows he is getting the information from Russian intelligence, though they do not believe he is involved in helping plan the hacking, officials told NBC. "The general view is he is a willing participant in the Russian scheme but not an active plotter in it. They just realized they could use him," said a senior intelligence official.

20. US, UK Cybersecurity Officials: Destructive Hacks Are Coming

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 20

London - The world should brace itself for more physically destructive hacks, two senior cybersecurity officials said Wednesday, warning that a more dangerous era of hacking was already upon us. Paul Chichester, the director of operations at Britain's new National Cyber Security Center, told an event hosted by British defense think tank RUSI that electronic intrusions were on their way to becoming more "destructive, disruptive and coercive." "That will be our future," he told a crowd of officers, academics and industry experts gathered for a two-day symposium in central London. Chichester was seconded by Air Force Lt. Gen. James K. McLaughlin, deputy commander at U.S. Cyber Command, who told attendees that infrastructure-wrecking attacks were being seen "right now in the environment." Neither official went into specifics about what they'd seen or why they felt the threat was intensifying, although McLaughlin invoked a cyberattack in Ukraine which knocked out three separate power distribution companies last year. The Dec. 23 incident, believed to have been pulled off by a team of hackers using stolen passwords, left 225,000 people without electricity, according to a U.S. Department of Homeland Security bulletin published two months later.

21. Yahoo calls for greater transparency from intelligence services

Financial Times, Hannah Kuchler, 2016 10 20

San Francisco - Yahoo is demanding US intelligence services reveal how they monitor online services, after a report said the internet company secretly scanned customer emails. In a letter to James Clapper, the US director of national intelligence, Yahoo said citizens in a democracy require more information to understand and debate how the US uses legal authorities to obtain private data. Yahoo said it found itself unable to respond in detail to the accusations in a Reuters article earlier this month, which claimed that the company had secretly built custom software to scan users' incoming emails for specific information requested by US intelligence officials. Ron Bell, Yahoo's general counsel, urged the director to confirm whether an order "as described in these media reports" was issued and, if so, declassify the order in whole or in part. He wrote that he wanted the office to make a "sufficiently detailed public and contextual comment to clarify the alleged facts and circumstances".

22. British jihadi urges other Muslims to join him and wage what he claims is a 'five-star' jihad in Syria

The Sun (UK), Jake Ryan, 2016 10 20

London - A BRIT jihadist has urged other Muslims to join him and wage what he claims is a "five-star" jihad in Syria. The call came in an article penned in English under the name Abu Salman Al-Britani which was published online on Tuesday. Al-Britani revealed that he expected to be dead within three months of arriving in Syria but was surprised at what he encountered. He said: "I thought I was coming to live in the mountains and starvation would be widespread. "I would participate in a couple of battles, and 2 or 3 months after (my arrival) I would be killed and be made Shaheed [martyred]..." He added: "Even though we may face certain hardships in Al-Sham, the Jihad in Syria is far more comfortable compared to what we hear of the Jihad in other lands."

23. Ireland to follow UK in setting up national cyber security centre

Computer Weekly (UK), Warwick Ashford, 2016 10 19

Dublin - Ireland plans to set up a national cyber security centre, according to Denis Naughten, the country's communications minister. The news comes less than a month after the UK's National Cyber Security Centre (NCSC) officially opened for business, combining all the government's cyber security agencies under one roof. "I will bring a memorandum to cabinet next week to establish a national cyber security centre that will focus on securing government networks," Naughten told the (ISC)2 EMEA Congress 2016 in Dublin. The centre will also cover the security of critical national infrastructure as well as assist industry and individuals to protect their digital assets. "The centre will build on the existing computer security incident response team that has been in place in my department since 2011, providing incident response services to government departments and core state agencies," said Naughten.

24. Muslim Council of Britain to set up alternative counter-terror scheme

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 10 20

London - British Muslims are planning to set up their own programme to stop people becoming terrorists in a direct challenge to the government's controversial Prevent scheme, the Guardian has learned. The plans are being masterminded by the Muslim Council of Britain (MCB), representing 500 charities, schools and mosques, which plans to start the Muslim-run counter-radicalisation scheme next year. "In reflecting the wishes of a cross-section of British Muslim society, our affiliates have directed the MCB to explore a grassroots-led response to the challenge of terrorism. Real challenges exists, as we see with Muslim families broken up as a number of children, mothers and fathers leave to travel to Syria," the MCB said in a statement. The Home Office's Prevent scheme is run by the police and security officials. The new initiative, run by a network of community groups across Britain, could cause concern as it could take people away from the official programme. The number of referrals to Prevent reached a record 8,000 in the year to April 2016.

25. UK spies infiltrated Isis leadership, ex-jihadis claim

The Independent (UK), Kim Sengupta, 2016 10 20

Urfa, Turkey - "They are afraid of a lot of things now. They are afraid of the bombing, they are afraid of the attack that's coming and they are also really afraid of the foreign spies who are among them". This was Rashid's description of what was going on inside Isis. And the Western intelligence agency that has infiltrated Isis the most, claimed the Belgian jihadi, was the British. Rachid is one of the thousands of foreign fighters who had gone to join Syria's jihad, graduating in extremism among rebel groups to two years serving with Isis. But disillusioned, he says, with the Islamists and fearing what lay ahead, he has fled across the border to Turkey. Rachid, a mechanic before he took up the gun in the name of Islam, was part of a small but steady flow of fighters leaving Isis as it faces an assault on Mosul, its last stronghold in Iraq and waited for the coming offensive against Raqqa, the capital of its "caliphate" in Syria. The contact with Rachid came through an intermediary in Turkey after I wrote an article in The Independent last month about thousands of jihadis from who, with Isis facing defeat, will be seeking to return. The picture painted by him was of an "Islamic State" where the sense of omnipotence that came during the astonishingly quick advance through Syria and Iraq has been replaced by foreboding, divisions and desertions. And with it has come rising paranoia and violent retribution being exacted on those deemed to be traitors. Rachid, who had trimmed his beard and burned the clothes and documents he had in Syria, was anxious to leave Urfa, the city where we met, as soon as possible. It has, despite being in Turkey, become a haven for Islamist extremists, including those from Isis.

26. Aussie kidnapped in Yemen

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 10 20

Sydney - An Australian living in Yemen was kidnapped at the weekend, raising concerns he may have fallen into the hands of Islamist militants. The unnamed man was kidnapped near the capital, Sanaa, in an area believed to be under the control of Houthi rebels, a Shia insurgency that has taken control of tracts of the country. It is not clear who is holding the man, or why he was taken. Sources contacted by The Australian said while there was concern the man may have fallen into the hands of a terrorist group, it was just as likely his kidnapping was part of a criminal enterprise. Yemen is the home to several rebel and extremist groups, the most notorious of which is al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula.

27. Ex-spy chief warns of net threats

Sydney Morning Herald, Deborah Snow and David Wroe, 2016 10 20

Sydney - The task of being an intelligence chief has become tougher with the rise of cyber threats and terrorism, according to the former head of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation, David Irvine, who says he would like to see a "much stronger" national cyber industry. Speaking during a rare interview in Canberra, Mr Irvine said "when you put cyber on top of [terrorism], it takes a bit of time off your sleep at night. The two issues have grown exponentially within a couple of decades and while the nature of the threats is the same, the vector has changed. And cyber is a new and very potent vector." Mr Irvine, who led Australia's overseas spy agency ASIS before he headed up ASIO, said he'd been "horrified" at the revelations of Edward Snowden, the subcontractor to the National Security Agency who exposed vast top- secret US government programs for monitoring global communications. "People say, well nobody lost their lives as a result of Snowden, but how do you know that? You run through your mind all the possible consequences of having your capabilities, which are there to defend the country, exposed ..."

28. Followers told to pray for terror case teens

The Australian, Jennine Khalik and Paul Maley, 2016 10 20

Sydney - An online campaign spreading messages of support for Australians convicted of terrorism has called on followers to pray for two teens charged with planning an attack in Sydney. Brothers Behind Bars, which is largely co-ordinated on Facebook, says it raises money to fund legal work for Australians accused, or convicted, of terror-related offences, and provides food packages for their families. Two 16-year-old boys were charged last week with knowingly being members of Islamic State. Police alleged the pair, arrested following a dramatic chase in the southwest Sydney suburb of Bankstown, bought bayonet hunting knives in preparation for a terrorist attack. "Please keep the brothers in your du'a (prayers)," the campaign, which also runs a channel on the encrypted messaging app Telegram, said. The #BrothersBehindBars drive is spearheaded by the former director of Sydney's controversial al-Risalah Islamic Centre, Wissam Haddad, and self- proclaimed Muslim cleric Junaid Thorne.

29. Rapid-fire guns pose terror risk

Adelaide Advertiser, Peter Jean, 2016 10 20

Adelaide - Rapid-fire shotguns could fall into the hands of would- be terrorists if import restrictions are relaxed, former prime minister Tony Abbott has warned. Federal and state police ministers will meet tomorrow to discuss whether the ban on seven-round Adler lever-action shotguns should continue. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has promised to keep the ban in place but some Coalition MPs have joined Liberal Democrat David Leyonhjelm in calling for it to be lifted. Abbott Government ministers promised Senator Leyonhjelm in 2015 that a one-year "sunset clause" would be placed on the regulation banning the Adler shotguns in exchange for the senator supporting a migration law. But Mr Abbott said there was "no way on God's Earth" he would have allowed the ban to be lifted while he was prime minister. "With a heightened terror threat there is just no way that any serious Coalition government ... should be allowing rapid-fire weapons on a very large scale into our country," he said. "If you allow (them) under relatively loose conditions you obviously raise the danger that people who want to do us harm will get access to them." (Full report)

Soulevant le danger que continue de représenter le terrorisme, il a appelé la communauté internationale à "conjuguer ses efforts en vue d'éradiquer à jamais ce fléau". Dans le même cadre, l'intervenant a mis en garde contre l'escalade du phénomène de l'islamophobie, invitant, à cet égard, l'OCI à "poursuivre ses efforts, en coordination avec la communauté internationale, pour définir et mettre en place les moyens politiques, juridiques et médiatiques à même de juguler ce fléau évoluant à contre-courant de l'esprit du dialogue des civilisations et du rapprochement entre les peuples", a-t-il relevé.

36. Morocco's Jihadist Paradox, Unraveled

Stratfor, Staff report, 2016 10 20

Analysis - When tourists are involved, authorities in Morocco have seemed hesitant to describe attacks as acts of terrorism. On Oct. 5, for instance, Moroccan authorities were reluctant to label a knife attack in Casablanca as an act of terrorism, noting instead that the perpetrator, who injured three Dutch tourists and a police officer, was mentally disturbed. Similarly, authorities attributed a November 2015 knife attack on German tourists in Fez to the two assailants' drug use. But, as we've seen in past attacks, an attacker's mental health issues or criminal activities do not preclude support for extremist groups. That Moroccan authorities would try to downplay any ideological motive in attacks on tourists is not surprising. Tourism there is an important industry, attracting some 10 million visitors each year. The country's leaders, aware of the devastating effects that jihadist attacks have had on tourism in Tunisia and Egypt, doubtless want to avoid casting the same pall over their own country. Despite their worries, however, Morocco faces a much lesser jihadist threat than do its neighbors in North Africa.

37. Microsoft to show code in Brazil to calm fears about spy 'back doors'

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 20

Brasilia - Microsoft Corp, still stung by accusations that it installed "back doors" for the U.S. government to access customers' communications, opened a center in Brazil on Wednesday where officials will be able to inspect its programming code, in an attempt to allay suspicions in the region that its software programs are vulnerable to spying. Behind reinforced walls and with strict security settings, the world's biggest software company showed off its fourth 'Transparency Center' in Brasilia, where experts from Latin American and Caribbean governments will be able to view the source code of its products. The effort to build trust follows heightened suspicions in the region after former U.S. National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden leaked documents in 2013 that showed the agency was capturing massive amounts of data from emails handled by major U.S. technology companies, including Microsoft. The leak, in addition to another Snowden disclosure that the United States had been spying on communications including those of former Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff, prompted Brazil and other governments around the world to reconsider how much they could trust U.S. technology companies not to install back doors at the request of U.S. intelligence agencies. At the new site, visited on Wednesday by officials including the speaker of Brazil's Congress, no electronics will be allowed into the secure viewing room.

Armed with rifles, grenades and explosive vests, they hit the Marina Country Club in Punggol first before fanning out across the island. These attacks set the scene for the simulated terror incident faced by security agencies over the last two days, in the largest counter-terrorism exercise held here so far. Led by the police, the 18-hour islandwide operation that began on Monday morning involved almost 2,500 officers from the Home Team, 660 Singapore Armed Forces (SAF) soldiers and about 60 community volunteers. 40. Foreign ministry issues strong condemnation of N.K. missile launch

Seoul - South Korea's foreign ministry issued a strong condemnation of North Korea's latest missile launch on Thursday, which it said would only worsen the communist regime's isolation from the international community. The U.S. Strategic Command said North Korea fired off what is presumed to be a mid-range Musudan missile from the northwestern city of Kusong. The latest missile test-launch came less than a week after the regime unsuccessfully tested another Musudan missile on Oct. 15. The latest ballistic missile launch "is a clear violation of United Nations Security Council (UNSC) resolutions, regardless of whether it succeeded or not," the ministry said in a statement. "The government strongly condemns the launch, given that it poses grave threats to the peace and security of the entire international community." The Thursday launch came in defiance of warnings issued by the UNSC's press statement that was adopted right after the previous test-firing, the foreign ministry said. It added, "the latest provocation highlights North Korea's manic obsession with nuclear and missile development."

41. IS man held was raising a sleeper cell?

Times of India, Neeraj Chauhan, 2016 10 20

New Delhi - Islamic State "operative" Subahani Haja Moideen's account that he was allowed to leave IS-held territory due to a knee injury that ruled him out of active fighting is likely to be closely scrutinised by the National Investigation Agency that is looking at the possibility of his being tasked with setting up a "sleeper cell". The NIA is considering the "sleeper cell" theory as Moideen had lain dormant for a year since his return and was detected only when he began to plan attacks on RSS members and some judges of the Kochi high court. While not outright rejecting the injury account, NIA investigators are looking to examine his links and plans thoroughly. The 31-year-old Kerala native, who was in touch with an IS handler based in Sweden, was arrested by NIA earlier this month after he had formed a Kerala module. He told interrogators earlier that he received a knee injury in Mosul, after which he desired to return to India.

42. N.K. vows to launch satellites, hints at possible long-range rocket test

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 20

Seoul - North Korea said Thursday it will continue to launch satellites into space despite South Korea's condemnation, which analysts said points toward Pyongyang testing a long-range rocket soon. North Korean satellites will continue going up even as South Korea condemns Pyongyang's move, an unidentified spokesman at North Korea's bureau on space development was quoted as saying by the country's media. "We will march toward the goal of conquering space by firing off more satellites in accordance with our five-year space development program," the spokesman said. The report came amid growing speculation that North Korea is likely to launch a long-range rocket in the not-too-distant future after its last launch in February. Pyongyang has claimed it has the right to develop its space program by putting satellites into orbit, but Seoul and Washington have viewed Pyongyang's move as a disguised test for its ballistic missile technology. Tensions are running high on the Korean Peninsula after Pyongyang conducted its fifth and most powerful nuclear test on Sept. 9, eight months after it detonated its fourth nuke.

Citing results of a preliminary investigation, Deputy Prime Minister Prawit Wongsuwon said the five were poised to assemble pipe bombs for use in attacks to be carried out in Bangkok and its suburbs. "We would not have taken action [against these suspects] if we didn't have solid evidence [to prove their involvement in the bomb plot]," he said, adding the public should not panic as security forces and intelligence officials are doing their duty. The five suspects were among 14 people detained in several raids on suspicion of being part of the car bomb attack plot, said Thawip Netniyom, secretary-general of the National Security Council yesterday. Nine have since been released but the others are still in military custody.

45. 4 nations back path to reviving Ukraine peace plan

Washington Post, Stephanie Kirchner, 2016 10 20

Berlin - The leaders of Germany, Russia, France and Ukraine on Wednesday agreed on a road map designed to revive the halting peace plan for eastern Ukraine at a highly anticipated meeting in Berlin. The agreement included the withdrawal of troops in four additional areas in the conflicted Donbass region and an expansion of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) monitoring mission, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said at a joint news conference with French President François Hollande early Thursday morning. The foreign ministers of the four countries are to discuss the road map in more detail in November, Merkel said. Little progress has been made in the implementation of the truce in eastern Ukraine since the German chancellor, the French president, Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko and Russian President Vladimir Putin met a year ago in the same format. According to the OSCE, the cease-fire in eastern Ukraine is violated almost on a daily basis.

46. As New Talks Begin, an Update on the War in Ukraine

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 10 20

Kiev - With soldiers dying daily in Ukraine, the site of the only active war in Europe, Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany hosted a meeting on Wednesday to see whether President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia was willing to cut a deal to end the conflict while he also faces pressure from the West over Moscow's role in Syria. Mr. Putin and Ms. Merkel met with President François Hollande of France and President Petro O. Poroshenko of Ukraine to talk about the fighting as the Ukraine crisis returns to the diplomatic agenda and the leaders try to restart a cease-fire. Separately, Mr. Putin, who is often in the eye of the storm on international crises, met with Ms. Merkel and Mr. Hollande to discuss the civil war in Syria, where the Russian Air Force is backing the government. At a news conference late Wednesday, Ms. Merkel said that, as predicted, "no miracles were achieved." But, she added, the value of meeting face to face was clear and that "it is urgently necessary" that high-level meetings continue as the foreign ministers of all four countries work on a new "road map" to resolve the conflict. From her comments after the meetings and those by Mr. Hollande and Mr. Poroshenko, it seemed that the road map amounted a new timetable for putting into effect the agreement reached in Minsk, Belarus, in 2015 but never fully observed.

47. Czechs Arrest Man Wanted by the F.B.I. for Hacking

New York Times, Rick Lyman, Hana de Goeij, 2016 10 20

Prague - A man identified as a Russian hacker suspected of pursuing targets in the United States has been arrested in the Czech Republic, the police announced Tuesday evening. The suspect was captured in a raid at a hotel in central Prague on Oct. 5, about 12 hours after the authorities heard that he was in the country, where he drove around in a luxury car with his girlfriend, according to the police. The man did not resist arrest, but he had medical problems and was briefly hospitalized, the police said in a statement. David Schön, a police spokesman, said on Wednesday that the arrest of the man, whose name has not been released, was not announced immediately "for tactical reasons." The Russian Embassy in Prague called for the man to be released. Jakub Janda, who studies the Russian government and is a deputy director of the European Values Think-Tank in Prague, said that the arrest served as confirmation that "the Czech Republic is so far considered a safe base for Russian intelligence and influence activities focused on Western targets." He added, "Prague is unofficially considered to be a springboard for some Kremlin activities inside Europe, also using huge Russian diplomatic presence of approximately 140 staff." Mr. Janda also said that the arrest showed that "Western governments are waking up and finally considering hostile Russian intelligence and disinformation operations to be an open and urgent threat, even at the level of the U.S. administration."

48. Dragan accuser spied for Croatia

The Australian, Jacquelin Magnay and Ivica Profaca, 2016 10 20

Split, Croatia - An international war crimes trial against Australian citizen and Serbian paramilitary commander Dragan Vasiljkovic exploded into an angry war of words as one of his main accusers was revealed to have been working for Croatian intelligence, raising questions about the use of his testimony. In a second setback, a key prosecution witness, a Serbian cook named Pero Dragisic, was one of three who failed to turn up to give evidence yesterday. But the testimony that ignited controversy was that of Velibor Bracic, 48, who told the international court sitting in Split that he was kicked in the head while on the ground by Mr Vasiljkovic shortly after being captured on June 16, 1991. Mr Vasiljkovic, better known as Captain Dragan in the Balkans and as Daniel Snedden in Australia, became agitated as he cross-examined Mr Bracic, telling the judge that he had waited 11 years for this moment. During the cross-examination Mr Bracic admitted: "I did some work for our (Croatian) intelligence." Mr Bracic refused to directly answer whether at the time of his arrest he was working as a spy. He said he had been caught on the Bosnia and Croatia border, north of Knin, while undertaking reconnaissance as a reserve in the Croatian police force.

49. Tajikistan starts anti-terror drills with China

Agence France-Presse, Staff reporter, 2016 10 20

Beijing - Tajikistan began joint anti-terror drills with China on Thursday close near the border with Afghanistan as part of Beijing's drive to boost security in the region. Tajikistan's defence ministry told AFP that the exercises on Tajik territory would last until October 24 and involve at least 10,000 troops as well as military vehicles and helicopters. Tajik authorities said last month that China would be building infrastructure to increase security on the 1,300-kilometre (800-mile) border between Tajikistan and Afghanistan, which is a haven for drug traffickers. China and Tajikistan entered into an anti-terror alliance with Pakistan and Afghanistan earlier this year. Security issues in former Soviet Central Asia, a region that borders China's restive Xinjiang province, were once the exclusive preserve of Russia.

50. Fight for Mosul rages as Iraqi forces push on

Al Jazeera, 2016 10 20

Baghdad - Battles intensify around Iraq's second-largest city with the town of Hamdaniya targeted for ISIL's expulsion. Three days into the assault on Mosul, Iraqi and Kurdish forces are steadily recovering outlying territory before the big push into the city itself, expected to be the biggest battle since the 2003 US-led invasion. Units from Iraq's elite counter-terrorism service, which has done the heavy lifting in most recent operations against ISIL, were poised to flush its fighters out of the town of Hamdaniya, officers said on Wednesday. "We are surrounding Hamdaniya now," Lieutenant-General Riyadh Tawfiq, commander of Iraq's ground forces, told AFP news agency. "There are some pockets [of resistance], some clashes. They send car bombs - but it will not help them." Explosives and booby traps laid down by Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant slowed down the offensive. The Iraqi army said it destroyed five cars driven by ISIL suicide bombers during the advance.

51. Irak : des chefs djihadistes ont fui Mossoul

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 20

Mossoul, Irak - De nouveaux assauts devraient avoir lieu dans la journée de jeudi, mais l'organisation Etat islamique retient des civils, malgré la fuite de certaines figures djihadistes. Les forces irakiennes s'appêtent à lancer, jeudi 20 octobre, plusieurs assauts autour de Mossoul, le dernier bastion du groupe Etat islamique (EI) en Irak, que des chefs djihadistes ont déjà quitté, selon un général américain. Depuis lundi, les forces fédérales et kurdes irakiennes ont fait de rapides progrès, se rapprochant depuis plusieurs directions de la deuxième ville d'Irak. Elles sont appuyées par la coalition internationale dirigée par Washington qui, outre son aviation, a des militaires sur le terrain pour les conseiller. Avant d'atteindre les abords directs de la ville, où 3000 à 4000 combattants seraient retranchés, les forces gouvernementales doivent d'abord s'emparer de territoires contrôlés par l'EI tout autour de la cité. Cette bataille sera «difficile», a prévenu le président américain, Barack Obama. Des dizaines de villages repris à 15 km au sud-est de Mossoul, les forces fédérales sont entrées mardi dans plusieurs quartiers de la ville chrétienne de Qaraqosh, suscitant des manifestations de joie parmi les chrétiens de la région réfugiés à Erbil, capitale de la région autonome du Kurdistan irakien. Des officiers du contre-terrorisme irakien ont affirmé que leurs forces étaient en passe de chasser les djihadistes de cette ville.

52. Tehran court sentences Iranian-Americans for 'spying' (Canada).

Al Jazeera, 2016 10 20

Tehran - An Iranian court has sentenced an Iranian-American businessman and his elderly father to 10 years in prison on charges of cooperating with the US, Iranian media reported on Tuesday. Iran's Fars News Agency reported that the pair was among a group of six who were "sentenced for spying in Iran". Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) in October 2015 detained Siamak Namazi, a businessman in his mid-40s with dual US-Iranian citizenship, while he was visiting family in Tehran. The IRGC in February arrested his 80-year-old father, Baquer Namazi, a former Iranian provincial governor and former UNICEF official who also has dual citizenship. Tehran prosecutor Abbas Jafari Dolatabadi, quoted by Fars, confirmed their sentences. Security officials have arrested dozens of artists, journalists and businessmen, including Iranians holding joint American, European or Canadian citizenship, as part of a crackdown on "western infiltration".

53. Tehran shrugs off U.S. statement on persons convicted of espionage charges

Tehran Times, 2016 10 20

Tehran - The Iranian Foreign Ministry on Wednesday shrugged off remarks by a U.S. official in regard to jail sentences against six persons in Iran on espionage charges, saying Iran does not value such "interfering" remarks. On Tuesday, Tehran's prosecutor announced that Siamak Namazi, an Iranian-American businessman, Baqer Namazi, his father, and four others have each been given 10 years in prison for espionage. Mark C. Toner, a deputy U.S. State Department spokesman, expressed concerns over the arrested U.S. citizens. "We join recent calls by international organizations and UN human rights experts for the immediate release of all U.S. citizens unjustly detained in Iran, including Siamak and Baquer Namazi, so that they can return to their families," Toner said. Foreign Ministry spokesman Bahram Qassemi said linking rulings against "the culprits and foreign spies" is an example of "useless effort to influence the international cooperation with the Islamic Republic of Iran."

54. Al Houthis accept Yemen truce 'to avoid defeat'

Gulf News, Saeed Al Batati, 2016 10 20

Al Mukalla - Heavy fighting rocked Yemen hours before a UN- brokered ceasefire was due to begin on Wednesday, as warring parties have come under mounting pressure to end a conflict that has raged for more than two years. Iran-backed Al Houthis have announced that they would adhere to a new truce aimed at paving the way for a new push by the UN envoy to Yemen to revive peace talks and put an end to the protracted conflict between the rebels and forces loyal to president Abd Rabbo Mansour Hadi. Unlike attempts at truces when the rebel movement used delaying tactics, Al Houthis responded positively, but also demanded a halt to air strikes as a precondition for halting fighting or joining an expected new round of peace talks. Analysts in Yemen say recent major developments on battlefields across Yemen could explain Al Houthis' U-turn over the truce.

55. FSA fighter denies terror ties in court

Lebanon Daily Star, Youssef Diab, 2016 10 20

Beirut - A high-ranking fighter from the Syrian opposition stood before the Military Court Wednesday and recalled how he had been kidnapped by Hezbollah. Osama al-Ousaly, from Yabroud, appeared before court chair Brig. Gen. Hussein Abdullah. He is charged with "forming an armed group and manufacturing bombs, artillery shells, explosive materials, explosive devices and car bombs that were sent from Arsal to Yabroud." Ousaly, who led the Free Syrian Army's "Qalamoun Shuhadaa (Martyrs)," said he didn't belong to any terrorist group and that his mission was limited to fighting the Syrian Army in Yabroud. He fled to Arsal after Yabroud fell to the Syrian Army and Hezbollah in 2014. He said that arms dealer Ammar Khalouf used to provide them with weapons and SUVs, while George Hiswani used to provide the money. He said Jabhat Fatah al-Sham and "Ousoud al-Sunnah," which belongs to Daesh (ISIS), were responsible for the bombing operations that used to occur in Lebanon and in Syria.

Beirut - General Security announced Thursday the arrest of eight terror suspects, who were allegedly preparing a series of suicide attacks across Lebanon. In a statement, General Security said it had busted a cell made up of eight Syrian nationals identified by the initials M.N., Kh.N., H.Kh., A.W., M.N., M.Sh., A.N., and R.N. It said they belonged to terror organization and were in contact with extremist groups. The suspects confessed to being ordered to rent an apartment "to receive and accommodate a group of suicide attackers" and prepare explosive devices and belts, the statement added. They were allegedly planning to carry out attacks against cafes and restaurants in touristic areas, as well as United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon patrols along the border with Israel. The statement said authorities had referred the eight men to the Judiciary, adding that security forces are continuing efforts to apprehend other militants linked to these attacks. (Full Report).

Jerusalem Post, Yaakov Lappin, 2016 10 20

Jerusalem - Security forces have arrested an Arab-Israeli couple accused of joining the terrorist group Islamic State in Iraq, the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) announced Thursday. The couple, Wisam and Sabrin Zabeidat from the northern city of Sakhnin, were arrested at Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport on September 22 following their return from Iraq with their three children. According to a statement released by the Shin Bet, the couple had traveled to Turkey for a family event with their three children, aged eight, six and three. From there, they made contact with another Arab-Israeli who had joined ISIS in 2013 and then helped the Zabeidats cross the border into Syria. The family was recruited by ISIS near the Syria-Turkey border and their Israeli passports were confiscated, according to the Shin Bet release. At one point, Wisam Zabeidat was separated from his family and sent to Iraq for further training and ideological indoctrination.

58. South Korea mulls leasing Israeli spy satellite

Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, 2016 10 20

Jerusalem - South Korea is considering leasing an Israeli spy satellite, according to South Korean news agency Yonhap. According to the report, South Korea is interested in becoming independent in space, rather than being dependent on American spy satellites. The possibility of leasing an Israeli spy satellite is being considered as tensions have risen on the Korean peninsula due to North Korea's accelerated development of missiles and its threats to use nuclear weapons. The development also suggests that South Korea does not completely trust that the US will provide the defense it has promised in the event of a military conflict. The United States and South Korea have a defense pact. The possible leasing of a spy satellite is part of South Korea's effort to upgrade its military capabilities. This desire has also seen South Korea mull the purchase of German air-to-air missiles with which to arm its American F-15 fighter jets.

59. De la Légion étrangère à Daech : l'inquiétant parcours d'un ex- militaire français

Le Point, Baudouin Eschapasse, 2016 10 20

Non identifié - Les services secrets américains affirment avoir identifié l'ex-légionnaire comme étant la "tête pensante" des attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles. Il se fait appeler Abou Souleymane al-Faransi. Et c'est sous ce nom de guerre qui fait référence à ses origines françaises qu'il était jusque-là connu. De son vrai nom, Abdelilah Himich, ce Franco-Marocain de 26 ans serait l'un des planificateurs des attentats organisés, par Daech, ces derniers mois en Europe. C'est, du moins, la conviction des services secrets américains, partagée par un certain nombre d'acteurs du contre-terrorisme français. Son nom apparaît régulièrement sur divers documents interceptés par les agences de renseignements de plusieurs pays occidentaux, aux côtés d'un autre « stratège » de l'État islamique : Abou Ahmad. Des conversations de ce dernier avec des protagonistes des attaques djihadistes perpétrées à Bruxelles le 22 mars attestent de la dangerosité de ces individus. Plusieurs sources s'étonnent d'ailleurs des conversations en français des deux hommes "ce qui remet en cause la nationalité d'Abou Ahmad qui maîtrise visiblement très bien l'argot des quartiers". Bras droit d'Abou Mohammed al-Adnani, tué par un drone américain pendant l'été et que les instigatrices de l'attentat raté de Notre-Dame de Paris voulaient venger, Abou Ahmad était, jusque là, présenté comme un Syrien.

60. Far-right 'Reich' proponent wounds police in shootout

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 10 19

Berlin - Four police officers were wounded when a member of a far-right group opened fire as officials served a warrant. The man was slightly wounded himself and taken into custody. The Bavarian interior minister Joachim Herrman said on Wednesday that authorities needed to take the danger presented more seriously in light of Wednesday's attack. He said they should examine the extent to which Reichsbürger members were owners of weapons. A press release from the police department of Middle Franconia on Wednesday detailed a shooting that left four officers wounded and one member of a far-right movement in custody. One officer's injuries are life-threatening, although he remains stable after being operated. Police say the suspect belongs to the "Reichsbürger" movement, which translates as "Citizens of the Reich." Members deny the existence of the current Federal Republic of Germany, established after World War II, and maintain that the German empire (or 'Reich') continues to exist as it stood in 1937. Berlin's state intelligence service described the movement in a recent report as "an extremely diverse range of small groups and individuals who believe in an ideological mixture of conspiracy theories, anti-Semitic and anti-democratic views, and who have been behaving increasingly aggressively for some time."

61. How Islamic State Weaponized the Chat App to Direct Attacks on the West

Wall Street Journal, Stacy Meichtry, Sam Schechner, 2016 10 20

Paris - A predawn attack on a French policeman's home, the killing of a priest during Mass and a car bomb planted near Notre Dame Cathedral in recent months were plots that appeared isolated until investigators discovered a common thread. Their authors had all allegedly been in contact with a man whom authorities identify as 29-year-old Rachid Kassim. From somewhere in Islamic State-held territory in Iraq or Syria, authorities say, the French national had used the encrypted Telegram chat app and other social-media tools to contact people back home--mainly French teenagers who are believed to have little or no previous connection to the terror group or each other--and instruct them on how to mount attacks. Investigators across Europe are alarmed by the rise of militants such as Mr. Kassim, who they suspect have developed a way to "remote control" attacks from far away. That is blurring the lines between assaults carried out by militants trained in Islamic State territory and those by so-called lone wolves who authorities assumed were acting without the direction or support of terror groups. "What worries us is a new type of attacker who only appears to be acting alone," said Hans-Georg Maassen, head of Germany's domestic intelligence. "Such assailants are being steered virtually from abroad via instant messaging."

62. Policeman dies after shooting by far-right gunman

The Local (Germany), Staf report, 2016 10 20

Berlin - During a police raid in Georgensgmünd, Bavaria on Wednesday morning, a member of a right-wing extremist movement immediately opened fire and injured four police officers, one of whom has since died due to his injuries, police said on Thursday morning. Police had originally reported the officer's death on Wednesday evening, only to send out a second press release later in the evening stating that he had not died. A second officer sustained a bullet wound to the arm, while two more were injured by shattering glass. The shooter himself - who was wearing a protective vest - was lightly injured in the raid and arrested by police. The 49-year-old shooter is reportedly part of a "Reichsbürger" movement - people who do not recognize the Federal Republic of Germany as a legitimate state, and who tend to believe the true borders of Germany are those that existed prior to the Second World War.

Berlin - Le président français et la chancelière allemande n'ont pas exclu dans la nuit de mercredi à jeudi des sanctions à l'égard de la Russie en raison des bombardements contre les civils sur la ville d'Alep en Syrie, à l'issue d'entretiens avec Vladimir Poutine. "Tout ce qui peut être de l'ordre de la menace peut être utile", a déclaré à la presse à ce sujet François Hollande, tandis qu'Angela Merkel a jugé à ses côtés "qu'on ne peut pas se priver de cette option" à la veille d'un sommet de l'Union européenne qui va largement aborder la question des relations avec la Russie. Les deux dirigeants sortaient d'une longue rencontre avec le président russe à Berlin consacrée à l'Ukraine et à la Syrie, les deux grands conflits sur lesquels Russes et Occidentaux s'opposent. Le président français est allé jusqu'à qualifier de "crimes de guerre" les frappes russo-syriennes sur les quartiers de l'est d'Alep, tandis que Mme Merkel en dénonçait le caractère "inhumain". Elle a parlé d'une conversation "claire et dure" avec M. Poutine. "Ce qui se passe à Alep est un crime de guerre, la première des exigences c'est la cessation des bombardements par le régime et ses soutiens" russes, a dit M. Hollande.

64. Turkey takes on a new anti-terror strategy, Erdogan says

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 10 19

Ankara - President Recep Tayyip Erdogan said Wednesday that Turkey has employed new understanding when it comes to counterterror operations, stressing that the government will take necessary steps to eliminate all terror threats before terror groups take action. Addressing village headmen at the Bestepe Presidential Complex in Ankara, the president said that Turkey will no longer follow what he called the "wrong security approach," saying that "From now on, we will not wait for troubles to come knocking on our doors." Underlining that Turkey has been through difficult times both politically and economically, the president said that the Turkish people have suffered for many years due to internal conflicts which he referred to as "brothers killing brothers." "We have lost thousands of our people due to brothers fighting each other. We do not want to pay a price anymore. I am announcing this today; from now on, Turkey has left its wrong understanding of security behind." Erdogan highlighted that Ankara's new counterterrorism approach will tackle the problem at its source rather than dealing with the consequences of the terror threat.

Ankara - Turkish police killed on Wednesday a member of ISIS terrorist organization who had planned a suicide bomb attack near Turkey's old parliament building and the mausoleum of Mustafa Kamal Ataturk, the founder of the Turkish Republic, in Ankara. The Turkish authorities announced on Wednesday that security forces succeeded in eliminating 24-year old Ahmet Balik from the southeastern province of Diyarbakir while attempting to capture him. Photos published by local media outlets showed the terrorist scouting the mausoleum of Ataturk and the former parliament building. The Interior Ministry said Balik is a member of ISIS who had planned suicide bomb attacks in the country. On Oct. 29, Turkey celebrates the anniversary of the establishment of the Turkish Republic. Thousands of Turks are expected to flock to the mausoleum of Ataturk on that day, while high-ranking Turkish officials are expected to attend ceremonies in the former parliament building.

Un nouveau dispositif de sécurité combinant technologie et contrôle humain sera bientôt mis en place à l'aéroport. Dernière trace des attentats du 22 mars (hormis la stèle commémorative qui a pris place à l'intérieur du bâtiment), les tentes plantées devant le hall des départs et destinées au pre-screening des passagers de l'aéroport de Zaventem vont prochainement disparaître. Ce qui ne signifie pas que les mesures de sécurité vont être allégées.

Mercredi, Jan Jambon et Arnaud Feist, CEO de Brussels Airport, ont en effet dévoilé le nouveau dispositif de surveillance renforcée qui sera prochainement mis en place à l'extérieur du bâtiment et, à l'intérieur, jusqu'au check-in. La sécurité étant assurée par le SPF Mobilité au-delà de cette zone. « Nous allons passer de mesures de sécurité très visibles à quelque chose de moins visible mais avec un niveau de sécurité rehaussé », a commenté le ministre de l'Intérieur. « Après les attentats, nous avons opté pour des mesures de sécurité visibles avec le déploiement des dizaines de policiers et de militaires. Nous savions que cette capacité n'était pas tenable à terme. » « Ces derniers mois , a-t-il poursuivi, plusieurs mesures de sécurité ont été testées. Aujourd'hui, le nouveau concept se décline en différentes couches : la collecte d'informations, la détection des risques et l'intervention. Chacune de ces couches intégrera le contrôle humain et de l'usage de la technologie. »

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles (site web), René Saint-Louis, 2016 10 21

Montréal - Environ 70 personnes ont participé jeudi aux audiences publiques sur la sécurité nationale, à Montréal, qui ont donné lieu à l'expression de plusieurs inquiétudes sur les moyens employés par le gouvernement canadien pour lutter contre le terrorisme et la radicalisation. On est préoccupé, entre autres, par toutes les nouvelles dispositions introduites par la loi qui permettent à 17 agences gouvernementales de partager tous les renseignements que le gouvernement détient sur les citoyens. Les nouveaux pouvoirs accordés au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) de poser des gestes illégaux sont aussi inquiétants. Ça rappelle les années 60 et 70, où la GRC a volé les listes de membres du Parti québécois par effraction, brûlé des granges et commis toutes sortes de gestes illégaux.

2. National security framework needs major overhaul

Toronto Star, Faisal Kutty, 2016 10 21

OpEd Over the next few weeks, rights groups, lawyers, activists, experts and concerned individuals will all weigh in on how to achieve a National Security framework upholding both security and rights. The problems with the existing framework are too many to canvass here, but there are a few things that must be done. First, CSIS must stop its practices of: showing up at homes and workplaces unannounced at odd hours; speaking with employers (who are ordered not to disclose this fact); offering incentives for "information"; intimidating newcomers; questioning people about specific institutions; inquiring about one's religiosity; and discouraging people from legal counsel. The situation is so dire that rights groups have had to distribute thousands of "know your rights" guides and organize workshops across the country on dealing with security agencies. Most don't have the courage to stand up, as anti-war activist Ken Stone did. "The visit was not warranted under the mandate of CSIS," says Stone. "It caused anxiety for me and my family." Stone was allegedly flagged for his trip to Iran and a 2012 Hamilton Spectator op-ed he wrote, titled "Harper is wrong in demonizing Iran." Like the hundreds of others (who our law firm is aware of), Stone felt agents showing up at his house unannounced was an attempt at intimidation. Stone raised funds, in part through crowdfunding, and complained to the Security Intelligence Review Committee (he is awaiting for decision from his 2015 hearing). Most Canadians would be aghast at some of the innocuous actions that trigger such visits. 3. Pillay: We still don't have the right balance between security and civil rights

Ottawa Citizen, Sukanya Pillay, 2016 10 21

Column: The Liberals campaigned on a promise to fix the "problematic" aspects of Bill C-51 - which passed into law as the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2015 last year - but have yet to close the deal. As the Oct. 22 two-year anniversary of the tragic shooting of Cpl. Nathan Cirillo looms, concerns regarding the act, and accountability, remain. The government's recently released Green Paper, "Our Security, Our Rights," forms the basis for public consultations on Canada's national security framework but does not assuage concerns about the anti-terrorism act. Bill C-22 was also introduced this year to create a parliamentary committee to review national security activities and intelligence in order to fill the Canada's current gap of no parliamentary oversight of national security. But it doesn't go far enough. As such, the potential for rights and accountability failures, and errors, persists and Canada is not safer. The anti-terrorism act included new and secret powers for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and rampant information-sharing among 17 agencies and more than 100 departments. These and other concerns about the act are exacerbated by accountability failures. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association and others brought a constitutional challenge of the act in July 2015, but the case is on hold pending the government's next steps. CCLA, however, continues to be concerned about national security accountability gaps. For example, under Bill C-51, CSIS has new and novel powers but there are no new commensurate accountability structures. The act introduced new CSIS warrants which can be obtained in secret, without adversarial process, and which compromise judicial independence. And, unlike traditional warrants which ensure compliance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, these warrants pre-authorize violations. Although the government has said CSIS will comply with the Charter, the Green Paper does not indicate how this will be done, and does not commit to amending the CSIS warrant provisions. Given CSIS officials' errors relating to the cases of Maher Arar, Omar Khadr and the Air India bombing, properly resourced and empowered accountability structures for CSIS - and the Canadian Security Establishment (CSE), Canada's electronic spy agency - are vital. Accountability mechanisms, currently siloed, must be integrated to properly review integrated activity among Canada's national security agencies. 4. 400 experts à la conférence sur la radicalisation

Le Soleil, Valérie Gaudreau, 2016 10 21

Québec - Impact des nouvelles technologies dans les discours haineux, rôle des villes contre la radicalisation ou encore des témoignages de familles de jeunes radicalisés : on en a appris davantage jeudi sur le contenu d'une grande conférence de l'UNESCO à Québec du 30 octobre au 1er novembre. La tenue dans la capitale de la conférence «Internet et la radicalisation des jeunes : prévenir, agir et vivre ensemble» avait déjà été annoncée en mai par la ministre québécoise des Relations internationales, Christine St-Pierre. Mais jeudi, le dévoilement de la programmation a permis d'apprendre que 400 experts et représentants de 70 pays convergeront vers Québec la semaine prochaine. La directrice générale de l'UNESCO, Irina Bokova, sera présente. On entendra aussi le lieutenant général à la retraite Roméo Dallaire et Jehangir Khanm, directeur de l'équipe spéciale de lutte contre le terrorisme des Nations Unies, en plus de divers experts, universitaires et représentants du secteur privé. Le responsable de la liberté d'expression et des relations internationales chez Google, Ross LaJeunesse, participera notamment à un atelier.

5. Airport delays costing economy, critics say

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 10 21

Ottawa - Officials at Pearson International Airport are pressing Ottawa to cough up more funding to ease backlogs at security and customs checkpoints that have left thousands of air travellers fuming. The problem even has the attention of the prime minister's office after Gerald Butts, the principal secretary to Justin Trudeau, took to social media to express his frustration at recent lineups. "Friday of Thanksgiving weekend and half the security lines are closed at Pearson. #fail," Butts said on Twitter on Oct. 7. But the long lines at peak times are testing more than the patience of passengers - they mean delays, even missed flights that give Canada's busiest airport a black eye and ultimately cost the economy. "I can't tell you how many times I've been on flights with international travellers who have talked about that. They'll try it once but it's just so painful that they are going to find other routings," said Jan De Silva, president and chief executive officer of the Toronto Region Board of Trade. She notes that Pearson, the country's biggest international hub, is a huge contributor to the economy and warns that this is at risk. "It's really not on par with what one would anticipate an international hub airport would have," De Silva said in an interview Thursday.

6. Canadians on the edge of battle

Ottawa Sun, David Krayden, 2016 10 21

Opinion: As anyone who has even a cursory understanding of the fundamentals of modern warfare can comprehend, an assault on a well-defended, heavily fortified position always means the severe risk of heavy casualties. When facing fanatical resistance like ISIL is bound to offer, it can result in a bloody battle indeed. The First World War had the astronomical levels of men killed in battle because it was a ceaseless exercise in rotating frontal assaults against a deeply entrenched opposition. But the Battle of Mosul was not inevitable. If U.S. President Barack Obama had not created a power vacuum and an unimpeded road for Islamist extremists to travel when he pulled American forces out of Iraq, we would not be experiencing a shudder in anticipation of the coming struggle to wrest this desert enclave of evil from ISIL barbarians. The Canadian Armed Forces are there too, in what Prime Minister Justin Trudeau terms, in his steadfast refusal to accurately articulate Liberal defence policy, a non-combat support. Of course the difference between offering support to combat forces and becoming one with those combat forces is like a cool oasis in the desert that the hot sun and the whistling bullets of war can quickly consume. Canada clearly has not immersed itself in a war zone in the naive assumption that it is only there to watch - not even in Trudeau's world. I don't know exactly how close to the action our CAF personnel have ventured thus far in the conflict, but it is highly unlikely that Canada will stand on the sidelines with our hands in the pockets while Iraqi forces and our American allies are cut down by ISIL fire.

7. China lauds coming 'golden era' of trade

Globe and Mail, Brian Milner, 2016 10 21

Ottawa - Chinese business leaders are confident that China and Canada are embarking on a "golden era" between the countries that will boost trade "exponentially," says Ma Weihua, president of the China Entrepreneur Club. But "this golden era cannot be achieved only through words," Mr. Ma told a lunch meeting of the Canada China Business Council in Toronto Thursday. Agreements reached by Ottawa and Beijing "must be materialized by entrepreneurs of the two countries." Mr. Ma, an economist and former star banker, is one of a dozen wealthy members of the CEC crossing Canada in an eightday trip to talk up trade and investment opportunities with this country's political and business elite. It's no coincidence that the we're-eager-to-do-business junket by what has been dubbed China's billionaires club comes amid warming bilateral relations in the wake of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's first visit to China in August and Chinese Premier Li Keqiang's trip to Canada last month. The 50-member CEC took a similar approach in earlier visits to the United States, Britain, Germany, Australia and other markets, relying on face-to-face meetings, in hopes of allaying concerns and building trust. In the past decade, Chinese-Canadian collaboration was largely restricted to big players in natural resources, an area dominated in China by state-owned enterprises.

8. Defending liberal democracy

Kingston Whig-Standard, Geoffrey Johnston, 2016 10 21

Column: Canadians are truly privileged to live in a stable liberal democratic country. We enjoy rights and freedoms that people in other parts of the world can only dream of but dare not push for out of fear of being killed. However, there are dark forces determined to destroy liberal democracy and kill Canadians. Thankfully, the people of this country can count on the brave women and men of the Canadian Armed Forces to defend democracy. And that makes our military personnel targets for cowardly terrorist attacks. In September 2014, the Islamic State issued an edict that urged sympathizers in Canada to kill their fellow citizens, using weapons of opportunity, including guns and cars. Weeks later, two Canadian extremists independently carried out so-called lone wolf attacks on Canadian soil, targeting uniformed soldiers. As we mark the second anniversary of the horrific terrorist attacks that took the lives of two brave Canadian soldiers, it seems appropriate to focus on the threat that terrorism poses to liberal democracy. In a compelling chapter about the Islamic State, also known as ISIS, ISIL or Daesh, Welsh chronicles the rise of the terrorist force in the summer of 2014. The jihadists captured large swaths of territory in Iraq and Syria, launching a reign of terror and religiously motivated mass murder targeting Assyrian Christians and other ancient ethnic and religious minorities. "The systemic and brutal violence perpetrated by Islamic State against the Yezidi, along with other minorities in Iraq and Syria, is a far cry from the progressive picture of the Middle East painted by so many commentators in the winter of 2011, during the early stage of the so-called Arab Spring," states Welsh. "The radical ideology espoused by Islamic State today not only incites religious violence but also adopts the language of millenarianism that is reminiscent of earlier religious prophecies about the end of the world," writes Welsh. In other words, the Islamic State calls Muslims to join "an apocalyptic battle" between Christian armies and jihadists.

9. Dion leads UN effort to ramp up pressure on Russia, Syria over Aleppo

Canadian Press, 2016 10 21

Ottawa - Canada and Russia traded barbs at the United Nations on Thursday as Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion led calls for an end to the bloody conflict in Syria. The exchange came during a special session of the UN General Assembly, organized by Canada and supported by more than 70 countries, in which Canada hoped to ratchet up pressure on Russia and Syrian President Bashar al-Assad to end the five-year-old war. Dion blasted the Security Council's failure to end the conflict before turning his sights towards Russia and Assad. The two have a responsibility to protect civilians, he warned, before calling them "belligerents" to the conflict. Dion called for an immediate end to airstrikes in the city of Aleppo, where Russian and Syrian government forces have conducted an unprecedented number of airstrikes in recent weeks. And he brushed aside a "pause" in the bombing instituted by Russia earlier this week. "A short humanitarian pause, announced unilaterally, without notice and without clear parameters, does not allow the necessary aid," said Dion. About 250,000 people are trapped in rebel-held parts of the city, which aid convoys have not been able to reach since July. UN officials reported that water and food supplies are running dangerously low and half of those caught in the crossfire are children. But Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to the UN, showed no signs of backing down. Instead, he repeated past assertions that Russian and Syrian forces were fighting terrorist groups, some of which have been trained and equipped by the U.S. Churkin went on to note that Dion had made no mention of either the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant or other terrorist groups, and he appeared to question if Canada was committed to fighting such elements.

10. Four men on trial for trafficking 492 Lankans to Canada

Daily Mirror (LK), 2016 10 21

Colombo - Six years after the vessel-MV Sun Sea-with nearly 500 Sri Lankan Tamils aboard arrived off the coast of British Columbia (BC), four men who were charged with human-smuggling saw their trial open Wednesday in BC Supreme Court in Vancouver, Canada. According to Vancouver Sun, Lesly Emmanuel, Kunarobinson Christhurajah, Nadarajah Mahendran and Thampeernayagam Rajaratnam have pleaded not guilty to the offence under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act. In his opening statement, Crown counsel Peter LaPrairie told a 12-member jury that the migrants were charged a fee, generally a $5,000 down payment, to be on the boat, with an additional $25,000 owing when they arrived in Canada, for a total of $30,000. "A Sri Lankan national who wishes to enter Canada must have a valid passport and a visa issued by the Canadian government to come to Canada," said LaPrairie. "None of the 492 persons aboard the MV Sun Sea had the required travel documents."

11. L'autre radicalisation

Le Devoir, Cathy Wong, 2016 10 21

Chronique - Djihadisme, islam radical, salafisme... Notre fixation collective sur ces formes de radicalisation nous amène-t-elle à en négliger d'autres tout aussi inquiétantes ? À minimiser des actions violentes inspirées par la xénophobie ou des idéologies d'extrême droite ? Elles sont pourtant une réalité, ici comme ailleurs. Il y a une semaine, dans l'État du Kansas, la police a arrêté trois hommes affiliés au groupe " Les Croisés " qui préparaient un attentat à la bombe visant un immeuble où logent plusieurs migrants somaliens de religion musulmane. Le but de l'acte aurait été de " réveiller " les Américains contre le " danger musulman ". La violence verbale dont ils faisaient preuve pour décrire les musulmans donne froid dans le dos. Le lendemain, en Allemagne, des milliers de personnes du groupe PEGIDA (Patriotes européens contre l'islamisation de l'Occident) brandissaient des banderoles sur lesquelles on pouvait lire " Réfugiés pas bienvenus ". Au même moment, des manifestations s'organisaient dans plusieurs villes françaises pour s'opposer à l'ouverture des centres d'accueil dédiés aux réfugiés de Calais. Mais ce serait une grave erreur. Samedi dernier à Québec, regroupés devant l'Assemblée nationale, une centaine de manifestants provenant de trois groupes, dont PEGIDA Québec, vociféraient leur aversion de " l'islam, assassin ". Pendant ce temps, la police albertaine enquêtait sur la distribution, dans un quartier résidentiel d'Edmonton, d'affiches sur lesquelles était écrit le mot-clic #BanIslam.

13. Opinion: Canadian Palestinians showcase culture and resilience

Saudi Gazette, Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan, 2016 10 21

It was a heart-warming sight for Palestinians and for those who believe in justice and human rights for all people - the flags of Canada and of Palestine were hoisted at Marion Dewar Park, just outside the Ottawa City Hall, to cheers and clapping. It was the third annual Palestinian festival of Ottawa which is designed to highlight the rich culture of the Palestinian people. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau sent a message of greetings, praising Palestinian Canadians' contributions to the multicultural mosaic of Canada. Canadian policy toward the Middle East might be puzzling and perhaps contradictory in that it favors a peaceful two-nation settlement but opposes any reasonable action that is designed to end the 49-year-old occupation by Israel of the West Bank and Gaza and building illegal settlements on occupied Palestinian land. Mohammed Azhar Ali Khan is a retired Canadian journalist, civil servant and refugee judge.

14. Policing gaps on Oct. 22, 2014, have been fixed

Ottawa Citizen, Vern White, 2016 10 21

Opinion: Saturday Oct. 22 will mark the two-year anniversary of the lone-wolf attack on a soldier at the National War Memorial and on Parliament Hill. Michael Zehaf-Bibeau shot and killed Cpl. Nathan Cirillo at the memorial, then continued to Parliament Hill in his vehicle, abandoning it near the East Block and proceeding on foot onto the grounds before commandeering another vehicle to take him to the front of the Centre Block. The area from Wellington to the front of the Centre Block is approximately the distance of a couple of city blocks, and was at that time patrolled by RCMP officers, with Senate and parliamentary security staffmanning the doors of the buildings. After wrestling with and wounding a security officer at the door, Zehaf-Bibeau proceeded down the centre hall of the building with his rifle, engaging in a firefight with police and security guards who were in pursuit. He was fatally shot multiple times by officers from the parliamentary security detail, RCMP and the Sergeant-at-Arms. These events had a profound impact on Canadians. The impact was made greater by the fact the gunman was able to get within 40 metres of the prime minister, cabinet members and parliamentarians who were meeting in various locations adjacent to the Hall of Honour. Let's look at the actions of the various agencies responsible for safety and security of Parliament that day. In my opinion, they performed exactly as they had been prepared to. And that was the problem. The RCMP at that time provided security that focused on vehicles entering the parliamentary precinct, with some limited foot or vehicle patrols. The two security agencies tasked with patrolling the buildings were engaged and managed separately from each other and the RCMP, operating under a segregated command, with limited weaponry and a problematic communication structure. The staffworking in each of the three groups was well-trained, often ill-equipped (communications and firearms) but very dedicated. The problem with the security management on that day had more to do with the segregating of tasks and a lack of clear structure. (Note: Ontario Sen. Vern White is a former Ottawa police chief and Durham region chief. He also spent more than 20 years with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.)

15. Tighter security could be coming to Parliament Hill: RCMP

Global News, Mike Le Couteur, 2016 10 21

Ottawa - Parliament Hill security may be beefed up two years after the attack that claimed the life of Corporal Nathan Cirillo. Two years after Michael Zehaf-Bibeau stormed Centre block, the head of Parliamentary Protective Services (PPS) says he's open to putting measures in place to better screen people who want to access the front lawn of Parliament Hill. Currently, people can enter the grounds unhindered, but that may not be the case forever. In the 16 months since he was appointed the head of the new merged security force several measures have been put in place to prevent another attack on Parliament hill. Communications have been harmonized so that all levels of security can actually speak to each other, guards have been given hand guns and RCMP officers are now more visible and more heavily armed on the grounds. C8 carbine rifles are now in the hands of Mounties as they patrol Parliament Hill. The directive follows the report into the shooting deaths of four RCMP officers in Mayerthorpe, Alberta. The report found the officers were not equipped with an appropriate weapon to face someone with a semi-automatic rifle. Seeing officers with high powered rifles can be jarring to some, but Duheme says it's just something people need to get used to. That visual deterrent is part of the changes implemented by the PPS. Other factors being considered include preventing ministers' cars from parking in front of East and West block buildings, a direct response to the events of Oct. 22, 2014. Despite increased security on the Hill, some still don't think it's enough. Former Ottawa police chief Senator Vern White is confident things are more secure, but he worries Parliament remains vulnerable to a more coordinated attack like at the office of Charlie Hebdo in Paris last year. White believes a terrorist group could get as far the front doors of Parliament where they would have the upper hand against PPS guards: "They'd enter into a firefight with people here who are not carrying carbines, they're carrying handguns."

16. Case of Former N.S.A. Contractor Escalates as Espionage Act Charges Loom

New York Times, Scott Shane, 2016 10 21

Baltimore - A former intelligence contractor stole the equivalent of 500 million pages of government documents over two decades of work at seven companies, including top-secret plans for an operation against a hostile country, prosecutors said in papers filed in Federal District Court here on Thursday. The prosecutors also said that the former contractor, Harold T. Martin III, who worked for the National Security Agency and other military and intelligence agencies, kept an "arsenal" of 10 firearms at home in Maryland, including an assault-style rifle and a loaded handgun that he kept illegally in his car. Mr. Martin was initially charged with theft of government property and mishandling of classified information, violations carrying a maximum sentence of 11 years. But the new filing said prosecutors planned to charge him with violating the Espionage Act and committing other felonies, crimes that could put him in prison for decades if he is convicted. He is scheduled to appear at a hearing in federal court on Friday afternoon for arguments about whether he will remain in detention. The government's filing deepens the mystery surrounding Mr. Martin's grand-scale compilation over decades of a home library of top-secret material, some of which F.B.I. agents found lying in the open in his car and home office. The new details in the government's filing paint a darker picture, offering hints -- though no proof -- that he might have taken the material to give it to others, conceivably even to a foreign nation. Prosecutors said he had communicated with others in foreign languages, including Russian, and downloaded information about the Russian language. "He presents tremendous value to any foreign power that may wish to shelter him within or outside the United States," they wrote. Calling the evidence against Mr. Martin "overwhelming" and his thefts "breathtaking," the prosecutors said his "crimes reflect a willingness to routinely betray the trust of the nation." Given that history, they said, he would pose a "grave danger" if released and could not be trusted to show up at a future trial.

17. Did Hillary Clinton reveal classified intel at debate?

CNN.com, Jamie Crawford, 2016 10 21

Washington - The Twittersverse was aflame in the hours after Wednesday night's debate with questions about whether or not Hillary Clinton divulged classified information about the country's nuclear arsenal. "There's about four minutes between the order being given and the people responsible for launching nuclear weapons to do so," Clinton said, explaining the quick decision-making required of a commander in chief and questioning Donald Trump's fitness for the job. "And that's why 10 people who have had that awesome responsibility have come out and, in an unprecedented way, said they would not trust Donald Trump with the nuclear codes or to have his finger on the nuclear button," she continued. But questions soon began to emerge about whether Clinton was too specific in her description of nuclear launch times and had perhaps revealed something she learned in a classified setting. A Clinton campaign aide said the information didn't come from a classified briefing, pointing to multiple instances when similar information has been disclosed in public or through open source material.

18. How Russia Pulled Off the Biggest Election Hack in U.S. History

Esquire, Thomas Rid, 2016 10 21

New York - On an April afternoon earlier this year, Russian president Vladimir Putin headlined a gathering of some four hundred journalists, bloggers, and media executives in St. Petersburg. Dressed in a sleek navy suit, Putin looked relaxed, even comfortable, as he took questions. About an hour into the forum, a young blogger in a navy zip sweater took the microphone and asked Putin what he thought of the "so-called Panama Papers." When Putin heard the blogger's question, his face lit up with a familiar smirk. He nodded slowly and confidently before reciting a litany of humiliations that the United States had inflicted on Russia. Putin reminded his audience about the sidelining of Russia during the 1998 war in Kosovo and what he saw as American meddling in Ukraine more recently. Returning to the Panama Papers, Putin cited WikiLeaks to insist that "officials and state agencies in the United States are behind all this." The Americans' aim, he said, was to weaken Russia from within: "to spread distrust for the ruling authorities and the bodies of power within society." Though a narrow interpretation of Putin's accusation was defensible--as WikiLeaks had pointed out, one of the members of the Panama Papers consortium had received financial support from USAID, a federal agency--his swaggering assurance about America's activities has a more plausible explanation: Putin's own government had been preparing a vast, covert, and unprecedented campaign of political sabotage against the United States and its allies for more than a year. The Russian campaign burst into public view only this past June, when The Washington Post reported that "Russian government hackers" had penetrated the servers of the Democratic National Committee. The hackers, hiding behind ominous aliases like Guccifer 2.0 and DC Leaks, claimed their first victim in July, in the person of Debbie Wasserman Schultz, the DNC chair, whose private emails were published by WikiLeaks in the days leading up to the Democratic convention. By August, the hackers had learned to use the language of Americans frustrated with Washington to create doubt about the integrity of the electoral system: "As you see the U. S. presidential elections are becoming a farce," they wrote from Russia. The attacks against political organizations and individuals absorbed much of the media's attention this year. But in many ways, the DNC hack was merely a prelude to what many security researchers see as a still more audacious feat: the hacking of America's most secretive intelligence agency, the NSA.

19. NSA Can Access More Phone Data Than Ever

ABC News, Lee Ferran, 2016 10 20

Washington - One of the reforms designed to rein in the surveillance authorities of the National Security Agency has perhaps inadvertently solved a technical problem for the spy outfit and granted it potential access to much more data than before, a former top official told ABC News. Before the signing of the USA Freedom Act in June 2015, one of the NSA's most controversial programs was the mass collection of telephonic metadata from millions of Americans -- the information about calls, including the telephone numbers involved, the time and the duration but not the calls' content -- under a broad interpretation of the Patriot Act's Section 215. From this large "haystack," as officials have called it, NSA analysts could get approval to run queries on specific numbers purportedly linked to international terrorism investigations. The problem for the NSA was that the haystack was only about 30 percent as big as it should've been; the NSA database was missing a lot of data. As The Washington Post reported in 2014, the agency was not getting information from all wireless carriers and it also couldn't handle the deluge of data that was coming in. On the technical side, Chris Inglis, who served as the NSA's deputy director until January 2014, recently told ABC News that when major telecommunications companies previously handed over customer records, the NSA "just didn't ingest all of it." "[NSA officials] were trying to make sure they were doing it exactly right," he said, meaning making sure that the data was being pulled in according to existing privacy policies. The metadata also came in various forms from the different companies, so the NSA had to reformat much of it before loading it into a searchable database. Both hurdles meant that the NSA couldn't keep up, and of all the metadata the agency wanted to be available for specific searches internally, only about a third of it actually was.

20. Private Security Group Says Russia Was Behind Hack of Clinton Campaign Chairman

New York Times, Nicole Perlroth, Michael D. Shear, 2016 10 21

San Francisco - At the start of 2014, President Obama assigned his trusted counselor, John D. Podesta, to lead a review of the digital revolution, its potential and its perils. When Mr. Podesta presented his findings five months later, he called the internet's onslaught of big data "a historic driver of progress." But two short years later, as chairman of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, Mr. Podesta would also become one of the internet's most notable victims. On Thursday, private security researchers (at Dell SecureWorks) said they had concluded that Mr. Podesta was hacked by Russia's foreign intelligence service, the GRU, after it tricked him into clicking on a fake Google login page last March, inadvertently handing over his digital credentials. For months, the hackers mined Mr. Podesta's inbox for his most sensitive and potentially embarrassing correspondence, much of which has been posted on the WikiLeaks website. Additions to the collection on Thursday included three short email exchanges between Mr. Podesta and Mr. Obama himself in the days leading up to his election in 2008. Mr. Podesta's emails were first published by WikiLeaks earlier this month. The release came just days after James R. Clapper Jr., the director of national intelligence, and the Department of Homeland Security publicly blamed Russian officials for cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee, in what they described as an effort to influence the American presidential election. To date, no government officials have offered evidence that the same Russian hackers behind the D.N.C. cyberattacks were also behind the hack of Mr. Podesta's emails, but an investigation by the private security researchers determined that they were the same.

21. Trump treats foreign policy like a game of 'Survivor'

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 10 21

Column - Reality TV is about winning. It doesn't matter how you manage to be a "survivor," so long as you stay on the island. That's the sensibility that Donald Trump, the ultimate reality-television star, brings to foreign policy. In Trump's world, winners don't have to worry about alliances, nuclear proliferation or human rights -- if they come out on top. Trump's comments during Wednesday night's debate in Las Vegas conveyed a values-free approach to foreign policy that would make Machiavelli blush. A generous characterization would be that he voiced an extreme "realism" that focused entirely on U.S. interests. A harsher assessment is that Trump's amoral approach would alienate long-standing allies and potentially endanger U.S. security. Trump's disdain for traditional foreign-policy positions was clear in his positive comments about Russian President Vladimir Putin. Even after U.S. intelligence agencies accused Russia of hacking American political parties to destabilize the election, Trump still had good things to say about the Kremlin leader. The big news Wednesday night was Trump's refusal to promise he would accept the election result if he loses. But why should that be a surprise? People who've done business with Trump say he's famous for holding back his final payment to contractors and negotiating for a better deal, or stiffing them altogether.

22. U.S. Ads Aim to Dispel Terrorism's Lure

Wall Street Journal, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 10 21

Washington - The Obama administration, which has struggled for years to combat the social-media lure of Islamic State, is experimenting with new ways to put its online antiextremism messages in front of would-be terrorist fighters overseas. The revamped effort uses targeted ads on Facebook linked to videos to reach the young men and women who have given digital hints that they could be thinking of traveling to Syria or Iraq to join extremist movements. The campaign -- being run by the Global Engagement Center, a multiagency initiative housed at the State Department -- is seen by U.S. officials as one of the most promising new initiatives aimed at dissuading would-be fighters. But many officials acknowledge that such efforts are tricky since the target audience can be suspicious of the U.S. government's involvement and that their effectiveness is impossible to know. "This isn't easy work," said Michael Lumpkin, who earlier this year left his post as assistant secretary of defense for special operations to run the Global Engagement Center. But early results have been encouraging. The center spent $15,000 on a pilot four-week Facebook ad campaign that targeted 13-to-34-year-old unmarried men and women in Morocco, Tunisia and Saudi Arabia who expressed an interest in Iraq, Syria or Islamic State-related topics, as indicated by their Facebook activity. Facebook didn't individually identify the people.

23. US firms could make Ireland terrorist target, says CIA head

Irish Times, Colin Gleeson, 2016 10 21

Dublin - The director of the CIA has suggested the Republic may be a target for Islamic terrorism due to the prevalence of US multinationals there. John Brennan, who succeeded David Petraeus as the head of the United States intelligence agency in 2013, said it was important for Irish authorities to be "vigilant" of the threats posed. "I don't think any country should feel immune from the reach of these terrorist organizations," he said in an interview with Irish-American website Irish Central. "Ireland first of all is an open and welcoming country, and also there are also a lot of Americans there and American businesses. "I was in Ireland last August and I met with the Irish intelligence heads and talked to them about the importance of sharing information. If there is anything that looks or seems a bit off putting, those pieces of the puzzle need to be put together," he said.

24. Wife of American Held in Yemen Speaks Out

New York Times, Adam Goldman, 2016 10 21

Washington - The wife of an American man secretly detained in Yemen for more than a year said in a Facebook posting that her husband was being held "unjustly" by one of the country's security agencies and expressed disappointment that the United States government has been unable to free him. Jihan Mohamed said her husband, Wallead Yusuf Pitts Luqman, was abducted in April 2015. This is the first time that Mr. Luqman has been publicly identified as being held by the Houthis, a Shiite rebel group, in Yemen. The family had stayed silent for fear that public discussion of his kidnapping could endanger his life. Ms. Mohamed said late Thursday on Facebook that her husband was arrested while trying to leave Yemen. The family was on a bus headed for Saudi Arabia when he was taken. 25. Can governments really keep us safe from terrorism without invading our privacy?

Wired (UK), Ruby Lott-Lavigna, 2016 10 20

London - GCHQ has many negative connotations attached to it - including illegally collecting data from the UK public - but David Omand, former head of GCHQ and now professor at Kings, is hoping for a change in the way governments deal with our private information. Referring to new legislation that is currently going through parliament - the 'Investigatory Powers Law' - he explained how regulation is being implemented to create transparency in the way the UK government deals with cybersecurity. "What is going on, as we speak, is a phase change in the relationship between the secret state and parliament," explained Omand. "One way of looking at this is that the secret activity of the state is now being fully bought under the modern rule of law." So where does the line stand with mining data for security reasons? Is there a balance to be reached between privacy and security? According to Omand, "2017 is the year of reconciliation, in which we recognise as a mature democracy, it is possible to have sufficient security and sufficient privacy." "The key to that is rule of law. Courts have to have comprehensible, black letter law."

26. GCHQ using cyber attacks on Isil to aid battle to take Mosul

London Daily Telegraph, Ben Farmer, 2016 10 21

London - GCHQ is using cyber warfare for the first time against Isil militants as part of the campaign to retake Mosul, the Defence Secretary has said. The cyber attacks are understood to have targeted the communications of Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant to disrupt co-ordination in the Iraqi city. Sir Michael Fallon told a conference organised by the Royal United Services Institute, a think tank on cyber warfare: "We are conducting military operations against Daesh [Isil] as part of the international coalition, and I can confirm that we are using offensive cyber for the first time in this campaign." He said £265 million is being pumped into "rooting out cyber vulnerabilities" in military and wider cyber- systems. (Full report).

27. Muslim anti-terror scheme 'risks worsening divisions'

London - A scheme to fight extremism that has been proposed by an organisation with links to a hardline Islamist group threatens to undermine the government's own strategy, critics have said. The Muslim Council of Britain, an umbrella group linked to 500 charities, mosques and schools, has confirmed plans to launch "a grassroots-led response to the challenge of terrorism". The MCB, which was linked to the Muslim Brotherhood by a government report published last December, will run the scheme in isolation from existing support networks for those believed vulnerable to radicalisation, including the Home Office's Prevent initiative. Prevent is an engagement strategy aimed at stopping people becoming terrorists or supporting terrorism. Its critics said that the MCB was adding its voice to a growing anti-Prevent lobby and would further damage its status. David Anderson, QC, the official reviewer of terrorism legislation, raised concerns that Prevent was being perceived as a "spying programme". Some critics have speculated that the MCB panels would be unaccountable and untrained, while others questioned the legitimacy of the organisation to speak for British Muslims. Haras Rafiq, chief executive of the Quilliam Foundation, a counterextremism think tank, said: "The danger is that a group, one that does not truly represent anyone but their affiliates, is going to add to the misconception that Prevent is a spying project that is in some way hostile to Muslims, rather than trying to keep us all safe." 28. Australia joins the fight for Mosul (Canada)

Australian Associated Press, Max Blenkin, 2016 10 21

Canberra - Iraq has seen its share of bloody battles but the long-planned offensive to retake Mosul, the country's second biggest city, is fated to be brutal above all. Islamic State forces are expected to fight to the bitter end, exploiting the city's long-suffering civilian population by using them as human shields, routinely resorting to suicide tactics, riddling streets with improvised explosive devices and maybe even using chemical weapons. Entrenched IS fighters will prompt the obliteration of entire city blocks by bomb and artillery. Civilians who survive this fighting will flee in large numbers, prompting a humanitarian crisis likely to exceed preparations made by the Iraqi government and international aid agencies. The battle could continue for months and Australia will play a part. From high overhead, precision laser and GPS-guided bombs from six RAAF F/A-18 Hornets will destroy IS fighting positions in shattering explosions. A RAAF KC-30A airborne tanker will refuel Australian and other coalition aircraft while a RAAF E-7A Wedgetail will manage the air space in a process termed deconfliction. It could certainly get crowded - aircraft from Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Jordan, the Netherlands, UK and US have all conducted airstrikes inside Iraq.

29. NATO Providing Air Support to Afghan Forces During Special Operations

TOLO News, Abdul Wali Arian, 2016 10 21

Kabul - NATO's Resolute Support Mission (RS) has said that the U.S forces have participated in more than 20 percent of special operations in Afghanistan, noting that NATO conducted at least 220 air strikes on insurgents' hideouts and safe havens during the current year. Talking on the impact of foreign air power in the battles, the Afghan Ministry of Defense (MoD) has said that air cooperation by the US forces to their Afghan counterparts has foiled numerous plots by insurgents to takeover some areas across the country. War against terrorism, backing, advising and training the Afghan security forces are the main duties of U.S forces in Afghanistan within the framework of NATO Resolute Support Mission (RS) in Afghanistan. "The targeted attacks which are carried out with special concentration in- fact eliminate Taliban's power pole and their strength," said Sediq Sediqqi, spokesman for the MoI.

Pakistan Dawn, 2016 10 21

New York - In a veiled reference to India, Pakistan voiced concern over the growing transfer of conventional armaments in volatile regions, saying it has every potential of fuelling instability and jeopardising the delicate regional balance. "South Asia is a sensitive region where one state's military spending grossly and vastly outshadows all others," Ambassador Tehmina Janjua, the permanent representative of Pakistan to the United Nations in Geneva, told the United Nations General Assembly's Disarmament and International Security Committee on Thursday. "We remain concerned over the growing transfers of conventional armaments especially in volatile regions that are inconsistent with the imperatives of maintaining peace, security and stability," she said in a thematic debate on conventional weapons. "The policy of dual standards towards South Asia, based on narrow strategic, political and commercial considerations, must be eschewed," the Pakistani envoy said.

On comprend parfaitement que la France soit « nerveuse » notamment après deux attaques terroristes à Paris en novembre 2015 et à Nice en juillet 2016 qui ont coûté la vie à plusieurs innocents, mais on ne comprend pas cette phobie qui s'empare des autorités françaises pour interpréter la prorogation de l'état d'urgence en Tunisie comme une éventuelle menace pour ses ressortissants. 35. Some opposition changes to Colombia peace deal 'inviabile'- president

Bogota - Several modifications to a peace deal with Colombia's FARC rebels suggested by the country's opposition are "inviabile," President Juan Manuel Santos said on Thursday, adding he remains committed to salvaging the accord. The government will take some opposition suggestions for changes to the accord with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, to guerrilla leaders, Santos said in a televised address. The government has been meeting with representatives of the right wing opposition and others who campaigned against the deal in hopes the rebels will accept changes to the accord. The peace deal was rejected in a surprise plebiscite result this month, shortly before Santos was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts to end the country's 52-year war. Many opposition proposals were "reasonable" Santos said on Thursday, but others are "totally inviable". The deadline for meetings with those against the accord has now passed, he said.

37. Bombmaker jailed 10 years for Jakarta terrorist attack

Straits Times, Wahyudi Soeriaatmadja, Francis Chan, 2016 10 21

Jakarta - Indonesian bombmaker Dodi Suridi, 23, was sentenced to 10 years in jail by a district court yesterday, for helping to make the explosives used during a terrorist attack in Jakarta in January. A second suspect, Ali Hamka, 47, was jailed for four years, after he was found guilty of trying to acquire firearms for the same strike. The two men are the first among a group of at least 17 suspects to be convicted for the brazen attack on the Indonesian capital, which the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) had claimed responsibility for. The Jan 14 attack was mounted by the "Jakarta Four" of Sunakim alias Afif, Muhammad Ali, Dian Juni Kurniadi and Ahmad Muhazin, who were armed with pistols, home-made bombs and grenades. Neither Dodi nor Ali Hamka was at the scene of the siege, which left eight people, including the four perpetrators, dead.

39. India: 3.2 million debit cards 'hacked', data breach alarms customers

Indo-Asian News Service, 2016 10 21

Mumbai - Prompting pre-Diwali panic among customers, an estimated 3.2 million debit cards of various banks are believed to have been "hacked" following a suspected security breach. Investigations have begun into the causes behind the security risks. Several banks, including the State Bank Of India (SBI), have already started blocking their customers' debit cards and re-issuing fresh ones free of cost. An estimated three million debit cards issued by various public or private banks are said to be affected by a potential data breach. Debit or credit cards are prone to security issues when unauthorised parties gain access to the confidential data embedded on them, even as they are being swiped in an automatic teller machine (ATM). In the current scenario, the SBI alone has blocked more than 600,000 debit cards while assuring that the malware-related security breach was reportedly detected in the non-SBI ATM network.

Le communiqué évoque la mise en place d'un "mécanisme de consultation bilatéral" qui se réunirait "régulièrement" pour discuter du différend maritime. Les deux pays vont en outre accroître la coopération entre leurs garde-côtes. Le document n'évoque pas le verdict de la cour internationale d'arbitrage qui a rejeté en juillet, sur saisie de Manille, les prétentions chinoises en mer de Chine méridionale, où plusieurs autres riverains (Vietnam, Brunei, Malaisie, Taïwan) se disputent le contrôle d'îles et d'îlots.

41. S. Korea, U.S. to consider deploying U.S. strategic assets to deter N. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 21

Washington/Seoul - South Korea and the United States will consider deploying U.S. strategic military assets to the South permanently on a rotational basis to strengthen the U.S. "extended deterrence" protection of the Asian ally from nuclear and missile threats from North Korea, Seoul's defense chief said Thursday. South Korean Defense Minister Han Min-koo made the remark after talks with U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter. Deployment of strategic assets, such as B-2 stealth bombers, would significantly back up repeated pledges by the U.S. to mobilize all military capabilities, including nuclear weapons, to defend the South. "We discussed a lot of options, including permanently deploying U.S. strategic assets on a rotational basis," Han said during a joint news conference with Carter at the Pentagon. "We'll conduct a review (of options) going forward, including those ones." Permanently deploying U.S. strategic assets on a rotational basis means keeping at least one such asset either in, over or off in South Korea at any given time. Such deployment would not only reassure South Koreans of the U.S. defense commitment, but serve as a strong warning and deterrent to North Korea leader Kim Jong-un. The U.S. has temporarily sent strategic assets, such as nuclear-capable B-52 and B-1B bombers, F-22 stealth fighter jets and nuclear-powered, cruise-missile submarines, to South Korea in a show of force in the wake of the North's two nuclear tests and a series of missile launches, but perceptions have grown among South Koreans that such one-off missions are not enough.

Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), made the remarks at a gathering on Friday to commemorate the 80th anniversary of the victory of the Long March. He noted that the Party's absolute leadership over the armed forces is the fundamental guarantee for the army's victory. "To build a strong country requires efforts to build a strong army, and only with a strong army can the country's security be guaranteed," Xi said. He called for efforts to foster a new generation of Chinese servicemen who are "soldiers with soul, high caliber, gut and virtue," and to build rock-solid troops with "iron-like belief, conviction, discipline and commitment." "The Long March is the glory of the people's army, and the honorable people's army must always carry forward the great spirit and fine tradition of the Red Army in the Long March," Xi said.

43. Digital Trail Betrays Identity Of Russian 'Hacker' Detained In Prague

Radio Free Europe, Dmitry Treshchanin, Nick Shchetko, 2016 10 20

Prague - An investigation by RFE/RL's Current Time TV has determined that the Russian national accused by American officials of hacking U.S. targets and arrested earlier this month in the Czech capital is 29-year-old Moscow resident Yevgeny Nikulin. Czech authorities this week said the suspect was detained in downtown Prague on October 5 in response to an Interpol warrant requested by the United States and now faces a Czech extradition hearing. Czech police and local media have identified him only as "Yevgeniy N," and the Russian and U.S. governments revealed only that he was a Russian citizen. Current Time's investigation uncovered Nikulin's Instagram account under the handle "i.tak.soidet," displaying a taste for luxury cars and jewelry and a digital trail that led through Belarus and Poland to the Czech Republic in the weeks before the Prague arrest. It is unclear exactly what role Nikulin is suspected of playing in the alleged U.S. website hacks or even which websites were involved. A spokesperson from the U.S. Embassy in Prague confirmed that a Russian had been detained who was "suspected of hacking U.S. targets."

44. Wheels within wheels

The Economist, Staff report, 2016 10 20

London - MYSTERY, MIRACLE AND authority are three powers alone able to hold the conscience of people captive, explains Fyodor Dostoyevsky's Grand Inquisitor in "The Brothers Karamazov". Mr Putin has mastered all three. Yet none of these is as important as secrecy, the main tool of a good spy. Nobody really knows what goes on behind the Kremlin's thick walls, or inside Mr Putin's head. But several things are becoming clearer. Mr Putin's rule is turning increasingly personal; a generational shift is taking place within his entourage; and the FSB, the successor organisation to the KGB, is emerging as the main mechanism for exercising power, often at the expense of all other security services, including the police. Mr Putin had always relied heavily on his former KGB colleagues, but after the annexation of Crimea the expansion of the FSB gained new momentum and greater public legitimacy. It now openly wields political and economic power. Mr Putin has recently appointed three members of his security detail and one former KGB officer as regional governors. After Stalin's death in 1953, the KGB was a "combat division" of the Communist Party, tightly controlled by its central committee, which did not want to see a repeat of Stalin's purges. When the party collapsed in 1991 the KGB lost its lustre, but the new rulers never dismantled it. Though the party could not survive without ideology, the KGB could. Today the FSB is personally overseen by Mr Putin. "There is no political control over the FSB. It is a self-contained and closed system," says Andrei Soldatov, an expert on Russia's security services. Behind the scenes, the FSB controls the Investigative Committee, the Russian equivalent of America's FBI. The prosecutor's office, in effect, has no independent oversight of the FSB and the courts take their cue from it.

45. Active protection system for battle tanks unveiled

Tehran Times, 2016 10 21

Tehran - Iran announced on Wednesday it had successfully deployed a modern homegrown active protection system (APS) on its Zulfiqar tanks, making them less vulnerable to battlefield threats. "The system can be mounted on armored personnel carriers and tanks. We have deployed it on Zulfiqar tanks and tested it successfully," Tasnim quoted Aaboutalebi, one of the experts working on the project, as saying on Wednesday. APSs detect threats from high-explosive anti-tank warheads such as those carried by the rocket-propelled grenade, enabling the tank and its crew to defeat such attacks and precisely engage the firing squad. "We have utilized a Doppler radar in designing the system and test-fields have been successful," Aaboutalebi added. Also, APS uses a firewall to survive incoming threats, he said.

The coordinated attacks began early on Friday when fighters armed with assault rifles and explosives attacked a power station and government buildings, including the police headquarters. ISIL, also known as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, or ISIL, quickly claimed responsibility for the attacks in online statements. In one of the incidents, at least three suicide bombers were killed as security forces foiled an attack on a former police complex in central Kirkuk. The ceasefire for an initial period of three days, took effect at one minute to midnight on Wednesday under a United Nations plan which aims to allow sorely needed aid to reach suffering civilians. But only one side appeared to silence their guns. Missiles fired from Yemen across the border into the southern Saudi Arabian province of Jazan wounded a number of civilians, the Saudi-owned TV news channel Al Arabiya reported on Thursday, quoting the Saudi civil defence unit. Jerusalem - A representative of Israel's Mossad espionage agency met secretly with the Muslim Brotherhood's Mohammed Morsi the day before he took office as Egyptian president in 2012, an Egyptian journalist revealed. According to Army Radio, the Egyptian journalist obtained a copy of the account of the get-together written in Hebrew by the Mossad operative. The spook said that the meeting was facilitated and attended by representatives of the US administration. Morsi reportedly told the Israeli that he had no intention of severing ties with the Jewish state and that he did not see the country with which Cairo signed a 1979 peace agreement as an enemy. The journalist, Walid Majdi, did not reveal how he obtained the document. In an April 2013 interview with Al-Jazeera, Morsi stressed Egypt's commitment to the peace accords signed with Israel as an expression of "the free will of the Egyptians," but added that true peace couldn't exist as long as Palestinians were denied their rights.

Times of Israel, Sue Surkes, 2016 10 21

Jerusalem - Three Palestinians who accepted an invitation to the sukkah of the head of a West Bank settlement were summoned by Palestinian Authority intelligence on Thursday to explain why they had visited "murderers of babies." The three, from two nearby Palestinian villages, were hosted by Oded Revivi, the mayor of Efrat, a settlement located 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) south of Jerusalem. It is a Jewish tradition to host friends and associates in the temporary structure during Sukkot (Feast of Tabernacles), to recall the booths supposedly erected in the desert by the Children of Israel during the Exodus from Egypt. Also at the gathering were senior figures in settlement authorities and the Israeli security services - - among them the head of the IDF Central Command Nitzan Alon, as well as members of the police and Civil Administration (the Israeli government's representative body in the West Bank).

55. Terror attack on wedding hall in south foiled -- security agency

Times of Israel, Stuart Winer, 2016 10 21

Jerusalem - A group of four Palestinians, including one who was granted temporary Israeli residency on humanitarian grounds, planned to carry out a terror attack at a wedding hall where one worked and also kidnap an IDF soldier to be used for leverage in negotiations with Israel, Israeli security officials said Thursday. The plans were thwarted by a joint Shin Bet security service and Israel Police investigation, details of which were permitted for publication on Thursday as southern state prosecutors filed indictments against the men at the Beersheba District Court. According to the Shin Bet, the four planned to carry out an attack on an event hall in southern Israel, as well as kidnapping and killing an IDF soldier to use his remains as a bargaining chip. The release did not detail what type of attack was planned on the hall or where it was located. According to media reports, the intended target was the Narnia event hall in Beersheba.

56. U.S. slaps fresh sanctions against alleged Hezbollah associates

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 10 21

Beirut - The U.S. Treasury Department and Saudi authorities Thursday announced fresh sanctions against alleged Lebanese members and financial backers of Hezbollah in the latest international crackdown against the group. The U.S. State Department announced that the U.S.-based assets of Lebanese national Haytham Ali Tabatabai, also known as Abu Ali al-Tabatabai, had been frozen under U.S. counterterrorism laws. U.S. authorities believe Tabatabai commands Hezbollah special forces on the ground in Syria, the State Department said in a statement. Others targeted include Lebanese nationals Muhammad al-Mukhtar Kallas, Hasan Jamal-al-Din, Yosef Ayad and Muhammad Ghaleb Hamdar. The sanctions also prevent U.S. citizens from doing business with these individuals. Baabda-based Global Cleaners SARL was also accused of financing the group. The Treasury Department said it is owned or controlled by Adham Tabaja and had sanitation contracts in Baghdad.

57. Yemen Government Expects Houthis to Procrastinate on Truce

Asharq Al-Awsat, Arafat Madabish and Abdul Hadi Habtoor, 2016 10 21

Aden, Riyadh - A new ceasefire announced by the U.N. for 72 hours went into effect in Yemen just before midnight Wednesday but remains a test for both warring parties, particularly with rebels' record in breaching all previous truces. The command of the Arab Coalition forces to support the legitimacy in Yemen said in a statement issued Wednesday that a three-day ceasefire has kicked off in Yemen in response to a request made by Yemeni President Abed Rabbuh Mansour Hadi in a letter addressed to Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques King Salman bin Abdulaziz. In his letter, Hadi informed the King that international and regional efforts exerted between the U.N., Hadi and the coalition have led to an agreement on a ceasefire for 72 hours. Hadi said the most important part of this agreement is the adherence of the Houthis and their allies to the ceasefire to allow humanitarian aid to enter areas under siege, especially in the city of Taiz.

58. Agent(e) s de terrain

Le Figaro Magazine, Rémi Kauffer, 2016 10 21

Paris - Deux livres donnent une idée concrète du travail de terrain des agent(e) s de renseignement. Surtout remarqué par les médias pour une polémique concernant les circonstances de la libération de sept otages français au Mali, Jean-Marc Gadoullet, ancien officier du service action de la DGSE, s'étend aussi sur certaines opérations du début des années 2000 au Congo, au Kosovo ou au Tchad. Bien qu'en exagérant la portée - aucun agent n'a jamais « sauvé le monde » à lui seul -, il offre un témoignage vécu sur l'activité pratique du SA. Plus large est la visée de Dalila Kerchouche. Grand reporter à Madame Figaro, elle a recueilli les confidences d'un vaste panel d'agentes de renseignement allant des services secrets proprement dits ou aux organismes spécialisés de la police, de la douane ou du ministère des Finances. Baptisées en bloc « espionnes », terme parfois un peu abusif dans leur cas, ces femmes révèlent le grand écart entre le métier d'enquêteur et la vie de famille. Elles dévoilent les rapports contrastés avec les collègues masculins, mais se montrent moins prolixes sur leurs missions, évoquées dans les grandes lignes seulement ou au travers d'anecdotes « décalées » avec soin.

59. Deux Français membres de "Daech" condamnés à six et dix ans de prison

La Relève (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 10 20

Paris - Deux français membres du groupe terroriste Daech, partis en 2014 en Syrie pour faire le jihad, ont été condamnés mardi à six et dix ans de prison par la Cour d'appel de Paris, a-t-on indiqué de source judiciaire. La cour a ainsi confirmé le jugement rendu en janvier dernier par le tribunal correctionnel de Paris contre les deux prévenus âgés respectivement de 28 et 22 ans, en l'assortissant dans les deux cas d'une période de sûreté des deux tiers et d'une inscription au fichier national automatisé des auteurs d'infractions terroristes. Les deux hommes sont partis en Syrie au début de l'année 2014. L'un d'eux n'est pas rentré en France et a prêté allégeance au groupe terroriste Daech. Il a travaillé dans la "police" de l'organisation et a participé au recrutement de jihadistes étrangers, selon des sources proches de l'enquête.

60. Foreign intel agencies behind Gülenists: former minister

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 10 20

Ankara - A former police chief and interior minister, Mehmet Agar, has told a parliamentary commission investigating the July 15 coup attempt that all illegal organizations, like the Gülenist network, have had links with foreign intelligence services. "Every secret organization in Turkey has foreign links. Usually, those links involve foreign intelligence services," Mehmet Agar told the commission on Oct. 20. Agar did not detail which foreign services were behind the Gülenist network blamed for the July coup attempt. Attending the commission, Agar indicated that while struggling against illegal organizations, mistakes could cause sympathizers to become militants. "When operating a struggle against such organizations, the main purpose should be to cancel this organization out, and to develop necessary measures to inhibit their re-emergence," he said. "Sympathizers should be given an opportunity to be rehabilitated and to return. If there are problems in investigations about them, they will become militants."

61. Germany reforms its main intelligence service

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 10 21

Berlin - Germany's lower house of parliament, the Bundestag, has passed a comprehensive reform of the country's main intelligence service, the BND. The new legislation strengthens government monitoring of intelligence activities while explicitly allowing the BND to carry out certain types of surveillance activities. The reform comes in the wake of the 2013 revelations by American whistleblower Edward Snowden that a number of national intelligence services, including the BND, had spied on behalf of the US National Security Agency (NSA) and that the NSA had spied on its allies. That prompted the formation of a German parliamentary committee to draft intelligence agency reforms. The new legislation subjects the BND to monitoring by an "independent panel" of two judges and a federal prosecutor and a "permanent commissioner" from the Interior Ministry. It stipulates that surveillance of international communications networks must be authorized by the Chancellor's Office rather than by the BND itself and explicitly prohibits economic and industrial espionage. The new laws also provide for better protection for whistleblowers within intelligence services and subjects the BND to annual public hearings instead of private ones, as has been the case. The reform permits the BND to cooperate with foreign intelligence services like the NSA if it serves specific purposes, including fighting terrorism, supporting the German military on foreign missions or collecting information concerning the safety of Germans abroad.

62. Guerre des mines : Londres et Paris vont développer des drones

Le Figaro, Véronique Guillemard, 2016 10 21

Paris - Laurent Collet-Billon, délégué général à l'armement, et Harriett Baldwin, son homologue britannique, ont donné ce jeudi le coup d'envoi du projet de lutte contre les mines. Initié en 2010, le programme Counter Measures (MMCM) prévoit de doter les deux pays de nouvelles capacités stratégiques de lutte contre les mines sous-marines, d'ici à 2021. Après avoir réalisé des études de faisabilité qui ont permis de valider le projet, le consortium franco-britannique emmené par le français Thales va construire deux démonstrateurs technologiques de drones de surface et sous-marins. Cela, pour un budget de 150 millions d'euros, financés à 50-50 par Paris et Londres. Les drones doivent être livrés aux deux Marines en 2019. « Ce projet innovant renforce davantage les relations de défense franco-britanniques », a déclaré Harriett Baldwin. Malgré le Brexit, les deux puissances militaires et nucléaires européennes restent plus que jamais partenaires dans la défense.

63. Isis sees European terror attacks as new priority after Iraq and Syria setbacks

The Independent (UK), Kim Sengupta, 2016 10 21

Urfa, Turkey - Senior Isis leaders have been forced to accept that they will lose their caliphate in Syria and Iraq and see terrorist attacks in the West as the way forward for jihad, according to foreign fighters who are abandoning the Islamist group as it faces an onslaught in Mosul and an impending attack on Raqqa. The killings of some of their best commanders, divisions and fear of treachery have contributed to Isis steadily losing territory, according to two Belgian Muslims who recently deserted and fled to Turkey. At the same time, destruction of munitions has led to the group depending more and more on light weapons, suicide bomb cars and IEDs (improvised explosive devices) to try and stem the offensives being launched against it. "When Daesh [Isis] went into Iraq and took the armour and Humvees from the Iraqi army, it was a big success because it allowed them to move forward very fast. But once the bombing started by the Americans a lot of these armoured cars and Humvees just got smashed; moving around in them just made you a big target," said Rachid, 27, who used to work as a mechanic in Belgium before his journey to Syria. "Now the Daesh leaders talk about ribat, which means defending territory, not going forward, so it is a different kind of warfare. Daesh have [surface-to-air] missiles, sure. They have even built their own but how many planes have they brought down? Very few, it is not so easy with modern planes," he continued. "They still have very good bombmakers and suicide cars are very good because they are effective and really make the enemy afraid. But when the Americans and the Russians started their air strikes these cars were getting blown up before they got to the enemy, so not so effective now and also numbers of people volunteering to be suicide bombers has fallen. "But you can get people prepared to be suicide bombers in Europe and they can cause much more damage. So, the leaders of Daesh are saying that is where the struggle should take place. A lot of the brothers now feel Mosul cannot be held, Raqqa cannot be held. So, the fight is moving to Europe".

64. Les actes antimusulmans en baisse en 2016

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 10 21

Paris - Les actes antimusulmans ont baissé sur les neuf premiers mois de l'année 2016 (-53,9%) par rapport à la même période en 2015, marquée par le contexte des attentats contre Charlie Hebdo et l'Hyper Cacher de Vincennes, a annoncé hier l'Observatoire national contre l'islamophobie. Quelque 149 actes antimusulmans ont été enregistrés entre janvier et septembre 2016, contre 323 en 2015, selon l'Observatoire. Cette composante du Conseil français du culte musulman (CFCM) recoupe ses chiffres avec les plaintes et mains courantes remontées au ministère de l'Intérieur. Il en ressort une liste d'actes antimusulmans ventilés en actions (agression contre des personnes ou des lieux de culte...) et menaces (propos et lettres d'injures notamment). "Cyber-haine" Entre janvier et septembre 2016, 52 actions antimusulmanes ont été enregistrées, contre 96 pour la même période en 2015 (-45,8 %). Quelque 97 menaces ont également été recensées, contre 227 en 2015 (-57,3%). "En revanche, l'islamophobie, via la cyber-haine reste en forte progression depuis l'attentat du 14 juillet à Nice", souligne l'Observatoire.

65. Teen Girl Stands Trial in Germany on Terror Charges

Asharq Al-Awsat, Majid al-Khateeb, 2016 10 21

Berlin - A teenage German girl of Moroccan origin went on trial in Germany Thursday for "attempted murder, grievous bodily harm and support for a foreign terrorist organization." Safia S., 16, was in the dock in the northern city of Celle, with the court due to decide whether the proceedings would take place behind closed doors because she is a minor. The German-Moroccan national risks 10 years in prison for stabbing a police officer, an assault allegedly "ordered" by ISIS but which was not claimed by the jihadist group. Prosecutors said the teenager, who is believed to have been radicalized as a young girl, had sought to catch the attention of police officers by following them around at the main train station in the northern city of Hanover. As the officers called her over for an identity check, Safia S. stabbed one of them in the neck with a long vegetable knife before being overpowered by another officer.

1. Curbs Needed on Sweeping Powers to Spy on Canadians

The Tyee, Micheal Vonn, 2016 10 27

Analysis: The Security of Canada Information Sharing Act -- also known as "the Information Sharing Act" -- was enacted as part of Bill C-51. It gives expanded powers to federal government agencies to collect and share Canadians' personal information, ostensibly for the purposes of "national security," but not in the way that term is usually used. The federal Privacy Commissioner's office describes the surveillance capacity given to government agencies under the Act as "unprecedented." The Information Sharing Act gives listed federal bodies (said to represent more than 100 agencies) the ability to disclose Canadians' personal information to other government institutions that have mandates or responsibilities that are relevant to the detection, identification, analysis, prevention, investigation or disruption of "activities that undermine the security of Canada." This term -- "activities that undermine the security of Canada"-- is a special concept that is entirely new to Canadian law. It is so broad that, according to the act, it goes far beyond public safety and includes aspects of ordinary public life ranging from "the administration of justice" to Canada's financial and economic stability. The act does not require individualized suspicion as a basis for information sharing amongst government agencies. There is no impediment in the Act to having entire databases shared with CSIS or the RCMP. The standard for "sharing" is very, very low. No compelling reason for the legislation has ever been given. In their recent response to the government's Green Paper, professors Kent Roach and Craig Forcese cite a CSIS briefing note from 2014 that set out some concerns about a lack of clarity with respect to sharing information for national security purposes. The briefing note did not call for a wholesale re-visioning of information sharing to address this concern, but rather suggested that "With appropriate direction and framework in place, significant improvements are possible to encourage information sharing for national security purposes, on the basis of existing legislative authorities." The intelligence alliance called the Five Eyes (comprised of agencies from the U.S., U.K., Australia, New Zealand and Canada) is having rather a bad time of it with respect to findings that it is conducting illegal surveillance on a massive scale. Our good friends at Privacy International just achieved a landmark ruling in the U.K. The Investigatory Powers Tribunal ruled that British security agencies have secretly and unlawfully collected massive volumes of personal data in breach of Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights and that this unlawful activity has been going on for years and years. 2. Monsef said she wanted to keep Iran trip 'hush hush'

Calgary Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 10 27

Column: Despite finally being open about it Tuesday, Democratic Institutions Minister Maryam Monsef wanted to keep her recent trip to Iran and Afghanistan "hush hush," according to an interview she did after returning to Canada in 2014. In a YouTube interview with Mike Judson, dated Dec. 6, 2014, Judson said "you had just done a visit back to Afghanistan, and it was kind of hush hush." "Yeah," replied Monsef. "Do you still want that visit to remain hush hush?" asked Judson. "Sort of," replied Monsef. "Not because of safety," she said, although she didn't explain why she wanted the trip to remain "hush hush." Monsef said she was in Iran and planned to cross into Afghanistan by car. When they arrived at the border, however, the situation seemed unsafe. "So we just did a U (turn)," said Monsef. "I got my passport stamped and got the visa stuff looked after, and just got back into the car and drove back." Instead, according to Monsef, she spent the next "two months or so" in Iran, from December 2013 until early 2014, staying with relatives and working with Afghan refugees in Iran. When Monsef was appointed into Trudeau's cabinet in late 2015, she was vetted by the RCMP and CSIS. One of the requirements for security clearance is to disclose all foreign travel within a ten-year period. Did Monsef disclose her trips to Iran and Afghanistan? Was the Prime Minister's Office aware of Monsef's extensive travel history in the region, in 2010, 2013 and 2014? Did they know about her Afghan passport? Or was the whole thing kept "hush hush"?

3. Bring heroes home

Toronto Sun, Joe Warmington, 2016 10 27

Column: It upset me very much to hear our brave interpreters were attacked while peacefully demonstrating in front of the Canadian Embassy in Afghanistan on Wednesday. Who were those gun-toting thugs in Kabul who punched out and threatened our hero Afghan interpreters? Did the Canadian Embassy do anything to help? I have sent these questions to both Global Affairs Canada and Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Needless to say, the rally did not go well. "While we were holding the folded banners and walking towards a park, we were stopped by armed strangers," interpreter Alex tells me. "They asked us 'what were you guys doing in front of the Canada Embassy' and 'what do the texts mean on the banners that you guys are carrying?' " Freedom of speech or protest isn't exactly free in Afghanistan. "We avoided saying a single word and kept going," explains Alex. "They started engaging us and insulting us, they were saying, 'you the interpreters are the infidels' slaves.' " That's when the beatings started. "They started fighting," said Alex. "One of us got injured so we took him to a hospital. We said it was just a personal hostility. We didn't disclose our rally even in hospital." This all happened after a one-day delay of the rally due to security concerns. "We were confused about the strangers who engaged us," said Alex. "I mean, who were those armed guys? We really couldn't recognize those strangers."

4. Canada orders anthrax vaccine

National Post, Tom Blackwell, 2016 10 27

Ottawa - Recalling a largely forgotten terrorist threat, the Public Health Agency of Canada has ordered up to 28,000 doses of anthrax vaccine, saying the bacteria remains "one of the most dangerous and lethal" possible biological weapons. The agency issued a sole-source tender recently for 15,000 to 28,000 shots of BioThrax from the Michigan company Emergent Bio-Solutions, to be delivered over five years. But the federal department refuses to say how the vaccine would be used or who would receive it in the event of an attack. Meanwhile, the stockpile is a small fraction per capita of what the American government has ordered recently, suggesting relatively few Canadians would have access to it. A former federal cabinet minister who dealt with what turned out to be anthrax false alarms while Toronto's police chief says buying the vaccine makes sense, regardless of how likely Canada is to be targeted. "The one thing I've always been concerned about in all my years in public safety, be it as police chief or (Ontario) commissioner of emergency management, is that the things you don't know are the things you fear the most," said Julian Fantino, now a board member of the Mackenzie Institute security think-tank. Its potential use as a weapon, however, means it's still a publichealth threat, said Rebecca Gilman, a Public Health Agency spokeswoman. "It is among the most dangerous and lethal agents available for a bioterror attack, with extraordinarily high mortality rates if people exposed to anthrax are not treated quickly," she said in an emailed statement. The tender indicates the vaccine could be used both as a preventive measure and "prophylactically" after someone had been exposed to anthrax, which kills 80 per cent of those who breath in the spores. However, Gilman said she was unable to comment on who would potentially receive it or under what circumstances, as those details are kept under wraps for "national security reasons." "This information could end up in the hands of those who could use it to inform their plans to harm Canadians through an act of terrorism," she said.

5. Conservatives accuse Liberals of concealing extent of Iraq mission iPolitics.ca, Janice Dickson, 2016 10 27

Ottawa - Conservative Interim Leader Rona Ambrose alleged today that the Liberals are no longer briefing the media on Canada's role in its anti-ISIS mission in Iraq. Ambrose said Trudeau "is not being transparent with Canadians about our role in these combat operations. He called it a training mission, but we have learned through social media that our troops on the front lines and engaging the enemy. This is serious." In question period today, she accused the Liberals' of changing the communications policy to eliminate technical briefings for media "for political reasons." Prime Minister Justin Trudeau replied by insisting his government remains open and transparent about the mission -- "but we will not compromise their safety for a communications exercise here at home." While the Canadian Forces and Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan continue to update the media on Canada's mission in Iraq, media were told earlier this month that the Canadian Forces will no longer disclose details when Canadian troops come under fire from ISIS militants while advising and assisting Kurdish fighters on the front lines in Iraq. McKay said that the government will assess the needs of the coalition, but right now the mission is focused on Iraq. McKay did not answer an additional question from Paul-Hus about whether an extended mission in Syria would be put to a vote in Parliament.

7. La CPI est-elle menacée ?

La Presse+, Jean-Thomas Léveillé, 2016 10 27

Québec - Après le Burundi et l'Afrique du Sud, plus tôt ce mois-ci, la Gambie est devenue hier le troisième pays à signifier son intention de se retirer de la Cour pénale internationale. Ces trois pays, tous dans le collimateur des défenseurs des droits de la personne, affirment que la Cour s'acharne sur les Africains. Son existence est-elle menacée ? Tout indique que le Burundi deviendra le premier pays du monde à se retirer de la Cour pénale internationale (CPI), qu'il accuse d'être à la solde des grandes puissances. Le président burundais Pierre Nkurunziza a promulgué la semaine dernière la loi adoptée par l'Assemblée nationale et le Sénat portant sur le retrait de Bujumbura du Statut de Rome, qui a donné naissance à la CPI en 1998. Il ne manque plus que la notification officielle au secrétaire général des Nations unies. L'annonce de ce retrait survient après que la CPI a entamé le printemps dernier un examen préliminaire « sur des actes de meurtre, d'emprisonnement, de torture, de viol et d'autres formes de violences sexuelles ainsi que sur des cas de disparitions forcées survenus au Burundi depuis avril 2015 », lorsque la candidature du président Pierre Nkurunziza à un troisième mandat a été annoncée. « C'est le propre des gouvernements autoritaires de se retirer des systèmes, surtout internationaux, qui les critiquent. » -- Fannie Lafontaine, titulaire de la Chaire de recherche du Canada sur la justice internationale pénale et les droits fondamentaux de l'Université Laval

8. La rédemption d'un ancien suprémaciste blanc

Québec - « On devient comme des missiles », raconte en entrevue un jeune homme radicalisé par des néonazis. Après dix ans d'activité au sein de groupes suprémacistes blancs, Daniel Gallant cherche aujourd'hui à tenir les jeunes à distance des néonazis. À quelques jours de sa participation à la conférence de l'UNESCO « Internet et la radicalisation des jeunes: prévenir, agir et vivre ensemble », il nous parle de son nouveau combat pour le dialogue. « Les maganés de la vie, les gens comme moi, on était considérés comme des missiles. On nous remplissait de carburant et on nous regardait littéralement exploser », raconte-t-il lors d'un entretien téléphonique depuis la Colombie-Britannique. Né dans une famille complètement dysfonctionnelle, Daniel Gallant était une bombe à retardement à 19 ans quand un groupe suprémaciste blanc l'a recruté. « En ciblant les sionistes, ça me donnait des gens à blâmer pour tout ce que je haïssais dans ce monde, comme avoir été battu par mon beau-père, avoir été élevé par six putains de beaux-pères... Toute cette merde, je pouvais la mettre sur le dos des juifs », raconte-t-il dans une vidéo de l'organisme Extreme Dialogue. « Pour prouver mon allégeance au groupe, j'avais décidé d'agresser une personne par jour.

10. Man surrenders to Quebec police after Muslim centre vandalized

Associated Press, Sidhartha Banerjee, 2016 10 27

Ottawa - Alcohol, not hate, fuelled a break-in and extensive vandalism at a Muslim centre in a remote part of Quebec, say provincial police. "It's the first business he (the accused) saw after he left the bar," said Sgt. Jean Tremblay, adding police believe the suspect was very inebriated. Authorities spoke with the 38-year-old suspect and said they don't believe the vandalism in Sept-Iles, which occurred at around 2:30 a.m. Tuesday, was a hate crime. The man turned himself in that afternoon after the incident at the centre, which was expected to open in the coming weeks. Nizar Aouini, a member of the local Muslim community, said he felt moved by the support he has received from people in the town, which is about 900 kilometres northeast of Montreal on the province's upper north shore. Photos posted by Aouini on Facebook showed plants strewn around the floor of the centre, a destroyed bookshelf and a toppled computer screen. The centre's director, Ben Rouine, says the centre was set to open in a few weeks.

11. Our national security needs a global perspective

Globe and Mail, Kent Roach, Stephen Toope & Carmen Cheung, 2016 10 27

Analysis: This fall, the federal government is asking Canadians for their views on national security policy. It is an important opportunity for all of us to engage in a national discussion on what our government should do - and not do - to keep us safe. Thinking about national security policy requires a global perspective. There are lessons to be learned from strategies and experiments in other countries. International organizations also influence how national governments respond to transnational security threats. The interplay between the local and the global is most obvious when the threat to national security comes from transnational terrorism. Terrorist organizations based in other countries may be able to influence Canadians to commit acts of terror at home or to join struggles abroad. Violence in Syria, Afghanistan and Somalia affects how Canadian policy makers respond to domestic threats. One example of the need for global and comparative perspective is with strategies to "prevent radicalization to violence." Building on a 2014 Security Council resolution, United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has issued a plan of action to prevent violent extremism. It recognizes the importance of human rights, the rule of law, economic opportunities and empowering youth and women in preventing violent extremism. It also calls for the creation of national strategies. Canada has been slow in moving toward such a strategy, though the government has recently committed $35-million over five years to establish an Office of the Community Outreach and Counter-radicalization Coordinator. This initiative provides an opportunity to learn from international experience. 12. Racism in policing is about outcomes, not intentions

Toronto Star, Desmond Cole, 2016 10 27

Opinion: A two-year study of police traffic stops in Ottawa has revealed - to no one's surprise - that cops in the nation's capital disproportionately pull over Middle Eastern and black drivers. Since police across Canada are being exposed for similar practices, their hollow excuses about a few bad apples are becoming less effective. Instead, our police increasingly argue that prejudiced police behaviour is well-intentioned, and therefore cannot be labelled as racist. Ottawa police chief Charles Bordeleau is using this strategy to shield his officers from accountability. Bordeleau has explained the targeting of Middle Eastern and black drivers by saying, "residents want us to be visible and active in areas with high crime or social disorder issues and to respond to violent crimes, shootings and gang activity." Someone should tell the chief that "racism" refers to systemic, unfair outcomes for racialized people - whatever police may believe about good intentions and colour-blindness, they are still abusing us. If a colleague at the Star steps on my foot every time he passes me in the hallway, it hurts. It doesn't matter if my colleague insists he never sees me standing there, or argues that he has to pass my desk to reach his own. What matters is that my toes are broken. Bordeleau is asking Middle Eastern and black residents not only to accept the damage of racist profiling, but to forgive the officers who repeatedly trample their Charter rights, particularly the right to drive Ottawa's streets without being pulled over for the non-offense of being in a "high crime or social disorder" zone. 13. RCMP crafts strategy for returning terrorists

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 10 27

Ottawa - Foreseeing a possible "flood of foreign fighters" from Syria, the RCMP has circulated a strategy that involves trying to understand the returning fighters' intentions and working with communities. The plan calls for monitoring the social media activity of the returnees, placing them on the no-fly list and asking Passport Canada to revoke their travel documents and flag their future passport applications. The RCMP has also compiled a list of indicators to ascertain the "future posture" of returning fighters that includes whether they are employed, married, "raising funds linked to a little-known charity" or "proselytizing." The "range of responses" for dealing with returnees who have received terrorist training abroad or taken part in foreign conflicts is outlined in a report obtained by the National Post under the Access to Information Act. "Amongst other things, the force must also determine whether they are radicalized and intent on committing crimes, including terrorist acts," said the report, Foreign Fighters:

Preventing the Security Threat in Canada and Abroad. The document, which the RCMP provided to federal officials who drafted the 2016 Public Report on the Terrorist Threat to Canada, was released amid concerns about fleeing combatants after Iraqi and Kurdish forces attacked Mosul.

14. RCMP launches new "terrorism awareness guide"

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 10 27

Montreal - With a level of detail unheard of from law enforcement, the RCMP's new "Terrorism and Violent Extremism Awareness Guide (www.rcmp-grc.gc.ca)" tackles everything from how to see whether your kids are becoming radicalized online, to how to check for signs of explosive testing: look for dead plants and unusual corrosion in the sink. Destined for parents, teachers, colleagues and friends of people at risk of becoming radicalized to violence, the guide includes a whole section on "indicators" of radicalization for police use as well, whether it's of the right-wing, left-wing or Islamist variety. Among things to look out for: Suspicious use of the Internet. The guide asks: "Does my child have several accounts on social media and does he/she use different identities in a specific network?" Signs he or she may be planning to travel to a conflict area: Accessing information on obtaining multiple passports, selling personal belongings. Signs he or she may be planning terrorist activities: Attempting to access restricted areas; acquiring weapons training, using drones, paintball. The guide was conceived as a training tool for police on the front line not necessarily up to date on anti-terrorism research and practice, explained RCMP Quebec Superintendent Martine Fontaine. But they soon realized the police could not prevent terrorism alone. There is no profile to look out for, but rather a "cluster" of changes, it says. Some are obvious, like an "overconsumption of violent propaganda" on the Internet. Others, like a change in appearance and dress style, are less obvious, and on their own may not mean anything. There is also a section devoted to left-wing extremists, like Anonymous, the "hacktivist" group that has disrupted websites in defence of a number of causes. This is not the first time the RCMP has tried to share its knowledge or enlist the help of the wider community. The United Against Terrorism handbook included a whole chapter written by the RCMP on understanding radicalization. But the RCMP withdrew its support for the document, developed with the Islamic Social Services Association and the National Council of Canadian Muslims the day after its launch in September 2014, because of the "adversarial tone" of the other chapters, which included a section on rights and responsibilities of Canadian Muslims.

15. Sécurité nationale La lutte à l'EI en Irak pourrait avoir un impact au Canada, prévient la GRC

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche, 2016 10 27

Montréal - L'intensification des combats contre le groupe armé État islamique dans la région de Mossoul, en Irak, pourrait avoir un impact au Canada en mobilisant certains partisans du groupe, prévient la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC). Celle-ci demande aux citoyens de demeurer « vigilants », tout en se gardant d'« être paranoïaques ». « La ville va être libérée, des gens fuient, et ils vont aller quelque part. Sans être paranoïaques, on doit être conscients de cette menace », souligne la surintendante Martine Fontaine, responsable de la prévention au Québec pour le corps policier fédéral. « Il n'y a plus de frontières : tout ce qui se passe à l'international a un impact partout. Avec internet, [toute la liberté] de mouvement des gens, les voyages, on doit être à l'affût de ce qui se passe à l'étranger, car on a des gens vulnérables qui sont influencés par la propagande. Ça demeure une préoccupation de tous les pays que les gens qui ont combattu avec Daech [le groupe armé État islamique] reviennent ou aillent continuer à combattre ailleurs », dit-elle. Alors que le terrorisme demeure la « principale menace au Canada en matière de sécurité nationale », la GRC dit compter sur l'aide du public afin d'ouvrir l'oeil.

16. Time for Tories to stop pandering to fear, hate

Toronto Star, Bob Hepburn, 2016 10 27

Column: First, it was Kellie Leitch with her plan for screening of potential immigrants for "anti-Canadian values." Now comes Steven Blaney with his proposals to test all citizenship applicants to preserve "Canadian identity" and to ban federal employees from wearing niqab face coverings at work. "It is critical that we make sure that new Canadians fully endorse the Canadian principles that are the foundations of our society," Blaney, a Quebec MP, said this week as he formally entered the federal Conservative leadership race. Leitch and Blaney are among a dozen or so possible candidates seeking the leadership, but their outspoken comments on immigration and Canadian "values," "principles" and "identity" have gained them far more news coverage than any of their competitors. Cynical politics on their part, or do they reflect a growing trend in Canada? Clearly, these two federal MPs are eagerly stirring the cesspool of fear, anger and hatred that has played a huge role in the populist anti-immigrant movement behind Donald Trump in the U.S. and the rise of right-wing politicians in Europe. In Canada, Leitch and Blaney are trying to tap into the deep discontent of some sectors of Canadian society, expressing a populist paranoid view of immigration, refugees and mainstream politics. At a glance, such an approach seems out of step with how Canadians really feel about immigration and values. That's because Canadians are becoming more immigrant-friendly - not less - than ever before, according to a new national poll.

Tribune de Genève, Olivier Bot, 2016 10 27

Moscou - Dans un entretien virtuel, le lanceur d'alerte Edward Snowden estime que le droit à la vie privée est toujours menacé par l'Etat « Les sociétés les plus connectées ont plus à craindre de la surveillance globale que d'un pays comme la Corée du Nord. » Depuis la Russie, où il a obtenu l'asile jusqu'en 2017, le lanceur d'alerte Edward Snowden a participé mardi à une discussion virtuelle programmée par le Global Editors Network et le quotidien allemand Süddeutsche Zeitung, dans le cadre d'un atelier sur les nouvelles formes de journalisme d'enquête. Celui qui révéla le programme « Prism » de surveillance électronique mondiale s'inquiète toujours des atteintes à la vie privée et à la liberté des citoyens grâce à l'interconnexion des données. « La NSA est à l'intersection de nombreuses sources de données, téléphone, Internet, e-mail. 18. Al Qaeda's ruthless pragmatism makes it more dangerous than Islamic State

Reuters, Colin P. Clarke, Barak Mendelsohn, 2016 10 27

Comment - Policymakers and terrorism scholars are debating whether al Qaeda or Islamic State is the more dangerous threat to the United States and the West. After the various bombings and attacks across the West, many experts insist Islamic State is the more serious problem. That is a mistake. Al Qaeda presents the gravest long-term problem to the West. Al Qaeda's ruthlessly pragmatic approach has placed it in a far better position to achieve its strategic objectives. It has proved more effective in taking advantage of U.S. policy in the Middle East, primarily in Syria, to legitimize itself as an armed force and, increasingly, as a viable political player. The al Qaeda-linked Jabhat al-Nusra, since rebranded Jabhat Fateh al-Sham, or JFS, is quietly morphing into a mainstream option in the broader panoply of rebel groups operating in Syria, even as Islamic State's caliphate continues to shrink and the United States and Russia spar over mistaken targets. If Jabhat Fateh al-Sham successfully embeds within the Syrian opposition, it could prolong the conflict in Syria. Even more worrisome, with a concerted political and military strategy, it could attain the long-term success that Hezbollah has achieved in neighboring Lebanon. With a highly capable, well-trained and well-armed franchise group on the periphery of Europe, al Qaeda would be even more dangerous than Islamic State. Note: Colin P. Clarke is a political scientist at the nonprofit, nonpartisan RAND Corporation. Barak Mendelsohn is an associate professor at Haverford College and author of "The al-Qaeda Franchise: The Expansion of Al-Qaeda and Its Consequences."

19. American Arrested in Tunisia for Terrorism Says He's the Islamic Messiah

The Daily Beast, Katie Zavadski, 2016 10 27

New York - One of two Michigan brothers arrested in Tunisia this week on suspicion of terror says he is the Islamic messiah foretold to bring about Judgment Day, according to social media posts discovered by The Daily Beast. NBC News identified one of the brothers as Patrick Alan Lawwill, 31, based on a passport shown to them by Tunisian officials Wednesday morning. Public records show Patrick has one brother who matches the age of the other suspect arrested in Tunisia, 32-year-old Nathan Wells Lawwill. Nathan posts on Facebook under a pseudonym where he says he is a convert to Islam who does not speak much Arabic and recently married in Tunisia. The day before his arrest, Nathan wrote he is a divine being. "I am two in one. Mahdi to Muslims and Messiah to the Jews," he wrote. "Christians hate me because they know Jesus when they see him. But not Jesus when I am hidden in plain sight. Did you not read all the parable and see the signs when I was still yet with you and now too?"

20. How the Kremlin Handles Hacks: Deny, Deny, Deny

Bloomberg View, Leonid Bershidsky, 2016 10 26

Column - The U.S. presidential election has made "Russian hackers" a powerful brand. There is, however, another that surpasses it: Ukrainian hackers. And the story of their most recent hack contains valuable lessons for U.S. politicians, particularly Hillary Clinton and the Democrats. A Ukrainian hacker collective calling itself CyberHunta -- a mocking reference to Russian propaganda outlets' moniker for the Kiev government, the junta -- claimed on Oct. 23 to have broken into an electronic mailbox that belongs to Vladislav Surkov, President Vladimir Putin's adviser for dealing with former Soviet breakaway regions. The purported hacked e-mails supposedly contain sensitive information, including, for example, a lengthy plan of "urgent measures for the destabilization of the situation in Ukraine." Unlike Clinton's allies after their e-mails were published, the Kremlin immediately denied the authenticity of the leaked communications. Putin's press secretary, Dmitri Peskov, told reporters that Surkov didn't use e-mail, so those who claim to have broken into his mailbox "must have had to sweat quite a lot" to forge messages. Peskov's denials have been refuted. The Atlantic Council's Digital Forensic Research Lab explained that the hackers' proof -- a large Microsoft Outlook data file -- contained header information for 2,237 messages, which would have required an impossible amount of sweat to forge. Besides, like any normal mailbox -- that of Clinton aide John Podesta, for example -- prm_surkova@gov.ru received plenty of routine and spam messages. They were all in the Ukrainian data dump, and they were consistent with those other Moscow recipients got at the same time. The denial, however, precluded journalists from asking the Kremlin about the stolen e-mails again, and it cast just enough doubt on the Ukrainian feat to make the story a little less newsworthy. The Democrats could have said the WikiLeaks e-mails were forged or doctored -- and no one could have proved otherwise.

21. Pentagon Says Airstrikes Targeted Qaeda Leaders

New York Times, Helene Cooper, 2016 10 27

Washington - The United States military carried out airstrikes on Sunday in eastern Afghanistan aimed at two of Al Qaeda's most senior leaders operating in the country, an attack described as one of the most significant in Afghanistan in several years, the Pentagon announced on Wednesday. An official statement said the Defense Department continued to assess whether the two men, Faruq al-Qatani and Bilal al-Utubi, were killed in the airstrikes. Peter Cook, the Pentagon press secretary, said on Wednesday night that "their demise would represent a significant blow to the terrorist group's presence in Afghanistan." He said the attacks came after an extensive period of surveillance over remote areas of Kunar Province. Mr. Qatani was described as Al Qaeda's emir for northeastern Afghanistan, assigned by the terrorist group's leadership to re-establish havens for operations throughout the country. Mr. Cook called him a "senior planner for attacks against the United States," with a long history of directing strikes against American and NATO forces.

22. Philippines emerge as 'jihad of choice' after Obama phases out counterterrorism operation

Washington Times, Guy Taylor, 2016 10 27

Washington - Support for the Islamic State has deepened cooperation among several extremist groups in Southeast Asia, which soon could focus on a decades-old insurgency in the Philippines as their "jihad of choice" while the terrorist group is beaten back half a world away in Syria and Iraq. Those findings, highlighted in a report this week by an Indonesia-based think tank, are likely to vex the Obama administration, which moved two years ago to phase out what had been for more than a decade a robust U.S. Special Forces counterterrorism operation in the southern Philippines. The report by the Institute for Policy Analysis of Conflict stresses how the Middle East-based leaders of the Islamic State group, also known as ISIS and ISIL, are expanding operations into Southeast Asia and view the Philippines as an annex. "The Philippines is important because as far as the ISIS leadership is concerned, it is the extension of the caliphate in the region," says the report, noting that the terrorist group has not declared a province but has increased ties with the formerly al Qaeda-aligned Abu Sayyaf in the nation's restive southwest. "Over the last two years, ISIS has provided a new basis for cooperation among extremists in the region," Sidney Jones, director of the Institute for Policy Analysis of Conflict, said in a statement on releasing the report Tuesday. "That cooperation could take on a new importance as ISIS losses in the Middle East increase and the incentive to undertake violence elsewhere rises."

23. Putin's chaos strategy is coming back to bite him in the ass

Foreign Policy, Mark Galeotti, 2016 10 27

Comment - Back in March, when the U.S. elections still seemed far away -- back before anyone had heard the name Fancy Bear and before everyone knew John Podesta's risotto secrets -- I was in Moscow talking to a Russian who had previously worked in the Kremlin. Over the course of a wide-ranging conversation, it became clear that we agreed on one key characteristic of Vladimir Putin. He called it the "Putin Paradox" and defined it thus: The Russian president's tactical instincts for how to seize an opportunity are so brilliant, and yet the strategic outcomes are almost invariably disastrous. Seven months later, the saga of Russian meddling in America's presidential election has managed to illustrate the "Putin Paradox" perfectly. There can be little serious debate at this point that Moscow is indeed meddling. Despite Donald Trump's skepticism, the U.S. intelligence community has collectively blamed Russia for the hack of Hillary Clinton's campaign emails, which were released by the website WikiLeaks, and the hack of the Democratic National Committee. In addition to this more hands-on interference, Russia's foreign-language state media, notably the RT television network and Sputnik press agency, consistently push a partisan, anti-Clinton line and spread claims of election rigging and other shenanigans. (This is tame, by the way, in comparison with the over-the-top rhetoric of Russian TV host and propagandist Dmitry Kiselyov, who claimed the U.S. establishment might kill Trump rather than let him become president -- but such bombast is intended for domestic consumption and not to influence the U.S. vote.) There are also concerns, still unproven, that Russians could hack electronic voting systems on Election Day. And yet, for all this effort, what has been achieved? There have been some successes -- but they seem likely to come at a very high cost. The success of Russia's intervention must be measured relative to its goals. Although a Trump victory seems increasingly unlikely, there's little reason to think that's what the Kremlin ever really wanted. The Republican nominee may seem like something of a fellow traveler now - - it was noticeable that even during the third debate he batted away opportunities to distance himself from Putin -- but he would be an unpredictable president. Putin has gotten used to operating as the wildest man on the geopolitical stage; a Trump presidency might severely cramp his style and his strategic calculations.

24. Refugees Felt at Home, Until White Militia Came

New York Times, Jack Healy, 2016 10 27

Garden City, Kansas - The newest pioneers in western Kansas arrive from Somalia and Myanmar, Mexico and Sudan: thousands of immigrants and refugees chasing work in the cattle yards and packing plants where pay starts at $16 an hour and little English is needed to saw through meat and bone. Even as Donald J. Trump and other politicians talk about deporting immigrants, blocking refugees and building border walls, many in this conservative corner of Kansas have come to embrace their growing diversity. Pho is a lunchtime staple downtown. The old Kwik Shop on Spruce Street became a Buddhist prayer space. Students in the local schools speak 35 languages. But then came a plot to attack all of that. This month, federal prosecutors announced that three white members of a militia from western Kansas had been accused of planning to bomb the apartments and makeshift mosque where Somali residents of Garden City live and pray. The three men called themselves "the Crusaders," prosecutors said. They called their targets "cockroaches." "I don't know why these people hate," Abdulkadir Mohamed, 68, a community leader in Garden City, said one recent afternoon. "We are not terrorists." Hate crimes in the United States against Muslims and people perceived as Arab have reached the highest level since just after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, new data shows. Researchers say the increase is a backlash against terrorist attacks in places like Paris and San Bernardino, Calif., and the result of anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim language by politicians.

25. Report: Chinese Spies Stole Pentagon Secrets

Washington Free Beacon, Bill Gertz, 2016 10 27

Washington - Chinese spies repeatedly infiltrated U.S. national security agencies, including official email accounts, and stole U.S. secrets on Pentagon war plans for a future conflict with China, according to a forthcoming congressional commission report. "The United States faces a large and growing threat to its national security from Chinese intelligence collection operations," states the late draft report of the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. "Among the most serious threats are China's efforts at cyber and human infiltration of U.S. national security entities." Chinese intelligence activities have "risen significantly" in the past 15 years and are conducted through several spy services, including the Ministry of State Security (MSS), the People's Liberation Army (PLA), and Communist Party military organizations such as the PLA General Political Department and the Party's United Front Work Department. A copy of the draft annual report for 2016 was obtained by the Washington Free Beacon. The final report will be released Nov. 16. The report identified repeated infiltrations by Chinese spies of U.S. national security entities, including the FBI and the U.S. Pacific Command.

26. The U.S. Cyber War With Russia Will Wait for President Hillary Clinton

The Daily Beast, Shane Harris, Nancy A. Youssef, 2016 10 27

Washington - After U.S. intelligence agencies and the Homeland Security Department publicly blamed Russia for a campaign of cyber espionage designed to interfere with the presidential election, the Obama administration promised a response "to protect [the country's] interests at a time and place of our choosing." But that response seems unlikely to come before Election Day. The question of how to retaliate for Russia's unprecedented meddling in the U.S. political system has been the subject of meetings among national security officials, but as of now those plans are still being worked out, according to four officials knowledgeable about the deliberations. Rather, the administration is likely to work in concert with the president-elect to fashion a response, one official said, like the others speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive internal deliberations. It would, after all, fall to that new commander-in-chief to deal with the repercussions or retaliating against Russia.

27. Tunisia Holds 2 From U.S. on Suspicion of Terror Ties

New York Times, Carlotta Gall, 2016 10 27

Jendouba, Tunisia - Two Americans were detained in this small town in northwestern Tunisia, suspected of involvement with a terrorist organization, police officials said on Wednesday. The men were arrested on Tuesday and then transferred to the country's main counterterrorism center in Tunis, the capital, the police said. They were released and driven away in a United States Embassy car on Wednesday, police officials said. The United States Embassy in Tunis said it could not comment on the case and referred questions to the State Department in Washington. A State Department spokesman, John Kirby, said in an email statement that the agency was aware of reports that American citizens had been arrested on suspicion of terrorist activities, but he declined any additional comment. The men are brothers, Nathan Wells Lawwliss, 32, and Patrick Alan Lawwliss, 31, according to both the police and a man who rented them an apartment. The police in this small, hardscrabble town have been dealing with terrorist suspects for several years. Islamist fighters operate in the low scrubby mountains that rise behind the town and occasionally they ambush police officers or lure youths to join them. But the police were scratching their heads over the latest arrivals: two Americans from Michigan with long beards and unkempt hair, who rented an apartment and said they were enrolling in the local university. The men, who had arrived in town on Sunday, were interviewed at the police station on Monday, when the police also obtained a warrant to search their apartment. By Tuesday morning they were under arrest and taken to Tunis. The elder brother possessed photos of Osama bin Laden, as well as numerous photos of women in full Islamic niqab, police officials said. He also displayed the black flag of the Islamic State on his Facebook page. He also had been messaging with someone in Syria on Facebook and expressed his desire to be in the front line of jihad to protect his younger brother, according to a police investigator. The message was dated Oct. 19, he said.

28. Armed officers to travel on Tube amid terror threat

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 10 27

London - Armed police officers are set to travel regularly on trains on the London Underground for the first time as the capital faces a heightened terrorism threat. British Transport Police (BTP) announced plans yesterday for its armed response officers to use trains to "get from A to B" rather than travelling by road. The force believes that the move will help to reassure the public but is also thought to be more convenient because of London's congested roads. A spokeswoman for BTP said that the plan had been hatched before last week's terrorism scare in Greenwich, southeast London. A 19-year-old man, arrested after a suspect device was found on a Jubilee Line train, remained in custody last night and was being questioned by counterterrorism detectives. The plan could cause a row with City Hall, however, because Sadiq Khan, London's mayor, is yet to sign it off.

29. Britain to send hundreds more troops close to Russia border in largest deployment since Cold War

London Daily Telegraph, Multiple reporters, 2016 10 26

London - Britain will send hundreds more troops close to Russia's border, the Government has said, as the Prime Minister also called for "pressure" on Moscow over the Syria crisis. Around 800 soldiers along with tanks, armoured vehicles and drones will now head to Estonia in the spring in a Nato effort to reassure the Baltic states over Russian aggression. The boosted mission, up from 500 announced earlier this year, will be Britain's largest long-term deployment to one of Russia's neighbours since the end of the Cold War. Defence sources said the six-month deployment to Tapa army base, around 100 miles from the border, was the start of a persistent UK presence in the country.

30. Climate change wars are coming, says top general

The Independent (UK), Ian Johnston, 2016 10 27

London - Climate change is threatening to force millions of people to become refugees and spark major wars that could "completely destabilise" the world, a leading general has warned. And countries which attempted to deal with the coming crisis by resorting to "narrow nationalistic instincts" - for example, by building walls to keep out refugees - will only make the problem worse, according to Major General Munir Muniruzzaman, chairman of the Global Military Advisory Council On Climate Change (GMACCC). He added that, while countries had talked a lot about the problems posed by global warming and how to address them, there did not seem to be "much action" on the ground. The GMACCC was set up in 2009 to investigate the security implications of climate change and its members include serving and retired military officers from around the world, such as the UK's Rear Admiral Neil Morisetti and Brigadier General Stephen Cheney, a former US Marine. Speaking ahead of the United Nations climate summit in Marrakesh next month, General Muniruzzaman said it was time to make good on the promises made at last year's historic meeting in Paris with global warming already contributing to flooding and droughts, threatening financial security and affecting people's health. "In our analysis, we are seeing the risk is now becoming all-pervasive from climate change in the sense that it is touching multiple sectors ... many of the sectors are being gravely challenged," he said. "In some areas of the world, some of the issues we are touching on are becoming so severe they hold tremendous conflict potential."

31. EU security intelligence critical to fighting terror, says senior police officer

The Independent (UK), Ashley Cowburn, 2016 10 27

London - Access to information in Europe-wide security databases, including the European Arrest Warrant, is "mission critical" in fighting terrorism, one of Britain's most senior policewomen has said. Helen Ball, the deputy assistant commissioner at the Metropolitan Police, also indicated that citizens in Europe would be at a greater threat from terrorism if Britain failed to work with its allies on the continent after Brexit. Ms Ball, who has been with the police force for over two decades, also ranked the European Arrest Warrant as ten out of ten in combating international terrorism. When asked by the Lords' EU Home Affairs sub-committee about the importance of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) on a scale of 1-10, Ms Ball replied: "At the moment we have very low usage of the European Arrest Warrant and there are very good reasons for that and as I look to the future I suspect we will have greater use of it. "So if I must answer your number question, I'd probably say on low usage at the moment about an eight... and if I'm looking to the future I think it's a 10. We must not be in a position where a terrorist can think, 'okay, there is a safe haven where it's going to take a very long time to be extradited and come to meet justice.'" She added if the European Arrest warrant was not to go forward, she would expect a replacement to bring "justice swiftly". In 2015 alone European countries made almost 13,000 arrest requests for individuals in the UK using the warrant, including 320 on alleged terror related offences, 433 for murder and manslaughter and 191 for rape. In the same year the UK used the EAW to make 228 requests for arrest from other EU countries, including four on terror charges, 19 for murder and manslaughter and 20 for rape. Speaking to peers on the committee, she added: "I think the way that terrorists are currently operating and the way I see them operating in the future that means we have an enormous amount to lose from diminishing our ability to work with European police forces and to share our intelligence with them. We are all safer because we can work together across Europe and share information with each other - that genuinely is helping to keep citizens of Europe safe."

32. Former NSA deputy director opens up about Snowden, Trump and mass surveillance London - John C. Inglis, a 28-year veteran of the National Security Agency (NSA) and deputy director between 2006 and 2014, served across multiple presidencies and held a slew of key roles yet one single name appears to haunt his tenure: Edward Snowden. To the former deputy head, Snowden is not a whistleblower and may indeed be an unwitting pawn of the Kremlin. Sitting calmly in the British Museum, London, Inglis exclusively told IBTimes UK how the agency was "stunned" by the leak now commonly known as the 'NSA files'. "Stunned in two ways," he said. "One, that someone would be audacious enough to release that amount of information, and two that it so misrepresented what the NSA was really doing. When it was all said and done there was a certain anger that came with that. "We were engaged in a dialogue that we were not totally prepared for," he admitted, before adding that staff couldn't "suffer the indulgence" of carrying on being angry. "We had to remind ourselves that we had a higher purpose - to defend the nation and allies of that nation," he said. Yet Inglis firmly believes that history will remember the NSA in a good light. "I think NSA is in the right place and I think history will judge that it was in the right place," he said, before conceding that "it will also judge that it wasn't transparent enough about what it was doing."

33. Six people are subject to Tpims, Home Office reveals

The Guardian (London), Alan Travis, 2016 10 26

London - Six extremists or terror suspects are now subject to official counter-terror orders that include being relocated from their home towns or cities, the Home Office has revealed. The confirmation that there are six orders covering terror prevention and investigation measures (Tpims) in force marks a revival in their use after three years in which no more than one or two individuals have been subject to the orders. The Tpim regime, which replaced counter-terror control orders, can include a range of measures including enforced curfews of up to 10 hours, tagging, requiring a person to live up to 200 miles from their current address and restrictions on overseas travel. They last for up to two years and are the toughest tool the security services can use against people they believe to be involved in terrorism but who cannot be prosecuted or deported. The Home Office said five of the six current Tpim suspects are British. The orders were thought to have largely fallen into disuse since December 2013 when eight Tpims were in force. Their revival coincides with the return to Britain of jihadi fighters from Syria.

34. WikiLeaks 'sowing the seeds of its own destruction' says former NSA chief

International Business Times (UK), James Murdock, 2016 10 26

London - A former deputy director of the US National Security Agency (NSA), John C Inglis, believes that WikiLeaks - the whistleblowing platform led by Julian Assange - has become

"internally confused" in recent years and that "natural forces" may soon wipe it out. "WikiLeaks might be in fact be sowing the seeds of its own destruction," Inglis told IBTimes UK in an exclusive interview on 25 October, indicating the organisation has overstepped a boundary by leaking material which has the potential to influence the upcoming US presidential election. The US government has namechecked Assange's organisation as being complicit in a Russian-led plot to influence the elections and - allegedly after a close word from US Secretary of State John Kerry - the government of Ecuador, which is hosting Assange under political asylum, was forced to step in. "My sense is that when Ecuador shuts down the internet access of Julian Assange - they say we are no longer comfortable with what you do - it might be that WikiLeaks has lost its way," Inglis said. "Not that I agreed with what it was doing in the first place. "I think that from a distance, over time, they have become somewhat internally confused and I'm not sure we need to kick that house over. Maybe in the fullness of time, natural forces will cause it to deteriorate and not be as interesting or as influential as it once was."

35. Islamic State hits Pakistan

The Australian, 2016 10 27

Editorial: Islamic State's central role in the massacre of 61 recruits at a Pakistani police training academy is a grim reminder that the threat posed by the evil forces of the bogus caliphate remains undiminished -- and may even be intensifying -- as they lose significant ground in the crucial battle for Mosul. After meeting in Paris with counterparts from 12 coalition countries, including our Defence Minister Marise Payne, US Defence Secretary Ash Carter has warned advances against Islamic State in Iraq and Syria could lead to the jihadists launching more attacks elsewhere. The brazen onslaught against the academy is clearly what he envisaged. Islamic State is now seeking to become a major terrorist force across Pakistan and Afghanistan in competition with the Taliban, linking with the deadly local Sunni terror group Lashkar-e-Jhangvi, long associated with al-Qa'ida. Pakistani intelligence authorities say the three suicide attackers who launched their assault in Quetta were directed by Islamic State commanders across the border with Afghanistan. There, it is estimated, they now have at least 1000 fighters in Nangarhar province, many from Central Asia. The US commander in Afghanistan, General John Nicholson, has warned they are seeking to establish a new caliphate, known as the Khorasan caliphate. Islamic State has claimed responsibility for recent attacks in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Bangladesh. As well, there are signs of significantly stepped up activity elsewhere in our region, especially in Indonesia and The Philippines, where the antics of the country's President Rodrigo Duterte are undercutting the actions of US forces fighting Abu Sayyaf terrorists linked to Islamic State. With the screws tightening on the jihadists it is imperative measures are intensified to prevent foreign fighters fleeing the battlefield and seeking to go on the attack elsewhere. There are fears the battle for Mosul and reverses for Islamic State elsewhere will lead to a major new wave of refugees seeking to flee through Turkey to Europe, giving the cover jihadists have used previously to infiltrate militants to launch deadly attacks in France. French President Francois Hollande has been in the forefront of warning about the threat this poses to all countries.

36. Terrorist kids set to return

Courier Mail, James Dowling, 2016 10 27

Canberra - Canberra is preparing for the return of the traumatised and indoctrinated children of Australian terrorists as ISIS loses control in Syria and Iraq. As Iraqi military encircles ISIS's stronghold in Mosul and Kurdish forces push towards its Syrian capital Raqqa, the Australian Government is preparing for the collapse of the terrorist group and some of the 110 Australians fighting there to come home. But it is not just the fear of well-trained fighters returning, but what happens to their children and families who were not involved in fighting. Justice Minister Michael Keenan said these children had been exposed to "ideological indoctrination and highly traumatic experiences". "We must be ready with strategies to protect the safety of our communities and the welfare of children," he said. Mr Keenan said the Australian Federal Police had a taskforce that would manage those suspected of being foreign fighters once they tried to come back. The Government's information on Australian fighters is often based on foreign intelligence information and is not always admissible to Australian courts. But he also signalled that these alleged fighters may not be pursued on terrorism charges but other criminal matters.

37. US rules terrorist mastermind Hambali to stay put in Gitmo

The Australian, Amanda Hodge, 2016 10 27

Sydney - One of Southeast Asia's most notorious militants and a mastermind of the 2002 Bali bombing, Hambali, will remain behind bars in Guantanamo Bay after US officials rejected his appeal for release, ruling he still posed a "significant threat to the security of the United States". The Indonesian-born terrorist who rose through the ranks of militant movements to become al-Qa'ida's top representative in the region and the operational commander for Indonesian terror outfit Jemaah Islamiah, appeared before the Guantanamo Prison Periodic Review Board in August to seek his release after a decade in detention. The board ruled Hambali, whose real name is Riduan Isamuddin, had a "lengthy history as a jihadist" and had "played a significant role in major terrorist attacks and plotting". Indonesian Security Affairs Minister Wiranto said yesterday the decision to keep Hambali behind bars was one for the US to make but Indonesia believed that terrorists could not be released unless they "understand that terrorism is not the right way, that terrorism is evil". "We are intolerant towards those terrorists who do not understand the need to go back to normal thinking," General Wiranto said in Jakarta after meeting Foreign Minister Julie Bishop to discuss the potential return of foreign terrorist fighters from Iraq and Syria. Indonesia was constantly monitoring the movement of home-grown militants, with the help of Australian intelligence agencies, and trying to minimise their influence on the largely moderate Islamic Indonesian community, he added.

Khaama Press, Ghanizada, 2016 10 27

39. Afghan militants massacre 30 civilians

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 10 27

Kabul - Militants with suspected links to ISIL abducted and killed around 30 civilians, including children, in central Afghanistan on Wednesday, raising concerns about the group's expanding presence beyond its eastern stronghold. The massacre occurred late on Tuesday north of Firoz Koh, the capital of Ghor province, with the local government calling it a revenge attack after an ISIL commander was killed. ISIL, which controls territory across Syria and Iraq and is making steady inroads in Afghanistan, has so far not officially claimed responsibility for the attack. "Our security forces with the help of locals conducted an operation and killed a Daesh commander yesterday. Daesh fighters in return abducted around 30 villagers, mostly shepherds," Ghor governor Nasir Khazeh said. "Their dead bodies were found by local people this morning."

Pakistan Dawn, Syed Sammer Abbas, 2016 10 27

Islamabad - India will expel a Pakistani high commission staff member for "espionage activities", a foreign ministry official said Thursday, as local media reported that New Delhi police had detained him. The Indian foreign secretary summoned Pakistani ambassador to India Abdul Basit to inform him that a Pakistan High Commission staffer has been declared persona non grata for espionage activities, Spokesperson of Indian Ministry of External Affairs Vikas Swarup said in a tweet. Delhi police crime commissioner Ravindra Yadav said the official had been detained on Wednesday with defence and other documents in his possession. A Pakistani diplomatic source said the visa official, named as Mehmood Akhtar, had been given 48 hours to leave the country. Akhtar was released in about three hours on intervention by our High Commission, the Foreign Office said.

The International News, 2016 10 27

Karachi - Pakistan's armed forces have targeted outposts of Indian army along the Line of Control and the Working Boundary, killing at least five enemy soldiers, sources said on Wednesday. "Pakistani forces gave befitting response to unprovoked Indian fire along the LoC. Five Indian soldiers are confirmed dead," said the sources. The sources said four Indian posts were destroyed on Tuesday in Pakistani shelling at the Bhimbar Sector. Earlier in the day, the Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR) said two civilians were killed and eight others injured as Indian forces resorted to unprovoked fire along the Line of Control (LoC) in Chaprar Sector. Tensions between the two countries have been strained since July, when Indian forces killed a young Kashmiri fighter, prompting mass protests in Indian-administered Kashmir. The resulting crackdown by security forces has seen at least 80 Kashmiri protesters killed.

Islamabad - Pakistan on Wednesday conveyed to the United States that India's Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) and Afghanistan's National Directorate of Security (NDS) are patronising terrorists groups to attack soft targets in the country. National Security Adviser Lt Gen (retd) Nasser Khan Janjua conveyed the message to US ambassador David Hale in a meeting today, said the statement released by the office of the NSA. The meeting was held to discuss the terrorist attack on Police Training College Quetta, counter-terrorism operations and cross-border attacks. Janjua also emphasised on the need to break the nexus between terrorists groups operation under the supervision of NDS and RAW. Pakistan has asked for US assistance to tackle the situation. The NSA informed the ambassador that the terrorists who attacked the police training college were constantly in contact with their leadership and handlers in Afghanistan.

43. US forces target senior Al Qaeda leaders in Kunar

Pajhwok Afghan News, Lalit K Jha, 2016 10 27

Washington - US forces carried out precision strikes in eastern Kunar Province this week, targeting Al-Qaeda's most senior leaders in Afghanistan, the Pentagon said. Pentagon Press Secretary Peter Cook said: "We are still assessing the results of the strikes, but their demise would represent a significant blow to the terrorist group's presence in Afghanistan." The Al-Qaeda leaders were identified as Faruq al-Qatani and Bilal al-Utubi. Al-Qatani served as Al-Qaeda's emir for northeastern Afghanistan, assigned by the group's leadership to re-establish safe havens there. He was a senior planner of attacks against the United States, with a long history of directing deadly attacks against American troops and coalition allies, Cook said. Likewise, al-

Utabi is assessed to have been involved in efforts to re-establish a safe haven in Afghanistan from which to threaten the West, and in efforts to recruit and train foreign fighters.

44. 'I'm Scared These Men Will Kill Everyone': ISIS Takes a Somalia Town

New York Times, Jeffrey Gettleman, 2016 10 27

Nairobi - The black flag of the Islamic State went up over an old, crumbling coastal town in Somalia at dawn on Wednesday, the latest sign of a sharpening duel between Somalia's top two militant groups. According to officials and residents, dozens of masked men carrying heavy machine guns, assault rifles and the Islamic State flag marched into Qandala, an ancient trading post on the Gulf of Aden. There was no resistance, the witnesses said. The Islamic State fighters simply walked down the main road into Qandala, a town known in Somalia for its old white castle on the sea. Residents stood back, staring with a mix of awe and fear. Even the fishermen who usually ply the warm waters of the gulf did not go to sea on Wednesday, banned by the militants. "I'm scared that these men will kill everyone -- civilians, soldiers, officials," Jama Mohamed Khuurshe, the town's commissioner, said at a news conference. For months, the Shabab, Somalia's leading Islamist militants, have been trying to beat back an insurgency within an insurgency. The Shabab have terrorized Somalia for years, hacking off hands of suspected thieves and detonating enormous suicide car bombs that kill scores in its relentless effort to bring fundamentalist Shariah law to Somalia. Shabab fighters seem to resent the new Islamic State upstarts, who in the past few months have been opening their own training camps and militant cells in remote towns across Somalia.

46. Islamic State-aligned group takes Somali town, say officials

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 26

Mogadishu - A group loyal to Islamic State seized the small port town of Qandala in Somalia's semi-autonomous Puntland region on Wednesday, the first town it has taken since emerging a year ago, officials said. The group, which refers to itself simply as Islamic State, is a rival to the larger al Shabaab force, which is linked to Islamic State's rival al Qaeda and once controlled much of Somalia. "Our soldiers were few and so could not fight longer," district commissioner Jamac Mohamed Khuurshe said. African peacekeepers are not deployed in Puntland, which lies at the eastern tip of the Horn of Africa. Soldiers and many residents fled and the militants cut off Qandala's communications, Khuurshe said. The Puntland Islamist group first announced its alignment to Islamic State a year ago in a statement on YouTube. The group is led by Abdiqadir Mumin, a former al Shabaab commander, a sign that some al Shabaab fighters see al Qaeda as a spent force and have been inspired by Islamic State's campaign in Iraq and Syria.

51. Authorities strengthen efforts to recover stolen assets overseas (Canada)

China Daily, Zhang Yan, 2016 10 27

Beijing - The government is stepping up efforts to recover billions of yuan in assets illegally transferred overseas by corrupt officials via money laundering platforms and underground banks. Statistics provided by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, the nation's top anti-graft watchdog, show that from 2014 to July, the police confiscated illicit assets sent overseas worth 7.62 billion yuan ($1.14 billion). Last month, during Premier Li Keqiang's official visit to Canada, the two countries signed a bilateral agreement to share illegally transferred assets, a move that is being seen as a milestone in China's program to recover misappropriated funds and assets. Similar agreements are now under negotiation with the United States, Australia and France. "Such agreements provide a legal framework for the countries involved to share the proceeds of stolen assets with China, once they are able to confirm that the money was transferred illegally by corrupt individuals or criminal organizations," said Hong Daode, a professor of criminal law at the China University of Political Science and Law in Beijing. Chain of evidence According to the Ministry of Public Security, a lack of bilateral extradition treaties and differences in national legal systems have seen the US, Canada, Australia and Singapore become popular destinations for corrupt officials in recent years. You Xiaowen, deputy director of the ministry's economic crimes investigation department, said the Chinese police face practical difficulties in repatriating fugitives and recovering funds: "It's the result of a lack of signed extradition treaties, political differences and complex legal procedures."

52. Bangladesh asks Canada for effective mechanism to deport Bangabandhu killer Noor
BDNews24, Senior Correspondent, 2016 10 27

Foreign Minister Abul Hassan Mahmood Ali made the proposal at a bilateral meeting with his Canadian counterpart Stephane Dion at Ottawa on Tuesday, his ministry said. They discussed the possible deportation of Noor Chowdhury, the self-confessed and convicted killer of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and his family members in 1975. Noor is evading the gallows by living in Canada since 1996. As a follow-up to the meeting held between the two prime ministers in Montreal last month, the foreign ministers discussed the question of bringing Noor to justice. The Canadian foreign minister said they would "take up the matter with relevant departments of Canadian government and revert," the Bangladesh foreign ministry said.

53. Canada sent fugitives back to China
China Daily, Staff reporter, 2016 10 27

Beijing - Canada, a popular destination for corrupt Chinese to flee, has been returning dozens of Chinese nationals annually, according to the National Post. The country has returned 24 Chinese nationals to China this year, and the previous Conservative government sent back more than 330, the newspaper reported on Sunday, citing data from Canada Border Services Agency data. In 2015, the numbers reached a 10-year high of 43, and the lowest number of returned fugitives over the last 10 years was 18, in 2010, the Post said. The statistics do not say what crimes people were accused of, according to the Post. More than a quarter of China's 100 most wanted graft suspects are believed to live in Canada, but the two countries do not have a formal extradition treaty. "The return of inadmissible persons is a normal part of the bilateral relationship with any country. Nothing has changed with this policy since the change in government in 2015," Nicholas Dorion of the Canada Border Services Agency told the National Post. A working group of Chinese and Canadian officials has been meeting regularly on common law-enforcement issues, including the return of Chinese fugitives to China, since 1999. China has vowed to pursue a search beyond its borders for corrupt officials and business executives, and their assets.

54. Cyber technology as potent terror tool in jihadi hands

The Pioneer, 2016 10 27

New Delhi - From its very inception in July 2014, the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS)/Daesh utilised cyberspace for propaganda and recruitment in a manner that was both innovative and extremely hard to counter. There is an active digital jihadi group within the IS which has designed effective Android Apps, and used the comparatively secure end-to-end encrypted instant messaging app Telegram, (and to a lesser degree, WhatsApp) for propaganda, weapons procurement, and to direct and publicise lone wolf/wolf pack attacks. As entry into its communication networks is difficult, prevention and countering of such terrorist acts is one of the most challenging tasks confronting intelligence and law enforcement agencies. The cyberjihadis (several groups such as the Cyber Caliphate, and three United Cyber Command have been identified) have proved their expertise on the dark web and have set up several websites for recruitment and tutorials on weapons-making, which can be entered only on invitation.

But the worrying trend is of more lone-wolf terrorists striking random targets in the name of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) militant group, said police chief Tito Karnavian. Speaking to reporters after a meeting at the Presidential Palace yesterday, General Tito said that while the "old network" of terrorist groups remains the larger threat, "lone wolf" cases are on the rise. "They are being recruited through social media and trained online, including being taught how to make bombs... and then they go on their missions alone," he added. The four-star police general did not give details of the lone-wolf cases he was referring to, but there were at least three such incidents in recent months. ISIS has claimed responsibility for the attack.

Tehran - Iran has unveiled a new light-weight, long-range stealth unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) capable of flying at a maximum altitude of 10,000 feet. The drone was put on show on Wednesday at an expo showcasing the latest achievements by the Iranian Aviation & Space Industries Association. Hamed Sa'eedi, an official with the association, said that, with a total weight of less than 20 kilograms and a flight time of over 15 hours, the drone can conduct such non-military missions as those for mapping, filming and image-collecting. He said that Iran plans to export the drone to different countries. Earlier this month, Iran's Islamic Revolution Guards Corps (IRGC) unveiled a new attack drone, the Saegheh (Thunderbolt), by reverse-engineering a US Central Intelligence Agency RQ-170 Sentinel drone that had been captured in December 2011. In recent years, Iran has made major breakthroughs in its defense sector and attained self-sufficiency in producing important military equipment and systems.

Qaraqosh - Iraqi army Humvees roar through the arid plains of Nineveh province, kicking up immense clouds of dust as they follow the dirt track that winds its way to the front. Among the rugged war machines is a white SUV, which seems in a particular hurry to reach its destination. In the car sit two priests, dressed all in black and wearing clerical collars, and a few men clad in army fatigues, clutching old Kalashnikovs. They are on their way to Qaraqosh, Iraq's largest Christian town, where the Iraqi army is fighting to expel the last ISIL fighters. Qaraqosh fell to ISIL in August 2014, shortly after the insurgents shocked the world by taking control of nearby Mosul. 62. New UNESCO Resolution Ignores Judaism's Connection to Temple Mount

Jerusalem - The UN's World Heritage Committee (UNESCO) adopted a second resolution on Jerusalem, again ignoring Judaism's connection to the Temple Mount. Although some Israeli officials, including Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu's office, said there had been some improvement in the language, the new resolution continues to ignore the Jewish relation to the Temple Mount, where Jews believe the First and Second Temples were built and destroyed. Ironically, the new resolution came the same day that the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) displayed a rare papyrus dating to the First Temple Period - about 2700 years ago - which has the oldest known mention of Jerusalem in Hebrew. A spokesman for the IAA said the papyrus was believed to have been plundered from a cave in the Judean desert and is one of only three Hebrew scrolls from that period. Lebanon and Tunisia submitted the resolution on behalf of Jordan and the Palestinians, who are not among the 21 member states of UNESCO.

Jeddah - The Yemeni government on Wednesday reiterated it did not receive any peace plan from the United Nations' Yemen envoy or any other party. It stressed it will reject any settlement that is not based on "UN Resolution 2216 and the GCC initiative, and if it does not take into consideration the outcome of the national dialogue," Yemeni government spokesperson Rajeh Badi told Arab News on Wednesday. The UN envoy Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed handed an outline for a peace plan to Houthi rebels in control of the capital, which includes divesting President Abed Rabbo Mansour Hadi, their rival, of his authority and stipulates the withdrawal of militias from major cities, a Houthi-affiliated politician told AP. According to a politician who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak publicly on the issue, the peace plan also includes transferring the powers of the internationally recognized president to a new prime minister and a vice president.

64. Secret Files Expose KGB Spies in Israel's Top Political and Military Echelon

Haaretz, Ofer Aderet, 2016 10 27

Jerusalem - The KGB, Russia's espionage organization, recruited and ran spies among Israel's Knesset members, senior army officers and intelligence community, as well as lower-level workers on classified projects, according to an investigation by journalist Ronen Bergman. The first part of his investigation will be published by Yedioth Ahronoth on Friday. The report is based on secret KGB documents copied over decades by an archivist at the spy organization, Vasili Mitrokhin, from the 1960s to the 1980s. He defected to Britain in 1992 and gave the documents to British intelligence. Some were published in books and the press over decades, triggering an international uproar as KGB agents operating in the United States, Britain and other countries were outed by name. Mitrokhin died in Britain in 2004. Half a year ago, the British espionage agency MI6 agreed to the publication of additional parts of the archive Mitrokhin left behind, in which Bergman found material on KGB activity in Israel.

65. Syria regime bombs Turkey-backed rebels for first time

Now Lebanon, Albin Szakola, 2016 10 27

Beirut - The Syrian regime has bombed Turkish-backed rebels in the northern Aleppo countryside for the first time since Ankara launched Operation Euphrates Shield in late August. A coordinating body for Free Syrian Army-affiliated factions fighting both ISIS and Kurdish-led troops in the region announced late Tuesday that Syrian aircraft targeted a village seized recently by Euphrates Shield rebels. "Syrian regime helicopters dropped barrel bombs on our positions in Tel Jeijan, killing three FSA fighters and injuring one other," the Hawar Kilis operation room, named after a north Aleppo village, said in its statement. Meanwhile, the Turkish military said that a helicopter "assessed to belong to regime forces" struck rebels southeast of Dabiq, in what appears to be the same incident. According to Ankara, two fighters were killed in the attack, while five others were injured.

66. Ankara Calls for the UN to Strengthen International Solidarity in the Fight Against Terrorism

Asharq Al-Awsat, Saeed Abdelrazek, 2016 10 27

Ankara - Ankara urged the United Nations to play a more effective role in strengthening international solidarity in the fight against terrorism. The Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan expressed hopes that the international organisation will play a leading part in strengthening international cooperation and solidarity in order to fight terrorism on the 71st anniversary of its founding. In a statement released by the presidential office on Monday, Erdogan said: "As a country that has been fighting against different terrorist organisations for a long time, we hope that the UN takes a leading role in the fight against terrorism." He continued by saying that UN member states must show solidarity with regards to fighting all terrorist organisations such as ISIS, the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), its Syrian arm the Democratic Union Party and the Gulen movement which Turkish authorities accuse of planning the failed coup attempt which took place in mid-July.

La Nouvelle Tribune (Maroc), Ayoub Bouazzaoui, 2016 10 26

Ankara, Turquie - Sur la liste noire de l'ONU des jihadistes les plus dangereux, le Français Kevin Guiavarch, soupçonné d'être un recruteur très actif du groupe EI, a quitté la Syrie pour rejoindre la Turquie où il est incarcéré. Deux de ses quatre femmes, parties avec lui, viennent d'être transférées en France et mises en examen. Kevin Guiavarch, 23 ans, avait rejoint la Syrie fin 2012, d'abord dans les rangs du Front Al-Nosra, la branche syrienne d'Al-Qaïda, avant d'intégrer l'organisation Etat Islamique (EI). Outre ses activités de recruteur, il est aussi soupçonné d'avoir été directement impliqué aussi dans le financement de l'organisation. Le jeune homme, qui dit être « repenté », avait écrit aux autorités françaises disant qu'il voulait rentrer en France, puis avait traversé en juin la frontière turco-syrienne avec ses quatre compagnes françaises et leurs six enfants avant d'être interpellé en Turquie où il est écroué dans l'attente d'un procès.

69. Four Ku Klux Klan units are currently operating in Germany

International Business Times, Staff report, 2016 10 27

Berlin - Four Ku Klux Klan units are currently operating in Germany, local media reports said Tuesday, citing a parliamentary inquiry. The KKK although marginal has a significant influence on the country's far-right groups. The white supremacist group characterized by its anti-immigration and anti-Semitic ideologies has been active in Germany since the early 1920s. The four clandestine units have a "very small number of members" according to the response to the government inquiry filed by the Left Party. KKK members in the country reportedly burn crosses, display swastika flags and sing "anti-constitutional songs." "The low membership numbers cannot discount the danger that emanates from such organizations," Left Party politician Monika Renner told the Sueddeutsche Zeitung newspaper. According to the Deutsche Welle broadcasting service, the U.S.-born group is suspected of committing at least 68 crimes in Germany since 2001. At least two police officers previously belonged to one of the four units called the 'European White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan,' according to the report.

70. Germany Investigating with 13 Chechens for Financing Terrorism

Asharq Al-Awsat, Majid al-Khateeb, 2016 10 27

Cologne - German police on Tuesday conducted numerous raids across five federal states and stormed an accommodation facility for refugees and 12 homes around the country that were believed to house people suspected of financing terrorism. Police searched residences in the eastern states of Thuringia and Saxony as well as in Bavaria, the western state of North Rhine-Westphalia and in Hamburg, police in Thuringia said in a statement. Local media say a white powder was found in one of the flats, but police say they have found no evidence of a concrete threat of attack. The raids, involving 400 police officers, were part of an investigation which began last year into a 28-year-old Russian of Chechen origin who is suspected of "preparing an act of violence against the state." The police have been investigating a 28-year-old Russian citizen of Chechen origin since the second half of 2015 who was suspected of preparing "a serious act of violent subversion," the statement said.

71. L'antiterrorisme belge

Le Soir, Ludivine Ponciau, 2016 10 27

Bruxelles - Un rapport d'experts évalue l'efficacité des mesures antiterroristes. La Belgique a sous-estimé l'intérêt de la lutte contre le financement du terrorisme. Au-delà des sommes en jeu, ces données financières auraient pu faire avancer bien des enquêtes. Près d'un an après les attentats de Paris, l'Institut Egmont publie une évaluation des mesures préventives et répressives prises en matière de lutte contre le terrorisme depuis les attentats de Charlie Hebdo par sept experts issus du monde académique. Un rapport assez sévère pour le gouvernement Michel et dont Le Soir a pu prendre connaissance. L'un des volets du rapport pointe l'inertie dont a fait preuve la Belgique en matière de lutte contre le financement du terrorisme alors que « la quête de l'argent est vitale pour les terroristes », souligne France Lemeunier, coauteure du rapport. La consultante en contre-terrorisme et analyste à l'Ocam ajoute que le terrorisme a atteint « une dimension financière sans précédent » et cite le cas « Zerkani », le « Papa Noël » des djihadistes qui poussait les jeunes radicalisés à commettre des larcins pour soutenir les combattants et financer les voyages vers la Syrie et qui, selon elle, est la parfaite illustration de cette dimension financière. « Les terroristes ont besoin d'argent pour mener des attaques, mais ils ont aussi besoin de ressources plus larges pour couvrir les frais d'organisation comme la propagande, le recrutement, les voyages, les formations, les salaires... », relève le rapport.

73. Syrian Teen Scouted Attack Sites for IS in Berlin

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 10 27

Berlin - German prosecutors say a 19-year-old Syrian migrant scouted out potential sites in Berlin for an attack by the Islamic State group. Federal prosecutors say the teenager, identified only as Shaas al-M. in keeping with German privacy rules, also recruited at least one person to fight in Syria. They allege he offered to act as a middle-man for IS members carrying out an attack in Germany and signaled his willingness to participate in an attack. Prosecutors said in a statement Thursday that al- M. joined IS in his Syrian home village in mid-2013. He underwent military training and performed guard duties for the group before leaving for Germany in mid-2015. The suspect was arrested March 22 and charged last week with membership of a foreign terrorist organization and breaking arms control laws. (Full report).

2. EQAO test glitch traced to cyber attack

Postmedia News, Deborah Van Brank, 2016 10 28

Ottawa - The massive failure of last Thursday's online literacy test for Grade 10 students in Ontario has been traced to an intentional cyber attack. The Education Quality and Accountability Office (EQAO) on Monday called the technical issues "an intentional, malicious and sustained Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) attack -- a type of cyber attack." It says a large volume of traffic from IP addresses around the globe was targeted at the network hosts of the test, with the intent of blocking school boards' and schools' and students' use of the server. EQAO said it is looking at ways of ensuring there is no repeat. A day after the EQAO testing, a similar DDOS attack took place aimed at several other servers and websites around the world and temporarily knocked out several sites, including Twitter. Quick facts about the EQAO Grade 10 literacy test: 900 Ontario high schools participated - or tried to -- in the Oct. 20 online test March, 2017, test would be mandatory for those who didn't write the October one) but most schools and school boards did so. about 8 a.m. Thursday the traffic to the EQAO's server wasn't coming from schools or school boards. Journal de Québec, Régys Caron, 2016 10 28

Québec - La burqa et le tchador sont pour elle des symboles de l'asservissement de la femme Le projet de loi sur les accommodements religieux permettrait le port de vêtements tels le tchador, le niqab et la burqa par les employés de l'État, dénonce l'ex-députée libérale Fatima Houda-Pepin. L'ex-députée libérale Fatima Houda-Pepin (photo) réfute l'argument de la ministre de la Justice, Stéphanie Vallée, qui invoque le droit à la liberté de religion pour refuser d'interdire le port de certains vêtements controversés. «Dans l'article 9 alinéa trois, il y a un accommodement qui permet le port de la burqa et du niqab, a soutenu l'ex- députée de La Pinière alors qu'elle comparaisait en commission parlementaire pour livrer ses commentaires au sujet du projet de loi 62. Le premier paragraphe de l'article 9 autorise le port du tchador», a-t-elle ajouté. Parce qu'ils sont antérieurs à la naissance de l'islam, ces vêtements ne sont pas des symboles religieux, mais des signes de l'asservissement de la femme, s'est insurgée Mme Houda-Pepin avant de rappeler que l'égalité homme-femme est un héritage de la Révolution tranquille.

5. Joly a du pain sur la planche

Le Droit, Paul Gaboury, 2016 10 28

Ottawa - En attendant l'arrivée d'un nouveau plan d'action sur les langues officielles, en avril 2018, la ministre du Patrimoine canadien Mélanie Joly a du pain sur la planche pour convaincre les députés du comité des langues officielles - incluant ceux de son propre parti - qu'elle est «la» ministre responsable du dossier. Pendant plus d'une heure, la ministre Joly a eu à défendre ses collègues du cabinet dans les dossiers touchant le Bureau de la traduction et de l'immigration francophone, vantant au passage l'«approche transversale» qui existe au sein de l'équipe ministérielle pour les langues officielles. Dans le dossier du Bureau de la traduction, le député néo-démocrate François Choquette a demandé à la ministre Joly si elle était d'accord avec les recommandations contenues dans le rapport unanime du comité, ou plutôt avec sa collègue Judy Foote qui a opté pour le statu quo. «Je travaille avec la ministre Foote afin que l'expertise au sein du Bureau de la traduction soit renforcée, tout en élargissant les services et en profitant des technologies. La ministre Foote est très compétente et la question des langues officielles fait partie de ses priorités», a assuré la ministre Joly, sans plus de précision sur le rapport du comité sur le Bureau de la traduction.

6. La radicalisation violente : ce n'est pas une affaire de religion!

Le Soleil, Brahim Benyoucef, 2016 10 28

Opinion - La question de la radicalisation violente refait surface. «Radicalisation, religion, immigration et terrorisme» est le sujet d'une récente étude menée auprès de 2000 étudiants du collégial à travers le Québec, par un groupe de recherche sous la direction de Cécile Rousseau. L'étude vient déconstruire certains mythes et aider à mieux comprendre le phénomène. Autour du niveau d'accord avec le fait d'utiliser des armes pour lutter contre l'injustice s'articule la question principale. La radicalisation violente n'est pas le propre d'une culture, d'une communauté ou d'une religion, révèle l'étude. L'étude révèle que les croyants sont moins favorables aux idées radicales violentes. L'étude révèle aussi que les immigrants de première génération sont moins favorables aux idées radicales violentes, que ceux issus de la deuxième génération et des originaires du Québec. L'âge de la vingtaine est l'âge explosif, et les garçons sont plus à risque selon l'étude. Il faut souligner cependant que l'étude concerne les étudiants du collégial seulement.

7. Le Front national du Québec prend forme

La Presse+, Martin Croteau, 2016 10 28

Québec - Déclarer l'indépendance du Québec, mettre fin aux accommodements raisonnables, détruire les mosquées : telles sont les propositions du Front national du Québec, un parti politique naissant qui pourrait présenter des candidats dès les élections de 2018. Militant politique de longue date, Daniel Boucher a réservé ce nom auprès du Directeur général des élections il y a deux semaines. Bien qu'il qualifie lui-même le FNQ d'« embryonnaire », il a bon espoir de présenter un candidat dans chacune des 125 circonscriptions du Québec au prochain scrutin. D'ici là, il se donne deux ans pour faire connaître ses idées. « Nous avons perdu deux référendums à cause du vote ethnique et de l'argent, disait Jacques Parizeau, et il avait parfaitement raison. Avec le Front national du Québec [FNQ] au pouvoir, le Canada n'aura pas l'occasion de nous faire perdre un autre référendum. » -- Extrait du site web du Front national du Québec En entrevue, ce résident de Québec ne fait aucun secret de la filiation idéologique entre son parti et celui de Marine Le Pen en France. C'est d'ailleurs sa rencontre avec la leader d'extrême droite, lors de sa visite au Québec en mars, qui l'a convaincu de lancer une formation politique. « C'est une personne que j'ai trouvée vraiment inspirante, a indiqué M. Boucher. Je me suis plus attardé à son programme de parti. C'est à partir de ce moment-là que je me suis intéressé à ce qui se passait en France. » Interdire l'islam S'il est élu, le FNQ s'engage à détruire les mosquées et à interdire l'islam au Québec. Selon M. Boucher, cette religion ne fait pas « bon mélange » avec la société occidentale. « Une mosquée, ce n'est pas juste un lieu de culte, a-t-il dit. C'est un lieu de recrutement, un lieu de propagande. Les imams font des discours incendiaires sur nous, les infidèles. » « Les mosquées seront détruites et l'Islam sera interdit dans le Pays du Québec. Car croire que l'Islam est compatible avec notre culture est comme croire que si vous nourrissez un alligator avec de la salade, qu'il finira par devenir végétarien. » -- Extrait du site web du Front national du Québec Il ne souhaite pas pour autant expulser tous les musulmans du Québec, seulement ceux qui refuseront de « s'intégrer » à leur société d'accueil.

8. Liberty moves north (Canada)

The Economist, Editorial Board, 2016 10 29

Editorial - Irredeemably dull by reputation, less brash and bellicose than America, Canada has long seemed to outsiders to be a citadel of decency, tolerance and good sense. Many of Canada's virtues spring from its history and geography and are not readily exportable (see Briefing). It is easier to be relaxed about immigration when your only land border is protected by a wall the size of the United States. Appreciation for the benefits of trade comes more easily to countries next door to big markets. British Brexiteers might justifiably claim that they voted for exactly what Canada already has: control of immigration and the freedom to negotiate trade deals with any country willing to reciprocate. Despite such luck, Canada suffers from some of the stresses that feed populism in other rich countries. It has experienced a decline of manufacturing jobs, stagnant incomes for most of its citizens and rising inequality. It, too, frets about a shrinking middle class. Canadians worry about Islamist terrorism, though the country has so far been spared a big attack. Some right-of-centre politicians, playing on fears that one will happen, indulge in Trumpian rhetoric. Yet Canada does not seem tempted to shut itself off from the world. What can other Western countries learn from its example? First, Canada not only welcomes newcomers but works hard to integrate them. The second lesson is the value of knowing when fiscal austerity does more harm than good. Canada is far from perfect. It remains a poorer, less productive and less innovative economy than America's. While championing freer international trade, Canada has yet to eliminate obstacles to trade among its provinces. For many liberals, Canada's emphasis on "peace, order and good government", enshrined in its constitution, is inadequate without an infusion of American individualism. But for now the world owes Canada gratitude for reminding it of what many people are in danger of forgetting: that tolerance and openness are wellsprings of security and prosperity, not threats to them.

9. Media and rights groups win right to intervene in Vice-RCMP fight

Canadian Press, 2016 10 28

Toronto - Media and rights groups on Thursday won the right to intervene in a news outlet's appeal of an order that one of its reporters turn over his materials to the RCMP. The ruling by Ontario's chief justice over objections of the government comes in a case that pits journalistic rights against those of police investigating potential criminal offences. In making his decision, Justice George Strathy rejected Crown arguments that the groups were trying to reinterpret already well-settled law, or introduce evidence not already before the court. The case involves an order that reporter Ben Makuch and Vice Media hand over background materials related to interviews he did with a Canadian man, Farah Shirdon, whom the RCMP accuses of terrorism-related offences. Police have argued the material is crucial to their ongoing investigation. The three separate groups now allowed to intervene in Vice's appeal -- to be heard in February -- comprise an eight-member media coalition that includes the CBC and APTN, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, and the B.C. Civil Liberties Association.

10. Missions must go beyond military might, Dallaire says

Toronto Star, Peter Goffin, 2016 10 28

Analysis: Retired lieutenant-general Roméo Dallaire is welcoming Canada's military commitment to peacekeeping missions in Africa. "They should have never left," said Dallaire, who was commander of UN forces in Rwanda in 1994 when more than 800,000 people, most of them members the Tutsi ethnic minority, were murdered by ethnic Hutu extremists. "The idea to start earning our spurs again in Africa, in a deliberate fashion to build capacity, to me, is probably one of the wisest decisions," he said. The Liberal government has pledged up to 600 troops and $450 million to UN peacekeeping missions, likely in Mali, South Sudan, the Democratic Republic of Congo or the Central African Republic. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan has said Canadian forces will use force on these missions if necessary. Dallaire, who served as a Liberal senator from 2005 to 2014, said Canada has an important role to play in bringing peace to foreign countries, but that it will require far more than blunt military might. "There's no such thing as simply bringing in a military solution to any conflict anymore. That's over," Dallaire said.

11. Monsef travelled to Iran on religious pilgrimage

Toronto Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 10 28

Column: Democratic Institutions Minister Maryam Monsef travelled to Iran using a religious pilgrimage visa and an Afghan passport. Nearly two weeks after questions were first put to Monsef about her extensive travel to Afghanistan and Iran in 2010, 2013 and 2014, her office has finally released a detailed statement, exclusive to the Sun. "Minister Monsef travelled to Iran in each case on her Afghan passport, which she obtained at the Afghan Consulate in Toronto," wrote John O'Leary, Monsef's Director of Communications. Iran is one of the most closed and secretive countries in the world. It is very difficult for private citizens from Canada to visit Iran. "In each case, she travelled to Iran on a pilgrimage visa, a common visa many Muslims use to visit holy sites in Iran." Iran issues special pilgrimage visas for Shi'ite Muslims wishing to visit the Imam Reza shrine in Mashhad. This shrine is considered one of the holiest sites for Shi'ite Muslims. "On her trips, she visited the Imam Reza shrine holy sites as well as her family members," O'Leary continued.

12. Opinion: Time to put Russia-Canada tensions in the deep freeze

Al Jazeera, Antonia Zerbisias, 2016 10 28

The world's most dangerous zone lies not in the Middle East, nor in Crimea, nor in the South China Sea. The real hot spot is the Arctic. That's where global warming may lead to global warring, between Russia, the United States and Canada. The fight would be a contest for control of shipping lanes emerging out of the melting ice, lanes that could cut the distance between the Atlantic and the Pacific by days. It would also be a battle for the exploitation of the 13 per cent of the world's oil reserves and 30 per cent of its natural gas believed to be beneath the seabed. This new Cold War is what Canada's most pessimistic pundits predict while touting Canada's "Arctic sovereignty" and detailing Russia's investments of billions of dollars in northern military and missile bases, nuclear ice-breakers and fighter jets. As if Canada could even begin to compete with all that, not to mention with the US's might and materiel.

Ottawa - Tevis Gonyou-McLean, un homme de 24 ans arrêté en août dernier pour avoir prétendument apporté son concours à l'organisation État islamique, a été interpellé de nouveau mardi pour bris de conditions, a rapporté le «National Post» jeudi. Arrêté le 12 août, Gonyou-McLean a été remis en liberté avec une série de 27 conditions à respecter, dont ne pas entrer en contact avec des membres de l'EI, ne pas participer à des activités terroristes et ne pas posséder d'arme. Selon l'avocat du suspect, les quatre chefs de bris d'accusation déposés contre son client n'auraient rien à voir avec ces conditions. «Ce que je peux vous dire, c'est que ce sont toutes des infractions mineures», a indiqué Biagio Bel Graco, en faisant vaguement allusion à des omissions de se rapporter à la police. Selon la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), Tevis Gonyou-McLean aurait eu l'intention de quitter le pays pour aller rejoindre l'EI ou, encore, de commettre un acte terroriste. La GRC a aussi indiqué qu'il avait déjà proféré des menaces de mort.

14. Peer pressure, identity crises drew young women to jihad

Toronto Star, Allan Woods, 2016 10 28

Toronto - What draws young Muslim women to an extremist strain of Islam and a life dodging bombs and bullets in Syria or Iraq? A new report into the realm of female Islamic radicalization in Quebec has found it is a matter of adolescent socialization and the fraught search for an identity as much as a matter of faith. The study is based on a dozen interviews conducted with those who tried to leave, who thought about leaving, or with family of those who have fled. It tells of teenage girls in Montreal wearing the niqab - a full face covering - to attract male suitors; of the pressure to show religious piety on social media; and of a "virtual sorority" of radicalized females around the globe helping to plan a foreign - and illegal - voyage. Prepared for Quebec's Conseil du Statut de la Femme by Montreal's Centre for the Prevention of Radicalization, the report comes after a wave of young Quebecers left or tried to leave the country to join jihadist groups in 2015. Overall, the report said, between three and seven females from Quebec are believed to have left the country for Syria or Iraq since 2013. Nationally, the researchers estimated that 10 females have gone abroad. Of the young women interviewed, all performed well in school and were raised in comfortable, middle-class households. But many complained of feeling caught between the demands and expectations of their immigrant families and those of francophone Quebec society. "Some of them forged an 'identity shell' that resulted in an eventual rupture with the outside world, including their family, their friends and the rest of society," the report said. Interventions and criticisms of this identity only pushed them further along their path. One young woman recounted her mother scolding her for wearing "terrorist clothing." Another spoke of the argument that ensued when her mother learned of her secret conversion to Islam. Among females convinced that life in Syria or Iraq would be better than in Canada, there were still reservations, based on reports of temporary marriages intended to fulfil the sexual needs of fighters. "They seemed to be preoccupied by certain real risks, like being forced into a marriage if they didn't arrive as a couple in the territory occupied by jihadist groups in Syria, or even suffering sexual assault if they were not accompanied by a man," the report said.

15. Police re-arrest Ottawa man in ISIL-linked peace bond case

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 10 28

Toronto - An Ottawa man arrested on a terrorism peace bond in August over his alleged support for ISIL has been charged with breaching his bail conditions, court officials said Thursday. Tevis Gonyou-McLean, 24, was out on bail awaiting the outcome of his peace bond case when he was re-arrested Tuesday and charged with four counts of breach of recognizance. Handout Tevis Gonyou-McLean, 24, an Ottawa resident arrested in August on a terrorism peace bond. Among the conditions of his release were that he not leave Ottawa, have no contact or communication with several suspected local members of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant network, and not possess weapons. But his lawyer said the alleged breaches that resulted in the new charges were unrelated to those conditions. "I can tell you this, they're all minor breaches," Biagio Del Greco said. The lawyer added he was awaiting details, but the charges concerned Gonyou-McLean's reporting and residence requirements. None stemmed from allegations he was "involved in any terrorist act." Police also filed a new charge of mischief against the man: he allegedly damaged an ankle bracelet after his arrest. He is back in custody and a bail hearing was scheduled for Monday. Although Gonyou-McLean was arrested Aug. 12, the case only came to public attention last month when VICE News reported the convert and pizza shop worker was Canada's latest terrorism peace bond case.

16. Radicalisation : le lien de confiance ébranlé?

Radio-Canada.ca, Louis-Philippe Ouimet, 2016 10 28

Montréal - Le Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence (CPRMV) de Montréal est souvent cité en exemple ailleurs dans le monde. Le secrétaire général de l'ONU, Ban Ki-moon, a même déjà dit être inspiré par celui-ci. Mais voilà que Radio-Canada a recueilli le témoignage d'anciens employés qui affirment que le directeur du centre les a incités à contrevenir à leur code de déontologie, en partageant des renseignements confidentiels obtenus auprès de personnes supposément radicalisées. Il s'agit d'informations troublantes à une semaine du sommet de l'UNESCO, qui réunira à Québec 250 experts en radicalisation, dont le directeur du CPRMV. La mission du CPRMV de Montréal est bien visible sur son site Internet. Le centre écrit, entre autres, qu'il peut « offrir un soutien et un accompagnement psychosocial aux individus en situation de radicalisation ou en voie de se radicaliser, d'une part, de même qu'à leurs proches, aux enseignants, aux intervenants du milieu ou à tout citoyen concerné et, d'autre part, à tout individu victime de discours ou de gestes haineux. » Toujours sur le site Internet, on peut lire ceci dans la section intitulée Approche : « Le CPRMV demeure donc un organisme autonome d'un point de vue stratégique et opérationnel, ce qui assure la confidentialité et le caractère anonyme de sa plateforme d'écoute et d'accompagnement, accessible à tous. » Des intervenants critiquent le centre Le psychologue Jacques Caron a travaillé pendant près d'un mois lors des débuts du CPRMV de Montréal. Sa vision du centre diffère de celle qui est affichée sur le site Internet de celui-ci. À cette étape-là [au début des activités du CPRMV], très clairement, on était un centre de délation beaucoup plus, on était un centre de répression beaucoup plus qu'un centre de prévention. Maintenant, avec le temps, je ne sais pas comment ça a évolué.

17. Radicalisation des jeunes femmes Loin de l'image de la petite étourdie

Le Soleil, Baptiste Ricard-Châtelain, 2016 10 28

Québec - Des agents de radicalisation sont à l'oeuvre au Québec et réussissent à embrigader de jeunes femmes dans un islam radical fantaisiste, révèle une recherche déposée jeudi à l'Assemblée nationale. Mais très peu d'entre elles aboutissent au Moyen-Orient. Le phénomène est limité, tempère Herman Debarice-Okomba, directeur du Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence. En Syrie, les services de renseignement ont dénombré entre 25 et 30 Québécois. Il ne faut pas être alarmiste. Aussi, parmi les quelque 550 Occidentales recensées dans les zones de conflit en Syrie et en Irak, entre 3 et 7 Québécoises ont été identifiées, ajoute Olivier Lamalice, chercheur au Conseil du statut de la femme. N'empêche, M. Lamalice et son collègue Benjamin Ducol, responsable de la recherche au Centre de prévention de la radicalisation, ont croisé une douzaine de jeunes femmes endoctrinées pour cette enquête. Ils n'ont mis que quelques semaines pour retrouver ces Québécoises. Et celles-ci leur ont parlé d'autres amies qui avaient flirté avec les mêmes idéaux. Parmi l'échantillon, certaines ont été arrêtées le jour du grand envol, à l'aéroport. C'est d'ailleurs à la suite du départ de Québécois vers la Syrie et l'Irak qu'on a voulu creuser les motivations de celles qui rêvent de s'y établir.

18. Radicalized women in Quebec well educated, from middle-class families, says report

CBC.CA, Ryan Hicks, 2016 10 28

Ottawa - For the first time, the provincial government has a picture of how young Quebec women become radicalized. The Quebec Council on the Status of Women presented the report Thursday afternoon at the National Assembly. It debunks some myths about radicalized women. The report is based on interviews with five radicalized women, and their friends and family. Researchers found the women are active participants, rather than being passive, naive or dependent on men. They started to become radicalized in their late teens - from the ages of 17 to 19. They came from middle class families, were successful in their studies and well-educated. The report also looked at the factors that can lead to radicalization, including a traumatic life experience, confusion over identity, and a search for meaning in one's life. Women told researchers they feel caught between two worlds: they felt too Québécoise for their country of origin, but too foreign living in Quebec.

19. Religion not a factor in violent radicalization of women: report

Globe and Mail, Raquel Fletcher, 2016 10 28

Ottawa - A new report reveals surprising reasons young women and girls get involved with radical terrorist groups overseas. The Status of Women report was released in Quebec City Thursday afternoon. The province hopes the report will help prevent vulnerable women from joining violent jihadist movements in Iraq and Syria. "They're not really women who are prone to violence at all. They're very successful at school, that was one of the elements of surprise," Immigration Minister Kathleen Weil said. There is no specific profile for a woman who might join a terrorist organization overseas. Researchers interviewed 12 people at a prevention centre in Montreal. The women they interviewed were between 17 and 19 years old. They found a family's economic situation didn't play a role. Neither did ethnicity. "They don't come from very religious families," Weil said. "They are themselves Muslim but they're not particularly religious." A McGill University research group released a study with similar findings earlier this week involving 2,000 CEGEP students. That report showed that religion actually protects young people from violent radicalization. The RCMP's new Terrorism and Violent Extremism Awareness Guide also underscores there is no single profile of someone who is radicalized.

20. Une rare fenêtre sur les Québécoises radicalisées

La Presse+, Gabrielle Duchaine; Denis Lessard, 2016 10 28

Montréal - À la fois femmes et djihadistes. Pourquoi des Québécoises décident-elles de tout abandonner et de partir en Syrie rejoindre des groupes djihadistes aux yeux de qui elles n'ont pratiquement pas de droits ? Une étude dévoilée hier par le Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence et le Conseil du statut de la femme ouvre une rare fenêtre sur ce qui se passe vraiment dans la tête des adolescentes radicalisées. Combien sont parties ? Entre trois et sept Québécoises auraient rejoint la Syrie depuis 2013, selon l'estimation des experts. À l'échelle internationale, on estime que les femmes représenteraient environ de 10 à 15 % du total des ressortissants occidentaux ayant rejoint la Syrie. Les chiffres pour le Québec ne tiennent pas compte des femmes qui ont tenté de quitter le pays et qui ont été stoppées en chemin ou qui ont changé d'idée avant de partir. Le rapport de les dénombre pas. « En raison de la dimension clandestine du phénomène, il demeure difficile d'indiquer très précisément le nombre de Québécoises ayant rejoint la Syrie ou tentées de le faire depuis le début du conflit sur place », lit-on. Selon les informations récoltées par La Presse au fil de nos enquêtes, au moins quatre jeunes femmes ont été interceptées avant leur départ, dont Sabrina Djermane, cette ex-élève du cégep Maisonneuve qui attend son procès à Montréal.

21. '60 Minutes' Interviews Minnesota Man Linked To ISIS

WCCO TV (Minneapolis), Esme Murphy, 2016 10 28

Minneapolis - A Minnesota terrorist, who recruited friends to fight for ISIS, says online videos made him feel special. Abdirizak Warsame, 21, recently sat down to speak with CBS Evening News anchor and "60 Minutes" correspondent Scott Pelley. In the exclusive interview -- set to air this Sunday -- the young Eagan man opened up about his motivations, and what he still thinks about every day. It's very rare for someone in federal custody, much less a convicted terrorist, to do an on-camera interview. Warsame told Scott Pelley he became radicalized by watching YouTube videos of the infamous American-born cleric, Anwar al-Awlaki. "He explained how Islam was, you know, like my calling," Warsame told Pelley. "It was almost like he was talking to you. And, like, it made you feel like you were special, and like you're the chosen one."

22. Booz Allen hires former FBI director to conduct security review

Washington Post, Christian Davenport, 2016 10 28

Washington - Booz Allen Hamilton said Thursday that it has hired Robert Mueller, a former FBI director, to conduct a review of the firm's security processes after one of its employees was charged with stealing huge amounts of classified data from the National Security Agency. "We take the trust clients place in us seriously and are proud to support our country's important national security missions," Craig Veith, Booz Allen's vice president for external relations, said in a statement. "We are committed to doing our part to detect potential insider threats, which are complex and constantly evolving." In a complaint that was unsealed this month, Harold T. Martin was charged in what is alleged to be one of the largest thefts of classified material in U.S. history. Martin's arrest follows the leaks of Edward Snowden, who also worked for Booz Allen while on contract to the NSA and walked away with troves of sensitive information. Prosecutors have said that Martin took at least 50 terabytes of digital data, or as much as 500 million pages of information. He also had six boxes of files, many of which were left open in his house or car, prosecutors said. Also on Thursday, in documents urging that Martin remain jailed, prosecutors alleged that they found the names of U.S. intelligence officers in the materials they recovered from Martin, which posed a particular threat to the safety of those operating undercover abroad. They said Martin's communications were being monitored -- except those with his lawyers -- and they remained concerned about the damage he could do if he was able to reveal any of the information he took.

23. Bundy Brothers Acquitted in Takeover of Oregon Wildlife Refuge

New York Times, Courtney Sherwood, Kirk Johnson, 2016 10 28

Portland - Armed antigovernment protesters led by Ammon and Ryan Bundy were acquitted Thursday of federal conspiracy and weapons charges stemming from the takeover of a federally owned wildlife sanctuary in Oregon last winter. The surprise acquittals of all seven defendants in Federal District Court was a blow to government prosecutors, who had argued that the Bundys and five of their followers used force and threats of violence to occupy the reserve. But the jury appeared swayed by the defendants' contention that they were protesting government overreach and posed no threat to the public. In a sign of the tension that ran through the trial, Ammon Bundy's lawyer, Marcus R. Mumford, frustrated that the Bundys were not being released, was restrained by four United States marshals after an outburst. "I knew that what my husband was doing was right, but I was nervous because the judge was controlling the narrative," said Ryan Bundy's wife, Angela Bundy, 39, in a telephone interview from the family ranch in Bunkerville, Nev. "But they saw the truth. I am just so grateful they saw it." Mr. Mumford said acquitting Mr. Bundy would be a victory for all Americans. "They're deceiving you," Mr. Mumford said, gesturing to the prosecutors. "It's the government that picks and chooses the rules it's going to comply with." In a statement, Oregon's governor, Kate Brown, said she was disappointed.

24. CIA to share 11 million declassified documents through agency's website

Washington Times, Andrew Blake, 2016 10 27

Washington - The CIA this week said it will make more than 11 million declassified documents searchable on the agency's website. The sizable collection of previously privileged documents currently resides on a database called the CIA Records Search Tool, or CREST, and for years has only been accessible by using computers at the National Archives and Records Administration in College Park, Md. Ryan Trapani, a spokesman for the intelligence agency, told the Federal of American Scientists on Tuesday that CREST documents will soon be uploaded to the CIA's official website, CIA.gov. "When loaded on the website they will be full-text searchable and have the same features currently available on the CREST system at NARA," he said. "This will dramatically increase the ability of the public to access these documents, which currently are available only by going to NARA in person," CIA spokesman Jonathan Lieu told The Hill on Thursday. The CIA hasn't said when the move will occur, but Mr. Trapani told FAS "we are moving out on the plan to make the transition," FAS reported.

25. Congress: Cuba to Share Critical U.S. Intel With Iranian Spies

Washington Free Beacon, Adam Kredo, 2016 10 27

Washington - Obama administration efforts to bolster the sharing of critical intelligence data with Cuba is likely to benefit Iran, which has been quietly bolstering its foothold in the country with the communist government's approval, according to conversations with members of Congress and other sources familiar with the matter. A little noticed Obama administration directive on Cuba, released Oct. 14, instructed the U.S. director of national intelligence to assist and cooperate with Cuba's intelligence services. The directive has raised red flags on Capitol Hill, where some lawmakers are concerned that Cuba will pass along critical U.S. intelligence to the Iranians, who have made moves in recent years to extend their influence in the communist country and other Latin American countries hostile to the United States. The Obama administration's move to share intelligence with Cuba is likely to be celebrated by Iran, according to congressional sources tracking the matter. "President Obama's instruction to DNI Clapper last week to look for ways to cooperate with Cuba on intelligence issues poses an unconscionable threat to the security of the American people," Victoria Coates, national security adviser for Sen. Ted Cruz (R., Texas), told the Free Beacon.

NBC News, Daniella Silva, 2016 10 28

New York - Authorities used pepper spray and fired bean bags at activists demonstrating against a controversial North Dakota oil pipeline as the standoff there reached a new peak Thursday, according to officials. Armed soldiers and police in riot gear removed the demonstrators using trucks, military Humvees, and buses Thursday afternoon, according to The Associated Press. Two helicopters and an airplane scanned the operation from the air. At least 141 protesters were arrested as of midnight Thursday (1 a.m. ET) after law enforcement slowly closed in and tensions escalated, the Morton County Sheriff's Department said in a statement. Seven protesters used "sleeping dragon" devices, which typically involve PVC or other pipe, to attach themselves to items, and fires were set on a highway and improvised fire bombs were thrown at law enforcement, the Morton County Sheriff's Department said in a statement. One woman allegedly fired three shots from a revolver at police, an emergency services official said. No one was hit.

27. Ex-National Guard member admits plotting attack to help Islamic State

Washington Post, Jasper Scherer, 2016 10 28

Washington - In the spring of this year, Mohamed Bailor Jalloh said he often thought about carrying out an attack to support the Islamic State. The Northern Virginia man drew inspiration from Nidal Hasan, the Army major who killed 13 people at Fort Hood, Tex., in 2009. But Jalloh, a former member of the Virginia National Guard, also questioned whether he could "ensure his heart would be strong and not fail him" during an attack, court records show. If he could not take part in an operation, he suggested, he could help by providing money or weapons. Jalloh, 27, pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Virginia to attempting to provide support to the terrorist group. Court records show that the case came together largely because one person Jalloh was communicating with was an FBI source. Jalloh, who was born in Sierra Leone, lived in Loudoun County and was a U.S. citizen. His family has declined to comment, and neighbors said they kept to themselves. Authorities have said Jalloh had a job at the time of his arrest in July but did not say where. Jalloh is set to be sentenced in January and faces a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison.

28. How Snowden Smartened Up Our Spying

Newsweek, Jack Goldsmith, 2016 10 28

Column - At the dawn of the Snowden revelations, many wondered whether the U.S. intelligence community would be destroyed. Some hoped that it would. But the opposite has happened: Despite undoubted intelligence losses, new collection barriers and diplomatic embarrassments, the community has emerged as a stronger organization despite, indeed because of, Snowden. Snowden forced the intelligence community out of its suboptimal and unsustainable obsession with secrecy. "Before the unauthorized disclosures, we were always conservative about discussing specifics of our collection programs, based on the truism that the more adversaries know about what we're doing, the more they can avoid our surveillance," Director of National Intelligence James Clapper said in 2013. Post-Snowden, the intelligence community operates on the principle that secrecy is not an absolute value, but one that needs to be traded off for other values, including domestic legitimacy. Snowden made it realize that, in the words of former NSA Director Michael Hayden, "although the public cannot be briefed on everything, there has to be enough out there so that the majority of the population believe what they are doing is acceptable." Forced transparency meant that the intelligence community had to justify itself before the American people for the first time ever--about what it did in the domestic arena and abroad, about the legality of and accountability for its actions and about its importance to U.S. national security. Note: Jack Goldsmith is a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution and the Henry L. Shattuck professor of law at Harvard University. From 2003 to 2004, he served as the assistant attorney general, Office of Legal Counsel. From 2002 to 2003, he served as the special counsel to the general counsel of the Department of Defense.

29. Putin denies hacking claims; Allegations that Russia is meddling in U.S. election are 'utter nonsense,' he says.

Los Angeles Times, Mansur Mirovalev, 2016 10 28

Moscow - Russian President Vladimir Putin on Thursday vehemently rejected claims that Moscow is tampering with the U.S. presidential election, and said it was "utter nonsense" that the Kremlin favors Republican Donald Trump. At the same time, Putin had kind words for Trump, saying that "he chose his method of getting through to voters' hearts." This month, the White House accused the Kremlin of masterminding cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee and leaking stolen emails. Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton has called Trump a puppet of Putin's. The Kremlin has denied the accusations, and Putin called them a ploy to divert public attention from issues such as gun violence or the United States' growing debt. Presidential hopefuls "apparently have nothing to say, so it's much simpler to distract people with presumed Russian hackers, spies and agents of influence and so on," he said in televised remarks at a gathering in the Black Sea city of Sochi.

30. States unprepared for Election Day cyber attack

Politico, Daniel Samuelsohn, 2016 10 28

Washington - State election officials around the country are woefully unprepared for a cyber disruption around Election Day. While states have spent years thinking about and planning for other types of crisis that can mess with voting -- from hurricanes to power blackouts and terrorist attacks -- they've been slow and ill staffed to develop contingency plans responsive to a hack attack that would adequately protect their systems in time for the 2016 presidential election. "They're waking up to it, but they largely don't know what questions to ask," said Jeremy Epstein, a senior computer scientist at the nonprofit research center SRI International and an expert on voting mechanics. A dozen battleground state officials surveyed by POLITICO insist the voting systems themselves are safe, as nearly all parts of the balloting process take place in a secure, offline environment. But they also repeatedly acknowledged there are limits to what they can control, and they recognize they face legitimate challenges from cyber intrusions to the myriad adjacent parts that go into an election, including online registration records and publicizing vote tallies.

31. The NSA deputy chief on Edward Snowden's true motivations

Washington Post Magazine, Joe Heim, 2016 10 30

Interview - Richard Ledgett Jr., 58, has worked at the National Security Agency since 1988. He and his wife live in Maryland and have three children. Washington Post: If (Edward) Snowden were sitting across from you, what would you say? Richard Ledgett: I'd ask him, Why did you do what you did? The narrative that he's told publicly about this actually doesn't track if you parse the timelines. He says he was motivated by Jim Clapper's remarks to Senator Wyden and the revelation that those remarks weren't accurate. If you look at the timeline, Snowden was actually stealing material and in contact with reporters eight months before that, so that doesn't track. Q: So even if the timeline doesn't scan, do you question his motivation? A: I do. I know a lot about this. I probably spent more time than anybody but our chief investigator on the actual investigation on this. I know a lot that I still can't talk about because it's sensitive investigational stuff. And if he does ever come back to the United States it will be part of the government's case against him. The things that I can say, I think a lot of what was in the House Intelligence Committee's report where they talk about him actually being mad about being disciplined -- I think that actually tracks more with motivation. Q: Do you think history will ultimately decide what Snowden did helped the country? A: That's a really hard one. I think if you weigh the benefit and the harm, the balance comes out pretty far on the harm side. That doesn't mean that there was absolutely no good to what he did. And I think that's an important nuance. It's heavily weighted towards harm. The little bit of good is forcing a conversation that we probably should have had earlier. And for me that was a lesson learned. That we should have talked about the particular authority, the Patriot Act authority, earlier in the process. Q: Should he go to jail? A: On balance I think he should go to jail. Assuming that he gets a trial and is convicted, which I think the case is very strong. I would vote for conviction. I think I would be disqualified from the jury.

32. Student remanded over ball-bearing bomb on Underground

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 10 27

London - An explosive device found on the London Underground was viable and contained ball bearings, it emerged today. The detail came at the first court appearance of the teenager accused of sparking the security alert last week at North Greenwich station, southeast London. Damon Smith, spoke only to confirm his name and address when he stood before senior district judge Emma Arbuthnot at Westminster magistrates' court. Mr Smith, originally from Devon, smiled and waved to his mother in the public gallery during proceedings. He twice gave her a thumbs up. The 19-year-old entered no plea to a charge of unlawfully and maliciously making or possessing an unspecified explosive substance with intent to endanger life or cause serious injury to property. However, Simon Eastwood, defending, indicated that his client, who has a form of autism, would plead not guilty on the ground that it was a prank. Judge Arbuthnot rejected an application for bail by the London Metropolitan University student and he was remanded in custody to appear at the Old Bailey on November 17.

The "viable improvised explosive device" found in an abandoned rucksack contained a timer, batteries and grey powder and the ball bearings would have maximised injuries to people. A 19-year-old man on Thursday appeared in court charged with explosives offences after the find on a Jubilee Line train. Damon Smith of Abbeyfield Road in Southwark, south-east London was alleged to have possessed or made an explosive device "with intent by means thereof to endanger life or cause serious injury to property". 36. Boko Haram Attacks Signal Resilience of ISIS and Its Branches

New York Times, Dionne Searcey, Eric Schmitt, 2016 10 27

Diffa, Niger - Defeating Boko Haram was a flagship campaign promise of President Muhammadu Buhari of Nigeria, the former general who took office a year and a half ago. Since then, the Nigerian military, aided by neighboring countries -- along with training from the United States, Britain and France -- has made huge advances. Mr. Buhari has claimed for months that Boko Haram has been defeated, and this month he revealed in the release of 21 of the nearly 300 girls kidnapped from a school by Boko Haram more than two years ago. Yet a troubling new series of attacks in Nigeria and the neighboring country of Niger, including one that killed dozens of soldiers, highlights how Boko Haram is far from eliminated. With the rainy season ending and roads becoming passable again, officials are bracing for more ambushes like the one at the river crossing. Boko Haram has pledged allegiance to the Islamic State, and Western intelligence officials believe the recent strikes were carried out by a group that splintered off with the Islamic State's blessing to focus on Western and strategic military targets. Now, the group is unleashing the kinds of military attacks that had been on the wane in past months, restoring a deadly urgency to the conflict just as it seemed the militants were finally losing traction. The splinter group has stated its intent to focus its attacks "away from local Sunni civilians and towards military and Western targets," said Cmdr. William J. Marks, a spokesman for the Defense Intelligence Agency in Washington.

40. Jeunes djihadistes : pris dans la toile de l'araignée

Journal du Mali, Olivier Dubois, 2016 10 27

Bamako - Au Mali, la pauvreté, le chômage, la corruption, l'insécurité, et l'absence de l'État dans certaines portions du territoire, exacerbe le désenchantement et les frustrations des populations, constituant un terrain propice pour les groupes djihadistes, qui ciblent en majeure partie les jeunes. L'extrémisme violent prôné par ces groupes, s'efface devant des raisons, souvent financières, qui poussent ces jeunes à s'enrôler. « Je les ai rejoint pour faire vivre ma famille ». « Comme l'État n'est pas là, chacun se protège comme il peut ». « J'ai rejoint le MUJAO car j'ai vraiment aimé leur manière de convaincre les gens, leur justice et leur droiture ». Ces témoignages sont ceux de jeunes combattants, logisticiens, informateurs, chauffeurs, des anonymes, qui ont répondu à l'appel des ces groupes extrémistes violents pour tenter de changer leur quotidien, protéger ou nourrir leur famille, et dans une moindre mesure, par conviction religieuse. On les nomme communément djihadistes, et au sein des katibas, ils sont des moudjahidines qui servent les objectifs des groupes extrémistes.

43. Colombia delays peace talks with ELN rebels until captive freed

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 28

Bogota - Colombia is delaying peace talks with Marxist ELN rebels until they free a politician held captive for six months, President Juan Manuel Santos said on Thursday, as he struggles to salvage a peace deal with FARC guerrillas that was rejected in a plebiscite. The National Liberation Army (ELN), the nation's second-biggest insurgent group, must release Odin Sanchez to the International Committee of the Red Cross before talks can begin in Ecuador, Santos said, reiterating a condition he set months ago. The opening ceremony had been scheduled to take place in Ecuador's capital at 6 p.m. EDT (2200 GMT) but it was canceled at the last minute. The government said the talks could still go forward as early as Friday or Saturday if the rebels free Sanchez, however. The 2,000-strong ELN, considered a terrorist group by the United States and European Union, has kidnapped hundreds of people during its 52-year insurgency to raise war funds and use hostages as bargaining chips with the government.

44. Abu Sayyaf received $7.3M in ransom from kidnappings: Philippine government (Canada)

Associated Press, Jim Gomez, 2016 10 28

Manila - Abu Sayyaf pocketed at least 353 million pesos ($7.3 million) from ransom kidnappings in the first six months of the year and have turned to abductions of foreign tugboat crewmen as military offensives restricted the militants' mobility, a confidential Philippine government report said. The joint military and police threat assessment report seen by The Associated Press on Thursday said the offensives have reduced the number of Abu Sayyaf fighters slightly, although the group remains capable of launching terrorist attacks. Government offensives have reduced the number of militants to 481 in the first half of the year from 506 in the same period last year but they managed to carry out 32 bombings in that time - a 68 per cent increase - in attempts to distract the military assaults, the report said. They wield at least 438 firearms and managed to conduct a number of terrorist trainings despite constant military assaults. President Rodrigo Duterte, who took office in June, has ordered troops to destroy Abu Sayyaf, known for its brutality, and he has ruled out the possibility of any peace talks with them. He has pursued talks with two other larger Muslim insurgent groups. Of the estimated 353 million pesos in ransom received by the Abu Sayyaf from January to June, the bulk was paid in exchange for the releases of 14 Indonesian and 4 Malaysian crewmen who had been held at Abu Sayyaf jungle bases in Sulu province, the report said. The militants got 20 million pesos ($413,000) in ransom for freeing Marites Flor, a Filipino woman who was kidnapped last year with two Canadians and a Norwegian from a yacht-berthing resort on southern Samal island. The militants beheaded the two Canadians after ransom deadlines lapsed. Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau urged governments not to pay ransom to discourage similar abductions. The Norwegian hostage, Kjartan Sekkingstad, was freed last month after a year of horrific jungle captivity when he was constantly threatened with beheading.

45. Espionage case: Pak official held, expelled for spying; ties take another hit

Times of India, Staff Report, 2016 10 28

New Delhi - The already dim prospects of any improvement in India- Pakistan relations were dealt another blow on Thursday with Delhi Police busting an espionage ring whose 'kingpin' is a Pakistan high commission official. The government declared Mehmood Akhtar persona non grata after he was nabbed buying classified documents from two men from Rajasthan at the Delhi zoo. Indian officials found that Akhtar enjoyed immunity even though he wasn't a diplomatic passport holder. Besides Maulana Ramzan Khan and Subhash Jangid who were nabbed from the zoo, Akhtar was in touch with Shoaib from Rajasthan. An FIR under Sections 3 and 5 of the Official Secrets Act has been registered against the accused, joint commissioner (crime) Ravindra Yadav said. A hunt for at least 10 people, including defence personnel who allegedly leaked the documents, is on. Late in the evening, Pakistan retaliated by declaring a staffer in the Indian high commission in Islamabad, Surjit Singh, persona non grata.

46. Islamic preacher, grocer were easy prey

The Hindu, Shiv Sunny, 2016 10 28

New Delhi - The Indian "spies" in the alleged espionage case arrested on Wednesday were paid meagre amounts for their efforts to collect defence-related information for their Pakistani handlers, investigators suggested. "The amount varied between Rs. 30,000 to Rs. 50,000 per month. Each time, the spies would bring in a thick stack of documents, some of them useful, others not," said Ravindra Yadav, Joint Commissioner of Police (Crime). Mahmood Akhtar, the Pakistan High Commission staffer who is accused of being an ISI agent, allegedly asked his contacts in Rajasthan and Gujarat to target men who were struggling for money. One such "spy," Maulana Ramzan Khan is a teacher at a mosque in Rajasthan's Nagaur district. Also an "Islamic preacher," Khan served as the caretaker of the mosque as well as taught around 40-50 children. "He was being paid Rs. 2,000 for taking care of the mosque and Rs. 3,000 for his role as a teacher. That made him an easy target," said a senior police officer.

47. Kim Jong-un orders full probe into Musudan missiles launches

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 10 28

Seoul - North Korean leader Kim Jong-un has ordered a special investigation team to conduct a full-fledged probe into the causes of the failure of recent intermediate-range missiles launches, a North Korean defectors group claimed Friday. "Kim has instructed the special investigation team to implement a probe into the national defense sector starting on Nov. 1 to make the causes for the launch failures clear," said Kim Heung-kwang, a North Korean defector and executive director of Seoul-based dissidents' group North Korea Intellectuals Solidarity, in a press conference. Kim attributed the investigation to the North Korean leader's belief that spies from the United States and South Korea had been implicated in a series of Musudan missile failures. It is speculated that North Korean authorities believe South Korea and the U.S. have done something detrimental to the missile parts, including the integrated circuit chips, that are imported from foreign countries, according to Kim.

48. Party Leaders in China Elevate the President's Status

New York Times, Chris Buckley, 2016 10 28

Beijing - President Xi Jinping of China received a potent boost to his status on Thursday, when a Communist Party meeting elevated him to "core" leader, putting him in the same revered ranks as Mao Zedong and Deng Xiaoping. Mr. Xi's newest title, carrying echoes of those political strongmen, reinforces his power to shape the new leadership of the party. It is also a warning that officials should fall in line, though some privately fear he has amassed too much control and has eroded traditions of collective leadership, built up to prevent a return to the arbitrary abuses of Mao's final decades. Since he became general secretary of the party in 2012, the leadership "with Comrade Xi Jinping as its core has acted on its words and led by example," said a communiqué from the four-day assembly of the Central Committee. "For a country and for a party, a leading core is vitally important," said the document, which was solemnly read on Chinese state television news. "It seems that this plenum really was a victory for Xi," Joseph Fewsmith, a professor at Boston University who studies Chinese leadership politics, said by email. "What exactly that means in terms of personnel changes is hard to say, but it seems that Xi will get what he wants."

49. In Russia's cyberscene: Kremlin desires, private hackers, and patriotism

Christian Science Monitor, Fred Weir, 2016 10 27

Moscow - While much is known about US cyber-war and -espionage capabilities thanks to the massive data leaks of former NSA contractor Edward Snowden, Russia's capacity for such is much more obscure. But the experience of Alexander Vyarya, which came to light virtually without notice last year, may offer a few telling glimpses of it. Mr. Vyarya, a young Russian programmer, was a team member at Qrator, a leading Russian cybersecurity company that specializes in mitigating the effects of distributed denial-of-service [DDoS] attacks. According to his account, given to the independent Russian online news service Medusa, the company was approached by an intermediary from Russia's Ministry of Communications looking for a specialist to help with a particular problem. Vyarya was "loaned" on an unofficial basis to Rostek, the Russian state technology conglomerate, in early 2015, and sent to an office in Sofia, Bulgaria. There, he was asked to help develop software not to block, but to amplify DDoS attacks. He did - and he was appalled when the program was "tried out" before his eyes on targets like Ukraine's Defense Ministry and the liberal Russian magazine Slon, he later told Medusa. By his account, he told his contact "I am not a hacker," and subsequently fled to Finland. Vyarya's experience - other than the young programmer's attack of conscience and relating his story to the press - is not unusual on Russia's cyberscene, says Andrei Soldatov, one of the country's foremost cybersecurity experts and co-author of The Red Web, a history of the Russian internet - and the security services' efforts to control it - that will be released in Russian next week.

50. Les hommes neufs de Vladimir Poutine

Le Monde, Isabelle Mandraud, 2016 10 28

Moscou - En vue de l'élection présidentielle de 2018, le président russe se débarrasse de sa vieille garde, pour placer une équipe plus jeune qui « ne tutoie pas le chef ». Un renouvellement qui accentue la personnalisation du régime. La garde prétorienne de Vladimir Poutine a changé. En l'espace de quelques semaines, plusieurs proches du chef de l'Etat russe ont été écartés et remplacés par d'autres collaborateurs, plus jeunes, souvent peu connus, comme Anton Vaïno, 44 ans, promu chef de l'administration présidentielle; Sergueï Kirienko, 54 ans, chargé de la politique intérieure; ou Viatcheslav Volodine, 52 ans, nommé président de la Douma, la chambre basse du Parlement. Tous partagent un point commun qui les différencie de leurs aînés, «ils ne tutoient pas le président», ainsi que le souligne le politologue Andreï Kolesnikov, mais ils ont, surtout, une mission bien précise devant eux: préparer l'élection présidentielle de 2018. L'été, au Kremlin, est souvent une période propice au ménage. Le 12 août, l'un des personnages les plus influents du pays, Sergueï Ivanov, 63 ans, qui régnait depuis décembre 2011 sur l'administration présidentielle, a été débarqué tout comme, un an auparavant, à la même période, Vladimir Jakouline, 68 ans, le puissant patron des chemins de fer russes pendant dix ans. Ces deux proches de Vladimir Poutine étaient issus du même sérail que le président, le KGB, et faisaient partie d'une génération parvenue en même temps au pouvoir.

51. Russia Flexes Military Muscle in New Way (Canada)

Wall Street Journal, Julian E.. Barnes, 2016 10 28

Brussels - Recent high-profile Russian military deployments are designed to showcase new Russian capabilities and a willingness to operate in many areas simultaneously, U.S. and alliance officials said. The Russian flotilla that is steaming toward Syria, led by the aircraft carrier Admiral Kuznetsov, is unlikely to have a decisive effect on that conflict, according to U.S. officials. Russian naval capabilities haven't been modernized as much as the country's air force or ground units, and the air power the Kuznetsov can bring is limited, the officials said. Still, the deployment has received international attention. Russia has stirred up tensions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with Spain initially granting Russia permission to refuel some ships only to have the request withdrawn as pressure mounted on Madrid. NATO has been building up its own forces in the Baltic and Black Sea regions, with allies pledging new contributions this week in Brussels, including British and German tanks headed to the Baltic states. Canada will send 450 soldiers and light armored vehicles, wheeled military transports similar to American Strykers. Canadian Defense Minister Harjit Sajjan said NATO's four battle groups bound for the Baltic states were clearly defensive. He added that the alliance has been transparent about its operations, announcing them months in advance. "That's what true deterrence is, to be able to show what we have, so there is no misconception, no fear that is created out of what you are doing," Mr. Sajjan said.

52. Ukrainian Hackers Release Emails Tying Russia to Uprising

New York Times, Andrew E. Kramer, 2016 10 28

Moscow - A group of Ukrainian hackers has released what it says are the emails of a senior Kremlin official that show a direct Russian role in creating and directing the rebel uprising in eastern Ukraine in 2014. The group claimed to have hacked the account of Vladislav Y. Surkov, for years President Vladimir V. Putin's chief domestic political adviser and now the top official overseeing Russia's Ukraine policy. The group released what it says are thousands of letters to and from Mr. Surkov's office email account, adding a fat dossier to this year's vast spill of emails around the world and showing high-level Kremlin meddling in Ukraine. While the authenticity of the documents has yet to be fully established, several of the people who corresponded with Mr. Surkov confirmed that the messages of theirs released by the hackers were the ones they sent. In a telephone interview, Yevgeny A. Chichvarin, a Russian entrepreneur living in exile in London, confirmed the authenticity of his emails to Mr. Surkov's aides. "Yes, this is my original text," he said. The Atlantic Council, a Washington think tank, analyzed the emails and determined they were genuine, based partly on the routing information.

Le Figaro, Alain Barluet, 2016 10 28

Mossoul - Les djihadistes s'accrocheront jusqu'au bout à la « capitale » irakienne de leur califat, où ils s'abritent derrière la population civile. À Mossoul, Daech se prépare à livrer la « mère des batailles » . Pas question, a priori, pour les forces de l'État islamique (EI) de céder le terrain dans sa « capitale » irakienne, la ville où Abou Bakr al-Baghdadi a proclamé en 2014 le « califat » au Levant. Encerclés dans leur sanctuaire - sauf sur le flanc ouest - par l'avancée des forces irakiennes, kurdes et des milices chiites, les combattants djihadistes seraient de 3 000 à 5 000 ainsi qu'un à deux autres milliers dispersés en périphérie pour retarder l'assaut attendu des forces adverses. Parmi ces djihadistes, des centaines de combattants étrangers, dont « environ 250 Français », indique-t-on à la Défense. Selon Washington, 900 djihadistes ont déjà été tués dans la bataille autour de Mossoul. Du côté de la coalition anti-Daech, qui était réunie à Paris cette semaine, toutes les hypothèses ont été envisagées, de la fuite des djihadistes au Fort Chabrol sanglant. Les perspectives se sont précisées ces jours derniers : des mouvements de combattants djihadistes, « plusieurs centaines », dit-on, ont été signalés en direction de Mossoul, et non l'inverse.

Tehran - A senior Iranian official has warned that the global arrogance has been sowing discord among Muslim nations to divert attention from Israel's crimes. "Hegemonic powers are making attempts to create divisions in the Muslim world to distract the public opinion from the main enemy that is the Zionist regime," Secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council Ali Shamkhani said Thursday. The official met high-ranking clerics in the holy city of Qom to brief them on Iran's measures to guarantee security in the face of Takfiri terrorism on its doorsteps. "Thanks to the valuable guidelines of the Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyyed Ali Khamenei Iran has managed to maintain security in and beyond its borders," Shamkhani said during a meeting with Ayatollah Nasser Makarem-Shirazi. Daesh and other Takfiri groups are inspired by Wahhabism which is widely preached in the Saudi kingdom and tolerated by its rulers.

55. Up to 900 ISIL fighters killed in Mosul battle, US says

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 10 28

Erbil - Up to 900 ISIL fighters have been killed in the offensive to retake Mosul, the United States said on Thursday, as camps around the city filled with fleeing civilians. Iraqis who fled their homes expressed joy at escaping ISIL's brutal rule as they were given shelter and assistance, in some cases reuniting with relatives they had not seen in more than two years. With air and ground support from the US-led anti-ISIL coalition, Iraqi government forces allied with Kurdish peshmerga fighters have taken a string of towns and villages from the extremists in a cautious but steady advance. General Joseph Votel, who heads the US military's Central Command, said the offensive was inflicting a heavy toll on the extremists. "Just in the operations over the last week and a half associated with Mosul, we estimate they've probably killed about 800-900 Islamic State fighters," Gen Votel said.

"This is one of the deadliest attacks on schools since the war in Syria began five years ago," Juliette Toumah, the regional chief for communications in the Middle East for UNICEF told The Media Line. "It was a horrific attack that happened during school hours." UNICEF director Anthony Lake said if the attack was deliberate it could constitute a "war crime." Lake said the school compound was "repeatedly attacked," adding that it may be the deadliest attack on a school since the war began more than five years ago. A photograph circulated on social media showed a child's arm, seared off above the elbow, still clutching the strap of a dusty black rucksack.

Jeddah - Saudi ground defenses intercepted late on Thursday a ballistic missile launched by Houthi militias targeting the holy city of Makkah. The Arab coalition said in a statement that the missile was downed 65 km from Makkah, adding that the coalition jet fighters attacked the rocket launchers in Saada and destroyed them. Meanwhile, Yemeni Prime Minister Ahmed Obeid bin Daghr on Thursday said Iran has trained thousands of Houthi fighters in Iran and Beirut, paving the way for the rebel militias' aggression. "The war in Yemen did not start on March 26, 2015. It, in fact, started when Houthis raised the guns against their political rivals and against the state with clear support from Iran, which trained around 6,000 Houthis in Iran or in Beirut under military experts," Bin Daghr said following a meeting with French Ambassador to Yemen Christian Tisti. Undisclosed placeline - Terror organizations al-Qaeda and ISIS are exploiting the state of chaos in Yemen and use the country as a base to infiltrate Saudi Arabia, authors of a famous book on the subject have said. Thomas Small and Jonathan Hacker - co-authors of Path of Blood: The Story of Al Qaeda's War on the House of Saud - told Al Arabiya English that ISIS is changing as a result of the campaigns against them while al-Qaeda has been taking advantage of a lesser spotlight on them. "Losing ground in Syria and Iraq, they are expanding into areas further and further afield from the Middle East," Thomas Small said. "Though the two groups argue over strategy and leadership, and because ISIS is now seen as the more barbaric of the two, al-Qaeda has managed to position itself, oddly enough, as a more "moderate" face of global jihadism," he said. According to Jonathan Hacker, both al-Qaeda and ISIS are exploiting the chaos in Yemen and use the country as a base to infiltrate Saudi Arabia.

The suspect, 25-year-old Mahmoud Mussa Abbasi, was arrested some three weeks ago. In addition, the Shin Bet investigations found that Abbasi has supported Hamas and was involved in several prior attacks in which Molotov cocktails and stones were hurled at Israeli security forces.

61. The KGB's long history of running agents in Israel

Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, 2016 10 28

Jerusalem - Researchers, historians, Shin Bet counter-espionage operatives and even the broader public did not need Israeli daily newspaper Yediot Aharonot's exposé this week about Israeli Soviet spies in order to know that Soviet intelligence tried and succeeded in penetrating into the heart of Israel's diplomatic-security-intelligence establishment. The depth of the penetration by the Soviet Union's KGB and GRU (military intelligence), or of the intelligence services of communist satellite states, has been testified to by a long line of agents who were convicted in Israel from the 1950s through to the 1990s. It is a long and impressive list of "moles," quality agents that penetrated every important department in Israel. These are the serious and important spies that caused the most damage to the Israeli defense and intelligence establishment. It is very likely that there were those who penetrated, spied and were never caught. The Soviet intelligence method was "quantity that becomes quality."

63. European judges rule against German neo-Nazi NPD in discrimination case

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 10 27

Berlin - The European Court of Human Rights has dismissed the claims of the National Democratic Party of Germany. The right-wing extremist party had claimed to be the victim of discrimination in Germany. The judges in Strasbourg ruled against Germany's National Democratic Party (NPD) on Thursday, deciding its claims were unwarranted because of the sufficient legal options available to it in Germany. The NPD had gone before the European Court of Human Rights to argue that its rights were being curtailed and it was being stigmatized due to its right-wing views. The party stated that its members were being barred from the civil service, were prevented from opening bank accounts and were not able to participate in elections. It also argued that there weren't enough ways to fight said discrimination legally. The court, however, rejected the NPD's claims as "patently unfounded," countering the far-right party's argument by insisting there were indeed enough legal methods in Germany at its disposal.

64. July 15 mastermind Gülen sheltered in US desperately searching for a new safe haven (Canada)

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 10 28

Istanbul - Justice Minister Bekir Bozdag said Thursday in a press conference that Turkish intelligence has obtained information indicating that Fetullah Gülen, who is in search for a new suitable place to take shelter from the possibility of extradition from the United States, may try to escape to Norway, Belgium, Brazil or Canada. Bozdag held a meeting with his U.S. counterpart Attorney General Loretta Lynch on Wednesday regarding the provisional arrest of U.S.-based fugitive Gülen. During the meeting, Turkey presented the U.S. additional evidence and documents on its request for the extradition of Gülenist Terror Group (FETÖ) leader Gülen, who is accused of leading the failed July 15 coup attempt that killed 241 people and left 2,194 others wounded. A press meeting was organized at the Turkish Embassy in Washington, D.C. regarding the details of the Bozdag-Lynch meeting. Responding to a question about whether any progress was made on the subject of Gülen's provisional arrest demand, Bozdag said the U.S. judiciary will make the decision regarding the issue and asserted that Turkey presented "more than enough" evidence for the demand. Bozdag said, "These are additional evidences to the file that we transmitted to U.S. authorities about Gülen's actions prior to the failed July 15 coup attempt. The file regarding the coup attempt has already been prepared in Turkey." "What we request is a provisional arrest warrant, and we presented new evidences concerning the demand," Bozdag added. The justice minister underscored the need for the U.S. to handle the situation with sensitivity, taking into consideration that Gülen, with the worry of a possible extradition, has already began to search for other countries to take shelter in. "Turkish intelligence has strong information that points to Gülen's pursuit of Belgium, Brazil or Canada as suitable places to shelter," Bozdag said.

La Haye - Le très attendu procès du député néerlandais anti-islam Geert Wilders s'ouvre lundi devant un tribunal sous haute sécurité, où l'homme politique controversé devra répondre de discrimination et d'incitation à la haine alors que le pays se prépare à ses prochaines élections législatives, prévues pour mars. Tous les regards seront tournés vers ce tribunal situé à proximité de l'aéroport d'Amsterdam-Schiphol, curieux de l'impact du procès sur les chances électorales de ce politicien d'extrême-droite, qui divise dans un pays se targuant pourtant de sa tolérance multiculturelle. Le procès, qui devrait se clôturer le 25 novembre, porte sur des propos tenus lors d'une soirée après les élections municipales de mars 2014 à La Haye. Le député à la chevelure peroxydée avait alors demandé à ses militants s'ils voulaient "plus ou moins de Marocains dans [leur] ville et aux Pays-Bas". Face à une foule scandant "Moins! Moins! Moins!", l'homme politique a répondu dans un sourire: "nous allons nous en charger."

66. Le Front national, un dilemme pour les médias français

La Presse+, Marc Thibodeau, 2016 10 28

Non identifié - Le Front national, sous la gouverne de Marine Le Pen, tente depuis plusieurs années de « dédramatiser » son image en vue d'élargir sa base politique et d'accéder un jour au pouvoir. Son approche pose un dilemme pour les médias du pays, qui s'interrogent sur la ligne de conduite à suivre dans leur couverture à l'approche du prochain scrutin présidentiel, comme en témoigne une récente prise de position du Monde à ce sujet. Quelle est l'approche préconisée par Le Monde ? Dans un numéro spécial paru au début de la semaine dans laquelle le discours du Front national est passé au crible, le directeur du quotidien français, Jérôme Fenoglio, indique qu'il ne publiera dans ses pages aucune tribune émanant des ténors de la formation. Le principe, appliqué depuis de nombreuses années, est réitéré avec force et reflète la volonté des dirigeants du journal de ne pas donner au parti un « signe supplémentaire de son institutionnalisation » à l'approche d'un scrutin présidentiel dans lequel la candidate d'extrême droite a d'excellentes chances de figurer au second tour. Comment le journal abordera-t-il le Front national ? M. Fenoglio note que le quotidien n'entend pas minimiser « ou passer sous silence » la « parole lepéniste » et traitera son parti avec la même rigueur que les autres par des portraits, des enquêtes ou des reportages, tout en s'abstenant d'offrir une tribune libre à ses dirigeants.

67. NATO Committed to Sustaining anti-ISIS Coalition's Momentum (Canada).

Asharq Al-Awsat, Abdullah Mustafa, 2016 10 28

Brussels - The fight against ISIS is a main topic on the agenda of discussions of NATO defense ministers who are holding a two-day meeting in Brussels. Alliance head Jens Stoltenberg said Wednesday that NATO will contribute its support for the U.S.-led coalition battling ISIS in Syria and Iraq through sophisticated surveillance planes. NATO leaders agreed in July to commit the AWACS planes after Washington had pressed hard for the alliance to make a concrete gesture to help the fight against ISIS. "NATO itself is now offering direct support with our AWACS surveillance aircraft," Stoltenberg told a press briefing in Brussels, announcing that the first flight took place on October 20. Britain, Canada, Germany and the United States agreed in July to lead the battalions of some 1,000 troops each, with the other 24 NATO allies expected to provide different components -- transport, communications and medical units.

1. L'affaire d'espionnage du chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé décortiquée

Radio-Canada (Nouvelles) (site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 10 31

Montréal - La communauté journalistique ainsi que plusieurs experts s'inquiètent à la suite des révélations selon lesquelles le journaliste de La Presse Patrick Lagacé a été espionné par les policiers. Qu'est-ce que la police cherchait à savoir? Quels moyens ont été employés? La protection des sources journalistiques est-elle en danger? En mai, on apprenait que deux journalistes, vraisemblablement Joël-Denis Bellavance et Gilles Toupin de La Presse, ont bel et bien été espionnés en 2007 par des agents de la GRC. Pendant neuf jours, en août 2007, des enquêteurs ont exercé, sans autorisation de leurs supérieurs, une surveillance physique sur les deux journalistes afin de trouver la personne qui leur divulguait des renseignements. Cette surveillance s'effectuait au moment où les journalistes couvraient l'enquête de la GRC et du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) sur Adil Charkaoui.

2. 'Indefensible,' La Presse reporter says of police tracking his phone

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman and Paul Cherry, 2016 11 01

Montreal - Montreal police strongly defended a highly controversial decision to spy on a La Presse columnist by tracking his cellphone calls and texts and monitoring his whereabouts as part of a necessary internal police investigation - while the journalist involved called what they did "indefensible." "Lives were not at stake, this was not a question of national security," La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé said in an interview Monday. "The leaks made them look bad, that's why they decided to go after me in the way they did." Opposition politicians are also condemning Montreal police for spying on Lagacé, though Mayor Denis Coderre stood by police chief Philippe Pichet on Monday, noting that a mayor should not intervene in police operations, but did say he was troubled by the news. For several months this year, police were monitoring Lagacé's iPhone to determine the identity of his sources, La Presse reported. This was confirmed to Lagacé last Thursday by Montreal police. At least 24 surveillance warrants were granted by courts in 2016, at the request of the Montreal police department's special investigations section, which probes crime within the police force. The warrants allowed police to track the telephone numbers of incoming and outgoing calls on Lagacé's phone, and to monitor the phone's location, although Pichet denied at a hastily convened press conference Monday that the GPS on his phone was monitored. Lagacé said he is sure many judges around the world have been asked by police departments to grant similar warrants, but refused because it was too "vulgar" to spy on a reporter. "It was incredibly aggressive," he said, questioning the judgment of the judge involved.

3. Affaire Patrick Lagacé Les patrons des médias québécois s'indignent

TVA Nouvelles avec l'Agence QMI, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 01

Montréal - Un texte dénonçant l'espionnage électronique par la police de Montréal dont a été la cible le chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé a été publié dans les principaux médias du Québec ce matin. Il porte la signature de 10 dirigeants de grandes salles de rédaction qui, dans un geste rarement vu, ont tenu à exprimer d'une seule voix leur indignation face aux cas récents d'intrusion injustifiée des autorités policières dans le travail des journalistes. Le vice-président TVA Nouvelles-Agence QMI, Serge Fortin fait partie des signataires. Voici donc le texte : Liberté de presse et protection des sources journalistiques: Les élus doivent passer aux actes Nous, dirigeants des principales salles de rédaction de Montréal, tenons à exprimer notre indignation et notre inquiétude face à l'espionnage électronique du journaliste Patrick Lagacé par la police de Montréal. Il est inacceptable que des enquêteurs aient pu obtenir accès aux données téléphoniques et à la géolocalisation d'un journaliste sans autre motif que d'identifier des sources journalistiques à l'intérieur du corps de police. Ce n'est pas le seul cas d'intrusion injustifiée des autorités policières dans le travail des journalistes. En juin, le premier ministre Justin Trudeau avait qualifié d'«inacceptable» la filature par la GRC des journalistes Joël-Denis Bellavance et Gilles Toupin, de La Presse. Puis en septembre, l'Assemblée nationale a adopté à l'unanimité une motion pour «rappeler l'importance du principe de protection des sources journalistiques» après que la Sûreté du Québec ait perquisitionné l'ordinateur du journaliste Michaël Nguyen, du Journal de Montréal. Dans les trois cas, les élus ont soit dénoncé l'intervention policière, soit s'en sont dits fortement préoccupés. Des actions concrètes sont nécessaires pour protéger les sources journalistiques.

4. A grotesque attack on a free press

Globe and Mail, 2016 11 01

Editorial: Smartphones are a pocket miracle, carrying as they do a secondby-second chronicle of our correspondence, conversations, images and movements. State access to them should be granted with caution, and rarely. Which brings us to the Montreal Police Service. Earlier this year, the force sought and obtained at least 24 warrants to monitor the metadata of the iPhone belonging to Patrick Lagacé, a prominent columnist for La Presse newspaper. Every byte of it. For five months. Even Mr. Lagacé's whereabouts were monitored through the phone's GPS system. Mr. Lagacé was not the target of any investigation. He is not suspected of anything nefarious. He didn't unwittingly find himself at the centre of a race against time to thwart terrorists. What he did do was his job. He has written a number of stories that have embarrassed the Montreal police. At one point, he was in contact with a detective who was under investigation by the police department's internal affairs branch. That was enough for Justice of the Peace Josée De Carufel to sign off on what can only be described as an intolerable intrusion into Mr. Lagacé's life.

5. Assault on freedom of the press

Montreal Gazette, 2016 11 01

Editorial: For the second time in two months, a journalist reporting on matters related to the justice system has found his own rights egregiously compromised. These affronts to freedom of the press are deeply troubling. Starting last January, Montreal police spied on La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé through his cellphone, obtaining his call records and tracking his movements, as part of what police said was an internal probe of antigang squad officers later charged with fabricating evidence. This is an outrageous violation of Lagacé's privacy and an attack on his role as a journalist in a democratic society. He was never a target of the probe nor suspected of any wrongdoing. And he was never even given an opportunity to safeguard his contacts from police scrutiny. In September, Journal de Montréal reporter Michaël Nguyen had his computer seized by the Sûreté du Québec after reporting on two judges under investigation by the Conseil de la magistrature. Nguyen's computer was put under seal, allowing Le Journal to fight the seizure. Nguyen was targeted because he had obtained information on disciplinary proceedings that had not been made public, including a video of a judge haranguing courthouse security guards. But La Presse later revealed that the supposedly secure confidential documents Nguyen was accused of stealing were readily available on the Conseil de la magistrature website.

6. Chiefs call on PM to condemn pipeline

Toronto Star, Tanya Talaga, 2016 11 01

Toronto - First Nations chiefs are testing Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's commitment to his relationship with indigenous people by asking him to speak out against a Canadian company's ties to the Dakota Access pipeline. The International Treaty Alliance of 85 First Nations and Tribes said on Monday that it is time for Trudeau to make a statement "condemning the role that Canadian company Enbridge Inc. has played in the severe violations of the rights of the indigenous people and their allies at Standing Rock." In the last several days, more than 140 people have been arrested in increasingly violent confrontations at the site of the construction of the $4-billion pipeline. Activists, who say they are protectors of the land and not protesters, charge constructing a pipeline threatens the traditional sacred lands and water supply of the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation in North Dakota. The pipeline would travel under the Missouri River. In response, thousands of indigenous people have camped out in Standing Rock on the shore of the Cannonball River. Demonstrators have faced a heavy police and U.S. National Guard presence. They say they have been hit with rubber bullets, faced police dogs and experienced rough treatment while being arrested. The Dakota Access pipeline would carry crude oil from the Bakken field to a refinery in Illinois.

7. De l'importance des enquêtes journalistiques

La Presse, Isabelle Hachey, 2016 11 01

Montréal - Elles ont fait naître un mouvement pacifiste, dévoilé des escroqueries érigées en système et fait tomber un président. De tout temps, les enquêtes journalistiques ont été essentielles à la démocratie. Tour d'horizon de quelques-unes des plus marquantes au Canada, en France et aux États-Unis. Le Watergate Ce n'était au départ qu'un cambriolage dans l'immeuble du Watergate, où se trouvaient les locaux du Parti démocrate à Washington. Les journalistes Bob Woodward et Carl Bernstein, du Washington Post, ont reçu l'aide du plus célèbre des informateurs - Deep Throat - pour établir un lien entre les cambrioleurs et la Maison-Blanche, impliquée dans cette affaire d'espionnage politique. Le scandale a mené à la démission du président Richard Nixon en 1974. Deep Throat - l'agent du FBI Mark Felt - n'a révélé son identité que 31 ans plus tard, en 2005. Christian Leblanc, avocat spécialisé en droit des médias chez Fasken Martineau, souligne que les États-Unis font d'ailleurs figure de modèle en la matière, la majorité des États ayant légiféré pour protéger les sources journalistiques. Le scandale des commandites Au Canada, le journaliste du Globe and Mail Daniel Leblanc s'est basé sur les informations fournies par « MaChouette » pour faire éclater le scandale des commandites. Son enquête a révélé que les fonds publics destinés à faire la promotion du fédéralisme avaient été détournés par des amis du gouvernement en place. Par la suite, Daniel Leblanc a risqué la prison en refusant de dévoiler l'identité de MaChouette. En 2010, la Cour suprême a jugé qu'on avait fait erreur en exigeant du journaliste qu'il trahisse sa source. « Selon la Cour suprême, il faut faire une pondération entre la divulgation de la source et ce que l'on tente de prouver, dit Me Leblanc. L'intérêt public, en terme de liberté d'expression, pèse lourd dans cette mise en balance. »

La Presse+, Patrick Lagacé, 2016 11 01

Chronique - Tout a commencé par un texto de l'éditeur adjoint de La Presse, Éric Trottier. « Faut que je te parle, jeune homme. » C'était jeudi en fin d'après-midi, je venais de finir une répétition pour l'enregistrement de Deux hommes en or, l'émission que je coanime à Télé-Québec. Je rappelle donc Éric. Sur le bruit de fond caractéristique des conférences téléphoniques, il m'annonce qu'il est avec Patrick Bourbeau, l'avocat de La Presse. Me Bourbeau m'explique les détails de l'affaire. Les quatre policiers arrêtés en juillet... Mon nom qui apparaît sur le radar des enquêteurs... Une demande faite à un juge... Un de nos procureurs qui parle à celui de la Couronne... Et... Et mon téléphone, espionné pour ses métadonnées pendant six mois. Pendant six mois, la police de Montréal a pu avoir accès à tous les numéros qui entraient dans mon téléphone, à tous ceux que je composais. Pour des appels ou pour des textos. Si vous m'avez appelé entre le 13 janvier et le 7 juillet, si je vous ai appelé, si nous avons échangé des textos : la police de Montréal le sait.

9. Feds decide to hold steady on immigration levels, for now

Toronto Star, Paul Wells, 2016 11 01

Toronto - What's this! A difference of opinion? Among Trudeau Liberals? Governments are usually so intent on describing their choices as though they were handed down on stone tablets that it is refreshing to see one admit, even by accident, that some of these questions are hard. Enter John McCallum, the minister of immigration, who has decided after long consideration that Canada's immigration levels are - well, pretty good, actually. This flies in the face of advice McCallum's colleague, Finance Minister Bill Morneau, has only just received from some of Morneau's favourite smart people, the Advisory Council on Economic Growth. Led by globe-trotting consultant Dominic Barton, the panel's interim report suggests a 50-per-cent increase in immigration over five years - led by a doubling in economic-class immigrants over the same period. This is not merely a matter of national pride or a vague sense that the more people who can call themselves Canadian the better, Barton argues. It's a necessary remedy to the slow aging of Canada's population and the difficulty Canadian firms have attracting "senior and specialized talent." Boosting immigration is part of Barton's plan to give every Canadian family a $15,000 pay raise by 2030. On Monday, McCallum said he'll hold total immigration levels steady next year, and boost economic immigration just a touch. Did he just cancel part of Barton's raise? A great big hint to McCallum's motives came when he tabled a summary report on Canada-wide consultations into immigration.

10. Feds fail to meet deadline to clear Phoenix backlog

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 01

Ottawa - Public Services and Procurement Canada missed its promised Halloween deadline to clear the backlog of pay problems caused by the Phoenix pay system, as the cases of 22,000 public servants remain unresolved, the department's top bureaucrat says. Deputy minister Marie Lemay said Monday the department couldn't meet its self-imposed Oct. 31 target because the remaining cases are older and more complicated than the front end of the pile and will require more work than expected. Lemay said she was disappointed but that the department did everything it could. She said "nobody can say there is something else we could have tried. ... We cleared 75 per cent of the backlog." Lemay said the next step is to develop a new plan that will take the department to a "steady state," when all the bugs are ironed out and pay transactions are being processed smoothly, on time and accurately. As of Monday, the department had resolved the pay issues of more than three-quarters of the 82,000 people who had been caught in the backlog as of the end of June. The queue of cases sitting at the Miramichi, N.B. pay centre to be processed is said to be growing, but the department resists calling those cases a backlog.

11. Hope for 'Liberal mandate' sways PSAC to reopen talks with Treasury Board

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 01

Ottawa - The largest federal union says it has decided to return to the bargaining table this week with the federal government's promise of a "revised mandate" that could revive stalled contract talks. Robyn Benson, president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, said Treasury Board negotiators signalled the government may be willing to move on key issues, including the contentious issue of replacing the existing sick leave regime. Benson says the Liberals' seeming change of heart came after the union launched an advertising campaign two weeks ago calling on the prime minister "to make good on his word." At that time, Benson threatened to pull out of deadlocked contract negotiations. "We are open to going back to the table, but they need to come with a Liberal mandate and my understanding is they have a new mandate and we are quite prepared to see this new mandate and whether it is enough or not. I hope it is worth our while," Benson said. Benson said PSAC is the first union to get a look at what that new mandate has to offer. PSAC, however, picked up its campaign against Trudeau this week. The union expanded its advertising campaign, which began in Ottawa, Gatineau, Toronto and Halifax, to radio and newspapers across the country.

12. Jury hears details of Tamil migrants' ocean journey

Globe and Mail, Sunny Dhillon, 2016 11 01

Vancouver - A Tamil man whose uncle died during their voyage to Canada on a migrant vessel six years ago has told a human-smuggling trial his relative was extremely ill in the days leading up to his death. The MV Sun Sea docked in British Columbia in August, 2010, carrying 492 Sri Lankan Tamils - 380 men, 63 women and 49 children. The ship was the second Tamil migrant vessel to arrive in this province in less than a year and made international headlines. Kunarobinson Christurajah, Lesly Emmanuel, Nadarajah Mahendran and Thampeernayagam Rajaratnam have each been charged under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act with organizing the trip. Their jury trial began two weeks ago in Vancouver. The MV Sun Sea departed with 493 persons on board, but one passenger died during the five-week voyage. Ragu Gnanasountharanayakam testified in B.C. Supreme Court on Monday and told the jury the deceased was his uncle. He said his uncle had been vomiting every time he ate. Mr. Gnanasountharanayakam said about two or three days before his uncle died, he began vomiting blood. He said his uncle was given some kind of medication, but it did not appear to help. Mr. Gnanasountharanayakam said he was sleeping next to his uncle when he died. He said he was allowed to go into the crew's area of the ship and call his parents to tell them what had happened.

14. La Presse says Montreal police tracked journalist's iPhone for months

Canadian Press, Morgan Lowrie, 2016 11 01

Montreal - A Montreal journalist whose iPhone was monitored by police for months says he was outraged to discover he'd been "spied on" as part of what he calls an effort to identify his sources. "I was living in the fiction that police officers wouldn't dare do that, and in the fiction that judges were protecting journalists _ and hence the public _ against this type of police intrusion," La Presse columnist Patrick Lagace said in an interview Monday. "Clearly, I was naive." The French-language newspaper said it learned at least 24 surveillance warrants were issued for Lagace's phone this year at the request of the police's special investigations unit. That section is responsible for looking into crime within the police force. Three of those warrants reportedly authorized police to get the phone numbers for all Lagace's incoming and outgoing texts and calls, while another allowed them to track the phone's location via its GPS chip. The surveillance was ordered as part of an internal probe into allegations police anti-gang investigators fabricated evidence. Five police officers were arrested this summer and two were charged as a result. Lagace said police told him they obtained the court-authorized warrants because they believed the target of one of their investigations was feeding him information. But he said the story in question was actually first reported on by a competitor, leading him to believe the investigation was actually a thinly veiled attempt to learn the identity of his sources within the police department.

15. La radicalisation à visage découvert

Le Soleil, Baptiste Ricard-Châtelain, 2016 11 01

Québec - Invités par l'UNESCO, ils sont quelques centaines à avoir choisi de passer deux ou trois jours au Centre des congrès de Québec pour discuter de la radicalisation des jeunes, surtout celle qui envoie des ados en Syrie. Ils évaluent notamment le rôle d'Internet dans le processus. Beaucoup d'interventions pour initiés, de survols. À travers, des humains : jeunes radicalisés de Montréal, militant repentini de l'extrême droite de Québec, mère d'un soldat tué en France... Morceaux choisis. > Le nationalisme blanc décomplexé à Québec «Je suis là pour m'excuser.» Devant nous, un grand baraqué. Rempli de remords. La Fédération des Québécois de souche, c'est lui. Ou plutôt, c'était lui, quand il cultivait le nationalisme blanc, vraiment blanc. «Je suis le fondateur, le seul et unique. C'est parti de ma tête.» Et elle était rasée, cette tête, à l'époque skinhead. Lui, c'est Maxime Fiset, de Québec, aujourd'hui étudiant universitaire... qui a déjà pensé faire sauter une bombe comme celle du marathon de Boston. Il a aussi été modérateur pour un site Web très raciste. Lundi, il est sorti de l'ombre pour dire qu'il a tout balancé. La radicalisation violente, «c'est plus proche de nous qu'on pense», prévient-il. Il était rendu à un tel point que les policiers l'ont arrêté pour propagande haineuse. Il a alors été expulsé de l'école où il apprenait l'électricité. Et privé d'Internet. Isolé, il s'est enfoncé encore plus en côtoyant seulement ses semblables.

16. Law enforcement, with approval of magistrates, harass media sources

Montreal - Canadians may be used to hearing about police tapping journalists' phones in China, or tailing them down the street in Turkey. But in Montreal, Canada? Unfortunately, say organizations like Canadian Journalists for Free Expression, it is happening a lot more than we think. "It's something we've been suspecting for a long time - that when this kind of power is in the hands of the police they will abuse it," said Tom Henheffer, executive director of CJFE. "I used to be cautious about drawing parallels with Canada and dictatorships like Turkey, China, Russia or Egypt. But the difference has started to erode, especially when it comes to privacy rights." For Henheffer, the revelation that Montreal police had been spying on La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé for six months is just the latest in a worrisome pattern. In Lagacé's case, the police obtained warrants to monitor his cellphone - to see who was calling or texting him, and who he called or texted - and even to pinpoint his location at any given moment through the GPS on his phone. But this year alone, there were also several other troublesome revelations: The Sûreté du Québec seized Journal de Montréal reporter Michael Nguyen's computer in September after he reported on a Quebec judge's questionable behaviour after a Christmas party. And in May it was revealed that La Presse reporters in Ottawa, Joël-Denis Bellavance and Gilles Toupin, were followed for nine days in 2007 by the RCMP, as the force tried to find out how they obtained classified documents. In all three cases, police, with the approval of magistrates, targeted journalists to hunt down their sources and try to stop leaks to the press - leaks that made them look bad.

17. Liberals in denial about Monsef story

Toronto Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 11 01

Column: A file within the federal government has been opened to investigate Democratic Institutions Minister Maryam Monsef for citizenship fraud. And the Liberal government seems to be in denial about it. The Sun exclusively reported that a file was opened to investigate Monsef, who claims she only recently learned she was born in Iran, not Afghanistan. A number of complaints were received through a tip line created by Canada Border Service Agency (CBSA) and the Department of Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada (IRCC), leading to an investigation. It remains unknown whether Monsef's proper birthplace information was included on her original refugee and citizenship application. While the Immigration department refused to comment on the investigation, claiming privacy laws prevented them from discussing details, Monsef's office issued a statement. "Minister Monsef is not aware of any actions by IRCC," wrote Monsef's Director of Communications, John O'Leary, in an exclusive email sent to the Sun. "It's standard practice for IRCC to contact an applicant when they are reviewing a file," wrote O'Leary. "That has not happened." When asked to verify how and why it is "standard practice" to inform someone of an investigation into their file, O'Leary simply repeated his line. "It's standard practice." Informing a person of an investigation, however, is not the standard practice.

18. Lutte contre la radicalisation La SQ met sur pied un grand centre de « cybersurveillance »

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche, 2016 11 01

Québec - De plus en plus appelée à faire la police sur le web autant que dans les rues, la Sûreté du Québec (SQ) est en train de regrouper ses meilleurs spécialistes pour créer un grand centre de « vigie et cybersurveillance » qui traquera toute forme de crime sur les réseaux sociaux et l'internet en général. Le directeur général de la SQ, Martin Prud'homme, a confirmé la création de cette équipe spéciale à La Presse, hier, lors de la conférence parrainée conjointement par l'UNESCO et le gouvernement québécois, à Québec, et ayant pour thème « Internet et la radicalisation des jeunes ». Une vingtaine de policiers travailleront sous peu dans cette unité centralisée sous les ordres du capitaine Jean Lafrenière. Et les budgets seront au rendez-vous, promet le patron du corps policier. Même si les logiciels, les équipements et la formation coûtent cher dans ce domaine. « C'est un des sujets de discussion à la conférence aujourd'hui : on se doit d'être au bon niveau dans l'ensemble des domaines. On veut regrouper nos équipes et augmenter leurs ressources humaines et matérielles. C'est vraiment une priorité », a affirmé M. Prud'homme. Ces patrouilleurs du Net devront être à l'affût d'un ensemble de crimes, pas seulement de ce qu'on appelait autrefois la cybercriminalité. « Aujourd'hui, on peut avoir de l'extorsion sur internet, des agressions sexuelles, de la pornographie juvénile ou de la radicalisation. » -- Martin Prud'homme, directeur général de la Sûreté du Québec

19. Montreal Cops Have Tracked a Journalist's Cellphone for the Past Year

Vice News, Justin Ling, 2016 11 01

Montreal police, investigating the possibility of crooked cops on the force, obtained warrants to surveil a journalist's iPhone, and even obtained permission to use his GPS chip to track his whereabouts at all time. But the federal minister of public safety, Ralph Goodale, stopped short of discouraging police forces from going to the courts to obtain judicial orders against journalists. Asked directly by NDP Member of Parliament Matthew Dubé on Monday about whether he'll issue a directive to create more formal rules around how police deal with journalists, Goodale would only say that "we take the freedom of the press in this country very, very seriously." Dubé raised the question after on Monday after Montreal newspaper La Presse published details on surveillances warrants, at least 24 in total, obtained to surveil journalist Patrick Lagacé. The MP also referenced another case, where federal police are working to obtain chat records from a VICE journalist's cell phone, as evidence that action needs to be taken. Lagacé, who works at La Presse, had been in contact with Faycal Djelidi, a Montreal police officer under investigation for a number of crimes, including perjury and obstruction of justice. When Lagacé's number popped up on Djelidi's phone, the Montreal police obtained the initial surveillance warrants for the journalist's device.

20. Protection des sources - Dériver inadmissibles

Le Devoir, Brian Myles, 2016 11 01

Editorial - L'espionnage du chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé est une dérive de trop au sein du Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM), qui a intégré la chasse aux sources dans son modus operandi. Ce n'est pas d'hier que les journalistes se méfient du SPVM. L'organisation, déjà animée d'une volonté de " contrôler le message ", a poussé d'un cran ses activités de surveillance dans la foulée de l'affaire Davidson. Des enquêteurs du SPVM et de la Sûreté du Québec (SQ) ont redoublé d'ardeur pour trouver les auteurs de la fuite sur Davidson, un policier qui aurait tenté de vendre au crime organisé la liste des informateurs du SPVM avant de s'enlever la vie, en 2012. Sans le travail des journalistes d'enquête, l'affaire Davidson aurait connu un enterrement de première classe, et personne n'aurait entendu parler de ce véritable scandale qui a terni l'image et la réputation du SPVM. Même les journalistes les plus paranoïaques de la profession n'auraient jamais pu imaginer que le SPVM irait aussi loin que l'espionnage des conversations téléphoniques et des déplacements. C'est pourtant ce qui vient d'arriver à Patrick Lagacé, chroniqueur à La Presse, dans une nouvelle affaire sombre pour le SPVM. Depuis le début de l'année, au moins 24 mandats de surveillance sur son portable ont été accordés à la section des Enquêtes spécialisées du SPVM. Les enquêteurs pouvaient même activer la puce GPS de son iPhone à distance.

21. Radicalization research chair to be created in Quebec

Montreal Gazette, Caroline Plante, 2016 11 01

Montreal - Ben vividly remembers the stinging insult when he went trick-or-treating on Halloween not too long ago. A man passing out candy called him a "dirty Arab." The 19-year-old recounted the story on Monday in an interview with the Montreal Gazette before he took the stage at an international conference on radicalization. Ben, not his real name, is one of several Montrealers who became radicalized, but were stopped by authorities before leaving the country. They're sharing their stories at the conference in an effort to prevent other teenagers from taking the same path. While Quebec doesn't lead the pack when it comes to racism and Islamophobia, Ben says some of it exists here. "When I'm with my mother, on the bus, we're stared at because she wears the veil. "There is a certain malaise since the Charter of Quebec Values, and because more attacks are happening in the Western world, Paris, Brussels, here in Canada too, it just makes matters worse for Muslims. Jihadist leaders tell young disillusioned Muslims "you can't live in the Western world, they don't want you, you can't be both Muslim and Canadian," he said. The insults and denigration, the fact that they often go unpunished, the feeling of rejection, the need to feel useful, is often what leads educated Muslim teenagers to rebel and seek solutions abroad, Ben later told the conference, his body hidden and his voice altered. But it's in a comic book - sponsored by Montreal's Centre for the Prevention of Radicalization Leading to Violence (CPRLV) - where Ben and the other Montreal youth opened up about their feelings to an author-illustrator.

22. Selon le professeur David Morin Pas de filière djihadiste à l'UdeS

La Tribune, Isabelle Pion, 2016 11 01

Sherbrooke - Malgré les dernières révélations sur un ex-étudiant de l'Université de Sherbrooke qui serait un présumé djihadiste, «on ne peut pas encore parler de filière de radicalisation islamiste» à l'UdeS, estime le professeur David Morin de l'UdeS, codirecteur de l'Observatoire sur la radicalisation et l'extrémisme violent (OSR). M. Morin deviendra le cotitulaire d'une nouvelle Chaire de recherche en prévention de la radicalisation et de l'extrémisme violent, dont la création a été annoncée lundi à la Conférence Québec-Unesco intitulée «Internet et la radicalisation des jeunes : prévenir et agir ensemble». Le Toronto Star révélait qu'un autre ancien étudiant de l'UdeS, Assane Kamara, fait face à une série de chefs d'accusation de terrorisme au Sénégal parce qu'il aurait tenté de joindre les rangs de l'État islamique (EI). Son nom s'ajoute à celui de trois Sherbrookoïses qui ont fait les manchettes, Zakria Habibi, Samir Halilovic et Youssef Sakhir, qui auraient fui le Canada pour rejoindre la Syrie. En 2015, Chiheb Esseghaier, un ex-étudiant de l'UdeS qui a été membre de l'Association musulmane de l'UdeS (AMUS), a reçu une peine de prison à vie après avoir comploté dans le but de faire dérailler un train de passagers de VIA Rail entre Toronto et New York.

23. Terror suspect freed from custody

Ottawa Citizen, Joe Lofaro, 2016 11 01

Ottawa - An Ottawa terror suspect has been released from custody after he was charged with breaching some of his bail conditions while awaiting the outcome of his case. The RCMP arrested Tevis Gonyou-McLean in August on a terrorism peace bond for his alleged support of ISIL and was later granted bail on several conditions that included wearing a GPS monitoring device on his ankle and a ban on possessing any terrorist logos. On Oct. 25, the 24-yearold was arrested again after police allege he failed to report to the John Howard Society's bail supervisory program and reside at his pre-approved address, and that he damaged his ankle bracelet, thereby allegedly committing mischief. But his Ottawa lawyer, Biagio Del Greco, said the breaches were the result of a "miscommunication" and said the damage to the bracelet occurred while his client was in police custody and was unintentional. None of the breaches was related to alleged terrorist activity. Last summer, the RCMP sought a terrorism peace bond against the Ottawa man after they alleged he uttered a threat to cause death or bodily harm to "unspecified persons." Police feared Gonyou-McLean might attempt to leave Canada to join a terrorist group, participate in the activity of a terrorist group, and commit an offence for a terrorist group. His case first came to light in a Vice News report about a man who worked at an Ottawa pizza shop came to the attention of the RCMP's national security unit. Del Greco confirmed on Monday that Gonyou-McLean no longer works at the pizzeria.

24. A Veteran Spy Has Given the FBI Information Alleging a Russian Operation to Cultivate Donald Trump

Mother Jones, David Corn, 2016 11 01

San Francisco - On Friday, FBI Director James Comey set off a political blast when he informed congressional leaders that the bureau had stumbled across emails that might be pertinent to its completed inquiry into Hillary Clinton's handling of emails when she was secretary of state. The Clinton campaign and others criticized Comey for intervening in a presidential campaign by breaking with Justice Department tradition and revealing information about an investigation--information that was vague and perhaps ultimately irrelevant--so close to Election Day. On Sunday, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid upped the ante. He sent Comey a fiery letter saying the FBI chief may have broken the law and pointed to a potentially greater controversy: "In my communications with you and other top officials in the national security community, it has become clear that you possess explosive information about close ties and coordination between Donald Trump, his top advisors, and the Russian government...The public has a right to know this information." A former senior intelligence officer for a Western country who specialized in Russian counterintelligence tells Mother Jones that in recent months he provided the bureau with memos, based on his recent interactions with Russian sources, contending the Russian government has for years tried to co-opt and assist Trump--and that the FBI requested more information from him. Does this mean the FBI is investigating whether Russian intelligence has attempted to develop a secret relationship with Trump or cultivate him as an asset? Was the former intelligence officer and his material deemed credible or not? An FBI spokeswoman says, "Normally, we don't talk about whether we are investigating anything." But a senior US government official not involved in this case but familiar with the former spy tells Mother Jones that he has been a credible source with a proven record of providing reliable, sensitive, and important information to the US government. In June, the former Western intelligence officer--who spent almost two decades on Russian intelligence matters and who now works with a US firm that gathers information on Russia for corporate clients--was assigned the task of researching Trump's dealings in Russia and elsewhere, according to the former spy and his associates in this American firm. This was for an opposition research project originally financed by a Republican client critical of the celebrity mogul. (Before the former spy was retained, the project's financing switched to a client allied with Democrats.) "It started off as a fairly general inquiry," says the former spook, who asks not to be identified. But when he dug into Trump, he notes, he came across troubling information indicating connections between Trump and the Russian government. According to his sources, he says, "there was an established exchange of information between the Trump campaign and the Kremlin of mutual benefit."

25. Comey faces a firestorm of criticism over renewed Clinton email probe

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 01

Washington - The Justice Department moved Monday to quell the outrage and frenetic speculation surrounding FBI Director James B. Comey's disclosure last week that the bureau has resumed its investigation of Hillary Clinton's private email server after discovering a new trove of emails. The department signaled that it now wants the politically charged investigation to follow standard procedures, including a strict limit on official comments about the probe and the provision of updates to Congress through routine channels. But after Comey's highly unusual disclosure last week rocked the final days of the presidential campaign, it may prove impossible for Justice to lower the temperature and regain control over how the investigation is conducted and depicted to the public. On Monday, criticism of Comey continued to mount, notably from prominent former law enforcement officials. Democrats and Republicans alike on Capitol Hill amplified their demands that Comey and Attorney General Loretta E. Lynch provide a more detailed account of the investigation into the emails, which were found on a computer belonging to former congressman Anthony Weiner (D- N.Y.) earlier this fall.

26. F.B.I. Begins Analysis of Clinton Aide's Emails

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 01

Washington - The F.B.I. on Monday began loading a trove of emails belonging to a top aide to Hillary Clinton into a special computer program that would allow bureau analysts to determine whether they contain classified information, law enforcement officials said. The software should allow them to learn relatively quickly how many emails are copies of messages they have already read as part of the investigation into the use of Mrs. Clinton's private server. The F.B.I. completed that investigation in July and, along with prosecutors, decided not to bring any charges against Mrs. Clinton or her aides. Whether investigators will be able to complete their review by Election Day is unclear. They have been under intense pressure from officials in both parties to do so since Friday, when the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, revealed the existence of the emails in an explosive letter to Congress. Robert E. Anderson Jr., a former senior F.B.I. executive, said it could take less than a day for the program to identify duplicates. He said that the program would organize the duplicates in a special folder and that F.B.I. agents and analysts would then check each of them to make sure it was indeed a copy. Should the F.B.I. find emails that it had never seen before containing potentially classified material, copies would have to be sent to other government agencies to determine their classification -- an elaborate and lengthy process.

27. FBI's Comey opposed naming Russians, citing election timing: Source
CNBC, Eamon Javers, 2016 11 01

Washington - FBI Director James Comey argued privately that it was too close to Election Day for the United States government to name Russia as meddling in the U.S. election and ultimately ensured that the FBI's name was not on the document that the U.S. government put out, a former bureau official tells CNBC. The official said some government insiders are perplexed as to why Comey would have election timing concerns with the Russian disclosure but not with the Huma Abedin email discovery disclosure he made Friday. In the end, the Department of Homeland Security and The Office of the Director of National Intelligence issued the statement on Oct. 7, saying: "The U.S. intelligence community is confident that the Russian Government directed the recent compromises of emails from U.S. persons and institutions, including from U.S. political organizations. ... These thefts and disclosures are intended to interfere with the U.S. election process."

28. Hackers reveal apparent targets of NSA cyber espionage
The Hill, Joe Uchill, 2016 10 31

Washington - The hacker or hackers who stole National Security Agency-built cyber tools have dumped new files in what appears to be yet another change of plans in monetizing the heist. The new files provide some insight into the targets of the NSA-affiliated hacking team called The Equation Group. Those targets include government servers in China and universities in Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. This is the second dump of files that came from the group The ShadowBrokers, who in August released sample files containing previously unknown hacking techniques used to circumvent popular security hardware. The August files also contained a tracking code used by the NSA that matched previously unreleased Edward Snowden documents, appearing to confirm the breach's provenance. In August, the group offered the complete cache of documents for auction. Not seeing the bidding totals they wanted, the group changed to a crowdfunding approach, saying it would release all files publicly if enough people donated money to a bitcoin address. "Ok peoples theshadowbrokers is promising you a trick or treating, here it is," the group wrote in a message accompanying the latest files. It labeled the folder containing the breached documents "trickortreat" and password protected it with the login "payus."

29. Investigating Donald Trump, F.B.I. Sees No Clear Link to Russia

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, Steven Lee Myers, 2016 11 01

Washington - For much of the summer, the F.B.I. pursued a widening investigation into a Russian role in the American presidential campaign. Agents scrutinized advisers close to Donald J. Trump, looked for financial connections with Russian financial figures, searched for those involved in hacking the computers of Democrats, and even chased a lead -- which they ultimately came to doubt -- about a possible secret channel of email communication from the Trump Organization to a Russian bank. Law enforcement officials say that none of the investigations so far have found any conclusive or direct link between Mr. Trump and the Russian government. And even the hacking into Democratic emails, F.B.I. and intelligence officials now believe, was aimed at disrupting the presidential election rather than electing Mr. Trump. Hillary Clinton's supporters, angry over what they regard as a lack of scrutiny of Mr. Trump by law enforcement officials, pushed for these investigations. In recent days they have also demanded that James B. Comey, the director of the F.B.I., discuss them publicly, as he did last week when he announced that a new batch of emails possibly connected to Mrs. Clinton had been discovered. Supporters of Mrs. Clinton have argued that Mr. Trump's evident affinity for Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin -- Mr. Trump has called him a great leader and echoed his policies toward NATO, Ukraine and the war in Syria -- and the hacks of leading Democrats like John D. Podesta, the chairman of the Clinton campaign, are clear indications that Russia has taken sides in the presidential race and that voters should know what the F.B.I. has found. 30. South African Spy Company Used by Gadaffi Touts its NSA-Like Capabilities

The Intercept, Jenna McLaughlin, 2016 10 31

Washington - The South African company best known for selling Muammar Gaddafi's regime spy equipment used to monitor millions of Libyans' international phone calls is now claiming it can intercept communications on a scale that rivals a government spy agency, according to a company brochure obtained by The Intercept. In a 2016 pamphlet produced by VAShTech SA Pty Ltd., the company outlines its current capabilities for governments, militaries, and law enforcement agencies around the world, claiming it can conduct "passive detection" of communications transmitted from satellites, fix-and-mobile phones, and fiber optic cable. The company is offering multiple tools to vacuum up communications from around the globe undetected, or what the company calls "communication intelligence extraction solutions" -- a capability not unlike the U.S. National Security Agency's PRISM program. The new brochure "shows the company has continued its established route of selling very powerful surveillance technology focusing on international gateways," says Matthew Rice, an advocacy officer at Privacy International, a U.K based nonprofit. "They're commercializing some of the most intrusive capabilities and selling them on for profit, including to authoritarian regimes. Some of these companies, such as VasTech and Hacking Team, are even funded in part by public money."

31. When the FBI Has a Phone It Can't Crack, It Calls These Israeli Hackers

The Intercept, Kim Zetter, 2016 10 31

Washington - Earlier this year, at the height of a very public battle between the FBI and Apple over whether the computer maker would help decrypt a mass murderer's locked iPhone, it appeared that a little-known, 17-year-old Israeli firm named Cellebrite Mobile Synchronization might finally get its moment in the spotlight. After weeks of insisting that only Apple could help the feds unlock the phone of San Bernardino killer Syed Rizwan Farook, the Justice Department suddenly revealed that a third party had provided a way to get into the device. Speculation swirled around the identity of that party until an Israeli newspaper reported it was Cellebrite. It turns out the company was not the third party that helped the FBI. A Cellebrite representative said as much during a panel discussion at a high-tech crimes conference in Minnesota this past April, according to a conference attendee who spoke with The Intercept. And sources who spoke with the Washington Post earlier this year also ruled out Cellebrite's involvement, though Yossi Carmil, one of Cellebrite's CEOs, declined to comment on the matter when asked by The Intercept. But the attention around the false report obscured a bigger, more interesting truth: Cellebrite's researchers have become, over the last decade, the FBI's go-to hackers for mobile forensics. Many other federal agencies also rely on the company's expertise to get into mobile devices. Cellebrite has contracts with the FBI going back to 2009, according to federal procurement records, but also with the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Secret Service, and DHS's Customs and Border Protection. U.S. state and local law enforcement agencies use Cellebrite's researchers and tools as well, as does the U.S. military, to extract data from phones seized from suspected terrorists and others in battle zones.

32. 'There will be terrorist attacks in Britain,' says MI5 chief

The Guardian (London), Paul Johnson, Ewen MacAskill, 2016 11 01

London - Sitting in the office of the president of the Royal Society, where he has just been the surprise guest speaker at its annual diversity conference, (MI5 director Andrew)Parker, who has made speeches and appeared once on the BBC Today programme, has a worldview that centres on three areas of threat. The first is Islamic-inspired terror, which he calls enduring and generational. "International terrorism in its latest shape, based on twisted ideology, brings terror to our streets and most of the developed world, including North America, Australia and Turkey," he says. "Currently, the flavour of it is Daesh, or Isil [Islamic State], and we still have the al-Qaida brand. This is something we have to understand: it's here to stay. It is an enduring threat and it's at least a generational challenge for us to deal with." He says the number of terror plots thwarted in the past three years stands at 12. "That sort of tempo of terrorist plot and attempts is concerning and it's enduring. Attacks in this country are higher than I have experienced in the rest of my career - and I've been working at MI5 for 33 years. The reality is that because of the investment in services like mine, the UK has got good defences. My expectation is that we will find and stop most attempts at terrorism in this country." He lets the word "most" sink in before adding: "There will be terrorist attacks in this country. The threat level is severe and that means likely."

33. Jihadis planning Paris-style gun attacks on British streets, police say

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 10 31

London - Terrorists wanted to get firearms to launch gun attacks on Britain's streets in five extremist plots foiled in the last two years, police have revealed, as they admitted that 800 legally owned guns had gone missing. In a rare joint appeal, the National Crime Agency and Scotland Yard's counter-terrorism command urged the public to report fears about lax gun security among legal owners as well as criminals handling firearms. The intensified activity comes as British law enforcement, security and intelligence services try to prevent a marauding terrorist gun attack, such as the one that struck Paris in November 2015, happening in the UK. They fear terrorists getting guns from criminals and are concerned by an apparent upsurge in guns on the streets in London and some other big urban areas. Assistant commissioner Mark Rowley, who is in charge of counter-terrorism for the police, said: "We know that firearms can enter the criminal market through a variety of means, including thefts from legitimate holders or dealers. Law enforcement, together with security and intelligence services, are working tirelessly to locate these weapons, confront the terrorist threat and keep the public safe."

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 01

Londres - Le chef du service de renseignement britannique MI5, Andrew Parker, met en garde, dans une interview au Guardian contre les méthodes "de plus en plus agressives" de la Russie et son recours aux cyber- technologies pour s'opposer à l'Occident. Moscou, a-t-il expliqué, "s'appuie sur toute sa gamme d'organes étatiques et toute sa puissance pour faire avancer sa politique étrangère de façon de plus en plus agressive, et cela comprend la propagande, l'espionnage, la subversion et les cyber-attaques". "La Russie est à l'oeuvre dans toute l'Europe et au Royaume-Uni. La tâche du MI5 est de lui barrer la route", a-t-il poursuivi. Ces déclarations surviennent une dizaine de jours après qu'une flotte navale russe de huit navires, en route pour les côtes syriennes, a fait l'objet de surveillance en mer du Nord de la part d'une frégate britannique.

35. MI5 head: 'increasingly aggressive' Russia a growing threat to UK

The Guardian (London), Ewen MacAskill, Paul Johnson, 2016 11 01

London - Russia poses an increasing threat to the stability of the UK and is using all the sophisticated tools at its disposal to achieve its aims, the director general of MI5 has told the Guardian. In the first newspaper interview given by an incumbent MI5 chief in the service's 107-year history, Andrew Parker said that at a time when much of the focus was on Islamic extremism, covert action from other countries was a growing danger. Most prominent was Russia. "It is using its whole range of state organs and powers to push its foreign policy abroad in increasingly aggressive ways - involving propaganda, espionage, subversion and cyber-attacks. Russia is at work across Europe and in the UK today. It is MI5's job to get in the way of that." Parker said Russia still had plenty of intelligence officers on the ground in the UK, but what was different now from the days of the cold war was the advent of cyberwarfare. Russian targets include military secrets, industrial projects, economic information and government and foreign policy. The spy chief also: . Said that 12 jihadi terror plots had been foiled by the security services in the past three years. . Identified the size of the homegrown problem: there are about 3,000 "violent Islamic extremists in the UK, mostly British". . Said that budget increases would see MI5 expand from 4,000 to 5,000 officers over the next five years. . Rejected criticism that the investigatory powers bill, due before parliament this week, was going too far in enabling intrusive surveillance, arguing that it correctly balances privacy and security. . Dismissed claims that Brexit would affect cooperation with European intelligence services. . Said his aim was to equalise the gender balance in MI5 and recruit many more operatives from ethnic minority backgrounds.

36. Philip Hammond to spend extra £1.9bn fighting cyber-attacks

The Guardian (London), Anushka Asthana, Jessica Elgot, 2016 11 01

London - Outdated computer systems are allowing malicious hackers to target everyone from companies at board level to individuals in their living rooms, according to the chancellor, who is promising to strike back against cyber-attacks. Philip Hammond will use a speech on Tuesday to unveil a £1.9bn package designed to boost Britain's defences against a growing online threat, which he will say is invading personal privacy and putting national security at risk. Speaking before the launch, Hammond said Britain must "keep up with the scale and pace of the threats we face" and insisted that the new funding will "allow us to take even greater steps to defend ourselves in cyberspace and to strike back when we are attacked". The money - which almost doubles the amount set out for a similar strategy in 2011 - will be used to improve automated defences to safeguard citizens and businesses, support the cybersecurity industry and deter attacks from criminals and "hostile actors". Tim Berners-Lee, the founder of the world wide web, speaking on Radio 4's Today programme on Tuesday said: "Clearly we have seen the internet can be attacked and the United Kingdom needs to have strong, but responsible and accountable police forces and GCHQ has to have the tools to defend us and defend the open internet.

London - Britain's security services have foiled 12 attempted terrorist attacks on UK soil since June 2013, the head of MI5 has said. The internal security service's director general Andrew Parker announced the figure in a talk to the Royal Society's fourth annual diversity conference. He said that terrorism - particularly from so-called Islamic State - posed the most visible security threat to Britain today. Speaking after the event, he warned that security forces would not be able to stop every planned terror attack. "ISIL is an enduring threat, here to stay, and is at least a generational challenge. 38. 'Patriot' accused of planning bomb attacks, court told

The Age, Adam Cooper, 2016 11 01

Melbourne - A man accused of planning deadly bombing attacks on left-wing targets ordered an ingredient for use in explosive devices and was compiling a right-wing version of The Anarchist Cookbook, according to court documents. Phillip Michael Galea, 31, was arrested by counter-terrorism police in August and charged with two terrorism offences. On Monday, he appeared via video link before Melbourne Magistrates Court, which was told he was now being kept at the Thomas Embling psychiatric hospital. According to documents released by the court, Galea this year told associates from right-wing and anti-Islam groups of plans he devised to bomb left-wing targets. On April 1, the papers say, he met with an associate and detailed plans to "attack two locations, both being premises aligned with the political left wing". The locations are not named in a prosecution summary released by the court. "Galea outlined his intentions were to cause as much devastation to these locations as possible in a team co-ordinated attack, using smoke bombs and improvised explosive devices," the summary says.

39. 70 killed as airstrike target Taliban gathering in abandoned Afghan army base

Khaama Press, 2016 11 01

Kabul - At least 70 Taliban insurgents were allegedly killed in an airstrike targeting the gathering of the group's fighters in an abandoned army base in southern Uruzgan province. Provincial governor's spokesman Dost Mohammad Nayab confirmed the airstrike took place late on Sunday afternoon in Chora district. He said at least 80 Taliban insurgents were also wounded as they were busy destroying the abandoned army base in the area. According to the local officials, the Taliban insurgents captured the army base two days ago following a coordinated attack and some security personnel surrendered to Taliban insurgents following the attack. In the meantime, the Taliban insurgents are claiming that the group's fighters did not suffer any casualties in the airstrike and some 30 civilians were killed in the attack. However, the local officials reject the Taliban claims as baseless and said all those killed or wounded in the attack were insurgents.

Washington Free Beacon, Morgan Chalfant, 2016 10 31

Washington - The Afghan government lost control of 2 percent of its territory this summer, as Taliban insurgents have continued to launch attacks in an ongoing conflict that top officials describe as a "stalemate." The Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction released its quarterly report to Congress over the weekend, naming the Taliban insurgency as the "most immediate challenge" to ongoing U.S. efforts to rebuild the war-torn country. The report, citing figures from U.S. Forces-Afghanistan, states that the Afghan government controlled or influenced approximately 63.4 percent of Afghanistan's districts as of August 28, over two percent less than the 65.6 percent it controlled three months earlier. The Taliban wields the most substantial power in Helmand province, where 21 percent of districts are either controlled or influenced by insurgents. The Afghan government controls 258 of the country's 407 districts, while insurgents hold 33 districts and 116 districts are contested.

41. Within Taliban, Former Chief Negotiator Emerges as a Voice for Peace Talks

New York Times, Mujib Mashal, 2016 11 01

Kabul - The Taliban's internal debate over whether and how to negotiate with the Afghan government is playing out in the open, even as there have been renewed attempts to restart talks. Breaking with nearly 15 years of public silence, Sayed Muhammad Tayeb Agha, who until recently was the Taliban's chief negotiator and head of their political commission, issued a letter about peace talks to the insurgency's supreme leader over the summer and discussed reconciliation efforts in an interview with The New York Times in recent days, his first on the record with a Western publication in years. In the letter, a copy of which was obtained by The Times and appeared in the Afghan news media, Mr. Agha supported the idea of talks, and said the insurgency should be urgently trying to position itself as an Afghan political movement independent from the influence of Pakistani intelligence officials who have sheltered, and at times manipulated, the Taliban since 2001. Mr. Agha led efforts to open the Taliban's political office in Qatar in 2011, and he was instrumental in negotiations that led to the release of the last known American prisoner of war held by the Taliban, Sgt. Bowe Bergdahl, in exchange for the release of five Taliban detainees from the American prison camp at Guantánamo Bay. But he became disgruntled over the internal power struggle that broke out in 2015 after the death of the movement's founder, Mullah Muhammad Omar, for whom he was a trusted aide. He remains in exile abroad. Within the Taliban, discussions of whether or how to take up negotiations have proved divisive. Some of the group's most senior field commanders openly bridled at the possibility in 2015, when a meeting in Pakistan seemed to signal that talks might progress. Now, however, with the insurgents seizing so much territory in Afghanistan and badly bloodying the security forces, some officials believe the Taliban might be more amenable to coming to the table.

42. Islamic State recognizes oath of allegiance from jihadists in Mali

Long War Journal, Thomas Joscelyn, Caleb Weiss, 2016 11 01

Washington - The Islamic State's Amaq News Agency has officially recognized an oath of allegiance sworn on behalf of a group of jihadists operating in Mali and neighboring countries. Abu Walid al Sahrawi first swore bay'ah (an oath of allegiance) to the so-called caliphate more than seventeen months ago, but Abu Bakr al Baghdadi's enterprise did not advertise it until yesterday. Amaq released a short statement acknowledging Sahrawi's oath, as well as a video of him reading his pledge. Sahrawi's organization is commonly known as the Islamic State in the Greater Sahara (ISGS). Sahrawi previously served as the spokesman for the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO). In that role, Sahrawi was allied with Mokhtar Belmokhtar, who was originally a commander in al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Disagreements with AQIM's leadership led Belmokhtar to establish his own force in 2012. MUJAO merged with Belmokhtar and his men in 2013 to form Al Murabitoon. But two years later, in May 2015, Sahrawi and a cadre of fighters broke away to establish a branch of the Islamic State in Mali.

43. Les ratés de l'intervention française

Horizons (Algérie), L.C., 2016 10 31

Bangui, Centrafrique - Le ministre français de la Défense, Jean- Yves Le Drian, s'est rendu hier à Bangui, pour signifier officiellement la fin de l'opération militaire française Sangaris lancée en décembre 2013. Mais rassure le Premier ministre français Manuel Valls, la France ne va pas abandonner la Centrafrique. Sur les 2.500 soldats déployés, près de 350 hommes et des drones en soutien à la Minusca resteront sur place. Trois ans après l'intervention française, la paix n'est pas encore revenue. Loin s'en faut. De nouvelles violences ont précédé et accompagné la fin de Sangaris engluée, par ailleurs, dans des scandales de viols sur mineurs et des « violences volontaires » suscitant une enquête judiciaire et parlementaire. Jeudi et vendredi, au moins 25 personnes, dont six gendarmes, ont été tuées lors d'affrontements à Bambari (centre) et ses environs, selon la mission onusienne, Minusca.

44. Nigeria to investigate alleged rapes by police and troops

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 10 31

Abuja - Nigeria's president has ordered an investigation into allegations by a rights group of rapes by soldiers and police of women and girls fleeing the Islamist militant group Boko Haram. Human Rights Watch said in a statement published on Monday that 43 cases of "sexual abuse, including rape and exploitation", had been documented by its researchers in July. A police spokesman flatly rejected the report. The women and girls were housed at seven camps in Maiduguri, the capital of Borno state, for people displaced by Boko Haram's seven-year-old insurgency, the rights group said. The rights group said it was also told of abuse carried out by camp leaders employed by authorities and members of local militias set up to help the military fight the insurgents. Nigeria's President Muhammadu Buhari was "worried and shocked" by the allegations, his spokesman Garba Shehu said in a statement on Monday.

taking place against the backdrop of a worsening economic crisis. The two sides, which over the years have repeatedly held talks that generated few concrete results, will meet again on Nov. 11, according to the opposition Democratic Unity coalition. "We are here to defend the Venezuelan people, to defend the people's right to escape this crisis through peaceful means," the coalition said after the meeting, which stretched from late Sunday into dawn on Monday. A papal envoy said the Pope is closely following the situation and hopes the process will proceed peacefully.

47. À Pékin, plus d'état de grâce pour Xi Jinping

Le Figaro, Jean-Luc Domenach, 2016 11 01

Opinion - Malgré l'étendue de son pouvoir, le dirigeant chinois se heurte aux mêmes difficultés que Deng Xiaoping dans les années 1980, argumente le sinologue*. Suivant les rumeurs savamment orchestrées à Pékin, Xi Jinping, qui achèvera en 2017 un premier quinquennat à la tête du Parti communiste chinois, va probablement demander au Comité central de son parti de lui faire confiance pour cinq années supplémentaires. Mais il n'est plus le même que lors de l'automne 2012. Le climat politique a changé en Chine. Hier, le ton était à l'optimisme et à la confiance. Aujourd'hui, il est à la punition non seulement des ennemis classiques du régime, mais encore de personnalités jusqu'alors jugées hors d'atteinte. Le nombre de cadres supérieurs menacés ou purgés ne cesse d'augmenter. Et les départements de la Propagande de l'État chinois s'énervent contre les commentaires de la presse internationale la mieux informée.

48. Cyber law aimed at foreign hackers

South China Morning Post, Viola Zhou, 2016 11 01

Beijing - Beijing has proposed a revised internet law to punish foreigners who hack Chinese websites as it steps up its campaign against cyberattacks it blames on the West. Although it was hard for governments to identify those behind cybercrimes, the move paved the way for China to take legal action against other states, analysts said. The proposed cybersecurity law changes would let the government freeze assets of foreign individuals or groups if they damaged China's key information infrastructure, Xinhua reported. Police would apply "other necessary punishment" to those outside the country who attacked, intruded, disrupted or harmed Chinese websites, according to the revised draft quoted in the report. The draft had been sent to the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress for approval, Xinhua said. China claims to be a victim of global cybercrimes, reporting growing numbers of attacks from overseas every year. Last year, authorities found more than 64,000 "control points" that had been controlling Chinese websites with malware from abroad, a 52 per cent rise from 2014, according to a government website.

49. S.Korean prosecutors arrest woman at centre of political crisis

Reuters, Ju-min Park, 2016 11 01

Seoul - The woman at the centre of a scandal that has plunged the South Korean presidency into crisis was held for a second day on Tuesday after being detained overnight to answer allegations of exerting inappropriate influence in state affairs. Prosecutors have said they are investigating whether Choi Soon-sil used her friendship with President Park Geun-hye to gain access to classified documents that enabled her to influence government matters and benefited personally through non-profit foundations. The growing scandal has sparked public anger and sent Park's approval rating to a record low, with thousands of protestors gathered in Seoul on Saturday night calling for her to step down. Park accepted the resignations of eight of her top aides over the weekend. Choi, 60, arrived at the prosecutor's office on Tuesday morning in handcuffs and a surgical mask and wearing a dark coat, escorted by correctional officers. A prosecution official and her lawyer said she had been detained late on Monday. Although Choi was being questioned at another location, a man used a heavy construction excavator to smash the front entrance of the Supreme Prosecutors' Office building in Seoul, injuring a security guard, in an apparent act of protest against Choi. He was arrested by police.

50. S. Korea orders foreign missions to allay overseas concerns on growing scandal

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 01

Seoul - South Korea has ordered its foreign missions to allay overseas concerns over an influence-peddling scandal involving President Park Geun-hye's longtime confidante, the foreign ministry said Tuesday. News reports have alleged Choi Soon-sil, a 60-year-old woman whose late father had long been a mentor for Park, illegally gained access to and edited Park's official speeches and even government documents. The scandal, which has roiled South Korea for over a week, also involves suspicions that Choi used her close personal relationship with Park to create two nonprofit foundations funded with corporate money and used them to make money. She is also suspected of having planted her acquaintances in government positions. "An order message was sent to all the diplomatic offices overseas yesterday under the name of the Foreign Minister (Yun Byung-se)," Cho June-hyuck, foreign ministry spokesman, said in a regular briefing. The message ordered the foreign missions to "actively inform (host countries) of the normal running of the government's key policies so as to prevent any unnecessary spread of concern over our diplomatic and security posture and the country's overall economic situation," the spokesman said.

51. Seoul, Tokyo hold talks on intelligence-sharing pact

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 01

Seoul - South Korea and Japan held working-level talks in Tokyo Tuesday to reach an understanding on an intelligence-sharing pact that could allow the neighbors to better cope with North Korea's evolving nuclear and missile threats, the defense ministry said. "The two sides resumed talks based on the terms they tentatively agreed to in 2012 and discussed a wide range of issues such as future meeting schedules and agendas," the Ministry of National Defense said in a statement. The next gathering will be decided through consultations with Japan, it said. Last week, the two neighbors agreed to reopen talks on a bilateral General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA), with the goal of concluding the pact by the end of the year. The U.S. welcomed the decision, saying the potential deal between its two Asian allies would bolster cooperation amid growing threats posed by Pyongyang. The communist regime has escalated saber-rattling with its nuclear and missile development programs. It conducted two nuclear tests and launched a series of missiles this year.

52. U.S. floating radar carried out surveillance mission near Korean Peninsula

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 01

Seoul - A U.S. floating radar station has returned to its home port of Hawaii after carrying out a surveillance mission near the Korean Peninsula with its advanced sensors, a South Korean military official said Tuesday. "The U.S. sea-based X-Band (SBX) radar was sent to an undisclosed location off the Korean Peninsula for a one-month deployment after departing Hawaii in late September. It sailed back to its home port in late October," the official told Yonhap News Agency. He didn't provide details about the mission and the vessel's route, citing the sensitivity of the matter. The SBX radar is aimed at detecting and tracking long-range ballistic missiles and rockets over the high seas. The data collected can be used to assess the capabilities and performance of a missile and help defend against the threat down the line. According to many military officials, the North's long-range intercontinental missiles could theoretically hit parts of the U.S. mainland. The SBX which displaces some 50,000 tons has a 116 meter by 85 meter radar system installed on its deck and has the capability to detect missile fired off upwards to 2,000 kilometers away.

Moscow - The Security Council is charged with working out the president's decisions on national security affairs. In this light, Sputnik asked Secretary Patrushev to lay out his views regarding the security situation in the world today, and the regions which he sees as the most problematic. "The situation in the world is not becoming any easier," the official admitted. "There is a growing competition for global influence and the use of global resources." At the same time, Patrushev added, "the excessive ambitions of some countries is provoking new challenges and security threats in a variety of regions around the world, and creates serious obstacles to the creation of bilateral and multilateral efforts aimed at resolving crisis situations." Asked to list the main threats to Russia's security, Patrushev cited first and foremost the continued buildup of NATO's military capabilities, "along with efforts to endow this organization with global functions." Threats to Russia include "the spread of [NATO] military infrastructure on Russia's borders, the deployment of new types of weapons, and the creation of a [US] global missile defense system." Other threats Moscow takes seriously include the "unprecedented threat" of global terrorism, represented first and foremost by the Daesh (ISIL/ISIS) terrorist group.

Armoured vehicles, including Abrams tanks, drew mortar and small arms fire as they moved on the village of Bazwaya in the dawn assault, while allied artillery and airstrikes hit ISIL positions. By evening the fighting had stopped and the units took up positions near Mosul's eastern border and some 8km from the city centre. Three suicide car bombers tried to stop the advance during the day before the army took control of the town but the troops destroyed them, said Brigadier General Haider Fadhil. The army said another unit, its ninth division, had moved up toward Mosul and was now approximately 5km from its eastern outskirts, the neighbourhood of Gogjali.

59. Lebanon Elects Hezbollah Ally as President

Wall Street Journal, Maria Abi-Habib, Noam Raydan, 2016 11 01

Beirut - Lebanon's parliament ended more than two years of political deadlock in the country, electing as president a former army general who is the main Christian ally of the Shiite militant group Hezbollah. Michel Aoun, 81 years old, won 83 out of the 127 votes cast on Monday, restoring the most powerful political office held by a Christian in the Middle East as the sect faces persecution across the region but enjoys rare security and power-sharing in Lebanon. Under longstanding political agreements, a Maronite Christian is always president while the prime minister is a Sunni Muslim and the parliament speaker is a Shiite Muslim. "Lebanon, which is walking among land mines, still hasn't been touched by the flames surrounding it in the region, and we will prevent any spark from reaching it," the new president told lawmakers. Saudi Arabia and Hezbollah ally Iran have jockeyed for influence over Lebanon since 2005, when Syria's 29-year occupation ended. For years, the Saudi monarchy and its Sunni Lebanese allies opposed the idea of Mr. Aoun as president. But as Riyadh became mired in protracted wars in Yemen and Syria, Saudi officials quietly acknowledged that Lebanon was no longer a priority, leading the way for Mr. Aoun's ascent. Anti-Iran pundits in the U.S. framed the political agreement that ensured Mr. Aoun's election as a win for Tehran and Hezbollah. But his Christian supporters said his ascent to the presidency was simply the will of most members of his minority sect, who see good relations with Hezbollah as necessary for stability but seek the group's eventual disarmament.

The Canadian/Egyptian was found guilty of supplying energy related information to Hizbollah, while the Emirati was convicted of handing over a list of vehicle registrations. 61. Alleged mastermind behind attack that 'almost broke the internet' goes on trial

Dordrecht, The Netherlands - A Dutchman accused of launching an unprecedented cyberattack that reportedly "almost broke the internet" in 2013 goes on trial on Tuesday. Sven Olaf Kamphuis, 39, denounced the case against him, and told the AD daily newspaper in a Skype interview that he would not appear in court in the southern Dutch city of Dordrecht. He will be represented by his lawyers. He is accused of being behind a massive distributed denial of service (DDoS) attack in March 2013 on Geneva and London-based volunteer group Spamhaus, court spokeswoman Lily Derksen said. Spamhaus publishes spam blacklists used by networks to filter out unwanted email. It blamed Dutch web-hosting service Cyberbunker for the attack, one of the largest in the history of the internet at the time. At the time, Kamphuis was said to be a spokesman for Cyberbunker.

62. His Vitriol Unchecked, Dutch Politician Skips His Own Trial for Hate Speech

New York Times, Nina Siegal, 2016 11 01

Amsterdam - The Dutch government's prosecution of a far-right lawmaker for hate speech was upstaged by his continued racial vitriol on Monday before the trial could get underway. The lawmaker, Geert Wilders, whose tirades against Islam, immigration and the European Union have made him one of the most divisive figures in Dutch politics, refused to attend the trial. Instead, he issued a series of inflammatory posts on Twitter, saying the Netherlands has a "huge problem with Moroccans" -- an echo of the denunciations he made in 2014 that are at the center of the hate-speech charges. The trial has exposed deep fissures in Dutch society, which is known for its religious tolerance but has a more troubled recent past: More than three-quarters of Dutch Jews were deported and killed during the Nazi occupation in World War II. The Netherlands was one of the six founding states of what became the European Union, but skepticism toward the bloc has been rising. In April, Dutch voters rejected a trade and cooperation agreement between the European Union and Ukraine, and after the British referendum on June 23 to leave the bloc, Mr. Wilders proposed that the Dutch hold a referendum on withdrawing as well. Mr. Wilders, 53, is charged with offending members of a group based on their race, and hate speech and discrimination. If convicted he could be sentenced to up to two years in prison, though people found guilty of such offenses are more commonly fined or required to do community service.

1. Goodale ducks question about journalists under surveillance iPolitics.ca, Staff reporter, 2016 11 02

Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale won't say how many Canadian journalists might be under police surveillance. In question period today, NDP leader Tom Mulcair raised the case of Montreal journalist Patrick Lagacé -- who learned recently that police had been monitoring his phone calls and location through GPS in his cellphone as part of an internal police probe. At least 24 warrants were issued on Lagacé's phone. "It's disgusting', as one of my colleagues said," Mulcair told the Commons, also citing the case of La Presse journalist Joel-Denis Bellavance, who has been tailed by police. Mounties followed Bellavance for nine days in 2007 in an attempt to track down a leak of classified documents. "Can the minister of public safety tell us whether other journalists are being spied upon either by the police, the RCMP or CSIS?" Mulcair asked Goodale. Goodale skirted the question, saying only that the issue is "entirely in the jurisdiction of Quebec, and this morning the premier of Quebec has made a very import pronouncement in that regard. "We all, I'm sure, in this House believe profoundly in the freedom of the press. It is a value that is enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms." He said police forces need to be "assiduous" in following the Supreme Court judgement which laid out rules to be followed in respect to press freedom.

2. How Montreal police may have been able to spy on a journalist

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 11 02

The Quebec government says it wants to make it more difficult to obtain a search warrant that would target a journalist, raising the bar to a higher level - on par with lawyers and judges. The move, announced by Premier Philippe Couillard, comes after it came to light that La Presse journalist Patrick Lagacé was being spied on by Montreal police. Through 24 issued surveillance warrants, the SPVM was able to obtain the identities of the people he spoke and texted with as well as to track his whereabouts via his iPhone's GPS. But how were the Montreal police able to obtain that in the first place? Cyberbullying law to blame? It will only be known on Nov. 24 how the Montreal police obtained the warrants from a justice of the peace. That's the date the warrants will be unsealed. Though some have pointed to the contentious anti-terrorism legislation, Bill C-51, as a catalyst for more invasive police tactics in Canada, Christopher Parsons, managing director of the Telecom Transparency Project at Citizen Lab, says a bill originally passed to curb cyberbullying may be to blame. Bill C-13 amended the Criminal Code to allow police to, among other things, track an object, person, or transmission of data if the authorities have the suspicion or belief that doing so could assist an investigation. Parsons says Couillard's promise to better protect journalists from surveillance would be "relatively novel," but there are still unanswered questions as to what those protections are. However, the fact that Montreal police chose to spy on Lagacé in the first place may point to "the cultures that have been built up within policing or security services," Parsons said. Even CSIS, he said, "tends to place the monitoring of journalists alongside monitoring of academics or monitoring certain government officials, so they're fairly protected." "The very fact that they were using these very, very invasive tools to monitor where the journalist was going and whom they were speaking with struck me as fairly extraordinary."

Ottawa - Le gouvernement Trudeau «croit profondément à la liberté de presse», mais il ne précise pas si des journalistes font actuellement l'objet d'une surveillance des corps policiers fédéraux. Dans la foulée de l'affaire Patrick Lagacé, le chef du Nouveau Parti démocratique Thomas Mulcair demande des comptes au gouvernement Trudeau à savoir si des journalistes «font actuellement l'objet d'une surveillance» des corps policiers fédéraux. «Quand on a appris que la GRC a fait de la filature dans le cas du journaliste Joël-Denis Bellavance [en 2007 et en 2008], le premier ministre [Justin Trudeau] a refusé de mener une enquête. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique peut-il nous dire clairement si d'autres journalistes font actuellement l'objet d'une surveillance de la GRC et du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS)?», a demandé le chef du NPD Thomas Mulcair cet après-midi à la Chambre des communes.

4. Ottawa falls short of real oversight for C-51 powers

The Province (Vancouver), Murray Rankin, 2016 11 02

Op-ed: Last year, former prime minister Stephen Harper's Bill C-51 brought in controversial new security powers, despite the opposition of hundreds of thousands of Canadians and the advice of legal scholars and civil liberties organizations. Resisting calls from the NDP and others to repeal the law, the Liberal government has kept C-51 on the books. Under the legislation, the sharing of personal information between government agencies was expanded, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was given unprecedented powers to disrupt terrorist plots and a range of perceived security threats, the right of police to preventively arrest people was expanded, and urging others to commit terrorism became a criminal offence. Now, Parliament is debating a proposal to plug a long-standing gap in our security architecture: Canada today stands alone among our closest allies in lacking independent, elected oversight of security and intelligence agencies. Unfortunately, the government's plan falls short of giving Canadians a real watchdog for their rights and safety. Bill C-22 would create a committee without the powers, the independence and the public trust needed to get the job done. The prime minister and cabinet would appoint its members, hand-pick its head, control the information it receives, block investigations into certain areas, and revise its reports without notifying Parliament and the public. Note: NDP House Leader Murray Rankin has served as legal counsel to the Security Intelligence Review Committee and as a Special Advocate in classified immigration proceedings.

Ottawa - Malgré tous les problèmes rencontrés avec le système de paie Phénix, à peine 61 % des gestionnaires du ministère des Services publics et de l'Approvisionnement du Canada (SPAC) ont suivi la «formation obligatoire» d'une heure offerte en ligne par l'École de la fonction publique du Canada pour se familiariser avec ce nouvel outil de travail. Chez les employés, le taux de participation est plus élevé, à 73 %, selon des données obtenues mardi par LeDroit. Pour expliquer les ratés du système Phénix, les dirigeants de SPAC ont mentionné jusqu'à maintenant que la formation des employés dans l'ensemble des ministères utilisant le système Phénix n'avait pas été suffisante pour permettre de se familiariser avec le nouvel outil, écartant jusqu'à maintenant toute responsabilité du fournisseur IBM et du système PeopleSoft. Au 21 octobre dernier, seulement 52 % des cadres avaient pris une heure de leur temps pour suivre la formation, comparativement à 62 % chez les employés. Devant la faible participation, le ministère y annonçait d'ailleurs le report de la date butoir pour participer.

7. A Canadian parallel to FBI versus Clinton

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Cohen, 2016 11 02

Op-ed: In the last fortnight of the presidential election of 1960, the race between John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon was very close. Kennedy won the televised debates, but had not closed the deal. Kennedy learned that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., had been arrested on a technicality - a traffic charge - and was in jail. On Oct. 26, Kennedy called King's wife, Coretta, to show his sympathy and offer his help. His brother, Robert F. Kennedy, made a call of concern to the judge. Surprisingly, King was released. African-Americans voted for Kennedy overwhelmingly. They may have been the difference in a race that Kennedy won by some 118,000 votes. The point: when elections are close, anything can tip the balance. Four days after the FBI revelation that it is reinvestigating Hillary Clinton's emails, polls show no clear impact, though the announcement has changed the tone of this race. The conversation is about her, not Donald Trump, and that is bad for her. When he is under scrutiny - his refusal to pay income taxes, his treatment of women, his views on Russia, minorities and nuclear arms - he loses. Now he has a stick and he is beating her, with glee. It isn't over. If you doubt how an unseen hand can reverse a race, ask these Canadians: Ralph Goodale, Paul Martin, Stephen Harper. Note: Andrew Cohen, a Canadian journalist, author and professor, is a Fulbright Scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Centre in Washington, D.C.

8. Affaire Patrick Lagacé Police et médias : les liaisons dangereuses

La Presse+, Jean-Claude Hébert*, 2016 11 02

Opinion - Sous réserve qu'elle soit consciente et volontaire, l'utilisation publique par un journaliste de renseignements policiers susceptibles d'entraver, de détourner ou de contrecarrer le cours de la justice engage sa propre responsabilité criminelle. Par contre, au mépris de son devoir de confidentialité, un policier peut servir l'intérêt public en enfilant le costume de source journalistique. Sur ce terrain miné, la collaboration entre un journaliste et un policier risque de perdre son innocence. En obtenant des ordonnances judiciaires autorisant l'espionnage d'un journaliste, des enquêteurs mettent à risque la proximité harmonieuse du tandem policier-média. Sans surprise, face à cette tromperie, les médias ressentent un haut-le-cœur. Selon la Cour suprême (affaire Globe and Mail, 2010), la mise au jour d'importantes nouvelles pour le public incite les sources désireuses de révéler ces informations à violer des obligations juridiques de nature civile. Un journaliste n'est pas tenu d'agir comme conseiller juridique auprès d'une source. Si un journal obtient légalement des renseignements véridiques sur une question d'intérêt public, l'État ne peut en interdire la communication en l'absence d'un intérêt public supérieur.

9. Ahmadiyya Muslims find freedom in Canada

Globe and Mail, Sherrill Sutherland, 2016 11 02

For the past month, the leader of the world's Ahmadiyya Muslim community has been visiting Canada and Canadian leaders such as Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Hazrat Mirza Masroor Ahmad, the Britain-based leader, who is considered the caliph of the sect, recently sat down with The Globe and Mail's Sherrill Sutherland. He discussed how his religious community is flourishing in Canada, even as it faces persecution elsewhere in the world. Can you describe the climate of oppression that the Ahmadiyya Muslims are facing in Pakistan? The mainstream Muslims believe that the person who was foretold by the Prophet of Islam to reform the Muslims and the whole world at large has not come. And we believe that that person has come and the title of that man, according to the prophecy of the Prophet of Islam, is of Prophet and Reformer. So this is the major cause of conflict and disturbance. And because of that, they enacted a law in 1974 declaring Ahmadiyyas as not Muslims for the purpose of law and constitution. Later on, in 1984, this law was further reinforced, that Ahmadiyyas cannot claim themselves to be Muslim. They cannot profess and practise as Muslims do. They cannot even name their children as Muslims are given the names. If you do it, you will be imprisoned for three years. Why did the government take this position of proposing a law that would effectively ban the Ahmadiyya people? Government should not interfere in the matter of religion; that is the secular and democratic government. But in the name of democracy, all is being done.

10. Canada marches into mission with 'eyes wide open,' Sajjan says

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 11 02

Ottawa - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan is headed to Mali and Senegal on a fact-finding mission next week as the federal government makes plans to deploy a military mission to Africa. Sajjan's five-day visit comes after an August trip to the Democratic Republic of Congo, Ethiopia, Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, all against the backdrop of the Liberal pledge to commit troops to an African mission. "We need to go into this eyes wide open, making sure that ... we look at the complexities of how (peace) operations have been done in the past and what we need to do," Sajjan told reporters in Ottawa. Sajjan offered no timeline of when a decision on the deployment could be made. "I have not set a deadline," he said. "I want to make sure that we have all the right information, so that we can have a comprehensive plan, a whole-of-government approach to peace operations that are going to bring added value to the United Nations and how they operate now," Sajjan said. As with his previous trip, officials in Sajjan's office cautioned that his itinerary should not be taken as a signal of where the Canadian force may wind up. "He'd like to get a better sense of the situation in West Africa," Jordan Owens told the Star. "Don't read too much into the location." Still, Mali - home to one of the deadliest peace missions in Africa - has emerged as one of the possible locations.

11. Curbing online extremism 'like trying to block wind'

Montreal Gazette, Caroline Plante, 2016 11 02

Montreal - Pulling hate material from the Internet will never be enough to curb the phenomenon of violent extremism, the head of free expression and international relations at Google told a conference on radicalization Tuesday. "What we've seen over the past couple of years is a realization that simply taking the content down doesn't work because one website goes down, two or three more are up the very next day," Ross LaJeunesse said. "Simply taking down the content doesn't address the feeling and the hatred which caused the speech in the first place. You need to engage the speakers who are promoting radicalization and hate online." He acknowledged that Google, the U.S.-based company that runs a search engine and the video-sharing service YouTube, has a role to play and argued the company is taking that responsibility very seriously. "We have started doing various programs, where, much like a regular advertising campaign, when someone searches for a key word that we think indicates they're looking for radical content, we then show them an advertising campaign about content that counters that speech," LaJeunesse said. Also, "we don't allow violent images on YouTube, we don't allow pornography, we've always built YouTube to be a community where everyone is going to feel comfortable participating and speaking and watching content that they like."

12. Cybersecurity talent shortage on the radar of government, business

CBC News, Julie Ireton, 2016 11 02

An international shortage of cybersecurity talent is expected to grow over the next few years, according to the Information and Communications Technology Council. The council's vice-president of talent innovation, Sandra Saric, said there's an expected need for more than 1.5 million people to work in cybersecurity globally by 2020. Solving the talent shortage was one of the challenges emphasized by government and private industry executives at a cybersecurity forum at the GTEC conference in Ottawa on Tuesday. It's an annual technology event that brings together business and government. "Getting more people to take science, technology, engineering and mathematics courses and degree programs, and also training them to be cybersecurity savvy is probably the first challenge," said Scott Jones, assistant deputy minister responsible for the information technology security program with Communications Security Establishment Canada (CSEC). Saric said there's a need for computer scientists, analysts, investigators and psychologists, as well as communications and marketing professionals. "We connect with the Ottawa police who have a cybercrime unit, they're having difficulty finding people. I've spoken to the RCMP who are also struggling ... it's across the board," she said. Saric said the Information and Communications Technology Council, a Canadian non-profit, is working on developing talented students before they have even graduated high school. The council has created cybersecurity competitions at high schools across the country to get students to develop these unique skills. "It's about youth, regardless of what career they enter, cybersecurity is a critical component of their learning and the knowledge they need," said Saric, who presented at the cybersecurity forum.

13. Enquête publique et projet de loi réclamés à Ottawa

La Presse+, Vincent Brousseau-Pouliot, 2016 11 02

Ottawa -- La pression s'accroît sur le gouvernement Trudeau à la suite de l'affaire Patrick Lagacé. Le NPD veut une enquête publique. Le sénateur indépendant André Pratte et le Bloc québécois entendent tous deux déposer un projet de loi sur la protection des sources journalistiques si le gouvernement n'en propose pas un, a appris La Presse. Et le commissaire à la protection de la vie privée du Canada souhaite aussi des lois plus claires en matière de protection des sources journalistiques. Le gouvernement Trudeau estime « prématurée » la question d'une intervention législative, mais le ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique Ralph Goodale a annoncé hier qu'il « examinera » la directive ministérielle de 2003 demandant aux forces policières de porter une « attention spéciale » au statut des médias dans le cadre d'enquêtes sur la sécurité nationale. Le cabinet du ministre Goodale n'était pas en mesure d'indiquer hier si cet « examen » comprendrait des consultations publiques. « Le ministre examine la directive ministérielle [...] afin de s'assurer que les plus grands soins sont pris lorsque des enquêtes criminelles et du journalisme se recoupent et que la valeur canadienne fondamentale de la liberté de presse est protégée », a indiqué Scott Bardsley, attaché de presse du ministre Goodale, qui se dit « toujours ouvert à recevoir des représentations » sur le sujet.

14. Lutte contre la radicalisation - De jeunes internautes montent au front

Le Devoir, Isabelle Porter, 2016 11 02

Québec - "Non à la haine" combat les extrémistes en engageant le dialogue en ligne et dans les écoles Pour contrer les extrémistes violents sur le Web, il faut faire en sorte que des jeunes leur répliquent sur le Web, estiment de nombreux participants à la Conférence de l'UNESCO sur Internet et la radicalisation. Charlotte De Mesmaeke, 24 ans, et Amal Hamich, 30 ans, font partie de la délégation belge de " Non à la haine ". " Non à la haine " est une campagne européenne lancée en 2013 pour lutter contre tous les discours haineux en ligne et hors ligne. Après avoir dressé un portrait de la radicalisation lundi, la Conférence de l'UNESCO tournait mardi les projecteurs vers les solutions, ou du moins des pistes de solutions, pour endiguer le phénomène. " On essaie d'engager un dialogue, de poser des questions, explique Charlotte. Parfois, on fait des signalements massifs de pages et il y a aussi toute une partie d'écoute des victimes qui se font harceler. " Amal porte le voile ; Charlotte pas. Elles s'insurgent contre la haine de l'Occident, l'islamophobie et toutes les formes d'intolérance. Dans leurs temps libres, ces deux " activistes " donnent des formations dans les écoles. " On ne met pas de barrière avec les jeunes. On crée un espace sans jugement, précise Amal. Même s'il y a un discours raciste, ce n'est pas grave dans le cadre de la discussion parce que l'objectif, c'est de savoir d'où vient ce discours et ce qui pousse la personne à penser de cette manière. 15. New national security committee could study RCMP surveillance of reporters: Goodale iPolitics.ca, Amanda Connolly, 2016 11 02

Ottawa - Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale suggested Tuesday that if reports emerged of RCMP keeping tabs on journalists for reasons linked to national security, the government's planned new national security committee could look into them. Along with Government House Leader Bardish Chagger, Goodale took questions from members of the House of Commons public safety committee Tuesday evening. The questions largely focused on critics' concerns about the government's ability to appoint the chair of the all-party committee, ministers' ability to veto requests for information, and the prime minister's authority to review the committee's reports and ask for redactions. However, controversial recent reports of police surveillance of La Presse journalist Patrick Lagacé's iPhone also came up. Goodale pointing out that Lagacé's case falls under Quebec's political jurisdiction, but if similar cases should come to light involving the Mounties and national security, the new committee could investigate them. "There may well be concerns about that from members of this future committee ... and it may well be that the committee would say we need to look at that," Goodale said. "First and foremost, the committee needs to decide what's important." During a pre-committee scrum with reporters, Goodale was asked about the Lagacé case and why he would not say if RCMP have made similar requests for warrants to conduct surveillance on journalists. RCMP also refused to disclose that information when asked to report the number of times the force has sought a warrant to conduct surveillance on journalists over the past year. "For security reasons, we cannot provide operation details of this nature," a force spokesperson said. "Cases of RCMP investigations relating to reporters are extremely rare, and when such cases occur, these are conducted under close monitoring parameters guided by ministerial directives. We recognize the importance of the freedom and independence of the press, and we respect it." The issue of disclosure by national security agencies -- including the RCMP -- to the new committee dominated questions Tuesday evening. C-22 allows for the committee to request information from any government agency working on national security -- a much broader mandate than similar committees in ally countries like the United Kingdom or Australia have.

16. Police spying on press deemed an 'overreach'

Montreal Gazette, Linda Gyulai, 2016 11 02

Montreal - International journalist organizations are condemning the Montreal police department's spying on a La Presse journalist through his cellphone as a violation of freedom of the press and as an "extraordinary example of overreach" by the authorities. They're also calling it a reminder to journalists to use data encryption and other means to protect their communications with their sources. "This seems like an outrageous breach of precedent and a threat to media freedom in Quebec," Peter Bale, president of the Global Editors Network, said from Washington, D.C., on Tuesday when he learned of the Montreal police surveillance of columnist Patrick Lagacé's phone as part of what the police claim was part of an internal probe of Montreal anti-gang squad officers later charged with fabricating evidence. Bale offered the same reaction to an incident involving the Sûreté du Québec's seizure of Journal de Montréal reporter Michaël Nguyen's computer in September after he reported on two judges who are under investigation by a provincial body that oversees the conduct of judges. "These cases seem like an extraordinary example of overreach by the Quebec police and Montreal police," Bale said, adding that both cases are fundamentally about protection of journalists' sources. The Committee to Protect Journalists, based in New York, also condemned the surveillance of journalists in Quebec.

17. Quebec tightens rules for monitoring of journalists

Montreal Gazette, Philip Authier, 2016 11 02

Montreal - With the premier saying journalistic freedom is a fundamental right, the provincial government is tightening the rules that allow police to obtain warrants to conduct surveillance of reporters. And in a sign of how seriously Quebec considers the situation, Public Security Minister Martin Coiteux has ordered inspections of Quebec's main police forces including Montreal's and the Sûreté du Québec to verify their investigation practices. "Concerned is too weak a word," Premier Philippe Couillard said Tuesday at a hastily called news conference. "For me what is happening is serious. It's not something that can be treated lightly. "We are faced with a major issue for a democratic society. I want to reassure the population and the media that I support them in their work, in the protection of journalistic sources. "People have died in the name of freedom of the press. It is a fundamental freedom." But despite calls from the opposition that the government either fire or suspend Montreal's police chief, Philippe Pichet, the government tread carefully, with Coiteux noting people have rights but refusing to affirm his confidence. Pichet's future is also chiefly the responsibility of Montreal and its executive committee, Coiteux said. "We are not going to indulge in a public lynching operation," Coiteux said standing with Couillard. Later, Pichet told reporters in Montreal in his mind he still has the legitimacy to stay on the job despite the revelation of police spying on reporters including La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé. The news has rocked the province and made international headlines.

18. Russia's friend in Ottawa

National Post, 2016 11 02

Editorial: Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion's official schedule has been very crowded of late. On Friday he was in Paris for a conference on "peacekeeping in francophone environments." Global Affairs Canada - the new name given his ministry - was pleased to reveal that, with France, Senegal and Bangladesh, Canada had duly reaffirmed its commitment to peacekeeping. As soon as that was over, Dion was off to Brussels to join Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on his belated journey to sign a trade deal with the European Union, which was finally approved after some feverish lastminute diplomacy. The signing prompted a flurry of tweets as Dion proudly attended the "historic" moment. Unfortunately, another important event somehow slipped past unremarked. In a transparent rebuke to its military activities in Syria, Russia was kicked off the UN Human Rights Council. Russia was beaten out by Hungary and Croatia, falling short by just two votes. The bluntness of the snub was evident in the fact that Cuba, China, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela - all bearing extended records of human rights abuses - remain on the council. Canada was among the 193 General Assembly members with a vote. Traditionally, countries don't reveal how they cast their ballot, to avoid any awkwardness within the UN's polite diplomatic salons. In this instance, however, Dion was urged by former Liberal justice minister and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler to defy tradition and make Canada's position public. It would, agreed Liberal MP Michael Levitt, shine "a light on the hypocrisy" of the council. "We need to have a strong voice in making sure that Russia and Syria are called out on these actions," he said.

19. Snowden to speak at McGill

Montreal Gazette, Staff reporter, 2016 11 02

Montreal - The timing couldn't be better. With many Quebecers in an uproar over police spying on La Presse reporter Patrick Lagacé, McGill University on Wednesday will welcome whistleblower Edward Snowden, who is wanted in the United States for giving classified material on U.S. surveillance programs to journalists. Speaking via video link, Snowden, a former government contractor at the U.S. National Security Agency, will discuss surveillance in Canada. The free public lecture is being organized by Media@McGill, an interdisciplinary hub focused on the study of contemporary media. It will take place on Wednesday at 7 p.m. in the Leacock Building, 855 Sherbrooke St. W. Seats will be first come, first served, with a lineup starting at 5:30 p.m. Snowden's leaks revealed how the U.S. and other countries monitor global private communications. He is now living in exile in Russia to avoid prosecution in the U.S. Last month, Snowden criticized Prime Minister Justin Trudeau for not repealing Canada's anti-terror law. On Monday, Snowden tweeted about the Lagacé surveillance, quoting a Montreal Gazette story and warning journalists that police are spying on them to identify sources.

20. Tracking of journalist highlights need for guidance to courts: privacy czar

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 11 02

Ottawa - Police surveillance of a Montreal journalist's smartphone suggests a need for clearer federal guidance to the courts, Canada's privacy czar says. Parliament has a role to play in instructing the courts on when to grant police a warrant to obtain sensitive data, privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien told a House of Commons committee on Tuesday. "This is a very worrisome issue," Therrien said under questioning at a meeting of the Commons information, ethics and privacy committee, which is conducting a review of the federal Privacy Act. Montreal-based La Presse newspaper said this week it had learned at least 24 surveillance warrants were issued for columnist Patrick Lagace's iPhone this year at the request of city's police service. The surveillance flowed from an internal probe into allegations police anti-gang investigators fabricated evidence. Three warrants reportedly authorized police to get the phone numbers for all Lagace's incoming and outgoing texts and calls, while another allowed them to track the phone's location via its GPS chip. "It's one thing to say that the courts are involved," Therrien said. "That's a good start. But this case leads me to believe that that's not adequate in itself. It may be useful to give the court tools so that they're better able to exercise their power." Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said Tuesday the Supreme Court of Canada had already explicitly laid out the test that must be satisfied when police investigations intersect with media freedoms.

21. Clinton Emails Could Help ex-NSA Contractor Who Took Terabytes Home, Attorneys Say

US News and World Report, Steven Nelson, 2016 11 01

Washington - In the four years Hillary Clinton sent and received State Department correspondence using a private and insecure email system, Harold T. Martin III allegedly stockpiled classified information inside his Maryland home and an unlocked shed. Martin faces charges for alleged theft of government documents and mishandling classified information that carry up to 11 years in prison, and he's been behind bars since his August arrest, with prosecutors saying they intend to file more serious Espionage Act charges, often used by the Obama administration to go after leakers and whistleblowers. Though prosecutors have not alleged the now-fired Booz Allen Hamilton contractor -- who worked for the National Security Agency six years before a transfer to the Pentagon last year -- is a spy or that he shared the information or allowed it to be accessed by a third party, they do allege he could be responsible for one of the largest security violations ever and knowingly mishandled classified records working various jobs over two decades. Defense attorneys for prominent whistleblowers, accused leakers and careless clearance-holders say that unless more damning evidence emerges they could see Martin making a successful plea for leniency by pointing to the Justice Department's decision this summer not to prosecute Clinton. "The Clinton case and the Martin [case] do have different facts. However, it is problematic that the severity of punishment in these cases has been based not on the facts of each case, but whether or not the accused is powerful and politically connected," says Jesselyn Radack, an attorney who has represented whistleblowers Edward Snowden, Thomas Drake and John Kiriakou. "The defense could seek leniency given the conclusion in the Clinton email case that extreme carelessness was not enough for charges," she says.

22. Evan McMullin Says He Was Aware Of CIA Torture Program, Cites "Gray Areas" BuzzFeed News, Ali Watkins, 2016 11 02

Washington - Evan McMullin, the former CIA officer running for president, told BuzzFeed News Tuesday that he was aware of -- but never participated in -- the agency's controversial torture program and would not wholly rule out the future use of tactics like waterboarding. "I was aware of it by virtue of where I was," McMullin said. "I was serving in a place that was the kind of place where people entered that program from that place, but I never participated in it, I never went to a black site, never met with a detainee." McMullin said he opposes the use of torture, but also declined to clearly qualify what he considered torture, and whether CIA tactics like waterboarding crossed the line. "I don't believe in taking it easy on terrorists when they're incarcerated. But I also don't support the use of torture. There are gray areas," he said. "I believe that waterboarding is in a gray area. I don't think we need to use it." "There's a scale, a range of actions that can be taken and it's useful to recognize that it is a range," he said.

23. F.B.I. Disclosure Is Policy Shift Since Summer New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 02

Washington - The F.B.I. and Justice Department faced a hard decision in two investigations this past summer that had the potential to rock the presidential election. The first case involved Donald J. Trump's campaign chairman, Paul Manafort, and secretive business dealings in Ukraine. The second focused on Hillary Clinton's relationships with donors to her family foundation. At the urging of the Justice Department, the F.B.I. agreed not to issue subpoenas or take other steps that would make the cases public so close to the election, according to federal law enforcement officials. Against this backdrop, the decision of the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, to send a letter to Congress last week about a renewed inquiry concerning Mrs. Clinton's emails is not just a departure from longstanding policy; it has plunged the F.B.I. and the Justice Department directly into the election, precisely what Justice officials were trying to avoid. Since Mr. Comey's revelation, the F.B.I. has hurried to analyze a cache of emails belonging to one of Mrs. Clinton's aides, Huma Abedin. It is increasingly unlikely that the review will be complete by Election Day, F.B.I. officials said, although they said there was a chance they could offer updates before Nov. 8. The mood at the F.B.I. is dark, and nobody is willing to predict what the coming days will bring, particularly if agents and analysts do not complete their review of Ms. Abedin's emails by Election Day. Officials said it would take something extraordinary to change the conclusion that nobody should be charged. But the absence of information has allowed festering speculation that the emails must be significant.

24. FBI faces high bar in Clinton case; Legal scholars say charges are unlikely, partly because of Comey's past remarks.

Los Angeles Times, Del Quentin Wilber, 2016 11 02

Washington - Even if FBI agents discover classified information on a newly seized laptop, Hillary Clinton is unlikely to face criminal charges, according to legal experts and former federal prosecutors. That's largely because the Justice Department and FBI Director James B. Comey have already declined to prosecute based on a legal conclusion that there was no evidence that Clinton and her aides intended to violate laws governing the handling of classified information, a key element of such a criminal offense. To change the calculus, the FBI would have to find correspondence that clearly demonstrates Clinton or her aides knowingly broke the law, exchanged materials they knew to be classified or attempted to interfere with the investigation by withholding or destroying evidence, according to former federal prosecutors and legal scholars. "Such an email itself would have to be one of those things you would be saying, 'I can't believe you wrote that down,' " said Roscoe Howard Jr., a former federal prosecutor and U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia during the George W. Bush administration. "I would be shocked if they found such a thing." The chances of the bureau missing such evidence after what Comey had described as a comprehensive inquiry would be slight, former prosecutors said.

25. Huma Abedin handled classified data on computer shared with Anthony Weiner

Washington Times, Ben Wolfgang, Andrea Noble, 2016 11 02

Washington - Emails released by the State Department over the past 18 months show that Huma Abedin frequently handled classified information -- suggesting a major reason why the FBI has been eager to get a full look at the personal computer she shared with her now-estranged husband. That computer has become the center of a major political flap in the final week before Election Day. Ms. Abedin's boss, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, is trying to fend off concerns that there is a smoking gun still to be found among her top personal aide's messages. But the track record indicates a reason for concern: Of the messages Mrs. Clinton turned over to the State Department, nearly 5,000 were sent to, or received from, Ms. Abedin. More than 180 of those contain information now determined to be "confidential," and one message is deemed to contain "secret" information. In the "secret" message, Ms. Abedin forwards to Mrs. Clinton information about a 2009 ballistic missile test by North Korea. "It is frankly remarkable that the FBI and Justice Department are only now investigating Abedin's connection to Clinton's mishandling of classified information," said Tom Fitton, president of the watchdog group Judicial Watch, which has sued to try to get to the bottom of the Clinton-Abedin connection at the State Department.

26. In the Nevada desert, Bundy family warns of another standoff

Washington Post, Kevin Sullivan, Juliet Eilpern, 2016 11 02

Bunkerville, Nevada - Less than a week after being acquitted at a trial over last winter's armed occupation of an Oregon federal wildlife refuge, Nevada rancher Ryan Bundy said another protest action will be justified if President Obama goes ahead with plans to create a huge national monument abutting the Bundy family's ranch here. "Absolutely! That's the best thing in the world for [people] to do," Bundy said Monday in a telephone interview from an Oregon jail, where he is being held pending a February trial related to a separate armed standoff in 2014 with federal agents at his family's ranch. "Read the Declaration of Independence," he said. "It says right there that if the government becomes abusive, it's our right and our duty to abolish that government. If the government won't restrain itself, whatever happens is their own fault." The suggestion of a potential uprising underscores the extent to which two competing political movements -- defiance of federal authority, and Obama's determination to permanently protect vast federal lands -- could collide next in this arid patch of land 110 miles northeast of Las Vegas. Federal officials were alarmed by the jury's decision to acquit Bundy, his brother Ammon and five others who staged a 41-day occupation early this year at the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge in remote eastern Oregon.

27. Russia is organising a cyber-coup in America

London Daily Telegraph, Con Coughlin, 2016 11 02

Column - If the old Cold War marked the high-water mark for the old fashioned military coup, then the new one that Russian President Vladimir Putin seems determined to launch against the West will be fought with a higher level of sophistication. No one in Washington seems in any doubt that Moscow has been behind the release of thousands of Hillary Clinton's personal emails that are seriously undermining her attempt to win the presidential election for the Democrats. As with Edward Snowden, the whistleblower who exposed sensitive details concerning America's intelligencegathering operations, the Clinton revelations have been made through Julian Assange's WikiLeaks website. This has resulted in the unlikely scenario where Donald Trump, the maverick Republican contender, is now publicly heaping praise on a website that prides itself on its Leftwing, anti-establishment credentials. Does Mr Assange really want to go down in history as the man who put Donald Trump in the White House? The more troubling point, though, is the direct impact Russia's skillfully managed cyber-offensive on the American political system could have on next week's poll. Mrs Clinton has made it clear on the campaign trail that, if she wins, she will take a more robust approach towards Moscow than we have seen from the White House during Barack Obama's presidency. Denying Mrs Clinton victory, then, is very much in Russia's interests, particularly if it results in a victory for Mr Trump, who has yet to provide a satisfactory explanation about the close links between his own advisers and the Russian government. Irrespective of who wins next week's contest, though, the real concern is that the precedent has been set whereby a hostile government can seek to change the political landscape of a rival nation without having to fire a shot in anger.

28. CPS decision in Abdel Hakim Belhaj rendition case faces legal challenge

The Guardian (London), Owen Bowcott, 2016 11 02

London - The decision by the director of public prosecutions not to charge a former MI6 official for the 2004 abduction and rendition of a Libyan dissident, Abdel Hakim Belhaj, is to be challenged in court. Lawyers for the human rights organisation Reprieve, which represents Belhaj and his family, have lodged a judicial review claim with the high court in London alleging that Alison Saunders "erred in law" in declining to prosecute Sir Mark Allen, who was previously head of counter-terrorism at MI6. The 23-page claim and its appendix of secret documents - which record joint CIA-MI6 plans to extract Belhaj from Malaysia and forcibly remove him to the torture cells of Muammar Gaddafi's regime - are the latest twist in a protracted legal saga. Reprieve alleges that Allen "did not obtain any proper or adequate political approval" for the rendition, which was arranged with the then Libyan intelligence chief, Moussa Koussa.

29. Cyberforce seeks 50 elite brains

London Times, Mark Bridge, 2016 11 02

London - Workers with no background in technology will be recruited to an "elite" force to defend the nation against cyberattacks through a ten-week bootcamp. As part of a £1.9 billion National Cyber Security Programme announced yesterday, the government will launch the free training course in London next year to turn people looking for a career change into codebreakers. In a move reminiscent of the War Office's use of a Telegraph cryptic crossword to recruit for Bletchley Park in 1942, the government will use psychometric tests to identify 50 brilliant brains. Once selected, they will complete exercises including dealing with a nationwide cyberattack. They will also study the mindset of hackers. The government said that, if successful, the GCHQ-certified scheme would later be introduced nationwide. According to the SANS Institute, the private company running the bootcamp, it will cram two years' worth of training into the ten-week schedule.

30. MI5 has been caught on the back foot once again

London Times, Sean O'Neill, 2016 11 02

Column - Russia, the head of MI5 warned yesterday, is using the "whole range of state organs and powers to push its foreign policy in increasingly aggressive ways". A decade after the state-sponsored murder of the anti-Putin dissident Alexander Litvinenko in London, Andrew Parker used the first newspaper interview given by a serving MI5 director-general to deliver this statement of the blindingly obvious. Perhaps it would have been better if Mr Parker had admitted that the Security Service has been largely barking up the wrong tree for the past ten years and underestimated the threat from Putin's regime. Over that period, MI5 has put pretty much all of its resources into spying on Islamists. That, of course, was a threat it also discovered late. One problem is that MI5 is perpetually led by insiders who have spent their entire career inside the organisation. Such people have a tendency to focus on the future of the institutions they love and engage in a constant quest for more staff, money and powers. This instinct for self-preservation has left MI5 behind the curve far too often. So perhaps we should be a bit concerned that it recently removed all references to the threat posed by China from its official website.

31. Russian hackers have launched repeated cyber attacks on UK government intranet, senior source says

Metro.co.uk, Toby Meyjes, 2016 11 01

London - Russian hackers have launched sustained cyber attacks on the UK government intranet, a senior source has revealed, amid growing tensions between the countries. The hackers have tried repeatedly to access the government's intranet, the source told metro.co.uk, as well as disrupt the gov.uk web addresses its various departments use. It is understood that the attacks have targeted all government departments rather than one in particular and the threat posed by Russian cyber attacks is one of the biggest the UK government faces. It comes on the same day the director general of MI5 Andrew Parker said the Kremlin was becoming 'increasingly aggressive' in its approach to its foreign policy, including cyber attacks.

32. UK must build cyber-attack capability, chancellor says

The Guardian (London), Jessica Elgot, 2016 11 01

London - The UK must strike back at hostile states in cyberspace and be capable of mounting sophisticated cyber-attacks of its own in place of military strikes, the chancellor has said. Philip Hammond said that unless the UK could match the cyber-attack abilities of foreign rogue states, the alternatives would only be to ignore digital attacks on Britain's infrastructure or use military force. Launching the government's £1.9bn national cybersecurity strategy, Hammond said the UK had to develop "fully functioning cyber-attack capability". He said: "If we do not have the ability to respond in cyberspace to an attack that takes down our power networks, leaving us in darkness, or our air traffic control, leaving us in darkness, we would be left with the impossible choice of turning the other cheek and ignoring the devastating consequences or resorting to a military response." Hammond said the world's next great conflict was likely to at least begin in cyberspace, before guns were loaded.

33. Why is MI5 making such a fuss about Russia?

The Guardian (London), Mary Dejevsky, 2016 11 01

Column - If I had cornflakes for breakfast (which I don't), I would have choked on them, reading Andrew Parker's view of the threat posed by Russia, not just to the world at large - that is a commonplace of the "new cold war" discourse - but to the stability of the UK. With the majority vote for Brexit against the strong preference of Scotland and Northern Ireland for remain, we have shown ourselves quite capable of inflicting potentially fatal harm to our national stability all by ourselves. Why would we need Russia to do it for us? That was a knee-jerk reaction to the main thrust of the MI5 chief's first national newspaper interview in the agency's history. But a second, more substantial, response chased behind it in the form of a rather basic, and recurrent, question. Why is the UK establishment in general, and UK intelligence in particular, so fixated on a supposed threat from Russia? Here are a few ideas. The first is that blaming Russia carries little cost. Russia is not China. Investment is not a big consideration. For all sorts of reasons, political relations have long been dire. Applying the same virulent rhetoric to terrorism conducted in the name of Islam, on the other hand, risks fomenting social and cultural strife here at home. A second reason, now as in the past, is that blaming Russia aligns us comfortably with the US, where stalwarts in Congress and at the Pentagon have never emerged from their old thinking about the threat. The Russia card has been played to exhaustion during this presidential campaign, to the point where it could swing the election - and I don't mean in Donald Trump's favour. A third factor is the consensus about a strong and malevolent Russia that still rules the "expert" community, and will probably do so for a few years yet - helped along by the hatchet-faced Putin. There are younger specialists who take a rather different view, but they are drowned out by the ingrained clichés.

34. Australia terrorist links to cartels

The Australian, Mark Schliebs, 2016 11 02

Sydney - Hezbollah and its associates have been using Australia to launder money for international drug cartels, with at least one locally based contact now helping security agencies to bring them down. A year after Australian authorities helped bust a major international money-laundering organisation allegedly headed by Pakistan's Altaf Khanani, Hezbollah associates in Colombia, West Africa and Europe are accused of moving $500,000 out of Australia in 2014. So far, only Mohammad Ahmad Ammar has been taken to the US for prosecution following the sting operation involving agents and informants for the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Australian Criminal Intelligence Commission. Mr Ammar last week pleaded not guilty to eight charges in a Florida court, six relating to money laundering and two counts of unlawfully using a communication device. An alleged accomplice and fellow Hezbollah associate, Hassan Mohsen Mansour, is under house arrest in France while the US seeks to extradite him for - unrelated money-laundering charges. Mr Mansour allegedly asked an unidentified Australia-based contact to help launder the money -- not knowing that person had become an ACIC informer. ACIC declined to comment yesterday.

35. Government agencies the new 'honey pots' for cyber spies

The Australian Financial Review, Fleur Anderson, 2016 11 02

Canberra - More than 40 per cent of Australia's government agencies have inadequate awareness of cyber security risks and could become the new "honey pots" of state-sponsored online espionage and cybercrime, a new investigation by private-sector cyber security experts has found. The Australian National University's National Security College found smaller government agencies and medium-sized business were the weakest link in Australia's cyber security defences because they are not vigilant enough about "low-level" threats like malware and denial of service attacks. Lead researcher Dr Tim Legrand, working in partnership with Macquarie Telecom Group, found it was very likely many attacks were not being reported to the federal government's Computer Emergency Response Team. This is despite a $230 million cyber security strategy introduced by Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull in April. "This means authorities may lack the accurate and comprehensive information needed to appropriately prioritise national cyber defence initiatives," the research paper said. The security of government computer systems is in doubt after the Bureau of Meteorology was hacked last year by a foreign power, which installed malicious software to steal documents and compromise other government networks, and the botched 2016 Census which was "attacked" but not hacked by traffic from Singapore.

36. US in mix for asylum resettlement (Canada)

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 11 02

Sydney - Refugees on Manus Island and Nauru will be offered permanent homes in a handful of third countries, which could include the US and Canada, as part of a multilateral resettlement deal the Turnbull government hopes to announce by the end of the year. The Australian understands the government is closing in on a deal that will enable it to dramatically downsize the processing centres on Manus and Nauru by offering permanent resettlement to most of about 1800 recognised refugees on Manus and Nauru. Details of the arrangements are being tightly held for fear of repeating the mistakes of the Gillard era, when similar arrangements with East Timor and Malaysia were prematurely disclosed, complicating negotiations. However, sources told The Australian the government was in the final stages of negotiations and several countries would likely be involved. Some are understood to be in the northern hemisphere, suggesting the US or Canada may be in the frame. In September, the Turnbull government pledged to take refugees from Central America housed in refugee camps in Costa Rica, prompting speculation a refugee swap with the US was in the offing. On Saturday, Malcolm Turnbull revealed the government planned to introduce legislation to permanently bar refugees processed on Nauru and Manus from obtaining any kind of Australian visa unless they first gained the explicit permission of the immigration minister. The proposal was savaged by refugee advocates, the Greens and parts of the Labor Party, but the Prime Minister defended it on the grounds it sent a necessary signal to people-smugglers and their clients. "They must know that the door to Australia is closed to those who seek to come here by boat with a people-smuggler," he said. "It is closed." Government sources say the legislation, which will be introduced during the next sitting of parliament, has two main purposes. It allows Australia to finalise resettlement deals with third countries while at the same time closing alternate routes to Australia -- for instance by emigrating from New Zealand.

37. 47 militants killed in Kunar clashes, says governor

Pajhwok Afghan News, Pajhwok Report, 2016 11 02

Asadabad - Local officials on Tuesday said dozens of militants suffered casualties during clashes with security forces in two days in different districts of eastern Kunar province. Some civilians and Afghan forces also suffered casualties during the clashes triggered by Taliban attacks on the provincial capital, Asadabad, and Sarkan, Manogi, Watapur and Dangam districts, the governor said. Wahidullah Kalimzai told Pajhwok Afghan News the attacks had been repulsed and the situation was currently under control. He said 47 militants including a commander were killed and 12 others wounded in Afghan forces' retaliatory attacks. Three Afghan soldiers were also killed and seven others injured. Kalimzai said 18 civilians were injured after the Taliban attacked Asadabad and the four districts. The injured civilians were currently under treatment.

38. New leak shows Pakistani ISPs may have been hacked by the NSA

The Express Tribune, Tech Desk, 2016 11 02

Islamabad - A group called the Shadow Brokers has released a new cache of data purporting to be taken from the NSA in a Medium post titled "Trick or Treat" -- revealing hundreds of IP addresses apparently compromised by the NSA as part of its operations. Interestingly, the majority of the nodes are located overseas, including compromises in China, Russia, India, or Pakistan, presumably to make it difficult for targets to attribute any attack launched through the network. At least four Pakistani Internet Service Providers (ISPs) are also part of the leaked list. As with any anonymous leak of stolen data, it's possible the information was fabricated or altered in transit, although previous Shadow Brokers publications have proven to be genuine. The Medium post is also signed with PGP, thus verifying that it was written by the same source as previous Shadow Brokers drops.

Lahore - Pakistan Awami Tehreek (PAT) Chairman Dr Tahirul Qadri will not join the Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf's sit-in scheduled for November 2 in Islamabad. According to PAT leaders, there was a possibility that Qadri could show up at the sit-in at the eleventh hour but now PAT Secretary General Khuram Nawaz Gandapur has been asked to lead party workers' delegation. "We have asked our party organisations from Jhelum to Rawalpindi to attend the sit-in while people from far-flung areas have not been invited as we do not have accommodation facilities for them," PAT Information Secretary Noorullah Siddiqi said. Speaking at a meeting of PAT Executive Council on Monday, Gandapur confirmed that he would lead his party activists at the dharna. Last month, Qadri claimed he will monitor PTI's 'lockdown' plan of Islamabad from Canada. PAT officials told The Express Tribune that Qadri has asked his party members to adopt a neutral stance and refrain from making statements that either support or confront PTI.

40. Al Qaida au Maghreb islamique diffuse une vidéo de son otage roumain

Le Matin (Algérie), Iulian Ghergut, 2016 11 01

Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso - Iulian Ghergut, un Roumain enlevé au Burkina Faso il y a plus d'un an et otage du groupe du jihadiste algérien Mokhtar Belmokhtar, est apparu dans une vidéo récente, rapportent mardi SITE, centre américain de surveillance des sites jihadistes, et l'agence mauritanienne Al-Akhbar. La diffusion de cette vidéo lundi intervient au lendemain de la publication par le groupe Etat islamique (EI), via son agence de propagande, Amaq, de l'acte d'allégeance d'Adnan Abou Walid Sahraoui, chef d'une dissidence du groupe de Belmokhtar, Al-Mourabitoune, et qui avait affirmé en mai 2015 détenir l'otage roumain. Le fait que cette vidéo émane d'Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi), auquel Belmokhtar s'est rallié en novembre 2015, atteste que l'otage se trouve bien entre les mains du groupe de Mokhtar Belmokhtar, a indiqué à l'AFP le directeur de l'agence Al-Akhbar, El-Heiba Ould Cheikh Sidaty, connue pour recevoir et diffuser régulièrement des communiqués des groupes jihadistes du Sahel.

Bamako, Mali - Le mouvement terroriste basé en Syrie a diffusé le serment prêté par un chef jihadiste basé dans le nord du Mali, et actif dans la bande sahélo-saharienne. Son nom : Abou Walid el-Sahraoui. Abou Walid el-Sahraoui avait déjà prêté allégeance au groupe Etat islamique. Mais cette fois, c'est le mouvement jihadiste lui-même qui diffuse le message, via son agence officielle Amaq. Ce qui a valeur de reconnaissance. Pour la première fois, le groupe Etat islamique confirme donc son implantation au Sahel. Abou Walid el-Sahraoui est un ancien cadre du Mujao, groupe islamiste qui avait participé à l'occupation du nord du Mali en 2012. Après l'opération française Serval, qui chasse les jihadistes en 2013, el-Sahraoui rejoint les rangs d'al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique, sous le commandement de Mokhtar Belmokhtar. En mai dernier, il s'en démarque finalement et prète allégeance au groupe Etat islamique, une première fois. En septembre, il revendique au nom de l'EI, l'attaque d'un poste de douanes, au Burkina. Puis une seconde attaque, il y a deux semaines au Niger, contre la prison de Koutoukalé où sont emprisonnés de nombreux combattants islamistes.

43. Venezuela opposition scraps Maduro trial but presses demands

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 02

Caracas - Venezuela freed four activists and the opposition postponed a symbolic trial in congress of President Nicolas Maduro on Tuesday even as it warned it would quit Vatican-backed talks in a matter of days if tough conditions were not met. Maduro met with opposition leaders on Sunday for the start of talks to ease a political standoff between the ruling Socialist Party and the opposition-led parliament during a spiraling economic crisis. As well as suspending its parliamentary proceedings against Maduro, the opposition also agreed to postpone a march planned for Thursday to the presidential palace that the government had described as part of a coup plot. But it demanded that the government release around 100 jailed opposition activists and bring forward the next presidential election - conditions that are likely to meet with significant resistance from government leaders.

44. Venezuela stops Post journalist, other correspondents from entering country (Canada)

Washington Post, Staff report, 2016 11 02

Washington - Venezuelan authorities stopped a Washington Post reporter at the Caracas airport late Monday night and denied him entry, in the latest case of blocking a foreign correspondent from covering the mounting political and economic turmoil in the South American country. Immigration officials told Joshua Partlow, 38, a dual U.S.-Canadian national, that he lacked a required work visa. Partlow and many other foreign correspondents with non-U.S. passports had routinely visited Venezuela in the past without work visas. Carlos Lauria, program director for the Americas at the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, said Venezuela adopted a regulation in 2004 requiring visiting correspondents to apply in advance for authorization from the Communications Ministry. But that has rarely been enforced in recent years. "They are enforcing this selectively now, I think, because they don't want coverage of the protests," Lauria said in a telephone interview. He said journalists from Spain, Peru and other countries have also been turned back at the Caracas airport in the past few weeks because they lacked authorization. The committee's own representative was also denied entry to the country in late August, with officials saying he lacked press credentials from Venezuela. Partlow, based in Mexico City, had entered Venezuela three times over the past year using his Canadian passport to cover developments in the country. On Monday night, he was instructed to stay in the Caracas airport and board the next flight to Miami, which left Tuesday morning.

46. Canada's 2017 immigration plan to benefit Indians

Hindustan Times, 2016 11 02

Toronto - The Canadian government has forecast its intake of newcomers to the country in 2017 will remain at the levels seen this year, but prospective migrants from countries such as India may have reason for cheer as targets for categories under which they are admitted have been raised. Canada's minister of immigration, refugees and citizenship John McCallum announced the 2017 immigration plan, the first of the Justin Trudeau government, after nationwide consultations. The government expects to welcome 300,000 new immigrants into Canada next year, the same figure as 2016. However, a drop in the intake of refugees means the quotas for the economic and family reunification classes will be enhanced. In 2016, the target for the economic class - the category most used by Indian immigrants - was at 160,600. This has now been upped to 172,500. The family reunification class has been increased by 4,000 to 84,000. Leading immigration lawyer Ravi Jain, of Toronto-based Green and Spiegel LLP, said: "This new target will benefit Indians as there will be more room to bring in Indian immigrants through both the family class and the economic stream. "I have already seen a decrease in processing time for my Indian clients who are sponsoring spouses and I expect that parental sponsorships will be processed faster as well."

The report suggesting that the diplomats were allegedly engaged in espionage in India drew a strong response from Pakistani diplomatic sources, who dismissed the charges as baseless. Government sources termed the episode an "internal" matter of Pakistan. Citing sources in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Islamabad, the Karachi-based Dawn reported that Mehmood Akhtar, the diplomat who was expelled by India on October 29 for spying, had named the four officials in a recorded statement in Delhi. 48. Intelligence agencies advise extra security for Andhra Pradesh CM Chandrababu Naidu

Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 11 02

New Delhi - Andhra Pradesh chief minister N Chandrababu Naidu has been advised by central intelligence agencies to remain in secure locations and travel with additional security in the wake of CPI (Maoist) threatening to target him in a "revenge attack" against the recent killing of 30 cadres on the Andhra Pradesh-Odisha border. "As the Andhra Pradesh chief minister was specifically named in the threat issued by the Maoists, we have alerted his personal security staff and asked them to take extra precautions," a top intelligence functionary told TOI. Naidu's beefed-up security detail will involve proper sanitisation of venues of his meetings. Naidu is a Z-plus protectee. He had earlier escaped an assassination attempt by the Maoists in 2003. Seoul/Washington - North Korea is getting ready to launch yet another Musudan intermediate-range ballistic missile in the next three days, a U.S. news report said Tuesday. Fox Business News cited two unidentified U.S. officials "with knowledge of this assessment" as saying that the North is preparing to conduct a launch "in the next 24 to 72 hours." It said the potential launch would be the ninth test of the Musudan missile this year. The Department of Defense declined to confirm the report. South Korea's military authorities confirmed the report, saying activities of a Musudan missile-carrying transport erector launcher (TEL) have recently been spotted in North Korea. "We cannot disclose the possible launch site but our analysis is that the North can launch a Musudan at any time. The military is on high alert to counter any provocative acts by the North," a defense official said, adding there was no pre-notice issued by Pyongyang to warn planes and ships that may be in the path of the missile.

50. Reshuffle reflects Park's refusal to quit

Korea Herald, Bae Hyun-jung, 2016 11 02

Analysis: The surprise appointment of a new prime minister was largely taken as two-way strategy by President Park Geun-hye -- apparently yielding to the political parties' call for a stronger Cabinet, but also implying that she will not completely step back from power. The hurried and arbitrary manner of the announcement, which triggered complaints from political circles, also led to speculation that the presidential office attempted to deflect the attention away from the additional revelations concerning the Choi Soon-sil scandal. Cheong Wa Dae on Wednesday tapped Kim Byong-joon, public administration professor at Kookmin University and former policymaker for the late liberal President Roh Moo-hyun, as the new prime minister to replace Hwang Kyo-ahn. "Kim may be seen as a 'responsible prime minister' who will have a reinforced range of authority and take charge of the nation's internal affairs," said a Blue House official. "He will largely act independently (from the presidential office) and take an active role in further reshuffling the Cabinet." The fact that the president exerted power in naming the new top official indicates that Park decided to reinforce the prime ministerial authority under the current administrative system, shunning the idea of constituting a new "neutral Cabinet."

Manila - National Police Director-General Rolando dela Rosa has ordered fixed checkpoints across the Philippines dismantled, following a directive from President Rodrigo Duterte. "We will remove the checkpoints immediately," Dela Rosa said in reports. However, the national police chief said authorities would keep in place "mobile checkpoints." The order comes nearly two months after Duterte placed the whole country under a state of emergency, following the devastating bombing in Davao City last September 2 that killed 14 people and injured 70 others at a night market. According to Dela Rosa, checkpoints would only be employed if there is "A1" information that suspects would be passing through a certain area. Last Saturday, Duterte, in a speech on Cotabato City, said checkpoints cause an unnecessary convenience to people, especially commuters. When a checkpoint is in place in a certain location, all commuters and vehicles passing through are carefully inspected.

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 02

Washington - U.S. National Security Adviser Susan Rice and Secretary of State John Kerry held talks with Chinese State Councilor Yang Jiechi in New York on Tuesday, the White House said, as the two countries have been struggling in negotiations on a new package of sanctions on North Korea. The two sides "reviewed progress in bringing about a more durable, stable, and productive bilateral relationship. To this end, they committed to manage differences constructively and to expand practical cooperation on regional and global challenges," National Security Council spokesman Ned Price said in a statement without elaborating. The meeting came as the two countries have been struggling to narrow differences in negotiations to put together a new package of U.N. Security Council sanctions aimed at punishing the North for its September nuclear test. The main point of contention in the negotiations is the U.S. demand for banning all of North Korea's exports of coal, a key source of hard currency for the communist regime, including exports for "livelihood purposes." The latest U.N. sanctions, adopted in March in response to the North's fourth nuclear test in January, ban the North's exports of coal, but those sanctions are not applied in case of exports for "livelihood purposes."

53. U.S. intelligence officials negative about S. Korea's nuclear armament, but say it's up to Seoul: lawmakers

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 02

Washington - U.S. intelligence officials reacted negatively to calls in South Korea for the country's own nuclear armament, but said it is ultimately up to the country whether to pursue the option or not, according to South Korean lawmakers Tuesday. Reps. Won Yoo-chul of the ruling Saenuri Party and Lee In-young of the Minjoo Party made the remark, saying they met with officials of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI). "They said it's basically an issue that South Korea should make a decision on, but questioned whether it would be effective," Lee told South Korean reporters. The North's fifth nuclear test in September has given rise to greater calls in South Korea for the country's own nuclear armament, with not only lawmakers of the conservative ruling Saenuri Party, but also members of liberal opposition parties making the pro-nuclear weapons case. The government of President Park Geun-hye has rejected such an idea as running against the principle of a Korean Peninsula free of nuclear weapons. Officials also say it would have negative effects on efforts to end the North's nuclear programs. U.S. officials have also expressed staunch opposition to the idea.

Kyiv - Mark Feygin, the Russian lawyer of a Ukrainian journalist Roman Sushchenko whom Russia accuses of "espionage", has said that it was a "family friend" who had tipped the Russian Federal Security Service which led to Sushchenko's arrest in Moscow September 30, TV Channel 5 reports. He [Roman Sushchenko] visited his brother in Moscow several times. He contacted a family friend. A family friend simply had him locked up. That's it," said the lawyer. As UNIAN reported earlier, the Federal Security Service September 30 detained in Moscow a correspondent of Ukrinform Roman Sushchenko, labeling him a "Ukrainian intelligence officer" who allegedly "deliberately collected information on the activities of the Russian armed forces and the national guard." A court in Moscow has ruled to arrest the journalist until November 30.

56. Iran court issues verdict for suspects in Saudi embassy attack

Reuters, 2016 11 02

Beirut - Iran's judiciary has issued verdicts for 20 people accused of storming Saudi diplomatic missions in January and will announce them in the near future, an official was quoted as saying by the judiciary news agency on Tuesday. Saudi Arabia cut diplomatic relations with its rival Iran after protesters stormed the kingdom's embassy in Tehran and consulate in Mashhad in response to Riyadh's execution of a prominent Saudi Shiite cleric. The Iranian government condemned the assault and President Hassan Rouhani, keen to improve Tehran's long-strained relations with its neighbours and the West, asked the judiciary to punish the protesters and prevent further attacks. The Mizan news agency quoted a judge as saying that the verdicts for 20 defendants had been issued and "will be announced soon." He did not give the names of the 20 and did not say whether they had been convicted or not.

57. Isis leader 'hiding in Mosul' as Iraqi forces enter city ahead of final battle

The Independent (UK), Patrick Cockburn, 2016 11 02

Irbil - The Iraqi Army has entered Mosul for the first time in over two years at the start of a battle which is likely to end in a decisive defeat for Isis. The significance of the fight for Mosul will be all the greater for Isis because its self-declared caliph, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, is believed to be still inside the city, a senior Kurdish official has told The Independent. Fuad Hussein, chief of staff to Kurdish President Massoud Barzani, said in an exclusive interview that his government had information from multiple sources that "Baghdadi is there and, if he is killed, it will mean the collapse of the whole [Isis] system." Isis would have to choose a new caliph in the middle of a battle, but no successor would have the authority and prestige of Baghdadi, the leader who surprised the world by establishing the caliphate after capturing Mosul in June 2014. Baghdadi has kept himself concealed for the last eight or nine months according to Mr Hussein, who added that the caliph had become very dependent on Isis commanders from Mosul and Tal Afar, a city just to the west of Mosul. Other senior and better known figures in Isis, particularly those from Syria and other countries, have been killed since their initial triumphs in the summer of 2014 when they took over much of northern Iraq and eastern Syria. The presence of Baghdadi in Mosul may complicate and prolong the battle for Mosul as his surviving adherents fight to the death to defend him. Mr Hussein said that "it is obvious that they will lose, but not how long this will take to happen." He said that Kurdish Peshmerga forces had been impressed by the extraordinary number of tunnels that Isis had dug in order to provide hiding places in the villages around Mosul.

58. Mideast partition plot meant to ensure Israel's security

Press TV, 2016 11 02

Tehran - A senior adviser to Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyyed Ali Khamenei has warned of plots hatched by the US and its regional allies to divide the Middle East countries, saying such a move aims to safeguard the Israeli regime's security. "The Americans and some of their regional allies are trying to sow discord and break up the region and want to partition and weaken big, strong and ancient countries in the region in order to [ensure] Israel's security and meet their own excessive demands," Ali Akbar Velayati, the Leader's top adviser on international affairs, said in a meeting with Mala Bakhtiar, chief of Executive Body of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), in Tehran on Tuesday. Velayati added that plotters and reactionary countries in the region seek to sow discord among Muslim nations; however, regional people would certainly be the final victors.

59. Assad in Person: Confident, Friendly, No Regrets

New York Times, Anne Barnard, 2016 11 02

Damascus - The guns were silent atop Mount Qasioun and the lights on its slopes twinkled over Damascus as President Bashar al-Assad of Syria welcomed a group of Western visitors into his French-Ottoman palace on Monday night, presenting himself as a man firmly in control of his country. He radiated confidence and friendliness as he ushered a group of British and American journalists and policy analysts into an elegant wood-paneled sitting room where he claimed that the social fabric of Syria was stitched together "much better than before" a chaotic civil war began more than five years ago. It was as if half his citizens had not been driven from their homes and nearly half a million had not been killed in the bloody fighting for which he rejected any personal responsibility, blaming instead the United States and Islamist militants. "I'm just a headline -- the bad president, the bad guy, who is killing the good guys," Mr. Assad said. "You know this narrative. The real reason is toppling the government. This government doesn't fit the criteria of the United States." Waxing philosophical, he spoke of every Syrian's right to be "a full citizen, in every meaning of this word," and likened intolerant versions of religion to a computer operating system that needed to be updated. He promised that a new era of openness and dialogue was underway in Syria and said that he was thinking ahead about how to modernize Syrians' mentality after a war that he believed his forces were assured of winning. Mr. Assad ruled out political changes until then and declared that he planned to remain president at least until his third seven-year term ends in 2021.

60. Canada wades into troubled Middle East waters

Jerusalem Post, Tovah Lazaroff, 2016 11 02

Jerusalem - Canada on Tuesday added its name to the list of countries who want to help break the frozen peace process between Israelis and Palestinians. "We want to be doing everything we can to create conditions where the direct parties involved, the Palestinian Authority, Israelis can find a way to the peace table," said Canada's Governor-General David Johnston. He spoke with The Jerusalem Post at a hotel lounge at the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem, just hours after arriving in Israel from Jordan. Ultimately it is the Israelis and the Palestinians who have come to a negotiated solution, said Johnston adding that other parties like Canada can encourage that, but can't substitute for it. The state visit, marks the first time that a Canadian Governor General, a post akin to the Israeli presidency, has visited the region and Israel, which has very strong ties with Canada. Johnston began his week long trip on October 29th and will remain in Israel and the Palestinian territories until November 5.

61. Prison terms for citizens involved in terror, criminal acts

Arab News, Mohammed Al-Sulami, 2016 11 02

Jeddah - The Specialized Criminal Court in Riyadh issued four separate sentences on Tuesday, giving varying prison terms to four citizens for involvement in criminal activities and support for terrorist groups. Two citizens received 10 years each for having traveled to Iran, where they met with a criminal wanted for carrying out terrorist acts in the Eastern Province and got weapon training. The criminal, currently detained, had instructed the two Saudis to undergo military training in an effort to later act to destabilize the security of the Kingdom. The two defendants also traveled to Iraq, at the behest of the said criminal, and joined training camps where they learned how to assemble machine guns and pistols. They then returned to the Kingdom, where they were apprehended. The court sentence starts from the date of arrest; after being released, the two will be forbidden from traveling abroad for another 10 years.

62. Senior intelligence official: There's a basis for a deal with the Palestinians

Jerusalem Post, Herb Keinon, 2016 11 02

Jerusalem - A senior Israeli military intelligence officer said that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is a legitimate peace partner, and that he has "consistently kept the peace and quiet," according to channel 10. Speaking to MKs and ministers recently, Brig.- Gen. Dror Shalom said "I know some of you might not like to hear this, but since 2004, there is a leader, Abu-Mazen (Abbas), who has generated quiet and opposed terrorism." He added that "there is a basis for a solution to the conflict." Shalom added that "it is true that we are not the world's problem, but we are an easy target." In early September, there was talk of a Russian- arranged meeting between Abbas and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, either in Moscow or in Luxembourg. "We'll see, either one - or any other place," Netanyahu had said, reiterating that Israel is "always ready for direct negotiations without preconditions." However, the meeting did not come to fruition.

63. Syria Intelligence Chief: Aleppo Conflict will End in 10 Days if West Stops Supporting Militants

Fars News Agency, 2016 11 02

Tehran - Syrian Air Force Intelligence Directorate head said that violence in the war-torn Syrian city of Aleppo could be ended within 10 days if the United States and the European Union end their practice of applying double standards to Syria and supporting militants in the country. "It is solely US and European double standards, which are the reason behind terrorist activity in Aleppo. If they stop financing the militants for 10 days in a row, the Aleppo problem will be resolved and the militants will take their weapons and depart to join their friends in Turkey," Said Syrian Air Force Intelligence Directorate head Jamil Hassan, RIA Novosti reported. The intelligence officer, who is also a close aide to Syrian President Bashar Assad, stressed that international politics should not determine the course of the battle for Aleppo and that the United States continued to back terrorists at the highest diplomatic levels.

Le Temps (Suisse), Richard Werly, 2016 11 02

Paris - Il y a ceux qui balaient publiquement les accusations. Candidat à la primaire présidentielle de la droite, premier ministre lors du lancement officiel du projet de cathédrale orthodoxe et du centre culturel russe à l'automne 2007 et défenseur virulent d'un axe stratégique Paris- Moscou, François Fillon en fait partie. « Accuser d'emblée la Russie de vouloir transformer ce centre culturel orthodoxe au coeur de Paris en station d'écoute, c'est nourrir des fantasmes inutiles et dommageables », argumentait-il à Genève, en mai, à la veille d'un séminaire sur la Russie organisé au château de Coppet. Et il y a ceux qui, depuis l'inauguration du site parisien le 19 octobre, et sur fond de malaise profond avec Moscou au sujet de la guerre en Syrie et en Ukraine, refusent cette omerta politique: « On parle d'un site russe doté de l'immunité diplomatique, situé à quelques centaines de mètres du Quai d'Orsay et de l'Elysée, interroge un ancien diplomate basé en Asie centrale. Poser la question de son utilisation, et des risques qu'il peut présenter, est la moindre des choses. »

65. Crackdown on the press brings protest in Turkey

Los Angeles Times, Umar Farooq, 2016 11 02

Istanbul - Hundreds of demonstrators camped overnight in protest at the Istanbul headquarters of Turkey's oldest secular newspaper after its editor and a dozen staffers were detained by police in what many see as a widening crackdown on government critics. Istanbul prosecutors said the journalists at the Cumhuriyet newspaper were being investigated for supporting groups the government has designated as terrorist organizations: followers of Fethullah Gulen, a self-exiled cleric whom the government blames for a July 15 coup attempt, and the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, which has waged a decades-long insurgency. Prosecutors took issue with the paper's portrayal of the investigation that followed the failed coup -- which so far has resulted in the arrests of 37,000 and the dismissal of 110,000 state workers -- as a "purge." The newspaper is one of the few remaining opposition news outlets in Turkey. "Instead of moves to strengthen democracy, we are faced with a counter-coup," said Kemal Kilicdaroglu, the head of the opposition Republican People's Party, or CHP, which has historical ties with the newspaper. "We are faced with a situation where the coup has been used as an opportunity to silence society's intellectuals and mount pressure on media," he told reporters while visiting Cumhuriyet's offices in Ankara, Turkey's capital.

Paris - Le fichier des « Titres électroniques sécurisés » (TES) vise à remplacer deux fichiers existants : le Fichier national de gestion (FNG) relatif aux cartes nationales d'identité et celui du système TES lié à la délivrance des passeports. Le nouveau fichier qui a été créé par le décret n° 2016-1 460 du 28 octobre 2016 collectera toutefois davantage de données que les deux fichiers qu'il remplacera (lire ci-contre). L'un des objectifs affichés par le gouvernement est de lutter contre la fraude et ce dernier assure qu'il n'y aura pas d'identification administrative, mais une authentification automatisée et élargie. Les données pourront être consultées par les agents chargés de réaliser les documents mais aussi par une très impressionnante liste de personnes, « pour les besoins exclusifs de leurs missions. ». Ainsi les agents des services de la police nationale et les militaires des unités de la gendarmerie nationale chargés des missions de prévention et de répression des atteintes aux intérêts fondamentaux de la Nation et des actes de terrorisme, individuellement désignés et dûment habilités auront accès au fichier. Idem pour les agents des services spécialisés du renseignement. Idem pour les agents de la direction centrale de la police judiciaire, individuellement désignés et dûment habilités (à l'exclusion de l'image numérisée des empreintes digitales). Les données pourront être par ailleurs partagées par le système de sécurité de Schengen et par Interpol.

68. Tabloid: Supo suspects Russia of buying up Finnish property for military personnel Yle (Finland), Staff report, 2016 11 02

Helsinki - Finnish Security and Intelligence Police Supo has speculated that Russia could use property it has purchased in Finland as accommodation for its military, according to the tabloid Iltalehti. In a report to presented to Parliament in September on threats facing Finland, Supo noted that a foreign power could make use of property purchased without any commercial or conventional real estate value. Supo speculated in the report that such real estate could be used for preparations to wield influence in a crisis situation. In practice, as a landowner, a foreign state could shut down road access or provide accommodation for troops, the agency said in the report. According to Iltalehti, in the context of the report, it was clear that Supo was specifically referring to real estate deals struck in Finland by Russia. Supo declined to comment on the matter when reached by Yle.

Québec - L'espionnage de journalistes par la Sûreté du Québec et le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal a soulevé une vague d'indignation et d'inquiétudes parmi les journalistes visés et au sein du monde politique. « Je couvre la politique depuis près de 40 ans, souvent sur des dossiers délicats. On se dit toujours que c'est possible d'être épié par les policiers, mais on est convaincu qu'ils n'oseraient pas aller jusque-là. Bien, il semble qu'on se soit trompé. » Denis Lessard, chef du bureau parlementaire de La Presse à Québec Amir Khadir, député de Québec solidaire « La réponse de la SQ de dévoiler [ces informations] démontre que le public a besoin d'être rassuré. Ce sont des questions auxquelles [la GRC et le SCRS] doivent répondre. On continue de demander une enquête publique qui nous permettrait de constater les faits : est-ce une pratique répandue ou arbitraire ? » Matthew Dubé, porte-parole du NPD en matière de sécurité publique « Comme n'importe qui, je vois que si la SQ et le SVPM le font, je ne tomberais pas en bas de ma chaise [si les corps policiers fédéraux le font aussi]. Le ministre Goodale doit demander des comptes aux services policiers sous sa juridiction et rendre des comptes en Chambre aussi. »

2. LGBTQ Canadians Sue Government for Decades-Long Witch Hunt

Vice News, Steven Goetz, 2016 11 03

In a Canadian military interrogation room in 1990, strapped to a polygraph machine and sensing unseen observers behind a two-way mirror, 21-year-old Canadian sailor Todd Ross finally broke down in tears and said out loud what he'd been unable to say even to himself: He was gay. The military gave Ross an ultimatum: accept an honourable discharge or perform "general duties"--grunt work--for the rest of his career.? He left feeling too ashamed to tell friends and family and worried the military police would turn its sights on his colleagues if he spoke out. He felt "he had somehow betrayed his country," entered a deep depression and considered suicide.? But Ross survived, and has now filed a $600 million class action lawsuit against the federal government in an Ontario courtroom, which is still awaiting certification. A second lawsuit has been filed in Quebec. Both are seeking compensation and an apology for the victims of a decades-long witch hunt to purge gays and lesbians from the Canadian military and public service.? The Trudeau government has said it intends to apologize to LGBTQ Canadians for past discrimination, but has offered no details beyond that. "The victims are not happy with the lack of an explanation why the government wasn't moving on this except that it isn't as important as other things on their agenda," Douglas Elliott, a gay rights activist and lawyer in the case, told VICE News. "That's not good enough."? The campaign to identify and purge gays and lesbians from the military and public service emerged out of the paranoia of the Cold War starting in the 1950s, according to files obtained by researchers in the past two decades.? According to government records, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) spent decades following World War II investigating, surveilling, and questioning suspected gay and lesbian public servants, including members of the military, about their sexual orientation. At one point, the RCMP amassed a list of 9,000 people deemed suspect and subject to investigation.? The Canadian government would often employ a device that would measure sweat and sexual reaction to certain words, phrases, and images--dubbed internally as the 'fruit machine'--to vet suspected LGBTQ government employees. The project was created through a government grant at the Carleton University Psychology Department.

4. National security green paper is a whitewash

Toronto Star, Azeezah Kanji, 2016 11 03

Op-ed: To guide the much-lauded and keenly anticipated public consultation on national security - billed as an unprecedented opportunity for Canadians to shape national security law and policy - the government has published a national security green paper entitled "Our Security, Our Rights." The configuration of the title reflects the general orientation of the document: security first, rights second. While the green paper's self-proclaimed purpose is "to prompt discussion and debate about Canada's national security framework," it seems far more concerned with manufacturing consent for Bill C-51's dramatic - and likely unconstitutional - expansion of security powers, than with enabling a well-informed public consultation. The federal privacy commissioner has observed that the "tone of the Government's discussion ... focuses heavily on challenges for law enforcement and national security agencies," as opposed to "democratic rights and privacy." According to the BC Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA), the green paper "reads like it was drafted by a public relations firm tasked with selling the current state of extraordinary, unaccountable powers." (And in response, the BCCLA has produced a "Different Shade of Green Paper," elucidating several problematic aspects of the Canadian national security framework that the government "forgot to mention.") The government's green paper and associated "background document" are a montage of tendentious elements. The vague intimations of danger ("Many Canadians have travelled to Syria and Iraq to join Daesh," "More people are radicalizing to violence" - with absolutely zero data or other supporting evidence cited regarding the existence or size of the threat). The fear-inducing hypothetical scenarios ("Ms. G is keen to travel overseas to join a terrorist group ... She then wants to return to Canada and train others to become terrorists," "The police conduct an urgent investigation into a group of ten people based on an anonymous tip ... Some members of the group are apparently planning to bomb an unknown public gathering that week"). And the leading questions ("Given the nature of the threats facing Canada, what scope should CSIS have to reduce those threats?"). There is much about the prospective perils of "terrorism," but nothing about the actual abuses of "counterterrorism": the many disturbing instances of people denied their security and their rights because Canadian agencies wrongly tarred them as "terrorist threats." The pages of the green paper and background document are full of hypothesized "terrorist" menaces, but the real-life victims of Canadian national security are glaringly absent. Note: Azeezah Kanji is a legal analyst and writer based in Toronto.

5. National security review must acknowledge Canadian government's shortcomings

CBC News, Steven Zhou, 2016 11 03

Op-ed: The Liberal Party is conducting a national security review process to figure out how to fulfil its election-time promise of amending the "problematic" parts of Bill C-51, now the Anti-Terrorism Act. The government has published a 21-page "Green Paper," along with a 73-page backgrounder, to pose questions to the Canadian public on the parameters of what reforms should take place. But the Green Paper's rhetoric and the national consultation itself go beyond just the topic of Bill C-51. It goes on to pose more general and philosophical questions of what kind of society Canadians want to live in and how the citizens of this country want to prioritize what are apparently the competing rights of security and freedom. Unfortunately, though the Green Paper admirably addresses the important issues of Canada's national review structure (or lack thereof), as well as the secretive relationship between intelligence-gathering and the due process of law, its overarching outlook doesn't include a strong civil liberties perspective. It is evident from reading the discussion paper that its primary purpose, along with the national consultation itself, is a way for the current government to entrench a certain security mindset that omits the specific (and well-documented) concerns that have arisen in civil society in the post-9/11 era. In other words, the consultation process and the Green Paper seem to have more or less ignored the robust criticisms regarding Canada's national security apparatus by civil society organizations, preferring instead to source (or "consult") public opinion as if Canadians haven't been voicing their concerns all this time. For instance, numerous civil society organizations, such as Canadian Journalists for Free Expression (CJFE) and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA) have sounded the alarm on how Canadian agencies have collected metadata over the years. Individuals within government such as Daniel Therrien, the Harper-appointed Privacy Commissioner, along with Jean-Marie Plouffe, the former Commissioner of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), have voiced similar concerns as to how current collection of "signals intelligence," which includes metadata, continues to jeopardize the privacy of Canadian citizens. And yet, despite these voices, the Green Paper doesn't include any mention of the CSE, Canada's main agency for the collection of signals intel. Note: Steven Zhou is a Toronto writer who has experience in human rights advocacy. He has worked for Human Rights Watch, OXFAM Canada and other NGOs.

6. Surveillance de journalistes : mutisme à la GRC et au SCRS

La Presse+, Vincent Brousseau-Pouliot, 2016 11 02

Ottawa - Alors que la SQ et la Ville de Montréal ont confirmé avoir mis des journalistes sous surveillance, la GRC et le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), les deux corps policiers fédéraux, ne veulent pas confirmer s'ils ont déjà adopté de telles pratiques, et le cas échéant à quelle fréquence. La GRC précise seulement que «les cas où des enquêtes de la GRC concernant des journalistes ont eu lieu sont extrêmement rares». Le commissaire de la GRC Bob Paulson a dit mercredi «ne pas être au courant que nous avons des enquêtes actives ou de la surveillance à l'égard de journalistes», mais la GRC n'a pas voulu confirmer si des journalistes ont été surveillés dans le cadre de ses enquêtes. Un cas de filature avait été rendu public il y a un an, celui du journaliste de La Presse Joël-Denis Bellavance qui a été pris en filature en 2007. Tout en précisant «reconnaître» et «respecter [...] l'importance de la liberté et de l'indépendance de la presse», la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) a indiqué ne pas pouvoir commenter «l'existence d'enquêtes en cours» ou «discuter des détails opérationnels» d'enquêtes passées. La GRC n'a pas précisé à La Presse si elle effectuait, comme l'a fait la Sûreté du Québec cette semaine, un examen de ses enquêtes pour déterminer si des journalistes ont été mis sous surveillance. La SQ a dévoilé aujourd'hui que six journalistes au Québec, dont Alain Gravel (Radio-Canada), Marie-Maude Denis (Radio-Canada), Isabelle Richer (Radio-Canada), Denis Lessard (La Presse) et Éric Thibault (Journal de Montréal).

7. 6 reporters spied on by Quebec provincial police

CBC News, Sabrina Marandola, 2016 11 03

Montreal - Quebec provincial police confirm that six members of the press were spied on in 2013 as part of a police investigation that was launched on the same day that a labour union boss filed a complaint. Three Radio-Canada journalists said they found out today, via unnamed sources, that the Sûreté du Québec was tracking their portable phones. This comes just days after a Montreal newspaper columnist said he was similarly tracked by that city's police force. Marie-Maude Denis and Isabelle Richer, the current hosts of the investigative program Enquête, as well as the show's former host Alain Gravel, said this afternoon that provincial police were tracking their incoming and outgoing calls and texts. "I've just learned that my incoming and outgoing calls have been spied on by the Sûreté du Québec in 2013," Denis tweeted in French. "My turn to get a confirmation that I was targeted by court mandates to obtain a log of my calls by the SQ," Gravel said. Journal de Montreal crime reporter Eric Thibault was also under surveillance, as was La Presse's National Assembly bureau chief Denis Lessard. Another journalist, whose name hasn't been released, was also monitored. Arsenaault's name came up a number of times at the Charbonneau Commission when, in 2013, the province's anti-corruption inquiry turned its attention to unions. The then-president of Quebec's Federation of Labour (FTQ) came under fire after witnesses testified that Arsenaault was aware of alleged links between some union leaders and organized crime but did nothing about it. He had also been involved in a legal battle with the commission over wiretaps of his phone conversations, gathered by police in an investigation unrelated to the anti-corruption inquiry. Arsenaault sent a letter of complaint to the SQ after news that he was the subject of a police investigation was being made public. "Michel Arsenaault was under scrutiny at the time. He was upset, so he complained to the SQ, which forced police to do an inquiry ... So they decided to ask for this warrant to spy on our cellular phone," Richer said.

8. After Phoenix and Shared Services problems, government seeks feedback on digital future

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 11 03

Ottawa - The federal government continues to receive advice on how it should improve its digital future as it works to fix problem-plagued projects including the Phoenix payroll system and Shared Services Canada. In a so-called, "intimate, armchair discussion" at the annual GTEC conference in Ottawa on Wednesday, parliamentary secretary for Public Services and Procurement Canada, Leona Alleslev opened up about the pitfalls experienced in the development of Shared Services Canada, or SSC. The department that's drawn criticism from other departments, including the RCMP, Statistics Canada and the Auditor General. Alleslev acknowledged the project has been ambitious with aggressive timelines and its attempt to save money. 'A bit too much all at once' "It may have been a bit too much all at once." said Alleslev. "Many people come up to me and say, SSC, enterprise-wide solution, consolidation, wasn't a good idea. Do you really think this is where we need to be going? And I'd say, absolutely, yes." Shared Services was created to streamline information technology across the government by combining more than 100 different email systems into one, reducing the number of data centres from 600 to about 20 and make the systems more secure and reliable.

Le local ne paie pas de mine, comme vous le voyez, mais c'est chaleureux ! Il y a de la bière dans le frigo (achetez-en de temps en temps), le mot de passe du WiFi est sur le routeur et le divan est un peu miteux, mais au moins on a le câble : RDI, LCN, TVA Sports, RDS, Canal Vie... Pour le téléphone, avant de faire un interurbain, faites le 9 et... C'est une blague, je n'ai pas fait installer le téléphone. On ne sait jamais, hein ? Blague à part, je suis content de vous recevoir. Je me sentais un peu seul, ici...  Je l'ai dit toute la semaine : je suis sûr que je ne suis pas le seul à avoir été espionné par la police. Je pensais surtout au Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM), dont les réponses au sujet de l'espionnage d'autres journalistes ont été on ne peut plus évasives... Et là, hier, paf, on a su le résultat des vérifications internes faites par la Sûreté du Québec (SQ) dans la foulée des révélations de La Presse : en 2013, six journalistes ont fait l'objet de mesures que Nixon à son plus parano n'aurait pas reniées. Six. Et pas les moindres : le chef de bureau de La Presse à Québec, les deux têtes d'affiche de l'émission Enquête de l'époque, un journaliste d'enquête du JdeM, une star du journalisme judiciaire radio-canadien. Juste ça !

10. From words to action

Montreal Gazette, 2016 11 03

Editorial: The bombshell that Montreal police spied on La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé through his cellphone has prompted political leaders at all levels to speak out in defence of a free press. Their words must be matched by action. To his credit, Quebec Premier Philippe Couillard moved swiftly to shore up protections for the media to conduct their essential work. Almost immediately, the bar will be set higher for police seeking search warrants against journalists, who will be accorded a status similar to that of lawyers, judges and MNAs. Couillard struck a working group with representatives of the judiciary, policing and the media to make recommendations to fortify the work of journalists, a crucial pillar of a democratic society. Among issues the group should consider is what specialized training should be required for the justices of the peace who sign off on the warrants like the ones concerning Lagacé, to ensure that they are aware of journalists' Supreme Court of Canada-recognized right to keep sources confidential. The group should also advocate better whistleblower protection, as recommended by the Charbonneau Commission, given that the Lagacé case highlights the vulnerability of sources.

11. Groups call for transparency, details on Yazidi resettlement plans

Toronto Star, Nicholas Keung, 2016 11 03

Toronto - More than a week after Ottawa announced it would bring in Yazidi refugees within four months, the community and its supporters are still waiting for details of Canada's resettlement plan. "After a long period of silence, we were happy to see the Canadian government taking action. But they are keeping us in the dark," said Majed El Shafie, founder of Toronto's One Free World International, which has 300 aid workers in Iraq and Syria assisting Yazidi refugees. "The government needs to be open and honest about how many they are bringing in, what the process is (for) choosing the refugees and how they are going to resettle them." El Shafie, who came to Canada as a refugee from Egypt in 2002, was among 11 community groups and leaders who held a news conference Wednesday calling on the government to provide concrete targets and a timeline of its plan. "I hope our Canadian government does not make the same mistakes where the real victims are ignored and others benefit instead due to political interests," said Mirza Ismail, founder and chairperson of Yazidi Human Rights International. Last week, Immigration Minister John McCallum made a surprise announcement on Yazidi resettlement by supporting a Conservative motion in Parliament. The Yazidis are a religious minority from northern Iraq and have been targeted by Daesh (also known as ISIS and ISIL) militants, with rape, torture and murder. There are tens of thousands of Yazidis displaced as a result of Daesh persecution in Iraq and Syria.

12. Journalistes espionnés : une « menace à notre démocratie », dit Edward Snowden

Radio-Canada (Nouvelles -web), d'Olivier Arbour-Masse, 2016 11 03

Montréal - « Une attaque radicale à la liberté de presse » et « une menace à notre modèle traditionnel de démocratie ». Voilà ce qu'Edward Snowden pense de « l'affaire Lagacé » et des six autres cas de journalistes espionnés par des corps de police québécois. Le célèbre lanceur d'alerte avait déjà commenté à deux reprises sur Twitter le dossier de l'heure dans l'actualité québécoise. Il a eu l'occasion d'étayer sa pensée mercredi soir, dans une vidéoconférence organisée à l'Université McGill, à Montréal. Des centaines d'étudiants ont fait la file pendant des heures afin de pouvoir entendre l'homme qui a permis de dévoiler les programmes de surveillance à grande échelle de la National Security Agency (NSA) aux États-Unis. Sa conférence ne pouvait se tenir à un moment plus opportun. Quelques heures avant qu'il prenne la parole devant un amphithéâtre bondé, on apprenait que la Sûreté du Québec a épié en 2013 les appels de six journalistes, dont Marie-Maude Denis, Isabelle Richer et Alain Gravel de Radio-Canada. En début de semaine, le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) s'est retrouvé sous les projecteurs pour avoir colligé les relevés d'appels et les métadonnées du journaliste de La Presse Patrick Lagacé. Oh, Canada... <https://t.co/D6kUPPDJ27> pic.twitter.com/KpmvbVYw8d -- Edward Snowden (@Snowden) 2 novembre 2016 Snowden estime que le chef du SPVM Philippe Pichet doit démissionner pour « restaurer la confiance (du public) et rétablir les bases de l'imputabilité ». M. Pichet, qui bénéficie toujours de l'appui du maire Denis Coderre, défend ses enquêteurs en affirmant qu'ils ont agi selon les lois en demandant et en obtenant l'autorisation d'espionner Patrick Lagacé auprès de la juge de paix Josée de Carufel. Or, le problème se situe précisément au niveau de la loi, selon Edward Snowden. Peut-on reconnaître ou à tout le moins débattre raisonnablement d'une nouvelle idée qui peut paraître un brin radicale? La loi commence à échouer dans sa mission de garantir nos droits. Edward Snowden « On ignore toujours selon quelle loi cette autorisation [de surveiller les journalistes] a été donnée », remarque-t-il. « Le gouvernement peut s'introduire dans nos vies privées sans presque rencontrer d'entrave alors que nous, les citoyens, ne savons presque rien sur sa façon d'opérer », poursuit-il, depuis la Russie où il est réfugié pour échapper aux accusations de trahison qui pèsent contre lui aux États-Unis. Le Canada et C-51 critiqués Snowden est catégorique : impossible de se fier aux dirigeants des agences de renseignement pour respecter les lois protégeant la vie privée.

13. Journalistes surveillés par la SQ : des zones d'ombre demeurent

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles web, Mélanie Meloche-Holubowski, 2016 11 03

Montréal - En décidant de surveiller en 2013 le registre des appels de six journalistes, dont trois de Radio-Canada, la Sûreté du Québec (SQ) a voulu faire la lumière sur une affaire qui remonte à une dizaine d'années. Retour sur un dossier aux ramifications multiples, qui n'a pas encore livré tous ses secrets. L'histoire commence avec l'Opération diligence menée par la SQ à la fin des années 2000 au sujet de l'infiltration de l'économie légale par le crime organisé. La SQ entreprend une enquête au printemps 2007 après la plainte d'un entrepreneur en maçonnerie, qui affirmait que les Hells Angels tentaient d'infiltrer son entreprise. L'enquête visait notamment à établir les liens entre la mafia, les motards et la Fédération des travailleurs du Québec (FTQ). Puis, en septembre 2013, certains médias apprennent que Michel Arseneault, alors président de la FTQ et président du conseil d'administration du Fonds de solidarité de FTQ, a fait l'objet de surveillance électronique et de filature de la SQ, entre septembre 2008 et septembre 2009. La fuite des transcriptions de cette surveillance électronique dans les médias arrive au moment où la commission Charbonneau se penche sur les milliers de conversations interceptées par la police au cours de l'Opération diligence.

15. L'ordre politique

La Presse+, Yves Boisvert, 2016 11 03

Chronique - Cette histoire illustre à merveille toute la trop grande proximité entre notre police « nationale » et le gouvernement du Québec, quel que soit le parti au pouvoir. Il y avait quelque chose de grotesque à entendre Stéphane Bergeron, hier, jurer qu'il n'avait pas « autorisé l'espionnage de journalistes ». Évidemment qu'il n'a pas autorisé ça. Il a cependant passé une commande politique au grand patron de la Sûreté du Québec. Et il a créé les conditions pour ce dérapage. Ce matin de septembre 2013, M. Bergeron, ministre de la Sécurité publique du gouvernement Marois, reçoit une lettre du président de la FTQ, Michel Arsenault. Arsenault est furieux : les médias révèlent depuis un certain temps qu'il a été la cible d'une enquête criminelle de la Sûreté du Québec de 2007 à 2009 sur l'infiltration du crime organisé dans la construction ; ils révèlent aussi que la SQ a avisé le gouvernement Charest de cette enquête « sensible » ; et un membre du gouvernement libéral a averti Arsenault qu'il faisait l'objet d'une enquête. L'enquête a avorté. (Tout ceci sera confirmé en novembre 2013 à la commission Charbonneau.) Ce jour de septembre 2013, donc, Michel Arsenault est furieux que des détails de cette enquête aient été divulgués dans les médias. Au lieu de se plaindre à la SQ, il écrit au ministre Bergeron. Hier, M. Bergeron a affirmé qu'il n'était pas vraiment intéressé par « les états d'âme » de M. Arsenault. Ce qui l'intriguait, c'était plutôt la fuite de l'enquête au gouvernement libéral.

16. La SQ a aussi espionné des journalistes

Le Soleil, Simon Boivin, 2016 11 03

Québec - Le scandale s'étend. La Sûreté du Québec (SQ) reconnaît avoir aussi espionné six journalistes et réclame une enquête sur elle-même. Le ministre de Sécurité publique de l'époque, le péquiste Stéphane Bergeron, jure n'en avoir rien su. Il ne s'agit plus uniquement d'un corps de police municipale. En 2013, la SQ a obtenu des autorisations judiciaires pour connaître l'identité de tous ceux qui ont discuté avec une demi-douzaine de journalistes. Parmi eux, les piliers de l'émission Enquête qui ont mis au jour les scandales dans l'industrie de la construction, Marie-Maude Denis et Alain Gravel, de même que la journaliste spécialisée en affaires juridiques à Radio-Canada, Isabelle Richer. Les registres des appels entrants et sortants des journalistes Éric Thibault, du Journal de Montréal, et de Denis Lessard, de La Presse, ont aussi été accessibles aux policiers. Sans verser dans l'écoute électronique, ils pouvaient néanmoins identifier leurs interlocuteurs. Les journalistes étaient surveillés pour des «allégations criminelles de divulgations illégales de contenus obtenus dans le cadre d'une écoute électronique». L'actuel directeur général de la SQ, Martin Prud'homme, a lui-même demandé à ce qu'un tiers indépendant se penche sur l'investigation déclenchée par son prédécesseur, Mario Laprise. Le ministère de la Sécurité publique mènera une enquête administrative, a assuré le ministre Martin Coiteux, mercredi, en début de soirée.

17. Les Canadiens mal protégés contre la surveillance abusive, selon Snowden

La Presse+, Marc Thibodeau, 2016 11 03

Montréal - Le lanceur d'alerte américain prenait part à une vidéoconférence organisée par l'Université McGill, hier Les Canadiens sont très mal protégés contre les pratiques de surveillance abusives, estime Edward Snowden, qui s'alarme des possibilités ouvertes aux services de renseignements d'ici et d'ailleurs par les nouvelles technologies de communication. L'ex-sous-traitant de la National Security Agency (NSA), qui participait hier à une vidéoconférence organisée par l'Université McGill, a souligné que le système de régulation des services de renseignement canadiens était probablement le plus « déficient en Occident ». Il a déploré à ce titre que le gouvernement libéral de Justin Trudeau tarde à réviser la Loi antiterroriste, dite loi C-51, qui confère des pouvoirs accrus à ces mêmes services. Nombre d'analystes, a-t-il relevé, pensent que la loi en question est trop mal formulée pour être modifiée et devrait tout bonnement être retirée. M. Snowden estime qu'il n'est tout simplement pas possible, ici ou ailleurs, de faire confiance aux autorités pour utiliser de manière responsable les technologies de surveillance existantes.

18. Montréal: des journalistes sur écoute

Le Figaro avec Reuters, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 03

Montréal - Les téléphones mobiles de six journalistes québécois ont été surveillés en 2013, a rapporté mercredi Radio-Canada, deux jours après que le journal La Presse a révélé que l'un de ses chroniqueurs vedettes avait été espionné par la police de Montréal. Selon la radio, la Sûreté du Québec (SQ), la police provinciale, a obtenu des mandats lui permettant d'obtenir le registre des appels entrants et sortants des six journalistes mais n'a pas enregistré leurs conversations. Guy Lapointe, porte-parole de la SQ, a expliqué mercredi soir à la radio 98,5 Montréal que la police avait cherché à déterminer l'origine de fuites ayant permis la divulgation dans la presse du contenu d'écoutes téléphoniques. Selon la presse canadienne ces fuites concernaient une affaire de fabrication de preuves par des policiers.

19. More Quebec journalists confirmed as targets of police surveillance

Globe and Mail, Ingrid Peritz, 2016 11 03

Montreal - A controversy over police surveillance of the press in Quebec deepened Wednesday with revelations that six journalists, including some of the province's top investigative reporters, had their cellphones surreptitiously monitored by provincial law enforcement as far back as 2013. The disclosures made by several media outlets and confirmed by the provincial Sûreté du Québec suggest that covert police surveillance of Quebec journalists dates further back and is more widespread than previously known. La Presse revealed this week that one of its journalists, columnist Patrick Lagacé, had his iPhone data tracked by Montreal police for months this year after they obtained search warrants. On Wednesday, Quebec provincial police said it had also obtained court warrants to monitor the log of incoming and outgoing cellphone calls of six journalists. The raft of disclosures has fuelled a growing sense of alarm over state surveillance of the press. On Wednesday evening, Quebec Public Security Minister Martin Coiteux told reporters his department would lead an administrative probe into the 2013 surveillance case at the Sûreté du Québec. It had been requested by its current director-general, Martin Prud'homme. The force was under the leadership of another chief, Mario Laprise, in 2013. "According to the information I have, this would be the only case in the last 20 years affecting journalists targeted by a Sûreté du Québec investigation," Mr. Coiteux said in Quebec City. Still, news that more journalists were being spied on through their cellphones left several in the media industry shaken and led the executive director of news and current affairs at Radio-Canada, Michel Cormier, to refer to the situation as an "unprecedented crisis." The five that have been identified are affiliated with Radio-Canada, La Presse and Le Journal de Montréal. "What floors me is that this is no longer the culture of the Montreal police service," Isabelle Richer said on Radio-Canada, where she is a journalist. "It's also the Sûreté du Québec. So it's a generalized hunt for sources." On Twitter, she called the news "surrealistic."

20. New probe ordered in surveillance scandal

Montreal Gazette, Philip Authier and Jason Magder, 2016 11 03

Montreal - The police spying crisis has gone from bad to worse, with Public Security Minister Martin Coiteux ordering an administrative investigation into the practises of the Sûreté du Québec dating back to 2013. Coiteux made the announcement within hours of the provincial police force revealing it had tracked the calls and movements of six journalists that year after news reports based on leaks revealed Michel Arseneault, then president of Quebec's largest labour federation, had his phone tapped. The controversy began Monday after Montreal media outlet La Presse reported that police had tracked columnist Patrick Lagacé's cellphone to find out if he was being leaked information from police officers. The new investigation - to be captained by officials in the Public Security department - is over and above internal investigations Coiteux has already ordered into the work of the province's police forces in the wake of the Lagacé scandal. Coiteux said that to his knowledge, it is the first time in 20 years such a case has emerged involving the provincial police. This specific one, however, took on a political dimension because the man at the centre of it and now in the hot seat is Stéphane Bergeron, who was the Public Security minister at the time, in 2013 in the Parti Québécois government of Pauline Marois. The surveillance of the six reporters was part of an internal probe ordered by then-SQ director Mario Laprise to find out which officers had leaked information to journalists about the investigation into Arsenault, who was being probed as part of an investigation into organized crime infiltrating the construction industry. Arsenault wrote to complain about the leaks to Bergeron, and Laprise ordered the investigation soon afterward. "What happened then was pretty unusual," Coiteux said. "A letter arrived in his (Bergeron's) office in the morning and by the evening an investigation was launched. And now we learned that under that investigation, journalists were targeted. "It's curious, to say the least. I was surprised and I was shocked and this is why we acted promptly and swiftly." Meeting reporters earlier, Bergeron, today the PQ's critic for Public Security, appeared as perplexed as everyone about the chain of events leading to the tracking of journalists under his watch.

22. Outil contre la radicalisation - Bédé chartrophobe

Le Devoir, Antoine Robitaille, 2016 11 03

Editorial - On croyait le premier ministre passionné par les essais philosophiques. Il a plutôt fait mardi l'éloge du neuvième art pour désamorcer la radicalisation. " J'aime beaucoup cet outil ", a-t-il déclaré, enthousiaste, en présentant Radicalishow, bédé conçue par le Centre de prévention de la radicalisation menant à la violence. " C'est la première fois que je lance une bande dessinée ", s'est-il amusé. Bien sûr, on n'oserait plus -- avec raison -- décrire la bédé comme un art mineur, un sous-genre de la littérature. Art Spiegelman pourrait bien, dans les prochaines années, être nobélisé. La noblesse de cet art n'est pas en cause ici. Mais ce livret de quelque 20 pages ayant reçu la sanction du premier ministre a de quoi susciter plusieurs malaises. Même quand il se veut cool et métaphorique comme Radicalishow, tout art " édifiant " (ici employé dans son sens péjoratif) est grossièrement didactique, moralisateur, infantilisant ; ses " messages " ressortent de manière involontairement comique. On ne fait pas de bonne bédé avec de bons sentiments.

Conçu à partir de témoignages de sept jeunes déradicalisés, l'ouvrage s'avère en fait un réquisitoire gratuit contre la charte des valeurs du gouvernement Marois ; et peut-être en partie, aussi, contre le projet de loi 62 sur la " neutralité religieuse " (terme visé dans la bédé) de l'actuel gouvernement. Autrement dit, les législations cherchant à affirmer la neutralité ou la laïcité de l'État sont désignées comme les seuls déclencheurs de la radicalisation!

23. PM pressed for inquiry into Afghan prisoners

Ottawa Citizen, David Pugliese, 2016 11 03

Ottawa - Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is being asked to reconsider his government's decision not to hold an inquiry into the treatment of Afghan detainees even as the International Criminal Court prepares to conduct its own investigation. In June, the government rejected an e-petition calling for a judicial inquiry into how the Canadian military treated prisoners in Afghanistan. Last month, Craig Scott, a law professor and former NDP MP who initiated the petition, asked Trudeau to reconsider the decision. Human rights activists, diplomats, and current and former parliamentarians, including former prime minister Joe Clark, have also written an open letter to the prime minister, demanding a full investigation of the military's transfer of prisoners to Afghan officials during the war. "There has been no response from the prime minister at all to any of these requests," Scott said Tuesday. "It's clear his government wants to do everything it can do to bury this issue." Canada's activities could be put in the spotlight if the ICC goes ahead with its probe into how U.S. troops, Afghan soldiers and the Taliban acted on the battlefield. Foreign Policy magazine, a U.S.-based publication, reported Tuesday the court is preparing to investigate allegations of crimes against humanity and war crimes in Afghanistan. Scott said the ICC could ask for evidence from Canadian sources and well as examining what Canadian officials knew about any abuse or torture. Trudeau's office had no comment, but the issue of the treatment of Afghan detainees has been dogging the military since 2009.

24. Saudi, Canadian meeting draws criticism

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 11 03

Ottawa - The Saudi Arabian flag flew on Parliament Hill on Wednesday as Canadian public officials met with a state-backed human-rights commission from the Mideast country, a controversial body that publicly supported the Islamic kingdom's mass executions in January, 2016. Human-rights advocates say they fear that treating the Saudi Arabian Human Rights Commission as a serious watchdog plays into the Riyadh government's efforts to bolster its reputation at a time when it is accused of violating international humanitarian law with aerial bombing in Yemen, locking up dissidents and discriminating against women and religious minorities. Canada's relationship with Saudi Arabia has come under intense scrutiny in the past 18 months over a $15-billion deal to sell weaponized armoured vehicles to the kingdom, which has an abysmal human-rights record. The country's chief envoy to Canada earlier this year called the contract a goodwill gesture to cement friendship between Riyadh and Ottawa. On Jan. 2, 2016, mass executions in Saudi Arabia - the largest in decades - killed 47, including Sheik Nimr al-Nimr, a dissident cleric critical of the House of Saud. Governments around the world, including Canada's, condemned the actions. The Saudi Human Rights Commission was quick to affirm the executions. In a statement issued by the state-controlled Saudi Press Agency, it said the verdicts "enforce justice, fulfill ... legitimate and legal requirements, and protect the society and its security and stability."

25. Sen. Andre Pratte wants stronger protection for reporters, sources

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 11 03

Ottawa - Independent senator and former journalist Andre Pratte wants the Liberal government to look seriously at beefing up protection for reporters and their sources. Pratte says if the government shows no interest, he'll pursue the idea himself. It is "quite worrisome" that Montreal police obtained warrants to monitor one of his former colleagues, La Presse columnist Patrick Lagace, Pratte said Wednesday in an interview. "I think it is time to look at this again." The newspaper said this week it had learned at least 24 surveillance warrants were issued for Lagace's iPhone this year in connection with an internal probe into allegations police anti-gang investigators fabricated evidence. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says the Supreme Court of Canada has already explicitly laid out the test that must be satisfied when police investigations intersect with media freedoms. In two key 2010 rulings, the high court did not create blanket constitutional protection for journalists, saying they are a "heterogeneous and ill-defined group of writers and speakers." Instead, the court spelled out a four-point test that allows judges to weigh competing public interests on a case-by-case basis. The Lagace case shows something more is needed, said Pratte, former lead editorial writer at La Presse. "I don't think we can simply say, 'The Supreme Court has issued those criteria, and they're good enough.' Well, obviously, they were not good enough to protect Mr. Lagace and his sources for a period of five months." Despite his apparent reluctance to revisit the existing regime, Goodale left the door open a crack.

26. Snowden: Spying by police 'radical attack on free press'

Montreal Gazette, Karen Seidman, 2016 11 03

Montreal - To some, whistleblower Edward Snowden is a traitor. To others, he's a hero. Whichever way you see him, Snowden - a former CIA employee and contractor for the National Security Agency (NSA) who is responsible for the largest national security breach in U.S. history - is a pivotal figure in any debate pertaining to the issue of government surveillance. He is one of the most wanted fugitives in the world after leaking thousands of classified NSA documents to a few journalists in 2013. His disclosures revealed, among other things, that U.S. telecommunications companies were providing the NSA with virtually all their customers' phone records and that the NSA has a tool to search nearly everything a user does on the Internet. So Snowden's talk at McGill University Wednesday night, as the city is in an uproar over police spying on La Presse reporter Patrick Lagacé and possibly much more widespread spying as well, was timely and promised to ignite an already fierce debate on authorities overstepping their bounds and cyber spying on their own citizens. Students lined up across the length of the campus to see him and McGill officials had to scramble to set up overflow rooms. When Snowden's giant image finally showed up on the screen, almost 90 minutes late, he was greeted with thunderous applause.

27. Snowden secoue le meilleur des mondes

Le Devoir (site web), Sarah R. Champagne, 2016 11 03

Moscou - Le moment n'aurait pu être mieux choisi pour entendre le plaidoyer d'Edward Snowden. La mise en garde du plus célèbre lanceur d'alerte du XXI^e siècle résonne particulièrement fort au milieu de cette semaine où l'espionnage de plusieurs journalistes ne laisse plus de doutes. Il est apparu sur écran géant en direct de Moscou, par une vidéoconférence à l'Université McGill. Le tonnerre d'applaudissements calmé, il affirme peu après : « Nous sommes tous surveillés, ce n'est pas de la science-fiction et ça arrive maintenant. » Prenant pour exemple les récents événements locaux, il s'inquiète de « cette attaque radicale de la liberté de presse, qui représente une menace au modèle traditionnel de notre démocratie ». Ces scandales constituent en fait de nouveaux épisodes des dérives des appareils de renseignement, peu importe l'échelle. Plus important encore, le rythme des avancées technologiques de la surveillance organisée « a dépassé le contrôle démocratique », insiste Snowden. Le temps où une grande équipe et des moyens extrêmement coûteux étaient nécessaires pour espionner une seule personne est loin derrière. « Cette dynamique s'est inversée complètement », dit-il, dans un contexte où une seule personne, loin de ses cibles, peut en traquer un nombre extraordinairement grand avec des précisions inimaginables. » Ce changement fondamental et dangereux pour le droit à la vie privée est sa motivation première à sonner l'alarme.

28. Why the Maryam Monsef case matters

Toronto Sun, Candice Malcolm, 2016 11 03

Column: Maryam Monsef was born in Iran, not Afghanistan as she once claimed. Most Canadians have now heard about this story, and most fall into two broad categories. Either they are sympathetic to Monsef's story, believe she is the victim of a tragic childhood in war-torn Afghanistan, and consider her birthplace controversy another iteration of the hardships of being a refugee. Or, they are skeptical of Monsef's story, concerned about the legal implications for a person whose citizenship application is likely to have contained false information, eager for the law to be applied equally and worried about how a person can reach a top position of power in the government without basic facts about their life coming out. I fall into the latter category. I don't believe Monsef is being forthright about her past. Her changing story, her time spent in Iran as an adult and her unwillingness to answer questions has led to major credibility issues in my mind. And because I'm skeptical, I've been asking a lot of questions. I've written more than a dozen articles - news reports and opinion pieces - uncovering facts and sharing my analysis about this evolving controversy. While we at the Sun have been following this story closely, some other journalists have decided to ignore it. Because these journalists appear to fall into the first category - sympathetic with Monsef and not skeptical - they seem to have decided facts are somehow irrelevant.

29. 'I'm not a terrorist,' Minnesota ISIL case defendant tells judge in a letter

Minneapolis Star Tribune, Stephen Montemayor, 2016 11 03

Minneapolis - In a letter to the federal judge who will sentence him later this month, one of nine Twin Cities men convicted of trying to support ISIL denounced the terror group he once sought to join as "cowards" and called himself a victim of the group's "intense mental warfare." "Your Honor, I am against terrorism and I'm not a terrorist," Hanad Musse wrote Judge Michael Davis in a letter signed from an Elk River jail last month. Musse was the first of the defendants to plead guilty last year to federal charges that they conspired to leave the United States and join ISIL in the Middle East. His letter to Davis was attached to a brief filed Wednesday by his attorney requesting a 6-year prison sentence in the case. Sentencing arguments from defense attorneys and prosecutors in the case are due Thursday, and Davis will sentence all nine men during hearings Nov. 14-16. Musse and five other defendants who pleaded guilty face maximum sentences of 15 years in prison. Three others convicted by a federal jury of charges including conspiracy to murder outside the United States face possible maximum life sentences.

30. Election Cyberattacks: Pro-Russia Hackers Have Been Accused in Past

NBC News, Gabe Joselow, 2016 11 03

London - While Americans are just coming to terms with the prospect of political cyberattacks tied to Russia -- it isn't the first time Kremlin-linked hackers have been accused of trying to influence voters in other countries. A torrent of stolen emails released by WikiLeaks -- most damaging to the Democrats and Hillary Clinton -- have marked the 2016 race in what U.S. intelligence officials say is an unprecedented attempt to by Vladimir Putin's government to undermine trust in the U.S. election process. Russia has been accused of this before, notably when hackers attempted to hijack an election in neighboring Ukraine in 2014. A few days before the vote, a sophisticated cyberattack shut down Ukraine's Central Election Commission's computer systems by disrupting the internal network. A pro- Russian hacktivist group called CyberBerkut claimed responsibility for the attack. CEC administrators were able to restore the system in time for the vote, but on election day the website was compromised again when a photo was posted falsely showing a far-right candidate had won the vote. Russian state television went on to broadcast an image allegedly taken from the site to report what turned out to be a false story.

31. John Brennan's attempt to lead the CIA into the age of cyberwar

Reuters, David Rhode, 2016 11 02

Washington - When America goes to the polls on Nov. 8, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials, it will likely experience the culmination of a new form of information war. A months-long campaign backed by the Russian government to undermine the credibility of the U.S. presidential election - through hacking, cyber attacks and disinformation campaigns - is likely to peak on voting day, the officials said. Russian officials deny any such effort. But current and former U.S. officials warn that hackers could post fictional evidence online of widespread voter fraud, slow the Internet to a crawl through cyber attacks and release a final tranche of hacked emails, including some that could be doctored. "Don't underestimate what they can do or will do. We have to be prepared," said Leon Panetta, who served as CIA director and defense secretary in President Barack Obama's first term. "In some ways, they are succeeding at disrupting our process. Until they pay a price, they will keep doing it." John Brennan, the current CIA director, declined to comment on the Russian efforts. But he said Russian intelligence operatives have a long history of marrying traditional espionage with advances in technology. More broadly, Brennan said, the digital age creates enormous opportunities for espionage. But it also creates vulnerabilities.

32. Microsoft to block Windows flaw used by Russian hackers

USA Today, Brett Molina, 2016 11 03

Washington - Microsoft says it will release a patch next week to address vulnerabilities in its Windows operating system exploited by a group reportedly tied to the Russian government and linked to the theft of emails from the Democratic National Committee. The group, called Strontium by Microsoft but Fancy Bear or APT 28 by other security researchers, has been tied to Russian state-sponsored hacking. U.S. intelligence agencies have said Russian groups were behind attempts to interfere with this year's U.S. presidential election. Strontium has targeted "government agencies, diplomatic institutions, and military organizations, as well as affiliated private sector organizations such as defense contractors and public policy research institutes," Microsoft's executive vice president of Windows and devices group Terry Myerson said in a blog post Wednesday. Myerson did not directly link Strontium to Russia, only that it has been used "to target a specific set of customers." But according to CrowdStrike, an Irvine, Calif.-based computer security firm that published a detailed analysis of the attack on the DNC intrusion in June, Strontium is simply another name for the group CrowdStrike called Fancy Bear, a Russian intelligence-affiliated adversary.

33. Obama Faults F.B.I. on Emails, Citing 'Incomplete Information'

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 03

Chapel Hill - President Obama threw the power of the White House behind Hillary Clinton on Wednesday. He faulted how the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, handled new emails related to the investigation into Mrs. Clinton's private server, and then shouted out to college students here in a pivotal battleground state that it was crucial that they vote because the "fate of the world is teetering." Mr. Obama's comments about Mr. Comey, broadcast early in the day as recent polls showed a tightening race, were striking for a president who has insisted he does not comment on F.B.I. investigations. But Mr. Obama appeared to be doing exactly that in implicitly criticizing Mr. Comey's decision to send a vague letter last week to Congress -- and by extension, the public -- informing lawmakers about a discovery of new emails related to Mrs. Clinton's use of a private server as secretary of state. "We don't operate on incomplete information," Mr. Obama said in an interview with NowThis News. "We don't operate on leaks. We operate based on concrete decisions that are made." Without mentioning Mr. Comey by name -- although it was clear whom he meant -- Mr. Obama suggested that the F.B.I. had violated investigative guidelines and trafficked in innuendo by alerting Congress last week. Mr. Obama's remarks, which followed searing criticism of the F.B.I. director from both parties, make it harder for Mr. Comey to defuse the worst crisis of his tenure at the bureau.

34. Senior FBI officials were told of new emails in early October but wanted more information before renewing Clinton probe

Washington Post, Sari Horwitz, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 11 03

Washington - Senior FBI officials were informed about the discovery of new emails potentially relevant to the investigation of Hillary Clinton's private email server at least two weeks before Director James B. Comey notified Congress, according to federal officials familiar with the investigation. The officials said that Comey was told that there were new emails before he received a formal briefing last Thursday, although the precise timing is unclear. The information goes beyond the details provided in the letter that Comey sent to lawmakers last week declaring that he was restarting the inquiry into whether Clinton mishandled classified material during her tenure as secretary of state. He wrote in the Friday letter that "the investigative team briefed me yesterday" about the additional emails. The people familiar with the investigation said that senior officials had been informed weeks earlier that a computer belonging to former congressman Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.) contained emails potentially pertinent to the Clinton investigation. Clinton's top aide, Huma Abedin, shared the computer with her husband, from whom she is now separated. Comey did not notify Congress as soon as he learned about the emails because officials wanted additional information before proceeding, the officials said. An FBI spokesman declined to comment.

35. The politics of espionage in the Obama-Brennan era

Reuters, David Rhode, 2016 11 03

Washington - Supporters hail CIA director John Brennan as a devoted public servant with a strong moral core and a tenacious work ethic. He has increased the recruitment of minority intelligence officers and promoted women to senior posts. He wears a lanyard around his neck every day that celebrates LGBT diversity at the CIA. But some former covert operatives say Brennan is too cautious and political. Liberals accuse Brennan of protecting the CIA instead of forcing it to become more accountable to Congress. In particular, they blame Brennan for convincing President Barack Obama to oppose the release of the full 6,000-page U.S. Senate report detailing torture by the CIA during the presidency of George W. Bush. In private hearings, they said, Brennan bristled at questions from senators regarding the report. After CIA officials searched the computer of a Senate staffer investigating torture, an outraged Sen. Dianne Feinstein accused Brennan's CIA of provoking a "constitutional crisis" by thwarting Congress' ability to perform its mandated right to oversee the executive-branch agency. Two other Democratic Senators called for Brennan's resignation. Obama and White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough aggressively defended Brennan, who eventually apologized to Feinstein. "The exhaustive 6,000-page Senate Intelligence Committee report fully documented the program," Feinstein told Reuters, "but the CIA under John's leadership has had difficulty confronting this dark chapter and learning from its mistakes." Leon Panetta, who served as President Obama's first CIA director, said he understood Brennan's desire to protect CIA officers who carried out interrogation methods deemed legal at the time by the Bush administration. But he said it was important to also be open with Congress and the public.

36. Though Useful in War, Drones May Be Too Costly for Duty Along U.S. Borders (Canada)

New York Times, Ron Nixon, 2016 11 03

Grand Forks, North Dakota - Cameras on drones stare down at the Canadian border from as high as 28,000 feet, scanning vast stretches of mountains, rivers and forests for potential terrorists and drug smugglers. The drones are intended to compensate for the Department of Homeland Security's lack of personnel and other surveillance equipment to adequately patrol the longest international border in the world. Equipped with high-tech cameras and radar, and capable of staying in the air much longer than planes flown by humans, the drones fill a critical gap in border security, officials with Homeland Security say. While the bulk of the department's drones are flown on the more troubled American border with Mexico, the ones here are used to surveil remote parts of the 5,500-mile border with Canada that are too risky for ground access or normal aircraft. The use of drones has been criticized by government auditors as costing too much -- about $60 million a year -- and producing too little, less than 2 percent of all apprehensions and drug arrests by the Border Patrol. In addition, privacy activists say that the government may be taking video of people who are not engaged in criminal activity. Data from Homeland Security shows drones assisted in 2,100 apprehensions last year, an increase from 1,400 in 2012, but a small fraction of the roughly 300,000 apprehensions of people trying to enter the United States illegally.

37. Turmoil in the FBI

CNN.com, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 03

Washington - Among the casualties of the 2016 presidential campaign is the mystique of the FBI. Behind the scenes over the past 15 months, infighting among some agents and officials has exposed some parts of the storied bureau to be buffeted by some of the same bitter divisions as the rest of American society. This account is based on interviews with more than a dozen officials close to the matter who spoke anonymously because they've been ordered not to speak to the news media. Tensions have built in particular over the handling of matters related to Hillary Clinton. Some of the sharpest divides have emerged between some agents in the FBI's New York field office, the bureau's largest and highest-profile, and officials at FBI headquarters in Washington and at the Justice Department. Some rank-and-file agents interpreted cautious steps taken by the Justice Department and FBI headquarters as being done for political reasons or to protect a powerful political figure. At headquarters, some have viewed the actions and complaints of some agents in the field as driven by the common desire of investigators to get a big case or, perhaps worst, because of partisan views.

38. Why Light Bulbs May Be the Next Hacker Target (Canada)

New York Times, John Markoff, 2016 11 03

San Francisco - The so-called Internet of Things, its proponents argue, offers many benefits: energy efficiency, technology so convenient it can anticipate what you want, even reduced congestion on the roads. Now here's the bad news: Putting a bunch of wirelessly connected devices in one area could prove irresistible to hackers. And it could allow them to spread malicious code through the air, like a flu virus on an airplane. Researchers report in a paper to be made public on Thursday that they have uncovered a flaw in a wireless technology that is often included in smart home devices like lights, switches, locks, thermostats and many of the components of the much-ballyhooed "smart home" of the future. The researchers focused on the Philips Hue smart light bulb and found that the wireless flaw could allow hackers to take control of the light bulbs, according to researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science near Tel Aviv and Dalhousie University in Halifax, Canada. That may not sound like a big deal. But imagine thousands or even hundreds of thousands of internet-connected devices in close proximity. Malware created by hackers could be spread like a pathogen among the devices by compromising just one of them.

39. Assange: WikiLeaks did not receive Clinton emails from Russian govt

RT (Russia), Staff report, 2016 11 03

London - In an exclusive interview with John Pilger to be broadcast by RT on Saturday, whistleblower Julian Assange categorically denied that the troves of US Democratic Party and Clinton work and staff emails released this year have come from the Russian government. "The Clinton camp has been able to project a neo-McCarthyist hysteria that Russia is responsible for everything. Hillary Clinton has stated multiple times, falsely, that 17 US intelligence agencies had assessed that Russia was the source of our publications. That's false - we can say that the Russian government is not the source," Assange told the veteran Australian broadcaster as part of a 25-minute John Pilger Special. Assange, who gave the interview in the Ecuadorian Embassy in London, where he has been for four years, also accused the US presidential candidate of being a pawn of behind-the-scenes interests, and voiced doubts about her physical fitness to take charge of the White House. "Hillary Clinton is just one person. I actually feel quite sorry for Hillary Clinton as a person, because I see someone who is eaten alive by their ambitions, tormented literally to the point where they become sick - for example faint - as a result of going on, and going with their ambitions. But she represents a whole network of people, and a whole network of relationships with particular states."

40. Setback for Theresa May as high court says MPs must approve Brexit

The Guardian (London), Owen Bowcott, 2016 11 03

London - Parliament alone has the power to trigger Brexit by notifying Brussels of the UK's intention to leave the European Union, the high court has ruled. The judgment, delivered by the lord chief justice, Lord Thomas of Cwmgiedd, is likely to slow the pace of Britain's departure from the EU and is a huge setback for Theresa May, who had insisted the government alone would decide when to trigger the process. The lord chief justice said that "the most fundamental rule of the UK constitution is that parliament is sovereign". A government spokesman said that ministers would appeal to the supreme court against the decision. The hearing will take place early next month.

41. Alleged IS man 'kept under radar': court

Australian Associated Press, Rebekah Ison, 2016 11 03

Sydney - A Sydney man accused of trying to send thousands of dollars to support Islamic State was sophisticated in using others to do things for him to "keep beneath the radar", a court has heard. Ali Al- Talebi, 27, was in contact with an Australian fighter in Syria and had religious chants downloaded from the jihadist militant group, the prosecution says. He allegedly helped recruit a younger Muslim man to send $6000 to Pakistan. The money was allegedly to be used for sending fighters to Syria, in 2014. The crown also says he tried to have more than $9000 in US bank notes sent to a man in Turkey, who had been nominated by Australian IS member Mohammad Ali Baryalei. It says the money was handed over in the presence of a group of men at the Parramatta mosque carpark before being taken by the young man to western Sydney money exchanges. The transfer attempts were made over three consecutive days in August, it alleges. Al- Talebi has been charged with two counts of attempting to give resources to a terrorist organisation and one count of knowingly making funds available to a terrorist organisation after raids in 2014.

Sydney Morning Herald, Rachel Olding, 2016 11 03

Sydney - Think outside the square. That's the message Caroline O'Hare is bringing to every police officer in NSW in the fight against terrorism. The police officer of 35 years, who has spent half her career in counter-terrorism, has spearheaded a new, mandatory training program equipping front-line officers to look for signs of radicalisation while attending routine jobs. It may be spotting something unusual when arresting a drug dealer. It may be asking extra questions at a domestic violence call. By July, all 16,000 police officers will have received the I-Rad training as the threat of terrorism continues to grow. "We're teaching them to really be aware of what is going on, to look for the extraordinary in the ordinary, because they're ... in the community every day," said Detective Chief Inspector O'Hare. Ms O'Hare, a Counter Terrorism and Special Tactics Command leader, is one of 23 police officers, unsworn employees and police volunteers nominated for the Police Officer of the Year awards, to be held in Sydney on Friday night.

43. Arrested Sydney man had links to members of foreign fighter network, counter-terrorism police say

ABC (Australia), Jessica Kidd, 2016 11 03

Canberra - Counter-terrorism police allege one of two people arrested in Sydney raids this morning had links to a member of foreign fighter network. A Sydney man accused of travelling to Syria to fight alongside Al-Qaeda affiliate Jabhat al-Nusra has alleged links to two other men who are also under the watch of counter terrorism police. State and federal police from the Joint Counter Terrorism Team have arrested Mehmet Biber, 24, and a 17-year old boy on suspicion of breaching foreign fighter laws. Biber was arrested at Birrong this morning over allegations he travelled to Syria to fight alongside Jabhat al-Nusra in July 2013. Counter terrorism police will allege he travelled to the conflict zone with the help of Islamic State supporter Hamdi Al Qudsi. Al Qudsi was sentenced to a minimum of six years in prison for his role helping seven young Australian men travel to fight with extremist jihadi groups in Syria, including the forerunners of Islamic State. The national manager of counter-terrorism for the Australian Federal Police, Neil Gaughan, said the 17-year old boy arrested this morning attempted to travel to the region to fight for IS in January 2015.

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 11 03

Sydney - Australian police on Thursday arrested a man believed to have fought with Syrian militants and a youth who was stopped at the border allegedly planning to join Islamic State in Syria. The pair were detained in early morning raids in Sydney, underscoring Australia's tough stance on dealing with so called "foreign fighters" heading overseas to join in conflicts in countries including Syria and Iraq. Australia has imposed some of the harshest penalties in the world on foreign fighters returning home as the country leads a push for the United Nations to adopt international standards to curb the threat they pose. "It is very unfortunate that even though ISIS is losing significant ground over there that we still have people, particularly young people, that are attracted to the ideology and are still attempting to leave the country," Neil Gaughan, national manager of counter-terrorism for the Australian Federal Police, told reporters. The 24-year-old man and the 17-year-old youth were both charged with breaching Australia's foreign incursion laws, which prohibit travel to foreign countries with the intention of engaging in hostile activity. Those found guilty face up to 25 years imprisonment.

45. Cabinet warned of cyber threats

The Australian Financial Review, Fleur Anderson, 2016 11 03

Canberra - Cabinet ministers have been told to improve the cyber security of their departments after it was found inadequate safeguards risked government agencies becoming the "honey pots" of secret information in cyber espionage. Dan Tehan, the minister assisting Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull on cyber security, will tell his senior colleagues they need to appoint top bureaucrats to be responsible for cyber security after a study by the Australian National University's National Security College found smaller government agencies and medium-sized business were the weakest link, or "honey pots", in Australia's cybersecurity defences because they are not vigilant enough about "low-level" threats like malware and denial of service attacks. This is despite a $230 million cyber security strategy introduced by Mr Turnbull in April. "This report clearly shows that, when it comes to government agencies, we've still got more work to do," Mr Tehan told The Australian Financial Review. "As a result of it I will be writing to all cabinet ministers, stressing to them the importance of cybersecurity, ensure that their departments and agencies are regularly updated on cyber issues and also ensuring that someone at the senior executive level has direct responsibility for cyber security."

46. New Zealand, Australia cooperate on Asia-Pacific cyber security

Xinhua News Agency, John Macdonald, 2016 11 03

Wellington - New Zealand and Australia have begun working together on initiatives to strengthen trans-Tasman cyber security, New Zealand Communications Minister Amy Adams said Thursday. Adams said she had recently held talks in Sydney with Australian Minister Assisting the Prime Minister for Cyber Security Dan Tehan, and they had agreed to work together on a range of initiatives that would benefit both countries. Areas of interest included boosting cyber skills, building the cyber capability of small and medium-sized businesses, and cooperating on joint awareness-raising campaigns. The initiatives would bolster the government's approach to cyber security issues, and further align Australia and New Zealand's public-private awareness initiatives and workforce readiness to reduce the cyber threat in the Asia-Pacific region. "Australia and New Zealand enjoy a productive relationship on cyber issues.

Working together means we can better respond to challenges and be prepared to deal with serious cyber security threats that could affect both our nations," Adams said in a statement. "Many New Zealand businesses operate in Australia and vice versa, and our citizens travel regularly between the two countries. We're committed to cooperating at a practical level to help our communities be safe online and ensure they're making the most of the digital economy," she said.

54. Jihadisme : l'Afrique en passe de perdre la bataille contre la radicalisation des jeunes ? (Canada)

Jeune Afrique, Barthélémy Gaillard, 2016 11 02

Québec, Canada - Pour Bakary Sambe, directeur de l'Observatoire des radicalismes et des conflits religieux en Afrique, une chose est sûre : « On n'a jamais vaincu une idéologie avec un code pénal ou une kalachnikov. » Jeune Afrique s'est entretenue avec lui en marge d'une conférence sur la lutte contre la radicalisation des jeunes sur internet, qui se tenait à Québec (Canada) en début de semaine. Jeune Afrique : En 2016, l'Afrique de l'Ouest, qu'on croyait relativement à l'abri de la menace jihadiste, a payé un lourd tribut... Bakary Sambe : [Il coupe] On fait comme si la région venait de découvrir ce que tout le monde appelle la « radicalisation », alors que ce phénomène est le fruit d'un processus remontant aux années 70 ! C'est à ce moment que cette bataille a commencé, pas maintenant comme on l'entend souvent. Et nous sommes en passe de la perdre pour l'instant. Pourquoi datez-vous les débuts de la radicalisation en Afrique aux années 70 ? À l'époque, la sécheresse a durement frappé les États de la bande sahélienne qui ont alors reçu le soutien financier des pétromonarchies. Ces dernières ont donné pour la construction de mosquées, pour les activités de nombreuses ONG religieuses. Puis dans les années 80/90, après la sécheresse, ce sont les politiques d'ajustement structurel menées par la Banque Mondiale et le FMI qui ont contribué à déstructurer les politiques sociales, de santé et d'éducation. Nos Etats se sont retrouvés à genoux. Quelles en ont été les conséquences ? C'est là véritablement que sont apparues les ONG religieuses, qui ont finalement remplacé les États auprès de certaines couches de population, et ce toutes confessions confondues. On a tendance à parler des associations islamistes en premier lieu, mais il ne faut pas oublier les structures pentecôtistes par exemple. Toujours est-il qu'au message des États s'est substitué un message religieux, qui plus est en contradiction avec celui délivré par l'Islam local. On a alors commencé à assister à un choc des systèmes religieux : l'Islam d'obéissance soufie enraciné en Afrique s'est retrouvé confronté au wahabbisme salafiste. Les États africains n'ont pas intégré la dimension sécuritaire du phénomène.

57. Big Indian espionage network in Pakistan exposed

The International News, Farooq Aqdas & Mariana Baabar, 2016 11 03

Islamabad - A big Indian espionage network in Pakistan has been exposed as five more Indian diplomats have been found involved in terrorism. The network of spies was discovered in the light of investigation of arrested RAW agent Kulbhushan Yadav. Islamabad is expected to announce at any time that two Indian 'diplomats' are persona non grata and expel them for carrying out subversive activities inside Pakistan. While there is still no official comment on these latest expulsions, The News has learnt that the Foreign Office is seized with the matter and is constantly in touch with its High Commissioner Abdul Basit based in New Delhi. Wednesday saw reports being leaked to the media that Rajesh Kumar Agnihotri has been identified as the RAW station chief, while Balbir Singh has been identified as an officer of the Indian Intelligence Bureau (IB). In an unusual step, photographs of the two Indians were flashed by television channels.

59. China carfentanil trade thrives as seizures top 400 in US (Canada)

Associated Press, Raphael Satter and Erika Kinetz, 2016 11 03

Shanghai - Seizures of the deadly chemical carfentanil have exploded across the United States, with more than 400 cases documented in eight states since July, The Associated Press has found. Fueled by a thriving trade out of China, the weapons-grade chemical is suspected in hundreds of drug overdoses in North America. An AP investigation last month showed how easily carfentanil can be purchased online from China. Of the 12 companies that initially offered to export carfentanil, just three have stopped. Nine continue to offer carfentanil for sale, no questions asked, and the AP identified four additional companies willing to sell the drug. Asked for comment, most denied making the offers. Jilin Tely Import and Export Co. initially claimed in an email that carfentanil was one of its "hot sales product." After being named in AP's story, the company's website vanished and it denied ever producing carfentanil. Carfentanil is a controlled substance in the U.S., where it can be used legally to immobilize large animals like elephants. But it is not controlled in China, the top source of fentanyl-related compounds that end up in the U.S., Canada and Mexico, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. "It's a loophole that needs to be closed because even small quantities can have a terrible lethal effect," said Andrew Weber, a former U.S. assistant secretary of defense for nuclear, chemical and biological defense programs. "Terrorists could acquire it commercially as we have seen drug dealers doing." Some 5,000 times stronger than heroin, carfentanil is so toxic that an amount smaller than a poppy seed can kill a person. It was researched for years as a chemical weapon and used by Russian forces to incapacitate Chechen separatists in 2002.

60. Espionage racket: Pakistan pulls out six embassy officials from India

Times of India, Indrani Bagchi, 2016 11 03

New Delhi - Pakistan on Wednesday pulled out six employees posted at its high commission in New Delhi, days after India declared one Pakistani official persona non-grata for espionage activities. The six high commission officials returned to Pakistan via the Wagah border. These six officials were reportedly named by expelled Pakistani high commission staffer+ Mehmood Akhtar during his interrogation. Pakistani high commission staffer Mehmood Akhtar was last week expelled from India after being declared 'persona non- grata'. Mehmood Akhtar is believed to have revealed that he was part of a bigger espionage ring operating from the mission. Sources said that ISI officer Mehmood Akhtar had admitted as much during questioning after he was detained by the Delhi Police crime branch. They claimed that apart from the four high commission officials he specifically mentioned, Mehmood said that there were at least 10 others tasked with sourcing information from Indians.

61. Pakistan may expel two Indian diplomats in Islamabad for spying

The Express Tribune, Kamran Yousaf, 2016 11 03

Islamabad - Two Indian diplomats in Islamabad have been caught spying for India's premier spy agency, Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), and may be expelled, sources told The Express Tribune on Wednesday. According to sources, Rajesh Kumar Agnihotri has been identified as RAW station chief, while Balbir Singh has been identified as an officer of the Indian Intelligence Bureau (IB). Both officers were working at the Indian High Commission office in Islamabad. A source said both Agnihotri and Balbir were involved in terrorist activities in the country. "Recently expelled Indian diplomat Surjeet Singh was also a part of Balbir's network," the source added. "Balbir Singh was helping the Indian IB operatives to carry out subversive activities in Pakistan," the source further said. In New Delhi, Vikas Swarup, the spokesman for India's Ministry of External Affairs, told Reuters the ministry was "aware" of the media reports.

62. S. Korean Army conducts combined arms drill to counter N.K. threats

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 03

Seoul - The South Korean Army said Thursday it is conducting a combined arms drill by mobilizing state-of-the-art K-2 Black Panther tanks in a bid to beef up its combat readiness against North Korea's threats. An infantry division is carrying out the exercise, which kicked off Monday and will run until Friday at the Seungjin training ground, located in Pocheon, north of Seoul, with about 70 tracked vehicles, including 20 K-2 tanks, and aircraft, it said. It marked the first time that the military conducted a battalion-level air-land drill since the K-2 tanks were deployed with front-line troops, it said. K-2, the South Korean military's latest main battle tank (MBT), has been produced since 2013 with more than 200 having been deployed so far. During the drill, K-2 battle tanks, K-21 mechanized infantry fighting vehicles and aircraft broke through mock anti-tank defense lines held by imaginary North Korean troops, the military said.

64. Hackers leak Putin plan to carve up Ukraine

London Times, Maxim Tucker, 2016 11 03

Kyiv - Leaked Kremlin emails reveal how Russian operatives botched an attempt last year to foment an uprising in Kharkiv, the second largest city in Ukraine. The emails, obtained by The Times, were apparently hacked from the inbox of Maria Vinogradova, an adviser to Vladislav Surkov, President Putin's point man on Ukraine. The civilian intelligence analysis group Inform Napalm said that it had traced the adviser to an office in central Moscow used by the FSB spy agency. Three of the Ukrainian hackers involved in the leak met The Times on condition of anonymity, carrying concealed weapons but rejecting suggestions that the hack had been carried out with the help of Ukrainian or US intelligence services. Last month NBC News reported that the CIA had vowed to retaliate against Russia for a series of intrusions targeting American political institutions. The inbox that they shared contains 423 emails between government officials and separatist leaders between 2014 and 2016. Highlights include a proposal from a rebel leader to split Ukraine into three parts under a federalised system, plans to replace unruly separatist officials who were then killed or arrested, and draft Ukrainian laws to be submitted by a pro-Russian party. The presidential office was also sent emails asking for approval of a screenplay and a poem about the war in eastern Ukraine. The email trove includes two maps sent in January this year by Denis Pushilin, a rebel leader who reports regularly to Mr Surkov, and suggests that Ukraine could be carved into three parts: an eastern third known as "New Russia", a central region, including Kiev, to be known as "Lesser Russia" and a smaller western area to take the historic name "Galicia".

65. Inside The Ukrainian 'Hactivist' Network Cyberbattling The Kremlin

Radio Free Europe, Christopher Miller, 2016 11 03

Kyiv - Dressed in a black sweater and equally nondescript turtleneck, with wisps of raven hair corkscrewing from under a black baseball cap, the lanky Ukrainian introduces himself in accented English as "Sean." Sean Townsend is his chosen pseudonym on Facebook, complemented by images of the notorious Guy Fawkes mask of hacker group Anonymous and the Ukrainian coat of arms. Before Sean, he was "Ross Hatefield," until the world's leading social network banned that account for impersonation. In hacker circles, he is better known as RUH8 -- pronounced "roo-hate" to express his aversion to all things Russian. He provided details of the cyberwar that has been raging -- parallel to the shooting war between Ukraine and Russia-backed separatists in eastern Ukraine over the past 30 months -- between the respective sides' patriotic hackers using digital subterfuge. RUH8 is part of a Ukrainian "hactivist" collective that includes four hacker groups: CyberHunta, Falcons Flame, Trinity, and RUH8. When working together, they call themselves the Ukrainian Cyber Alliance. Their declared enemy is the Kremlin, and their avowed mission is to expose its meddling in Ukraine and ultimately to destroy Russian President Vladimir Putin's regime. They regard a hacker group called CyberBerkut -- which international cybersecurity experts have blamed for digital attacks on Ukrainian ministries and its presidential election in 2014 -- as their Russian counterpart. They also believe CyberBerkut is an alias for Fancy Bear, a hacker group with suspected ties to the Russian state that is thought to have worked with another Russian group, Cozy Bear, to disrupt the upcoming U.S. presidential election.

67. Moscow office of Amnesty International closed by Russian authorities

The Independent (UK), Ben Kentish, 2016 11 03

London - The Moscow office of Amnesty International has been sealed off by Russian authorities. An Amnesty spokesperson told The Independent staff had arrived at work to find the office doors sealed, the locks removed, the electricity cut off and the alarm system de-activated. Attached to the door was a notice apparently from Moscow city authorities, from whom Amnesty rent the building, saying no one could enter the office without being accompanied by a Russian official. The premises was "property of a city of the Russian Federation", the note said. The Moscow city government said the group was behind on the rent, but Amnesty said it had documents to prove it was up to date with payments. In a statement, the Moscow city property department said it had sent written warnings to Amnesty that it was in arrears. "This complaint was ignored by the unscrupulous tenant," the statement said. The department said it voided Amnesty's lease on the grounds that the tenant was violating the terms of the rental agreement. "In this connection, the premises were closed and sealed off," the statement said. John Dalhuisen, Amnesty International's Europe Director, said in a statement: "This bizarre claim is simply not true. Amnesty International received no advance notice about this and we have documents proving our rent for the property has been paid up to and including October." Amnesty says it had no warning of the closure and is still unsure why the office was sealed. Its staff in Moscow are understood to be working to try to resolve the issue as quickly as possible. It is understood there have been no arrests and the charity does not at this stage believe the office has been searched by authorities.

68. Ayatollah Khamenei Dismisses Talks with "Liar, Disloyal, Cheater" US

Fars News Agency, 2016 11 03

Tehran - Supreme Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyed Ali Khamenei rejected certain remarks that negotiations and compromise with Washington would resolve problems, and said the "liar, disloyal and cheater" US is itself a crisis-hit country. "Negotiations with the US will not resolve our problems, because firstly, they are liar, disloyal and cheater and stab in the back, and secondly, the US, itself, is crisis-stricken and how can a crisis-hit country resolve another country's problems," Ayatollah Khamenei said in Tehran on Wednesday, addressing a large gathering of Iranian school students and teachers on the occasion of Students Day in Iran. Stressing that international assessment centers and even the Americans, themselves, have admitted the political, economic, international and moral crises in the US, he said that Washington whose debts have approached its GDP cannot settle the problems in Iran and it is merely after looting Iran's wealth and resources to rescue itself from the crisis.

69. ISIL leader Baghdadi confident of Mosul battle victory

Al Jazeera, 2016 11 03

Baghdad - ISIL leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi has expressed confidence in victory, in his first message after US-backed Iraqi forces started an offensive to take back Mosul, the last major city under control of his group in Iraq. He also called on Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) fighters to invade Turkey. "This raging battle and total war, and the great jihad that the state of Islam is fighting today only increases our firm belief, God willing, and our conviction that all this is a prelude to victory," he said in an audio recording released online by supporters on Thursday. Al Jazeera could not verify the authenticity of the 31-minute-long recording. Sherifa Zuhur, a visiting scholar at the University of California, Berkeley, told Al Jazeera that with this recording Baghdadi is sending a message to supporters of ISIL, also known as ISIS, to fight to the death. Zuhur said the latest recording was made within the last 10 days.

Mossoul - La Division d'or, unité d'élite antiterroriste, a pris sans trop de difficultés le quartier de Gogjali. Mais les djihadistes de l'EI se sont repliés vers le centre de la deuxième ville irakienne. A l'extérieur, les éléments se déchaînent. Un vent de sable ocre balaie Gogjali, le premier quartier à l'entrée est de Mossoul, tout juste libéré des combattants de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI), en milieu d'après-midi, mardi 1er novembre. Il gomme les contours des habitations, déjà écrasées sous une chape de poussière d'un gris laiteux. L'air est saturé de particules. Des pneus finissent de brûler dans les rues. Des champignons de fumée s'élèvent sous les tirs d'artillerie et les frappes de la coalition internationale. La poussière vole au passage des Humvee blindés noirs. La Division d'or, les forces antiterroristes irakiennes (ICTF), s'offre un dernier engagement avant la tombée de la nuit. Elle vient -titiller les combattants djihadistes sur la route principale qui relie Erbil au centre-ville de Mossoul, face au cimetière Al-Karama. Un véhicule piégé l'accueille dans un fracas de débris, qui endommage un tank et un bulldozer. La réplique est immédiate. Les -mitrailleurs et artilleurs d'élite se déchaînent contre les djihadistes, qui les harcèlent depuis l'ouest. Une offensive de neuf heures. Assis à même le sol dans une petite maison située près de l'immeuble de la radio-télévision locale - Al-Mawsil -, le major Salam - Jassim Hussein, de la première division des ICTF, orchestre la manoeuvre. 71. Tehran ex-prosecutor given 135 lashes for corruption (Canada).

Agence France Presse, 2016 11 03

Tehran - Tehran's notorious former chief prosecutor Saeed Mortazavi, whose role in curbing dissent has been condemned by human rights groups for years, has been sentenced to 135 lashes on charges related to a corruption trial, Iranian media reported Wednesday. Mortazavi was convicted of "seizing and wasting public funds" while head of the Social Security Organization, an Iranian NGO that provides insurance for the elderly, unemployed and others, in 2012 and 2013, according to state TV's website. The sentence marked a dramatic reversal of fortune for a man who once personified the heavy hand of the Islamic Republic's hard-line judiciary. In 2010, Human Rights Watch described Mortazavi as a "serial human rights abuser." Zahra Kazemi, an Iranian-Canadian photo journalist, died in Tehran's notorious Evin prison in 2003 in the midst of this crackdown on critical media. The Canadian government said Kazemi was tortured to death and accused Mortazavi of direct involvement.

The accused and two of his brothers were involved in the Qatif riots and took part in several terrorist acts during which one brother was killed in an exchange of fire with the Saudi police. 74. Israel Vulnerable to Cyberattacks on Civilian Sector, Top-secret Report Says

Haaretz, Barak Ravid, 2016 11 03

Jerusalem - Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has made the establishment of a national system for protecting Israel from cyberattacks a priority and a point of pride, but the state's main oversight agency warns that critical infrastructure is unprepared to withstand the substantial threat they face from hackers. On Tuesday, State Comptroller Joseph Shapira issued a report warning that Israel is not geared up to defend against cyberattacks on civilian computer networks. The 63-page report is top-secret and has not been made public, but Shapira's office released an unclassified six-page executive summary of the document. A reading of the summary suggests that many of the details of the report were classified in order to avoid disclosing the extent of Israel's vulnerability to cyberattack. Shapira focuses his criticism on the slow pace with which the National Cyber Bureau and the new National Cyber Security Authority on one hand, and the Shin Bet security service on the other, are dividing their responsibilities.

75. Palestinians trying to 'politicize' Interpol

Times of Israel, Raoul Wootliff, 2016 11 03

Jerusalem - Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan criticized an attempt by the Palestinian Authority to join the international police force Interpol, saying the move would politicize the body and damage its integrity. Speaking with Russian police officers during an official visit to Moscow, Erdan, whose ministry is responsible for the police service, said that the move was part of Palestinian efforts to impose unilateral decisions on Israel via international bodies. "Interpol is an important professional organization tasked with helping its members fight crime and ensure public safety," Erdan said. "It cannot be turned into a political body driven by extraneous considerations, as the Palestinians are trying to do." The Palestinians want their request to join Interpol to come to a vote during the organization's annual general assembly next week, but Jerusalem is working to prevent the vote, fearing that they would leak sensitive information to Palestinian terror groups, Israeli officials said.

76. Sparks fly over purpose of cell evidence at STL

Lebanon Daily Star, Victoria Yan, 2016 11 03

Beirut - Sparks flew over cellular network evidence at the Special Tribunal for Lebanon Tuesday as proceedings resumed following a weeklong suspension. Throughout the day's curtailed hearing, prosecution counselor Fabia Wong organized and presented cellular evidence collected by the prosecution and witnesses from prior hearings. "What the prosecution alleges was that the 'green network' [of cellular phones] was a coordination network to exchange information of all the conspiracy and coordinates acts done to further the conspiracy," Wong said. Cellular data has been critical to the prosecution's case. Several groups of cellular networks - codified by color - have been used to expose various elements of the alleged conspiracy that led to the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Nineteen people were killed and another 200 wounded in the attack. The center of activity of these networks pointed to Haret Hreik, a southern suburb of Beirut known to be a Hezbollah stronghold.

Paris - Les ministres de l'intérieur et de la justice ont défendu, mercredi, la création d'un fichier rassemblant les détenteurs d'un titre d'identité. Au prix d'arrangements avec la réalité. Le ministre de l'intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, et le ministre de la justice, Jean-Jacques Urvoas, sont tous les deux montés au créneau, mercredi 2 novembre, pour défendre la création par décret, dimanche 30 octobre, d'un fichier unique rassemblant les données personnelles et biométriques de tous les détenteurs d'une carte d'identité ou d'un passeport. La création de cette base de données - «Titres électroniques sécurisés» (TES) - qui pourrait, à terme, réunir toute la population française, inquiète. Elle interroge aussi puisqu'elle était prévue dans une loi proposée par la droite et adoptée en 2012. Un texte censuré en partie par le Conseil constitutionnel à la suite de saisines par les groupes socialistes à l'Assemblée nationale - dont M. Urvoas - et au Sénat. Pour défendre le choix du gouvernement, les arguments de MM. Cazeneuve et Urvoas naviguent donc en eau trouble, entre amnésie et mauvaise foi.

80. Former spy chiefs call for EU-US intelligence hub (Canada)

EU Observer, Andrew Rettman, 2016 11 03

Bratislava - Europe and the US need an "intelligence hub" to fight terrorism, with French and German ideas on EU military integration unlikely to bear fruit, Germany's former spy chief has said. The counter-terrorism hub, to be based in The Hague, would start out like the Schengen zone, the EU's passport-free travel area. It would involve a core group of trusted states such as Canada, France, Germany, Switzerland, the UK, and the US. Their intelligence services would form "operational task forces" and, as with Schengen's IT security system, would have access to each other's data. They would also create a "centre of excellence" to reform other EU states' services, which could join down the line. "I was one of the fathers of the Schengen agreement in the 1990s. That was established outside EU structures and only later integrated in the EU system and I think we can do the same", Augustus Henning, the former head of Germany's BND intelligence services, told EUobserver in an interview.

81. Les confidences qui scellent un divorce

Valeurs Actuelles, Catherine Nay, 2016 11 03

Paris - Les socialistes ont rompu avec le président mais, persuadé de sa supériorité, celui-ci veut se représenter. La droite se tient sur ses gardes. Le divorce semble consommé entre François Hollande et le loyal Manuel Valls qui ne décolère pas depuis la parution du livre confessions Un président ne devrait pas dire ça... Oui, il a été heurté par son incontinence verbale pas digne d'un homme d'État. Oui, il y a des choses dont il n'aurait jamais dû parler, comme la révélation d'au moins quatre homicides ciblés de terroristes, ordonnés par l'Élysée et réalisés par la DGSE. Ou encore ce récit de l'échec de l'intervention d'un commando de la DGSE, en Somalie, le 11 janvier 2013, pour libérer l'un des leurs, Denis Alex, détenu par un groupe salafiste. François Hollande avait donné le feu vert. L'opération a foiré. Pourquoi ? Le commando agissait lors d'une nuit sans lune. Il n'a pas vu un garde qui dormait à l'extérieur. Il a été neutralisé mais le bruit de la détonation a donné l'alerte. Résultat : Denis Alex a été assassiné par les ravisseurs au moment de l'assaut, ainsi que deux membres du service action. « Y a-t-il eu une erreur imputable au service ? », interrogent les journalistes. Réponse de François Hollande : « Il ne me viendrait évidemment pas à l'idée de leur dire : "Vous auriez dû contourner le garde, le liquider à l'arme blanche..." » Il n'empêche, s'il le dit, c'est qu'il le pense. Le président viole l'obligation sacrée du secret. Manuel Valls avance que les militants socialistes et les élus éprouvent comme une forme de « honte ». Pour oser employer ce mot, c'est qu'il est concerné lui-même. Oui, le livre a changé sa relation avec le président.

Paris - Le dessous des cartes L'enquête sur l'ex-patron du renseignement révèle que Bernard Squarcini n'a jamais coupé les ponts avec son ancienne maison, tout en travaillant pour LVMH. Juste avant d'être présenté aux juges, Bernard Squarcini a tenté de s'expliquer. « Je suis parti contraint et forcé, a déclaré l'ex-patron de la DCRI (le renseignement intérieur, devenu la DGSI en 2014). J'ai changé d'activité, mais j'ai gardé un état d'esprit identique à celui qui m'accompagnait en ma qualité de haut fonctionnaire. » Une défense bien maladroite. Mis en examen fin septembre notamment pour « compromission » et « trafic d'influence », le « Squale » est justement soupçonné d'avoir continué, après son départ, en février 2013, à se comporter comme un chef du renseignement au mépris de la loi. Les juges cherchent à comprendre quels intérêts a défendu l'ancien espion. Ceux de l'Etat, comme il le prétend? Ceux de ses amis Claude Guéant et Alexandre Djouhri, avec lesquels il n'a jamais rompu les liens ? Ceux de sa société d'intelligence économique, Kyrnos Conseil, dont le premier client est Bernard Arnault, patron de LVMH ? Pour parvenir à ses fins, Squarcini est allé jusqu'à solliciter, à de multiples reprises, Patrick Calvar, son remplaçant à la tête du renseignement intérieur. L'enquête révèle ainsi que, en juin 2013, le « Squale » demande un coup de main à son successeur pour régulariser les séjours de deux femmes russes et de leurs enfants sur le territoire français. Du temps de sa splendeur, Squarcini était déjà intervenu cinq fois en leur faveur. Entendu comme témoin (une situation inédite), Patrick Calvar reconnaît avoir accepté de faire la démarche, mais à titre exceptionnel. Qui sont ces deux Russes, résidant à Nice ? Des proches d'Alexandre Djouhri, un homme d'affaires lié aux plus gros contrats de la République, et qui se trouve aujourd'hui au centre d'une enquête sur le supposé financement libyen de la campagne de Sarkozy en 2007. Pourquoi protéger ces deux femmes, membres de la belle-famille de Djouhri ? « Affaire réservée », a opposé Bernard Squarcini aux questions des policiers, comme s'il était toujours chargé de protéger un mystérieux intérêt de l'Etat. Dans le bureau du « Squale », les enquêteurs ont également découvert un dossier au nom d'Andreï Skoch, oligarque russe classé 18e fortune du pays.

83. Quatre mosquées soupçonnées de radicalisation ont été fermées en région parisienne
Atlantico (site web), Journaliste maison, 2016 11 03

Paris - Le ministère de l'Intérieur a annoncé que ces établissements étaient soupçonnés de promouvoir une idéologie radicale. Elles sont soupçonnées de promouvoir l'islamisme radical. Ce mercredi, quatre mosquées de région parisienne ont été fermées par les autorités. Dans un communiqué, le ministère de l'Intérieur précise que leur fermeture a été décidée sur "le fondement des dispositions de l'article 8 de la loi sur l'état d'urgence permettant la fermeture des lieux de culte au sein desquels sont tenus des propos constituant une provocation à la haine ou à la violence ou une provocation à la commission d'actes de terrorisme ou faisant l'apologie de tels actes". Parmi ces établissements, figurent la mosquée Al- Islah de Villiers-sur-Marne, dans le Val-de-Marne. Fin août, une perquisition avait permis de découvrir qu'elle abritait une école coranique clandestine. Cette école était connue des services de renseignement pour avoir été fréquentée par plusieurs personnes condamnées pour leur participation présumée à une filière djihadiste à destination de la Syrie. La mosquée Al Rawda, située à Stains, en Seine-Saint-Denis, a également été fermée. Accueillant 500 et 600 personnes pour la prière du vendredi, l'établissement "compte parmi ses anciens fidèles de très nombreux individus djihadistes", selon l'arrêté. Même sanction pour un lieu de culte baptisé Masjid Al Fath, à Clichy-sous-Bois.

84. Second perpetrator of July 15 coup attempt identified as Kemal Batmaz
Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 11 03

Istanbul - The chief prosecutor's office in the capital of Ankara who is investigating the July 15 coup plot announced yesterday that there was another member of the Gülenist terror cult (FETÖ) at a military base where the coup was commanded from, and he was captured shortly after the coup attempt. The suspect, identified as Kemal Batmaz, former manager of a Gülen-linked company, is accused of planning and conducting the coup with Adil Öksüz, a theology lecturer and Gülen's point man for the army, who remains at large. Batmaz, whose presence at the Akinci air base in Ankara on the coup night was not disclosed before, is seen walking freely around the base and conversing with officers who joined the coup in security camera footage released by Turkish media outlets yesterday. More footage shows Batmaz accompanying Adil Öksüz at Atatürk Airport in Istanbul as the two returned from the United States two days before the putsch attempt. Prosecutors say Öksüz and Batmaz flew to the United States, where FETÖ leader Fetullah Gülen resides, on Jul. 11, confirming the allegations that Öksüz went to the Pennsylvania retreat of Gülen to get his approval for the coup. Security camera footage also shows some military officers give a military salute to Batmaz as he passes by them at the base. Batmaz was in custody at Sincan prison where coup plotters are held when the prosecutors discovered his links to Öksüz. He was interrogated again but rejected the allegations of involvement in the coup.

1. Canada's spies aren't above Canada's laws

Globe and Mail, Editorial Board, 2016 11 07

Editorial - Justice Simon Noël of the Federal Court of Canada's severe decision on the Canadian Security Intelligence Service may be 137 pages long - but it gets at the basics of what it means to live in a liberal, rule-of-law society. The Federal Court's recent decision, replete with blacked-out passages, is about "associated data." CSIS is intended to prevent threats to Canada, and it collects information to do so. It turns out that for years, CSIS failed to keep its supervising Federal Court judges up to date on all that it was gathering and warehousing - but CSIS wanted to be absolved anyway. The decision of the Federal Court shows how aghast the judges were when the true situation emerged at last. It's fair to say the court felt betrayed. The court's job was to keep CSIS's actions within the law. But CSIS didn't fully reveal to the court what it was up to - and some of it turns out to have been outside the law. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale is right to say the government will not appeal the judgment. It remains to be seen how CSIS will get rid of its huge information dump.

2. Canada confiscates spooks' data nets after illegal trawling dragged up too much metadata

The Register (UK), Richard Chirgwin, 2016 11 07

London - Canada's Federal Court has rapped the Canadian Security Intelligence Service's (CSIS) knuckles for retaining too much citizen metadata. Its judgement (in a secret case, with relevant names redacted) was handed down in October and published last Thursday. Justice Simon Noel was more than peeved that the CSIS gathered data under warrants, but didn't inform the court of the data collection program - and did so for as long as 10 years. The judgement outlines that the CSIS interpreted its mandate as giving it the right to suck everything it collected into its "Operational Data Analysis Center" (ODAC). When it created the ODAC (in April 2006), it told its minister, then Conservative MP Stockwell Day - but it failed to tell the courts. Essentially, the spooks used warrants to collect legitimate information - and to go on fishing expeditions, gathering "associated data" the court didn't know about.

3. CSIS claims it has been transparent with ministers about data collection

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 11 07

Ottawa - Facing fallout from judges complaining of being kept in the dark over some of its activities, Canada's domestic spy agency says its officials always keep CSIS's political masters and watchdogs aware of what it is doing. In a rare public statement, the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service says that his predecessors briefed ministers several times over the past decade about the kinds of data collection done within what CSIS calls its "Operational Data Analysis Centre." "The creation of ODAC ... was presented to the Minister of Public Safety in July, 2006, explaining the requirement for advanced analytics and the ability of ODAC to retain data, including metadata, for extended periods of time," Michel Coulombe said in a statement released Sunday. "The minister was also briefed on the program in March, 2010." His remarks come days after the Federal Court released a scathing ruling faulting CSIS for unlawful data retention and not being forthright with judges. CSIS's current minister, Ralph Goodale, has also since complained of lax record keeping by the spy agency. Most Canadians had never heard of the ODAC intelligence facility until last week. While much remains murky, it appears to be a repository of all kinds of data that federal intelligence analysts can study in attempts to predict, or better understand, security threats.

4. MPs question PM's power over upcoming National Security Committee

Hill Times, Rachel Aiello, 2016 11 07

Ottawa - The government's bill proposing the establishment of a new National Security and Intelligence Committee of Parliamentarians needs to be amended to give its members more access to information and lessen the prime minister's ability to interfere, Parliamentarians heard last week. The proposed committee under Bill C-22 is mandated to review activities carried out by any department that relates to national security or intelligence and report annually on its reviews and findings. Unlike other parliamentary committees, this one would report directly to the prime minister, members would require a security clearance, and all meetings would be held in private. In addition, the chair--who the PMO announced in January to be Liberal MP David McGuinty (Ottawa South, Ont.)--would receive a $42,000 "additional annual allowance" and the up to eight members will be paid an extra $11,900, which is the going rate for chairs of House of Commons committees. As it's drafted, the new committee would have less teeth than other federal security expert bodies, have a narrower scope of access to information, and the prime minister would be able to veto studies or redact the committee's reports at his discretion if there's something judged to be potentially jeopardizing national security. During the first two days dedicated to Bill C-22 at the House Public Safety and National Security Committee, members heard from Public Safety and National Security Minister Ralph Goodale (Regina-Wascana, Sask.), Government House Leader Bardish Chagger (Waterloo, Ont.); their top advisers; the heads of Canada's security agencies, the RCMP, CSIS, CBSA, and CSE; and top experts and past watchdogs.

6. Security forces must be held accountable

Vancouver Sun, Daryl Wakeham, 2016 11 07

Letter to the Editor - Given the director of CSIS's recent display of contempt for Canada's Parliament, if not for our Constitution, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale has no other option than to demand Michel Coulombe's resignation. It will send a strong message to all of our security forces from CSIS, CSEC, the RCMP and the Quebec police, on both the municipal and provincial levels, to respect our laws. The 1982 McDonald Commission found the RCMP Security Service, PROFUNC, had a history of bending and breaking the law, violating rights, and essentially waging clandestine wars against its self-labelled "enemies." It was the McDonald Commission which recommended the foundation of our civilian intelligence service -- CSIS. To continue to give Coulombe unsupervised and non-accountable power is an incredible risk to our democracy. Canada does not need its own J. Edgar Hoover, the former director of the FBI infamous for spying on citizens and later using this information as psychological warfare and blackmail. After accepting Coulombe's resignation, the Trudeau government must create a multiparty parliamentary oversight committee, then enact the strongest whistleblower protection legislation for all police and security forces. It will send a message to all who purport to be protecting Canada while breaking its laws. Failure to do so will further the inculcation of a secret police agency mindset, beholden to no one but its non-elected directors. Daryl Wakeham, Vancouver (Full letter).

7. Coderre soutient Pichet

La Presse+, Katia Gagnon, 2016 11 07

Montréal - En pleine tourmente dans l'affaire d'espionnage de journalistes, le maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre, réitère sa confiance à l'endroit du chef du SPVM, Philippe Pichet. « On a un directeur de police qui a dit ce qu'il a dit et je n'ai aucune raison de douter de lui. Si le processus de vérification des faits nous amène ailleurs, on va prendre les décisions qui s'imposent. Mais au même titre que je vais me battre pour la liberté de presse, je vais me battre bec et ongles pour qu'on respecte le principe de la société de droit », a déclaré M. Coderre, hier, lors d'un point de presse en marge d'un colloque organisé par sa formation politique. Le maire est donc finalement sorti du mutisme qu'il observait sur cette délicate affaire d'espionnage depuis que La Presse a révélé, samedi, que le SPVM avait non seulement espionné les appels entrants et sortants d'au moins deux journalistes, dont le chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé, mais également obtenu un mandat d'écoute électronique pour M. Lagacé et le journaliste Vincent Larouche.

8. Denis Coderre se défend à Tout le monde en parle

Journal de Montréal, Hugo Duchaine, 2016 11 07

Montréal - Pressé de questions des quatre journalistes autour de lui, le maire Denis Coderre s'est défendu d'intervenir auprès de la police de Montréal lorsque des sources policières coulent des informations dans les médias, hier, sur le plateau de Tout le monde en parle. «Non», a-t-il finalement répondu, interrogé à savoir si son bureau appelle le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) après une fuite. Il y a une semaine, La Presse révélait que le SPVM avait espionné les communications du chroniqueur Patrick Lagacé dans le cadre d'une enquête interne visant un policier. Le Journal a ensuite révélé que trois journalistes, dont le reporter du Bureau d'enquête Félix Séguin, avaient été la cible de procédures du SPVM pour identifier leurs sources. « PAS À MA CONNAISSANCE » Le maire de Montréal a toutefois répondu le même «pas à ma connaissance», que répétait le chef Pichet lundi dernier, lorsque Patrick Lagacé lui a demandé si lui ou son bureau avait appelé le SPVM pour se plaindre de la fuite d'un rapport mettant le maire dans l'embarras.

9. La police politique made in Montréal

La Presse+, Patrick Lagacé, 2016 11 07

Chronique - Il y a trop de proximité entre le maire Coderre et « sa » police. Le bien public commande d'ériger un mur plus haut entre le SPVM et le bureau de notre maire hyperactif et contrôlant. Le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM) m'avait donc déjà espionné en décembre 2014, dans une affaire distincte de celle de 2016, révélée la semaine dernière par La Presse. Et cette fois, l'histoire implique Denis Coderre. Elle commence le 20 mars 2012, coin LaSalle et Desmarchais, dans l'arrondissement de Verdun. Il est 10 h du matin. Une policière remarque un Jeep Cherokee 2011 dont l'immatriculation n'a pas été payée. Elle l'intercepte. Au volant, le député libéral fédéral de Bourassa, Denis Coderre. La policière lui colle une contravention de 444 $. Jusqu'ici, rien à signaler. Celui qui allait devenir maire de Montréal fin 2013 a oublié de « payer ses plaques », sans doute comme des dizaines d'autres Québécois ce jour-là. Le constat porte le numéro 786 218 204. Deux ans et demi plus tard, une rumeur court dans les rangs de la police de Montréal. Ce constat d'infraction, le maire Coderre ne l'aurait jamais payé. Pourquoi cette rumeur ? Parce que dans le système informatique du SPVM qui consigne les constats d'infraction, le dossier 786 218 204 se voit assigner un code que bien des policiers ne comprennent pas : « INEXISTANT ».

10. Police surveillance scandal: Montreal mayor stands by police chief

Montreal Gazette, Andy Riga, 2016 11 07

Montreal - Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre has rebuffed calls for police chief Philippe Pichet to step aside, but has asked for an "administrative review" of how police handled surveillance of La Presse reporters. That's on top of a review by Montreal city council's public- security commission and an investigation by a provincial public inquiry, which will also look at a separate case involving Sûreté du Québec spying on six other reporters. Last week, La Presse disclosed that Montreal police obtained 24 warrants to monitor the cell-phone logs of its journalist Patrick Lagacé. On Saturday, the newspaper revealed police had also obtained warrants to listen to Lagacé's calls and to those of colleague Vincent Larouche. The new revelation appears to contradict Pichet's assertions about the extent of the surveillance. Opposition parties and Montreal's police union say Pichet should at a minimum leave his post temporarily while the actions of his department are investigated. However, Coderre said he won't ask him to stand down, adding that he will not take part in a "public lynching" of Pichet or interfere with police work or the justice system.

11. Skepticism about peace bonds after arrest of alleged ISIL supporter for second time in two weeks

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 11 07

Toronto - An alleged ISIL supporter has been arrested in Ottawa for the second time in less than two weeks for violating the conditions of his release, raising new questions about terrorism peace bonds. Police picked up Tevis Gonyou-McLean, 24, on Saturday morning -- just five days after a judge had freed him from custody following his arrest for multiple previous breaches of his release conditions. "He was arrested, I believe, yesterday morning on breaches," his lawyer Biagio Del Greco said in an interview Sunday. He said there were two alleged breaches this time, one of them for a curfew violation. The 24-year-old was required to observe a 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew and wear an electronic GPS ankle bracelet. He appeared in court over the weekend and the matter was adjourned to Tuesday.

12. Surveillance de journalistes - Coderre lance une enquête administrative sur le SPVM

Le Devoir, Philippe Orfali; Annabelle Caillou, 2016 11 07

Montréal - Refusant toujours de suspendre son chef de police dans la foulée du scandale d'espionnage de journalistes, le maire de Montréal a annoncé dimanche l'ouverture d'une "enquête administrative" sur les actes du Service de police de la Ville de Montréal (SPVM). Dans un geste inhabituel, Denis Coderre a confié à l'inspecteur général de Montréal, Denis Gallant, le mandat d'examiner les gestes du chef de police Philippe Pichet en lien avec l'espionnage de journalistes, dont Patrick Lagacé, de La Presse. Le maire a toutefois insisté pour dire que ce mandat avait été confié "à titre personnel à Me Denis Gallant", qui l'"a accepté de façon pro bono". Son rapport devra être remis au plus tard le 31 janvier 2017. D'ici là, pas question de suspendre Philippe Pichet comme le lui demande l'opposition officielle à l'hôtel de ville, et le chef du Parti québécois, Jean-François Lisée. "On ne peut pas commencer une analyse de la situation sans avoir les faits", a expliqué M. Coderre dans une mêlée de presse, en demandant "aux gens d'être patients".

13. They're watching

National Post, Editorial Board, 2016 11 07

Editorial - Canadians can't help but be disappointed and disturbed by the revelation that Montreal police received multiple warrants to spy on at least seven journalists in an effort to uncover their sources. As whistleblower Edward Snowden wrote on Twitter in response: "Are you a journalist? The police spying on you specifically to identify your sources isn't a hypothetical." Unsettling as it is to learn that Montreal police surreptitiously tracked the smartphone of La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé (with the help of no fewer than 24 separate warrants since January), equally jarring is the fact we will never know how many whistleblowers and tipsters this will prevent from speaking anonymously to investigative journalists in the future, enabling secrets to remain hidden, wrongdoing to remain unrevealed and offering cover to powerful interests engaged in corrupt or wrongful activities. There's a reason journalists have risked going to prison rather than give up their anonymous sources: confidentiality is necessary to ferret out the uncomfortable facts that could strengthen society and achieve justice - but could carry painful repercussions for any insider brave enough to reveal them. Perhaps the Montreal force's surveillance of Lagacé, and at least six other journalists, could have been excused, or at least understood, if it had been undertaken in extraordinary circumstances - for example, to stop an imminent terrorist attack or otherwise protect the public's immediate security. But it wasn't. Instead, it seems to have been motivated by a desire among police management to figure out which of the force's officers were talking to journalists and leaking information - something management apparently couldn't accomplish on its own, though it exerted considerable pressure, allegedly including threats to try to keep its force quiet.

14. Cyber SWAT teams gird for ballot trouble

USA Today, Elizabeth Weise, Kevin Johnson, 2016 11 07

Washington - Law enforcement officials, government workers and cyber-security professionals are preparing to swoop in, track and hopefully block anyone attempting a cyberattack aimed at destabilizing the U.S. presidential election. The possibility is slight, with risks lessened by the fractured, pre-digital nature of the national voting apparatus. Still, fears that hackers -- perhaps from Russia -- could instill doubts about the voting process via attacks on the Internet infrastructure have put the cyber- security community on guard. In a way, they are girding for war, but the fronts are multiple and decentralized. Although many are keeping low profiles, we know about some. The Department of Homeland Security has been conducting cyber audits of state and local election systems since August, responding to requests from 46 states and 32 local election officials. Indiana is setting up an election cyber war room. In Washington, D.C., and on the ground in 26 states, the non- partisan Election Protection coalition will staff hotlines for voters and have an election geek squad ready for questions from jurisdictions.

15. Even if Trump Loses, His Candidacy Has Emboldened Extremist Supporters

New York Times, Jonathan Mahler, Julie Turkewitz, 2016 11 07

New York - Ten years ago, Jim Gilchrist was waging a lonely battle. His organization, the Minuteman Project, which sent volunteers, often armed, to patrol America's southern border, was widely considered a fringe vigilante group with alarmist views about the dangers posed by Mexican immigrants. Today, Mr. Gilchrist feels vindicated. "I never thought I'd see the day where illegal immigration was included in a presidential candidate's top three issues," Mr. Gilchrist, a supporter of Donald J. Trump, said. "For me personally, my mission has been accomplished." While Mr. Trump seems likely to lose the election, many of his most extreme supporters say they believe that they have already won. Whether the subject is immigration, military intervention, the news media or federal government corruption -- and even the entire democratic process -- their views, long thought to be well outside the political mainstream, have been given a voice inside it. And that voice belongs to the presidential nominee of a major political party. "Trump has shown that our message is healthy, normal and organic -- and millions of Americans agree with us," said Matthew M. Heimbach, a co-founder of the Traditionalist Youth Network, a white nationalist group that claims to support the interests of working-class whites. It also advocates the separation of the races.

16. F.B.I. Says Review Clears Clinton in Email Inquiry

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 07

Washington - The F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, told Congress on Sunday that he had seen no evidence in a recently discovered trove of emails to change his conclusion that Hillary Clinton should face no charges over her handling of classified information. Mr. Comey's announcement, just two days before the election, was an effort to clear the cloud of suspicion he had publicly placed over her presidential campaign late last month when he alerted Congress that the F.B.I. would examine the emails. "Based on our review, we have not changed our conclusions that we expressed in July with respect to Secretary Clinton," Mr. Comey wrote in a letter to the leaders of several congressional committees. He said agents had reviewed all communications to and from Mrs. Clinton in the new trove from when she was secretary of state. The letter was a dramatic final twist in a tumultuous nine days for both Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Comey, who drew widespread criticism for announcing that the F.B.I. had discovered new emails that might be relevant to its investigation of Mrs. Clinton, which ended in July with no charges. That criticism of Mr. Comey from both parties is likely to persist after the election. While the new letter was clear as it related to Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Comey's message was otherwise vague. He did not say that agents had completed their review of the emails, or that they were abandoning the matter in regard to her aides. But federal law enforcement officials said that they considered the review of emails related to Mrs. Clinton's server complete, and that Mr. Comey's letter was intended to convey that. One senior law enforcement official said that as recently as Friday, it was not clear whether the review would be completed by Election Day. But after days of working in shifts around the clock, teams of counterintelligence agents and technology specialists at the bureau's headquarters in Washington finished their examination of the thousands of emails. Officials had decided to make their decision public as soon as they had reached it, to avoid any suggestion that they were suppressing information.

17. For FBI, email investigation yields little but criticism

Washington Post, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 07

Washington - From the moment they secured a warrant, dozens of FBI agents worked night and day to analyze a trove of messages that they thought might help advance their probe of Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server, according to a senior law enforcement official. The pressure was intense. FBI Director James B. Comey had told legislators in late October - less than two weeks before the election - that the bureau's work had resumed, igniting a firestorm of criticism that his revelation had affected the election. The agents' work, at first, seemed endless. They had to use special software to sift through some 650,000 emails. But on Sunday, just two days before the election, Comey announced that the team had news to share. After reviewing "all of the communications that were to or from Hillary Clinton while she was Secretary of State," he wrote, investigators had "not changed our conclusions." The messages, U.S. officials familiar with the case said, were personal or duplicative of those found earlier in the investigation. Republicans said the announcement was vague and that they had unanswered questions about how investigators concluded that Clinton should face no charges in the first place. Democrats, meanwhile, said they remained concerned that Comey had told legislators so close to Election Day that the email investigation was resuming, though they were heartened to see the matter ostensibly put to rest.

18. The coming clash with China

Washington Post, Josh Rogin, 2016 11 07

Column from Beijing - If Hillary Clinton is elected, her national security team plans to urgently address the growing North Korean nuclear and missile threat. That would surely raise tensions on the Korean peninsula - and it could also lead to an early and acrimonious confrontation between a Clinton administration and the Chinese government of Xi Jinping. Xi is staunchly opposed to Clinton's plan to drastically increase sanctions on the regime of Kim Jong Un. At the Munich Security Conference Core Group meeting here last week, Chinese officials and experts delivered a clear and unequivocal message to the visiting Westerners: China will not take any steps against Pyongyang that might increase the chance of a confrontation with the North Korean regime or encourage regime change on China's border. Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Zhang Yesui said that although China might endorse a limited U.N. Security Council resolution in response to North Korea's recent provocations, there's no Chinese appetite for further pressure. The Chinese rationale is simple: Beijing values stability on the Korean peninsula more than it fears the growing prospect that North Korea will succeed in its goal of becoming a full-fledged nuclear power capable of striking the West. "China will never allow war or chaos on the peninsula, and if that occurs that will help no one," Zhang said. "We need to bring the issue back to the track of dialogue and consultation." In Washington, there's bipartisan consensus that returning to the negotiating table without significantly more leverage against the Kim regime would be a futile and perhaps even dangerous misstep. At best, it would only repeat a failed pattern of bribing the North Korean government into a short-term pause in its mischief.

19. Under the Din of the Presidential Race Lies a Once and Future Threat: Cyberwarfare

New York Times, David E. Sanger, 2016 11 07

Manchester, N.H. - The 2016 presidential race will be remembered for many ugly moments, but the most lasting historical marker may be one that neither voters nor American intelligence agencies saw coming: It is the first time that a foreign power has unleashed cyberweapons to disrupt, or perhaps influence, a United States election. And there is a foreboding sense that, in elections to come, there is no turning back. The steady drumbeat of allegations of Russian troublemaking -- leaks from stolen emails and probes of election-system defenses -- has continued through the campaign's last days. These intrusions, current and former administration officials agree, will embolden other American adversaries, which have been given a vivid demonstration that, when used with some subtlety, their growing digital arsenals can be particularly damaging in the frenzy of a democratic election. "Most of the biggest stories of this election cycle have had a cybercomponent to them -- or the use of information warfare techniques that the Russians, in particular, honed over decades," said David Rothkopf, the chief executive and editor of Foreign Policy, who has written two histories of the National Security Council. "From stolen emails, to WikiLeaks, to the hacking of the N.S.A.'s tools, and even the debate about how much of this the Russians are responsible for, it's dominated in a way that we haven't seen in any prior election."

20. Call for Prevent-style strategy to stop children engaging in cybercrime

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 11 07

London - Britain's cybercrime tsar will formally ask the government to set up a programme based on the controversial Prevent strategy to stop children as young as 12 becoming involved in sophisticated computer offences, the Guardian has learned. Dr Jamie Saunders said training was needed to help spot teenagers at risk as many young internet users experiment with hacking or other cyber offences without realising that what they are doing is a crime. Saunders, the director of the national cyber crime unit at the National Crime Agency (NCA), said he was proposing the scheme, known internally as Cyber Prevent, to ministers. It is modelled in part on Prevent, the official counter-radicalisation programme that has been dogged by controversy. But instead of trying to divert aspirant jihadis away from terrorism, Cyber Prevent would aim to deter computer-literate youngsters from carrying out distributed denial of service attacks (DDoS) and other cybercrimes, such as hacking private details.

21. UK's Muslim Brotherhood policy 'undermined by ties with Saudi Arabia'

The Guardian (London), Robert Booth, 2016 11 07

London - The government has allowed confidence in Britain's policy towards the Muslim Brotherhood to be undermined by the impression it is being influenced by the Islamist group's enemies in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf, MPs have warned. The UK's impartiality towards the group that ruled in Egypt from 2012 to 2013 - but has been designated as a terrorist organisation by Saudi Arabia and the UAE - is now in question because of the way it handled an official review of the organisation, members of the foreign affairs select committee said in a report published on Monday. The appointment of Sir John Jenkins, who was the British ambassador to Saudi Arabia until 2015, to lead the review "created the impression that a foreign state, when it was an interested party, had a private window into the conduct of a UK government inquiry", they said. Crispin Blunt MP, chair of the committee, said any repeat of the failings would undermine Britain's credibility in engaging with political Islamist groups that have performed well in elections across the Middle East and north Africa. The MPs also cited concerns that the UK's image abroad had been damaged by the government's failure to mention the violent persecution of the Brotherhood in the review's conclusions published last November. David Cameron had said parts of the group "have an ambiguous relationship with violent extremism".

22. Islamist a narcissist and attention-seeker: MP

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 11 07

Canberra - Junaid Thorne, the radical Islamic preacher who police believe has become the spiritual godfather to a group of extremists at the centre of a major terrorism probe, is an arrogant "narcissist" who set up shop in Sydney after being run out of town by Perth's Muslim community. Counter-terrorism expert and federal Labor MP for the Perth seat of Cowan Anne Aly has lashed out at Thorne who, along with his elder brother Shadyn, she came to know when the pair lived in Perth. Dr Aly said the Aboriginal, self-styled Islamic preacher, who is now at the centre of Sydney's largest terrorism investigation, was an attention-seeking narcissist who cared little for the young men in his orbit, many of whom were either dead or in prison. "My take on Thorne is he is a narcissist, he is an attention-seeker," Dr Aly told The Australian. "He doesn't give a damn about the young people who he calls his brothers. He puts them in dangerous situations he wouldn't put himself in." In recent months, Thorne's reputation as a spiritual hard man to Sydney's small pool of Muslim radicals has deepened, thanks to a spell in Goulburn's SuperMax prison and Thorne's own youth, which was spent worshipping in the mosques of Saudi Arabia. Police believe Thorne has seized the mantle once carried by Hamdi Alqudsi, a Sydney extremist recently jailed for six years for terrorist recruitment. Along with Wissam Haddad, another Sydney radical well known to police and ASIO, Thorne has been delivering - Friday sermons to a small group of Muslims in Sydney's west.

23. US terror warning for Philippines region popular with Australian tourists (Canada)

Sydney Morning Herald, Lindsay Murdoch, 2016 11 07

Bangkok: Terrorist groups are planning kidnappings on central Philippines islands popular with Australian tourists, including parts of the business and tourism hub of Cebu, the United States has warned. The warning - repeated by the Australia government on its smartraveller.gov.au website - comes only days after a report that South-east Asia is facing a growing risk of extremist violence, especially from the southern Philippines, where a handful of militant Islamist groups have sworn allegiance to Islamic State. The US warned foreigners to avoid the southern regions of Cebu, one of the nation's most popular tourist sites because of its idyllic beaches, spectacular diving and whale watching. "The US embassy alerts US citizens that terrorist groups are planning to conduct kidnappings in areas frequented by foreigners on the southern portion of Cebu island," the advisory said. The embassy identified Dalaguete and Santander on Cebu and nearby Sumilon island, a short boat ride from the tourist hot-spots of Bohol and Dumaguete. The warning indicates that the notorious kidnapping-for-ransom group Abu Sayyaf is roaming more widely from its bases in the islands of Jolo and Basilan. It comes after a surge of kidnappings in the southern Philippines which included the first attack on a cargo ship, despite Philippines President Rodrigo Duterte's stepped-up military offensive against the militants. Formed with the backing of al-Qaeda in the 1990s, Abu Sayyaf has reaped millions of dollars from kidnappings for ransom, targeting Westerners, Filipinos and Malaysians. MoD spokesman Gen. Dawlat Waziri told reporters in Kabul that the ongoing war and violence in the country is an intelligence war, insisting that the Taliban resistance would not last more than a month if the group would wage insurgency alone. He did not elaborate further regarding any specific regional intelligence agency but the Afghan officials have long been criticizing Pakistan's Inter Services Intelligence for supporting the Afghan militants. The Afghan officials are saying that the leadership group of the Taliban and other militant groups including the Haqqani terrorist network are based in Pakistan and are openly convening gatherings besides planning and coordinating attacks in Afghanistan.

25. « Au Togo, Manuel Valls à contre-histoire »

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 07

Paris - Le socialiste et ancien ministre Kofi Yamgnane fustige la complaisance du chef du gouvernement envers le régime du président Gnassingbé. Le premier ministre français vient d'effectuer, à la fin du mois d'octobre, une tournée africaine pour, comme disent certains journaux, «prendre de la hauteur et se présidentialiser». Sa première escale fut Lomé, capitale du Togo où, tel un président, il a passé en revue des troupes assassines du pays. Il y a prononcé un discours mémorable aux yeux du pouvoir du président Faure Gnassingbé qui, probablement, n'en demandait pas tant. «Le Togo change, il change dans le bon sens. La France croit au Togo et la France veut une relation plus forte avec le Togo», a-t-il déclaré. Ou encore: «Votre pays change, il avance, il progresse», «Il y a un Togo moderne, en renouveau», «Comment ne pas déjà ressentir les vibrations et les transformations?», «Comment ne pas voir qu'une Afrique nouvelle se dessine et se prépare ici?», « M.le Président, vous faites avancer ce pays avec patience, avec détermination», «Vous avez eu à coeur, et c'est comme ça que l'on reconnaît les grands dirigeants, de favoriser la réconciliation des Togolais entre eux et avec leur peuple [sic] » ... N'en jetez plus! Il rendait ainsi hommage au pouvoir en place pour, à ses yeux, les progrès accomplis par le Togo en matière de démocratie et de bonne gouvernance, son action diplomatique et sa détermination à lutter contre le terrorisme, entre autres propos laudatifs à l'endroit de son hôte.

26. L'Afrique va-t-elle quitter la Cour pénale internationale ?

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 11 07

Chronique - Trois États africains menacent de se retirer de la Cour pénale internationale (CPI) plongeant l'instance dans la crise. Justice Depuis sa naissance en 2002, la Cour, qui siège à La Haye, n'avait jamais été aussi menacée. Pourquoi cette crise s'est-elle ouverte ? Elle est née de la décision, d'abord du Burundi, puis de l'Afrique du Sud et enfin de la Gambie de quitter la CPI, ce qu'aucun pays signataire du traité de Rome n'avait jamais fait. Il faut néanmoins différencier les trois cas. Le choix du Burundi, petit pays en pleine crise politique depuis un an et dont le président, Pierre Nkurunziza, est menacé d'une enquête, n'est pas surprenant. Celui de la Gambie, État isolé sous le joug du dictateur Yahya Jammeh, ne l'est pas plus. Il en va tout autrement de l'Afrique du Sud, puissance économique et démocratique majeure de l'Afrique. Richard Dicker, de Human Rights Watch, ne s'y trompe pas, accusant Pretoria de « trahison envers les victimes » . « La sortie de l'Afrique du Sud serait un coup très dur pour la justice internationale », souligne Florent Geel, de la Fédération internationale des droits de l'homme (FIDH), espérant que le vote nécessaire du Parlement pourrait forcer le gouvernement à surseoir à sa décision. Pretoria justifie son départ, en affirmant que ses obligations envers la CPI entrent en contradiction avec certaines dispositions constitutionnelles, notamment celle sur l'immunité diplomatique des chefs d'État. Ce coup de sang tire son origine dans la polémique qui avait marqué la visite du président soudanais Omar el-Béchar à Johannesburg en 2015, à l'occasion d'un sommet de l'Union africaine (UA). Le leader soudanais étant visé depuis 2008 par un mandat d'arrêt pour crime de guerre et génocide, la CPI avait enjoint l'Afrique du Sud de l'arrêter.

27. Two Kidnapped Italians, One Canadian Freed in Libya...Flown to Italy

Asharq al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 11 07

Tripoli- Two Italian workers and a Canadian taken hostage in Ghat southwestern Libya on September 19 have been freed overnight and were flown to Italy, the Italian foreign ministry said in a statement on Saturday. The three - Danilo Calonego, Bruno Cacace and Frank Poccia - were working on airport projects in Libya's southwestern desert where they got kidnapped by an armed group that blocked the vehicle in which they were travelling, the ministry added; stating that they were technicians employed by construction group Conicos. "The three were released in the early hours of Saturday and were handed over to Italian authorities," said Hassan Ottman, a spokesman for the municipal council in the Libyan town of Ghat. Italian media reports said the men would be speaking with prosecutors before being reunited with their families. This is not the first of its kind incident since numerous criminal and armed groups are active in Libya's vast southern desert where several Italian companies exist.

29. Bangladesh arrests 'mentor' of Japanese farmer's assassins (Canada).

Agence France Presse, 2016 11 07

Dhaka - Bangladesh police said they arrested early Sunday a veteran Islamist extremist who had "mentored" the assassins of a Japanese farmer shot dead last year. Rangpur district police chief Mizanur Rahman said Belal Hossain, described as the recruiter and mentor of the killers of Kunio Hoshi, was detained along with three of his followers during an operation in the northern district. "Hossain was an absconding militant and a senior member of the JMB who mentored and trained up Kunio's killers," Rahman said. He was referring to the homegrown Jamayetul Mujahideen Bangladesh (JMB), an extremist group which has been banned for over a decade. Since a deadly attack in July on a Dhaka cafe in which gunmen killed 22 people -- mostly foreigners -- security forces have shot dead at least 40 Islamist militants. Among those killed was a Canadian of Bangladeshi origin described by police as the mastermind of the cafe attack.

30. Beijing Tightens Its Control Over Internet With New Law

Wall Street Journal, Josh Chin, Eva Dou, 2016 11 07

Beijing - China's government approved a broad new cybersecurity law aimed at further tightening and centralizing state control over the internet, including the role foreign companies play in Chinese cyberspace. The law, passed by the standing committee of China's legislature and issued publicly on Monday, tasks agencies and enterprises with improving their ability to defend against network intrusions while demanding security reviews for equipment and data in strategic sectors. The law includes provisions such as a requirement that internet operators provide unspecified "technical assistance" to authorities in cases involving national security. It also requires security checks for equipment used for critical infrastructure, which is defined as including information services, energy, transportation, finance and other important sectors. During the drafting, the law was criticized by some foreign business groups and technology experts as a blueprint for further walling off China's already isolated internet.

31. China adopts cyber security law in face of overseas opposition

Reuters, Sue-Lin Wong and Michael Martina, 2016 11 07

Beijing - China adopted a controversial cyber security law on Monday to counter what Beijing says are growing threats such as hacking and terrorism, but the law triggered concerns among foreign business and rights groups. The legislation, passed by China's largely rubber-stamp parliament and set to take effect in June 2017, is an "objective need" of China as a major internet power, a parliament official said. Overseas critics of the law say it threatens to shut foreign technology companies out of various sectors deemed "critical", and includes contentious requirements for security reviews and for data to be stored on servers in China. Rights advocates also say the law will enhance restrictions on China's Internet, already subject to the world's most sophisticated online censorship mechanism, known outside China as the Great Firewall. Yang Heqing, an official on the National People's Congress standing committee, said the Internet was already deeply linked to China's national security and development. "China is an internet power, and as one of the countries that faces the greatest internet security risks, urgently needs to establish and perfect network security legal systems," he told reporters at the close of a bimonthly legislative meeting. More than 40 global business groups petitioned Chinese Premier Li Keqiang in August, urging Beijing to amend what they said were controversial sections of the law. Chinese officials have said it would not interfere with foreign business interests.

32. China adopts law on cybersecurity

Xinhua News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 07

Beijing - China's top legislature on Monday adopted a Cybersecurity Law to safeguard sovereignty on cyber space, national security and the rights of citizens. The government will take measures to "monitor, defend and handle cybersecurity risks and threats originating from within the country or overseas sources, protecting key information infrastructure from attack, intrusion, disturbance and damage," the law reads. Efforts will also be made to punish criminal activities online and safeguard the order and security of cyberspace. Individual users and organizations are not allowed to jeopardize security on the Internet or use it to "damage national security, honor and interests," according to the provisions. Online activities that are attempts to overthrow the socialist system, split the nation, undermine national unity, advocate terrorism and extremism are all prohibited, according to the provisions, which also forbade activities including inciting ethnic hatred, discrimination and spreading violence and obscene information online.

34. In unprecedented act, China bars 2 HK lawmakers from office

Associated Press, Kelvin Chan and Gerry Shih, 2016 11 07

Beijing - China's top legislature on Monday effectively barred two democratically elected separatist lawmakers from taking office in Hong Kong, an intervention into a local political dispute that's likely to spark further turmoil in the southern Chinese city. The National People's Congress Standing Committee in Beijing issued a ruling on a section of Hong Kong's mini-constitution covering oaths taken by officials that meant two newly elected pro-independence lawmakers, who displayed anti-China sentiment during their swearing-in last month, would be disqualified. The move is likely to trigger protests in Hong Kong, where thousands of people took to Hong Kong streets Sunday after Beijing signaled it was planning to intervene. They demanded that China's central government stay out of the political dispute, saying the move would undermine the city's considerable autonomy and independent judiciary by bypassing its top court, where the case is currently being heard. Police used pepper spray and batons against some demonstrators trying to reach Beijing's liaison office after the rally ended. Four people were arrested and two officers were injured, police said. The dispute centers on two newly elected pro-independence lawmakers, Sixtus Leung, 30, and Yau Wai-ching, 25, who altered their oaths to insert a disparaging Japanese expression for China. Displaying a flag reading "Hong Kong is not China," they vowed to defend the "Hong Kong nation." Their oaths were ruled invalid, but subsequent attempts have resulted in mayhem in the legislature's weekly sessions.

35. Military on high alert against N.K. threats around U.S. election

Seoul - South Korea's military said Monday it will stay on high alert as North Korea may fire an intermediate-range ballistic missile (IRBM) around the U.S. presidential election scheduled for Tuesday (local time). Military officials said Pyongyang may want to send a strong message to the new U.S. president that it will not give up its nuclear and missile development programs despite international condemnations and sanctions. "We are closely watching every move by the North Korean military at its Punggye-ri nuclear test site and other possible missile-launching sites. The military is fully prepared to respond to any provocative acts by the North," an official from Seoul's Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) told reporters in a briefing. Both the South Korean military and the U.S. forces stationed on the Korean Peninsula said they are utilizing all available resources to keep close tabs on the movement of missiles. The Musudan or BM-35 missile is an IRBM with an estimated range of some 3,500 kilometers, which is enough to allow it to target the U.S. Pacific territory of Guam. The island is home to many strategic assets that can support South Korean and U.S. forces in the event of a conflict breaking out on the peninsula.

The four-day meeting is expected to spark controversy from hard-line groups, particularly with the expected arrival of a delegation from Israel in Bali on Sunday. The National Police said they were aware of a number of threats and had prepared accordingly for the second-biggest event after the UN General Assembly, including from Islamic State (IS) related groups in Indonesia. "The Bali Police have been instructed to anticipate terror threats from IS-related groups or followers of Santoso," said Bali Police operational division head Adj. Sr. Comr. 38. With Interpol's Help, Russia Pursues Its Domestic Enemies Abroad

New York Times, Andrew Higgins, 2016 11 07

Vilnius - Determined to punish domestic opponents who flee abroad, as well as non-Russians whose lives and finances it wants to disrupt, Moscow has developed an elaborate and well-funded strategy in recent years of using -- critics say abusing -- foreign courts and law enforcement systems to go after its enemies. Some countries, including Russia, "work really hard to get Interpol alerts" against political enemies, said Jago Russell, the chief executive of Fair Trials International, a human rights group in London, because "this helps give credibility to their own prosecution and undermines the reputation of the accused." "It is also potentially a good threat to use against people still in the country: 'You may be able to leave, but don't assume you will be safe,'" he added. The efforts have often fallen flat in the end, but have succeeded in tying up their targets in legal knots for months and years.

Beirut, Aleppo, Aden, Baghdad - From Baghdad to Mosul, Aleppo to Raqqa, the people caught up in the region's raging conflicts are likely to have more to worry about than who wins the US election. Yet whether it is Barack Obama's inaction over Syria, or George W Bush's decision to invade Iraq, recent history has shown that the foreign policy decisions taken in the White House are keenly felt in the Middle East. The complex wars in Iraq, Syria and Yemen all involve the United States. Regardless of who wins the election, the US will continue to have a role to play in these conflicts and an influence on their outcomes. The National spoke with the people most affected by these conflicts about what they hope will come next. "The US election has brought us hell here," said Hamad Al Issa, a resident of rebel- held eastern Aleppo. Iraqi forces withdrew from several towns which were earlier seized as well as other towns due to ISIS fighting back and to avoid loss of souls, revealed the source. ISIS is calling us for this battle which represents a suicide to the organization but to us it is a battle of liberation and should be conducted based on correct military bases," added the source. Muscat - An American citizen held in Yemen was released on Sunday and evacuated from rebel-controlled Sanaa to Muscat along with Yemenis wounded in the country's conflict, the sultanate's foreign ministry said. The unidentified man was transported onboard an Omani military aircraft after his release was secured "following a request by the US government (to Oman) to continue helping in (releasing) its citizens held in Yemen", the ministry said in a statement carried by the state news agency ONA. It said he was set free following "coordination with concerned parties in Sanaa," in an apparent reference to Iran-backed Shiite Huthi rebels. Last month, Muscat secured the release of two other Americans who were held in Sanaa. 42. Iran Owns up to Arming Coup Militias in Yemen

Asharq al-Awsat, Jordan Dakamseh and Badr al-Qahtani, 2016 11 07

London - New York- Fars News Agency, a "semi-official" news agency of the Government of Iran, reported Houthis fighters bombarding national army positions with Iran-manufactured rocket artillery, despite Iran top officials refuting accusations on directly interfering in Yemen's civil conflict. Iran's incumbent Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif had denied any claims on his country arming the Houthi-led coup in Yemen. Many precedents have revealed the extent of Iranian involvement in Yemen. The Saudi-led Arab coalition had exposed numerous warehouses stockpiling Iran- made arms in Yemen, in addition to intercepting frequent weapons shipments sent to coup militiamen. Washington announced last week that at least four Iranian arms shipments were apprehended en route to Yemen. The confiscated cargo reportedly included state-of-the-art arms. On the other hand, the U.N. Special Envoy to Yemen Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed arrived to Sanaa on Thursday to resume talks with the insurgency delegates.

Tribune de Genève, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 07

Paris - Fruit d'une longue enquête, « Nos très chers émirats » explore les dessous de la lune de miel entre Paris et les pays du Golfe. Après avoir cosigné il y a deux ans Les chemins de Damas, Georges Malbrunot et Christian Chesnot jettent un nouveau pavé dans la mare avec Nos très chers émirats(1). Un ouvrage explosif qui lève un coin du voile sur les pratiques peu glorieuses d'une partie de la classe politique et l'aveuglement de la diplomatie française. En cherchant à démêler le vrai du faux à propos du financement du terrorisme par les monarchies du Golfe, les deux journalistes remettent en perspective les enjeux qui sous-tendent le soutien de la France aux rebelles syriens. En démarrant votre enquête, vous attendiez-vous à découvrir que les élites françaises étaient à ce point corrompues? Nous savions que le Qatar et l'Arabie saoudite arrosaient la France, les Etats-Unis et la Grande-Bretagne. C'était un secret de Polichinelle. Ce n'était d'ailleurs pas le sujet du livre. Ce que nous voulions explorer au départ, ce sont les liens des monarchies du Golfe avec le financement du terrorisme et le prosélytisme religieux. Quand nous avons découvert que certains hommes politiques avaient profité du « Qatar-bashing » entre 2012 et 2013 pour monnayer leur soutien à l'émirat, nous sommes restés pantois.

Paris - Si les enquêteurs ont beaucoup avancé sur le dossier des attaques qui ont frappé Paris et Saint-Denis il y a un an, il reste encore des zones d'ombre, s'agissant notamment de l'identité du commanditaire. Le dossier est énorme, avec de multiples ramifications. Un an après les attentats du 13 novembre 2015, qui ont fait 130 morts et plus de 400 blessés à Paris et à Saint-Denis (Seine-Saint-Denis), policiers et magistrats continuent de l'alimenter. Cette enquête éminemment internationale - ce qui l'a parfois freinée - avance des deux côtés de la frontière, en France et en Belgique. Les auteurs directs du carnage ont été rapidement identifiés. Neuf sont morts, dont Abdelhamid A., présenté rapidement comme l'un des cerveaux de l'opération. Ce Belge a été tué le 18 novembre lors de l'assaut visant l'appartement de Saint-Denis où il s'était caché. Avec deux autres assaillants, il faisait partie du trio ayant tiré sur des terrasses parisiennes. Les deux autres commandos, composés également de trois hommes chacun, avaient visé le Bataclan et le Stade de France. Un seul des terroristes du 13 novembre est vivant: Salah A., un Français installé en Belgique, qui a été arrêté à Bruxelles en mars et transféré en France fin avril. Il a participé à la préparation des attaques et convoyé des kamikazes vers le Stade de France.

48. German Islamists sign up for weapons training

London Times, Allan Hall, 2016 11 07

Berlin - At least 20 Isis sympathisers have been discovered in the ranks of the German army after signing up to acquire detailed knowledge of weapons and explosives. German recruiters have also received a number of requests from potential soldiers asking whether they can join on short-term commissions to undergo extensive training in firearms and equipment. The details were disclosed by intelligence officials of the Bundeswehr. Ursula von der Leyen, the defence minister, is poised to introduce legislation allowing the military counterespionage service (MAD) to carry out security checks on every prospective recruit. German law allows for vetting only after people have joined up. The discovery of Islamists in the army at a time when citizens are nervous about a terrorist attack means the law is expected to pass before the end of the year. Authorities revealed that a number of individuals had been contacting recruiters in recent months "inquiring about whether they could sign up for a few months to undergo intensive weapons and equipment training".

49. Germany fears UK may quit spy programme because of Brexit

The Guardian (London), Phillip Oltermann, 2016 11 07

Berlin - Germany fears Britain may pull out of a key intelligence-sharing programme in May next year, a move that it says would create a "moment of weakness" in the fight against terrorism and jeopardise security across the EU. As the continent remains on alert for terrorist attacks, Berlin is understood to view intelligence as Britain's primary contribution to European collaboration, and fears it could use future cooperation as a bargaining chip in Brexit negotiations. According to documents seen by the Guardian, Germany is already lobbying the British government to renew its role in Europe's law enforcement agency, Europol, before its current collaboration runs out on 1 May 2017. In a response to a parliamentary question submitted by Germany's Left party, Angela Merkel's government confirmed that it believed the European commission should encourage the UK to remain in Europol. Doing so was in Britain's interest, the document produced by the German interior ministry said, because "collaborating and sharing information via Europol can help the UK prevent and fight terrorism and serious crime".

50. La Belgique, "pépinière" de jihadistes

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 07

Bruxelles - La Belgique, d'où ont été organisés les attentats du 13 novembre 2015, a acquis la réputation mondiale d'être une "pépinière" de jihadistes. Dans le volet belge de l'enquête, 19 personnes ont été inculpées depuis un an, soupçonnées d'avoir été mêlées à des degrés divers aux tueries de Paris. Proportionnellement à sa population (11 millions d'habitants), la Belgique est un des pays d'Europe qui fournit le plus de combattants à l'organisation Etat islamique (EI): 465 Belges sont actuellement en Syrie, en sont revenus ou ont tenté de la rejoindre, selon les derniers chiffres officiels. - Une longue histoire de radicalisation - La Belgique est apparue comme une base arrière des radicaux islamistes dès le milieu des années 1990, lorsque le Groupe islamique armé (GIA) algérien a menacé le royaume de représailles après le démantèlement d'une de ses cellules à Bruxelles. Après les attentats du 11 septembre 2001 aux Etats-Unis, les autorités belges ont découvert que les assassins tunisiens du légendaire commandant Massoud, le "Lion du Panshir", chef de la résistance anti-talibans en Afghanistan, disposaient de faux passeports belges et de soutiens logistiques en Belgique.

51. Le chef présumé d'ETA arrêté en France

Le Monde, Sandrine Morel, 2016 11 07

Ascain, France - Le fugitif Mikel Irastorza, 41 ans, a été arrêté à Ascain, dans les Pyrénées, lors d'une opération conjointe entre la DGSI et la garde civile espagnole. Il ne reste plus grand-chose du groupe séparatiste basque ETA. Une quinzaine de membres actifs, tout au plus, selon la police espagnole. La majorité se trouverait en France. En fuite. C'était le cas du numéro un présumé d'ETA, Mikel Irastorza. L'homme de 41ans a été arrêté dans la nuit du vendredi 4 au samedi 5 novembre à Ascain (Pyrénées-Atlantiques), lors d'une opération menée conjointement par la garde civile espagnole et la Direction générale de la sécurité intérieure (DGSI). Deux personnes, un homme de nationalité espagnole et une femme française qui hébergeaient M.Irastorza, ont aussi été arrêtées lors de l'opération. Selon la police espagnole, ce coup de filet est «un coup dur contre les structures d'ETA car il suppose la perte du chef de l'organisation terroriste et l'élimination de la structure chargée de la gestion de l'arsenal d'armes et explosifs». «ETA est totalement à terre», confirme-t-on côté français.

52. Turkey Steps-up Security Measures after Baghdadi's Threats

Asharq al-Awsat, Said Abdul Razzak, 2016 11 07

Ankara - Turkish security forces raised the state of alertness across the country following Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi's recorded message stating an attack on Turkey, Thursday, especially in cities where ISIS militants are mainly centered. Gaziantep governorate, south Turkey, has witnessed security alert by police after the publishing of the voice record as police forces spread all over the city when they received notices that terrorist operations will be carried out by ISIS militants in the city. Security forces also warned citizens from gathering in public areas. Police forces established security barriers on the borders of Gaziantep Security Directorate; they cut off the roads before the directorate so that people and vehicles could not pass by and they took extensive security measures in all security centers in case of any terrorist attack. In a recorded message, Thursday, al-Baghdadi urged all his followers to wage all-out war and take the fighting into Turkey.

1. Best practices make Canada's top employers stand out

Globe and Mail, Diane Jermyn, 2016 11 09

The latest best practices from the winners of Canada's Top Employers for 2017 are worth a second look. While these industry leaders already excel in making their organizations a place where people love to come to work through a wide variety of innovative initiatives, many have gone further in transforming their physical space to further engage workers. In many cases, employee feedback was key in planning the design of their newest spaces, such as at Samsung Canada. As a result, the company's LEED certified head office features plenty of flexible and open work space that invites employee collaboration, dedicated idea rooms and casual breakout areas, as well as a technology showroom featuring current and future technology. While the selection process to choose the winners of Canada's Top Employers continually evolves to include new questions that reflect changes in the workplace, the underlying methodology has not significantly changed since the project began in 2000. The competition remains a catalogue of best practices. To select the winners, the editors of Canada's Top 100 Employers compare each organization's policies to others in their industry and region to see whether they're a leader. Each employer's application is judged by rigorous criteria in eight key areas: 1) physical workplace; 2) work atmosphere and social; 3) health, financial and family benefits; 4) vacation and time off; 5) employee communications; 6) performance management; 7) training and skills development; and 8) community involvement. Canada's Top 100 Employers is an annual national competition. Any employer with its head office or principal place of business in Canada may apply regardless of size, whether private or public sector. Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Ottawa. National security; 3,299 employees. Introduced a four-day work week option, allowing employees to work four days each week for up to three months annually, with salary adjusted accordingly.

2. Coderre renonce à l'enquête de Denis Gallant

La Presse+, Tommy Chouinard; Tristan Péloquin, 2016 11 09

Montréal - Le maire de Montréal a annoncé sa décision après avoir reçu l'assurance du ministre Martin Coiteux que la commission d'enquête créée par Québec se penchera sur la surveillance de journalistes par le SPVM. Critiqué de toutes parts pour avoir confié à Me Denis Gallant le mandat de faire une enquête administrative au sujet de la surveillance des journalistes, Denis Coderre se ravise. Le député péquiste Pascal Bérubé demande au gouvernement Couillard de préciser le mandat de la commission parlementaire sur la surveillance policière des journalistes afin d'inclure la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) et le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) au nombre des corps policiers qui témoigneront. « Le ministre n'a jamais voulu intégrer la GRC et le SCRS, on trouve ça suspect. Pour que la démarche réussisse, il faut que tous les joueurs soient inclus.

3. Inquiry on police spying has many questions to answer

Sarnia Observer, Allison Hanes, 2016 11 09

Editorial: Quebecers are on the verge of another potentially explosive public inquiry, this one sparked by revelations about police spying on journalists. The need for a full inquiry became rapidly apparent as the snooping scandal that broke last week widened, from Montreal police tracking one columnist for months, to the Sûreté du Québec peering into five years' worth of phone records belonging to six top investigative journalists. To its credit, the Couillard government, which first had announced more limited measures, was quick to see the broader need. Many questions require answers. Among them: How many journalists were tracked, and by whom? On what grounds did judges and justices of the peace sign off on the warrants police used to obtain the reporters' call records? The Supreme Court recognizes that journalists should be able to keep their sources confidential, save in exceptional circumstances. So far, however, this seems to have been about plugging leaks within police departments, not any urgent matter of national security. How exactly did police use these phone records, many obtained during a period when investigative reporters were breaking stories about corruption, influencepeddling and political financing that eventually prompted the Charbonneau Commission? The Parti Québécois public security critic, Stéphane Bergeron, stepped aside after it emerged he had called the then-chief of the SQ, when Bergeron himself was public security minister, and asked him about leaks to journalists. Afterward, police pried into the call records of several journalists. Bergeron vehemently denies any suggestion that he was even aware of such moves, much less authorized them. This inquiry will occur in a context where state surveillance is a matter of national and global concern. There are new revelations about CSIS being less than candid with judges about what it was doing with all the data it wanted permission to collect in Canada. And the matter blew up during a week when American fugitive whistleblower Edward Snowden spoke via video link at McGill University about the implications of electronic spying.

4. Mieux protéger les journalistes que les citoyens?

Journal de Montréal, Pierrot Péladeau, 2016 11 08

Blogue - Le film 'La vie des autres' se déroule en Allemagne de l'Est à l'époque où, volontairement ou sous la contrainte, un citoyen sur sept espionnait ses voisins pour la Stasi (Ministère de la Sécurité d'État) Est-ce souhaitable à l'égard de la surveillance policière des communications ? Ou même possible ? Coup d'oeil sur la réalité matérielle des choses. Révéler qu'on a surveillé pendant cinq ans les télécommunications de Denis Lessard revient à déclarer qu'on a surveillé les actions de toute la classe politique québécoise La réalité à laquelle nous sommes confrontés m'apparaît d'ailleurs beaucoup mieux représentée par les hésitations manifestes des gouvernement Trudeau, Gendarmerie royale (GRC) et Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) à nous offrir quelque garantie concrète sur ce même sujet. Trois, comment d'autant plus alors que notre propre Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications canadien (CST) participe à des opérations de surveillance de masse de la NSA ?

5. Overnight Security Guards Keep Finding Classified or 'Protected' Documents Around Parliament

Vice Canada, Rachel Brown, 2016 11 09

A number of federal departments, including Canada's spy agency, have been careless with classified or secure government documents. Since the Liberals took office last November, there's been more than 10,000 incidents in which such documents were mishandled or improperly stored, according to a 93-page report tabled last week in the House of Commons in response to a question from Conservative MP Gord Brown. The Conservatives have been quick to condemn the government, but it's not clear how many similar incidents occurred when they were in power. The report, first cited by the CBC, provides few details about what the documents are or how exactly were mishandled. It's not clear whether any of the incidents compromised security or privacy. Public Services and Procurement Canada and Global Affairs are the worst offenders, reporting a combined 5,624 instances where employees didn't abide by the security protocols for the documents. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) reported 659 such instances, 12 of which "required further investigation." And the Communications Security Establishment, Canada's foreign intelligence agency, reported 491 incidents, although the agency notes that none of the documents ever left Parliament. Officials at the Canada Border Services Agency reported 77 incidents where protected documents were mishandled. A number of cabinet ministries also confessed to mishandling documents, including 11 such incidents reported by the office of Democratic Reform Minister Maryam Monsef. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale's office--which is responsible for national security--reported six instances of document carelessness. The department overall reported more than 270 incidents, many of which seem to have been discovered during the night shift by parliamentary security officials, including "where cabinets were found unlocked by security during evening patrols."

7. Coderre annule l'enquête sur la police de Montréal

Journal de Montréal, Marie-Christine Trottier, 2016 11 09

Montréal - L'enquête sur les écoutes de journalistes sera faite par Québec Denis Coderre recule et annule l'enquête administrative qu'il voulait mener sur l'espionnage des journalistes par le SPVM. Le maire Denis Coderre est sous les projecteurs depuis plusieurs jours à propos des mandats du SPVM. Selon le maire, il est désormais «peu utile» de confier une enquête administrative sur le SPVM à Denis Gallant puisqu'il a obtenu «l'assurance» que la commission d'enquête publique annoncée par Québec, la semaine dernière, couvrira les activités du SPVM. Pourtant, le gouvernement Couillard annonçait le 1er novembre qu'un comité d'experts allait se pencher sur les méthodes d'enquêtes du SPVM, de la Sûreté du Québec et du SPVQ. Deux jours plus tard, Québec a octroyé à ce comité d'experts les pouvoirs nécessaires pour la tenue d'une commission d'enquête sur ces mêmes corps policiers. Denis Coderre a ensuite annoncé qu'il allait confier à son tour une enquête administrative ad hoc à Denis Gallant, qui occupe actuellement le poste d'inspecteur général à la Ville de Montréal. «Il risque d'être contreproductif que plusieurs enquêtes soient menées de front sur le sujet», indique le maire.

8. Coderre cancels inquiry into police surveillance

Montreal Gazette, René Bruemmer, 2016 11 09

Montreal - Two days after he announced Montreal inspector general Denis Gallant would hold an ad hoc "administrative review" into the police surveillance scandal enveloping the police force and city hall, Mayor Denis Coderre said Tuesday Gallant's investigation is no longer necessary and has been cancelled. Given that a provincial inquiry called by Premier Philippe Couillard last week is already looking into the Montreal police force's surveillance of La Presse journalists, including one who had been investigating a $444 ticket issued to Coderre, as well as the Sûreté du Québec's monitoring of reporters in a separate case, Gallant's inquiry is no longer necessary, the mayor said in a statement. Coderre said he obtained the assurance Tuesday morning of Quebec Public Security Minister Martin Coiteux that the provincial inquiry will investigate the Montreal police's surveillance techniques. Having another inquiry, Coderre said, risks becoming "counter-productive." Montreal city council's public security commission is also investigating the matter.

10. Élections Américaines Un voisin à surveiller

Le Devoir, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 09

Ottawa - Le Canada devra composer avec les changements à la Maison-Blanche Justin Trudeau a pris soin, depuis des mois, de ne jamais s'immiscer dans la campagne électorale américaine en refusant de commenter les candidatures et prises de position d'Hillary Clinton et de Donald Trump. Bien que tous deux aient tenu des discours diamétralement opposés sur le spectre politique, chacun laissait présager des défis pour le premier ministre canadien. Commerce Bien qu'Hillary Clinton ait elle aussi tenu un discours protectionniste au fil de la campagne américaine, elle ne menace pas pour autant la survie de l'Accord de libre-échange nord-américain que veut renier Donald Trump -- quoiqu'elle ait évoqué l'idée de le renégocier. Mme Clinton a cependant critiqué le Partenariat transpacifique qu'envisagent de signer les États-Unis avec, entre autres, le Canada, l'Australie, la Nouvelle-Zélande, le Japon, le Chili, le Pérou et le Mexique.

11. Hausse des cas de financement d'activités terroristes au Canada

Journal de Québec, Diane Tremblay, 2016 11 09

Québec - La lutte contre le blanchiment d'argent et le financement des activités terroristes tend à s'intensifier au Canada, selon un document du CANAFE qui révèle une hausse de 17% du nombre de cas. En 2015-2016, le Centre d'analyse des opérations et déclarations financières du Canada (CANAFE) a reçu 1618 rapports de ses partenaires tels que les corps policiers et les institutions financières par rapport à 1380 l'année précédente. CONSTANTE PROGRESSION Le nombre de cas portés à l'attention de cet organisme chargé de protéger l'intégrité du système financier en prenant des mesures pour détecter et décourager le blanchiment d'argent et le financement d'activités terroristes est en constante progression depuis cinq ans. «C'est beaucoup plus large que la mafia et les groupes criminels. La nouvelle tendance, c'est le financement des activités terroristes. Même si les actes n'ont pas lieu au Canada, il y a des ressortissants partout au pays. Il faut que les institutions financières accompagnent le régime pour aider les corps policiers à identifier ces personnes-là», a fait part Éric Lachapelle, chef de conformité responsable de la lutte au blanchiment d'argent pour le Mouvement Desjardins. L'an dernier, 483 échanges relativement au financement d'activités terroristes et à des menaces pour la sécurité du Canada ont été transmis au CANAFE dont les représentants sont à Québec aujourd'hui pour participer à une activité de l'association of Certified Anti-money Laundering Specialists.

12. Hometown rallies behind ailing teen in 'Butterfly Mile'

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Duffy, 2016 11 09

Ottawa - Jonathan Pitre's supporters will "walk him home" from Minnesota in an act of solidarity and symbolism at a fundraising event Nov. 19. The event, which will be held in Russell, about 40 km southeast of Ottawa, was inspired by a Facebook post by Pitre's mother, Tina Boileau, in response to a flood of questions from well-wishers about how they could help the family. Boileau suggested that people walk, run or wheel a mile, and post a picture of something beautiful or inspiring from their journeys. She called it the Butterfly Mile Challenge and invited participants to also make a donation to DEBRA Canada, a charity that assists people with epidermolysis bullosa (EB). Pitre suffers from a severe form of EB and is in Minneapolis in an attempt to change the course of his skin disease with a stem cell transplant. Pitre's hometown of Russell has taken the Butterfly Mile Challenge to heart. Community leaders have organized an event at the Russell Fairgrounds on Nov. 19 that will bring people together from across Ottawa to walk for Jonathan. More than 325 people have already registered for the Butterfly Mile. Organizers are hoping to sign up enough walkers to collectively cover the distance that it would take for Pitre to return home: about 2,414 kilometres.

13. Liberals propose pay raise, 'employee wellness plan' in PSAC talks

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 09

Ottawa - The federal government has returned to the bargaining table with its largest union with an offer of a pay raise and a proposal to defuse the politically fraught sick leave reforms with an "employee wellness" plan that would be discussed separately from ongoing contract talks. The Public Service Alliance of Canada and Treasury Board negotiators are locked in an extended bargaining session, duking it out over two big issues common to all 18 federal unions: wages and sick leave. The government's proposed 2.25-per-cent raise over three years is the first move on wages in months. PSAC is the largest union, representing more than 90,000 public servants at five bargaining tables, and has been the most intractable on changes to the existing sick leave regime. A deal with PSAC could set the pattern for other unions. The talks opened last week with a "revised" Liberal proposal to take its sick leave reforms off the table to be dealt with in a separate and independent process. Treasury Board President Scott Brison has said he wants to "modernize" sick leave. Until now, the Liberals have stuck with the previous Conservative government's plan to replace the existing regime, which gives public servants 15 days of sick leave a year. Unused leave can be banked and used later. All the unions signed a solidarity pact when this round of bargaining began more than two years ago, refusing any concessions on sick leave.

14. Quebec's thin line between politics and privacy

Globe and Mail, Yves Boisvert, 2016 11 09

Column: It has been open season on journalists' sources in Quebec, it seems. And if this was not troubling enough, we learned Monday that a warrant was obtained to check the phone record of La Presse columnist Patrick Lagacé after a complaint by the Mayor of Montreal. So on top of police overreach and legal officials not stopping them, there was political pressure to catch sources. Of course, Mayor Denis Coderre never ordered officials to spy on journalists. He just called the police chief to ask, probably in a very calm tone, how the heck do journalists find out about my tickets? Let's recap. In 2014, a rumour circulated in the Montreal police force that Mr. Coderre, the new Mayor, managed to clear himself of a $444 ticket for an unpaid licence plate. A police source sent a computerized copy of the ticket to Mr. Lagacé. On it was a special code. The source suspected that code meant the ticket was cancelled in some way. The journalist checked. False story. The ticket was paid. Nothing was written. But Mr. Coderre was not amused to find out his data had been sent to the press. What do you do when you become a victim of alleged police indiscretion? You call the police chief.

15. Trump and Canada: All the ways northern neighbour could feel election aftershock

Canadian Press, Alexander Panetta, 2016 11 09

Washington - Donald Trump's ground-shaking election win sent shockwaves around the world, jolting markets and stunning political leaders around the globe. America's neighbours could feel the effects more than most. Here are some ways Canada could be affected by a Trump win: - Climate policy: Trump promises to pull the U.S. from international climate agreements. He says he'll shred President Barack Obama's greenhouse-gas policies, and gut the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. Canada has numerous climate projects with the U.S. -Trade: Trump has repeatedly demanded a renegotiation of NAFTA - or he says he'll cancel it. That may cause jitters to the north, given that Canada sends three-quarters of its exports south. -Keystone XL: Trump has said several times he favours construction of the Keystone XL pipeline from Alberta. A campaign document suggested he'd invite TransCanada Corp. to reapply. If he's serious about proceeding, it could be a bit of welcome news for the Canadian government. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau had supported the pipeline, and now faces political dilemmas at home related to new pipelines.

17. Can Donald Trump be a good President?

Foreign Policy, Peter Feaver, Will Inboden, 2016 11 09

Comment - Donald Trump shocked the pundit class, the media, Washington, D.C., the United States, the world, and yours truly tonight. We were wrong about Trump's electoral prospects, thinking he had little to no chance to win. Is it possible we were wrong about Trump's governing prospects? For the sake of our nation and the world, we hope so. He is now our president. He does not have our unwavering support, but because he is now our president-elect, he has our initial support. We want him to succeed as president because if he succeeds, America succeeds. We continue to believe that he will have to change in some fundamental ways to be effective as president of all Americans. He will need to put the nation's interest ahead of his own. He will have to study policies more, and polls less. He will have to assemble a capable cabinet and senior national security team. He will have to listen to people who disagree with him to figure out what he can learn from them rather than merely figure out how to attack them. We close with two final thoughts on foreign policy and national security. First, President Trump must immediately start campaigning to win the trust and respect of a constituency he completely ignored until now: foreign leaders and foreign publics. They do not have a vote in our election, but our election results matter to their lives. Most were greatly concerned about what a Trump presidency would mean and they will have a great incentive to hedge against the United States, protecting themselves from their worst-case fears of what Trump might do. He would be wise to reach out to our allies to reassure them and speak calmly but forcefully to our adversaries to deter them. It's time to throw out the campaign slogans disparaging our allies. Second, Trump must beef up his foreign policy and national security team. Some of the best people on the Republican side of the aisle are #NeverTrumpers, like us, and so are ruled out of consideration. But fortunately for the country, some very fine professionals kept their powder dry and so are available to serve. We hope the Trump inner circle will reward competence and experience, and not just enthusiastic loyalty. And we hope our friends will heed the call.

18. Donald Trump's Victory Promises to Upend the International Order

New York Times, Peter Baker, 2016 11 09

Jerusalem - Donald J. Trump's stunning election victory on Tuesday night rippled way beyond the nation's boundaries, upending an international order that prevailed for decades and raising profound questions about America's place in the world. For the first time since before World War II, Americans chose a president who promised to reverse the internationalism practiced by predecessors of both parties and to build walls both physical and metaphorical. Mr. Trump's win foreshadowed an America more focused on its own affairs while leaving the world to take care of itself. Global markets fell after Tuesday's election and many around the world scrambled to figure out what it might mean in parochial terms. For Mexico, it seemed to presage a new era of confrontation with its northern neighbor. For Europe and Asia, it could rewrite the rules of modern alliances, trade deals, and foreign aid. For the Middle East, it foreshadowed a possible alignment with Russia and fresh conflict with Iran. Continue reading the main story "All bets are off," said Agustín Barrios Gómez, a former congressman in Mexico and president of the Mexico Image Foundation, an organization dedicated to promoting its reputation abroad. Crispin Blunt, chairman of the foreign affairs committee in Britain's House of Commons, said, "We are plunged into uncertainty and the unknown." One of the few places where Mr. Trump's victory was greeted enthusiastically was Russia, where state-controlled television has been feasting on the circuslike elements of the American election. "Trump's presidency will make the U.S. sink into a full-blown crisis, including an economic one," said Vladimir Frolov, a Russian columnist and international affairs analyst. "The U.S. will be occupied with its own issues and will not bother Putin with questions." "As a consequence," he added, "Moscow will have a window of opportunity in geopolitical terms. For instance, it can claim control over the former Soviet Union and a part of the Middle East. What is there not to like?"

19. Donald Trump Is Elected President in Stunning Repudiation of the Establishment

New York Times, Matt Flegenheimer, Michael Barbaro, 2016 11 09

New York - Donald John Trump was elected the 45th president of the United States on Tuesday in a stunning culmination of an explosive, populist and polarizing campaign that took relentless aim at the institutions and long-held ideals of American democracy. The surprise outcome, defying late polls that showed Hillary Clinton with a modest but persistent edge, threatened convulsions throughout the country and the world, where skeptics had watched with alarm as Mr. Trump's unvarnished overtures to disillusioned voters took hold. The triumph for Mr. Trump, 70, a real estate developer- turned-reality television star with no government experience, was a powerful rejection of the establishment forces that had assembled against him, from the world of business to government, and the consensus they had forged on everything from trade to immigration. The results amounted to a repudiation, not only of Mrs. Clinton, but of President Obama, whose legacy is suddenly imperiled. And it was a decisive demonstration of power by a largely overlooked coalition of mostly blue-collar white and working-class voters who felt that the promise of the United States had slipped their grasp amid decades of globalization and multiculturalism. "The forgotten men and women of our country will be forgotten no longer," Mr. Trump told supporters around 3 a.m. on Wednesday at a rally in New York City, just after Mrs. Clinton called to concede. In a departure from a blistering campaign in which he repeatedly stoked division, Mr. Trump sought to do something he had conspicuously avoided as a candidate: Appeal for unity. "Now it's time for America to bind the wounds of division," he said. "It is time for us to come together as one united people. It's time." That, he added, "is so important to me."

20. In Trump, NATO Faces a Challenge

Wall Street Journal, Julian E. Barnes, 2016 11 09

Brussels - The North Atlantic Treaty Organization faces one of the biggest challenges since the end of the Cold War with the election of Donald Trump, a persistent critic of the alliance. The president-elect has questioned whether the U.S. should be committed to the defense of countries that fail to spend enough on their militaries. He has suggested a softer stance against Russia and urged NATO and its 29 member states to focus more on fighting terrorism. On Wednesday, NATO Secretary-General Jens Stoltenberg congratulated Mr. Trump on his election victory but delivered a stern reminder of America's obligations to its allies. "NATO's security guarantee is a treaty commitment," said Mr. Stoltenberg, who criticized Mr. Trump's comments during the campaign. "All allies have made a solemn commitment to defend each other. This is something absolutely unconditioned." While Mr. Trump has repeatedly called on NATO to focus more on counterterrorism, he has also praised the alliance for creating a post in the organization aimed at improving intelligence-sharing among allies. Douglas Lute, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, pointed to the appointment of a new assistant secretary- general for intelligence as an example of how the alliance is taking a more aggressive role in the terrorism fight. "He has been critical of NATO's role in counterterrorism, but most recently he has noted that NATO has taken steps...in particular in appointing a top-tier official centered on intelligence," Mr. Lute said.

21. Julian Assange Releases More Emails and Defends WikiLeaks' Mission

New York Times, Steve Eder, 2016 11 09

New York - Julian Assange operates from the Ecuadorean Embassy in London, where his internet connection was recently cut off. But that has not stopped him from being one of the most significant and unusual players in the 2016 election campaign in the United States. His WikiLeaks platform has released tens of thousands of hacked emails from inside Hillary Clinton's campaign and the Democratic National Committee, making Mr. Assange a reviled figure among supporters of the Democratic nominee and a hero to backers of Donald J. Trump. On Tuesday morning, Mr. Assange weighed in one last time as Americans headed to the polls, releasing a statement that offered an explanation for making the leaks public, an assertion of impartiality and a defense of the WikiLeaks mission. "The real victor is the U.S. public, which is better informed as a result of our work," Mr. Assange wrote, adding that his organization publishes information as quickly as possible and "as fast as the public can absorb it." "This is not due to a personal desire to influence the outcome of the election," he said.

22. President-Elect Donald Trump Faces Foreign-Policy Quandaries

Wall Street Journal, Carol E. Lee, Felicia Schwartz, 2016 11 09

Washington - President-elect Donald Trump is set to inherit one of the most complicated, high-stakes foreign-policy portfolios in a generation, stepping into a tense world as a little-known leader whose positions on key issues are largely undefined. Mr. Trump has suggested in speeches, interviews and statements on the campaign trail that he would reorient U.S. policy in potentially significant ways, questioning U.S. support to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and other historic alliances, upending trade deals and drawing closer to Russian President Vladimir Putin. On other issues, he has pledged to revamp the U.S. strategy against Islamic State. Mr. Trump has given few details of his likely approach, but he said he would ramp up military action against the terror group. He has suggested the U.S. join forces with Russia to confront Islamic State, which isn't a member of the more than 60-member coalition against the extremist group. Current White House officials see North Korea as the most significant and high-stakes challenge facing Mr. Obama's successor. Many of them privately believe the next president should order a comprehensive review of North Korea policy that puts all options, including military ones, on the table. Pyongyang has conducted four of its five nuclear tests during Mr. Obama's administration, most recently in September, along with tests of missiles and other weapons over the past decade. Mr. Trump hasn't discussed the threat of North Korea's nuclear program in any detail other than to say that he thinks that the U.S. deployments to the Korean peninsula haven't done much to counter it.

23. The 2016 Election Puts CIA Oversight in Play

Newsweek, Jeff Stein, 2016 11 08

Washington - The elections may well have a big effect on Senate oversight of the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies. The committee's current Republican chairman, North Carolina Senator Richard Burr (has retained) his Senate seat. Burr supports aggressive use of CIA drone strikes to kill suspected terrorists, which Hillary Clinton has also backed, but his efforts to suppress the intelligence panel's report on CIA torture made him anathema to liberal Democrats. On the House side, five-term California Republican Representative Devin Nunes, a Trump supporter, is expected to glide to re-election and retain his chairmanship of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. As for (John) Brennan's future in a Trump administration, the CIA chief all but took himself out of contention when he gave a speech in July saying he would not order the torture of suspected terrorists or target their families, as the Republican candidate has vowed.

24. U.S. allies look on anxiously, far-right exults as Trump wins presidency

Washington Post, Simon Denyer, 2016 11 09

Beijing - Anxiety and disbelief mounted among U.S. allies, but Europe's far right exulted Wednesday, as Donald Trump won a shock victory in the U.S. presidential race. Concerns were sharp in Brussels, the headquarters of NATO and the European Union, where Trump had been universally opposed, as well as in key Asian strategic allies such as Japan and South Korea. But China's state media chortled at how the elections revealed the decline of American democracy. Nowhere was the result felt more keenly than in Mexico, as the peso crumbled on a night of lightning bolts and thunder in the country's capital. "It feels like our nightmare is here," tweeted Jorge Guajardo, who was Mexico's ambassador to China from 2007 to 2013. In Europe, there was never any secret about the continent's overwhelming preference before the vote. Among major U.S. allies across the Atlantic, leaders spoke openly of their contempt for Trump and their fear of the consequences should he be elected. Senior U.S. diplomats moved quickly to assure European partners that nothing would change. But many staffers were clearly shocked at the results. "There is a lot of continuity here no matter who wins later this morning," U.S. Ambassador to NATO Douglas Lute told a mostly European crowd of diplomats and politicians watching the results come in. "NATO has always been a bipartisan venture for the United States."

25. US official: Security controls 'working' despite NSA theft

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 11 09

Washington - The top U.S. counterintelligence official announced that secret government data is vulnerable to thieves, such as the National Security Agency insider accused of working undetected for more than 20 years to steal a large trove of classified material, even as he defended the security controls put in place after the Edward Snowden theft. "I believe the reforms are working very well. I think we've done an amazing job in the intelligence community and across the government in executing our reforms," said Bill Evanina, the chief counterintelligence and security adviser to the national intelligence director. "However, I will say that if someone wakes up tomorrow and they make a decision that they're going to steal data from the government, they will be successful at it." Evanina told The Associated Press in a recent interview that no matter how good security controls are, they will never catch every insider or hacker -- and they must be continually improved because of technological advances. His extensive comments followed the August arrest of former NSA contractor Harold Thomas Martin III, 51, of Glen Burnie, Maryland. Martin remains in custody after a judge deemed him to be a flight risk.

26. Brazilians suspected as GCHQ investigates Tesco cyberattack

London Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 09

London - The cyberattack on 40,000 Tesco Bank accounts "looks unprecedented", the chief City watchdog said yesterday, as it emerged that GCHQ is helping to investigate the crime. Reports from victims pointed to Brazil as the origin of the biggest hack to strike a British bank, but the country's authorities have not yet been contacted by their British counterparts. Tesco said that it had been hit by "a systematic, sophisticated attack" with 20,000 customers having an estimated £17 million drained from their accounts. The bank has frozen all online transactions and many customers have had their debit cards blocked. Andrew Bailey, chief executive of the Financial Conduct Authority, told MPs that he was worried about weaknesses in banks' IT systems. He said: "The heart of the concern is what is the root cause of this and what does it tell us about broader threats." The National Cyber Security Centre, a new part of GCHQ that tackles online crime, confirmed that it was providing "on-site assistance" to Tesco. It is working alongside the National Crime Agency to investigate. Several customers said that fraudulent transactions were made in Rio de Janeiro.

27. GCHQ to investigate Tesco bank hack

London Daily Telegraph, Ben Martin, 2016 11 09

London - TESCO has enlisted the help of GCHQ, the spy agency, to assist its investigation of what is the most serious cyber attack launched against a British bank. The supermarket chain contacted the National Cyber Security Centre (NCSC), a new part of GCHQ that tackles crime online, after it learned of the theft at the weekend at Tesco Bank, in which money was taken from about 20,000 current accounts. The NCSC has been providing "on-site assistance" to the company. It is working alongside the National Crime Agency to investigate the attack. Tesco Bank confirmed on Monday that it had detected "online criminal activity" in 40,000 current accounts and that money was taken from half of them. Chris Philp, an MP on the Commons Treasury select committee, has suggested the theft could have been "state-sponsored".

28. Don't believe anything you hear, Canberra was no nest of spies

The Australian Financial Review, Brian Toohey, 2016 11 09

Column: John Blaxland's enthusiastic sales pitch for his new book suggests Canberra residents must have found it hard not to trip over Russian spies doing battle with Australian spy catchers in the 1970s and '80s. Blaxland, co-author of the latest volume of the official history of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation told The Canberra Times last week, "It was on for young and old" in shops, restaurants, cafes and bars in Manuka, Kingston, Deakin, Yarralumla, Red Hill and parks near the Soviet and Chinese embassies. Blaxland said Russian spies were waiting for "a pre- arranged contact to turn up to drop something off or have a 'brush-past' [jargon for quick handover]". But not everyone is convinced it occurred, not least because it is not in the official history itself, The Secret Cold War. When asked to confirm that the Russian spies met their Australian contacts in shops, cafes etc in each of the locations Blaxland named, a spokesman for ASIO referred this column to the official history - a book it knows doesn't confirm these details. On the contrary, it says ASIO hadn't managed to detect a KGB officer meeting an agent. This might explain the gently sceptical comment from a former senior defence official, Patrick Gourley, who told this column, "Millers of Manuka was a hotbed for the spy trade. Valeri Ivanov once did brisk business there attired in an attractive pale lemon organza twin set". Perhaps some readers were reassured by Blaxland's claim in The Canberra Times that every line in the book "was scrutinised but ultimately approved by ASIO's top brass". It's not nearly as clear-cut.

The two officials said the three Indians left Pakistan on Tuesday and another five "undercover agents" will also leave Islamabad soon. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorised to talk to the media. Pakistan has withdrawn six diplomats from its embassy in New Delhi after their names were released to Indian media. Islamabad reciprocated by revealing names of eight Indian diplomats, claiming they were spies. Pakistan-Indian tensions subsequently flared, amid friction over unrest in the contested Kashmir region, which both claim in its entirety.

34. Agadez, centre de recueil des renseignements pour une lutte efficace contre le terrorisme

All Africa, Noël Ndong, 2016 11 08

Agadez, Niger - La ville d'Agadez dans le Sahel au Niger a été choisie par l'armée américaine pour accueillir une nouvelle base de drones. Agadez est l'un des principaux centres de transit sur la route de l'Europe pour les migrants ouest-africains. Les Etats-Unis ont décidé d'y installer des Reaper MQ-9, des drones armés pour la surveillance de toute la région, le nord du Niger, le Mali et la Libye où l'Etat islamique profite du chaos pour s'installer. C'est la base qui aura nécessité le plus important investissement du pentagone en Afrique. Le coût est de 100 millions de dollars. Cette installation s'est faite avec l'accord des autorités nigériennes. Le pays est au coeur des turbulences qui touchent les pays de la bande sahélienne, le Mali, l'Algérie, le Tchad, le Nigeria, la Libye ; des incursions de Boko Haram et des djihadistes. La construction de base de drones répond aussi à un besoin de Paris qui mène l'opération Barkhane -3000 hommes, des hélicoptères et avions de chasses - contre les groupes djihadistes qui tentent de recréer des sanctuaires terroristes sur un territoire de plus de 5 millions km2. Un effectif et un équipement dérisoire et moins sophistiqué par rapport à l'étendue de la superficie.

Bamako, Mali - Quatre ans après le début de l'intervention militaire française, le nord et le centre du pays demeurent le théâtre d'attaques régulières. Pas un jour ou presque sans attaque au Mali. Forces gouvernementales et populations civiles, rebelles touareg et arabes de l'Azawad - la partie septentrionale du pays qu'ils revendiquent -, casques bleus de la Mission des Nations unies au Mali (Minusma) et soldats français de l'opération " Barkhane " sont les cibles quasi quotidiennes de la guérilla menée par les groupes djihadistes toujours implantés au Mali. Dimanche 6 novembre au matin, un soldat de la paix togolais et deux civils maliens ont été tués à une quarantaine de kilomètres de Douentza, dans le centre du pays. Une embuscade qui renforce le statut de la Minusma de mission la plus périlleuse pour les militaires qui la servent. Dans la nuit précédente, une base de l'armée malienne avait été prise d'assaut dans la région de Tombouctou, confirmant que, en dépit des formations de l'Union européenne, les militaires déployés par Bamako s'avèrent le plus souvent incapables de résister aux combattants islamistes. A peine vingt-quatre heures plus tôt, un sous-officier de l'opération " Barkhane " avait succombé à ses blessures après que son véhicule eut sauté sur une mine dans les environs de Kidal. Une mort qui porte à dix-huit le nombre de soldats français tués au Mali depuis janvier 2013 et le déclenchement de l'opération " Serval ".

Identified first through a photograph taken earlier, Tamim was shot dead with his two accomplices in a police raid in Narayanganj on August 27. Investigators say he accompanied the five Gulshan attackers from their Bashundhara residence and left bidding them farewell just before the 12-hour siege began around 8:40pm on July 1.

41. S. Korea, Japan make progress in talks on military intel pact

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 09

Seoul - South Korea and Japan made progress Wednesday in negotiations on a bilateral pact to share military intelligence on North Korea, Seoul officials said. "The two sides have thoroughly reviewed the wording of the pact and found a consensus on major terms," the Ministry of National Defense said in a statement after a second round of working-level talks at the ministry's headquarters in Seoul. They will continue to consult to arrange the next meeting, the ministry said, expressing hopes that they would finalize the pact's wording soon. Expectations have been growing that it won't take long before they conclude the General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA), since they resumed negotiations in Tokyo last week after a botched attempt four years ago in the face of public opposition in Seoul. In 2012 the two nations initialed the pact, but Seoul suspended its signing due to strong opposition from opposition parties and civic groups. They claimed the deal was arranged too hastily and behind the scenes. Seoul and Tokyo, which are still in historical rows, are seeking to conclude the pact by the end of this year in a move that they say is aimed at countering North Korea's growing nuclear and missile threats.

The Iranian intelligence minister said that Iran owes its stable security conditions to the efforts made by the country's intelligence forces who nip any plot in the bud and carefully watch any suspicious move right from the beginning. Alavi reiterated that the enemy is doing its best to make Iran an insecure country, and said they are even training terrorists to produce explosives from several chemical substances to explode them in different places across Iran. "The level of security governing our country is, as in the words of Leader of the Islamic Revolution [Ayatollah Seyyed Ali Khamenei], unparalleled," Alavi said on Monday. "The increase in our country's security index comes as we are witnessing the deaths of people in countries here and there, which shows how the security index is low in most countries of the world," the Iranian intelligence minister said. Alavi attributed the advantage to the smart efforts by the country's undercover intelligence agents, "who would detect any suspicious activity and nip every plot in the bud," and to diligence by and cooperation among all police, security, military forces, and political directorships and other influential sectors.

49. A Mossoul, la résistance acharnée de l'EI

Le Monde, Hélène Sallon, 2016 11 09

Mossoul - Snipers, mortiers et voitures piégées ralentissent fortement l'avancée des forces antiterroristes irakiennes Au bout d'une ruelle étroite bordée de villas, en lisière sud du quartier Saddam, dans le nord-est de Mossoul, lundi 7 novembre, le tank Abrams s'engage seul sur la droite. La colonne de blindés Humvee noirs de la Division d'or se met en stand-by. Une trentaine de mètres en avant, des combattants de l'organisation Etat islamique (EI) se terrent derrière les blocs de béton et les carcasses de camions dont ils ont barré la rue. Armés de mitrailleuses et de lance-grenades RPG 9, ils visent les forces antiterroristes irakiennes (ICTF). Deux rues plus loin, leurs snipers sont en embuscade. Le char engage les cibles à six reprises mais le sifflement des balles continue de se faire entendre. Une famille profite d'une rare accalmie pour fuir, avec quelques vêtements entassés à la hâte dans un panier à linge. Un tir de RPG s'écrase sur une maison voisine. Une frappe aérienne est ordonnée à la coalition internationale. Près d'une heure s'est écoulée, le champ est libre. Au quatrième jour de leur offensive dans ce quartier résidentiel, les hommes de la division d'élite progressent encore dans un mouchoir de poche. Les offensives éclair des premiers jours, dans les faubourgs est de la deuxième ville d'Irak, sont un vieux souvenir. Dans ce tissu urbain truffé de djihadistes, leur avancée est lente.

50. Hezbollah: Syria conflict depends on new US president

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 11 09

Beirut - Hezbollah Deputy Secretary-General Naim Qassem said Tuesday that the new U.S. administration will determine how long the war in Syria continues, adding that his party "sees no way to back out of Aleppo and Syria" before "victory." "Despite all sacrifices made, we will continue to fight in Syria," Qassem said in an interview published by Hezbollah's Al-Ahed news site. "We are determined to oust the takfiri scheme." The Hezbollah official accused the U.S. of founding ISIS to counter his party's military efforts, and of backing the group until it had become a threat to the country. Turning to Aleppo, Qassem said the siege on rebel fighters in the city was an indication that Hezbollah and the Syrian government were on the path to victory, adding that partitioning in Syria would not be a viable solution to the conflict. He defended his party's involvement in the neighboring country, saying that the assistance to the "brethren in Syria began because the conflict is that of the [Arab] nation."

51. ISIS suspects arrested for terror plot against Israeli soccer team in Albania

Jerusalem Post, Allon Sinai, 2016 11 09

Jerusalem - Israel's 2018 World Cup qualifier against Albania this weekend was relocated on Tuesday after four suspects were arrested in connection with planning a terror attack against the blue-and-white national team. According to reports in Albania, four people with links to ISIS were seized following a tip from the Mossad that they were preparing an attack on the Israel squad. Israel's Counter-Terrorism Bureau confirmed that there was a plot to harm the national team and urged Israeli fans not to travel to the match. As a result, the Albanian Football Association asked FIFA to move Saturday's match from the stadium in Shkoder to Elbasan, which is closer to the country's capital Tirana and is believed to be easier to secure. Israel's players were also told in advance that they wouldn't be able to return to their teams in Europe directly from Albania as is accustomed following international matches.

52. L'organisation terroriste met en scène sa bataille

Le Monde, Madjid Zerrouky, 2016 11 09

Mossoul - " Martyrs en or contre Division d'or. " Cette formule d'un djihadiste pourrait -résumer la guerre médiatique que mène l'organisation Etat islamique (EI) dans son compte rendu de la bataille de Mossoul. L'EI a fait des très médiatisées forces antiterroristes irakiennes et de leurs blindés à la couleur noire caractéristique l'acteur principal de la guerre que l'organisation djihadiste donne à voir sur ses canaux de propagande, en contrepoint de la couverture médiatique occidentale. Au début de la progression des forces gouvernementales dans les faubourgs de Mossoul, la propagande de l'EI s'était employée sans surprise à contrebalancer leurs premiers succès. Selon elle, les assaillants étaient rejetés et les villages repris. A Mossoul, la vie suivait son cours normal, les -habitants étant présentés comme " indifférents " à la guerre. L'entrée de forces irakiennes dans des quartiers de la ville et la volonté affichée par Abou Bakr Al-Baghdadi, le chef de l'EI, de défendre Mossoul jusqu'au bout a changé la donne.

55. China says "no grace period" for foreign NGOs under tough new law

Reuters, Staff reporter, 2016 11 09

Beijing - There will be no "grace period" for the implementation of new regulations limiting the activities of foreign non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in China that are slated to come into effect in 2017, according to the Ministry of Public Security. Western governments have lambasted the foreign NGO law passed in April, saying it treats the groups as a criminal threat and would effectively force many out of the country. "China is a country with the rule of law - no law has a 'transition period' or 'grace period' after it takes effect," a representative from the Ministry of Public Security's Foreign NGO Management Bureau told consular officials from 11 countries at a briefing in Shanghai on Tuesday. Foreign NGOs would have to partner with a Chinese organisation and would be banned from working in different geographical regions from their Chinese counterparts, the representative said, according to a statement on the ministry's website. Chinese officials defend the foreign NGO law, saying it would only be used to punish a handful of law-breaking NGOs.

C'est la première fois qu'il accorde une interview - sous couvert d'anonymat. Après avoir déposé carte d'identité et téléphone portable à l'entrée, nous pouvons commencer l'interview. Notre interlocuteur est un homme avenant d'à peine plus de 40 ans, qui ne correspond ni au cliché de l'agent ni à celui du génie de l'informatique. Paris - Un an après les attentats de Paris qui ont fait 130 morts, le réseau derrière ces attaques revendiquées par le groupe Etat islamique (EI) a été en grande partie démantelé, des suspects ont été incarcérés en France et en Belgique et un organisateur identifié. - Neuf assaillants, tous morts - Les attentats sur des terrasses parisiennes, la salle de concert du Bataclan et le Stade de France, en banlieue parisienne, ont été perpétrés par neuf hommes répartis en trois commandos partis de Belgique, auxquels il faut ajouter Salah Abdeslam, dont le rôle au soir du 13 novembre reste énigmatique. Le commando dit des "terrasses" (39 morts) comprenait trois hommes. Deux d'entre eux, dont le Belge Abdelhamid Abaaoud, 28 ans, une figure jihadiste francophone en Syrie considéré comme le coordinateur de l'opération, ont été tués par la police cinq jours plus tard en banlieue parisienne. Le troisième, le Français Brahim Abdeslam, frère de Salah, s'est fait exploser seul dans un restaurant. Le commando du "Stade de France" (un mort) comprenait un Français résidant en Belgique et deux Irakiens, venus de Syrie dans le flux de réfugiés, tous morts en kamikazes près du stade, où se jouait un match de foot.

58. Ces données sensibles seront accessibles à des milliers d'agents

La Croix, Marie Boëton, 2016 11 09

Paris - Faut-il avoir peur du mégafichier de données personnelles? Marc Rees Spécialiste du droit des nouvelles technologies et rédacteur en chef de NextImpact La création du fichier TES pose de vraies questions de fond. Si personne ne conteste le souhait du gouvernement de mieux détecter les documents contrefaits, sa façon de procéder a interpellé. Créer par simple décret, au coeur de la Toussaint, une base de données aussi intrusive ne pouvait que choquer. Une loi s'impose afin que soient débattus au grand jour les tenants et aboutissants d'un tel projet. Car disposer d'un mégafichier de ce genre n'est pas sans risque. Il centralisera en effet les données personnelles de l'ensemble de la population, des données aussi sensibles que les empreintes digitales, la numérisation du visage, le lien de filiation, l'adresse, etc. Agrégées au sein d'une seule et même base, ces données seront accessibles à des milliers d'agents (au sein de la police, de la gendarmerie, des préfectures, des services de renseignement, etc.) Il suffira d'un seul fonctionnaire mal intentionné pour rendre possible une utilisation malveillante de ces informations. Certes, ce risque existe d'ores et déjà concernant les passeports, puisque les informations qu'ils contiennent sont agrégées au sein d'une seule et même base. Mais cela ne concerne que les quinze millions de Français détenteurs d'un tel titre. Le fichier TES concernera, lui, près de 60 millions de Français. On change bel et bien d'échelle.

59. Germany rejects Turkey's assertion that Berlin backs militant groups

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 09

Berlin - German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier on Tuesday rejected an accusation by his Turkish counterpart that Germany backs the Kurdish militant group PKK, saying such organisations were banned in Germany. Turkish Foreign Minister Mevlut Cavusoglu accused Berlin on Tuesday of allowing the PKK and far-leftist DHKP-C, both of which have carried out armed attacks in Turkey, to operate on German soil with impunity. "The PKK and other extremist parties are banned as terrorist groups here. They are criminally prosecuted," Steinmeier said. "That is why I cannot understand the comments made about Germany today in Turkey. Repeating the claims does not make them right." Turkish President Tayyip Erdogan said last week that Germany had become "an important haven for terrorists" such as the PKK and DHKP-C, and would be "judged by history" for failing to extradite supporters of a U.S.-based cleric blamed by Ankara for the failed July 15 military coup.

60. Terrorisme: Interpol dénonce le manque de partages de données biométriques entre Etats

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 09

Lyon - Le secrétaire général d'Interpol Jürgen Stock a dénoncé mercredi l'insuffisant partage entre Etats de données biométriques susceptibles de permettre d'identifier plus efficacement les terroristes. L'organisation de coopération policière estime qu'"environ 15.000 combattants se trouvent dans les zones de conflit et qu'un nombre indéterminé d'entre eux pourrait rentrer dans leur pays d'origine pour (...) s'engager dans des opérations clandestines". L'assemblée générale d'Interpol, qui était réunie à Bali (Indonésie), a souligné "l'urgence à traiter cette menace", écrite dans un communiqué. "Bien que le partage d'information via Interpol ait permis aux organisations nationales de maintien de l'ordre d'empêcher des terroristes et des candidats terroristes de voyager, le manque de données biométriques reste un maillon faible", déclare M. Stock, cité dans un communiqué de l'organisation. "Ne pas fournir aux agents en première ligne les informations dont ils ont absolument besoin pour identifier les terroristes de retour de zones de conflit, c'est leur bander les yeux, les obliger à faire leur travail avec une main attachée derrière leur dos", estime-t-il. Le patron d'Interpol souligne que les informations biométriques destinées à l'identification, telles que les empreintes digitales et l'ADN, sont "cruciales" dans le contexte actuel.

Le Temps, Céline Zünd, 2016 11 09

Berlin - Après l'intervention sur un plateau TV de Nora Illi, vêtue d'une burqa, la presse allemande se déchire pour savoir s'il est légitime d'inviter une représentante de l'islam fondamentaliste à une heure de grande écoute. L'irruption sur le petit écran allemand de Nora Illi, la représentante féminine du Conseil central islamique suisse (CCIS) de Nicolas Blancho, qui ne se sépare jamais de son niqab en public, n'en finit pas de susciter des vagues d'indignation en Allemagne. L'ancienne punk zurichoise convertie à l'islam à l'âge de 18 ans était dimanche soir l'invitée de la chaîne ARD dans l'émission d'Anne Will, devant quelque 5 millions de téléspectateurs, sur le thème de la radicalisation des jeunes. Ancien chef de la section antiterroriste du parquet de Paris (2001-2004), ce magistrat de 62 ans n'a jamais perdu de vue le combat à mener contre les islamistes radicaux. En dépit de ses affinités avec le pouvoir actuel, celui qui occupe aujourd'hui la fonction d'avocat général à la Cour de cassation multiplie les critiques envers l'organisation de la lutte antiterroriste. « Nous ne constatons pas le sursaut exigé par la gravité de la menace », assène-t-il. Une chancellerie faible, un ministère de l'Intérieur fort. Depuis leur retour au pouvoir, en 2012, les socialistes n'ont pas inversé cette tendance, née sous les gouvernements précédents. « La justice ne sait plus faire prévaloir ses orientations, déplore Michel Debacq. L'échange d'informations opérationnelles avec les enquêteurs tend à disparaître. Une tendance s'est affirmée d'écarter l'autorité judiciaire du traitement préventif de l'action terroriste. » « Grosso modo, précise-t-il, jusqu'en 2005, pour anticiper l'action terroriste les responsables policiers discutaient stratégie et tactique avec les magistrats. Paris - Les enquêteurs pensent que l'alias " Abou Ahmad " cache Oussama Atar, un Belge de 32 ans, vétéran du djihad Abou Ahmad. Ce nom de guerre plane depuis plusieurs mois sur les attentats de Paris et de Bruxelles. Derrière cette kunya (surnom musulman) se cache le seul donneur d'ordre établi en Syrie à avoir laissé des traces de son implication dans la vague d'attaques qui a endeuillé les deux capitales. Le seul que les enquêteurs pensent avoir identifié. Selon les informations du Monde , les services de lutte antiterroriste belges sont parvenus à la conclusion que ce mystérieux donneur d'ordres s'appelle Oussama Ahmad Atar, un djihadiste belge de 32 ans. Son identité a récemment été recoupée par les enquêteurs français : Oussama Atar a été désigné comme étant Abou Ahmad, sur une planche comprenant plusieurs photographies, par l'un des terroristes qu'il avait envoyés en Europe. Oussama Atar avait déjà été évoqué en août par la presse belge comme un possible " cerveau " des attentats de Bruxelles, sans que son rôle opérationnel soit détaillé. Un certain consensus existe aujourd'hui au sein de la communauté du renseignement sur son implication dans les attaques qui ont frappé les deux capitales.

1. Surveillance: Mulcair veut que Goodale et Wilson-Raybould s'expliquent

Ottawa - Le chef néo-démocrate, Thomas Mulcair, demande aux ministres de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, et de la Justice, Jody Wilson-Raybould, de rendre des comptes devant le Comité permanent de la sécurité publique sur la surveillance des citoyens et des journalistes.

De passage à Montréal, mercredi, M. Mulcair a exigé que les deux ministres s'expliquent sur la tentative du ministère de la Justice d'empêcher que ne soit rendue publique l'information voulant que le Service canadien de renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) ait illégalement recueilli et conservé des données personnelles de citoyens canadiens pendant une décennie. «Comment se fait-il que le ministère de la Justice se soit battu en Cour très récemment à Ottawa pour empêcher qu'on dise la vérité aux Canadiens sur le fait que le SCRS a maintenu et gardé pendant des années, complètement illégalement, un ensemble de renseignements sur des particuliers au Canada, sur des citoyens canadiens?», a demandé M. Mulcair.

2. Want to move to Canada? Well, their spy agency is involved in mass surveillance too International Business Times (UK), Mary-Ann Russon, 2016 11 09

London - The US is not the only country to have grave problems relating to government mass surveillance - the Federal Court of Canada recently ruled that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS)'s practice of collecting and retaining data on citizens for over a decade is unlawful. US citizens who voted for Hillary Clinton in the US presidential elections have been taking to Twitter to announce that they intend to move to Canada in the wake of business entrepreneur Donald Trump's victory, but it might be worth noting that although Canada has Justin Trudeau as prime minister, it doesn't mean the country doesn't have some similar problems. Intriguingly, the Canadian federal court found that the judiciary had no idea that bulk surveillance was being carried out at all, despite the fact that judges are required to sign off on warrants and intelligence programmes. Although the spy agency's actions of collecting the data and not informing the courts that the programme even existed are deemed to be illegal by the federal court, recent changes to legislation now mean that the CSIS is entitled to now continue collecting all that data on citizens, and it doesn't even need a warrant signed by a judge anymore. And even better, the CSIS is currently facing no repercussions at all for its actions, and although it has agreed to stop analysing the data it has collected, it is still continuing to collect other data from other federal departments.

3. Anxiety, and Jokes, North of Border After U.S. Vote New York Times, Ian Austen, Dan Levin, 2016 11 10

Ottawa - The move-to-Canada memes started spreading in earnest shortly after Donald J. Trump looked increasingly likely to win Florida: "Election Night Starter Kit," read a post on Instagram, above photos of United States passports and an Air Canada plane. Another post depicted a machine-gun-toting man riding a moose, with the words "Canadian Border Patrol Watching for Illegal Americans." The comedians may have been on to something. Later on Tuesday night, the website of Canada's immigration department crashed. Social media quickly filled with speculation that it had been overloaded by Americans looking for a new country to call home. "It definitely makes me happy to live under the Trudeau government," said Cordell Jacks, 36, an international development worker in Vancouver, British Columbia, referring to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Mr. Jacks added that he wanted to see his country become a leader in championing human rights and battling climate change. "Canada's going to be in a higher position to take on global issues that America's going to put to the side," he said. Since becoming prime minister a year ago with a promise of "sunny ways," Mr. Trudeau has enjoyed an unusually close relationship with President Obama. Now the Canadian government must plan for a future where the differences between Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Trump will probably go far beyond style.

4. Trump win puts pressure on Ottawa to boost NATO spending

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 11 10

Ottawa - Donald Trump's ascension to the White House is expected to play havoc with Canadian defence policy, putting heavy pressure on the Trudeau government to increase Canada's modest military spending. The presidency of Mr. Trump, who has repeatedly professed admiration for Russian President Vladimir Putin, casts doubt on the future of the NATO military alliance, which has been a bedrock of Western foreign policy for close to 70 years. As a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canada has committed, on paper at least, to boosting military spending to 2 per cent of annual economic output. Right now, however, Ottawa spends about 1 per cent of this country's Gross Domestic Product on defence. U.S. leaders have tried to nudge Canada to do more for decades. Even President Barack Obama tried, diplomatically, during his speech to the Canadian Parliament in June, where he said NATO would be "more secure when every ... member, including Canada, contributes its full share to our common security." Mr. Trump is not expected to be so gentle. During the U.S. election campaign, he suggested pulling out of NATO, or failing to come to the aid of member states not paying their full dues. "It's possible that we're going to have to let NATO go," he said in April. "When we're paying and nobody else is really paying, a couple of other countries are but nobody else is really paying, you feel like the jerk." Fen Hampson, distinguished fellow at the Centre for International Governance Innovation, said it would be wrong to assume that Mr. Trump was merely playing to the cameras and will revert to more standard policies on allies' military spending or on NATO.

5. Comey faces complicated path under Trump administration

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 11 10

Washington - FBI Director James Comey faces a complicated path under a Donald Trump administration. Does he try to serve out the remaining seven years of his term under a president who has publicly questioned the FBI's integrity? Or does he stay on as a safeguard against executive power and a guide for a novice president on complex national security matters? The term of the FBI director is set at 10 years as an affirmation of the bureau's political independence, and some other chiefs including Robert Mueller, Comey's predecessor, have served presidents of both parties. But Comey would be in the delicate position of working with a president who lobbed occasional criticisms from the campaign trail against the nation's premier law enforcement agency. Though attention had centered on whether Comey could have co-existed with a Hillary Clinton presidency, given the FBI's investigation into her email practices and his own public statements about the probe, that question applies at least equally to a Trump administration. FBI officials did not respond to a message about Comey's plans, but James McJunkin, a former FBI assistant director, said he doubted Comey was fazed by Trump's campaign trail statements. He said Comey knew when was appointed in 2013 by President Barack Obama that his 10-year term would carry over at least two presidential administrations that might differ sharply. "I can't imagine he would think this is anything more than politics as usual," McJunkin said. "I think politicians say whatever they think they can in order to seize the moment, and I think that once Trump settles into office, he'll realize the value of the independence that Comey displayed."

6. Could President Trump Really Turn the NSA Into a Personal Spy Machine?

Motherboard (VICE), Staff report, 2016 11 09

New York - It's the nightmare scenario that many worried about: the US elects a president who uses the country's nearly omnipotent surveillance powers for his or her own gain. Edward Snowden has described the NSA's spying capabilities as the "architecture of oppression," with the fear being that it could be deployed by a malicious commander in chief. But what could President Trump, a man who has incited hate speech against minorities and threatened to jail his political rivals, actually do with the NSA? Could he turn the NSA into his own personal spying army? "No. By and large it's not going to happen, if for no other reason than there's too many institutional safeguards that are setup," Bradley P. Moss, a national security attorney who represents intelligence community employees, told Motherboard in a phone call. If Trump did try to use the NSA for his own personal or financial gain, there would be a mass of resignations and whistleblowers coming forward, Moss said. Trump would not be able to authorize surveillance on, say, Hillary Clinton by himself, Moss said: at minimum, the order would have to go through a court (whether that particular court is essentially a rubber stamp is another issue, though). And on top of the legality of such an operation, there are the layers of lawyers and other institutions that handle such things. "There's the internal bureaucracy that's designed to try to limit some of the more egregious or crazy ideas that might come from a political appointee," Moss said. "You couldn't just willy-nilly start spying on any particular American citizen you wanted," he added. Foreign targets don't have the same sort of protections, however.

7. For Russia and Putin, a Surprise Gift From America

New York Times, Neil MacFarquhar, 2016 11 10

Moscow - The victory of Donald J. Trump declared early on Wednesday was an unexpected bonus for the Kremlin, which had used the long, tortured United States election campaign to prove the global reach of its disruptive disinformation operations and to cast doubt on the entire Western democratic process. In some ways the result was less important to President Vladimir V. Putin than the fact that Moscow could exploit the campaign as evidence that the West was in chaotic decline. Mr. Putin coolly congratulated Mr. Trump on his victory on Wednesday, expressing hope that the two could work together in a "constructive dialogue" to solve international crises, including the issue of security, according to the official Kremlin website. Still, there was no mistaking the enthusiasm with which the Kremlin viewed Mr. Trump's ascension. His lack of foreign policy experience, questioning of NATO, open admiration for the Russian leader and seeming acceptance of Russia's annexation of Crimea all seemed to play into the Kremlin's hands. Prominent analysts gloated about the opportunity this presented for Russia to extend its global influence and, possibly, shed economic sanctions imposed by the United States and Europe over Crimea and Ukraine. "Undoubtedly, they are drinking champagne, and for two reasons: one is political, the other psychological," said Gleb O. Pavlovsky, a political consultant who once worked for the Kremlin.

8. Gen. Michael Hayden: Trump Won on Anger and May Act on Beliefs

Newsmax (US), Sandy Fitzgerald, 2016 11 09

Washington - Donald Trump became the president-elect by "showing anger and being accusatory," and unless he has a meaningful conversation with the "fact-based" world's people, former CIA and National Security Agency Director Michael Hayden fears the worst. "I fear he will act on the other set of beliefs, and that is going to be very bad for America and the world," Hayden, who was among a group of security experts opposing Trump's campaign, told CBS News anchor Charlie Rose on the "CBS This Morning" program early Wednesday. Trump won by "not being all that fact-based and scapegoating real and imagined enemies," said Hayden, and "none of that fits into the intelligence picture. That is very alien to the way intelligence comes at an issue." Hayden also commented on Russian President Vladimir Putin's congratulatory letter to Trump, and said he agrees that it would be good to have good relations with Moscow. However, he also thinks Trump, after he takes office, should make conditions on Russia to stop some of its worldwide actions. "I've yet to see word, in terms of what Russian behavior has to look like before we enter into this more meaningful dialogue," said Hayden. "I'd like to get there too, but it can't be cost-free for the Kremlin."

9. Intelligence community is already feeling a sense of dread about Trump

Washington Post, Greg Miller, 2016 11 09

Washington - A palpable sense of dread settled on the intelligence community on Wednesday as Hillary Clinton, the candidate many expected to win, conceded the race to a GOP upstart who has dismissed U.S. spy agencies' views on Russia and Syria, and even threatened to order the CIA to resume the use of interrogation methods condemned as torture.

10. Islamist extremists celebrate Trump's election win

Washington Post, Ishaan Tharoor, 2016 11 09

Washington - Donald Trump's presidential election victory has already been cheered by Russian President Vladimir Putin, a constellation of right-wing European populists, a former Ku Klux Klan leader and a Middle Eastern strongman. But there's another curious constituency that seems to be happy about the new American president-elect. Shortly after Trump was declared the victor, a number of prominent Salafist ideologues linked to jihadist outfits in the Middle East took to social media to cheer the prospect of a Trump presidency. The remarks signaled the militants' apparent belief that the victory of a candidate like Trump, who has suggested potentially unconstitutional blocks on Muslim immigration and advocated torture, undermines the United States' moral standing in the world. Social-media sites associated with both the Islamic State and al-Qaeda also hailed Trump's success as the beginning of "dark times" for the United States, marked by domestic unrest and new foreign military campaigns would sap the strength of the American superpower. "Rejoice with support from Allah, and find glad tidings in the imminent demise of America at the hands of Trump," said the Islamic State-affiliated al-Minbar Jihadi Media network, one of several jihadi forums to post commentaries on the results of the U.S. election.

11. People in tech are freaking out about Donald Trump being given control of the NSA

Business Insider (US), Sam Shead, 2016 11 09

New York - Last month, Wired published a story with the headline "Imagine if Donald Trump controlled the NSA." Now there's no need to imagine. Security consultant Dan Tentler wrote on Twitter: "Trump will control the NSA. Think about that for a second. What the f did you people do?" Former CIA analyst Patrick Eddington questioned what the NSA will do under Trump given that it warranted mass surveillance under former president George Bush. Frederike Kaltheuner, who works in policy at campaign group Privacy International, wrote on Twitter: "The NSA will now be run by a Trump government. This is why we should never give a carte blanche to powerful institutions."

12. Scared About Trump Wielding FBI And NSA Cyber Power? You Should Be

Forbes, Thomas Fox-Brewster, 2016 11 09

New York - Americans are understandably anxious about the idea of Donald Trump wantonly wielding "The Cyber" to quiet his enemies, following his election to president today. But whatever the future for non-white citizens, women, the climate and the free press in Trump's America, the surveillance state of the U.S. will not immediately expand as a result of his ascent to power, at least from the perspective of the most powerful of the 17 intelligence agencies. That's according to former National Security Agency staffers, including former deputy director Chris Inglis, who told FORBES prior to the election the NSA wouldn't cave to excessive demands of any president: it's first duty, he said, was to uphold the Constitution, not obey crazy demands. "Given an unlawful order... it must say 'no.'" Dave Aitel, a former NSA computer scientist, said it was unlikely the NSA would see any change in the near future. "There's no reason to panic yet... It's much less a concern with the NSA than the Department of Justice," he said, pointing to Trump's vocal support on the feds' attempts to force tech companies like Apple into breaking their own security measures to get data on suspects.

13. Team Trump Struggling to Fill National Security Jobs

The Daily Beast, Kimberly Dozier, Shane Harris, 2016 11 10

Washington - President-elect Trump is scrambling to line up senior officials to run the government's sprawling intelligence and homeland security bureaucracy. Team Trump is struggling to fill numerous key slots or even attract many candidates because hundreds have either sworn they'd never work in a Trump administration or have directly turned down requests to join, multiple current and former U.S. officials with direct knowledge of the transition efforts told The Daily Beast. Team Trump didn't expect to win until the campaign's internal polling a month before the election signaled a possible victory. That's when senior Trump officials went into overdrive, trying to build a bench of experienced national security candidates with top secret clearances willing to work for a Trump presidency--and they met resistance across the landscape of experienced GOP national security professionals. One person who met last month with Trump's national security and homeland security transition team leader said that she confessed that many candidates had flatly rejected attempts to recruit them, believing that Trump was unfit to hold the office of commander in chief. "She said that it was going to be very difficult to fill positions in that space because everybody that had experience was a never-Trumper," this person said, speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss private conversations.

14. Trump's torture support could mean the end of GCHQ-NSA relationship

The Register (UK), Alexander J. Martin, 2016 11 09

Column - If comments made on the campaign trail by Donald Trump were sincere, then today's British government will need to do some serious soul-searching very soon. Trump, who was today announced as the president- elect of the United States of America, has been controversially outspoken while seeking to be nominated as the Republican Party's presidential candidate, and while campaigning to be elected as President. Many of his outbursts had been criticized for their deemed sincerity - and vulgarity - but it is particularly his defense of torture (despite his nation's ratification of the United Nations Convention Against Torture, and the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment) that could provoke problems between the UK and US. The constitution may ostensibly be amended, and a UN convention might be derogated from, but a US decision to legalize torture would very probably prohibit the greater part of the intelligence-sharing aspects of the UK and US's special relationship - a relationship that already is substantively about the collaboration between GCHQ and the NSA (US National Security Agency).

15. Trump will soon be working with an FBI director he attacked

Washington Post, Sari Horwitz, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 11 10

Washington - Donald Trump will enter the White House with an awkward relationship with the FBI director after attacking the bureau over its handling of the investigation into former secretary of state Hillary Clinton's private email server. Comey, who is in the third year of a 10-year term, is unlikely to go anywhere. Unlike the attorney general, the FBI director does not change with the administration. And officials close to Comey say he has no plans to leave, despite the political turmoil around the bureau since his surprise announcement last month on the Clinton investigation. Comey's handling of the Clinton matter drew withering criticism from current and former Justice Department officials, including former attorney general Eric H. Holder Jr. Nearly 100 former senior law enforcement officials from both parties censured Comey for sending his letter, which they said amounted to influencing the election in violation of long-standing Justice Department policy. James O. Pasco, the executive director of the National Fraternal Order of Police, which endorsed Trump, said that Comey needs to avoid such controversial actions if he is to succeed in a relationship with the president-elect. "The thing about Comey is that he set himself up as a man who reports to no one," Pasco said. "Because he reports to no one, he feels empowered to just act with his own voice. I think it's important for any public servant to be responsive to the people that the public has elected to represent them. And I think if he does that, he'll probably be okay."

16. U.S spy agencies to begin top secret Trump briefings within days

Reuters, Mark Hosenball, 2016 11 10

Washington - U.S. intelligence agencies will soon begin giving President-elect Donald Trump the same top secret national security briefings they give President Barack Obama, current and former intelligence officials said Wednesday. The briefings by veteran career intelligence analysts, which will begin in the next few days, will include some of the government's most closely-guarded secrets, including details of undercover espionage operations and classified intelligence collection methods, including the National Security Agency's controversial eavesdropping operations, the officials said. The Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI), which will be in charge of Trump's briefings, had no immediate comment. "I'm certain the intelligence agencies will approach these briefings with absolute professionalism," said John McLaughlin, a former Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency who participated in presidential briefings. "Once the American people have chosen a president he or she is entitled to complete support from intelligence, and intelligence agencies have to assume that a president-elect will be equally professional," McLaughlin said.

17. What a Trump Presidency Means for Cybersecurity, Net Neutrality and Internet Freedom

Newsweek, Anthony Cuthbertson, 2016 11 10

New York - Donald Trump has promised to immediately make cybersecurity a top priority, citing concerns about cyberattacks from the likes of China and North Korea. His written policies on cybersecurity are summed up in four bullet points that lack any concrete detail, but include the promise to develop cyber weapons. It states: "Develop the offensive cyber capabilities we need to deter attacks by both state and non-state actors and, if necessary, to respond appropriately." According to Uri Rivner, head of cyber strategy at biometrics firm BioCatch, Trump will take such threats seriously and combating them will be high on the future administration's agenda. "Cyber threats to both critical infrastructure and financial systems are just the sort of clear and present danger that requires decisive action--the likes of which the president elect has been advocating," Rivner tells Newsweek. "This in turn may lead to more aggressive cyber security policies, faster response to cyber attack campaigns, and greater investment in cyber security defenses." It remains unclear how clued up Trump is on the actual issues and specific threats facing his administration. On the occasion that he has vocalized his thoughts on cybersecurity, there is little to suggest a clear or informed perspective.

18. Will Donald Trump Go Rogue in the War on Terror?

Bloomberg View, Eli Lake, 2016 11 10

Column - When Donald Trump takes the oath of office in January, he will assume extraordinary powers used by the last two presidents to wage a global war on terrorism. For the next president's critics, this is a recipe for rule-of-law disaster. After all, Trump proposed a ban on all Muslims entering the country after last year's rampage in San Bernardino, California. He has pledged, with profane enthusiasm, to bomb the Islamic State out of existence. Trump has at times said he would bring back torture for detainees, and that he would create a national database for all American Muslims. Such promises led the American Civil Liberties Union in July to conclude in a paper that Trump represented "a one man Constitutional Crisis." How can someone who wants to bring back waterboarding and ban Muslims be trusted with the expansive power to wage a war without end? The answer may be that Trump has no interest in waging it in the first place. Despite his bluster, he has also signaled distaste for foreign engagements. A Trump campaign slogan was "America First," which he told the New York Times in July meant "we are going to take care of this country first before we worry about everybody else in the world." Then there is the fact that Trump has said so many outrageous things that at least some in his party don't think he means them. Representative Devin Nunes, the chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, told me Wednesday that "it's ridiculous to think Trump would bring back torture." Nunes said Trump said such outbursts can be chalked up to the fact that he was a first-time politician.

19. Will Top Cyber Talent Join the Trump Team? Jury's Out

Nextgov.com, Joseph Marks, 2016 11 10

Washington - Will cybersecurity experts who shunned President-elect Donald Trump's campaign sign on to secure government and private sector networks during the Trump presidency? The answer's far from clear. Some former officials and cyber experts sounded an optimistic tone Wednesday, saying duty to country would outweigh partisan divisions or hostility to Trump's particularly divisive style in technology and national security sectors. Others were less sanguine. "Given the overall shortage of experts in the cybersecurity workforce and the pay available in the private sector, it is always going to be hard filling top administration jobs with qualified candidates," said Ian Wallace, co-director of the New America think tank's Cybersecurity Initiative. "Add to that the fact that some qualified candidates may not want to serve in a Trump administration, and we can expect that it will take a while to fill some of the government's top cybersecurity jobs," Wallace added.

20. Yahoo Employees Knew in 2014 About State-Sponsored Hacker Attack

New York Times, Vinu Goel, 2016 11 10

San Francisco - Yahoo employees knew in 2014 that a hacker backed by a foreign government had broken into its network, the company said in a securities filing on Wednesday. But Yahoo did not say whether the attack that year -- which led to the theft of data like names, birth dates and encrypted passwords for more than 500 million accounts -- was disclosed to senior management at the time. The timeline of who knew what about the attack and when has become central to the company's plan to sell its internet operations to Verizon Communications for $4.8 billion. Yahoo first publicly disclosed the security breach on Sept. 22 this year, about two months after it struck the deal with Verizon. The company said it discovered the hacking, the largest known data breach affecting a private company, while investigating a hacker's claim in July to have obtained certain Yahoo user data. The breach was not disclosed to Verizon during negotiations, and last month Verizon executives said that it might have materially diminished the value of Yahoo -- and could cause Verizon to reopen the deal, which is expected to close early next year.

London Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 10

London - Britain will "extract advantage" from a Trump presidency, Conservative MPs and cabinet ministers said yesterday, pointing to his team's strong support for the country and Brexit. Theresa May said that Donald Trump was a fit person for the presidency and that the countries would remain "strong and close partners". Her congratulations were notably warmer than those of other European leaders. Government sources said she believed that it was better to be "an influential ally than an uninfluential critic" of Mr Trump after she had resisted attempts to draw her into the campaign. Mrs May turned down a request from Hillary Clinton's team to meet her in New York in September. She had also rejected an offer of a meeting with Donald Trump while she was attending the UN general assembly and believed that it was best to keep her distance from both camps, said insiders. Instead, Sir Kim Darroch, Britain's ambassador to Washington, was given the job of building strong contacts with senior Republicans in Congress and cultivating key members of Mr Trump's likely administration including John Bolton, a former ambassador to the UN.

Wellington - New Zealanders need to better understand the risks of prioritising user features over security when it comes to the many internet- connected devices we use, says a Massey University cybersecurity expert. Dr Andrew Colarik, a senior lecturer with the Centre for Defence and Security Studies, discussed the many ways in which our personal, company and national security information can be extracted and used against us at the Massey University Future NZ Forum on Cyberscurity, held this morning. Dr Colarik warned that New Zealand hasn't invested heavily enough in infrastructure to make the country resilient against denial-of-service attacks, or to keep data safe. The problem, he says, is the infrastructure we have built is scaled for New Zealand's population, but that same infrastructure connects us to the rest of the world. "Everything we do in this country is now so dependent on the free flow of information and the connections that we maintain. Any disruption to that will have huge, cascading effects," he says.

29. Donald Trump Could Pull U.S. From Nigeria's Boko Haram Fight, Warns Wole Soyinka

Newsweek, Conor Gaffey, 2016 11 09

New York - The victory of Donald Trump in the U.S. presidential race could jeopardize U.S. support in Nigeria's fight against Boko Haram, according to Nigerian Nobel Prize winner Wole Soyinka. In an exclusive interview, Soyinka tells Newsweek that Trump's "bunker mentality" could see the U.S. withdraw support for counter-terrorism operations in West Africa. The Nigerian author and playwright also says that he will not destroy his U.S. residency permit just yet, despite a pre-election pledge to "cut" his green card, which is afforded to immigrants granted permanent residence in the country. Under the administration of Barack Obama, the U.S. has provided financial support and military training to West African countries fighting Boko Haram. The U.S. provided $71 million worth of equipment, logistics and training to five countries-- Nigeria, Cameroon, Chad, Niger, and Benin--that together formed a joint task force in 2015 to fight the militants, according to a February fact sheet from the U.S. State Department. "One should expect that level of collaboration to diminish. Trump's mentality is one of, 'What are we doing there? What business do we have over there?'" says Soyinka, speaking to Newsweek from New York. "I foresee Trump dismissing that kind of expectation offhand and closing in, shrinking, becoming smaller in terms of [the U.S.'s] presence in other parts of the world," he says.

New Delhi - The government has said one of the reasons to demonetise currency notes of Rs. 500 and Rs. 1,000 was to curb the circulation of fake currency notes, but there seems to be no definite account of the amount of such notes in circulation. As per a study done by the Indian Statistical Institute, Kolkata in 2015, the only concrete work done on the subject, at any given point of time Rs. 400 crore worth of fake currency notes were in circulation in the economy. This is merely 0.025 percent of the total budget outlay of Rs. 19.7 lakh crore as announced this fiscal. Different agencies have their own estimates based on the recoveries made by them. According to the National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB), in 2015, various law enforcement agencies seized 1,78,022 pieces of fake Rs 1,000 currency notes. This means Rs 17 crore fake notes which were in circulation could be calculated as they could be seized. Similarly in 2015, as many as 2,99,524 pieces of Rs. 500 fake notes were seized by the agencies.

33. Chinese official named head of Interpol, drawing criticism

Associated Press, Christopher Bodeen, 2016 11 10

Beijing - A top Chinese police official was elected president of Interpol on Thursday, setting off alarm bells among rights advocates over abuses and a lack of transparency within China's legal system, as well as the potential misuse of the police organization to attack Beijing's political opponents. Vice Public Security Minister Meng Hongwei was named as the first Chinese to hold the post at the organization's general assembly on the Indonesian island of Bali, Interpol announced in a press release. The Lyon, France-based International Criminal Police Organization has 190 member nations and has the power to issue "red notices." It's the closest instrument to an international arrest warrant in use today. Interpol circulates those notices to member countries listing people who are wanted for extradition. While Interpol's charter officially bars it from undertaking "any intervention or activities of a political, military, religious or racial character," critics say some governments, primarily Russia and Iran, have abused the system to harass and detain opponents of their regimes. Interpol says it has a special vetting process to prevent that from happening.

37. U.S. President-elect Donald Trump reaffirms Washington's security commitment to S. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, Staff reporter, 2016 11 10

Seoul - U.S. President-elect Donald Trump on Thursday reaffirmed Washington's security commitment to South Korea during his telephone conversation with South Korean President Park Geun-hye, an official source said. During the talks that lasted some 10 minutes, Trump was quoted as saying that the United States will maintain a "firm, strong" defense posture to defend its Asian ally South Korea. The talks took place at around 10:00 a.m. (Korea time). Trump added that Washington will work together with Seoul "until the end" for the security of the United States and South Korea, according to the official. In response, Park congratulated him on his electoral win, stressing that South Korea and the U.S. have built trust based on the alliance while weathering a series of challenges together over the past six decades. She also pointed out that the alliance has served as a "cornerstone" of peace and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific. "I expect that (we) can strengthen and develop the alliance down the road for the shared interests in various areas," she was quoted as saying during the phone talks. Trump, in turn, said that he agreed with Park's remarks "100 percent." The South Korean leader, then, pointed to North Korea's nuclear issue as the "greatest threat" facing the two nations.

38. Des "saboteurs" ukrainiens arrêtés en Crimée

Le Figaro avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 10

Kiev - Les services spéciaux russes (FSB) ont annoncé aujourd'hui l'arrestation d'un groupe de "saboteurs-terroristes" envoyés selon eux par Kiev dans la péninsule annexée de Crimée pour y attaquer des sites militaires et des bâtiments administratifs. "Les services de sécurité ont arrêté à Sébastopol les membres d'un groupe de saboteurs-terroristes envoyés par le principal service de renseignement du ministère de la Défense ukrainien", a annoncé le FSB dans un communiqué. Selon ce dernier, le groupe, arrêté hier, "prévoyait de commettre des actes de sabotage sur des cibles comme des infrastructures politiques et militaires" et avait en sa possession "des engins explosifs puissants, des armes, des munitions" et des moyens de communication. Le ministère ukrainien de la Défense a démenti ces accusations, dénonçant dans un communiqué publié sur son site internet "une autre imposture" visant à discréditer l'Ukraine et à dissimuler les "actes répressifs" commis par la Russie contre les habitants de Crimée critiques à l'égard de Moscou.

39. It's Putin's World Now

The Daily Beast, Michael Weiss, 2016 11 10

Column - If, as the poet says, America is not the world, then the world is surely owed an apology for the lack of attention paid to what ought to have been, and are, a series of alarming developments throughout Europe and the Middle East. Perhaps appropriately, all have involved or implicated a revanchist authoritarian power for which the incoming commander in chief has repeatedly professed his admiration and which, after having done all it could to facilitate an upset American electoral outcome--"maybe we helped a bit with WikiLeaks," as pro-Kremlin political analyst Sergei Markov put it Wednesday morning--offers its hearty congratulations on his victory. Meanwhile, Russia's alleged "wet work" and maneuvering outside the United States in the last two weeks has been even more impressive. In Montenegro, a tiny and relatively young Balkan nation sandwiched between Bosnia and Albania, a cabal of Russian nationalists has been accused of trying to assassinate the prime minister, Milo Djukanovic, following a campaign of election interference. U.S. officials say the abortive putsch bear all the hallmarks of a Kremlin project of subversion, including the funneling of money to a pro-Moscow opposition party, biased news organizations, and key "influencers." Serbia was also a target of what appears to have been an assassination attempt or coordinated act of anti-state violence. According to Serbia's Interior Ministry, an impressive cache of weaponry--grenades, ammunition, sniper rifles, and a bazooka--was later uncovered in the woods close to Vacic's family home, outside Belgrade. As Interior Minister Nebojsa Stefanovic put it, "It is very disturbing that [the hidden weapons] were located on this turning, where the Prime Minister's vehicle must slow down to minimal speed... That is an ideal distance, of only 50 meters, for such weapons to be used." Might the murder of a second head of a European government have been in the offing? And if so, who were the culprits and their sponsors? Of particular concern to is that one alleged participants in the Montenegrin plot is Bratislav Dikic, a former Serbian special forces commander, who was sacked for criminal and "terrorist" activity. Another conspirator has been identified as Aleksandar Sindjelic, a well-known Serbian fascist who is one of the top 300 "terrorists" being sought by the Ukrainian government for his participation in Russia's dirty war in the regions of Donetsk and Lugansk--a war thetas overseen by Russian intelligence officers, paratroopers and special forces.

41. Russia says it has detained Ukrainian saboteurs in Crimea

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 10

Moscow - Russia's Federal Security Service said on Thursday it had detained a group of Ukrainian saboteurs who it accused of planning to attack military sites and infrastructure in Crimea, but Kiev dismissed the story as false. The Federal Security Service, or FSB, said it had confiscated explosive devices and weapons from the group, which it said was made up of intelligence agents from the Ukrainian Defence Ministry. The Interfax news agency cited a person familiar with the matter as saying that the FSB had detained three Ukrainian military personnel who had been plotting to attack power plants and water purification facilities in Crimea. Ukraine said the FSB story was false. "Nobody has detained Ukrainian military personnel," Andriy Lysenko, a spokesman for the National Security and Defence Council, told Reuters. "This is yet another frame-up by the Russian security forces."

42. Iran's missile power acts as deterrence force

Islamic Republic News Agency, 2016 11 10

Tehran - Chief of Staff of the Iranian Armed Forces Major General Mohammad Hossein Baqeri underlined that Iran's missile power prevents the enemies from even thinking of attacking the country. 'Given the guidelines of Supreme Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyed Ali Khamenei our missile strength has reached a point that does not even allow the enemies to think of attacking the country,' General Baqeri said, addressing a ceremony in Tehran on Thursday. Noting that the Russians have been seeking Iran's assistance in building the long-range drones with such a precision-striking power, he said, 'Of course, the Americans and the Zionists might be in possession of such drones.' In relevant remarks in late September, Major General Baqeri underlined the country's high capabilities in building different military equipment, and said the Iran-made long-range drones are now carrying out missions against terrorists in Iraq and Syria.

43. L'Iran s'inquiète, l'Arabie et l'Égypte attendent et le régime de Damas se félicite

Le Figaro, Goerges Malbrunot, 2016 11 10

Téhéran, Iran - Inquiétude en Iran. Attentisme prudent en Arabie saoudite et satisfaction non dissimulée à Damas. L'élection de Donald Trump a suscité des réactions contrastées chez les dirigeants du Moyen-Orient. Réagissant rapidement à la victoire du candidat qui voulait « déchirer » l'accord nucléaire conclu en 2015 entre la communauté internationale et l'Iran, Javad Zarif, le chef de la diplomatie de Téhéran, a déclaré que « le plus important » était « que le futur président respecte les accords, les engagements pris à un niveau multilatéral ». À huit mois du scrutin présidentiel iranien, le succès de Trump renforce les ultraconservateurs, persuadés que le « grand Satan » américain ne respectera pas cet accord nucléaire défendu par leur adversaire, le président de la République, Hassan Rohani. Ce dernier estime, de son côté, que M. Trump ne pourra pas revenir sur cet arrangement historique, car il a été « entériné » par l'ONU. En Arabie saoudite, la victoire de Trump ne constitue pas une réelle surprise. Les cercles dirigeants ne l'excluaient pas. « Nous pouvons travailler avec Trump », confiait récemment au Figaro un haut responsable saoudien, rappelant que le prince Walid Ben Talal avait investi ces dernières années dans l'empire Trump. Déçu par Barak Obama et sa politique de réconciliation avec l'Iran, le roi Salman a souhaité à M. Trump « le succès dans (sa) mission pour réaliser la sécurité et la stabilité du Moyen-Orient et dans le monde ». Leaders des monarchies du Golfe, « les dirigeants saoudiens vont observer Trump », analyse un diplomate familial de Riyad. S'ils voient que les États-Unis se réinvestissent dans la région pour contrer l'Iran, ils le suivront. Mais dans le cas contraire, si les Saoudiens voient que la bride est lâchée à la Russie, comme ils sont pragmatiques, ils finiront par se retourner vers Moscou ».

44. La très efficace stratégie de décapitation des cadres de l'État islamique

Le Figaro, Georges Malbrunot, 2016 11 10

Mossoul - Pour préparer l'offensive militaire contre Mossoul, la coalition internationale a éliminé de nombreux dirigeants intermédiaires de Daech. Coupant les liens entre la direction et la base djihadiste, cette stratégie risque de favoriser la dispersion des combattants étrangers et leurs retours vers leurs pays d'origine. Les uns après les autres, les têtes sont tombées. En l'espace d'un mois, dix-huit cadres de Daech ont été tués, selon l'ONG « Raqqa est assassinée en silence ». Entre le 20 août et le 21 septembre, une cascade d'éliminations ciblées a préparé l'offensive militaire contre Mossoul, lancée fin octobre 2016 par les forces de sécurité irakiennes et leurs alliés de la coalition internationale. Grâce à des renseignements humains ou des écoutes téléphoniques, ces liquidations ont visé des cadres intermédiaires de Daech. Ces maillons indispensables à la transmission des consignes entre une direction, de plus en plus isolée pour des raisons de sécurité, et la cohorte des djihadistes locaux ou étrangers, en première ligne dans la défense de Mossoul, la « capitale » du califat autoproclamé en juin 2014 par Abou Bakr al-Baghdadi.

45. 30 Al Qaida militants killed by coalition-backed Yemeni troops in Hadramout

Gulf News, Saeed Al Batati, 2016 11 10

Al Mukalla - Thirty Al Qaida operatives were killed in heavy clashes with Yemeni government troops in a remote village in the province of Hadramout, the highest number of casualties in a single day for Al Qaida since April, a senior army commander said on Wednesday. Major-General Faraj Salmeen Al Bahasni, the commander of Al Mukalla-based 2nd Military Region said in a statement that soldiers, backed by air cover from the Saudi-led coalition, raided an Al Qaida hideout on a farm in Al Maseni, a remote region west of the city of Mukalla, Hadramout's capital, killing 30 and capturing a number of them. Al Bahasni's statement was carried by the region's official Facebook page. Al Bahasni said four of his soldiers were killed and 12 injured in the 24-hour battle. "This is the third consecutive successful [raid against Al Qaida] carried by [the] Hadramout Elite Forces," the statement said. Al Qaida had held the territories for more than a year.

47. Hamas urges Trump to re-evaluate US policy that 'favors Israel'

Jerusalem Post, Staff Report, 2016 11 10

Jerusalem - Hamas on Wednesday urged US president-elect Donald Trump to "bring justice to the Palestinians." Speaking to reporters in Gaza, the Islamist group spokesman, Sami Abu Zuhri, said: "The Palestinian people is not very much concerned about the changes in American policies towards the Palestinian cause because such a policy is constant and is based on bias in favor of the Israeli occupation. However, we urge the American President to re-evaluate this policy and to work on bringing justice to the Palestinians." Trump has told Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last month that if elected, the United States would recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, marking a potential dramatic shift in US policy. While Israel calls Jerusalem its capital, only few other countries accept that. Most nations maintain embassies in Tel Aviv. Palestinians want east Jerusalem, captured by Israel in a 1967 war, as capital of the state they aim to establish alongside Israel in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

48. Trump a 'wild card' for the Middle East

The National (UAE), Josh Wood, 2016 11 10

Beirut - In the hours after divisive Republican Donald Trump was declared the winner in the US presidential election, congratulations flooded in from America's friends and foes in the Middle East. Some countries in the region hope to reboot tattered relationships, others are trying to continue long-standing partnerships or keep dialogue open despite mutual hostility. Mr Trump has promised to overhaul Washington's foreign policy, but his proposals for the Middle East have so far been at best vague and at worst contradictory. For countries in the region, Mr Trump is a wild card whose direction will affect the most serious issues they face. During his campaign, Mr Trump continually exaggerated the strength and ability of ISIL even though the group was suffering significant losses in Iraq and Syria. The US was "not winning" the war against ISIL and the operation to retake Mosul was a "disaster", he proclaimed. He frequently said ISIL controlled much of Libya's oil when they do not.

Athènes - Un engin explosif de faible puissance a été lancé tôt jeudi matin contre l'ambassade de France à Athènes, faisant un blessé léger, a-t-on appris de source policière. Selon un policier, il s'agissait vraisemblablement d'une grenade. Le bâtiment n'a pas été endommagé et l'agent de sécurité touché n'est que légèrement blessé, a-t-il ajouté. Des traces sont visibles à l'extérieur de l'ambassade, sur le trottoir. D'après les images de vidéosurveillance, le projectile a été lancé par des inconnus circulant à moto. L'attaque n'a pas été revendiquée. L'ambassade de France se trouve à proximité de la place Syntagma, en face du Parlement, dans l'un des secteurs les plus sécurisés de la capitale grecque. Le ministère des Finances, également proche du Parlement, a été évacué jeudi matin à la suite d'une alerte à la bombe. La police a déterminé qu'il s'agit d'un canular.

50. Face aux risques de radicalisation, les villes misent sur la prévention

Montreuil, France - Formation des personnels, partenariat avec des associations, renforcement des liens avec la police... Depuis les attentats, de nombreuses municipalités multiplient les initiatives afin de mieux détecter les risques. Une expertise locale pas assez mise en valeur. Que peuvent les villes, à l'échelon local, face à la radicalisation ? C'est la question que de nombreux élus se posent depuis les attentats contre le journal Charlie Hebdo le 7 janvier 2015, suivis par ceux du Bataclan, le 13 novembre 2015. Certaines villes ont réagi très tôt, comme Montreuil, en Seine-Saint-Denis, directement touchée par la mort de Tignous, dessinateur de Charlie Hebdo, et par la mort d'enseignants montreuillois tués au Bataclan. Après les nombreuses cérémonies d'hommage, la première décision de la mairie a été d'ajouter le « R » de radicalisation à la charte de prévention et de lutte contre la délinquance. « Dans un deuxième temps, nous avons monté une exposition à partir de dessins des collégiens sur la liberté d'expression, qui a permis de sensibiliser nos jeunes », explique Philippe Lamarche, adjoint (PCF) aux finances et à la tranquillité publique à la mairie de Montreuil.

51. Five Men Arrested on Suspicion of Recruiting For ISIS in Germany

Asharq Al-Awsat, Majid al-Khateeb, 2016 11 10

Berlin - Germany's Interior Minister Thomas de Maiziere considers the arrest of five militants on charges of supporting a terrorist organisation in Germany as "an important success against extremist supporters of ISIS in Germany". He also described the raids as good news and said that the arrests indicate that Germany's security forces are "active, determined and vigilant". The Minister's comment came after police carried out raids in the western state of North Rhine-Westphalia and the northern state of Lower Saxony. Police arrested Ahmad Abdulaziz Abdullah A (Abu Walaa) and four of his accomplices: a Turkish national called Hasan C, a German-Serb called Boban S, a German national Mahmoud O and a Cameroonian named Ahmed FY. The Interior Minister of North Rhine-Westphalia Ralf Jaeger said that the arrest of the extremist preacher Abu Walaa and his accomplices was 'an important blow to the extremist network that aims to recruit young people for ISIS in Germany'.

52. German cabinet approves cyber security strategy

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 09

Berlin - The German cabinet on Wednesday adopted a new cyber security strategy to counter a rising number of threats targeting government institutions, critical infrastructure, businesses and citizens. The strategy calls for the creation of a mobile Quick Reaction Force housed within the Federal Office for Information Security (BSI), as well as similar teams within the federal police and domestic intelligence agency that are able to respond to cyber threats against government institutions and critical infrastructure. Germany's Cyber Defense Center will fall under the authority of the Interior Ministry, which will seek to foster inter-agency coordination and cooperation. The new strategy also calls for greater cooperation and information sharing between the public and private sectors on cyber threats, a policy that is in line with United States' cyber defense strategy. The government wants to build up awareness and support for businesses and expects them to take active measures to protect against cyber threats. Of particular focus is protecting critical infrastructure, including energy and water supplies, healthcare systems, digital routing systems and transportation.

53. Gülenists sabotaged reconciliation process with the PKK, former Turkish intelligence official says

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 11 09

Istanbul - Former National Intelligence Organization (MIT) official Emre Taner said Wednesday that the government's 2009 talks with the PKK terrorist organization had aimed for reconciliation and put a halt to 40 years of bloodshed, but the whole peace process was sabotaged by foreign powers and the Gülenist terror cult (FETÖ). In a meeting with the Turkish Parliament's commission investigating the July 15 Gülenist coup attempt, he said that the talks with the terrorist group was not "treason" but only an effort to stop PKK terrorists. "We started the Oslo talks to prevent foreign powers from using the PKK as a tool. Many of them are in affiliation with the terrorist group," he said. "Gülenists were disturbed about it as the terror problem was being solved by Recep Tayyip Erdogan's government," he added. Not mentioning directly a specific group or intelligence organization that leaked the audiotape of the talks, he said: "Those who did not want the peace process to succeed leaked the tape," pointing to the prime suspect, the Gülenist terror cult.

L'Obs avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 10

Athènes - La police privilégie la piste d'un acte commis par la mouvance extrémiste anarchiste locale. Deux inconnus circulant à moto ont jeté jeudi matin une grenade devant l'ambassade de France à Athènes, blessant légèrement un policier en faction, a indiqué une source policière. La brigade anti-terroriste s'est saisie de l'enquête sur cet attentat, qui s'est produit peu avant 5 heures locale (2 heures à Paris), sur une des grandes avenues centrales d'Athènes, en face du Parlement, a ajouté la même source. La policier, qui se trouvait devant la guérite gardant le portail principal de l'ambassade, a été hospitalisé pour des premiers soins mais n'est que très légèrement blessé aux jambes. L'explosion de la grenade n'a causé que des dégâts mineurs au portail. Le pâté de maisons a été bouclé par la police. Mouvance anarchiste La police privilégie dans l'immédiat la piste d'un acte commis par la mouvance extrémiste anarchiste locale, qui revendique régulièrement des attaques sans victimes contre des cibles diplomatiques, économiques ou politiques, selon la même source. Les représentations françaises en Grèce sont sporadiquement visées par des actions revendiquées par ou imputées à des groupes extrémistes anarchistes. En octobre, cette nébuleuse avait annoncé une série d'actions pour réclamer la libération de Georges Ibrahim Abdallah, un Libanais qui purge depuis 1987 une peine de détention à perpétuité en France pour actes terroristes.

55. Le retour des enfants-soldats de l'EI redouté par les services antiterroristes

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 10

Paris - Ils ont appris à tirer à la kalachnikov, à poser des bombes et ont assisté, voire participé, à des exactions d'une rare violence: les enfants endoctrinés par le groupe jihadiste Etat islamique (EI) poseront, à leur retour en Europe, un inextricable problème de sécurité. Alors que l'EI recule sur le terrain, le retour des jihadistes d'Irak et de Syrie doit être "la principale préoccupation" en matière de sécurité des "cinq, des dix prochaines années", a martelé lundi le Premier ministre Manuel Valls. Et les services antiterroristes redoutent que ces mineurs - enrôlés de force ou avec la bénédiction de leurs parents jihadistes - deviennent de "véritables bombes à retardement", selon les mots du procureur de Paris François Molins. "Depuis plusieurs mois, la propagande de l'EI accentue ses efforts en faveur du recrutement d'enfants combattants en publiant sur internet des vidéos mettant en scène de très jeunes soldats combattants", estime le renseignement intérieur français dans une note récente. En mettant en avant ses "lionceaux du califat", l'organisation jihadiste veut montrer sa capacité "à accueillir et à former, aussi bien religieusement que militairement, la progéniture" de ses membres mais aussi "envoyer un message aux pays occidentaux" pour démontrer sa "pérennité".

Istanbul - Turkey should be a top priority in U.S. foreign policy, a top adviser to President-elect Donald Trump said Wednesday in an article that slammed Barack Obama for failing to understand Ankara's geopolitical position. "We must begin with understanding that Turkey is vital to U.S. interests," retired Gen. Michael Flynn wrote for the Hill newspaper. He also called Turkey "a source of stability in the region". Flynn was a key national security adviser to Trump during his presidential campaign and is expected by many to be appointed to a Cabinet position, possibly as defense secretary. Noting the extradition request by Turkey of Gülenist Terror Group (FETÖ) leader, Fetullah Gülen, as one of the key points of contention between Washington and Ankara, Flynn suggested the U.S. handover Gülen. The former chair of the Defense Intelligence Agency suggested that although Gülen presents himself as a moderate Islamic scholar, he is a radical who "has publicly boasted about his 'soldiers' waiting for his orders to do whatever he directs them to do."

1. Canadian values matter now more than ever

Toronto Sun, Anthony Furey, 2016 11 15

Column: Over the weekend we learned about two unfortunate incidents involving Conservative leadership candidates that underscore why Canadian values matter now more than ever. Deepak Obhrai, an Alberta MP, received a flurry of racist emails telling him to leave the country and go back to where he came from. Obhrai came here in 1977 from Tanzania - likely before some of his less than inclusive correspondents were even born. Before he was a politician, Obhrai worked as an accountant and business owner. He's been a valuable contributor to our society for decades. If anyone feels uncomfortable living in the same country as Obhrai, they should get the hell out of here, not him. Meanwhile, provincial police were called after what appeared to be an attempted break-in at Ontario MP Kellie Leitch's home. I have family in the area Leitch lives in and I know there's been a recent string of garage break-ins right around there, so make of this what you will. But this happened, according to her campaign, shortly after someone publicly offered to reveal Leitch's address to anyone upset with her. Leitch advocates screening prospective immigrants for anti-Canadian values. Obhrai, along with other candidates, does not agree with that policy. It's a topic that riles people up. Leitch stirred the pot further by likening her plan to Donald Trump's "extreme vetting" of Muslim immigrants. You can understand why both candidates might be subject to attacks online and worse. People want to silence them. So where do we go from here? Leitch has started an important conversation. Those observers calling her all the names in the book need to consider two things: First, a Forum Research poll showed a clear majority of Canadians like the idea. This includes 87% of Conservative supporters, 59% of NDPers and 57% of Liberals. Canadians support her. No wonder she's not backing down. Second, take a look at Leitch's definition of Canadian values. Here's what she told the media in September: "Screening potential immigrants for anti-Canadian values that include intolerance towards other religions, cultures and sexual orientations, violent and/or misogynist behaviour and/or a lack of acceptance of our Canadian tradition of personal and economic freedoms is a policy proposal that I feel very strongly about." Who's against this? What's wrong with developing our screening methods with this inclusive philosophy in mind? Bizarrely, some MPs and pundits have said this can't even be done. That's nonsense and they know it. CSIS has already acknowledged Syrian refugee applications that raised a "red flag" were put aside. And we can define red flags however we please.

2. Police, Power and Privacy

Toronto Star and CBC News, Staff reporters, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - The RCMP has provided unprecedented access to the Toronto Star and the CBC in an effort to make its case that antiquated laws and diminished police powers in the digital age are allowing suspected terrorists, drug gangs and child abusers to operate beyond the law. Journalists from the two media outlets have reviewed the details of 10 high-priority cases after clearing RCMP security checks for access to "top-secret" information. In each case, investigators were stonewalled by legal and technical obstacles in accessing digital evidence, the Mounties say. Most of the suspects remain at large. These cases stand at the centre of an emerging national debate. Police argue they are on the losing side of a digital divide, while on the other side are tech-savvy criminals who are shielded by impenetrable encryption, telecommunication companies and technology manufacturers. Privacy advocates argue that police have never before had such powers of surveillance and that they have failed to provide evidence that the public's safety is in jeopardy. The audience is Canadians who are alarmed to learn that some criminals are increasingly beyond the reach of the law. They are equally alarmed by the recent Federal Court ruling that denounced the national spy agency, CSIS, for illegally gathering the private information of Canadians, and by news that Quebec police forces intercepted and tracked the cellphones of as many as 10 journalists to discover their sources. "We need a public debate," said RCMP Chief Supt. Harold O'Connell, the force's director general of national security investigations. "We can influence, we can tell you what we think the lay of the land is, and then you, as Canadians and legislators, decide where you want us to be."

3. Alleged suicide bomber hid behind digital encryption

Toronto Star, Robert Cribb, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - One of the most dramatic Canadian national security cases in recent memory - ending with the shooting of a bomb-carrying terrorism suspect on his way to a shopping mall - was obstructed for more than a year by unbreakable encryption, RCMP officials revealed in a detailed briefing to the Toronto Star and the CBC. Investigators had had suspicions of terrorist activity by 24-year-old Daesh supporter Aaron Driver since December 2014. But they couldn't gather enough evidence. "Hindsight would say that he was obviously farther along in preparing," said Jeff Adam, the RCMP's director general in charge of technical investigations services. In the end, it was the last-minute tip of an "imminent" threat from the FBI - it had spotted Driver's martyrdom video - that foiled what might have been a mass killing. The tip came as Driver was preparing homemade explosives for a suicide bombing mission later that day. Police shot and killed Driver outside his home in Strathroy, Ont., in August, just as he entered a cab to head to a shopping area in downtown London, Ont. Contrary to what was reported at the time, the explosive device Driver carried was deadly. Full detonation in a public place would have caused "death and grievous bodily harm," Adam said. An analysis of the bomb, obtained by the Star and CBC, shows that anyone within 2.1 metres (about seven feet) of the detonation would have faced death or serious injury, not including the impact of shrapnel "fragmentation."

4. B.C. man accused of terrorism wouldn't mourn killing of soldier: trial hears

Canadian Press, Geordon Omand, 2016 11 15

Vancouver - A British Columbia man accused of posting extremist Muslim propaganda online told police officers he doesn't see a problem with his comments inspiring someone to shoot a Canadian soldier, a court has heard. Othman Hamdan, of Fort St. John, pleaded not guilty in B.C. Supreme Court on Monday to four terrorism-related offences, including encouraging the commission of murder, assault and mischief, all for terrorist purposes. He also pleaded not guilty to inducing and instructing someone to carry out a terrorist act, whether directly or indirectly. The court also heard arguments about whether statements Hamdan made to RCMP officers outside his apartment in November 2014 and during two subsequent interviews should be admitted as evidence. "There's nothing wrong with asking someone to stand up against an oppressor," Hamdan, 35, is heard telling two police officers in an audio recordings played in court. "Somebody who reads this, if he stands up against an oppressor, it's an honourable (act).

It's nothing to be ashamed about," he added, referring to posts he made on the Facebook page registered under his pseudonym, Adam Khalifa. Hamdan confirms that he created the website as he spoke to the officers inside a Tim Hortons restaurant on April 1, 2015. He can be heard disparaging former prime minister Stephen Harper for providing aid to the Kurdistan Workers' Party, a militant group based in Turkey and Iraq that advocates for Kurdish independence. Hamdan described it as a terrorist organization. "I don't see me shooting any Canadian soldiers, but I don't see any problem with somebody fighting back against an oppressor," Hamdan told the officers. "Whether it's Canadian, Chinese, Indian _ it doesn't matter. An oppressor is an oppressor."

5. Brandon teen to be sentenced for supporting ISIS online

CBC News Manitoba, Staff reporter, 2016 11 15

Winnipeg - A Brandon, Man., boy who was arrested last year for using social media to express support for the Islamic militant group ISIS will be sentenced Tuesday. The boy, who was 16 when he was arrested last November, entered a guilty plea in a Winnipeg courtroom in September to counselling the commission of an indictable offence at the direction of, or in association with, a terrorist group. The teenager, who can't be identified because he is a youth, will be sentenced as a youth. He has been held in custody since his arrest. While no details on what led to the arrest have been given in court, police seized a number of items from the teen's western Manitoba home last year, including a computer that was being looked at "closely," officials said at the time. The teenager will be sentenced by a judge in Brandon, a city of about 50,000 people located 200 kilometres west of Winnipeg. Arrested a few months after Aaron Driver The Brandon boy's arrest came only a few months after Aaron Driver's June 2015 arrest in Winnipeg for communicating with what RCMP called well-known ISIS supporters in the U.K. and the U.S.

6. Inside RCMP's file room

Toronto Star, Robert Cribb, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - The RCMP shared details of 10 ongoing "high-priority" investigations with the Toronto Star and CBC News to begin a public debate on expanding police capabilities while investigating crimes involving digital and online evidence. This coincides with a federal review of Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act (Bill C-51) and a public consultation on the government's Green Paper on National Security, which includes proposals to enhance police digital capabilities. To allow access to the investigations, the RCMP conducted security screening and granted top-secret clearances to Robert Cribb of the Toronto Star and Dave Seglins of CBC News. The RCMP provided summaries and interviews on the cases but withheld names, locations and key details that could compromise ongoing investigations, prosecutions and secretive police techniques. Case 3: 'Too much information' tests RCMP capacity RCMP intercepted cell and residential communications of a "high- risk traveller" in Eastern Canada suspected of planning to join a terrorist group overseas. The Internet/phone provider lacked interception capabilities, so police spent considerable resources to install their own equipment, but were eventually swamped by 21 million data points (web searches, images, videos, texts). Much of the data was encrypted and unintelligible. The case remains under investigation. Case 6: Terrorist group communications prove elusive RCMP are investigating a group of individuals suspected of participating in a terrorist organization and plotting to travel overseas. Police attempted a court-ordered interception of their devices but found the communications were encrypted. As a result, police had to design technical solutions which meant they needed an extension of the court order, and this has delayed the process. The communications among the suspected terrorists have not been obtained. The case is still under investigation.

7. Les forces spéciales canadiennes face à Mad Max

La Presse+, Vincent Larouche, 2016 11 15

Mont Zardak, Kurdistan irakien - Si leur mission consiste principalement à épauler et former les forces kurdes qui combattent l'EI en Irak, les soldats canadiens font tout de même face à des attaques qu'on dirait directement sorties d'un film hollywoodien. Les 4 x 4 blindés débouchent au sommet de la montagne dans un nuage de poussière. Des soldats canadiens lourdement armés, bardés de gadgets technologiques, en sortent et s'avancent vers un rempart d'où ils embrassent l'horizon. L'endroit leur est familier : c'est ici qu'ils ont fait face pendant des mois aux djihadistes du groupe État islamique (EI), dont les tactiques meurtrières leur semblaient parfois sorties d'un film post-apocalyptique. La Presse a accompagné hier les forces d'opérations spéciales canadiennes dans le nord de l'Irak, où elles offrent depuis 2014 assistance et entraînement aux combattants kurdes locaux qui luttent contre l'EI. Les soldats d'élite canadiens, dont plusieurs cachent leur visage et leur nom pour des motifs de sécurité, n'avaient jamais accordé un accès aussi poussé aux médias depuis le début de leur mission. Jusqu'à il y a environ un mois, le mont Zardak marquait la ligne de front. « Quand je suis arrivé ici, on voyait les drapeaux de Daech [acronyme arabe de l'EI] dans les villages ici en bas », explique le lieutenant-colonel Steven Hunter, du Régiment d'opérations spéciales du Canada.

8. Man shot by police was former Falun Gong activist

Vancouver Sun, John Colebourn, 2016 11 15

Vancouver - A man shot and killed by Vancouver police last week was detained in China in 2002 for his involvement in a Tiananmen Square demonstration in Beijing. Daniel Peter Rintoul, 38, has been identified by the B.C. Coroners Service as the person fatally shot at an East Vancouver Canadian Tire store on Thursday. Rintoul was arrested in China after trying to unfurl a banner for the spiritual practice of Falun Gong. Rintoul repeatedly yelled "Falun Gong Hoa" (Falun Gong is good) as he was shoved into a police van. He was allegedly beaten, detained for 20 hours and sent home to Alberta. He has been living in Vancouver for the last few years. Relatives in Calgary acknowledged that Rintoul was the wellknown Falun Gong activist. The Calgary woman at the family home said she was working on writing a media statement. She said she expected Rintoul's name to be released to the public Tuesday, and was caught offguard when it was revealed a day early. "I've been getting phone calls like crazy," she said. "I just don't know what to say. All I can say is, 'No comment.'" Falun Gong, also known as Falun Dafa, is a spiritual practice based on truthfulness, compassion and forbearance and involves slowmoving exercise and meditation. It has been outlawed in China since 1999, where thousands of practitioners - who are considered a cult by the Chinese government - have been detained or forced into labour camps.

9. Top secret RCMP files reveal digital roadblocks in terrorism, major crime cases

CBC News and Toronto Star, Staff reporters, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - Suspected child predators, drug traffickers and extremists allegedly planning attacks or to join ISIS are escaping the eyes of the law due to increasingly impenetrable encryption and other digital roadblocks, according to top secret RCMP files reviewed by a CBC News/Toronto Star investigation. The Mounties provided access to the files in a bid to demonstrate how investigations of tech-savvy suspects are increasingly "going dark" because crucial evidence is beyond their reach. The rare look inside active investigations comes amidst a thorny debate and public consultation on Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act (C-51), which includes proposals to significantly expand police powers. Four ideas floated in the federal government's green paper on national security would enhance investigative capabilities, including the power to compel suspects to unlock their encrypted computers and cellphones and a law to require telecommunication and internet service providers to install interception and data-retention equipment in their networks. But privacy and civil liberties advocates are fiercely opposed to such measures and demand police provide more evidence to justify their request for new powers. RCMP Chief Supt. Jeff Adam admits law enforcement hasn't done a great job explaining the investigative challenges of the digital world to the public. "So far, [the debate] appears to be driven very much from one side, which is those that would like more privacy and more anonymity," he said. "What we need is an awareness of Canadians and lawmakers that our capabilities as they existed in the past, and the expectations of our ability to deliver on those, has changed significantly where we have less capability but potentially the same expectations." To bolster its case, the RCMP granted one CBC reporter and one Toronto Star reporter access to 10 "high priority" investigations. The two journalists underwent RCMP screening to obtain top secret security clearance. They were then provided details and summaries of the 10 cases, though police withheld names, locations and other details to protect the investigations and potential court cases. In one case, police say they obtained warrants to conduct surveillance on a group of people in Eastern Canada suspected in a terrorism conspiracy. They discovered the main suspect's phone was connecting to multiple cellular networks, none of which was technically equipped to intercept the suspect's text messages and internet traffic.

10. Trudeau's Cuba trip to focus on trade ties, human rights

Toronto Star, Tonda MacCharles, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - At a state dinner in Havana, the red carpet will be out to welcome Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his wife Sophie Grégoire Trudeau to Cuba Tuesday. Trudeau goes to Havana 40 years after his father became the first leader of a NATO country to visit post-revolutionary Cuba. But the Liberal government is not playing up the return of a Trudeau son to Cuban shores as a renewal of personal ties forged in 1976 between his father Pierre Elliot Trudeau and the Castro administration. Instead Canadian government officials are casting Trudeau the son's trip as diplomatic mission to reinforce trade links, to continue Ottawa's "respectful engagement" with Cuba and to deliver a human rights message. Two government officials who briefed reporters on a for-background-only basis acknowledged "clearly the name of Trudeau is known in Cuba, clearly this is a significant factor" but said the significance of the Trudeau family's history there "is more for the Cubans," said one. "This is first and foremost an opportunity for the government of Canada to exchange with Cuba," he said. They said Trudeau's message on the ground will include a display of support for civil society groups in Havana who defend human rights, for "peaceful pluralism, respect for diversity and in particular, the rights of women and girls and LGBTQ" people. They didn't utter the word democracy, saying "Whether it's specific to election and multiparty elections, I think he'll talk about the importance of strong governance and structures." But many Cuban observers say Trudeau's trip comes at an important political moment with the election of Donald Trump to the White House. Trump has sent mixed signals on Cuba.

11. Trudeau affirms commitment to NATO, Latvia mission following Trump victory

Canadian Press, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 11 15

Ottawa - Canada is pressing ahead with plans to deploy hundreds of troops as part of a NATO effort to deter Russian aggression in eastern Europe amid concerns about the military alliance's future under Donald Trump. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Monday affirmed Canada's commitment to lead one of four NATO forces in eastern Europe, which will see 450 Canadian troops deploy to Latvia starting next year. Trudeau said he is "very proud" that Canada is taking a leadership role "as we support the Baltic states and defend the eastern European border against Russia." His comments came as NATO members scrambled to understand how the Trump administration plans to deal with and support the 67-year-old military alliance. During the presidential election campaign, Trump repeatedly called NATO obsolete and warned the U.S. would not automatically come to the defence of a member that was attacked. The real-estate mogul and reality- television star also praised Russian President Vladimir Putin, despite a clampdown on human rights and democracy in Russia and its actions in Ukraine and Syria. Now that Trump has been elected president, many NATO members have been wringing their hands over what might happen if Russia decided to flex its muscles in eastern Europe in the same way it did in Ukraine.

12. Trump effect moving north, experts warn

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 11 15

Montreal - There was a time when Daniel Gallant would get up in the morning looking for his first fight. "I decided to show my dedication to the movement by committing an assault every day for a year," said the former white supremacist, listing off his weapons of choice: his fists, a beer stein, a car door, billy clubs, a hockey stick. Now Gallant, 41, who has turned the Swastika tattoo on his stomach into a raven, is trying to prevent others from following in his steelted boot steps down the same violent path. His job just got tougher with the election of Donald Trump, he says. David Duke, the former "imperial wizard" of the Ku Klux Klan who was running for the senate in Louisiana, was among the first to congratulate Trump on his election night victory, claiming some of the credit for his campaign. Duke himself lost, but hours later, the KKK marched on the streets of North Carolina. They are planning a "victory parade" Dec. 3. If anyone thought Trump, now elected, would distance himself from his more extreme backers, they will have to think again: Trump just named his campaign chief Steve Bannon - the founder of the alt-right website Breitbart, and widely seen as racist, misogynist and anti-Semitic - as his chief strategist and "senior counsellor." Then came Front National Leader Marine Le Pen, up for election in France next year, proclaiming with Trump's election a "new world order."

13. 'Knife fight' as Trump builds an unconventional national security cabinet

CNN.com, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 15

Washington - Donald Trump's transition is being marked by sharp internal disagreements over key cabinet appointments and direction, both for internal West Wing positions and key national security posts, sources involved in the transition team tell CNN. One source with knowledge of the transition described it as a "knife fight." The divisions are being played out as Trump considers key appointments in the national security and diplomatic sectors, including secretary of state, with mainstream conservatives supporting John Bolton against Rudy Giuliani, who is seen as a loyalist to Trump. On other key national security appointments, there is more agreement. Sen. Jeff Sessions is now the leading contender for attorney general, and is in the mix for secretary of defense as well, say multiple sources with knowledge of the transition. Retired Lt. General Ron Burgess, former director of the DIA, is a leading contender for director of national intelligence. Retired General Michael Flynn is leading candidate for national security adviser. Pete Hoekstra, a long-serving former congressman from Michigan who chaired the House Intelligence Committee from 2004-2007 is thought to be in the running for the same role or director of the CIA.

14. Attacks on Muslim Americans Fuel Increase in Hate Crime, F.B.I. Says

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, 2016 11 15

Washington - The F.B.I. reported Monday that attacks against American Muslims surged last year, driving an overall increase in hate crime against all groups. The data, which is the most comprehensive look at hate crime nationwide, expanded on previous findings by researchers and outside monitors, who have noted an alarming rise in some types of crimes tied to the vitriol of this year's presidential campaign and the aftermath of terrorist attacks at home and abroad since 2015. That trend appears to have spiked in just the last week, with civil rights groups and news organizations reporting dozens of verbal or physical assaults on minorities and others that appear to have been fueled by divisions over the election. In its report on Monday, the F.B.I. cataloged a total of 5,818 hate crimes in 2015 -- a rise of about 6 percent over the previous year -- including assaults, bombings, threats, and property destruction against minorities, women, gays and others. Attacks against Muslim Americans saw the biggest surge. There were 257 reports of assaults, attacks on mosques and other hate crimes against Muslims last year, a jump of about 67 percent over 2014. It was the highest total since 2001, when more than 480 attacks occurred in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Responding to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by a lawyer for the demonstrators, U.S. District Judge Berle M. Schiller gave the agencies until early next year to submit a list of any records detailing the agencies' potential surveillance activities, along with a justification of why those documents should be withheld from public disclosure. Schiller said he would rely upon that list to determine whether to release such documents or whether he would need to examine such records in person before making his decision.

The Minister of Defence, Brig-Gen. To this end, Dan-Ali warned the DAs and concerned authorities that the federal government would no longer tolerate any form of shoddiness and lack of creativity in handling of national security matters. He called for innovation, noting that "given the complexity and uncertainty of today's security environment, our defence architecture and thought process would have to significantly to provide sustainable military and political outcomes.

17. How Trump Can Gut Obama's National Security Policies on Day One

NBC News, Ken Dilanian, 2016 11 15

New York - President Obama made aggressive use of the CIA and Special Operations Forces to hunt and kill al Qaeda, ISIS and other terror groups. But he also imposed a set of rules designed to regulate the conduct of U.S operatives -- banning torture, for example, and minimizing the risk of civilian casualties in drone strikes. President-elect Trump, who campaigned against those rules, would be able to undo most of those rules in his first hour in office. In fact, if he chooses to do so, Trump can quickly reshape large swaths of American national security policy, much of which is governed by executive orders and presidential policy guidance that can be overridden by the president's signature. That includes U.S. sanctions on Russia, and its recent rapprochement with Cuba. "The range of unilateral presidential authority is astonishingly broad," said Steven Aftergood, who directs the project on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists. "If you look at the presidential policy directives issued by Obama, they cover topics as diverse as biological weapons, nuclear weapons policy, intelligence surveillance policy, cyber operations, maritime security, arms-transfer policy, and on and on. And because it is based on presidential authority, it can also be revised and reshaped by a new president." "Although the more visible executive orders on national security involved closing Guantanamo and ending torture," said Stephen Vladeck, a national security expert at the University of Texas School of Law, "the far more significant internal constraints adopted by the Obama administration involved targeted killing and surveillance -- two contexts in which the government embraced limits on its authority that were far more significant than those imposed by Congress or the Constitution, especially as applied to non-citizens overseas." In 2014, in the wake of the Edward Snowden leaks, Obama issued a policy document tightening the rules on surveillance.

18. Secret Backdoor in Some U.S. Phones Sent Data to China, Analysts Say

New York Times, Matt Apuzzo, Michael S. Schmidt, 2016 11 15

Washington - For about $50, you can get a smartphone with a high- definition display, fast data service and, according to security contractors, a secret feature: a backdoor that sends all your text messages to China every 72 hours. Security contractors recently discovered preinstalled software in some Android phones that monitors where users go, whom they talk to and what they write in text messages. The American authorities say it is not clear whether this represents secretive data mining for advertising purposes or a Chinese government effort to collect intelligence. International customers and users of disposable or prepaid phones are the people most affected by the software. But the scope is unclear. The Chinese company that wrote the software, Shanghai Adups Technology Company, says its code runs on more than 700 million phones, cars and other smart devices. One American phone manufacturer, BLU Products, said that 120,000 of its phones had been affected and that it had updated the software to eliminate the feature. Kryptowire, the security firm that discovered the vulnerability, said the Adups software transmitted the full contents of text messages, contact lists, call logs, location information and other data to a Chinese server. The code comes preinstalled on phones and the surveillance is not disclosed to users, said Tom Karygiannis, a vice president of Kryptowire, which is based in Fairfax, Va. "Even if you wanted to, you wouldn't have known about it," he said.

19. Snowden warns of increase in U.S. domestic spying after Trump victory

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 15

Buenos Aires - Donald Trump's election as U.S. president raises concern that Washington may increase the intrusiveness of domestic intelligence gathering, former U.S. spy agency contractor Edward Snowden said on Monday, warning that democratic checks and balances were losing ground to authoritarianism. Snowden lives in Moscow under an asylum deal after he leaked classified information in 2013 that triggered an international furor over the reach of U.S. spy operations. He spoke at a teleconference hosted by Buenos Aires University's law school. "We are starting to substitute open government for sheer authoritarianism, a government based not upon the principle of informed consent granted by people who understand its activities but rather a trust in personalities, a trust in claims, a trust in the hope that they will do the right thing," Snowden said. Washington pledged not to engage in indiscriminate espionage following Snowden's 2013 disclosures. But Snowden questioned if that policy could be modified by new officials "who have a very different set of values and can govern in the dark."

20. The terrifying prospect of an Attorney General Giuliani

Washington Post, Radley Balko, 2016 11 15

Comment - Among the names being tossed around for Donald Trump's attorney general is Rudy Giuliani, a politician that the journalist Jimmy Breslin once called "a small man in search of a balcony." Of course, Giuliani's name isn't a surprise. The former New York mayor -- who once said that "freedom is about the willingness of every single human being to cede to lawful authority a great deal of discretion about what you do" -- has been a Trump adviser and surrogate for months. He's actively lobbying for the Justice Department post, but he has also been mentioned as a possibility to head up the Department of Homeland Security. It seems likely that Trump's election is the end of criminal-justice reform at the federal level. Given his campaign rhetoric, and Trump's endorsement by nearly every law enforcement agency in the country, I doubt we'll see any more damning reports on police abuse from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. But Giuliani at Justice is an especially troubling proposition. This is a man whose career has been marked by prosecutorial excesses, knee-jerk defenses of abusive cops and an affinity for using the power of his political offices to get vengeance on his enemies. Note: Radley Balko blogs about criminal justice, the drug war and civil liberties for The Washington Post. He is the author of the book "Rise of the Warrior Cop: The Militarization of America's Police Forces."

21. Trump's most important new partner: The intelligence community

Washington Post, Michael Hayden, 2016 11 14

Op-ed - I don't envy the president-elect's intelligence briefers. Candidate Donald Trump stormed through the election as a primal force of dystopia, anger and accusation. More often than not, there was little effort to back up accusations with fact. Many of them were, in fact, not true. With that record, a fair question is: What role will facts and fact-bearers play in the Trump administration. What happens when he is told that Syrian refugees are already extremely vetted? Or when his intel briefer dishes up that the Russians really aren't targeting the Islamic State? What controls - - new data or preexisting mythology? For many authoritarian populists (think the leaders of Turkey, Venezuela and Russia), it's the latter. The intelligence community sometimes makes mistakes, but it strives to create a fact-based, inductive view of the world. From as much data as it can acquire, it works to create general conclusions. Not surprisingly, there are often tensions with policy makers who tend to be deductive, trying to apply their vision to specific situations. For its part, the intelligence community needs to understand how the president-elect learns and how contrarian ideas are best served up to him. Not an easy task. And the intelligence community needs to stand its ground, even, or especially, when it is irritating the client in chief. Simply writing down an unwelcome assessment or saying it once is not enough.

22. Trump Backer Pushes for New CIA 'Enhanced Interrogation'

The Daily Beast, Kimberly Dozier, 2016 11 14

Column - The former senior CIA officer who championed waterboarding hopes President-elect Donald Trump will bring harsh interrogation methods--and bring the CIA back into the business of interrogating terrorist suspects. "We have to be able to capture terrorists. We have to be able to interrogate them. We don't do that anymore," said Jose Rodriguez, who led the CIA's clandestine service during the Bush administration. A Trump supporter, Rodriguez said he didn't want to lead the CIA, though he has been named as a possible pick. But he does want to bring back some form of now-illegal interrogation measures, like waterboarding, sleep deprivation, and other so-called "enhanced interrogation methods" approved by the Bush White House to question terrorist suspects in the wake of the al-Qaeda attacks of 9/11. "Enhanced interrogation techniques are well known to the enemy and we would have to come up with something else," he told The Daily Beast, though he declined to describe what that might entail. He also wants the Trump administration to block current cases against CIA employees who carried out the program. Trump said during the presidential campaign he would bring back waterboarding "and much worse."

23. Trump team seeks top-secret security clearances for Trump's children

CBS News, Julianna Goldman, 2016 11 15

New York - President-elect Donald Trump is potentially seeking top secret security clearances for his children, sources tell CBS News. The Trump team has asked the White House to explore the possibility of getting his children the top secret security clearances. Logistically, the children would need to be designated by the current White House as national security advisers to their father to receive top secret clearances. However, once Mr. Trump becomes president, he would be able to put in the request himself. His children would need to fill out the security questionnaire (SF-86) and go through the requisite background checks. While nepotism rules prevent the president-elect from hiring his kids to work in the White House, they do not need to be government officials to receive top secret security clearances.

24. U.S. on alert for new nuclear or missile tests by N. Korea

USA Today, Kirk Spitzer, 2016 11 15

Washington - Among the pressing issues facing President-elect Donald Trump when he takes office on Inauguration Day will be North Korea's rogue nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs -- and a crisis might not wait that long. U.S. forces and allies in Japan and South Korea are on alert for a new missile launch after recent satellite imagery that showed what appeared to be potential preparations at North Korea's Sohae launch facility. North Korea has carried out two nuclear weapons tests and dozens of missile tests and launches this year in defiance of United Nations sanctions. Although not all the missile tests have been successful, the North has made significant advances in developing nuclear weapons and the technology needed to mount them to long-range missiles. South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff said last week it was closely monitoring moves by the North Korean military at its Punggye-ri nuclear test site and other possible missile-launching sites and is prepared to respond to any provocative acts, South Korea's Yonhap News Agency reported. North Korea's leaders have often timed weapons tests or other provocative actions to key dates and events at home or overseas as a way of drawing attention to its demands.

26. Assange agrees to take DNA test over rape allegations

London Times, John Simpson, 2016 11 15

London - Julian Assange has agreed to take a DNA test over an allegation that he raped a woman in her sleep, after he was questioned at the Ecuadorean embassy in London yesterday. Mr Assange, 45, who founded the whistleblower website WikiLeaks, has taken refuge at the embassy since losing an extradition battle in 2012. There has been a four-year stalemate over his demand to be interviewed there. The Swedish authorities wanted to question him in Stockholm, where two women lodged complaints of rape and sexual assault against him in 2010. The five-year statute of limitations for one of the women's claims has now passed. Mr Assange insists that his sexual encounters with the women were consensual. He has argued throughout that he faces onward extradition to the US, where he believes that he could be jailed for sedition and espionage after WikiLeaks released thousands of US military and diplomatic secrets.

27. Donald Trump's new chief strategist Steve Bannon 'will call Nigel Farage before Theresa May'

London Daily Telegraph, Christopher Hope, Peter Dominiczak, 2016 11 15

London - Donald Trump will consult Nigel Farage about any policy proposals which will affect Britain before he contacts Theresa May, according to the Ukip leader's aides. Steve Bannon, Mr Trump's chief strategist, will "run ideas" past the Ukip leader before discussing them with the British Prime Minister, claims Arron Banks, the millionaire Ukip donor. Mr Banks and Mr Farage met with Mr Bannon and Mr Trump for talks in New York on Saturday. The news came as ministers vowed to defy Mrs May by holding talks with Mr Farage about his meetings with the president-elect in New York at the weekend. Downing Street has reacted angrily to a Cabinet backlash over Mrs May's decision to dismiss Mr Farage's offer to "mend fences" with the Trump camp, after disobliging comments by ministers and No 10 aides during the US presidential election campaign.

28. UK accused of withholding evidence over Russian whistleblower's death

The Guardian (London), Luke Harding, 2016 11 15

London - The government is refusing to release "super-sensitive" evidence from Britain's spy agencies which could shed light on the mysterious death of a Russian whistleblower, the high court has heard, fuelling perceptions of a cover-up. The home secretary, Amber Rudd, has made an application preventing the disclosure of intelligence files concerning Alexander Perepilichnyy, who collapsed and died in November 2012 outside his luxury home in Weybridge, Surrey, after he had been out jogging. He was 44. Surrey police have said there were no suspicious circumstances surrounding his death. However, a pre-inquest hearing heard that traces of a rare and deadly plant poison, Gelsemium elegans, were discovered in his stomach and that the poison has been used in the past by Russian and Chinese assassins. On Monday, the case spilled over into the high court. The judge, Mr Justice Cranston, held two sessions: one open to the public and the other secret. The home secretary had filed a public interest immunity (PII) certificate, arguing that disclosure of possible evidence from MI5 and MI6 might damage national security. In the months before his death, Perepilichnyy received a number of death threats.

29. UK opts in to new Europol intelligence-sharing programme

Financial Times, Helen Warrell, 2016 11 14

London - The UK will opt in to a new intelligence-sharing programme with EU law enforcement agency Europol, in an effort to boost cross-border action against terrorism and cyber crime ahead of Brexit. Brandon Lewis, policing minister, said on Monday that while it was still "too early to speculate" on whether security co-operation would continue after Britain leaves the EU, the government had decided to join the updated Europol framework in the short term. It is UK's first significant opt-in decision since the June referendum. Britain's collaboration in Europol was due to expire in May 2017 because the last government initially rejected the new programme, fearing it would reduce the operational independence of UK policing and increase the obligation to share intelligence data. Ministers have now secured concessions that do not extend the agency's powers over member states. Historically, Europol has been able to gather and disseminate intelligence, but its officers have no executive powers such as the right to make arrests. Following the terrorist attacks in Paris last year, some European interior ministers have called for more power for the agency. Charles Michel, Belgium's prime minister, even suggested the EU should set up a "European CIA". The new agreement falls far short of this, giving a "clear mandate" only to the EU's internet referrals unit, which tackles online terrorist propaganda, and allowing Europol to initiate investigations together with member states.

30. Strict bail conditions, including $250k bond, for 22yo Sydney man charged with terrorism-related offences

ABC (Australia), Stephanie Dalzell and Jackson Vernon, 2016 11 15

Sydney - A 22-year-old Sydney man arrested over alleged terrorism-related offences has been granted bail with strict conditions that include a $250,000 bond. Muhammad Abdul Karim Musleh was arrested by the Joint Counter Terrorism Team at a property in Wattle Grove, in Sydney's south-west, on Tuesday. Authorities allege he travelled to the Syrian conflict zone in 2013, and played an active role in supporting others to travel to the region. His defence counsel, Greg Scragg, told Parramatta Local Court Musleh's parents had offered a bail bond of $250,000.

Mr Scragg said Musleh's mother, who is a government interpreter, and his father, an accountant for Transport NSW, would take out a second mortgage on their home in order to meet the payment. "My client understands if he was to breach bail conditions he puts at risk his mother's money and his family home," she said. "It has been explained to him in clear terms." The Crown prosecutor told the court bail was not opposed, as long any flight risk was mitigated by a set of stringent conditions.

31. Case Looms for Possible U.S. War Crimes in Afghanistan

New York Times, Somini Sengupta, Marlise Simons, 2016 11 15

New York - The prosecutor of the International Criminal Court said Monday that she had a "reasonable basis to believe" that American soldiers committed war crimes in Afghanistan, including torture. The international prosecutor has been considering whether to begin a full-fledged investigation into potential war crimes in Afghanistan for years. In Monday's announcement, the prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, signaled that a full investigation was likely. Still, the prosecutor did not announce a final decision on an investigation, which would have to be approved by judges, and it is unlikely that the United States will cooperate. The United States is not a party to the court, which was established to prosecute war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide. But Afghanistan is a member of the court, so allegations of crimes committed in its territory, no matter the nationality of the perpetrators, are widely considered to be fair game. David Bosco, an Indiana University professor who follows the court, said the language of the report suggested that Ms. Bensouda was ready to seek its permission to proceed to an investigation in "a matter of days or weeks."

A statement from the Presidential Palace said the president told a UN's sanctions delegation that the world's body should consider terrorism a long-term threat. The president stressed continued war on terrorism and said: "We want all terrorists and the current Taliban leader Mullah Haibatullah's names to be added to the UNSC list." The president asked the UN delegation to establish a coordinated mechanism for further discussing the issue "We want a long lasting peace in Afghanistan and for this reason we are ready with an obvious strategy." 33. Unprovoked Indian firing at LoC could lead to 'strategic miscalculation'

The International News, Mariana Baabar, 2016 11 15

Islamabad - The civil and military leadership on Monday strongly deplored the continuous ceasefire violations by the Indian forces which on Sunday night saw seven Pakistani soldiers killed in Thub near the Bhimber area, with Chief of Army Staff (COAS) General Raheel Sharif directing his soldiers at the Line of Control (LoC) to 'effectively' respond to India's unprovoked firing across the border, promising that his army would continue to respond effectively and leave no stone unturned to defend the motherland. Pakistan impressed upon India that these continuous violations could lead to "a strategic miscalculation". As Raheel Sharif honoured his dead soldiers by attending their funeral ceremony in Jhelum, he also attended a briefing on the latest situation, including the continuous unprovoked ceasefire by India. The foreign secretary deplored the increasing Indian ceasefire violations at the LoC and the Working Boundary, especially in the last two months.

Kabul - US military and US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) personnel may be guilty of committing war crimes during the interrogation of detainees in Afghanistan, says the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague. ICC Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda said in a report on Monday there was "reasonable basis to believe that, in the course of interrogating these detainees ... members of the US armed forces and CIA resorted to techniques amounting to the commission of the war crimes of torture, cruel treatment ... and rape." 35. Egypt's Mohamed Morsi has death sentence overturned

Cairo - Egypt's court of cassation has overturned a death sentence against the country's deposed president Mohamed Morsi and ordered a retrial, according to reports. The country's first democratically elected president, Morsi was overthrown by a military coup in July 2013 after having served just one year of a four-year term. The organisation to which he belonged, the Muslim Brotherhood, has since been outlawed. A government crackdown on the movement, as well as other groups, has resulted in tens of thousands of arrests and mass trials. Morsi was tried in an Egyptian court on several charges, including one of escaping prison during the 2011 uprising against then-president Hosni Mubarak. He was also accused of sharing state secrets with foreign powers, including Qatar. His defence argued that he was merely engaging all foreign entities within the limits that any head of state would.

Voice of America, Chika Odua, 2016 11 14

Abuja - The head of the Biafra separatist movement in Nigeria has written an open letter to U.S. President-elect Donald Trump. The movement hopes Trump, who backed British voters' decision to leave the European Union, will also support a push for Biafra to win independence. The letter, sent by a Nigerian activist named Nnamdi Kanu, contains a forceful appeal to the U.S. president-elect. It says Trump's victory placed upon him a "historic and moral burden ... to liberate the enslaved nations in Africa," which it says are trapped in artificial boundaries designed to reinforce colonial domination. Kanu currently sits in a prison in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, charged with treason for supporting a movement calling for territories in southeastern Nigeria to break away and form a country called Biafra. Biafra tried to break away once before -- in a three-year war starting in 1967 that left at least 1 million people dead, mostly from starvation.

40. Azhar sanctions: Uri out of India's proposal to U.N.

New Delhi - India has decided to drop any reference to the Uri attack from its proposal to be placed before a United Nations sanctions committee to designate Jaish-e-Mohammad (JeM) chief Masood Azhar as an international terrorist, a senior government official told The Hindu. China had put a technical hold on this proposal in April this year, which was extended on October 1. Within hours of the attack on the Uri Army camp on September 18, where 18 soldiers were killed, the Director-General of Military Operations Lt. General Ranbir Singh told a press conference in Delhi that the attack was carried out by two terrorists belonging to the JeM. The investigations were then handed over to the National Investigation Agency (NIA), which is yet to conclude its probe. Intelligence officials, however, have said the modus operandi of the Uri attack had tell tale signs that it was carried out by Lashkar-e-Taiba, another Pakistan-based terrorist outfit.

The law and its related topics, including how to put coordination of government departments into practice and how to review products and services before they are made available on the internet, will also be heated topics of discussion at the World Internet Conference, experts said. Li Yuxiao, secretary-general of the Cybersecurity Association of China, said that he will go to Wuzhen, Zhejiang province, to participate in the third WIC, which runs from Wednesday to Friday, adding that one of his focuses will be legal issues. "It's good to see that our nation has finally drawn up and adopted its first Cybersecurity Law," Li said. "It's the guide when we draft some other cybersecurity-related rules, and I think its adoption has brought more confidence to internet and judicial professionals," he said. "I'd like to share the law with foreign guests and listen to their opinions at the conference." The law, with 79 articles, was approved by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, China's top legislature, on Nov 7, and will be effective on June 1, 2017.

The committees will be independent from local government to prevent interference, while members of the committees will be elected by local legislators and headed by the provincial Party chief, according to a China Daily interview with an insider who declined to be named. Guo said that Beijing has already conducted substantial research into the program according to the requirements of the central government. 44. Opposition cries foul over Korea-Japan military pact

Korea Herald, Staff reporter, 2016 11 15

Seoul - Opposition parties Tuesday set in motion a campaign to oust Defense Minister Han Min-koo over a controversial military pact with Japan that was tentatively signed by the two sides late Monday. Making good on their pledge, the three groups -- the Democratic Party of Korea, People's Party and Justice Party -- decided to submit a parliamentary motion to recommend the minister's dismissal on Nov. 30 and put it to vote at a plenary session slated for Dec. 2. Its passage is likely, since the opposition bloc controls more than a majority of seats in Parliament. A provisional deal was reached in Tokyo on Monday evening on the General Security of Military Information Agreement, which aims to enhance cooperation in coping with North Korea's growing nuclear and missile threats. It does not require parliamentary ratification. A previous effort to sign the deal was derailed in 2012 in the face of strong public disapproval in Seoul. The opposition parties have threatened to unseat the defense minister if he pushes through the deal this time, without public consensus.

Seoul - South Korea will put the military intelligence-sharing pact it reached with Japan up for final Cabinet approval this week, the foreign ministry said Tuesday, as Seoul is moving to finalize the controversial deal despite local objections. South Korea and Japan tentatively signed the General Security of Military Information Agreement (GSOMIA) on Monday, which would allow the South to share its sensitive military intelligence on North Korea with Japan. The Ministry of Government Legislation has checked the deal and "upon the completion of screening, the deal may get introduced to the next vice ministerial meeting on Thursday," ministry spokesman Cho June-hyuck said in a press briefing. Approval at the vice ministerial session will allow it to be forwarded to a Cabinet meeting, the spokesman said. The next Cabinet meeting after Thursday is set for Nov. 22. It is the Asian neighbors' second attempt to forge a military pact in the face of mounting threats from North Korea's nuclear and missile programs.

Four years ago, the countries came close to reaching the deal, but it fell apart amid a public outcry over the military deal involving the former colonizer.

Beijing - Donald J. Trump has called China a "currency manipulator," threatened to impose stiff tariffs on Chinese imports and accused the country of inventing the idea of climate change to hurt American businesses. But in his first telephone conversation with President Xi Jinping of China, Mr. Trump, now the president-elect, appeared to set aside those critiques expressed on the campaign trail, vowing that the two nations would have "one of the strongest relationships," according to a statement released by Mr. Trump's transition office, Reuters reported. Mr. Xi, in turn, told Mr. Trump that "facts have shown that cooperation is the only correct choice" for the United States and China, according to Xinhua, the Chinese state news agency. In the phone call, which took place on Monday Beijing time, the two men agreed to maintain close communications and to meet at an early date. Despite the optimistic tone, analysts believe the relationship between Mr. Trump and Mr. Xi could grow tense if Mr. Trump follows through on his campaign promises, including a vow to impose a 45 percent tax on Chinese imports. Already, foreign policy experts in China appear to be nervous about the prospect of a trade war.

Mossoul, Iraq - Un mois après le début de l'offensive contre Daech, les combats sont loin d'être terminés. Ils se sont d'abord livrés dans les villages de la plaine de Ninive, fortifiés par l'État islamique, avant d'atteindre la périphérie de Mossoul. Les forces irakiennes sont désormais à trois kilomètres du Tigre, le grand fleuve qui traverse la ville du nord vers le sud. Le long de la route numéro 2, large avenue qui traverse en ligne droite les faubourgs de Mossoul en direction du centre-ville, beaucoup des bâtiments ont été écrasés par des bombes comme avec un marteau géant. Aucun être vivant n'est visible et les rues ressemblent à celles d'une ville fantôme, alignement interminable de commerces et d'entrepôts, de maisons d'habitation et d'immeubles bas. De temps en temps, des obus d'artillerie traversent le ciel avec un bruissement métallique avant d'aller exploser un peu plus loin. Parfois, un camion militaire irakien recouvert de plaques de blindage fonce en direction des combats, chargé de soldats ou de cartons de ravitaillement, ou bien une ambulance revient toutes sirènes hurlantes de la bataille.

The trial centers on Fajer Faraj, who was arrested as he attempted to leave Lebanon for Turkey on his way to Germany. 55. Terrorisme « Pour Daech, les vidéos d'exécution font office de purge politico-religieuse »

L'Humanité, Ixchel Delaporte, 2016 11 15

Paris - La chercheuse Alexandra Herfroy-Mischler a décrypté le contenu d'une soixantaine de vidéos de décapitation, tournées au Pakistan, en Afghanistan et en Syrie. Un travail inédit qui questionne la stratégie de communication de Daech en direction des populations locales. Et interroge également le rôle des médias occidentaux dans cette « dynamique de l'horreur et de la peur ». Chercheuse associée au CNRS, au Centre de recherche français de Jérusalem (CRFJ), Alexandra Herfroy-Mischler travaille également pour le Harry S. Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace, à l'Université hébraïque de Jérusalem. Vous avez travaillé sur 62 vidéos de décapitation, immolation et exécution produites par Daech entre août 2014 et juin 2015. Quel était votre objectif ? Alexandra Herfroy-Mischler On voulait rassembler ces vidéos pour en connaître leur contenu précis, comment elles avaient été fabriquées, avec quels moyens, quelles durées, dans quelles langues et surtout décrypter attentivement chaque message. Les vidéos n'ont pas une unité de temps. Elles peuvent aller de cinq à vingt-trois minutes. Nous avons aussi constaté que leur production est exponentielle. Nous avons eu une première surprise : la plupart des vidéos (24 sur 62) sont produites par des entités locales et non pas par les trois agences de presse officielles de Daech, Al-Hayat, Al-I'tisam et Al-Furqan. Fabriquées localement, elles sont ensuite rattachées à Daech. Sur ces 24 vidéos locales, prises sur le vif, seulement 16 % possèdent des micros, avec un niveau technologique peu avancé. L'autre aspect, c'est que 45 des 62 vidéos sont produites en arabe sans sous-titre. La certitude que ces vidéos faisaient partie d'une stratégie de propagande internationale a été complètement mise en cause par ces résultats inattendus.

56. What can be done about Europe's listless pursuit of Hezbollah terrorists? (Canada).

Jerusalem Post, Benjamin Weinthal, 2016 11 15

Jerusalem - After murdering five Israelis and their Bulgarian bus driver in 2012, two Hezbollah operatives who were put on trial in absentia on Thursday at a Sofia court remain secure in Lebanon. The lethargy surrounding the efforts to capture the two mirrors the glacial-like pace of the trial. Procedural difficulties in serving legal notification to all of the Israeli victims, including 32 wounded in the terrorist attack in Burgas, caused a second postponement until December 12. "Iran and Hezbollah were behind the Burgas bombing, just as they were responsible for the atrocities in Argentina. The former head of Bulgaria's counter-terrorism unit and the US government believe both suspects - Lebanese-Canadian Hassan el-Hajj Hassan and Lebanese-Australian Meliad Farah - are in Lebanon. In a sign of waning enthusiasm, there has been no significant action to compel the Lebanese government to extradite the Hezbollah operatives.

57. What challenges will the CIA face under Trump?

Jerusalem Post, Yonah Jeremy Bob, 2016 11 15

Jerusalem - The biggest immediate challenge and strategic intelligence shift by the CIA and the American special operations forces under President-elect Donald Trump is likely to be in Syria and Iraq. Obama administration officials from the Pentagon have been battling the CIA and the State Department for some time to focus the US fighting as exclusively as possible on Islamic State and not against the Assad regime or other Syrian terrorist groups. Currently, on top of air strikes, at least a few hundred CIA and special forces personnel are advising and providing arms to the Syrian rebels to fight both ISIS and Syrian President Bashar Assad, who ruled the united country until the 2011 civil war broke out and still seeks to regain control of the country. All of that may change on January 20 when Trump takes his seat at the Resolute desk. It has been the job of the CIA to vet which Syrian rebel groups get US arms and advisers and which do not because of links to al-Qaida and other terrorist tendencies.

58. « Les mettre tous en prison, c'est une solution temporaire »

Le Soir, Philippe de Boeck, 2016 11 15

Bruxelles - Pour Vincent Seron, chaque pays confronté au phénomène des « returnees » a sa méthode ou en improvise une. La Belgique a une politique et des lois en la matière avec un principe qui est l'incarcération de tout « returnee ». On peut le comprendre à certains égards puisque le facteur de risque est très élevé. En laisser passer un à travers les mailles du filet peut avoir des conséquences dramatiques. L'expérience montre que les « returnees » sont particulièrement dangereux, notamment dans les attentats commis en Europe. En les mettant en prison, on les neutralise temporairement. Mais on sait aussi que la prison est un vecteur de radicalisation. Des gens qui ne l'étaient pas le sont devenus en prison, tels les frères Kouachi, par exemple. Une étude du King's College de Londres vient de démontrer que 17 % des individus suivis se sont radicalisés derrière les barreaux. En Belgique, on incarcère ces détenus dans des sections spécialisées pour assurer une meilleure prise en charge ; mais aussi pour éviter qu'ils contaminent les autres. Certains pays ont pris la voie inverse, à savoir qu'ils tablent sur la contamination positive en les mélangeant dans la société.

59. Attack on Dutch elections possible warns counter-terror boss

NL Times, Taylor Moore, 2016 11 14

The Hague - With European citizens becoming more polarized when it comes to integration, Islam and asylum, the Netherlands must prepare for a possible attack during the parliamentary elections in March, cautions Dick Schoof, the National Coordinator for Counterterrorism and Security. Radicalized loners, both ultra nationalists and religious fanatics, could be particularly dangerous, he told radio station BNR. He added that the ISIS propaganda machine is relentlessly targeting "vulnerable, impressionable people who are not on the radar screens of security authorities." These online messages are calling on disillusioned people to carry out attacks on behalf of the militant group. But the primary danger is from the alleged jihadists who return to the Netherlands from Iraq and Syria. It is one reason why the Dutch threat level is at its second-highest level. There are European arrest warrants out for about 190 Dutch people who fought in the Syrian Civil War, and whose whereabouts are not known. There were 270 known Dutch people who went to join the uprising there, of which 44 were killed, and roughly 40 returned. With ISIS losing ground, Schoof warns that more may be headed back to the Netherlands.

60. Enquête Squarcini, ex-chef de la DCRI, aurait mis ses réseaux au service de LVMH

L'Humanité, P. Du., 2016 11 15

Paris - On en sait un peu plus sur les activités troubles de Bernard Squarcini, chef du renseignement intérieur (DCRI) jusqu'en mai 2012. Mis en examen le 4 novembre pour « violation du secret de l'enquête », « trafic d'influence » et « compromission du secret-défense », ce proche de Nicolas Sarkozy est soupçonné d'avoir utilisé ses contacts au sein de la justice et de la police pour servir des intérêts privés, au sein de l'officine Kyros. De nouvelles informations, publiées hier par Mediapart, montrent comment il a contribué à l'espionnage, pour le compte de LVMH, des héritiers de la famille Hermès après avoir sollicité un magistrat encore en poste dans le but d'obtenir des informations sur une procédure opposant les deux groupes du luxe. Bernard Squarcini aurait aussi fait appel à un agent de la DGSI pour glaner des informations sur un opposant kazakh.

61. German Constitutional Court rules out access to NSA's 'selectors' list

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 15

Berlin - The Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe on Tuesday delivered a verdict, saying the government in Berlin did not need to transfer its secret list of spy targets to the commission investigating the US' spy agency NSA's activities in Germany. The government's need to keep certain data confidential outweighed the NSA commission's desire for more details on the issue in this case, judges said in an October decision that was made public on Tuesday. The verdict also said that releasing the "selectors" list without approval from the United States could endanger the functioning of intelligence agencies and jeopardize Germany's effectiveness in matters of national security. Green party politician Konstantin von Notz, who is on the parliamentary committee investigating NSA issues, expressed disappointment at Tuesday's verdict. "Large portions of the illegal BND practices conducted over years will remain in the dark," he said in Berlin, adding that because of the way the systems worked, further scandals and rights violations were "pre-programmed."

62. Police make raids against suspected 'IS' supporters across 10 states in Germany

Deutsche Welle, Staff report, 2016 11 15

Berlin - A string of raids were carried out across Germany early on Tuesday morning against suspected "Islamic State" (IS) sympathizers. According to news agency DPA, the raids took place in more than 200 homes and offices across 10 federal states. Authorities carried out searches targeting individuals belonging to the "True Religion" Salafist group ("Die wahre Religion"), who have stirred up controversy for passing out a particularly fundamentalist translation of the Koran. Some 65 raids were carried out in the state of Hesse, 15 of them in the city of Frankfurt alone. Every one of the searches took place in Berlin or the former West. Salafism promotes a very strict interpretation of Islamic scripture and the use of Sharia law to impose order. The "True Religion" Salafists targeted in Tuesday's raid have become infamous in Germany in recent years for disseminating copies of the Koran emblazoned with the slogan "Read It!" before they were banned from doing so in pedestrian zones by Interior Minister Thomas de Maizière.

63. Quand Israël tentait d'espionner la sécurité intérieure

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 11 15

Paris - En 2011-2012, le Mossad a essayé de faire acheter au renseignement intérieur et à la direction de la police des moyens techniques piégés. Les affaires d'espionnage entre les Etats ne se règlent quasi jamais au grand jour. L'évocation dans une procédure judiciaire visant Bernard Squarcini, ex-patron de la sécurité intérieure, d'une tentative d'espionnage de la Direction générale de la police nationale (DGPN) et de la Direction centrale du renseignement intérieur (DCRI) par le Mossad, les services secrets israéliens, est une première. Soupçonné de plusieurs faits, dont certains relevant du trafic d'influence, l'ancien chef de la DCRI, de 2008 à 2012, a en effet révélé, fin septembre, l'existence d'une opération du Mossad contre des intérêts français, après avoir été sommé de s'expliquer sur le placement sur écoute d'un policier en 2011. Suspecté d'avoir pu détourner les moyens de la DCRI pour régler des comptes personnels, M. Squarcini s'est défendu en dévoilant l'enquête de contre-espionnage ciblant les services secrets israéliens dans laquelle ce fonctionnaire a été écouté.

64. Vaste opération de la police allemande contre un groupe salafiste

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 11 15

Berlin - La police allemande a annoncé avoir mené mardi matin une vaste série de perquisitions en 200 endroits différents contre un mouvement salafiste soupçonné d'avoir incité 140 personnes à rejoindre les rangs du groupe Etat islamique (EI). Les opérations ont été menées par plusieurs centaines de policiers dans dix Etats régionaux du pays au petit matin et ont visé quelque 190 appartements et bureaux. Le groupe visé, baptisé "La vraie religion" et comptant plusieurs centaines de membres, a été interdit. C'est la deuxième fois seulement depuis 2001, que les autorités allemandes prennent une telle décision: à l'époque, un groupuscule appelé "L'Etat du califat", agissant depuis Cologne, avait lui aussi été interdit en raison de son idéologie extrémiste. Le mouvement visé mardi était dans le collimateur des autorités allemandes en raison d'opérations controversées de distribution de corans dans des zones piétonnières de plusieurs villes, associées au recrutement de volontaires pour le "jihad".

1. ISIS, ISIL or something else? Declassified documents reveal struggle over what to call terrorists

National Post Online, Stewart Bell, 2016 11 16

Toronto--When a federal bureaucrat circulated a map depicting "the Islamic State's regional spread," an email soon followed from the Foreign Affairs Department saying the document had to be changed. "We do not recognize the group as 'The Islamic State' and it is important it not be suggested that we do," read the email, which proposed amending the wording to " 'the global ambitions of ISIL' or something similar." Declassified documents released under the Access to Information Act show how Canadian officials struggled with language as they drafted a key report on terrorism in the age of the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. Planning for the latest annual Public Report on the Terrorist Threat to Canada began in April 2015, during the final months of the Conservative government. But the process dragged on for so long it was not released until August 2016. An RCMP analyst said the report failed to recognize the "wide-ranging nature" of the terrorist threat, particularly the danger posed by " 'lower-risk' activities such as the perpetuation of violent ideologies, recruiters, facilitators and fundraising." Michel Coulombe, director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, was concerned about the report's reference to the roughly 180 Canadians overseas taking part in terrorist activities - including about 100 in Syria and Iraq.

2. Mounties lobbying for more power

Toronto Star and CBC News, Robert Cribb and CBC staff, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - The RCMP is lobbying Prime Minister Justin Trudeau for more powers - including access to digital information without warrants - to investigate suspects who are hiding behind uncrackable encryption on their digital devices, a Toronto Star/CBC investigation has found. "I can safely say that there's criminal activity going on every day that's facilitated by technology that we aren't acting on," RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson told the Toronto Star and CBC in an exclusive interview. "We're losing our ability, if we haven't lost it entirely, to bring the traditional investigative response to technologically facilitated crime because of the misunderstanding, in my view, of the privacy threat." The RCMP has reached a point, Paulson said, that Canadians should "think about where you go with that complaint because I don't know that we can help you." "And that's a terrible thing for a person who's in charge of a police force to say when citizens, when companies, when corporate Canada, or indeed when the government comes to us and says, 'Hey, we've been victimized on the Internet.'" An RCMP briefing document sent June 23 to Trudeau's national security adviser compares Canadian law enforcement's digital investigative capabilities with four western countries - and Canada stands alone. The country lacks police powers in six categories, including legal remedies for cracking encryption, intercepting communications and accessing suspects' identities. The other countries - Australia, the U.K., the U.S. and New Zealand - are, with Canada, members of the Five Eyes intelligence alliance. "When we come up against impediments to getting evidence ... that's demoralizing," Paulson said. Any powers handed to police come with the risk of abuse, said Christopher Parsons, a technology and privacy researcher at the Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto. "The solution is not to say, 'It's very hard for police, just trust us and let us sign off on our own warrants,'" he said. "We know that police will over-exercise that power." In recent weeks, two cases of law enforcement overreaching their powers made scandalous headlines. Two weeks ago, a Federal Court judge denounced the Canadian Security Intelligence Service's monitoring and retention of information on thousands of Canadians' and, in Quebec, police forces admitted to intercepting and tracking cellphones belonging to at least 10 journalists. "I can't sit here and say that it's going to be a perfect," Paulson said. But when abuses occur, those responsible are held accountable, he said. "Canadians can be persuaded that there is a reasonable, reliable administrative oversight mechanism, that it can be seen externally."

3. Protéger les sources, à la source

Le Devoir, Denis Ferland, 2016 11 16

Chronique - Le gouvernement fédéral profite pour l'instant du fait que les projecteurs sont braqués sur les patrons politiques des deux corps policiers impliqués dans le scandale de la surveillance des journalistes au Québec pour se tenir sur les lignes de côté. C'est que la réponse du gouvernement libéral nous laisse jusqu'à maintenant sur notre appétit. Bien sûr, M. Trudeau parle de faits "troublants" et de son "ouverture" à apporter des correctifs au besoin. Le ministre responsable de la GRC et du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS), Ralph Goodale, trouve ça "inquiétant" et il rassure en disant que ses services ne se sont pas livrés à de telles pratiques, ce que les patrons des agences ont réitéré. Il considère que le cas Lagacé relève des compétences québécoises, ce qui n'est qu'en partie exact. Oublié par M. Goodale, l'épisode de la surveillance de deux autres journalistes de La Presse par la GRC dans l'affaire Charkaoui nous laisse croire qu'aucun corps policier n'est à l'abri d'un dérapage.

4. The government isn't out of the nation's bedrooms - yet

Ottawa Citizen, Bruce Hicks, 2016 11 16

Op-ed: On Dec. 21, 1967, a young Liberal "star" justice minister named Pierre Trudeau famously told the media that "there's no place for the state in the bedrooms of the nation." He was defending changes he wanted to make to the Criminal Code through an omnibus bill which, among other things, would remove the absolute ban on homosexual sex acts between men in Canada. At the time this was referred to as Parliament "decriminalizing homosexuality," but that wasn't entirely correct. "Gross indecency," which made any and all homosexual acts illegal (including just two men kissing), wouldn't apply if it took place in private between two (and only two) people over the age of 21. "Buggery" was renamed "anal intercourse" and applied to both gay men and now heterosexual couples (to protect it from a court challenge) with similar restrictions. It is noteworthy that there had never been restrictions on heterosexual sex acts in Canada. There was a statutory rape provision to protect female children under the age of 14. And there were various indecent and later sexual assault rules enacted, but those have nothing to do with consensual sex. With Parliament having just made homosexuality, per se, legal, some Canadian government agencies took it upon themselves to find other ways to restore its illegality. The rationale for the military openly defying changes Parliament had made for the civilian population was that only heterosexual men were "manly" enough to contribute to combat roles, and their very presence would undermine a unit's morale. There were more, disgustingly homophobic, arguments advanced, but they don't bear repeating here. But civilians in the public service were not free from discrimination. Canada's counter-intelligence service, first housed within the RCMP and then within the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), became obsessed with weeding out homosexuals from the entire public service. Note: Dr. Bruce Hicks is a visiting fellow and adjunct professor at York University and is a former director of Egale Canada.

5. 'I don't know that we can help you': RCMP boss 'consumed' with 'inability' to investigate in digital world

CBC News and Toronto Star, Dave Seglins, Robert Cribb and Chelsea Gomez, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - The RCMP is lobbying the Prime Minister's Office for new powers to bypass digital roadblocks in cases where national security threats and other "high priority" suspects hide online and operate anonymously beyond the reach of police. "I can safely say that there's criminal activity going on every day that's facilitated by technology that we aren't acting on," RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson told CBC News and the Toronto Star in an exclusive interview. The problem is a major focus for Paulson, and one that only gets more urgent as technology advances and suspects find new ways to cover their digital tracks. "Because of our inability -- and the future inability -- to protect Canadians, both from garden variety criminality and from the national security threat, I see that as really significant," Paulson said. "I'm consumed with trying to make sure that we're able to mitigate the threat." But privacy advocates and civil liberties groups remain unconvinced that effort requires expanded investigative powers for police. On June 23, the RCMP sent Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's national security adviser a briefing note that says Canada lacks strategies and laws to address the technological limitations of police investigations. The RCMP argues the U.S., Australia, the U.K. and New Zealand -- members of our Five Eyes intelligence alliance -- do much more than Canada to help their police forces deal with high-tech obstacles like encryption, and interception and storage of digital information. "It's a challenge," Paulson said. "I think we're lagging." The RCMP briefing note closely mirrors four policy ideas floated in the federal government's green paper on national security, which is open for public consultation. The RCMP and other police leaders say aside from requests for basic subscriber information, these additional powers would be used only in targeted investigations and would require a warrant from a judge.

6. 'Want him to be safe:' Wife says Turkish-Canadian imam Davud Hanci in solitary

Canadian Press, Lauren Krugel, 2016 11 16

Calgary - The wife of a Calgary imam says he is being held in solitary confinement in Turkey and worrying about his well-being has been torturous. Davud Hanci, who has Canadian and Turkish citizenship, was arrested in July shortly after a failed coup attempt. Rumeysa Hanci says she has not been able to speak to her husband since he was allowed a phone call shortly after he was detained. "I just want him to be safe there and to come home as soon as possible," she said from Toronto, where she is staying with family. "I love him so much and I miss him so much."

She said Canadian government officials have not been able to see him. Foreign Affairs Minister Stephane Dion raised consular cases, including Hanci's situation, on a phone call last week with his Turkish counterpart, said spokeswoman Chantal Gagnon. Freedom of the press and recent terrorist attacks were also discussed. Another Turkish Canadian, Ilhan Erdem, was arrested at Istanbul's Ataturk Airport following the attempted coup.

7. Bell Canada hacker sentenced to nearly four years in US prison

Ottawa Citizen, Andrew Seymour, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - An American man who hacked login and password combinations for thousands of Bell Canada customers and then posted the information online has been sentenced to nearly four years in a U.S. prison. The 45-month sentence handed down in a Chicago courtroom this month to the 22-year-old Tennessee man is in stark contrast to the one received by a 15-year-old Canadian teen who avoided jail after helping to perpetrate that cyber attack and several others on U.S. businesses, universities and government departments between October 2012 and April 2014. The pair were members of a hacking collective calling themselves NullCrew. The two boasted online that they hacked into the personal information as a "public service" to expose how easily personal information that should have been protected could be accessed. The 22-year-old's identity cannot be published as a result of a publication ban placed on the Canadian teen's court case. Canadian prosecutors said million of files were exfiltrated during the Bell Canada hack and 300,000 of them contained client information. The U.S. hacker posted about 12,700 logins and passwords and Tweeted a link to the data. It was only after the Feb. 1, 2014, hack that the RCMP learned from the FBI that an investigation had been underway for more than a year and that the suspects had long since been identified.

8. Dans le quartier Glebe à Ottawa Une croix gammée sur la porte d'une rabbin

Le Droit, Louis-Denis Ebacher, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Une croix gammée peinte sur la porte de la résidence d'une femme rabbin d'Ottawa soulève l'indignation dans la classe politique et la population. La victime, Anna Maranta, affirme que ce graffiti de swastika est une conséquence de l'élection de Donald Trump à la présidence des États-Unis. «C'est ce qui a été déclenché par le président américain élu, et ceux qui le soutiennent», a écrit la rabbin Maranta sur sa page Facebook, en accompagnant son commentaire de la photo du symbole antisémite peint en rouge sur sa porte. Sur cette même porte, la femme avait précédemment accolé un message souhaitant la bienvenue aux visiteurs. Elle tient son lieu de culte à cette adresse de la rue Powell, dans le quartier Glebe. «L'incident est arrivé quelque part entre 23 h, lundi et 2 h 45, (dans la nuit de lundi à mardi), écrit Mme Maranta. Je me suis réveillée vers 2 h 30 et j'ai aperçu un reflet provenant de la vitre de ma porte.» La femme indique sur son profil Facebook qu'elle a tout de suite su qu'il s'agissait d'une croix gammée, symbole prisé des nazis et néonazis. En plus de la croix gammée, le mot «kike» a aussi été écrit sur la porte. Il s'agit d'une insulte ethnique, d'une expression péjorative envers les juifs. Vives réactions Le maire et le chef de la police d'Ottawa ont vivement dénoncé cet acte, mardi.

9. Defiant PS union chief in a battle for her job

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 11 16

She's caught in a firestorm of controversy, infighting and perceived betrayal of Shakespearean proportions but will not step down. Emmanuelle Tremblay faces a looming vote on her leadership of the Canadian Association of Professional Employees after an internal probe that has left the union in tatters and even prompted calls for a police investigation into cyberbullying. On Wednesday, she will chair what is widely expected to be a fiery and rancorous annual general meeting. Then, next month, the 13,000 members of CAPE will have to decide whether Tremblay's transgressions warrant her removal from office. They've been given a stack of confidential documents, obtained by the Citizen, that includes an independent investigator's report, which lays bare his findings into allegations levelled against Tremblay in a petition last February. The union has hired the global firm PricewaterhouseCoopers to hold the electronic vote, which will be conducted over several weeks. Tremblay returned to work this week as union president after serving a five-week suspension. She quickly fired off a letter to members that she was back and "hit the ground running." "This unfortunate turn of events has certainly been a teaching moment for a new leader like me, but I assure you that I have dusted myself off," she wrote. "I want nothing more but to turn the page on this incident so I can completely focus my attention on what matters: our members' interests."

10. ISIL supporter's bomb could have killed, injured

National Post, 2016 11 16

The homemade bomb that ISIL supporter Aaron Driver partially detonated in the back seat of a cab in Strathroy, Ont., last August could have killed or severely injured anyone within 2.1 metres, according to a report. Investigators completed a forensic audit on the device and found 139 steel ball bearings (.38 calibre), which they say could have killed or injured many more people outside the blast zone. "The analysis tells us that if it had gone off, for example, on a city bus, there would've been death and grievous injuries," the RCMP's Jeff Adam told the CBC. Driver, 24, pictured, detonated the bomb as police approached his taxi. It only partially exploded. The taxi driver escaped serious injury by diving out of the car moments before. Driver was shot dead by police. (Full report)

11. Les soldats canadiens tirent les premiers

Le Devoir, Marie Vastel, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Les soldats canadiens n'ont pas seulement dégainé leurs armes pour répliquer à l'ennemi en Irak. Ils ont également tiré lorsqu'ils anticipaient l'approche d'une menace. Rien de neuf à ce droit de se défendre, martèle le chef d'état-major de la Défense. Mais l'opposition accuse le gouvernement d'avoir dupé les Canadiens en niant que ses soldats participent à une mission de combat. L'armée canadienne avait déjà reconnu, dès janvier 2015, que ses troupes avaient échangé des coups de feu avec l'ennemi en Irak par « légitime défense ». Le mois dernier, la Défense admettait que la mission avait évolué et que ce genre d'incident devenait « un peu plus la norme ». Mais voilà que l'armée a confié à un journaliste de la CBC, accueilli sur le terrain par la Défense, que ses forces spéciales ont parfois été les premières à tirer, et ce, pour défendre tant leurs propres troupes ou les troupes locales que pour protéger des civils. Convoqué en comité parlementaire mardi, le chef d'état-major de la Défense a corroboré. « Je peux vous confirmer sans équivoque que l'utilisation de la force par nos soldats dans le cadre de cette opération, l'utilisation de force armée, de force létale, a seulement été utilisée de façon défensive afin de s'assurer que nos partenaires ne soient pas victimes d'une attaque », a affirmé le général Jonathan Vance.

12. Manitoba teen apologizes for promoting terrorism on social media

Canadian Press, Staff reporter, 2016 11 16

Brandon, Man. - A Manitoba teenager who promoted terrorist activity online and urged people to "strike from within" apologized in court Tuesday and said he had not thought about the possible outcomes of his actions. "I regret what I've done ... I was struggling with my identity," the 17-year-old, who cannot be identified because of his age, told his sentencing hearing in a Brandon court. "I didn't think ahead (about) my actions." The teen pleaded guilty earlier this year to counselling the commission of an indictable offence for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with a terrorist group. He has been in custody since his arrest a year ago. The hearing was the first time details about the case were made public. Crown attorney Ian Mahon said police were contacted by a CBC reporter about a Twitter account belonging to someone who was preparing to head overseas to fight for the Islamic State. The teen initially denied being behind the account, but later admitted to it, Mahon said. The teen had urged people to join him in a migration overseas he referred to as Hijrah.

13. Muslim activist lashes out after new death threat

Montreal Gazette, Catherine Solyom, 2016 11 16

Montreal - The head of AMAL-Quebec - the Association of Muslims and Arabs for a Secular Quebec - has received death threats again, this time from an online commenter calling for him to be executed by a firing squad. It's the third time Haroun Bouazzi has filed a complaint with Montreal police in the last year, increasingly concerned for his own safety after Internet users on separate occasions have called for him to be hanged, whipped to death, set afire and shot between the eyes. "Police so far have never found a way to file criminal charges, even though threatening to put a bullet between someone's eyes is actually criminal," Bouazzi said Tuesday. "And these are not anonymous users. The police had their names five minutes later." Bouazzi, who recently changed his life insurance policy and began using an alarm system in his home after one anti-Islam website published his home address, doesn't believe the police have been taking his, or other people's complaints about hate crimes seriously. After he filed a complaint nine months ago, Bouazzi said police took nine days before they began investigating. By then the IP address of the user was no longer available, he was told. They couldn't press charges.

14. Ottawa woman wakes to find anti-Semitic graffiti spray-painted on her home

CBC News, Staff reporter, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - An Ottawa woman who runs a Jewish prayer centre says she was "stunned" to wake up in the middle of the night and discover someone had spray-painted a swastika and an anti-Semitic slur on the front door of her Glebe home. It happened sometime between 11 p.m. Monday and 2:45 a.m. ET Tuesday, Anna Maranta told CBC News. "I went to bed a little later than usual and woke up in the middle of the night, around 2:30, and as I was walking back to my room coming down the hall I saw a reflection on my front door, which is a glass window door, that kind of startled me," said Maranta, who describes herself as a rabbi. "I knew right away it was a swastika." The word "k--e" was spray-painted above it. "I came and took a look at it and was just stunned that this had happened," Maranta said. "I immediately took a photo and then contacted some of my friends just to get some feedback and support." Maranta takes care of children during the day in her home, and said she quickly covered the hateful message with newspaper. The graffiti has since been removed. She also filed a report with Ottawa police online. Maranta said she's often been engaged in social activism, but that "this is the first time I've ever had a really personal attack. It just feels very, very different.

15. Peacekeeper powers to be strengthened, general says

Toronto Star, Bruce Campion-Smith, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Canada has learned the lessons of Rwanda and troops deployed on the coming peace mission to Africa will go armed with robust rules of engagement to defend themselves and those around them, Gen. Jonathan Vance says. The top general said Canada has much to offer a peace mission, with skilled soldiers to train local troops, military muscle to deter violence and help foster stability, and an imperative to look after vulnerable populations. With a potential risky deployment in the offing, Vance faced questions Tuesday about Canadian troops working under the umbrella of the United Nations and whether they would have the ability to ensure their own safety. "We've learned a lot since Rwanda. I will make certain that the troops have the rules of engagement they need to be able to defend themselves and those who they work with," Vance, the chief of defence staff, said in an appearance before the Commons defence committee. "They'll have the rules of engagement they need ... to be able to effectively contribute to that mission to the extent that we decide as a country to contribute," he said. Retired lieutenant-general Roméo Dallaire headed the UN mission in Rwanda during the 1994 genocide. With an ill-equipped force, he appealed to the UN for additional assistance and reinforcements in a bid to stop the frenzy of killings, but was turned down.

16. Ratés du système de paye Phénix Ottawa ignore combien il doit à ses employés

La Presse+ avec La Presse canadienne, Joël-Denis Bellavance; William Leclerc, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Le gouvernement fédéral est incapable de chiffrer le montant total des salaires qui n'ont toujours pas été versés aux fonctionnaires fédéraux en raison des problèmes liés au système de paye Phénix. Alors que la ministre responsable de Services publics et Approvisionnement Canada, Judy Foote, avait promis de régler ce problème « totalement inacceptable » pour le gouvernement Trudeau avant le 31 octobre, il reste toujours 22 000 dossiers en arriéré qui n'ont pas encore été réglés. Et l'on refuse maintenant de fixer un autre échéancier, de crainte d'être incapable de le respecter. Résultat : des milliers de fonctionnaires pourraient avoir de la difficulté à remplir leur déclaration de revenus pour l'année d'imposition 2016 si les problèmes liés à ce nouveau programme ne sont pas réglés au début de la nouvelle année. Les problèmes liés au système de paye Phénix ont d'ailleurs contraint certains ministères à utiliser le fonds d'urgence mis à leur disposition pour payer des employés au cours des derniers mois, a appris La Presse. En tout, près de 19 millions de dollars de ces fonds d'urgence ont été utilisés à cette fin jusqu'ici.

17. Spy agency kept court in the dark about data

Toronto Star, Alex Boutilier, 2016 11 16

Ottawa - Canada's electronic spies were asked to brief the Federal Court on their intelligence-gathering activities, the Star has learned. But the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) declined to meet with federal judges earlier this year, saying an ongoing constitutional challenge prevented them from doing so. The request came from the same judge that found CSE's partner agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), illegally kept information on innocent people for almost a decade. In a strongly worded ruling released this month, Justice Simon Noël found CSIS kept the court in the dark about a program to retain and analyze data about innocent people between 2006 and 2016. The ruling gave an unprecedented look at CSIS's Operational Data Analysis Centre, which for years had been storing data about "non-threat" individuals. While the information was intercepted legally, the court ruled it was illegal for CSIS to keep and analyze it indefinitely. The ruling came out of a briefing on the program by Noël for judges who approve CSIS warrants. In documents obtained by the Star, CSE chief Greta Bossenmaier was told that Noël requested a general educational briefing from her agency around the same time. But because of a constitutional challenge launched by the B.C. Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA) against CSE's intelligence activities, currently before the court, the agency declined Noël's invitation. "A briefing to the Federal Court could have reasonably led to the perception from the public and the BCCLA that CSE may be attempting to influence the (court's) judgment or opinion as it related to this ongoing case," Lauri Sullivan, a spokesperson for the agency, said an email to the Star. "It is important to note that CSE has provided briefings to Federal Court designated judges in the past, and would consider doing so again in the future (provided any conflict concerns are addressed as they relate to the ongoing BCCLA case)."

18. The RCMP Is Using the Media to 'Create Moral Panic' About Encryption

Motherboard, Jordan Pearson, 2016 11 16

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has turned to two of the country's top media outlets to make their case for new surveillance capabilities in what critics say is a PR play orchestrated to sow public worry about privacy-boosting technology. Police in Canada have long pushed for broadened surveillance powers that would force people to unlock their phones, for example, or force telecommunication companies to provide real-time access to subscriber information. No such laws currently exist, but to show why the police believe they need them to do their jobs, the country's federal force worked with two of Canada's most respected media entities. The RCMP gave the CBC's David Seglins and the Toronto Star's Robert Cribb security clearance to review the details of 10 "high priority" investigations--some of which are ongoing--that show how the police is running into investigative roadblocks on everything from locked devices to encrypted chat rooms to long waits for information. The Toronto Star's headline describes the documents as "top-secret RCMP files." The information sharing was stage-managed, however. Instead of handing over case files directly to the journalists, the federal police provided vetted "detailed written case summaries," according to a statement from Seglins and Cribb. These summaries "[formed] the basis of our reporting," they said. The journalists were given additional information on background, and allowed to ask questions, according to the statement, but "many details were withheld." The stories extensively quote RCMP officials, but also include comment from privacy experts who are critical of the police agency's approach.

19. Thicker Canada-US border unlikely under Trump, ex-security czar predicts

Canadian Press, Colin Perkel, 2016 11 16

Toronto - The Canada-U.S. border is unlikely to see any thickening under president-elect Donald Trump despite the Republican's protectionist campaign rhetoric, former American security czar Tom Ridge said Tuesday. While Trump's views on Mexican migrants and Syrian refugees appeared to be sharply at odds with Canada's approach, Ridge said Canada needs to take a deep breath and wait to see what actually emerges from a Trump administration. Ridge, appointed as first Homeland Security secretary in the aftermath of the 9-11 attacks on the United States, was fiercely critical of the campaigning Trump, denouncing his "bumper-sticker approach" to policy and a bombastic tone that "reflects the traits of a bully." Now that the campaign is over, Ridge said he hoped Trump would "substantially alter his approach" to borders. "There's always a difference between the political rhetoric and actually the governing posture that he takes," Ridge told The Canadian Press in an interview. "There'll be strong and countervailing influences on some of these issues within the legislative branch as well." But one Canadian diplomat, Doug George, consul general to Detroit, wasn't so sure the road ahead will be smooth.

20. Top general says Canada shot first at IS

Globe and Mail, Michelle Zilio, 2016 11 16

The country's top soldier says that Canadian troops have shot first at Islamic State forces in Iraq, reopening the question of whether the military is engaged in a combat mission against the terror group. While government and military officials have said Canadian Forces are allowed to fire in defence in Iraq, General Jonathan Vance, chief of the defence staff, made it clear Tuesday that troops have fired first at the Islamic State. However, he said this does not mean the mission is turning from a "train, advise and assist" role into a combat one. "The use of force by our soldiers on this operation ... has only been used in a defensive mode to ensure that our partners were not subject to an attack that they couldn't deal with," Gen. Vance told the House of Commons defence committee. "If you are suggesting that our forces have been manoeuvring so as to provide offensive fire, thereby taking the fight to the enemy, then you are wrong." Speaking to reporters after the meeting, Gen. Vance insisted Canadian troops have always been allowed to fire first in the fight against the Islamic State - something he says he has made clear throughout the mission. "I've said this publicly. We do not have to be shot at first to defend ourselves," Gen. Vance said. "I don't think that any Canadian that's listening out there would think that we need to be shot first before we can take defensive actions."

21. Troops could face extreme risk in Mali

Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York, 2016 11 16

Johannesburg - Confirmed weapons stockpiles in Mali, Libya could explain Ottawa's hesitance to announce peacekeeping plans in Africa. Canadian troops could face a terrifying arsenal of rebel-held weapons, from rockets and artillery to shoulder-fired missiles and anti-tank mines, if they are deployed as expected in a peacekeeping operation in the West African country of Mali. A report released on Wednesday shows that the terrorist and separatist groups have obtained a wide range of heavy weaponry from government stockpiles in both Mali and Libya, as well as other unknown sources. The report, published by British-based Conflict Armament Research, also traces the weapons used by the Islamist radicals who killed six Canadians and 24 other civilians in Burkina Faso earlier this year. Their weapons were relatively new Chinese-made assault rifles, which - based on their similar serial numbers - appeared to share the same supplier as Islamic State fighters in Syria, the report says. Conflict Armament Research is largely financed by the governments of Britain and Germany and the European Union. Its 49page report is one of the most extensive recent studies of the sources of illicit weapons in West Africa. The huge range of heavy weapons in Mali could help explain why the Canadian government has been cautious and hesitant in announcing its peacekeeping plans in Africa. The government announced in August that it will deploy up to 600 soldiers and 150 police officers in "peace and stabilization operations" in Africa, but nearly three months later, it still hasn't revealed the location of the deployment.

23. Donald Trump's Transition Team Reshaped

Wall Street Journal, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 16

Washington - Another round of staff changes buffeted President- elect Donald Trump's transition team Tuesday amid resistance from within the Republican Party over a top choice for secretary of state. Vice President- elect Mike Pence formally signed documents that put him in charge of the transition team, and officials insisted the 10-week effort to build an administration is on schedule. In one of his first moves, Mr. Pence ordered the removal of all lobbyists from the transition team, said one transition team member with knowledge of the decisions. Earlier Tuesday, former Michigan Rep. Mike Rogers, once considered a candidate to lead the Central Intelligence Agency, was ousted from the Trump transition team's national security unit. Matthew Freedman, who was leading the group's planning for the White House National Security Council, also departed. Mr. Freedman didn't return messages seeking comment. Mr. Rogers was told he was being replaced because everyone who was brought in by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, the transition team's original chairman, was being ousted, according to a person familiar with the conversation. Frank Gaffney, a Reagan administration veteran, was brought in to assist on national security issues, as has GOP U.S. Reps. Pete Hoekstra and Devin Nunes. On Tuesday night, Mr. Trump tweeted: "Very organized process taking place as I decide on Cabinet and many other positions. I am the only one who knows who the finalists are!"

24. Ex-Nato leaders call for extraordinary meeting with Donald Trump

The Guardian (London), Julian Borger, 2016 11 16

Brussels - Two former Nato chiefs have called for an extraordinary summit soon after Donald Trump's inauguration to reassure traditional allies that the US will still come to their defence. Former Nato secretary general Anders Fogh Rasmussen and his predecessor Jaap de Hoop Scheffer also warned the US president-elect against making a hasty deal with Vladimir Putin that would cede Crimea and eastern Ukraine as a Russian sphere of influence. They argue it would set a precedent for further expansionism in Russia's "near- abroad". "If we accept the annexation of Crimea we will have given up on the rule-based order and it would have consequences elsewhere in the world," Rasmussen told reporters in a call organised by the Atlantic Council thinktank. During the election campaign, Trump said the people of Crimea appeared to want to live under Russian rule and said he would look at whether the US would recognise Moscow's 2014 annexation of the peninsula. He also told the New York Times that allies would have to reimburse Washington for their protection or be told: "Congratulations, you will be defending yourself."

25. Families sobbing, Tuesday's final ISIL defendant gets 10 years in prison

Minneapolis Star Tribune, Stephen Montemayor, Faiza Mahamud, 2016 11 15

Minneapolis - Adnan Farah, the younger of two brothers caught up in Minnesota's ISIL recruiting investigation, was given 10 years in prison Tuesday afternoon as U.S. Senior Judge Michael Davis concluded the second day of sentencings in the case. Farah, 19, whose first attempt to leave the United States, in 2014, was thwarted when his parents confiscated his passport, had asked to be released to a counseling program. Federal prosecutors had requested a sentence of 15 years. Farah pleaded guilty to federal terror-recruiting conspiracy charges last spring, just weeks before he was set to go to trial, and breaking ranks with his older brother, Mohamed. Earlier on Tuesday, Davis sentenced Farah's co-defendant Hanad Musse to 10 years in prison after an emotional hourlong hearing. Musse, 21, who once described himself as "a servant of Allah," later pleaded guilty and had asked for 72 months in prison. Federal prosecutors had recommended 15 years. He was the fifth of nine defendants who will appear before U.S. Senior Judge Michael Davis this week as sentencing continues in the nation's largest ISIL recruiting prosecution. In Tuesday's first hearing, Hamza Ahmed was sentenced to 15 years in prison for his convictions on charges of supporting the terror group ISIL and committing financial-aid fraud to finance an attempted trip to Syria.

26. Giuliani's Ties Raise Question for State Dept. (Canada)

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 11 16

Washington - Rudolph W. Giuliani, facing a flood of questions about whether his business dealings should disqualify him from being named President-elect Donald J. Trump's secretary of state, on Tuesday defended his lucrative 15 years in the private sector as a credential for the job. "I have friends all over the world," Mr. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, said in an interview. "This is not a new thing for me. When you become the mayor, you become interested in foreign policy. When I left, my major work was legal and security around the world." As secretary of state, Mr. Giuliani, a loyal, often ferocious backer of Mr. Trump's candidacy, would make fighting Islamist terrorism the centerpiece of the incoming administration's foreign policy. He vaulted to national prominence because of his leadership after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and he still views foreign policy through the prism of that day. But Mr. Giuliani's business ties are a major red flag. He built a lucrative consulting and speechmaking career after leaving City Hall. His firm, Giuliani Partners, has had contracts with the government of Qatar and the Canadian company that is building the Keystone XL oil pipeline, and Mr. Giuliani has given paid speeches to a shadowy Iranian opposition group that until 2012 was on the State Department's list of foreign terrorist organizations.

27. NSA Chief: 'Uneven' Cooperation Between Public, Private Sectors Impedes Cyber Defenses

Wall Street Journal, Alan Cullison, 2016 11 16

New York - The head of the U.S. National Security Agency said "uneven" cooperation between the government and private sector has hampered the fight against a "literal onslaught" of cyber attacks from criminal and state-supported hackers. Speaking at The Wall Street Journal CEO Council, Adm. Michael S. Rogers said the host of hackers is "so large and so diverse" that perpetrators are difficult to identify. About two-thirds are criminals or criminal groups looking to steal personal information for financial gain, and the balance are state-sponsored hackers, he said. He said company leaders need to take a personal interest in cyber security, which has become too important a matter to be delegated entirely to network security specialists. "You need to shape the discussion," he said. "I don't pretend that this needs to totally dominate your life, but there is a significant role for you to play."

"There shouldn't be any doubt in anybody's mind," NSA Director Michael S. Rogers said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal on Tuesday. "But this is a call that Mr. Trump needs to make," he cautioned. "He needs to have someone that he can have total confidence in at the CIA, as the director of national intelligence."

30. Trump's Win and Transition Turmoil Buy Time for FBI Chief Comey

Bloomberg News, Chris Strohm, 2016 11 16

New York - The election of Donald Trump may have saved James Comey's job as FBI director -- at least for the time being. Comey's stunning back-and-forth on the Hillary Clinton e-mail inquiry less than two weeks before the election would have made it hard for him to stay had the Democrat won. But his moves cost him allies in both parties and prompted questions about whether he politicized the bureau and would be able to remain in office for long during a Trump administration, too. "The way the e-mail investigation played out, he's got both Republicans and Democrats mad at him and suspicious of his motives," said Stewart Baker, a former general counsel at the National Security Agency. Baker said he respects Comey. Now it's unlikely Comey would voluntarily resign before Trump takes office in January and the two have a chance to talk one-on-one, according to six current and former U.S. national security officials who asked not to be identified. And with Trump's transition team still struggling to settle on nominees for key cabinet and national security posts, Comey can expect to remain in the job at least until 2017, they said. Trump himself told CBS's "60 Minutes" during an interview broadcast Nov. 13 that he wasn't sure if he would ask Comey to resign.

31. U.S. Officials Fear Trump Is Playing Into Terrorists' Hands

The Daily Beast, Shane Harris, Nancy A. Youssef, 2016 11 16

Washington - U.S. officials who've been working to refute terrorist propaganda and blunt recruitment by ISIS and other groups are bracing for a Donald Trump administration, fearing that he and his advisers could set back their efforts by years and play into terrorists' hands. Three U.S. officials told The Daily Beast that President-elect Trump's campaign rhetoric, combined with the names now surfacing as potential top national security advisers in the next administration, signal a dramatically different approach that could give ISIS ammunition to claim that the United States is engaged in a religious war. In fact, ISIS commanders have already begun to make that argument. "This guy [Trump] is a complete maniac," Abu Omar Khorasani, an ISIS leader in Afghanistan, told Reuters. "His utter hate towards Muslims will make our job much easier because we can recruit thousands." Equating radical terrorism with Islam was not only inaccurate, it was "not very helpful if we are talking about a lasting ISIS defeat," one defense official told The Daily Beast, adding that it allows the terror group to claim that it is defending Muslims everywhere. "They will say, 'Join us. America has declared war on Islam.'" "Of course we are concerned," a second official said of the heated rhetoric on the campaign trail that is now apparently transferring into the next administration. The official noted that the U.S.

military is making demonstrable progress on the battlefield against ISIS but that those gains could be offset by recruitment efforts given a new boost from incoming administration officials.

32. Why Mike Rogers's departure from the Trump team is alarming

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 11 16

Column - The ouster of former congressman Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) from Donald Trump's transition team is a worrisome sign of continuing internecine battles in the GOP and the ascendancy of Trump's personal political allies in shaping the president-elect's agenda. Rogers, a widely respected former FBI agent who headed the House Intelligence Committee, had been seen as a figure of stability and continuity in intelligence matters. He was mentioned as a possible next director of the CIA or director of national intelligence. But Rogers was told last weekend by Rick Dearborn, executive director of the transition team, that he was being removed from his role in the national-security group advising Trump. He was replaced by Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.), who took over as the committee's chairman after Rogers left Congress in 2014 and has been a far more partisan chairman. Rogers had angered House GOP hard-liners when his committee issued a bipartisan report in 2014 clearing Hillary Clinton of personal wrongdoing in the 2012 Benghazi incident. That report was characteristic of the way Rogers chaired the committee, in a working partnership with then-ranking Democrat, Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger (Md.). (Rogers added "additional views" that criticized "senior State Department officials" for dismissing threat warnings, denying requests for extra security in eastern Libya and other errors.) But this consensual approach clearly didn't suit Trump's inner circle. According to GOP insiders, the most likely picks for CIA director include Nunes and former Rep. Pete Hoekstra (Mich.), who served on the House intelligence panel; former Defense Intelligence Agency chief Lt. Gen. Mike Flynn is being considered as well, though there are doubts he could be confirmed. A wild card mentioned by one source is former Defense Department official Frank Gaffney. All four are known as combative personalities who disdain the bipartisan approach that Rogers represented.

33. Extremist group banned in Germany over links to Isis remains active in Britain (Canada)

The Independent (UK), Lizzie Dearden, 2016 11 16

London - Members of an extremist group banned in Germany for inspiring more than 140 Isis fighters with its "violent" ideology remains active in the UK and are seeking to recruit followers in Britain's largest cities, The Independent can reveal. Police have launched almost 200 raids across Germany at mosques, offices and homes linked to Die Wahre Religion (DWR) movement, meaning "The True Religion"- but British security forces are powerless to stop the same group's activities. Members were running a stall in London's busy Oxford Street as recently as Sunday and have posted footage of events in towns and cities including Leicester, Nottingham and Blackburn. A familiar face at the stalls has been the founder of DWR, Ibrahim Abou- Nagie, who attended the Read! campaign's launch in Manchester in September 2014 and has made several appearances across the UK since. Mr Abou-Nagie could not immediately be reached for comment, while John Fontain, a British Muslim convert who appeared with him at the launch of DWR's British affiliate denied knowledge of Germany's ban when contacted by The Independent. "We plan to take this to different cities in the UK," Mr Fontain said in a video from the 2014 UK launch in Manchester. "All the main [British] cities and inshallah [God willing], we want to go to Canada, America and Australia as well, inshallah. Please make dua [prayers] for us."

34. Old Treaties and New Bonds Empower Native Tribes (Canada)

New York Times, Kirk Johnson, 2016 11 16

Bella Bella, British Columbia - The simmering standoff between the police and Native Americans and their allies who oppose a giant oil pipeline project in North Dakota is the most visible sign of an emerging movement that is shifting the debate about how public lands across North America should be managed. From the rocky, pebbled beaches north of Seattle, where the Lummi Nation has led the fight against a proposed coal terminal, to southern Utah, where a coalition of tribes is demanding management rights over a proposed new national monument, to the tiny wooded community of Bella Bella, British Columbia, 350 miles north of the United States border, Native Americans are asserting old treaty rights and using tribal traditions to protect and manage federally owned land. "If you want to own it, you have to act like you own it," said Kelly Brown, the director of resource management for the Heiltsuk Nation in Bella Bella. The Heiltsuk pressed the Canadian government for joint management of the local herring fishery and won this year through a campaign of sit-ins and political lobbying. The force for change comes in part from tribes' forming new alliances as they defend territorial claims and manage resources. In some places, the focus is on fossil fuels and pollution; in others, on an awareness that climate change could have a disproportionately harsh impact on tribal populations because of where they live, in coastal or forest areas, or their dependence on natural resources or foods. "The tribal voice, and their concerns and what happens on those lands -- that's accelerating right now, and where it's going to go, I don't know," said John Freemuth, a professor of public policy at Boise State University who studies public lands. "It's a big story and a growing story."

35. 'Extremist' turned back on jihad after one month in Syria

The Australian, Ean Higgins and Paul Maley, 2016 11 16

Sydney - An alleged Australian extremist who police say fought with al- Qa'ida militants in Syria spent one month in the conflict zone before returning home to renounce the jihadist life. NSW and federal police yesterday arrested 22-year-old Muhamad Abdul Karim Musleh and charged him with two counts of foreign incursions relating to a brief trip he took to Syria in June 2013.

Sources contacted by The Australian painted a picture of an unlikely jihadist, one who by some accounts was quick to turn his back on radical Islam once he had seen it first hand. The Australian understands Musleh was part of a wider network of Australian radicals who were actively recruiting and sending young Australians to fight in the Syrian conflict, which at that time was dominated by Jabhat al Nusra, al-Qa'ida's official affiliate in the Syrian war. Police believe Musleh travelled to Syria with the help of jailed terrorist kingpin Hamdi Alqudsi, an Islamist recruiter who sent dozens of jihadists into the maw of the Syrian conflict when it was in its early stages. Police allege that Alqudsi worked with a second Sydney terrorist Mohamed Ali Baryalei, who acted as the Syria-based point-man for Alqudsi's network.

36. Airports warned of 'terrorist infiltration'

Sydney Morning Herald, Rachel Olding, 2016 11 16

Sydney - Australian airports are "extremely vulnerable" to infiltration by terrorists who could launch catastrophic attacks from within, one of the world's leading cybercrime and counter-terrorism experts has warned. Jim Kent, an adviser to the United Nations who pioneered digital investigation techniques as a British police officer, said recent events have highlighted the potential for terrorists to infiltrate airports by corrupting airport officials or hacking digital systems. In May, Fairfax Media uncovered widespread and unprecedented corruption among Australian border security workers in Melbourne and Sydney who have been assisting organised crime rings and drug smugglers for years. Last week, the Australian Federal Police revealed that air traffic control broadcasts at Melbourne had been hacked over several weeks by a hoaxer and there have been warnings from the Australian Criminal Intelligence Commission that links between crime gangs and terrorists are growing. Dr Kent, who spoke to Fairfax Media in Sydney ahead of briefings with the federal government, said the risk was greater when large agencies operated in silos. "Airports are still extremely vulnerable to infiltration ... by terrorist groups because critical monitoring of unusual activity and enforcement of security measures is rarely joined up," he said.

37. Shift on terror could see troops get the call

The Australian, Paul Maley, 2016 11 16

Sydney - The federal government could be given a greater say in deciding when the army is sent in to end terror attacks such as the Lindt cafe siege. A wide-ranging review of so-called "call-out" powers, which was prompted by Man Haron Monis's 2014 attack on the Lindt cafe in Sydney's Martin Place, is likely to recommend streamlining the procedures required for the military to go to the assistance of state police forces. Tony Abbott, who as prime minister stood ready to use call-out powers should that have proved necessary during the siege, played down concerns that the process for deploying troops was cumbersome and time-consuming. Mr Abbott, who on the day of the siege was in regular communication with authorities in NSW and was prepared to send in an SAS team quartered at Sydney's Holsworthy Army Barracks, said he was not aware of problems with the operation of such powers. "In my time, in areas of national security, there was complete candour and common purpose between the states and the commonwealth," he said. "That said, anything that expedites state and commonwealth co-operation in this area is to be welcomed." The role of the military in such situations became a subject of debate following the Martin Place siege, with NSW police criticised for a series of apparent bungles in their response. Cafe manager Tori Johnson and barrister Katrina Dawson died, as did Monis, who was killed when tactical police stormed the building.

38. Turnbull launches new spy in the sky

Australian Associated Press, Max Blenkin, 2016 11 16

Canberra - High in the sky the prime minister and immigration minister have learned firsthand how the RAAF can better detect enemy submarines or people smuggler boats. Malcolm Turnbull and Peter Dutton flew from Avalon to Canberra aboard the RAAF's newest acquisition, the Boeing P- 8A Poseidon, with crew members briefing them on the aircraft's advanced surveillance capabilities. RAAF chief Air Marshal Leo Davies, who shared the flight, said the aircraft's mission system operators showed Mr Turnbull and Mr Dutton just what the aircraft can do. "They were really excited. They were talking about 'I can do this now and I was not able to do that on a P- 3.' It's a really exciting story," he told reporters. This aircraft, which arrived from the US on Tuesday, is the first of 15 Poseidons which will replace the RAAF's 19 Lockheed AP-3C Orion maritime surveillance and patrol aircraft from 2019. Poseidon is based on the widely used Boeing 737 airliner. It looks similar to aircraft flown by Qantas and Virgin except it's painted grey and is dotted with small antennae, indicating the advanced electronics inside.

Le Monde, Julien Bouissou, 2016 11 16

Baloutchistan, Pakistan - Un kamikaze a causé la mort de 52 fidèles dans un sanctuaire soufi L'organisation Etat islamique (EI) vient de faire son entrée macabre au Pakistan. En l'espace de trois mois, l'organisation djihadiste a revendiqué dans ce pays musulman d'environ 190 millions d'habitants trois des attaques les plus meurtrières depuis le début de l'année. Dans la nuit du 12 au 13 novembre, un jeune homme s'est fait exploser dans le sanctuaire soufi de Shah Nourani, dans la province méridionale du Baloutchistan, à 150 km de Karachi, tuant 52 fidèles. Les premiers secours sont arrivés deux heures après l'attaque, dans une région dépourvue d'infrastructures et dotée d'une mauvaise couverture en téléphonie mobile. Quelques jours auparavant, dans la nuit du 24 au 25 octobre, 61 personnes ont été tuées dans l'attaque d'un collège de police à Quetta, la capitale du Baloutchistan, par trois kamikazes. Dans la même ville, le 8 août, un attentat devant les urgences d'un hôpital a fait 73 morts. " Il n'y a pas de présence de l'EI au Baloutchistan. La revendication est fausse " , a -répété dimanche le secrétaire aux affaires intérieures de la province, Sarfraz Bugti. Malgré ce démenti officiel, les analystes s'accordent pourtant à constater une percée de l'EI au Pakistan.

Goma, RDCongo - Les activités, suspendues il y a quarante-huit heures, ont repris timidement lundi à la petite barrière de Goma séparant la RDC et le Rwanda après une tension observée le week-end à la suite de la mort d'un jeune congolais. L'origine d'arrêt des activités à la barrière a été consécutive à la mort de, M. Jeannot Mampuya, qui a succombé après avoir reçu une balle tirée par un militaire rwandais dans la tête sous prétexte qu'il voulait traverser illégalement la frontière. Mécontents de cet acte ignoble, les Congolais habitant le quartier Birere, non loin de la frontière avaient décidé d'aller venger leur compatriote tué injustement, selon eux.

46. Senior Libyan al-Qaida leader reported slain in drone strike

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Benghazi - A senior al-Qaida leader was reportedly killed in a late-night drone strike that hit his home in Libya's remote south, a Libyan news agency said Tuesday. The strike was suspected to be the work of a Western military but a Pentagon spokesman denied it was carried out by the United States. The LANA news agency said that Abu Talha al-Hassnawi, a key figure in al-Qaeda's North African affiliate, was killed in his house in Sabha late on Monday. According to the agency, al-Hassnawi was previously a leading member of al-Qaida's affiliate in Syria, and was a leading recruiter of fighters heading to fight in Syria's vicious and complex conflict that has seen rival al-Qaida and Islamic State militants battle each other. Al-Hassnawi was also purportedly close to the a top militant once considered the most dangerous man in the Sahara -- the one-eyed terror leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar, a former member of al-Qaida's North Africa branch -- and has been seen in his company in the past.

47. Colombia's new peace accord is final, will not be changed: government

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 11 16

Bogota - A revised peace accord between Colombia's government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia is final, negotiators said on Tuesday, a statement likely to anger those who rejected the original draft in a referendum as too favourable to the rebels. Chief government negotiator Humberto de la Calle said the new pact to end 52 years of war with the Marxist FARC group was the best and most complete agreement the two sides could achieve, and it will not be adapted again. "This is the final accord; it's the definitive accord," he told reporters in Bogota. "There's really no room for more negotiation." A decision on how the new accord will be approved will come after meetings with legislators, which are expected soon, Interior Minister Juan Fernando Cristo said. The law does not require President Juan Manuel Santos to hold a new referendum, so he could try to ratify it through Congress. The expanded and highly technical 310-page document appears to make small modifications to the original text, such as clarifying private property rights and detailing more fully how the rebels would be confined in rural areas for crimes committed during the war.

48. Colombia's president heads to U.S. amid cancer fears, delicate time for peace

Miami Herald, Jim Wyss, 2016 11 16

Bogota - Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos is traveling to the United States Wednesday for medical tests amid fears that his prostate cancer has returned. The trip comes at a sensitive time, as the administration is trying to win approval for a modified peace deal with the country's largest guerrilla group. In a brief statement from Bogotá's Santa Fe Hospital, Santos, 65, said the news that his cancer might have returned had caught him by "surprise." He first underwent prostate surgery in October 2012, when he said a "small tumor" had been removed during surgery. At the time, he said there was a "97 percent chance" that he was totally cured. Adolfo Llinás, the head of the medical center, said that Santos had come in for a routine checkup when doctors found elevated levels of prostate-specific antigen, or PSA, a protein used to track prostate cancer. Llinás said Santos would travel to the Johns Hopkins cancer center in Baltimore for additional tests not available in this Andean nation.

49. China's Arctic ambitions take shape in remote Iceland valley (Canada)

Associated Press, Jill Lawless, 2016 11 16

Laugar, Iceland - In a remote valley near the Arctic Circle where the wind whips the coarse yellow grass, China and Iceland are preparing to look to the sky -- and a shared future. Construction workers are building a research facility to study the Northern Lights, whose spectacular streaks of color light up Iceland's winter skies. Funded by China's Polar Research Institute, the facility will house Chinese, Icelandic and international scientists when it opens next year. This cement shell is a concrete achievement in the burgeoning relationship between the rising Asian superpower, population 1.37 billion, and this tiny North Atlantic island nation of 330,000 people. It may seem a lopsided friendship, but both countries perceive benefits. Beijing wants an Arctic ally as climate change opens up new sea routes and resource-extraction opportunities, while Iceland seeks heavyweight friends to anchor it against stormy economic waves. "It is better to be a friend to everyone when you are small than be an enemy to anybody," said Reinhard Reynisson, director of the nonprofit company building the Aurora Observatory. Reynisson speaks with the confidence of a country that has weathered earthquakes, volcanoes, famine and financial meltdown since it was settled by Vikings in the 9th century. But China's growing interest has also aroused suspicions among some Icelanders, who are wary of big powers trying to grab their resources, whether fish, energy or land. Iceland was nudged in China's direction by financial calamity. When the global credit crunch hit in 2008, Iceland's banks -- whose debts had ballooned to more than 10 times the country's GDP -- collapsed. Iceland's currency nosedived, unemployment soared, and Iceland was forced to go the International Monetary Fund and the European Union for bailouts. It also began looking for new economic partners to help it rebuild -- and China was willing. In 2010, the two countries agreed currency swaps between Iceland's krona and China's yuan, and in 2013 they signed a free trade agreement -- the first between China and a European country. With Iceland's support, China was granted observer status in 2013 at the Arctic Council, whose core members are Canada, Denmark, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Russia, the United States and Iceland.

50. China execution sends message on judicial authority

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe, 2016 11 16

Beijing - An outcry in China over the death sentence for a gruesome revenge killing of a village official raised hopes that authorities here were prepared to entertain a new conversation about rural injustice and the death penalty. But Jia Jinglong's execution for murder on Tuesday morning has made him, instead, the latest symbol of China's draconian unwillingness to broker discussion that calls into question Communist Party rule. Hours before Mr. Jia's death by lethal injection, the state-run People's Daily, among the country's most authoritative government voices, raised his case in a dark unsigned article that warned against challenging the system. The article suggests the legal experts and media commentators who questioned the execution of Mr. Jia are free to air their thoughts in private, but not in public. "The law must be trusted," it wrote. "Every citizen, especially those close to the law, should spontaneously defend judicial authority, and should not challenge it at will, based on personal preference or prejudice." Anyone guilty of damaging public trust in judicial authority, it says, should be punished "in order to purify the Internet environment." Under President Xi Jinping, China has staged a sweeping crackdown on dissent that has included more severe control of speech, particularly online, and the arrest and imprisonment of hundreds of lawyers and activists who have sought to fight violations of the country's own constitution.

51. China ex-vice mayor wanted for corruption returns from US

Associated Press, Christopher Bodeen, 2016 11 16

Beijing - A former vice mayor and China's most-wanted fugitive accused of corruption was arrested after returning from the U.S. on Wednesday in the latest success for President Xi Jinping's battle against graft. Yang Xiuzhu arrived in Beijing after spending 13 years on the run in countries across Asia, Europe and North America. A former deputy mayor in the eastern city of Wenzhou, Yang, 70, is wanted in China for allegedly embezzling more than $40 million. She had sat atop the list of China's 100 most-wanted graft suspects who Beijing has asked Interpol to help apprehend. Yang was immediately taken into custody after being led off a plane by a pair of policewomen. After passing through immigration, she was led into a room where she heard the charges against her read out by a prosecutor and signed a charge sheet. The entire process was broadcast live on state television. The Communist Party's anti-corruption watchdog says it has taken custody of 37 of the 100 most-wanted graft suspects since launching its "Sky Net" campaign to apprehend them in April 2015. They include both Yang and her brother, businessman Yang Jinjun, who is suspected of graft and bribery and returned to China late last year.

Vous être l'heureux propriétaire d'un smartphone tournant sous Android acheté pas trop cher ? Vos SMS, vos contacts, la liste de vos appels téléphoniques ou encore vos données de déplacement sont peut-être en train d'être analysés à Pékin. La société de sécurité informatique Kriptowire a, en effet, repéré qu'un logiciel préinstallé dans certains téléphones tournant avec le système d'exploitation de Google. Il surveillait secrètement les utilisateurs et envoyait même l'intégralité des textos et autres données sur un serveur basé en Chine. Et ce, au rythme de toutes les 72 heures ! Les téléphones prépayés et bas de gamme seraient les plus vulnérables mais le nombre de produits concernés reste encore flou, indique le New York Times qui révèle l'information. Le logiciel mis en cause a été créé par la société chinoise Shanghai Adups Technology, qui prétend être présent sur plus de 700 millions de téléphones, voitures et autres appareils connectés. Cette société a des partenariats avec de grands constructeurs chinois comme Huawei et ZTE. Au moins une société américaine, Blu Products, serait concernée, avec 120.000 terminaux équipés du logiciel mais une mise à jour aurait rapidement permis d'éliminer la fonctionnalité en cause, précise le groupe.

53. Funds tap turns dry for terror and Maoist groups after demonetisation

Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 11 16

New Delhi - Demonetisation of higher denomination currency notes by the government seems to have dealt a body blow to funding of terror in Jammu & Kashmir as well as Left-wing extremist violence across several states. While hawala cash transfers to terrorists and separatist elements based in Kashmir, which were mostly in denomination of Rs 500 and Rs 1,000, have come to an abrupt halt, Maoist groups, particularly in states like Bihar and Jharkhand, are at pains to "convert" the extortion money that has been stocked as piles of cash into 'legal tender', according to sources. An intelligence officer tracking terror funding in Jammu & Kashmir said hawala channels had run dry after the the scrapping of Rs 500 and Rs 1,000 notes. With no unaccounted cash to fund violence and protests in the valley, the lead trouble-makers have been forced to lie low. For, they no longer have the money to pay the local youths to pelt stones and stage violent protests.

54. Government bans controversial preacher Zakir Naik's NGO for 5 years (Canada).

Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 11 16

New Delhi - The government on Tuesday banned Islamic Research Foundation (IRF), the NGO of controversial Islamic preacher Zakir Naik+, as an 'unlawful organisation' for five years with immediate effect. The ban has been enforced under the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act (UAPA) and approved at a meeting of the Union Cabinet. TOI had earlier reported that the government intended to ban IRF+ citing Naik's "objectionable and subversive" speeches, the criminal cases filed against him and other members of IRF in Mumbai and Sindhudurg in Maharashtra and Kerala, as well as his "dubious" links with Peace TV that allegedly features "communal" and "pro- jihad" content as grounds for such a ban. An 'unlawful' association is different from a 'terrorist' organisation listed under UAPA. The Islamic orator is banned in the UK and Canada for his hate speech aimed against other religions. He is among 16 banned Islamic scholars in Malaysia.

In his statement, Modi said, "We recognize that terrorism is a global challenge, knows no boundaries and has extensive links with other forms of organized crime.
