Opposition New Democrat MP Murray Rankin called the retention of the metadata "a gross abuse of power and an unjustifiable intrusion into the privacy of Canadians" and said that Canadian spy agencies lacked oversight.

Canada is currently reviewing its national security laws and framework.

The court judgment added to an ongoing debate in Canada over police powers, press freedom and privacy following revelations that Quebec police had spied on at least seven journalists.

Quebec announced it will hold an inquiry into the surveillance of journalists by police forces in the province.

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called the surveillance "troubling" and said nothing similar was happening at the federal police force level.

Two of the province's police forces admitted they had obtained court warrants to monitor phones owned by journalists in order to track sources linked to leaks.

NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden spoke out on the revelations, calling police actions a "radical attack on the operations of the free press".

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, August 23, 2016 8:47 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-08-23

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique August 23, 2016 / le 23 août 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Police and passwords

An opinion piece states, "Handing over the electronic password to your computer or cellphone to police could give them more access to your personal information than turning over the key to your house. That's why Canadians must carefully guard their privacy rights when considering any proposal to make it easier for law-enforcement officials to rummage through their digital data. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale is calling for a public discussion on how to strike the right balance between the need for privacy and the need to give police adequate tools to fight all sorts of Internet-and computer related crime. It's a debate that's long overdue. And it's one that cannot be delayed much longer in light of a high-profile call from the country's police chiefs for a new law that would force people to hand over electronic passwords, albeit with the permission of a judge. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police argues quite rightly that electronic devices are being used in the commission of all sorts of crime - from fraud to child abuse - and law enforcement is struggling to keep up. It notes that Canada has no law to compel someone to provide a password or encryption key during an investigation. The trick is to find a way to give police the powers they really need while safeguarding the right to privacy, as well as constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination and unreasonable search and seizure. Reasonable and probable grounds of a potential crime must be shown in a warrant. It can't be a fishing expedition. The warrant would have to describe exactly what police are looking for." Toronto Star (Times Colonist, A8)

Password protection a crucial charter right

An opinion piece states, "You have the right to remain silent - for now. If certain law enforcement officials have their way, we may soon be required to divulge our Facebook and iPhone passwords to the police. Last week, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police adopted a startling resolution calling for legislation that, on judicial authorization, would "compel the holder of an encryption key or password to reveal it to law enforcement." Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale invited public debate on the proposal. Police are responding to new challenges wrought by modern technology. Encryption renders data unintelligible without the user's password. Even with a warrant to seize and search a cellphone or computer, police cannot gain access to the valuable information stored on those devices unless they can guess the password (or hack into the device, as the FBI recently did with a locked iPhone in the San Bernardino case). Police worry criminals are "going dark"- i.e., using encryption to evade detection and prosecution. Compelling suspects to surrender their cellphone and computer passwords is an enticing solution to this problem. But it is one that ought to be unacceptable in a free and democratic society. The police chiefs' proposal would lead to a radical erosion of our constitutional rights protected under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. When the state accuses us of a crime, we are entitled to say, "prove it." The Supreme Court of Canada has said this right - the right against self-incrimination - is the organizing principle of our criminal justice system. An accused person is under no obligation to assist the state in her or his own prosecution, whether by answering questions about where she was the previous night or by revealing passcodes." Toronto Star, A11; * Hamilton Spectator

Police chiefs' request goes one step too far

An editorial states, "Time for another discussion about balancing our individual rights with the need for reasonable security measures. This time, though, there's no middle ground from our perspective. The national association of police chiefs wants the ability to compel citizens to hand over online passwords provided a court order is obtained. This is a bad idea. A step too far. Beyond the pale. Why? Here are two arguments against this idea. One, admittedly tongue-in-cheek, goes like this. Who remembers all their passwords? So the police get a court order and want them all. So you end up giving them three old ones before you stumble across the new one. We can just hear it now: "Honest officer, I never log off so I don't need my password ..." Two, more seriously: This idea is just too broad and duplicates tools the police should be able to use now. As it stands, if the police have adequate evidence justifying a search of your property, they can get it by obtaining a court-sanctioned search warrant. Typically, warrants include appropriate conditions and restraints. How is searching your car or house any different than searching your phone or hard drive? (...) Ralph Goodale hasn't said what he thinks of this specific measure. But he's likely to hear from his advisers that it will be tested through a constitutional challenge if enacted, and it will probably lose. It goes too far and is too broad. Goodale is right about one thing. He says these issues are getting a lot more scrutiny in the U.S. than they are here. Canadians, Goodale says, need to have more discussion about how far police and security agencies should be willing to go. He's right. Certain reasonable curtailments to privacy and freedom may be justifiable; others may not be - like this one. But we may not know one from the other without a robust national discussion." Hamilton Spectator, A12

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Lawyers call for national cybersecurity standards

Technology lawyers say they're hopeful the federal government's public consultation on cybersecurity will result in a set of national standards for digital safety in Canada. Technology lawyer Lisa Abe-Oldenburg says that, currently, it's difficult to advise clients who ask about the level of security standards they should be following to protect their systems. "There's really not a lot of legislation we can point to to give them any kind of guidance and comfort," she says. "It often becomes a negotiation between the customer and the supplier." Ira Nishisato, partner at Borden Ladner Gervais LLP, complains of the same issue. "There are essentially no national standards," Nishisato says. "From a legal perspective, the issue is always the question of standard of care — to what standard of care could an organization be held to in terms of ensuring the integrity and the security of its system? "Right now, if you look for what you should be doing, it's really not a question that avails itself of a straightforward answer," he adds. "It would be extraordinarily helpful to have some sort of direction in terms of national guidelines or national standards for cybersecurity and cyber-risk management." Last week, the federal government announced it would be launching a public consultation "on the evolving cybersecurity landscape" with the goal of strengthening digital safety. "The government's cybersecurity review is an opportunity to build Canadian strength and expertise. Canadians spend more time online than people in any other country," said Ralph Goodale, minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness. "We need to get really good at cybersecurity — across our personal, business, infrastructure and government sectors — so we can take full advantage of the digital economy, while protecting the safety and security of Canadians, and selling our valuable cyberskills and products into a booming market throughout the rest of the world," Goodale added. Current legislation and regulations around cybersecurity lack rigour, according to Abe-Oldenburg. Canadian Lawyer Magazine (2016-08-22)

China edges ahead in the race to build hack-proof cyber security systems

The international power struggle for the control of data has intensified with a number of Chinese companies now trying to challenge entrenched cloud vendors such as Microsoft, Google and Amazon. The growing market, targeted by Chinese players such as Huawei, Alibaba and Baidu, has raised serious questions about security of data storage and whether tech firms in China or elsewhere are vulnerable to attack. The National UAE (2016-08-22)

China's proposed cyber law unnerves foreign players in cloud

International platforms such as Google, Facebook and Twitter are already banned in China. But there are worries about a new cyber security law being formulated in Beijing that would require data collected in China to remain in the country. The National UAE (2016-08-22)

Commentary: Evidence points to another Snowden at the NSA

An opinion piece states, "In the summer of 1972, state-of-the-art campaign spying consisted of amateur burglars, armed with duct tape and microphones, penetrating the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee. Today, amateur burglars have been replaced by cyberspies, who penetrated the DNC armed with computers and sophisticated hacking tools... Now, in the latest twist, hacking tools themselves, likely stolen from the National Security Agency, are on the digital auction block. Once again, the usual suspects start with Russia — though there seems little evidence backing up the accusation..." Reuters (2016-08-22)

France, Germany want limits on encryption to fight terrorism

France and Germany want messaging apps such as Telegram to limit encryption to help governments monitor communications among suspected terrorists. Privacy advocates argue that encryption is essential to online security, notably for banking transactions. French Interior Minister Bernard Cazeneuve said authorities are not pushing to ban encryption, but to work with companies that offer encrypted services so that they cannot be abused by violent extremists. He and his German counterpart said Tuesday they're pushing for a Europe-wide policy limiting encryption to be discussed at an EU summit next month. The ministers also stressed the need for a unified European system for sharing police information, after deadly extremist attacks in both countries this summer. Cazeneuve said French authorities have detained three people this month with "clear plans" to stage attacks. Associated Press (Cape Breton Post)

Cyber criminals increasingly using insiders in telco attacks: Kaspersky

Kaspersky Lab said internal staff members are latest vulnerability in telecoms service providers' security systems. Kaspersky Lab warned that people employed by telcos are as much a threat to the security of networks and subscriber data as remote cyber attacks. The security company said cyber criminals are increasingly using service providers' own staff to gain access to sensitive data. Joint research conducted by Kaspersky Lab and B2B International found that 28% of all cyber attacks and 38% of targeted attacks now involve malicious activity by company insiders. Scammers typically target staff members who are unhappy, but are also known to employ blackmail using compromising information, the security company said. That information is gathered either from publicly available sources or from previously stolen data, which cyber criminals then use to force employees to provide details of their corporate credentials and internal systems, and to distribute spear-phishing attacks. Employees who can quickly provide access to subscriber and customer data or SIM duplication and reissue facilities are in the most demand from criminals. Total Telecom

Imperva: Application layer DDoS attacks are on the rise

Application layer DDoS attacks are becoming more common, perhaps because they cost less for malicious actors to execute and can more effectively evade defenses than network layer attacks, Imperva says. One such attack generated 8.7Gbps at its peak, "unheard of in relation to application layer assaults," in an effort to thread its way through the DDoS mitigations that had been set up to defend against such attacks, according to Imperva's "DDoS Threat Landscape Report 2015-2016" released today. Application layer attacks can be measured in responses per second required from the application targeted, and they generally require less volume than network layer attacks to succeed, the report says. That means they require fewer botnet resources, if botnets are the platform from which the attack is launched. That in turn means attackers on a budget can afford to create attacks that last longer. More than 44 percent of application layer attacks lasted more than an hour while just 12.2 percent of network layer ones did. Network World

Linux Trojan targets Drupal, WordPress for DDoS and ransoms

A newly found piece of malware targeting web servers running on Linux machines is scanning popular content management systems (CMS) for vulnerabilities to expand a botnet. Russian security firm Dr. Web says the malware is capable of launching distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks, sending spam email, and self-propagating across a network. The malware targets a number of widely used systems, including Drupal, Wordpress, Magento, ContactScanner, AirOS, Exagrid, Jetspeed, and others. One feature of the malware scans for websites that use these systems, attempting to exploit known vulnerabilities to expose user details, private SSH keys, and login credentials stored on remote servers. The security firm attributes the malware to recent attacks on Drupal sites that used an SQL injection flaw to compromise web servers. Victims faced a demand of 1.4 Bitcoin to release the key. CSO Online

Rex Linux Trojan Turns Infected Machines to Bitcoin Miners, Unleashes DDoS Attacks

The number of attacks on computers is increasing almost exponentially these days. The latest one to make news is the Rex Linux Trojan. This "Swiss knife" of a malicious program is a piece of work capable of running DDoS attacks, hold the infected computer for ransom (ransomware) and even mine Bitcoin without the user's knowledge. Built on Google's Go platform, the Trojan was first identified by cyber security firms three months ago. The earlier version of Rex Linux Trojan was much weaker and it was found targeting Drupal websites. Security experts were able to defeat the ransomware easily. However, Rex Linux Trojan as evolved since then to become a considerable threat. According to reports, the malware uses peer to peer communication network and has 5 major parts and it is capable of attacking more than just CMS platforms like Drupal. The different parts of Rex Linux Trojan include an attack vector, Bitcoin mining capability, Command and Control Communication, ransomware and DDoS attack. The malware is delivered by bots scanning the internet for vulnerable websites. It is found to take advantage of multiple well-known security vulnerabilities of the platforms. Rex Linux Trojan makes use of CVE-2014-3704 Drupalgeddon vulnerability for infecting Drupal based web platforms. Similarly, Magento based websites are targeted using Shoplift RCE bugs. Many plugins on WordPress are found to be vulnerable to Rex Linux Trojan. Some of the compromised plugins include WooCommerce, Robo Gallery, Rev Slider, WP-Squirrel, Site Import, Brandfolder, Issuu Panel and Gwolle Guestbook. Bitcoin News Service

Eddie Bauer Asserts Malware Hit its Retail Store PoS Systems

Retail store Eddie Bauer based in Bellevue, Washington declared on August 18, 2016 that malware had infected its PoS systems letting unauthorized parties reach customers' credit and debit card data during January 2-July 17 this year (2016). But customers who made purchases via the eddiebauer.com website didn't have their card data affected. Following the announcement, KrebsOnSecurity.com, on 5th July 2016, contacted Eddie Bauer because it (the website) had known about the breach from many people engaged in combating scams against financial institutions in USA. Everybody of those people stated they had detected a fraud scheme involving client cards wherein the most common aspect was that those cards had been lately utilized at certain 350+ stores of Eddie Bauer. The scam combating specialists stated that the breach and resultant theft seemed as dating back to not before January 2016. A free service of ID-theft protection has been offered from Eddie Bauer to all clients impacted, for a 12-month period. However, this doesn't seem to help much if crooks keep managing making fraudulent buying through fake payment cards in the name of the actual card-owners. Consumerist.com posted this, August 18, 2016. SPAMFighter News

New malware successfully attacked industrial sectors in over 30 countries

A new wave of targeted attacks against the industrial and engineering sectors in multiple countries around the world have been discovered by the Kaspersky Lab Global Research and Analysis Team. Using spear-phishing emails and malware based on commercial spyware kits, criminals hunt for valuable business related data stored in their victims' networks. In total, over 130 organisations from 30 countries including Spain, Pakistan, the United Arab Emirates, India, Egypt, United Kingdom, Germany, Saudi Arabia and other countries were successfully attacked by this group. In June 2016, Kaspersky Lab researchers spotted a wave of spear-phishing e-mails with malicious attachments. These messages were mostly sent to the top and middle level managers of numerous companies. The e-mails sent by the attackers appeared to be coming from a bank in the UAE, looking like payment advice from the bank with an attached SWIFT document, but in reality the attached archive contained malware. Further investigation conducted by Kaspersky Lab researchers showed that the spear-phishing campaign has most likely been organised by a cybercriminal group which has been tracked by company researchers since March 2015. The June attacks appear to be the most recent operation conducted by this group.

Network World Asia

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, October 19, 2016 8:50 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-10-19

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 19, 2016 / le 19 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Businesses must buck surveillance

Resisting government mass surveillance isn't just the right thing to do - it's good for business, whistleblower Edward Snowden told a Toronto cybersecurity conference Tuesday. Speaking via video link to the annual Canadian industry event SecTor, Snowden brought up the recent revelation that Yahoo Inc. had agreed to scan customers' emails for U.S. intelligence. Shortly after, Verizon Communications Inc. asked for a US$1 billion discount on its US$4.8 billion agreement to buy the company, according to a report in the New York Post. "If you collaborate with the government in this regard, far beyond what the law requires, it can actually have a significant, substantial consequence for your valuation," Snowden said. "Yahoo, which is a very powerful, very rich organization, cooperated beyond what was legally required. And it damaged its brand (...)" Snowden cited Open Whisper Systems, which makes the encrypted messaging app Signal, as an example of an organization that benefited from pushing back against a government request for cooperation in a surveillance program. With the help of the American Civil Liberties Union, Open Whisper Systems fought a gag order on a subpoena for information associated with two phone numbers. Ultimately, Open Whisper Systems had to comply with the subpoena, but the damage was mitigated because of another Snowden-approved policy: Only retaining as much personal data as absolutely necessary. The subpoena asked for browsing history and tracking data stored in web browsers, but Signal doesn't collect that information. "Companies work for their customers first. This means they should only hold the data that's absolutely necessary for the operation of their businesses," Snowden said. "When this story broke about Open Whisper Systems abiding by this principle, the fact they were being compelled through the state's monopoly on use of law actually benefited their brand." Postmedia (Financial Post, FP3; National Post); IT World Canada (2016-10-18)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Politics this morning: EU-Canada Arctic Conference takes place in Ottawa

(...) There will be a panel discussion on cyber security in Canada, and how the country can increase the protection of important data. The event will take place from 9:15-11:15 in Room 160S, Centre Block, Parliament Hill in Ottawa. The speakers include: David Murakami Wood, Canadian research chair for the Surveillance Studies Centre at Queens University; Claude A. Sarrazin, president of SIRCO; Bonnie Butlin, national coordinator and chair of the National Council of the Canadian Cybersecurity Alliance; and Peter Sloly, executive director, risk advisory/cyber, national lead for security & justice sector, at Deloitte Canada. Hill Times

Canada's cybersecurity strategy is anemic: expert

Canada's cybersecurity strategy is so outdated, the last time it was revised was in 2010 when Conservative Vic Toews was public safety minister. Six years doesn't seem like a long time for a policy to lay untouched, but in the world of espionage it's an eternity. "I would suggest that our cybersecurity strategy is somewhat anemic," Stephanie Carvin, a former Government of Canada national security analyst, said. The assistant professor at Carleton University's Norman Paterson School of National Affairs said she believes Canada's strategy on the public safety department's website lacks any teeth. "The government has principles and it has a document that's called the cybersecurity strategy, but it's not clear to me that we actually do have a strategy that is behind it with any kind of meat." Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale acknowledges the gaps in our system and has said he is committed to plugging them. "We're looking at the governance of our cyber security systems, we're looking at the technology, we're looking at the financing to see what's necessary to make us stronger," Goodale said. When he was appointed minister, Goodale was mandated to lead a full review of infrastructure to protect Canadians from cyber-threats. Department officials say that consultation will be done in December. There is no fixed timeline for the changes to be implemented, but Minister Goodale is looking to other nations for advice. "Israel for example, is considered to be very good at this, as well as the United States and the Brits and others," Goodale said. Surghar Daily

Over 100 groups cashing in on ransomware, Canadian infosec pros told

Ransomware is such big business that security vendor F-secure is tracking 110 gangs making money from the malware, the company's chief research officer has told annual SecTor cyber security conference. It's the biggest single problem infosec teams face today, Mikko Hypponen told the Toronto conference on Tuesday, because once a machine is infected "it will stop you dead in your tracks." Things are so bad that a number of organizations are buying digital wallets with Bitcoin as protection for the day they are infected – and their willingness to pay ransoms only makes things worse, Hypponen added, because the more victims that pay the more attackers are encouraged. IT World Canada

Only do penetration tests if your security program is up to it, say experts

Penetration testing is an exam that cyber security experts tout for finding out the true strengths and weaknesses of an organization's personal and technology defences. However, if your organization doesn't have a mature security program pen testing is a waste of time and money, two veterans warned infosec pros Tuesday at the annual SecTor cyber security conference in Toronto (...). In an interview later West and Baseggio expanded on this and other points. "If you have a very immature security program and you know it – which most clients do – then that's a very clear indication you should probably put your money into the building blocks that make you secure rather than a shot in the dark," said Baseggio. "You already know your network is insecure because you haven't put any effort into it." IT World Canada

Province's cellphone security sub-par, but getting better

The B.C. government's lax rules on taxpayer-paid iPhones and tablets has left it blind to the security risks of viruses, hackers and unauthorized applications used by public officials - some of whom wait months to report lost devices, according to two new investigations. Auditor General Carol Bellringer and acting Information and Privacy Commissioner Drew McArthur issued joint reports Tuesday that raise red flags about government security for thousands of smartphones and tablets. But they also admitted the province has plugged the most serious security holes since their audits concluded in November 2015, and they didn't investigate whether there were any cases in which data was inappropriately accessed. "While I'm encouraged, there's also some work to be done," McArthur said. "The highest of the risks have been addressed, or we would not have released the report publicly," Bellringer added. Postmedia (Vancouver Sun, A6); Globe and Mail

OPP focus on raising awareness about phishing and ransomware as cyber security awareness month continues

Members of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) remind everyone to be aware of the email scams criminals use to commit identity theft and other crimes. Phishing is any e-mail falsely claiming to be from an established legitimate organization such as a financial institution, business or government agency. The e-mail may request or direct the consumer to visit a certain website to update or provide personal and/or financial information and passwords. It is really a malicious attempt to collect customer information for the purpose of committing fraud. KingstonRegion.com

Cobourg forum provides Internet fraud and cyber crime information for seniors

Seniors are invited to learn about Internet fraud and cyber crime at a forum. The 6th annual Seniors Active Living and Education Forum, hosted by the Cobourg Seniors Activity Centre, is on Friday, Oct. 21. The free forum includes more than 35 exhibitors as well as education sessions on services for Cobourg's seniors. Topics will include hearing aids, fraud, insurance, health and more. Local businesses and non-profit organizations will participate in the program to offer information on local services. Northumberland News

Hackers create more IoT botnets with Mirai source code

Malware that can build botnets out of IoT products has gone on to infect twice as many devices after its source code was publicly released. The total number of IoT devices infected with the Mirai malware has reached 493,000, up from 213,000 bots before the source code was disclosed around Oct. 1, according to internet backbone provider Level 3 Communications. "The true number of actual bots may be higher," Level 3 said in a Tuesday blog post. Hackers have been taking advantage of the Mirai malware's source code, following its role in launching a massive DDOS (distributed denial-of-service) attack that took down the website of cybersecurity reporter Brian Krebs. CSO Online; Softpedia; PC World; Motherboard

Hajime IoT Worm Considerably More Sophisticated Than Mirai

Security researchers have discovered a new IoT worm that appears to share behavior with the more popular Mirai IoT malware, but which is far more sophisticated than the latter. Because Mirai is the Japanese word for "future," they named this new variation Hajime, the Japanese word for "beginning." Responsible for Hajime's discovery are Sam Edwards and Ioannis Profetis, security researchers for Rapidity Networks. Softpedia

Flaw in Intel chips could make malware attacks more potent

Researchers have devised a technique that bypasses a key security protection built into just about every operating system. If left unfixed, this could make malware attacks much more potent. ASLR, short for "address space layout randomization," is a defense against a class of widely used attacks that surreptitiously install malware by exploiting vulnerabilities in an operating system or application. Ars Technica

Microsoft Releases KB3192403, KB3192404, and KB3192406 Preview Rollups

Starting this month, Microsoft is shipping Windows 7 and 8.1 updates as rollups in two different cycles, one on Patch Tuesday for security fixes and another one on the third Tuesday of each month for non-security fixes, plus a preview of next month's rollup. Softpedia

Sofacy APT Develops New Flash Player Exploit Platform Called DealersChoice

The Sofacy cyber-espionage group, also known as Fancy Bear, APT28, Sednit, Pawn Storm, or Strontium, has developed new hacking tools, which they've deployed over the summer in live attacks. According to Palo Alto Networks, the group targeted a Ukrainian defense organization and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of a nearby country. Sofacy used spear-phishing emails to deliver malicious documents to their victims. The group spoofed communications from the European Parliament's Press Unit in order to fool recipients (...) The spear-phishing campaign delivered malicious documents about a possible Russian invasion of the Ukraine, drawing the recipient's attention. According to Palo Alto, when a victim would open these documents, they'd be presented with decoy files instead, which contained text copy-pasted from international news media. Under the hood, the original files would load another Word document via embedded OLE objects, which would, in turn, contain Adobe Flash SWF files. These double-nested Office files would attempt to exploit the user's PC for unpatched Flash vulnerabilities. Softpedia

US Reps Requesting Further Intel Around Yahoo Surveillance Story

Nearly 50 representatives from 27 different states are still looking to clear the air around this month's Yahoo surveillance story. In a letter on Friday addressed to Attorney General Loretta Lynch and Director of National Intelligence James Clapper, government officials asked for clarity around the surveillance program mentioned in a jarring Reuters article earlier this month. Threatpost

Experts 'Outraged' by Warrant Demanding Fingerprints to Unlock Smartphones

Civil libertarians and security experts say a Department of Justice search warrant goes too far in seeking fingerprint data to crack open smartphones. The warrant in question would allow law enforcement to search a Lancaster, Calif., residence for an undisclosed number of smartphones. The warrant would also force anyone in the home to use their fingerprints to unlock a phone if it uses a mechanism similar to Apple's Touch ID biometric technology. Experts say the warrant is one of a growing number that overreach when it comes to the government's attempt to circumvent encryption locks used by Apple and other smartphone makers. Threatpost

Media vulnerable to Election Night cyber attack

Despite spending hundreds of millions of dollars on security upgrades, U.S. media organizations have failed to properly protect their newsrooms from cyberattacks on their websites, communications systems and even editing platforms — opening themselves up to the possibility of a chaos-creating hack around Election Day. In just the past month, BuzzFeed has been vandalized, and both Newsweek and a leading cybersecurity blog were knocked offline after publishing articles that hackers apparently didn't appreciate. Federal law enforcement is investigating multiple attacks on news organizations, and journalists moderating the presidential debates say they've even gotten briefings from the FBI on proper cyber hygiene, prompting them to go back to paper and pens for prep work. Politico

Trump Twitter Support Artificially Exaggerated by Bots – Report

Presidential hopeful Donald Trump's Twitter support was over-exaggerated due to significant bot activity on the site four times as great as that of his rival Hillary Clinton, according to new research. Oxford University's Philip Howard made the claims in a new report analysing tweets made on the night of the first presidential debate and the succeeding three days. Focusing on accounts which only posted messages with hashtags in favor of one candidate, he then went on to ascertain if any of these had tweeted more than 50 times each day across the period in question — indicating they were bots. Infosecurity Magazine

How Europe Can Fight Cyber Attacks (And Win)

The cyber landscape in Europe is about to change. As the U.S. presidential campaign enters its home stretch, the issue of cyber security is front-and-center. Rarely a day goes by when a new report of a corporate or government breach fails to make headlines. Across Europe on the other hand, news of major cyber attacks, particularly against European companies, are rarely found on the front pages of Le Monde, Der Spiegel or La Repubblica. Have European institutions done a better job of safeguarding against attacks than their American counterparts? Has Europe just been exceptionally lucky? The answer to both questions is a resounding no. The unfortunate truth is that breaches are occurring with frequency across Europe (...) First, the cyber landscape in Europe is about to change profoundly. The adoption of the EU

General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) is a watershed event. For the first time, companies across Europe will be required to disclose data breaches to national data protection authorities and, where warranted, affected individuals. Importantly, failure to do so may result in extraordinary penalties of up to 4% of total revenues (...) According to forensic experts, companies in Europe are currently taking three times as long to identify penetrations of their IT systems. Just as important, the EU must help companies peel back the secrecy that currently enshrouds cyber incidents. Fortune

Nation-State Hackers Hit Japanese Nuclear Facility

A Japanese nuclear research facility has been hacked, resulting in the theft of 59,000 files. The University of Toyama's Hydrogen Isotope Research Center is one of the world leaders in tritium research. Tritium, also known as Hydrogen-3, is a radioactive isotope of hydrogen that is an important fuel for controlled nuclear fusion, and a key component of hydrogen bombs. It is also one of the contaminants in the water building up at the Fukushima No. 1 nuclear plant. The infiltrators stole the lab's tritium research, according to Japanese media, along with the personal details of 1,493 researchers. Attackers stole data in three batches: December 2015, March 2016 and June 2016. Infosecurity Magazine

India's Axis Bank says no loss from cyber attack

Axis Bank Ltd, India's third-biggest private sector lender by assets, said on Wednesday there was no loss to its customers from a recent cyber attack. "Our internal monitoring mechanism identified such a threat recently and all steps have been undertaken to neutralize the same," the bank said in a statement to Reuters. Reuters; Economic Times

Virtual Safety: Cyber security in AR/VR games

It is a fact universally acknowledged that laws and regulations lag behind technology. Augmented reality (AR) and virtual reality (VR) applications are no exception to this. Online games platforms have all the ingredients to attract hackers and cybercriminals: large numbers of individuals and personal data, in-game purchases (involving the handling of payment details), code running on "always on" and "always present" mobile devices and players (whether kids or not) likely to be more interested in the gaming experience than staying safe in cyberspace. Little wonder then that the Sony PlayStation Network hack in 2011 compromised the database of 77 million people, including personal data and payment card information (...) When you take the vulnerabilities of online gaming and overlay it with the uniquely more personal/intimate interface of AR/VR applications with their users, the consequences of security lapses could be more immediate even than theft and identity fraud. Early reports about this year's new AR game which has taken the world by storm (we need not speak its name), suggest that AR (and VAR) applications are just as vulnerable to data hacks and malware as other systems. IT Pro Portal

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, October 21, 2016 8:49 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-10-21

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 21, 2016 / le 21 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Security breach caused online frenzy

Last month Yahoo announced that at least 500 million accounts were hacked, leaking important personal information. This security breach caused an online frenzy that left many people afraid of having their online information stolen, both in the U.S. and right here at home in Nova Scotia. "People in Nova Scotia are at no greater nor lesser risk than anyone else in the world," said Dr. Wayne Patterson, professor of Computer Science at Howard University. ". . . some prominent Nova Scotians such as Premier Stephen McNeil, Sidney Crosby or Ellen Page might need extra levels of protection." But Patterson suggested keeping information as secure as possible by backing up documents onto a removable device, such as a memory stick. "Some vendors may suggest that you protect your data by storing it in a 'cloud,'" said Patterson, a New Brunswick native. "This is certainly becoming more and more popular, but it is a fairly unsettled issue amongst those of us who do research in cybersecurity." In Yahoo's case, they had recently shut down the division of research staff specifically addressing security issues and were in the process of rebuilding. But Yahoo is not the only company that has been breached in the past. "Microsoft was notorious for many years in putting the most minimal effort in their software development on providing strong security," said Patterson, director of the Cybersecurity Research Center, associate vice provost for Research and senior fellow for Research and International Affairs in the Graduate School at Howard. Chronicle-Herald, E3

Verizon relooking at Yahoo deal after millions hacked

Verizon is doubling down on language it used last week to describe the massive, historic data breach affecting an estimated 500 million Yahoo accounts - a move that puts even greater pressure on the beleaguered web company as it seeks to close a sale to the telecom giant. At the moment, "we have to assume (the breach) will have a material impact on Yahoo," said Verizon chief financial officer Fran Shammo on an investor call Thursday. A change in Yahoo's business that's deemed "material" is one that could make the Internet firm much less attractive to Verizon financially, and under the terms of the deal could allow Verizon to back away from the transaction. Verizon's lawyers talked by phone with Yahoo for the first time Wednesday to discuss the impact of the breach on Yahoo's business, according to Shammo. Verizon will take "some time" to determine the fate of the deal, Shammo said, unless Yahoo "comes up with a different process" for interacting with its buyer. Washington Post (Waterloo Region Record, C7)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Cyber security in Canada overdue for an update, experts tell Senate open caucus

Cyber security in Canada needs a major overhaul, one that looks at the problem beyond just the virtual scope; that was the message that panelists delivered at a public open caucus meeting hosted by Senate Liberals this past Wednesday during Cyber Security Awareness Month. "The rate and nature of change requires an evergreen cyber strategy," said Peter Sloly, executive director with Deloitte Canada, who works in the cyber section of the risk advisory services. "There's no point in having one in 2010 and updating it in 2014 or having one in 2016 and then updating it four years later around an election cycle." Sloly, a former deputy chief of the Toronto Police Service, emphasized that like policing, cyber security is more than law enforcement; it requires prevention, engagement, and the protection and promotion of rights. These same elements can, and should, apply to cyber security. Hill Times (2016-10-20)

"I've seen pretty much all your tech secrets"

Government prosecutors intend to file additional "serious felony charges" against a former NSA contractor who was arrested in August and charged with stealing a massive trove of top-secret intelligence documents. In court papers filed Thursday [you can read them below], the government said Navy veteran Harold T. Martin III stole 50,000 gigabytes of data over the course of two decades, which far exceeds the number of documents Edward Snowden took from the NSA and leaked to journalists. (One gigabyte can store about 10,000 pages.) Prosecutors say Martin, who had been a contractor with Booz Allen Hamilton — the same company that employed Snowden at the time of his leak — is a national security threat and a flight risk, and must remain behind bars until a trial in his case begins next year... "Some of the documents are marked 'Unclassified/For Official Use Only,' and many are marked 'Secret' and 'Top Secret,'" the court filing says. "Many of the documents marked 'Secret' and 'Top Secret,' also bear special handling caveats. The information stolen by the Defendant also appears to include the personal information of government employees." Vice News (2016-10-20)

U.S., U.K. cybersecurity officials: Destructive hacks are coming

The world should brace itself for more physically destructive hacks, two senior cybersecurity officials said Wednesday, warning that a more dangerous era of hacking was already upon us. Paul Chichester, the director of operations at Britain's new National Cyber Security Centre, told an event hosted by British defence think-tank RUSI that electronic intrusions were on their way to becoming more "destructive, disruptive and coercive." "That will be our future," he told a crowd of officers, academics and industry experts gathered for a two-day symposium in central London. Chichester was seconded by Air Force Lt. Gen. James K. McLaughlin, deputy commander at U.S. Cyber Command, who told attendees that infrastructure-wrecking attacks were being seen "right now in the environment." Neither official went into specifics about what they'd seen or why they felt the threat was intensifying, although McLaughlin invoked a cyberattack in Ukraine which knocked out three separate power distribution companies last year. The Dec. 23 incident, believed to have been pulled off by a team of hackers using stolen passwords, left 225,000 people without electricity, according to a U.S. Department of Homeland Security bulletin published two months later. Canadian Underwriter (2016-10-20)

Can governments really keep us safe from terrorism without invading our privacy?

GCHQ has many negative connotations attached to it - including illegally collecting data from the UK public - but David Omand, former head of GCHQ and now professor at Kings, is hoping for a change in the way governments deals with our private information. Referring to new legislation that is currently going through parliament - the 'Investigatory Powers Law' - he explained how regulation is being implemented to create transparency in the way the UK government deals with cybersecurity. "What is going on, as we speak, is a phase change in the relationship between the secret state and parliament," explained Omand. "One way of looking at this is that the secret activity of the state is now being fully bought under the modern rule of law." In 2013, when the NSA scandal went public, the way governments mine data from its citizens became of public concern. No longer were the intelligence departments free to take what they wanted without public repercussion and outrage. "It kicked off a moral panic around Europe. It lead to investigations and endless court cases against the government." However, in 2015 and 2016, when terrorists hit Paris, Orlando, Nice and other major cities around the world, intelligence agencies cited the attacks as the reason behind their rigorous stealing of data. Omand explained how we'd reached this state of cyberthreat. "There were urgent demands for intelligence on those who mean us harm, but that coincided with the fact that we have been placing our personal intelligence in the digital world." So where does the line stand with mining data for security reasons? Is there a balance to be reached between privacy and security? According to Omand, "2017 is the year of reconciliation, in which we recognise as a mature democracy, it is possible to have sufficient security and sufficient privacy." Wired UK (2016-10-20)

Hack us and you're basically attacking America, says UK defence sec - And we'll attack you back, promises Defence Secretary

Britain is splurging £265m on military cyber security – and that includes offensive capabilities, according to Defence Secretary Sir Michael Fallon. Speaking at the Royal United Services Institute yesterday, Sir Michael said the investment into the Cyber Vulnerability Investigations programme would "help us protect against these threats". "The average cost of the most severe online security breaches for bigger companies starts at almost £1.5m, up £600,000 from 2014," said Sir Michael, adding: "It's only a matter of time before we have to deal with a major attack on UK interests." So far Britain has managed to avoid the sort of targeted large-scale hacks that have seen big US tech companies such as Yahoo! see 500 million user accounts compromised, or the Target hack which saw millions of credit card and debit card details as well as names and addresses leaked into the hands of cyber-criminals. UK Register

Snapchat, Skype, BBM not protecting users' privacy, says Amnesty International

Major messaging services like Snapchat, Skype and BlackBerry's BBM are not taking basic steps to ensure privacy, according to Amnesty International. The organization said this failure has serious human rights repercussions since it leaves users, and particularly activists, vulnerable to spying from cybercriminals and government agencies. "If you think instant messaging services are private, you are in for a big surprise," Sherif Elsayed-Ali, the head of Amnesty International's technology and human rights team, said in a news release. "Young people, the most prolific sharers of personal details and photos over apps like Snapchat, are especially at risk," he added. The organization conducted a privacy assessment of the most popular messaging apps in the world. Some of the other apps included in the report are Facebook's messaging service and WhatsApp, Apple's iMessage and Facetime, Google's Allo, Duo and Hangouts, Tencent's QQ and Wechat, and Telegram. CBC News

Microsoft launches cyber security engagement centre in India

US tech giant Microsoft has set up a cyber security engagement centre (CSEC) in the Delhi-NCR region that will help it work with partners to identify and respond to cyber threats in the country. The India centre, which is the seventh such facility for the company globally, will function as a satellite to Microsoft's Redmond Digital Crimes Unit (DCU). While Microsoft declined to comment on investment details, it said the company invests about USD 1 billion annually in the area of security research, innovation and development. "The CSEC's mission is to help build a trusted and secure computing environment, a critical enabler for India's digital transformation. It will work towards fostering deeper cyber security collaborations with public and private sector organisations for this," Microsoft India Chairman Bhaskar Pramanik said. Deccan Chronicle

Cybersécurité en France : 47% de cyberattaques en moins en 2016

En France, le nombre de cyberattaques détectées par les entreprises au cours des 12 derniers mois s'élève en moyenne à 11 incidents par jour (soit une baisse de 47% à taux de change constant par rapport à 2015) pour un montant moyen de pertes financières estimé à 1,5 million d'euros (en diminution de 56% à taux de change constant en un an). Dans la première publication d'une série de quatre livres blancs présentant les principaux enseignements de cette étude, PwC démontre que les entreprises perçoivent désormais la cybersécurité comme un enjeu clé facteur de croissance et d'innovation pour leurs activités. En effet, 59% des dirigeants interrogés par PwC déclarent avoir augmenté leurs dépenses de cybersécurité en 2016 pour accompagner la transformation digitale de leur entreprise. En France, les entreprises ont investi en moyenne 3,9 millions d'euros dans la sécurité de leurs systèmes d'information au cours des 12 derniers mois. Finyear

When Gadgets Attack: Internet of Things Compromises Security

The number of electronic devices with Internet connection is growing rapidly. Many of them use simple default passwords and therefore run a high risk of getting hacked. In the worst case scenario, grave consequences are to be expected, Nordic security experts warn. Everything from household appliances to industrial machinery may be controlled remotely via Internet. The phenomenon is called Internet of Things (IoT), and is expected to surpass mobile phones as the largest category of Internet-connected devices in just a year's time. A large part of these devices are still plagued by poor security, Swedish security analyst Leif Nixon, founder and owner of Nixon Security, told Finnish state broadcaster Yle. Most of them still use default usernames and passwords and are prone to hacker attacks. Sputnik International

Survey finds voters more worried about cybersecurity than ISIS, climate change

New data released today from cybersecurity company, Cybereason, revealed that nearly 70 percent of registered U.S. voters believe cyber attacks are more threatening to the U.S. than ISIS. In fact, 64 percent are concerned about a major cyber attack against the US. With cyberattacks on the rise across the country, findings showed that in addition to ISIS, voters are also more concerned about cybersecurity than climate change and nuclear weapons. In this national survey, which comes on the day of the final presidential debate, Cybereason looked at voters' views on the top issues being discussed by both candidates on the campaign trail. The data revealed that no matter the outcome of the election, the next president of the U.S. will face a growing cybersecurity threat not faced by any president current or previous. And voters know it. Demonstrating this growth in awareness among voters, 77 percent said they are more concerned about cybersecurity policy this election than they were during the last presidential election. Voters also ranked cyber-related threats as the fourth most important issue behind only the economy, healthcare, and education and well ahead of hot button issues like terrorism, immigration, supreme court appointments and gun policy. Government Security News

GCHQ tech leader's plan to secure an entire country

"This is weird, OK? This is not something you'll normally see at a cybersecurity conference. This is called data, and evidence," said Dr Ian Levy, technical director for cyber security and resilience at the UK's Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), and now technical director of the UK's new National Cyber Security Centre (NCSC). Levy is responsible for implementing the technical aspects of the UK's 2016-2021 National Cyber Security Strategy, which is expected to be released within weeks. The evidence in question demonstrates the effectiveness of DMARC, the Domain Message Authentication Reporting and Conformance protocol, designed to help eliminate spam and other email spoofing attacks. DMARC is one of the strategies that Levy is using to harden .gov.uk domains and networks against cyber attack. As an initial test, Levy implemented DMARC for the top-level .gov.uk domain. Any email alleging to be from an address @gov.uk but originating from outside their networks was then redirected to Levy's own account. In the first 24 hours, he received around 58,000 emails, nearly all of them claiming to be from taxrefund@gov.uk. About the same number were received on the second day. On the third day, though, the number dropped to just four. After one more bulk attempt on the fourth day, the scammer was never seen again, presumably because he or she could see it wasn't working anymore. The message to the national conference of the Australian Information Security Association (AISA) in Sydney on Wednesday was blunt. "If anybody in this room, as a cybersecurity professional, has an email domain and doesn't have DMARC, you should be ashamed of yourselves," Levy said. ZDNet

Russia prepares to prevent possible US cyber-attacks

Russia is reported to be designing a package of measures aimed at preventing possible cyber-attacks from the US. The move is a response to recent statements by US vice-president Joseph Biden about US plans to provide an adequate response to Russia in cyberspace, following attacks on the Democratic Party headquarters. Sergei Kislyak, the Russian ambassador to the US, told SCMagazineUK.com that the US government has not yet provided any evidence that the cyber-attacks on the DNC were organised by Russian hackers. Meanwhile, Yuri Ushakov, the Russian presidential aide, says Russia has already begun designing protective measures. Ushakov says that the threats from Biden could be considered as a pure rudeness, especially as they refer to specific individuals in the Russian government. The planned measures have not been disclosed, however, according to the press-service of the Russian Federal Security Service (FSB), they may involve increasing cyber-security on the e-mail servers and databases of Russian special services including the FSB, Foreign Intelligence Service and the Russian Military Intelligence. SC Magazine

Smart cities 'at risk of cyber attacks', say IT pros

A majority of IT (Information Technology) professionals believe smart cities are at risk of cyber attacks. Around 98% of 200 respondents surveyed by Tripwire, which assessed cyber security challenges associated with smart city technologies, said so. Smart cities use IT solutions to manage a wide range of services including smart grids, transportation, surveillance cameras, wastewater treatment and more. A total of 38% of professionals said smart grids have the greatest cyber security risks when compared to services and 55% believe cities do not devote adequate security resources to smart city initiatives. Last month the World Energy Council also warned the energy sector, with the emergence of smart grids and services, are an "attractive target for hackers". When asked about why there is a lack of cyber security resources for smart city initiatives, 61% of those surveyed said budgets while 60% believe politics interfere with decision-making. Energy Live News

Multiple banks hit: 3.2 million debit cards compromised; how it happened, what happens now?

On Wednesday, India's largest bank, State Bank of India, said it had blocked close to 6 lakh debit cards following a malware-related security breach in a non-SBI ATM network. Several other banks, such as Axis Bank, HDFC Bank and ICICI Bank, too have admitted being hit by similar cyber attacks — forcing Indian banks to either replace or request users to change the security codes of as many as 3.2 million debit cards over the last two months... On September 5, some banks came across fraudulent transactions in which debit cards were used in China and the US when customers were actually in India. Cardholders also detected similar transactions — subsequently, the banks complained to the National Payments Corporation of India (NPCI), which has oversight over retail payments systems in India. The probe by NPCI found a malware-induced security breach in the systems of Hitachi Payment Services, which provides ATMs, point of sale and other services in India. The investigation alleged that the security breach occurred in the ATMs of a particular private bank. (On Thursday, Hitachi spokesperson Loney Anthony said that an interim report submitted by an independent auditor in September did not "suggest any breach/compromise" in its systems, and that the final report was expected by mid November.) The Indian Express

The Rise of DDoS in IOT

In September 2016, OVH Octave Klaba tweeted that his company had sustained a DDoS attack which reached over 1tb in size. This was in a week when security journalist Brian Krebs also suffered a significant attack on his own website. OVH shared information on some of the attacking addresses with Fujitsu CTI analyzing a number of the source addresses. We discovered a number of indicators that a botnet of insecure internet connected devices could be the reason for the large attacks which was the number one prediction in our annual report. The attack, which resulted in downtime for Brian Krebs, reached 600GBs and the combined attacks on OVH reached over 1Tb in total traffic, Klaba said, "This botnet with 145607 cameras/dvr (1-30Mbps per IP) is able to send >1.5Tbps DDoS. Type: tcp/ack, tcp/ack+psh, tcp/syn." A number of the analyzed attacking addresses were what appeared to be commercial and residential CCTV portals. Identifying this pattern was relatively trivial and made possible by using a search parameter to discover information disclosed in the banner using Shodan the IoT search Engine. Searching for the string "H264DVR", the encoding method used by the DVR. In simple terms a DDoS attack is a flood of the victims systems resources by multiple servers 'flooding' the target with traffic, the attack is often facilitated by compromised devices and services such as WordPress sites. Researching deeper into the large number of devices, it appears a number of flaws existed in the devices which are named 'Netsurveillance' which allow access to the web portals without any formal authentication. As well as default passwords for insecure services such as Telnet. InfoSecurity

Open-source hack-proof router aims to close cyber security gap

Routers are the gateway of every home internet network. Yet, while many computers run antivirus software, little has been done thus far to protect routers against cyber threats. A new device, described as the world's first hack-proof router, was launched on Thursday at the CES Unveiled Show in Prague. The main strength of the Turrís Omnia router, a spin-out of a cyber security research project by Czech Republic's domain administrator NIC.cz, is the fact that it automatically updates and patches vulnerabilities as they become known. "If you look at an average router you can buy from a shop, it comes with firmware that is not designed to ever be updated," explained NIC.cz CEO Ondrej Filip. "But routers are quite easy to hack and there have been a lot of examples in the past of vulnerabilities that have never been fixed." As a result, most people end up with poorly secured home networks protected only by default passwords set by manufacturers. All it takes is an attacker with skills that can be learned from online tutorials to access a neighbour's internet network. Once they do that, they do not only gain unauthorised access to the internet, but they can also intercept and monitor all traffic that is taking place or even hijack the router to perform an attack on someone else. Engineering and Technology

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, November 03, 2016 8:43 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-11-03

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
November 3, 2016 / le 3 novembre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Les Canadiens mal protégés contre la surveillance abusive, selon Snowden

Les Canadiens sont très mal protégés contre les pratiques de surveillance abusives, estime Edward Snowden, qui s'alarme des possibilités ouvertes aux services de renseignements d'ici et d'ailleurs par les nouvelles technologies de communication. L'ex-sous-traitant de la National Security Agency (NSA), qui participait hier à une vidéoconférence organisée par l'Université McGill, a souligné que le système de régulation des services de renseignement canadiens était probablement le plus « déficient en Occident ». Il a déploré à ce titre que le gouvernement libéral de Justin Trudeau tarde à réviser la Loi antiterroriste, dite loi C-51, qui confère des pouvoirs accrus à ces mêmes services. Nombre d'analystes, a-t-il relevé, pensent que la loi en question est trop mal formulée pour être modifiée et devrait tout bonnement être retirée. M. Snowden estime qu'il n'est tout simplement pas possible, ici ou ailleurs, de faire confiance aux autorités pour utiliser de manière responsable les technologies de surveillance existantes. La Presse +, 1; Agence QMI (Journal de Montréal, Journal de Québec) (2016-11-03); Montreal Gazette (2016-11-02)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

RCMP part of international raids on Darknet users

Law enforcement agencies around the world are stepping up their efforts to check the growth of cyber crime, most recently last week when nine police and intelligence agencies, including the RCMP, launched co-ordinated action against buyers and sellers of illicit drugs and other illegal activities on Darknet global marketplaces. "In Canada, the collaboration between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Canada Post, and the Canada Border Services Agency led to the identification and targeting of an international distributor of narcotics based in Quebec that was operating on the Darknet," the force said in the statement. "This resulted in numerous seizures and the detention of an individual involved in the international distribution of the narcotics. The investigation is ongoing." Internationally the action, dubbed by all participants as Operation Hyperion, resulted in numerous international seizures, arrests and leads on cases related to the buying and selling of illicit drugs and other goods on the Darknet, the part of the Internet only accessible through browsers that ensure Websites selling illegal material can only be reached anonymously. The RCMP said the operation will also help law enforcement agencies continue to combat the trafficking of illegal goods and services by identifying new smuggling networks and trends. IT World Canada (2016-11-02)

After Phoenix and Shared Services problems, government seeks feedback on digital future

The federal government continues to receive advice on how it should improve its digital future as it works to fix problem-plagued projects including the Phoenix payroll system and Shared Services Canada. In a so-called, "intimate, armchair discussion" at the annual GTEC conference in Ottawa on Wednesday, parliamentary secretary for Public Services and Procurement Canada, Leona Alleslev opened up about the pitfalls experienced in the development of Shared Services Canada, or SSC. The department that's drawn criticism from other departments, including the RCMP, Statistics Canada and the Auditor General. CBC News

How to protect yourself (and your phone) from surveillance

Cyber security and online privacy experts aren't surprised by revelations that Quebec and Montreal have been spying on several journalists. In fact they say journalists — and the public at large — are far too careless. When the news came out this week that police had been spying on LaPresse journalist Patrick Lagacé, it was no surprise to Geneviève Lajeunesse with Crypto Québec. "I was shocked by their shock." Here are five key tips to sum up Lajeunesse's advice on protection from online surveillance, whether you're a journalist, an anonymous source, or a citizen who happens to protect your privacy. CBC News

As CIA shifts gears in response to cyber threats, critics call for good old-fashioned spywork

When America goes to the polls on Nov. 8, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials, it will likely experience the culmination of a new form of information war. A months-long campaign backed by the Russian government to undermine the credibility of the U.S. presidential election — through hacking, cyberattacks and disinformation campaigns — is likely to peak on voting day, the officials said. Russian officials deny any such effort. But current and former U.S. officials warn that hackers could post fictional evidence online of widespread voter fraud, slow the internet to a crawl through cyber attacks and release a final tranche of hacked emails, including some that could be doctored (...) John Brennan, the current CIA director, declined to comment on the Russian efforts. But he said Russian intelligence operatives have a long history of marrying traditional espionage with advances in technology. More broadly, Brennan said, the digital age creates enormous opportunities for espionage. But it also creates vulnerabilities. Reuters (CBC News)

Why Windows hack is being blamed on Russia-linked group

Microsoft's Windows chief has accused a notorious group of hackers - previously linked to Russia - of making use of an unpatched flaw in its operating system. Terry Myerson said Strontium was exploiting the bug to infect PCs in order to get access to potentially sensitive data. Strontium is also known as APT28 and Fancy Bear, and has previously been blamed for attacking a French TV network and the US Democratic Party. Microsoft says it is working on a fix. It intends to release the patch next week. BBC News

Universal hijack hole turns DIY Wix blogs into botnets

Millions of do-it-yourself websites built with the Wix web maker were at risk of hijack thanks to a brief zero day DOM-based cross-site scripting vulnerability. Wix boasts some 87 million users, among them two million paying subscribers. Contrast Security researcher Matt Austin (@mattAustin) dug up the flaw he rates as severe, and attempted to get Wix to patch it under quiet private disclosure since October. Register; ZDNet

Malvertising campaign uses fake ad networks

Recent malvertising campaigns were discovered by two security research firms, highlighting the threat of fake and legitimate—but poorly managed—advertising networks that infect victims by taking advantage of redirected web traffic. One of the campaigns, disclosed by Malwarebytes, created fake advertising networks on a high-trafficked adult website that were registered via proxy. The campaign, dubbed HookAds, redirected targets to spoofed adult webpages in order to spread malware. These secondary decoy adult websites attempted to serve RIG and Neutrino EK exploit kits to inject payloads. SC Magazine

GM Bot malware campaign targets 94 mobile banking apps

A recently discovered Android banking malware campaign targets 94 mobile banking apps used by individuals across at least seven countries including the U.S. The malware, a new variation of GM Bot, disguises itself as a Adobe Flash Player program, according to a blog post today by cybersecurity firm Fortinet. But in reality, it creates fraudulent overlays that appear whenever a legitimate banking app is opened, tricking users into entering their log-in credentials so attackers can steal them. U.S. financial institutions and services targeted in this mobile scam include Citibank, Chase, Paypal, TD Bank and many others – but the scam also includes banks operating in Austria, Australia, France, Germany, Poland and Turkey. SC Magazine

Android Trojan posing as Flash Player targets over 90 major banks across US and Europe

A new Android banking Trojan, which masquerades as a Flash Player app, targeting customers of at least 90 major banks across the US and Europe has been uncovered. The malware can be considered to be highly advanced and dangerous, especially given its ability to bypass SMS-based two-factor authentication. International Business Times UK

Your WiFi-connected thermostat can take down the whole Internet. We need new regulations.

Late last month, popular websites like Twitter, Pinterest, Reddit and PayPal went down for most of a day. The distributed denial-of-service attack that caused the outages, and the vulnerabilities that made the attack possible, was as much a failure of market and policy as it was of technology. If we want to secure our increasingly computerized and connected world, we need more government involvement in the security of the "Internet of Things" and increased regulation of what are now critical and life-threatening technologies. It's no longer a question of if, it's a question of when. Washington Post

Why U.S. Is Worried About China's Chip Industry

Nations are competing to build the world's fastest supercomputers and at the center of that race are homegrown chips. Supercomputers can help with scientific simulations, weapons development, scenarios critical to national security and economic projections. Advanced semiconductors are also of crucial importance for the development of satellites, drones, robots and self-driving cars. Most consumer electronics have also semiconductors as their building blocks. According to PC World, the battle between China and the U.S. government is now stepping up in the market for semiconductors. The U.S. claims that China is indulging in unfair trade practices and rigging the semiconductor market in its favor. During a Wednesday event organized by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Penny Pritzker, U.S. secretary of commerce, said that this unprecedented state-driven interference in the chip industry can undermine the innovation ecosystem and distort the market. iTech Post

Accenture Says One-Third of Corporate Cyber Attacks Succeed

About one-third of targeted attempts to breach corporations' cyber defenses succeed but three-quarters of executives remain unaccountably confident in their security strategies, Accenture Plc. reported Wednesday in a survey of 2,000 security officers representing large enterprises worldwide. The "alarmingly high" failure rate in defending against attacks is compounded by their "sheer volume," Accenture said in the report, titled Building Confidence: Facing the Cybersecurity Conundrum (...). The survey follows recent high-profile data breaches of Sony Corp., Target Corp., the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, leaks from the e-mail accounts of Democratic Party officials, and a denial of service attack on the servers of Dyn Inc. in October that silenced Twitter Inc. and other major internet companies for several hours. Bloomberg

Flood of threat intelligence overwhelming for many firms

Three years after Target missed alerts warning them about a massive data breach, the amount of threat information coming in from security systems is still overwhelming for many companies, according to new reports, due to a lack of expertise and integration issues. Seventy percent of security pros said that their companies have problems taking actions based on threat intelligence because there is too much of it, or it is too complex, according to a report by Ponemon Research released on Monday. In particular, 69 percent said that their companies lacked staff expertise. As a result, only 46 percent said that incident responders used threat data when deciding how to respond to threats, and only 27 percent said that they were effective in using the data. CSO Online

It's Time To Address The Cybersecurity Gender Gap Before It's Too Late

It's well known that women are underrepresented in technology roles. While women make up 47% of the workforce, only 34% of tech industry professionals are women. Within the cybersecurity sector, the numbers are even worse. Only 10% of IT security workers are women, contributing to a projected 1.5 million unfilled positions within the industry by 2020. While it's unfeasible to completely close the cybersecurity gender gap within three years, this should serve as a wake-up call for educators and employers to more seriously address the dearth of women in cybersecurity and technology more broadly. Dark Reading; Computer Weekly

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, November 23, 2016 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-11-23

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

November 23, 2016 / le 23 novembre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Watchdog wants rules for spies sharing info

Other national security agencies may be taking the same broad view of the law that led CSIS to illegally keep data on innocent people for almost a decade, the federal privacy watchdog says. Privacy commissioner Daniel Therrien said he's calling on Parliament for clearer rules about how spy- and law-enforcement agencies obtain, retain and destroy information on Canadians. Therrien said information-sharing powers granted in Bill C-51, the former Conservative government's controversial spying bill, need restrictions on what agencies can share and how long they can keep the information. "Security agencies, with (Bill C-51 powers) and with the absence of rules around retention, for instance, would be able to collect and retain information that they don't really need," Therrien told the Star outside a House of Commons committee Tuesday. "I don't dispute that CSIS needs to analyze information in order to do their job ... but once the analysis has been completed and the vast majority of people about whom they're collecting information are found not to be a threat, and that's the case, then they should destroy that information." "I don't think that's the kind of country we want, where the security services of the country hangs onto information on vast amounts of people in case it might be helpful one day," Therrien added. In his testimony before the access to information, privacy and ethics committee, Therrien noted Canadian spy agencies misusing powers is not a "theoretical" issue. He noted that CSIS was recently found by a federal court to have illegally kept data on an unknown number of innocent Canadians between 2006 and 2015. Therrien's comments come as the governing Liberals are in the midst of a wide-ranging review of Canada's national security agencies and issues of oversight for spies. They also come as Canada's national police force, the RCMP, are publicly arguing for expanded investigative powers in the online world. A spokesperson for Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said the minister looks forward to the Commons committee's report on Bill C-51's information-sharing powers and appreciates Therrien's insight into these issues. Toronto Star, A10

Big Brother et « Five-eyes »

La consultation sur la sécurité nationale menée par le gouvernement Trudeau tire à sa fin et deux événements récents appellent les Canadiens à la plus grande vigilance pour la suite des choses. L'affaire de la surveillance des journalistes au Québec et le jugement de la Cour fédérale sur la collecte et la rétention de données personnelles par le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) montrent bien que l'équilibre entre la sécurité et la protection de la vie privée reste au centre des préoccupations devant les demandes incessantes de pouvoirs accrus des autorités. Les libéraux ont promis en campagne d'« annuler les dispositions problématiques » du projet de loi C-51 adopté en vitesse après les attaques d'octobre 2014, législation qu'ils avaient appuyée avec réserve. Ils ont inclus cet engagement dans une consultation plus large basée sur un livre vert qui lance les discussions. Le gouvernement est déjà passé à l'action sur un aspect de la consultation, soit la supervision politique des agences et organismes chargés de la sécurité nationale. Le projet de loi C-22 prévoit la formation d'un Comité parlementaire sur la sécurité nationale et le renseignement. Tenus au secret, ses membres auront un accès sans précédent au Canada aux informations sur les opérations liées à la sécurité nationale. Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a expliqué son empressement en indiquant que le Canada était une « anomalie » en la matière par rapport à ses partenaires de ce club du renseignement qu'est le « Five-Eyes », qui regroupe aussi les États-Unis, la Grande-Bretagne, l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande. Il s'est d'ailleurs rendu en début d'année à Londres, se disant inspiré par le modèle britannique, qui a le grand mérite selon lui de ne pas avoir donné lieu à des fuites qui auraient pu mettre en danger la sécurité nationale. La participation du Canada aux échanges du groupe Five-Eyes est d'ailleurs un élément central du contexte dans lequel les nouvelles normes canadiennes sur la sécurité nationale seront définies. C'est un aspect que les Canadiens doivent garder à l'esprit quand ils évaluent les positions des autorités compétentes et des défenseurs de la vie privée. Étant donné l'attrance britannique du ministre Goodale, l'adoption jeudi dernier à Londres du projet de loi sur les pouvoirs d'investigation mérite l'attention. Fait intéressant, d'autres dispositions de la même loi se retrouvent parmi les hypothèses soumises aux Canadiens par le ministre Goodale dans son livre vert. C'est ainsi que les fournisseurs britanniques de services de communication (FSC) devront conserver pendant une année les données de navigation en ligne de leurs clients et que les enquêteurs pourront accéder sans mandat aux données de connexion. Les FSC seront contraints d'aider les autorités lors d'interceptions ciblées, en plus de devoir retirer sur demande leur propre chiffrement des données. Le Devoir, A3

Big Brother sleeps easy

An opinion piece states, "The revelation that Montreal police secretly monitored several journalists' smartphones for months, ostensibly in hopes of discovering the source of internal information leaks, has brought home for many people the troubling reality of government snooping. The fact that thousands of students recently lined up to watch whistleblower Edward Snowden at a video conference at McGill University is another sign of the public's growing concern about respect for the right to privacy. Indeed, it is not just journalists who are targeted by electronic surveillance. Revelations about the National Security Agency (NSA) in the United States also touch Canadians, since in the age of the Internet and social networks, telecommunications knows no borders. It is reasonable to imagine that practically all our communications could be intercepted, filtered and recorded by governments. This is now the world in which we live. Thanks to Snowden's revelations, Canadians know our federal government is actively helping the United States with surveillance programs of its own. For example, it was revealed in April that the RCMP had decrypted about one million private messages from BlackBerry smartphones. In addition, we know that the number of communications intercepted in Canada grew by a factor of 26 in 2015, without the authorities giving any reasons. This opacity is at the heart of the problem: "Big Brother" is completely lacking in transparency. A Federal Court ruling revealed recently that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) had acted illegally by conserving personal data for 10 years. It is alarming to discover just how unclear the limits imposed on surveillance agencies and police forces are. It is probably this lack of clarity that allowed Montreal's police force and the provincial Sûreté du Québec to put so many journalists under watch for such specious reasons." National Post, A11

Online voting deserves a try

An opinion piece states, "If there's any place that would use new technology to drive local democracy, you'd think it would be Waterloo. Once voted the smartest city in the world, it is respected and celebrated as one of Canada's most thriving high-tech hubs. So, when faced with dismally low turnouts in local municipal elections, you might expect Waterloo's civic leaders to leap at the chance to employ online voting to increase voter participation. Unfortunately, you'd be wrong to do so. On Monday, city councillors rejected trying something new and chose to stick with traditional paper ballots... Waterloo councillors were spooked by the possibility hackers could break into the electronic voting system. They worried it would be hard to prove such a vote was free of fraud and that, if a problem arose, it would be impossible to do a recount." Record, A6

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Conficker Still on Top as Malware Jumps 5% in October

Malware continued its inexorable rise in October with the number of attacks increasing 5% over the previous month, although UK and US users appeared to be insulated from the worst, according to new stats from Check Point. The vendor's Global Threat Index also revealed a 5% increase in active malware families, highlighting the constantly evolving threat landscape. However, it was ransomware that once again proved to be among the most prolific category of malicious software, rising 13% compared with August. That may have been driven in part by the prevalence of Locky, which was rated the second most successful piece of malware, responsible for 5% of global attacks spotted by Check Point. Infosecurity Magazine

Ransomware abusing encrypted chat app Telegram protocol cracked

Ransomware which abuses the Telegram app API has been stopped in its tracks only weeks after discovery. The malware, TeleCrypt, is typical ransomware in the way that the malicious code operates... However, the malware also has unusual aspects, such as the use and abuse of Telegram Messenger's communication protocol to send decryption keys to the threat actor, which, according to Secure List, appears to be the "first cryptor to use the Telegram protocol in an encryption malware case"... However, the ransomware also contains a major flaw. Telecrypt encrypts files by looping through them a single byte at a time, and then simply adding a byte from the key in order, as noted by Scott, and as such, this simple encryption method made the task of creating a decryption application easier for researchers. The security specialist has been able to rapidly develop a decryption tool which allows victims to recover their files without paying up. However, you need an unencrypted version of a locked file to act as a sample to generate a working decryption key. ZD Net; Bleeping Computer; Help Net Security

Decryptor Available for Princess Locker Ransomware

Polish security researcher Hasherezade has found a way to help victims of the Princess Locker ransomware by cracking the ransomware's encryption system and releasing a free decryptor. Princess Locker is a ransomware family that appeared at the end of September and was made available as a Ransomware-as-a-Service, rentable via a Dark Web portal. The ransomware was never at the center of a massive distribution campaign, but the crooks behind it made some victims regardless, who remained locked out of their files. After spending a few days looking at the ransomware's mode of operation, Hasherezade announced yesterday on Twitter that she finally found a way to recover files locked by this threat. The decryption package can be downloaded from this Google Drive page. Bleeping Computer

Crysis Averted: Eset Releases Free Ransomware Decryptor

Victims of the Crysis ransomware now have a get out of jail free card after security vendor Eset announced a free decryptor tool. Crysis first broke onto the scene in June after competitor TeslaCrypt apparently ceased operations and tens of thousands of users began downloading the free decryptor for it. Detected as Win32/Filecoder.Crysis, the ransomware was able to encrypt files on fixed, removable and network drives using strong encryption algorithms, according to Eset... Eset prepared the free decryptor tool after a user known as 'crss7777' dumped the master decryption keys last week in a post on the BleepingComputer.com forums. Infosecurity Magazine

This cheap and nasty ransomware will try to encrypt files across your network and removable drives

One of the cheaper forms of ransomware that crooks can buy on the dark web has evolved worm-like capabilities which enable it to move across networks and external drives, and even to re-encrypt files which have already been encrypted by other ransomware. The Stampado ransomware is available to buy on the dark web for just $39, and is described by the seller as 'cheap and easy to manage ransomware' and offers buyers a 'full lifetime license'. While it might be expected that cheap ransomware offers wannabe cybercriminals very little bang for their buck, cybersecurity researchers at Zscaler have analysed Stampado and have found it to contain self-propagating features which make it extremely effective -- it can spread across multiple devices and drives connected to the infected system. Typically infecting victims via a spam email or drive-by download, the malware installs itself in the %AppData% folder with the name scvhost.exe, in an effort to pass itself off as the genuine Windows executable process svchost.exe. ZD Net

Android Malware Blocks Mobile Antivirus Apps from Launching

One Android banking trojan has borrowed a trick from its desktop counterparts, and besides stealing login credentials from banking apps, this threat also sabotages mobile antivirus applications and prevents them from launching. For the moment, this Android banking trojan is active only in Germany and targets the mobile apps of 15 German banks. Discovered by malware analysts at Fortinet and tracked as Android/Banker.GTltr.spy (Banker.GT for this article), this threat is your run-of-the-mill Android banking trojan. The one feature that allows it to stand out is its ability to detect the presence of local mobile security applications and block them from starting. Bleeping Computer; Security Week; SC Magazine

Exploit Code Bypasses Linux Security Features Leaving Systems Vulnerable

Linux is generally referred to as a more secure operating system and it happens for a good reason: the number of hacks, malware, and vulnerabilities that can be used to compromise a Linux machine is substantially smaller than in the case of Windows, and it's all thanks to security features that are baked into the OS. But security researcher Chris Evans says that it's easier than most of us think to break into a Linux system and all you need is a scriptless exploit. First of all, some context. Evans says that his exploit attempts to use a memory corruption vulnerabilities in the GStreamer framework that's available in the majority of Linux distributions -- his demonstration, however, was made on Fedora. The exploit bypasses two of the security systems that are integrated in Linux, namely address space layout randomization (ASLR) and data execution protection (DEP), which is also known as NX or No-Execute. Softpedia

Exploit Code Released for NTP Vulnerability

A researcher has released a proof-of-concept exploit for a vulnerability in the Network Time Protocol daemon that could crash a server with a single, malformed packet. The Network Time Foundation's NTP Project on Monday patched the bug and nine others with the release of NTP 4.2.8p9. Threat Post; Security Week

WordPress Plugins Leave Black Friday Shoppers Vulnerable

Researchers are calling into question the safety of some of the top WordPress e-commerce plugins used on over 100,000 commercial websites prepping for Black Friday and Cyber Monday online sales. In reviewing the top 12 WordPress e-commerce plugins, application security testing firm Checkmarx found four with severe vulnerabilities tied to reflected XSS (cross-site scripting), SQL injection and file manipulation flaws. "If these vulnerabilities are exploited, users of over 135,000 websites could find their personal data, including credit card information, threatened," according to Checkmarx's analysis of the plugins, published Tuesday. Threat Post; Bleeping Computer

Hackers Could Infect Headphones to Spy on You

"Israeli security researchers at Ben Gurion University have found a way to convert typical headphones into microphones and then use them to record audio in the room just like a fully-featured spying device." Using headphones as microphones is not rocket science, and many of us already did that in the good old days when running our own LAN parties, but what the researchers actually managed to do is not only that, but also using the output channel of the audio card for input signal and then recording sound. Specifically, using malware called Speak(a)r, the security researchers turned headphones into microphones by converting vibrations in the air emitted by the sound (such as your voice) into electromagnetic signals. This makes it possible for the headphone to act as a regular microphone and detect pretty much any sound from across the room. The next step was to trick the output channel of the audio chip to become an input channel and thus allow the recording of sound. According to Wired, this was possible thanks to a feature that's available in the Realtek audio codec chip, making it possible for the malware to record audio. Softpedia; Bleeping Computer

Facebook spam caught delivering Locky ransomware

A Facebook spam campaign has been found distributing Nemucod and Locky ransomware. The campaign was discovered by security researchers Bart Blaze and Peter Kruse when the pair saw spam being distributed over the Facebook instant messaging system over the weekend of 19 November. The campaign itself is nothing new. It hijacks accounts when users click on an SVG image, activating the scam. An SVG image was apparently chosen because it allows code to be put directly into the photo. The SVG image links to a website which impersonates YouTube and prompts users to install an extension on their computer which asks for permission to "read and change all your data on the websites you visit". Researchers think that it is through that extension the scam takes hold of its victim's Facebook accounts. Once an account is hijacked, it will then send on the same lure to all of that account's friends, spreading the infection as widely as possible. SC Magazine; Help Net Security

OneDrive for Business accounts used to spread malware

Malware purveyors have been making use of cloud services for some time, sending cloud-storage links that host malware to victims is an efficient way for cyber criminals to operate. In a new twist to the technique, Forcepoint Security Labs has discovered that cybercriminals have been utilizing compromised Microsoft OneDrive for Business accounts to host malware since at least August of this year. Criminals are exploiting the 'MySite' feature which allows work-related files to be uploaded and shared, even with external parties. Download links are sent to prospective victims as part of social engineering mass-mailing campaigns. Beta News

Eir we go again: Irish ISP router flaw allows total takeover

A security researcher has found a bug in a router used by Irish ISPs that could enable an attacker to gain full control of the modem from the internet. This is not the first time that bugs have been found in Eir modems. Previous firmware versions were vulnerable to CVE-2014-9222, the "Misfortune Cookie" bug. The bug was patched in firmware version 2.00(AADU.5)D0 in 2015. In a blog post by security researcher Kenzo2017, a D1000 modem router, used by Ireland's largest ISP Eir, could be used to hack into internal computers on the network, as a proxy host to hack other computers or even as a bot in a botnet. SC Magazine

Security Firm Detects 57M Attempts to Exploit 2-Year-Old Router Firmware Backdoor

The case of the Netis router firmware backdoor shows you that even if a company puts out a patch to resolve security issues, the problem lingers on for years, as users fail to update their devices, or the patch itself fails to properly fix the issue. In 2014, Trend Micro researchers announced they found a hidden user account in the firmware of Netis routers... The Chinese company that sold that particular router put out a patch to mitigate exploitation attempts, but didn't remove the account completely. Hackers found workarounds around the patch and many devices were left unpatched, mainly because the firmware update procedure involved a complex series of operations that many users didn't have the technical skills to follow through... Trend Micro, the company that discovered the flaw, added specific rules in its security systems to detect exploitation attempts for this backdoor, back in August 2016. In only three months, the company said that telemetry data picked up 2.9 million exploitation attempts on around 5% of its customer base. Extrapolating this number to its entire clientele, Trend Micro estimates that there must have been over 57 million attempts to exploit the backdoor in the last three months alone, which is a massive number. Bleeping Computer; Security Week

Shad0wS3C Hacker Breaches Mexican Government Website

Shad0wS3C leader Gh0s7 has managed to hack another website, this time belonging to Instituto de la Función Registral del Estado México (also known as IFREM). Gh0s7 told us that he discovered a vulnerability in their server that allowed him to get the main database file, which includes sensitive information such user data, passport details, and other personal information that was exposed in the breach. The hacker explains that he didn't hack the website for hacktivism, but to show the world that his team Shad0w Security (Shad0wS3C) is back in business. Softpedia

Madison Square Garden admits hackers spent a year harvesting visitor credit-card data

The Madison Square Garden Company has revealed that for a year malware has been capturing payment-card data from a system that processes payments for several of its properties. MSG warned customers on Tuesday that the breach had exposed customer data held on the magnetic strip of credit cards, including card numbers, cardholder names, expiration dates, and internal verification codes. Card-issuing banks recently notified MSG of suspicious transaction patterns, which led to an investigation by MSG and confirmation of the infection in the last week of October, it said. It's not clear why the company only revealed the incident now. ZD Net

Catastrophic botnet to smash social media networks in 2017

Social media networks and their prolific use will prompt a plague of botnets in 2017, security researchers have warned... As we come into 2017, botnets capable of causing such damage are likely to become a bigger challenge to control, according to Mike Raggio, chief research scientist at social media security firm ZeroFOX. The security expert predicts that in the next year, a "massive" botnet will target and disrupt popular social media platforms, potentially including Twitter, Facebook, and LinkedIn. Raggio believes that in 2017 there will be a significant uptick in social media botnets which aim not only to disrupt but also to earn money for their operators. Botnets-for-hire, such as Lizard Squad's LizardStresser tool, are already well established. However, botnet operators are now leveraging social media to increase the strength of these slave-and-command systems, such as in the case of Linux/Moose (.PDF), which targets Linux-based routers in order to command enslaved devices to commit fraudulent actions -- such as spreading the botnet's malware further -- on social media networks. ZD Net

The FBI Hacked Over 8,000 Computers In 120 Countries Based on One Warrant

In January, Motherboard reported on the FBI's "unprecedented" hacking operation, in which the agency, using a single warrant, deployed malware to over one thousand alleged visitors of a dark web child pornography site. Now, it has emerged that the campaign was actually several orders of magnitude larger. In all, the FBI obtained over 8,000 IP addresses, and hacked computers in 120 different countries, according to a transcript from a recent evidentiary hearing in a related case. The figures illustrate the largest ever known law enforcement hacking campaign to date, and starkly demonstrate what the future of policing crime on the dark web may look like. This news comes as the US is preparing to usher in changes that would allow magistrate judges to authorize the mass hacking of computers, wherever in the world they may be located. Motherboard

How Israel Built One Of The World's Most Powerful Cyber Armies

In the last few years, along with the United States, UK, China and Russia, Israel has become a superpower in the world of government hacking and cyber espionage. Israeli cyberspies are believed to have worked with NSA hackers to develop Stuxnet, the world's first cyberweapon. And many of its cyberspies and warriors have moved to the private sector to launch companies worth hundreds of millions of dollars that have a footprint all over the globe, such as Cellebrite or the NSO Group. How did such a small country become such a big player in the world hacking stage? At the core of Israel's success in cyberspace is a military intelligence corps named Unit 8200, which specializes in sophisticated hacking and espionage operations. Motherboard

Here's a Picture of a Phone-Tracking Device That We've Never Seen in the Wild

For years, in almost complete secrecy, cops and feds in the United States—and elsewhere—have been using powerful devices called Stingrays, cell site simulators, or IMSI catchers to track and spy on cell phones. Over the last few years, and only after long legal fights and several public documents requests, we've learned a little bit more about IMSI catchers, including some of the agencies that use them. Yet we've rarely seen them. Some official pictures have been published online, mostly mined from patent applications, but we've practically never seen them in the wild until now. Here's a picture of a stack of IMSI catchers, which trick phones into connecting to them by pretending to be a cell tower, sitting on what is likely the seat of a police car or van. Motherboard

Russian Spammer Uses Fake Google Domain to Tell Webmasters to Vote Trump

Some clever Russian crook has found a way to register a lookalike Google domain by taking advantage of Unicode characters to create an alternative way of spelling Google. The crook replaced the first letter of the word google, which is "g", with "ǂ", a character that's part of the expanded Unicode character set... It was employees of web analytics firm Analytics Edge that discovered the google.com domain. Analytics Edge says that the group behind this domain had used it for "referral spam," which is a term that describes the side-effect of somebody abusing a site's resources or linking back in massive numbers... For this particular case, the Analytics Edge team says that spammers weren't interested in probing websites for vulnerabilities or hotlinking images. Inside their referral links, the Russian spammer(s) left a political message that read "'Vote for Trump," which appeared in the dashboards of several of Analytics Edge's clients. Bleeping Computer

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, December 09, 2016 8:41 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-12-09

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

December 9, 2016 / le 9 décembre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

BlackBerry unveils platform focused on business security

BlackBerry Ltd. has unveiled a device management software platform it calls a safeguard against cyber security threats in a mobile and hyper-connected corporate environment... Called BlackBerry Secure, the platform builds on BlackBerry's enterprise management software suites with enhancements, more integration and added scalability to help business and government clients manage and secure mobile and other devices. BlackBerry said on Thursday that the platform protects communications for all messaging and file types - ultimately targeting new markets where secure management and applications are critical. The company said the platform will prevent hackers from penetrating devices and computers, provide intelligence for secure supply chain communications, ensure patient confidentiality in healthcare and protect assets in the financial industry. Toronto Star; Postmedia Network (Gazette; National Post); IT World Canada

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange ready to start membership push

After months of planning the country's first national IT threat service has issued its first threat report to a few early members and is ready to launch a campaign to expand its numbers, including lowering its fee for small businesses... Directors of the exchange come from some of the country's biggest enterprises including Air Canada, Bell Canada, Canadian National Railway, Manulife, Telus, TD Bank and Royal Bank. While many CISOs and infosec pros already get information from vendors, blogs and some threat data from vendors and services they subscribe to, the not-for-profit CCTX hopes to show value by tailoring reports and threat feeds for Canadian customers who don't want to know about the latest malware sweeping other parts of the world. The exchange also differs from other threat intelligence groups set up by industry associations and limited to verticals such as the healthcare or financial sectors by having a broad audience. The cross-industry appeal of the exchange has drawn the admiration of Rick Howard, chief security officer of Palo Alto Networks, who was one of the keynote speakers at Wednesday's symposium and who believes the CCTX is the first national threat exchange in the world. IT World Canada

ThyssenKrupp's technical trade secrets stolen in massive hack

German steel maker ThyssenKrupp has revealed its technical trade secrets have been stolen in a cyber attack on its systems. The company's own investigations revealed southeast Asian hackers were the primary suspects, launching a highly organised and professional attack on the organisation. ThyssenKrupp uncovered the attacks in April, although the criminal activity apparently happened in February and involved the hackers stealing project data from the company's plant engineering division and other areas of its business... The company added that there had been no evidence of sabotage and no signs that any hacker tried to manipulate data, applications or any other resources. However, German business magazine Wirtschafts Woche claimed the attacks specifically targeted ThyssenKrupp's production plants in areas of Europe, India, Argentina and the US. IT Pro; Infosecurity Magazine; Help Net Security; Security Week; Bleeping Computer; CSO Online

Ransomware Jumps Threefold in 2016

Ransomware attacks on businesses grew threefold this year to reach one every 40 seconds by October, according to new data from Kaspersky Lab. The Russian AV firm claimed that attacks came once every two minutes at the start of the year. For individuals it was even worse, with Kaspersky Lab calculating one attack every 10 seconds by Q3, up from once every 20 seconds at the beginning of the year. Some 20% of organizations worldwide suffered an IT incident as the result of a ransomware infection this year, and the same percentage of small businesses never got their files back even after paying up. That chimes with separate research from Trend Micro from earlier this year which claimed that one in five UK firms it polled were left without a decryption key after they paid the ransom. While Kaspersky Lab was at pains to point out there's no such thing as a low-risk sector, education was worst hit, accounting for 23% of all attacks, while retail and leisure (16%) was least affected. Infosecurity Magazine

New Scheme: Spread Popcorn Time Ransomware, get chance of free Decryption Key

Yesterday a new in-development ransomware was discovered by MalwareHunterTeam called Popcorn Time that intends to give victim's a very unusual, and criminal, way of getting a free decryption key for their files. With Popcorn Time, not only can a victim pay a ransom to get their files back, but they can also try to infect two other people and have them pay the ransom in order to get a free key. To make matters worse, there is unfinished code in the ransomware that may indicate that if a user enters the wrong decryption key 4 times, the ransomware will start deleting files. Bleeping Computer

Banking Trojan Uses Gmail Popup to Extend Infection to Victim's Android Phone

A group of malware authors has come up with a new method of transcending an infection from the user's computer to his Android smartphone. Discovered by security researchers from BadCyberLabs, the initial infection is with the ISFB (also known as Gozi2) banking trojan, while the second-stage infection was via the Marcher Android banking trojan. Bleeping Computer

Yahoo fixes flaw allowing an attacker to read any user's emails

Yahoo has fixed a severe security vulnerability in its consumer email service that could have allowed an attacker to read a victim's email inbox. The cross-site scripting (XSS) attack only required a victim to view an email in Yahoo Mail. The internet giant paid out $10,000 to security researcher Jouko Pynnonen for privately disclosing the flaw through the HackerOne bug bounty. In a write-up, Pynnonen said that the flaw was similar to last year's Yahoo Mail bug, which similarly let an attacker compromise a user's account. Yahoo filters HTML messages to ensure that malicious code won't make it through into the user's browser, but the researcher found that the filters didn't catch all of the malicious data attributes. He explained that sending a specially crafted email could have triggered malicious JavaScript to be immediately executed. Pynnonen said in an email that exploiting the flaw was "rather easy," but finding the bug was difficult. ZD Net; Security Week

Solar Power Firm Patches Meters Vulnerable to Command Injection Attacks

Solar software and analytics firm Locus Energy has pushed out a patch to its residential and commercial power meters to address a vulnerability that could allow hackers to access equipment and remotely execute code. According to independent security researcher Daniel Reich, who privately disclosed the flaw to Locus Energy in January, the bug is a command injection vulnerability that allows hackers to hijack vulnerable solar meters. Threatpost

US government seeks more data on Apple customers

Apple has seen a sharp year-over-year increase in the number US government demands for customer data. The company's first biannual report this year covers how many demands were made from global law enforcement and intelligence agencies -- including the US government -- for data it stores. Apple said it reviewed 4,822 demands for device data from US authorities, affecting 10,260 devices, an increase of 26 percent on the same period a year earlier. The company said that it was compelled to turn over data in over three-quarters of all cases. Additionally, the company received 1,363 demands from US authorities, the top requesting country, affecting 9,090 accounts. Apple turned over data in 84 percent of those cases. ZD Net

Government spies surveil phones in flight, report says

Turns out the skies are not so friendly after all, at least as far as privacy is concerned. American and British intelligence agencies have been surveilling cell phone use on commercial flights since 2005, according to a new investigation by Le Monde based on documents leaked by former NSA contractor Edward Snowden. As journalist and digital media teacher Dan Gillmor tweeted, it's "another good reason to use airplane mode when you're on the plane." But just turning on your phone when the plane is above 10,000 feet reveals your location to the NSA, according to 2010 internal NSA newsletter posted by Le Monde... Le Monde goes on to explain how the spy agencies can extract information like email addresses and Skype and Facebook ID data and then correlate it with flight and passenger data to pinpoint a particular user. They can also reportedly see what you're doing on your phone, be it looking through email or using a travel app. CNET; CSO Online; Le Monde

Georgia says it's traced an attempted voter hack to DHS

Georgia's secretary of state says the state was hit with an attempted hack of its voter registration database from an IP address linked to the federal Department of Homeland Security. The allegation by Georgia Secretary of State Brian Kemp is one of the more bizarre charges to come up in the recent spate of alarms about voting-system hacks. He said in a Facebook post on Thursday that he had been made aware of the failed attempt to breach the firewall protecting Georgia's voter registration database. The attack was traced to an Internet Protocol address associated with DHS, he said. CSO Online

Russian cyberspies likely behind DNC breach move on to German election

A group of suspected Russian cyberspies blamed for interfering in the U.S. election is also attempting to influence the upcoming vote in Germany, according to the country's domestic intelligence agency. The Russian hacking group known as Fancy Bear or APT 28 has been targeting political parties in the country, Germany's Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BfV) intelligence agency said in a statement Thursday posted online by Politico. The hacking activities have led to a surge in spear-phishing email attacks directed at German politicians, the agency said. CSO Online

Georgia Tech's $17 Million Rhamnusia Project and the Difficulty of Attribution

The Georgia Institute of Technology, Georgia Tech, has been awarded a $17.3 million contract to develop a scientific method for cyber attack attribution. Dubbed Rhamnusia after the ancient Greek spirit of divine retribution, the project will use machine learning (ML) technology to discover the groups behind different cyber-attacks. Security Week

You're Probably Fine with SMS-Based Two-Factor Authentication

Using a phone to secure your email, Facebook, or other online accounts has got a lot of bad press recently. In June, hackers broke into the Twitter account of prominent Black Lives Matter activist DeRay McKesson, after tricking Verizon into redirecting his text messages to another SIM card. And then a month later, the US National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) advised companies to find an alternative to SMS two-factor authentication. SMS messages can be intercepted in various different ways, including through the exploitation of vulnerabilities in the infrastructure of mobile networks, as well as by the use of IMSI-catchers, otherwise known as Stingrays. That's fine, but arguably statements like "SMS-based two factor authentication is insecure" trickle down into public consciousness, and those who really could benefit from linking a phone to their account may think it's a bad idea. But the truth is that the vast majority of people would be much, much better off using SMS 2FA rather than using no two-factor method at all. Motherboard

New Call to Regulate IoT Security By Design

A Washington, D.C. think tank whose mission is critical infrastructure security has joined the call for lawmakers to consider regulating the security of connected devices. In a report published this week, the Institute for Critical Infrastructure Technology pinned the blame for a rash of Mirai malware-inspired IOT botnet DDoS attacks on manufacturer negligence. The report points out the lack of security by design in devices such as DVRs and IP-enabled closed circuit TV cameras that are protected by weak or known default credentials as the root cause for the emergence of these attacks... Regulation, echoing what Bruce Schneier said during a recent House briefing, is the most appropriate choice, the report's authors James Scott and Drew Spaniel said, even at the risk of stifling innovation. Threatpost

How the Cyber Kangaroo can help defend the Internet of Things

What are Australia's policy options for responding to the internet threats of 2022? This question was explored in the 360° Cyber Game conducted jointly by RAND Corporation and the National Security College (NSC) at the Australian National University (ANU) in Canberra on Thursday. ZD Net

"Love," "Girl," and "Angel" are the Most Commonly Used Words for Passwords

A new research shows that Internet users no longer stick with "123456" for their passwords, but instead, they pick some shockingly easy to guess words. CBT Nuggets writes that after analyzing data of 50,000 leaked emails and passwords, it discovered that the most commonly used words for passwords are "love," "star," "girl," and "angel." Next in line are rock, miss, hell, Mike, and John because yes, using names in your passwords is always a good idea. NOT! "Perhaps unsurprisingly, the most common names of those hacked are also ... well, some of the most common names in America – with Mike/Michael, Chris/Christopher, John/Jonathan, and Dave/David leading the pack," the research reveals. "Men were slightly more prone to being hacked, based on our info. And interestingly, those aged 25 to 34 were four times more likely to be hacked than any other demographic. They also happen to be the men most likely to be named Mike, Chris, John, or Dave." Softpedia

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, December 12, 2016 8:56 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique - 2016-12-12

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

December 12, 2016 / le 12 décembre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Goodale keeps door open to CSIS use of metadata gathered from innocent people

The federal public safety minister is keeping the door open to the idea of Canada's spy agency crunching potentially sensitive data about innocent people. Ralph Goodale told MPs at a House of Commons committee Thursday he is weighing views on whether the Canadian Security Intelligence Service should be allowed to retain and use such information... Goodale told MPs on the public safety committee the government would "consider all of the factors that are relevant in these circumstances" as it completes a review of national security policy. Canadian Press (Whitehorse Star, 19)

How 'sigint' nabbed a Canadian al-Qaeda operative

Communications intercepted by U.S. and British spy agencies led to the arrest of the first al-Qaeda inspired terrorist caught in Canada, according to a newly leaked document. The memo, circulated within the U.S. National Security Agency more than a decade ago, provides a rare and detailed look at the world of intelligence-sharing. In early 2004, a cell of British terrorists was caught scheming to explode a bomb in London. After Scotland Yard launched "Operation Crevice" to round up the conspirators, Canadian police simultaneously moved to arrest an Ottawa software engineer. Momin Khawaja had helped build detonators for the conspirators. The suspects, including Mr. Khawaja, were twenty something Westerners whose families had hailed from Pakistan. They had travelled to a terrorist training camp in that country and emerged from it wanting to bomb Britain for its role in the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan. Evidence included discussion of close co-operation between British and Canadian police. But prosecutors glossed over how "signals intelligence" (or sigint) captured long before the bust had laid a foundation for detectives. The details are revealed in a document flowing from Edward Snowden, the fugitive former American contractor who took volumes of files from the NSA in 2013 to leak them to the media... The leaked NSA memo, which is to be officially declassified in 2032, says that "well over 100 Sigint reports were issued on Operation Crevice." Most came from GCHQ but "the NSA reporting contributed significant pieces to the jigsaw." A Canadian agency called the Communications Security Establishment is a close NSA and GCHQ ally, but the Operation Crevice memo makes no mention of it. At that time, the Canadian agency was beginning to get secret authorizations from cabinet ministers to expand its powers. Globe and Mail, A8

Students in province to become 'Cyber Patriots' to battle hackers

A worldwide search for the next generation of cyber-security experts landed in a New Brunswick high school on Friday. A quartet of Grade 12 students at Hillsborough's Caledonia Regional High School spent the day warding off virtual attackers targeting a hypothetical company's computer system as part of a multinational contest called Cyber Patriot IX. The contest is hosted by the United States Air Force Association which hopes to recruit new talent through it for the flourishing industry. Telegraph Journal, A7

Spy agency target shrouded in mystery

Canada's electronic eavesdropping agency has been brought in to support the Canadian military for an operation within the country, according to documents obtained by the Ottawa Citizen. The Department of National Defence confirms it has requested such assistance but is tight-lipped about the details, adding that it conducts its intelligence activities within existing laws or directives from the government. The request for an intelligence-gathering operation by the Communications Security Establishment was for the period starting Jan. 1, 2016, and ending on Dec. 31, the heavily censored briefing note said. The request was filed last year with DND deputy minister John Forster, the former head of the CSE. The request was made by then Maj.-Gen. Paul Wynnyk, who was commander of the Canadian Forces Intelligence Command. "I formally request the support of the Communications Security Establishment in the ongoing provision of domestic operational Electronics Intelligence support to DND/CAF," wrote Wynnyk, who has been since promoted and appointed commander of the Canadian Army. The document was obtained by the Citizen using the Access to Information law. Postmedia Network (National Post, A1, Ottawa Citizen, London Free Press, Star Phoenix, Leader-Post, Edmonton Journal, The Province, Windsor Star, Vancouver Sun, Calgary Herald, Kingston Whig Standard)

Beware phoney emails, city urges

On Nov. 24, Kay Hedstrom received a suspicious email claiming she had been charged $18.03 for negligent driving on April 11. The email said the ticket would be forwarded to her mailing address but that she could see "photo proof" of the incident immediately by clicking on a link in the email... These kinds of emails are likely a new, more sophisticated type of phishing scam. They don't ask recipients to pay for their fake tickets online, but to click on a photo of their car or license plate. Clicking on the link downloads malware, which could give scammers access to the data on their devices. Edmonton Journal, A3

Hacker deals Hyland Cinema low blow

The owners of the Hyland Cinema are reeling after the cinema's website was hijacked Sunday by someone who posted a bizarre racist manifesto and video. The hacker also took over the cinema's e-mail lists and sent the same material to thousands of people under the tagline Hyland Movie Guide: Special God's Holy Day Edition. London Free Press, A1 / Front

Trump says Russia couldn't have affected election results

President-elect Donald Trump said foreign governments or other parties may have tried to influence the election through hacking, but it didn't affect the results, a view that may put him at odds with several leading lawmakers, including some Republicans. Bloomberg News (Toronto Star); Associated Press (Cape Breton Post, B4)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Trade tribunal looking into weather supercomputer contract

A trade tribunal is conducting an inquiry into how the federal government handled the purchase of a powerful new weather-forecasting supercomputer for Environment Canada. Computer company Hewlett-Packard Canada alleges the government's IT department, Shared Services Canada, wrongly invoked a national security exception in the procurement process. Hewlett-Packard is the latest in a long list of Canadian companies to allege the federal government routinely imposes such exceptions for no good reason. "Government contracts are a huge business in Canada. This is a real market that a lot of businesses in Canada depend on to survive," said Chris McLeod, an Ottawa lawyer who specializes in international trade and public procurement. A national security exception means buyers are exempt from trade rules that require all bidders to be treated equally and may mean equipment must be made in certain countries and data must be stored or processed within Canada. Hewlett-Packard has also asked the Federal Court to determine if Shared Services Canada (SSC) applied the exception appropriately. (...) What followed was a high-level meeting with senior executives from Canada's spy agencies CSIS and CSEC, the Privy Council Office, Treasury Board and Shared Services. Two invitees from DND were absent but they, like all the others, signed attestations saying they agreed to the idea of invoking a blanket exception. Soon after, Ring approved the plan. "I agree to invoke the national security exception for all purposes to exempt the procurement of goods and services related to the Government of Canada's electronic mail (email) network, and data centre infrastructure, systems and services from the application of Canada's domestic and international trade agreements, including those that may come into force in the future," Ring wrote in his response to Long. CBC News

Fintech as a Force for Social Good

For enterprises concerned about network security, identity verification has become a top-of-mind issue in an era of ubiquitous cyber-crime. But for millions around the world with no valid identification, standard computer access and identity authentication measures such as passwords pose a formidable barrier to not just public services, but also to the formal economy and traditional financial institutions. Postmedia Network (National Post)

Lawyers say cops' crime database is full of holes

Lawyers say they regularly receive incomplete or inaccurate criminal records from the national police database which can lead to wrongful arrests, unfair sentences or critical information missing at bail hearings. The consequences of this were most recently seen when a man convicted of sexual assault fled to Pakistan in November before he could be sentenced. Moazzam Tariq was allowed to remain out on $10,000 bail after his conviction, because the Toronto police and Crown didn't know he'd fled the country before while on bail after being criminally charged in Peel Region in 2010. Tariq, now 29, came back to Canada in 2011 and was arrested at the airport. He eventually pleaded guilty to dangerous driving in 2012. However, that conviction and his withdrawn charges - including for a failure to appear for his court date - were not recorded in the Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) database, a Toronto court heard Thursday. It's unclear whether Peel Regional Police failed to submit the information to the RCMP, which is in charge of the database, whether it was part of the backlog of convictions the RCMP has yet to enter into the database, or whether it fell through the cracks.

The RCMP was not able to respond to questions by deadline on Friday and questions to the Minister of Public Safety were referred to the RCMP... While the RCMP is working on modernizing the system, CPIC records continue to fail to show an up-to-date and accurate criminal history across jurisdictions, lawyers say. Toronto Star

Project Juice: How texts and emails unravelled a massive steroid-trafficking ring

Their text messages and emails carried an air of confidence. One boasted to his girlfriend that he and his partner had netted $20,000 in one week. Another referred to his lab worker-underlings as "dumb dumbs." But one by one, members of a national steroid-distribution ring became ensnared in a lengthy Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) investigation dubbed Project Juice. This past week, the last of the accused, Gautam Srivastava, a former University of Victoria computer science professor and youth baseball coach, pleaded guilty in provincial court in Vancouver to one count of smuggling. However, a judge stayed the case after finding that Srivastava had faced an unreasonable delay in the proceedings due to a late request by the Crown that investigators obtain additional evidence. "A stay ends the prosecution, despite the guilty plea," said federal prosecutor Alexandra Rice, who had been seeking a two-year sentence. "In other words, he will not have a criminal record." A CBSA spokeswoman said in a statement that investigators had still "dismantled a major steroid-smuggling ring and prevented a significant amount of illicit drugs from entering our communities." Public awareness campaigns have repeatedly warned of the dangers of steroids — a synthetic version of testosterone — to increase muscle mass, strength and speed. "Increased speed. Increased breast size," says an ad posted on the website of the Canadian Centre for Ethics in Sport (CCES). "Bigger Muscles. Smaller testicles." Yet, data from the CBSA show steroids have consistently ranked among the top drugs seized after marijuana. Postmedia News \(Leader-Post\)

It's online scam season and 'the phishing is good'

As Christmas approaches, experts suggest an extra dollop of caution before clicking on email package delivery notices. Fake notifications are proliferating, bringing not holiday cheer - but holiday ransomware. The holiday phishing season began just before U. S. Thanksgiving and will likely extend until after Christmas, said Caleb Barlow, vice-president for IBM Security. "This is a US$445-billion business. These are campaigns, run by the criminal equivalent of marketers," he said. Security company FireEye sees a significant increase in fake package email alerts beginning in November, an almost 100 per cent increase from the average of September-October. USA Today \(Winnipeg Free Press\)

Real Oversight Needed for Law-breaking National Security Agencies - Seventh in a series to help you participate in the federal consultation on national security

An opinion piece states "National security accountability — everyone says they want it. But not everyone means the same thing when they use the language of 'accountability.' The dangers of 'faux accountability' are always serious, but especially so on national security matters where secrecy can mask abuses and law breaking. There is a growing concern that what the government might mean by 'accountability' is primarily the creation of a Parliamentary oversight committee for national security matters. Bill C-22, which would create such a committee, is working its way through Parliament right now. An oversight committee is long overdue, but it is entirely inadequate as a means of achieving accountability. What's the problem? There is a crisis of public confidence in national security agencies that appear to break the law with no consequences. Law-breaking by national security agencies is regularly rewarded with changes to laws that expand their powers even further." The Tyee

Samsung : 90% des Note 7 récupérés et de nouvelles mesures pour les autres

Le long chemin de croix de Samsung pour en finir avec l'affaire Galaxy Note 7 explosifs se poursuit. Les différents programmes de rappel/échange lancés dans plusieurs pays de la planète semblent porter ses fruits puisque 2,7 millions d'unités aurait été récupérés, soit 90% des modèles vendus, selon le Korea Herald qui chiffre donc à 3 millions environ le nombre de phablettes vendues. ZDNet France

Ransomware Popcorn Time : ne payez rien en l'aidant à infecter d'autres internautes

Un lien vous est recommandé par une connaissance. Vous cliquez ? N'ayez pas peur de la froisser en prenant vos précautions en termes de sécurité. Les auteurs d'un ransomware ont eu une idée pour optimiser le taux d'infection de leur programme malveillant. ZDNet France ; Infosecurity-Magazine; DarkReading

Ransomware attacks against businesses increased threefold in 2016

The number of ransomware attacks targeting companies increased threefold from January to September, affecting one in every five businesses worldwide. According to a new report from security company Kaspersky Lab, the rate of ransomware attacks against businesses increased from one every two minutes to one every 40 seconds during that period. CSO

Grid security insights for 2017: Pressure mounts to prevent physical attacks

'Tis the season for predictions! As we close out 2016 and look forward to 2017, it seems appropriate to pause a moment and provide some grid security predictions for the new year. Predictions based on trends, insight, and understanding can arm security programs with the knowledge needed to test policies, exercise physical protection systems, and allocate corporate funds for resources. CSO

London Councils Running Outdated Software

Nearly 70% of London's borough councils are using out of date operating systems, exposing them to greater cybersecurity risk, according to new research from Databarracks. A spokesman confirmed to Infosecurity that the back-up firm received responses to a Freedom of Information request from every London borough and the City of London. Infosecurity-Magazine

Netgear working to fix flaw that left thousands of devices open to attack

A remotely exploitable vulnerability in the Nighthawk line of Netgear routers was disclosed on Friday. The flaw leaves customers exposed to having their connections hijacked, as someone exploiting the vulnerability can take complete control of the device. Despite having months to address the problem, Netgear has yet to publish a fix. CSO

Senate Votes To Upgrade Cyber Command Into War-Fighting Unit

NDAA legislation awaits Obama signature; Admiral Mike Rogers will still head both Cyber Command and NSA, at least for now. The US Senate voted last week to separate Cyber Command from NSA and make it an independent combatant unit, The Hill Reports. The legislation - the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) - now moves on to President Barack Obama for approval. DarkReading

Obama demande une enquête sur le piratage de l'élection présidentielle

Barack Obama a demandé aux agences américaines du renseignement d'ouvrir une enquête sur le piratage informatique et sur l'intervention de puissances étrangères dans le déroulement de la campagne présidentielle aux États-Unis cette année. Le président américain a souhaité qu'un rapport lui soit remis sur ce sujet avant qu'il quitte la Maison-Blanche le 20 janvier, a déclaré Lisa Monaco, conseillère à la sécurité intérieure, vendredi. Radio Canada; Agence France-Presse \(La Presse\); Politico

Canadian Cyber Threat Exchange ready to start membership push

After months of planning the country's first national IT threat service has issued its first threat report to a few early members and is ready to launch a campaign to expand its numbers, including lowering its fee for small businesses... Directors of the exchange come from some of the country's biggest enterprises including Air Canada, Bell Canada, Canadian National Railway, Manulife, Telus, TD Bank and Royal Bank. While many CISOs and infosec pros already get information from vendors, blogs and some threat data from vendors and services they subscribe to, the not-for-profit CCTX hopes to show value by tailoring reports and threat feeds for Canadian customers who don't want to know about the latest malware sweeping other parts of the world. The exchange also differs from other threat intelligence groups set up by industry associations and limited to verticals such as the healthcare or financial sectors by having a broad audience. The cross-industry appeal of the exchange has drawn the admiration of Rick Howard, chief security officer of Palo Alto Networks, who was one of the keynote speakers at Wednesday's symposium and who believes the CCTX is the first national threat exchange in the world. IT World Canada

Ransomware Jumps Threefold in 2016

Ransomware attacks on businesses grew threefold this year to reach one every 40 seconds by October, according to new data from Kaspersky Lab. The Russian AV firm claimed that attacks came once every two minutes at the start of the year. For individuals it was even worse, with Kaspersky Lab calculating one attack every 10 seconds by Q3, up from once every 20 seconds at the beginning of the year. Some 20% of organizations worldwide suffered an IT incident as the result of a ransomware infection this year, and the same percentage of small businesses never got their files back even after paying up. That chimes with separate research from Trend Micro from earlier this year which claimed that one in five UK firms it polled were left without a decryption key after they paid the ransom. While Kaspersky Lab was at pains to point out there's no such thing as a low-risk sector, education was worst hit, accounting for 23% of all attacks, while retail and leisure (16%) was least affected. Infosecurity Magazine

Yahoo fixes flaw allowing an attacker to read any user's emails

Yahoo has fixed a severe security vulnerability in its consumer email service that could have allowed an attacker to read a victim's email inbox. The cross-site scripting (XSS) attack only required a victim to view an email in Yahoo Mail. The internet giant paid out $10,000 to security researcher Jouko Pynnonen for privately disclosing the flaw through the HackerOne bug bounty. In a write-up, Pynnonen said that the flaw was similar to last year's Yahoo Mail bug, which similarly let an attacker compromise a user's account. Yahoo filters HTML messages to ensure that malicious code won't make it through into the user's browser, but the researcher found that the filters didn't catch all of the malicious data attributes. He explained that sending a specially crafted email could have triggered malicious JavaScript to be immediately executed. Pynnonen said in an email that exploiting the flaw was "rather easy," but finding the bug was difficult. ZDNet News; Security Week

US government seeks more data on Apple customers

Apple has seen a sharp year-over-year increase in the number US government demands for customer data. The company's first biannual report this year covers how many demands were made from global law enforcement and intelligence agencies -- including the US government -- for data it stores. Apple said it reviewed 4,822 demands for device data from US authorities, affecting 10,260 devices, an increase of 26 percent on the same period a year earlier. The company said that it was compelled to turn over data in over three-quarters of all cases. Additionally, the company received 1,363 demands from US authorities, the top requesting country, affecting 9,090 accounts. Apple turned over data in 84 percent of those cases. ZDNet News

Government spies surveil phones in flight, report says

Turns out the skies are not so friendly after all, at least as far as privacy is concerned. American and British intelligence agencies have been surveilling cell phone use on commercial flights since 2005, according to a new investigation by Le Monde based on documents leaked by former NSA contractor Edward Snowden. As journalist and digital media teacher Dan Gillmor tweeted, it's "another good reason to use airplane mode when you're on the plane." But just turning on your phone when the plane is above 10,000 feet reveals your location to the NSA, according to 2010 internal NSA newsletter posted by Le Monde... Le Monde goes on to explain how the spy agencies can extract information like email addresses and Skype and Facebook ID data and then correlate it with flight and passenger data to pinpoint a particular user. They can also reportedly see what you're doing on your phone, be it looking through email or using a travel app. CNET; CSO Online; Le Monde

Russian cyberspies likely behind DNC breach move on to German election

A group of suspected Russian cyberspies blamed for interfering in the U.S. election is also attempting to influence the upcoming vote in Germany, according to the country's domestic intelligence agency. The Russian hacking group known as Fancy Bear or APT 28 has been targeting political parties in the country, Germany's Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BfV) intelligence agency said in a statement Thursday posted online by Politico. The hacking activities have led to a surge in spear-phishing email attacks directed at German politicians, the agency said. CSO Online

Georgia Tech's $17 Million Rhamnousia Project and the Difficulty of Attribution

The Georgia Institute of Technology, Georgia Tech, has been awarded a $17.3 million contract to develop a scientific method for cyber attack attribution. Dubbed Rhamnousia after the ancient Greek spirit of divine retribution, the project will use machine learning (ML) technology to discover the groups behind different cyber-attacks. Security Week

How the Cyber Kangaroo can help defend the Internet of Things

What are Australia's policy options for responding to the internet threats of 2022? This question was explored in the 360° Cyber Game conducted jointly by RAND Corporation and the National Security College (NSC) at the Australian National University (ANU) in Canberra on Thursday. ZDNet News

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, January 19, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
January 19, 2015 / le 19 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Hackers are for hire online

The business of hacking is no longer just the domain of intelligence agencies, international criminal gangs, shadowy political operatives and disgruntled "hacktivists" taking aim at big targets. Rather, it is an increasingly personal enterprise. At a time when huge stealth attacks on companies like Sony Pictures, JPMorgan Chase and Home Depot attract attention, less noticed is a growing cottage industry of ordinary people hiring hackers for much smaller acts of espionage. A new website, called Hacker's List, seeks to match hackers with people looking to gain access to email accounts, take down unflattering photos from a website or gain access to a company's database. In less than three months of operation, over 500 hacking jobs have been put out to bid on the site, with hackers vying for the right to do the dirty work. New York Times (Telegraph-Journal, D1)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Lizard Squad's cyberattack-for-hire service hacked - 14,000 customer details leaked

The hacking group responsible for bringing down the PlayStation Network and Xbox Live on Christmas day has itself been hacked. The Lizard Squad offers up a service called Lizard Stresser which allows anyone to rent botnet to carry out distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks. Well it turns out the Squad has got a taste of its own medicine and has itself been hacked. Someone attacked the Lizard Stresser website and released a customer database of 14,241 registered users - although only a few hundred have actually paid for the service, according to KrebsOnSecurity. Mirror.co.uk

Russia, jihadis or cyberwarfare – which is the most urgent of the new threats we face?

Other threats are available, and no longer simply on a scale of conventional versus unconventional. The power of cyber warfare became clear in 2014: some parts of Sony Corporation are still using private email to conduct business, so devastated were the media giant's systems by the cyber-attack that took The Interview off America's movie screens. If, as alleged, it was perpetrated by North Korea, then its cyber-warriors achieved an impact which the early Soviet general Mikhail Tukhachevsky would have been proud of. "Assault the enemy through the depth of his formation," was Tukhachevsky's doctrine, and with Sony, someone did. The Guardian

China calls Snowden's stealth jet hack accusations 'groundless'

China dismissed accusations it stole F-35 stealth fighter plans as groundless on Monday, after documents leaked by former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden on a cyber attack were published by a German magazine. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

After Gmail blocked in China, Microsoft's Outlook hacked, says GreatFire

Chinese users of Microsoft Corp's Outlook email service were subject to a hacking attack at the weekend, just weeks after Google Inc's Gmail system was blocked in China, an online censorship watchdog said on Monday. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

The NSA was tracking North Korea's hackers long before they attacked Sony Pictures

Intelligence gathered by the National Security Agency on North Korea more than four years ago led the US government to blame Pyongyang for the recent attack on Sony Pictures, according to a report from the New York Times. The report, citing former US officials, computer experts, and documents leaked last week by Edward Snowden, says the NSA used malware to track North Korean hackers as part of a program launched in 2010. That allowed the government to blame North Korea with unusual speed and certainty following December's hack on Sony Pictures, but the report also sheds light on how Pyongyang's hackers were able to get away with it in the first place. The Verge

Four in five malware alerts are a 'waste of time'

Businesses are being bombarded with thousands of malware alerts each week, but only 19 percent are credible, costing companies on average $1.3m in wasted resources. False positives - malware alerts that turn out not to be a threat - are a significant drain on business, according to the results of a survey by the Ponemon Institute. What's more, such false alarms are potentially distracting security professionals from dealing with real threats that, if left unchecked, may leave a company with a bigger mess than simply cleaning up after a minor malware infection. ZDNet

Dongle bingle makes two MEELLION cars open to exploit

A bluetooth dongle used to track driver habits for insurance purposes has been hacked potentially allowing cars to be remotely hijacked, researcher Corey Thuen says. The Register

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, January 21, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
January 21, 2015 / le 21 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Documents show feds kept mum on NRC hack

The federal government knew it had been the target of a cyber attack last year but stayed silent for several days as it developed a comprehensive communications plan, internal documents show. The documents, including a "Communications Approach" dated July 25, 2014, show the National Research Council was aware it had been hacked at least days before telling employees and client companies that their information was vulnerable. The attack was eventually revealed by news organizations on July 28 and later confirmed by federal officials, who said the research agency was targeted by a "highly sophisticated Chinese state-sponsored actor." After the hack hit headlines, NRC management warned employees away from sharing sensitive information over email, using removable storage devices like USBs, and connecting to the agency's network at home. Toronto Star, A1

Privacy watchdog probes Saanich's use of spyware

B.C.'s information and privacy commissioner is launching an investigation into Saanich's use of spyware on municipal computers, including that of Mayor Richard Atwell. Times-Colonist, A1; Globe and Mail

Washington man charged with helping run Silk Road 2.0 site

A man was charged Tuesday with helping run one of the most sophisticated and widely used criminal marketplaces on the Internet. The Silk Road 2.0 website allowed anonymous users to buy and sell illegal drugs, weapons and other illicit items. It emerged as a copycat site a month after the man accused of running the original Silk Road site was arrested in October 2013. Officials on Saturday arrested Brian Richard Farrell, 26, who told federal agents he was a top assistant to the operator of Silk Road 2.0. The Associated Press (Times-Colonist, A10)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Identity theft insurance: Is it worth it?

A CBC investigation about an Ontario woman who was defrauded on three different occasions for thousands of dollars at her bank seems like a perfect illustration of why people should invest in identity theft insurance. But there is disagreement among industry experts about whether insurance like this is necessary. Identity theft insurance is "generally not a good deal," says John Lawford, executive director and general counsel for the Public Interest Advocacy Centre in Ottawa. CBCNews.ca

As terror threats rise, privacy is now more important than ever

New poll numbers show about two-thirds of people believe it is more important for the federal government to investigate possible terror threats than to avoid intruding on personal privacy. Since the September 11 attacks in 2001, the resounding verdict was to investigate all terror threats, even if investigation infringes on personal privacy. Following the revelations of domestic government surveillance by former NSA contractor Edward Snowden, a high of 39 percent said the government should not harm privacy. But after the Paris terrorist attacks and the rise of the Islamic State terror group, 63 percent of the public want more protection over privacy, according to new Washington Post-ABC News poll figures. Does now really seem like the best time to compromise on security by calling for encryption to be outlawed, in the process stripping Internet users of their privacy, and opening them up to hacks, attacks, and identity theft? ZDNet

New report claims zero-day attack on Sony Pictures

The tools involved in the Sony Pictures attack may have been more sophisticated than we thought. Recode's Arik Hessdahl is reporting that the attackers employed a previously undisclosed vulnerability to break into the Sony Pictures system, according to "sources familiar with the Sony investigation." Also known as a zero-day vulnerability, undisclosed weaknesses are particularly valuable in the security world, and typically employed by nation-state attackers. It's unclear how central the exploit was to the attack or which system was found to be vulnerable. Much of the previously reported software involved in the attack had been re-used from earlier attacks in South Korea in 2013. The Verge

Edward Snowden says secret Apple spyware is the reason he won't use an iPhone

Is Apple's wildly popular iPhone series hiding spyware that can collect information about users without their knowledge. As thoroughly as developers have dug through Apple's iOS code over the past seven and a half years, one would think functionality like that would have been unearthed by now. According to NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden, however, iPhones are capable of activating "special software" behind the scenes that collects information about users, who are completely oblivious to the fact that their phones are gathering this sensitive data. Yahoo! News

Feds Say 3rd Guilty Plea Entered in Computer Hacking Case

Federal prosecutors have obtained a third guilty plea involving an international hacking ring that gained access to a U.S. Army computer network while targeting computer giant Microsoft and several video game developers. The Associated Press (ABC News)

Obama aims for overhaul of cybersecurity standards

President Barack Obama is expected to push for new cybersecurity legislation during his State of the Union address on Tuesday night, the first time a U.S. president has made this emerging threat a priority. Obama will advocate for policy that encourages the private sector and government to share information on threats, expands the ability of law enforcement to prosecute cybercrime and condenses sometimes conflicting state laws into one federal statute, among other changes outlined by the White House last week. CNBC

Survey: Cybersecurity pros endorse Obama's data breach notification rules

More than three quarters of ISACA members surveyed by the cybersecurity training and benchmarking organization said they agreed or strongly agreed with Obama's proposal to require breached organizations to notify affected customers within 30 days. Only about 8 percent of the 3,400 respondents said they disagreed or strongly disagreed. Most of ISACA's 115,000 members are IT professionals. Computerworld

How Obama Fell Short on Cybersecurity

An opinion piece states, "Our nation is being turned inside out electronically and we seem helpless to stop it. The Russians have broken into a White House network and JPMorgan Chase. The Chinese have stolen blueprints, manufacturing processes, clinical trial results and other proprietary data from more than 140 companies and have utterly penetrated major media. The Iranians attack our banks, our electric grid is assaulted with frightening frequency and North Korea has brought Sony to its knees. Meanwhile, credit card data from big retailers such as Target and Home Depot are for sale electronically by the boatload. Infrastructure is at risk. Last month, attackers disrupted production at a German steel plant and damaged its blast furnaces, using only cyber methods. The fact that network attacks are getting worse, even after vast sums have been invested in defense, should tell us something fundamental about the deeply flawed nature of our networks. Unfortunately, the measures just announced by President Barack Obama do not address these flaws. He's right that better information-sharing between the private sector and the government is overdue; Congress should finally pass legislation to make it possible. But it would not address underlying weaknesses in the Internet. Stiffer sentences for cyber crime may be useful, but they would not make our infrastructure harder to attack or our communications more secure. His proposal for a uniform breach-notification law would simplify companies' legal compliance, but it would do nothing to prevent breaches..." Politico

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, January 27, 2015 8:49 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 27, 2015 / le 27 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Des Idées en revues - L'exigence de transparence et le "contrôle social 2.0"

Quiconque utilise Internet aujourd'hui doit s'attendre à ce que ses moindres faits et gestes puissent faire l'objet d'une surveillance continue et en temps réel. Si nous pouvions déjà le soupçonner, les troublantes révélations d'Edward Snowden sur l'étendue de la surveillance menée sur le Web par la National Security Agency (NSA) nous l'ont confirmé. Le Devoir, A7

Données personnelles - WikiLeaks trahi par Google

Des courriels -- y compris les brouillons --, des informations personnelles et des métadonnées... Lundi, le site Internet spécialisé dans la révélation d'informations secrètes, WikiLeaks, a accusé Google de collaboration honteuse avec les autorités américaines qui se sont fait livrer, sans grande résistance, par le géant du tout numérique, des données personnelles sur trois journalistes au service de Julian Assange. Une complicité dans l'intrusion qui violerait les lois sur la protection de l'intimité aux États-Unis, dit WikiLeaks, mais qui pourrait également nuire à l'image du célèbre moteur de recherche et fournisseur, avec Gmail, de service de communication numérique à des millions d'internautes dans le monde. Le Devoir, A1 ; SC Magazine

Cyberbullying policy a bust with kids

Zero-tolerance cyberbullying policies have made kids less likely to go to adults for help for fear that police will become involved, a survey of Canadian children's lives online suggests. Parents and teachers need to act less like online cops and more like mentors, found the survey by MediaSmarts, Canada's think-tank for digital and media literacy. "We don't believe that surveillance, in particular covert surveillance, is particularly effective. We all know teens are masters of avoiding surveillance," said Matthew Johnson, director of education at MediaSmarts. "Teens feel like they're guilty until proven innocent and they're more covert about what they're doing and less likely to seek help if something goes wrong." MediaSmarts spoke to 5,400 students from grades 4 to 11 in every Canadian province and territory, and had four focus groups with different age groups and with parents, between 2012 and 2013. Many of the children and teens feel adults overreact to conflict online, the survey found. London Free Press, A1

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Natural Resources Canada website ads smack of possible hacking

For several days, obscure advertisements have appeared on the Natural Resources Canada website, suggesting hackers might have gained access to the domain. The content of the ads varies, promoting, among other things, different weight loss strategies, online music lessons and belly dancing classes. Collectively, they contain the department's "nrcan.gc.ca" in their URLs. After noticing these ads, iPolitics contacted the department early Monday morning to inquire. The department responded shortly after 5 p.m., stating in an email that iPolitics should direct its query to Public Safety Canada. Public Safety Canada has yet to return a phone call from iPolitics. While the spate of out-of-place lifestyle ads on a normally staid government website doesn't appear to be a major security breach, hacking isn't a new issue for the Canadian government. Most recently, the National Research Council was hit by a cyberattack the government blamed on state-sponsored Chinese hackers. As now-former Communications Security Establishment head John Forster explained in a July letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail, "These malicious actors are constantly probing Government of Canada systems and networks for weaknesses so that they infiltrate them and steal valuable information. "When we detect emails or other communications that contain malware or other threats, we block, collect and analyze them. And, we work with appropriate departments to take action to neutralize the threat." iPolitics

Singapore ups the ante in cyber security fight

Singapore is gearing up for a crackdown on cyber crime with the launch of a central agency and the appointment of a minister in charge of cyber security, the government said on Tuesday, as the wealthy city-state grapples with a rise in online crime. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Hacker group claims it is behind outages at Facebook, other sites

Internet sites including Facebook, the world's largest social network, Instagram and other popular sites suffered temporary outages on Tuesday and a hacker group associated with other recent high-profile attacks claimed it caused the outages. Reuters (Yahoo! News); Guardian UK

Facebook says that outage was technical, not DDoS related

Late Monday evening, Facebook dropped offline after reporting an error message on its homepage. Immediately after, their image-sharing service Instagram went down, followed by Tinder. Three of the Web's hottest properties were offline, and no one knew why. CSO; CNET News

Facebook's outage exposes our digital fragility

OMG Facebook is down! Down too went Instagram. It was just for an hour this morning, but the tweets screamed "Do I have to talk to someone real?" In a manner of speaking, yes. Despite the hackers of Lizard Squad claiming credit, it is now clear that an outage at Facebook's HQ was responsible. But the confusion was understandable after Lizard Squad had in recent weeks variously hit Sony executives and Microsoft products. It brought down PlayStation and Xbox platforms over Christmas. Guardian UK

Un "méga-hacker" sera extradé vers les USA

La justice néerlandaise a autorisé aujourd'hui l'extradition vers les Etats-Unis d'un hacker russe soupçonné d'avoir dérobé plus de 160 millions de numéros de cartes de crédit en pénétrant les systèmes de sociétés américaines et européennes. Ce piratage informatique est un des plus importants jamais réalisés contre des sociétés américaines et européennes. Le Figaro

Most EU businesses unclear on latest cyber security laws

Most businesses in the UK, France and Germany feel guidelines to achieve compliance with new European Union cyber security legislation are unclear, a study has revealed. A third of organisations polled also do not understand the impact of the coming cyber security legislation, according to a study by security firm FireEye. Computer Weekly

Apple preparing fix for Thunderstrike malware in upcoming OS X 10.10.2 release

It's long been said, both by Apple and independent security experts, that Apple's computers are more secure than those running Windows. That does not mean, however, that Macs are invulnerable to malware threats. One particularly terrifying example is called Thunderstrike. It allows a malicious actor to replace the firmware in Macs with something much more nefarious. The firmware controls extremely low-level functions of the computer, everything that happens from the moment the power button is pressed. Yahoo! News

'Sexy Girls' wallpaper app in Google Play store accessed account info

The "Sexy Girls Wallpaper Gallery" app that was previously available in the Google Play store did in fact offer background photos of women, but it also asked for a permission that granted it access to information from popular accounts, according to Malwarebytes. SC Magazine

Link between NSA and Regin cyberespionage malware becomes clearer

Keylogging malware that may have been used by the NSA shares significant portions of code with a component of Regin, a sophisticated platform that has been used to spy on businesses, government institutions and private individuals for years. PC Advisor; CSO

China signals censors will continue to crack down on VPN services

China has defended its growing attempts to control the Internet, after disrupting several services that allowed users to view the Web free of censorship. CSO

Internet of Things: A security threat to business by the backdoor?

The rise of the Internet of Things (IoT) has already sparked concerns about privacy: now security pros are worried that badly configured gadgets might provide a backdoor for hackers looking to break into corporate networks. ZDNet News

DEA cameras tracking hundreds of millions of car journeys across the US

A U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration program to keep tabs on cars close to the U.S.-Mexican border has been gradually expanded nationwide and is regularly used by other law enforcement agencies in their hunt for suspects. PC Advisor

Java is the biggest vulnerability for US computers

Oracle's Java poses the single biggest security risk to US desktops, according to a new report from Copenhagen-based security vendor Secunia ApS, because of its penetration rate, number of vulnerabilities, and patch status. PC Advisor

Maldrone: Malware which hijacks your personal drone

Malware is no longer limited to PCs, mobile devices, corporate networks and Internet of Things (IoT) gadgets -- your drones are now also vulnerable to hijacking. The use of drones, also known as unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs), has expanded into the commercial consumer sector within the past few years. Now relatively cheap to produce, tiny, personal UAVs can be purchased and used for a variety of purposes -- from advanced photography to capturing sports and spying upon Apple construction sites. ZDNet News

Germany's privacy leaders gather to discuss suspending US Safe Harbor

On Wednesday, German data privacy commissioners will meet in Berlin for their annual conference. On the agenda will be discussions on one thing: whether the Safe Harbor agreement between the EU and the US should be scrapped. The meeting will allow the German regulators to voice their ongoing frustration over the lack of reform that followed the recent revelations that the US' surveillance agency, the NSA, was collecting German citizens' data. ZDNet News

Australia rushes to fix troubled Defence tech research law

The Australian government is rushing through legislation to fix Department of Defence trade laws that academics have warned could bring an end to technology research in Australia. In 2012, the former Labor government passed the Defence Trade Control Act (DTCA) with little fanfare, in a bid to bring regulation that already exists for physical exports, such as weapons proliferation, into the digital world. ZDNet News

Security Alert as Hoax Caller Put Through to PM Cameron

The UK government is reviewing its procedures this week after security breaches led to the disclosure of GCHQ boss Robert Hannigan's private mobile number, and then allowed a hoax caller pretending to be Hannigan to be put through to the prime minister. An official statement claimed that after the two hoax calls to government departments on Sunday, a notice had been sent out "to all government departments to be on the alert for such calls." Infosecurity Magazine

Malaysia Airlines Site Back Up as Hackers Threaten Data Dump

Troubled carrier Malaysia Airlines confirmed on Monday that hackers compromised its DNS records to redirect its visitors to a page apparently owned by Lizard Squad. Infosecurity Magazine

'Mastermind' hacker steals 20 million credentials from dating website

The user names and email addresses of 20 million visitors to Russian online dating website Topface have reportedly been put up for sale on a crime forum, according to anti-fraud firm Easy Solutions. Tech World

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, January 28, 2015 9:11 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 28, 2015 / le 28 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Small businesses must address privacy

Imagine finding out that a stranger has received highly sensitive information about you because a company has sent your mail to the wrong person. Or asking to look at your own personal information for the sake of fixing a suspected error, only to be denied access to it by the company that collected it. As privacy commissioner of Canada, it's these kinds of things I want to draw attention to on this Data Privacy Day. About a third of private-sector privacy complaints to my office under the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act, Canada's federal private-sector privacy law, involve smaller businesses that employ fewer than 100 people. Winnipeg Free Press, A9

Taylor Swift se moque de son hacker

La chanteuse Taylor Swift s'est moquée hier du hacker qui a brièvement pris possession de ses comptes sur les réseaux sociaux et menacé de publier des photos de la star nue, affirmant qu'elles n'existent pas. Les comptes Twitter et Instagram de Taylor Swift avaient été piratés par au moins un hacker qui a menacé de publier des photos nues d'elle si ses fans ne le payaient pas avec suffisamment de bitcoins, une monnaie virtuelle. «Un hacker qui dit avoir des photos de moi nue"?» a écrit la star lorsqu'elle a pu reprendre le contrôle de son compte Twitter. «Pfff tu aimerais bien mais tu ne peux pas! Amuse-toi bien sur Photoshop parce que tu n'as RIEN.» Taylor Swift, très active sur les réseaux sociaux, est l'une des quatre seules célébrités à être suivie par plus de 50 millions d'utilisateurs sur Twitter. Associated Press (Le Soleil, 36)

Facebook paralysé

Facebook est tombé en panne pendant une cinquantaine de minutes tôt, hier, dans plusieurs pays. La panne a notamment affecté les abonnés du Canada, des États-Unis, du Royaume-Uni, de l'Australie et de pays d'Asie. Peu après la reprise des activités, une multitude d'abonnés asiatiques ont rapporté que les fonctions étaient lentes et incomplètes. Le réseau Instagram a aussi été affecté. Facebook a publié un communiqué assurant que la panne s'était produite lors de mises à niveau techniques, non pas à cause d'une cyberattaque. Cette panne a été la plus longue à toucher Facebook depuis celle du 24 septembre 2010 qui avait duré 90 minutes. Associated Press (Le Soleil, 19 ; The Record, E3)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CSE tracks millions of downloads daily: Snowden documents

Canada's electronic spy agency sifts through millions of videos and documents downloaded online every day by people around the world, as part of a sweeping bid to find extremist plots and suspects, CBC News has learned. Details of the Communications Security Establishment project dubbed "Levitation" are revealed in a document obtained by U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden and recently released to CBC News. Under Levitation, analysts with the electronic eavesdropping service can access information on about 10 to 15 million uploads and downloads of files from free websites each day, the document says. "Every single thing that you do - in this case uploading/downloading files to these sites - that act is being archived, collected and analyzed," says Ron Deibert, director of the University of Toronto-based internet security think-tank Citizen Lab, who reviewed the document. In the document, a PowerPoint presentation written in 2012, the CSE analyst who wrote it jokes about being overloaded with innocuous files such as episodes of the musical TV series Glee in their hunt for terrorists. CBC analyzed the document in collaboration with the U.S. news website The Intercept, which obtained it from Snowden. The presentation provides a rare glimpse into Canada's cyber-sleuthing capabilities and its use of its spy partners' immense databases to track the online traffic of millions of people around the world, including Canadians. That glimpse may be of even greater interest now that the Harper government plans to introduce new legislation increasing the powers of Canada's security agencies. CBC News

Kenya's Christian-owned Hope FM radio hijacked

Suspected hackers briefly hijacked a popular Christian radio station in Kenya, and played Islamic verses before it went off air. Hope FM said on its Facebook account that a "foreign signal" had interfered with its broadcast on Tuesday night. It resumed transmission about three hours later. BBC News

National Security Agency link to Regin cyberespionage malware becomes clearer

The keylogger program, likely part of an attack framework used by the U.S. National Security Agency and its intelligence partners, is dubbed QWERTY and was among the files that former NSA contractor Edward Snowden leaked to journalists. It was released by German news magazine Der Spiegel on Jan. 17 along with a larger collection of secret documents about the malware capabilities of the NSA and the other Five Eyes partners -- the intelligence agencies of the U.K., Canada, Australia and New Zealand. "We've obtained a copy of the malicious files published by Der Spiegel and when we analyzed them, they immediately reminded us of Regin," malware researchers from antivirus firm Kaspersky Lab said Tuesday in a blog post. "Looking at the code closely, we conclude that the 'QWERTY' malware is identical in functionality to the Regin 50251 plugin." Moreover, the Kaspersky researchers found that both QWERTY and the 50251 plug-in depend on a different module of the Regin platform identified as 50225 which handles kernel-mode hooking. This component allows the malware to run in the highest privileged area of the operating system -- the kernel. Computer World UK

Clueless British politician says Snapchat helped ISIS take over territory in Syria and Iraq

A former British defence minister claims that territorial gains by Islamic State militants in Iraq and Syria were at least partly due to their mastery of Snapchat and WhatsApp. Tom King, a former Tory MP and cabinet minister who is now a life peer in the House of Lords, made his remarks during a debate of the Counter-Terrorism and Security Bill, the Conservative government's proposed legislation that would increase surveillance of internet communications. [...] King was speaking in favour of beefing up police and intelligence powers, part of a concerted effort by the U.K. government to undo some of the damage caused by revelations about its surveillance efforts in the trove of documents from Edward Snowden. The country's GCHQ spies — along international partners including the U.S. National Security Agency and Canada's Communications Security Establishment (CSEC) — were found to be hoovering up vast quantities of data on hundreds of millions of innocent people around the world with little to no oversight. However, the initial outrage and calls for reform have largely receded and several countries have backtracked on promises of greater transparency or are actively campaigning to increase surveillance even further following terrorist attacks in Paris and elsewhere. Canada.com

World's largest DDoS attack reached 400Gbps, says Arbor Networks

Some time in December 2014 an unnamed ISP experienced an NTP reflection DDoS attack that peaked at a router-straining 400Gbps, easily the largest denial of service event in Internet history, Arbor Networks' 10th Annual Infrastructure Report has revealed. Tech World

Simple Google search found alleged Silk Road founder

It was a simple Web search that led to the arrest of Ross Ulbricht, accused mastermind of the Silk Road underground online marketplace, a U.S. Internal Revenue Service special agent testified Monday in a Manhattan federal courtroom. Tech World

Insider threats changing security spending, report says

To guard against insider threats, organizations should focus their attention on securing data rather than endpoints, research revealed in recent report indicated. "93 percent [of U.S. respondents] believe they are somewhat or more vulnerable to insider threats," Sol Cates, CSO at Vormetric, which published the "2015 Vormetric Insider Threat Report," told SCMagazine.com in an interview. "I want to know what the other seven percent are doing that make them feel they've solved their [security] problems." SC Magazine

Firm finds link between Regin spy tool and QWERTY keylogger

Researchers have found that a surveillance tool detailed in recent Snowden leaks is "identical in functionality" to a plugin for malware, called "Regin." SC Magazine

'Ghost' vulnerability poses high risk to Linux distributions

A fault in a widely used component of most Linux distributions could allow an attacker to take remote control of a system after merely sending a malicious email. PC Advisor

Cisco integration gives Samsung Knox users more options for secure connectivity

Samsung Electronics smartphones and tablets protected using the company's Knox security technology have been integrated with VPNs from Cisco Systems, giving enterprises more options for communicating securely. PC Advisor

NFL in Privacy Fumble as App Leaks Data

Security experts have warned of a major flaw in the official NFL Mobile app which could expose sensitive personal information to hackers, just days before Sunday's Super Bowl XLIX. Mobile security firm Wandera claimed that although users are signed into the app securely via their NFL.com account, the application then exposes these log-ins through an unencrypted API call. Infosecurity Magazine

Dealing with the Stress of an Infosec Job

IT security professionals are in great demand, as the need to protect and defend information systems environments from data leaks and/or malicious attacks is becoming essential to the survival and prosperity of all organizations. A recent spur in attacks to government systems as well as renowned private companies has brought back to light how important it is to employ good IT security teams and have proper security defense systems in place. Using only a computer, in fact, a savvy hacker can wreak havoc to an entire business and cripple an organization of any size. Infosecurity Magazine

Data Protection Warning: Prepare Now for New EU Privacy Laws

European organizations are being urged to use today's ninth annual Data Protection Day as an incentive to step up preparations for major new EU privacy laws coming down the road. The date was created to raise awareness about data protection issues as it falls on the anniversary of the opening for signature of the Council of Europe's Convention 108 – a cornerstone of international privacy laws. Infosecurity Magazine

Data Protection Day: Five steps to securing data

Research has revealed that data loss is a top concern of IT executives, according to data management firm Iron Mountain, which has compiled five steps to securing data to mark Data Protection Day. Computer Weekly

Old arguments may bog down US data breach notification legislation

A drive in the U.S. Congress to pass a law requiring companies with data breaches to notify affected customers may get bogged down in old arguments. Infosecurity Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, January 28, 2015 9:11 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 28, 2015 / le 28 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Small businesses must address privacy

Imagine finding out that a stranger has received highly sensitive information about you because a company has sent your mail to the wrong person. Or asking to look at your own personal information for the sake of fixing a suspected error, only to be denied access to it by the company that collected it. As privacy commissioner of Canada, it's these kinds of things I want to draw attention to on this Data Privacy Day. About a third of private-sector privacy complaints to my office under the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act, Canada's federal private-sector privacy law, involve smaller businesses that employ fewer than 100 people. Winnipeg Free Press, A9

Taylor Swift se moque de son hacker

La chanteuse Taylor Swift s'est moquée hier du hacker qui a brièvement pris possession de ses comptes sur les réseaux sociaux et menacé de publier des photos de la star nue, affirmant qu'elles n'existent pas. Les comptes Twitter et Instagram de Taylor Swift avaient été piratés par au moins un hacker qui a menacé de publier des photos nues d'elle si ses fans ne le payaient pas avec suffisamment de bitcoins, une monnaie virtuelle. «Un hacker qui dit avoir des photos de moi nue"?» a écrit la star lorsqu'elle a pu reprendre le contrôle de son compte Twitter. «Pfff tu aimerais bien mais tu ne peux pas! Amuse-toi bien sur Photoshop parce que tu n'as RIEN.» Taylor Swift, très active sur les réseaux sociaux, est l'une des quatre seules célébrités à être suivie par plus de 50 millions d'utilisateurs sur Twitter. Associated Press (Le Soleil, 36)

Facebook paralysé

Facebook est tombé en panne pendant une cinquantaine de minutes tôt, hier, dans plusieurs pays. La panne a notamment affecté les abonnés du Canada, des États-Unis, du Royaume-Uni, de l'Australie et de pays d'Asie. Peu après la reprise des activités, une multitude d'abonnés asiatiques ont rapporté que les fonctions étaient lentes et incomplètes. Le réseau Instagram a aussi été affecté. Facebook a publié un communiqué assurant que la panne s'était produite lors de mises à niveau techniques, non pas à cause d'une cyberattaque. Cette panne a été la plus longue à toucher Facebook depuis celle du 24 septembre 2010 qui avait duré 90 minutes. Associated Press (Le Soleil, 19 ; The Record, E3)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CSE tracks millions of downloads daily: Snowden documents

Canada's electronic spy agency sifts through millions of videos and documents downloaded online every day by people around the world, as part of a sweeping bid to find extremist plots and suspects, CBC News has learned. Details of the Communications Security Establishment project dubbed "Levitation" are revealed in a document obtained by U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden and recently released to CBC News. Under Levitation, analysts with the electronic eavesdropping service can access information on about 10 to 15 million uploads and downloads of files from free websites each day, the document says. "Every single thing that you do - in this case uploading/downloading files to these sites - that act is being archived, collected and analyzed," says Ron Deibert, director of the University of Toronto-based internet security think-tank Citizen Lab, who reviewed the document. In the document, a PowerPoint presentation written in 2012, the CSE analyst who wrote it jokes about being overloaded with innocuous files such as episodes of the musical TV series Glee in their hunt for terrorists. CBC analyzed the document in collaboration with the U.S. news website The Intercept, which obtained it from Snowden. The presentation provides a rare glimpse into Canada's cyber-sleuthing capabilities and its use of its spy partners' immense databases to track the online traffic of millions of people around the world, including Canadians. That glimpse may be of even greater interest now that the Harper government plans to introduce new legislation increasing the powers of Canada's security agencies. CBC News

Kenya's Christian-owned Hope FM radio hijacked

Suspected hackers briefly hijacked a popular Christian radio station in Kenya, and played Islamic verses before it went off air. Hope FM said on its Facebook account that a "foreign signal" had interfered with its broadcast on Tuesday night. It resumed transmission about three hours later. BBC News

National Security Agency link to Regin cyberespionage malware becomes clearer

The keylogger program, likely part of an attack framework used by the U.S. National Security Agency and its intelligence partners, is dubbed QWERTY and was among the files that former NSA contractor Edward Snowden leaked to journalists. It was released by German news magazine Der Spiegel on Jan. 17 along with a larger collection of secret documents about the malware capabilities of the NSA and the other Five Eyes partners -- the intelligence agencies of the U.K., Canada, Australia and New Zealand. "We've obtained a copy of the malicious files published by Der Spiegel and when we analyzed them, they immediately reminded us of Regin," malware researchers from antivirus firm Kaspersky Lab said Tuesday in a blog post. "Looking at the code closely, we conclude that the 'QWERTY' malware is identical in functionality to the Regin 50251 plugin." Moreover, the Kaspersky researchers found that both QWERTY and the 50251 plug-in depend on a different module of the Regin platform identified as 50225 which handles kernel-mode hooking. This component allows the malware to run in the highest privileged area of the operating system -- the kernel. Computer World UK

Clueless British politician says Snapchat helped ISIS take over territory in Syria and Iraq

A former British defence minister claims that territorial gains by Islamic State militants in Iraq and Syria were at least partly due to their mastery of Snapchat and WhatsApp. Tom King, a former Tory MP and cabinet minister who is now a life peer in the House of Lords, made his remarks during a debate of the Counter-Terrorism and Security Bill, the Conservative government's proposed legislation that would increase surveillance of internet communications. [...] King was speaking in favour of beefing up police and intelligence powers, part of a concerted effort by the U.K. government to undo some of the damage caused by revelations about its surveillance efforts in the trove of documents from Edward Snowden. The country's GCHQ spies — along international partners including the U.S. National Security Agency and Canada's Communications Security Establishment (CSEC) — were found to be hoovering up vast quantities of data on hundreds of millions of innocent people around the world with little to no oversight. However, the initial outrage and calls for reform have largely receded and several countries have backtracked on promises of greater transparency or are actively campaigning to increase surveillance even further following terrorist attacks in Paris and elsewhere. Canada.com

World's largest DDoS attack reached 400Gbps, says Arbor Networks

Some time in December 2014 an unnamed ISP experienced an NTP reflection DDoS attack that peaked at a router-straining 400Gbps, easily the largest denial of service event in Internet history, Arbor Networks' 10th Annual Infrastructure Report has revealed. Tech World

Simple Google search found alleged Silk Road founder

It was a simple Web search that led to the arrest of Ross Ulbricht, accused mastermind of the Silk Road underground online marketplace, a U.S. Internal Revenue Service special agent testified Monday in a Manhattan federal courtroom. Tech World

Insider threats changing security spending, report says

To guard against insider threats, organizations should focus their attention on securing data rather than endpoints, research revealed in recent report indicated. "93 percent [of U.S. respondents] believe they are somewhat or more vulnerable to insider threats," Sol Cates, CSO at Vormetric, which published the "2015 Vormetric Insider Threat Report," told SCMagazine.com in an interview. "I want to know what the other seven percent are doing that make them feel they've solved their [security] problems." SC Magazine

Firm finds link between Regin spy tool and QWERTY keylogger

Researchers have found that a surveillance tool detailed in recent Snowden leaks is "identical in functionality" to a plugin for malware, called "Regin." SC Magazine

'Ghost' vulnerability poses high risk to Linux distributions

A fault in a widely used component of most Linux distributions could allow an attacker to take remote control of a system after merely sending a malicious email. PC Advisor

Cisco integration gives Samsung Knox users more options for secure connectivity

Samsung Electronics smartphones and tablets protected using the company's Knox security technology have been integrated with VPNs from Cisco Systems, giving enterprises more options for communicating securely. PC Advisor

NFL in Privacy Fumble as App Leaks Data

Security experts have warned of a major flaw in the official NFL Mobile app which could expose sensitive personal information to hackers, just days before Sunday's Super Bowl XLIX. Mobile security firm Wandera claimed that although users are signed into the app securely via their NFL.com account, the application then exposes these log-ins through an unencrypted API call. Infosecurity Magazine

Dealing with the Stress of an Infosec Job

IT security professionals are in great demand, as the need to protect and defend information systems environments from data leaks and/or malicious attacks is becoming essential to the survival and prosperity of all organizations. A recent spur in attacks to government systems as well as renowned private companies has brought back to light how important it is to employ good IT security teams and have proper security defense systems in place. Using only a computer, in fact, a savvy hacker can wreak havoc to an entire business and cripple an organization of any size. Infosecurity Magazine

Data Protection Warning: Prepare Now for New EU Privacy Laws

European organizations are being urged to use today's ninth annual Data Protection Day as an incentive to step up preparations for major new EU privacy laws coming down the road. The date was created to raise awareness about data protection issues as it falls on the anniversary of the opening for signature of the Council of Europe's Convention 108 – a cornerstone of international privacy laws. Infosecurity Magazine

Data Protection Day: Five steps to securing data

Research has revealed that data loss is a top concern of IT executives, according to data management firm Iron Mountain, which has compiled five steps to securing data to mark Data Protection Day. Computer Weekly

Old arguments may bog down US data breach notification legislation

A drive in the U.S. Congress to pass a law requiring companies with data breaches to notify affected customers may get bogged down in old arguments. Infosecurity Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, January 30, 2015 10:23 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 29, 2015 / le 29 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Privacy watchdog seeks reports of major breaches

B.C.'s independent privacy watchdog called on the provincial government Wednesday to start reporting all major privacy breaches to her office. Elizabeth Denham issued a 60-page report showing that the government investigated more than 3,700 suspected privacy breaches and confirmed 2,700 between April 2010 and December 2013. Yet, she said, fewer than 45 of those cases were reported to her office. "I'm concerned that we only heard about one per cent of the breaches that the government investigated over a four-year period," she said. Denham said the government is not even telling her about confirmed breaches caused by malicious viruses, hacking or phishing. There were seven such breaches from 2010 to 2013, her report says. "We're not hearing about some of the cyberattacks," she said. "We're not hearing about the numbers of people that were affected. Times-Colonist, A5

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Infamous Regin malware linked to spy tools used by NSA, Five Eyes intelligence

The infamous Regin malware strain has been connected to the QWERTY cyberweapon documented in files related to the US National Security Agency and released by whistleblower Edward Snowden. Last month, Der Spiegel published the source code of a malicious program dubbed QWERTY, which is a keylogger allegedly used in cyberespionage operations (.PDF) by a number of governments. Colloquially known as Five Eyes, the governments of the US, Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand are believed to be users of the spyware kit. ZDNet News

Measuring the impact of government cyber security initiatives on enterprise

New research released today reveals that 45% of IT professionals feel government initiatives like CERT-UK and Operation Waking Shark II have actively helped them raise awareness of cybersecurity to senior management. The research, conducted by cybersecurity service provider SecureData and Vanson Bourne, investigated the impact government security initiatives had on end-user organisations in 2014, with nearly half (47%) reporting that initiatives have helped them communicate the importance of security across their organisation. Over a third (39%) of participants also stated that they had used the insights from such initiatives to define IT security standards and policies, with a quarter (24%) using information garnered from them to set security strategies. Information-Age UK

Sécurité IT : les attaques DDoS changent de visage

Arbor Networks constate une évolution radicale des attaques par déni de service, plus fréquentes, plus puissantes... et mal maîtrisées. Plus fréquentes, plus puissantes... mais aussi mal maîtrisées du fait d'un manque cruel de compétences : ainsi Arbor Networks décrit-il les attaques par déni de service (DoS) dans sa 10e étude annuelle sur la sécurité des infrastructures IT mondiales. En une décennie, les signalements d'attaques sont passés de 8 Gbit/s à 400 Gbit/s. La disponibilité d'une plus grande bande passante n'y est pas étrangère, au même titre que l'exploitation de techniques dévastatrices comme l'amplification par réflexion. Cette dernière s'appuie sur des failles réseau au niveau DNS qui permettent de démultiplier le volume des campagnes, d'un facteur pouvant atteindre 80. Un phénomène illustré fin 2014 avec pas moins de 5 attaques par réflexion NTP dépassant les 200 Gbit/s. IT Espresso

Banking malware uncovered by IBM

IBM Trusteer, part of the IBM group, has found a malware toolkit that assumes control over a user's keyboard and mouse. Designed specifically for the banking sector, it conducts fraudulent payments without the user's knowledge. The malware, known as KL-Remote, is able to bypass such security measures as passwords. It tricks a number of detection tools, as they assume that the fraud is carried out from the hacker's device as opposed to the victim's. It is installed once the computer has been infected, and includes a number of pre-determined bank URLs. Acumin UK

Importations IT : la Chine veut les codes source et des backdoors

Le gouvernement chinois travaille à un règlement obligeant les fournisseurs de technologies de ses banques à livrer leurs codes source et à ménager des accès sur leurs équipements. La Chine va obliger les fournisseurs vendant des technologies à son secteur financier à transmettre les codes source des logiciels employés (firmware compris), à accepter des audits et à mettre sur pied des centres de R&D dans le pays, selon un article paru dans le New York Times. Le quotidien se base sur un document officiel qui doit être remis aux entreprises dans les prochains mois. Ce texte prévoit que 75 % des technologies employées dans le secteur financier chinois en 2019 soient « sûres et contrôlables ». Selon le New York Times, ce document a été approuvé par les autorités chinoises en fin d'année dernière. En plus de centres de R&D bâtis dans le pays, de permis pour leurs employés, les entreprises vendant des équipements au secteur financier devront ménager des ports permettant aux autorités locales de monitorer et contrôler les équipements. Cette future législation a déclenché une réaction d'un groupe d'associations professionnelles, dont la chambre de commerce américaine, qui a écrit une lettre de protestation à un comité du parti communiste chinois spécialisé dans la cybersécurité et dirigé par le président Xi Jinping. Silicon.fr

En 10 ans, les attaques DDoS se sont fortement amplifiées

Arbor Networks a publié sa 10e étude annuelle sur les attaques par déni de service. Le constat est sans appel : puissance et fréquence en hausse, et manque cruel de compétences sur ces sujets. Chaque année, Arbor Networks a pris l'habitude de publier une étude sur la sécurité des infrastructures IT mondiales (WISR pour Worldwide Infrastructure Security Report). La 10e édition a été dévoilée et permet de balayer une décennie d'attaques par déni de services. Parmi les constats saillants de l'étude, Eric Michonnet (notre photo), directeur Europe du Sud d'Arbor Networks souligne : « En 10 ans, les signalements d'attaques sont passés de 8 Gbit/s à 400 Gbit/s. » Une multiplication par 50 en une décennie qui s'explique par plusieurs raisons. Selon le dirigeant, « la disponibilité d'une plus grande passante a été un facteur fort de développement de la puissance des attaques. Il faut ajouter également des éléments techniques comme l'amplification par réflexion qui utilise des failles réseaux au niveau DNS via différents protocoles pour accroître parfois par 80 le volume des campagnes ». Ce phénomène d'amplification est surtout apparu dans le spectre d'Arbor à la fin de l'année dernière, avec pas moins de 5 attaques par réflexion NTP au-dessus de 200 Gbit/s (cf schéma ci-dessous). Silicon.fr

Maldrone, le premier malware pour drone

Une nuée de drones qui échappent au contrôle de leurs propriétaires pour aller s'abattre simultanément sur une centrale nucléaire... Scénario de science-fiction, ou de film catastrophes, dites-vous ? Il se pourrait aussi que ce soit l'actualité de demain... ;-) Les drones, parce qu'ils sont de plus en plus répandus, intéressent les hackers en conséquence. L'informaticien indien Rahul Sasi vient de fournir une preuve de concept du hacking des drones. Il a créé Maldrone, un programme qui se greffe dans le logiciel de navigation du drone, et qui permet d'en prendre le contrôle avec un smartphone. En l'occurrence un AR.Drone 2.0 du fabricant français Parrot. Mais tout drone s'appuyant sur une architecture ARM/Linux peut être victime de Maldrone, tout aussi bien. Programmez.com

Over half IT professionals fear cyber attack

A survey by the Information Systems Audit and Control Association (ISACA), a global IT non-profit, has found that 61% of Australia and New Zealand's IT professionals expect a cyber attack in 2015. Surveying over 100 IT professionals locally and across all manner of business, the results are far higher than the global score as 46% of worldwide respondents expect the same troubles in the coming year. In another startling finding, the survey details that 43% of those surveyed in Australia and New Zealand are prepared for a "sophisticated cyber attack," and that 85% of respondents believe there is a shortage of skilled cyber security professionals. Insurance Business

Zombie Computers Now More Intimidating

Arbor Networks, a prominent cyber security company, recently published a report which is based on analysis of a collection of ten years' worth of distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks. The report suggests both the number and scale of DDoS attacks has tremendously increased. DDoS attacks aim at disabling access to a website basically by increasing the number of entries through BOTNETs, also known as zombie computers. The hacker or hackers first employ various means to hack vulnerable computers, create a BOTNET, then strive to cut its connection to a targeted website by overloading its servers. The initial DDoS attacks had specific targets such as betting and gambling websites, which could not afford to be put offline during a game. Thus, it was a very useful tool for cybercriminals, who had been using cyber means for committing crimes. But as Darren Anstee, a senior analyst at Arbor says, new actors have begun conducting DDoS attacks for various purposes. Eurasia Review

Ghostbusting in the 'critically' vulnerable Linux machine

Security vendor Qualys has exposed and defined a new critical Linux vulnerability in the Linux GNU C Library (versions 2.2 and newer) that is capable of instigating remote code execution in some cases. The threat could lead to malicious control over user devices and system installations that date back to year 2000. Known formally as CVE-2015-0235, the threat is more jauntily named GHOST because it can be triggered by the "_gethostbyname" function, a networked computing control used by a vast number of machines. Qualys CTO Wolfgang Kandek has said that the flaw could allow attackers to gain remote control of a system without having any prior knowledge of system credentials. An attacker could send a simple email on a Linux-based system to trigger a buffer overflow and automatically get complete access to that machine. SC Magazine

Click-fraud ZeroAccess botnet rises from the ashes

The ZeroAccess botnet, disrupted by Microsoft in 2013, has risen up once more to commit click-fraud and data theft. Originally discovered in 2013, the ZeroAccess botnet -- also known as Sirefef -- targeted major search engines and browsers, commandeering search results and routes queries to websites rigged to infect computers with malware, steal information or to generate revenue from fake online ad clicks. ZeroAccess gathers machines when users visit compromised websites and unwittingly download malware. In turn, this malicious code rigs the computer up to the botnet, becoming another slave machine the botnet operator can control. Microsoft, together with Europol's European cybercrime centre, the FBI, and tech industry figures disrupted the botnet system in 2013, which the Redmond giant estimated cost advertisers $2.7 million monthly. However, after six months of relative inactivity, the botnet is once again operating. According to Dell SecureWorks researchers, the peer-to-peer botnet began to resurface from March 21, 2014 until July 2, 2014, and on January 15 2015, click-fraud templates are now once again being distributed to compromised systems. ZDNet

Silk Road operators paid thousands of Dollars to fight hackers and malware

Silk Road Case : Operators say they paid thousands of Dollars to prevent malware, DDoS and vulnerability attacksThe Silk Road hearing which is going on at Southern District of New York and overseen by District Judge Katherine Forrest is throwing up surprising facets of operating a illegal website. Silk Road which was operating on Tor anonymiser network and dealing in drugs and contraband goods and had to pay thousands of dollars per month to cyber extortionists. Much more like a mafia organisation in the physical world which has to pay off several authorities to avoid raids, seizures and detection, Silk Road which was operating outside of law had to depend on payoffs to survive, it seems. Techworm

Malware infects payment card system at French Lick Resort

Indiana-based French Lick Resort announced on Tuesday that malware had infected its payment card system, and any guest who used their credit and debit cards at any venue at the resort between April 23, 2014, and Jan. 21 may have had their personal information compromised. How many victims? Unknown at this time. What type of personal information? Names, account numbers, card expiration dates and card verification values. What happened? Malware infected the French Lick Resort payment card system, compromising personal information for any guest who used their credit card at any venue at the resort. SC Magazine

Drones infected with malware can drop from the sky or be hijacked for surveillance

You're minding your own business, when something in the sky snags your attention. Is it a bird or a plane? Nope, it's a drone falling out of the sky because it's infected with malware. Yeppers, "you read that right," wrote security engineer Rahul Sasi regarding the title of his post describing "Maldrone—the first backdoor for drones." Although he shows off the malware by infecting a Parrot AR.Drone within wireless range, making it "drop like a brick," theoretically an attacker could also take control of any drone with an ARM processor and Linux-based operating system and then use it for surveillance. Peachy. Sashi plans to present "Drone Attacks: How I hijacked a drone" on February 6 at Nullcon in India. "Once my program kills the actual drone controllers, it causes the motors to stop and the drone falls off like a brick," Sasi said. "But my backdoor instantly takes control, so if the drone is really high in the air the motors can start again and Maldrone can prevent it from crashing." Computerworld

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, February 11, 2015 8:53 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique February 11, 2015 / le 11 février 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Cybersecurity requires traps, not walls - Hackers can overwhelm older defences

Ever since the Internet blossomed in the 1990s, cybersecurity was built on the idea that computers could be protected by a digital quarantine. Now, as hackers routinely overwhelm such defences, experts say cybersecurity is beyond due an overhaul. Their message: Neutralize attackers once they're inside networks rather than fixating on trying to keep them out. First they need to convince a conservative business world to gamble on a different approach. And having sold generations of defensive systems that consistently lagged the capabilities of the most advanced hackers, the industry itself must overcome skepticism it's flogging another illusion of security. According to U.S. cybersecurity company FireEye, 229 days is the median length of time attackers lurk inside their victim's computers before being detected or revealing themselves, underscoring the weakness of conventional tools in identifying sophisticated intruders. The traditional defences must "have a description of the bad guys before they can help you find them," said Dave Merkel, chief technology officer at Fire-Eye Inc. "That's just old and outmoded. And just doesn't work anymore," he said. "There's no way to guarantee that you never are the victim of cyberattack." Merkel said in the worst case he knows of, attackers hid themselves for years. Experts aren't recommending organizations stop deploying perimeter defences such as antivirus software or firewalls that weed out vanilla threats. But they say a strategy that could be likened to laying traps is needed to counter the sophisticated hacks that can cause huge losses. Associated Press (Windsor Star, C8)

Samsung privacy statement reveals potential for smart TVs to eavesdrop private conversations

Watch what you say in your living room. Samsung's smart TV could be listening. And sharing. Voice recognition technology in the South Korean company's Internet connected TVs captures and transmits nearby conversations. The potential for TVs to eavesdrop is revealed in Samsung's smart TV privacy policy available on its website. "Please be aware that if your spoken words include personal or other sensitive information, that information will be among the data captured and transmitted to a third party through your use of Voice Recognition," the policy said. For the voice command feature to work, the TV listens for speech which is translated by third-party software into text and sent back to the TV as a command. Samsung declined to name the software company. The TV also transmits other information including its unique identifier. Samsung said data collection is aimed at improving TV performance but users can disable it. In a statement, the company said it takes consumer privacy "very seriously." Associated Press (St. John's Telegram, B2)

Hacker hits Twitter exec's account, sends spam tweets

Twitter Inc.'s chief financial officer's account on the company's website has been hacked. Anthony Noto's account on the social-media website, @anthonynoto, sent hundreds of auto-replies to various Twitter users with posts containing spam links, indicating that the account was compromised. There's no sign that any account information was stolen, and it isn't clear how the tweets were sent, said Jim Prosser, a spokesman for Twitter. "His account was sending spam tweets," Prosser said. "We've locked the account down and deleted the tweets." Prosser wouldn't comment on whether Noto uses two-step verification, which helps protect accounts. It's the second time Noto, who joined the San Francisco-based company in July, has had public issues with his Twitter account. Last year, the new CFO accidentally sent a private message about a deal to his public Twitter followers. The company has since worked to improve its product for direct messages. Bloomberg (Toronto Star, S11)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

L'El pirate le compte twitter d'un magazine américain

Le compte Twitter du magazine américain Newsweek a été brièvement piraté mardi par un groupe qui s'est servi de cette plateforme pour diffuser des messages en faveur du groupe État islamique et menacer Michelle Obama, l'épouse du président américain. Les pirates se sont revendiqués d'un «Cybercalifat» et ont posté un message clamant «Je suis IS», l'acronyme anglais de l'Etat islamique, en référence au slogan «Je suis Charlie» né après l'attentat contre l'hebdomadaire satirique français, en janvier. TVA Nouvelles

Global Conflicts Could Spawn More Cyber Attacks, Firm Says

The North Korea-led hack of Sony Pictures could become a template for a new round of cyber-attacks stoked by escalating international conflicts involving the U.S., including ongoing negotiations aimed to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon, the leader of a security research firm said Monday. NBC News

Cyberattacks Rising in Utah, Likely Due to NSA Facility

Utah state officials have seen what they describe as a sharp uptick in attempts to hack into state computers in the last two years, and they think it related to the NSA data center south of Salt Lake City. The increase began in early 2013 as international attention focused on the NSA's $1.7 billion warehouse to store massive amounts of information gathered secretly from phone calls and emails. CIO Today

Tim Cook to address hacking at White House summit

After a messy year for Apple's cybersecurity reputation, CEO Tim Cook will talk about hacking at a White House summit on Friday. The summit, which will be held at Stanford University, takes place months after several celebrities' nude photos were stolen from their iCloud accounts and Apple controversially decided to prevent law enforcement from accessing customers' iPhone data. Apple has also been criticized for its lack of urgency when addressing security issues. CNN

Dutch government website outage caused by cyber attack

Cyber attackers caused the outage of Dutch government websites and a prominent satirical news portal for most of Tuesday, a Dutch government official said on Wednesday. The outage affected most of the central government's main websites but phones and emergency communication channels remained online. Other websites, including GeenStijl.nl, which mocks politicians and religions, were also hit by the "distributed denial of service" attack, Rimbart Kloosterman said. Reuters (TheGlobeandMail.com)

Chinese Hackers Infect Forbes, Spy on Visitors

Chinese spies have reportedly infected the Forbes website in order to steal data from staff at defense and finance organizations. The attack is unlike most attacks on large websites, as the motive was for intelligence, rather than profit. The Forbes website attack reportedly took place in November 2014, with the security gap plugged by approximately three days later. To propagate the attack, hackers replaced a legitimate file on the web server used for the "Thought of the Day" feature, which appeared on every page of the Forbes website. The malicious file was then automatically downloaded to every user that visited the site, which then took advantage of known flaws in Internet Explorer and Adobe Flash to provide unrestricted access to visitors' computers. Infopackets

Nigeria: Experts Warn On Continuous Cyber Attacks

CYBER security experts have said that much needs to be done to prevent highly destructive cyber-attacks, especially on the nation's critical infrastructure. During a presentation at the Cyber Security Expert Association Of Nigeria (CSEAN) conference in Abuja, a representative of the Director General of the National Information Technology Development Agency (NITDA), Abdul-Hakeem Ajijola, said, "the Inadequate training and a culture of complacency among many owners and operators of critical infrastructure are significantly raising the risks of highly damaging cyber-attacks throughout the world." According to the President of CSEAN, Remi Afon, the year 2014 had some of the most recorded targeted cyber-attacks and data breaches ever experienced worldwide and year 2015 promises to be worse. AllAfrica

Homeland Security: Assessing the impact of a shutdown

What would be the impact in Connecticut of a shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security? Depends on who you ask. Congressional Republicans have minimized the impact of a potential shutdown, which will occur if Congress does not approve a new DHS budget by Feb. 27. That budget is currently stalemated because the GOP has added language to a $40 million funding bill that would keep DHS running. The Republican provision, to which Democrats object, would block President Obama's new immigration initiatives. The Democrats, including Connecticut Sens. Richard Blumenthal and Chris Murphy, say a DHS shutdown would leave the nation in dire circumstances, perhaps even vulnerable to new terrorist attacks. The CT Mirror

Les apps Android de rencontres: de vraies espionnes selon IBM

Selon IBM, plus de 60% des applications de rencontre en ligne permettent d'espionner leurs utilisateurs à leur insu. A l'approche de la Saint Valentin, les chercheurs d'IBM se sont penchés sur l'intégrité des applications Android dédiées aux rencontres. Et le résultat est pour le moins inquiétant. Pas moins de 26 applications sur les 41 étudiées (soit plus de 63%) comportent des vulnérabilités de sécurité jugées « moyennes ou élevées » qui exposent leurs utilisateurs à des vols de données personnelles mais aussi celle de l'entreprise qui les emploie. Les applications compromises permettent ainsi d'accéder aux données GPS du smartphone (permettant ainsi de pister les habitudes de l'utilisateur) pour 73% d'entre elles, aux informations de paiement (pour la moitié des analyses) avec la possibilité d'effectuer des transactions à la barbe du propriétaire du terminal mobile, ou encore aux caméra et micro de l'appareil (même quand l'application n'est pas activée) pour espionner l'utilisateur et son entourage. Silicon.fr

From Goblin Panda to Flying Kitten: the latest online security threats

Goblin Panda, Flying Kitten and CyberBerkut may sound like the lineup of a particularly esoteric music festival, but according to online security firm CrowdStrike, they were three of the most prominent cyber threats in 2014. The company's annual Global Threat Intel Report identifies activity from 39 different groups in the last year, dividing them into four categories: criminals, hacktivists, state-sponsored groups and nationalist adversaries. The names may raise a smile, but their activities are entirely serious, targeting companies and individuals with a range of threats, from malware to hacking foreign websites for propaganda purposes. "Western businesses and enterprises need to know that there are serious bad guys in North Korea, China, Iran, Russia and other countries working tirelessly on ways to get around our defenses to steal intellectual property, disrupt business and even destroy," said CrowdStrike's vice president of intelligence Adam Meyers as the report was published. UK Guardian

Report: Chinese groups behind most state-sponsored attacks in 2014

Chinese adversaries were the most active state-sponsored cyberthreat groups last year, according to report released today by CrowdStrike, but it was Vietnam, not the U.S., that was its top target. A group CrowdStrike code-named "Goblin Panda" targeted the country because of ongoing disputes over territorial rights in the South China Sea. Last May, a Chinese state-owned energy company deployed an oil rig in Vietnamese territorial waters, close to the Paracel Island, which are claimed by both countries. This resulted in clashes between ships belonging to the two countries, protests in Vietnam, and an increase in Chinese cyberattacks against Vietnamese government agencies. CSO

Iran Created 'Shamoon' Malware By Learning From 'Stuxnet' Attack

After suffering a devastating cyber attack by the 'Stuxnet' virus engineered by Israel and the US, Iran learnt from the experience to create the 'Shamoon' virus. The US National Security Administration (NSA) suspects that Iran's state hackers learned from previous attacks against its networks and created the 'Shamoon' virus which infected 30,000 computers of the Saudi-American oil company, ARAMCO in 2012 besides infiltrating over 50 aerospace, airline and petrol corporations, hospitals and universities all over the world. Reporting from the contents of 2002 NSA documents leaked by Edward Snowden, Silicon Republic said that the NSA is worried that Iran's cyber weapons are becoming more and more potent, as it continues to improve on its enemies tactics. DefenseWorld.net

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, February 25, 2015 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
February 25, 2015 / le 25 février 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Government computers subject to 'millions' of 'probing attempts' daily: Fantino

Junior defence minister calls out "foreign countries or companies" as well as "criminal organizations," "activists with political or social agendas" and "terrorists" as possible cyber threats. Cyber security concerns were top of mind at this year's Ottawa defence conference, as revelations continue to come out about the extent of international electronic eavesdropping by allied nations and Canada. United States National Security Agency director Admiral Michael S. Rogers spoke at the Ottawa Conference on Security and Defence, lamenting the loss of public trust exacted by the exposure of top secret files gathered by former US security contractor-turned-whistleblower Edward Snowden. Associate Minister of National Defence Julian Fantino also chose to spend half his Feb. 20 speech at the event talking about cyber security, suggesting that "millions of Canadians" will "fall victim to cybercrime," and "millions of probing attempts are detected daily of government systems." Some of those Canadians are inside Mr. Fantino's own government. A financial update tabled in Parliament on Feb. 19 showed the "unauthorized cyber intrusion" on the computer systems of a national research organization last year will cost the government $32.5 million. Hackers broke into the National Research Council's computers in July 2014, and Canada's chief information officer, Corinne Charette, blamed a "highly sophisticated Chinese state-sponsored actor"-an allegation a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy called "groundless" on CBC News. In his speech, Mr. Fantino called out "foreign countries or companies" as well as "criminal organizations," "activists with political or social agendas" and "terrorists" as possible cyber threats. Embassy

Companies unprepared for cyberattacks, report finds

Organizations that oversee sensitive information remain woefully unprepared to fend off increasingly clever and sophisticated data raiders, according to a sobering new study. Nearly 70 per cent of those hit by data breaches in 2014 found out about the infractions from outsiders such as police or customers, according to a report issued Tuesday by Silicon Valley security software firm FireEye Inc. Data breach victims took a median of 205 days - almost seven months - to realize they had been hit, giving "attackers ... a free rein in breached environments far too long before being detected," the report said, while "run-of-the-mill cyber criminals" out to steal creditcard data are becoming harder to distinguish from state-sponsored attackers due to advanced camouflaging tools and tactics. Despite increasing awareness of cyberthreats and investments to protect sensitive data, including personal customer information and corporate secrets, corporations appear to be falling behind in their efforts to counter hackers. Many companies are better prepared for fires, floods and ice storms than data breaches, which "are more likely, and likelier to have a more significant business impact" than other emergencies, said John Proctor, vice-president of global cybersecurity with Montreal information technology services firm CGI Group Inc. Globe and Mail, B3

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Chain of 3.2 million 'zombie computers' disrupted

Law enforcement officials in Europe are claiming victory after disrupting a chain of 3.2 million computers worldwide that were surreptitiously controlled by hackers. Europol's European Cybercrime Centre targeted the cybercrime ring by seizing control of its servers. The hacked PCs were acting as a botnet, or a network of hijacked computers programmed to perpetrate mass online fraud. Computer scientists sometimes refer to victimized machines as "zombie computers." "We worked together to shut down the command and control servers for the network in various countries across the European Union," Paul Gillen, head of operations at the cybercrime centre, told Reuters. "The criminals have lost control of the infrastructure they were using." The Hill

CSE monitors millions of Canadian emails to government - Critics question how long data is stored and what it's used for

Canada's electronic spy agency collects millions of emails from Canadians and stores them for "days to months" while trying to filter out malware and other attacks on government computer networks, CBC News has learned. A top-secret document written by Communications Security Establishment (CSE) analysts sheds new light on the scope of the agency's domestic email collection as part of its mandate to protect government computers. CBC analyzed the document in collaboration with U.S. news site The Intercept, which obtained them from U.S. National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden. Canada's electronic spy agency watched visits to government websites and collected about 400,000 emails to the government every day, storing some of the data for years, according to the 2010 document. Today's volume is likely much higher given online traffic growth. CBC News

U.K.-U.S. spy hacking 'probably happened,' SIM card maker admits

Gemalto, the world's largest maker of mobile SIM cards, said a preliminary company probe of sophisticated attacks against it in 2010 and 2011 showed British and U.S. intelligence services "probably" hacked into its office networks. Gemalto said the suspected attacks by the U.S. National Security Agency and Britain's Government Communications Headquarters "probably happened," but said the intrusions "only breached its office networks" and "could not have resulted in a massive theft of SIM encryption keys." The Franco-Dutch company was responding to a report by investigative news site The Intercept, which last week published documents it said showed that U.S. and British spies hacked into Gemalto, potentially allowing them to monitor the calls, texts and emails of billions of mobile users around the world. Reuters (Globe and Mail)

US announces $3 million reward for accused prolific cyber criminal believed to be in Russia

The U.S. government has announced a $3 million reward for information leading to the arrest of a man American authorities call one of the world's most prolific computer hackers. Evgeniy Bogachev, who is believed to be in Russia, was indicted in Pittsburgh last year on charges including bank fraud and conspiracy. His picture has been plastered on "Wanted" signs distributed by the FBI. Bogachev is accused of acting as ringleader for a massive hacking operation in Russia and Ukraine that installed malicious software on victims' computers to capture bank account numbers, passwords and other sensitive information. CharlottetownGuardian.ca

Anthem says hack may affect more than 8.8 million other BCBS members

Health insurer Anthem Inc, which earlier this month reported that it was hit by a massive cyberbreach, said on Tuesday that 8.8 million to 18.8 million people who were members of other Blue Cross Blue Shield plans could be victims in the attack. Anthem, the second-largest U.S. health insurer, is part of a national network of independently run Blue Cross Blue Shield plans through which BCBS customers can receive medical services when they are in an area where BCBS is operated by a different company. It is those Blue Cross Blue Shield customers who were potentially affected because their records may be included in the database that was hacked, the company said. Anthem does not know the exact number of Anthem versus non-Anthem customers affected by the breach because of those incomplete records, which prevent it from linking all members with their plan, Anthem spokeswoman Kristin Binns said. Yahoo! News

FBI aware of 60 different cyberthreat groups linked to nation-states

The FBI is aware of 60 different cyber threats groups linked to nation-states, a senior bureau official said on Tuesday. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

FBI offers $3 million reward for Russian 'cyber fugitive'

The FBI today announced it's offering a $3 million reward for information leading to the direct arrest or capture of Evgeniy Mikhailovich Bogachev, who the bureau is labeling "a prolific cyber criminal" guilty of helping push along the crippling GameOver Zeus botnet. The feds maintain that the botnet was responsible for financial damages exceeding $100 million before it was finally shut down in June of last year. The Verge

Companies are falling short in efforts to counter cyberattacks: report

Organizations that oversee sensitive information remain woefully unprepared to fend off increasingly clever and sophisticated data raiders, according to a sobering new study. Globe and Mail

The NSA's SIM heist could have given it the power to plant spyware on any phone

An opinion piece states, "Last week, The Intercept published shocking new documents detailing a campaign by US and UK spies to hack into the SIM manufacturer Gemalto, stealing crucial encryption keys that protect and authenticate cellphone signals. But while it was clearly a major attack, I had a hard time seeing the operational benefits for the world's spy agencies. SIM encryption only protects calls between your phone and the cell tower, which means any would-be surveillers would need to stay within a mile of the target. It's also puzzling because carriers are often happy to hand over all their data with a blanket court order. Why would the GCHQ go to so much trouble for access to data they mostly already have? The spyware would live on the SIM card itself. But in the days the report published, evidence a more frightening line of attack has surfaced. The stolen SIM keys don't just give the NSA the power to listen in on calls, but potentially to plant spyware on any phone at any time..." The Verge

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, March 05, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
March 5, 2015 / le 5 mars 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

As the threat landscape changes, so too must approaches to security

As seen in high profile hacks that exposed more than one million customer details, cybercriminals are finding ways to access networks and private accounts like never before, exposing even the most knowing user to a security breach. Cisco's latest Annual Security Report sheds light on the increasingly intelligent and harder-to-navigate threat landscape, particularly in terms of the nature of threats and the key risk factors. Information Age

Enforcement cut global banking Trojans 53 percent

Coordinated global enforcement efforts reduced the number of financial Trojans by more than half -- 53 percent -- in 2014, according to a new report from Symantec, and phishing email rates fell 74 percent. CSO Online

Huawei, Intel expand tie-up amid China's rising scrutiny of U.S. tech firms

China's Huawei Technologies Co Ltd and Intel Corp are expanding an existing alliance to provide cloud computing to global telecoms carriers, as U.S. tech firms vie for Chinese tie-ups to retain access to a tough mainland market. China's government has been openly pushing for the use of more Chinese and less foreign-made technology, both to grow its own tech sector and as a response to former U.S. National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden's leaks about widespread U.S. cyber surveillance. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Une première base de données Snowden est créée au Canada

La première base de données en ligne de documents classifiés dévoilés par Edward Snowden, ancien consultant de la National Security Agency (NSA) aux États-Unis, a été créée au Canada. L'archive Snowden est un projet conjoint des Journalistes canadiens pour la liberté d'expression (JCLE) et de la faculté d'information de l'Université de Toronto. Pour la première fois, des centaines de documents classifiés ont été indexés pour une recherche exhaustive en ligne. Associated Press (Le Devoir)

The apps Edward Snowden recommends to protect your privacy online

There are a host of free, easy-to-use apps and programs that can help protect your privacy online, and if everybody uses them it can provide a sort of "herd immunity" said Edward Snowden in a live video chat from Russia on Wednesday. Snowden appeared via teleconference in an event hosted by Ryerson University and Canadian Journalists For Expression, to launch the CJFE's online database that compiles all of the publicly released classified documents the former U.S. National Security Agency contractor leaked. In response to a Twitter question, Snowden expanded on what tools he recommends for privacy. CBC News

Microsoft Corp achieves ISO cloud privacy certification

Privacy is top-of-mind for many industries, especially when it comes to the cloud. Since the U.S. government began demanding access to cloud-based data from Microsoft's Irish data centre, customers realized that they may not be safe from privacy violations even if their information is not resident in the U.S. Microsoft and other industry players have been fighting the demands, since they're all placed in the awkward situation of breaking someone's laws no matter what they do. If they capitulate, the EU won't be happy (nor will customers), and if they don't, the U.S. government will be miffed. With lawyers. National Post

Mobile apps plagued by security problems

According to the February 2014 McAfee Labs Threat Report, many apps identified as having Secure Socket Layer (SSL) issues by the Computer Emergency Response Team (CERT) at Carnegie Mellon University last September have still not been fixed, putting users at risk. In an eWeek article, Intel Security's CTO, Raj Samani, talks about why this could be happening. National Post

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca)*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, March 06, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
March 6, 2015 / le 6 mars 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

CRTC to issue first fine under anti-spam law

The CRTC is preparing to mete out a $1.1-million fine against a company it accuses of "flagrantly" flouting Canada's anti-spam legislation. Quebec-based corporate training company Compu-Finder has 30 days to contest the CRTC's ruling. Canadian Press (Toronto Star, S9)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

The top 10 ways Canadians were scammed in 2014

British Columbia's Better Business Bureau has just released its list of the top 10 scams of 2014, and it shows most scams are now happening online, and scam artists are increasingly using social media to net victims. Canadians lost more than $70-million to scams last year, up from $53-million the year before, according to the Canadian Anti-Fraud Centre. But that's likely a conservative estimate, since only about 5 per cent of victims actually report scams. Globe and Mail

UK authorities arrest suspect in US DoD cyber attack

Britain's National Crime Agency says a suspected hacker has been arrested in connection with a cyber attack on the U.S. Department of Defense. The agency said Friday the 23-year-old man arrested in western England is suspected of offenses linked to data stolen from a messaging service used by DoD employees. The Associated Press (Yahoo! News)

National Crime Agency arrests 56 across the UK on suspicion of cyber crime

The National Crime Agency (NCA) has arrested 56 suspected hackers in 25 separate operations this week in a bid to apprehend people believed to be behind denial-of-service attacks, data theft, fraud and virus writing. The NCA also took the unusual step this week of visiting 70 companies to warn them that their servers are vulnerable to attack and could be compromised to either send spam or to act as springboards for attacks on other organisations' IT infrastructure. Computing; Forbes

French spooks' cyber-weapon snooping on Syrians

More details of French cyberespionage capabilities are seeping into the public sphere, following reports of a cyber-weapon operating in Syria that may have been backed by French intelligence. Casper, which follows the Babar virus which disclosed in documents leaked by NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden, is a snooping tool used to track victims in Syria from as early as April last year, making use of a unpatched "zero day" Flash flaw to carry out mischief. Computer Business Review

Playing defense in ranks: Cybersecurity reimagined

News of cyber attacks seems to be almost a weekly occurrence. These headlines are indicative of a much broader trend that promises to fundamentally shift the balance of power in the cyber security landscape. The age of the cyber offensive is here and regularly puts on display the futility of cyber defense. Some of the victims of cyber attacks have been lax in their cyber security practices; however, even organizations considered role models have not been spared. Over the past few years, we have witnessed a surge in the sheer number of cyber attacks, greater occurrences of successful breaches and increases in associated costs to affected organizations as well as individuals. While cyber threats are not a new phenomenon, the scale, frequency and degree of socio-economic impact are much more significant and threaten to continue growing if left unchecked. SC Magazine

Pentagon to increase focus on cyber security of arms programs

Cyber attacks on U.S. weapons programs and manufacturers are a "pervasive" problem that requires greater attention, the top U.S. arms buyer said Thursday, saying that he would add cyber security to new acquisition guidelines for the industry. Reuters

US hospital sues Bank of America for failing to stop loss in $1m cyber attack

A US hospital is suing Bank of America for alleged failings in relation to a cyber attack that led to losses of more than $1m. In 2013, Chelan County Hospital lost about $1m when cyber criminals put unauthorised payments into its payroll system, according to website krebsonsecurity.com. Computer Weekly

DDoS top security fear as businesses weigh reputational damage risk

Distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks are the most worrying type of online attack for businesses and reputational damage and unhappy customers are among the most feared outcomes of such an incident, a new customer survey has revealed. CSO Online

Stuxnet, Snowden and Sony: Why we've passed the cyber security tipping point

Heavy-handed pressures from tech-unaware legislators, successful strikes by laterally-thinking hackers, a growing tide of dissent about government intervention and corporate concerns about last year's massive hack of Sony Pictures corporate documents have pushed us past the security tipping point into an environment where cyber-attacks will increasingly become favoured tools of nation states and terrorist groups, a leading security journalist has warned. Speaking to CSO Australia after a keynote presentation at the CSO Perspectives Roadshow 2015, Kim Zetter – an award-winning security journalist with Wired and author of the recent book Countdown to Zero Day – said that while the Stuxnet industrial-espionage worm had shown some people how serious the cyber-security arms race had become, it was attacks against Sony that had really crystallised the issue in the minds of the world's business leaders. CSO Australia

Did hackers plant the malware on North Korea's news site?

Pyongyang might not be trying to infect your computer after all. A dangerous malware program operating out of North Korea's official news site was initially thought to be the work of the North Korean government. The Hill

Luxury hotel chain breached

Luxury hotel chain Mandarin Oriental Hotel Group has confirmed a data breach that may have affected all of the company's 28 worldwide locations. The Hill

Microsoft Windows vulnerable to 'FREAK' encryption flaw too

Computers running all supported releases of Microsoft Windows are vulnerable to "FREAK," a decade-old encryption flaw that leaves device users vulnerable to having their electronic communications intercepted when visiting any of hundreds of thousands of websites, including Whitehouse.gov, NSA.gov and FBI.gov. CNET

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, March 10, 2015 8:34 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
Attachments: Cyber Security Media Summary - 2015-03-10.docx

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

March 10, 2015 / le 10 mars 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Le Bloc ciblé par des pirates

Un groupe de pirates islamique soutient s'être attaqué au site Internet du Bloc québécois en raison de la récente prise de position du parti contre le port d'un voile lors des cérémonies de citoyenneté. Le piratage a été revendiqué par un groupe appelé United Islamic Cyber Force, selon le message en anglais qui était visible sur la page d'accueil de la formation politique fédérale. Plusieurs sites hébergés par le même serveur informatique que le Bloc québécois ont été victimes de la même cyberattaque, hier matin. Mais le groupe de pirates, qui a précisé être basé en Albanie, assure que c'était bel et bien le parti qu'il avait dans sa mire. Presse canadienne (Le Droit, 17)

Hackers attack reporters

Hackers who attacked a U.S. employee of Ethiopian Satellite Television in 2013 have recently launched a new round of attacks against the broadcaster, an Internet watchdog group said in a report published Monday that links the spyware to the Ethiopian government. Citizen Lab, which is based at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs, says the hackers used upgraded espionage software to send out booby-trapped emails in November and December. The broadcaster's general manager, Neamin Zeleke _ one of those targeted by the malicious messages _ says it didn't take a genius to figure out the same actors were at work. "They didn't even bother to change the email address," he said. Associated Press (Cape Breton Post, A11)

'ISIS' hack hits church website - North Douglas Pentecostal one of many targets in reported hoax

The pastor of North Douglas Pentecostal Church in Saanich says he does not feel threatened after the church's website was hacked by purported supporters of the Islamic State terrorist organization. Rev. Rod Fair said an associate pastor discovered a message reading "Hacked by Islamic State (ISIS) We Are Everywhere" accompanied by an emoticon, Arabic script, music and a banner on top of the website's template. There was also a Facebook address and a flag. The hackers posted their banner over the church website template, so no matter what page visitors tried, the banner was at the top. Times Colonist, A3

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CIA sought to hack Apple iPhones from earliest days: The Intercept

CIA researchers have worked for nearly a decade to break the security protecting Apple phones and tablets, investigative news site The Intercept reported on Tuesday, citing documents obtained from NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden. The report cites top-secret U.S. documents that suggest U.S. government researchers had created a version of XCode, Apple's software application development tool, to create surveillance backdoors into programs distributed on Apple's App Store. It said the latest documents, which covered a period from 2006 to 2013, stop short of proving whether U.S. intelligence researchers had succeeded in breaking Apple's encryption coding, which secures user data and communications. Efforts to break into Apple products by government security researchers started as early as 2006, a year before Apple introduced its first iPhone and continued through the launch of the iPad in 2010 and beyond, The Intercept said. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Most Cyber Attacks Occur From This Common Vulnerability

As you read this, hackers are working diligently to uncover avenues, inroads and byroads to get into your confidential corporate data. I know what you're thinking. You've heard this all before, your company isn't vulnerable and you already took care of it. Are you sure? Time for a reality check. Even if you figured out how to plug holes in your networks, the hackers may be gaining access through applications and solutions. Sure, many organizations have significant network security in place but it's not enough as 84% of all cyber-attacks are happening on the application layer. This final security frontier, the application layer, was a hot topic during a recent SAP Radio broadcast where three security experts weighed in on the threat of cyber-attacks and offered ideas on how to prevent them. Forbes

IBM investit 4 milliards de dollars supplémentaires dans ses métiers d'avenir

Afin d'accélérer sa transformation, le géant informatique américain IBM a décidé d'accroître ses investissements de 4 milliards de dollars en 2015 dans le social, la mobilité, l'analytique, le cloud et la sécurité. L'objectif est de booster de 55 % ses revenus dans ces domaines d'avenir d'ici 2018. IBM met le cap sur les métiers d'avenir du numérique. Et pour accélérer sa marche, le géant américain de l'informatique a décidé de revoir l'allocation des investissements de façon à consacrer 4 milliards de dollars supplémentaires aux SMACS (Social, Mobility, Analytics, Cloud computing, Security), les secteurs porteurs de demain que sont les réseaux sociaux, les mobiles, l'analytique et le Big Data, le cloud computing et la cybersécurité. En 2014, IBM affiche dans ces domaines un revenu de 27 milliards de dollars, en progression de 16 %, alors que son chiffre d'affaires total a baissé de 6 % à 92,7 milliards de dollars. L'ambition est de faire passer les revenus tirés des SMACS à 40 milliards de dollars en 2018. Une migration qui devrait s'accompagner par une montée du logiciel, puisqu'il représente 50 % des revenus dans ces métiers d'avenir, deux fois plus que pour l'ensemble des activités du groupe. Ce qui serait bénéfique sur les résultats financiers, car le logiciel offre de bien meilleures marges que le matériel ou les services. L'usine digitale

Malwares dans les smartphones Xiaomi Mi 4 ? Méfiez-vous des contrefaçons

Accusé la semaine dernière par l'expert en sécurité Bluebox de mettre à mal la sécurité des utilisateurs de son smartphone Mi4, le constructeur chinois Xiaomi a clarifié la situation : non, ses terminaux ne cachent pas de malwares. Les modèles testés étaient des contrefaçons ! Parfois, les smartphones contrefaits sont tellement crédibles que même les experts en sécurité s'y laissent prendre : l'entreprise Bluebox, spécialisée dans la sécurité des données mobiles, en a fait les frais ces jours-ci. Bluebox a publié la semaine dernière un rapport dans lequel elle accusait Xiaomi de vendre des terminaux Mi4 embarquant des malwares, cachés dans des applications prenant l'apparence de services Google. Au programme, des adwares visant à contrôler les publicités affichées sur les smartphones, et des chevaux de Troie permettant à des pirates d'avoir la main sur certaines fonctions des téléphones. Rien de bien réjouissant pour les utilisateurs du Mi4, ni pour Xiaomi qui a rapidement annoncé le lancement d'une enquête, soupçonnant au passage Bluebox d'avoir fait ses tests sur une contrefaçon. Clubic.com

BACK OFF, spooks: UK legal hacking code should be 'resisted at all costs' says lawyer

A proposed "electronic interference" code for spooks will sanction pervasive hacking powers without judicial or parliamentary scrutiny, experts and campaigners have warned. The government slipped out its consultation documents on "equipment interference" and "interception of communications" last month – on the same day the Investigatory Powers Tribunal ruled that GCHQ's snooping programmes had been illegal prior to December 2014. It intends to provide a legal framework for how intelligence services tamper with equipment. Caroline Wilson Palow, legal officer at campaign group Privacy International, said the code is the first time the UK intelligence services have admitted they engage in hacking. Responding to the consultation she said: "The draft code grants the intelligence services incredible powers to hack into people's phones, computers, and communications infrastructure," she said. UK Register

Russia adopts quantum computing to counter foreign spyware and sabotaged cyber-imports

Russian government agencies have detected foreign-controlled spyware networks in the country, and a host of compromised devices, leading to moves to adopt quantum computing solutions. The Russian Federal Security Service and the Ministry of Internal Affairs are reported to have jointly detected and closed down three major foreign agent networks operating in the country using spyware systems run from abroad. Although the full details of the investigation have not been disclosed, the attacks are reported to have focused on the websites of large Russian corporations and state agencies as well as stealing of personal data. Russian law-enforcement agencies are currently continuing their investigation to identify those responsible for the attacks. An official spokesperson of the Federal Security Service told SCMagazineUK.com that as a result of several months monitoring and investigation, the Russian security service was able to close down the operation and prevent further activity by the networks. This was claimed to have helped prevent exfiltration of some two million pages of private information. SC Magazine

Beware! WhatsApp calling feature a scam, contains malware

If you get a notification from your friends asking you to use WhatsApp to make a phone call do not click on the link. Users across the world are being targeted by scammers who are sending fake messages asking users to try out the new call feature in WhatsApp. If users click on that link they are directed to another website where the users are asked to fill in a survey. Upon filling this survey, the users are then asked to download a certain application which is said to be a dangerous malware that may affect your phone. WhatsApp on the other hand has not yet confirmed their calling feature. However there are a few users who claim that they have used the calling feature in the messaging application. OneIndia

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca)

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, March 17, 2015 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
March 17, 2015 / le 17 mars 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Cyber attack at NRC kept from other departments

Federal cybersecurity officials kept a tight lid on who was aware of a serious cyber attack at the National Research Council last year, a move one security officer suggested may have robbed other departments of a fighting chance to protect their systems as well. Internal government emails show that officials were aware of the hack at least a week before they went public with the news. Ottawa Citizen, A7 (National Post)

RBC, Rogers named in NSA papers

The U.S. National Security Agency has been trying to map the communications traffic of corporations around the world, and a classified document reveals that at least two of Canada's largest companies are included. A 2012 presentation by a U.S. intelligence analyst, a copy of which was obtained by The Globe and Mail, includes a list of corporate networks that names Royal Bank of Canada and Rogers Communications Inc. The presentation, titled "Private Networks: Analysis, Contextualization and Setting the Vision," is among the NSA documents taken by former contractor Edward Snowden. It was obtained by The Globe from a confidential source. Globe and Mail, A1

Les Américains changent leurs habitudes

De plus en plus d'Américains sont attentifs à la protection de leurs données personnelles et communications sur internet depuis les révélations sur les programmes de surveillance américains, indique une étude du Pew Research Center publiée hier. AFP (Le Journal de Montréal, 57)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Séoul accuse le Nord d'une cyberattaque

Le parquet sud-coréen a imputé aujourd'hui à la Corée du Nord la responsabilité d'une cyberattaque qui a visé en décembre l'opérateur de centrales nucléaires Korea Hydro and Nuclear Power (KHNP), à l'issue d'une enquête sur les adresses internet utilisées par les hackers. Le Figaro ; Reuters

Spooks tell business: Consider stripping staff of smart phones to avoid cyber attacks

Britain's spies have told businesses to consider stripping employees of company smart phones and memory sticks to protect themselves from cyber-attacks, The Telegraph can disclose. Advice issued by GCHQ, the government's listening post, and other departments warns firms that staff are the "weakest link in the security chain" and protective action must be taken. Companies have been told staff should only use trusted Wi-Fi networks – effectively ruling out using laptops in coffee shops like Starbucks without special protections – and constantly update internet browsers. The Telegraph

Cyber Hack Confirmed As Costing $15 Million As Sony Reports Increased Results

Sony has belatedly announced consolidated results for the third quarter of its 2014-15 financial year. It also revealed operating profits at Sony Pictures Entertainment higher than previously reported. The company confirmed that costs to repair and investigate the November cyber attack on SPE amounted to $15 million in the current quarter, but said in its latest forecast that the impact of the attack on its consolidated results for the full financial year ending on March 31, 2015, "will not be material." Variety

Cybercriminals boost sales through 'data laundering'

New and subtle business models are emerging for cybercriminals, boosting their sales of stolen data and offering new ways to inflict damage on target organisations. Hackers are commercialising stolen data by selling it back to legitimate businesses, one security expert has warned. There is a term for this: "Data laundering", which has been defined as "obscuring, removing, or fabricating the provenance of illegally obtained data such that it may be used for lawful purposes". Much like money laundering, data laundering helps to both monetise and legitimise the proceeds of crime.

ZDNet

Cyberattacks caused the leak of one billion records in 2014

In 2014, approximately one billion records of personally identifiable information (PII) were leaked online, according to IBM X-Force. IBM researchers say cyberattackers are more often applying creative ways and new approaches to fundamental attacks including DDoS and the use of malware in order to steal valuable information, ranging from sensitive data which can be used in identity theft to financial account details. As a result of the evolving threat landscape, 2013 saw a surge in leaked records, with approximately 800,000 stolen. However, there was a rise of 25 percent in leaked records, reaching a staggering one billion. ZDNet

Biggest hacking threat to business? Wearables

The rising popularity of wearable devices—and workers bringing them into the office—could pose a major security threat to businesses this year, cybersecurity experts have warned. A number of companies, including Apple to LG, have launched smartwatches this year. It comes as wearable shipments are set to explode in 2015, hitting 75 million, up 158 percent from 2014, according to research from CCS Insight. As users increasingly don the latest gadgets to track fitness or answer calls, they will inevitably bring them into the office, opening a new hacking front for attackers. CNBC

Scottish government 'super database' - the privacy, security and legal fears

The Scottish National Party's (SNP) plans to create a "super database" that would capture and store data about Scottish citizens' health, and share it with other government bodies, has been criticised by privacy campaigners who believe the system could be a ploy to sneak in a national ID scheme through the back door. Computing.co.uk

Not all data breaches are created equal – do you know the difference?

It was one of those typical, cold February winter days in Indianapolis earlier this year. Kids woke up hoping for a snow day and old men groaned as they scraped ice off their windshields and shoveled the driveway. Those were the lucky ones, because around that same time, executives at Anthem were pulling another all-nighter, trying to wrap their heads around their latest data breach of 37.5 million records and figuring out what to do next. And, what do they do next? This was bad – very bad – and one wonders if one or more of the frenzied executives thought to him of herself, or even aloud, "At least we're not Sony." Why is that? 37.5 million records sure is a lot. A large-scale data breach can be devastating to a company. Expenses associated with incident response, forensics, loss of productivity, credit reporting, and customer defection add up swiftly on top of intangible costs, such as reputation harm and loss of shareholder confidence. However, not every data breach is the same and much of this has to do with the type of data that is stolen. CSO Online

Tired of forgetting your password? Yahoo says you don't need one any more

Passwords: easily forgotten, but also easily guessed. It's a bitter irony that minutes can be spent racking brains trying to remember whether a required security question answer is a pet's name, first school or place of birth – meanwhile a cyber-criminal is merrily typing in a person's favourite colour and relieving bank accounts of hard-earned wages. Guardian UK

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, March 19, 2015 7:53 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique March 19, 2015 / le 19 mars 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

CAPE BRETON HIT HARD

Nova Scotia is once again a winter wonderland. Although spring officially starts Friday, the province is buried under deep snow. By late afternoon Wednesday, many areas had been blanketed with 30 to 60 centimetres of snow, with a little less having fallen in the South Shore region, where 10 to 25 centimetres of the white stuff fell, said Environment Canada meteorologist Jean-Marc Couturier. "There are unconfirmed reports that 75 centimetres fell in one area in Halifax," Couturier said. This followed a storm that hit the region Sunday, dumping up to 40 centimetres of snow in many areas. Chronicle-Herald, A1; Chronicle-Herald; Chronicle-Herald; Telegraph-Journal; Cape Breton Post; Canadian Press (The Guardian)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Rogers victimized by ransomware

A misstep by an IT employee of Canadian communications conglomerate Rogers Communications allowed the contractual information of 50-70 of the company's business customers to be exposed via Twitter. On March 1, someone using the Twitter name @TeamHans posted a link to a zip file containing dozens of contracts for telecommunications services and personal email correspondence. The company admitted that a hacker had gained access to the email account of an enterprise sales employee through a phishing ploy aimed at someone on the company's support desk. SC Magazine

New BIOS Implant, Vulnerability Discovery Tool to Debut at CanSecWest

When the National Security Agency's ANT division catalog of surveillance tools was disclosed among the myriad of Snowden revelations, its desire to implant malware into the BIOS of targeted machines was unquestionable. While there's little evidence of BIOS bootkits in the wild, the ANT catalog and the recent disclosure of the Equation Group's cyberespionage platform, in particular module NLS_933W.DLL that reprograms firmware from most major vendors, leave little doubt that attacks against hardware are leaving the realm of academics and white hats. Threat Post

Google Project Zero exploit 'rowhammer' hardware bug

Google Project Zero vulnerability researchers have discovered a way to exploit what it they call a "rowhammer" hardware bug found in many dynamic random-access memory (DRAM) devices. In some modern DRAM devices, "repeatedly accessing a row of memory can cause bit flips in adjacent rows," according to a blog post penned by Mark Seaborn, sandbox builder and breaker and Thomas Dullien, reverse engineer. SC Magazine

Mysterious 'high priority' OpenSSL security fix incoming

The OpenSSL Project has announced plans to release a massive update that will include a "high priority" security fix. The project announced the update in a public statement, promising it will fix numerous "defects" in OpenSSL. "The OpenSSL project team would like to announce the forthcoming release of OpenSSL versions 1.0.2a, 1.0.1m, 1.0.0r and 0.9.8zf," read the statement. "These releases will be made available on 19 March. They will fix a number of security defects. The highest severity defect fixed by these releases is classified as 'high' severity." The exact nature of the high priority bug remains unknown, though the update follows the discovery of several critical vulnerabilities in OpenSSL, including the notorious Heartbleed which came to light a year ago. V3

Target agrees to pay $10 million to settle lawsuit from data breach

Target Corp has agreed to pay $10 million in a proposed settlement of a class-action lawsuit related to a huge 2013 data breach that consumers say compromised their personal financial information, court documents show. Under the proposal, which requires federal court approval, Target will deposit the settlement amount into an interest bearing escrow account, to pay individual victims up to $10,000 in damages. The claims will be submitted and processed primarily online through a dedicated website, according to the court documents. Reuters

CIO Journal: Microsoft Tackles Some Security Issues

Microsoft Corp. has made changes to its Windows software to address security challenges inherent in prior versions. Although still in the early stages of adoption, Windows 8 and the coming Windows 10 include technology that could help chief information officers shield the operating system from malicious code. Wall Street Journal

Dark Web's 'Evolution' black market vanishes off the map

The 'Evolution' marketplace, an illicit trading ground accessed through the Tor network, has vanished without warning. As reported by security expert Brian Krebs on Wednesday, Evolution took the place of Silk Road, a separate online black market also accessible only through Dark Web conduits and the Tor network. Silk Road, which sold illegal wares from marijuana to fake passports and drugs, was originally shut down in 2013. However, the marketplace resurfaced in 2014, only to once again be closed down late last year by police. ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, March 24, 2015 8:46 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
March 24, 2015 / le 24 mars 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Terror groups target soldiers on social media

A secret military intelligence report has warned of an "emerging trend" in which terrorist groups use social media to harass the family and friends of Canadian military personnel. The Department of National Defence is refusing to say how prevalent the problem is. However, the report emerges amid growing concerns about the safety of military personnel in Canada and other western countries at a time when personal information is readily accessible online. Just this weekend, for example, Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, sparked anger and horror after publishing the names, addresses and photographs of 100 American military members over the weekend, urging supporters to kill them. Islamic State has claimed the information used to make the hit list was stolen from U.S. government computers, but some analysts say the data was already publicly available online and probably culled and compiled by the militant group's propagandists. The Canadian military intelligence assessment, written in January and obtained by the Citizen using the Access to Information law, says the "primary aim of terrorism is the achievement of psychological effects on a target audience." Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, A1; Ottawa Citizen, A1; Calgary Herald, B1; National Post, The Province, Edmonton Journal, Leader-Post, The Gazette, Windsor Star, Star Phoenix)

Wiseman says relax on security breach

Finance Minister Ross Wiseman said everybody will be able to relax when they see a report into how the government handled a reported security breach into its data. In the House of Assembly, Liberal MHA Paul Lane raised the issue of a report in The Weekend Telegram. A former government security analyst told The Telegram about a security breach discovered in June 2013, connected to "botnet" servers in Eastern Europe and New Zealand. The Telegram, A2

Online Media / Médias en ligne

A Higher Law

It is not wisdom, but authority, that makes a law, the saying goes. Perhaps that's why international cybersecurity laws are so lacking, says Danny Bradbury. December 2014 was a big month for cybersecurity in Canada. The country passed legislation allowing it to ratify an international treaty on cybercrime a mere 13 years after it was first unveiled. Infosecurity-Magazine

Faillie mal patchée par Adobe : sérieux problème sur les vidéos Flash

Une vulnérabilité patchée par Adobe en 2011 sur la brique Flex continue de poser un sérieux problème de sécurité, affirme une équipe de chercheurs en sécurité. Les vidéos Flash compilées avec l'outil touché peuvent être utilisées pour compromettre des navigateurs Web. ZDNet France

DDoS-ers Switch to Short, Sharp Low Volume Attacks – Report

Organizations need to be prepared for a new generation of DDoS attacks which are shorter in duration and smaller in size but more carefully crafted to distract security teams and profile networks for follow-up attacks. These are the findings from Corero Network Security's inaugural Quarterly DDoS Trends and Analysis Report. Infosecurity-Magazine

Study: One-third of top websites vulnerable or hacked

According to a new report from Menlo Security, one out of three of the top million websites are either vulnerable to hacking or already hacked. For example, attackers used the Forbes.com website last month for a quick watering hole attack. According to Dallas-based research firm iSIGHT Partners, Inc., the attack only lasted a couple of days in late 2014, used a zero-day Adobe Flash vulnerability, and was linked to a Chinese cyber espionage group. CSO

Researchers map Drupal attack that bypasses poorly tuned Web Application Firewalls

Late last year, CSO Online reported on a vulnerability in Drupal that could have left thousands of websites compromised. Last week, researchers examined the attack in more detail, measuring the time it would take to compromise a website completely. CSO

Google catches bad digital certificates from Egyptian company

Google said Monday an Egyptian company issued digital certificates that could have been used to intercept data traffic to its services, which did not appear to have been abused. CSO; Computer Weekly

The data breach quiz: What have we learned?

Data breaches from Target to Sony to Anthem have been getting a lot of attention as millions of personal records are violated, and there's lessons to be learned about data security from all these events. Here's a short quiz about some of these and cyber security in general that will gauge how well you are prepared to deal with these threats. Keep score as you go and find out how well you did at the end. CSO

Taylor Swift Buys Adult Domain Names to Thwart Fraudsters

US songstress Taylor Swift has been defensively registering new adult-themed generic Top Level Domains (gTLDs) in a bid to head off phishers, cybersquatters and the like. The 25-year-old American singer-songwriter, or more likely her management team, made the proactive move of buying up TaylorSwift.porn and TaylorSwift.adult – two of the new gTLDs which go on public sale on 1 June, according to the BBC. Infosecurity-Magazine

The undercover war on your internet secrets: How online surveillance cracked our trust in the web

A black shrouded figure appears on the screen, looming over the rapt audience, talking about surveillance. But this is no Big Brother figure seeking obedience though, rather its opposite - perhaps even its nemesis. NSA contractor-turned-whistleblower Edward Snowden is explaining how his former employer and other intelligence agencies have worked to undermine privacy on the internet, and beyond. TechRepublic (Yahoo! News)

Apple quietly pulls anti-virus apps from App Store in negativity crackdown

Apple has pulled an unknown number of mobile security apps from the iOS App Store as part of a new policy that takes exception to the 'anti-virus' and anti-malware' software categories, Mac security firm Intego has revealed. TechWorld

Legislators set to introduce student privacy bill

In January, President Obama urged lawmakers to put forth legislation that would further protect student data – a call two congressmen have now answered through bipartisan effort. SC Magazine

Twitch is recommending users also change their passwords on other sites

Account information for users of Twitch, the popular live-streaming service for gamers, may have been accessed through unauthorized means, the service warned on Monday. PC Advisor

Case that could overturn EU-US data exchange deal to be heard by top EU court

U.S. companies' ability to process personal information from European Union citizens will be challenged in the European Union's highest court on Tuesday. PC Advisor

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, April 09, 2015 9:01 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique April 9, 2015 / le 9 avril 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Ex-Saanich staffer alerted Atwell about spyware

A computer specialist who once worked for the District of Saanich has confirmed that he alerted incoming Mayor Richard Atwell about spyware installed on municipal hall computers, saying he had an ethical responsibility to do so. Times Colonist, S2

Hackers taking an 'old school' approach to computer break-ins

Some of the most familiar tricks from the hacker playbook are taking on another life, according to a new report that suggests junk emails have once again become a security threat. Websense, a U.S.-based firm which monitors data theft in the business community, says malicious software practices from the 1990s are experiencing a resurgence in popularity with criminals. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, A6, C4; Times Colonist, B11)

Youth Hackathon planned

What is a Hackathon? "A marathon-like event of intensely focused collaboration and coding to create a solution to a problem or produce something useful." Kids these days spend countless hours web surfing, social networking, and gaming, and programming has helped them develop sophisticated technology skills and become extremely tech-savvy. Chronicle Herald, N11

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Une centaine de policiers réunis à Nicolet pour parler de cybercriminalité et de radicalisation

Si votre téléviseur fonctionne par reconnaissance vocale, que vos portes se déverrouillent à distance grâce à votre téléphone cellulaire ou même que votre balance transmet votre poids à votre ordinateur grâce au wi-fi, prenez garde. Dans notre monde branché, tout ce qui est connecté à Internet peut être détourné à des fins de cybercriminalité. C'est le message que l'expert en sécurité Benoit Gagnon a livré aux policiers réunis au 4e colloque FRANCOPOL sur la cybercriminalité, Escroquerie sur Internet et radicalisation, à l'École nationale de police du Québec à Nicolet, mercredi. Plus de 120 professionnels issus d'organisations policières, de ministères, d'organismes gouvernementaux et d'institutions financières ont pris part à l'événement organisé conjointement par la Sûreté du Québec, l'École nationale de police du Québec, la Gendarmerie royale du Canada, le Service de police de la Ville de Montréal et le Service de police de la Ville de Québec. Radio-Canada

Piratage de TV5 Monde : réactions politiques et précisions sur l'attaque

Mercredi soir, le réseau TV5 Monde a fait l'objet d'une attaque informatique décrite comme « d'une puissance inouïe » par son directeur général, Yves Bigot. Si la chaîne a pu reprendre le contrôle de ses comptes Twitter et Facebook, son site Internet et son informatique interne restent encore très affectés. ZDNet France; Associated Press (Globe and Mail, Truro Daily, Western Star, Daily Herald); BBC News; Guardian UK; CNN; Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Russian's lawyers: US hacking charges should be dismissed

Lawyers for a Russian man accused of hacking into U.S. restaurants and stealing credit card numbers have asked a federal judge to dismiss the indictment against him, arguing that the U.S. Secret Service overstepped its authority when agents took him into custody in the Maldives. Associated Press (Yahoo! News)

Un policier dénonce Google et Microsoft

Un policier de la Côte d'Ivoire dénonce Google et Microsoft en matière de cybercriminalité. Ces grandes sociétés détiendraient des preuves importantes qui seraient pertinentes aux policiers. Agence QMI (Le Journal de Montréal)

Un vaste recours collectif contre Facebook

Un groupe de 25.000 usagers accusant Facebook d'utiliser illégalement leurs données personnelles a déposé aujourd'hui un recours collectif contre le réseau social au tribunal civil de Vienne, qui doit maintenant dire si leur action est recevable. Le Figaro

Data protection concerns 72% of Britons in post-Snowden world, research shows

New research has found that 72% of British adults are concerned about their private information online, worried about hackers and unauthorised access to their data. The research, conducted by YouGov, surveyed more than 2,000 British adults and found that 32% of respondents would be willing to pay to protect their information online. In a significant change in consumer behaviour, 29% felt it was their own responsibility to protect their data. Guardian UK

Asian giant Singtel swoops on Trustwave for managed security services

Asian telecoms giant Singapore Telecommunications Limited (Singtel) has swooped on privately-held US security firm Trustwave in a deal reported to be worth $810 million (£540 million). TechWorld

Attackers Blend New With Old to Foil Corporate Defenses

Some 81% of all emails scanned by Websense last year were unwanted or malicious, a 25% increase on 2013, according to the vendor's latest annual Threat Report. The report highlights eight key trends set to keep corporate IT security leaders busy over the next year. Infosecurity Magazine

Internet of Things Day: Time to Consider IoT Threats, Say Experts

Today marks the fifth annual Internet of Things Day, but security experts have been using the occasion to warn organizations not to allow the IoT to become the 'Internet of Threats'. Internet of Things Day is comprised of events all around the world – from Singapore to Sweden and Bangalore to Barcelona – with a mission to promote, educate and share all things IoT. Infosecurity Magazine

UK Cyber Insurance Demand Rockets After Breaches

Cybersecurity insurance finally appears to be coming of age in the UK after Lloyd's of London reported a 50% year-on-year increase in submissions during the first quarter. The news from Lloyd's, one of the world's largest insurance marketplaces, will provide a hefty PR boost for a fast-growing industry which appears to be expanding on the back of a series of high profile data breach incidents last year. Infosecurity Magazine

Tokenization would not have prevented most retail breaches

Tokenization, where credit card numbers and other sensitive data is replaced by random characters, can be a secure alternative to encryption in many cases -- but would not have helped in the majority of retail breaches over the past two years. CSO

In a mock cyberattack, Deloitte teaches the whole business how to respond

A security breach or big data loss can trigger an emergency for the entire business, not just for the IT or security teams, so staffers from multiple departments must know how to react quickly and effectively in such situations. CSO

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, May 13, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique May 13, 2015 / le 13 mai 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Chinese cyberweapon can overwhelm websites

China has developed an offensive cyberweapon that can redirect Internet traffic to attack targeted websites, say researchers from Citizen Lab, a cybersecurity think-tank housed at the Munk School of Global Affairs in the University of Toronto. In a recent report, researchers show that this tool - which they have dubbed China's "Great Cannon" - intercepts foreign web traffic, injects it with malicious code, then uses it to serve Chinese interests by directing it to overwhelm chosen websites. National Post, A9

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Pentagon hunts for ISIS on the secret Internet

After months of bombing by the U.S. and coalition forces, ISIS remains undefeated on the ground and has now entered a new phase, using the cyber-world as a weapon. For evidence of the evolution, one need look no further than the recent ISIS inspired attack in Garland, Texas, which was carried out after gunman Elton Simpson publicly posted a tweet on the Internet, using the hashtag #TexasAttack. It's a trend that has captured the attention of law enforcement and now the military. It's forcing the Pentagon to confront a secret Internet most of us never see, in a place most of us have never seen. It's called the Deep or Dark Web. The U.S. believes ISIS -- and other potential terrorists -- are now using the most covert part of the online world to recruit fighters, share intelligence and potentially plan real world attacks. CNN

Kaspersky opens cyber research centre in London

Security firm Kaspersky has opened a new cyberattack research centre in London. The company said the opening of its first research facility in western Europe would help it track web attacks around the clock. The centre will be based at Kaspersky's recently-opened offices in Paddington, London, with three members of its global research team joined by a small group of anti-malware experts. Kaspersky explained the new London hub would allow it to detect and protect against emerging malware threats more rapidly. Wired.co.uk

Malware-infected home routers used to launch DDoS attacks

Tens of thousands of home routers have been infected with malware and are being used by hackers to launch distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks. The router-based botnet was discovered by Web security firm Incapsula while investigating a series of DDoS attacks against dozens of its customers that have been going on since late December. Incapsula's researchers traced the malicious traffic back to routers made by Ubiquiti Networks and distributed by ISPs around the world to their customers. The devices had DDoS malware programs installed on them -- usually more than one, the researchers said in a report published Tuesday. Computerworld

Romania turns hacking crisis into advantage, helping Ukraine

Ukraine is turning to an unlikely partner in its struggle to defend itself against Russian cyber warfare: Romania. The eastern European country known more for economic disarray than technological prowess has become one of the leading nations in Europe in the fight against hacking. The reason: the country's own battle against Internet renegades and a legacy of computing excellence stemming from Communist dictator Nicolae Ceausescu's regime. The Associated Press (Yahoo! News)

GCHQ puts out open recruitment call for 'white hat' hackers

GCHQ is openly recruiting computer network operations specialists for the first time. The signals intelligence agency is looking to hire an unspecified number of staff to work in both cyber-security and cyber-intelligence roles. The Register

Police forces skill-up to fight cyber crime

UK police forces are taking action to improve officers' cyber crime-fighting skills, a freedom of information (FoI) request has revealed. According to figures obtained by web security firm Veracode, more than 3,800 police officers have enrolled in training designed to make them better at investigating cyber crimes. Computing.co.uk

FireEye, PFU Systems reveal new enterprise threat defense system

FireEye and PFU Systems have introduced a new enterprise-level security system to combat malware and prevent the spread of infection. Revealed on Tuesday, the new enterprise cybersecurity system combines Fujitsu-owned PFU Systems' iNetSec Smart Finder technology with the FireEye NX Series security platform. ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, May 21, 2015 7:54 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
May 21, 2015 / le 21 mai 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Spy agencies target mobile phones, app stores to implant spyware

Canada and its spying partners exploited weaknesses in one of the world's most popular mobile browsers and planned to hack into smartphones via links to Google and Samsung app stores, a top secret document obtained by CBC News shows. Electronic intelligence agencies began targeting UC Browser — a massively popular app in China and India with growing use in North America — in late 2011 after discovering it leaked revealing details about its half-billion users. Their goal, in tapping into UC Browser and also looking for larger app store vulnerabilities, was to collect data on suspected terrorists and other intelligence targets — and, in some cases, implant spyware on targeted smartphones. The 2012 document shows that the surveillance agencies exploited the weaknesses in certain mobile apps in pursuit of their national security interests, but it appears they didn't alert the companies or the public to these weaknesses. That potentially put millions of users in danger of their data being accessed by other governments' agencies, hackers or criminals. CBC News analyzed the top secret document in collaboration with U.S. news site The Intercept, a website that is devoted in part to reporting on the classified documents leaked by U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden. The so-called Five Eyes intelligence alliance — the spy group comprising Canada, the U.S., Britain, Australia and New Zealand — specifically sought ways to find and hijack data links to servers used by Google and Samsung's mobile app stores, according to the document obtained by Snowden. Over the course of several workshops held in Canada and Australia in late 2011 and early 2012, a joint Five Eyes tradecraft team tried to find ways to implant spyware on smartphones by intercepting the transmissions sent when downloading or updating apps. CBC.ca; The Intercept; Techworm

Hackers grab 1.1 million CareFirst members' data in "sophisticated" cyberattack

Data on about 1.1 million current and former subscribers of health insurance company CareFirst has been stolen by hackers, the company has confirmed. In a statement, the non-profit said it was the target of a "sophisticated" cyberattack, in which a single database of members' names, birth dates, email addresses, and other subscriber data was stolen. Credit card, social security, and medical data were not taken in the breach. Passwords, which were stored in an unaffected separate system, were not taken. But in the case of CareFirst's breach, it took almost a year for the breach to be found. ZDNet; Help Net Security; USA Today; Reuters; CBS News

Ransomware rescue kit released to combat criminal enterprise

A ransomware removal and rescue kit has been released to give businesses an alternative to paying a fee to unlock encrypted files. In order to combat this kind of criminal enterprise, security professional Jada Cyrus has compiled a rescue kit which is available for free online. Designed to help "streamline the process of responding to ransomware infections," the ransomware response kit comes with instructions and decryption tools for different strains of ransomware. ZDNet

DDoS attacks increase and methods changed in Q1 2015, report says

DDoS attacks are still on the rise but attackers are changing their methods for executing the cyber assaults, according to Akamai's Q1 2015 State of the Internet Report. The findings show that criminals are using lower bandwidth attacks that occur more frequently and last longer in an attempt to evade detection. The report noted that recent trends also include "the common use of multi-vector campaigns, the availability of booter services and low-cost DDoS campaigns that can take down a typical business or organization." SC Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, May 22, 2015 7:58 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
May 22, 2015 / le 22 mai 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Canada in spy group looking to leverage mobile vulnerabilities: Report

What do we expect from Canadian spy and policy agencies empowered to intercept suspicious mobile communications — warn the public of a vulnerability discovered, or quietly exploit it? That's a question raised by a CBC report today from documents purloined by former U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden. They show that Canada and the other countries in the Five Eyes spying partnership — the U.S., Britain, Australia and New Zealand — began targeting UC Browser in late 2011 after discovering it leaked revealing details about its half-billion users as part of a strategy to find ways to implant spyware on smartphones. Among the targets were servers used by Google and Samsung mobile app stores, ideal places to introduce spyware. What the agencies didn't do, says the CBC report, was warn the public, Google, Samsung, or UC Browser's maker of any vulnerabilities they found. "That potentially put millions of users in danger of their data being accessed by other governments' agencies, hackers or criminals," said the CBC. The report raises a lot of other questions, including how worried CISOs should be about the apps on the wide number of mobile devices allowed to connect to their networks. At the very least it shows data loss prevention software has to be part of every organization's arsenal. IT World Canada; CBR Online; International Business Times; Tech Times; Ars Technica; Information Week

Malware upsurge threatens millions of POS devices

Notable brands like Target, Neiman Marcus, PF Chang's, Staples, Michaels Stores, and Home Depot have all have become victims of point of sale (POS) security breaches targeting consumer payment card data. In the majority of cases, POS attacks take place due to malware infections. During the past few years there has been a considerable rise in malware families including POSCardStealer, Dexter, Alina, vSkimmer, ProjectHook, BlackPOS and others, many of which can be easily purchased online. According to the 2014 Verizon Data Breach Investigations Report (DBIR), 198 total incidents related to POS intrusions were reported. ABI Research expects the total number of POS related security incidents with confirmed data exposure will hit 600 by the end of 2015. Help Net Security

mSpy finally admits they've been hacked

After having first denied that they suffered a breach and had their customer's data stolen and leaked on the Dark Web, mobile spyware maker mSpy has finally admitted that the incident happened, but they claim that only 80,000 customers (and not 400,000) have been affected. Brian Krebs, who was pointed towards the leaked data last week by the hackers themselves, analyzed it and tracked down some of the affected mSpy customers, who confirmed that they used the company's solution to monitor their employees, children and "friends." After that, continuing to claim that there was no hack was pointless. The company claims that the hackers tried to blakmail them first, but that they didn't pay up. Obviously, the hackers then chose to leak the information. Help Net Security

Windows Live ID scam targets personal information

Kaspersky Lab experts are warning of a new scam that uses Windows Live ID as bait to catch personal information stored in user profiles on services like Xbox LIVE, Zune, Hotmail, Outlook, MSN, Messenger and OneDrive. What appears to be a typical phishing email is actually an email that goes to the Windows Live website, with no apparent attempt to get the victims' logins and passwords. So what's the trick? After following the link and authorizing the account, users received a prompt: an application requested permission to automatically log into the account, view the profile information and contact list, and access a list of the users' email addresses. Scammers gained access to this technique through security flaws in the open protocol for authorization, OAuth. Users who click "Yes" don't give away their login and password credentials, but they do provide their personal information, the email addresses of their contacts and the nicknames and real names of their friends. Help Net Security

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca)

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, May 25, 2015 8:55 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
May 25, 2015 / le 25 mai 2015

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Digital blackmail

Typically, people complain about lawyers holding them to ransom, but sometimes, it's the other way around. In January, the Law Society of British Columbia reported that three law firms in the province had been attacked by a unique form of computer malware. Online thieves from halfway around the world had locked up the files on lawyers' computers, rendering them inaccessible - and the lawyers were charged a hefty fee to get them back. Crooks carry out this kind of attack using a category of malicious software called Ransomware. It is a growing threat, and in just a few months, the number of attacks on high-value B.C. businesses have grown. "The Law Society is aware of at least seven instances where law firms were targeted by ransomware," David Jordan, spokesman for the society, said this month. The society would not reveal the names of the firms involved. Ransomware infects computers much like any other virus. Victims "catch" it by visiting malicious websites, which they may be fooled into visiting by a spam email. In one case, emails contained phoney FedEx and UPS tracking notices with links that take victims to a site that immediately infects their machines. Instead of simply stealing passwords or using an infected computer to send spam as many other viruses do, ransomware is particularly devious. It will systematically scramble the files on the victim's computer, locking them with a digital key to which only the criminal has access. National Post, FP6

Online Media / Médias en ligne

'Plane Talk' with Canada's top soldier, on the biggest threat to Canada

He has served as the commander of the Canadian Forces for nearly three years now and is expected to take his final salute later this summer. But before Gen. Tom Lawson says goodbye to the troops, the Royal Canadian Air Force general agreed to take a seat next to Tom Clark to chat about his future and his heroes. The full transcript of Lawson's flight is pasted below, but here are some highlights: Biggest threat to Canada: Probably natural disasters such as fires, floods and hurricanes. In terms of man-made threats, the biggest danger might be "some sort of cyber threat to our systems, our energy systems, our computer systems, things that we bank on that would change our way of life very, very quickly." Global News

"Secret Questions" pose security risk according to Google

New research conducted by Google suggests that the "security questions" utilised by web services are neither secure nor reliable enough to work as an account recovery mechanism. "What was your first teacher's name?", "what street did you grow up on?" and "what is your favourite food?" are all examples of questions commonly asked by online services in attempt to verify a user's identity when they forgot their password. Despite their prevalence, Google Anti-Abuse Research Lead Elle Bursztein says security questions suffer from a fundamental flaw. "Their answers are either somewhat secure or easy to remember - but rarely both," wrote Bursztein on Google's Online Security blog. Google's research showed that easy-to-remember questions could be easily guessed using common knowledge and publically available information, or due to a small set of possible answers. The research was conducted by analysing hundreds of millions of secret question and answer combinations used for account recovery claims on Google's services. According to Google, an attacker would have a 19.7% chance of guessing an English-speaking user's answer to the question "what is your favourite food?". With ten guesses, the likelihood increases to 36.5%. The research also showed that an attacker would have a 39% chance of correctly guessing a Korean-speaking user's place of birth with just ten attempts, and a 21.3% chance of working out a Spanish-speaker's father's middle name. Cyber Shack

Stark consequences of a single failure illustrate importance of new era cyber protections

The significant impact a single failure can have in an environment of quickly advancing interconnectedness and interdependency on the Internet demands a new way of thinking about cyber security, argues Ray Boisvert, president and

CEO of I-Sec Integrated Strategies. Speaking at the ARC Group Canada Spring Seminar 2015 in Toronto Thursday, Boisvert, a former assistant director, intelligence with the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), cited an industry estimate that the number of devices connected to the Internet would soon be north of the 60-billion mark. "The Internet of Things is everything connected in our homes, our offices, everything that transforms our lives daily and increasingly becomes interconnected and, more important to you, interdependent," he told attendees. "One failure can have really stark consequences for your personal lives and for your professional existence." The challenge is everyone is living in an environment where the threat surface keeps on growing. Why? Because of the Internet of Things, Boisvert said. Canadian Underwriter

Government facility in 3 months to Clean Malwares from Mobiles, PCs

(India's) Government is setting up a centre that will detect malicious programmes like 'botnets' and help device owners remove such harmful softwares for free. "We are setting up 'botnet' cleaning and malware analysis centre within three months. It will automatically detect botnets that trigger various cyber crimes and suggest the device owner to remove it from their device with help of our facility," IT Secretary R S Sharma told PTI. The project is a part of Digital India programme and aims to create safe and secure cyber space, Sharma said. The centre is being set up with an outlay of about Rs 100 crore and national cyber security watchdog Indian Computer Emergency Response Team (ICERT) has selected vendor for the same. Gizbot

Researchers find hacked routers used in "botnet" mostly in Thailand

Apparently tens of thousands of home routers are infected with malware being used by hackers to launch distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks. Security firm Incapsula discovered the router-based botnet while investigating a series of DDoS attacks against its customers that have been ongoing since December. The firm's researches tracked the malicious traffic to routers made by Ubiquiti Networks and distributed by Internet companies to their customers around the world. Those devices were found to have DDoS malware installed on them, the researchers said in a report last week. Thai Tech

'Five Eyes' Spy Agencies Planned to Hack Samsung and Google's Mobile Support

Western secret agencies partnership known as the "Five Eyes" launched a surveillance unit called Network Tradecraft Advancement Team (NTAT) to spy on smartphone users as well as a major Chinese mobile web browser. As top secret document obtained by Edward Snowden has revealed, they planned to hijack data and insert malware into Samsung devices with Google apps. The documents obtained by Edward Snowden and published by CBC on May 21, 2015, revealed plans from as early as 2011 from major spy agencies to attempt and compromise Google and Samsung servers to spy on their mobile users as well as a major Chinese mobile web browser. The united effort was spearheaded by government spy agencies from Canada, U.S., New Zealand, Australia, and Britain, a partnership known as Five Eyes. Their goal, to "harvest the wealth" of information stored on mobile phones all over the world, and find ways to compromise those phones by implanting malware that they control. According to the document, the agencies ultimately sought to associate mobile users and the telecommunications with their online activity, by using the Spy super browser called XKEYSCORE. The Coin Telegraph

Ransomware Building Kit Freely Available

A ready-made kit that allows anyone with minimum technical skills to build their own version of crypto-malware has become available on an underground forum, at no other cost than a piece of the ransom paid by the victims. Malware-as-a-service is a booming business and up until recently it did not apply to ransomware with file encryption features, but this changed last week, when a toolkit called Tox was released, free of charge. It allows anyone to quickly create ransomware that can be distributed via spam botnets or bulk email clients, charging 20% of whatever the victim pays, in exchange for the services provided by the Tox site. Softpedia

Fake Minecraft 'scareware' apps found on Google Play

Useless 'Minecraft' apps promising cheats and other materials on the Google Play store were actually laced with scareware warnings about non-existent viruses. Over 600,000 Android users installed at least one of the malicious apps. The goal of the apps is to get an unsuspecting user to sign up for a premium SMS service at a cost of 4.80EUR per week. ESET reported its discovery last week on its blog, detailing over 30 different apps that had managed to get through Google's malware filter, Bouncer. They were uploaded to the market over the past 9 months from different developer accounts, though they all likely come from the same source. Afterdawn

New Point-of-Sale Malware NitlovePoS Sends Card Data via Encrypted Connection

Security researchers identified a fresh malware piece targeting point-of-sale (PoS) systems that relies on encrypted communication to exfiltrate payment card info from the memory of the payment processing machines. By sending data using SSL (Secure Sockets Layer), hackers ensure that detection at network level is more difficult since the details of the communication cannot be analyzed. The threat, dubbed NitlovePoS by security researchers at FireEye, is delivered discriminately, from a server hosting a herd of malware, after cybercriminals first identify the nature of the victim. The infection starts with a spam email that purports to come from someone looking for a job, who delivers a Word document rigged with a malicious macro script, whose support is disabled by default in Microsoft Office components. Softpedia

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca)*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, June 23, 2015 8:00 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
June 23, 2015 / le 23 juin 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Power grids in U.S., Canada are becoming more reliable: Kemp

An opinion piece states, "North America's power grids set new records for reliability in 2014 despite being tested by extreme cold during the polar vortex and rising concerns about physical and cyber attacks on the network. Over the last year, newspapers have been full of stories about the threat posed by physical and cyber-attacks on transformers and power lines, extreme weather and solar storms. But on most measures, electricity networks across the United States and Canada are becoming more reliable as a result of increased investment and attention to operational standards over the last decade. There were fewer interruptions last year as a result of failures originating in the bulk power system, which includes power generators and high-voltage transmission lines. Reuters

U.S. data hack may be 4 times larger than the government originally said

The personal data of an estimated 18 million current, former and prospective federal employees were affected by a cyber breach at the Office of Personnel Management - more than four times the 4.2 million the agency has publicly acknowledged. The number is expected to grow, according to U.S. officials briefed on the investigation. FBI Director James Comey gave the 18 million estimate in a closed-door briefing to Senators in recent weeks, using the OPM's own internal data, according to U.S. officials briefed on the matter. Those affected could include people who applied for government jobs, but never actually ended up working for the government. The same hackers who accessed OPM's data are believed to have last year breached an OPM contractor, KeyPoint Government Solutions, U.S. officials said. When the OPM breach was discovered in April, investigators found that KeyPoint security credentials were used to breach the OPM system. CNN

Kaspersky slams GCHQ and NSA for Duqu 2.0-level attacks

Kaspersky has slammed the NSA and GCHQ following reports the agencies targeted it with "reverse engineering" cyber attacks. A Kaspersky spokesperson told V3 the reports are "worrying" and said that, if true, the GCHQ and NSA are leaving businesses and general web users dangerously vulnerable. V3; SPAM Fighter; The Inquirer; International Business Times; PC Magazine; Ars Technica; Forbes

Cyber attackers prefer to encrypt communications, report shows

Cyber attackers are using encryption to hide their communications, a study by Vectra Networks has revealed. A comparison of hidden tunnels in encrypted traffic compared with clear traffic shows attackers favour HTTPS over HTTP for hidden tunnels, according to the latest Post-Intrusion Report. If an HTTP session is carrying a hidden second conversation, there will be discernible patterns in the timing, volume and sequencing of traffic, according to Vectra Networks. Computer Weekly

LOT airline hack signals the first in emerging cyberthreat trend

An aviation security researcher believes the attack on Polish airline LOT is the first indicator of a new trend in the cybersecurity realm. Ruben Santamarta, principal security consultant for IOActive, is the author of research in the field of SATCOM and aviation security. In a whitepaper documenting his research (.PDF), Santamarta explained how satellite communications (SATCOM) -- used to support industries including aviation, the military and emergency services -- are often vulnerable to exploits and flaws including backdoors, hardcoded credentials, insecure protocols and weak encryption algorithms. ZDNet

Hackers exploit MacKeeper flaw with new Mac OS malware

A newly-discovered security flaw in MacKeeper, the controversial OS clean-up utility, is providing cybercriminals a backdoor to diffuse a new strain of Mac malware known as OSX/Agent-ANTU, according to researchers at BAE's cyber security unit. The Stack; Sophos Security

RubyGems Software Flaw Affects Millions of Installs

Trustwave researchers, using collaborative research data from OpenDNS, have discovered a vulnerability that could affect 1.2 million software installations per day. The issue affects the RubyGems distribution software, which is used by a range of businesses, including start-ups, social media sites and payment gateway companies—to the tune of 438 million installations per year. RubyGems helps businesses and application developers distribute software to a central location so that end users can download it and use it. The vulnerability can be exploited to unknowingly lead end users to a server that's controlled by criminals. Criminals can then feed the end user malware, compromising the computer and gaining access to all of the victim's sensitive information. And the kicker is that the attack would be unnoticeable to the end user. Info Security Magazine

HP Releases Details, Exploit Code for Unpatched IE Flaws

Researchers at HP's Zero Day Initiative have disclosed full details and proof-of-concept exploit code for a series of bugs they discovered that allow attackers to bypass a key exploit mitigation in Internet Explorer. The disclosure is a rarity for ZDI. The company typically does not publish complete details and exploit code for the bugs it reports to vendors until after the vulnerabilities are fixed. But in this case, Microsoft has told the researchers that the company doesn't plan to fix the vulnerabilities, even though the bugs were serious enough to win ZDI's team a $125,000 Blue Hat Bonus from Microsoft. The reason: Microsoft doesn't think the vulnerabilities affect enough users. Threat Post

La menace de sécurité sur les mobiles reste faible, mais méfions nous, Christophe Jolly, Cisco

Le dernier rapport Data Breach 2015 de Verizon, rendu public le mois dernier, conclut que les menaces de sécurité liées aux terminaux mobiles sont généralement « exagérées ». Autre conclusion forte de ce rapport : le nombre de vulnérabilités qui ont été utilisées pour des exploits en 2014 – indépendamment de la plateforme – est “marginal”. Informatique News

New Spear Phishing Attack Bypasses Two Factor Authentication

Symantec researchers are warning of a new spear phishing attack that targets mobile users with the aim of bypassing two-factor authentication and taking over victims' email accounts. eSecurity Planet

Leaked Saudi emails reveal new victim of Iranian hackers

Documents published by WikiLeaks, sourced from the Saudi government, have revealed the country's Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MOFA) as a victim of the series of attacks in 2014 collectively called Operation Cleaver. Until the documents were published last week, the MOFA was an unknown victim of the attacks that were blamed on actors in Iran. CSO Online

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, June 29, 2015 8:58 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique June 29, 2015 / le 29 juin 2015

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Cybersecurity fund boosted by a rise in data breaches

A new exchange-traded fund that taps into the cybersecurity market has skyrocketed to $1-billion (U.S.) in assets under management in just seven months. With the crafty ticker name HACK, the PureFunds ISE Cyber Security ETF mimics the ISE Cyber Security Index, which tracks the performance of companies actively engaged in providing services for cybersecurity and for which cybersecurity business activities are a key driver of their business model. The rise in data breaches among banks, large retailers and even government offices is creating a necessary investment into enhanced cybersecurity technology, says Andrew Chanin, CEO of PureFunds and portfolio manager of HACK. Globe and Mail, B11 (2015-06-27)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Institutions financières vulnérables

Même si les institutions financières ont adopté des mesures pour combattre les fraudes informatiques, elles sont encore vulnérables aux attaques cybernétiques, surtout celles perpétrées par le crime organisé, affirment des spécialistes en cybersécurité. Éric G. Hébert, consultant en cybersécurité, souligne que les attaques sont de «plus destructrices», comme l'ont mis en lumière les révélations d'Edward Snowden, l'informaticien qui a notamment révélé au monde les agissements de la National Security Agency (NSA) aux États-Unis. «Dorénavant, la prémisse est que toute entreprise, quelle qu'elle soit, peut être compromise et qu'elle l'est probablement déjà», souligne ce consultant qui compte plus de 20 ans d'expérience, et qui réalise des mandats pour des banques au Canada... Le système bancaire mondial est une des principales cibles des cyberattaques. Et les banques canadiennes n'y échappent pas, révélait en novembre Finance et Investissement (FI), à partir de documents du Ministère des Finances à Ottawa. Par exemple, les institutions financières du pays ont été attaquées à huit reprises au cours du premier trimestre de 2013 (la période sur laquelle se concentrait l'information obtenue par FI), selon le Centre canadien de réponse aux incidents cybernétiques (CCRIC), une agence fédérale. Pour des raisons évidentes, les institutions financières avec lesquelles nous avons communiqué ont refusé de se prononcer quant aux menaces de sécurité qui planent sur elles. Finance et Investissement

CryptoWall : l'ultra nuisible provoque des pertes colossales

Pour l'Internet Crime Complaint Center (IC3) du FBI, le malware CryptoWall est la menace du moment qui cible tant les particuliers que les entreprises aux USA. Entre avril 2014 et juin 2015, l'IC3 a reçu 992 plaintes en rapport avec ce ransomware. Pour l'ensemble des victimes aux États-Unis, le montant des pertes s'élève à plus de 18 millions de dollars (16 M€). Une somme colossale qui ne tient pas uniquement compte des rançons payées mais englobe tous les frais inhérents à une infection, la mise en place de contre-mesures ou encore la perte de productivité. CryptoWall n'est pas endémique aux USA. Il a également touché l'Europe et l'Australie. Il fait partie de cette famille de nuisibles qui chiffrent les fichiers sur l'ordinateur d'une victime et demande une rançon en échange d'une clé de déchiffrement. GNT

Internal threat among biggest cyber security challenges, says former FBI investigator

Even tech-savvy employees can be fooled into allowing attackers access to company networks, warns former FBI investigator Don Codling. One of the biggest cyber security challenges for business is that "there is no patch for careless, greedy or stupid", said former FBI Computer Intrusion Unit head Don Codling. "But savvy, well-meaning employees can be fooled into doing something to allow attacks access to company networks," he told a Storm Guidance seminar in London. Few people, he said, would not click on an email that appeared to be a subpoena sent by their personal lawyer –

but that would be enough to let attackers into their company network. Once on the network, Codling said the most common tactic by attackers is to seek out privileged users to compromise their accounts and use their credentials to move freely in the network. Computer Weekly

UK Agencies Take Out Cybercriminal Gang

Investigators from six different European countries, supported by Europol and Eurojust, joined together to bring down a cybercriminal group in Ukraine. Europol announced late last week that the action, which took place in Ukraine on June 18 and 19, resulted in five suspects being arrested, eight houses searched across four cities and the confiscation of computer equipment and other devices for further investigation. The joint investigation team (JIT) targeted the high-level cybercriminals and their accomplices because they were suspected of creating and distributing two banking Trojans, known as Zeus and SpyEye. Europol confirmed the group is believed to be behind the malware, as well as channeling and cashing out the profits from its use. "The cybercriminals used malware to attack online banking systems in Europe and beyond, adapting their sophisticated banking Trojans over time to defeat the security measures implemented by the banks," Europol reported. PYMNTS

Report: Clickfraud malware a gateway to other threats

Malware that secretly clicks on ads in order to defraud advertisers might seem generally harmless to infected machines, but can serve as a gateway to more serious infections, according to a report released today by Damballa. Clickfraud malware has been showing up a lot this year, said Stephen Newman, CTO at security vendor Damballa, with about 32 million active infections spotted in the company's customer base during the first half of this year, or about 210,000 per day. According to the Association of National Advertisers, it costs US businesses about $6.3 billion a year in wasted ad money. But how much of a threat is it to enterprises with infected machines? If it sneaks in past initial security controls, the malware tries to be as undetectable as possible while it racks up the fraudulent ad clicks in the background. Channel World

Windows 10 update will make users targets for scams

In just more than a month, Windows 10 will be released as a free download via Windows Update. This will be prime opportunity for scam artists to trick users into believing something is wrong with their computer. BBB advises consumers to be on the lookout for sales pitches from bogus tech support employees whose goal is to install malware and steal information. Here's how the scam works. Victims receive a telephone call from someone claiming to be with tech support, usually from a well-known company such as Microsoft, telling them their computer is sending error messages, and they're detecting a virus on the computer. The scammer says only a tech support employee can remove the virus, but they first need access to the computer. If the victim gives the OK, the caller will run a scan and point out how the virus has infected the computer. They then offer to remove the virus for a fee and ask for credit card information. Victims who allowed the caller remote access to their computers, whether they paid for the virus to be removed or not, reported difficulties afterwards, according to the FBI Internet Crime Complaint Center. Jacksonville Progress

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, July 06, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 6, 2015 / le 6 juillet 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

China downplays Hillary Clinton claim it hacked U.S. information

China on Monday downplayed an accusation by U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton that Beijing had tried to "hack into everything that doesn't move in America". At a campaign event in New Hampshire on Saturday, Clinton said the U.S. must be "fully vigilant" about China's military, adding that Beijing had stolen commercial secrets from defense contractors and "huge amounts of government information". Beijing has in the past expressed outrage over U.S. government claims it engages in state-sponsored hacking of commercial information, saying China is itself a victim of hacking attacks. Asked about Clinton's remarks, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Hua Chunying said the two sides had taken a "constructive spirit" in tackling the issue. "China and the U.S. have taken a constructive spirit and approach to strengthening dialogue and cooperation to jointly face various challenges in line with the interests of both sides in a way that is conducive to peace and prosperity in the region and the world," Hua told a regular news briefing. Reuters; BBC News

The OPM cyberattack was a breach too far

An editorial states, "The other shoe is expected to drop this week on the disastrous loss of confidential information from the databases of the Office of Personnel Management. The agency is expected to reveal the extent to which information from security investigations of current, former and prospective federal employees and contractors was compromised. The background checks often unearth sensitive and intimate matters, and the loss may put many at risk of blackmail. The agency is expected to reveal this week how many dossiers were taken, but reports suggest it was in the millions. The breach comes on top of a separate intrusion in which personally identifiable information on 4.2 million federal workers was filched from the OPM databases. President Obama ought to be far more steamed about the break-ins than he appears. The OPM director, Katherine Archuleta, knew as well as anyone how sensitive the data was, yet the door to her agency was apparently left ajar. Thieves walked out with an intelligence goldmine, the most intimate details about U.S. public servants, including those who handle the most highly classified secrets of the United States. This was an unforgivable failure of stewardship that should lead to firings for incompetence. Ms. Archuleta, confronted with questions on Capitol Hill, refused to shoulder any blame. "I don't believe anyone" at the agency "is personally responsible," she said. "If there is anyone to blame, it is the perpetrators." ... " Washington Post

Why the new Canadian telco transparency rules fall short

Canadians have become increasingly troubled by reports revealing that telecom and internet companies receive millions of requests for subscriber data from a wide range of government departments. In light of public concern, some Internet and telecom companies have begun to issue regular transparency reports that feature aggregate data on the number of requests they receive and the disclosures they make. The emergence of transparency reports from companies such as Rogers, Telus, and TekSavvy has helped shed light on government demands for information and on corporate disclosure practices. However, they also paint an incomplete picture since companies have offered up inconsistent data and some of the largest companies, including Bell, have thus far refused to come clean on past requests and disclosures. The Privacy Commissioner of Canada released a report last week that showed that all transparency reports are not created equal. For example, TekSavvy has provided information on the content of the disclosures, the number of accounts affected, and instances where users were notified. By contrast, companies such as Rogers, Telus, Allstream, and Wind Mobile have not disclosed this information, offering more limited data. In an effort to create greater uniformity in transparency reporting, Industry Canada has just released new transparency reporting guidelines. The government states that it has released the guidelines "to help private organizations be open with their customers, regarding the management and sharing of their personal information with government, while respecting the work of law enforcement, national security agencies, and regulatory authorities." While the Privacy Commissioner of Canada lauded their release, the guidelines raise several significant concerns. Hill Times.com

Cyberattacks target government of Alberta websites - "They start to think like a hacker and what a hacker would do to protect against those kinds of threats"

Alberta government websites — which hold personal information about everything from protection of children at risk to driver's licences — are under constant threat of attack, according to the office tasked with keeping them safe. "On average, this year we have about 500 different attacks every day going on the Alberta government websites," says Michael Crerar, director of Security Policy and Planning with Service Alberta. The Government of Alberta hosts about 200 government and agency websites, which provide information on programs and also store personal information from residents in databases. To keep those pages online, around-the-clock security operations are run from an office in downtown Edmonton, where cyber-security officers monitor and thwart attempted hacks from around the globe. The attacks are preempted, Crerar said, by automated systems and by officers watching trends and events. "We're definitely seeing more attacks and they're becoming more complicated, so our defences have to become more complicated," he said. Crerar said the methods used by those attacking the sites are constantly evolving. As such, security officers have learned to adapt quickly. CBC News (2015-07-04)

U.S. Agencies Conduct Cyberwar Games

The Pentagon, Department of Homeland Security, National Security Agency and a host of other agencies joined British officials and a number of private companies for a three-week cyber war game, testing 14 teams on a range of simulated attacks on two continents. The exercise, held in June at a military facility in Suffolk, Va., aimed to prepare the U.S. military, security officials and others for what some believe is the next frontier in warfare: cyberattacks. Wall Street Journal (2015-07-05)

Hackers hacked: Malware firm's data leaked, ties with regimes exposed

An Italian company that sells hacking tools to various governments was apparently itself the target of a hacker attack, resulting in its internal documents being leaked online and its deals with countries such as Sudan and Saudi Arabia exposed. The Milan-based Hacking Team develops spyware and malware tools that can target computers and mobile devices across various platforms. The company maintained that it legally sold its products to be used for law enforcement. RT; SC Magazine UK; The Guardian

Hacking Team breach: A 400GB corporate data dump and online mockery

Twitter has spent the last 12 hours mockingly asking if Hacking Team was awake yet, but the firm's massive data breach reveals a more serious side to the PR disaster -- deals allegedly between Hacking Team and oppressive governments. Over the weekend, the secretive Hacking Team security firm was the victim of a cyberattack which ripped the company's corporate secrets apart and exposed the malware provider's email communications to the eyes of the Internet. Milan, Italy-based Hacking Team is known for the creation of surveillance solutions for government agencies. Predictably, considering the client base, Hacking Team's dealings have rarely been formerly disclosed, leaving the security industry to wonder who customers are and what spy tools are floating around cyberspace -- and for what purposes. ZDNet

Leak of ZeusVM malware building tool might cause botnet surge

The Internet could see a new wave of botnets based on the ZeusVM banking Trojan after the tools needed to build and customize the malware program were published online for free. The source code for the builder and control panel of ZeusVM version 2.0.0.0 was leaked sometime in June, according to a malware research outfit called Malware Must Die (MMD). The leak was kept under wraps by the researchers as they tried to stop the files from becoming widely available, an effort that ultimately exceeded their resources. As a result, the group decided to go public with the information Sunday in order to alert the whole security community so that mitigation strategies can be developed. Computerworld

Scottish SMEs get discounted cyber-security

The Scottish Business Resilience Centre (SBRC) has recruited five graduates from Dundee's Abertay University 'Ethical hacking and Countermeasures' BSc degree to provide affordable services to protect companies - particularly small firms - from cyber-criminals and scammers. SC Magazine UK

225 000 fresh malware strains per day for Q1 2015

PandaLabs, the anti-malware laboratory at multinational security vendor Panda Security, has detected over 225 000 new malware strains per day during the first quarter of the year, with peaks reaching 500 000. This is based on analysis of global IT security episodes from January to March 2015 and according to Panda Security the results represent a 40% increase over the same period last year and well above the daily average for that year. ITWeb Africa

Encryption's holy grail is getting closer, one way or another

Whether it's a reaction to the Snowden revelations, a reaction to the continual news of massive data breaches, or just the obvious need to secure data in the cloud -- or all of the above -- new technologies for working directly on encrypted data are getting plenty of attention. "Yes, it is a very, very hot area," Raluca Ada Popa, one of the creators of CryptDB, told

ZDNet last Friday. Her new startup, Prevail, building on CryptDB's successor Mylar, is just part of the buzz." It works by executing SQL queries over encrypted data using a collection of efficient SQL-aware encryption schemes," the paper said. "CryptDB can also chain encryption keys to user passwords, so that a data item can be decrypted only by using the password of one of the users with access to that data. ZDNet

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-
sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca)*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, July 17, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
July 17, 2015 / le 17 juillet 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Hacker pair each get a million reward miles from United Airlines

Two hackers have scored a million frequent-flier miles each on United Airlines for finding security holes in the airline's computer systems. The awards were made under a security program that United started in May. Technology companies have offered so-called bug bounties, but they are unusual in the transportation industry. United spokesman Luke Punzenberger said Thursday that two people have received the maximum award of 1 million miles each and others got smaller awards. A million miles is enough for several first-class trips to Asia or up to 20 round-trips in the U.S. Associated Press (Chronicle-Herald, B4)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Spam email levels hit 12-year low

People are being sent fewer spam emails than at any time in the past 12 years, according to security firm Symantec. It said that fewer than 50% of emails which it scanned during June were junk - the lowest percentage it had seen in over a decade. The fall suggests that cyber-thieves are looking to other ways to make money from people going online. The security firm said legal action against the criminal networks that pipe spam to people had helped to cut junk. However, it said the fall in spam had been offset by a rise in the amount of malware being made. BBC News

British Man Charged With Hacking US Networks Arrested

A British man accused of hacking into U.S. government computer networks has been arrested in England and U.S. prosecutors say they'll attempt to have him brought to New Jersey. Lauri Love, of Stradishall, England, has been charged with hacking into various agencies, including the U.S. Army, NASA, the Federal Reserve and the Environmental Protection Agency. Matthew Reilly, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in New Jersey, said Love was arrested Wednesday and that U.S. officials filed an extradition request. The 29-year-old also faces federal charges in New York and Virginia. Associated Press (ABC News)

Cybersecurity intern accused in huge hacking bust

On Wednesday the U.S. Justice Department announced a massive international bust of Darkode, an online black market for hackers. Among those charged with crimes was Morgan Culbertson, a 20-year-old from Pittsburgh. He's accused of creating a nasty malware that infects Android phones, steals data and controls the device. Culbertson is currently a sophomore at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh. He's a two-time intern at the cybersecurity software maker FireEye where he's been researching malware on Android smartphones, tearing apart viruses, and analyzing them. According to federal investigators, Culbertson went on to create the infamous "Dendroid" malware. For $300, anyone who bought it could turn any legitimate Android app into malware. Buyers even got round-the-clock software support. CNN

Spectacular breach at Italian surveillance company puts the world's spymasters in the hot seat

A dramatic breach at an Italian surveillance company has laid bare the details of government cyberattacks worldwide, putting intelligence chiefs in the hot seat from Cyprus to South Korea. The massive leak has already led to one spymaster's resignation and pulled back the curtain on espionage in the iPhone age. More than 1 million emails released online in the wake of the July 5 breach show that Hacking Team sold its spy software to the FBI and to Russian intelligence. It worked with authoritarian governments in the Middle East and pitched to police departments in the American suburbs. It even tried to sell to the Vatican all while devising a malicious Bible app to infect religiously minded targets. "It's a mini-Snowden event," said Israel-based security researcher Tal Be'ery, likening the impact of the leak to the publication of top secret NSA documents by former intelligence worker Edward Snowden. The Telegram; Associated Press (CBC News)

Grassley questions whether FBI broke the law with contract

The government's relationship with the controversial Italian surveillance firm Hacking Team may have violated the law, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a letter sent Wednesday to the FBI. Hackers recently broke into Hacking Team's networks, dumping troves of internal documents, contracts and emails with clients. The leaked documents revealed long-standing ties with the U.S. government, along with deals between the company and oppressive governments across the Middle East, Africa and Eastern Europe. ADVERTISEMENT "It is troubling that the leaked documents also revealed Hacking Team's business relationships with a number of repressive regimes around the world, including Sudan," Grassley said in his letter. Grassley singled out Sudan because of a 2007 law that forbids the U.S. government from doing business with companies conducting restricted business with Sudan, such as selling military equipment. The Hill

Google, Adobe barricade Flash against hacker hordes – we peek inside

Google's team of computer security gurus have described the anti-hacker defenses they've helped Adobe add to Flash Player. It's hoped that these mechanisms will thwart or frustrate miscreants' attempts to exploit programming bugs in the software, and thus hopefully prevent attackers from hijacking victims' PCs and Macs. The defenses aren't perfect, but given the number of attacks on Flash and the fact that Adobe can't find every bug in its source code, they are a welcome development. Late on Thursday, Google's Project Zero team revealed that the latest version of Flash, 18.0.0.209 – which was released this week to patch vulnerabilities exploited by spyware maker Hacking Team – employs three mitigations developed by Google and Adobe. The mitigations revolve around Vector.<uint> arrays in Adobe Flash's ActionScript: these are arrays of unsigned integers, and are stored in memory as a length value and the array data. The length value defines how many elements are in the array. The Register

Chrome Will Soon Show More "Safe Browsing" Malware Warnings Than Ever Before

Depending on your surfing habits, chances are you've come across a warning in Chrome that tells you that it's probably safer not to proceed to whatever site you wanted to look at. That's Google's Safe Browsing technology at work, and over the next few weeks, the company plans to roll out a number of improvements to this service. This means you'll see more Safe Browsing warnings than ever before, simply because Google has become better at finding sites that harbor malware, unwanted software and phishing attacks. Over the last few months, Google has put its focus on ad injectors, the kind of applications that insert ads into pages that didn't previously have them (or replace existing ones). These ad-injection networks are often vectors for malware attacks. Ideally, Safe Browsing will prevent unsuspecting users from installing these ad injectors on their computers. Techcrunch; InfoSecurity

Trend Micro discovers Hacking Team Android malware app that avoids Google Play checks

Hacking Team had developed an Android app that could dynamically execute malware payloads, and appeared within Google's Play store as an innocuous news app, Trend Micro has said. The app, BeNews, only requested three permissions from a user when installed, and was able to avoid Google's automated app checks as no exploit was contained within its code, the security firm said. "The fake news app was downloaded up to 50 times before it was removed from Google Play on July 7," Trend Micro said. "Looking into the app's routines, we believe the app can circumvent Google Play restrictions by using dynamic loading technology." ZDNet

Wicked WikiLeaks leaks considered harmful: Alert over malware lurking in dumped docs

Documents laced with malware have been found in WikiLeaks.org's cache of files obtained from hacked CIA wannabe Stratfor. Intelligence biz Stratfor was ransacked by Jeremy Hammond in late 2011, and its email archives passed to whistleblowing website WikiLeaks in early 2012. The Julian Assange™-led organization soon began distributing the archives using the BitTorrent file-sharing network, and publishing extracts on its website. In March 2015, WikiLeaks made the emails available in a handy searchable database, just like it's done with the leaked Sony Pictures and Hacking Team files. Unfortunately, no one appears to have had the time to scrub the five million Stratfor emails, which date back to 2004, clean of malware. The Register

Microsoft checks hundreds of millions of PCs for CryptoWall and Reveton ransomware

Microsoft checked hundreds of millions Windows computers for ransomware this month. The check took place through the Malicious Software Removal Tool (MSRT), the built-in virus removal tool that is able to detect and remove most malware families. The tool is updated each month to be able to detect new malware families. Simultaneously MSRT also scans the computer for these families. This month Microsoft released an update that can detect Crowti/CryptoWall and Reveton ransomware on computers. CryptoWall distributes through email attachments and can be bundled with all kinds of other malware and exploit kits. In May and June Microsoft detected about 300,000 computers that were infected with CryptoWall. Once the malware becomes active it will encrypt all kinds of files and then asks a ransom to decrypt them. Infections with the ransomware were mainly discovered in the United States and Brazil. myce.com

Weeks later, services for cyber theft victims still a work in progress

Beth Cobert comes to the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) carrying good will from federal labor leaders developed during her days just a few blocks away at the Office of Management and Budget. President Obama sent her to be OPM's acting director a week ago in the wake of Katherine Archuleta's hasty departure as HR chief following disclosures that the personal information of more than 22 million federal employees and others was stolen in a massive security breach. OPM plans a "suite of comprehensive services" for the 21.5 million employees, contractors and applicants for security clearances, and their families, whose information was stolen in the breach of background investigation information announced on June 12. That includes identity restoration support, identity theft insurance, identity monitoring for minor children, continuous credit monitoring and fraud monitoring for at least three years. Washington Post

No Child Left Behind bill mandates cyber education report

The Senate rewrite of No Child Left Behind would require the secretary of Education to submit a report to Congress on the state of cybersecurity higher education. The provision is an attempt to address the chronic shortage of cyber workers nationwide, frequently cited as a reason the country's digital defenses are struggling to catch up to hackers. The upper chamber on Thursday easily passed an overhaul of the 13-year-old education bill, which had become widely derided on both sides of the aisle. With its 81-17 vote, Congress transferred more decision-making power back to state and local authorities. The Hill

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, August 05, 2015 8:46 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique August 5, 2015 / le 5 août 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Anatomy of a hack attack - or two

In recent weeks, a bumper crop of computer-security scare stories have revealed that hackers could remotely attack your Jeep, your Android phone, your Mac and even a Brinks safe. Security flaws are discovered all the time but, in recent years, it might have seemed everything breaks all at once in late July and early August. The timing is no coincidence. These hacks generate buzz ahead of the two high-profile conferences in computer security held in Las Vegas this week: Black Hat, which began Aug. 1, and Def Con 23, which starts on Thursday. Here's a list of the improvements we need. The season of digital horrors began with a July 21 story from Wired's Andy Greenberg detailing how researchers Charlie Miller and Chris Valasek took command of a Jeep Mr. Greenberg was driving, turning off the transmission and cutting the brakes. Worse, they did so without needing direct access to the car: A flaw in the entertainment system was accessed using the vehicle's wireless Internet connection. On July 27, Joshua Drake, a researcher with Zimperium, detailed how a text message could let hackers break into millions of smartphones powered by Google's Android operating systems, even on its recent Jelly Bean version. The bug was in a media protocol called "Stagefright" that in some cases allowed an attacker to break in and delete the malicious text, so users wouldn't know they had been hacked. Google rushed a fix out to its manufacturing and phone carrier partners but, in the past, such updates have taken time to reach actual users... One tenet of computer security is "don't connect it to the Internet." The term "air gapped" means a device has no wireless or physical network connection. But an Israeli team from Ben-Gurion University figured out how to make a basic GSM phone "listen" to the radiation coming from these air-gapped PCs in order to steal passwords or encryption keys. Globe and Mail, A6

Hacked radio system unique to Fiat Chrysler

The company that makes car radios that friendly hackers exploited to take control of a Jeep Cherokee says its other infotainment systems don't have the same security flaw. Harman International chief executive Dinesh Paliwal said Tuesday that the hackers used a cellular connection to get to the radio, which they used to control critical functions such as brakes and steering. The hack by Twitter security expert Charlie Miller and Chris Valasek, who heads auto security for a consulting firm, touched off the recall of 1.4 million vehicles from Fiat Chrysler to patch software holes. Associated Press (Waterloo Region Record, C3; London Free Press)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

The Deep, Dark Web Is Getting Some Company Soon — From Canadian Cops

Canada's federal police service is investing in software that, it hopes, will let it shed light onto the darkest regions of the deep internet. The money, part of a wide-reaching program aimed at defense and security research, will be spent developing software to trace and monitor supposedly nefarious activity on the darknet — a series of encrypted sites that advertise everything from human trafficking to hitmen. The Canadian Safety and Security Program (CSSP) is a funding regime that provides resources to various public safety, policing, and military programs run in conjunction with government departments. Previous rounds of funding have contributed to products that can track explosives, equipment that can detect drugs from their vapors, and training to protect Canada's energy infrastructure from cyber attacks. The most recent cash infusion, worth some $12 million for a dozen projects, focuses on everything from efforts to combat radicalization in Muslim communities, to defusing improvised explosive devices (IEDs), and technology targeting drones. Perhaps the most politically-charged and potentially controversial project is run by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and two technology firms. VICE News

The digital nudist colony

An opinion piece states "Hacker group blindsides CSIS with 'cabinet-level' security breach, July 29. As usual the hackee, this time the Canadian government, cries foul while scrambling to catch up with the hacker. Of course the hacker is to blame; nice people do not pry into other peoples' secrets. But in this, and in every other case I can recall, no one mentions the security professionals who design and implement the obviously inadequate protections that Anonymous, Edward Snowden or Royal Canadian Navy Sub-Lt. Jeffrey Delisle are able to circumvent. Incompetent and negligent "experts" are collecting hundreds of millions of dollars from governments, companies and citizens for an illusion of security and, worse, we continue to pay for the privilege of belonging to this digital nudist colony." Toronto Star

Canadian hacktivists use Donald Trump's website to praise Jon Stewart

The Canadian arm of an anonymous, decentralized hacktivist group is taking credit today for sending a public thank you message to outgoing Daily Show host Jon Stewart — via Donald Trump's official corporate website. "We are writing you today via Mr Trump's website because, seeming, the only way to get anyone to pay attention any more is to grease a Presidential candidate's website," reads an archived version of a page on Trump.com entitled "Your Moment of Zen, Mr. Stewart." Signed by TelecomixCanada, the letter goes on to thank Stewart for his "many happy years of quality journalism and entertainment" on The Daily Show, and to extend an invitation of sorts. CBC News

Flash bites again: Huge malware campaign hits Yahoo ads

Yahoo has shut down a massive malware campaign that may have affected millions of visitors to its sites. Yahoo confirmed it had stopped the scheme, which began last week, which had been using Yahoo's ad network to infect end users PCs with malware. 'Malvertising', as it's known, is an increasingly common technique where an attacker essentially tricks an automated ad network into delivering malware embedded in ads. ZDNet; Enterprise Innovation

EFF Launches Do Not Track Standard to Boost User Privacy

Rights group the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF), privacy body Disconnect and a group of web companies this week launched a new "Do Not Track" (DNT) standard designed to persuade website owners and advertisers to respect netizens' privacy online. Those companies signing up to the new setting will have to agree not to store or share information on individuals visiting their web pages. However, the policy itself may not accrue a huge amount of interest as it is opt-in and voluntary — meaning these firms are free to ignore it, as they have with previous versions. Even major supporters like Microsoft and Yahoo have recently appeared to grow cold on the idea. Infosecurity Magazine

Chinese hackers hijack commercial VPN service to launch cyberattacks

Hacking groups are utilizing a commercial VPN service to mask cyberattacks originating from China. On Tuesday at the Black Hat conference in Las Vegas, RSA Research unveiled research relating to a commercial VPN service offered in China. Dubbed Terracotta by the researchers, the VPN service comprises of over 1500 virtual private network (VPN) nodes obtained mainly through exploiting vulnerable Windows-based servers used by legitimate organizations. New victim slave nodes are constantly added to Terracotta without the knowledge or permission of legitimate companies operating the servers. ZDNet

Hackers Exploit BIND DoS Flaw to Take Out DNS Servers

Hackers are already exploiting in the wild a newly discovered critical vulnerability in the near ubiquitous BIND DNS servers, causing denial of service, according to a security firm. Sucuri founder Daniel Cid warned in a blog post on Sunday that the DoS flaw (CVE-2015-5477) could allow a remote and unauthenticated attacker to crash the BIND daemon, taking out the DNS server. Infosecurity Magazine

Bunitu Trojan botnet supports commercial VPN infrastructure

Malware which turns your machine into remote port for unauthorized traffic has evolved beyond spreading through adware and integrated within VPN service VIP72. Bunitu Proxy is a Trojan which exposes infected machines to act as a proxy for remote clients. Once installed on a machine, the malware opens ports for remote connections, registers itself in the client's database -- sending data concerning its address and open ports to controllers -- and accepts connections on the exposed ports. This, in turn, can slow down network traffic or reroute infected IPs as a source for illegal traffic and activities -- thereby potentially framing an individual for online activity they know nothing about. ZDNet

No smartwatch safe from attack

As part of an ongoing series looking at Internet of Things (IoT) security, HP today unveiled results of an assessment confirming that smartwatches with network and communication functionality represent a new and open frontier for cyberattack. The study conducted by HP Fortify found that all of the smartwatches that HP Fortify were found to contain significant vulnerabilities, including insufficient authentication, lack of encryption and privacy concerns. HP said in a report that, as smartwatches become more mainstream, these will increasingly store more sensitive information such as health data, and through connectivity with mobile apps may soon enable physical access functions including unlocking cars and homes. Enterprise Innovation

Lockheed Open Sources Its Secret Weapon In Cyber Threat Detection

The cybersecurity team at Lockheed Martin will share some defensive firepower with the security community at Black Hat this week with the open source release of an internal advance threat tool it has been using in house for three years now. Dubbed Laika BOSS, this malware detection platform is meant to help security analysts better hunt down malicious files and activity in an enterprise environment. Known for pioneering the cyber kill chain methodology of threat defense, Lockheed's cyber security team developed Laika BOSS to execute on kill chain defense philosophies. The development of the tool followed a similar path for many security solutions Lockheed hones, explains Mike Gordon, who oversees the Cyber Incident Response Team and network defense at the company. Dark Reading

GES New Cloud May Be The Most Tempting Hacker Bait Ever

Today, General Electric becomes the latest company to challenge Amazon for a piece of the huge and growing cloud computing market by introducing its first hosted cloud service—a service designed specifically for building applications for the Internet of Things. Unlike Amazon's AWS service, which is open to everyone from large companies to individual users, GE is specifically targeting the industrial market—think connected jet engines, medical equipment, and mail-sorting machines. By inviting in some of the most high-value hacking targets, GE may be creating the most tempting jackpot in the history of cloud computing. General Electric is well aware of the sensitive nature of the data and applications it proposes to host. In fact, it's making security its number-one selling point. The big question is whether it can actually deliver on that promise. Wired

Counterterrorism expert wants to arm US companies with hack-back capabilities

We should arm companies with cyber weaponry so they can strike back against hackers says Juan Zarate, a former US deputy national security advisor for counterterrorism. Zarate, an advisor to the administration of President George W. Bush, believes that the government should "deputize private companies to strike back against cyberattackers as a way to discourage widespread threats against the nation's businesses," as IT World reports... Zarate said that since many businesses have limited options for defending their networks, the country should start developing "aggressive" means to discourage cyberattacks, or what he referred to as "tailored hack-back capabilities". These would take the form of "cyberwarrants," he said... Naked Security

Japanese PM says Japan should first check whether exposed U.S. spying is true

Japan should first check whether the exposed spying was true with the United States and then try to understand its ally's true intention, instead of responding to the messages released by Wikileaks, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Tuesday. Abe made the remarks at a special committee meeting of the upper house of Japan's Diet while responding to the recently exposed U.S. spying on Japan by the Wikileaks website. "If the alleged spying were true as the Wikileaks website revealed, as an ally of the U.S., Japan would find it extremely regrettable," Abe said, adding, "We are strongly asking the U.S. to check the facts." Xinhua

Kosovo police arrest three suspected of cyber crimes

Kosovo has arrested three people suspected of committing cyber crimes, following a joint investigation with the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, police said on Tuesday. Charges against the three Kosovo men, aged between 23 and 26, include "theft of personal and banking data and online sale of malicious software to infect computers," according to a police statement. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, August 18, 2015 8:47 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

August 18, 2015 / le 18 août 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

How you learn to hack a car

At first glance, the Las Vegas ballroom looked like the set of an auto show: three cars in the middle of a room filled with a rumbling crowd. But behind the vehicles were rows of tables filled with car parts connected to laptops. Seated at the stations were hackers watching screens flashing as they learned just how the computers inside the cars work - and how they could break in. The Car Hacking Village at the recent DEF CON cybersecurity conference was just the latest reflection of how security experts are scrambling to keep up with risks posed by the new technology that now come standard in most cars. Industry researchers recently found flaws in the Tesla Model S and the Jeep Cherokee, giving the issue more urgency. Learning to hack a car isn't simple. Finding the right car to experiment on can be expensive, for example - and you need to figure out how its computer systems work. At the Car Hacking Village, researchers got hands-on experience with cars' digital systems. But the goal isn't just to manipulate the technology, it's to help find problems so they can be fixed. Washington Post (The Gazette, B9; Windsor Star, Waterloo Region Record)

IRS breach bigger, earlier

A computer breach at the IRS in which thieves stole tax information from thousands of taxpayers is much bigger than the agency originally disclosed. An additional 220,000 potential victims had information stolen from an IRS website as part of a sophisticated scheme to use stolen identities to claim fraudulent tax refunds, the IRS said Monday. The revelation more than doubles the total number of potential victims, to 334,000. The breach also started earlier than investigators initially thought. The thieves accessed a system called "Get Transcript," where taxpayers can get tax returns and other filings from previous years. The thieves cleared a security screen that required knowledge about the taxpayer, including Social Security number, date of birth, tax filing status and street address, the IRS said. Associated Press (London Free Press, D5)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Darkode hacker pleads guilty to spreading Facebook malware

One of the 12 people charged when the Darkode cybercrime forum was seized has pled guilty and will be sentenced on November 23rd. According to Reuters, Eric Crocker aka Phastman from Birmingham, New York, has admitted that he and other hackers from the forum broke into at least 77,000 computers. They apparently used a tool called "Facebook Spreader" to infect machines. Reuters didn't explain how it works in detail, but in this one example posted on Reddit, the malware spreads because infected people's accounts are programmed to send all their friends a file to download. That file runs as soon as you click it. Engadget

Probe of Clinton's private server could find hints of hacking

Now that federal investigators have Hillary Rodham Clinton's homebrew email server, they could examine files on her machine that would be more revelatory than the emails themselves. Clinton last week handed over to the FBI her private server, which she used to send, receive and store emails during her four years as secretary of state. The bureau is holding the machine in protective custody after the intelligence community's inspector general raised concerns recently that classified information had traversed the system... Clinton again this weekend repeated a carefully constructed defence of her actions, in that she did not send or receive emails marked classified at the time. But her emails show some messages she wrote were censored by the State Department for national security reasons before they were publicly released. Associated Press (Globe and Mail)

What we know about the NSA and AT&T's spying pact

New Edward Snowden documents revealed on Saturday in the New York Times detail a decade-long secret partnership between the NSA and AT&T, which provided the spy agency with metadata on billions of emails. Although the Times story has garnered a lot of attention, it offers few details about how the telecom conducted the siphoning and spying for the NSA. But two stories published almost decade ago by WIRED and Salon provide in-depth details about the secret rooms at AT&T facilities in San Francisco, Missouri, and other areas across the US that the NSA used to siphon internet data. AT&T isn't identified by name in the Snowden documents, but the Times notes that "a constellation of evidence" points to AT&T as the primary company mentioned in them, which several intelligence officials have confirmed to the paper. Wired

University of Virginia Targeted by China, Officials Say

The University of Virginia says that hackers from China hit its networks over the weekend, forcing the university to take its network offline. According to the university, the hackers did not access any personal data, such as Social Security numbers or personal health information, of students or staff and faculty. It started with a few software vulnerabilities that the intruders were able to effectively exploit—highlighting the ongoing need to keep systems up to date. UVA turned to Mandiant to "investigate the nature of the attack and to take corrective action." The school shut down its network to patch the vulnerabilities on Friday and went back online Sunday. Infosecurity Magazine

Mozilla Prepares New Privacy-Enhancing Firefox

Mozilla is readying a new version of its flagship browser Firefox designed with even more privacy enhancements in mind. Pre-beta versions of the browser are now ready for testing with features designed to block elements of websites which track and record user behavior, the organization said in a blog post. This includes content as well as analytics, social elements and other services that may be collecting data without the user's knowledge... Mozilla also plans to make third party add-ons safer by enforcing verification against a list of specially created guidelines by default. Infosecurity Magazine

Send attackers on a wild goose chase with deception technologies

Midsized companies with revenues from $100 million to $1 billion spent an average of $3 million on information security as of 2014 per "The Global State of Information Security Survey 2015" from PwC. "I promise you, bad guys are not spending $3 million to break into your organization," says Allen Harper, chief hacker, Tangible Security. Still information burglars are getting through. And since 92 percent of IT and security professionals surveyed globally use signature-based antivirus software on their servers, despite AV's inability to stop advanced threats and targeted attacks, according to Bit9's 2013 Server Security Survey, exploits such as zero-days, which have no signatures give attackers the upper hand. CSO Online

Ransomware goes open source in the name of education

Turkish security bod Utku Sen has published what appears to be the first open source ransomware that anyone can download and spread. The "Hidden Tear" ransomware, available to GitHub, is a functional version of the malware the world has come to hate; it uses AES encryption to lock down files and can display a scare warning or ransom message to get users to pay up. Sen says the malware will evade detection by all common anti-virus platforms. "While this may be helpful for some, there are significant risks," Sen says. "Hidden Tear may be used only for educational purposes. Do not use it as a ransomware." Register

Anti-botnet initiatives useless in sea of patch-hating pirates

Three Dutch researchers have crunched data gleaned from efforts to battle the Conficker bot and declared anti-botnet initiatives all but useless for clean-up efforts. Conficker was born in 2008 spreading aggressively through a since patched remote code execution Microsoft vulnerability (MS08-067) that affected all operating systems including servers. The rate increased with a malware update that allowed Conficker to spread via USB A million machines are thought to be still infected. Some 12 million unique IP addresses were still pinged a Conficker sinkhole server in the six weeks to December last year, despite that the botnet is headless and long abandoned. Register

Dridex - a new Trojan horse malware, Bitdefender warns

Romanian online banking users have been for the past few days the target of a new, customized wave of spam messages sent by Dridex, a new Trojan-type backdoor that steals users' login details. According to a press release, Bitdefender experts warn that the virus targets users of two local banks. According to experts, Dridex is a relatively new virus, which has evolved from Cridex, another Trojan horse malware, the successor of the infamous virus Zeus. ACTmedia

Your torrent client could help hackers hijack your computer

When you use a torrent client, you take your chances. Even if it's just the ever-so-mild chance of running afoul of some sort of copyright regime, torrent traffic is rarely totally legally kosher. Yet a new study from an international team of security researchers has concluded that some of the world's most popular torrent clients can open you up to a completely different sort of legal problem: one in which your computer is made part of a criminal attack without your consent. Extreme Tech

BitTorrent: Hackers are unlikely to succeed at boosting DoS attacks using our systems

BitTorrent has told The Inquirer that we can all chill on panic talk about lone hackers and souped-up denial-of-service (DoS) attacks, informing us that the published problems have been taken care of. We are here because security research, the scourge of Oracle the malware industry, found that BitTorrent could be exploited by lone warriors and used to bring down sites through DoS attacks. It would usually take a whole gang of computers to lob a DoS attacks at an organisation, but it is now apparently possible to do some of the grunt work through one computer, in one bedroom, and through BitTorrent's services. Inquirer

DDoS Attacks Hit Record High in Q2 – Akamai

Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) activity hit record highs during the second quarter of 2015, with powerful attacks over 100 Gbps continuing to rock businesses around the world, according to Akamai's latest State of the Internet report. The report found that DDoS attacks grew in volume by 132% year-on-year and 7% since the previous quarter. Average peak attack bandwidth and volume increased slightly but remained much lower than the highs seen a year ago, with less powerful but longer duration attacks favored this quarter. Infosecurity Magazine

Advanced Persistent Threats Going Unnoticed By Website Owners

The term 'Advanced Persistence Threat' (APT) fills news pages on a regular basis. According to ISACA APT Awareness Study, 93.6 per cent of respondents consider APTs to be a "very serious threat" for their companies. Advertising However, many APT attacks, do not really fall under the 'advanced' category in terms of the attackers' sophistication. A very recent exploit, combined with phishing or newly registered domains are rather 'low-cost APTs', for which we should probably introduce the new term 'LCAPT' or just 'LAPT' to distinguish these from genuine APTs. Techweekeurope

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 06, 2015 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 6, 2015 / le 6 septembre 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Google Releases Patches for Stagefright 2.0

Google has patched 'Stagefright 2.0' – two new critical remote code execution vulnerabilities, one of which affects almost every Android device since 2008. Security firm Zimperium, which discovered the first Stagefright flaws back in April, claimed in a blog post that the new vulnerabilities "manifest when processing specially crafted MP3 audio or MP4 video files." The first vulnerability (in libutlils) impacts almost every Android device since version 1.0 released in 2008. We found methods to trigger that vulnerability in devices running version 5.0 and up using the second vulnerability (in libstagefright). Google assigned CVE-2015-6602 to vulnerability in libutlils." The second critical flaw is CVE-2015-3876 in libstagefright. The flaws apparently lie in the processing of metadata in the files, so even previewing a song or video would lead to infection. Infosecurity Magazine

Fresh Apple Malware Attacks Jailbroken and Non-Jailbroken Devices

A fresh Apple iOS malware has appeared on the scene, dubbed YiSpecter. YiSpecter is different from previously seen iOS malware in that it attacks both jailbroken and non-jailbroken iOS devices through unique malicious behaviors, according to Palo Alto networks. Specifically, it spreads via unusual means, including the hijacking of traffic from nationwide ISPs, an SNS worm on Windows, and an offline app installation and community promotion. It's also the first malware seen in the wild that abuses private APIs in the iOS system to implement malicious functionalities. So far, the malware primarily affects iOS users in mainland China and Taiwan. On infected iOS devices, YiSpecter can download, install and launch arbitrary iOS apps, replace existing apps with those it downloads, hijack other apps' execution to display advertisements, change Safari's default search engine, bookmarks and opened pages, and upload device information to the C2 server. Infosecurity Magazine; ZDNet; The Register; CNN

Attack Vector Aims at Microsoft Outlook Web Application

A new attack method targeting Microsoft Outlook Web Application (OWA) allows hackers to collect and retain ownership over a large set of credentials, allowing them to maintain persistent control over an organization's environment. According to research from Cybereason, the attack involves a malicious module loaded onto Microsoft OWA, an internet-facing webmail server, which enabled the attackers to record authentication credentials and be provided with complete backdoor capabilities. One specific attack was detected by way of a suspicious DLL loaded into the OWA server (a webmail component of Microsoft Exchange Server), with several interesting characteristics. Although it had the same name as another benign DLL, the suspicious DLL went unsigned. Infosecurity Magazine; ITProPortal; Computing

Hackers using DDoS attacks as a 'cyber smoke screen' to mask wider threats

Hackers and cyber criminals have always used distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks to target organisations across the world, but new research indicates that the attack method is quickly evolving as it becomes cheaper to create and deploy. This is a definite risk for businesses and their security teams that are already required to fend off a rising number of cyber intrusions on their networks. A DDoS attack typically attempts to overwhelm a server with web traffic and take the site offline, and has been used to target everything from the UK National Crime Agency to the Church of Scientology. v3.co.uk

Stolen T-Mobile customer data already for sale on the dark web

The cache of 15 million customer records stolen from T-Mobile's credit monitoring service Experian has reportedly been listed for sale on the dark web. Irish fraud prevention and security firm Trustev told VentureBeat that its researchers have found data remarkably similar to the stolen from Experian for sale on underground marketplaces. "This morning [the researchers] saw listings go up for 'fullz' data that matches the same types of information that just came out of the Experian hack," said the Trustev spokesperson on 3 October. v3.co.uk

Trump Hotels' payment system was hacked for nearly a year - and its Toronto property was one of the victims

Customer credit and debit card numbers may have been stolen at seven Trump hotels, including one in Toronto, after its payment systems were hacked for nearly a year. The Trump Hotel Collection said on its website that hackers gained access to its systems between May 2014 and June 2015 at the front desk of those hotels. Hotel restaurants and gift shops were also hacked. The hotel operator said an independent forensic investigation has not found any evidence of customer's information being misused. The company is offering affected customers a year of free identity theft protection. Associated Press (National Post) (2015-10-05)

Risk of serious cyberattack on nuclear infrastructure growing, independent policy institute finds

The risk of a serious cyberattack on global civil nuclear infrastructure is growing, as facilities become ever more reliant on digital systems and make increasing use of commercial 'off-the-shelf' software, according to a new report from Chatham House, a London, United Kingdom-based independent policy institute. The report, released on Monday, found that "the infrequency of cyber security incident disclosure at nuclear facilities makes it difficult to assess the true extent of the problem and may lead nuclear industry personnel to believe that there are few incidents." In addition, the trend to digitization, when combined with a lack of executive-level awareness of the risks involved, means that nuclear plant personnel may not realize the full extent of their cyber vulnerability and are thus inadequately prepared to deal with potential attacks. The report, titled Cyber Security at Civil Nuclear Facilities – Understanding the Risks, was compiled from a literature review; interviews with industry practitioners, policy makers and academics; a series of expert roundtable workshops at Chatham House; and soliciting feedback from industry experts at international conferences. Interviews were conducted with 30 practitioners working on cyber security and on nuclear issues in fields ranging from industry to government, international organizations and academia. A variety of countries participated, including the United States, U.K., Canada, France, Germany, Japan, Ukraine and Russia, as well as representatives of major international organizations, including the IAEA and the European Network and Information Security Agency. Canadian Underwriter; Daily Mail; Computerworld (2015-10-05)

Europe's Top Court Declares 'Safe Harbour' Invalid

The Safe Harbour agreement which allows data on EU citizens to be transferred to and stored in the US has been declared invalid by the European Court of Justice, in a landmark ruling that could have far-reaching repercussions for American cloud computing companies and their customers. Safe Harbour was devised at the turn of the millennium as a way for US firms to store data on Europeans even though the data protection regimes of the two regions are at odds. However, it started to unravel when law student Max Schrems complained to the Irish Data Protection Commission that his Facebook data may be at risk from NSA snoopers, under the PRISM scheme revealed by Edward Snowden in 2013. Infosecurity Magazine; The Hill

The European Union's Digital Assertiveness

Digital information systems, above all the Internet, play a central role in the free movement of goods, services and people across borders. Legislation at all levels struggles to keep pace with rapid technological advances, leaving many areas inadequately regulated. ... Estonia operates largely without using Russian infrastructure and technology and has established a strong security network with eight international mirror servers in friendly states, including the United Kingdom, Germany, the United States, Canada, South Africa and Japan. As far as electronic governance is concerned, small countries like Estonia are considerably further advanced than the big EU member states. ISN

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, October 21, 2015 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 21, 2015 / le 21 octobre 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Regulators across Canada warn about sham stock promotion using popular apps

Securities regulators in nine provinces are warning about fraudulent stock promotions that use popular smartphone applications such as WhatsApp to generate investor interest. They say the so-called pump-and-dump scheme targets potential investors in Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Labrador, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec, and Saskatchewan. The sham involves creating artificial interest in a particular stock by using spam to talk up the benefits of a company and convince people to invest. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, B1; Times Colonist, B2; Vancouver Sun, D1/FRONT)

Sony settles employee hacking lawsuit, pays $8 million for loss

Sony Pictures Entertainment has reached a settlement with current and former employees, agreeing to pay up to $8 million US to reimburse them for identity theft losses, preventive measures and legal fees related to the hack of its computers last year. The settlement was filed with the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles and still needs to be approved by a judge. The agreement calls for up to $10,000 a person, capped at $2.5 million, to reimburse workers for identity theft losses, up to $1,000 each to cover the cost of credit-fraud protection services, capped at $2 million, and up to $3.5 million in legal fees. Associated Press (Times Colonist, B4; Hamilton Spectator, A15)

High school hacker porn to be wild

A New Zealand high school says whoever hacked its e-mail system sent porn to all 2,700 students. Parents of students at Mount Albert Grammar School in Auckland were notified Monday and the e-mail database was shut down. Postmedia News (Toronto Sun, 2; Ottawa Sun, 2; Edmonton Sun, 2; Calgary Sun, 2)

New York and Jerusalem team up

New York and Jerusalem are joining forces to protect their water supplies from cyber-attack. The goal is to create the "cyberdefence for water infrastructure," said Zohar Yinon, who runs Jerusalem's Hagihon water utility. The effort will identify weaknesses in the networks used to manage sewage and water flows. "Imagine what might happen in the Middle East if the water we are supplying to both Jews and Arabs gets contaminated by cyber-attack and we don't find out about it in time," Yinon said. Bloomberg News (National Post, A14)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

How the NSA broke encryption on trillions of secure connections

Some Edward Snowden leaks have revealed that the NSA and other intelligence agencies can break encryption barriers for mass surveillance purposes. It has been theorized that a flaw in encryption used by many Internet services lets the spy agency decrypt HTTPS, SSH, and VPN traffic, and a new paper seems to prove that. Indeed, a massive effort comparable to the attempts of breaking the German Enigma coding machine during the World War II seems to have given the NSA the tools required to break trillions of secure connections. BGR (Yahoo! News)

Senate to consider controversial cyber security bill

The U.S. Senate is expected to begin considering as soon as Tuesday a long-delayed bill that would make it easier for corporations to share information about cyber attacks with each other or the government without concern about lawsuits. The House of Representatives passed its version of the Cybersecurity Information Sharing Act (CISA) in April. A few lawmakers and several big tech companies, however, have come out against the measure, arguing that it fails to protect users' privacy and does too little to prevent cyber attacks. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Stuxnet: A wake-up call for nuclear cyber security

Stuxnet was a wake up call for the nuclear industry, according to Andrea Cavina, nuclear security professional at Coresecure.org. "When I started work at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in 2006 there was no specific focus on computer security," he told the (ISC)2 Security Congress, Europe, the Middle-East and Africa 2015 in Munich. Computer Weekly

Nationwide Building Society outsources IT infrastructure

Nationwide Building Society has outsourced its IT infrastructure to Capgemini for the next five years as part of its digital transformation. The contract covers service integration, service desk and user services. Computer Weekly

Sony settles employees' hacking lawsuit, to pay up to $8 million for loss, identity protection

Sony Pictures Entertainment has reached a settlement with current and former employees, agreeing to pay up to $8 million to reimburse them for identity-theft losses, preventative measures and legal fees related to the hack of its computers last year. The settlement was filed with the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles late Monday and still needs to be approved by a judge. Associated Press (The Province, Charlottetown Guardian, St. John's Telegram, Globe and Mail); Infosecurity-Magazine

Ex-federal agent sentenced to 6 1/2 years for stealing digital money from Silk Road drug website

A former undercover federal agent has been sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison for using his position to steal more than $700,000 in digital currency from an online drug bazaar known as Silk Road. Federal prosecutors on Monday announced the sentence against former Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Carl M. Force, who pleaded guilty to extortion and other charges. Force was tasked with masquerading as a drug dealer who had connections to hit men and establishing communications with Ross Ulbricht, operator of the multimillion-dollar marketplace for illegal drugs and other contraband. After he infiltrated the website, Force sold Ulbricht information about the Silk Road investigation. Ulbricht has been sentenced to life in prison. Associated Press (The Telegram, The Province)

Oracle's critical security update: 154 problems fixed in latest patch

Oracle's October critical patch update includes security updates and patches for 154 vulnerabilities including a flaw which allows an attacker full control over a vulnerable system. The California-based company's October 2015 Critical Patch Update includes 154 fixes which patch holes in a wide range of products, including Oracle Database, Fusion Middleware, Hyperion, Enterprise Manager, Oracle Linux & Virtualization, Java and MySQL. ZDNet News

Microsoft's top lawyer: We face 'digital dark ages' without Safe Harbor solution

Microsoft's top lawyer has set out a four-point plan for trans-Atlantic data sharing, which he thinks can revive the EU-US Safe Harbor pact that Europe's top court scuttled earlier this month. Microsoft president and chief legal officer Brad Smith argues in a blog post that a solution to the data-transfer issue is essential for preserving a global internet. ZDNet News; PC Advisor

Let's Encrypt free certificates now trusted by major browsers

Let's Encrypt reached a major milestone this week by announcing the project's free security certificates are now trusted by all major browsers including Firefox and Chrome. San Francisco-based Let's Encrypt is a free open-source certificate authority (CA) operating under the Internet Security Research Group (ISRG). ZDNet News

Researchers publish chip-and-PIN fraud report, $680,000 stolen by clever crooks

In a research paper published by the École Normale Supérieure University in Paris, France, and the Centre Microélectronique de Provence (CEA), researchers outlined the forensic analysis they conducted on evidence used in a fraud case four years ago. CSO Online

illusive networks Raises $22Mn to Fund Cyber Deception Technology

illusive networks has announced a $22 million Series B round of funding, led by new investor New Enterprise Associates (NEA). The round included participation from new and existing investors Bessemer Venture Partners, Marker LLC, Citi Ventures and Eric Schmidt's Innovation Endeavors. Kittu Kolluri, general partner at NEA, will join illusive networks' Board of Directors. Infosecurity-Magazine

Google, Yahoo tighten spam filtering

Google and Yahoo are expanding their use of a successful system for identifying spam. The move is part of years-long effort to implement a series of checks designed to figure out if an email really has been sent by the domain it purports to come from. CSO Online

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, October 23, 2015 8:41 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 23, 2015 / le 23 octobre 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

CIA director's emails published

WikiLeaks posted material Wednesday from what appears to be CIA director John Brennan's personal email account, including a draft security clearance application containing personal information. The material presumably was taken in a compromise of Brennan's email account by a hacker who told The New York Post he's a high school student protesting U.S. foreign policy. The hacker claimed he posed as a Verizon employee and tricked another employee into revealing Brennan's personal information. Brennan was seeking security clearance while applying for a job as a White House counterterrorism adviser. Associated Press (Calgary Herald, A19; Toronto Star; Leader-Post)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

TalkTalk cyber-attack: Boss 'very sorry for security breach'

The head of TalkTalk says she is "very sorry" for the frustration and worry caused to customers after a major cyber-attack on the firm on Wednesday. The phone and broadband provider said personal and banking details of up to four million customers may have been accessed in the "significant" attack. Chief executive Dido Harding said the company had been working through the night to try to contact all customers. TalkTalk said it was too early to know exactly who had been affected. "I'm very sorry for all the frustration, worry and concern this will inevitably be causing all of our customers," Ms Harding told BBC News. "We have been working through the night to make sure that we contact all of our customers and can reassure them about how they can keep their data safe." BBC News

Le transfert Europe-USA de données personnelles est compromis

Dans une décision rendue le 6 octobre, la Cour de justice de l'Union européenne a invalidé le « Safe Harbour », un arrangement administratif qui permettait le transfert de données personnelles entre l'Europe et les États-Unis. La décision est une conséquence des révélations d'Edward Snowden au sujet des intrusions de l'agence américaine de sécurité dans les données personnelles de milliers d'internautes. Elle remet en question le cadre juridique qui permet le transfert massif de données d'un continent à l'autre, notamment plusieurs services reposant sur des solutions « infonuagiques », comme Facebook, Google ou Amazon. L'affaire origine d'une plainte logée par un citoyen autrichien utilisateur de Facebook. Comme pour les autres abonnés résidant dans l'Union européenne, les données qu'il fournit à Facebook sont transférées, en tout ou partie, à partir de la filiale irlandaise de Facebook sur des serveurs situés sur le territoire des États-Unis. Le citoyen s'est adressé à l'autorité irlandaise de protection des données personnelles. Il a invoqué les révélations faites en 2013 par Edward Snowden au sujet des activités des services de renseignement des États Unis. Journal de Québec

Suppliers to blame for 18 per cent of cyber-security incidents: Kaspersky Lab

Third-party suppliers are to be blamed for 18 per cent of cyber-security incidents according to a recent survey conducted by Kaspersky Lab. Through the survey, the security company found that the average cost of third-party supplier cyber-crime incidents was more than $3 million for enterprises. Results showed more than a third of companies do not trust their suppliers, with a climb in the figures from 33 per cent last year up to 37 per cent in 2015. Kaspersky said the trend was the same for SMB as well as large corporations. The survey also indicated that security incidents involving third-party supplies are no less dangerous for businesses than direct cyber-attacks on a company's infrastructure. According to Kaspersky, in both cases, the cost of amends is equally high. For SMBs, the company found the average cost to be $67,000, while the figure for large corporations was $3.27 million. Security Asia

IBM SoftLayer : 1er hébergeur de spams au monde ?

Big blue affiche peut-être la plus forte croissance sur le marché des logiciels de sécurité, mais c'est aussi le propriétaire de la plus grande source mondiale de spams. Selon l'organisme anti spam à but non lucratif Spamhaus, un gang de hackers brésiliens serait en partie responsable de ce mauvais palmarès. Dans un rapport publié mercredi, l'expert en sécurité Brian Krebs qualifie la filiale SoftLayer acquise en 2013 par IBM, de prestataire de services « le plus spam-friendly de l'Internet ». Sur la liste des FAI les moins performants en terme de lutte contre le spamming, établie par Spamhaus.org, SoftLayer détient actuellement la première place. Selon l'organisme à but non lucratif, en terme d'abus, SoftLayer est le pire fournisseur de services Internet. Pire, le FAI hébergerait « les campagnes de spammeurs ». Pour la seule journée de jeudi, Spamhaus a comptabilisé 685 campagnes de spams liées à SoftLayer. Unicom-sc, qui arrive en seconde position dans cette liste, a presque l'air d'un petit joueur avec ses 232 campagnes. Le Monde informatique

La détection Anti-Malware de Google donne des faux positifs

Depuis plusieurs mois, Google a identifié les applications COLLATZ comme « ayant un virus inconnu ». J'ai demandé à Google plus de détails puisque leurs états d'analyse affirment que Collatz contient un « malware indéterminé » alors que tous les scans de virus que j'ai fait ne présentent pas de problème. Comme les autres sites s'appuient sur leurs (google) outils de sécurité, je n'ai pas été en mesure de mettre à jour le certificat SSL expiré. Comme le client BOINC ne permettra pas de passer en HTTP s'il y a un problème avec le certificat SSL (par exemple, il est expiré), je devais supprimer le certificat. Cela signifie que les connexions ne sont plus chiffrées. Merci, Google, vous avez accompli l'exact opposé de ce que vous vouliez et vous avez fait la sourde oreille à toutes les tentatives pour que vous remédiiez à la situation. BOINC

CCTV Cameras Hijacked to Form Worldwide DDoS Botnet

Over 900 CCTV cameras sporting default or weak login credentials were hacked and joined into a DDoSing botnet that covers the entire globe, as Incapsula researchers are reporting. Hacking the CCTV cameras wasn't as hard as you'd think, and as the security researchers are explaining, a simple dictionary brute-force attack was more than enough to easily crack the CCTV systems. The blame solely resides in the persons that configured the devices, who used weak login SSH or Telnet passwords, didn't change the default ones at all, or left the cameras open to outside connections in cases where it wasn't necessary. According to the Incapsula team, all compromised CCTV systems were running BusyBox, a stripped-down version of the Linux operating system, specifically built to run on IoT devices with limited memory and CPU resources. After the devices were compromised via brute-force login attacks, the .btce malware was being dropped on their system, malware derived from ELF_BASHLITE (also known as GayFgt and Lightaidra), a malware family specially designed for BusyBox setups running on ARM architectures. Softpedia

Spammers Trick Users into Opening Malicious Email 'From' UK Cops

British law enforcers are warning internet users to delete an email which appears to have been sent from Lancashire Constabulary. The force said in an update on Wednesday that the spam purports to come from "Lyn Whitehead" and asks the recipient to pay an invoice attached to the mail. Lancashire Constabulary explained the following: "If you have opened the attachment and 'enabled macros' it is very likely that all your personal data will have been breached. You MUST change all your passwords for personal accounts, including your bank accounts. This email has NOT BEEN sent from Lancashire Constabulary. A third party supplier to the Constabulary has had their data breached, as a result of the breach this Lancashire Constabulary email address has been spoofed and used to generate spam to recipients far and wide." InfoSecurity

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 27, 2015 8:26 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 27, 2015 / le 27 octobre 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CSIS spam scam returns

There's a phone scam trying to convince unsuspecting people that Canada's spy agency has discovered their computers are being used to pump out spam. I know because I got a call Monday from one of the gang. ITWorldCanada.com

SecTor 2015: IT pros — Canada's spooks want you

Among the trade show booths at this week's SecTor security conference in Toronto was one for an organization that hadn't appeared at previous IT or security shows in the area before: The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). Usually recruiting at job fairs and universities, the spy agency sent four staffers (two of them literally men in black) plus a media spokesman to this year's show to make a pitch for those with infosec skills. According to the agency's Web site, right now it wants an applications analyst/developer, IT analysts, a programmer analyst, a security assessment analyst and a systems analyst. ITWorldCanada.com

NSA warns of growing danger of cyber-attack by nation states

The deputy director of the US National Security Agency (NSA), Richard Ledgett, has warned of the increasing danger of destructive cyber attacks by states. He told the BBC: "If you are connected to the internet, you are vulnerable to determined nation-state attackers." He said nations would need to identify red lines that should not be crossed. He also said agency targets, numbered in "the high hundreds", had discussed leaks by contractor Edward Snowden, with some changing their behaviour. BBC.com

TalkTalk hack: Boy, 15, arrested in Northern Ireland released on bail

A 15-year-old boy arrested in Northern Ireland in connection with the TalkTalk hacking attack has been released on bail pending further inquiries. The Metropolitan Police, which is investigating the attack, said a County Antrim house was searched on Monday. The boy was arrested on suspicion of Computer Misuse Act offences. He was taken into custody at a County Antrim police station and was being questioned by detectives from the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The investigation being conducted by the Metropolitan Police Cyber Crime Unit, Police Service of Northern Ireland Cyber Crime Centre and National Crime Agency is continuing. The Metropolitan Police said on Tuesday that the boy had been "bailed to a date in November". BBC News; Belfast Telegraph; Wired; Irish Post; Irish Times; Financial Times; Reuters; CNet; CNBC; Info Security Magazine; The Guardian; Computer Weekly; The Telegraph; IT Pro Portal; Threat Post

FBI recommends that victims of ransomware pay up

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) advises companies that fall victim to hacks involving Cryptolocker, Cryptowall or other forms of ransomware to pay the ransom, said Joseph Bonavolonta, an assistant special agent with FBI, speaking at the Cyber Security Summit 2015 in Boston. Noting that while the agency has their back, "the ransomware is that good," the Security Ledger quoted Bonavolonta as saying. "To be honest, we often advise people just to pay the ransom" because efforts by the Bureau to defeat the encryption used have proved futile. SC Magazine

Top German official infected by highly advanced spy trojan with NSA ties

German Chancellor Angela Merkel may not be the only high-ranking leader from that country to be spied on by the National Security Agency. According to a report published over the weekend, German authorities are investigating whether the head of the German Federal Chancellery unit had his laptop infected with Regin, a highly sophisticated suite of malware programs that has been linked to the NSA and its British counterpart, the Government Communications Headquarters. Ars Technica; Engadget

New strain of malware attempts to entirely replace browser

Online security researchers at PCRisk have reported a new form of malware that imitates local installations of the Google Chrome browser to steal personal information, install more malware and displaying pop-up ads for other malicious websites. The “eFast Browser” is based on Google’s Chromium open-source browser, allowing it to maintain the look and feel of Google Chrome while disguising its malicious effects. According to MalwareBytes, in order to be as comprehensive as possible in its attacks, the eFast Browser makes itself the default browser, taking over several system file associations, including HTML, JPG, PDF, and GIF. It hijacks URL associations such as HTTP, HTTPS, and Mailto, and replaces existing Chrome desktop website shortcuts with its own versions. SC Magazine

New Campaign Shows Dridex Active, Targeting French

Two weeks after authorities announced they had taken down the botnet behind the banking malware Dridex, new research suggests the threat is alive and well. Researchers with security company Invincea announced today that they’ve noticed 60 instances of attackers dropping Dridex on users in France, during the past four days. As part of a newly reinvigorated campaign, attackers are apparently rigging Microsoft Office documents to look like receipts from hotels and stores. When users open the documents, which are being spread through phishing emails, macros communicate back and forth to create malware, PIDARAS.exe, that goes on to communicate with hosts in Japan, via a command and control server. Threat Post

DDoS botnet comprised of nearly a thousand CCTV cameras

After observing a distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attack targeting a client, researchers with Incapsula identified a DDoS botnet comprised of nearly a thousand closed-circuit television (CCTV) cameras. The attack – which consisted of HTTP GET floods peaking at 20,000 requests per second – had traffic originating from approximately 900 CCTV cameras worldwide, a Wednesday blog post said, explaining the attack targeted a “rarely-used asset of a large cloud service, catering to millions of users worldwide.” The cameras were open to being compromised because they were remotely accessible and used default or easily guessed credentials, the blog post said. SC Magazine

Following botnet disruption, researchers observe Dridex resurgence

Researchers with Invincea are warning that Dridex activity has resumed. The advisory – issued on Monday – comes weeks after law enforcement announced that the Dridex botnet had been significantly disrupted as part of a global operation, and that a 30-year-old Moldovan man had been charged with being an administrator. In a Monday email correspondence, Pat Belcher, director of security analytics at Invincea, told SCMagazine.com that the security firm has recently seen a number of localized Dridex variants targeting victims based on language and region. SC Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 27, 2015 8:26 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 27, 2015 / le 27 octobre 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CSIS spam scam returns

There's a phone scam trying to convince unsuspecting people that Canada's spy agency has discovered their computers are being used to pump out spam. I know because I got a call Monday from one of the gang. ITWorldCanada.com

SecTor 2015: IT pros — Canada's spooks want you

Among the trade show booths at this week's SecTor security conference in Toronto was one for an organization that hadn't appeared at previous IT or security shows in the area before: The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). Usually recruiting at job fairs and universities, the spy agency sent four staffers (two of them literally men in black) plus a media spokesman to this year's show to make a pitch for those with infosec skills. According to the agency's Web site, right now it wants an applications analyst/developer, IT analysts, a programmer analyst, a security assessment analyst and a systems analyst. ITWorldCanada.com

NSA warns of growing danger of cyber-attack by nation states

The deputy director of the US National Security Agency (NSA), Richard Ledgett, has warned of the increasing danger of destructive cyber attacks by states. He told the BBC: "If you are connected to the internet, you are vulnerable to determined nation-state attackers." He said nations would need to identify red lines that should not be crossed. He also said agency targets, numbered in "the high hundreds", had discussed leaks by contractor Edward Snowden, with some changing their behaviour. BBC.com

TalkTalk hack: Boy, 15, arrested in Northern Ireland released on bail

A 15-year-old boy arrested in Northern Ireland in connection with the TalkTalk hacking attack has been released on bail pending further inquiries. The Metropolitan Police, which is investigating the attack, said a County Antrim house was searched on Monday. The boy was arrested on suspicion of Computer Misuse Act offences. He was taken into custody at a County Antrim police station and was being questioned by detectives from the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The investigation being conducted by the Metropolitan Police Cyber Crime Unit, Police Service of Northern Ireland Cyber Crime Centre and National Crime Agency is continuing. The Metropolitan Police said on Tuesday that the boy had been "bailed to a date in November". BBC News; Belfast Telegraph; Wired; Irish Post; Irish Times; Financial Times; Reuters; CNet; CNBC; Info Security Magazine; The Guardian; Computer Weekly; The Telegraph; IT Pro Portal; Threat Post

FBI recommends that victims of ransomware pay up

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) advises companies that fall victim to hacks involving Cryptolocker, Cryptowall or other forms of ransomware to pay the ransom, said Joseph Bonavolonta, an assistant special agent with FBI, speaking at the Cyber Security Summit 2015 in Boston. Noting that while the agency has their back, "the ransomware is that good," the Security Ledger quoted Bonavolonta as saying. "To be honest, we often advise people just to pay the ransom" because efforts by the Bureau to defeat the encryption used have proved futile. SC Magazine

Top German official infected by highly advanced spy trojan with NSA ties

German Chancellor Angela Merkel may not be the only high-ranking leader from that country to be spied on by the National Security Agency. According to a report published over the weekend, German authorities are investigating whether the head of the German Federal Chancellery unit had his laptop infected with Regin, a highly sophisticated suite of malware programs that has been linked to the NSA and its British counterpart, the Government Communications Headquarters. Ars Technica; Engadget

New strain of malware attempts to entirely replace browser

Online security researchers at PCRisk have reported a new form of malware that imitates local installations of the Google Chrome browser to steal personal information, install more malware and displaying pop-up ads for other malicious websites. The “eFast Browser” is based on Google’s Chromium open-source browser, allowing it to maintain the look and feel of Google Chrome while disguising its malicious effects. According to MalwareBytes, in order to be as comprehensive as possible in its attacks, the eFast Browser makes itself the default browser, taking over several system file associations, including HTML, JPG, PDF, and GIF. It hijacks URL associations such as HTTP, HTTPS, and Mailto, and replaces existing Chrome desktop website shortcuts with its own versions. SC Magazine

New Campaign Shows Dridex Active, Targeting French

Two weeks after authorities announced they had taken down the botnet behind the banking malware Dridex, new research suggests the threat is alive and well. Researchers with security company Invincea announced today that they’ve noticed 60 instances of attackers dropping Dridex on users in France, during the past four days. As part of a newly reinvigorated campaign, attackers are apparently rigging Microsoft Office documents to look like receipts from hotels and stores. When users open the documents, which are being spread through phishing emails, macros communicate back and forth to create malware, PIDARAS.exe, that goes on to communicate with hosts in Japan, via a command and control server. Threat Post

DDoS botnet comprised of nearly a thousand CCTV cameras

After observing a distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attack targeting a client, researchers with Incapsula identified a DDoS botnet comprised of nearly a thousand closed-circuit television (CCTV) cameras. The attack – which consisted of HTTP GET floods peaking at 20,000 requests per second – had traffic originating from approximately 900 CCTV cameras worldwide, a Wednesday blog post said, explaining the attack targeted a “rarely-used asset of a large cloud service, catering to millions of users worldwide.” The cameras were open to being compromised because they were remotely accessible and used default or easily guessed credentials, the blog post said. SC Magazine

Following botnet disruption, researchers observe Dridex resurgence

Researchers with Invincea are warning that Dridex activity has resumed. The advisory – issued on Monday – comes weeks after law enforcement announced that the Dridex botnet had been significantly disrupted as part of a global operation, and that a 30-year-old Moldovan man had been charged with being an administrator. In a Monday email correspondence, Pat Belcher, director of security analytics at Invincea, told SCMagazine.com that the security firm has recently seen a number of localized Dridex variants targeting victims based on language and region. SC Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, November 02, 2015 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
November 2, 2015 / le 2 novembre 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Suspicious death

The Calgary police cyber crimes unit is helping detectives piece together the final days of a Calgary woman found dead in her Castleridge home last week. Police were called to Amanda Antoni's Castledale Way N.E. home just before 4 p.m. on Monday, Oct. 26, after her husband arrived home to discover her body. Calgary Sun, 19

United States, U.K. team up to test and strengthen financial cybersecurity

The U.S. and British governments will hold a joint exercise to test cyber security and information sharing arrangements involving global financial institutions, according to the U.K. National Computer Emergency Response Team. The initiative will not be a "war game" involving live testing and will instead check communication and co-ordination links between governments, authorities and companies, an emailed statement from CERT said. While it will involve financial firms, it will not test their individual responses, it said. As online criminals grow more sophisticated, the exercise is part of ongoing engagement between the U.K. and U.S. after President Barack Obama and Prime Minister David Cameron said in January the two countries would deepen cyber security ties. Further details on the initiative should be released in the next couple of weeks, CERT said. "The exercise is still in the planning stages and as such we are unable to currently confirm all the participants," the statement said. "The event will be taking place before the end of the year." Bloomberg News (National Post, FP4)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Hacking Team returns with encryption cracking tool pitch to customers

As law enforcement grumbles over the uptake in encryption services offered by technology firms, Hacking Team is keen to get on in the game and restore its client list through a new set of encryption-breaking tools. Over the past year, police agencies worldwide, the US FBI complaining the loudest, have been battling the wave of encryption use which has steadily increased in popularity since the disclosure of government surveillance projects made by former US National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden. ZDNet News

Safe Harbor ruled invalid

The data-sharing agreement known as Safe Harbor was ruled invalid on Oct. 6 by the Court of Justice of the European Union, with widespread ramifications for organizations ranging from cloud computing providers to multinational companies that move information across the Atlantic. SC Magazine

Vodafone admits hack, customer bank details stolen

Vodafone has admitted to a security breach which has led to the theft of sensitive information belonging to 1,827 customers in the United Kingdom. Last week, the telecommunications provider released a statement saying that "unauthorized account access" took place between midnight on Wednesday 28 October and midday on Thursday 29 October. ZDNet News; Infosecurity-Magazine; Computer Weekly; CNET News

Police Crack Down on DroidJack Spyware with Europe-wide Arrests

Police have raided homes and made arrests across Europe and the US as they look to crack down on an Android spyware tool dubbed 'DroidJack.' Europol revealed in a short statement that in the investigation, initiated by Germany, law enforcers from Germany, France, the UK, Belgium, Switzerland and the United States "carried out a number of house searches and arrests of suspected users of the mobile phone malware." Infosecurity-Magazine

Kaspersky announces death of CoinVault, Bitcryptor ransomware, releases all keys

Kaspersky has released all the known keys required to unlock files encrypted by the CoinVault and Bitcryptor ransomware, giving victims the chance to get their files back without paying up. The Moscow, Russia-based cybersecurity firm says both the variations of ransomware are now dead as all the decryption keys required to unlock systems infected with the malware are now in the public domain. ZDNet News; CSO

US and UK Banks Ready for Resilient Shield Cyber War Games

US and UK banks will this month take part in a major transatlantic cybersecurity exercise to test their readiness to withstand a serious attack on their systems. Operation Resilient Shield was announced by prime minister David Cameron on his visit to see Barack Obama in January. Infosecurity-Magazine

LightCyber game lets IT pros become the attacker

It's only a game, but LightCyber hopes its Cyber Attack Training System (CATS) helps IT folks think like attackers in order to better defend their networks. The online game sets players up with stolen login credentials for a networked machine and turns them loose with Metasploit tools. The idea is for security pros to discover and compromise other devices on the network with the goal of capturing a specific file. PC Advisor

UK police arrest third person in TalkTalk breach investigation

UK police arrested a third suspect on Saturday relating to the breach at communications provider TalkTalk, which said the amount of data exposed is less than initially thought. CSO

Debate: Economic sanctions and retaliatory measures are an effective response to foreign cyberattacks

An opinion piece states, "Sanctions are an effective counter to foreign cyber attack when they are designed around the primary goal, effects, and management of critical success factors. The goal must be to deter future state-sponsored or enabled cyber attacks..." SC Magazine

The Encryption Fallacy

An opinion piece states, "Yet another intrusion with data theft. Yet another chorus of yells for encryption. I could be referring to the eBay intrusion from last year (or the Sony incident from November 2014...or any number of recent data loss incidents) with the subsequent hysteria over their not encrypting certain personal information at rest..." Infosecurity-Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, November 03, 2015 8:40 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
November 3, 2015 / le 3 novembre 2015

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Hacking Team returns with encryption cracking tool pitch to customers

As law enforcement grumbles over the uptake in encryption services offered by technology firms, Hacking Team is keen to get on in the game and restore its client list through a new set of encryption-breaking tools. Over the past year, police agencies worldwide, the US FBI complaining the loudest, have been battling the wave of encryption use which has steadily increased in popularity since the disclosure of government surveillance projects made by former US National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden. ZDNet News

Tor Messenger: an alternative solution for encrypted untraceable instant messaging

Following in the wake of its web browser, the anonymous network Tor has released a beta version of a new instant messenger. Tor Messenger is a new instant messaging program based on Instantbird, an open source instant messenger client provided by the Mozilla Foundation. Relaxnews (Yahoo! News)

Canada is among top malware-hosting countries but stays relatively safe, researchers say

In the threat landscape, Canadians may be helping attack others while avoiding the brunt of it. These are among the findings of Kaspersky Lab's Q3 malware report, which found that Canada and Sweden are newcomers to a list of "Top 10 countries where online resources are seeded with malware." The list saw the U.S. and Russia lead in their share of web attack sources, followed by the Netherlands and Germany. China, Sweden and Canada were among the top 10, but ranked the lowest. The report said that statistics were based on "the physical location of the online resources that were used in attacks ... (web pages containing redirects to exploits, sites containing exploits and other malware, botnet command centers, etc.)" Researchers matched domain names against actual domain IP addresses, after which a physical location or GEOIP is determined. Yet, Canadian internet users seem to stay relatively safe in the global exchange of malware. Canada ranked as the second most secure country, behind Japan, with only 2.87 per cent of users attacked in the past quarter, followed by Denmark, Sweden and Australia. Computer Dealer News

Spam bot leverages Linux-based CMSs, report warns

For some time infosec pros have known that plugins for WordPress, Joomla and other content management systems are being leveraged by attackers. More evidence of that has come in a report from Akamai's Security Intelligence Research Team (SIRT), which discovered a widely distributed botnet that leverages CMS systems to launch co-ordinated brute-force spamming campaigns. "The portions that could be mapped account for over 83,000 unique infections across 2 of the 4 infection layers," says the report. While binary infections only target Linux, other php based infections were found running on all major server operating systems—Windows, Linux, os x, Unix, SunOS, and variants of bsd. Akamai has dubbed the botnet 'Torte' because of its multiple layers. IT World Canada

Cyber attack against key Bulgarian institutions still ongoing: official

A cyber attack targeting websites of key state institutions in Bulgaria is still ongoing, an official said here on Tuesday. Valeri Borisov, Deputy Minister of Transport, Information Technologies and Communications, told reporters that websites of institutions such as the Ministry of Interior, State Agency for National Security, parliament, president and Central Election Commission (CEC) have experienced difficulties as a result of a distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attack, which initially hit the website of CEC on Oct. 25. "A website of an important state institution was attacked two billion times within 24 hours," Borisov said on the sidelines of a conference on e-government. There was no way to count how many attacks were made against all websites in the country during the last 10 days, he added. Xinhua

Plus de 300 000 nouveaux malwares mobiles au 3e trimestre

Selon Kaspersky, le nombre de nouveaux malwares mobiles a progressé de près de 11 % entre le 2^e et le 3^e trimestre. Principalement des adwares. Le nombre de nouveaux malwares apparus sur le marché mobile a connu un nouveau bond au cours des derniers mois. Selon le rapport IT threat evolution de Kaspersky détaillant les menaces rencontrées lors du troisième trimestre 2015, pas moins de 323 374 agents malveillants ont été créés sur la période. En croissance de 10,8% par rapport au deuxième trimestre et une augmentation multipliée par plus de 3 depuis le début de l'année. Le rapport du laboratoire de l'éditeur s'appuie sur les données récoltées depuis son réseau de veille, le Kaspersky Security Network (KSN), tiré des remontées d'informations d'une partie des 400 millions de clients de l'éditeur répartis dans 213 pays et territoires. Silicon.fr

SME Suppliers Falling Short of Security Expectations – Report

Nearly 70% of procurement managers in large organizations believe SME suppliers could do more to protect sensitive client data, according to new research from KPMG. The global consulting firm polled 175 UK procurement chiefs across several sectors and found reassuringly that standards are high when it comes to vetting suppliers. A large majority (86%) said they would consider removing a firm if it suffered a data breach and nearly half (47%) claimed suppliers are contractually obliged to report such an incident. Nearly all respondents (94%) agreed with the statement that standards were important when awarding a contract, with around two-thirds requiring their suppliers to demonstrate certification by Cyber Essentials, ISO, PCI DSS or another respected accreditation body. If there is no accreditation to speak of, 41% of respondents claimed they would expect the supplier to foot the bill in the near future. George Quigley, a partner in KPMG's Cyber Security practice, argued that SMEs can find it difficult to understand the nature of the threat landscape and how they could be exposed to risk. There are also challenges around "defining and identifying" which data is critical and therefore needs protecting. Infosecurity Magazine

Hackers increase attacks on Russian online banking

Amid the growing number of cyber-attacks on the Internet systems of Russian banks in recent months, Russian banks are considering designing new systems of IT security. Details of the new systems being developed by Sberbank, VTB and other leading banks have not been disclosed. A spokesman for the Russian Association of Banks told SCMagazineUK.com that last year total losses at Russian banks from cyber-attacks on their Internet banking systems amounted to more than RUB 10 billion (£167m, US$250m). It is expected that these figures may increase significantly this year, as hacker attacks on the online banking systems grow more sophisticated. SC Magazine

US and UK to test financial cyber-security this month

The United States and Britain will test later this month how its regulators would respond if their financial sectors suffered a major cyber-attack or broader IT problems, a British official said today. The test, for which no date has yet been set, will focus on how regulators for the world's two biggest financial centres in New York and London communicate in an emergency, a spokesman for British government cyber-security body CERT-UK said. "It is testing how we would react to 'x' scenario, how would our colleagues in the US react to same, (and) how would we then coordinate communications with each other, to the sector and within the sector," he said. "There will be no testing of cash machines coming down, banks coming down or anything like that," he added, contradicting an earlier media report. US President Barack Obama and British Prime Minister David Cameron agreed last January to hold the joint exercise this year and coordinate their responses to an online attack on their financial sectors. Reuters (Himalayan Times)

Anti ad-block firm PageFair becomes cyberattack victim, distributes malware

Over 500 websites were compromised over the weekend due to analytics software provided to publishers by PageFair. Mobile ad-blocking is a hot topic. Browser add-ons and mobile apps are slowly rising in popularity with consumers looking for a cleaner Web experience, but as a result, content publishers relying on advertising models which pay out for eyeballs and clicks are steadily losing revenue. Many publishers use third-parties to provide ads -- which, unfortunately, can also sometimes allow malware to slip through the net and compromise websites and visitor systems. This technique, known as malvertising, has struck high-profile targets such as Yahoo and UK newspaper The Daily Mail. PageFair is an anti-adblock firm which provides analytics to publishers who wish to see how much revenue they are losing due to ad-blocking software impacting these networks. Perhaps ironically, the company's free analytics mimicked ad networks which distribute malware over the weekend -- through its use by a cybercriminal to propel Trojans through websites using the software and towards visitor devices. ZDNet

Chimera ransomware targets German SMEs, threatens to leak sensitive data

A new version of the Chimera ransomware [German] is hounding German firms, attacking corporate Windows systems and threatening to release sensitive information should the target not pay up. The attack is delivered through fake emails sent via different addresses -- mostly from the domain @emialn.de, but not exclusively. The emails are supposedly sent from individuals claiming to be looking for a job or offering a service. The body text contains a malicious link to a Dropbox address with a downloadable file. Once opened, the programme proceeds to encrypt local data as well as content on linked network drives, locking the computer and posting a ransom note. In German the extortion message demands a payment of 2.45 bitcoin (approx. £610) to decrypt the files. If the company fails to make the payment, the criminals promise to leak personal data including Word, Excel and PDF documents, photos and videos, as well as any stored corporate information. The Stack

Windows Legacy Layer Used to Bypass EMET Security Measures

The Windows WoW64 subsystem used to support older (or newer) 32-bit applications on 64-bit architectures can be leveraged to bypass security measures added by Microsoft with the introduction of the Enhanced Mitigation Experience Toolkit (EMET). WoW64, or "Windows 32-bit on Windows 64-bit," is a subsystem (component) of recent versions of the Windows operating system, which allow Windows 64-bit versions to run applications designed for 32-bit processors. WoW64 plays a crucial part in the Windows OS, working as a legacy layer that allows older tools to run on more modern hardware and software. On the other hand, EMET is a collection of security measures packed into one single tool, which Microsoft uses to mitigate and protect Windows computers from vulnerabilities found in third-party applications. In previous years, security researchers have proved many times that various other exploit mitigation tools and antivirus solutions lose their effectiveness when running on the WoW64 subsystem. Softpedia

CoinVault and Bitcryptor, R.I.P.

Kaspersky and Dutch police have shut down these two strains of ransomware in a joint effort, arresting the authors and seizing the decryption keys. The bell has tolled for CoinVault and Bitcryptor ransomware according to international cybersecurity giant Kaspersky. The final blow was dealt just recently in a joint effort between Dutch law enforcement authorities and Kaspersky. This particular kind of malware was first spotted by Kaspersky in late 2014. In April, Dutch police seized a CoinVault server after which the campaign took a bit of a holiday before coming back with Bitcryptor, a new and improved version. This two-stroke body blow to the pervasive set of ransomwares hit in two forms: first, both their authors were arrested in one fell swoop by the Dutch authorities in mid-September, and second, Kaspersky has released all 14,000 of the ransomwares' decryption keys, allowing those affected to easily un-ransom themselves. SC Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, November 10, 2015 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique November 10, 2015 / le 10 novembre 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Whistleblower to deliver address for Queen's

A man some people consider a hero and others believe is a criminal is to present the opening address at a Queen's University conference later this week. Edward Snowden, 32, the former Central Intelligence Agency employee and United States government contractor who leaked thousands of classified documents that revealed the extent of global surveillance programs operated by the U.S. and its English-speaking allies, is to present the opening keynote speech at the Queen's International Affairs Association's Model United Nations Invitational on Thursday. The event is to include 250 student delegates from 15 schools across North America. Snowden, who has asylum in Russia, is to speak about cyber security at the conference via video link (...) Last month, Lyon, author of the book Surveillance after Snowden, received a $2.5 million grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada to conduct a five-year study of big data and surveillance and how it affects the everyday lives of people. Rogers said the talk is to touch on the previous Conservative government's controversial Bill C-51 and the potential for changes to that legislation by the new Liberal government. Bill C-51, the Anti-terrorism Act 2015, broadened the authority of Canada's surveillance and law enforcement agencies by giving them more power to thwart suspected terrorist plots - not just gather information about them. Lauren Craik, president of the international affairs association and a third-year economics student, said the talk is to be tailored to the Canadian audience. Kingston Whig-Standard, A3

Europe declaws Iran's 'rocket kitten' hackers

European authorities have taken action to take down a cyber espionage campaign believed to be linked to Iran's powerful Revolutionary Guard, the first operation of its kind since Tehran signed a nuclear treaty, researchers say. The hacker group - dubbed "Rocket Kitten" by security experts who have been hunting the hacker group since early 2014 - has mounted cyberattacks on high-profile political and military figures globally since that time, according to researchers from several cyber security firms who have monitored its activities. The action could hamper Tehran's efforts to gather sensitive intelligence from rivals including Saudi Arabia, Israel, Turkey, the United States. Reuters (Toronto Sun, A46; Edmonton Sun, Calgary Sun, Winnipeg Sun)

Parsing the risks in cyber insurance

When an insurance company sells protection against a house fire or car accident, it leans on decades of data from past experience to price policies. For every 1,000 houses you insure you have a rough idea how many will burn. That basic yet key ingredient is all but missing in the growing business of cyber insurance, in which business is booming as the list of hacking incidents from Target to Ashley Madison grows. Add to the mix the ever-changing nature of hacks and different levels of security sophistication among companies, and the challenges mount alongside the opportunities. "There are many unknowns," said Nick Galletto, cyber risk services leader for the Americas at Deloitte. Hacks such as the one that hit adultery website Ashley Madison can give an idea of the cost of the fallout of such an event. But that doesn't come close to providing the depth of data insurers use to create and measure the underwriting standards when they sell protection against house fires, break-ins and car accidents. Financial Post, FP3

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Linux hit by crypto-ransomware - but attackers botch private key

Admins are facing a variant of Linux malware that encrypts files on infected web servers. But the good news for now is the private key that locks down those files is predictable. The crypto-ransomware is aimed at Linux system administrators and demands exactly one Bitcoin to restore access to key files. One Bitcoin was worth about $420 last week but is currently $375. According to Russian antivirus firm Dr Web, which labeled the ransomware Linux.Encode.1, the files it encrypts suggests the main target is website administrators whose machines have web servers deployed on them. ZDNet, Infosecurity Magazine

CryptoWall 4.0 the nastiest strain yet

The fourth version of the CryptoWall ransomware has landed in the wild, equipped with better evasion techniques and tactics to thwart antivirus protection and detection. Ransomware attacks computers and encrypts user files and folders via infected email attachments, with attackers demanding ransom payments to unlock the scrambled documents. Users are told to make the payment by a specific deadline or risk having the private key to unlock the files deleted. The active CryptoWall ransomware spawned from CryptoLocker, which is thought to have extorted more than $3 million from victims before the botnet used to distribute it - Gameover Zeus - was taken down last year. SC Magazine (IT News)

New ransomware threatens to make private files public

Criminals has upped the ante with new ransomware that threatens to not only encrypt data but also to publish those files on the internet if victims don't pay up. According to a blog post by IT security organisation, the Anti-Botnet Advisory Centre, a service of the German Association of the Internet Industry, the malware has been doing the rounds on computers within German businesses and organisations. The malware has been sent via email to firms disguised as job applications or business offers. The emails contain a link to a malicious file hosted on Dropbox. Once installed, Chimera encrypts both local files and those on network drives connected to the machine. When rebooted, the computer displays a ransom note on the user's desktop asking for a payment of around €630 in Bitcoin to provide a key to decrypt files. SC Magazine

Malvertising threat on the rise but ad-blocking tools could stem the tide

Malvertising is cheap, effective, difficult to combat and, unfortunately for internet users, on the rise. It is now routinely used by cyber criminals to inject malware into unwitting computer systems and cause havoc by exploiting flaws in popular software such as Adobe Flash, as Jérôme Segura, senior security researcher at Malwarebytes, explains. "Malvertising is an effective and very profitable infection vector and it gives [cyber criminals] the ability to target millions of people in a few minutes," he said. "Flash is a very popular platform which has suffered from many exploits and zero-days so it is a piece of software that is using in drive-by download attacks. It just so happens that Flash is also heavily used by the advertising industry because it provides dynamic content. v3.co.uk

Quick Heal: IoT and iOS the new targets of malware

High profile targeted attacks on devices running Apple's iOS and creative Internet of Things (IoT) attacks are on the hacking agenda, according to the latest quarterly threat report from security provider, Quick Heal. In its third quarter threat report, Quick Heal predicts iOS will become the new target for Android malware authors and hackers. "It is expected that Android malware will soon be altered to affect iOS users as well, and jailbroken iOS devices will be the first wave of targets for these attacks," Quick Heal said. "Recently, the 'XcodeGhost' malware was found on the Apple App Store and this is just the beginning of such attacks." ZDNet

20,000 Popular Apps Trojanized with Adware

Trojanized, auto-rooting adware is emerging as a major force in the Android ecosystem, affecting about 20,000 popular apps, including Candy Crush, Facebook, GoogleNow, NYTimes, Okta, Snapchat, Twitter, WhatsApp and many others. The malware roots the device automatically after the user installs it, embeds itself as a system application and becomes nearly impossible to remove. "Adware, which has traditionally been used to aggressively push ads, is now becoming trojanized and sophisticated," said Lookout Security researcher Michael Bentley, in a blog. "This is a new trend for adware and an alarming one at that." Infosecurity Magazine

Nuclear Exploit Kit malware drives users to Kelihos Trojan family

Internet security firm Zscaler says it has discovered a website compromise attack on the Internet pages belonging to the International Council for Women. This compromise led users to a Nuclear Exploit Kit (EK) landing site, a form of malware on a par with its Angler Exploit Kit (EK) infection cycle cousin. In this particular case, the end user could get infected through the 'information stealing' Kelihos bot if the full exploit cycle executes successfully. A malicious iframe leads users to a Nuclear EK landing page that was heavily obfuscated to evade security software detection. Upon successful execution of the obfuscated JavaScript, a malicious Flash file is downloaded on the victim's machine. Upon successful exploitation, a new variant of the Kelihos bot is downloaded and installed on the victim's machine. SC Magazine

Cameron Orders Government Cybersecurity Tests

Prime minister David Cameron has ordered a series of cyber attack exercises to be carried out in every government department in order to test their resilience to hackers. The PM's decision was made following a briefing by Cabinet Office minister, Matthew Hancock, in which he warned of the dangers of an attack similar to the one which struck the US Office of Personnel Management (OPM), according to the Sunday Times. While much of the UK media has been focused of late on the Talk Talk attack, which may in the end have compromised less than 160,000 customers, the OPM hack earlier this year was far more damaging. Infosecurity Magazine

Cyber attacks threatening national security double in past year, GCHQ reveals

Cyber attacks that threaten national security have doubled in a year with the UK now facing up to seven serious assaults every day, GCHQ has warned. The intelligence agency is identifying 200 cyber attacks every month that either target critical organisations and networks or come from significant sources, such as hostile states. That compares to 100 a month just last summer. Ciaran Martin, director general for cyber security at GCHQ, said: "These are attacks that are of significance to national security. "That is either because of who the aggressor or the victim is or because of the nature of the attack." Telegraph

The top security threats of 2016

It's been an interesting year in the world of cybersecurity. Ransomware is running rampant across multiple platforms, the Ashley Madison hack left heartbreak in its wake, Jeeps were hacked and taken offroad and TalkTalk is fumbling after the latest data breach allowed cyberattackers to dance away with customer data. We're seeing a shift as threat actors turn towards digital methods to cause harm or get their point across -- but what are we likely to see next year? According to Intel's McAfee security team, things are going to get interesting. A selection of 2016 threats to cybersecurity are below: ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, December 07, 2015 8:59 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique December 7, 2015 / le 7 décembre 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Zombies informatiques neutralisés

Le CRTC a récemment exécuté un mandat à Toronto pour le retrait d'un serveur de commande et de contrôle de la famille de maliciels Win32/Dorkbot. Ces maliciels ont infecté au-delà d'un million d'ordinateurs personnels dans plus de 190 pays, a précisé le Conseil de la radiodiffusion et des télécommunications canadiennes (CRTC). « Ces réseaux de zombies, qui sont très dangereux, sont utilisés aux fins d'activités illégales et peuvent mener au vol d'identité et à la fraude. Cette intervention montre que les partenariats entre les organismes d'application de la loi à l'échelle nationale et internationale sont essentiels en vue de lutter contre les cybermenaces transnationales », a indiqué Manon Bombardier, cadre en chef de Conformité et enquêtes du CRTC. (...) Dorkbot se propage au moyen d'une clé USB, des programmes de messagerie instantanée et des réseaux sociaux. Une fois qu'on a porté atteinte à l'intégrité d'un ordinateur, on peut lui ordonner de voler les mots de passe pour effectuer des transactions bancaires et les paiements en ligne. Il est aussi possible de télécharger et installer des maliciels dangereux et s'unir à d'autres ordinateurs infectés pour expédier des demandes multiples à un serveur en vue de dépasser sa capacité de réponse. Cette situation est aussi connue comme une attaque par déni de service. Le mandat a été exécuté conformément à la Loi canadienne antipourriel. Aux fins de cette enquête, le CRTC a collaboré avec plusieurs partenaires, dont le Federal Bureau of Investigation, Europol, Interpol, Microsoft inc., la Gendarmerie royale du Canada, Sécurité publique Canada et le Centre canadien de réponse aux incidents cybernétiques. Presse Canadienne (Journal Montréal, 38)

Who is listening as your children talk to their toys?

Your daughter rips open the wrapping paper and screams with excitement - it's Talk To Me Tammy! After connecting the doll to your home's wireless network through a smartphone app, she and Tammy start chatting. Tammy tells her jokes, quizzes her on some math questions and says her favourite colour is pink. She asks your daughter lots of questions about her likes and dislikes, hopes and dreams, and family and friends. The next day, you notice advertisements for products your daughter told Tammy she wants on your Facebook page. That's because buried in Tammy's terms of service - which you didn't read - was a clause authorizing the toy company to sell the data Tammy collects to marketers. Meanwhile, hackers who don't want to pay the toy company for your daughter's valuable data are working on a way to access it for free. Financial Post (Edmonton Journal, B6; Calgary Herald)

La police enquête sur un vol de données personnelles d'employés la STO

Des employés de la Société de Transport de l'Outaouais (STO) auraient été les victimes de vol d'identité. La STO a été avertie de la situation, mercredi, par une institution bancaire qui venait de recevoir une quinzaine de demandes en quelques jours de personnes disant travailler pour le transporteur public. Radio-Canada ; Le Droit, 10 (2015-12-05)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

After Paris Attacks, French Cops Want to Block Tor and Forbid Free Wi-Fi

After the recent Paris terror attacks, French law enforcement wants to have several powers added to a proposed law, including the move to forbid and block the use of the Tor anonymity network, according to an internal document from the Ministry of Interior seen by French newspaper Le Monde. That document talks about two proposed pieces of legislation, one around the state of emergency, and the other concerning counter-terrorism. Regarding the former, French law enforcement wish to "Forbid free and shared wi-fi connections" during a state of emergency. This comes from a police opinion included in the document: the reason being that it is apparently difficult to track individuals who use public Wi-Fi networks. As the latter, law enforcement would like "to block or forbid communications of the Tor network." Motherboard (2015-12-06)

NSA's shuttered program was 'a sacrificial lamb' in U.S. mass surveillance

The National Security Agency in the United States may have shuttered its controversial bulk phone record collection program, but that doesn't mean people living in that country suddenly have their communications free from government scrutiny... Snowden also revealed that Canada's electronic spy agency tracks millions of downloads daily by people around the world, including Canadians. While it's hard to know much about the Canadian Security Establishment because of the secrecy surrounding the agency, there is "evidence of the same kind of indiscriminate surveillance as the NSA engages in," says David Lyon, the director of Queen's University's surveillance studies centre and author of Surveillance after Snowden. CBC News (2015-12-06)

Global operation targets Dorkbot botnet

An international operation involving law enforcement organisations, government cyber security teams and private organisations has targeted the Dorkbot botnet. Europol, Interpol, the US department of homeland security, the US National Cyber Investigative Joint Taskforce and the FBI partnered with Microsoft and other private sector organisations to disrupt the Dorkbot infrastructure, including command and control servers in Asia, Europe, and North America. This included seizing domains to disrupt the botnet operators' capacity to control their victims' computers. Computer Weekly; Infosecurity Magazine; Engadget (2015-12-04); ZDNet (2015-12-04)

Anonymous calls for internet "trolling day" against ISIS

Anonymous has called for the internet to target ISIS in an international "trolling day". An anonymous post requests that on 11 December, anti-ISIS protesters and internet users band together to ridicule the group. The plan mostly revolves around mocking ISIS on social media, with a list of instructions for attacking the group on Twitter, Instagram, Facebook and YouTube, as well as offline protests and demonstrations. While the group has lately become known for slightly more sophisticated hacking operations, this particular plan of attack evokes Anonymous' roots as puerile internet pranksters. IT Pro Portal; Metro News UK

Widespread exploit kit, ransomware program, and password stealer mixed into dangerous malware cocktail

An ongoing attack campaign combines a very effective password stealer, the most widespread exploit kit, called Angler, and the latest version of the infamous CryptoWall file-encrypting ransomware program. The attackers first use the Pony computer Trojan to pilfer passwords from compromised computers, including FTP and SSH credentials that webmasters use to administer websites, according to researchers from Heimdal Security. PC World

Hackers hide malware inside Dropbox accounts to target media organizations

A new form of malware that targets mass media agencies has been discovered by researchers at the US-based security firm FireEye. The malware was detected in Hong Kong where it was being used to target a small number of media agencies with the initial targets of the attack being newspapers, radio stations and television studios. The malware leaves a user vulnerable by offering a backdoor to their system. The way in which this is achieved is unique because its command and control or C&C server is hidden inside Dropbox accounts. FireEye was able to trace the malware back to a group of hackers by the name admin@338, who is believed to have ties with the Chinese government. Beta News

Cash machines in malware risk as embedded Windows XP reaches end of life

Tens of thousands of cash machines could become vulnerable to malware and DDoS attacks next month when support for the embedded version of Windows XP comes to an end. From January 2016, Microsoft will be issuing no further security patches or updates for the OS which is still used in the majority of ATMs to deliver cash to customers in the UK and elsewhere around the world. SC Magazine

New payment card malware hard to detect and remove

FireEye says it has discovered a type of malware designed to steal payment card data that can be very difficult to detect and remove. The cybercriminal group behind the malware, which FireEye nicknamed "FIN1," is suspected of being in Russia and has been known to target financial institutions. The malware, which FIN1 calls Nemesis, infected an organization that processes financial transactions, which FireEye did not identify. IT World

Ponmocup is the '15 million' machine botnet you've never heard of Botconf One of the world's most successful, oldest, and largest botnets is an underestimated and largely-unknown threat that has over time infected 15 million machines and made millions plundering bank accounts. The findings from a team of eight Fox IT researchers say the 'Ponmocup' botnet controlled 2.4 million infections at its peak in 2011 and now holds about half a million machines under its power. Lead author Maarten van Dantzig presented the work at the BotConf conference this week in the paper Ponmocup: A giant hiding in the shadows. The Register (2015-12-03)

Senators Want Government Ransomware Update

Two US senators have written to the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and Attorney General seeking more information on how the government is keeping federal PCs free of ransomware. Tom Carper and Ron Johnson sent the missives to Jeh Johnson and Loretta Lynch following the rise of variants such as CryptoLocker, CryptoWall and CryptoDefense. CryptoLocker managed to make its owners $27 million in just two months, while CryptoWall has netted hackers over $18 million, the senators claimed. Infosecurity Magazine; Hacked

Lawmakers want proof China is honoring hacking pledge

The clock is ticking on the Obama administration to determine whether China is adhering to a September pledge to eradicate corporate hacking. Over the past few months, U.S. officials have fended off accusations that Beijing has not scaled back its massive hacking apparatus by insisting it will take time to assess whether the Asian power is complying with its agreement to cease conducting — or knowingly supporting — economic espionage. But pressure will rise again in the coming months if the White House doesn't create some type of metric that can show, either way, whether China is complying. The Hill

This is why tech toys are dangerous

A Hong Kong-based company called VTech got hacked Nov. 14. VTech makes a wide variety of consumer electronics and is one of the world's largest toy makers. Some of their toys encourage the use of VTech's Kid Connect program, which enables kids to chat with parents and download content. The hacker exposed the breach to the online publication Motherboard and claimed that the point of the hack was to expose VTech's bad security (...). A Hong Kong-based company called Vtech got hacked Nov. 14. VTech makes a wide variety of consumer electronics and is one of the world's largest toy makers. Some of their toys encourage the use of VTech's Kid Connect program, which enables kids to chat with parents and download content. The hacker exposed the breach to the online publication Motherboard and claimed that the point of the hack was to expose VTech's bad security. Computerworld

Hack Me: A Geopolitical Analysis of the Government Use of Surveillance Software

In summer 2015 a South Korean intelligence officer identified only as Lim was found alone on a mountain road, slumped over in his car. Beside his body was a piece of burnt coal that had emitted a fatal dose of carbon monoxide poison, next to a three-page suicide note. Lim had reportedly succumbed to the pressure surrounding his work to implement controversial tracking software within the South Korean National Intelligence Service (NIS). The note suggests that as Lim lay in the car, one Italian company was clearly on his mind: 'Hacking Team.' A few days earlier, in a major twist of irony, Milan-based Hacking Team was itself hacked. More than 400GB of internal data was extracted by unknown perpetrators, who then gleefully used the organization's own Twitter account to break the news. Infosecurity Magazine

Broadcast Media / Médias télédiffusés :

CBC News – The National provided a report on the RCMP's Cybercrime Strategy which was announced earlier this week. Rough Transcript (2015-12-04)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, December 23, 2015 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
December 23, 2015 / le 23 décembre 2015

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Apple CEO backs use of mobile encryption - District attorney says that 'crimes go unsolved' because of technology on iPhones

Apple CEO Tim Cook defended the company's use of encryption on its mobile devices, saying users should not have to trade privacy for U.S. national security. In a broad interview with 60 Minutes on the future of Apple, Cook stood by the company's stance of refusing to offer encrypted texts and messages from users. Cook also discussed the idea of "back door" access for law enforcement, claiming any one could potentially swipe sensitive data. "There's likely health information, there's financial information," Cook says, describing a user's iPhone. "There are intimate conversations with your family, or your co-workers. There's probably business secrets and you should have the ability to protect it. And the only way we know how to do that, is to encrypt it. Why is that? It's because if there's a way to get in, then somebody will find the way in." Cook says Apple co-operates with law enforcement requests, but can't access encrypted information on users' smartphones. According to a page on Apple's website detailing government requests, Apple says encryption data is tied to the device's passcode. Cook also dismisses the notion iPhone users should swap privacy for security. "We're America. We should have both." USA Today (Toronto Star, S8; Hamilton Spectator)

Sorting out cybersecurity truth is tricky

His reputation scorched by Edward Snowden, the former director of the National Security Agency is heading a cybersecurity startup that aims to short circuit data leakers, cyber warriors, terrorists and thieves. Keith Alexander's new company, IronNet, is just one of dozens, possibly hundreds, of cybersecurity startups, a group that over the last couple of years has attracted nearly $5 billion in investments. "It's the new hotness," said Alex Pinto, who runs the MLSec Project, an open-source cybersecurity outfit. "There are so many startups out there, you could not fall over and not hit one," said Eric Schou, director of product marketing for security at HP Enterprise. Like many others, IronNet employs a technology called behaviour analytics or behaviour modelling, which purports to learn hacker patterns and monitor networks to detect foul play before serious damage is done. Whether any of these startups can effectively employ what looks like cutting-edge technology is hard to say, because, like cybersecurity in general, their doings are wrapped in secrecy. Good luck to any potential customers trying to sort out what works and what doesn't. Cybersecurity websites are filled with fancy technical language with little detail. IronNet, for example, says it offers "breakthrough, patent-pending technology" with "complex behavioural modelling, big data analytics and proactive responses." One company says it uses "hyper-dimensional security analytics," while many companies don't bother to explain how their systems work at all, at least not until you contact the sales rep. Behaviour analytics is "a big deal" for cybersecurity, said Avivah Litan, vice-president at research firm Gartner. "But it's already a buzzword. Everybody says they have it." Los Angeles Times (Waterloo Region Record, C3)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Man charged with hacking celebs' emails, stealing

A Bahamian man hacked into celebrities' email accounts to steal unreleased movie and TV scripts and sex tapes and peddled some of the scripts, boasting to an undercover agent that he had dossiers on at least 130 stars and bigshots in entertainment, sports and media, federal prosecutors in New York said. Seattle Times (2015-12-22)

Thousands of prisoners in Washington got out early because of a software glitch

Washington Governor Jay Inslee has ordered corrections officials to halt some prison releases after announcing today around 3,200 prisoners were released early due to a programming error, according to a report from NBC affiliate King-5 News. The error dates back to 2002, when the Washington Supreme Court ordered the Department of Corrections (DOC) to apply "good time" credit, such as participation in rehabilitation programs, earned in county prisons to state sentences. For more than a decade, the DOC's system has been over-crediting some inmates and releasing them before their sentences were up. The Verge (2015-12-22)

Sanrio probes reported Hello Kitty hack exposing 3.3 million users - Breach not yet confirmed by Sanrio and it's not clear if financial info was exposed

Sanrio, the Japanese owner of the Hello Kitty brand, on Monday said it was investigating a report that its database was hacked and private information on 3.3 million users was exposed. The leaked data from the fan site of the Japanese toy company includes information like users' full names, email addresses and encrypted passwords, according to the report by security website CSOnline.com, which cited researcher Chris Vickery. "The alleged security breach of the SanrioTown site is currently under investigation. Information will be made available once confirmed," said a spokeswoman for Sanrio, best known for its popular Hello Kitty character which emblazons items ranging from stationery to clothing. It was not clear if the exposed data contained any financial information. Reuters (CBC News) (2015-12-22)

New botnet found popping PoS systems via Windows update vulnerability

New research from security analysis firm Trend Micro has highlighted a new strain of point-of-sale (PoS) malware that comes on the back of related incidents in hotel checkout systems. Researchers say the malware they have identified is linked to an early version of a potentially powerful, adaptable and invisible botnet that seeks out PoS systems within networks. Trend Micro threat analysts Erika Mendoza and Jay Yaneza explain that this malware has already extended its reach to small and medium-sized business networks all over the world, including a healthcare organisation in the US. The name Operation Black Atlas is in reference to BlackPoS, the malware primarily used in this operation. SC Magazine (2015-12-22)

Botnet of Aethra Routers Used for Brute-Force WordPress Sites

Italian security researchers from VoidSec have come across a botnet structure that was using vulnerable Aethra Internet routers and modems to launch brute-force attacks on WordPress websites. This particular incident was uncovered after one of the VoidSec researchers was sifting through his WordPress log file and found a brute-force attack coming from the same IP range. After further investigation, all the IPs came from six Internet Service Providers (ISP): Fastweb, Albacom (BT-Italia), Clouditalia, Qcom, WIND, and BSI Assurance UK, four of which are from Italy. What all these networks had in common were Aethra routers. VoidSec researchers narrowed down most of the attacks to these devices. Softpedia News

DDoS attacks rise by 180 percent in 2015

To some this will come as a surprise, to others not as much, but the Distributed Denial of Service, also known as DDoS -- was the most popular type of cyber-attack in the past year. According to a report by security firm Akamai, there has been a jump of 180 percent in the number of DDoS attacks in 2015. The ending year also saw records broken in the size of the attacks, as well. The DDoS is a type of attack where a large number of infected machines are ordered to try and access a particular website. With millions of computers trying to open the same site, it eventually crumbles under pressure, bringing the site down. This can lead to losses in both reputation and finance -- with damages going up into millions. Beta News

The Worst Hacks of 2015

Last year we witnessed some of the most shocking cyberattacks ever, with North Korea allegedly hacking Sony over the release of a dumb comedy movie to unknown hackers spilling the private nude pictures of dozens of celebrities. For some, it was the year hacking truly became the norm. But somehow, 2015 was worse. Hacking and data breaches weren't just the norm, but they reached far and wide, hitting victims of all kinds, from regular consumers, to government employees, and even children and cheaters. It seemed like no one was spared. We've decided to look back to 2015 and revisit not only the worst data breaches, but those that pushed the boundaries and redefined the world of information security. In no particular order, here's our list. Motherboard

Attackers using social media to spread malware with 'free' offers

Security awareness training usually focuses on the online communications people use most: Email. However, a recent malware campaign aimed at getting banking credentials of people in Brazil is a reminder that social media is also a vehicle for tricking employees. According to researchers at cloud security provider Zscaler, attackers are using Facebook, Twitter and other sites to offer short links (like those composed by bit.ly) to coupon vouchers and free software applications like WhatsApp and Avast antivirus. The overwhelming number of people who clicked on the links came from Facebook, the company said. IT World Canada

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, January 29, 2016 8:57 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 29, 2016 / le 29 janvier 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Surveillance - Ottawa a laissé filer les informations des Canadiens

Les espions des réseaux électroniques du pays ont non seulement épié des Canadiens, mais ils ont en outre partagé des informations sur ces citoyens avec leurs alliés, a révélé le commissaire chargé de surveiller leurs opérations. L'incident -- " involontaire " -- a été décelé fin 2013... mais n'a été dévoilé au grand jour que deux ans plus tard. Il aura fallu attendre le rapport annuel du commissaire surveillant les activités du Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST) pour apprendre jeudi que l'organisme a transmis certaines métadonnées de Canadiens à ses alliés sans que ces informations soient " adéquatement protégées ". " Aucun nom " n'a été transmis aux partenaires du Canada et les données " en soi ne comportaient pas assez d'information pour mener à l'identification d'un Canadien ", a insisté un fonctionnaire du CST en présentant les conclusions du rapport du commissaire Jean-Pierre Plouffe (...) Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Ralph Goodale, a tenu à rappeler que le gouvernement libéral " a entrepris une révision complète du cadre de renseignement et de sécurité ". L'objectif : s'assurer que les agences parviennent à protéger les Canadiens, tout en respectant leurs droits et libertés, a-t-il résumé. " Et cette révision amènera un lot de changements. " Mais les libéraux ont refusé d'indiquer s'ils serraient la vis à l'espionnage de ressortissants canadiens. Le Devoir, A1 ; Agence France-Presse (Guardian UK, Yahoo! News); Wall Street Journal

Service gathered tax info

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service repeatedly obtained taxpayer information from the Canada Revenue Agency without presenting a court approved warrant for the data. That revelation was among several concerns raised in the latest annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which monitors CSIS compliance with law and policy. The report tabled Thursday said the spy service must do more to ensure insiders don't pilfer secret material. It also urged CSIS to inform the Federal Court how it uses metadata-the telltale digital trails that accompany messages and phone calls-collected from cyberspace. The findings came the same day the watchdog over the Communications Security Establishment, Canada's electronic spy agency, found the CSE had improperly shared metadata about Canadians with key foreign allies. The reports prompted the NDP to express concern about erosion of civil liberties. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale stressed the Liberal government was embarking on a comprehensive review of Canada's national security and intelligence framework with the twin aims of effective security and respect for rights. Far from being an isolated incident, there were "multiple instances" of a CSIS regional office getting warrantless access to taxpayer data from the federal revenue agency, the review committee said in its report for 2014-15. Questions about the practice were first raised by the Federal Court, prompting CSIS to ask the review committee to look into the matter. Canadian Press (London Free Press, B3, Toronto Star, iPolitics)

Ministry broke rules, leading to data breach: Privacy czar

British Columbia's Education Ministry lost personal information pertaining to 3.4 million students when staff breached security policies and misplaced a hard drive with data stretching back 30 years, an investigation has revealed. Privacy Commissioner Elizabeth Denham said in a report released Thursday that the ministry did not secure a portable hard drive when the information was transferred from computer servers in an effort to save on storage costs. Globe and Mail, A5

Privacy concerns raised over webcams

A young child asleep on a couch in Israel. Mourners huddled together at a small funeral in Brazil. An elderly woman stretching in a fitness centre in Poland. All available for anyone to watch via the unsecured webcams overhead. This isn't "1984," it's the world in 2016. Shodan, a search engine that indexes computers and devices rather than information, now allows users to pull screenshots from nanny cams, security cameras and other connected devices around the world that don't ask for a username or password. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, C5)

Nova Scotia woman's cyberbullying video mocked by bullies

A Dartmouth woman who made an online video to raise awareness about cyberbullying says she has become the target of bullies, with thousands of comments pouring in. Courtney Bolivar, 20, made the video in July 2014. It depicts a young woman who gets a series of degrading text messages, then takes her own life as a result. "I've dealt with [bullying] my whole life and it's something that awareness really needs to be brought to," said Bolivar. "Cyberbullying is such a big thing these days, and it's just so terrible that I ended up getting cyberbullied for making a cyberbullying short film." The irony isn't lost on Bolivar, who noticed a video making fun of her work this week. The attack video shows Bolivar's face and name. After the video was posted by an anonymous user who goes by Leafy, thousands of comments flooded Bolivar's YouTube channel. "It was mocked, just basically making fun of the awareness of it and a lot in the video is said that cyberbullying doesn't exist and people can just close their laptop, turn off their phone," she said. "Now there are thousands and thousands of internet trolls and people just being hateful on all of my videos." CBC News

Privacy report reinforces need for overhaul

An opinion piece states, "To learn that our digital surveillance agency broke privacy laws by revealing information about Canadian citizens to our allies is one thing. To learn that the Conservative government of the day, when apprised of this security breach, withheld the information from Canadians, is quite another. But that is where we are today, after learning of a major invasion of Canadian privacy more than two years after the fact. If our spy agencies, aided and abetted by the government of the day, wanted to fuel suspicion of internal surveillance in this country, they succeeded. If they wanted to ratchet up distrust, they scored. This despite an effort Thursday to get ahead of this story with the first-ever background briefing for journalists from an official with the Canadian Security Establishment (CSE) - only 26 months after a software glitch was discovered that was sending metadata on Canadians to our Five Eyes allies without the proper scrubbing to hide identities. How many Canadians? We don't know. What did the allies do with the information? We are only left with the assurances of Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan that our relationship with those allies, including the U.S. National Security Agency, was "solid" and they wouldn't take advantage of an honest mistake..." Toronto Star, A12

Privacy breach a failure of 'executive leadership'

An opinion piece states, "For the sake of a $14,000 saving in storage costs, the B.C. Education Ministry embarked on a botched data backup scheme that risked breaching the personal privacy of millions of British Columbians. So said Information and Privacy Commissioner Elizabeth Denham Wednesday upon releasing the findings of an investigation launched last fall when the ministry reported it misplaced a computer hard drive containing data on some 3.4 million school students, their families and some teachers..." Vancouver Sun, B6

Bullies, beware

An editorial states, "Cyber bullies, beware. Canada's courts are prepared to come down hard on people who publish intimate videos or pictures on the Internet without consent. And a good thing it is, in an era of "sexting" and "revenge porn." In the first case of its kind in Canada, Ontario Superior Court Justice David Stinson has just ordered a man to pay $100,000 in damages, plus $41,708 in legal costs and interest, to a former girlfriend for posting a sexually explicit video of her after promising he wouldn't show it to anyone. This sends a forceful and welcome message that abusing a partner's trust can carry a heavy cost. While "publication of an intimate image without consent" has been a crime in Canada since 2014, subject to up to five years in prison, this latest ruling fills a gap by setting a precedent in civil law as well. It establishes the right to sue for breach of confidence "if the matter publicized or the act of publication ... would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and ... is not of legitimate concern to the public." And rightly so, given the damage that can result." Toronto Star, A14, Globe and Mail

Online Media / Médias en ligne

CBC adopts SecureDrop to allow for anonymous leaks

CBC News is launching a powerful new tool to help those with important information or sensitive documents contact our journalists using encryption and anonymous online messaging. CBC's SecureDrop is a web-based system that allows whistleblowers to confidentially reach CBC journalists, including those who work in investigative units across Canada and on our leading programs the fifth estate, Go Public and Marketplace. CBC News

Canadian Spies Get Spanked Again For Sharing Citizens' Data With the NSA

They won't tell us what it means, but the Canadian government has confirmed that its spy agencies have a real problem with mass-collecting its citizens' metadata. They won't say how many Canadians were affected, what processes led to the mass-spying, how much information was shared with international intelligence agencies like the NSA, or even how they define "metadata." But they're confident everything will be okay. After news broke that untold number of Canadians had their private information collected by a top-secret intelligence agency, Minister of National Defence Harjit Singh Sajjan told reporters even he didn't know how far it went. "We can't give you the actual number because, the way I was informed, by us actually trying to dig into that answer itself, we will be actually violating the law on digging up that type of information,"

Sajjan said. Two heavily-scrubbed reports released Thursday, looking into activities of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) in the 2014-2015 fiscal year. Vice.com

Report: Nuclear plants in unstable regions vulnerable to cyberattacks

Nuclear power plants need to improve security systems to safeguard against non-traditional terrorist attacks, but that's challenging for developing countries, experts said Thursday. Nuclear power has grown in popularity in many regions as a constant zero-carbon energy source, said Michael Wautlet, director of nuclear energy policy for the National Security Council. It provides a way to reduce carbon emissions and comply with standards set by the Paris climate talks. UPI

Android bugs made up 10 percent of Google's $2m bounty payouts - in just five months

Google paid out over $2m to security researchers last year for reporting flaws in Google products, of which $200,000 went on bugs in Android in just five months. ZDNet News

HSBC fights off denial of service attack on its internet banking systems

HSBC has confirmed that it fought off a denial of service attack on its internet banking systems this morning. A spokesperson for HSBC said: "HSBC internet banking came under a denial of service attack this morning, which affected personal banking websites in the UK. ZDNet News

FBI: Hacking Tool Only Targeted Child Porn Visitors

The FBI's investigation into a child pornography dark web site called Playpen has been one of the most controversial cases of law enforcement hacking. In February 2015, the FBI seized the site and ran it from its own servers in order to deploy a hacking tool against visitors. Motherboard

How 'ASCII Matrix' Survived 490 Times Longer than the Average Torrent

A torrent of an ASCII version of The Matrix created more than 12 years ago has gone down in internet folklore as the longest-living torrent of all time, and is apparently still going strong, with users continuing to download and seed it today. TorrentFreak dubbed it "the oldest torrent that's still being actively shared." So what is the average lifespan of a torrent, anyway? Motherboard

US Police Organisation Hacked, Documents Posted Online

Documents related to a US police association have been dumped online, as well as a database of personal information and member-only forum backup. The affected organisation is the "Fraternal Order of Police" (FOP), which describes itself as "the world's largest organization of sworn law enforcement officers, with more than 325,000 members in more than 2,100 lodges." Motherboard

U.S., British spies hacked Israeli air force: reports citing Snowden

The United States and Britain have monitored secret sorties and communications by Israel's air force in a hacking operation dating back to 1998, according to documents attributed to leaks by former U.S. spy agency contractor Edward Snowden. Israel voiced disappointment at the disclosures, which were published on Friday in three media outlets and might further strain relations with Washington after years of feuding over strategies on Iran and the Palestinians. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Cisco drops 11 clock-crashing patches for 46 things, probes 142 more

Cisco has patched 11 remote denial-of-service and network time protocol vulnerabilities spanning at least 46 products and is investigating a further 142 offerings which may be affected. The Register

Head of NSA's Elite Hacking Unit: How We Hack

Inside the notoriously secretive National Security Agency is an elite unit made up of some of the best hackers on the planet, charged with breaking into computer networks around the world. Exactly how the Tailored Access Operations (TAO) cell works is a closely-held secret -- despite some recent leaks -- but in a rare public appearance, TAO's chief shed some light on how America's top cyber spies do their thing. ABC News

TalkTalk on Ropes Again After Indian Call Centre Staff Arrested

UK ISP TalkTalk is reeling once again after it emerged that three call centre workers in India were arrested on suspicion of using customer data to commit fraud. TalkTalk claimed in a statement on Wednesday that it has been working with outsourcer Wipro and local police in Kolkata following a "forensic review" it launched after the October 2015 data breach. Infosecurity-Magazine

Exclusive: School Websites Contain Pornographic and Gambling Links

A number of school websites contain pages which feature links to gambling, counterfeit goods and pornographic material. In research revealed exclusively to Infosecurity, researcher Terence Eden found a number of academy, secondary and primary school websites which had pages with rogue text and links to suspicious pages. Infosecurity-Magazine

SANS: Israel CNI Attack Didn't Take Out Power Grid

The SANS Institute has tried to dampen press speculation that a major cyber-attack disrupted Israel's power grid this week, claiming it was actually just ransomware targeting the PCs of a regulator. The misunderstanding came from comments made by Israel's Minister of Infrastructure, Energy and Water, Yuval Steinitz, who told CyberTech 2016 attendees on Tuesday that a "severe cyber-attack" was ongoing on the Israel National Electric Authority. Infosecurity-Magazine

OpenSSL patches a severe but not widespread problem

The OpenSSL project has patched a problem in the cryptographic library but one that likely does not affect many popular applications. OpenSSL enables SSL (Secure Sockets Layer) or TLS (Transport Layer Security) encryption. Most websites use it, which is indicated in Web browsers with a padlock symbol. CSO

Review: 'The Power of Privacy'

To mark Data Protection Day 2016, The Guardian and US-tech company Silent Circle have joined forces to create a thought-provoking short film raising awareness of the current situation of data security and what may be in store for both individuals and enterprises in the future. Rob Smith, CMO of Silent Circle, told Infosecurity that the inspiration for the documentary was to create a piece of innovative, shareable content that spreads the message that cybersecurity is a massive, global issue that must be taken seriously. Infosecurity-Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, February 01, 2016 8:33 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique February 1, 2016 / le 1 février 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Protecting Canada

While Canada and the U.S. are vulnerable to an electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attack that has the potential to destabilize our power grid, water systems, food supply chain and more, the solution is relatively simple. But first the issue needs to become a priority for Canadian politicians. Part 1 of this two-part feature explained former CIA analyst Dr. Peter Pry's attempts to educate policymakers and the military on the need to protect our electrical grid. If an enemy detonated a nuclear missile above the skies of North America, it could take out our grid for months. Countries like North Korea and various terrorist groups have shown they can launch EMP missiles. "This is a bigger threat than the classic nuclear war we talk about," Pry explained during a recent visit to Toronto. "It will kill a lot more people. One bomb will basically end our civilization (...)" In the mandate letter sent to Ralph Goodale, minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau instructs him to "lead a review of existing measures to protect Canadians and our critical infrastructure from cyber-threats." This review could be the beginning of the answer, but neither the minister's office nor department would confirm EMP is a priority. Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, A16; Toronto Sun, Winnipeg Sun, Calgary Sun, Edmonton Sun)

The Internet's Wild West

Hijacking "smart" toasters and refrigerators and hacking corporate ventilation systems are among the new threats envisioned by cybersecurity experts as an increasing array of items are connected to the Internet. The Internet of Things, a movement that seeks to control everything from factory equipment to traffic lights and household appliances through the web, creates vast opportunities for improved efficiency and convenience. But unless companies address the emerging cybersecurity risks, the Internet of Things (or IoT) will fail, said Stephen Pattison, the vice-president of public affairs at ARM Holdings, the U.K. semiconductor company. "We ain't seen nothing yet," Pattison said, speaking on a panel at the recent Security Innovation Network's U.S./U.K. Global Cybersecurity Innovation Summit in London. Bloomberg (Waterloo Region Record, A10, Hamilton Spectator)

All eyes on you - Shodan search engine raises privacy concerns

A young child asleep on a couch in Israel. Mourners huddled together at a small funeral in Brazil. An elderly woman stretching in a fitness centre in Poland. All available for anyone to watch via the unsecured webcams overhead. This isn't "1984," it's the world in 2016. Shodan, a search engine that indexes computers and devices rather than information, now allows users to pull screenshots from nanny cams, security cameras and other connected devices around the world that don't ask for a username or password. Canadian Press (Edmonton Sun, A48) (2016-01-31)

U.S. and U.K. spied on Israeli drones for years

U.S and British intelligence cracked the codes of Israeli drones operating in the Middle East and monitored their surveillance feeds for almost 20 years, according to documents leaked by an American whistleblower and published in international media on Friday. Reports by the German magazine Der Spiegel and the investigative website The Intercept said the details emerged from documents leaked by Edward Snowden, the former National Security Agency contractor who leaked millions of documents about U.S. government surveillance in 2013. Associated Press (Whig-Standard, B5; Ottawa Citizen, Vancouver Sun) (2016-01-30)

Transit security beefed up in wake of computer threat

B.C. Transit has beefed up online security in the wake of a threat to its computer systems that prompted the agency to take its website offline for two days in early December. The Crown agency hired information technology experts to assess the situation and make recommendations. Times Colonist, A1/Front (2016-01-30)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Cisco patches authentication, denial-of-service, NTP flaws in many products

Cisco Systems has released a new batch of security patches this week for flaws affecting a wide range of products, including for a critical vulnerability in its RV220W wireless network security firewalls. The RV220W vulnerability stems from insufficient input validation of HTTP requests sent to the firewall's Web-based management interface. This could allow remote unauthenticated attackers to send HTTP requests with SQL code in their headers that would bypass the authentication on the targeted devices and give attackers administrative privileges. CSO Online

OpenSSL patch quashes rare HTTPS nasty, shores up crypto chops

OpenSSL maintainers have pushed a pair of patches, crushing a dangerous but uncommon bug that allows HTTPS to be unravelled while also hardening servers against downgrade attacks. Affected servers are open to key recovery attacks only if it runs certain Digital Signature Algorithm and static Diffie-Hellman key exchange subgroups, while running OpenSSL version 1.0.2. The high severity bug (CVE-2016-0701) revealed by Adobe engineer Antonio Sanso and which is fixed in version 1.0.2f. Register; CSO Online

Two-thirds of Android users vulnerable to web history sniff ransomware

Miscreants have put together an especially pernicious strain of Android ransomware that threatens to bare your browsing history. The so-called Lockdroid ransomware brandishes overlaid popups in order to trick marks into allowing the malicious code to gain admin privileges on targeted devices. The clickjacking ruse works on devices running versions of Android prior to 5.0 (Lollipop), leaving an estimated two in three Android smartphone users at risk. Register; CSO Online; IT Pro

HP LaserJet printer could be a gaping hole in your security defences

Have you got an HP LaserJet printer tucked away in the corner of the office? If that's the case, then be warned that malware peddlers could be abusing the hard drive on board the device. This warning comes courtesy of security researcher Chris Vickery (who runs the MacKeeper blog), and he notes that your HP printer has a substantial wedge of storage space built-in which could be accessed and used for nefarious purposes by hackers if left on its default settings. The storage is there so staff can use it for large print jobs, but the HP LaserJet devices have a default setting which puts up an FTP server on port 9100 – and if you don't protect that port, hackers could easily access it, and in Vickery's words, you are "basically handing an anonymous FTP server to the hacker community". Tech Radar

Intel's security extensions are SGX: secure until you look at the detail

A pair of cryptography researchers have published a graduate thesis that accuses Intel of breaking its "Software Guard Extensions" (SGX) security model by bad implementation decisions. Victor Costan and Srinivas Devadas of MIT write (PDF) the SGX architecture operates by sending symmetric keys over the Internet. Launched in 2013, SGX added a set of CPU commands that let programmers create locked containers, with hardware enforcing access to both the code and data inside the container. Register

Basic error can reveal hidden dark web sites

Some dark web sites are unwittingly giving away their secret locations thanks to a basic configuration mistake that's been cropping up on regular websites for years. Dark web sites (known as hidden services or .onion sites) use the sophisticated, multi-layered encryption of the Tor network to hide themselves and the source of their traffic but actually run on the same plain vanilla web server software that normal web sites do. The most widely used web server software of all is Apache which has been top dog since 1995 and still commands a market share approaching 40%. Naked Security

27% of all malware variants in history were created in 2015

Last year was a record year for malware, according to a new report from Panda Security, with more than 84 million new malware samples collected over the course of the year. That averages out to around 230,000 new malware samples a day, said Luis Corrons, technical director of Panda's PandaLabs unit. Or 27 percent of all malware ever created. Trojans continued to account for the main bulk of malware, at 51.45 percent, followed by viruses at 22.79 percent, worms at 13.22 percent, potentially unwanted programs such as adware at 10.71 percent and cases of spyware at 1.83 percent. CSO Online

Viruses, Worms, Android All See Huge Spikes Last Quarter

A rapid growth of 236% in viruses and worms between the third and fourth quarter of 2015 has a direct correlation to the free-fall in reconnaissance activity by the bad guys between Q2 and Q4 of 2015. This indicates that their targets have already been scoped out and that the perpetrators moved into wholesale attack mode. According to Solutionary's Security Engineering Research Team (SERT) Quarterly Threat Report for Q4 2015, a 77% drop in reconnaissance activity from the third to fourth quarter means that overall, it has plummeted nearly 88% from levels seen in Q2. Infosecurity Magazine

Cyber extortion is a growing, but largely hidden threat

Cyber extortion is a growing threat to companies around the world, but the extent of the practice is largely hidden because many firms just pay up and keep quiet, say security experts. More and more public sector companies are being targeted because they are believed to be fairly likely to pay up to minimise the impact on public services. Lincolnshire County Council is the latest known target of cyber extortion, but reported cases are just the tip of the iceberg, according to David Flower, managing director of security firm Carbon Black. Computer Weekly; v3.co.uk

ISIS Cyber Caliphate migrating to new communications platform

Cyber Caliphate, the hacking unit of ISIS/Daesh, in its search for a secure encrypted communications platform to broadcast its message to supporters, will move its mass communications from its Telegram account to Threema, an encrypted communications application developed by the Swiss company Threema GmbH, SCMagazine.com has learned. Steven Stalinsky, executive director of the Middle East Media Research Institute (MERI), told SCMagazine.com that the Cyber Caliphate announced to supporters in a Telegram post on Friday that the jihadi group would migrate communications to Threema. SC Magazine

'Blackshades' webcam malware co-creator gets probation

The head of the 'Blackshades' hacking ring might be doing hard time, but one of his former partners won't be facing so bleak a future. A judge has sentenced malware co-creator Michael Hogue to 5 years' probation, a forfeiture of $40,000 and 500 hours of community service in return for pleading guilty to hacking and malware distribution charges back in 2013. The Remote Access Tool he helped write was heinous (it allowed webcam spying and ransom hijacking), the judge said. Engadget

US declares 22 Clinton emails 'top secret'

The Obama administration confirmed for the first time Friday that Hillary Clinton's home server contained closely guarded government secrets, censoring 22 emails that contained material requiring one of the highest levels of classification. The revelation comes three days before the Democratic candidate competes in the Iowa presidential caucuses. State Department officials also said the agency's Diplomatic Security and Intelligence and Research bureaus are investigating if any of the information was classified at the time of transmission, going to the heart of Clinton's defence of her email practices. iPolitics (2016-01-31)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, February 19, 2016 8:53 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
February 19, 2016 / le 19 février 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

We're marshalling our snoops

The Communications Security Establishment, Canada's electronic spy service, is set to play a more prominent role in the war against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, The Canadian Press has learned. Multiple sources familiar with the plans, speaking on condition of anonymity owing to the sensitivity of the matter, say the government is deploying a capability that only a "handful of countries" in the world can provide. CSE is part of the so-called "Five Eyes" community, along with the U.S. National Security Agency-the NSA. CSE spokesperson Ryan Foreman acknowledged the agency is helping Canada's military under the umbrella of Operation Impact, Canada's anti-ISIL mission in the Mideast, but refused to elaborate. "While we are proud of our contributions to CAF's missions, CSE is obligated to respect the Security of Information Act, and cannot address specific operational questions," Foreman said. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan has for weeks been signalling the military will introduce a "more robust" intelligence-gathering regime, one that allies - chastened by withdrawal of six CF-18s -arehappy to see join the fight. Separately, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale confirmed Thursday that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service also will play a stepped-up role in the fight against the Islamic State, but he also refused to be specific. Canadian Press (London Free Press, B1/Front, Guardian, Red Deer Advocate, Times Colonist, Record, National Post, Times & Transcript, Whig-Standard); Toronto Star, A10

Trudeau government targets cyber threats

With Internet-based child sex-ploitation crimes skyrocketing, the Trudeau government intends to launch a "credible and comprehensive" review this spring of cybersecurity threats in Canada. Officials with Public Safety Canada said Thursday that while the details of that review are still being hammered out by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale, a review will determine how Canada can best deal with everything from online predators to digital jihadists. Kathy Thompson, assistant deputy minister in charge of the Community Safety and Countering Crime Branch at Public Safety Canada, said that while the crime rate continues to decline across the country, "there are some exceptions. One of those exceptions is child sexual exploitation over the Internet - that is going up exponentially, year over year." Thompson made her remarks at the House of Commons Public Safety and National Security Committee, where MPs are looking for topics their group can zero in on during the current parliamentary session. A cybersecurity review that looks at legal gaps and shortcomings in police resources could form a plan for the way the Trudeau government approaches lawand-order issues. Toronto Sun, A8 (Calgary Sun, Winnipeg Sun, Ottawa Sun, Edmonton Sun)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Apple apologizes, issues fix for Error 53 that disables iPhones and iPads

Apple has released a software update for iPhone and iPad users who found that their devices stopped working after going to third-party technicians for repairs. The problem, known as Error 53, bricks your phone if any non-Apple source tampers with the newest version of the Touch ID fingerprint sensor, installed on the iPhone 5s, 6 and 6s and some models of the iPad. Apple has said it was designed as a security feature to prevent unauthorized access to the phone. But many users called the function a means to stifle independent repair shops that might charge less for repairs than those from an official Apple store. CBC News; Global News

Facebook, Twitter, Google express public support in Apple's fight with feds

Leading tech companies are rallying behind Apple — some belatedly — in its fight against a court order requiring the company to help investigators break into an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino mass shooters. A U.S. magistrate ordered Apple to produce software that would give investigators access to the iPhone at issue. Apple has until next Tuesday to challenge that ruling, setting the stage for a legal clash that could determine whether tech companies or government authorities get the final say on just how secure devices like smartphones can be. Associated Press (CBC News); Toronto Star

Has Apple secretly leaked your private data to the government?

An opinion piece states "Apple CEO Tim Cook's now widely shared "Message to our Customers" is an attempt to make the best PR move in a bad situation. Were Apple to comply with the FBI's request to access information locked on a suspected San Bernardino shooter's phone, it probably wouldn't be the first time that the government has deputized Apple to breach its customers' privacy. According to documents revealed by Edward Snowden in 2013, Apple was one of the participants in the U.S. National Security Agency's PRISM program, giving authorities access to its customers' information including their emails, messages and photos. Apple for its part has denied any such involvement, but given the secretive nature of the United States Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISA Court), Apple and other technology companies would be prohibited to publicly acknowledge their involvement in such programs. Hence the frustrating Catch-22 — is Apple really a champion of privacy rights? Or is all this bluster just an act to score PR points with their customers, despite the fact that legislative conditions already exist to force Apple to co-operate in secret?" Toronto Star; Toronto Sun

Apple likely to invoke free-speech rights in encryption fight

Apple Inc. will likely seek to invoke the United States' protections of free speech as one of its key legal arguments in trying to block an order to help unlock the encrypted iPhone of one of the San Bernardino shooters, lawyers with expertise in the subject said this week. The company on Thursday was granted three additional days by the court to file a response to the order. Apple will now have until Feb. 26 to send a reply, a person familiar with matter told Reuters. The tech giant and the Obama administration are on track for a major collision over computer security and encryption after a federal magistrate judge in Los Angeles handed down an order on Tuesday requiring Apple to provide specific software and technical assistance to investigators. Reuters

Twitter password recovery bug exposes 10,000 users' personal information

Twitter has notified 10,000 users that their email addresses and phone numbers may have been exposed due to a bug in the website's password recovery feature. The incident happened over the course of 24 hours on an unspecified day last week, but the company alerted affected users on Wednesday. "Any user that we find to have exploited the bug to access another account's information will be permanently suspended, and we will also be engaging law enforcement as appropriate so they may conduct a thorough investigation and bring charges as warranted," Twitter said in a blog post. Infoworld

Dangerous RCE Flaws Found in Popular E-Com Software

Security experts have gone public with two Remote Code Execution vulnerabilities branded high-risk, after the e-commerce software vendors responsible failed to patch the issues despite being told about them at the end of December. High-Tech Bridge Security Research Lab revealed the flaws in popular software providers osCommerce and osCmax in separate advisories yesterday, having notified the firms privately on 21 December. Both are remote code execution flaws made possible by Cross Site Request Forgery (CSRF) and have been given a CVSSv3 base score of 5.3. However, the security vendor claimed both are easily exploitable via social engineering, so are in reality a much bigger threat to customers. Infosecurity Magazine

And as for actual WordPress pingbacks you should probably switch 'em off

More than 26,000 WordPress sites have been enslaved and used in a recent distributed denial-of-service attack campaign using a vulnerability first described in March 2014. The layer seven attacks exploit the pingback feature activated by default on WordPress sites, which informs other sites when they have been linked to. Those pingbacks can be abused to flood sites. WordPress pushed a fix April 2014 in version 3.9 and later which added IP addresses logs that show the origin of pingbacks, but attackers don't seem to mind. Sucuri malware analyst Daniel Cid says the attacks represent about 13 per cent of distributed denial of service attacks hitting its customers. Register

New Android Malware Combines Ransomware with a Banking Trojan

Malware targeting Android devices is slowly evolving day by day and is starting to rival its desktop-based counterpart. One of the most complex threats targeting the Android ecosystem is Xbot, a newly discovered Android malware that is a combination between a banking trojan, an infostealer, and ransomware. According to security researchers from Palo Alto Networks, Xbot seems to be a second-generation threat evolved from the Aulrin Android trojan, spotted first in 2014. Softpedia; CSO

Judge Rules FBI Must Reveal Malware It Used to Hack Over 1,000 Computers

On Wednesday, a judge ruled that defense lawyers in an FBI child pornography case must be provided with all of the code used to hack their client's computer. When asked whether the code would include the exploit used to bypass the security features of the Tor Browser, Colin Fieman, a federal public defender working on the case, told Motherboard in an email, simply, "Everything." "The declaration from our code expert was quite specific and comprehensive, and the order encompasses everything he identified," he continued. Fieman is defending Jay Michaud, a Vancouver public schools administration worker. Michaud was arrested after the FBI seized 'Playpen', a highly popular child pornography site on the dark web, and then deployed a network investigative technique (NIT)—the agency's term for a hacking tool. This NIT grabbed suspects' real IP address, MAC address, and pieces of other technical information, and sent them to a government controlled server. Motherboard

One-Third of IT Staff Are Hackers

About a third of IT staff have hacked an organization—sometimes the one they work for. A report from Absolute Software shows a real "physician heal thyself" situation going on: A high percentage of IT personnel admitted to not following the same security protocols they are expected to enforce. Of those surveyed, 33% of respondents admitted to successfully hacking their own or another organization. The report also showed that 45% admitted to knowingly circumventing their own security policies. "Given that IT is the security gatekeeper for an organization, it was alarming to see such high incidents of non-compliant behavior by IT personnel," said Stephen Midgley, vice president, Global Marketing, Absolute. "Even if these actions are being performed to validate existing infrastructure, senior leadership should be aware that this activity is occurring. It may also be worthwhile to consider third-party audits to ensure adherence with corporate security policies." Infosecurity Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, March 01, 2016 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique March 1, 2016 / le 1 mars 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

National security policy under review, says Goodale

Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale says his department is undertaking a national security review. "We want open, inclusive consultations that reassure Canadians that their engagement is not just a window dressing but that it's meaningful and has impact," the minister told a recent Ottawa defence conference. Mr. Goodale said the government is looking for "thoughtful discussion, analysis [and] debate." He specifically cited a National Post op-ed by Luc Portelance, former president of the Canada Border Services Agency and Ray Boisvert, former assistant director of intelligence at Canada's spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. Their message was that the government has a "timely opportunity to consider a thorough assessment of our national security structure" and advocated a "national security reset." That kind of input is "very valuable," Mr. Goodale said, adding expert opinion will be "taken very seriously into account (...)" One thing that Mr. Goodale's mandate letter does specify is to conduct a review of cyber security policy with other cabinet ministers. Expect it to be "comprehensive," he told the CDA Institute crowd. Embassy

CSE chief must break her silence

An editorial states, "I am happy the Star has articulated the outrage that some readers probably feel over the recent Senate testimony of the commissioner of the Communications Security Establishment. Last Monday, Commissioner Jean-Pierre Plouffe was unable to assess for the Senate the scale of the leak of partially anonymous information on Canadians from our electronic spy agency, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), to its foreign partners, including the U.S. National Security Agency. He has indicated, essentially, that there is no way to know how many Canadians have been affected and for how long the problem has persisted. To me, it is inconceivable that scientists and engineers at the CSE, who are using systems with known performance characteristics, could not provide the commissioner with at least a minimum number of potential victims of the leak. I have to wonder whether all the details relevant to the problem have been made available to him. The commissioner has the legal authority to subpoena witnesses in pursuit of an answer to the question of how many victims there may be. The Inquiries Act gives him the power to chase down evidence that people within the CSE may not want to divulge. If ever there was a time to press harder on the public's behalf using these admittedly blunt tools, this is probably it. And what of the chief of the CSE, Greta Bossenmaier, our nation's top electronic spy who oversees the actual day-to-day operations of the agency? Not a peep. In fact, she's been peep-less without peer during this unprecedented debacle." Toronto Star, A10

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Apple Wins Ruling in New York iPhone Hacking Order

A federal magistrate judge on Monday denied the United States government's request that Apple extract data from an iPhone in a drug case in New York, giving the company's pro-privacy stance a boost as it battles law enforcement officials over opening up the device in other cases. The ruling, from Judge James Orenstein in New York's Eastern District, is the first time that the government's legal argument for opening up devices like the iPhone has been put to the test. The denial could influence other cases where law enforcement officials are trying to compel Apple to help unlock iPhones, including the standoff between Apple and the F.B.I. over the iPhone used by one of the attackers in a mass shooting in San Bernardino, Calif., last year. New York Times

After huge OPM hack, Pentagon budgets $615m for new background check IT system

The Pentagon is planning on spending more than half a billion dollars on building an IT system to support the new National Background Investigations Bureau (NBIB). The US Department of Defense (DoD) will soon approach the private sector to develop the new background-checking computer system, Reuters reports. NBIB replaces the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) for security clearances after an embarrassing breach, thought to be the work of Chinese hackers, exposed personal information of 22 million government workers. ZDNet

Mac malware prompts speculation of Hacking Team resurrection

A recently discovered Apple Mac OS X malware sample has raised speculation that exploit seller Hacking Team is returning to the market after a disastrous cyberattack which spilled the firm's corporate innards into the public domain last year. In July 2015, Italian firm Hacking Team, a provider of surveillance tools, malware and spyware to government, law enforcement and intelligence agencies worldwide, experienced a catastrophic data breach after a cyberattacker compromised their servers and managed to steal 400GB of corporate data. The company's exploits and tools were, before then, a closely-guarded secret -- and the sudden release of all Hacking Team's deepest secrets was met with glee by security researchers worldwide who immediately began developing patches to close these zero-day vulnerabilities. ZDNet; PC World; International Business Times; Computerworld; Motherboard

ESET Fixes NOD32 Update That Flagged All Internet Sites as Infected

ESET managed to ruin the Monday morning of many system administrators today, after the company rolled out a virus signature database update to Windows computers that wrongly flagged all Internet websites as infected. The update's version is 13102 (20160229) and affected only Windows machines, for both home and business users. ESET was quickly made aware of the issue, and by afternoon, the company quickly rolled out version 13103 to remove the false positive detections. Softpedia News

'Fingerprint' security flaw ramps up malvertising campaigns

Malvertising campaigns have been discovered which utilise sophisticated "fingerprint" techniques to lead security researchers off the trail and only deliver payloads to legitimate victims. Malvertising is the use of ad networks to serve unwitting visitors malware and exploit kits, including Angler and Neutrino. Many legitimate websites rely on advertising to generate revenue, and unfortunately, malware may slip through the net. ZDNet

eBay Vulnerability Allows Attackers To Bypass Code Validation

Check Point, a company focused on IT security, has uncovered an eBay vulnerability that allows attackers to bypass the online auction and sales site's code validation. Once the code validation is bypassed, this allows hackers to control code remotely and execute malicious Javascript code against eBay users. According to Check Point, the flaw was discovered and the company then disclosed the nature of the vulnerability to eBay on December 15 of last year. Just over a month later, eBay has stated that they have no plans to fix the vulnerability, as eBay allows active content with strict guidelines — but guidelines that Check Point was able to bypass and provide a proof of concept that they had done so. Techaeris

Hackers hold Melrose Police Station to ransom for the paltry sum of one bitcoin

Cyber criminals targeting a police station in the US successfully stole an encryption key used to access vital incident response-logging software and in a ransom-style ultimatum, charged a fee for its release. However, unlike previous attacks of this nature, the hackers chose not to demand thousands of dollars, and instead charged the cops just one bitcoin. The software in question, known as TriTech, allows law enforcement officers to process records remotely while on patrol using laptops and has been adopted by some US police departments to increase efficiency. International Business Times

Hacking group Anonymous celebrates its top ten accomplishments

Recently Anonymous has mostly been in the news for targeting Islamic State on the web, playing its part in helping to shut down thousands of ISIS-supporting accounts on Facebook and Twitter. But the hacktivist collective, which has been active since 2003, has initiated a lot of campaigns over the years, targeting a variety of people and organisations, some more successfully than others. The group's list of achievements is quite impressive – ranging from getting an internet predator arrested, to taking on the Church of Scientology. IT Pro Portal

Hospital Security Fail: Report Outlines Dangerous Shortcomings

Hospitals are risking patient lives by failing to protect critical computer systems that can be manipulated by attackers. In a scathing report that looks at the current state of hospital security, researchers say everything from bedside patient monitoring systems, automated drug dispensing machines to patient records are inadequately protected. The findings are from Baltimore, Md-based firm Independent Security Evaluators who conclude that hospitals need to overhaul their security systems or risk patient fatalities. Researchers say they were able to hack hospital systems and devices along with disabling patient alarms designed to alert staff to a life-or-death health event. Threatpost

SSL visibility: decrypt and conquer

As internet traffic is increasingly encrypted, so the need to inspect encrypted traffic grows as that's where the malware will be says Ron Symons, adding that the time to invest in such systems is now. Companies have long had to be on their guard against data breaches, but for consumers the threats have often felt removed – something “out there” rather than close to home. 2015 may have seen a sense of false security for many consumers, but 2016 is bringing a new wave of hidden threats. Since Edward Snowden's big reveal back in 2013, operations on the Secure Socket Layer (SSL) have become increasingly popular with application owners and hackers alike, offering high levels of security, confidentiality and integrity. SC Magazine

RSA 2016: Industry failing to understand malware life cycle

While malware designers are constantly updating their software and adapting to beat security, anti-malware companies are failing to keep pace with them. That's the view of Christopher Elisan, principal malware scientist at RSA. He gave a talk at RSA on Monday entitled “Demystifying a malware attack”. To truly counter the malware, he said it is vital to understand the components of malware and how they interact otherwise you may find yourself fighting – and even declaring victory – against the wrong bit of software. SC Magazine

Look Out! Hacker Attacks Are Soaring

Hackers set their sights on the retail and gaming industries. Hackers are on the prowl, and there are no signs that their hunting is slowing down. In its latest State of the Internet report, Akamai Technologies, which helps companies serve their sites and digital content to the public, says that the number denial of service attacks against company websites and services in the fourth quarter rose 40% compared to the previous quarter. Such attacks, which involve hackers using thousands of computers to overload websites, rose a whopping 149% compared to the fourth quarter of 2014. Fortune; Tech Week Europe

Skills Shortage Hits Hackers

The skills shortage has hit the attacking community too, with cyber-criminals also struggling to find the right talent. According to research by Digital Shadows, attackers need an ecosystem of malware writers, exploit developers, botnet operators and mules, but finding individuals who can be trusted is difficult and requires a rigorous application procedure. This has led many to adopt traditional recruitment techniques to identify top talent to meet their needs. This includes job ads on forums or boards, and weeding out people with no legitimate technical skills. Infosecurity Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, March 16, 2016 8:46 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

March 16, 2016 / le 16 mars 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Google aims for more encryption

Google is disclosing how much of the traffic to its search engine and other services is being protected from hackers as part of its push to encrypt all online activity. Encryption shields 77 per cent of the requests sent from around the world to Google's data centres, up from 52 per cent at the end of 2013, according to company statistics released Tuesday. The numbers cover all Google services except its YouTube video site, which has more than one billion users. Google plans to add YouTube to its encryption breakdown by the end of this year. Encryption is a security measure that scrambles transmitted information so it's unintelligible if it's intercepted by a third party. Google began emphasizing the need to encrypt people's online activities after confidential documents leaked in 2013 by former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden revealed that the U.S. government had been vacuuming up personal data transferred over the Internet. The surveillance programs exploited gaping holes in unencrypted websites. Associated Press (Chronicle-Herald, B2; London Free Press)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Government tech support putting RCMP, public safety at risk, documents reveal

Internal RCMP reports and emails obtained by CBC News show that Shared Services Canada's takeover of the Mounties' tech support has been a costly disaster that has jeopardized court cases and investigations while putting the safety of officers and members of the public at risk. The documents received through access to information include correspondence from RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson in which he refused to give SSC any more control over the Mounties' information technologies. SSC is the federal department created in 2012 to take over the delivery of email, data centre and network services for 43 government agencies, including the RCMP. By all internal accounts, its work on behalf of the RCMP has been a fiasco. At a Sept. 25, 2015 meeting between Paulson and SSC president Liseanne Forand, the commissioner highlighted a number of examples where the department's mistakes and oversights have affected policing operations, including... Overall, the documents raise serious concerns about three major areas — safety and security, loss of service or information, and cost to taxpayers. A January 2014 memo to Paulson from the RCMP's civilian IT employees highlighted dozens of concerns. In December 2013, Mounties reported having to spend almost $1 million to sustain systems critical to two special units, including one that investigates online child sex assaults, because SSC "is neither willing nor able to purchase" the equipment required. CBC News

Carleton professor fights cyberattacks from Orléans

Behind locked doors at a municipal building in the Ottawa suburb of Orléans, Tony Bailetti is quietly working on a plan to turn Canada into a global powerhouse for fighting cyberattacks. The professor is known for nurturing more than 200 companies in his job straddling Carleton University's business and engineering departments. These days, he jokes that he practically sleeps at VENUS Cybersecurity, a non-profit hub he created in a former town council office. Bailetti is preoccupied by much more than malicious software nabbing credit card data from retailers like Target. His eye is on big intrusions — the idea that cyberattackers could take down power grids and water systems, or remotely take over control of cars from their drivers. And his goal is to have Canada "playing with the bigger boys and girls" to tackle the global problem of cybersecurity in fewer than five years. "The people who have investments in critical infrastructure — we will be the go-to guys," Bailetti said. CBC News

Canadian Librarians Must Be Ready to Fight the Feds on Running a Tor Node

Political dissidents and cyber criminals alike will soon be sending anonymous internet traffic through a library at Western University in Canada, thanks to a new "node" in the encrypted Tor network operated by staff there—the first to open at a library in the country. In Canada, the legality of running a Tor node is essentially untested, making the high profile, institutionally-backed node at Western a potential target for the feds. Tor is touted as a tool for people, such as journalists, to keep their browsing habits safe from spies and police. But more nefarious traffic, such as drug dealing or child pornography, also passes through the network. A small public library in New Hampshire began operating a Tor node last year, and faced pressure from the Department of Homeland Security to shut it down. The library resisted, and the node is still running. Motherboard

Crypto ransomware lurks in ads on popular websites

Crypto ransomware has been found lurking in adverts served on popular websites including the BBC, the New York Times, MSN and AOL. The UK's National Crime Agency and the FBI have issued warnings about a sudden spike in ransomware, which is malware that typically encrypts data on a target computer and demands a ransom in exchange for the decryption key. In the latest campaign, various security research teams have discovered ransomware in ads served on news sites last weekend through a compromised online advertising network. ComputerWeekly; ZDNet; Guardian UK; CSO Online

VMware vRealizes that vRealize has XSS bugs on Linux

A tricky Tuesday for VMware's vRealize products, which have received the first maintenance release for version 7 and also become the subject of a security alert. Let's do the alert first, as it explains that several vRealize products have a pair of cross-site-scripting bugs that could compromise a user's workstation. The mess means that vRealize Business Advanced and Enterprise 8.x on Linux need a patch, to version 8.2.5. VMware vRealize Automation has a similar problem. This one's nothing to cancel a good lunch over: it only impacts version 6.x on Linux. Upgrading to version 6.2.4 will sort things out. Register

Major sites hit with the Angler Exploit Kit

Major US political commentary and entertainment sites have been hit by a new malvertising campaign, related to the Angler Exploit Kit, security researchers have warned earlier this week. According to Trend Micro's fraud researcher Joseph C Chen, the campaign targeting users in the US has probably affected tens of thousands of users in the first 24 hours of its existence. Loads of big publishers have been hit, including MSN.com, NYTimes.com, AOL.com or NFL.com, to name a few. Although the 'big players' have all removed the malicious ad, the campaign is still active, Trend Micro's researcher says. ITProPortal

Juniper starts waving fixes for DROWN vuln

Juniper Networks has identified products it says are vulnerable to the DROWN attack. DROWN turned up at the end of February, and is a relic of enduring but pointless support for the long-deprecated SSLv2 protocol. The most prominent exposure to DROWN is in web sites that weren't configured to refuse attempts at SSLv2 connection. However, hardware vendors use HTTPS to secure access to management consoles, which means the vulnerability sent the whole industry scrambling to identify and patch vulnerable systems. In Juniper's advisory, the company says its ScreenOS (the operating system for NetScreen firewalls), Security Threat Response Manager (STRM), its JSA virtual appliance, and its WLC Wireless LAN Controller had the DROWN vulnerability. The Register

Endgame exposes malware that punishes poor spelling

A new variation of the well-known typosquatting scam has been spotted by Endgame that attempts to take advantage of folks who forget to include or misplace the letter 'C'. The security firm Endgame has come across a new campaign utilizing the well-worn method known as typosquatting to spread malware to poor typists who are attempting to visit some of the most popular sites on the web. SC Magazine; Financial Times

Android Trojan Targets Customers of 20 Major Banks

ESET experts warn of Android banking malware that can steal credentials – and even bypass two-factor authentication. ESET researchers have discovered a strain of Android malware that can steal the login credentials of mobile banking users. The malware, detected by ESET security systems as Android/Spy.Agent.SI, presents victims with a fake version of the login screen of their banking application and locks the screen until they enter their username and password. Using the stolen credentials, the thieves can then log in to the victim's account remotely and transfer money out. Information Security Buzz

Amex Investigates Possible Data Breach

American Express is investigating a potential data breach in California. Apparently, one of the third-party service providers used by the payment giant's merchant partners was compromised, leading to the possible exposure of account numbers, names, expiration dates and other information. In a notice [PDF] to customers filed with the Office of the Attorney General in California, Amex chief privacy officer Stefanie Ash said that the company was "vigilantly monitoring" accounts for fraudulent activity. The notice said that customers could receive more than one letter about the incident if more than one account was affected. "It is important to note that American Express owned or controlled systems were not compromised by this incident, and we are providing this notice to you as a precautionary measure," Ash wrote. Infosecurity Magazine

Security experts uncover malware suspected of hijacking 77K Steam accounts per month

Account-stealing malware sells for as little as £20 on the black market, researchers find. Security experts have uncovered 'Steam Stealer' malware suspected of hijacking 77,000 Steam accounts per month. Steam Stealer, discovered by Kaspersky researcher Santiago Pontiroli and independent researcher Bart P., has been observed in the wild in almost 1,200 instances. Valve reports that almost 77,000 Steam accounts are stolen or compromised every month, and while some will be the victim of social engineering and spear-phishing campaigns, Steam Stealer and its variants are now suspected to be behind the vast majority of them. Cloudpro.co.uk

Former US anti-terror chief tears into FBI over iPhone unlocking case

A former counter-terrorism chief has laid into the Feds over its ongoing Apple iPhone battle – saying FBI director Jim Comey is exaggerating the need for access and that if agents really wanted into the phone, they would just send it to the NSA. Richard Clarke was national security advisor and head of counter-terrorism to presidents Clinton and Bush. Speaking to National Public Radio (NPR) on Monday, he was blunt about what he feels is the FBI's goal. "[The FBI] is not as interested in solving the problem as they are in getting a legal precedent," Clarke said. "Every expert I know believes the NSA could crack this phone. They want the precedent that government could compel a device manufacturer to let the government in." Clarke also points to the fact that three past national security directors as well as a former head of the NSA and other high-level security officials are "much more sympathetic" to Apple's arguments than the FBI's. Register

Security Automation is Nascent, But Set for a Big Spike

A lack of automation in cybersecurity controls is leading to increased breaches and other incidents—which in turn is prepping the way for a big spike in automation investment. According to AlgoSec's State of Automation in Security survey, 20% of organizations had a security breach, 48% had an application outage and 42% a network outage in the last year resulting from errors during manual security-related processes. This is all leading to an awareness that manual processes can't keep up with the accelerating threat landscape: 80% of respondents believe that automation will increase the overall security posture of their organizations, while 75% think it will improve application availability, reduce errors and enable them to process security policy changes faster. Infosecurity Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, April 06, 2016 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique April 6, 2016 / le 6 avril 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

WhatsApp toughens encryption after Apple-FBI row

The popular messaging service WhatsApp said Tuesday it had implemented "full end-to-end encryption," a move which steps up privacy but may lead to conflicts with law enforcement agencies. The Facebook-owned mobile application with one billion users worldwide made the announcement following weeks of intense debate over efforts by US authorities to compel Apple to help break into an encrypted iPhone. Agence France-Presse (Yahoo! News); New York Times (National Post); Reuters (Globe and Mail) Independent UK; Wired Magazine; Computerworld; PC Advisor; Infosecurity Magazine

Why WhatsApp's Encryption Embrace Is a Landmark Event

The news that Facebook's WhatsApp now supports encryption across all its apps is nothing short of seismic. There have always been those who were keen on using encrypted communications — politicians trying to avoid the gaze of their rivals and foreign spies, corporate executives trying to protect their trade secrets, activists trying to organize opposition to oppressive regimes and, yes, criminals trying to evade law enforcement. But, in the big picture, these are fringe cases. Before Edward Snowden told the world about the extent of state surveillance in 2013, few "normal" people were interested in adding heavy protections to their communications. Soon, over a billion of them will be using this facility without even trying. Fortune; Motherboard

Adobe preps emergency Flash patch for bug hackers are exploiting

Adobe will this week issue an out-of-band patch for Flash after spotting a critical flaw that is now being "actively exploited" in the wild. The flaw, CVE-2016-1019, affects Flash Player version 20.0.0.306 and older for Windows, OS X, Linux, and Chrome OS. Adobe made the jump to patch after learning that users of Windows 7 and Windows XP are being actively targeted by malware writers exploiting the flaw. It hopes to have the fix out by April 7 or as soon as possible afterwards. Register; Infosecurity Magazine; ZDNet

Locky Ransomware Morphs as Spam Attacks Spike

Locky, an emerging ransomware threat that first burst on the scene in February, has already started to mutate and morph into new variants. The changes come just as researchers observe a fresh spike in propagation. Locky is distributed via email attachments, specifically Word documents disguised as invoices. The docs contain macros which download and install the ransomware. When originally discovered, the botnet behind the spam mail was found to be the same as that which delivers the majority of emails containing the infamous Dridex trojan. Locky is also spread via exploit kits. Infosecurity Magazine

Server software poses soft target for ransomware

An alternate method for infecting computers with ransomware signals a shift in tactics by cybercriminals that could put businesses at greater risk, according to Symantec. A type of ransomware called Samsam has been infecting organizations but is not installed in the usual way. "Samsam is another variant in a growing number of variants of ransomware, but what sets it apart from other ransomware is how it reaches its intended targets by way of unpatched server-side software," Symantec wrote. The perpetrators behind Samsam use a legitimate penetration tool called Jexboss to exploit servers running Red Hat's JBoss enterprise application server. Infoworld

5 ways to become a smaller target for ransomware hackers

Hacking for ransom is on the rise — on pace to beat out last year's figures — and hits people where it hurts, locking them out of files, photos and critical records until they pay hackers a bounty to restore their access. Hackers bait users to click on infected email links or open infected attachments, or they take advantage of outdated and vulnerable systems. Associated Press (Truro Daily, Yahoo! News)

Apple goes server-side to fix Siri lock screen bypass security flaw

Apple has fixed a security flaw within Siri which granted attackers with physical access to a device the chance to snoop through a victim's media and contacts. The security flaw, posted on Full Disclosure, came to light on Tuesday. Security researcher Benjamin Kunz Mejri discovered the bypass flaw and publicly disclosed the vulnerability after two weeks of waiting for Apple to respond to his submission without success. ZDNet

Security bods disclose lock bypass bug in iOS

In late March, Johns Hopkins University's professor Matthew Green said a bypass existed, but withheld details pending Apple's patch. This may or may not refer to the same issue: Vulnerability Labs says the bug is present in iOS 9.3.1 (as well as 9.2.1), even after Cupertino's April 4 2016 update. The group says it notified Apple of the issue on March 18. Here's what the researchers, led by Benjamin Kunz Mejri, found: some installed applications allow interactions without demanding a passcode. Example applications listed in the advisory include Yahoo!, Twitter or Facebook. On a locked phone, the attacker can use Siri to search through the target application; that search shows an @ tag in the slide preview, the advisory says, and pushing the @ tag button makes the basic context menu available. Register

What Apple Vs. The FBI Can Teach Us About Cloud Storage Security

The recent Apple vs. FBI debate hit close to home for the cloud community because it touched on one of the industry's hottest topics: data security. The FBI struggled to access information on the iPhone because the phone is encrypted using the owner's personal passcode, so not even Apple could access data on the phone. It had asked Apple to help create a backdoor that would potentially allow the government to access phones without the owner's authorization or knowledge. The government already had the iPhone in its possession, and reported this week that it was able to access data on the phone independently. Events like this highlight security as a major concern in general, but especially for cloud storage users. Your data is stored with your cloud provider; so many companies are concerned about backdoors, subpoenas, hacks and other access by third parties. Would you even know if hackers, the government, or foreign entities are trying to sneak a look at your data? In fact, you might not. Infosecurity Magazine

Nest disables smart home device, triggers IoT security concerns

Internet of Things (IoT) thermostat company Nest will disable the company's smart home product Revolv on May 15, sparking concerns over the future security of the IoT devices. The decision to disable the $299 device was announced by Revolv founders Tim Enwall and Mike Soucie on Revolv's website. The founders will re-focus on building Works with Nest, a platform of compatible devices that integrate into the Nest system. "Unfortunately, that means we can't allocate resources to Revolv anymore and we have to shut down the service." SC Magazine; CBC News

One in Five Companies Gets Malware Infections via Social Media

Social media usage inside companies is not something to wonder about and remain in awe, as it was a few years back, but quite the opposite, as these days, many organizations rely on it to boost their business (...) A study by Osterman Research reveals that 73 percent of all surveyed companies have a Facebook account and use it for business reasons, 64 percent use LinkedIn, and 56 percent employ Twitter. Additionally, the usage of closed-circuit social platforms such as Microsoft SharePoint, Cisco social platforms (Jabber, WebEx, WebEx Social), Microsoft Yammer, Salesforce Chatter, and IBM Connections has also grown in the past years. Softpedia News

InfoSecurity's Most Wanted: The top six threats at large

1: Wanted: Data-stealing rogue mobile app
Wanted For: Falsely impersonating brand, data theft, and brand damage
Modus Operandi: Threat actors leverage rogue versions of brand name mobile apps to gain access to intended victim tablets and mobile phones. They can accomplish this in two ways: 1. With permissionware (i.e. packages of permissions used to access sensitive data), malware, spyware, or adware, threat actors can download, modify, repackage, and upload brands' legitimate mobile apps. ITProPortal

Nearly Every Latin American Country Is Using This Software To Spy On Their Citizens

Almost every Latin American government has purchased or shown interest in obtaining aggressive surveillance software, taking advantage of a failure to enforce lax regulations but potentially violating human rights, according to a new report by the Santiago-based NGO, Derechos Digitales. Authorities in Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Honduras, Mexico and Panama have all bought software licensed from Hacking Team, an Italian company that sells some of the most invasive spying software in the world. Argentina, Guatemala, Paraguay, Uruguay and Venezuela have negotiated with the company but do not appear to have bought any products as of July, according to the report, released last week. Buzzfeed (2016-04-05)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, April 07, 2016 8:43 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

April 7, 2016 / le 7 avril 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Turquie - 50 millions de Turcs voient leurs données personnelles divulguées sur le Web

Les autorités turques enquêtent sur une gigantesque fuite des données personnelles de 50 millions de Turcs, une affaire prise très au sérieux par Ankara, qui révèle les failles dans la sécurité des réseaux informatiques du pays. La base de données, qui n'a pas été authentifiée, a été mise en ligne par des pirates informatiques en début de semaine. Ces informations contiendraient entre autres le numéro d'identification national, le sexe, les noms des parents, la date et le lieu de naissance, ainsi que l'adresse des personnes concernées. Le parquet d'Ankara a ouvert une information judiciaire mercredi pour déterminer les circonstances de cette fuite, qui expose près de deux tiers des 78 millions de Turcs à toute une série de fraudes, selon l'agence de presse progouvernementale Anatolie. Des responsables turcs ont confirmé la fuite, datant les données divulguées de 2010. Le Devoir, B6

Global leader advises How to become a cybersecurity hub

A high-tech entrepreneur who has helped build Israel into a global leader in cybersecurity says New Brunswick should follow the Israeli example and form a bureau dedicated to fostering the development of the industry. With exports totaling $3.5 billion - roughly five per cent of the $75 billion worldwide market in 2015 and 20 per cent of private investment - Israel is currently home to 430 cyber security companies and 40 cyber security research and development centres of foreign multinationals, including Canadian companies. Roni Zehavi heads Israel's central coordinating body for cyber industry initiatives between government agencies, Israel defence forces, academia, and the public - known as the CyberSpark Industry Initiative. He's slated to deliver the keynote address at a computer science research expo hosted by the University of New Brunswick on Friday, as New Brunswick attempts to carve out its own new niche as a centre of excellence in cybersecurity. Telegraph-Journal, D1

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Canadian law firms a 'sweet spot' for attack, says intelligence expert

Canadian lawyers are among those in the global legal community who may be looking closer at their information security procedures after the revelation of a massive hack of international documents from a Panamanian law firm. They ought to, according to an Ontario cybersecurity lawyer (...). Because they hold sensitive corporate and personal information law firms are logical targets of attackers. However Ray Boisvert, a former assistant director of intelligence at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and now president of the advisory firm I-Sec Integrated Strategies, said in an interview they may not appreciate what they hold. "Sometimes organizations, law firms, some government relations firms and lobbyists and others don't always recognize how valuable their information assets are," he said. "I think they see their role and quality and value as provisioners of advice — and that's true — but they also have great repositories for stuff." In this country attention on cybersecurity has mainly been focused on organizations related to critical infrastructure — banks, utilities, governments and law enforcement agencies, and transportation companies. IT World Canada

Why WhatsApp's Encryption Embrace Is a Landmark Event

The news that Facebook's WhatsApp now supports encryption across all its apps is nothing short of seismic. There have always been those who were keen on using encrypted communications — politicians trying to avoid the gaze of their rivals and foreign spies, corporate executives trying to protect their trade secrets, activists trying to organize opposition to oppressive regimes and, yes, criminals trying to evade law enforcement. But, in the big picture, these are fringe cases. Before Edward Snowden told the world about the extent of state surveillance in 2013, few "normal" people were interested in adding heavy protections to their communications. Soon, over a billion of them will be using this facility without even trying. Fortune, Washington Post (Toronto Star)

Locky Ransomware Morphs as Spam Attacks Spike

Locky, an emerging ransomware threat that first burst on the scene in February, has already started to mutate and morph into new variants. The changes come just as researchers observe a fresh spike in propagation. Locky is distributed via email attachments, specifically Word documents disguised as invoices. The docs contain macros which download and install the ransomware. When originally discovered, the botnet behind the spam mail was found to be the same as that which delivers the majority of emails containing the infamous Dridex trojan. Locky is also spread via exploit kits. Infosecurity Magazine

Nest disables smart home device, triggers IoT security concerns

Internet of Things (IoT) thermostat company Nest will disable the company's smart home product Revolv on May 15, sparking concerns over the future security of the IoT devices. The decision to disable the $299 device was announced by Revolv founders Tim Enwall and Mike Soucie on Revolv's website. The founders will re-focus on building Works with Nest, a platform of compatible devices that integrate into the Nest system. "Unfortunately, that means we can't allocate resources to Revolv anymore and we have to shut down the service." SC Magazine; CBC News

Israeli cyber experts on high alert to defend against Anonymous online attacks

Israeli security agencies are on alert over the potential for cyber-attacks by Anonymous on Thursday, after the hacker group previously targeted the Jewish state each April 7. The attacks in solidarity with the Palestinians have in the past succeeded in blocking government sites, including for the ministries of defense and foreign affairs. "We are prepared for all forms of aggression," an official from the Shin Bet domestic security agency told AFP. "Israel is well-protected." Anonymous has already released a threatening video with a "message for the crazy murdering Zionist entity in Isra-Hell that we are coming back to punish you once again." i24 News

Mobile cyber threats pave way for the anti-malware security market

It's not just desktop computers that are being targeted by hackers, smartphones and tablets are also in their crosshairs. It's a common assumption that only desktop computers can be hacked. Unfortunately, this isn't the case, as most digital devices can be hacked in some manner, including mobile devices. This has spawned a new market for anti-malware technology, with IT cyber security companies now investing heavily into cyber security software for smartphones and tablets. Hackers may target users' mobile devices to steal sensitive data, such as their list of contacts, photos, videos, frequently visited websites, account information, and even financial data. While most of the major mobile operating systems (OS) have anti-malware measures embedded into their systems, there's no fool-proof way to protect against hacking. To provide stronger security measures for mobile device users companies are now offering third-party anti-malware mobile software and services. The Global Mobile Anti-Malware Market 2016-2020 report by Market Research Reports provides an in-depth look at the global market for mobile anti-malware software. It covers both present and future scenarios for global anti-malware, complete with market size, regions of interest, key vendors, market trends, expert analyses and more. WhaTech

Security Experts Crack Dridex Admin Panel, Recover Victim Data

Security researchers from buguroo have managed to find one of Dridex's many admin panels, and after leveraging an older vulnerability, they hacked its backend, retrieved user data and kept an eye on its activity to analyze how the crooks operated. Their investigation started in January 2016, when their bugFraud Defense endpoint protection system detected a classic Dridex alert, related to Web injections taking place in the user's browser, where Dridex's malware was loading malicious JavaScript on banking websites in order to steal authentication credentials. Analyzing the alerts in more depth, researchers found the IP address of one of the Dridex admin panels hardcoded in the malicious JavaScript files used to hijack the user's browser. Because Dridex operations are carried out on a massive scale, the crooks behind this huge botnet use multiple smaller infrastructures, which security researchers call subnets. This fractured architecture makes it harder to detect Dridex's operations for security firms, and also harder to sinkhole the cybergang's infrastructure. Softpedia News

Linux botnet attacks increase in scale

Hackers are using malware which targets Linux to build botnets to launch distributed denial of service (DDoS attacks) security researchers have warned. The so-called BillGates Trojan botnet family of malware - apparently so named by the virus writers because it targets machines running Linux, not Windows - has been labelled with a "high" risk factor in a threat advisory issued by Akamai's Security Intelligence Research Team. Akamai said the biggest attack to date using such a botnet occurred towards the end of 2015. "The biggest attack campaign observed, including malicious traffic from the BillGates botnet along with other various attack vectors, was on December 30, 2015 and had a well-distributed peak bandwidth of about 308 Gbps across our scrubbing centers," the advisory said, and Akamai warns that the power of the attacks is on the rise - which is why the malware has been given a "high" risk factor. ZDNet

Bill Gates/bot malware family used to launch DDoS attacks

The Bill Gates/bot family of malware continues to be used to facilitate distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks, allowing bad actors to seize full control of infected systems, according to a threat advisory from Akamai's Security Intelligence Research Team (SIRT), which ranked the risk factor as "high." The researchers noted that the attack vectors in the toolkit of the malware, which was revealed on a Russian website in 2014, include ICMP flood, TCP flood, UDP flood, SYN flood, HTTP Flood (Layer7), and DNS query-of-reflection flood. "This malware is an update and reuse of the Elknot's malware source code," the advisory said. "Over the years, the botnets composed of it have grown, and today's botnets are launching significantly large attacks." SC Magazine

New tactics mean spear-phishing will become a much greater danger

There's been a worrying development in spear-phishing, with a security company observing a new campaign in which the attacker(s) has been able to scale up and target a much larger group of would-be victims. Proofpoint says that it has been tracking a threat it has named TA530 since the beginning of the year, which is targeting top-brass execs including vice presidents and directors along with the likes of CFOs. Spear-phishing refers to the fact that a malicious email is highly targeted to the victim, containing personal details designed to persuade them that it's a genuine message. Normally that takes a fair bit of work in terms of tailoring the email, but the danger with the new TA530 threat is that it appears to automatically customise each email to include not just the victim's name, but also job title, company name and phone number. Not only this, but it also offers up relevant subject lines and attachment names all designed to lure the victim into making that fatal click which lets malware invade their computer. TechRadar

Megabreach: 55 MILLION voters' details leaked in Philippines

A massive data breach appears to have left 55 million Philippine voters at much greater risk of identity fraud and more. Security researchers warn that the entire database of the Philippines' Commission on Elections (COMELEC) has been exposed in what appears to be the biggest government related data breach in history. The COMELEC website was compromised and defaced on 27 March by Anonymous Philippines before a second hacker group, LulzSec Pilipinas posted COMELEC's entire database online days later. All sorts of sensitive information – including passport information and fingerprint data – appears to have been included in the data dump. Some of the data was encrypted but there were some fields that were left wide open, according to a investigation by Trend Micro. UK Register

Latest phishing email contains personal data

Action Fraud says it has received thousands of calls about a new email scam that's sweeping the country. It's of particular concern, they say, as the emails include detailed personal information such as full name, address and postcode. They are also - unusually - grammatical and correctly spelled. The emails purport to be chasing up a debt to one of a number of companies, including Optex (Europe) Ltd, British Millerrain Co Ltd and Greenoaks Ltd - all perfectly legitimate companies that have nothing to do with the scam. They claim that there's an invoice outstanding, and ask for payment of several hundreds of pounds. The recipient is asked to click on a link to receive a printable version of the invoice. AOL UK

27 million doctors' mobile devices at high risk of malware

More than 27 million Android devices running medical apps are likely to have high risk malware installed, according to a new report. The Mobile Threat Intelligence report from threat defense company Skycure is focused on healthcare and finds that doctors who use mobile devices to assist their day-to-day practice are exposed to network threats, and that these significantly increase over time. In a single month, one in five (22 per cent) of mobile devices will be at risk of a network attack. This figure nearly doubles to 39 per cent after four months. In addition to network threats, mobile devices continue to be plagued by malware. More than four per cent of all Android devices were found to be infected with malicious apps. Medical app users need to be particularly wary, as the report shows 27.79 million devices with medical apps installed might also be infected with high-risk malware. The Skycure mobile threat defense platform conducted 51 million network tests in 2015, and detected the installation of nearly 13,000 malicious apps. IT Pro Portal

Google boosts network Safe Browsing with malware, social engineering alerts

Google has announced an upgrade for Safe Browsing Alerts which adds information on additional threats to help network administrators protect their users. Network administrators have shouldered a heavy task. In today's world, cyberattacks and threats are increasing in sophistication, the range of dangers has increased exponentially, and IT staff are faced with the challenge of protecting corporate networks -- often holding valuable business and customer data -- as best they can. It's no simple task, and employees need all the investment and help they can have. Google is one such company to provide tools and systems for network admins, including the Safe Browsing Alerts for Network Administrators tool. Launched five years ago, the tool works in a similar way to Safe Browsing by warning administrators when potentially harmful URLs are discovered on their networks. ZDNet

Petya Ransomware attacks your Hard Drive

This year should be declared as year of Ransomware! Cyber-criminals come up with new families and new versions of it, resulting in making life miserable for victims of their extortion campaigns. In our threat predictions for 2016, we had predicted that Ransomware will be a major threat in this year. Little did we know that Ransomware would target Master

Boot Record. We have witnessed Ransomware locking desktop, encrypting files, Web servers, shared drives and backups and targeting various operating systems. According to the latest research of eScan, a new variant of Ransomware named Petya (Trojan.Ransom.Petya.C) has been found targeting human resources in German companies, the Malware replaces Master Boot Record (MBR) and encrypts the Master File Table on an infected Windows computer's hard drive and demands 9 Bitcoin in return for the decryption key. IIFL

Fake App Store steals iPhone users' money

Some iPhone users in China are being conned by the AceDeceiver malware. The hack that makes you think you're buying a app on the App Store, but only deducts money from your credit card without getting you the app. The Daily Star reported that, "A technique used for installing pirated iOS apps onto non-jailbroken Apple devices has now been deployed by criminals looking to compromise user accounts. Security firm Palo Alto Networks recently discovered what it's calling a new family of iOS malware that's capable of infecting non-jailbroken (stock) devices. In July 2015 and February 2016, an app claiming to be a wallpaper resource passed Apple's stringent checks to make its way to the App Store. The App would then check if you're located in China and go into the malicious mode. Hindustan Times

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, April 15, 2016 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

April 15, 2016 / le 15 avril 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Microsoft suit is latest tech clash with US over privacy

As we live more of our lives online, the companies we trust with our digital secrets are increasingly clashing with authorities who want access to the messages, pictures, financial records and other data we accumulate in electronic form. Microsoft opened a new front in the battle over digital privacy this week, suing the Justice Department over its use of court orders requiring the company to turn over customer files stored in its computer centres often without notifying the customer involved. It's the latest in a series of legal challenges brought by Microsoft and some of its leading competitors. Apple recently fought a high-profile battle over the FBI's demand for help unlocking an encrypted iPhone in San Bernardino, California, and it's continuing to challenge similar demands in other cases. Other companies, including Google, Facebook and Yahoo, have increased their use of encryption. They've also sued for the right to report how often authorities demand customer information under national security laws, after former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden leaked details of government data-gathering efforts. Privacy advocates have applauded those moves, while authorities complain they could stymie legitimate investigations. Associated Press (Telegram, Guardian, Waterloo Region Record)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Ottawa should create cyber threat advisory committee, says security lawyer

The federal government should follow Washington's lead and create an advisory committee of experts on national cybersecurity — announced yesterday — including both the public and private sector, says a security lawyer. "I do believe that Canada would benefit from a similar setup where the Minister of Public Safety, the Minister of Defence and the Prime Minister could get input and recommendations from a panel made up of experts/stakeholders from the private, public, law enforcement and academic sectors," Imran Ahmad of the firm Cassels Brock, who also sits on the advisory board of the Canadian Advanced Technologies Alliance's (CATA) Cyber Security Council, said in an interview. Ottawa "would benefit from a holistic view on cybersecurity threats to Canada that are affecting Canadians on a daily basis and that go beyond a narrow national security lens. IT World Canada

Uninstall: Trend Micro uncovers critical vulnerabilities affecting QuickTime for Windows

Currently using Apple Inc.'s multimedia software QuickTime for Windows within your business? You might want to reconsider: Trend Micro Inc.'s Zero Day Initiative's discovery of two new, critical vulnerabilities affecting the software have been revealed as Apple ends support for the software. In a detailed blog post, the IT security vendor outlines how critical vulnerabilities within the multimedia program can enable remote attackers to take over an IT system. According to Christopher Budd, Trend Micro's global threat communications manager, at present there are no active attacks exploiting these vulnerabilities. But in light of the fact Apple currently has no intention to release new security updates or patches for the Windows version of the software, it is recommended that enterprises look at uninstalling the software immediately. IT World Canada; Infosecurity Magazine

GozNym: The double-headed malware monster targeting US banks

Banking Trojans Nymaim and Gozi ISFB have combined to create a new hybrid, GozNym, which has already become responsible for the theft of millions of dollars from banks. According to IBM X-Force researchers, the operators of the powerful Nymaim Trojan have recompiled its source code with slices of the Gozi ISFB source code, which has created a "double-headed monster" hybrid malware which has improved capabilities. The team says the banking Trojan is already actively used in attacks against financial institutions with the overall aim of compromising business accounts. ZDNet; Infosecurity Magazine

New Malware Steals $4 Million at U.S., Canada Banks

Cybersecurity researchers at IBM Corp. said Thursday they have discovered a new type of malicious software that has been used to attack customers of 22 U.S. banks and two in Canada. The attacks have resulted in the theft of roughly $4 million dollars in the first few days of April, the researchers said. The malware is targeting bank customers with business accounts, mostly at banks in the U.S., according to a blog posting on IBM X-Force, which is part of IBM's security business. The malware also focuses on credit unions and "popular" e-commerce platforms. IBM Security didn't identify the institutions, but said they have been alerted to the incidents and have taken measures to stop the attacks. Wall Street Journal

Jigsaw ransomware: Saw-inspired malware deletes files bit by bit hourly until you pay

A particularly vindictive individual or group of hackers has released a new crypto-ransomware named Jigsaw, after the killer in the Saw horror films. It not only encrypts the files on your computer, but also sets a timer and deletes more files every hour that the user delays paying the ransom. The malware targets over 120 file extension types. Once activated, a screen with Billy the puppet (Jigsaw's mouthpiece in the Saw films) tells the victim in either English or Portuguese that they have 24 hours to pay a bitcoin ransom of between $20-$200 (£14-£140) in order to decrypt their files. International Business Times

Report: Feds staying mum on possible Firefox vulnerability

Experts are speculating that the FBI may be closely guarding a secret vulnerability in the Firefox browser that it can exploit for future law enforcement purposes, according to a Motherboard report yesterday. The article refers to a network investigative technique that the FBI used to hack visitors of the Playpen child pornography website. That site runs on the encrypted Tor network, but an exploit that works on the Tor browser would also work just as effectively on Firefox, upon which Tor was built. SC Magazine

Facebook scam promises friend's video, delivers malware instead

A new spam campaign tries to fool Facebook users into downloading malware by luring them to a fake YouTube page supposedly featuring a friend's video. According to a scam alert from research firm ESET, victims receive either a false notification that they were tagged in a friend's timeline post, or a message purportedly sent by a friend via Messenger. SC Magazine

Exclusive: Canadian Police Obtained BlackBerry's Global Decryption Key

A high-level surveillance probe of Montreal's criminal underworld shows that Canada's federal policing agency has had a global encryption key for BlackBerry devices since 2010. The revelations are contained in a stack of court documents that were made public after members of a Montreal crime syndicate pleaded guilty to their role in a 2011 gangland murder. The documents shed light on the extent to which the smartphone manufacturer, as well as telecommunications giant Rogers, cooperated with investigators. According to technical reports by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that were filed in court, law enforcement intercepted and decrypted roughly one million PIN-to-PIN BlackBerry messages in connection with the probe. The report doesn't disclose exactly where the key — effectively a piece of code that could break the encryption on virtually any BlackBerry message sent from one device to another — came from. But, as one police officer put it, it was a key that could unlock millions of doors. Government lawyers spent almost two years fighting in a Montreal courtroom to keep this information out of the public record. (... BlackBerry's Canadian and American offices declined to comment for this story. A spokesperson for Rogers declined to address the case directly, instead sending a prepared statement stating that they protect their customers' privacy and only cooperate with valid legal requests. Minister of Public Safety Ralph Goodale would not speak to the specifics of the case or Operation Clemenza during a phone conversation with VICE News, nor would he comment on the appropriateness of the RCMP obtaining the global decryption key, but did say he was familiar with the operation. Citing the ongoing public debate in the United States over the FBI's request to unlock the cellphone that belonged to the San Bernardino shooters, Goodale said that now is the time for discussions about encryption and privacy to be had. "Where is the proper intersection, or boundary line if you will, between the proper requirements of public safety and the proper requirements of privacy? And where does society want to define that line, and that discussion has not been had yet?" Goodale said. "That discussion has to be had." Goodale went on to say that his government will be introducing legislation to establish an independent Parliamentary review committee for Canada's intelligence collection services before the Summer, although did not specify whether that body would also be tasked with overseeing the RCMP. Vice News; Huffington Post; Le Monde; Journal de Montréal; Register

Saint John drug network tricked by 'Trojan horse': cyber expert

Police used a classic Trojan horse scenario to crack an illegal drug network in Saint John, says David Shipley, a cybersecurity expert at the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton. In this case, the Trojan horse was actually a collection of encrypted BlackBerry cellphones supplied by police to members of the alleged crime group. Court documents released this week include a statement of facts agreed to by the Crown and by defence lawyer Rod MacDonald. CBC News

Apple and FBI head back to Congress to debate encryption

Apple and the FBI will once again appear in front of a congressional committee to debate the ongoing encryption issue. The fight over the San Bernardino phone may be over, but the argument over how our data is securely stored rages on. The subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation will hold a hearing called Deciphering the Debate Over Encryption: Industry and Law Enforcement Perspectives. Those appearing in front of congress will include Apple general counsel Bruce Sewell and FBI executive assistant director for science and technology, Amy Hess. Other witnesses include security and cryptography researcher, Matthew Blaze, MIT researcher Daniel Weitzner, RSA president Amit Yoran and law enforcement representatives from New York, Indiana and the National Sheriff's Association. Engadget

More than 45,000 sign petition against U.S. encryption-breaking bill

More than 45,000 people have signed a petition against proposed U.S. legislation that would require tech companies to break into their users' encrypted data when ordered to by a judge. The proposal, from Senators Richard Burr and Dianne Feinstein, would require smartphone OS developers and other tech vendors to assist law enforcement agencies by breaking their own security measures. Credo Action, a progressive activist group, launched a petition opposing the Compliance with Court Orders Act on Tuesday, and more than 43,000 people had signed it by early Thursday afternoon. InfoWorld

Encryption backdoors: The brief history of an oxymoron

Over the past year, we've heard politicians the world over discussing the need for governments to be able to bypass encryption. Major Silicon Valley powers like Apple and Google have repeatedly told lawmakers that they can't be given access to the encrypted services they provide for their users, with or without a warrant, because they don't have that access themselves – only the user has the encryption key. That's where we see pushback from law enforcement and intelligence agencies who claim that this standard is unacceptable and allows criminals and terrorists to plot freely, away from the eyes of the law. Their solution? Create a backdoor into encryption that allows the government to access encrypted data, while still keeping it safe for everyone else. IT Pro Portal

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, April 15, 2016 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
April 15, 2016 / le 15 avril 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Microsoft suit is latest tech clash with US over privacy

As we live more of our lives online, the companies we trust with our digital secrets are increasingly clashing with authorities who want access to the messages, pictures, financial records and other data we accumulate in electronic form. Microsoft opened a new front in the battle over digital privacy this week, suing the Justice Department over its use of court orders requiring the company to turn over customer files stored in its computer centres often without notifying the customer involved. It's the latest in a series of legal challenges brought by Microsoft and some of its leading competitors. Apple recently fought a high-profile battle over the FBI's demand for help unlocking an encrypted iPhone in San Bernardino, California, and it's continuing to challenge similar demands in other cases. Other companies, including Google, Facebook and Yahoo, have increased their use of encryption. They've also sued for the right to report how often authorities demand customer information under national security laws, after former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden leaked details of government data-gathering efforts. Privacy advocates have applauded those moves, while authorities complain they could stymie legitimate investigations. Associated Press (Telegram, Guardian, Waterloo Region Record)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Ottawa should create cyber threat advisory committee, says security lawyer

The federal government should follow Washington's lead and create an advisory committee of experts on national cybersecurity — announced yesterday — including both the public and private sector, says a security lawyer. "I do believe that Canada would benefit from a similar setup where the Minister of Public Safety, the Minister of Defence and the Prime Minister could get input and recommendations from a panel made up of experts/stakeholders from the private, public, law enforcement and academic sectors," Imran Ahmad of the firm Cassels Brock, who also sits on the advisory board of the Canadian Advanced Technologies Alliance's (CATA) Cyber Security Council, said in an interview. Ottawa "would benefit from a holistic view on cybersecurity threats to Canada that are affecting Canadians on a daily basis and that go beyond a narrow national security lens. IT World Canada

Uninstall: Trend Micro uncovers critical vulnerabilities affecting QuickTime for Windows

Currently using Apple Inc.'s multimedia software QuickTime for Windows within your business? You might want to reconsider: Trend Micro Inc.'s Zero Day Initiative's discovery of two new, critical vulnerabilities affecting the software have been revealed as Apple ends support for the software. In a detailed blog post, the IT security vendor outlines how critical vulnerabilities within the multimedia program can enable remote attackers to take over an IT system. According to Christopher Budd, Trend Micro's global threat communications manager, at present there are no active attacks exploiting these vulnerabilities. But in light of the fact Apple currently has no intention to release new security updates or patches for the Windows version of the software, it is recommended that enterprises look at uninstalling the software immediately. IT World Canada; Infosecurity Magazine

GozNym: The double-headed malware monster targeting US banks

Banking Trojans Nymaim and Gozi ISFB have combined to create a new hybrid, GozNym, which has already become responsible for the theft of millions of dollars from banks. According to IBM X-Force researchers, the operators of the powerful Nymaim Trojan have recompiled its source code with slices of the Gozi ISFB source code, which has created a "double-headed monster" hybrid malware which has improved capabilities. The team says the banking Trojan is already actively used in attacks against financial institutions with the overall aim of compromising business accounts. ZDNet; Infosecurity Magazine

New Malware Steals $4 Million at U.S., Canada Banks

Cybersecurity researchers at IBM Corp. said Thursday they have discovered a new type of malicious software that has been used to attack customers of 22 U.S. banks and two in Canada. The attacks have resulted in the theft of roughly $4 million dollars in the first few days of April, the researchers said. The malware is targeting bank customers with business accounts, mostly at banks in the U.S., according to a blog posting on IBM X-Force, which is part of IBM's security business. The malware also focuses on credit unions and "popular" e-commerce platforms. IBM Security didn't identify the institutions, but said they have been alerted to the incidents and have taken measures to stop the attacks. Wall Street Journal

Jigsaw ransomware: Saw-inspired malware deletes files bit by bit hourly until you pay

A particularly vindictive individual or group of hackers has released a new crypto-ransomware named Jigsaw, after the killer in the Saw horror films. It not only encrypts the files on your computer, but also sets a timer and deletes more files every hour that the user delays paying the ransom. The malware targets over 120 file extension types. Once activated, a screen with Billy the puppet (Jigsaw's mouthpiece in the Saw films) tells the victim in either English or Portuguese that they have 24 hours to pay a bitcoin ransom of between $20-$200 (£14-£140) in order to decrypt their files. International Business Times

Report: Feds staying mum on possible Firefox vulnerability

Experts are speculating that the FBI may be closely guarding a secret vulnerability in the Firefox browser that it can exploit for future law enforcement purposes, according to a Motherboard report yesterday. The article refers to a network investigative technique that the FBI used to hack visitors of the Playpen child pornography website. That site runs on the encrypted Tor network, but an exploit that works on the Tor browser would also work just as effectively on Firefox, upon which Tor was built. SC Magazine

Facebook scam promises friend's video, delivers malware instead

A new spam campaign tries to fool Facebook users into downloading malware by luring them to a fake YouTube page supposedly featuring a friend's video. According to a scam alert from research firm ESET, victims receive either a false notification that they were tagged in a friend's timeline post, or a message purportedly sent by a friend via Messenger. SC Magazine

Exclusive: Canadian Police Obtained BlackBerry's Global Decryption Key

A high-level surveillance probe of Montreal's criminal underworld shows that Canada's federal policing agency has had a global encryption key for BlackBerry devices since 2010. The revelations are contained in a stack of court documents that were made public after members of a Montreal crime syndicate pleaded guilty to their role in a 2011 gangland murder. The documents shed light on the extent to which the smartphone manufacturer, as well as telecommunications giant Rogers, cooperated with investigators. According to technical reports by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that were filed in court, law enforcement intercepted and decrypted roughly one million PIN-to-PIN BlackBerry messages in connection with the probe. The report doesn't disclose exactly where the key — effectively a piece of code that could break the encryption on virtually any BlackBerry message sent from one device to another — came from. But, as one police officer put it, it was a key that could unlock millions of doors. Government lawyers spent almost two years fighting in a Montreal courtroom to keep this information out of the public record. (... BlackBerry's Canadian and American offices declined to comment for this story. A spokesperson for Rogers declined to address the case directly, instead sending a prepared statement stating that they protect their customers' privacy and only cooperate with valid legal requests. Minister of Public Safety Ralph Goodale would not speak to the specifics of the case or Operation Clemenza during a phone conversation with VICE News, nor would he comment on the appropriateness of the RCMP obtaining the global decryption key, but did say he was familiar with the operation. Citing the ongoing public debate in the United States over the FBI's request to unlock the cellphone that belonged to the San Bernardino shooters, Goodale said that now is the time for discussions about encryption and privacy to be had. "Where is the proper intersection, or boundary line if you will, between the proper requirements of public safety and the proper requirements of privacy? And where does society want to define that line, and that discussion has not been had yet?" Goodale said. "That discussion has to be had." Goodale went on to say that his government will be introducing legislation to establish an independent Parliamentary review committee for Canada's intelligence collection services before the Summer, although did not specify whether that body would also be tasked with overseeing the RCMP. Vice News; Huffington Post; Le Monde; Journal de Montréal; Register

Saint John drug network tricked by 'Trojan horse': cyber expert

Police used a classic Trojan horse scenario to crack an illegal drug network in Saint John, says David Shipley, a cybersecurity expert at the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton. In this case, the Trojan horse was actually a collection of encrypted BlackBerry cellphones supplied by police to members of the alleged crime group. Court documents released this week include a statement of facts agreed to by the Crown and by defence lawyer Rod MacDonald. CBC News

Apple and FBI head back to Congress to debate encryption

Apple and the FBI will once again appear in front of a congressional committee to debate the ongoing encryption issue. The fight over the San Bernardino phone may be over, but the argument over how our data is securely stored rages on. The subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation will hold a hearing called Deciphering the Debate Over Encryption: Industry and Law Enforcement Perspectives. Those appearing in front of congress will include Apple general counsel Bruce Sewell and FBI executive assistant director for science and technology, Amy Hess. Other witnesses include security and cryptography researcher, Matthew Blaze, MIT researcher Daniel Weitzner, RSA president Amit Yoran and law enforcement representatives from New York, Indiana and the National Sheriff's Association. Engadget

More than 45,000 sign petition against U.S. encryption-breaking bill

More than 45,000 people have signed a petition against proposed U.S. legislation that would require tech companies to break into their users' encrypted data when ordered to by a judge. The proposal, from Senators Richard Burr and Dianne Feinstein, would require smartphone OS developers and other tech vendors to assist law enforcement agencies by breaking their own security measures. Credo Action, a progressive activist group, launched a petition opposing the Compliance with Court Orders Act on Tuesday, and more than 43,000 people had signed it by early Thursday afternoon. InfoWorld

Encryption backdoors: The brief history of an oxymoron

Over the past year, we've heard politicians the world over discussing the need for governments to be able to bypass encryption. Major Silicon Valley powers like Apple and Google have repeatedly told lawmakers that they can't be given access to the encrypted services they provide for their users, with or without a warrant, because they don't have that access themselves – only the user has the encryption key. That's where we see pushback from law enforcement and intelligence agencies who claim that this standard is unacceptable and allows criminals and terrorists to plot freely, away from the eyes of the law. Their solution? Create a backdoor into encryption that allows the government to access encrypted data, while still keeping it safe for everyone else. IT Pro Portal

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, April 18, 2016 11:55 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
April 18, 2016 / le 18 avril 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Microsoft suit latest tech clash with government over privacy

Microsoft opened a new front in the battle over digital privacy this week, suing the Justice Department over its use of court orders requiring the company to turn over customer files stored in its computer centres - often without notifying the customer involved. It's the latest in a series of legal challenges brought by Microsoft and some of its leading competitors. Apple recently fought a high-profile battle over the FBI's demand for help unlocking an encrypted iPhone in San Bernardino, Calif., and it's continuing to challenge similar demands in other cases. Other companies, including Google, Facebook and Yahoo, have increased their use of encryption. They've also sued for the right to report how often authorities demand customer information under national security laws, after former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden leaked details of government data-gathering efforts. Associated Press (Toronto Star, B5) (2016-04-16)

'Dalhousie is under fire' - Hacker attack 'anonymous' claims inaction over rape claims

Anonymous, a global hacktivist group, attacked websites associated with Halifax's Dalhousie University in retaliation for claimed inaction by the school and local police over an alleged frat-house rape. As the distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks were launched last week and over the weekend, members of a Halifax-based cell of Anonymous released a video statement again naming the alleged attacker and suggesting his family's influence within Halifax may be the reason charges have not been laid. "Dalhousie is under fire," a spokesman for Halifax Nova Scotia Anonymous told the National Post. "Doing nothing is not an option. Every day that goes by without charges being laid tells the women of Halifax not to go forward with their complaints of rape." Anonymous claims the university's main website was offline for at least 43 minutes on Monday. Postmedia Network (StarPhoenix, N4, London Free Press, Vancouver Sun, National Post) (2016-04-18)

The destructive threat of cyberwar

An opinion piece states "There is a consensus that aggression by one nation against another is a serious matter, but there is no comparable consensus about what constitutes aggression. Waging aggressive war was one charge against Nazi leaders at the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trials, but 70 years later it is unclear that aggression, properly understood, must involve war, as commonly understood. Or that war, in today's context of novel destructive capabilities, must involve "the use of armed force," which the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court says is constitutive of an "act of aggression." Cyberskills can serve espionage -- the surreptitious acquisition of information -- which is older than nations and not an act of war. Relatively elementary cyberattacks against an enemy's command-and-control capabilities during war was a facet of U.S. efforts in Operation Desert Storm in 1991, in the Balkans in 1999 and against insurgents --- hacking their emails --- during the "surge" in Iraq. In 2007, Israel's cyberwarfare unit disrupted Syrian radar as Israeli jets destroyed an unfinished nuclear reactor in Syria. But how should we categorize cyberskills employed not to acquire information, and not to back military force, but to damage another nation's physical infrastructure? In the Second World War, the United States and its allies sent fleets of bombers over Germany to destroy important elements of its physical infrastructure --- steel mills, ball bearing plants, etc. Bombers were, however, unnecessary when the United States and Israel wanted to destroy some centrifuges crucial to Iran's nuclear weapons program. They used the Stuxnet computer "worm" to accelerate or slow processes at Iran's Natanz uranium-enrichment facility, damaging or even fragmenting centrifuges necessary for producing weapons-grade material. The things controlled by or through computers include not just military assets (command-and-control systems, the guidance mechanisms of smart munitions, etc.) but also hospitals, electric power grids, water works, the valves of dams and the financial transactions of banks. Clearly the United States needs a cyberdeterrent capacity -- the ability to do unto adversaries anything they might try to do unto us. One problem, however, is that it can be difficult to prove the source of a cyberattack, such as that which Vladimir Putin did not acknowledge launching, but almost certainly did launch, in 2007 to punish Estonia for annoying Russia." Washington Post (Telegraph-Journal, A7) (2016-04-18)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

New Malware Steals $4 Million at U.S., Canada Banks

Cybersecurity researchers at IBM Corp. said Thursday they have discovered a new type of malicious software that has been used to attack customers of 22 U.S. banks and two in Canada. The attacks have resulted in the theft of roughly $4 million dollars in the first few days of April, the researchers said. The malware is targeting bank customers with business accounts, mostly at banks in the U.S., according to a blog posting on IBM X-Force, which is part of IBM's security business. The malware also focuses on credit unions and "popular" e-commerce platforms. IBM Security didn't identify the institutions, but said they have been alerted to the incidents and have taken measures to stop the attacks. Wall Street Journal (2016-04-14)

A scheme to encrypt the web might actually be working

Apple's move to encrypt you iPhone and WhatsApp's rollout of end-to-end encrypted messaging have generated plenty of privacy applause and law enforcement controversy. But more quietly, a small non-profit project has enacted a plan to encrypt the entire global web. And it's working. Earlier this week, the San Francisco-based Internet Security Research Group (ISRG) announced that the initiative it calls Let's Encrypt is coming out of beta—and that it's making serious headway toward helping tens of millions of unencrypted sites around the world switch from the insecure web standard HTTP to HTTPS, which encrypts your web browsing to protect it from surveillance. Without that layer of encryption, a regular HTTP connection can be intercepted and read by anyone between a web visitor's browser and the site he or she is visiting—whether a hacker on the same Wi-Fi network, an internet service provider, or a government agency. Wired Magazine (2016-04-14)

US governments at all levels severely lacking in cyber security, report finds

U.S. government agencies at all levels failed miserably in protection against cyber attacks as revealed in a study done by the independent security risk-assessment firm SecurityScorecard. The study, which compared 17 private industries and their ability to prevent and identify vulnerabilities, placed government entities dead last. The SecurityScorecard grade is "a comprehensive indicator of relative security health, or security posture" determined by benchmark performance in 10 security categories. Of the 600 government organizations tested NASA was the worst, receiving failing grades in multiple categories. Rounding out the bottom alongside the government are education, telecommunications, pharmaceutical and energy. Top performers included information services, construction, food, technology and manufacturing. Between April 2015 and April 2016, the firm documented 35 major data breaches in all levels of government. The three categories that the lowest performing government entities had trouble in included malware infections, network security and software patching cadence. Examiner.com (2016-04-15)

'Perfect storm' of ransomware, malvertising and phishing attacks follow 'Celebgate' forum breach

Malwarebytes researchers spotted what they called the "perfect storm" of ransomware, malvertising, phishing attacks, and other malware following the breach of a popular forum dedicated to "Celebgate" leaked nude photos. On, April 12, havebeenpwned tweeted that the forum was compromised and exposed 179,000 accounts, 30 percent of which had already been compromised in previous breaches. Following the attack, researchers spotted on the forum's mobile site several compromised accounts, dubiously worded advertisements, malvertising, rogue mobile programs, and redirects to website based versions of ransomware that "lock" victims onto sites, according to an April 14 blog post. Among the malicious ads researchers spotted was a pornographic popup that attempted to load SLocker ransomware, a message posing as a United Nations warning, and other messages attempting to extort users. SC Magazine (2016-04-15)

The Vigilante Who Hacked Hacking Team Explains How He Did It

Back in July of last year, the controversial government spying and hacking tool seller Hacking Team was hacked itself by an outside attacker. The breach made headlines worldwide, but no one knew much about the perpetrator or how he did it. That mystery has finally been revealed. After eight months of almost complete silence, the pseudonymous digital vigilante behind the hack has resurfaced, publishing a detailed explanation of how he broke into the company's systems and laid bare its most closely guarded secrets. The write-up breaks down not only how the hacker, who calls himself Phineas Fisher, sneaked into Hacking Team's network and quietly exfiltrated more than 400 gigabytes of data, but also serves as a manifesto of his political ideals and the motives behind the hack. "And that's all it takes to take down a company and stop its abuses against human rights," the hacker proclaimed at the end of his guide, which Motherboard has seen in advance. "That's the beauty and asymmetry of hacking: with just 100 hours of work, one person can undo years of a multimillion dollar company's work. Hacking gives the underdog a chance to fight and win." Motherboard (2016-04-16)

Top government agencies flunk cyber security tests - NASA, FBI, IRS found lacking in network security, patching, malware safety

U.S. government agencies rank last in cyber security performance as compared to 17 private industry sectors, including healthcare, legal, manufacturing and transportation, according to a new report by SecurityScorecard, a New York-based startup. According to SecurityScorecard's data, federal agencies' security strengths include application security, password exposure, Cubit score and social engineering. That signals the organization is monitoring its websites and its employees are trained in security awareness, the researcher said. On the other hand, those agencies also struggled to repel malware, maintain strong network security and implement timely security patches, the study showed. SecurityScorecard said it tracked 35 major data breaches among all government agencies for the 12-month period beginning in April 2015. It paid particular importance to NASA, the FBI and the IRS inasmuch as those federal organizations have each been hit with large security breaches this year. Of the three, NASA scored the worst among all examined government agencies at every level, performing below the U.S. State Department and the IT systems of Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Washington. Channel Economics (2016-04-18)

Le ransomware CTB-Locker stocke les clés de déchiffrement sur blockchain

Ainsi que le décrivent les chercheurs de Sucuri, les auteurs du ransomware CTB-Locker utilisent un champ de métadonnées dans les transactions Bitcoin pour stocker des clés de décryptage. Le blockchain, qui sert de registre de transaction publique pour la cryptomonnaie bitcoin, est utilisé par les auteurs du ransomware CTB-Locker pour livrer des clés de déchiffrement à leurs victimes. La technique, qui évite aux cybercriminels de gérer et de maintenir une infrastructure web fiable, a été observée dans une version récente du ransomware ciblant les serveurs web. Cela fait longtemps que CTB-Locker vise les ordinateurs Windows. Mais, pour la première fois, en février dernier, une variante basée sur PHP, capable d'infecter les sites web, a fait son apparition, marquant une évolution de la menace. Dans cette première version, la routine de déchiffrement comportait un script appelé access.php qui servait de passerelle vers le serveur back-end des attaquants. Ce script de passerelle, hébergé par plusieurs sites Web piratés, servait à fournir la clé de décryptage aux victimes qui s'étaient acquittés de la rançon. Selon les chercheurs de l'entreprise de sécurité Sucuri, cette approche n'était pas fiable, parce que les sites web piratés pouvaient être nettoyés par leurs propriétaires. Et les pirates devaient constamment mettre à jour la liste des passerelles utilisées par le malware, une opération sans doute trop difficile à gérer. Le Monde Informatique (2016-04-18)

Hack the Pentagon: US offers 'bug bounty' to test country's cyber defences

A competition to 'Hack the Pentagon' gets under way today. The US Department of Defence initiative rewards so-called white-hat hackers who uncover and report security flaws in US cyber defences. Although the Pentagon regularly assigns its own internal security experts to test its systems, this is the first time the US government has offered a "bug bounty" programme to outsiders. Such competitions are more common in the private sector where companies like Microsoft and Facebook offer large cash rewards as part of their bug bounty programmes. Only vetted participants who signed-up when registration opened last month are allowed to participate in Hack the Pentagon, and those taking part must be US citizens. Announcing the competition in March, Ash Carter, the US secretary of defence, said: "I am always challenging our people to think outside the five-sided box that is the Pentagon." "Inviting responsible hackers to test our cyber-security certainly meets that test." The competition is led by the Pentagon's Defense Digital Service (DDS), a small unit of technology experts that was established last year. The competition comes to an end on 12 May. ITV News (2016-04-18)

Canada: Botnet Takedown: First Warrant Issued Under Canada's Anti-spam Law

Canada's anti-spam law ("CASL") outlines violations, enforcement mechanisms, and penalties aimed at protecting online consumers against spam, electronic threats, and misuse of digital technology. CASL's anti-spam rules came into effect on July 1, 2014. CASL's software update and installation rules came into effect on January 15, 2015. The latter rules are often referred to as malware/spyware computer program rules. Under these rules, CASL applies when a person, in the course of a commercial activity, installs or causes to be installed a computer program on any other person's computer system, unless the person has obtained the express consent of the owner or an authorized user of the computer system... On December 3, 2015, the CRTC announced that it served its first-ever warrant under CASL to take down a command-and-control server located in Toronto, Ontario. A command and control server is a centralized computer that issues commands to a botnet and receives reports back from the co-opted computers. A botnet is a set of computers that have been compromised through the installation of malware and which can be instructed to send spam, install additional malicious programs, and/or steal passwords, among other illicit activity. The malware in this case was Win32/Dorkbot malware, which has infected more than one million personal computers worldwide by spreading through social networks, instant messaging programs, and USB flash drives... According to the CRTC, agencies from around the world, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Europol, Interpol, Microsoft Inc., the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (the "RCMP"), Public Safety Canada, and the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre, are working together on the investigation of Dorkbot. The warrant in Canada was granted by a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice and was carried out with assistance from the RCMP. No further details have been provided by the CRTC yet regarding the details of the warrant or the execution process. Mondaq (2016-04-18)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca)

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, April 18, 2016 11:55 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
April 18, 2016 / le 18 avril 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Microsoft suit latest tech clash with government over privacy

Microsoft opened a new front in the battle over digital privacy this week, suing the Justice Department over its use of court orders requiring the company to turn over customer files stored in its computer centres - often without notifying the customer involved. It's the latest in a series of legal challenges brought by Microsoft and some of its leading competitors. Apple recently fought a high-profile battle over the FBI's demand for help unlocking an encrypted iPhone in San Bernardino, Calif., and it's continuing to challenge similar demands in other cases. Other companies, including Google, Facebook and Yahoo, have increased their use of encryption. They've also sued for the right to report how often authorities demand customer information under national security laws, after former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden leaked details of government data-gathering efforts. Associated Press (Toronto Star, B5) (2016-04-16)

'Dalhousie is under fire' - Hacker attack 'anonymous' claims inaction over rape claims

Anonymous, a global hacktivist group, attacked websites associated with Halifax's Dalhousie University in retaliation for claimed inaction by the school and local police over an alleged frat-house rape. As the distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks were launched last week and over the weekend, members of a Halifax-based cell of Anonymous released a video statement again naming the alleged attacker and suggesting his family's influence within Halifax may be the reason charges have not been laid. "Dalhousie is under fire," a spokesman for Halifax Nova Scotia Anonymous told the National Post. "Doing nothing is not an option. Every day that goes by without charges being laid tells the women of Halifax not to go forward with their complaints of rape." Anonymous claims the university's main website was offline for at least 43 minutes on Monday. Postmedia Network (StarPhoenix, N4, London Free Press, Vancouver Sun, National Post) (2016-04-18)

The destructive threat of cyberwar

An opinion piece states "There is a consensus that aggression by one nation against another is a serious matter, but there is no comparable consensus about what constitutes aggression. Waging aggressive war was one charge against Nazi leaders at the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trials, but 70 years later it is unclear that aggression, properly understood, must involve war, as commonly understood. Or that war, in today's context of novel destructive capabilities, must involve "the use of armed force," which the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court says is constitutive of an "act of aggression." Cyberskills can serve espionage -- the surreptitious acquisition of information -- which is older than nations and not an act of war. Relatively elementary cyberattacks against an enemy's command-and-control capabilities during war was a facet of U.S. efforts in Operation Desert Storm in 1991, in the Balkans in 1999 and against insurgents --- hacking their emails --- during the "surge" in Iraq. In 2007, Israel's cyberwarfare unit disrupted Syrian radar as Israeli jets destroyed an unfinished nuclear reactor in Syria. But how should we categorize cyberskills employed not to acquire information, and not to back military force, but to damage another nation's physical infrastructure? In the Second World War, the United States and its allies sent fleets of bombers over Germany to destroy important elements of its physical infrastructure --- steel mills, ball bearing plants, etc. Bombers were, however, unnecessary when the United States and Israel wanted to destroy some centrifuges crucial to Iran's nuclear weapons program. They used the Stuxnet computer "worm" to accelerate or slow processes at Iran's Natanz uranium-enrichment facility, damaging or even fragmenting centrifuges necessary for producing weapons-grade material. The things controlled by or through computers include not just military assets (command-and-control systems, the guidance mechanisms of smart munitions, etc.) but also hospitals, electric power grids, water works, the valves of dams and the financial transactions of banks. Clearly the United States needs a cyberdeterrent capacity -- the ability to do unto adversaries anything they might try to do unto us. One problem, however, is that it can be difficult to prove the source of a cyberattack, such as that which Vladimir Putin did not acknowledge launching, but almost certainly did launch, in 2007 to punish Estonia for annoying Russia." Washington Post (Telegraph-Journal, A7) (2016-04-18)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

New Malware Steals $4 Million at U.S., Canada Banks

Cybersecurity researchers at IBM Corp. said Thursday they have discovered a new type of malicious software that has been used to attack customers of 22 U.S. banks and two in Canada. The attacks have resulted in the theft of roughly $4 million dollars in the first few days of April, the researchers said. The malware is targeting bank customers with business accounts, mostly at banks in the U.S., according to a blog posting on IBM X-Force, which is part of IBM's security business. The malware also focuses on credit unions and "popular" e-commerce platforms. IBM Security didn't identify the institutions, but said they have been alerted to the incidents and have taken measures to stop the attacks. Wall Street Journal (2016-04-14)

A scheme to encrypt the web might actually be working

Apple's move to encrypt you iPhone and WhatsApp's rollout of end-to-end encrypted messaging have generated plenty of privacy applause and law enforcement controversy. But more quietly, a small non-profit project has enacted a plan to encrypt the entire global web. And it's working. Earlier this week, the San Francisco-based Internet Security Research Group (ISRG) announced that the initiative it calls Let's Encrypt is coming out of beta—and that it's making serious headway toward helping tens of millions of unencrypted sites around the world switch from the insecure web standard HTTP to HTTPS, which encrypts your web browsing to protect it from surveillance. Without that layer of encryption, a regular HTTP connection can be intercepted and read by anyone between a web visitor's browser and the site he or she is visiting—whether a hacker on the same Wi-Fi network, an internet service provider, or a government agency. Wired Magazine (2016-04-14)

US governments at all levels severely lacking in cyber security, report finds

U.S. government agencies at all levels failed miserably in protection against cyber attacks as revealed in a study done by the independent security risk-assessment firm SecurityScorecard. The study, which compared 17 private industries and their ability to prevent and identify vulnerabilities, placed government entities dead last. The SecurityScorecard grade is "a comprehensive indicator of relative security health, or security posture" determined by benchmark performance in 10 security categories. Of the 600 government organizations tested NASA was the worst, receiving failing grades in multiple categories. Rounding out the bottom alongside the government are education, telecommunications, pharmaceutical and energy. Top performers included information services, construction, food, technology and manufacturing. Between April 2015 and April 2016, the firm documented 35 major data breaches in all levels of government. The three categories that the lowest performing government entities had trouble in included malware infections, network security and software patching cadence. Examiner.com (2016-04-15)

'Perfect storm' of ransomware, malvertising and phishing attacks follow 'Celebgate' forum breach

Malwarebytes researchers spotted what they called the "perfect storm" of ransomware, malvertising, phishing attacks, and other malware following the breach of a popular forum dedicated to "Celebgate" leaked nude photos. On, April 12, havebeenpwned tweeted that the forum was compromised and exposed 179,000 accounts, 30 percent of which had already been compromised in previous breaches. Following the attack, researchers spotted on the forum's mobile site several compromised accounts, dubiously worded advertisements, malvertising, rogue mobile programs, and redirects to website based versions of ransomware that "lock" victims onto sites, according to an April 14 blog post. Among the malicious ads researchers spotted was a pornographic popup that attempted to load SLocker ransomware, a message posing as a United Nations warning, and other messages attempting to extort users. SC Magazine (2016-04-15)

The Vigilante Who Hacked Hacking Team Explains How He Did It

Back in July of last year, the controversial government spying and hacking tool seller Hacking Team was hacked itself by an outside attacker. The breach made headlines worldwide, but no one knew much about the perpetrator or how he did it. That mystery has finally been revealed. After eight months of almost complete silence, the pseudonymous digital vigilante behind the hack has resurfaced, publishing a detailed explanation of how he broke into the company's systems and laid bare its most closely guarded secrets. The write-up breaks down not only how the hacker, who calls himself Phineas Fisher, sneaked into Hacking Team's network and quietly exfiltrated more than 400 gigabytes of data, but also serves as a manifesto of his political ideals and the motives behind the hack. "And that's all it takes to take down a company and stop its abuses against human rights," the hacker proclaimed at the end of his guide, which Motherboard has seen in advance. "That's the beauty and asymmetry of hacking: with just 100 hours of work, one person can undo years of a multimillion dollar company's work. Hacking gives the underdog a chance to fight and win." Motherboard (2016-04-16)

Top government agencies flunk cyber security tests - NASA, FBI, IRS found lacking in network security, patching, malware safety

U.S. government agencies rank last in cyber security performance as compared to 17 private industry sectors, including healthcare, legal, manufacturing and transportation, according to a new report by SecurityScorecard, a New York-based startup. According to SecurityScorecard's data, federal agencies' security strengths include application security, password exposure, Cubit score and social engineering. That signals the organization is monitoring its websites and its employees are trained in security awareness, the researcher said. On the other hand, those agencies also struggled to repel malware, maintain strong network security and implement timely security patches, the study showed. SecurityScorecard said it tracked 35 major data breaches among all government agencies for the 12-month period beginning in April 2015. It paid particular importance to NASA, the FBI and the IRS inasmuch as those federal organizations have each been hit with large security breaches this year. Of the three, NASA scored the worst among all examined government agencies at every level, performing below the U.S. State Department and the IT systems of Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Washington. Channel Economics (2016-04-18)

Le ransomware CTB-Locker stocke les clés de déchiffrement sur blockchain

Ainsi que le décrivent les chercheurs de Sucuri, les auteurs du ransomware CTB-Locker utilisent un champ de métadonnées dans les transactions Bitcoin pour stocker des clés de décryptage. Le blockchain, qui sert de registre de transaction publique pour la cryptomonnaie bitcoin, est utilisé par les auteurs du ransomware CTB-Locker pour livrer des clés de déchiffrement à leurs victimes. La technique, qui évite aux cybercriminels de gérer et de maintenir une infrastructure web fiable, a été observée dans une version récente du ransomware ciblant les serveurs web. Cela fait longtemps que CTB-Locker vise les ordinateurs Windows. Mais, pour la première fois, en février dernier, une variante basée sur PHP, capable d'infecter les sites web, a fait son apparition, marquant une évolution de la menace. Dans cette première version, la routine de déchiffrement comportait un script appelé access.php qui servait de passerelle vers le serveur back-end des attaquants. Ce script de passerelle, hébergé par plusieurs sites Web piratés, servait à fournir la clé de décryptage aux victimes qui s'étaient acquittés de la rançon. Selon les chercheurs de l'entreprise de sécurité Sucuri, cette approche n'était pas fiable, parce que les sites web piratés pouvaient être nettoyés par leurs propriétaires. Et les pirates devaient constamment mettre à jour la liste des passerelles utilisées par le malware, une opération sans doute trop difficile à gérer. Le Monde Informatique (2016-04-18)

Hack the Pentagon: US offers 'bug bounty' to test country's cyber defences

A competition to 'Hack the Pentagon' gets under way today. The US Department of Defence initiative rewards so-called white-hat hackers who uncover and report security flaws in US cyber defences. Although the Pentagon regularly assigns its own internal security experts to test its systems, this is the first time the US government has offered a "bug bounty" programme to outsiders. Such competitions are more common in the private sector where companies like Microsoft and Facebook offer large cash rewards as part of their bug bounty programmes. Only vetted participants who signed-up when registration opened last month are allowed to participate in Hack the Pentagon, and those taking part must be US citizens. Announcing the competition in March, Ash Carter, the US secretary of defence, said: "I am always challenging our people to think outside the five-sided box that is the Pentagon." "Inviting responsible hackers to test our cyber-security certainly meets that test." The competition is led by the Pentagon's Defense Digital Service (DDS), a small unit of technology experts that was established last year. The competition comes to an end on 12 May. ITV News (2016-04-18)

Canada: Botnet Takedown: First Warrant Issued Under Canada's Anti-spam Law

Canada's anti-spam law ("CASL") outlines violations, enforcement mechanisms, and penalties aimed at protecting online consumers against spam, electronic threats, and misuse of digital technology. CASL's anti-spam rules came into effect on July 1, 2014. CASL's software update and installation rules came into effect on January 15, 2015. The latter rules are often referred to as malware/spyware computer program rules. Under these rules, CASL applies when a person, in the course of a commercial activity, installs or causes to be installed a computer program on any other person's computer system, unless the person has obtained the express consent of the owner or an authorized user of the computer system... On December 3, 2015, the CRTC announced that it served its first-ever warrant under CASL to take down a command-and-control server located in Toronto, Ontario. A command and control server is a centralized computer that issues commands to a botnet and receives reports back from the co-opted computers. A botnet is a set of computers that have been compromised through the installation of malware and which can be instructed to send spam, install additional malicious programs, and/or steal passwords, among other illicit activity. The malware in this case was Win32/Dorkbot malware, which has infected more than one million personal computers worldwide by spreading through social networks, instant messaging programs, and USB flash drives... According to the CRTC, agencies from around the world, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Europol, Interpol, Microsoft Inc., the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (the "RCMP"), Public Safety Canada, and the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre, are working together on the investigation of Dorkbot. The warrant in Canada was granted by a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice and was carried out with assistance from the RCMP. No further details have been provided by the CRTC yet regarding the details of the warrant or the execution process. Mondaq (2016-04-18)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca)

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, April 21, 2016 8:46 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
April 21, 2016 / le 21 avril 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Forum to focus on cyber-security needs in US and Canada

Cybersecurity experts are planning to hold a forum on ways the United States and Canada can toughen their online defenses. The discussion will focus on the growing number of lone wolf and foreign government-sponsored cyber-attacks that harm national security and commerce in both countries. Thursday's event is sponsored by The New England-Canada Business Council and will include a discussion of strategies needed to stem the tide of cyber-attacks particularly those by crime syndicates, rogue nations, terrorist groups and individual hackers. Associated Press (Winnipeg Free Press, Economic Times, Daily Journal)

Developer offers generic ransomware detection for OS X

The increasing use by attackers of ransomware has security researchers thinking of new defences to mount. For organizations who have Mac users, Patrick Wardle, director of researcher at Synack, a California security solutions provider, has come up with what he calls a generic ransomware threat protector for the OS X platform. Unlike solutions sold by commercial vendors that detect particular strains of ransomware, Wardle's solution called RansomWhere? identifies a factor common in all ransomware; the creation of encrypted files. IT World Canada; ZDNet; Register

Google has flagged itself as a malware risk

Google.com can be a source of malware infections – and this is according to Google itself, no less. If you check out the Safe Browsing Site Status of the search giant's transparency report and enter Google.com as a URL to be checked, you'll be informed that the current status of the site is 'partially dangerous'. "Some pages on Google.com contain deceptive content right now," the status warns. Tech Radar

Denial-of-service attacks now a cover for something more sinister

While to date police have considered distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks to be a low-level crime, they are now starting to take them a lot more seriously. According to Mike Hulett, head of operations at the National Crime Agency's Cybercrime Unit, DDoS attacks have risen up law enforcement's agenda for a couple of reasons. ZDNet

Lock-hackers crack restricted keys used to secure data centres

A group of Melbourne lock-pickers have forged a creative method for popping so-called restricted locks by 3D printing keys found on freely-available designs on patent sites. The feat demonstrated at the BSides Canberra security conference last week is a combination of opportunistic ingenuity and lock-picking mastery, and will be warmly-received by red team penetration testers and criminals alike. Lock-picking is common within the information security industry, is a staple at hacker conventions, and is becoming an increasingly used skill as part of anything-goes attempts to access controlled areas wherein computers can be found. Register

Criminals in the cloud: How malware-as-a-service is becoming the tool of choice for crooks

Everyone is working to a cloud business model now -- even virus writers. Rather than turning a profit just once by selling a security exploit as a one-off, authors of malicious software are now selling malware as a cloud-based service. This means they make money each time someone pays to use or rent one of the products, according to researchers. "The biggest cybercrime operations are essentially computer software and services companies, albeit illicit ones," says the 2016 Trustwave Global Security Report, which claims that criminal services sold on the 'dark web' even come with the reassurances and terms and conditions you'd expect to see with any other legitimate software product. ZDNet

Alarming Percentage of Orgs Can't ID a Data Breach

Just one-fifth (19%) of organizations have what they consider to be "excellent" visibility into their data and database assets. According to Osterman Research's database security industry report, about 39% of organizations surveyed also said that they lack the necessary tools to allow them to identify a database breach. "This study reveals there's a clear shift beginning to occur in information security away from total reliance on perimeter security toward a greater emphasis on database security," said Michael Osterman, president of Osterman Research. "Identifying compromised database credentials and insider threats will likely receive far more investment in the future. And, the actual rate of successful infiltrations or other leakage events is likely greater than discussed in this report due to inadequate organizational systems for tracking successful threats." Infosecurity Magazine

SpyEye creator nets prison time for malware that bilked $1B globally

The Russian creator of a computer program that enabled cybercriminals to infect millions of computers and drain bank accounts in multiple countries was sentenced Wednesday to serve 9 ½ years in federal prison. Aleksandr Andreevich Panin, 27, who went by aliases "Gribodemon" and "Harderman" online, pleaded guilty to a count of conspiracy to commit bank and wire fraud in January 2014 after reaching a deal with prosecutors. Associated Press (CBC News, Vancouver Province); PC World

Australia PM launches cybersecurity campaign

Australia set out a far-reaching cybersecurity strategy on Thursday, invoking the leaks of United States whistleblower Edward Snowden, terrorism and even the threat of war to push for a coordinated global approach to protection of online data. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, who faces an election in July amid waning popularity, is trying to position himself as a leader who can transform Australia into a tech-savvy business hub as its economy deals with a commodities downturn. Reuters; Sky News Australia

Apple refuses to hand over source code to Chinese authorities

Apple has revealed that Chinese authorities have asked for access to the company's source code in the last couple of years. The revelation was made by Apple general counsel Bruce Sewell as he tried to deflect accusations that have sprung up in the wake of the San Bernardino iPhone case. The battle between Apple and the FBI rumbled on for a while as authorities asked the iPhone manufacturer to crack encryption or provide a backdoor into the phone at the centre of the case. Apple refused to help the FBI, leading to accusations that the company was failing to help US authorities whilst assisting those abroad. Apple categorically denies handing over information to the Chinese authorities. IT Pro Portal

In a First, Judge Throws Out Evidence Obtained from FBI Malware

For the first time, a judge has thrown out evidence obtained via a piece of FBI malware. The move comes from a case affected by the FBI's seizure of a dark web child pornography site in February 2015, and the subsequent deployment of a network investigative technique (NIT)—the agency's term for a hacking tool—in order to identify the site's visitors. "Based on the foregoing analysis, the Court concludes that the NIT warrant was issued without jurisdiction and thus was void ab initio," Judge William G. Young of the District of Massachusetts writes in an order. "It follows that the resulting search was conducted as though there were no warrant at all." "Since warrantless searches are presumptively unreasonable, and the good-faith exception is inapplicable, the evidence must be excluded," it continues. Motherboard

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, April 28, 2016 8:49 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Follow Up Flag: Follow up
Flag Status: Completed

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique April 28, 2016 / le 28 avril 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

German nuclear plant suffers cyber attack designed to give hackers remote access

A nuclear power plant in Germany has been found to be infected with computer viruses, but they appear not to have posed a threat to the facility's operations because it is isolated from the Internet, the station's operator said on Tuesday. The Gundremmingen plant, located about 120 km (75 miles) northwest of Munich, is run by the German utility RWE. The viruses, which include "W32.Ramnit" and "Conficker", were discovered at Gundremmingen's B unit in a computer system retrofitted in 2008 with data visualisation software associated with equipment for moving nuclear fuel rods, RWE said. Malware was also found on 18 removable data drives, mainly USB sticks, in office computers maintained separately from the plant's operating systems. RWE said it had increased cyber-security measures as a result. The Telegraph \(UK\); Motherboard; SC Magazine; Popular Mechanics; TechWeek Europe; SC Magazine UK; Computing

Angler Exploit Kit: Biggest, Baddest Drive-By Shooter in Town

A full 80% of the active drive-by attacks observed in the past month can be attributed to the Angler exploit kit and its as-a-service rental model. "Angler relies on a huge and resilient infrastructure to distribute all sorts of malware, and the exploit kit operations have been quite intense for the past months," said Andra Zaharia, security specialist at Heimdal Security, adding that since the Angler exploit kit surfaced in 2013, it's evolved into a massive threat for users and companies alike. "But this new upsurge in Angler activity shows that the exploit kit could be getting even stronger." She added that Angler's success in the cyber-criminal community is heavily reinforced by the aggressive tactics that the exploit kit employs. One of these tactics is using a domain generation algorithm to engineer high-volume compromises without being detected by traditional antivirus. Info Security Magazine

Malware menace with 'scary' backdoor strikes 12 million machines

Cisco Talos has warned of a malware infection that has backdoor capabilities and 12 million machines in its grasp. The malware can steal personal information and gain administration rights. Talos calls it a 'generic trojan' made worse owing to its scale and payload. A common theme in the malware is a lot of incidents of the word 'Wizz' in the code. "The word 'Wizz' was in the name of every sample analysed, roughly 7,000 unique samples," Talos said in a blog post. The Inquirer; SoftPedia News

Qatar National Bank hacked; 1.4GB file archive leaked online

Reports indicate that Qatar's National Bank (QNB) has been hit with a cyberattack which has exposed roughly 1.4GB of corporate data. According to Cryptome, it is not known how the financial institution's data was leaked, and it could be anything from simple human error to an outside cyberattacker or inside job. Whatever the cause, a 1.4GB file cache has now entered the public realm and is available for download, reportedly containing sensitive corporate data and client financial information. ZDNet; Financial Times

Former Tor Developer Helped the FBI by Creating Malware to Go After Tor Users

Matthew Edman, a former core developer on the Tor Project, has helped the FBI after leaving the non-profit by creating the Torsploit malware used to deanonymize users of the Tor network, the Daily Dot reported yesterday. Edman joined the Tor Project in 2008 while a student at the Baylor University. He was assigned to work on Vidalia, a now defunct project that was a simple GUI that allowed users to deploy and manage Tor connections on their computer. Tor leadership stopped working on Vidalia in 2013, but by that time, Edman had already started working for the Mitre Corporation as a senior cyber-security engineer. SoftPedia News

All ATMs can be hijacked with malware, Kaspersky says

ATMs can be easily hacked and malware installed, meaning funds could be stolen, a report by Kaspersky Labs has revealed. The company identified two key hardware flaws with the ATMs it researched - the fact that the computer inside the machine can be easily accessed and once hackers manage to reach the PC, they are running outdated systems, so can be easily infected. IT PRO

Most breaches are still caused by PEBKAC and ID10T errors like falling for phishing

When it comes to data breaches, what big, bad cyber-boogeyman method should you fear and point the finger of blame at this year? The biggest security concern is not IoT, not mobile, not even ransomware; it's you, us, mere humans, which are the weak link being exploited and the number one problem leading to breaches. It's not some new attack attributed as the cause of most security incidents; oh no, it's falling for phishing, which has been around since about the dawn of email. ComputerWorld

As US drops "cyber bombs," ISIS retools its own cyber army

The Islamic State has been deft in its use of the Internet as a communications tool. ISIS has long leveraged social media to spread propaganda and even coordinate targets for attacks, using an ever-shifting collection of social media accounts for recruitment and even to call for attacks on individuals ISIS leaders have designated as enemies. But the organization's efforts to build a sophisticated internal "cyber army" to conduct information warfare against the US and other powers opposing it have thus far been fragmented and limited in their effectiveness—and more often than not they've been more propaganda than substance. Now, ISIS is taking another crack at building a more credible cyber force. As analysts from Flashpoint note in a report being published today (entitled "Hacking for ISIS: The Emergent Cyber Threat Landscape"), ISIS earlier this month apparently merged four separate pro-ISIS "cyber" teams into a single group called the United Cyber Caliphate. Ars Technica

ISIS Doesn't Trust Tor, Likes Snowden's Favorite Operating System (And Still Can't Hack Much)

Since the Paris attacks in November, the San Bernardino shootings in December, and the subsequent brawl between Apple and the FBI, there's been a growing obsession around the technical capabilities of terror group ISIS. How does it use encryption? Is it building a cyber warfare arm? The current answers: like the organization itself, its hacking skills and use of cryptography are patchy but developing at a trajectory that's concerning enough to cause anxiety amongst intelligence specialists. Hints of the operational security of ISIS, or ISIL as it's often called, can be found in literature aimed at jihadis. This week saw the release of the ninth edition of the Dar Al-Islam, an official ISIS publication written in French. In a section dedicated to technology, there's a warning about using anonymizing network Tor, which sends users through a number of randomly-selected servers and encrypts traffic. Concerns were raised by Dar Al-Islam about "malicious nodes", the points at the distributed Tor network controlled by spies, often used to intercept traffic and pilfer data from users. The article recommended users not enter sensitive or personal data on any website, "in particular when accessed with Tor". Forbes

Ransomware accounted for a quarter of hack attacks in the UK last week

Ransomware accounted for a quarter of the threats aimed at UK computer users over the past week, according to data gathered by security firm ESET using its LiveGrid telemetry. The UK has seen a spike in ransomware attacks looking to seize control of targeted machines and lock users out or destroy data if they do not pay a fee. The rise is attributed to malicious code called JS/Danger.ScriptAttachment which tries to download and install various malware and execute crypto-ransomware, such as Telsacrypt. This aims to encrypt data and demand payment for it to be decrypted. V#

GozNym banking malware spotted in Europe

IBM's X-Force reported today the actors behind the hybrid GozNym banking trojan have released a new configuration that is targeting European banks using redirection attacks. The recent targets include 17 Polish banks and one in Portugal. However, a new twist has been included, using redirection attacks targeted at customers using these banking institutions. IBM reported the GozNym gang have created about 200 URLs that point a victim to what they believe is their bank website, but in fact it is one controlled by the bad guys. SC Magazine UK

New site on dark web offering one-stop ransom services

A new site was discovered on the dark web that allows hackers to upload stolen data and sell the data to criminals or criminal groups. The site, called Ran$umBin, models the user-friendly themes of the crowd-sourcing movement in an apparent attempt to bring best practices of established businesses to the criminal operations. The website is billed as a 'one-stop' ransom marketplace and receives a commission on data that criminals upload to extort ransomware victims. SC Magazine

Should hospitals pay up when it comes to ransomware?

Ransomware has become a major threat to the U.S. healthcare industry this year. The high-profile attacks that involved Hollywood Presbyterian Hospital in Los Angeles, MedStar Health in Washington, D.C., and other healthcare systems are just the tip of the iceberg. Over half of hospitals surveyed recently by HIMSS Analytics and Healthcare IT News said they had been hit by ransomware attacks in the past year. Another 25 percent were unsure whether such attacks had occurred. It's not clear how many hospitals have paid ransoms to cyber-criminals to unencrypt their data and/or unlock their systems. Hollywood Presbyterian announced it had paid $17,000 to get its data back after being unable to use its EHR for 10 days. Methodist Hospital in Henderson, Ky., also reportedly paid $17,000. MedStar's systems were at least partly down for nearly a week, but the organization didn't say whether it had paid a ransom. Asked whether they'd fork over the ransom payment if hackers had encrypted their hospital's patient data, about half of the healthcare executives in the HIMSS Analytics survey said they wouldn't. Forty-four percent said they were unsure, and just 5 percent said they would pay. But experts say that the exponential growth of ransomware attacks indicates that some victims are yielding to the hackers' demands. CIO

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca).*

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, May 03, 2016 8:52 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique May 3, 2016 / le 3 mai 2016

Print Media / Médias en ligne

Spy agency cagey on privacy breaches: Bureau won't put a number on cyber-snoops since 2007

The Communications Security Establishment is refusing to release the number of privacy breaches the agency has logged since 2007. Documents obtained by the Star state the intelligence and cyber defence agency has maintained a central database for certain privacy violations since 2007. These breaches are categorized as minor "procedural errors" or more serious "privacy incidents," and reviewed by the CSE Commissioner's office every year. "In these files, CSE records any incidents it identifies that put at risk the privacy of a Canadian in a manner that runs counter to (or is not provided in) its operational policies," says a September 2014 letter from former CSE chief John Forster to a senior Treasury Board official. The Star requested just the number of breaches - no details about what actually transpired or the Canadian personal information involved - but was told the agency could not comply due to "operational security concerns." "Releasing the number of (breaches) would provide insight into CSE's capacity to conduct operations, the extent of its capabilities, the degree to which partner organizations benefit from sharing and the reach of the programs," wrote spokesperson Ryan Foreman in an email last week. CSE is one of Canada's most technologically sophisticated agencies, responsible for collecting foreign intelligence and protecting Canadian networks from cyber attacks. It is forbidden to use its surveillance tactics against Canadian citizens, except under specific circumstances. But disclosures from U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden have aroused suspicion about CSE's tools and tactics as part of the Five Eyes alliance that also includes the U.S., U.K., Australia and New Zealand. Documents tabled in Parliament last month show CSE logged 13 privacy and information breaches in 2015, affecting at least 630 individuals. The agency did not report any of the privacy breaches to the federal privacy commissioner, as CSE determined that there was "no significant risk" to the individuals involved. CSE further refused to report the activities that led to the breaches. Toronto Star, A2

RCMP seek access to Panama Papers for tax probe

RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson says the Mounties are "hopeful" they will soon get access to the Panama Papers as part of a criminal investigation into income-tax evasion and money laundering by Canadians with assets in offshore tax havens. Commissioner Paulson would not disclose how the RCMP expect to obtain the 11 million leaked documents known as the Panama Papers, which date back four decades and are allegedly connected to the Panamanian law firm Mossack Fonseca, which specializes in the creation of shell companies in tax havens around the world. "Yes, we are interested in getting our hands on them and what criminality it may represent and what investigations that we should pursue," Commissioner Paulson told reporters after testifying before the Senate committee on national security and defence. "We are obviously interested what those papers and the discussions around those papers - what it means and what criminality may be at play." RCMP Deputy Commissioner Mike Cabana had told senators the RCMP have discussed with "foreign partners" how the force could obtain the documents and said they expected to "see the documents in their entirety." Deputy Commissioner Cabana said the RCMP have not been involved in discussions with the government of Panama. When reporters later asked Commissioner Paulson whether the RCMP were planning to obtain the massive records of shell companies and offshore accounts through either judicial warrant or voluntary disclosure, he was circumspect. Globe and Mail, A4; Toronto Star, A4

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Nasty piece of Android malware monitors texts, browser history and banking information

There's a new piece of nasty Android malware floating around that Android users should be on the lookout for. Masquerading as a update for Google's mobile Chrome browser, the malware is hosted on webpages designed to look like they are official Google or Android landing pages. Originally spotted by the security firm Zscaler, the malware is designed to monitor call logs, browser history, text messages and banking information. Once installed, the malware logs the aforementioned data and sends it all back to a remote command and control server. What's more, Zscaler notes that the malware is capable of checking if a user has any antivirus apps installed, and if so, terminating them to evade detection." BGR (Yahoo! News); Register

Pwnedlist vulnerability exposed 866M accounts

A Michigan school district network engineer discovered a security vulnerability affecting the pwnedlist.com service that exposed 866 million account credentials. The pwnedlist.com service shares publicly leaked username and password information with companies. The service aims to help companies alert their users when user password information has been breached. "PwnedList actively protects you by continually monitoring sites that host stolen credentials and other security data," the website states. "You can check your online accounts and know with virtual certainty whether they've been compromised at any time." SC Magazine

FBI Issues New Ransomware Warning as Utility is Hit

The FBI has been forced to issue a new ransomware alert, warning internet users that the number of infections is only going to rise again in 2016. Reports had circulated last year that the Feds were advising organizations to pay up if infected with ransomware, in order to get their files back. However, in the latest official update the focus was on education, prevention and having in place a solid business continuity plan in case of attack. Cyber Division assistant director, James Trainor, warned that paying the ransom doesn't guarantee that an organization will get its data back. Infosecurity Magazine

Ransomware Spikes, Tries New Tricks

Ransomware authors constantly upping their game, techniques, to stay ahead of security researchers. The quick money to be made in ransomware scams appears to be driving furious innovation in the cybercrime world. Over the last several months, security researchers have reported seeing malware authors constantly employing new tricks, tools, and techniques to snag victims and stay ahead of security researchers. The authors of Locky, one of the most prolific ransomware samples currently in circulation, have gone into full defensive mode. In a report released this week, German security firm Avira Operations said that the group behind Locky had begun using public key encryption to protect communication between victims and the command and control servers that are being used to manage the malware. Dark Reading

Botnets getting bigger and stronger, says Kaspersky

Cyber-criminals are shifting away from cheap DDoS attacks that are easy to implement to more complex and focused ones, according to a new report from Kaspersky. In its quarterly DDoS Intelligence report, the firm said that there was also a nearly fourfold increase in the number of DDoS attacks. Around 74 countries were targeted by DDoS attacks in Q1 and as in the previous quarter, the vast majority of those resources were located in just ten countries, with Ukraine, Germany and France all making a new appearance. The report said that over 70 per cent of attacks in the first quarter lasted no longer than four hours. At the same time, there was a reduction in the maximum attack duration with the longest DDoS attack lasting just eight days (the longest registered attack in Q4 2015 lasted almost two weeks). During the reporting period, the maximum number of attacks against a single target increased: 33 attacks compared to 24 in the previous quarter. SC Magazine

Low-tech attackers use open source tools

Kaspersky Lab researchers have uncovered a new trend among cyberespionage threat actors: instead of developing customised hacking tools or buying them from third-party suppliers on the criminal underground, they are using tools available on the web for research purposes. Several cyberespionage campaigns utilising such tools have been spotted recently by experts. This trend demonstrates that not only is the price of dangerous cyberattack tools falling, the tools are becoming more effective, and their accessibility – higher. This means that even less-professional, less-skilled and less-resourced hacker groups can now pose a threat to users and companies. IT Online

Tick cybergang uses custom malware to target Japanese websites

Symantec researchers spotted a cyberespionage group, dubbed "Tick," spreading custom malware through compromised Japanese websites. The group is believed to have been active since 2006 and primarily targets Japanese organizations such as large technology, engineering, and media firms in order to steal sensitive information, according to an April 28 Symantec blog post. SC Magazine

Anonymous shut down the Bank of Greece website with DDoS attack

The online hacktivist group, Anonymous has recently recommenced its operation called #Oplcarus to target the corrupt global financial institutions. In the first attack after the recommencement, the Anonymous launched a Distributed Denial of Services (DDoS) attack again Bank of Greece website. The powerful DDoS attack took down the bank website, forcing the servers to remain offline for more than 6 hours. The #Oplcarus was relaunched by Anonymous in March 2016. Anonymous says that the banks and financial giants are involved in corruption and Oplcarus operation is a means to to register their protest against such crony capitalism. The Anonymous also released a video announcing the attack. Tech Worm

Samsung tightens smart home kit security after curious bods prod apps

Samsung has said there's nothing for owners of its SmartThings home security gear to worry about – after researchers showed numerous ways to commandeer devices and disable locks. The three researchers from the University of Michigan, who were partially sponsored by Microsoft, have demonstrated that with the help of malicious apps, electronically activated door locks can be opened, alarms set off, and settings fiddled with for smartish homes – all remotely. Register

Facebook to add self-destructing message feature to its Messenger App

Will it or will it not was not the issue, the issue was when will Facebook Messenger App get the self-destructing messages feature like Snapchat. From the looks of it, the Facebook's standalone Messenger App for iOS will soon get a self-destructing message feature probably in the next version update. Apple App tracker, iOSAppChanges first posted the information on Twitter, showing details of disappearing messages in Facebook Messenger v68.0 for iOS. While this is the version currently available in the app store, it looks as though it won't be officially released until a future update. Tech Worm; iTech Post

WhatsApp users face 72-hour BLACKOUT, here's everything you need to know

Millions of WhatsApp users are facing days without access to the service following the order of a total ban in Brazil. A Brazilian judge ordered wireless phone carriers to block access to Facebook's WhatsApp messenger for 72 hours throughout Latin America's largest country on Monday, the second such move against the popular messaging application in five months. The decision by the judge in the northeastern state of Sergipe applies to the five main wireless operators in Brazil and affects WhatsApp's more than 100 million users in the country. The reason for the order is not known due to legal secrecy in an ongoing case in the Sergipe state court. Brazil's law enforcement have previously spoken out against WhatsApp and its end-to-end encryption – a feature that blocks government agencies from gaining access to resident's messages. Speaking out about the nationwide ban, a spokesperson for WhatsApp said: "After cooperating to the full extent of our ability with the local courts, we are disappointed a judge in Sergipe decided yet again to order the block of WhatsApp in Brazil." The decision "punishes more than 100 million users who depend upon us to communicate themselves, run their business and more, just to force us hand over information that we don't have," the statement said, without elaborating. Express UK

Messaging apps and encryption: A false sense of security

In the last couple of weeks we have seen consumer messaging giants WhatsApp and Viber retrospectively add end-to-end encryption technology to their communications platforms. The notion of providing users with improved security is certainly to be applauded, and seeing messaging apps adopt encryption as a necessity as opposed to simply a nice-to-have feature, is long overdue. However, the manner in which providers are increasingly introducing encryption technology within apps as an afterthought is potentially providing a false sense of security to the billions of people that use them on a daily basis. The reality is that messaging platforms like WhatsApp, Viber, and countless similar offerings on the marketplace do not provide users with a level of encryption that safeguards truly sensitive information – yet they continue to claim they do. The danger here is that the majority of users are unaware that there are different levels of encryption, so when these apps describe themselves as being identical to those that offer higher levels of security, it is understandable that consumers and business users believe them. Terms like end-to-end encryption, for example, can apply to vastly different systems and lead end users into a false sense of security that their calls, text messages, and instant messages are being sent securely. IT Pro Portal

We Cannot Fight DDoS Attacks With Our Eyes Closed

Whilst distributed denial-of-service (or DDoS) attacks aren't a new challenge for businesses to deal with, they are increasing in size, scope and frequency. In fact, we find ourselves at a point in time whereby these attacks are at an all-time high, with the fourth quarter of 2015 showing an 85% increase in DDoS attacks. Businesses, then, need to be better prepared to face this type of threat. First thing's first: when going into battle, you need to know what you're up against. As the name implies, a DDoS simply tries to prevent a service from working and in this case, the attacker uses a large number of machines from all over the internet to send vast amounts of traffic towards the unwitting target. By flooding a targeted website or server with enormous amounts of malicious traffic, criminals are overwhelming businesses and forcing their internet-dependent properties offline temporarily. While sometimes used as a threat in ransom demands or even for politically motivated attacks, the fact is that even "just" being taken offline can have significant impacts on huge consequences in terms of loss of revenue and damaged brand reputation and tech credibility. Infosecurity Magazine

Cyberattackers are getting quieter once they're inside the network

In early 2016, cybersecurity continues to be a central concern among virtually all industries, businesses and organisations. Despite record investments in prevention security controls, cyberattackers of every stripe have shown that they remain quite adept at breaking into protected networks to steal and damage critical assets. Finding and stopping these attacks is now a priority at all levels, from boardrooms to the command line. Our latest Post-Intrusion Report takes an analytical look into what is going on inside actual customer networks and how attack techniques and strategies are evolving. IT Pro Portal

Three ways to reduce the odds that incidents become breaches

The annual Verizon Data Breach Investigations report released last week was filled with with informative charts and graphs of data gathered from thousands of incidents and breaches around the world, including one that showed infosec teams are still too slow to detect breaches. The percentage of breaches discovered within days of compromise is going down, despite all the new staff, hardware and software CISOs are investing in. Meanwhile attackers are getting better at exfiltrating data — roughly 67 per cent of the time data is out the door within days. It doesn't have to be that way, argues Umesh Yerram, IBM's cybersecurity strategy, risk and compliance Leader for North America. If infosec teams did three things they could radically cut the detection time and better protect the enterprise: IT World Canada

How to share information while keeping confidentiality and control

Any business or public institution needs to leverage the Internet to conduct business relationships with their ecosystem: clients, partners, service providers, auditors, etc. The trend of externalisation of key company functions further drives the need to exchange business information with people outside of the company perimeter. How do you share your confidential information today? Today, more than 90 per cent of companies share confidential information in an unprotected manner. Many use a legal protection mechanism, an NDA, SLA or other legally binding instruments, while others just trust being lucky. Very few implement technology measures to ensure that their key confidential information is not leaked when shared. Actually, their counterparts can truly intend to honour the NDA, but then fall foul of a cyberattack and hence lose the information involuntarily. IT Pro Portal

The Future of Encryption is in these Politicians Hands

Encryption is complicated. Legislating for it, even more so. But after years of shrugging off the issue, Congress finally seems motivated to create a legal framework for one of our most critical digital security features. Here's a quick rundown at some of the politicians who are shaping the encryption debate—and the laws that will come of them. Wired Magazine

Australia seeks to bolster tech credentials with cyber budget

Australia promised to inject fresh funds into a range of technology projects in its annual budget on Tuesday, building on an ambitious plan for sectors like FinTech and cybersecurity to replace funds lost from a waning mining investment boom. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, who made his fortune as a former online entrepreneur, is trying to position himself as a leader who can transform Australia into a tech-savvy business hub as its economy deals with a commodities downturn. Reuters; ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, June 10, 2016 9:04 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique June 10, 2016 / le 10 juin 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Why the meaningless hack attacks?

An opinion piece states "On Monday, Drake was hacked. On Tuesday, Lana Del Rey was hacked. This followed a spate of social media hijackings, including virtual violations of Katy Perry, Kylie Jenner, the NFL and Chelsea Handler. As the Huffington Post noted: "It Appears Every Celebrity Twitter Account Is Being Hacked Right Now." It does. But to what end? Before we go any further, let me be clear: Hackers, I am not making fun of you. I'm not. Since I can barely recall my passwords - remind me to change my Star email to xd7wg43sasd+jgs68#?s after this column - I respect your ability to unearth ones you never created. So please do not steal my identity or pilfer my meagre RRSP or commandeer my texts unless you have time to send long overdue replies to distant relatives, in which case I'll give you the damn password. I'm just trying to understand your motivation. Toronto Star, E3

Online Media / Médias en ligne

RCMP's BlackBerry-cracking methods could be revealed in Quebec court

A Quebec court could today pull back the curtain on secretive police techniques, including how the RCMP intercepted BlackBerry text messages to prove a murder conspiracy plot, as a judge considers whether to lift a publication ban in a case involving the Montreal Mafia. The case stems from Project Clemenza, a police operation that resulted in scores of organized crime arrests in 2014. At the time, police announced they had intercepted more than one million BlackBerry messages tied to allegations of drug trafficking, kidnapping, arson, weapons and other violent offences. (...) Chief Supt. Jeff Adam, who oversees the RCMP's Technical Investigations Services, declined to discuss with CBC News the specific methods used. But given rapid changes in technology and public concern in the post-Snowden era, as mobile developers move toward more secure "end-to-end" encryption, he says investigators are finding their jobs increasingly difficult. "What we're seeing now is ... the best evidence of people conspiring to commit a crime is lost to us. And that's what we call 'going dark,'" Adam said. CBC News

Ottawa startup gets funding from CIA's investment agency

Ottawa computer security company Intersect has attracted an undisclosed amount of investment from American venture capital firm In-Q-Tel, the organization that invests in firms and technology on behalf of the Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the U.S (...) The investment from In-Q-Tel is a major shot in the arm for the Ottawa firm, which can now say that it has received something akin to a seal of approval from some of the world's leading intelligence and security organizations. "After a rigorous evaluation and due diligence process, Intersect demonstrated how anomalous behaviours can be accurately surfaced and conveyed with actionable information, allowing government security experts to focus on mitigating risks and stopping attacks that may threaten our safety," said Dale Quayle, chief executive officer at Intersect in a statement released Thursday morning (...) The company's expertise in tracking and monitoring large amounts of complex data led to a suite of security tools, which were eventually called the Intersect Advanced Threat Detection Platform. The tools can be used to track an employee's data use across large corporate networks and set off alarm bells if someone tries to tamper with sensitive files without authorization. Ottawa Citizen (2016-06-09)

Twitter forces password resets for accounts vulnerable to hackers

Twitter is forcing millions of users to reset their passwords after reports that the login credentials for nearly 33 million Twitter accounts were being traded on the dark web. The leak was reported by stolen credential repository LeakedSource, which said Twitter was not hacked, but that the credentials were stolen using malware on users' computers. According to Twitter, the credentials may also have been amassed through the collection of information from other recent breaches, or a combination of both. Computer Weekly; Newsweek; ZDNet

Finger pointed at web browsers over password mega-leaks

Insecurities in the way major web browsers store passwords and other information, combined with malware on people's PCs, could be behind a string of credentials leaks, security specialists have warned. Furthermore, the malware may also be able to access personal information used by browsers to pre-populate web forms. Twitter has suspended millions of accounts in response. It looks like we can't show you adverts on this page, which may be caused by ad blocker software on your device. Because we rely on advertising to fund our journalism, please disable any ad blockers from running on V3, then reload the page to see the rest of this content. You can find more information about this here. This is the view of specialists at security software company Rapid7 following an analysis of recent password leaks. v3.co.uk

Researchers find exploit affecting Microsoft's BITS

Researchers discovered an exploit against Background Intelligent Transfer Service (BITS), a component of Microsoft's Windows 2000 that is used to transfer files asynchronously between a client and a server. The malware authors used the BITS alert to download malware, and then launched the program, according to the Dell SecureWorks research team. Once the malware's payload was completed, the script deleted itself. The malicious activity continued to persist after the malware had been eliminated. SC Magazine; ZDNet

Chrome Bug Enabled Crooks to Send Malicious Code to Your Browser as PDF Files

Google has recently patched a high severity security bug in the Chrome browser that allowed crooks to send malicious code to your browser and take over your entire system. The issue, tracked by the CVE-2016-1681 identifier, affects the browser's built-in PDF reader called PDFium. Google patched the issue with the release of Chrome 51.0.2704.63, released on May 25. In the meantime, Chrome released another wave of security updates at the start of June. Softpedia News; SC Magazine

Mozilla's Firefox 47 patches 13 vulnerabilities, two critical

In its latest Firefox browser release, Mozilla this week fixed two critical vulnerabilities – a buffer overflow hazard and a set of memory safety hazards – plus 11 other security holes ranging from low to high in severity. Discovered by the security researcher “firehack,” the buffer overflow issue (CVE-2016-2819) would occur while parsing HTML5 fragments in a foreign context such as under an SVG (Scalable Vector Graphics) node. According to Mozilla in its security advisory, inserting an HTML fragment into an existing document can trigger a “potentially exploitable crash.” SC Magazine; ZDNet; Computerworld

Hackers Break into Websites Using SQL Injections to Leave SEO Spam Behind

A black hat SEO campaign is currently underway, with hackers employing SQL injections to break into websites and contaminate their content with links to adult and pharmaceutical sites. Security firm Imperva discovered the campaign back in March 2016 and says it tracked it down to as early as November 2015. The company says that crooks used SQL injections to break into at least 700 hosts, where they injected low-quality links inside their HTML code. Softpedia News

Hackers shift to Neutrino exploit kit to spread CryptXXX ransomware

The criminal gang behind the enhanced CryptXXX ransomware have moved away from using the Angler exploit kit to the Neutrino EK. Researchers from SANS said that pseudo-Darkleech campaign began using Neutrino exploit kit (EK) to send CryptXXX ransomware this Monday. The researchers noted that up to this point the ransomware was only distributed using Angler. SC Magazine

Crysis Ransomware Appears Out of Thin Air to Take TeslaCrypt's Place

Three weeks after ESET was announcing that the infamous TeslaCrypt ransomware was shutting down operations, the Slovakian security firm is now reporting on the ransomware that's taken TeslaCrypt's place. Named Crysis versions of this ransomware were spotted online in mid-February. ESET claims that these first versions were not some of the best they've seen, and the company's experts believe they might be able to crack their encryption system. Softpedia; Register

How a Bad UI Decision from Microsoft Helped Macro Malware Make a Comeback

Following numerous reports from various security firms about a large number of malware that uses macro scripts in Office documents to spread, the US-CERT team has issued an official alert to all organizations about this resurging threat. Macros are not malicious by nature, being added to automate various operations in the Office suite. Macro malware, as this threat is sometimes called, relies on small scripts attached to Office files that execute when the document is opened, if there's no security restriction. Softpedia

EMC and VMware both suffer malicious user access messes

VMware and EMC have each revealed security nasties. EMC's problem is with Data Domain OS, the operating system for its disk backup boxes. AS EMC's notification explains, “Data Domain logs the session identifier of a user logged in via the GUI in a file that is accessible to all users.” All users? D'oh! That means “A malicious user could use the disclosed session identifier to take over the account of the victim, a GUI user whose session identifier was disclosed. Which means a low-level storage admin could log in as their boss. Register

Linux Kernel 3.18.35 LTS Released with MIPS, Btrfs & EXT4 Fixes, Updated Drivers

After releasing Linux kernel 4.1.26 LTS, kernel developer Sasha Levin informed the community about the availability of the thirty-fifth maintenance release of the long-term supported Linux 3.18 kernel series. Linux kernel 3.18.35 LTS is out now with many improvements, updated drivers, and general core kernel bug fixes, providing more stability, compatibility, and reliability to users of various GNU/Linux operating systems powered by a kernel from the Linux 3.18 LTS series, which will receive support until January 2017. Linux kernel 3.18.35 LTS changes a total of 98 files, with 1259 insertions and 535 deletions. Softpedia News

Slicing Into a Point-of-Sale Botnet

Last week, KrebsOnSecurity broke the news of an ongoing credit card breach involving CiCi's Pizza, a restaurant chain in the United States with more than 500 locations. What follows is an exclusive look at a point-of-sale botnet that appears to have enslaved dozens of hacked payment terminals inside of CiCi's locations that are being relieved of customer credit card data in real time. Krebs on Security

Anonymous Shifts Focus from Banks to Stock Exchanges As Oplcarus Continues

Oplcarus, the Anonymous operation that aimed to launch a barrage of DDoS attacks against the banking sector, has reached phase three, which is now called OpMayhem and is targeting stock exchanges all over the world. In a video released on YouTube over the weekend, the hacker collective laid out a plan of attack for the rest of the month, gathering all members (called Anons) to rally and launch coordinated attacks on global stock markets. At the time of writing, the group has successfully launched DDoS attacks against the NYSE Euronext Market, the London Stock Exchange, Nasdaq Baltic, the Philippines Stock Exchange, the Lao Security Exchange, the Turkey Stock Exchange (Borsa Istanbul), the Athens Exchange Group, and the Panama Stock Exchange. Softpedia News

Hamas Behind DustSky Cyber-Espionage Campaign

A cyber-espionage group known as the Gaza Cybergang, the Gaza Hackers Team or Molerats has resumed operations in April 2016, after previously shutting down all activities when security firm ClearSky discovered its presence in January 2016. The Gaza Cybergang has been around since 2012 when various security firms first detected its operations. Since then, the group has been extremely active, developing custom malware and launching intensive campaigns such as DownExecute, XtremeRAT, MoleRAT, or DustSky (NeD Worm). Softpedia

Facing Data Deluge, Secret U.K. Spying Report Warned of Intelligence Failure

Secret report warned that British spies may have put lives at risk because their surveillance systems were sweeping up more data than could be analyzed, leading them to miss clues to possible security threats. The concern was sent to top British government officials in an explosive classified document, which outlined methods being developed by the United Kingdom's domestic intelligence agency to covertly monitor internet communications. The Security Service, also known as MI5, had become the "principal collector and exploiter" of digital communications within the U.K., the eight-page report noted, but the agency's surveillance capabilities had "grown significantly over the last few years." MI5 "can currently collect (whether itself or through partners ...) significantly more than it is able to exploit fully," the report warned. "This creates a real risk of 'intelligence failure' i.e. from the Service being unable to access potentially life-saving intelligence from data that it has already collected." The Intercept (2016-06-07)

Small businesses bearing the brunt of cyber crime, says FSB

Small firms are unfairly carrying the cost of cyber crime in an increasingly vulnerable digital economy, according to a survey of members by the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB). Smaller firms are collectively attacked seven million times a year, costing the UK economy an estimated £5.26bn, the survey report revealed. The report claimed, however, that cyber crime costs small businesses disproportionately more than big businesses when adjusted for organisational size. Computerweekly

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Dist List 1; !Cyber Dist List 2; !Cyber Dist List 3; !Cyber Dist List 4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, July 11, 2016 8:43 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 11, 2016 / le 11 juillet 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Cyberattackers coming for your data

If the titans of the tech industry can get hacked, what hope is there for the rest of us? That's the general conclusion after the news that Facebook's Mark Zuckerberg and former Twitter CEO Dick Costolo have had some of their social media accounts compromised in the past few weeks. For Zuckerberg, it was his Pinterest and LinkedIn accounts. Then, Costolo's Twitter account suddenly featured some questionable tweets (...) For Zuckerberg and Costolo, it's believed that the hacks originated from LinkedIn's 2012 data breach. That breach was initially thought to be 6.5 million records, but now is believed to have consisted of more than 117 million records (...) The pair were obviously targeted, but the truth is that despite the fact that they are high profile and tech savvy, they are human and their technology usage is just as haphazard as the rest of us (...) Dave Ostertag, global investigations manager, investigative response at Verizon Enterprise Services, said his team investigated 526 incidents in 2015, up from 400 in 2014. Ostertag's enterprise services team is one of the largest in the world that has responded to approximately a third of the enterprise data breaches in the world, and it recently released its 2016 Data Breach Investigations Report. Through its research, the company has found that 89 per cent of breaches had a financial or espionage motive. Despite scary-sounding terms such as social engineering, spear phishing, malware, ransomware and scripts, researchers know that these are not necessarily sophisticated attacks, though they may sound like it. "If you look at the tools they're using, like the Zeus Trojan - that's 20 years old now, but we still see it ... in some of the biggest attacks to try and steal credentials and get access to the network," said Ostertag. Toronto Star, B1

Facebook tests 'secret' messages

Two years ago, Messenger, a photo and text messaging service, appeared to be almost an afterthought at Facebook, the social networking giant. Messenger often took a back seat to the limelight enjoyed by WhatsApp, the messaging app that Facebook had bought for $19 billion (U.S.). And Messenger's capabilities were so limited that you could not send friends an animated GIF, as you could with other messaging services. But since mid-2014, Facebook has been playing a furious game of catch-up with Messenger. That June, Facebook's chief executive officer, Mark Zuckerberg, hired a PayPal executive, David Marcus, to take over Messenger and build it into a world-class competitor (...) Last week, Facebook said it will also begin testing "secret conversations" inside Messenger, a feature that offers end-to-end encryption on some messages to be read only on the two mobile devices that users are communicating with. While it stops short of full encryption that other messaging services such as WhatsApp have adopted, it gives Messenger a heightened mode of security that Facebook hopes will attract global audiences. New York Times (Toronto Star, B6); Wired Magazine; Al Jazeera (2016-07-08)

Fear of cybercrime creates opportunity for consultants

For businesses and health care institutions, the threat of cyberfraud is on the rise, unleashing fierce competition among law firms and consultants seeking to advise them. As the threat rises, so has the number of lawyers making it a specialty. Most large firms have practice groups devoted to data security, and so do many smaller ones, fuelling the competition (...) A series of high-profile data breaches -notably the huge loss of records by Target and the attack by hackers on Sony, exposing sensitive internal emails -have raised awareness (...) That high cost has spawned a new market in insurance coverage for companies looking to protect themselves. Philadelphia Inquirer (Toronto Star, B4)

Ottawa braces for era of leaks

It's not a matter of if there will be another Edward Snowden, it's a matter of when, according to internal government documents obtained by the Star. Global Affairs officials warned minister Stéphane Dion in November an event on the scale of Snowden's disclosures about Internet surveillance is inevitable. "Incidents similar to the Snowden disclosures and the Sony hack will happen again and we can expect that sudden events will affect international debates on cyberspace," the document reads. The briefing note, prepared for Dion in November and obtained under access to information law, suggests that Snowden's disclosures about western mass surveillance "altered the tone" of the international discussion on cyberspace. In 2013 Snowden, a former employee of the U.S. National Security Agency (NSA), pulled back the curtain on mass surveillance online, detailing the capabilities of the "Five Eyes" countries - Canada, the United States, the U.K., Australia and New Zealand - to monitor activity online. His release of classified NSA documents triggered outrage among those who said he put lives at risk, and praise from others who argued he shed light on questionable practices. He was forced to flee the U.S. and was granted asylum in Russia. Toronto Star, A6 (2016-07-09)

Encryption actually protects law-abiding Canadian citizens

An opinion piece states, "When it comes to policing and national security, far too often Canadians are asked to let fear trump their rights. Recently, the front page of the Toronto Star featured the headline, "Encryption creating a barrier for police ...," potentially convincing some readers that the technology's only purpose is to aid criminals. Rarely do we see headlines such as, "Encryption protects thousands of Canadians' credit card information," or "Encryption enables secure communications for every Canadian." or even the aspirational, "Canada leads the way in cybersecurity for its citizens." Toronto Star, A11 (2016-07-10)

Privacy documents ironic

A letter to the editor states, "Re: Data encryption hampering police work, July 2. I can't be the only one who found irony in the sentence "the documents, heavily censored and stamped 'secret'," in reference to police communication to our government about citizen privacy. Justin Trudeau's government (which promised openness and transparency) works for the citizens. The Liberals opposed Bill C-51 as a violation of our privacy rights, as did most Canadians..." Toronto Star (2016-07-08)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Beware, there might be malware in unofficial Pokemon Go app downloads

Pokemon Go might just be the game of the year. Nintendo struck gold with this mobile endeavor, as millions of users around the world have already downloaded the application and are devoting plenty of time to hunting Pokemon. That also means that hackers have adapted their attacks to hunt those Pokemon fans who're eager to try out the application. Researchers have already discovered malware inside versions of the Pokemon Go app for Android. BGR; Fortune; Huffington Post; Register

Hacker bites Datadog, finds hard-to-chew bcrypt passwords

Software as a service monitoring platform Datadog, used by the likes of Facebook, Salesforce, and Citrix, has been breached and therefore suggested strongly that customers reset their passwords. The company says attackers hit multiple servers Friday including production servers, and a database of user credentials. Other customers of the popular tech firm include Spotify, The New York Times, and Samsung. At least one user has detected unsuccessful attempts to use Amazon Web Services credentials shared with the breached service. Datadog chief security officer Andrew Becherer says affected passwords are stored using bcrypt with a unique salt making it one of the strongest ways to keep the credentials and slow decryption efforts. Register

Amazon Suffers Security Breach; 80,000 Login Credentials Leaked

A hacker going by the online handle of 0x2Taylor has claimed to breach the servers of electronic commerce giant Amazon ending up leaking login credentials of 80,000 users. The 597.4 MB leaked data includes usernames and encrypted passwords of Amazon Kindle users. Hackread (2016-07-10)

GootKit Banking Trojan Receives Massive Update

GootKit, one of the top ten most active banking trojans in the world, received a massive update in June, an upgrade that added core modifications to the way the malware operates, according to a report by IBM's X-Force Research team. GootKit is a less-known banking trojan that appeared in 2014, and unlike most of its competition, it has never had its source code leaked online, nor has it been rented via a Malware-as-a-Service operation. Softpedia

Cerber Devs Create New Ransomware Called Alfa

The developers behind the Cerber ransomware released their latest creation upon the Interwebs, and it's a new ransomware variant named Alfa, Bleeping Computer reported last week. Cerber is one of today's most active and widespread ransomware families, alongside Locky, CryptXXX, and Jigsaw. Security researchers did not crack its encryption, so it is quite odd to see the group creating a new and different version without an apparent reason. Softpedia (2016-07-10)

Drowning Dalek commands Siri in voice-rec hack attack

University boffins have brewed one of the most complex mechanisms for loading malware onto phones by way of surreptitious Google Now and Siri voice commands hidden in YouTube videos. For the attack to work, phones need to be in a state where they can receive voice commands - a feature often left unlocked - and close enough to the audio source for the instructions to be understood. There's also the trouble of masking the phone's beep which is an acknowledgment that voice commands have been received and could alert users to an attack. Register

How to hack mobile devices using YouTube videos

Researchers have devised a way to leverage YouTube to hack mobile devices. A team from the University of California, Berkeley, and Georgetown University have developed the means to compromise a mobile device using hidden voice commands embedded within a YouTube video. In order for the device to be attacked, the intended victim needs to do nothing more than watch the YouTube content. The researchers say on their project page that the hidden voice commands used by the attack are "unintelligible to human listeners but which are interpreted as commands by devices." ZDNet; Softpedia

Android Nougat Has A Code That Will Prevent Ransomware From Resetting Lockscreen Passwords

There are many types of malware and millions of users are losing money because of their naivety or lack of interest to protect their devices better. Many don't install an anti virus program because they don't think it's necessary, but they're leaving their phones exposed to malicious software and cry with crocodile tears when they realize that they've been tricked to install lockscreen ransomware. This type of malicious software takes over the device and the user is forced to send money to attackers to unlock his phone and retrieve the files that have been encrypted. Google has introduced a code in its upcoming Android Nougat OS which will protect users against these attacks. Neurogadget

Islamic State's Twitter traffic is nearly half of what it once was

The Islamic State group's Twitter traffic has plunged 45 percent in the past two years, the Obama administration says, as the U.S. and its allies have countered messages of jihadi glorification with a flood of online images and statements about suffering and enslavement at the hands of the extremist organization... Among the images: A teddy bear with Arabic writing and messages saying IS "slaughters childhood," "kills innocence," "lashes purity" or "humiliates children." A male hand covering a female's mouth, saying IS "deprives woman her voice." A woman in a black niqab (veil), bloody tears coming from a bruised eye, and the caption: "Women under ISIS. Enslaved. Battered. Beaten. Humiliated. Flogged." Associated Press \(Global News\) \(2016-07-09\)

Gang arrests in Russia may have put significant dent in malware, says researcher

We love to read news reports in which a police force takes down a major crime gang. In one swoop the community is cleansed. Can it happen in the digital world? Cisco Systems security researcher Nick Biasini raises the question after use of several high regularly-used pieces of malware plunged last month following the arrests of several people in linked to the spread of a Russian-specific piece of malware named Lurk, a banking trojan specifically targeting banks in that country that drained some US$45 million from accounts. Lurk, he writes, was largely distributed through the Angler exploit kit, which is often used to spread ransomware. But within a week of the arrests Angler — which he calls "the most prolific, successful and sophisticated compromise platform" — has disappeared from threat activity reports. IT World Canada \(2016-07-08\); Register

Euro 2016 Fans Hit Hard by Cyber Threats

The cyber-risk for digitally active sports fans has more than doubled during the 2016 Euro soccer tournament. According to the Allot Communications and Kaspersky Lab's MobileTrends Q2 2016 report, mobile has changed the way we experience sporting events as fans flock to the digital arena to watch, record and share their reactions. Seventeen percent of mobile users who exhibited little or no use of sports apps or websites before the games became active sports fans during the games. However, cyber-criminals are taking advantage of this to trick sports fans into downloading infected apps or clicking malicious links. Nearly 50% of these "casual fans" transitioned into sports fans' behavior profiles, with high potential risk for malware. Infosecurity Magazine \(2016-07-08\)

NATO Ambassador: How The Ukraine Crisis Fits Cyber War Narrative

When Kenneth Geers, ambassador of the NATO Cyber Centre, first suggested two years ago that there might be a connection between spikes in cybercriminal activity and spikes in geopolitical conflict, there was skepticism. Since then, NATO has declared cyberspace a domain for war and regions of geopolitical strife have also seen their fair share of cyberespionage and cybercrime. What's been learned and has the skepticism waned or grown? Geers, who has been living in Ukraine for the past two years, will discuss this in an upcoming session at Black Hat USA, "Cyber War in Perspective: Analysis from the Crisis in Ukraine (...)" Two years ago, Vladimir Putin signed a bill incorporating the Crimean peninsula into the Russian Federation, and Russian military forces massed along the Ukrainian border. Geers was a global threat analyst for FireEye at the time, and noticed a spike in malware traffic traced back to Ukraine and Russia at the height of the conflict between the two nations. Geers tentatively suggested at the time that there could be a connection between the geopolitical climate and the increase in cybercriminal activity, and that this connection could be used for threat intelligence. He received some pushback, at the time, even among colleagues within FireEye. Since then, however, Ukrainian targets have been hit with more cyberattacks that directly or indirectly impact the country's autonomy. Dark Reading (2016-07-07)

Homeland Security's big encryption report wasn't fact-checked

If you watch Marvel's Agents of S.H.I.E.L.D., Blacklist, or any other TV show with make-believe espionage, you probably hear the term "going dark" at least once a week. In the real world, "going dark" has become FBI shorthand for when baddies can't be spied on, or manage to vanish into thin internet, at the fault of encryption. And it's at the heart of an oft-virulent tug-of-war between entities such as the FBI, Apple, civil liberties groups, conspiracy theorists, and lawmakers. Engadget (2016-07-08)

It is inevitable, law enforcement agencies have to deal with encryption in consumer technologies

Law enforcement agencies around the world are having a tough time dealing with criminals and anti social elements who now have easy access to encryption in communication services. In the US, there was a standoff between Apple and the FBI over the creation of a backdoor to unlock the phone of a terrorist. Google and Facebook supported Apple's stand that creating such a backdoor would compromise the security of a large number of Apple users, and planned to introduce better encryption in their own products. Firstpost

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, July 15, 2016 8:50 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 15, 2016 / le 15 juillet 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Aerospace firm owner sentenced for hacking

A Chinese man who ran an aerospace firm with offices in British Columbia has been sentenced to nearly four years in jail for stealing confidential information on a U.S. military transport aircraft and the F-35 stealth fighter. Su Bin had pleaded guilty in federal court in Los Angeles to helping two Chinese military hackers. Among the targets of the hacking efforts was information on the U.S. F-22 and F-35 stealth fighters as well as Boeing's C-17 transport aircraft, which is also used by the Canadian Air Force. In a plea agreement, Su admitted to conspiring with the two hackers in China to gain unauthorized access to computer networks in the U.S. between October 2008 and March 2014. Su travelled to the U.S. on 10 occasions during that period, according to court documents. He was arrested in Richmond, B.C., in June 2014 and a Canadian court ordered Su's extradition to the U.S. in September 2015. The 51-year-old has been sentenced to three years and 10 months in jail. He was also fined $10,000. Postmedia (Ottawa Citizen, N4; StarPhoenix, Montreal gazette, Ottawa Sun); Globe and Mail; Register

Online Media / Médias en ligne

What's Next For Canada's Surveillance Landscape?

Edward Snowden's 2013 revelations of massive state surveillance shocked the world and made it more aware of electronic privacy issues, but north of the border, Canada continues to struggle with its own. Just over a year ago, the former Conservative Canadian government, led by Stephen Harper, enacted a piece of legislation that enraged privacy advocates. Bill C-51 extended the powers of Canada's intelligence services, prompting an open letter from over 100 Canadian academics imploring the government to rethink it. Even the federal Privacy Commissioner complained about it. A year later, we have a new government that has promised to overhaul things. What has been done, and where does Canada's complex debate over privacy and national security sit now? (...) Liberal leader and now-Prime Minister Justin Trudeau voted for the bill but vowed to temper it a little in two broad areas. The first focal point was oversight. The Liberal government would create a multi-party oversight committee to ensure that CSIS was acting appropriately. Snowden himself criticized Canada for poor spying oversight back in May 2015, not long before the Bill became law (...) The Liberal leader vowed to alter this and started to make good on this promise in early 2016. His public safety minister Ralph Goodale has now introduced Bill C-22, which would create a cross-party oversight committee that would oversee almost 20 agencies related to national security (...) The second problem that Trudeau had with C-51 was with the bill's scope. He promised to refine some of its language to omit legal protests and advocacy from definition as terrorist activities, and said that he would introduce a mandatory review period for the legislation. He hasn't taken these steps at the time of writing, and privacy advocates are awaiting the government's next move. In the interim, Trudeau has been shuffling. One notable political action was his appointment of a new national security advisor, Daniel Jean, in May this year. Jean replaces former Harper government National Security Advisor Richard Fadden, an ex-director of CSIS, who recently retired. Dark Reading

Whistleblower Edward Snowden to keynote Toronto conference

The man that says he lives on the Internet will be the showcase speaker at SecTor, a Toronto-based security conference this year. Edward Snowden, the former CIA employee and government contractor that leaked classified documents about a mass surveillance operation run by the National Security Administration (NSA), will be appearing at the conference via a video link from Russia, where he's been living under asylum since 2013. SecTor will be Snowden's first and only commercial conference appearance in North America this year, conference organizers say. "Edward Snowden is not only one of the biggest names in cybersecurity, but his unique situation and cybersecurity experiences also make him one of the most important and influential," said SecTor co-founder Brian Bourne in an email announcement... Beyond NSA's clandestine mass surveillance operations that were leaked by Snowden, Canada's Communications Security

Establishment (CSE) has also been the subject of some of his classified leaks. He's also said that Canada's intelligence gathering operations have the "weakest oversight" among western nations. IT World Canada

US Cyber Mission Force Nearly Ready for Action

The US military's Cyber Mission Force will finally be ready for action by the end of September, according to US Cyber Command and NSA boss, Admiral Michael Rogers. The new elite cyber force will eventually contain over 6000 operatives split into 133 groups, which will be tasked with both offensive and defensive missions. Unusually for a military endeavor, troops will be deployed before the unit has been completely staffed, Rogers told a National Press Club gathering attended by NPR. "We find ourselves in a situation a little unusual in the military arena. As soon as we get a basic framework, we are deploying the teams and putting them against challenges," he's reported as saying (...). The force, which apparently features military personnel alongside civilians, is estimated to finally be ready on 30 September 2018. Last month Air Force Brig. Gen. Charles L. Moore Jr. told the House Armed Services Committee that the Cyber Mission Force has already encountered a few challenges relating to equipment, training, recruitment and "finalizing the command-and-control structure." Infosecurity Magazine

Here's What We Know About the NSA's Elite Hacking Squad

Some of the best hackers in the world work for the NSA. They are the ones who are tasked with hacking into the most—supposedly—impenetrable targets, be it the computers of an Iranian nuclear power facility, or the cellphones of a fugitive terrorist. As far as anyone knows, they don't have a cool sounding name, but they are collectively known as "The Office of Tailored Access Operations," or TAO. They have been called "a squad of plumbers that can be called in when normal access to a target is blocked." And while that name, and that description, might sound underwhelming, they're the NSA's elite-hacking unit, its black bag operations team. Very little is known about TAO, but most of what we know today comes from documents leaked by the former NSA contractor Edward Snowden. To learn more about them, and as part of CYBERWAR, VICELAND's ongoing series on hacking, we travelled to Berlin and London to talk to the journalists who have investigated these sophisticated government hackers in the last few years. Motherboard

Almost Any Messaging App Will Do—if You're ISIS

On July 1, five Islamic State fighters stormed the Holey Artisan Bakery in Bangladesh's capital, Dhaka, ultimately claiming 28 lives in a 12-hour siege. Before IS (ISIS, or Daesh) officially released the claim, the group's 'Amaq News Agency released ongoing updates from inside the restaurant through its Telegram channel. The first message stated that IS "commandos" attacked the restaurant, which was "frequented by foreigners," and an update minutes later reported that over "20 people of different nationalities [were] killed." 'Amaq then increased the number of casualties to 24 with 40 wounded, and followed up with photos of the bloody scene inside the restaurant. It was clear that this direct, uninterrupted communication the attackers had with 'Amaq was facilitated by a smartphone app. Five days later, The Times of India reported that the app was Threema, an end-to-end encrypted messaging service. This reported confirmation of yet another messaging app used in a terror attack echoed other reports from this past year. The Paris attackers are known to have communicated with WhatsApp and Telegram apps prior to their operations on November 13, 2015. Najim Laachraoui, the bomb maker and co-attacker in the March 22, 2016 Brussels attacks, reportedly used Telegram, while fugitives connected to the aforementioned Paris attacks used WhatsApp, the mobile app Viber, and even Skype to talk to IS leaders in Syria before authorities located them. Motherboard

Pokémon Go spawns over 200 'PokéMalware' clones

Eight new malicious apps released every hour following Pokémon Go's UK launch. Pokémon Go has spawned more than 200 malicious impostors since its launch, researchers have discovered. Over the first 24 hours of the game's UK launch, eight unofficial clones of the app were released every hour, according to security company RiskIQ. Within 24 hours, the total number of unofficial apps was 215, released by 70 unique developers across 21 app stores. These unofficial clones can be highly dangerous, however, as RiskIQ EMEA vice president Ben Harknett pointed out. "Approximately half of these unofficial apps are requesting broad permissions from users, risking data exposure via mobile devices," he said. IT Pro

Cisco gives you two nasty bugs to fix before the weekend

Cisco has patched two vulnerabilities, including a remote denial of service bug in its Network Convergence System routers. Attackers can send packets to TCP listening ports running SSH, secure copy protocol, and secure FTP that can overwhelm NCS 6000 routers and cause processors to reload. The Borg rates the vulnerability (CVE-2016-1426) as highly critical on account of it offering a method to remotely disrupt routers in certain configurations. "The vulnerability is due to improper management of system timer resources," Cisco says in an advisory. Register

cuteRansomware Signals a Malicious Move to the Cloud

A newly uncovered strain of malware called cuteRansomware launches from a Google Doc to host the decryption key and command-and-control functionality. The Netskope research team detected the maliciousness when it noticed that a user with a GitHub account "aaaddress1" had published source code for a ransomware module based on C# called "my-Little-Ransomware." It turned out that a security researcher at AVG had also spotted a malicious modified Chinese version of my-Little-Ransomware and dubbed it "cuteRansomware" because of the mutex name used by the original author. Although it seems to be a basic ransomware created by modifying the my-Little-Ransomware source code, the use of cloud services like Google Docs may be a signal about attacker intentions to use cloud services in the future; and in fact, they will abuse cloud services not only for storing keys but also for their command-and-control (C&C) communications. Infosecurity Magazine

CryptXXX Devs Provide Free Decryption Keys for Some Ransomware Versions

If you are one of the people who had their data locked by the CryptXXX ransomware, you might be lucky enough to recover your files for free. Earlier today, users visiting the Tor-based payment sites of the CryptXXX ransomware discovered that, after logging in with their ID, instead of receiving decryption instructions, they got the actual decryption key, for free, without doing anything. This didn't happen for all users, but only for CryptXXX ransomware variants that encrypt files using the .crypz and .cryp1 file extensions at the end. In May, the crooks behind the TeslaCrypt ransomware decided to close shop and provided a master key to recover the files of all infected users. CryptXXX does not use a master key, but private keys differ for each victim, so there's no universal magic key that can unlock everyone's files in one go. It is currently unknown if the leakage of these keys was done intentionally by CryptXXX's authors or is a server glitch. Softpedia

Nation State Energy Grid Malware Bypasses Cyber and Physical Security

Security researchers have discovered new malware designed to bypass traditional physical and cybersecurity which could be used in an attack to shut down an energy grid. SentinelOne's Joseph Landry and Udi Shamir explained in a lengthy analysis that despite some reports in the media, the malware has not been crafted to specifically target Scada systems, although it has been used to attack at least one energy company. However, they did reveal that it's likely to have been designed by an eastern European nation state, based on its sophistication, the "extreme measures it takes to evade detection," and the fact it exhibits behavior seen in previous nation state rootkits. Infosecurity Magazine

Hackers Steal Data from Polish Defence Ministry and Ask for $50,000 Ransom

A group of hackers who call themselves "Pravy Sector" [Right Sector] are extorting the Polish Government on Twitter, threatening to release data stolen from Poland's Defence Ministry if the government doesn't pay $50,000, either to a Ukrainian bank account or a Bitcoin address. The name Right Sector is also used by an extremist Ukrainian nationalist organization activating in Russia, currently outlawed. The hackers claim to represent the group, but there's no evidence to support either their claims or their alleged Ukrainian or Russian nationality. Softpedia

Security software priorities shift from defence to detection and response

Firms are tackling the unrelenting hacker threat by investing in security information and event management technology. The tech handles threat detection and security incident response through the real-time collection and analysis of security events. Spending in this area is growing faster than in any other segment of the security market, up 15.8 per cent, according to analyst Gartner. The sharpest decline in the security spending was on consumer-focused software, which fell 5.9 per cent year on year. Gartner said interest in technologies focused solely on preventing security breaches is on the wane, in contrast to offerings that enable detection and response. "Organizations are shifting security budgets from prevention to prediction, detection and response, and security vendors need to be capture this shifting spend," it said, pointing to identity governance and administration and data loss prevention technologies as growth areas. ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, July 19, 2016 8:43 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 19, 2016 / le 19 juillet 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

StatsCan says government's IT agency providing 'slower, lower quality services'

Setbacks and shortcomings at the federal government's tech support agency could delay Statistics Canada's release of "mission critical" information required by the Bank of Canada, Department of Finance and commercial banks, according to a report. The document, submitted to Canada's chief statistician Wayne Smith, is one among more than a dozen reports, drafted at Smith's request from all of his directors general. Smith asked for the reports in an effort to fully understand the impact of Shared Services Canada (SSC) on his department. The memos, obtained by CBC News under access to information laws, detail how yet another federal ministry is embroiled in a dispute with SSC over services standards, red tape, billing and the capacity of IT infrastructure to keep up with departmental demands. CBC News

Hongkongers warned to avoid fake websites charging high fees for travel permits to Canada

Hongkongers who are required to apply for additional electronic authorisation when travelling to Canada have been warned to stay away from fake websites which scam travellers into paying additional fees costing up to 17 times the official charge. The warning from the Canadian government was issued after it reportedly received about 500 complaints from victims who had paid unnecessary fees or from people reporting suspicious websites. A statement from the Canadian government issued on Monday said several companies have set up websites since August 1 last year, when Electronic Travel Authorisation (eTA) was first phased in, to lure travellers into paying more than the official fee of C$7 (HK$ 41.92) to provide information and submit the applications on behalf of the applicants. South China Morning Post

Maxthon web browser blabs about your PC all the way back to Beijing

A web browser developed by Chinese company Maxthon has allegedly been collecting telemetry about its users. Polish security consultancy Exatel warns [PDF] that Maxthon is phoning home information such as the computer's operating system and version number, the screen resolution, the CPU type and speed, the amount of memory installed, the location of the browser's executable, whether ad-block is running, and the start page URL (...) Back in February, Canada's Citizen Lab claimed a web browser made by China's top search engine Baidu leaked all sorts of sensitive information. The Android version of Baidu's browser exposed unencrypted GPS coordinates, search terms and URLs visited. The Windows version was rated as even leakier, sending out search terms, hard drive serial numbers, network MAC addresses, the title of all webpages visited, and the GPU model number, apparently. Register

'Prominent' Admin of Top ISIS Forum Hacked

An administrator of a top-tier ISIS web forum, who one expert describes as a "prominent" member of the online jihadi community, has been hacked. On Sunday, an independent researcher known as "Switched," who first reported the news, tweeted two Pastebin posts containing alleged correspondence of Abu Alaaina Khorasani, who is an administrator of the "Shumukh al Islam" website. Shumukh al Islam, or "Glory of Islam," regularly hosts official ISIS propaganda (...) According to Alkhouri, the messages, which are mostly in Arabic and stretch back over two years, deal with the conflict between ISIS and Al Qaeda supporters, the procedures around obtaining new members for the forum, and other correspondence with current members. A small number of messages also appear to have been encrypted with Asrar al-Mujahideen, a custom jihadi encryption program similar to PGP. Motherboard

World-Check terror suspect DB hits the web at just US$6750

The World-Check database that lists "heightened risk individuals and organizations" is reportedly up for sale on the dark web. The database is a commercial product offered by Thomson Reuters, which bills it as a useful tool for those fighting money laundering, "organized crime, sanctions, Countering the Financing of Terrorism (CFT), and Politically Exposed Persons (PEPs)." The database contains some 2.2 million records. Customers include major banks and spookhaüses galore. Access is only granted after a vetting process and agreement to tough non-disclosure agreements. As The

Register revealed the World-Check database was breached last month thanks to a user's customer couchdb leak. That mistake made the database becoming open to plunder hours after the breach became public. Register

Pre-Snowden Whistleblower Explains How NSA Got 'Unleashed' To Spy On Everyone

Thomas Drake was a 48-year-old decorated Air Force and Navy veteran, and a senior executive at the National Security Agency, the NSA, when he decided he had to speak up against what he considered the spy agency's abuses. That's when he anonymously contacted a reporter at The Baltimore Sun, helping her expose wrongdoing at the agency in a series of articles. Two years later, the FBI raided his home, and the US government launched an investigation into Drake for leaking classified information and espionage (...) "History was at stake," he said in a recent interview with VICE's reporter Ben Makuch filmed for VICELAND's series on hacking and surveillance, CYBERWAR. In a deleted scene, Drake explains how the NSA got "unleashed" after 9/11 and expanded its spying powers, pushing it beyond the limits of what he believed was acceptable. "The mantra was, just get the data," Drake said. "Collect it all, so we can know it all." Motherboard

For $800 you can buy internet engineers' answer to US government spying

The long-awaited response from internet engineers to Edward Snowden's revelations of mass surveillance by the US government has been launched in Berlin. The CrypTech project launched an alpha prototype of its open-source crypto-vault at the 96th meeting of the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF), and held a two-day workshop prior to the meeting to walk a closed group of net nerds through it. The prototype will be shown at several encryption sessions at the conference later this week, and the team is selling a small initial batch of the cards – between 25 and 50 of them – online for $800. Register

Governments Ramp Up User Data Requests to Google

Google handed over data on users to the authorities in nearly two-thirds of cases in the second half of 2015, according to its latest Transparency Report. The report shows that the web giant received requests for data 40,677 times during the period 1 July and 31 December 2015, and user account information 81,311 times - up from 69,000 during the previous six months. It claimed that 64% of the time it produced "some data," although it's impossible to know how much. Infosecurity Magazine

Scan Reveals Hydropower Plants, Other Critical Infrastructure Exposed Online

An Internet scan of the IPv4 address space uncovered more than 100 critical facilities exposed to the public Internet, including hydropower plants in Germany and Italy, and a smart building in Israel hosting luxury apartments. The investigation, conducted by researchers at Internet Wache of Berlin, started in the fall of 2015 as a search for specific routers used by industrial control systems. Researcher Tim Philipp Schafers found more than he bargained for when unauthenticated web applications for ICS management interfaces began coming up in searches. The researchers noticed a pattern in the HTTP headers that were turning up and wrote a Python script that was fed into the ZMap and scans.io tools in order to search for the pattern in the IPv4 public space. Theatpost

Four Cyber Attacks On UK Railways In A Year

Sky News has learned that the UK railway network has suffered at least four major cyber attacks over the last year alone. And experts have warned that the digital systems controlling trains are vulnerable to hackers, who could cause injury or death in the real world. Sergey Gordeychik, a security researcher at Kaspersky Lab in Moscow, has discovered several weaknesses in rail infrastructure. He told Sky News: "Hackers can get access not only to simple things like online information boards or in-train entertainment, but also to computer systems which manage trains by itself, which manage signals, manage points, and in this case, if they have enough knowledge, then they can create real disaster related to train safety." Sky News; Dark Reading; Softpedia

Fitness Bands Struggle With Privacy; Leave Data Exposed

They may be one of the hottest gadgets around right now, but fitness bands and smartwatches may be a disaster waiting to happen from a security point of view, according to a new report. And considering the personal information held on many of them, the consequences of a breach could be disastrous. The research from AV-Test looked into eight of the biggest selling devices in the fitness band/smartwatch category: Basis Peak, Microsoft Band 2, Mobile Action Q-Band, Pebble Time, Runtastic Moment Elite, Striiv Fusion, Xiaomi MiBand, and Apple Watch. Fitbit was left out of this examination, having undergone its own separate test earlier this year. Infosecurity Magazine

Google Removes Suite of Chrome Extensions That Hijacked Facebook Accounts

Maxime Kjaer, a 19-year-old Danish student, has uncovered a set of Google Chrome extensions that were hijacking Facebook accounts but were capable of many more malicious actions. Crooks were distributing these extensions via Facebook posts for all sorts of cheesy and raunchy viral content. Users who clicked on the links inside those Facebook posts landed on a site that asked them to verify their age. Unlike other sites that allowed users to enter their age in a form, these ones were asking them to install one of many Chrome extensions. Softpedia

Lurk banking Trojan propagated via 'legitimate' software

Researchers at Kaspersky Lab have found that the Lurk banking Trojan was propagated by cyber-criminals in some cases using legitimate software to widen its distribution potential. Users downloading and installing genuine remote access software from ammy.com will have been affected, if not infected, since early February 2016. Moscow based researchers at Kaspersky say that they believe that attackers used weaknesses in the Ammy Admin website security system, in order to add the malware to the installation archive of the remote access software. SC Magazine; ZDNet; ArsTechnica

Researchers Crack Furtim, SFG Malware Connection

New research is challenging what security researchers know about Furtim, a new malware strain that has been compared to Stuxnet because of its believed targeting of industrial controls in energy companies. According to security experts at Damballa, Furtim and the recently discovered SFG malware are one in the same – only varying by a few lines of code that include the HTTP header information. Threatpost

Cerber ransomware C&C server shut down by research firm and CERT-Netherlands

The server used in a Cerber ransomware campaign discovered in June has been shut down, through a coordinated effort involving the security research firm FireEye, the Computer Emergency Response Teams in the Netherlands (CERT-Netherlands), and web hosting companies. The malicious spam email campaign, discovered by FireEye, used Microsoft Word attachments containing macros that launched a command and control Cerber installers. SC Magazine

CGI Script Vulnerability 'Httpoxy' Allows Man-in-the-Middle Attacks

An old scripting vulnerability that impacts a large number of Linux distributions and programming languages allows for man-in-the-middle attacks that could compromise web servers. The vulnerability, which affects many PHP and CGI web-apps, was revealed Monday in tandem with the release of a bevy patches from impacted companies and platforms. Researchers at SaaS distributor VendHQ named the vulnerability Httpoxy. It affects server-side web applications that run in Common Gateway Interface (CGI) or CGI-like environments, such as some FastCGI configurations, along with programming languages PHP, Python, and Go. Threatpost

Guilt by ASN: Compiler's bad memory bug could sting mobes, cell towers

A vulnerability in a widely used ASN.1 compiler isn't a good thing: it means a bunch of downstream systems – including mobile phones and cell towers – will inherit the bug. And an ASN.1 bug is what the Sadosky Foundation in Argentina has turned up, in Objective Systems' software (...) That makes a bug in the compiler a serious issue even if, as the Sadosky Foundation's detailed advisory says, it's hard to assess just how big the issue might be right now. The compiler-generated code that controls your mobile phone's radio – the baseband component – and the network providing your phone signal and connectivity may be buggy as a result of this toolchain weakness. Those bugs, exploitable via data thrown at them over the airwaves, will end up built into critical gear and no one will realize there are security holes present – until now. Register

Flaw in vBulletin add-on leads to Ubuntu Forums database breach

Ubuntu support forums users should be on the lookout for dodgy emails after the website's database of 2 million email addresses was stolen. Canonical announced the security breach on Friday after being notified that someone was claiming to have a copy of the UbuntuForums.org database. An investigation revealed that an attacker did get access to the website's user records through a vulnerability. The exploited SQL injection flaw was located in the Forum Runner add-on for vBulletin, commercial web forum software that powers over 100,000 community websites on the Internet and is especially popular with companies. The vulnerability was known, but the Canonical IS team had failed to apply the patch for it in a timely manner. CSO Online

Philippines Government Websites Hit by Massive DDoS Attacks, China Suspected

A member of the Philippines administration announced that 68 government websites suffered crippling DDoS attacks last week. According to the official, the attacks started on the afternoon of July 12, the very same day the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague in the Netherlands unanimously ruled for the Philippines in a conflict with China. More specifically, it all concerned several newly created islands in the West Philippine Sea that intruded into the Philippines' maritime territories. Softpedia; IS Buzz

How a healthcare hacker is pressuring victims to pay up

Pay up or face your patients' wrath. That's how one hacker is trying to shake down U.S. healthcare providers after stealing sensitive data about their patients. TheDarkOverlord claims to have stolen 10 million patient records and is selling them on the black market. In the meantime, the hacker is trying to extort the providers by telling them their patient data won't be sold if they pay a ransom. CSO Online

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, July 19, 2016 8:43 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 19, 2016 / le 19 juillet 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

StatsCan says government's IT agency providing 'slower, lower quality services'

Setbacks and shortcomings at the federal government's tech support agency could delay Statistics Canada's release of "mission critical" information required by the Bank of Canada, Department of Finance and commercial banks, according to a report. The document, submitted to Canada's chief statistician Wayne Smith, is one among more than a dozen reports, drafted at Smith's request from all of his directors general. Smith asked for the reports in an effort to fully understand the impact of Shared Services Canada (SSC) on his department. The memos, obtained by CBC News under access to information laws, detail how yet another federal ministry is embroiled in a dispute with SSC over services standards, red tape, billing and the capacity of IT infrastructure to keep up with departmental demands. CBC News

Hongkongers warned to avoid fake websites charging high fees for travel permits to Canada

Hongkongers who are required to apply for additional electronic authorisation when travelling to Canada have been warned to stay away from fake websites which scam travellers into paying additional fees costing up to 17 times the official charge. The warning from the Canadian government was issued after it reportedly received about 500 complaints from victims who had paid unnecessary fees or from people reporting suspicious websites. A statement from the Canadian government issued on Monday said several companies have set up websites since August 1 last year, when Electronic Travel Authorisation (eTA) was first phased in, to lure travellers into paying more than the official fee of C$7 (HK$ 41.92) to provide information and submit the applications on behalf of the applicants. South China Morning Post

Maxthon web browser blabs about your PC all the way back to Beijing

A web browser developed by Chinese company Maxthon has allegedly been collecting telemetry about its users. Polish security consultancy Exatel warns [PDF] that Maxthon is phoning home information such as the computer's operating system and version number, the screen resolution, the CPU type and speed, the amount of memory installed, the location of the browser's executable, whether ad-block is running, and the start page URL (...) Back in February, Canada's Citizen Lab claimed a web browser made by China's top search engine Baidu leaked all sorts of sensitive information. The Android version of Baidu's browser exposed unencrypted GPS coordinates, search terms and URLs visited. The Windows version was rated as even leakier, sending out search terms, hard drive serial numbers, network MAC addresses, the title of all webpages visited, and the GPU model number, apparently. Register

'Prominent' Admin of Top ISIS Forum Hacked

An administrator of a top-tier ISIS web forum, who one expert describes as a "prominent" member of the online jihadi community, has been hacked. On Sunday, an independent researcher known as "Switched," who first reported the news, tweeted two Pastebin posts containing alleged correspondence of Abu Alaaina Khorasani, who is an administrator of the "Shumukh al Islam" website. Shumukh al Islam, or "Glory of Islam," regularly hosts official ISIS propaganda (...) According to Alkhouri, the messages, which are mostly in Arabic and stretch back over two years, deal with the conflict between ISIS and Al Qaeda supporters, the procedures around obtaining new members for the forum, and other correspondence with current members. A small number of messages also appear to have been encrypted with Asrar al-Mujahideen, a custom jihadi encryption program similar to PGP. Motherboard

World-Check terror suspect DB hits the web at just US$6750

The World-Check database that lists "heightened risk individuals and organizations" is reportedly up for sale on the dark web. The database is a commercial product offered by Thomson Reuters, which bills it as a useful tool for those fighting money laundering, "organized crime, sanctions, Countering the Financing of Terrorism (CFT), and Politically Exposed Persons (PEPs)." The database contains some 2.2 million records. Customers include major banks and spookhaüses galore. Access is only granted after a vetting process and agreement to tough non-disclosure agreements. As The

Register revealed the World-Check database was breached last month thanks to a user's customer couchdb leak. That mistake made the database becoming open to plunder hours after the breach became public. Register

Pre-Snowden Whistleblower Explains How NSA Got 'Unleashed' To Spy On Everyone

Thomas Drake was a 48-year-old decorated Air Force and Navy veteran, and a senior executive at the National Security Agency, the NSA, when he decided he had to speak up against what he considered the spy agency's abuses. That's when he anonymously contacted a reporter at The Baltimore Sun, helping her expose wrongdoing at the agency in a series of articles. Two years later, the FBI raided his home, and the US government launched an investigation into Drake for leaking classified information and espionage (...) "History was at stake," he said in a recent interview with VICE's reporter Ben Makuch filmed for VICELAND's series on hacking and surveillance, CYBERWAR. In a deleted scene, Drake explains how the NSA got "unleashed" after 9/11 and expanded its spying powers, pushing it beyond the limits of what he believed was acceptable. "The mantra was, just get the data," Drake said. "Collect it all, so we can know it all." Motherboard

For $800 you can buy internet engineers' answer to US government spying

The long-awaited response from internet engineers to Edward Snowden's revelations of mass surveillance by the US government has been launched in Berlin. The CrypTech project launched an alpha prototype of its open-source crypto-vault at the 96th meeting of the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF), and held a two-day workshop prior to the meeting to walk a closed group of net nerds through it. The prototype will be shown at several encryption sessions at the conference later this week, and the team is selling a small initial batch of the cards – between 25 and 50 of them – online for $800. Register

Governments Ramp Up User Data Requests to Google

Google handed over data on users to the authorities in nearly two-thirds of cases in the second half of 2015, according to its latest Transparency Report. The report shows that the web giant received requests for data 40,677 times during the period 1 July and 31 December 2015, and user account information 81,311 times - up from 69,000 during the previous six months. It claimed that 64% of the time it produced "some data," although it's impossible to know how much. Infosecurity Magazine

Scan Reveals Hydropower Plants, Other Critical Infrastructure Exposed Online

An Internet scan of the IPv4 address space uncovered more than 100 critical facilities exposed to the public Internet, including hydropower plants in Germany and Italy, and a smart building in Israel hosting luxury apartments. The investigation, conducted by researchers at Internet Wache of Berlin, started in the fall of 2015 as a search for specific routers used by industrial control systems. Researcher Tim Philipp Schafers found more than he bargained for when unauthenticated web applications for ICS management interfaces began coming up in searches. The researchers noticed a pattern in the HTTP headers that were turning up and wrote a Python script that was fed into the ZMap and scans.io tools in order to search for the pattern in the IPv4 public space. Theatpost

Four Cyber Attacks On UK Railways In A Year

Sky News has learned that the UK railway network has suffered at least four major cyber attacks over the last year alone. And experts have warned that the digital systems controlling trains are vulnerable to hackers, who could cause injury or death in the real world. Sergey Gordeychik, a security researcher at Kaspersky Lab in Moscow, has discovered several weaknesses in rail infrastructure. He told Sky News: "Hackers can get access not only to simple things like online information boards or in-train entertainment, but also to computer systems which manage trains by itself, which manage signals, manage points, and in this case, if they have enough knowledge, then they can create real disaster related to train safety." Sky News; Dark Reading; Softpedia

Fitness Bands Struggle With Privacy; Leave Data Exposed

They may be one of the hottest gadgets around right now, but fitness bands and smartwatches may be a disaster waiting to happen from a security point of view, according to a new report. And considering the personal information held on many of them, the consequences of a breach could be disastrous. The research from AV-Test looked into eight of the biggest selling devices in the fitness band/smartwatch category: Basis Peak, Microsoft Band 2, Mobile Action Q-Band, Pebble Time, Runtastic Moment Elite, Striiv Fusion, Xiaomi MiBand, and Apple Watch. Fitbit was left out of this examination, having undergone its own separate test earlier this year. Infosecurity Magazine

Google Removes Suite of Chrome Extensions That Hijacked Facebook Accounts

Maxime Kjaer, a 19-year-old Danish student, has uncovered a set of Google Chrome extensions that were hijacking Facebook accounts but were capable of many more malicious actions. Crooks were distributing these extensions via Facebook posts for all sorts of cheesy and raunchy viral content. Users who clicked on the links inside those Facebook posts landed on a site that asked them to verify their age. Unlike other sites that allowed users to enter their age in a form, these ones were asking them to install one of many Chrome extensions. Softpedia

Lurk banking Trojan propagated via 'legitimate' software

Researchers at Kaspersky Lab have found that the Lurk banking Trojan was propagated by cyber-criminals in some cases using legitimate software to widen its distribution potential. Users downloading and installing genuine remote access software from ammy.com will have been affected, if not infected, since early February 2016. Moscow based researchers at Kaspersky say that they believe that attackers used weaknesses in the Ammy Admin website security system, in order to add the malware to the installation archive of the remote access software. SC Magazine; ZDNet; ArsTechnica

Researchers Crack Furtim, SFG Malware Connection

New research is challenging what security researchers know about Furtim, a new malware strain that has been compared to Stuxnet because of its believed targeting of industrial controls in energy companies. According to security experts at Damballa, Furtim and the recently discovered SFG malware are one in the same – only varying by a few lines of code that include the HTTP header information. Threatpost

Cerber ransomware C&C server shut down by research firm and CERT-Netherlands

The server used in a Cerber ransomware campaign discovered in June has been shut down, through a coordinated effort involving the security research firm FireEye, the Computer Emergency Response Teams in the Netherlands (CERT-Netherlands), and web hosting companies. The malicious spam email campaign, discovered by FireEye, used Microsoft Word attachments containing macros that launched a command and control Cerber installers. SC Magazine

CGI Script Vulnerability 'Httpoxy' Allows Man-in-the-Middle Attacks

An old scripting vulnerability that impacts a large number of Linux distributions and programming languages allows for man-in-the-middle attacks that could compromise web servers. The vulnerability, which affects many PHP and CGI web-apps, was revealed Monday in tandem with the release of a bevy patches from impacted companies and platforms. Researchers at SaaS distributor VendHQ named the vulnerability Httpoxy. It affects server-side web applications that run in Common Gateway Interface (CGI) or CGI-like environments, such as some FastCGI configurations, along with programming languages PHP, Python, and Go. Threatpost

Guilt by ASN: Compiler's bad memory bug could sting mobes, cell towers

A vulnerability in a widely used ASN.1 compiler isn't a good thing: it means a bunch of downstream systems – including mobile phones and cell towers – will inherit the bug. And an ASN.1 bug is what the Sadosky Foundation in Argentina has turned up, in Objective Systems' software (...) That makes a bug in the compiler a serious issue even if, as the Sadosky Foundation's detailed advisory says, it's hard to assess just how big the issue might be right now. The compiler-generated code that controls your mobile phone's radio – the baseband component – and the network providing your phone signal and connectivity may be buggy as a result of this toolchain weakness. Those bugs, exploitable via data thrown at them over the airwaves, will end up built into critical gear and no one will realize there are security holes present – until now. Register

Flaw in vBulletin add-on leads to Ubuntu Forums database breach

Ubuntu support forums users should be on the lookout for dodgy emails after the website's database of 2 million email addresses was stolen. Canonical announced the security breach on Friday after being notified that someone was claiming to have a copy of the UbuntuForums.org database. An investigation revealed that an attacker did get access to the website's user records through a vulnerability. The exploited SQL injection flaw was located in the Forum Runner add-on for vBulletin, commercial web forum software that powers over 100,000 community websites on the Internet and is especially popular with companies. The vulnerability was known, but the Canonical IS team had failed to apply the patch for it in a timely manner. CSO Online

Philippines Government Websites Hit by Massive DDoS Attacks, China Suspected

A member of the Philippines administration announced that 68 government websites suffered crippling DDoS attacks last week. According to the official, the attacks started on the afternoon of July 12, the very same day the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague in the Netherlands unanimously ruled for the Philippines in a conflict with China. More specifically, it all concerned several newly created islands in the West Philippine Sea that intruded into the Philippines' maritime territories. Softpedia; IS Buzz

How a healthcare hacker is pressuring victims to pay up

Pay up or face your patients' wrath. That's how one hacker is trying to shake down U.S. healthcare providers after stealing sensitive data about their patients. TheDarkOverlord claims to have stolen 10 million patient records and is selling them on the black market. In the meantime, the hacker is trying to extort the providers by telling them their patient data won't be sold if they pay a ransom. CSO Online

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, July 20, 2016 8:56 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 20, 2016 / le 20 juillet 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Cyber Security Threats

Cyber security threats because of employees' mobile gaming use are a concern for chief information officers (CIO). "There is ongoing conversation about what data is being collected with these sorts of interactive online games, so if employees are using their corporate mobile device, it's possible that it could create some vulnerabilities - though there is no talk of such a threat at the moment," says Nima Mirpourian, of Robert Half Technology. A recent survey of CIOs from Robert Half shows that keeping their organization's data safe is their top concern. In another one of their surveys, 54% cite plans to enhance employee training on IT security issues. Toronto Sun, A61

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Canada's electronic spy agency won't reveal if shared info leads to torture overseas

Canada's electronic spy agency won't say how often it shares information that could lead to someone being tortured in an overseas prison. The Communications Security Establishment – which monitors threats from foreign terrorists and spies – has censored documents that spell out the figures, even though the RCMP and Canadian Security Intelligence Service have revealed such numbers in the past. The reticence prompted Amnesty International Canada to say "much greater transparency" is needed from the Ottawa-based CSE. "At stake is Canada's compliance with crucial international human rights obligations to prevent torture and ill-treatment," said Alex Neve, Amnesty's Canadian secretary general. The secretive CSE has been thrust into the national spotlight in recent years due to leaks by Edward Snowden, the former spy contractor who worked for the National Security Agency, CSE's American counterpart. It is also among a handful of Canadian agencies, including the RCMP, CSIS, the Canada Border Services Agency and National Defence, bound by a government instruction that allows it to share information with foreign partners – even when it means someone could be abused as a result of that exchange. Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale said earlier this year the Liberals will review the "troubling set of issues" raised by the foreign-sharing policy, enacted by the previous Conservative government. Canadian Press (Global News, News Review, Times Colonist, CTV News)

Phoenix flaw put PS personnel files at risk

The Public Service Alliance of Canada is renewing its call to scrap the government's Phoenix payroll system in light of newly released documents indicating that a flaw exposed the personal information of thousands of civil servants. "We knew this was going to be a disaster right from Day 1," PSAC executive vice-president Chris Aylward fumed Tuesday evening. "We knew this was going to be a Gong Show, and look where we are today," he said. "This is completely unacceptable. ... It's time to shut it down." Documents obtained by CBC News reportedly show officials were warned as early as Jan. 18 that the Phoenix system has a flaw that allows widespread access to employees' personnel records, including social insurance numbers. In an emailed statement to Postmedia, Public Service Minister Judy Foote's office confirmed government officials discovered the flaw early in the Phoenix rollout. Canadian Press (Ottawa Citizen, A2, Ottawa Sun); CBC News (2016-07-19)

Turkey blocks WikiLeaks over release of AK Party emails

Turkish officials have downplayed the release of hundreds of thousands of private emails belonging to members of the ruling party that were published on the WikiLeaks website. The whistle-blower website was blocked on Wednesday by Turkey's Internet watchdog, TIB, shortly after the mass release of the emails, which included the current phone numbers of AK Party members of parliament. The internet authority said an "administrative measure" had been taken against WikiLeaks, a generic term it often uses when blocking websites in Turkey. Al Jazeera independently confirmed the authenticity of emails and phone numbers of at least 10 members of parliament released by WikiLeaks. Al Jazeera; Motherboard; RT; Independent UK

BlackBerry CEO questions Apple's encryption stance

BlackBerry chief executive John Chen has questioned whether Apple's stringent approach to encryption and user privacy is sensible, warning that the firm's attitude could be harmful to society. Speaking at the BlackBerry Security Summit in New York, Chen was quizzed about his opinion on government requests for customer data, and used it as a chance to criticise Apple, even if he avoided mentioning the firm directly. "One of our competitors, we call it 'the other fruit company', has an attitude that it doesn't matter how much it might hurt society, they're not going to help," he said. "I found that disturbing as a citizen. I think BlackBerry, like any company, should have a basic civil responsibility. If the world is in danger, we should be able to help out." Chen's comments relate to the case earlier this year in which Apple faced off against the FBI over whether to provide backdoor access to an iPhone 5C used by a terrorist. BlackBerry's stance is somewhat surprising considering the firm's reputation for keeping sensitive data over its network secure, but Chen said that as long as the guidelines are clear and adhered to there is nothing wrong with handing over data. v3.co.uk

Government Officials Conflicted About Encryption

Encryption — which prevents unauthorized users from accessing devices and data — is a double-edged sword, experts have said. While U.S. citizens use the technology to protect personal information, bad actors such as terrorists are employing it to hide illicit activity. Encryption services are also vitally important to the government, said a panel of department heads in May. "We know we need it," said Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter during a joint press conference at Intel's corporate headquarters in Santa Clara, California. "We know that strong encryption is part of the solution for the future (...)" "I think it's fair to say that ... globally the market for cybersecurity that should exist doesn't yet exist," he said. "But what that says is that there will be a big market for those innovators that get here first (...)" But such technology can make it harder for law enforcement to detect criminal activity, said Secretary of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson. The government and the private sector are "interested in finding the right solution that accommodates both strong encryption and enables us to track crime and to track potential terrorist plots for reasons of law enforcement, public safety and national security," he said. A cooperative agreement is possible and officials are "working very hard on this issue," he said. National.Defense.Magazine

Hacker 'Phineas Fisher' Speaks on Camera for the First Time—Through a Puppet

A little bit over a year ago, the normally quiet Twitter account of Hacking Team, an Italian company that sells spying tools to governments all over the world, started acting weird. "Since we have nothing to hide, we're publishing all our e-mails, files, and source code," read a Tweet published on late Sunday, July 5, 2015 (...) Hacking Team, which at that point was already notorious for selling its wares to repressive regimes and governments such as Ethiopia, Morocco, and others, had just gotten hacked (...) Since then, the hacker, who goes by the moniker Phineas Fisher, has kept mostly quiet, except for some tweets on his own Twitter account, and a writeup on how he broke into Hacking Team, which also served as a manifesto of his "hack back" hacking political movement (...) Before all this, though, just a few weeks after his hack, I asked him if he wanted to do an interview with some colleagues from VICE Canada, who were working on a documentary on the growing market of cyber mercenaries, companies that sell hacking and spying tools to police and intelligence agencies all over the world. After some back and forth, Phineas Fisher agreed—with one strange condition. "I'll do a video interview if you get kermit the frog (or a homemade non-trademark violating puppet) and a voice actor to read lines I type in chat," Phineas Fisher told me. Motherboard

Apple Has Its Own Stagefright Vulnerability

Apple has fixed five issues in OS X and iOS that pose a striking resemblance to the famous Stagefright vulnerability found in Android devices that allows attackers to fully compromise devices via a malicious image. The vulnerability resides in the way Apple products process certain types of image files. Affected products include OS X, iOS, tvOS, and watchOS. Tyler Bohan of the Cisco Talos team discovered the issues, which can be exploited by sending a malformed image attached to an email to victims, embedded in a Web page, via iMessages, MMS messages, and all sorts of other applications. Softpedia

Exploit kits now adopting recent Office vulnerabilities: Report

Cyber security trends can be hard to nail down because attacker strategies constantly evolve. But a new report from Sophos suggests that criminals have finally turned away from an old Microsoft Office exploit and instead are favouring two new ones. However, the report also emphasizes the importance CISOs have to put in their patching strategy because even the new exploits have fixes out for them. Sophos says that data gathered recently from customers shows the four-year old CVE-2012-0158 vulnerability, which allows remote attackers to execute arbitrary code via a crafted Web site, Office document, or .rtf file has been supplanted in exploit kits by CVE-2015-1641, also a remote execution attack and CVE-2015-2545, which allows remote attackers to execute arbitrary code via a crafted EPS image that would be embedded in a document or email. IT World Canada

Gmail Security Filters Can Be Bypassed Just by Splitting a Word in Two

Some of Gmail's security features that are responsible for detecting malicious macros can be bypassed just by splitting "trigger words" in half or across rows, security researchers from SecureState have discovered. Macros are script snippets attached to Office documents that, if the user allows it, can execute and automate a series of tasks. Created to simplify various tasks at work, macros have been abused since their early beginning by malware authors to carry out malicious operations that resulted in the installation of malware on targeted systems. Softpedia

Antivirus Engines Affected by Code Hooking Vulnerability

Six vulnerabilities in the way some software vendors utilize the "code hooking" technique expose their products to exploitation from malware that can leverage these security flaws to bypass security mitigations and compromise targeted devices. Hooking is a coding technique that allows an application to tap into the process of another application. Many types of desktop applications enable and use it, and especially security products that need to monitor other apps for malicious activity. Softpedia

Google Chrome Malware Leads to Sketchy Facebook Likes

Ever wonder how your mild-mannered friend's Facebook feed suddenly got packed with lewd clickbait? That's the question Maxime Kjaer was determined to answer when he noticed a friend's Facebook feed peppered with Likes for sketchy link bait such as "Basic Kissing Tips". "Intrigued, I decided to go down the rabbit hole and see what this was all about," wrote Kjaer, a 19-year-old computer science student at Swiss Federal Institute of Technology in Switzerland, in a blog post Monday. What he found was what he called a "glaring security hole" in the Google Chrome Webstore that allowed malware authors to infect Chrome browsers via a bogus age verification extension. Threatpost

Don't Fall for the Pokémon Malware

Google removed a handful of malicious, fake Pokémon apps during the past weekend. It is another example of developers creating bootleg apps to take advantage of people caught up in the latest craze—and a reminder that you should play it safe when downloading apps. Outside of the Google Play store, it is even worse. In third-party Android app stores, there are more than a dozen apps posing as either the real "Pokémon Go" or apps that can help "Pokémon Go" players, according to security researchers. They warn that many of these will install spyware on phones, collect private data or deliver spam. "Pokémon Go Ultimate" was one of the handful of harmful apps that Alphabet Inc. -owned Google removed from Play. It was flagged as harmful by Lukas Stefanko, a malware researcher with IT security firm Eset Ltd. Wall Street Journal

White paper: 100 new ransomware families ID'd in 2015, as campaigns adopt APT tactics

In its new special report Ransomware and Businesses 2016, Symantec declares that within the last year, ransomware has rapidly advanced in maturity and severity, while also exploding in terms of overall numbers. If the threat that ransomware poses to your corporate systems hasn't already been keeping you awake, the researchers at Symantec have added some more nightmare-fuel in the form of a new white paper. In its special report Ransomware and Businesses 2016, the cybersecurity firm declares that within the last year, ransomware has rapidly advanced in maturity and severity, while also exploding in terms of overall numbers. SC Magazine

New Made-in-China Web Shell Threatens the Security of Web Servers Worldwide

Two Chinese security researchers have created a new Web shell that they open-sourced on GitHub for everyone to use, including the bad guys. Seen for the first time in December 2015, this new tool, named Cknife, is coded in Java and includes server-side components that allow it to connect to Java, PHP, ASP, and ASP.NET servers. The authors of this new tool are two Chinese security researchers, Chora and MelodyZX, also known as MS509Team. According to a Recorded Future investigation, the two wanted to create a clone of China Chopper, a very efficient yet outdated (code-wise) Web Shell that was launched in 2013 and has been the preferred tool of Chinese red teams, criminal groups, and APTs. Softpedia

DDoS Attack Takes Down US Congress Website for Three Days

The US Congress has just recovered after a three-day DDoS attack that has crippled its online portal congress.gov, along with adjacent sites such as the US Library of Congress (loc.gov) and the US Copyright Office (copyright.gov). The attack started on Sunday evening, July 17, and initially targeted the Library of Congress website, affecting the same server infrastructure on which the other two websites were also hosted. Despite initial defensive measures, the attack slowly escalated in the following days and continued to cause trouble for government officials and site visitors until five hours before this article's publishing date. Softpedia

DDoS attacks are getting bigger and more frequent in 2016, study shows

As cybersecurity threats and concerns continue to mount, DDoS attacks are quickly increasing in size, scale and complexity, new figures show. According to data released by Arbor Networks, the first six months of 2016 have seen an escalation in Distributed Denial of Service attacks with the largest attack registering at a whopping 579Gbps - a 73% increase from the biggest DDoS attack in 2015. DDoS attacks take place when a malicious group or individual floods a company's network with fake traffic in order to take it down. The attacks have become more commonplace due to readily available free tools and cheap online services that allow any resentful individual with a decent internet connection to launch an attack against a company's servers, if they choose to do so. International Business Times

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.*

*Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, July 26, 2016 8:52 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique July 26, 2016 / le 26 juillet 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

DNC email hack: A look at the theory Russian operatives led attack to boost Trump's bid

Days after a massive leak of hacked emails threatened to spoil the Democratic Party's convention kickoff, political operatives and assorted experts continue to debate whether the attack was a Russian plot to boost Donald Trump's presidential bid. Donald Jensen, a resident fellow at the Center for European Policy Analysis and expert on Russia, says the potential motive is obvious. "Certainly the Kremlin prefers Trump, there's no question about that at all," he said (...). A cybersecurity firm the Democrats hired reportedly found traces on the party's network of at least two sophisticated hacking groups that have ties to the Russian government. In an interview with Democracy Now, Wikileaks founder Julian Assange refused to reveal the source of the emails, but said when it comes to the DNC, "there's lots of consultants that have access, lots of programmers." "And the DNC has been hacked dozens and dozens of times. Even according to its own reports, it had been hacked extensively over the last few years." In a later interview with NBC, Assange said there's "no proof ... whatsoever" that Russian intelligence was responsible for the hack. The FBI announced Monday it's investigating. CBC News; Washington Post (Leader-Post, StarPhoenix, Vancouver Sun, Montreal Gazette, Edmonton Journal, Calgary Herald, Windsor Star, National Post, Ottawa Citizen); Globe and Mail; AFP (Le Nouvelliste); Canadian Press (Telegraph-Journal, Winnipeg Sun, Edmonton Sun, Toronto Sun, Kingston Whig-Standard, Calgary Sun, Ottawa Sun, Waterloo Region Record); Motherboard

Courriels démocrates - "La publication de WikiLeaks n'est pas un "scoop"

Un article d'opinion dit « WikiLeaks a besoin d'exister et de publier régulièrement. Mais je ne suis pas sûr que cette publication leur profite, ni sur le crédit ni sur la confiance que l'on peut accorder à leurs publications. Le problème est que, contrairement à d'autres lanceurs d'alerte comme Edward Snowden [l'ex-consultant de la National Security Agency (NSA) à l'origine des révélations sur le programme de surveillance de la NSA], WikiLeaks est dépendant de ses sources et surtout de la qualité des informations que des tiers lui apportent. Il y a eu violation des correspondances, mais il n'y a pas en contrepartie le bénéfice de la désignation d'un péril supérieur, qui justifierait la violation du secret des correspondances. De plus, même si ce n'est pas systématique, WikiLeaks a pris l'habitude de s'adjoindre les médias, qui venaient mettre en perspective et raffiner leur matière brute. Ici, il y a juste la mise en ligne de données, mais pas de travail éditorial autour. On peut s'interroger sur le fait qu'il n'y ait pas eu de média qui ait été mis dans la boucle. Ont-ils estimé que le jeu n'en valait pas la chandelle ? » Le Devoir, B5

Police, judges and legislators meet to discuss balancing cybercrime with privacy in Halifax

Judges, lawyers, legislators and law enforcement officials from around the world are meeting in Halifax to discuss the unique challenges of delivering justice in the digital age. Members of the International Society for the Reform of Criminal Law say they'll tackle issues such as cyber-stalking, cyber-bullying and Internet luring at their 29th annual conference. Organizers say the anonymity of the online world, along with the lack of national boundaries, creates space for virtually untraceable criminal activity. But they say technology has also provided tools to fight crime through surveillance and information-sharing. Canadian Press (Chronicle-Herald) (2016-07-25)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Kremlin says idea it hacked U.S. Democratic Party emails absurd

The Kremlin dismissed as absurd on Tuesday allegations it was behind the hacking of U.S. Democratic Party emails, saying unidentified individuals were trying to cynically exploit fear of Russia for electoral purposes. It responded after cyber security experts and U.S. officials said there was evidence Russia had engineered the release of sensitive Democratic Party emails in order to influence the Nov. 8 U.S. presidential election. Reuters

Vendors, Police and Europol Begin Ransomware Fightback

An initiative to educate and prevent further ransomware payments has been launched by Europol, law enforcement and the private sector. Called 'No More Ransom', it is led by Intel Security, the Dutch National Police, Europol and Kaspersky Lab and is a new online portal aimed at informing the public about the dangers of ransomware and helping victims to recover their data without having to pay ransom to the cyber-criminals. With the number of ransomware victims growing at an alarming rate – according to Kaspersky Lab the number of users affected rose from 131,000 in 2014-2015 to 718,000 in 2015-2016 – the portal is intended for users to find information on what ransomware is, how it works and how to protect themselves. Infosecurity Magazine; IT Pro UK

Windows UAC Bypass Leaves Systems Open to Malicious DLLs

Researchers have crafted a stealthy new way of bypassing Windows User Account Controls (UAC) that opens the door to attacks on targeted systems. According researchers, the bypass technique can fly under the radar of security solutions that monitor for this type of circumvention. The UAC bypass technique works on Windows 10 systems, and as opposed a number of other UAC bypasses techniques, this one does not raise red flags because it doesn't rely on a privileged file copy or code injection, according to Matt Graeber and Matt Nelson who found the workaround and outlined it in a technical breakdown on the Enigmaox3 website. Threatpost

Modified Hackhound PWS used for cyberespionage spearphishing

McAfee Labs researchers spotted a series of spearphishing attacks using a modified version of the Hackhound password stealer (PWS) for what they believe to be an industrial cyberespionage campaign. The PWS, dubbed ISR Stealer, leverages compromised websites to host access panels and also targets companies that deal with machinery parts, according to a July 21 blog post. SC Magazine; Softpedia

Upcoming Tor Design Battles Hidden Services Snooping

More than 100 malicious Tor Hidden Services Directories (HSDirs) were found to be snooping on the services they host, and in some cases, operators were actively using the data collected to attack the services. While at first blush, the discovery would seem to put another dent in the privacy and anonymity aspects so heavily associated with the Tor network, project representatives say it's been an "ongoing annoyance" and one that has been addressed in an upcoming design. Developer Sebastian Hahn said code has been written, but a release date is still to be determined. Tor representatives also downplayed the attack, saying for example, that it does not unmask the operator behind a hidden service, which has long been a law enforcement and intelligence agency goal. Threatpost

New Decryption Tools Aid Ransomware Fight

Security firm AVG has fired back in the long-running tit-for-tat battle with the ransomware black hats by releasing a new tool to decrypt files locked with the Bart variant. Malware analyst Jakub Kroustek explained that the new tool would work on all versions of the ransomware seen "to date." "Rather than rewriting files with their encrypted versions, like other ransomware families do, Bart moves each file to a separate password-protected archive (ZIP file), then deletes the originals. The encrypted files are easy to recognize, because they're ZIP archives, denoted by .zip extensions," he added. Infosecurity Magazine

Encryption breakthrough: Scientists derive truly random numbers using two-source extractors

Random numbers are a lot more important than most of us realize. Besides creating keys used to encrypt anything from databases to email, random numbers help predict weather patterns, sort out gaming theory, and are utilized in the creation of music. One might think it would be easy for computers to generate random numbers, but people at Random.org disagree, "Surprising as it may seem, it is difficult to get a computer to do something by chance. A computer follows its instructions blindly and is therefore completely predictable." Tech Republic

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, July 29, 2016 8:47 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
July 29, 2016 / le 29 juillet 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

FBI said to investigate possible hack of another Democratic Party organization

The FBI is said to be investigating yet another suspected hack of a Democratic Party organization, this time of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee that raises funds for Democrats running for the House of Representatives. The previously unreported hack of the DCCC is likely to have been aimed at gathering information on donors rather than steal funds, four sources told Reuters. CSO Online

WikiLeaks' methods questioned by whistleblower Edward Snowden

Former U.S. National Security Agency contractor, Edward Snowden, has censured WikiLeaks' release of information without proper curation. On Thursday, Snowden, who has embarrassed the U.S. government with revelations of widespread NSA surveillance, said that WikiLeaks was mistaken in not at least modestly curating the information it releases. CSO Online

Ransomware Author Leaks Rival's Decryption Keys

Victims of the Chimera ransomware were thrown a lifeline this week after a rival malware author appeared to leak the decryption keys online. Spotted by Malwarebytes on Tuesday, the Twitter user @Janussecretary posted a link to a Pastebin document containing the keys and a message. Infosecurity-Magazine

Building an Effective Incident Response Plan

An opinion piece states, "When it comes to incident response and a company's ability to manage a data breach, no organization can afford to be caught off guard. The effects of an uncontrolled and poorly managed data breach can be catastrophic to businesses of all sizes, not to mention the public relations nightmare and subsequent liability that can ensue when an organization drops the ball in the wake of a cyber-attack..." Infosecurity-Magazine

Cleaning up after cyber attacks is good, but deterring attackers is better

An opinion piece states, "The White House has published its strategy outlining how the country will respond to significant cyber attacks. The Presidential Policy Directive on United States Cyber Incident Coordination makes it clear for the first time that the FBI and the National Cyber Investigative Joint Task Force (NCIJTF) would take the lead in 'threat response activities'..." ZDNet News

IRS Get Transcript Scam Duo Get Jail Time

A Georgia couple have been handed down a combined sentence of over eight years behind bars for their part in a sophisticated IRS scam involving the Get Transcript tool. Anthony Alike, 42, will serve 80 months in jail followed by three years of supervised release, and Sonia Alike, 27, will spend 21 months in prison, followed by three years of supervised release, after defrauding the tax service of over $1 million. Infosecurity-Magazine

A Day in the Life of an IT Pro: Hacked off with IoT

Friends, Romans, fellow IT Pros, lend me your ears. It's time to talk about Internet of Things (IoT) now, I know the topic of connected fridges and the like is often covered, but amid the cacophony of excited consumers is a warning – the impact of IoT on enterprise security could be monumental. Infosecurity-Magazine

Netflix Phishing Campaign Takes Advantage of Fare Hike

A phishing campaign targeting Netflix customers is making the rounds, stealing login credentials. Since Netflix recently announced a service fee hike, spammers saw an opportunity to exploit the situation. According to researchers at AppRiver, phishing emails attempt to impersonate a Netflix account-verification email. Infosecurity-Magazine

Pwnie Express makes IoT, Android security arsenal open source

Pwnie Express has given the keys to software used to secure the Internet of Things (IoT) and Android software to the open-source community. The Internet of Things (IoT), the emergence of devices ranging from lighting to fridges and embedded systems which are connected to the web, has paved an avenue for cyberattackers to exploit. ZDNet News

Getting caught using a VPN in the UAE will cost you over $500,000

New federal laws issued in the United Arab Emirates has resulted in an outright ban on the use of VPNs -- and a fine of up to $545,000 if you are caught using one. Last week, UAE President His Highness Sheikh Khalifa bin Zayed Al Nahyan issued a new set of federal laws which include one forbidding UAE citizens from using VPNs to mask their digital footprints. ZDNet News

Amazon saw spike in US demands for customer data

The total number of government requests for data on Amazon customers has doubled over the past year. The retail and cloud giant quietly announced the latest figures for the first six months of 2016 ending June in a report, published Thursday evening, which showed a total of 1,803 different requests from the US government. ZDNet News

Hackers can record everything you type on certain wireless keyboards

A computer security research team has identified a weakness in several brands of low-cost wireless keyboards that could allow hackers to view and record every word, number and password typed by a user from up to about 75 metres away. According to Bastille, an Atlanta-based research team, eight wireless keyboards made by companies such as Hewlett-Packard, Radio Shack and Toshiba send keystroke data from the board to the USB dongle that connects to your computer without the encryption needed to mask what someone is typing. CBC News; Wired; Threatpost

Clues in DNC hacking point to Russia, despite Trump claims

Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump said is reasserting that whoever hacked the Democratic National Committee and stole years of internal emails remains a mystery. But private security experts — although not yet any U.S. government agencies — say they found persuasive clues that point to hacking groups whose previous targets track closely with the strategic interests of Russia's government, especially its civilian and military intelligence and security agencies. Associated Press (Seattle Times)

Is D.N.C. Email Hacker a Person or a Russian Front? Experts Aren't Sure

Who is Guccifer 2.0, the self-proclaimed Romanian "lone hacker" responsible for copying thousands of emails and other files from the Democratic National Committee — a real person, or a front created by Russian intelligence officials? Technology specialists have been debating that question since June 15, when CrowdStrike, a cybersecurity firm hired by the Democratic National Committee, announced that sophisticated hacker groups with Russian links were responsible for breaching the committee's computer servers. Within hours of the announcement, someone using the moniker Guccifer 2.0 started a blog to mock that finding, posting several of the stolen documents and claiming sole credit. But the publication by WikiLeaks of an archive of the committee's internal emails — and the uproar they caused on the eve of the Democratic National Convention — have focused wider attention on who, or what, is operating behind that name. While WikiLeaks has not said how it obtained the emails, Guccifer 2.0 claimed in a blog post last month to have sent them to WikiLeaks. New York Times; Motherboard; Daily Beast

U.S. is the source of most cyberattacks: Sucuri

Russia, Iran, China and North Korea are home to more than their fair share of cybercriminals, but the nation most responsible for housing malicious actors is the United States. And of the 50 states and various American territories California holds the dubious honor of hosting the most bad guys within its borders, this according to a blog by Daniel Cid, Sucuri founder and CTO. Cid's study found that 38 percent of attacks originated in the United States with 11 percent coming from California, which by itself is more than any other individual country. SC Magazine

Germany is cracking down on 'dark net' crime after the Munich shooting

German police will do more to fight crime committed on the "dark net", they said on Wednesday, days after a gunman killed nine people with a weapon bought on that hidden part of the internet. "We see that the dark net is a growing trading place and therefore we need to prioritize our investigations here," Holger Muench, head of Germany's Federal Police (BKA), told journalists as he presented the latest annual report on cyber crime. Reuters (Business Insider)

Twitter suspends accounts that lured ISIS supporters to install spyware

Twitter has suspended at least two accounts that were spreading links to spyware aimed at people who sympathise with terrorists. Twitter announced in February that it had blocked 125,000 accounts for promoting mostly ISIS-related terrorist attacks. While the company may have taken a stand against terrorist propaganda on the service, it also draws a hard line on using Twitter to spread malware that could be used to identify potential ISIS recruits. CSO Online; International Business Times

We Need to Change the Psychology of Security

An opinion piece states "There are a wide variety of opinions on how to fix security and stop the seemingly endless parade of breaches. Like many, I believe the problem is multi-faceted: it's more than just a lack of encryption, the inability to block malware, or that IT professionals don't do "the basics," though these all contribute to security failures. I believe we have a people problem, but not in the same way that most might think. The security industry has made a lot of mistakes along the way, and some of these mistakes have made the security professional's job needlessly difficult. In hindsight, one of these mistakes was to separate security from IT. We need to correct that..." Motherboard

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, August 02, 2016 8:46 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
August 2, 2016 / le 2 août 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Preventing fraud in real estate transactions

Unfortunately, we live in a society where fraud is on the rise and new schemes to defraud unsuspecting victims seem to be regular features on the nightly newscase, alongside the weather report. Real property is not immune to fraud. In fact, there has been so much fraud in real estate that banks are taking additional precautions with mortgages, the law society has implemented rules and best practices for lawyers and real estate agents have to comply with identification verification processes required by their governing body... Real estate agents must follow the guidelines of and submit reports to FINTRAC (Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada). Real estate agents must obtain the identification of their clients. They must keep a record of the client's name, client's address, nature of the client's principal business or occupation, and the individual's date of birth. To obtain this information, the real estate agent must also record the type of documents used to verify the identity, (e.g., driver's licence), its reference number and its place of issue. Real estate agents also must report to FINTRAC suspicious transactions and transactions that involve a large cash transaction of over $10,000. Ottawa Sun, H7

Snowden made Canadian spies review contractor policy

When Edward Snowden begin leaking secrets about mass surveillance in the United States, Canada's electronic spy agency quietly wondered if their security screening was sufficient to stop a copycat. Newly released documents show some of the behind-the-scenes actions taken by the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) three years ago, when contractor Snowden first pulled back the curtain on the West's pervasive mass surveillance capabilities. Toronto Star, A4

Canada's electronic spies revealed

EONBLUE: The Communications Security Establishment's EONBLUE program tapped into the physical infrastructure of the Internet, collecting data at real-world choke points, according to documents published by Der Spiegel newspaper. The program reportedly allows CSE to collect vast amounts of information, as well as conduct cyberdefence and potentially offensive actions. Levitation: Another tool in CSE's mass surveillance box, Levitation tracked between 10 million and 15 million downloads and uploads to popular file-sharing sites per day, according to documents reviewed by CBC. Of the hundreds of millions of interactions tracked, CSE found approximately 350 "interesting downloads" per month, the outlet reported. Toronto Star, A4

Cybercrime arrest

Interpol says it has arrested a Nigerian accused of scamming $60 million from companies around the world through fraudulent e-mails. Interpol says one target alone paid out $15.4 million. Associated Press (Winnipeg Sun, A5); Infosecurity-Magazine

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Are you asking your clients these important cyber questions?

As cyber security risks are increasingly at the forefront, businesses large and small must remain constantly proactive against attacks – including the White House. U.S. President Obama recently issued an “attack plan” against cyber hacks, warning of a “revolution” of computer threats and growing cyber aggression from nations such as Russia and North Korea, and terrorist organizations such as the Islamic State. Insurance Business Canada

Travel Smart

Personal safety should be a key concern for anyone at the Olympics in Rio de Janeiro in August, and so should cybersecurity. The Games will attract not only athletes and spectators, but hackers eager to sniff Wi-Fi traffic, snatch data and infect devices with malware... On its "Cyber security while travelling website", the Government of Canada warns us to "use free computing resources with the assumption that any information you enter could be seen by an unauthorized third party." Toronto Star

Google issues anniversary Android patch - and Qualcomm bugs dominate

Google's August patch for Android fixes 22 bugs in the operating system as well as over 80 bugs in component drivers, most of which affect devices with Qualcomm components. Google has once again bifurcated its monthly bulletin to make it easier for Android device makers to patch common OS bugs quickly, while a second set of fixes addresses flaws in device drivers, kernel issues, bootloaders, and other components that only affect some device models. ZDNet News

Cyberattaque contre des organismes publics

Les services russes de renseignement ont annoncé samedi avoir mis au jour une attaque informatique «planifiée» visant à espionner une vingtaine d'organisations, dont des agences publiques et industries militaires. Le FSB, l'héritier du KGB soviétique, explique avoir détecté des cas d'infection par un logiciel malveillant «destiné au cyberespionnage dans les réseaux informatiques d'environ 20 organisations sur le territoire de la Russie». Agence France-Presse (Journal de Montréal, Journal de Québec)

Data program accessed in cyber-attack on Democrats, says Clinton campaign

A data program used by the campaign of the Democratic presidential candidate, Hillary Clinton, was "accessed" as a part of hack on the Democratic National Committee (DNC) that intelligence officials believe was carried out by Russia's intelligence services, Clinton's campaign said on Friday. Guardian UK

Malware disguised by SSL traffic spikes over the last year

The use of encrypted traffic to disguise malware attempting to infiltrate user devices and enterprise networks has "significantly" risen over the past year, researchers say. According to cybersecurity firm Blue Coat, there was a visible increase in the use of SSL/TLS encryption standards born out of privacy worries. However, while many individuals are now using these protocols whenever possible, it appears that threat actors are also harnessing SSL to disguise their activities. ZDNet News

Hackers hit Czech billionaire minister's companies to protest gambling law

The Anonymous hackers' group briefly shut down company websites of billionaire Czech Finance Minister Andrej Babis's food and agriculture empire in protest at a law giving the state the power to close illegal gambling sites. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Lockheed Martin to open AU$13m multi-disciplinary R&D centre in Melbourne

US defence giant Lockheed Martin will be spending AU$13 million over three years on a new research and development facility in Melbourne, aiming to solve the technology challenges of the future, and work in the so-called "art of the possible". ZDNet News

Experts: Iranian link to attempted hack of Syrian dissident

Syrian opposition activist Noura Al-Ameer was combing through her emails late one night when a message caught her eye. The sender was "Assadcrimes" and he promised information about Iranian meddling in the Middle East. But the email seemed odd somehow. Associated Press (Charlottetown Guardian)

Google donne le coup d'envoi à HSTS sur ses serveurs

Google annonce avoir mis en place le HSTS, HTTP Strict Transport Security sur ses différents services et son nom de domaine Google.com. Cette mise à jour vise à améliorer la sécurité des utilisateurs en convertissant automatiquement les liens présents sur la page en HTTPS. ZDNet France

WhatsApp Privacy Fears as Deleted Chats Are Recovered

WhatsApp chats can still be retrieved even if users think they've completely deleted or cleared them, according to new research. Security researcher, Jonathan Zdziarski, claimed that even the latest version of the app leaves a forensic trace of all chats – at least on iOS. Infosecurity-Magazine

Around 200 Million Yahoo Credentials Dumped Online

A hacker responsible for dumping hundreds of millions of MySpace, LinkedIn and other credentials online in recent months has now reportedly put up for sale 200 million Yahoo log-ins. The individual, known as "Peace," is selling the same combination of usernames, passwords hashed with the md5 algorithm, dates of birth, and in some cases email addresses. Infosecurity-Magazine

The Future of Mobile Security

An opinion piece states, "Mobility has become the new normal for computing, but the enterprise is not fully embracing the capabilities of always-on, always-connected, devices as a result of inadequate security tools. In order to improve the capabilities of mobile in the enterprise, the next generation of enterprise mobile security solutions needs to evolve and develop to take control of both BYOD and enterprise-owned mobile fleets..." Infosecurity-Magazine

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca).*

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, August 17, 2016 8:40 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique August 17, 2016 / le 17 août 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Les chefs de police réclament l'accès légal aux mots de passe

Les chefs de police canadiens réclament une loi pour contraindre les gens à révéler leurs mots de passe aux forces de l'ordre s'ils ont obtenu l'approbation d'un juge. L'Association canadienne des chefs de police (ACCP) a adopté une résolution incitant le gouvernement à prendre des mesures législatives pour faciliter l'obtention de preuves électroniques. L'ACCP estime que les criminels ont de plus en plus recours au chiffrement pour dissimuler leurs activités illicites en ligne. Le commissaire adjoint de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), Joe Oliver, a déclaré qu'aucune loi canadienne ne contraignait actuellement le détenteur d'un mot de passe à le révéler aux policiers dans le cadre d'une enquête. Lors d'une conférence de presse mardi, M. Oliver a soutenu que les criminels, qu'ils soient membres de la mafia ou pédophiles, bénéficient d'un anonymat quasi absolu grâce à des outils en ligne qui camouflent leur identité, de même que leurs communications. «Les victimes dans l'espace numérique sont réelles, a rappelé M. Oliver. Les lois du Canada et sa capacité à maintenir l'ordre doivent suivre le rythme de l'évolution technologique.» Cette résolution de l'ACCP survient alors que le gouvernement fédéral entame ses consultations en matière de cybersécurité, notamment par rapport à l'équilibre entre les besoins des policiers et les libertés fondamentales. Ces consultations se poursuivront jusqu'au 15 octobre. La Presse Canadienne (Le Quotidien, 17, Le Soleil); Canadian Press (Times & Transcript, Calgary Herald, National Post, Ottawa Citizen, Leader-Post, Edmonton Journal, Waterloo Region Record, Toronto Star, Hamilton Spectator, Edmonton Sun, Toronto Sun, Cape Breton Post, Chronicle-Herald, The Telegram, The Guardian)

Calgary police push for right to access digital passwords

Calgary police are supporting calls for a new law that would force civilians to hand over electronic passwords to investigators with a judge's permission. Calgary police Chief Roger Chaffin was among those at the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police who voted Tuesday to ask for legal means to obtain such digital evidence, saying it would help law enforcement keep pace with cybercrime. But civil liberties advocates say such a law would be highly problematic, and might even clash with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. "When the chiefs of police want this sort of self-incrimination and openness, will it apply to them as well?" said Rocky Mountain Civil Liberties Association director Sharon Polsky, insisting it would be "flagrantly in violation" of Canadians' privacy rights. Current laws don't allow police to compel someone to give them a password. Deputy Chief Sat Parhar, who was in Ottawa with Chaffin to vote on the resolution, said the new legislation would be a guide for law enforcement, outlining when it is and isn't OK to access certain data. "There's a rule book, the rule book is the criminal code," said Parhar. "We're just saying this needs to be represented in the rule book. You don't want the police doing things without some sort of guidance through the law." Calgary Herald, A1

Fighting crime in the digital age

An opinion piece states, "This week, top police officials from coast to coast have descended on our nation's capital for the 111th annual Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police conference. The topic that will shape their discussion, Public Safety in a Digital Age: Real Victims - Real Crime, is timely, given that we're at an important societal juncture. So much of our daily lives now take place online: our wealth passes through jurisdictions in the form of ones and zeros; the most intimate details of our lives, whether they are held by government or industry, rest on servers located somewhere around the globe; and our critical infrastructure, whether it is managed by the public or private sector, is operated digitally. Given the recent media coverage of data breaches and many people's personal experiences with fraudulent phishing schemes, it's understandable that we, as consumers and citizens, want to erect the highest walls possible around our valuable digital assets. This is a natural human reaction, but it isn't a realistic societal response, given the magnitude of our online world." National Post, A8

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Ottawa announces public consultation on cyber security strategy

The federal government has started a three-month public consultation on updating its cyber security strategy, asking security pros and citizens for input on how it should not only strengthen the national IT systems and critical infrastructure in the private sector but also help businesses and residents. Public Services Minister Ralph Goodale said Tuesday the consultation, which ends Oct. 15, will help identify gaps and opportunities, bring forward new ideas to shape Canada's renewed approach to cyber security and capitalize on the advantages of new technology and the digital economy. IT World Canada

Public Safety Canada launches public consultation on cybersecurity landscape

Public Safety Canada (PSC) has launched a public consultation on the "evolving cybersecurity landscape." On Tuesday, the federal government launched the Consultation on Cyber Security to help identify gaps and opportunities, bring forward new ideas to shape Canada's renewed approach to cybersecurity and capitalize on the advantages of new technology and the digital economy, PSC said in a statement. From now until Oct. 15, PSC will be leading the consultation by engaging stakeholders and Canadians on the trends and challenges of cybersecurity, as well as on new initiatives under consideration which will strive to build Canada's resilience, capability and innovation in cybersecurity, the department said. Topics of the consultation include: the evolution of the cyber threat; the increasing economic significance of cybersecurity; the expanding frontiers of cybersecurity; and Canada's way forward on cybersecurity. "Canadians spend more time online than people in any other country," said Ralph Goodale, Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, in the statement. "We need to get really good at cybersecurity – across our personal, business, infrastructure and government sectors – so we can take full advantage of the digital economy, while protecting the safety and security of Canadians, and selling our valuable cyber skills and products into a booming market throughout the rest of the world." Canadian Underwriter

Canadian Police Lobbies for Law That Would Force People to Reveal Passwords

Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) Assistant Commissioner Joe Oliver told Canadian press in a conference on Tuesday that his institution asked government officials for a law that would allow police officers to force crime suspects to reveal passwords for devices and online accounts. The RCMP official claims a spike in the number of cases where criminals employ encryption to protect sensitive and possibly incriminating data. RCMP officials are trying to criminalize situations where suspects refuse to cooperate. The proposal the RCMP made involves oversight, with a judge approving in situations where RCMP officers can force citizens to reveal passwords. Softpedia News; CanTech Letter; Motherboard

Hacking group auctions 'cyber weapons' stolen from NSA

A mysterious online group called the Shadow Brokers claims to have infiltrated an elite hacking unit linked to the National Security Agency and stolen state "cyber weapons", and is now auctioning them off to the highest bidder. The stolen malware is said to belong to Equation Group, a sophisticated hacking team believed to be operated by the NSA. So far, the Shadow Brokers have only released a few taster files and images of the cache, but security researchers said they appear to be legitimate. The leak, announced in broken English by the group in a series of posts on Twitter, Tumblr, Pastebin and Github, was accompanied by claims that the group was in possession of state-sponsored "cyber weapons". Kaspersky Lab, the security company that first exposed Equation Group's cyber-espionage in 2015, has published a detailed blogpost showing a "strong connection" between the files found in the leak and their earlier findings about Equation Group. Kaspersky has found encryption algorithms among more than 300 files in the Shadow Brokers' cache used in a way that has only been seen before in Equation Group malware. The Guardian; Threat Post; Ars Technica; Softpedia News

Snowden Claims Russia is Behind NSA Hack

Former NSA contractor Edward Snowden has claimed that the Kremlin is most likely behind the recent cyber-attack on what is thought to be an NSA C&C server, and is using the data as leverage against a possible retaliation for the state-sponsored campaign against the Democrat party. The 'group' known as Shadow Brokers went public earlier this week with a treasure trove of "cyber weapons" it said belong to the Equation Group – outed last year by Kaspersky Lab as probably being baked by the NSA. Now Snowden has taken to Twitter to reveal what he believes happened – namely that the state-backed Shadow Brokers accessed a "staging server" belonging to the NSA, where it found the binaries it is now trying to 'sell'. Info Security Magazine; Fortune; Engadget; RT

#Shadowbrokers hack could be Russia's DNC counter-threat to NSA

One of the most interesting hacks in recent memory is almost certain to be a compromise of infrastructure operated by an ultra-elite hacking group thought to be the United States' National Security Agency. The breach involves the public release of more than 300 files that showcase a host of exploits against companies including Cisco and Fortinet, plus tools known to be part of the National Security Agency's arsenal. Initial analysis by the likes of Kaspersky Labs, NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden, and a host of independent security researchers shore up claims by a hacking group calling itself Shadow Brokers that the exploits and toolsets it hopes to auction for millions of dollars in Bitcoins are legitimate Equation group weaponry. Kaspersky Labs last year revealed the Equation group to be almost certainly a state-sponsored actor and, according to deep analysis of its activities, highly likely to be a wing of the National Security Agency given a series of very striking operational and technical similarities. It is a group that until February last year had conducted global hacking campaigns of the highest sophistication in complete stealth including interdiction attacks and persistent hard disk firmware re-writing using a suite of unique malware families. Its attacks had gone unnoticed for more than 14 years. Now the same Kaspersky Labs analysts who revealed Equation group confirm it has been compromised in the Shadow Brokers breach. The Register

The Shadow Brokers NSA hack claim unlikely say experts

The claim by the hacking group the Shadow Brokers that it has pilfered surveillance tools from another group, allegedly associated with the National Security Agency (NSA), is being called bogus by security experts. SC Magazine

How Cyberattacks on Critical Infrastructure Could Cause Real-Life Disasters

In October 11, 2012, then Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta warned of the impending dangers of a digital Pearl Harbor, a cyberattack that targeted critical infrastructure and caused real, physical damage. Since then, others have sounded the alarm bells of a cyberattack on infrastructure. Yet, other than the Stuxnet attack on an Iranian nuclear power plant, and a blackout enabled by a malware infection in Ukraine, there are very few examples of cyberattacks whose effects have spilled beyond the digital world. Security experts seem to agree that the threat is real—though highly misunderstood—and yet squirrels cause far more problems to the energy grid than hackers. But the fact that infrastructure attacks don't seem to happen very often doesn't mean they are not possible. Critical infrastructure, many agree, is highly vulnerable. Motherboard

Largest ransomware-as-a-service scheme pulls in US$195,000 a month: Report

Canadians are among those who have fallen victim to a global ransomware-as-a-service scheme which targeted tens of thousands of users in 201 countries and territories in July alone, according to security researchers. The researchers at Check Point Software and IntSights Cyber Intelligence of Israel released a report Tuesday saying the service, which it calls Cerber, is currently running 161 active campaigns with a total estimated profit of US$195,000 last month alone. In July an estimated 150,000 devices were infected. Each day an average of eight new campaigns on average are launched, Check Point says. The biggest percentage of victims so far are in South Korea (29 per cent), the U.S. (14 per cent), Taiwan (9 per cent) and China (eight per cent). However, Check Point says there's evidence to support the developer's claim that Americans are among the top people willing to pay up. IT World Canada; The Merkle; Graham Cluley News

US Dept of Energy spends $34m on securing the smart grid

The US Department of Energy (DOE) has awarded $34 million in funding to projects aimed at securing the smart grid. In total, 12 projects have been accepted as part of the Obama Administration's focus on energy-based infrastructure and the Office of Electricity Delivery and Energy Reliability's Cybersecurity of Energy Delivery Systems (CEDs) program. The DOE says the projects will aim to enhance the "reliability and resilience" of US smart grids through "innovative, scalable, and cost-effective research." The main focus, however, is on security -- and how to keep core infrastructure and electrical grids as safe as possible from outside intrusion. ZDNet; The Register

Researchers Developed a System to Find Zero-Day Exploits

Researchers from Arizona State University created a way that makes gathering data from dark net markets and forums easy, and it helps identify new emerging cyber threats as they are released. The system utilizes search engines and dark net sites through the Tor network, and the researchers say they have found 30 marketplaces, and over 20 forums where black hat hackers reside. The system automatically gathers data from the sites and utilizes multiple information mining and machine learning techniques to organize the data that is collected. The Merkle

Pokémon Go 'App' Hides Nasty Ransomware Surprise

Security researchers have discovered new ransomware masquerading as a Pokémon Go app which also creates a backdoor in the victim's machine as well as attempting to spread itself via removable media. The malware itself is an updated version of the Hidden Tear open source initiative, according to Lawrence Abrams at Bleeping Computer. Discovered by researcher Michael Gillespie impersonating a Windows Pokémon Go app, the ransomware scans a victim's drive and encrypts any file with a certain extension -- as per usual. However, there are some features which demand further attention. Info Security Magazine; SC Magazine

New Vawtrak Trojan variant leverages SSL pinning, HTTPS

A new variant of the Vawtrak banking Trojan uses HTTPS to secure its command and control communications, and it includes support for SSL certificate pinning to evade detection in enterprise environments. As researchers continue to discover more about the deployment of new features in Vawtrak, the Trojan's developers continue to add new security features to the sophisticated malware platform. Vawtrak's incorporation of SSL certificate pinning, reported by Fidelis

Cybersecurity, follows the recent PhishLabs' report that Vawtrak developers had added a domain generation algorithm (DGA) to the Trojan that is marketed as crimeware as a service and sold privately to malicious actors. Tech Target

Hacker puts source code of HL7 software vendor PilotFish up for sale on dark web

Security firm InfoArmor discovered that a cybercriminal placed the source codes to all PilotFish Technology software for sale on the dark web. PilotFish develops legacy standards, systems and technology software, including middleware to integrate disparate systems and HL7-supported medical devices. The threat actor, called 'batwhatman,' is offering the source codes on the underground marketplace called AlphaBay, which is on the TOR network and actively used by cybercriminals to sell illegal goods and services like stolen digital data. Currently, the marketplace has over 90,000 members. Health Care IT News

Data Of Nearly 900,000 At Risk In Latest Cyber Attack

Valley Anesthesiology and Pain Consultants, a large practice with more than 300 providers serving multiple hospitals across the greater Phoenix region, has suffered a cyber attack affecting 882,590 patients. The incident also affects all current and former employees and providers, the number of which was not disclosed. Information Management

Trojan affecting TeamViewer comes knocking on European and US doors

Another backdoor Trojan, BackDoor.TeamViewer.ENT.1, has been detected installing legitimate TeamViewer components on infected machines to spy on users. Doctor Web researchers discovered the malware has been in development since 2011 and regularly releases modified versions of it. The backdoor is distributed under the name SpyAgent. SC Magazine

Super-Sophisticated Spyware Spotted After 5-Year Run

Symantec and Kaspersky Lab last week separately announced the discovery of a highly sophisticated advanced persistent threat that had eluded security researchers for at least five years. A previously unknown group called "Strider" has been using Remsec, an advanced tool that seems to be designed primarily for spying. Its code contains a reference to Sauron, the main villain in The Lord of the Rings, according to Symantec. The APT spyware is called "ProjectSauron" or "Strider" in Kaspersky's report. The malware has been active since at least October 2011, Symantec said. It obtained a sample after its behavioral engine detected it on a customer's systems. Kaspersky found out about ProjectSauron when its software caught an executable library registered as a Windows password filter loaded in the memory of a Windows domain controller. The library had access to sensitive data in cleartext. Tech News World

Brazil Hit With a Second Major Banking Trojan Attack

Brazil is seeing its second major banking Trojan campaign in two weeks. IBM X-Force has discovered a new version of Zeus Sphinx, a sophisticated malware campaign now targeting the online banking and Boletto payment services of three of the top Brazilian banks, and one bank in Colombia, according to its configuration file. The criminals are likely trying to capitalize on the Olympic games in Rio, first with Zeus Panda, which targeted 10 local banking and payment industry targets in Brazil. Now, a fresh version of the Zeus Sphinx malware has been uncovered; it adapts social engineering injections to manipulate users in each targeted bank. Info Security Magazine; SC Magazine

Operation Ghoul targets Middle East engineers, industrial players

Researchers have uncovered a wave of attacks against industrial and engineering companies in the quest for cash. According to Kaspersky, sensitive corporate financial data is the top target of the threat actors behind the campaign "Operation Ghoul," which operates primarily in the Middle East but is known to attack companies worldwide. The researcher's report, published on Wednesday, says that cyberattackers are using spear phishing as the main technique to infiltrate company servers. ZDNet; Threat Post

Hackers only need 5 minutes to forge a phishing scam and 25 minutes to break into systems – Report

How long do you think it may take cybercriminals to hack into your computer? According to a new report by cloud-based cybersecurity firm Duo Security, it may take less than half an hour for hackers using phishing email campaigns to access systems and steal sensitive information. Duo Security collected data from 400 organisations using its free web-based tool Duo Insight, which allows internal IT teams to test employee response by sending out phishing campaign simulations. The firm said that of the 11,542 users who received such phishing emails, 31% clicked on links that could have potentially compromised systems via malware or virus attacks. International Business Times

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, August 18, 2016 8:33 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique August 18, 2016 / le 18 août 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Lawyer says proposal to obtain device passwords runs afoul of court rulings

Any law that would force civilians to give police electronic passwords - an initiative police chiefs across the country are supporting - would be unlikely to pass, law experts say. "We do have rulings in Canada and in other jurisdictions that say this type of mandated disclosure is not acceptable, specifically because it forces people to participate in their own incrimination," said Tamir Israel, a lawyer for the Ottawa-based Canadian Internet Policy and Public Interest Clinic (CIPPIC). "It's hard to fully assess it without knowing the full parameters of what they have in mind." Calgary police Chief Roger Chaffin was among those at the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police who voted Tuesday to ask for legal means to obtain passwords, saying it would help law enforcement keep pace with cybercrime. The CACP is a lobbying organization, and the resolution passed has no effect on current law. Though details on prospective legislation weren't released, RCMP assistant commissioner Joe Oliver said Tuesday searches would require a judge's permission. Israel said that depending on what the specifics of such a law would be, it's very likely it would violate Canadians' civil rights. Previous Supreme Court rulings have said law enforcement can do a cursory search of a phone unprotected by a password or passcode shortly after arresting someone. However, they can't take an in-depth look or try to get into a password-protected device without a warrant, nor they can they force you to give them a password. The Calgary Police Service declined to speak to Postmedia for this story. However Dep. Chief Sat Parhar said Tuesday that a law granting police access to passwords would help with a range of cases. Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, A6, Calgary Herald)

Top-secret NSA code published online

The release on websites this week of what appears to be top-secret computer code that the National Security Agency has used to break into the networks of foreign governments and other espionage targets has caused deep concern inside U.S. intelligence agencies, raising the question of whether America's own elite cyberwarriors have been hacked and their methods revealed. Most outside experts who examined the posts, by a group calling itself the "Shadow Brokers," said they contained what appeared to be genuine samples of the code - though somewhat outdated - used in the production of the NSA's custom-built malware. Most of the code was designed to break through network firewalls and get inside the computer systems of competitors like Russia, China and Iran. According to these experts, the coding resembled a series of "products" which were described in general terms in documents stolen three years ago by Edward J. Snowden. But the documents released by Snowden and his associates contained no actual source code. By midday Tuesday, Snowden himself, in a Twitter message from his exile in Moscow, declared that "circumstantial evidence and conventional wisdom indicates Russian responsibility" for publication, which he interpreted as a warning shot to the U.S. government in case it was thinking of imposing sanctions against Russia in the cybertheft of documents from the Democratic National Committee. Toronto Star, A11

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Canadian government launches public forum on cyber security

On Wednesday, the federal government launched a public forum that will invite members of the Canadian public to share their views on Canada's cyber security landscape. This call for public consultation will be open until October 15th, 2016. Some of the topics covered in the consultation include the evolution of the cyber threat, the increasing economic significance of cyber security, the expanding frontiers of cyber security and, moving forward on cyber security. Canada has the heaviest internet users in the world and the greatest number of computers per capita, which amounts to 129 computers per 100 people. In addition, over 70 percent of Canadian businesses have fallen victim to cyber attacks in the past. On that note, the current global market for cyber security products is poised to grow to $170 billion by 2020 while the job market for cyber experts is expected to rise by 6 million over the next four years. MobileSyrup.com

Canadian Police Association Endorses Citizen-Monitoring Law

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police (CACCP) has passed a resolution mandating the group advocate for a law that would force people to provide electronic passwords to police with judge's consent. CACCP President Chief Clive Weighill and Ottawa Police Chief Charles Bordeleau, noted the reasons behind the decision. "Police services across the world are facing new challenges and threats related to technological developments and the criminal innovation that has ensued," said Bordeleau. "[We are looking for] a way forward that helps us fuse traditional policing with modern day cyber-activity." In Canada, the recent Osterman Research Study reported that 44 of 125 Canadian companies interviewed suffered a ransomware attack in the past 12 months of which 33 of the victims paid a ransom that was between $1,000 and $50,000 in order to regain stolen data. Canadian healthcare and financial industries were most affected, industries highly dependent on access to business critical information. Weighill added, "We are all aware of the painful and often tragic consequences that can result from victimization where technology is a factor. Criminal capability development is currently outpacing our response as a community and that only by working together across law enforcement and the private sector can we successfully reduce the threat of cybercrime." But Jacob Ginsberg, senior director of Echoworx, told Infosecurity that a law of this nature would remove protection and privacy from law abiding citizens. Info Security Magazine

Canadian Law Enforcement Admit -- And Then Deny -- They Own A Stingray Device

Stingrays are now as common as cockroaches in the United States, but we haven't heard much about their use by Canadian law enforcement. A denial or a confirmation would be nice, but not strictly necessary. It's safe to assume anything US cops can get, Canadian law enforcement can obtain as well. Earlier this month, Vice's Motherboard revealed the first confirmation of Stingray use by a local law enforcement agency. (The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have owned and operated Stingray devices for most of the last ten years.) According to the BC Civil Liberties Association, which posted a blog announcing the news on Monday, the Vancouver police used an IMSI catcher once, nearly a decade ago, and without a warrant. "We sent a letter asking the Vancouver police if they'd ever used one of the RCMP's IMSI catchers, and if they would again," said Micheal Vonn, policy director for the BCCLA. "The answer to both questions was yes." (...) Vancouver law enforcement -- according to what had been told to Motherboard -- didn't own the Stingray it used. It borrowed the device from the RCMP and was instructed on how to use it by a Mountie tech. Several hours later, the Edmonton PD wasn't so sure it owned and/or deployed an IMSI catcher. Tech Dirt

Cisco and Fortinet confirm flaws exposed in 'NSA hack', issue patches to counter malware

Firewall providers Cisco and Fortinet have both issued security advisories confirming that vulnerabilities exposed by the mysterious Shadow Brokers, who recently claimed to have hacked and stolen cyberweapons from NSA-linked Equation Group and put them up for auction, do exist and affect their products. Both companies have issued fixes addressing the exploits that were recently made public, adding to the mounting evidence that the data exposed in the high-profile leak is legitimate. Cisco identified two flaws affecting Cisco Adaptive Security Appliances (ASA) devices that are usually used to protect networks and data centres. Both vulnerabilities were remote code execute flaws that essentially allowed a hacker who knows how to carry out an attack to do so from anywhere across the globe. "Cisco immediately conducted a thorough investigation of the files released, and has identified two vulnerabilities affecting Cisco ASA devices that require customer attention," the company said in a statement. "On Aug 17, 2016, we issued two security advisories, which deliver free software updates and workarounds where possible." Fortinet also issued an advisory warning users of another vulnerability affecting its own firewalls. The company said that its Fortigate firewall, which was released before August 2012, had a high-severity "cookie parser buffer overflow vulnerability." Other firms whose products appear to have been exploited by the Equation Group, including Juniper and Topsec, have not released any advisories yet. International Business Times; Info Security Magazine; CXO Today; IT Pro Portal; Computing; The Register; Ars Technica UK; ZDNet; V3; Threat Post

Former NSA Staffers: Rogue Insider Could Be Behind NSA Data Dump

There are a lot of unanswered questions surrounding the shocking dump of a slew of hacking tools used by an NSA-linked group earlier this week. But perhaps the biggest one is: who's behind the leak? Who is behind the mysterious moniker "The Shadow Brokers"? So far, there's no clear evidence pointing in any direction, but given the timing of the leak, and the simple fact that very few would have the capabilities and the motives to hack and shame the NSA publicly, some posited The Shadow Brokers could be Russian. But there's another possibility. An insider could have stolen them directly from the NSA, in a similar fashion to how former NSA contractor Edward Snowden stole an untold number of the spy agency's top secret documents. And this theory is being pushed by someone who claims to be, himself, a former NSA insider. Motherboard

The Shadow Brokers auction demonstrates why it is a bad idea to hoard security holes

A hacking collective known as the Shadow Brokers are auctioning stolen surveillance tools used by a US government sponsored information security group. The Shadow Brokers calls these utilities "weapons" and were taken from an NSA linked group that cyber security firm Kaspersky refers to as the "Equation Group." The Equation Group is a known threat actor, an organisation or entity whose activities can compromise the information security of an organisation. Here are some of the leaked tools that Shadow Group has put on auction. Kaspersky's Global Research and Analysis Team (GRaT) refers to the Equation Group as the "Death Star of the Malware Galaxy." Kaspersky also calls the Equation Group "Omnipotent". The Equation Group are one of the most technologically sophisticated groups in the world, with the creators of complex malware such as Stuxnet and Flame working for them. Equation Group has been known to use zero day exploits for its attacks. A zero day exploit is a security vulnerability that is unknown to the organisation creating the hardware or software with the vulnerability. For example, some of the zero day exploits that have supposedly leaked from the Equation Group to the Shadow Brokers have to do with Cisco products. The Equation Group had been hoarding a number of these zero day exploits, to use in its operations, and when these leak, there is a major problem for information security. This raises serious questions on the acceptability of such practices by major security agencies associated with governments. In this case, according to Wired, it is inevitable that there will be an investigation into NSA over the leaks. Firstpost; WIRED

The Shadow Brokers' NSA hack claim unlikely, say experts

The claim by the hacking group the Shadow Brokers that it has pilfered surveillance tools from another group, allegedly associated with the National Security Agency (NSA), is being called bogus by security experts. SC Magazine

NSA's website goes down amid hacking fears

An almost day-long outage of the National Security Agency's website has raised further questions as to whether America's most secretive surveillance agency has itself been compromised, days after a shadowy cybergroup claimed to have obtained some of the NSA's most powerful hacking tools. The NSA.gov website went down late Monday, according to Politico, and was not restored until late Tuesday. A request for comment to the NSA from FoxNews.com was not immediately returned. FOX News

FireEye warns 'massive' ransomware campaign hits US, Japan hospitals

The dangerous and as-yet-undefeated Locky ransomware is being hurled at hospitals across the United States and Japan in a 'massive' number of attacks, according to FireEye researcher Ronghwa Chong. Locky is a popular ransomware variant that will encrypt files in a way that forces users to pay ransoms or cut their losses and purge data. This month the already increasingly hammered health sector is copping a massive spray of phishing attacks bearing the Locky ransomware. The Register

Android malware being spread via Google AdSense

Google's AdSense advertising program is used by many sites across the Internet. But Android users should beware of some nasty malware that is being spread by Google's AdSense network. InfoWorld

Researchers spot Nemucod in Brazil spreading banking trojans

ESET researchers spotted the Nemucod downloader used to spread banking trojans and other malware in Brazil. On August 12, ESET researchers spotted an outbreak of a new Spy.Banker variant that is similar to previous ones used by other banking trojans in South America and that, during execution, check if the victim's system settings are in Portuguese before injecting the banker's payload, according to an Aug. 17 blog post. The trojan is spread along with two modified versions of an unnamed popular utility software, which are used to extract usernames and passwords from popular browsers as well as credentials for local email clients, the blog said. SC Magazine

Shark ransomware-as-a-service chomps its way to a 20% commission

A new type of ransomware called Shark is being offered for rent on an 'as-a-service' basis payable with a 20 percent cut of the payments it generates to its creators. Symantec discovered the malware which is distributed on a professional looking website. Shark is reportedly customisable, uses a fast encryption algorithm, supports multiple languages and is currently undetectable by all antivirus software. SC Magazine UK

Bitcoin Website Issues "State-Sponsored Attack" Warning

Crypto-currency aficionados navigating to the Bitcoin website yesterday were greeted with a grim security warning saying that the project's binary files, soon to be released, would most likely be targeted by "state-sponsored attackers." The project cites "reasons" that make it believe that the binary files used to run Bitcoin software on mining pools and exchange servers might be the target of cyber-attacks. Softpedia News

Operation Ghoul: Industrial and engineering firms under attack

Security researchers from Kaspersky Lab have warned of a new cyber-attack project which they named Operation Ghoul. Conducted by a group of hackers, it targets organisations in the industrial and engineering sectors in more than 30 countries and aims to extract as much data as possible. The data is then sold on the black market, and Kaspersky Lab says financial gain is the main motive behind the operation. More than 130 companies have been targeted, in countries such as Spain, Pakistan, United Arab Emirates, India, Egypt, United Kingdom, Germany and Saudi Arabia. IT Pro Portal

Ransomware becomes most 'profitable' malware

Ransomware has become the most profitable malware type in history. This is according to the Cisco 2016 Midyear Cybersecurity Report, which finds organisations are unprepared for future strains of more sophisticated ransomware. It notes fragile infrastructure, poor network hygiene and slow detection rates are providing ample time and air cover for adversaries to operate. IT Web

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité
publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca).*

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, August 19, 2016 8:20 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique August 19, 2016 / le 19 août 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Bankers scramble after $81M cyber-heist

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York and Bangladesh's central bank have agreed to withdraw additional payment security measures put in place after one of the world's biggest cyber-heists, the theft of US$81 million from Bangladesh Bank's account at the Fed, two sources said. The decision comes after SWIFT, the global financial messaging platform, promised in May to strengthen security on software tools used by its clients and to develop new tools that would raise a red flag when a payment instruction deviates from normal patterns. The decision was taken at a meeting in New York this week between officials from Bangladesh Bank, the New York Fed and SWIFT, said a source close to Bangladesh Bank. They have agreed on a tentative timeline to withdraw the additional security measures. National Post, FP8

Twitter suspends 360,000 over violent extremism

Twitter has suspended 360,000 accounts since mid-2015 for violating its policies banning the promotion of terrorism and violent extremism. The San Francisco-based company said in a blog post it has also made progress in preventing users who were suspended from immediately returning to the platform using different accounts, which has been a problem in the past. It said its rate of daily suspensions is up 80 per cent since last year, though it did not provide specific numbers. The suspensions spike immediately following terrorist attacks, it said. Associated Press (Times Colonist, B2); Edmonton Sun (Calgary Sun)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Calgary police say password resolution 'not mass surveillance'

Even if police forces are successful in seeking legal measures compelling people to give up smartphone and computer passwords, law-abiding Calgarians won't have to worry about officers demanding them, says the head of the Calgary force's technology unit. "We wouldn't be able to compel them to say, 'hey, give us your password,' it would be a judge who would order them," Staff Sgt. Ryan Jepson of the technical operations section told the Eyeopener on Wednesday. In no way shape or form are police going to be walking up to people and saying, 'hey, give us your passwords.' This would have to go through a judicial process." CBC News

Malware Infected All Eddie Bauer Stores in U.S., Canada

Clothing store chain Eddie Bauer said today it has detected and removed malicious software from point-of-sale systems at all of its 350+ stores in North America, and that credit and debit cards used at those stores during the first six months of 2016 may have been compromised in the breach. The acknowledgement comes nearly six weeks after KrebsOnSecurity first notified the clothier about a possible intrusion at stores nationwide. KrebsOnSecurity.com; InfoSecurity-Magazine.com; ZDNet; Engadget; Reuters; Fortune; International Business Times

Cisco and Fortinet Warn Customers About NSA-Linked Exploits

Cisco released signatures but no patch for the exploit code-named EXTRABACON. Leaked code that can overcome popular, pervasive computer network firewalls is live and in the wild. Cisco and Fortinet, firewall makers based in the United States, have warned their customers about recently revealed vulnerabilities in their products. The so-called Shadow Brokers, a pseudonymous hacker or group of hackers, this weekend claimed to have stolen these exploits from a top-tier cyberespionage unit known as the Equation Group, which experts have associated with the United States National Security Agency. Fortune; Tech Times; eWeek

Cisco patches zero-day revealed by "NSA hackers"

The Shadow Brokers are a self-styled hacker group that recently kicked off a tongue-in-cheek media campaign claiming that they'd penetrated the NSA (or someone like that – they're referring to the victim as the Equation Group). Shadow Brokers say they've made off with a virtual warehouse of tip-top "cyberweapons" that they plan to auction off. To help you believe they have some good stuff in the auction files, they've released a bunch of hacked data for free, including documents, programs, scripts, exploit code and so on. What we do know from the Shadow Brokers archive is that something was stolen or leaked by someone, at some unknown earlier time. Whether it's only being leaked now by the original thieves, or whether it's been re-stolen by a new lot of crooks, we don't know. But at least one of the exploitable vulnerabilities amongst the free files, found in the directory, not only works, but also turns out to have been a zero-day bug. The bug was obviously news to Cisco, who quickly and creditably responded with an analysis and a patch. Sophos Security; IT World Canada

NSA zero days and encryption backdoors need clear disclosure policies

An opinion piece states, "The government has another public balancing act on its hands with the disclosure this week of exploits against commercial security products that were purportedly cooked up by the NSA. These attack tools revealed by a group called Shadow Brokers date from sometime before June 2013 and some of them were still effective this week, which means the NSA never told the vendors about them. That helps flesh out what the Obama administration meant two years ago when it said that under most circumstances the NSA would tell vendors if it exploits vulnerabilities in their security products. The exception: the disclosure policy wouldn't apply if there were a clear national security or law enforcement need." Network World

The NSA Data Leakers Might Be Faking Their Awful English To Deceive Us

Nobody knows who's hiding behind the moniker of The Shadow Brokers, the mysterious group who earlier this week dumped a slew of hacking tools belonging to the NSA. Is it the Russian government? Is it actually a disgruntled rogue NSA insider? For now, there's no hard evidence pointing in either direction. But The Shadow Brokers' language in their rambling manifesto might give us some clues. In fact, the apparent broken English might just be a ruse, a trick to make us believe the author doesn't speak the language, according to a linguistic analysis of it. Motherboard

Did the NSA Have the Ability to Extract VPN Keys from Cisco PIX Firewalls?

An analysis of the BENIGNCERTAIN exploit included in The Shadow Brokers data dump reveals that the Equation Group, a cyber-espionage group that many have linked with the NSA, had the ability to crack open Cisco PIX firewalls and extract VPN and RSA private key and other sensitive configuration details. Over the weekend, a person or group named The Shadow Brokers dumped online a trove of data they said they stole from a server hosting the malware used in a live operation by the Equation Group. The hackers are now selling this data to the highest bidder in an anonymous Bitcoin auction. Softpedia News

Shadow Brokers NSA leak: this too could be a form of Russian propaganda, says expert

As the Western world's information security crowd grapples with the implication of the Shadow Brokers leaks, one researcher has suggested that Edward Snowden's role in interpreting the leaks is itself part of Russia's information war against the US. Associate Professor Matthew Sussex from the Australian National University studies Russian foreign and security policy, with a focus on new trends in conflict "especially in 'hybrid' warfare and in the evolution of propaganda". Sydney Morning Herald

'Massive' Locky ransomware campaign targets hospitals

A 'massive' cybercriminal campaign is targeting hospitals with the notorious Locky ransomware and is using a new technique in an effort to infect systems with the file encrypting software. Cybersecurity researchers at FireEye observed a spike in the number of attempts at Locky deliveries during the first half of August, with hospitals accounting for over half the instances in which hackers attempted to infect a user with a ransomware payload. ZDNet; International Business Times; Threat Post

Wikileaks hosts hundreds of malware files in email dumps

Wikileaks is reportedly hosting over 300 malware samples among the website's cache of leaked emails. As reported by The Register, Bulgarian security researcher Dr Vesselin Bontchev claims that the malware, of which there are at least 300 files hosted, has been found within the recent email dump of communication from the Turkish party AKP. ZDNet; The Register

Malware Turns Servers into Cryptocurrency Mining Engines

A malware called Linux.Lady targets Redis servers that have been placed online without passwords and launches a cryptocurrency mining software, according to hackread.com. According to Dr. Web, a Russian software retailer, Linux.Lady uses Google's Go programming language and targets Redis servers that lack passwords from systems administrators. Dr. Web claims the malware can collect information about an infected computer and send it to the C&C server, download it and launch a cryptocurrency mining utility, then attack more computers on the network. Crypto Coins News

FSociety Ransomware Is Here, but It's Pretty Lame

"Mr. Robot" fans will be glad to know that real-life crooks are taking inspiration from the TV series and are now using the FSociety name and logo to develop a ransomware variant around this brand. Softpedia News

Operation Ghoul attacks terrorize industrial and engineering orgs

Kaspersky researchers spotted a wave of attacks that has affected more than 130 organizations in at least 30 countries. Dubbed Operation Ghoul, the group behind the attacks appears to be financially motivated and targets executives at mostly small to medium-sized industrial manufacturing and engineering organizations by using spear phishing emails that include compressed executables, Kaspersky Senior Security Researcher Mohamad Amin Hasbini said in an Aug. 17 blog post. The malicious emails appear to come from a bank in the United Arab Emirates and deliver a malware based on the Hawkeye commercial spyware, which is designed to collect data such as passwords, keystrokes and screenshots, to send to the attackers. SC Magazine

Smart Electrical Sockets Could Be the Next Botnet

Smart electrical sockets might launch the next cyberattack, or might even put your life in danger. Security researchers at Bitdefender have found a vulnerability in a popular brand—the researchers did not disclose which—that they say could allow an attacker to turn power outlets into botnets, read your email, and even set your house on fire if you connect an appliance that could overheat. Motherboard; Softpedia News

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, August 30, 2016 8:27 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
August 30, 2016 / le 30 août 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Rebooting Canada's Cybersecurity Strategy

A blog post states "What should Canada's next cybersecurity strategy look like? The federal government is asking the country how it should the harden private and public sector against attack. Public services minister Ralph Goodale announced the three-month consultation in late August, after voicing the need for an update. Items on the government's agenda include certification schemes for business cybersecurity, best practice frameworks, and fostering better board-level governance around cybersecurity. The government is also mulling a national cybercrime centre to help manage cross-jurisdictional cybercrime investigations, which would join the existing Cyber Incident Response Centre. Some of the questions for citizens in the associated workbook include how law enforcement can better address cybercrime challenges, and how public and private sector organizations can better protect themselves from cybercrime threats including ransomware and identity theft. The government wants to know whether public expectations for policing in cyberspace differ from those for policing in the physical world." Sector.ca

FBI warns of possible state election-system hacks

The FBI is warning state officials to boost their election security in light of evidence that hackers breached related data systems in two states. In a confidential "flash" alert from its cyber division, first reported by Yahoo News and posted online by others, the FBI says it's investigating the pair of incidents and advising states to scan their systems for specific signs of hacking. The FBI isn't naming the states it says were breached. The Aug. 18 warning came just days after Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson hosted a call with secretaries of state and other state election officials to talk about cybersecurity and the election infrastructure. Associated Press (Charlottetown Guardian)

Cisco patches exploit, 27 million vBulletin accounts exposed - Security news IT leaders need to know

Cisco has released an update for its Cisco Adaptive Security Appliance (ASA) software to correct a high risk issue with Simple Network Management Protocol (SNMP) code that could allow an authenticated, remote attacker to cause a reload of the affected system or to remotely execute code. It says all versions of SNMP are affected, including that in some of its end-of-life products such as Cisco Firewall Service Modules and Cisco PIX Firewalls that may still be in use. It does not plan updates for these products. It advises administrators to allow only trusted users to have SNMP access and to monitor affected systems using the snmp-server host command. Exploits for the vulnerability have been publicly released; the company has published a blog post discussing this and other vulnerabilities revealed by the Shadow Brokers, a self-styled hacker group selling the exploits. It advises customers to update their systems as soon as possible. Postmedia Network (National Post)

Cyber threat grows for bitcoin exchanges

When hackers penetrated a secure authentication system at a bitcoin exchange called Bitfinex earlier this month, they stole about $70 million worth of the virtual currency. The latest survey of 46 securities exchanges released three years ago by the International Organization of Securities Commissions and World Federation of Exchanges found that more than half had experienced a cyber attack. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

Voter databases in two states breached by foreign hackers, FBI

Foreign hackers made their way into voter databases in two states in recent weeks, according to a Yahoo! News report. The FBI's Cyber Division revealed in a "flash" report that it uncovered evidence that the election databases were hacked, which led to the agency issuing warnings to election officials across the country to strengthen the security of their computer systems. The news follows on suspicions that Russian state-sponsored hackers were behind the July intrusions into systems belonging to the Democratic National Committee as well as other political groups in order to affect results for the upcoming presidential election. SC Magazine; Computerworld; Computerworld; LA Times; Info Security Magazine; Ars Technica; Threat Post

Kaspersky patches DoS and kernel flaws affecting drivers

Denial-of-service (DoS) and kernel vulnerabilities affecting the functionality of Kaspersky's KLIF, KLDISK, and KL1 drivers discovered by a pair of researchers at Cisco Talos were patched by Kaspersky Lab. Two of the flaws affect Kaspersky's KLIF driver (CVE-2016-4304, CVE-2016-4305) and allow a malicious application to execute a malicious API call using invalid parameters. The vulnerabilities affect intercepted NtUserCreateWindowEx and NtAdjustTokenPrivileges functions. The flaws "can cause an attempt to access inaccessible memory by the driver resulting in a system crash," wrote Cisco Talos Senior Research Engineer Marcin "Icewall" Noga and Vulnerability Researcher Piotr Bania in a corporate blog post Friday. SC Magazine

RIPPER ATM Malware Uses Malicious EVM Chip

A never-before-seen malware family known as RIPPER is being blamed for a rash of ATM heists in Thailand last week. The malware, found by researchers at FireEye, is responsible for the theft of 12 million baht ($378,000) from ATMs at banks across Thailand. The discovery of the malware coincided with news reports from the Bangkok Post newspaper of ATM robberies by cybercriminals. While law enforcement agencies in Thailand have not attributed the theft to the RIPPER malware, FireEye said on Friday it believes it is the same. Threat Post; Info Security Magazine; The Register

New Ransomware Looks, Acts Like Windows Update

Microsoft no longer lets you decide whether to install Windows system updates, and online criminals have noticed. The new Fantom ransomware takes advantage of this situation by nearly perfectly mimicking the Windows Update process, and will keep almost any user fooled until it's too late. AVG security researcher Jakob Kroustek discovered Fantom last week. He notified the Bleeping Computer blog, and the details are pretty scary. Tom's Guide

Meet USBee, the malware that uses USB drives to covertly jump airgaps

In 2013, a document leaked by former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden illustrated how a specially modified USB device allowed spies to surreptitiously siphon data out of targeted computers, even when they were physically severed from the Internet or other networks. Now, researchers have developed software that goes a step further by turning unmodified USB devices into covert transmitters that can funnel large amounts of information out of similarly "air-gapped" PCs. Ars Technica

Kaspersky fixes antivirus crash bug

Internet and antivirus giant Kaspersky has fixed a number of flaws that could be used to crash its flagship software, rendering its protection useless. Talos Group, the security arm of Cisco, said in a blog post that three of the flaws were denial-of-service flaws that could crash the software, and the fourth could leak data, which may allow an attacker to exploit a local system. ZDNet

Malware uses Twitter to control devices

A new type of malware that uses social media accounts instead of command-and-control (C&C) servers has been discovered by ESET researchers. The virus, called Twitoor, is a backdoor capable of downloading other malware onto an infected device by hiding on the smartphone and checking Twitter for commands. IT Web

Pegasus iOS exploit uses three zero days to attack high-value targets

A new remote iOS exploit called Pegasus leverages three zero days in what appear to be state-sponsored targeted attack campaigns against political dissidents. Apple has rolled out a patch for a dangerous remote iOS exploit that has been used by governments to attack political dissidents, rights activists and journalists. Tech Target

Pegasus creators claim malware only sold for lawful use

A spokesman for NSO Group, the Israeli company bought by a U.S. private equity firm and is responsible for developing Pegasus, claims the malware and was only sold to governments under signed agreements to be used in a lawful manner. SC Magazine

Iran Uncovers Malware at Petrochemical Plants

Iran has said that it has discovered industrial malware at two of its petrochemical complexes. According to the Tehran Times, "Necessary defensive measures were taken" after the malware was detected and removed, said brigadier general Gholam-Reza Jalali. He added that the malicious code was not linked to recent blazes at Iranian plants. Info Security Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media
Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, September 12, 2016 8:41 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique September 12, 2016 / le 12 septembre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Making the spies accountable: real change or illusion?

An opinion piece by security experts Ron Atkey, Craig Forcese, and Kent Roach states "Canada was once a leader in national-security accountability. When the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) was created in 1984, it was subject to scrutiny by a parallel "review" body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC). The Liberal government of the period, however, declined to follow the McDonald Commission's recommendation for a committee of security-cleared parliamentarians who would also watch the intelligence service. (...) But SIRC and the CSE commissioner cannot conduct joint accountability reviews, sharing secret information. And so SIRC and its counterpart are limited to narrow, "stovepiped" mandates. And they are kept to their own silos in terms of co-ordination, even as the agencies they review rightly operate more seamlessly. The Arar inquiry raised concerns that much security work, such as that done by the Canada Border Services Agency, was subjected to no review whatsoever. And for the RCMP, we had only a body that could hear complaints, but usually not get the information needed to pursue them. After the Arar report, the Harper government did very little to cure these problems. It created a new review body for the RCMP, but limited its ability to extract information. And so now there were three review bodies stovepiped to three (and only three) security agencies, confined to their own separate silos and possessing varying capacity to conduct robust review." Globe and Mail, A11

'The Closer you get to the money the more of a target you are to Cyber Criminals

(...) For the Canadian financial industry, the stakes in the cyber-security game are enormous. Bay Street banks and wealth management firms have access to some of the most sensitive data in the country, and access to millions of dollars in savings and investments, which makes them a natural target for hackers (...) In January, the consultancy said investment by Canadian companies in safeguards against cyber security threats had increased by 82 per cent year-over-year, but still accounts for less than five per cent of overall information technology (IT) spending (...) A July report from Symantec said Canada ranks among the top 10 countries targeted by ransomware attacks, a popular tactic of cyber criminals that was on public display this summer when the University of Calgary's network was infiltrated (...) Those who track online offences and attacks say it is impossible to get a complete picture of the vulnerabilities in Canada because financial institutions are unlikely to reveal hacks unless they are forced to do so. "Many organizations tend to take security seriously only when they have been hit by a cyber event or if they are required by regulation to have a certain level of preparedness," says Satyamoorthy Kabilan, director of national security and strategic foresight at the Conference Board of Canada. Canada's main bank regulator, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, and the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, which polices investment dealers, don't specifically require reporting through legislation or regulation. Postmedia (Financial Post, FP4; National Post)

Les données de plusieurs étudiants ont été volées

La police recherche deux fraudeurs qui auraient trafiqué des ordinateurs de l'Université Concordia afin de voler les informations personnelles de plusieurs étudiants. L'hiver dernier, les deux individus seraient parvenus à installer des enregistreurs de frappe sur trois ordinateurs des bibliothèques Webster et Vanier, situées sur les campus du centre-ville et de Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Ces dispositifs, qui ont l'allure de petites clés USB, se branchent à l'arrière de l'ordinateur et permettent d'enregistrer les données personnelles des utilisateurs au fur et à mesure qu'ils tapent sur le clavier, incluant mots de passe et codes d'accès. Journal de Montréal, 6

CIA chief warns of hacking

CIA Director John Brennan warned on Sunday that Russia has "exceptionally capable and sophisticated" computer capabilities and that the U.S. must be on guard. When asked in a television interview whether Russia is trying to manipulate the American presidential election, Brennan didn't say. But he noted that the FBI is investigating the hacking of Democratic National Committee emails, and he cited Moscow's aggressive intelligence collection and its focus on high-tech snooping. Associated Press (Calgary Sun, A41; Edmonton Sun, London Free Press, Chronicle Herald, Red Deer Advocate, Charlottetown Guardian, Winnipeg Sun, The Province, Vancouver Sun, StarPhoenix, Montreal Gazette, Leader-Post, National Post, Ottawa Citizen, Calgary Herald)

Hackers look for financial small fry

A director of an international bank took concerns about cyber crime into his own hands recently, hiring a specialized team to covertly breach his own company's network. The attackers used a so-called "spear phishing" technique, baiting the bank's employees to open an email that appeared to come from someone they knew. If they did - and clicked on the attachment - their computers were infected with malicious software, which then spread to other computers in the network. Once they were in, the expert hackers revealed themselves to the bank's management, who they then graded on their ability to track down the infiltrators and thwart unauthorized money transfers. "Once we ... gave them hints, it took more time than it should have to find us," says Robert Masse, a partner at Deloitte in Montreal who runs the consultant's Canadian incident response practice, which runs such infiltration exercises for financial companies around the world. Masse, who agreed to discuss only non-Canadian cases because he didn't want to risk disclosing information that could identify a client in the small domestic market, said he was not surprised the international bank was not up to snuff. Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, NP6; Leader-Post, Edmonton Journal)

Stopping online predator

An opinion piece states "With online predators just a few mouse-clicks away, young people can be victimized with tragic ease, even from the far side of the world. That's why it's essential to have strong protections in place. And why it's so troubling to find "serious gaps" in existing efforts to shield kids from cyber-exploitation. "Much more needs to be done" to keep vulnerable children safe, according to a consultant's study prepared for the federal government in March. Commissioned by Public Safety Canada, the study is meant to guide federal funds to where they're most needed to combat online sexual exploitation. Existing resources are "are being strained," according to the study, with the Canadian Press reporting that kids in parts of Canada, especially in rural areas and the north, are at risk of being underserved by counselling, prevention programs, victim treatment and other initiatives." Times Colonist, A12

Don't fear the SOE

An opinion piece states, "Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's recent trip to China appears to have gone swimmingly, although Canada's concerns over Chinese state-owned enterprises (SOEs) have reportedly dampened the prospects of full-blown freetrade negotiations between the two countries. SOEs - particularly Chinese SOEs - have long been a concern to Canadians. As Brian Lee Crowley and Sean Speer of the Macdonald-Laurier Institute wrote in the Financial Post: "Placing limits on Chinese SOE investment in key sectors that involve strategic or critical assets such as the oilsands ... was prudent and wise. Few in the intelligence community would argue that the security risks are worth the economic benefits." Or, to quote Konrad Yakabuski, writing in the Globe and Mail, "as Chinese SOEs spread their tentacles across the planet ... Western governments must increasingly weigh their desire for foreign investment against the national security concerns raised by Chinese ownership of critical assets." SOEs certainly pose risks that must be carefully managed. Their links to foreign governments leave them uniquely positioned to advance political ends such as espionage or cyber-warfare. This point was recently underlined by reports that a Chinese state-sponsored actor hacked Canada's scientific research body, the National..." National Post, A8

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Public Safety: ransomware incidents have nearly doubled over last year

Public Safety Canada tells iPolitics that three-quarters through 2016, its internet risk response unit's investigations into ransomware - in which a cybercriminal compromises a computer system until ransom is paid - are up by nearly double over last year's figures. According to stats from the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre, which monitors and coordinates national responses to cyber security incidents, ransomware had accounted for almost 22 per cent of all the malware samples it studied. For all of 2015, they made up only 12.5 per cent of more than 30 million samples. "CCIRC has observed an increase in the number of malware samples that are submitted by partners and are discovered to be ransomware," Public Safety spokesperson Jean-Philippe Levert wrote in an email. The department regularly analyzes malware samples so it can warn and mitigate against threats. Ransomware is a type of malicious computer attack where hackers will take control of a computer system and lock it down or encrypt files until a ransom is paid - often through bitcoins, an untraceable digital crypto-currency. While those stats alone don't give a picture of whether attacks are on the rise in Canada, Canada had a proliferation of ransomware attacks in 2015 and more warnings at the start of 2016. In the spring, Canada and the U.S. issued a rare joint warning about a surge in attacks, and drawing concern the situation could worsen as they become more sophisticated. 2016 also saw a number of high profile Canadian organizations hit up - notably, University of Calgary paid out $20,000 this summer, and the Ottawa Hospital was also hit back in March but it managed to wipe the infected computers' drivers. iPolitics

Oliver Stone on Canadian surveillance and 'Snowden's timing

Canadians who take in the new film "Snowden," about National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden, should know they're not immune to the online privacy issues raised in the drama, says director Oliver Stone. "Canadians are part of the Five Eyes," Stone noted in an interview at the Toronto International Film Festival, referring to the intelligence alliance comprised of Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. "(They) trust each other to the degree that apparently they share quite a bit together. However, it's hard to believe that the U.S. gives everything away." "Snowden" made its world premiere at the Toronto film fest on Friday. Canadian Press (Ottawa Citizen)

Do more to stop online predators

With online predators just a few mouse-clicks away, young people can be victimized with tragic ease, even from the far side of the world. That's why it's essential to have strong protections in place. And why it's so troubling to find "serious gaps" in existing efforts to shield kids from cyber-exploitation. "Much more needs to be done" to keep vulnerable children safe, according to a consultant's study prepared for the federal government in March and revealed by The Canadian Press. That's a sobering finding, especially in light of an earlier memo indicating that police have insufficient resources to keep pace with this threat. Commissioned by Public Safety Canada, and obtained through the Access to Information Act, the newly released study is meant to guide federal funds to where they're most needed to combat online sexual exploitation. Existing resources are "are being strained," according to the study, with CP's Jim Bronskill reporting that kids in parts of Canada, especially in rural areas and the north, at risk of being underserved by counselling, prevention programs, victim treatment and other initiatives. This is especially worrisome given evidence that rural and other isolated kids are particularly vulnerable. The heart-rending fate of Port Coquitlam teenager Amanda Todd is stark evidence of what can happen when kids fall prey to computer predators. Manipulated by an online tormentor, she committed suicide at the age of 15 after years of cyberbullying, including the repeated circulation of nude photos. No child, or parent, deserves to go through that. Hamilton Spectator

UNB successfully defends against massive increase in cyber attacks

There's been a dramatic increase in cyber attacks on the University of New Brunswick recently, according to David Shipley, the university's director of strategic initiatives for information technology services. So-called brute force remote intrusion attacks recently hit a new all-time high of 185 million in one week. CBC News

C'est le mutisme concernant la cyberattaque

La Commission scolaire des Appalaches reste silencieuse sur la cyberattaque dont elle a été victime au cours des derniers jours. Aucun commentaire ne sera donné sur le déroulement de l'enquête, comme sur le fonctionnement à l'interne. L'approche est déplorée par le syndicat de l'enseignement de l'Amiante. «Ce n'est pas une question de vie ou de mort. Les gens ont le droit de savoir où on s'en va», souligne le président Francis Jacob. Journal de Montréal

Russian Hacking: Why the U.S. Isn't Retaliating

After weeks of news stories describing Russian intelligence operations to hack into the U.S. political system, many Americans may be wondering what the Obama administration intends to do about it. The answer: Not very much, at least in the short term, current and former U.S. national security officials say. NBC News

Hot-cross-platform Mac vuln

Hackers have developed a cross-platform backdoor capable of infecting Windows, Linux or Mac OS X desktop computers. The Mokes malware family is able to steal various types of data from the victim's machine, including but not limited to screenshots, files and keystrokes. Researchers at Kaspersky Lab first came across malicious binaries on Linux and Windows systems back in January before the recent discovery of an OS X variant of Mokes. The malware was put together in C++ using Qt, a cross-platform application framework. Register; Tech Radar; Telegraph

White House names retired Air Force general as first cyber security chief

The White House on Thursday named a retired U.S. Air Force brigadier general as the government's first federal cyber security chief, a position announced eight months ago that is intended to improve defenses against hackers. Gregory Touhill's job will be to protect government networks and critical infrastructure from cyber threats as federal chief information security officer, according to a statement. Reuters; Computing; Hacked; CSO; Register

How America's 911 emergency response system can be hacked

Critical to the success of the 911 emergency phone system, which has saved countless lives since it was first implemented in 1968, is its ability to quickly route calls to emergency responders closest to a caller. But a group of researchers say they've found a way to effectively disable the 911 emergency system across an entire state for an extended period of time by simply launching what's known as a TDoS attack, or telephony denial-of-service attack, against 911 call centers. The tactic involves infecting mobile phones to cause them to automatically make bogus 911 calls. Washington Post

Galaxy Note 7 : Samsung exhorte les sud-coréens à ne plus utiliser son smartphone

Dans le même temps, la Commission américaine de protection des consommateurs demande la même chose tandis que de plus en plus de compagnies aériennes interdisent l'usage de l'appareil à bord. ZDNet France

Guccifer 2.0 again denies Russian connection, mocks reports linking hacker to APT groups

An individual who self-identified as Guccifer 2.0 continues to deny reports by security firms that link the purported hacker or hacking group to Russian advanced persistent threat (APT) groups, according to a Wall Street Journal report. SC Magazine

MaidSafe secure internet concept enters testing phase

After a lengthy development period, secure internet startup MaidSafe has begun alpha testing elements of its the Secure Access For Everyone (Safe) Network, a proposed distributed peer-to-peer network that the founders believe will be a game changer for internet security. Computer Weekly

Crafty malware is found targeting U.S. government employees

A tough-to-detect malware that attacks government and corporate computers has been upgraded, making it more aggressive in its mission to steal sensitive files, according to security firm InfoArmor. Last November, InfoArmor published details on GovRAT, a sophisticated piece of malware that's designed to bypass antivirus tools. It does this by using stolen digital certificates to avoid detection. CSO

Emerging technologies are poking holes in security

Accelerated change challenges change management, security DevOps and emerging technologies that enable business innovation and opportunities demand fast, frequent change from the enterprise. The speed and regularity as well as the kinds of change challenge change management and ultimately security. CSO

Trouble spotted on the network

We had a scare the other day with a critical cross-site scripting (XSS) attack that seemed to be entirely contained — source and destination — on our own network. Tracking it down and resolving the issue were fairly routine procedures, but it's worth noting how it's possible to spot potential security problems when you don't have a world-class security operations center (SOC) that's staffed with skilled analysts and stuffed with large-screen monitors and all the bells and whistles. CSO

GM Recalls Millions of Cars After Critical Bug Found

General Motors has been forced to recall over four million cars following a software defect linked to at least one death. The bug forces the air bag sensing and diagnostic module (SDM) software to activate a diagnostic test if it encounters certain driving conditions, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA). Infosecurity-Magazine

Million Dollar DDoS Tool Hacked

A 'booter' service designed to simplify DDoS attacks has been hacked and the details of its paying customers revealed, it has emerged. Researcher Brian Krebs revealed the news in a blog post, claiming the vDOS tool had made its Israeli owners around $600,000 in two years. Infosecurity-Magazine

Russian IM Biz QIP Spills 33 Million User Accounts

Russian instant messaging site QIP.ru has been breached and the details of over 33 million users released, with passwords apparently stored in plaintext. In a brief message sent to Infosecurity, the Utah-based security vendor said it had been sent details from 33,380,559 accounts in total, which it verified with successful password reset attempts. Infosecurity-Magazine

Securing the human operating system: How to stop people being the weakest link in enterprise security

A company can spend all the funds it wants on the latest cybersecurity technology, like firewalls, threat detection, artificial intelligence and machine learning tools, but there is one security risk that can't be blocked from entering the company networks: the employee. Whether they're being coerced into doing it or not an employee could actively be working with hackers and cybercriminals to let them inside in your network. But in many cases it's a lax or ill-informed attitude to cybersecurity by staff which is potentially putting organisations at risk, with employees falling victim to phishing one of the major reasons that data breaches occur. ZDNet News

Post 9/11, we're still trying to balance freedom, security

Hundreds of millions of dollars have gone to state and local governments since the Sept. 11 attacks to prevent and prepare for acts of terrorism and other disasters. The money has bought military-style armor, vehicles and training for local police. It's prompted federal, state and local governments to share intelligence. It's launched initiatives to improve cyber-security, heighten surveillance and detect explosives. Eagle-Tribune

Is there a shift in the IT security market?

According to analyst firm IDC, the expected growth of the specialised threat analysis market will mark a new era in the IT security sector. IDC Security Products' program vice president Christian A. Christiansen recently introduced some highlights from the company's Specialized Threat Analysis and Protection Market (STAP) research, which quantified the opportunities for solutions countering APTs [advanced persistent threat] band targeted attacks MIS Asia

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 04, 2016 8:50 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 4, 2016 / le 4 octobre 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

In Canada's North, a Single Satellite Outage Means Losing Basic Services

Around 5 PM Eastern time on Sunday, a satellite providing internet services to most of North America went offline due to a technical glitch, the CBC reported. If you live the vast majority of communities in southern Canada or the US, you probably didn't notice. But in some parts of Canada's sparsely populated North, losing just one satellite means giving up basic services like access to ATMs or a flight out of town. In other words, life went offline before the satellite's function was restored on Monday afternoon. The satellite in question was Ottawa-based Telesat's Anik F2, which first went online in 2004 and has a coverage area spanning Canada's northernmost tip down to the southern US. Most places in North America don't totally depend on Anik F2 for an internet connection, and have landlines as well as other satellites—even some of Telesat's—to fall back on if one piece of equipment goes offline (...)“The satellite provided service for telephony, and for commercial enterprises like bank machines,” said Flaherty. “Airports use it for their air traffic control, and any of those services would have been down.” Some Twitter users also reported stores being cash-only as payment services apparently went offline. The outsized effects of a single satellite briefly going offline in the North highlights just how fragile and sparse internet infrastructure is in the region. Motherboard

Digital Defense, Inc. Discovers Multiple Zero-Day Vulnerabilities within EMC Unisphere for VMAX

Digital Defense, Inc. (DDI), a leading provider of Vulnerability Management as a Service, disclosed the discovery of six previously undiscovered security vulnerabilities in EMC Unisphere for VMAX, the web-based management interface to provision, manage and monitor VMAX storage systems. The vulnerabilities discovered could allow unauthorized access to arbitrary file retrieval with root privileges and denial of service. Dell EMC was swift in its collaboration with DDI and has released two security advisories [ESA-2016-121 and ESA-2016-122] to address these vulnerabilities. Digital Journal; ARS Technica UK

Over 70 Per Cent Terrorists Using Cyber Space: PMO Cyber Coordinator

Over 70 per cent of terrorists and terror groups across the globe are using various cyber medium tools to spread the evil of terrorism and further their goals, Gulshan Rai, the National Cyber Security Coordinator in the Prime Ministers Office (PMO) has said. Speaking at the India Conference on Cyber Security & Internet Governance organised by Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi, Mr Rai said 70-75 per cent of terrorists are using tools like voice over internet telecom, social media and even encryption to spread the menace of terrorism and further their goals. He said that post the controversy surrounding whistle-blower Edward Snowden, users and nations have become worried about the security of their data and are now using various encryption techniques and policies that has led to interruptions in seamless flow of data and information. NDTV; One India

Google diverts would-be jihadists away from radical websites

Hundreds of thousands of people seeking information about Islamic State on Google have been diverted to anti-extremism search results, as part of a drive to stop Muslims becoming radicalised online. The pioneering project directed people searching for particular Isis-related terms to YouTube videos that confront jihadist propaganda. The under-the-radar scheme, which has been praised by government ministers, made use of Google's AdWords service, which allows organisations to pay to have their results at the top of searches. The Times

Google Chrome update corrects use-after-free vulnerability

Google last week announced the impending rollout of Chrome version 53.0.2785.143, which includes three security fixes for the Windows, Mac and Linux operating systems. According to US-CERT, a remote attacker could exploit one of these vulnerabilities in order to take control of an affected system. According to Google's Chrome Releases blog post page, the latest update addresses a high-severity use-after-free vulnerability – officially designated CVE-2016-5177 – that was found in the open-source V8 JavaScript Engine by an anonymous external researcher who was awarded a $5,000 bug bounty. Google's own internal security audits and fuzz testing also resulted in additional fixes, the company reported. SC Magazine

SANS Institute in IoT Botnet Warning

The SANS Institute is urging security professionals to help monitor the internet for attempts to compromise IoT devices after confirming that they're happening virtually every minute. The organization's Johannes Ullrich wrote in a new note that he ran a test using an old DVR connected to a "normal" cable modem internet connection, ensuring that it wouldn't be used to attack other systems. "The sad part is, that I didn't have to wait long. The IP address is hit by telnet attempts pretty much every minute. Instead of having to wait for a long time to see an attack, my problem was that the DVR was often overwhelmed by the attacks, and the telnet server stopped responding. I had to reboot it every few minutes," he explained. Infosecurity Magazine

Are you at risk? Experts fear spike in hacking after code used in one of the largest cyber attacks in history is released

Web security analysts have warned of a flood of online attacks from hackers after code for a bot used to carry out a huge hack was published online. The code, which can turn unsecured devices such as web cameras, routers, phones and other hackable internet-connected devices into 'bots', could be used to target websites, knocking them offline. Called 'Mirai', the code is believed to be behind last month's landmark attack on security website Krebs On Security (...). He warned of the potential for a huge hike in attacks by 'internet of things' (IoT) devices, which could be used to bombard websites with requests, overloading them and effectively shutting them down. Daily Mail; Computer Weekly; SC Magazine

Hackers now have wider choice of weapons

Over the past two weeks, hackers launched two of the biggest digital attacks in Internet history, targeting a French Internet provider and one of the foremost computer-security journalists in the United States. What's perhaps more unusual is not the size of the attacks, but their source: Internet-connected cameras and digital video recorders like those in home and office security systems. Cyber-criminals hacked into thousands of these devices around the world and used them to bombard analyst Brian Krebs and the French company OVH with trillions of bits of meaningless data. The attack was severe enough to temporarily shut down Krebs's website. The attacks raise questions about the security of the much-vaunted Internet of Things (IoT), in which everyday objects from home appliances to door locks, cars, and digital video recorders are connected over a network and can be controlled remotely. The research firm Gartner Inc. estimates there are about 6.4 billion IoT devices in the world, with many many more on the way — 20.8 billion by 2020. Internet security analysts say that many of these devices are just as hackable as our home computers, but much harder to protect from attack. Boston Globe

The Internet of Things Sucks So Bad Even 'Amateurish' Malware Is Enough

Over the last few weeks, unknown hackers have launched some of the largest cyberattacks the internet has ever seen. These attacks weren't notable just by their unprecedented size and power, but also because they were powered by a large zombie army of hacked cameras and other devices that fit into the category of Internet of Things, or IoT. On Friday, the hacker who claims to have created the malware that was powering this massive "Botnet Of Things" published its source code, which appears to be legitimate (...). However legitimate, the malicious code isn't actually that sophisticated, according to security researchers who have been studying it (...). Despite being anything but Stuxnet or any other sophisticated malware, it still works, and now that is available for all to use, it is actively spreading. Motherboard

Here's a Live Map of the Mirai Malware Infecting the World

Last weekend, a hacker publicly released the code of "Mirai", the piece of Internet of Things malware that was used to create some of the most powerful botnets ever. Those botnets fired record breaking attacks at well-known security journalist Brian Krebs's site, as well as a popular server provider company (...). On Monday, the security researcher known as MalwareTech released a map showing, in real-time, infections of Mirai across the world. Motherboard

Army Wants Soldiers Trained to Fight Through Cyberattack

U.S. Army modernization officials said Monday that the service must start training soldiers to survive a cyberattack on the battlefield. "We must be able to understand what can happen to our systems through a cyberattack, and what is the enemy's capability and how do we counter that," Lt. Gen. (P) Gustavo "Gus" Perna, Army G4, told an audience at the Association the United States Army's annual meeting in Washington, D.C. "We need to face that with some stark reality, and we better do it quickly or we are going to have systems on the battlefield that we are not going to be able to operate despite the supply chain or the training of our soldiers." Perna took part in a forum with government and industry officials to discuss modernization as it relates to the threat of potential, near-peer enemies. Military.com

General: Cyber capabilities exceed authorities

The commanding general of the U.S. Army Forces Command said the Army is on the way to meeting its "initial design function" for tactical cyber capabilities, but the authority to use some of them is lacking (...). He added that the Army is pulling the top performers from other combat specialties as it works to stand up cyber forces. But the goal is to eventually train specialists in cyber warfare from the time of enlistment (...). "We have integrated small capabilities, select capabilities, both defensive and offensive at the tactical level to explore what's in the art of the possible," he said. "What we've learned is there's a tremendous amount of tactical application [that cannot be used] because the authorities [haven't] quite caught up to the capabilities and the art of the possible." FCW

The company linked to the OPM hack just got hired by the government again

A company connected to the massive hack targeting the Office of Personnel Management two years ago has been rehired by the US government. Keypoint, which processes background investigations on behalf of its clients, will provide its vetting services for a new government agency that was set up in the wake of the 2014 intrusion (...). Keypoint has repeatedly been accused of losing control of a list of usernames and passwords used to access the OPM's databases, which led to the larger intrusion. The newly formed National Background Investigations Bureau, set to open its doors later this month, will also work with three other contractors to process the thousands of applications it receives each month. ZDNet; Infosecurity Magazine

Hacker group finds almost no takers for stolen NSA cyber tools

Foreign hackers responsible for the theft of top secret cyber weapons from the National Security Agency are ranting that no one is interested in buying the stolen cyber tools. A group calling itself the Shadow Brokers, which claimed responsibility in mid-August for penetrating the NSA and seizing prized malware, said in a profane Borat-like posting over the weekend that it has found "no interest" for its online auction of the pilfered cyber weapons. The group originally released some teaser cyber tools for free, and analysts confirmed that they appeared to be state-of-the-art malware from the NSA's secret hacking division. News Tribune

'Strong possibility of widespread cyber attacks by NK,' says leading cyber security expert

Following North Korea's fifth nuclear test on September 9, concern is mounting in anticipation of the North's next provocation. Some analysts believe that a launch of long range ballistic missiles and large-scale cyber attacks may be carried out on October 10, the anniversary of the inauguration of the Workers' Party. In the past, the regime has launched crippling cyber attacks soon after nuclear tests conducted in defiance of UN resolutions. North Korean hacking units are possibly already on high alert and ready to engage in cyber warfare once the order is given (...). In an interview with Mr. Sang Myung Choi, director of HAURI CERT (Computer Emergency Response Team), it was revealed that "the North Korean government is preparing cyber warfare on an international scale" aimed at "causing significant economic damage and safety issues, and to instigate social disorder". Daily NK

EU Comes Down on Exports of Cyber-Surveillance Tech

The European Commission (EC) proposed last week an amendment to Regulation (EC) No 428/2009, which is a law that governs the export of dual-use technology, that can be used for both civil and military purposes. The changes proposed by the EC are meant to make it harder and time-consuming for European companies to export dual-use technologies outside the EU, to countries that have a history of human rights abuses. Dual-use technology, especially cyber-surveillance hardware and software, was regularly abused by governments around the world to spy on their citizens, protesters, journalists, and dissidents (...). The new law changes must be approved by the EU Parliament, and then implemented at the state-level by each EU member. Softpedia

Bulk surveillance review is 'fiction', claims former NSA technical director

An independent review into plans to introduce wide-ranging bulk surveillance powers for UK intelligence agencies and law enforcement should be filed under "fiction", according to a former director of the US National Security Agency. The Bulk Powers Review, conducted by the independent reviewer of terrorism legislation, David Anderson, and a small team of security cleared experts, concluded that there was "a proven operational case" to give intelligence and law enforcement agencies bulk surveillance powers. But William Binney, a former technical director at the NSA, told Computer Weekly that the Anderson Review had failed to consider the underlying technology behind bulk powers, which will be introduced in the Investigatory Powers Bill (...). "The bulk powers they are to assess are those that the NSA and GCHQ have used since 2001," said Binney. "So this bill and study are to review and then authorise something that they have been doing for 15 years and, yes, we are joining the Russians and Chinese in monitoring our populations." Computer Weekly

Lauri Love on US extradition and how hackers can help companies

If businesses are serious about reducing the risk of cyber attacks, they must work closely with hackers, says Lauri Love, the UK computer security expert who is facing extradition to the US, accused of computer crimes. Mr Love, who lost his appeal against extradition in September, says more should be done to ensure young people with computer skills learn to use their talents in a positive way working for companies, rather than engaging in crime. The transition to cyber vandalism and worse often starts when a bright but socially awkward teenager is drawn into the wrong circles, he says (...)

Companies could learn a lot from hackers, Mr Love says. Most businesses severely underestimate their risk from cyber crime. Hackers often penetrate their defences in very basic ways. Financial Times

Trump: Cybersecurity should be a top priority

What would Donald Trump do about cybersecurity if elected president? His statements so far have been a little vague. Until now. On Monday, he gave some specifics on how he'd approach protecting the government and private industry from the threat of hackers. CNET News

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Wednesday, October 05, 2016 8:47 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 5, 2016 / le 5 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

How Ottawa revived Canada's most controversial privacy issue

An opinion piece written by Michael Geist, Canada Research Chair in Internet and E-commerce Law at the University of Ottawa, states "The controversial issue of lawful access rules, which address questions of police access to Internet subscriber information and the interception capabilities at Canadian telecommunications companies, has long been played down by Canadian governments. When the policy proposals first emerged in the early 2000s, the Liberal government focused on the anti-terrorism and antispam benefits. Subsequent Conservative proposals promoted the ability to combat child pornography and, most recently, cyberbullying (...) Notwithstanding the legislative resolution and renewed legal certainty, Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale has quietly revived the lawful access debate with a public consultation that raises the prospect of new rules that would effectively scrap the 2014 compromise. Ironically, the focus this time is the public's demand for amendments to Bill C-51, the Conservatives' anti-terrorism law that sparked widespread criticism and calls for reform during last year's election campaign. In other words, the balance of Canadian privacy is being put at risk by a policy initiative the purports to fix privacy. The Public Safety consultation skips over the years of lawful access debate by putting everything back on the table, acknowledging that the law was updated less than 24 months ago but suggesting that more change may be needed (...) In fact, Mr. Goodale places another controversial issue on the policy table, noting that encryption technologies are "vital to cybersecurity, e-commerce, data and intellectual property protection, and the commercial interests of the communications industry" but lamenting that those same technologies can also be used by criminals and terrorists." Globe and Mail, B4

Yahoo scanned emails for NSA, FBI

Yahoo Inc. last year secretly built a custom software program to search all of its customers' incoming emails for specific information provided by U.S. intelligence officials, according to people familiar with the matter. The company complied with a classified U.S. government directive, scanning hundreds of millions of Yahoo Mail accounts at the behest of the National Security Agency or FBI, said two former employees and a third person apprised of the events. Some surveillance experts said this represents the first case to surface of a U.S. Internet company agreeing to a spy agency's demand by searching all arriving messages, as opposed to examining stored messages or scanning a small number of accounts in real time (...) Reuters was unable to determine what data Yahoo may have handed over, if any, and if intelligence officials had approached other email providers besides Yahoo with this kind of request. According to the two former employees, Yahoo chief executive Marissa Mayer's decision to obey the directive roiled some senior executives and led to the June 2015 departure of chief information security officer Alex Stamos, who now holds the top security job at Facebook Inc. Postmedia Network (Financial Post, FP1); Ottawa Citizen; Reuters (CBC, Guardian (UK)), Associated Press (CTV News); CNET; ZDNet; SC Magazine; Infosecurity Magazine; Softpedia

Online Media / Médias en ligne

After Yahoo Revelations, Microsoft Swears It Didn't Spy on Users for the NSA

Microsoft was one of the first tech companies to deny involvement in spying programs secretly launched by the NSA and the US government and carried by Yahoo, according to recent revelations. The Redmond-based tech giant provided a very short statement to explain that the firm has never been involved in spying programs like the ones that Yahoo might have been part of, but the company refused to provide any other details on this. Softpedia

New FBI head in San Francisco was key figure in iPhone hack

The FBI's new leader in San Francisco is a former drug investigator who developed expertise in technology that put him at the centre of the government's effort to unlock an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino shooters. Special Agent

Jack Bennett previously headed the bureau's digital forensics labs, which were tasked with accessing the San Bernardino gunman's phone. Bennett was at an FBI lab in Quantico, Virginia, in March when an outside company showed the bureau how it could hack the device. The tool ended the FBI's high-profile fight with Apple Inc. over access to the cellphone. That battle exposed a rift between the bureau and Silicon Valley over encryption. Associated Press (Montreal Gazette, Cape Breton Post, Guardian, Telegram)

Feds subpoena, gag encrypted chat firm Open Whisper Systems

Open Whisper Systems, the brainchild of cryptographer Moxie Marlinspike, has published the results of an unsealed subpoena set against the company -- and how little US law enforcement received for their trouble. The company is the developer of encrypted messaging application Signal, recommended by NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden, of which the technology is also used in other services including WhatsApp, Facebook Messenger and Google Allo. According to court documents unsealed last week, OWS was forced to hand over user data as part of a federal investigation, but the firm's ethos gave law enforcement very little to work with. ZDNet; Threat Post

Facebook rolls out opt-in encryption for 'secret' Messenger chats

As of today, all of Facebook's 900 million Messenger users should be able to choose to have specific chat threads end-to-end encrypted, protecting a message from all eyes except the sender and recipient. Called Secret Conversations, the feature also allows users to set messages to self-destruct anywhere between five seconds to one day. Once a Secret Conversation is initiated, Facebook's app says that the conversation has been "encrypted from one device to the other". Encrypted conversations can be started from the home page by tapping a new message and then tapping the Secret button on the top right corner of the page, followed by the contact you want to start a secret chat with. The new privacy feature follows the completion of Facebook's end-to-end encryption rollout for the billion users of its other chat app, WhatsApp, earlier this year. ZDNet

Brand-New Delphi Trojan Exfiltrates Vast Amounts of Info

A never-before-seen credential-stealing Trojan has been uncovered, found to be backdooring machines and exfiltrating large amounts of information. Written in Delphi coding language (should we call it the Oracle at Delphi?), the Trojan.sysscan malware is being used by a single source as the payload for attacks that repeatedly use brute-force passwords for RDP credentials, according to GuardiCore. The malware has extensive capabilities to search and extract cookies and other credentials containing authentication details such as usernames and passwords. It appears to be targeted at banking, gambling and tax websites, and can scavenge information saved by Point of Sale (PoS) software. It also can run on every Windows version from XP through Server 2012 R2, the firm said. Infosecurity Magazine

OpenJPEG Flaw Allows Code Execution via Malicious Image Files

An update released last week for the OpenJPEG library addresses several bugs and important security issues, including a flaw that can be exploited to execute arbitrary code using specially crafted image files. OpenJPEG is an open-source library designed for encoding and decoding JPEG2000 images, a format that is often used to embed image files inside PDF documents. OpenJPEG is used by several popular PDF readers, including PDFium, the default PDF viewer in Google Chrome. Cisco Talos researchers discovered that OpenJPEG is plagued by an out-of-bounds heap write issue. The vulnerability allows an attacker to execute arbitrary code on the targeted user's system if they can trick the victim into opening a specially crafted JPEG2000 image or a PDF document containing such a file (...)The vulnerability was reported to OpenJPEG developers in late July and it was patched last week with the release of version 2.1.2. The issue is tracked as CVE-2016-8332 and it has been assigned a CVSS score of 7.5, which puts it in the high severity category. Security Week

Researchers spot remote code execution flaw in FreeImage

Cisco Talos researchers spotted a remote code execution vulnerability in the FreeImage Library XMP Image Handling affecting version 3.17.0. The bug is caused by an out-of-bounds write vulnerability which exists in the XMP image handling functionality of the FreeImage library and if exploited, would allow an attacker to use a specially crafted XMP file to cause an arbitrary memory overwrite resulting in code execution, according to an Oct. 3 blog post (...) A user can become infected if they open a malformed file sent to them via email, are tricked into downloading and opening the malicious file, or if the file is sent via instant message and is automatically opened due to user configuration, Talos Senior Technical Leader and Global Outreach Manager Craig Williams told SCMagazine.com. The file only needs to get to the victim's machine in order to execute the attack, he said. The vulnerability has already been reported and was patched in the CVS on Aug. 7, although the firm hasn't released a new version of the software. SC Magazine

Hacked WordPress Core File Leveraged for Hijacking a Site's Web Traffic

With WordPress dominating the CMS market by far, hackers will become more creative and aggressive in taking over websites and persisting infections for as much as possible. A new trick discovered by Sucuri experts during the past weeks sees attackers leveraging yet another WordPress core file to insert malicious code on hacked websites and redirect traffic to malicious sites. The file in question is wp-includes/template-loader.php, a core WordPress file that is responsible for managing the site's page templates. In this most recent incident, hackers had altered this file to casually redirect some of the website's legitimate traffic to a malicious page that was offering users product keys for various Microsoft products at reduced prices. Softpedia

Insulin pump vulnerabilities could lead to overdose

Users of the Animas OneTouch Ping insulin pump system have been warned that security vulnerabilities in the device allow attackers to remotely deliver insulin doses. On Tuesday, researchers from Rapid7 revealed the existence of three vulnerabilities in the Animas OneTouch Ping insulin pump system (...) According to Rapid7 researcher Jay Radcliffe, the first vulnerability, CVE-2016-5084, reveals that data flowing between these two modules is transmitted in the clear. This opens the door for eavesdroppers to capture information such as dosage data and blood glucose results. The second critical security flaw, CVE-2016-5085, stems from the weak pairing between the pump and meter. The pairing process takes place during setup to prevent pumps from taking orders from other remotes in the vicinity and is done through a five-packet exchange in cleartext where the devices exchange serial numbers and some additional information (...) The third security vulnerability is equally as dangerous. The bug, CVE-2016-5086, highlights the fact the communication taking place between the pump and meter has no timestamps or sequence numbers and because of this, no defense against replay attacks, in which legitimate commands could be intercepted by an attacker and then played back at a later date. ZDNet; Threat Post

Three-quarters of Firms Hit by DDoS

Nearly three-quarters of global firms have suffered a DDoS attack over the past 12 months with half losing $100,000 or more each hour during peak periods, according to the latest study from Neustar. The global DDoS mitigation provider polled just over 1,000 C-suite execs to compile its October 2016 Worldwide DDoS Attacks & Protection Report. Of those who had experienced an attack, 85% said they were subject to multiple blasts, with the largest number (29%) suffering attacks between 2-5 times. Although 49% claimed they lost $100,000 per hour during peak periods as a result of an attack, the figure went as high as $250,000 or more for a third of respondents. Time is money, but unfortunately 71% of respondents said they took an hour or more to detect attacks and 72% an additional hour to respond. More worrying still for organizations is the fact that DDoS attacks appear to be increasingly used in conjunction with efforts to steal information, infect systems with ransomware or other cyberattacks – possibly as a smokescreen to distract IT teams. Infosecurity Magazine

Newsweek Site Suffered DDoS Attack After Trump Report

Newsweek's website suffered a distributed denial of service (DDoS) attack after it broke the story that US presidential candidate Donald Trump's company had violated a trade embargo on Cuba, reports TPM quoting Newsweek editor-in-chief Jim Impoco. A probe into the hack continues, but initial examination of the rogue IP addresses indicate that they originate from Russia, but they also could be spoofed, according to Newsweek. "As with any DDoS attack, there are lots of IP addresses, but the main ones are Russian, though that in itself does not prove anything," said Impoco. Dark Reading

Attack on South Korean "vaccine" router blamed on North Korea

North Korea is suspect number one in an attack against South Korea's cyber command last month, according to a member of the main opposition party, Minjoo. Representative Kim Jin-pyo, a member of the parliament's national defence committee, told South Korea's Yonhap News Agency the attack targeted a "vaccine routing server" on the cyber command network. The server provides security for around 20,000 military computers that access the internet. SC Magazine

Assange vows Google, US election leaks as WikiLeaks turns 10

In coming weeks, the site is set to publish documents related to Google, the US presidential election and more, according to controversial founder Julian Assange (...) Assange promised new information every week for the next 10 weeks, related to Google, military operations, arms trading and mass surveillance. He also promised that all documents related to the US presidential election would be published before the vote on November 8. Assange denied reports that he intended to harm the campaign of Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton, although he did describe the reaction to leaks of Democratic emails as "neo-McCarthy-esque hysteria." Motherboard

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Thursday, October 06, 2016 8:49 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 6, 2016 / le 6 octobre 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

NSA contractor arrested over 'stolen secret code used to hack Russia'

The FBI has secretly arrested a National Security Agency (NSA) contractor suspected of stealing highly classified computer codes used to hack the computer systems of foreign governments including Russia and China, raising fears of another embarrassing intelligence leak to rival the Edward Snowden affair, the New York Times reported on Wednesday (...). The contractor in this case, who was reportedly arrested "in recent weeks", is suspected of stealing the NSA's "source code", used to break into the computer networks of rival powers such as Russia, China, Iran and North Korea. Independent \(UK\); New York Times; Washington Post; CNET; SC Magazine; IT Wire; Intercept; Softpedia

Google Patches 78 Vulnerabilities in Android

Google this week released another set of monthly patches for the Android mobile operating system, in an attempt to address no less than 78 security vulnerabilities.

Just as it has over the past few months, Google split the October 2016 security patches in two, each focused on specific issues. The 2016-10-01 security patch level addresses 20 vulnerabilities in various platform components, while the 2016-10-05 security patch level plugs 58 flaws in kernel subsystems, drivers, and OEM components. SecurityWeek

Researcher finds flaws in industrial control devices

In a report by Applied Risk, ICS security researcher, Alexandru Ariciu, said that flaws found in MOXA E1242 Ethernet remote I/O series used in factory automation, range from code injection in the web application to weak password policies and implementation. One of the problems lies in the devices web application that fails to sanitise user input, resulting in Javascript injection in the webpage. An exploit could allow an attacker to execute arbitrary code in the context of the browser of the users visiting the affected web pages... Another issue is that passwords are sent via the HTTP GET method. The md5 hash of the password that is used for authentication on the device is sent as a parameter in each GET request to the server. "This is considered to be bad practice, as an attacker with a MITM position can easily circumvent this implementation and bypass the authentication mechanism," said Ariciu. Also the password used to authenticate users to the system is truncated to eight characters. Any user trying to use a longer password will have its password cut down to the first eight characters. Also, the MD5 hash challenge that is created for authentication and is later used in all GET requests will be created using these first eight characters. SC Magazine

Akamai Post-Mortem Report Confirms Mirai as Source of Krebs DDoS Attacks

With all the infosec community impatiently waiting for more details on the huge DDoS attack that hit the KrebsOnSecurity blog, Akamai has now released its official post-mortem report on the aforementioned incident... As Krebs moved his website to Google's Project Shield, other investigators looking into the DDoS traffic determined that attackers had used a botnet created with the Mirai malware. Discovered by MalwareMustDie in September, the researcher said this malware is vaguely related to the Gafgyt malware family tree (also known as Lizkebab, BASHLITE, Bash0day, Bashdoor, and Torlus). According to Akamai's own investigation, the malware is also related to the Kaiten malware, which, just like Gafgyt, targets smart IoT devices. Akamai says its researchers had been tracking this Kaiten variant (identified as Kaiten/STD) since January this year. Akamai's analysis of Kaiten/STD is identical with MalwareMustDie's Mirai findings, so there's nothing new to surprise us in relation to the malware's mode of operation, which consists of brute-forcing Telnet and SSH ports left open on IoT devices, mainly on IP cameras, CCTV and DVR systems... According to Akamai's official numbers, the Krebs DDoS attack reached 620 Gbps, as Krebs tweeted himself, and also involved an additional, smaller botnet, outside of Mirai. Akamai also confirmed that the Mirai botnet was mainly comprised of security cameras and DVRs, as initially rumored. Around half of the bots were located in the EMEA (Europe, Middle East, and Africa) region, while North America and the APJ (Asia-Pacific and Japan) region accounted for around a quarter each. Softpedia

DDoS attacks consistent, relentless and costly

Neustar, a provider of real-time information services, has published its "October 2016 Worldwide DDoS Attacks & Protection Report: A Steady Threat in the Connected World," (registration required for a free report) focused on DDoS attack and protection trends. The report says the DDoS attack volume has remained consistently high and these attacks cause real damage to organisations. The global response also affirms the prevalent use of DDoS attacks to distract as "smokescreens" in concert with other malicious activities that result in additional compromises, such as viruses and ransomware. IT Wire

Spotify Free is Serving Up Malware

Numerous users are flooding music streaming service Spotify's Twitter feed, reporting that the freemium tier service has been hit with a malvertising attack. Those running Spotify Free on the desktop are periodically seeing strange browser behavior, with malicious ads serve malware popping up unbidden... For its part, Spotify responded in the user forum, saying that it has placed the issue under investigation. Infosecurity Magazine; SC Magazine

Oil 'slick': Sneaky OilRig malware campaign flows into new territory

A backdoor malware campaign dubbed OilRig that in May was discovered targeting organisations in Saudi Arabia is now trying to drill into government entities in Turkey, Israel and the US, as well as Qatari companies and organisations. Palo Alto Networks Unit 42 threat research team updated the campaign's latest spear-phishing efforts in a blog post on Tuesday, warning that the campaign has updated its "Helminth" backdoor software as well as the malicious Excel documents that distribute the malware via macros. According to the blog post, the phishing emails targeting Qatari organisations "were very specific to the organisation receiving them and in some cases were sent from partner organisations that already had a relationship with the recipient." Changes to malware over the last five months include the emergence of four distinct variants, each of which drops different filenames upon execution, Palo Alto continued in its report. SC Magazine

Beware of New Steam Spam Leading to Malware

Since last week, Steam gamers have been warning each other, via Twitter and Reddit, about a new spam campaign that tries to lure them to a site to download malware on their computers, which in the end, allows crooks to take over their PCs. This spam campaign begins with a hacker taking over a legitimate Steam account. This is possible today thanks to the large number of data breaches disclosed this year, many of which included cleartext passwords. If Steam gamers haven't turned on two-factor authentication for their Steam accounts and reused the same password on multiple sites, attackers can gain control over their accounts, and then use this newly-found access to spam their friends with malicious links. Softpedia

Official: Hackers who hit French TV station are still active

A French official says the hackers who knocked a French television station offline last year are still regularly trying break in to French government computers. Senior French cybersecurity official Guillaume Poupard says sensors deployed at government ministries routinely pick up electronic signatures linked to the group. The revelation adds another dose of intrigue to the attack, which briefly interrupted 11 channels belonging to TV5 Monde and packed its social media sites with propaganda for the Islamic State group. The idea that tech-savvy fanatics could hijack a major broadcaster sent a shiver across France. But L'Express magazine turned those fears on their head when it reported that investigators believed a Russian group carried out the attack. Associated Press (Yahoo News)

Two-thirds of IT Bosses Fear Ransomware Attack

Over two-thirds (69%) of IT decision makers believe their organization will be hit by a ransomware attack over the next 12 months, although many are still unsure what that will actually entail, according to Trend Micro. The security giant shared more findings from a poll of over 300 IT leaders, which has already revealed that 44% have experienced an attack over the past two years. The figure for those bracing themselves for an attack in the next year rose to 75% for organizations that have already been on the receiving end, Trend Micro claimed. Infosecurity Magazine

And the country with the most bot infections is... Turkey

Turkey has the largest number of total "bot" infections with one bot for every 1,139 internet users in the country and also contains 18.5 percent of all of the bots across the EMEA region, according to researchers at Symantec's Norton division. Most of the affected computers resign in the cities of Istanbul and Ankara which together account for more than half of the country's population, according to the press release. The report also found that following Turkey, the top ten countries by total bot population in descending order include, Italy, Hungary, Germany, France, Spain, the U.K., Poland, Russia, and Israel. SC Magazine

Watch a Quantum Computing Expert Describe How the World's About to Change

Quantum physics, with its descriptions of bizarre properties like entanglement and superposition, can sound like a science fiction fever dream. Yet this branch of physics, no matter how counterintuitive it seems sometimes, describes the universe all around us: As physicists have often told me, we live in a quantum world. Soon, this will be better reflected in our technology, and everything it can do. "We're moving towards a new paradigm for computation," quantum information scientist Michele Mosca, who's based at the Institute for Quantum Computing at the University of Waterloo, recently told me. He compared this shift in thinking to when humanity abandoned the flat Earth hypothesis and accepted that our world is round... In a public lecture delivered on Wednesday from the Perimeter Institute for Theoretical Physics, Mosca will describe the "new quantum era" and the promises and challenges it brings. Take, for example, public key cryptography that is used to protect secret communications around the world. When the first true quantum computer powers up, maybe a decade from now, it's predicted that it will be able to crack this type of encryption, no problem. Mosca has been urging governments and corporations to start planning for this. Mosca's talk, which begins at 7 pm E.S.T., will be livestreamed here on Motherboard. Motherboard

Terror groups likely to be first to unleash cyber weapons, says Eugene Kaspersky

Terror groups, not nation states, are the most likely to unleash devastating cyber weapons, according to Eugene Kaspersky, chief executive and co-founder of security firm Kaspersky Lab... Unlike traditional weapons, cyber weapons can be reverse engineered, improved and used on those who developed them, so nation states are unlikely to use them on each other. "But I am really afraid some terrorist group will pay cyber criminals to develop and deploy such weapons on their behalf," he said, noting that some cyber criminals work like mercenaries, providing cyber crime services to anyone who is willing to pay. Kaspersky said cyber weapons are likely to fall in one of three categories: those aimed at causing physical damage, destroying critical data and telecommunications... Critical infrastructure is the most "problematic" and probably the "scariest" area, he said, because cyber criminals are well-resourced and can attack even well-protected networks... According to Kaspersky, the vast majority (384 million) of malicious files detected are aimed at Windows, compared with Android (18 million) and Mac OS (30,000). Computer Weekly; SC Magazine

Canada's National Security Consultation I: Digital Anonymity & Subscriber Identification Revisited... Yet Again

An opinion piece states, "Last month, Public Safety Canada followed through on commitments to review and consult on Canada's national security framework. The process reviews powers that were passed into law following the passage of Bill C-51, Canada's recent controversial anti-terrorism overhaul, as well as invite a broader debate about Canada's security apparatus. While many consultation processes have explored expansions of Canada's national security framework, the current consultation constitutes the first modern day attempt to explore Canada's national security excesses and deficiencies. Unfortunately, the framing of the consultation demonstrates minimal direct regard for privacy and civil liberties because it is primarily preoccupied with defending the existing security framework while introducing a range of additional intrusive powers..." CIPPIC

The Canadian Government's Plan to Sell New Spying Powers to Citizens

Canada's government is taking a forum for citizens to sound off about its spying powers and flipping it into an opportunity to sell Canadians on new and overbroad police capabilities, according to a new watchdog report. In September, Trudeau's Liberals made good on a promise to open a public consultation on national security and released two documents, a green paper and a background document, explaining the issues at stake to Canadians at a time when the government is ramping up its efforts to thwart domestic terrorists. These included hot topics such as the difficulties police face when dealing with encrypted devices and issues surrounding data retention. However, according to the watchdog report, the government's framing of the issues is selling Canadians on a police power that has been shot down again and again by the courts and the public: warrantless access to subscriber information from telecom companies. "Successive federal governments have sought to legislatively enshrine a state power to access subscriber identification data from telecommunications companies," Citizen Lab researcher Christopher Parsons and Canadian Internet Policy and Public Interest Clinic staff lawyer Tamir Israel write in their report. "Such legislative initiatives would have facilitated access to such data on an indiscriminate basis and without any judicial authorization or control." "All of these attempts have proven controversial and each has fallen in the face of public resistance," they continue. In 2014, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that accessing subscriber information without a warrant constitutes an illegal search. In its green paper, the government describes subscriber information as being akin to a phone book. However, subscriber information includes IP addresses, name, home address, phone number, email address, and mobile devices' IMSI number—much more information than is contained in your average phone book. "Our laws on how information can be properly collected and then used in court as evidence were mostly written before the rapid pace of new technology became a consideration," the government's green paper states. Now, police worry about "slow and inconsistent access to basic subscriber information to help identify who was using a particular communications service at a particular time," the report states. Motherboard; Boing Boing

Canadian government re-opens privacy debate on access to telecom subscriber info

The Canadian government has revived a discussion on a particularly controversial privacy topic: how much access law enforcement should have to telecom subscriber information in the name of public safety. In September 2016 the government opened a public consultation on national security, releasing a 'green paper' and background document that details issues, challenges and general questions surrounding national security threats like domestic terrorism. Many topics are covered in the documents, but there's one in particular that may sound familiar to Canadians: the issue of warrantless access to subscriber information from telecom companies. Michael Geist, Canada research chair in internet and e-commerce law at the University of Ottawa, states in an article for The Globe and Mail that the government has been pushing for easier access to carrier data since the early 2000s, with the initiative seeing setbacks such as the defeat of Bill C-30. Lawful access legislation eventually passed in 2014, resembling something near a compromise between consumer and government interests. Warrant-less disclosure of information and government surveillance capabilities for telecoms were nixed, but the legislation also eliminated liability concerns for Internet service providers (ISPs) that voluntarily disclose basic information and gave the police new powers to require access to digital data. The above-mentioned public consultation — started by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale — has put the issue back up for debate, however. “The Public Safety consultation skips over the years of lawful access debate by putting everything back on the table,” writes Geist, “acknowledging that the law was updated less than 24 months ago but suggesting that more change may be needed.” As for the Minister's thoughts on the matter, a spokesperson stated to Motherboard: “While both basic subscriber information (BSI) and a phone book can both be used to identify someone, BSI requires safeguards because some of it can reveal intimate details of a person's activities when linked to other information. That principle has been affirmed by the courts. The government is committed to protecting both Canadians' safety and their rights, including their privacy rights.” The spokesperson added that the green paper was meant to “provoke discussion.” The public consultation remains open until December 1st, 2016 and can be accessed here if you'd like to add your voice to the conversation. MobileSyrup.com

Russian special services to decrypt Internet traffic

The Russian Federal Security Service (FSS, or FSB) together with the country's Ministry of Communications, are introducing of a set of technical procedures that will provide it with unencrypted access to the Internet traffic of all Russian citizens. This move is the implementation of the recently approved Yarovaya Law, (a package of bills which amended a pre-existing counter-terrorism law as well as separate laws regulating counter-terror and public safety measures), which obliged local and global IT companies, operating in Russia, including Google, "Yandex", Mail.ru Group, Whatsapp, Telegram, Viber, Facebook, "VKontakte" to provide encryption keys for their web-servers at the request of the FSB. SC Magazine

Yahoo email scanning: Apple, Google, Microsoft say they'd fight similar requests in court

Yahoo is facing increased scrutiny after being accused of secretly building a custom software program to search all of its customers' incoming emails at the request of the U.S. government (...)Yahoo has neither confirmed nor denied the report. In a statement to Reuters a company spokesperson said, “Yahoo is a law abiding company, and complies with the laws of the United States.” It's still unclear whether the alleged software searched only U.S. citizens' emails, or if Canadian users were also impacted (...)While Microsoft declined to comment on whether it had ever received a similar request, the company said it has “never engaged in the secret scanning of email traffic.” Facebook and Twitter both said they had not received similar requests and noted that if they did they would oppose them in court. Apple, which fought a U.S. government order to hack an iPhone belonging to one of the San Bernardino shooters by creating custom software, maintained that it would fight these types of requests in court. Global News

Facebook Marketplace launches, selling guns, drugs and baby hedgehogs

Facebook's Marketplace has immediately been flooded with people selling guns, drugs and baby hedgehogs. The company has been forced to apologise after its brand new feature – intended to let people sell things in the same way as they would through Ebay or Craigslist – has already been flooded with illegal items, those that break rules, and others that are just odd. As well as offering illegal items like drugs, some users appeared to be selling things that are banned by Facebook's own terms, like snakes and hedgehogs. Independent \(UK\)

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, October 07, 2016 8:49 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 7, 2016 / le 7 octobre 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Yahoo's Government Email Scanner Was Actually a Secret Hacking Tool

The spy tool that the US government ordered Yahoo to install on its systems last year at the behest of the NSA or the FBI was a "poorly designed" and "buggy" piece of malware, according to two sources closely familiar with the matter... Anonymous sources told The Times that the tool was nothing more than a modified version of Yahoo's existing scanning system, which searches all email for malware, spam and images of child pornography. But two sources familiar with the matter told Motherboard that this description is wrong, and that the tool was actually more like a "rootkit," a powerful type of malware that lives deep inside an infected system and gives hackers essentially unfettered access. The rootkit-like tool was found by Yahoo's internal security testing team during one of their checkups, according to a source. "They assumed it was a rootkit installed by hackers," an ex-Yahoo employee, who requested anonymity to discuss sensitive issues, told Motherboard. "If it was just a slight modification to the spam and child pornography filters, the security team wouldn't have noticed and freaked out." "It definitely contained something that did not look like anything Yahoo mail would have installed," the source added. "This backdoor was installed in a way that endangered all of Yahoo users." Motherboard

WildFire rises from the grave as the rebranded Hades Locker

The WildFire Locker ransomware has risen from the dead and rebranded itself using the apropos name of Hades Locker. In late August, WildFire Locker disappeared after the organizations behind NoMoreRansom.org were able to seize control of the ransomware's Command & Control servers. This allowed NoMoreRansom to gain access to many of the decryption keys for the ransomware's victims. Unfortunately, the ransomware developers were not apprehended and it now appears they have been biding their time before releasing a new ransomware. Hades Locker was discovered yesterday by Michael Gillespie when a victim uploaded a copy of the ransomware's ransom note to ID Ransomware. Bleeping Computer; Security Week

FastPOS Malware Adopts Modular Design

FastPOS, a piece of point-of-sale (PoS) malware that emerged in early summer, has recently received a series of updates designed to make it more efficient just in time for the holiday season. When first detailed in June, the malware stood out because of its ability to quickly exfiltrate all of the stolen credit card data. The threat was found to include a custom RAM scraping algorithm for data collection and a keylogger, to send data via HTTP GET requests, and to target only cards that could be used internationally and which don't require a PIN. New samples observed last month revealed that the malware has been used against small-medium businesses, only one month after the command and control (C&C) domain was registered. The malware now uses a modular design with separate components for 32-bit and 64-bit systems, which makes it more difficult to detect, Trend Micro researchers say. Security Week

Cerber Ransomware switches to a Random Extension and Ends Database Processes

Late last week, a new version of Cerber Ransomware was released that included some new features. The most notable change is the switch from the static .Cerber3 extension for encrypted files to a random 4 character extension, the use of a HTA file as the ransom note, and the termination of various database processes before encryption. Bleeping Computer; Security Week

Apple Weakened Safari's Private Browsing in iOS 10

Besides crippling the password system for iTunes backups, it appears that Apple has also weakened Safari's Private Browsing mode, according to Stacey Jury, Digital Forensic Analyst for IntaForensics... Jury explains that, in previous iOS versions, Safari kept this list of Private Browsing "suspended state" URLs inside a Plist file. As soon as the user closed the Private Browsing session, iOS would clear those links from the Plist file. Things changed in iOS 10, released last month. Jury says that Safari started using a database to store information on the Private Browsing "suspended state"

URLs. The IntaForensics expert says that, while Apple does its due diligence and removes the "suspended state" URLs from the database, it does not overwrite the DB entries with random data, as a precautionary safety measure. This allows an attacker with access to the device to use forensics or database recovery tools to salvage the deleted database entries. This would have been technically impossible if Safari continued to use Plist files. Softpedia

Mobile App Collusion Can Bypass Native Android Security

Android's native security mechanisms, most notably application sandboxing, secure devices against threats from one app at a time. Multiple apps however, can collude in different ways and bypass these protections. Researchers on Wednesday at the 26th Virus Bulletin International Conference brought this threat from the theoretical to the practical. They exposed a number of apps that use malicious versions of the MoPlus SDK to work in concert and run up premium SMS charges, steal personal data stored on mobile devices and even synchronize the execution of payloads. Threat Post

X.Org Library Flaws Allow Privilege Escalation, DoS Attacks

X.Org developers released patches and updates to address over a dozen vulnerabilities found in several client libraries. The flaws can be exploited by local or remote attackers to cause a denial-of-service (DoS) condition or escalate privileges. X.Org is a popular open source implementation of the X Windows System (also known as X11, X or X-Windows), the graphical windowing system used by Unix and Linux operating systems. The X.Org (Xorg) libraries provide the routines used within X-Windows applications. Tobias Stoeckmann of the OpenBSD Project discovered that many of these client libraries don't sufficiently validate the responses they receive from servers, which introduces vulnerabilities that could be exploited by local or remote attackers. Security Week

Web-Based Keylogger Used to Steal Credit Card Data from Popular Sites

Popular ecommerce sites have been infected with web-based keyloggers that are being used to steal credit card data as it's entered into online checkout forms. More than 100 compromised sites have been identified, but the number could be in the thousands, researchers said. RiskIQ, in collaboration with ClearSky, published their findings (PDF) Thursday, and said some of the ecommerce sites impacted include Everlast Worldwide, the Australian ecommerce site for apparel giant Guess and Fidelity Investments' FidelityStore, a site maintained by a third-party firm SwervePoint. Threat Post; Security Week

US NIST Warns Security 'Fatigue' is Putting Users at Risk

A reluctance to deal with computer security is putting users in danger online as they take unnecessary risks due to general fatigue with things like passwords, according to a new NIST study. The US standards body uncovered feelings of resignation, loss of control, fatalism, risk minimization, and decision avoidance in its interviews with a range of ordinary computer users aged between 20 and 60-years-old. The research team found respondents have grown tired of being on constant alert for online threats and of trying to understand the nuances of online security issues. Infosecurity Magazine; SC Magazine

Google Patches DoS Vulnerability in Android

One of the 78 vulnerabilities that the October 2016 Android Security Bulletin released this week has patched was a flaw in the GPS component that could be exploited remotely to cause denial of service on vulnerable devices. The issue would be exploited by a Man-in-the-Middle (MitM) attacker capable of manipulating assisted GPS/GNSS data provided by Qualcomm, which could result in the device crashing or rebooting. The bug is said to affect the open source code in AOSP, as well as proprietary code in a Java XTRA downloader provided by Qualcomm. Security Week

VMware Patches Directory Traversal Flaw in Horizon View

VMware has released updates for the Windows versions of its Horizon View product to address an important vulnerability that could lead to information disclosure. Security researcher Mike Arnold, known online as "BrukOut," discovered that the desktop virtualization product is plagued by a flaw that could allow a directory traversal on the Horizon View Connection Server. A remote attacker can exploit this weakness to gain access to some potentially sensitive information... The security hole affects VMware Horizon View versions 5.x, 6.x and 7.x for Windows. The issue has been addressed with the release of versions 7.0.1, 6.2.3 and 5.3.7. VMware has rated the vulnerability "important," while ZDI has assigned it a CVSS score of 5.8, which puts it in the "medium" severity category. Security Week

Free Tool Protects Mac Users from Webcam Surveillance

Hijacking a user's webcam is one of the more dastardly tactics used for surveillance. In most cases the attacker can use a number of different webcam-aware malware samples to quietly turn on and record audio and video from the target's machine. Doing so, however, also turns on the embedded LED light that signals the webcam has been activated, a clear hint to the user that something could be amiss if this behavior is unexpected. In recent months, malware samples on the Mac side have emerged that allow for the monitoring of user-initiated audio and video sessions over apps such as Skype, FaceTime or Google Hangouts. By hitching a ride on these sessions, not only is the malware spying on, for example, a sensitive conversation between business partners or friends, but it's doing so without the need for stealth—or mysteriously turning on the LED indicator. On Thursday at Virus Bulletin, prolific Mac security expert and Synack director of research Patrick Wardle released a tool called OverSight that monitors for the internal macOS processes that manage the webcam and microphone, and sparks an alert to the user when one of these processes accesses these services. The user can then make a choice to either allow or block the session to continue. Threat Post; Motherboard; ZDNet; Security Week

This breakthrough number-changing credit card may help eliminate fraud

Imagine a world without credit card fraud. Impossible, you might say. And you'd probably be right. But any effort to rein it in helps. Every time your bank card is cloned or skimmed from an ATM or by scammer, or stolen from a website or a phishing attack, your credit card is wide open for a thief to use until you catch on and cancel it. That might soon be a thing of the past, thanks to one technological advancement: A credit card with a rotating security code. ZDNet

Cloud Security Alliance lays out security guidelines for IoT development

The Cloud Security Alliance (CSA) Internet of Things (IoT) working group has published a report to guide designers and developers on basic security measures it believes must be incorporated throughout the development process. The report, Future-proofing the Connected World: 13 Steps to Developing Secure IoT Products, says that because IoT is broad-ranging and developing at great pace, identifying controls that can be applied against IoT products is difficult, noting its main reason for compiling the report is to give designers and developers a starting point to work from. ZDNet

DHS official: Half of U.S. states have sought help to thwart election hackers

Hacking threats have prompted 25 states so far to seek out the Obama administration's help in assessing vulnerabilities and fending off attacks to their voting systems headed into Election Day, a Department of Homeland Security official told POLITICO on Wednesday. DHS won't name the specific states that have reached out for federal aid — that's up to each individual state to confirm, the agency said. But DHS has been providing a running total on the overall number of states. Last Friday, a department official said that 21 states had expressed an interest in its vulnerability scanning services. Politico

U.S. stays with controversial e-voting, but Canada still shy

At the best of times U.S. elections are heated, and these aren't necessarily the best of times. We've already seen the discovery of data breaches at the Democratic party and candidate Hillary Clinton. This week one technology writer warned that the November U.S. presidential election "can be rigged and sabotaged, and we might never even know it happened." He was referring to the use in 10 U.S. states of touch screen voting machines that don't have paper backups, which some experts worry are vulnerable to malware. For these and other reasons Canadian electoral officials are still cautious about adopting electronic voting here. Some municipalities are using machine-readable paper voting systems, but touch screen or online voting in federal and provincial elections is still taboo. "I have no plans to introduce online voting for 2019," Marc Mayrand, Canada's chief electoral officer told Parliament's special committee on electoral reform in July... "We have to be careful. We also need to look at security. We want to preserve certain characteristics of the vote: confidentiality, secrecy, reliability, and integrity. When we start looking at moving online, I would point out the big difference currently in our system compared to any other services you get online: the risk of online services currently is the provider's. If you go online at a bank, you use your MasterCard, and somebody misuses it or accesses your account, the provider will cover that. That's one aspect that does not exist in the voting process." IT World Canada

EFF: NSA's Support of Encryption 'Disingenuous'

The National Security Agency came out in support of encryption again Wednesday, but privacy advocates were quick to contest the agency's stance, criticizing it for having a different definition of the term than others. Glenn Gerstell, general counsel for the NSA, stressed that the agency believes in strong encryption multiple times during a panel, "Privacy vs. Security: Beyond the Zero-Sum Game," at Cambridge Cyber Summit here at MIT, on Wednesday. Another panelist, Cindy Cohn, executive director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, took offense and said that when the NSA uses the word encryption, it should really place an asterisk at the end. "I think there should be an asterisk most of the time. I've been in meetings with people from the NSA and FBI and when they say we support strong encryption... what they really mean is strong encryption that only they have access to," Cohn said. Threat Post

We're not going to beat cybercrime in our lifetime says ex-FBI cyber chief

A former director of the FBI's crime and cybercrime response unit has warned that the problems of hacking and cybercrime will not be solved in our lifetimes, but we that we owe it to future generations to avoid completely mismanaging the issue to make it worse to deal with in years to come. Shawn Henry spent 24 years at the FBI where he rose through the ranks to oversee all of the Bureau's criminal and cyber investigations across the globe before retiring from the organisation in 2012. "We're not going to solve it, folks, not in our lifetime, but we have to constantly manage it," he said, speaking at IP EXPO 2016 in his post-FBI role as president of cybersecurity firm CrowdStrike... Rather than an organisation sitting back and waiting to see if it's attacked, Henry argues that cybersecurity professionals should be constantly examining their own network looking for indicators of attack because "If we're not out constantly hunting for the adversaries they're hunting us". ZDNet

Exclusive: The Aspen Institute's Walter Isaacson Interviews Admiral Michael S. Rogers from the Cambridge Cyber Summit Today

Following is the unofficial transcript of an EXCLUSIVE interview with Admiral Michael S. Rogers, Commander, U.S. Cyber Command; Director, National Security Agency; Chief, Central Security Service, live from the Cambridge Cyber Summit hosted by The Aspen Institute, CNBC and MIT on Wednesday, October 5th. CNBC

Arrested NSA Contractor 'Doesn't Fit the Profile'

The FBI has arrested NSA contractor Harold Martin, who is suspected of stealing highly classified source code developed by the agency to hack the computer networks of adversaries like Russia, China, Iran and North Korea. Apparently though, the suspect did not fit any of the usual profiles of an "insider threat."... One administration official told the New York Times that he didn't fit the assumed profile, and that he was "not like a Snowden or someone who believes that what we were doing was illegal and wanted to publicize that." A Navy veteran working on a Ph.D. in computer science, Martin may have simply been collecting files for his own edification—much like other senior officials across Washington take classified documents home with them. It's a known shadow practice, but not a malicious one. Infosecurity Magazine; Daily Beast

ATM Malware Gang Slowly Dismantled by British Police

London Police is slowly dismantling an ATM malware gang operating out of Romania, which British authorities say is responsible for stealing £1.6 million ($2 million) from UK cash machines. The gang's biggest heist, which was also the one that drew the attention of UK authorities, took place over the 2014 May Bank Holiday weekend when the crooks stole £1.3 million ($1.65 million). The group hit 51 ATMs across Bognor Regis, Brighton, Liverpool, London, and Portsmouth. The gang operated by infecting the cash machines with malware that allowed them to withdraw large sums of money. Police say the malware had a particular feature that allowed it to delete itself to hide its tracks... Police got lucky when the group was careless, and one member was recorded by a hidden ATM surveillance camera. Softpedia

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 11, 2016 8:42 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 11, 2016 / le 11 octobre 2016

Online Media / Médias en ligne

IAEA chief: Nuclear power plant was disrupted by cyber attack

A nuclear power plant became the target of a disruptive cyber attack two to three years ago, and there is a serious threat of militant attacks on such plants, the head of the United Nations nuclear watchdog said on Monday. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) Director Yukiya Amano also cited a case in which an individual tried to smuggle a small amount of highly enriched uranium about four years ago that could have been used to build a so-called "dirty bomb"... "This issue of cyber attacks on nuclear-related facilities or activities should be taken very seriously. We never know if we know everything or if it's the tip of the iceberg." Amano declined to give details of either incident, but said the cyber attack had caused "some disruption" at the plant, although it did not prove to be very serious since the plant did not have to shut down its operations. He said he had not previously discussed the cyber attack in public... He said the attack was disruptive, not destructive, a term used to refer to incidents like the 2014 attack that destroyed data on computers of Sony Corp's Sony Pictures Entertainment and rendered some of its internal networks inoperable. Concerns about cyber attacks on nuclear sites have grown in recent years after the emergence of computer malware that can be used to attack industrial controls. Reuters; ZDNet; SecurityWeek

2015 TV5Monde Hack Almost Destroyed TV Station's Infrastructure

A cyber-attack that took place on April 8, 2015, could have whipped out TV5Monde's entire infrastructure, according to Yves Bigot, TV5Monde General Director. Eighteen months after the attack took place, Bigot revealed new details about the incident to fellow British TV station, the BBC. Bigot says the attackers compromised the TV station in January 2015, but they lay hidden and collected data about the network's mode of operation and internal structure. He says the attackers collected data about how the TV station operates and their hardware equipment. They then created malware specific to each action they wanted to take, and they deployed it all at once, on the night TV5Monde had launched its twelfth TV channel. When the malware sprung into action, it started deleting data and sabotaging critical hardware, such as the encoder systems used to transmit programs to TV-broadcasting satellites. In a matter of minutes, eleven of twelve TV5Monde channels had gone off-air, with engineers scrambling to discover the problem. The attack would have been much worse, with much more grave consequences if a technician wouldn't have identified the malware-infected equipment and disconnected it from the company's network, isolating the attack. Softpedia

GE Machine Monitoring System Plagued by Serious Flaw

A serious vulnerability found in one of GE's Bently Nevada condition and vibration monitoring products can be exploited by remote attackers to gain unauthorized access to affected devices, ICS-CERT warned on Thursday. The vulnerability, tracked as CVE-2016-5788 and assigned a CVSS v3 score of 10, affects the serial and USB versions of GE Bently Nevada 3500/22M, a machine monitoring system used around the world in the energy and chemical sectors. The security hole is caused by the existence of several open ports on the affected device. The open ports allow a remote attacker to gain unauthorized access to the system with elevated privileges. While there is no evidence that the vulnerability has been exploited for malicious purposes, ICS-CERT warned that even an attacker with low skill can exploit it. SecurityWeek

Cisco Warns of Critical Flaws in Nexus Switches

Cisco Systems released several critical software patches this week for its Nexus 7000-series switches and its NX-OS software. The vulnerabilities can allow remote access to systems, enabling a hacker to execute code or commands on targeted devices. According to Wednesday's Cisco Security Advisory, both the Nexus 7000 and 7700 series switches are susceptible to overlay transport virtualization buffer overflow flaws. This bug (CVE-2016-1453) is due to "incomplete input validation performed on the size of overlay transport virtualization packet header parameters," Cisco said. Exploiting this vulnerability can result in a buffer overflow and open the door for an attacker to execute arbitrary code and obtain full control of the system, Cisco said. Cisco has released a software update and workaround instructions to mitigate the vulnerability. Threat Post

RIG Exploit Kit Attacks Spike in September

The RIG toolkit became the most active exploit kit (EK) in September, accounting for nearly one quarter of EK attacks during the timeframe, a new report from Symantec reveals. The security firm's recent intelligence report for September 2016 shows that the RIG EK grew by more than 21 percentage points to grab 24.6% of the EK market, compared to the only 3.2% share it enjoyed in August 2016. Neutrino, which was the most active EK since Angler's death in June, dropped from 13.9% to 12% market share over the course of the last month, Symantec reveals. In late September, RIG was observed replacing Neutrino in massive malvertising campaigns, which suggested that the threat landscape was changing once again, after being heavily shaken in May-June, when both Nuclear and Angler EKs disappeared. In early October, security researcher Kafeine revealed that Neutrino's operators decided to close shop, while those behind RIG started adding more advanced features to their malicious software. Although RIG grew during September, Symantec researchers say that the number of web attacks blocked during the month decreased to 392 thousand per day, most probably a result of the decline in major toolkit activity seen over the last few months. New malware variants were on the rise again during last month, reaching 50.1 million, a record level for the past 12 months. According to Symantec, the increase was most likely determined by a surge in click-fraud activity that began in August surrounding the Trojan.Kovter family of threats. September was also the third month in a row to register an increase in email malware rate, which has reached one in 113 emails, the highest rate seen since January. SecurityWeek

DXXD Ransomware Shows Ransom Note Using Windows Legal Notice Screen

A new ransomware that goes by the name of DXXD uses the Windows Legal Notice screen to show a ransom note even before the user logs on his or her computer. The Windows Legal Notice screen is an intermediary screen that appears before the Windows login form and, as its name hints, it's there for the purpose of showing various types of legal notices and other messages before a user can use the PC. This is the first time a ransomware author has used the Legal Notice screen to show a ransom note, but won't be the last. "A very efficient way of delivering a ransom note" While users can dismiss the notice by pressing the "OK" button, the screen does its job and gets the user's attention. Users who encounter these screens and then log on their computers will find some of their files encrypted by the DXXD ransomware, a new threat that appeared towards the end of September. Softpedia; Bleeping Computer

Facebook DM Spam Campaign Targets French Users with Eko Malware

The campaign consists in users receiving a message from one of their friends, asking them if they are the person in a video. The link purports to be a YouTube video uploaded online. The message is very well engineered to use both the receiver's name and photo for the spam link's preview. Users who follow the link are tricked to install a Chrome browser extension to view the video. The extension hides the Eko malware. According to reports in French local media, including the Le Monde newspaper, this extension, which uses different names, injects ads in the pages users visit, but can also collect data such as passwords and browser history. Softpedia

New JavaScript Malware Shuts Down Your PC If You Terminate Its Process

Researchers from Kahu Security have come across a new malware variant, coded in JavaScript, which hijacks your browser's homepage but will also shut down your computer if you detect the intrusion and attempt to terminate its process. Variants of this malware have been spotted online since 2014, but not as aggressive in their behavior as this latest variation. The malware arrives on user PCs as a malicious file attachment via email spam, and despite being a JavaScript file, it is not executed inside a browser, but via the Windows Script Host, the Windows built-in JavaScript executor. Softpedia

Ransomware became main threat to Android users in 1H 2016

The Android SLocker ransomware family accounts for 16 percent of mobile malware in the UK. Recent research conducted by Bitdefender shows that ransomware became the main danger to Android users in the first half of 2016. Bitdefender's Android statistics also found that SLocker ransomware accounts for almost half of all mobile malware in Denmark, a quarter in Germany, 21.54 percent in Australia and 16 percent in the US. On Android, ransomware has been caught attempting to lock devices and has become gradually harder to remove from one iteration to the next. SC Magazine

StrongPity APT Covets Secrets of Crypto Users

APT groups covet secrets, and one in particular has chosen to target users intent on protecting theirs. The group is known as StrongPity, and it's been a characteristic APT outfit using its share of zero days and modular attack tools to infiltrate victims and conduct espionage. This summer, however, the group took a left turn and began using watering hole attacks to steer its targets toward sites hosting malware-laced versions of WinRAR and TrueCrypt, two free encryption utilities long popular with security and privacy conscious users. The group was especially active during the summer, Kaspersky Lab researcher Kurt Baumgartner said, hitting many victims in Belgium and Italy primarily, as well as others in Europe, North Africa and the Middle East. Kaspersky Lab released a report today chronicling StrongPity's activities this summer. Threat Post; Softpedia; SecurityWeek

Malware Increasingly Abusing WMI for Evasion

Malware is increasingly using Windows Management Instrumentation (WMI) queries to evade detection and to determine the environment it is running in, FireEye researchers warn. Leveraging WMI to evade detection has been seen before, and Mandiant revealed last year that advanced persistent threat (APT) groups were using WMI and PowerShell to move laterally, harvest credentials, and search for useful information within Windows environments. Now, FireEye is offering more specific examples of how WMI queries can be leveraged for nefarious purposes. Security Week

Malware exploits weakness in Windows Troubleshooting Platform

You'd hope that a mechanism for troubleshooting problems of operating system isn't an opening for a cyber attack. However, that's exactly what has happened to Windows Troubleshooting Platform (WTP). According to security vendor Proofpoint, attackers have found a way to leverage WTP to socially engineer email recipients into executing malware by an attachment. IT World Canada; Security Week

When DVRs Attack: A Post IoT Attack Analysis

Researchers examining the aftermath of last month's massive distributed denial-of-service attack against KrebsOnSecurity.com and French hosting giant OVH have identified key flaws that contributed significantly in those attacks and have unearthed new details on how the assaults were carried out. Security firm Flashpoint says it has identified the manufacturer of the DVRs and IP-based cameras leveraged in the attack. It also says it has discovered a new trivial web authentication bypass vulnerability in the 500,000 devices used in the DDoS attacks. Threat Post

Apache OpenOffice 4.1.3 Brings Enhancements to the Build Tools, Security Fixes

The Apache Software Foundation released today, October 10, 2016, the third maintenance update to the OpenOffice 4.1 stable series of the open-source and cross-platform office suite. Apache OpenOffice 4.1.3 is now the latest and most advanced build of the powerful office suite, bringing various under-the-hood improvements and enhancements to keep the software project reliable and stable. The most important one is a fix for a security issue that could have allowed remote attackers to cause a denial of service (system crash) or execute malicious code via crafted MetaActions in ODP and OTP files. Softpedia

New Windows 10 Cumulative Updates, Security Patches to Launch Today

Microsoft will kick off the Patch Tuesday rollout in a few hours, and Windows 10 systems are expected to get its own batch of fixes, including brand new cumulative updates for the original version released in July 2015 (10240), November Update (1511), and Anniversary Update (1607). Just like usual, cumulative updates are particularly important for Windows 10 users because they bring computers completely up-to-date once they are installed, but it's no secret either that plenty of them actually came with bugs and caused trouble on PCs. Softpedia

US Man Arrested for Stealing Bitcoin from Dark Web Users

The US Department of Justice (DoJ) has pressed official charges against a man named Michael Richo, 32, of Wallingford, Connecticut, for stealing Bitcoin using fake login pages from users of Dark Web marketplaces. According to an FBI affidavit, between November 2013 and October 2014, the suspect collected over 10,000 login credentials for several Dark Web marketplaces, which allowed him to log into the victim's accounts and transfer their Bitcoin to his own wallet. Richo held these funds in a Bitcoin wallet hosted on the Local Bitcoins service. Whenever he needed cash, he would convert the stolen Bitcoin into dollars and deposit various sums in his Bank of America account or Green Dot prepaid debit cards, or withdraw money via Western Union or MoneyGram transfers. Softpedia

The FBI Needs Access to Another iPhone

The FBI could be heading for another legal showdown with Apple over gaining access to the iPhone of a dead terror suspect, after admitting it has a device belonging to Dahir Adan, who stabbed 10 people in a Minnesota mall in September. FBI special agent Rich Thornton told reporters at a press conference late last week that the Feds have the device and that it's locked with a passcode, but didn't reveal what model it is. That will determine what options are open to investigators. If it's running iOS 8 and above, for example, it will be locked and encrypted so that even Apple can't help. Brute forcing the code is also unlikely to work because an auto-erase function will wipe all data after 10 incorrect attempts... If the Feds decide to pursue Apple again we could be in for a repeat of the standoff that occurred at the start of the year after investigators tried to force Apple to build a backdoor in order to help them access the phone of deceased San Bernardino shooter Syed Farook. Infosecurity Magazine

FBI Hacked Computers in Australia as Part of Global Child Porn Sting

In early 2015, the FBI hacked thousands of computers across the world, based on a single, arguably illegal, warrant. Now, Motherboard has learned that as part of the same operation, the FBI also hacked computers in Australia, highlighting how law enforcement agencies are increasingly using malware to remotely search computers outside of their jurisdiction. The case, codenamed Operation Pacifier, revolves around the FBI's investigation into one of the largest ever dark web child pornography sites, called Playpen. When the FBI seized the site in 2015, instead of shutting it down, the agency briefly ran Playpen from a government server in order to deploy a network investigative technique (NIT)—the agency's term for a piece of malware—in an attempt to identify its visitors. The agency's malware used a Tor Browser exploit, and then grabbed a suspected Playpen user's IP address, MAC address, and other technical information. As well as obtaining over 1,000 US IP addresses, and distributing much of this information throughout the FBI and to other US-based law enforcement agencies, the FBI also gave details on suspects overseas to foreign agencies. Motherboard

Controversial snooping technology 'used by at least seven police forces'

Controversial surveillance technology that indiscriminately harvests information from mobile phones is being used by at least seven police forces across the country, a far larger number than previously known, according to police documents. The hardware, known as an IMSI catcher, tricks mobile phone handsets across an area of several miles into connecting to them by impersonating cellphone towers, and can be used to pinpoint phone owners' locations or intercept phone calls and text messages. The Metropolitan police were previously known to have purchased IMSI (international mobile subscriber identity) technology. However, documents obtained by the Bristol Cable, a citizen's media cooperative, indicate that at least six other police forces have bought the same hardware, also referred to as CCDC (covert communications data capture). Guardian UK

US Government Blames Russia for Recent Hacks, Fails to Provide Any Evidence

A joint statement from the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) accuses the Russian government of recent attacks on US voter registration systems, but also the DNC and DCCC hacks. The statement, published late Friday afternoon, October 7, cites an investigation carried out by the US Intelligence Community (USIC), who "is confident" that the Russian government is behind the attacks. USIC says the recent Democratic National Committee (DNC) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) hacks and subsequent leaks are classic techniques used by the Russian government to sway public opinion. "Such activity is not new to Moscow - the Russians have used similar tactics and techniques across Europe and Eurasia, for example, to influence public opinion there," the statement reads. "We believe, based on the scope and sensitivity of these efforts, that only Russia's senior-most officials could have authorized these activities." Softpedia; ZDNet; Security Week; Infosecurity Magazine

US required to declassify Yahoo spying order, say experts

The Obama administration "must declassify" a secret court order that forced Yahoo to scan the emails of its customers' emails as part of a surveillance program. The order, first disclosed by Reuters last week, directed the company "to siphon off messages containing the character string the spies sought and store them for remote retrieval" by the intelligence community. But questions remain over exactly how the intelligence community compelled the web giant to carry out the classified order -- specifically if Yahoo was forced to rewrite software at the behest of the order, or use an existing system designed to filter spam, as reported by The New York Times. California-based rights group the Electronic Frontier Foundation said in a blog post that provisions passed by Congress in the wake of the Edward Snowden revelations "require" the government to review the order for potential public release. Ordinarily, secret orders from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which authorizes the government's surveillance requests, are never released. But Congress last year passed provisions in the Freedom Act, which replaces parts of the expired Patriot Act, after the government was found to have widely interpreted the law in secret to carry out mass surveillance. "If the reports about the Yahoo order are accurate -- including requiring the company to custom build new software to accomplish the scanning -- it's hard to imagine a better candidate for declassification and disclosure under Section 402," said Aaron Mackey, a legal fellow at the EFF. ZDNet

Turkey Blocks Dropbox, OneDrive & Google Drive to Hide Recent RedHack Data Dump

Turkey has blocked access to Dropbox, Microsoft OneDrive, and GitHub in order to prevent its citizens from accessing a series of controversial files dumped online by the RedHack hacking crew. The block was put in motion on Saturday, October 8, and initially targeted Dropbox, OneDrive, and Google Drive. Officials removed Google Drive from the list today after Google complied with a takedown notice from the government and removed the RedHack data from their servers. Softpedia

Data retention supported by two-thirds of Australians: ANU

A poll by the Australian National University (ANU) has found that over two-thirds of respondents support the federal government's telecommunications data retention laws for the purpose of protecting national security. The Attitudes to National Security: Balancing Safety and Privacy -- ANU poll July 2016 [PDF], conducted via a random phone survey of 1,200 individuals between June and July, found that 67 percent thought the retention of communications metadata is "justified as part of the effort to combat terrorism and protect national security". In addition, almost 70 percent approve of data retention for counter-terrorism purposes. ZDNet

Singapore urges need to thwart cyberattacks with coordinated local, global efforts

The Singapore government has underscored the need to safeguard critical infrastructures and drive the necessary ecosystem to safeguard the nation's cyberspace, including pushing ahead with plans to restrict internet access among its employees... Lee pointed to the December 2015 attack on Ukraine's power grid and and this year's cyber theft involving Bangladesh Bank, which lost US$81 million. He added that the Singapore government, too, had been a target and had experienced phishing and malware attacks, as well as the defacement of its websites. Government systems also had been compromised and the financial sector had suffered DDoS attacks, he said. The increased risks, particularly the potential for cyberattacks to bring down critical infrastructures, prompted the Singapore government to set up a separate body--Cyber Security Agency (CSA)--last year to oversee the nation's cybersecurity efforts. It also kicked off a year-long consultation with more than 50 stakeholders, including government agencies, professional groups, private companies, and academics, to put together a new national cybersecurity strategy, which the prime minister unveiled today. The new plan expanded on previous national cybersecurity efforts and covered four key focus areas, which included beefing up critical infrastructures. creating a safer cyberspace, deepening capabilities in this space, and boosting international collaboration to fight cybersecurity threats. ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, October 24, 2016 8:48 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique October 24, 2016 / le 24 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

How not to launch a cyber-attack

The Obama administration seems to have a penchant for broadcasting its plans to the world before putting them into action. But telling your opponents what your next move will be is a bad idea. Whether in football, the board game Risk or the real world, a strategy should surprise them and keep them off balance. If your adversaries know you are coming, they can react faster, deploy pre-emptive countermeasures and ultimately blunt the impact of whatever it is you plan on doing. Since the Democratic National Committee's email servers were hacked in the lead-up to the Democratic convention and allegations began swirling about Russian President Vladimir Putin's attempts to disrupt the American election through cyber-attacks on American soil, the Obama administration has been vocal about how it plans to deal with the situation. We now know that the U.S. has proposed a proportional counterattack: Central Intelligence Agency Sources reportedly noted that the administration had asked the intelligence agency to prepare a "clandestine" cyberattack that aims to "embarrass" the Russians. Vice-President Joe Biden said on Meet the Press that the U.S. is intent on "sending a message" to Putin. Of course, while the U.S. seems to have lost its strategic advantage here, its actual tactics may still be in the works behind closed doors, assuming it hasn't already initiated some kind of retaliation. But there's no question that it has blown the element of surprise. Postmedia Network (National Post, A8)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Mirai-Fueled IoT Botnet Behind DDoS Attacks on DNS Providers

A botnet of connected things strung together by the Mirai malware is responsible for Friday's distributed denial-of-service attacks against DNS provider Dyn. The DDoS attacks impacted Internet service on the East Coast of the United States, and were responsible for keeping Dyn and a number of its high-profile customers offline during different times during the day. Level 3 Communications, a large service provider located in Colorado, said that it was monitoring the attacks and that it believed 10 percent of the IP-enabled cameras, DVRs, home networking gear and other connected devices compromised by Mirai were involved in Friday's attacks... Level 3 and security company Flashpoint confirmed on Friday that Mirai was behind Friday's attacks, which were still ongoing as of last night. Flashpoint said it is working with law enforcement and other resources to track the source of the attacks. Threat Post; Softpedia; ZDNet; SC Magazine

After massive cyberattack, shoddy smart device security comes back to haunt

Friday morning saw the largest internet blackout in US history. Almost every corner of the web was affected in some way - streaming services like Spotify, social sites like Twitter and Reddit, and news sites like Wired and Vox appeared offline to vast swathes of the eastern seaboard. After suffering three separate distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks, Dyn, the domain name system provider for hundreds of major websites, recovered and the web started to spring back to life... All signs point to a massive botnet utilizing the Internet of Things, powered by malware known as Mirai, which allows the botnet's operator to turn a large number of internet-connected devices -- surveillance cameras, smart home devices, and even baby monitors -- against a single target. In this case, it was Dyn's servers... Dyn later said Saturday in a blog post that the attack was "highly distributed" and involved "tens of millions of IP addresses." ZDNet

Twitter Account Shows Mirai Botnets Using Your Security Camera In Cyber Turf War

In the wake of a major cyber attack that blocked access to popular websites along the East Coast on Friday, security researchers have created a Twitter account that posts live updates of ongoing distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks being launched by massive armies of smart devices compromised by malware known as Mirai. The account, called Mirai Attacks, includes updates showing the IP addresses being targeted by the zombie botnets bearing the malware's digital signature, which currently include over half a million infected Internet of Things devices like security cameras and smart

TVs. The compromised devices were partly blamed for a large attack on Friday that targeted key infrastructure supporting the internet's Domain Name System (DNS), resulting in outages for popular sites including Twitter, Reddit, and Etsy. Motherboard

Serious Dirty Cow Linux Vulnerability Under Attack

A nine-year-old Linux vulnerability that affects most of the major distributions has been recently used in public attacks. The flaw, nicknamed Dirty Cow because it lives in the copy-on-write (COW) feature in Linux, is worrisome because it can give a local attacker root privileges. While the Linux kernel was patched on Wednesday, the major distributions are preparing patches. Red Hat, for example, told Threatpost that it has a temporary mitigation available through the kpatch dynamic kernel patching service that customers can receive through their support contact. Dirty Cow is a privilege escalation vulnerability in copy-on-write, CVE-2016-5195. A race condition exists that allows local users to gain write-access to read-only memory and elevate their privileges to root. Threat Post

Linux Backdoor Doesn't Require Root Privileges

A newly observed Linux backdoor Trojan can perform its nefarious activities without root access, by using the privileges of the current user, Doctor Web security researchers have discovered. Dubbed Linux.BackDoor.FakeFile.1, the malware is being distributed as an archived PDF, Microsoft, or Open Office file, the security researchers say. As soon as it has been launched, the Trojan would save itself to the user's home directory, in the `.gconf/apps/gnome-common/gnome-common` folder... Once installed on a compromised system, the backdoor can execute a multitude of commands: send to the C&C server the quantity of messages transferred during the session; send a list with the contents of the specified folder; send a specified file or a folder with all its contents; delete a directory; delete a file; rename a folder; remove itself; launch a new copy of a process; and close the current session. Other operations supported by the malware include: establish backconnect and run sh; terminate backconnect; open the executable file of the process for writing; close the process file; create a file or folder; write the transmitted values to a file; obtain the names, permissions, sizes, and creation dates of files in the specified directory; set 777 privileges on the specified file. The backdoor can also terminate its own operation upon command. Security Week

Ransomware Reaches the Malware Top 3 for the First Time

According to statistics gathered by Check Point, for the first time ever, ransomware has entered the top 3 of today's most dangerous malware. While everybody knows how dangerous and devastating a ransomware infection can be, the number of affected victims was regularly low, and never large enough to warrant a spot on the top 10, let alone top 3 most dangerous malware families around. Things changed this summer and autumn when ransomware infections seem to have gone out of control. The ransomware family that made it into the top 3 is none other than Locky. Locky's prevalence is no surprise, knowing that it received several updates in the past months and is spread via the massive Necurs botnet, which according to recent statistics gathered by MalwareTech, has over 6 million bots ready to send Locky spam. Softpedia

Malware Authors Adopting the Freemium Model Spells Bad News for the Rest of Us

Malware authors offering free-to-download versions of their malicious software lower the bar and skills needed to enter the cyber-crime scene. The freemium model has long been around in software development. Since the early days of e-commerce, software developers have figured out that by offering a free but feature-limited version of their apps, they could draw in more sales later on, as users got accustomed to their software package and wanted access to more features. This hasn't been the case with malware, where crooks were only interested in making a quick buck, and have always been offering malware under a commercial license only. But the freemium model is slowly making its way among malware developers, with negative consequences on the rest of us. Softpedia

Prestashop Malware Found Logging Admin Credentials

There's a new brand of web malware going around, according to Sucuri security experts, who say this sneaky threat is designed to log admin credentials for e-commerce stores. Currently targeting only Prestashop installations, this new threat was found on a hacked store by Sucuri researcher Conrado Torquato. The researcher says the attacker had gained access to the server and modified the `"/controllers/admin/AdminLoginController.php"` file to include a keylogger. This particular PHP file is responsible for loading the admin panel login page. The extra code the attacker added collected the text admins entered in the login form and sent it via email to the attacker's inbox. Torquato says the attacker collected the site's domain, the login page's URL, and the admin's credentials (in cleartext). Softpedia

Cracking of Sphinx Trojan DGA Opens the Door for Botnet Takedown

Security researchers from Arbor Networks have cracked the Domain Generation Algorithm (DGA) used by the Sphinx banking trojan, which, in theory, would allow security firms and authorities to intervene and take down the botnet. The Sphinx trojan appeared in late August 2015 and is another banking trojan put together using the leaked source code of the infamous Zeus banking trojan. Just like the original Zeus and subsequently created banking trojans, Sphinx infects victims and connects to an online server to retrieve instructions and further modules. Softpedia

Testing MBRFilter against Ransomware that modify the Master Boot Record

Though not very common, Master Boot Record (MBR) encrypting or modifying ransomware can be disastrous when they hit. This is because they will not bother encrypting the actual files and instead encrypt a drive's Master File Table, or MFT, which essentially makes all of a victim's files inaccessible until the ransom is paid. To battle these types of malware, Cisco Talos has released a Windows disk filter driver called MBRFilter that listens for programs trying to modify the Master Boot Record and blocks them. This effectively blocks these types of ransomware from being installed and encrypting the MBR. Bleeping Computer

iOS Apps Leak More User Data Than Android Apps

An analysis of transactions originating from devices protected by Zscaler security products reveals that iOS applications leak private user information in more situations than Android apps. The result of this study shows that the generally accepted theory of iOS being more secure than Android doesn't necessarily apply to the apps running on these two platforms. According to data gathered in the last quarter, Zscaler says it detected around 200,000 transactions from a total of 45 million, where an app has leaked user data. The type of leaked information includes personally identifiable information (PII) (user mobile number and email addresses), geo-location data (latitude and longitude coordinates), and device metadata (IMEI, MAC, IMSI numbers, Network, OS, SIM card information, manufacturer). The biggest offender were iOS apps. Zscaler says it tracked 26 million transactions originating from iOS devices and their apps, of which 0.5 percent leaked user data, for a total of 130,000 operations. The vast majority of the leaked data, 72.3 percent, was related to a user's device information. Additionally, 27.5 percent of transactions leaked geo-location coordinates, while only 0.2 percent of the apps exposed PII data. 70 percent of all the transactions that leaked private user data were traced back to iOS devices in China, and 20 percent to devices in South Africa. The US, the UK, and the Republic of Ireland made up the rest of the top 5. Softpedia

Fake Microsoft Security Essentials Antivirus Out in the Wild

One of the most recent support call scams involves Microsoft's Security Essentials, the free antivirus solution that the company is offering to users of Windows 7 or older Windows versions. The company published a warning today to explain that this fake Microsoft Security Essentials antivirus is actually a scam detected as SupportScam:MSIL/Hicurdismos.A and whose only goal is to convince you that there's something wrong with your PC, only to pay for fake repairs. The first fishy thing about this fake antivirus is that it's aimed at Windows 8 and Windows 10 computers, but the genuine package can only be installed on Windows 7 and earlier - Microsoft Security Essentials was replaced by Windows Defender in Windows 8 and 10, and this is pre-installed on all systems. After installing, the fake package generates a Blue Screen of Death, which once again contains elements proving it's all just a malicious attempt to steal your money. The BSOD displays contact information (e.g. a phone number), whereas Microsoft never includes such details in error information. This way, users who get this fake BSOD are recommended to call the phone number and ask for repairs that are only performed in return for a fee. Softpedia; ZDNet

International mobile data networks still a serious security problem

Documents leaked by Edward Snowden showed that the UK's Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) had supposedly hacked Belgian telecommunications company Belgacom. A presentation at the Ruxcon information security conference in Melbourne on Saturday suggests that it wasn't a difficult job. The short version is that roaming mobile data connections are routed via a shoddy network that's meant to be separate from the internet, but isn't. The long version is, well, here we go... ZDNet

Doubt shaping up as the most sinister hack consequence

What happens when we are forced to doubt the integrity of our data? Our software? Our messages? Doubt, it turns out, can foster all sorts of outcomes. In hacking, doubt may be at its most sinister. It can inject chaos and false reality into any company or organization that is a target. "What do you do when you can't believe the data," Michael Rogers, director of the National Security Agency, said earlier this year after admitting one of his top three fears going forward is that data theft will turn into data manipulation, which leaves data where it rests but with perceived, subtle or substantial changes. "What happens when that same activity [hacking] is used to manipulate data, software or products and we cannot trust the data?" ZDNet

CIA Election AntiCheat Control malware preys on the fear of Voter Fraud

Criminals love to prey on people based on current news topics and there are few topics right now that are bigger than the 2016 United States presidential election. This can be seen in a new malware discovered by MalwareHunterTeam called CIA Election AntiCheat Control - 2016. This computer infection pretends to be a notice from the CIA that requires people to send $50 or their upcoming vote will not count. Bleeping Computer

CIA readies itself for cyber-attack on Russia

The CIA is preparing to launch a cyber-attack against Russia, according to reports from NBC News. It was reported that US intelligence officials said the attack was in retaliation for alleged Russian interference in the upcoming presidential election. Spies have reportedly been tasked with coming up with various options for "wide-ranging 'clandestine' cyber operation designed to harass and "embarrass" the Kremlin leadership. The report says that groundwork has been laid for an attack with targets being selected as well as other preparations. Former intelligence officials said that the CIA had gathered documents that could expose unsavoury tactics by Russian President Vladimir Putin. SC Magazine

US Indicts Russian Hacker Behind Dropbox and LinkedIn Breaches

US authorities have officially indicted Yevgeniy Aleksandrovich Nikulin, 29, a Russian national, for hacking Dropbox, Formspring, and LinkedIn. Nikulin was detained in Prague, the Czech Republic on October 5, following an international arrest warrant issued through Interpol. News of his arrest came out only last week. Authorities are waiting for a Czech court to decide on his extradition to the US. Softpedia; ZDNet

Pentagon to Launch More Bug Bounty Programs

Following the success of the "Hack the Pentagon" program, the U.S. Department of Defense has decided to continue to test its websites and networks for cybersecurity vulnerabilities using crowdsourced experts. The DoD announced on Thursday that it awarded a combined $7 million to HackerOne and Synack for helping the organization's components launch their own bug bounty initiatives. HackerOne will help the DoD run challenges similar to Hack the Pentagon, while Synack will provide assistance for a private program open only to highly vetted researchers. The private program will focus on the Pentagon's sensitive IT assets. The DoD expects the contracts to cover up to 14 challenges in which hundreds of researchers will be rewarded. Security Week

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, October 25, 2016 8:44 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

October 25, 2016 / le 25 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

How home devices are being hijacked to attack the web

The huge cyberattack that crippled the Internet and disabled dozens of websites Friday appeared to be the biggest attack of its kind the world has ever seen. But it may not hold that title for long. What made last week's Internet takedown so effective - and, some would say, sinister - was how the attackers weaponized everyday devices like security cameras, digital video recorders and baby monitors. Taking advantage of the devices' web connections, hackers could infect them with malicious software and use them to paralyze huge portions of the Internet with a barrage of junk data in what is known as a distributed denial of service, or DDoS, attack. For many, the breach was a stark demonstration of just how insecure the Internet remains. To some, it also felt like a call to action. At a time when everything from televisions to refrigerators to kids' toys are being equipped with an Internet connection, experts and legislators said, something ought to be done to ensure the security of these devices. Yet there is little consensus around who should bear that responsibility.

Toronto Star, B7

Design autos to halt cyber attacks, U.S. urges

The U.S. government's highway safety agency says automakers should make cybersecurity part of their product development process by assessing risks and designing protections. Companies also should identify safety critical systems such as engine control computers and limit their exposure to attacks, under best-practice guidelines released Monday by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. The agency also wants automakers to limit access to car owners' personal data. The guidelines aren't requirements but will go into effect after a 30-day public comment period. Postmedia Network (Windsor Star, B1); Reuters (Financial Post); Infosecurity Magazine

Online Media / Médias en ligne

EQAO Confirms Cause of Technical Issues During Online OSSLT Trial

The Education Quality and Accountability Office (EQAO) confirms that the cause of the technical issues that resulted in the cancellation of the October 20 province-wide trial of the online Ontario Secondary School Literacy Test (OSSLT) was an intentional, malicious and sustained Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) attack—a type of cyberattack... An extremely large volume of traffic from a vast set of IP addresses around the globe was targeted at the network hosting the assessment application. The impact of this DDoS, initiated by an unknown entity or entities, was to block legitimate users' (i.e., school boards', schools' and students') access to the EQAO test application. An in-depth and ongoing investigation will lead to recommendations on how to prevent similar incidents in the future. EQAO undertook several successful field and load tests to gauge the system's readiness in the lead-up to the October 20 trial. This final trial was meant to test the system's readiness on a larger scale and, notwithstanding the DDoS attack, EQAO remains confident that assessments can be administered online successfully. EQAO's shift to online assessments mirrors classroom trends that see a greater emphasis on the use of digital technology. EQAO; CBC News; Postmedia Network (North Bay Nugget; Chatham Daily News; London Free Press; Toronto Sun; Ottawa Sun; Hamilton Spectator; Kitchener-Waterloo Record; National Post); Toronto Star

Over 70,000 Canadian credit cards suddenly on sale on dark web: SecTor

Some Canadian organizations like to think they're safer from cyber attack because of the relatively few publicly-reported data breaches here. It's true there are fewer breaches reported in this country. And international figures show reported malware attacks here are lower than in the U.S. But that doesn't mean they don't happen. It's just that they don't get reported. For example, at this week's SecTor security conference in Toronto a Telus Security Solutions consultant said early this year a batch of over 70,000 Canadian credit card numbers popped up for sale on the darknet. So far no organization has announced a theft. Milind Bhargava made the revelation as part of a presentation he and another Telus security investigator did on how much personal information on Canadians was available on the darknet. His division regularly monitors credit card sales sites for corporate customers, he said. It's not hard to identify Canadian credit and debit cards – the first six digits of every card identifies the bank and type of card. In the early months of this year "suddenly we saw 70,000-plus cards from the same province," he said. "Multiple banks, but all from the same province. We have never seen so many from the same province." He wouldn't identify the province or the). The card data, with expiry dates ranging from this year to 2020, were being sold for between forty cents and $3 each. IT World Canada

China electronics firm to recall some U.S. products after hacking attack

China's Hangzhou Xiongmai Technology Co Ltd said it will recall some of its products sold in the United States after it was identified by security researchers as having made parts for devices that were targeted in a major hacking attack on Friday. Hackers unleashed a complex attack on the internet through common devices like webcams and digital recorders and cut access to some of the world's best known websites, a stunning breach of global internet stability. The electronics components firm, which makes parts for surveillance cameras, said in a statement on its official microblog that it would recall some of its earlier products sold in the United States, strengthen password functions and send users a patch for products made before April last year. Globe and Mail; Hacker News; Softpedia; Associated Press (Cape Breton Post; Guardian; Telegram); Agence QMI (Journal de Montréal; Journal de Québec); Threat Post

Locky Adds Support for a New "ST" Extension

Security researcher MalwareHunterTeam tells Softpedia that the infamous Locky ransomware has returned today with a new spam campaign that's spreading a new version of the ransomware. Last week, Microsoft's Malware Protection Center had revealed that the group behind Locky had reduced its spam efforts and was testing a new distribution method that relied on small spam campaigns spreading booby-trapped LNK (shortcut) files. Over the weekend, Locky's creators have returned to their old tricks, and are in the midst of a massive spam campaign that spread zipped HTA, WSF, and JS files, which are Locky's classic infection methods. An analysis of the email lures used for this spam campaign is available via My Online Security. Softpedia; Bleeping Computer

Rowhammer Attack Can Now Root Android Devices

Researchers have discovered a method to use the Rowhammer RAM attack for rooting Android devices, and can even be combined with existing Android vulnerabilities such as Bandroid and Stagefright. For the past two years, since researchers discovered the attack, the term Rowhammer has been used to describe a procedure through which attackers launch read & write operations at a row of memory bits inside a RAM memory card. The repeated read and write operations cause an electromagnetic field to appear, which changes local memory bits from 0 to 1 and vice versa, in a process called bit flipping. In the past, researchers have tested the Rowhammer attack against DDR3 and DDR4 memory cards, weaponized it via JavaScript, took over PCs via Microsoft Edge, and hijacked Linux virtual machines. Softpedia; Threat Post; SC Magazine; Beta News

GM Bot Banking Trojan Can Now Bypass Android 6 Security Defenses

GM Bot, considered by many as the most advanced Android banking trojan known today, has just received a major update, which now allows it to target users of smartphones that run Android 6, aka Marshmallow. Released in October 2015, for a period of time, many thought Android 6 to be impervious to threats like GM Bot and other malware families that rely on the tactic of overlaying fake content on top of other apps. First signs of trouble appeared in May 2016, when Symantec researchers discovered Android malware abusing Android's Accessibility feature to target Android 6, and then in June 2016 when malware began using two other workarounds. Softpedia; SC Magazine

The most common malware, country by country

Microsoft has released an analysis of the extent of malware worldwide and what specific threats are likely to hit each country. There is no one-stop solution for malware when it comes to either consumers or the enterprise, but by tracking what malware is hitting where, security professionals can analyze trends to tailor solutions for users, and staff can remain on top of the game to protect corporate networks they are responsible for. ZD Net

UK Researcher Finds Stupid Simple Method to Bypass PayPal 2FA

UK security researcher Henry Hoggard has found a very simple method of bypassing PayPal's two-factor authentication (2FA) mechanism, allowing an attacker to take over PayPal accounts in less than a minute. The researcher claims to have discovered this method while in a hotel with no telephone signal, and no way to receive the 2FA verification code to his device via SMS. The researcher says the problem was found in the "Try another way" link that appears under the 2FA section of the login screen. PayPal provides this option to PayPal account owners for situations when they can't reach their phone, or they have no signal, as this was the case. In these types of situations, PayPal asks the user to answer his security questions. Hoggard discovered that if the attacker had a proxy server running that can intercept and hold the PayPal server requests, it would allow him to tamper with the HTTP data and trick PayPal into granting him access to the account. All the attacker had to do was to remove the "securityQuestion0" and "securityQuestion1" parameters from the

HTTP request, as seen below. The technical skills needed to carry out such attacks are entry level for any hacker wannabe. Softpedia

St. Jude Faces New Claim Heart Implants are Hackable

St. Jude Medical is facing fresh allegations its heart implant devices are vulnerable to cyberattacks. The claims were introduced by the defense as part of St. Jude's defamation lawsuit against short seller Muddy Waters and security firm MedSec. In a legal filing submitted Monday, experts hired by Muddy Waters and MedSec back their claims that St. Jude's cardiac implants are vulnerable to cyberattacks. The report is from independent security firm Bishop Fox, whose testimony was presented as evidence to the federal court in Minnesota hearing the case. Threat Post; ZD Net

Kaspersky Launches Industrial Control Systems CERT

Kaspersky Lab announced last week the launch of a new global computer emergency response team (CERT) focusing on industrial control systems (ICS). Through the Kaspersky Lab ICS-CERT, the security firm wants to share its knowledge and experience in securing industrial systems and coordinate the exchange of information between stakeholders. The new initiative aims to provide information on the latest threats, vulnerabilities, security incidents, mitigation strategies, incident response, compliance and investigations. Since it's a non-commercial project, the Kaspersky Lab ICS-CERT will offer information and services free of charge. Kaspersky has invited ICS product vendors, government agencies, critical infrastructure operators, and other types of entities to join its initiative. The services offered by the company through its ICS-CERT can help organizations determine if they are compliant with state and industry regulations, learn about vulnerabilities in the software and hardware components they use, conduct a general assessment of their ICS network, perform penetration testing, and analyze malicious files and artifacts collected following an attack. Security Week

CoreOS Patched Against the "Dirty COW" Linux Kernel Vulnerability, Update Now

The development of the security- and container-oriented CoreOS GNU/Linux operating system have updated all three channels of the distribution to patch the OS against the well-known "Dirty COW" Linux kernel vulnerability. CoreOS 1122.3.0 is now the current stable version of the Linux-based operating system, shipping with a fix for the privilege escalation vulnerability in Linux kernel that's fully documented at CVE-2016-5195, as well as a patch for a denial of service (DoS) issue with the systemd init system, documented at CVE-2016-7795. On the other hand, the Beta channel of CoreOS is now at version 1185.2.0, and the Alpha channel at version 1192.2.0, also shipping with the patches mentioned above, but running a more recent kernel from the now deprecated Linux 4.7 branch, build 4.7.3, as CoreOS 1122.3.0 is using Linux kernel 4.7.0. Softpedia

Apple fixes bugs: One flaw let attackers grab iPhones with booby-trapped JPEG

Apple has released the first security updates for iPhone and Mac hardware since launching its private bug-bounty scheme... Unlike Google's habit of publishing rewards for bugs in Chrome, Apple hasn't said whether any of Monday's patches qualified for a payment under its private bug bounty scheme. Still, the fixes highlight the importance of third-party researchers to Apple software security. Apple is attributed to just one of the 12 bugs patched in the iOS 10.1 release. Among these externally-found bugs is one from a researcher from Tencent's KeenLab, which could give an attacker control of an iPhone or iPad by having the user simply view a malicious JPEG. The same bug was patched in macOS Sierra 10.12.1, which was also released on Monday. Google's bug hunters at Project Zero continue to help secure Apple software, with this month's contribution addressing a bug that allowed an application to execute arbitrary code with root privileges. Project Zero also helped plug an issue in iOS' system boot that could allow an attacker in possession of the device to execute arbitrary code in the kernel. ZD Net

Intel, Visa partner on payments encryption for connected devices

A new collaboration between Visa and Intel is aiming to drive better payment security for connected devices. Specifically, the two tech giants want to build secure payments encryption into the hardware layer of chipsets in connected devices. That would mean all future Intel-powered devices will encrypt stored payments data both while at rest and in motion to "provide more secure data transmission." In other words, if a hacker exploits a vulnerability and gains access to a device, any payments data stored on that device will be encrypted and unusable. ZD Net

UK spy agency GCHQ paid NZ firm Endace to power Internet fiber-optic taps

The 2013 Snowden documents revealed UK intelligence agency GCHQ to be tapping into the undersea cables that carry Internet traffic, covertly gathering vast amounts of digital comms data under a surveillance program code-named Tempora — apparently with the help of commercial partners. Now leaked documents obtained by The Intercept confirm GCHQ paid New Zealand-based Endace to create data capture systems to enable it to tap high speed Internet traffic. Tech Crunch

Census outage could have been prevented by turning router on and off again: IBM

Computer giant IBM has conceded the issues surrounding the census website outage could have been avoided if it had turned one of its routers off and on again beforehand. BM's admission came as it provided evidence to a Senate committee inquiry looking at the botched handling of August's census, in which millions of Australians were unable to lodge their census forms online for 40 hours. IBM senior engineer Michael Shallcross told senators one of two routers experienced difficulties when it was rebooted on August 9, the night of the census. The router was rebooted after experiencing a Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) cyber attack from overseas, but then mistakenly gave out information suggesting that census data was being compromised. Mr Shallcross said while engineers simulated the impact of the router being turned off in the lead-up to August 9, they did not manually power the machine down. ABC News; ZD Net

Dropbox and LinkedIn Hacker Most Likely Behind BitMarket.eu Bitcoin Heist

Yevgeniy Nikulin, the Russian national that was recently arrested in the Czech Republic for hacking Dropbox, Formspring, and LinkedIn, might have also stolen around $400,000 from Bitcoin exchange BitMarket.eu, according to new evidence discovered by Microsoft security researcher Tal Be'ery. Softpedia

U.S. vigilante hacker takes over Russian Foreign Ministry site

A self-described patriotic American vigilante hacker named Jester reportedly took over the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs website on Friday in retaliation for alleged Russian cyberattacks on the United States. "Knock it off. You may be able to push around nations around you, but this is America. Nobody is impressed," Jester posted in a somewhat disjointed and threatening letter, reposted here on Twitter, to the Russian government. The note stated he knows they are behind recent attacks on U.S. interests. According to CNNMoney, Jester said he wanted to "poke them in the eye". "I know it's you, even by proxy, and you know it's you. It doesn't matter whether it's you and China, you and North Korea, or you and some random group calling themselves 'New World Hacking' – It's still a pathetic flex..." Jester wrote on Twitter. The Jester has a history of similar attacks. SC Magazine

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Monday, October 31, 2016 8:53 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
October 31, 2016 / le 31 octobre 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

When hackers get into the driver's seat

Less than a week after one of the most massive cyber attacks in U.S. history, federal officials want to ensure hackers won't be able to invade the computers that increasingly control automobiles. Guidelines issued for automakers and developers earlier this week by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration acknowledge that protecting increasingly autonomous cars from cyber attack will be an ongoing battle. "In the constantly changing environment of technology and cybersecurity, no single or static approach is sufficient," NHTSA Administrator Mark Rosekind said in a statement released with the new guidance. "Everyone involved must keep moving, adapting and improving to stay ahead of the bad guys." The NHTSA guidance suggests a layered series of protections that will prevent a vehicle from misbehaving, even when its cyber defences are penetrated. The goal of the guidance is to make sure cyber security is a key part of designing cars in a world where hackers and foreign powers are all hungry to reach into whatever electronic realm they can, for fun, profit or strategic advantage. Washington Post (Winnipeg Free Press) (2016-10-29)

Facebook defends use of clients' biometric data - Facial recognition technology could be abused, privacy advocates say

Facebook Inc.'s software knows your face almost as well as your mother does. And like mom, it isn't asking your permission to do what it wants with old photos. While millions of Internet users embrace the tagging of family and friends in photos, others worried there's something devious afoot are trying block Facebook as well as Google from amassing such data. As advances in facial recognition technology give companies the potential to profit from biometric data, privacy advocates see a pattern in how the world's largest social network and search engine have sold users' viewing histories for advertising. The companies insist that gathering data on what you look like isn't against the law, even without your permission. If judges agree with Facebook and Google, they may be able to kill off lawsuits filed under a unique Illinois law that carries fines of US$1,000 to US$5,000 each time a person's image is used without permission - big enough for a liability headache if claims on behalf of millions of consumers proceed as class actions. A loss by the companies could lead to new restrictions on using biometrics in the U.S., similar to those in Europe and Canada. Facebook declined to comment on its court fight. Google declined to comment on pending litigation. Bloomberg (Vancouver Sun) (2016-10-29)

Canadians in dark over voter data use - Commons committee says it will study whether parties need rules to protect public's privacy

As Parliament considers peering into political parties' collection and use of sensitive personal information about citizens, those parties are busy developing more powerful and sophisticated tools to track voter data. Canada has virtually no rules governing how political parties collect, use and share information about voters they meet on the doorstep, hear from on issues, or observe on social media. In fact, Canadians are largely in the dark about what kinds of information parties collect and how they use it. But a House of Commons committee plans to study whether parties should have some basic rules for collecting - and protecting - private information like political beliefs, financial information, family makeup and contact information from millions of citizens. Daniel Blaikie, the New Democrat MP who suggested the study, said multiple witnesses brought the issue to the Access to Information and Ethics committee during a review of the Privacy Act this year. "Part of (the concern) is just that it is just something where there isn't a lot known," Blaikie said in an interview Thursday. "Witnesses had expressed a lack of knowledge of where exactly (the data) goes," Blaikie said. "So the idea was really just to get a better idea, if there was going to be regulation, where would you put it and how would it work." How much of an appetite Parliament has to debate the issue, however, remains to be seen. All three major parties have a strong interest in keeping secret the specifics of their data operations. Toronto Star, A1 (2016-10-30)

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Microsoft shifts Canadian cloud focus from data sovereignty to data security

For the past few years, Microsoft Corp. has sold Canadian enterprise customers on its ability to keep their cloud-based data in Canada. Now it's trying to sell them on its ability to keep their cloud data safe. With Microsoft operating two new data centres on Canadian soil, data security is supplanting data sovereignty as the focal point of its ongoing push into the cloud market here. At the Microsoft Canada Tech Summit event in Toronto on Thursday, the company repeatedly emphasized its focus on security during a series of presentations highlighting cloud offerings such as Azure, Outlook and Office 365. "Security is not a bolt-on. We don't necessarily sell security as a separate product. It's built into Windows, it's built into Office 365, it's built into Azure and all our products," Takeshi Numoto, Microsoft's global corporate vice-president of cloud and enterprise, told reporters at a media roundtable after the event. Microsoft opened its first Canadian data centres in Toronto and Quebec City earlier this year. The move was welcomed by Canadian enterprises in sectors like finance, government, and healthcare, which must keep customer data within Canada to comply with security and privacy regulations. IT Business (2016-10-28)

Malware from Friday's DDoS attack continues to harass in short bursts

It's still unclear who pulled off Friday's massive internet disruption, but the malware largely responsible for the cyber attack has since assaulted new targets -- possibly including video gamers. Since last Friday, botnets created by the Mirai malware have been launching distributed denial-of-service attacks at seemingly random targets, in short bursts, according to a security researcher who goes by the name MalwareTech. He has tracked Mirai-powered botnets and helped produce a Twitter feed that monitors their DDoS attacks. On Wednesday alone, the feed posted close to 60 attacks, many of them lasting from 30 seconds to over a minute long. Copycat hackers have been taking advantage of the Mirai malware ever since the source code was released on an online forum on Sept. 30. So far, 23 unique command-and-control servers have been connected with Mirai activity, MalwareTech said in messages over Twitter. CSO Online (2016-10-28)

New Annoying Ransomware Forces Victims to Take Online Surveys

Tens of thousands of people all over the world have been hit by malware that locks their files and demands a payment to unlock them, creating a cottage—illegal—industry dedicated to spreading this type of threat. Ransomware, as it's called, is so lucrative that countless different strains have popped up in the last couple of years. Some are really effective ones, and some are just plain weird. Now, someone is making particularly annoying new type of ransomware. Instead of asking infected users for money, it forces them to fill out tedious online surveys. This new ransomware strain is apparently still in development, and hasn't infected anyone yet, according to the blog Bleeping Computer, which first wrote about the ransomware on Thursday, after it was discovered by GData security researcher Karsten Hahn. Motherboard (2016-10-28)

Is online voting really secure?

An editorial states "On Prince Edward Island voters have had the right to cast a secret ballot in a publicly protected private voting booth since 1913. It is the best protection for the freedom of our society. Flash forward to 2016. Voter privacy and protection is a thing of the past. The head of Elections P.E.I., with a sworn duty and responsibility to protect voters, has approved online voting and telephone voting, but is it secure? Elections Canada has banned online voting, calling it unsafe and open to hacking and manipulation. The security and integrity of the vote cannot be guaranteed. Also there is no voter protection of undue influence from other people. The identity of the voter and the pin number cannot be confirmed. The person who actually voted in not known. It is also possible to collect pin numbers in a pool and vote as a block for one choice. Who counts the paper ballots and transposes them to a digital format. If Elections P.E.I. cannot guarantee the integrity of the vote, it should be suspended until such time as it is secure, if not the outcome of this electoral exercise is already in question before the first vote is cast." Charlottetown Guardian (2016-10-28)

Why do people still use email - or at least not secure it?

As the political campaigning south of the border dominates headlines and social media feeds, one seemingly innocuous technology has been at the heart of ongoing scandals: email. First came the controversy over Hillary Clinton's private email servers and the subsequent scrutiny of the contents of her deleted messages. Since then, there's been a steady stream of email hacks, with thousands of Democratic National Committee emails published by WikiLeaks throughout the campaign. These hacked emails, many of which were the result of phishing, feature messages from Clinton, her campaign chair, the campaign's communication director and other prominent members of her team. An email leak over the summer, just before the Democratic National Convention, led to the resignation of DNC chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz. It's enough to make you wonder why they all keep using email, or at the very least, why they haven't taken more security precautions. In a recent op-ed for the New York Times, writer Farhad Manjoo asserts that "email is simply not up to the rigours of modern political and business life." Security vulnerabilities and privacy issues are just the tip of the iceberg. According to a recent report, over 200 billion emails are sent each day. Mixed in with the important messages is a slew of spam, advertisements and other useless information, making email inefficient, as well as overwhelming, for many users. CBC News (2016-10-29)

86-year-old woman on hook for illegal zombie game download

Post-nuclear war, zombie-killing video games are not Christine McMillan's thing. But the 66-year-old from Ontario has been warned she could have to pay up to $5,000 for illegally downloading a game she'd never heard of. She is one of likely tens of thousands of Canadians who have received notices to pay up, whether they are guilty or not... In May, she received two emails forwarded by her internet provider. They were from a private company called Canadian Intellectual Property Rights Enforcement (CANIPRE) claiming she had illegally downloaded Metro 2033, a first-person shooter game where nuclear war survivors have to kill zombies. McMillan's IP address, the string of numbers that identifies each computer communicating over a network, was used to download the game... McMillan called Cogeco, her internet service provider, and discovered the emails were perfectly legal under the federal government's so-called "Notice and Notice" regulations introduced last year under the Copyright Modernization Act. The law requires internet providers to forward copyright infringement notices to customers suspected of illegally downloading content like video games and movies. Customers are identified only through their IP address. The service provider does not disclose any personal information to the copyright enforcers... The owner of CANIPRE told Go Public he gets 400 calls and emails from people on a busy day and "most of them" settle. "Ultimately, we are helping our clients get their educational message out about anti-piracy and theft of content and how it harms them and their rightful marketplace," Barry Logan said... Network security analyst and technology expert Wil Knoll calls it a "dragnet cash grab." "It's preying on people that don't necessarily understand the system or the technology that surrounds it," he said, "and they're willing to pay out of court because they're scared." Knoll says because McMillan lives in an apartment, someone could have accessed her unsecured wireless connection, then downloaded the game using her IP address. He says even secured connections can be hacked. "It's very hard then to correlate, or nearly impossible, to correlate from that IP address to any individual that's inside the house, or to prove it forensically," he said. CBC News

Defending the grid - IoT across the power grid creates new openings for hackers

The month's final theme for National Cyber Security Awareness, building resilience in critical infrastructure, should resonate as a priority for all. If you look at what happened with the Mirai and Dyn attacks, they present the harsh reality that most IoT developers hoped they could avoid. The obvious damage that will continue to come with these attacks range from general frustration to economic losses. But, at the risk of seeming overly paranoid, I am going to agree that these IoT DDoS attacks change the game. In thinking about the wide range of vulnerabilities yet to be exploited, one serious unintended consequence with IoT is that lives are potentially at stake. Whether it's medical devices going offline or electrical grids being compromised, the stakes go beyond frustration and fiscal loss. The electrical grid runs everywhere, and there are a few different ways that it can be compromised. The potential of a physical attack is always ongoing, said Stewart Kantor, CEO of Full Spectrum but there are other risks. "One risk is that the data traffic gets blocked and they can't connect to what's controlling the grid. Another is that somebody gets in and takes control, like Ukraine," Kantor said. CSO Online

No More Ransomware expands beyond Europe

Three months after its launch, No More Ransomware has expanded its reach outside of Europe. This is good news for a project that started off as a collaboration between the Dutch National Police, Europol, Intel Security and Kaspersky Lab. It has now announced 13 new members including Columbia. The main goal of the No More Ransomware project is to provide free tools to help users recover their data. According to its latest press release more than 2,500 people manage to decrypt their data in the first two months. It is estimated that they saved over $1 million between them. This is a good start in taking money from the malware community but far from a major hit. Enterprise Times

No time to drop your guard as data breach costs skyrocket

When BYOD originally took off, security concerns drove companies to take measures to counteract the risks of allowing remote access to company data from employee devices. Many believed they had shut the door to cybercrime. In reality, data breaches have continued to soar. According to research from PwC, showcased in a recent infographic from Swivel Secure, the number of small firms experiencing a data breach jumped by 14 per cent last year – and although in 2014, the average cost of such a breach was £90k, it rose to £190k in 2015. The number of large companies suffering a breach rose 9 per cent over the same period, with average costs per breach increasing from £800k in 2014 to a phenomenal £2.3 million last year. In total, a staggering 90 per cent of large businesses admitted to a data breach, with more than two-thirds having been attacked by an unauthorised outsider in the last year. IT Pro Portal

Botnet Mirai : 500000 objets connectés encore compromis

Vecteur de plusieurs attaques informatiques (DDoS) ces dernières semaines, le botnet Mirai dispose encore d'une emprise sur plus de 500 000 objets connectés dans le monde. Par ailleurs, des variantes commencent à voir le jour. Dans la famille des virus, malwares et consorts qui deviennent populaires, je demande Mirai : le botnet est encore extrêmement actif, à en croire de multiples rapports. Disséqué par des spécialistes récemment (Dr.Web notamment), repéré par plusieurs constructeurs (sur certaines gateways Sierra Wireless par exemple), il continue sa vie, tapi dans l'ombre. Selon un récent rapport d'Arbor Networks, environ 500 000 objets connectés de par le monde sont encore sous contrôle de Mirai. On note une concentration dans certaines zones géographiques comme en Asie notamment (Chine, Macao, Hong-Kong, Vietnam, Taïwan, Thaïlande, Corée du Sud, Indonésie) mais aussi en Amérique du Sud (Brésil) et en Europe (Espagne). L'Informaticien

Camera driven mass DDOS attack used rented botnets

The last month has seen DDOS attacks on various sources on a magnitude no one has ever seen before: in some cases more than a terabit per second of data. This was more than anyone thought possible, but it was all because whoever was responsible, rented some of the most extensive botnet networks, made up of many Internet of Things (IOT) devices. Although it's been suspected that botnet rental was a growing industry in the bowels of the internet, this recent loaning and subsequent attacks have proved to be far more extensive than anyone expected or even thought was viable. Whoever was behind it was clearly well connected and well funded. In each instance of the large-scale DDOS attacks in recent weeks, a network of IOT devices infected with the Mirai malware was largely responsible. The self-spreading malware has hooked its tentacles into many thousands of devices around the world and has proved very effective at helping to take down online services. But in some cases another network known as Bashlight was used too, as well as other less well known botnets. KitGuru

AtomBombing : Windows attaquable par une technique d'injection de code

Toutes les versions de Windows sont affectées par AtomBombing. Cette attaque par injection de code franchit toutes les barrières. Pas de correctif pour ce qui n'est pas une vulnérabilité. AtomBombing est une technique d'injection de code baptisée ainsi par une équipe de chercheurs en sécurité de la société enSilo. Elle affecte toutes les versions de Windows et peut passer inaperçue auprès des solutions de sécurité usuelles. Ce nom AtomBombing ne fait pas référence à un bombardement atomique mais au fait que la technique tire parti d'une fonction de Windows dénommée Atom Tables. Ces tables permettent aux applications de stocker des données, voire de les partager avec d'autres applications. Ce qui est alors troublant est que AtomBombing n'exploite ainsi pas des vulnérabilités de sécurité de Windows mais une fonctionnalité native. Un simple patch ne peut alors pas être publié pour venir corriger le problème. Generation NT

Hacking forum cuts section allegedly linked to DDoS attacks - HackForums.net has shut down its "Server Stress Testing" section

An online hackers' forum has deleted a section that allegedly offered for-pay distributed denial-of-service attacks, following the recent massive internet disruption. HackForums.net will be shutting down the "Server Stress Testing" section, the site's admin Jesse "Omniscient" LaBrocca said in a Friday posting. "I do need to make sure that we continue to exist and given the recent events I think it's more important that the section be permanently shut down," he wrote. The section was designed to let members offer so-called stress testing services for websites as a way to check their resiliency. However, security firms claim Hack Forums was actually promoting DDoS-for-hire services that anyone could use to launch cyber attacks. Hack Forums has been in the news lately following the emergence of Mirai, a malware blamed for a string of recent distributed denial-of-service attacks, including earlier this month that disrupted access to dozens of sites in the U.S. Although it's still unclear who pulled off the attack, the Mirai source code has been publicly available on Hack Forums since Sept. 30, when an anonymous user named "Anna-senpai" posted the code to the site. Computerworld

Ransomware is now among top three most common malware: study

Ransomware has moved into the top three positions in Check Point Software Technologies Ltd.'s index of the most prevalent malware, with the Locky ransomware accounting for 6 percent of all recognized attacks globally during September. The relative presence of ransomware attacks, within the total number of global attacks, increased by 13 percent. In line of recent trends, the number of active malware families remained high, with three new entries making the top ten, including Chanitor, a downloader for malicious payloads, the Blackhole exploit kit, and Nivdort, a multipurpose bot. For the sixth consecutive month HummingBad remained the most common malware used to attack mobile devices. Overall, Conficker was the most prominent family accounting for 14 percent of recognized attacks; second placed, Sality, accounted for 6 percent; and third placed Locky was responsible for 6 percent. In total, the top ten families were responsible for 50 percent of all recognized attacks. Security Asia

Powerful new DDoS attack vector discovered

Corero Network Security has disclosed a significant new zero-day DDoS attack vector observed for the first time against its customers last week. The new technique is an amplification attack, which utilizes the Lightweight Directory Access Protocol (LDAP): one of the most widely used protocols for accessing username and password information in databases like Active Directory, which is integrated in most online servers. While Corero's team of DDoS mitigation experts has so far only observed a handful of short but extremely powerful attacks against their protected customers originating from this vector, the technique has potential to inflict significant damage by leveraging an amplification factor seen at a peak of as much as 55x. Therefore, in terms of its potential scale, if combined with the Internet of Things botnet that was utilized in the recent 655 Gigabyte attack against Brian Krebs's website, we could soon see new records broken in the DDoS attack landscape, with potential to reach tens of Terabits per second in size in the not too distant future. The DDoS landscape has been extremely volatile in recent weeks, particularly with the release of the Mirai code and subsequent Mirai infected Internet of Things (IoT) devices, and we expect this trend to continue for the foreseeable future. Security Asia

Shadow Brokers dump reveals NSA targets - Accompanying gibberish encourages disrupting US election

The Shadow Brokers hacking group has posted a fresh dump containing a list of servers compromised by an NSA-linked group. The list contains historic targets of the Equation Group. Mail providers, universities and targets in China make up the bulk of the roster. Each were targets of INTONATION and PITCHIMPAIR, codenames for cyber-spy hacking programmes. Documents leaked by whistleblower Edward Snowden provide strong evidence that previous dumps by the Shadows Brokers feature malware and exploits that originated at the NSA, as previously reported. The latest Shadow Brokers dump was signed using the same key as the initial dump of NSA exploits, which the Shadow Brokers unsuccessfully tried to auction off. A message accompanying the latest dump somewhat incoherently calls for attempts to disrupt the forthcoming US presidential election. This poorly argued rabble-rousing has been met with some derision. Security experts have questioned the value of the leaked target list, at least outside the realm of cyber-espionage historians. "The list of servers is nine years old. [Many] likely no longer exist or [are] reinstalled," said security researcher Kevin Beaumont, in an update on Twitter. UK Register

Boffin's anti-worm bot could silence epic Mirai DDoS attack army - And break every computer crime law along the way

A GitHub user going by Leo Linsky has forked a repo created by researcher Jerry Gamblin to create an anti-worm "nematode" that could help to patch vulnerable devices used in the massive Mirai distributed denial of service attack. The nematode, a concept detailed by security man Dave Aitel [PDF], would fight back against the massive and highly dangerous inter-of-things-borne botnet used in highly disruptive attacks against major web infrastructure including DNS provider Dyn. Some 100,000 Telnet-exposed-and-web-connected cameras, sensors and other devices are held to have downed Dyn. Researcher Scott Tenaglia Friday found a stack buffer overflow vulnerability in the Mirai code which could be used to crash bots and shut down Mirai attacks. The worm goes further and can be used to break into woefully insecure internet-of-things devices and change the default Telnet credentials within. Doing so would lock Mirai and other malware users out of the devices, along with legitimate administrators. "This is a purely academic research project intended to show a proof of concept anti-worm worm, or nematode, for the types of vulnerabilities exploited by Mirai," Linsky says. UK Register

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca.

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre / CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Tuesday, May 17, 2016 8:54 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique
May 17, 2016 / le 17 mai 2016

Print Media / Médias imprimés

Government and tech should look for a middle ground on encryption

For months, a single Apple iPhone has held the attention of the news media, legislatures, security agencies and civil liberties organizations around the world. The smartphone confiscated in the investigation stemming from a mass shooting in San Bernadino, Calif., has gone from potential evidence to symbol of a backlash against the questionable use of intelligence in the name of national security. (...) By contrast, BlackBerry has adopted a more co-operative approach, opting to maintain decryption keys. The Canadian company's corporate policy caused some uproar recently when court documents on the surveillance of a Montreal-area organized-crime ring shed light on the "back door" in its technology. Chief executive John Chen advised customers that use of the decryption was not unlimited and that "there is a balance between doing what's right, such as helping to apprehend criminals, and preventing government abuse of invading citizens' privacy." BlackBerry is clearly in the minority, though. With less fanfare, Google has followed Apple's lead on encryption with the Android platform. WhatsApp, the Facebook-owned messaging platform, recently introduced mandatory end-to-end encryption. (...) The public apprehension that some of the world's largest tech companies are using to justify enhanced encryption is real and shouldn't be discounted. A recent study by Ipsos and the Centre for International Governance Innovation (CIGI) on Internet security and trust in 24 countries, including Canada and the United States, found 57 per cent of citizens are more concerned about their online privacy than they were a year earlier. Just 38 per cent believed their online activities were not being monitored. (...) This goes well beyond what critics of national security agencies would call existential threats, such as terrorism and cyberwarfare. They include crimes such as sexual exploitation of children and fraud schemes that prey on the vulnerable. Both are enabled by anonymity, the ease of operating across jurisdictions and enhanced encryption. Globe and Mail, B4

Online Media / Médias en ligne

BfV agency says Russia is behind German cyber-attacks

According to Germany's domestic intelligence agency, Russia was most likely responsible for the major cyber-attack on the Bundestag last year, forcing computer systems to go offline for days. "One of the most active and aggressive campaigns is the 'Sofacy/APT 28' campaign," said the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BfV) agency. The BfV added that it sees "evidence of Russian state control" in the operation that infected computers with Trojan software that would've given the attackers permanent access to computers used by staff and MPs at the Bundestag. The Sofacy/APT 28 campaign has had fingers pointed at it for a wide range of attacks on governments and finance institutions since 2004. The BfV has been monitoring the group for years and pointed out that some of its hacks on Germany were going on for over a decade. "The campaigns that the BfV has observed in the past have generally been focused on obtaining information, in other words spying," said Hans-Georg Maassen, president of the BfV. "But lately intelligence agencies have also shown a willingness to conduct sabotage." SC Magazine

SS7 vulnerability defeats WhatsApp encryption, researchers claim

A vulnerability in an international telecoms standard could render encryption useless in message services such as WhatsApp and Telegram, according to security researchers. A report by Positive Technologies found the flaw in Signaling System 7 (SS7), an international standard that defines how network elements exchange information over a signalling network. The technology was developed in 1975 but never updated to take into account advancements in mobile technology or the rise of cyber-crime. Researchers at the company said the vulnerability could enable hackers to "send, intercept and alter SS7 messages by executing various attacks against mobile networks and their subscribers." SMS authentication is used as a security verification mechanism in messages apps such as WhatsApp, Viber, Telegram, Facebook and others. The authentication is routed through SS7 signalling. The researchers said that one-time codes via SMS are insecure, "because mobile communication is insecure". SC Magazine

Ukrainian hacker admits plotting to use stolen news releases

A Ukrainian hacker pleaded guilty Monday to his role in an international scheme that used stolen unpublished news release to make $30 million in profits. Vadym Iermolovych entered the plea in Newark, New Jersey, to a complaint charging him with aggravated identity theft and conspiracy to commit wire and computer hacking. The 28-year-old Kyiv man faces up to 20 years in prison when he's sentenced Aug. 22. Associated Press (Mississauga.com)

Failed hack via SWIFT on Vietnam bank tried to send funds to Slovenia: central bank

Vietnam's central bank said on Tuesday a failed hacking attempt on Tien Phong Bank (TPBank) using the SWIFT messaging system sought to fraudulently transfer 1.2 million euros ($1.36 million) to a Slovenian bank late last year in one transaction. The thwarted transfer on Dec. 8 was the only hack attempt via SWIFT detected by TPBank and no other Vietnamese lenders, or the central bank itself, have been affected, Le Manh Hung, head of the State Bank of Vietnam's Information Technology Department told Reuters in an interview. Reuters (Yahoo! News)

The FBI has quietly been hacking Americans for 20 years

Countless Snowden leaks have detailed the highly sophisticated tools used by the NSA to collect data in bulk from unsuspecting people, including American citizens. But the NSA isn't the only agency conducting spying operations. The FBI has been spying on US citizens as part of ongoing investigations for two decades, yet many details about its data collection practices are still secret, despite all of the leaks in recent years. According to Wired, the FBI's history of hacking goes back for some two decades, but little is known about the types of tools and spying operations it conducts. That's because search warrants often fail to provide detailed information about wiretapping techniques, and defense attorneys don't always challenge the FBI. Even so, Wired has put together a list of the known hacking operations the FBI has conducted over the years, some being more complex than others. Carnivore was a traffic sniffer the FBI installed with permission from ISPs in starting in 1998. The tool was supposed to be able to extract metadata but not the actual contents of communication, though research demonstrated that Carnivore can in fact collect message content if abused. Yahoo! News

EU adopts new cyber security rules

The Council of the European Union (EU) formally adopted new rules to step up the security of network and information systems across the EU on Tuesday. The network and information security (NIS) directive would increase cooperation between EU member states on the vital issue of cyber security, said the council. It lays down security obligations for operators of essential services, in critical sectors such as energy, transport, health and finance, and for digital service providers including online marketplaces, search engines and cloud services. Each EU member state would also be required to designate one or more national authorities and to establish a strategy for dealing with cyber threats, said the council. The Netherlands presidency together with the EU Agency for Network and Information Security (ENISA) has already started preparing the implementation of the directive. Xinhua

Google Zero : Symantec n'échappe pas à la faille

L'équipe de Google Zero a décelé une nouvelle faille au sein d'un antivirus. Cette fois, il s'agit des antivirus édités par la société Symantec. Selon Tavis Ormandy, chercheur en cybersécurité chez Google Zero, l'outil proposé par Symantec serait victime d'une faille de sécurité permettant à un attaquant de faire crasher la machine de la cible à distance. Le problème provient de la façon dont l'antivirus de Symantec analyse le trafic entrant et sortant de la machine. Comme l'explique Tavis Ormandy, un attaquant connaissant la faille peut en effet envoyer un exécutable modifié à la machine cible, et Symantec tentera alors de l'ouvrir afin de scanner celui-ci. Malheureusement, l'outil de scan est vulnérable à une attaque de type dépassement de tampons (buffer overflow) pouvant conduire à une exécution de code malveillant sur la machine de la cible. L'attaque est d'autant plus redoutable sur les machines Windows, où la faille découverte permet également à l'attaquant de disposer des droits d'administration sur la machine pour son code malveillant. Le moteur de scan des produits Symantec nécessite en effet les droits administrateurs pour fonctionner sur l'ordinateur. Une exploitation réussie de cette faille se manifeste également par un crash de la machine. ZDNet

Botnet : près d'un million de machines infectées via de fausses pubs Google

Des chercheurs en sécurité ont découvert un nouveau botnet infectant plusieurs centaines de milliers d'ordinateurs. Le botnet en question est baptisé redirector.paco et ce dernier est en mesure de remplacer les encarts de publicités de Google AdSense for Search. Selon trois experts de BitDefender, ce réseau de machines zombies serait en activité depuis septembre 2014. Plus de 900 000 ordinateurs en seraient infectées, particulièrement aux Etats-Unis, en Grèce, en Inde et en Malaisie. « Pour rediriger le trafic, le malware procède à une modification du registre en altérant les valeurs des clés AutoConfigURL et AutoConfigProxy des paramètres Internet », est-il ainsi expliqué. Une fois hackées, ces clés redirigeront l'internaute vers une autre adresse. L'infection de la machine provient de l'installation d'une application vérolée. Les chercheurs ont notamment identifié des fichiers modifiés de YouTube Downloader, WinRAR, KMSPico ou Stardock Start. Clubic

IBM's AI Watson might be solving cyber-crime by end of year

IBM will train its Watson artificial intelligence system to solve cyber-crimes, the tech giant announced. Big Blue will spend the next year working with eight universities to help the Watson AI learn how to detect potential cyber-threats. The eight educational institutes include California State Polytechnic University, Pomona; Pennsylvania State University; Massachusetts Institute of Technology; New York University; the University of Maryland, Baltimore County (UMBC); the University of New Brunswick; the University of Ottawa and the University of Waterloo. The cognitive system will process large amounts of information and students will train up Watson by annotating and feeding the system security reports and data, according to IBM. SC Magazine

Locky Ransomware Distribution Network Hacked to Show Warning Message Instead

The practice of hacking malware botnets and then replacing their payloads with pro-user content is starting to become the norm, with another of these incidents being reported by the team from F-Secure. The company says that one of its security researchers stumbled upon a weird sample coming from the server network (botnet) from which most of the Locky ransomware-carrying spam is sent out. The file was a ZIP archive containing a JavaScript file. If the user double-clicked this JavaScript file, the script would download in normal circumstances the Locky ransomware and launch it into execution, effectively encrypting their files. This time around, the F-Secure researcher, named Päivi, discovered that, instead of Locky, this file was downloading something different, also launching it into execution. It appears that someone hacked the Locky distribution network and replaced the Locky ransomware payload with a benign file that showed a simple popup warning users not to open email attachments from untrusted sources (screenshot below). "You are reading this message because you have opened a malicious file," the popup reads. "For your safety, don't open unknown emails attachment." [sic] Softpedia News

Une nouvelle menace cible les distributeurs automatiques de billets : le groupe Skimer

Skimer, un groupe russophone, force les distributeurs automatiques de billets (DAB) à l'aider à dérober de l'argent. Découvert en 2009, Skimer a été le premier programme malicieux à prendre pour cible les DAB. Sept ans plus tard, les cybercriminels ré-utilisent ce malware. Mais le programme, ainsi que les escrocs, ont évolué ; ils représentent une menace encore plus importante pour les banques et leurs clients partout dans le monde. Imaginons qu'une banque découvre avoir été victime d'une attaque. Étrangement, aucune somme d'argent n'a été dérobée et rien n'a été modifié dans son système. Les criminels sont partis comme ils sont venus. Serait-ce possible ? Découvrir les raisons qui expliquent l'emploi d'une méthode aussi inhabituelle n'a pas été simple. Mais dans le cadre d'une enquête menée suite à un incident, l'équipe d'experts de Kaspersky Lab a mis au jour le scénario imaginé par les cybercriminels et découvert des traces d'une version améliorée du malware Skimer sur l'un des DAB d'une banque. Il avait été posé là et n'avait pas été activé jusqu'à ce que les criminels lui envoient un contrôle : une façon ingénieuse de couvrir leurs traces. Le groupe Skimer commence ses opérations en accédant au système du DAB, soit physiquement, soit via le réseau interne de la banque visée. Ensuite, après être installé avec succès dans le système, l'outil Backdoor.Win32.Skimer, infecte le cœur de l'ATM, c'est-à-dire le fichier exécutable en charge des interactions entre la machine et l'infrastructure de la banque, de la gestion des espèces et des cartes bancaires. Global Security Mag

Sophos lance un outil d'entreprise pour nettoyer les malwares qui exploitent les vulnérabilités

Sophos annonce la disponibilité de Sophos Clean, le tout dernier composant de son portefeuille Enduser Protection de solutions de détection, remédiation et nettoyage de malwares. Cette technologie sans signatures repose sur une combinaison de techniques d'analyse comportementale, d'analyse forensique et d'intelligence collective pour détecter et nettoyer un ensemble de codes malveillants ou indésirables, comprenant menaces Zero-day, chevaux de Troie, rootkits, malwares polymorphiques, cookies irritants, spywares et adwares. Conçu à partir de technologies issues de l'acquisition de SurfRight B.V. en décembre 2015, Sophos Clean représente une nouvelle génération d'outils de détection et de nettoyage des menaces connues et inconnues. Il ne nécessite pas l'installation du scanner de vérification à la demande, ce qui est particulièrement utile dans le cas d'infection par ransomwares ou dans les situations où les malwares manipulent les logiciels de sécurité installés sur les systèmes. Global Security Mag

International click-fraud bot strikes close to a million victims worldwide

A botnet which has infected systems around the world counts almost one million victim PCs within its network, researchers say. Botnets are networks of PCs which have been infected with malicious software designed to take control of the system without the owner's knowledge. This can lead to 'slave' PCs being forced to send spam or launch distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks against web domains, but controllers may also redirect slave PC users to malicious domains. Another feature of botnets is altering PCs to change where traffic goes in the quest for ad clicks. If the operator tampers with internet configuration settings, they can forward searches to third-parties which manipulate search engine results to push users towards pages injected with ads that generate money for the cybercriminals. ZDNet

Bugs : iOS 9.3.2 est disponible mais bloque certains iPad Pro 9,7"

Depuis hier soir, iOS 9.3.2 est disponible. Cette mise à jour embarque divers correctifs censés corriger plusieurs failles de sécurité. Apple annonce d'ailleurs que 22 problèmes ont été résolus. Souvenez-vous, il était possible de contourner l'écran de verrouillage d'iOS pour accéder aux contacts mais également aux photos et bien plus encore. C'est un bug de Siri qui était à l'origine de cette faille. Les problèmes de Bluetooth audio relevés sur l'iPhone SE ont aussi été résolus. Une autre faille très importante permettait d'exécuter un code grâce auquel un hacker pouvait prendre le contrôle de votre iPhone ou de votre iPad et y envoyer un malware. C'est d'ailleurs ce type de faille qui est utilisée pour le Jailbreak. Désormais, la méthode du code est insuffisante pour une prise de contrôle totale. Logiciel.Mac

Malicious Android apps slip into Google Play, top third party charts

Malicious Android applications have bypassed Google's Play store security checks to enslave infected devices into distributed denial of service attack, advertising fraud, and spam botnets. The apps are legitimate games that in some stores outside of Google Play have made it to highly-contested top free games charts. Checkpoint malware men Andrey Polkovnichenko and Oren Koriati say the malware family they dubbed Viking Horde, thanks to the chief offending game Viking Jump, varies depending on the capabilities of the infected phone. "Perhaps the most dangerous functionality is the update mechanism [which] allows downloading and executing any remote code on the device," the pair say. "The botnet created by the attackers spread worldwide to users from various targeted countries." A series of sought permissions has led to user suspicion and subsequent low-ranking on the Google Play store. UK Register

Researchers spot spike in phishing attacks leveraging 2016 Rio Olympics

Kaspersky Lab researchers spotted a spike in phishing attacks, email scams and spam messages that mimic branding from the 2016 Rio de Janeiro Olympics. Researchers Tatyana Shcherbakova and Andrey Kostin said threat actors are registering domains with names containing words such as "rio" and "rio2016" and purchasing cheap SSL certificates to make their phony sites look more credible, according to a May 16 Securelist post. Cyber crooks have also sent fake emails claiming users had won lotteries and false advertisements for televisions and other products including magic pills that promise to make the recipient an "Olympic champion," the post said. SC Magazine

Researchers launch another salvo at CryptXXX ransomware

Kaspersky Lab researchers are playing a game of cat-and-mouse with the authors of the CryptXXX ransomware, and have released another new tool to help victims get their files back without paying a fee. Ransomware is malware which uses pressure and the threat of losing content forever to force people to pay a fee to cyberattackers in the hopes of gaining access to their systems. Once a machine is infected, the malware encrypts files and presents a lock screen, preventing users from accessing the PC. A demand is given for payment in return for a key to decrypt your files -- which may, or may not, work. CryptXXX, first discovered in April, is not your standard breed of ransomware. The software not only encrypts your files with the .crypt extension but also attacks any files on connected storage devices, steals cryptocurrency wallet funds stored on your system and may also send sensitive data to cyberattackers. ZDNet

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@Canada.ca

Sent to: !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #1; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #2; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #3; !Cyber Security Media Summary Dist List #4

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP (PS/SP)
Sent: Friday, January 09, 2015 8:45 AM
To: Cyber Security / Sécurité cybernétique (PS/SP)
Subject: Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique

Cyber Security Media Summary / Revue de presse sur la sécurité cybernétique January 9, 2015 / le 9 janvier 2015

Print Media / Médias imprimés

SaskPower warns customers of email and phone scams

SaskPower customers are being targeted by scammers using phone calls and emails to try to get personal information from their victims. Leader-Post, A4

Online Media / Médias en ligne

Sony's computer network is still down following cyber-attack

More than six weeks after hackers attacked Sony Pictures Entertainment, its computer network is still down but the studio has not lost a single day of production on any of its films or television, CEO Michael Lynton told The Associated Press on Thursday. The Associated Press (Global News)

U.K. Power Grid is Under Attack From Hackers Every Minute, Says Parliament

The U.K. government is one step ahead of hackers trying to turn off the country's lights -- for now. The prospect of cyber-attacks on the nation's power network is a major threat to the country's security, according to James Arbuthnot, a member of parliament who chaired the Defense Select Committee until last year. He plans to visit National Grid Plc (NGI) next month to discuss the issue. "Our National Grid is coming under cyber-attack not just day-by-day but minute-by-minute," Arbuthnot, whose committee scrutinized the country's security policy, told a conference in London last year. "There are, at National Grid, people of very high quality who recognize the risks that these attacks pose, and who are fighting them off," he said, "but we can't expect them to win forever." Businessweek

CryptoWall ransomware variant gets new defenses

CryptoWall, one of a family of malware programs that encrypts files and demands a ransom from victims, has undergone a revamp that is frustrating security researchers. At one time, CryptoWall was a second-rate successor to CryptoLocker, which largely disappeared after law enforcement shut down the Gameover Zeus botnet that was used to distribute it. Computerworld

Dridex malware targets 15,000 UK bank accounts daily

Malware targeting people's banking details is hitting 15,000 people's inboxes a day, security researchers warned this week. The malicious macro virus masquerades as Microsoft Office and Excel email attachments coming from reputable retailers or banks, which contain a banking Trojan known as Dridex. IT PRO

Pastebin: The remote backdoor server for the cheap and lazy

Malware writers are using the Pastebin web clipboard to host backdoor code, researcher Denis Sinegubko suggests. The code-sharing site was used to store code that was later tapped in attacks against websites running a vulnerable instance of the popular RevSlider plugin. The Register

FBI doubles down on North Korea accusation for Sony Pictures hack

The FBI has reiterated its belief that North Korea is ultimately behind the hacking of Sony Pictures, in the face of continued criticism from independent security researchers who doubt the organisation's findings. "There's not much I have high confidence about," the FBI director, James Comey, told the press, but "I have very high confidence ... on North Korea." He pre-empted concerns of researchers that the North Korean connection was a smokescreen, saying they "don't have the facts I have, they don't see what I see". The Guardian

Scammers Target Brokerage Accounts

Scammers target all kinds of financial accounts, but those of customers at brokerages and investment-advisory firms have a special appeal: They typically hold large sums of money, often in the six- or seven-figure range. Advisers, regulators and security experts say they have seen a rise in attempts by criminals to siphon funds from them over the past two years. Often, the scams involve use of confidential information that somehow leaked, or was stolen, from the bank or the client. Breaches are all too common: This week, Morgan Stanley said that a rookie adviser based in New York, Galen Marsh, had managed to take information on some 350,000 wealth-management accounts. Some of the data was posted on the Internet and offered for sale, the firm said. Wall Street Journal

Sony Hackers May Have Left Deliberate Clues, Expert Says

Apparent slip-ups by the hackers of Sony Pictures that have helped convince U.S. investigators the hackers are North Koreans have a precedent, and may even have been deliberate to win domestic kudos, according to a top cybersecurity expert and former senior North Korean official. Wall Street Journal

Snowden: US started rash of cyberattacks

The rise in cyberattacks used by governments around the world started with the United States, according to government leaker Edward Snowden. In an upcoming interview with PBS, Snowden pointed the finger at the United States's reported use of the Stuxnet virus against an Iranian nuclear facility, which was discovered in 2010. "It is important to highlight that we really started this trend in many ways when we launched the Stuxnet campaign against the Iranian nuclear program," Snowden said, according to a transcript posted on Thursday. The Hill

Modern security tactics fail to protect against malware, study finds

No matter if you work for a government contractor or a top legal firm, there's a good chance your company's computers are infected with malicious software. That's a conclusion reached by FireEye, a computer security analysis and consulting firm, which released on Thursday a new study detailing how most companies are more vulnerable than they may think. CNET

South Korea's Other Hacking Incident and the Need for Greater Cooperation in Northeast Asia

The U.S.-DPRK tit-fo-tat over the Sony hack has continued into the new year, with the Obama administration announcing sanctions on three organizations and ten individuals on January 2 and North Korea responding with indignation two days later. But the media focus on the Sony hack obscures a potentially much more dangerous hacking incident that has also been attributed to North Korea involving release of personal information of over 10,000 employees of the Korea Hydro and Nuclear Power Company (KHNP), which operates 23 nuclear reactors in South Korea. This story line includes demands by the hackers that KHNP shut down at least one South Korean reactor by Christmas Day (a threat that was ignored). There are also reports that the origins of the hack may have been traced to Shenyang, a city that houses a known platform for North Korean cyber operations. Specialists on nuclear plant systems assert that the hacking incident posed no real danger to the operation of South Korean plants, but they do highlight the sensitivity—and potential vulnerability—of South Korean nuclear facilities to a potential North Korean attack. This eventuality is potentially as damaging as the threat of North Korean nuclear use that South Korea now faces if indeed North Korea has developed a mid-range payload delivery capability. Forbes

Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca

Ellis2, Andrew (PS/SP)

From: [REDACTED]
Sent: Thursday, November 19, 2015 5:27 AM
To: MEDIAMONIT MEDIAMONIT
Subject: Cyberattacks on infrastructure a 'major threat,' says CSIS chief (CBC News/Dave Seglins-also mention of CSE)

Cyberattacks on infrastructure a 'major threat,' says CSIS chief
Lack of detection of ISIS plot in Paris attack sign of group's growing cyber expertise, experts warn.
CBC News
Dave Seglins
2015 11 19

The head of Canada's main spy agency says he views the possibility of a cyberattack by ISIS or other extremist groups on the country's "critical infrastructure" as "a major threat."

"Cyber is one of our top priorities," Michel Couombe, director the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) told an Ottawa news conference on Wednesday.

Couombe was responding to questions after Britain announced it is nearly doubling funding for cyber counterterrorism amid fears ISIS is looking to target Western infrastructure such as hospitals, airports or power plants by using the internet.

He was flanked by RCMP Commissioner Bob Paulson and Ralph Goodale, Canada's newly appointed minister of public safety.

"This is an area that I'm beginning to be further briefed on by the department," Goodale told reporters, deferring to his deputy minister and CSIS.

Britain's cyber war

Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer George Osborne visited the U.K.'s electronic spy agency, GCHQ, on Tuesday to announce £1.9 billion ($3.6 billion) in new funding.

It's to develop tools to defend against cyberattacks, but also to facilitate offensive operations over the internet against extremist threats.

"The stakes could hardly be higher," Osborne told his spy audience. "If our electricity supply, or our air traffic control, or our hospitals were successfully attacked online, the impact could be measured not just in terms of economic damage but of lives lost.

"They have not been able to use it to kill people yet by attacking our infrastructure through cyberattack," Osborne said. "They do not yet have that capability. But we know they want it, and are doing their best to build it."

ISIS hacking capabilities

The Paris attack has been widely recognized as a failure by the world's surveillance agencies for not detecting any advance chatter or plotting. That lack of detection is also a testament to the growing sophistication of ISIS.

"The fact they've been able to conduct pretty sophisticated terrorist operations tells me that they have the ability to fly quote unquote 'under the radar,'" said Amos Guiora, a law professor and counterterrorism specialist at the University of Utah.

"The fact that they're able to do this successfully tells me that their cyber capabilities are very significant," he told CBC News. Guiora is the author of an upcoming book on law and policy around cyberterrorism.

Guiora could not identify any instances of ISIS attacks launched exclusively over the internet, but says ISIS has attracted legions of young, technically savvy adherents.

"ISIS has two ways of doing it. One, people who are signed up to ISIS. And [two] perhaps people who are going to be paid a lot of money by ISIS to bring their talents to ISIS. I mean money is not a problem for these guys. Neither is their desire, their capability and their reach.

Canada's cyber-arsenal

Canada's electronic spy agency has been building a global system of sensors to monitor wide swaths of internet traffic to try to defend Canadian internet space.

Documents leaked by U.S. security whistleblower Edward Snowden reveal that Canada's Communications Security Establishment (CSE) has also been developing tools to fight back, including cyberweapons to disrupt online chat groups, shut down websites and even destroy computer networks.

But according to numerous observers, there are still major gaps in Canada's cyber-security strategy when it comes to protecting vital infrastructure. that is connected to the internet.

"I think it is true that area is relatively poorly defended," cautions David Skillicorn a computer studies professor at Queen's University and the Royal Military College in Kingston, Ont.

He notes the federal government, CSE and industry are working to fix problems, but warns that vulnerabilities remain.

"Many of those things that you would think would run on separate systems are actually connected to the internet," Skillicorn told CBC News.

"Pipelines, power supplies, water treatment and things of that sort. We have had one example of a pipeline in Turkey that appears to have been exploded by remote control, by some kind of hack. So anyone who runs a pipeline is worried about things like that."

The Ministry of Public Safety does lead the Canadian Cyber Incident Response Centre to help co-ordinate and share advice and intelligence in the event of major cyberattacks and breaches.

However, Skillicorn and numerous other observers outside of government said Canada is behind.

"It's certain that we are not where we want to be or where we should be," Skillicorn said.

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
January 4, 2014 / le 4 janvier, 2014

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

INQUEST INTO THE DEATH OF ASHLEY SMITH / ENQUÊTE SUR LA MORT D'ASHLEY SMITH

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

NIL

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Kelly considers asking army to aid cleanup

Toronto's two mayors are at odds over the city's ice storm response, revealing the imperfections of an "awkward" power-sharing arrangement that left the city without a distinct leader, several councillors say. Deputy Mayor Norm Kelly said Friday he is making "exploratory calls" to find out whether calling in the army might help to ease the massive ice storm cleanup effort, which is projected to take up to eight weeks. Rob Ford fired back on Twitter on Friday evening. "I see no need to call in the army when we have over 600 staff dedicated to clean up efforts," he wrote. "The City of Toronto is on top of the situation." Josée Picard, spokeswoman for Public Safety Canada, confirmed that any request for troops would first be made to the province, which would then decide whether to forward it to the federal government. In order for a request for military help to be granted, she said "the assistance must not be available otherwise within the private sector because of timeliness, magnitude or specialty of service." Toronto Star, GT2; Le Journal de Montréal; StarPhoenix (Edmonton Journal, Windsor Star, Leader-Post, Ottawa Citizen); Globe and Mail

Armed with army facts

The Ontario government has no plans to ask the Canadian military to help Toronto clean up after last month's devastating ice storm and says the city has not yet asked for such intervention. Deputy Mayor Norm Kelly had floated the idea, but on Friday downplayed "exploratory phone calls" made by his office, while still not ruling the option out. He said the request had to be made through Queen's Park. Late in the day, a spokesperson for Premier Kathleen Wynne's office stated army assistance is "currently not under consideration by the province, but the municipality has also not yet made the request for federal assistance." The Post's Natalie Alcoba sheds light on the issue... A federal government spokesman said Public Safety Canada has not received an official request for help in Toronto. National Post, A9

'Frost quakes' spook chilled residents

The extreme cold is leaving the Toronto area with a bang rather than a whimper as residents are reporting loud booming sounds that may be caused by "frost quakes." Residents are reporting noises loud enough to wake them up as temperatures dipped below -20 C. Such booms occur when moisture in the ground freezes and expands, putting pressure on rock. This pressure is ultimately released with a loud boom as the rock cracks. According to the Maine Geological Survey, the phenomenon is also known as a cryoseism. The agency calls it "a literal 'cold snap'" and describes the sounds variously as a "deep rumbling" that shakes windows, a "shudder" and a cracking sound. Ottawa Citizen, A2

Storm wallops Newfoundland, power outages across island

Power was out for residents in many parts of Newfoundland Saturday morning, as Newfoundland Power reported severe weather caused outages across Newfoundland. People across the island took to social media to report lost power from various parts of the island shortly after 9 a.m. NT. The storm continued on the Avalon Peninsula and parts of the east coast of Newfoundland Saturday morning after a reported 38 centimetres of snow fell overnight Friday. Travellers hoping to make it through St. John's International Airport will be forced to rescheduled arrangements, as most flights are cancelled or delayed. Newfoundland Power ended its rotating power outages Friday night, saying people seemed to respond to the company's plea to conserve power. Michelle Coughlan, with Newfoundland Power, said they start again as early as Saturday morning. Problems with broken generators have caused problems at Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro's Holyrood Generating Station, and limited how much power is available to customers across the province. CBC News

Nova Scotia at a standstill as blizzard hits East Coast

Eastern Canada was dealt a wintry wallop Friday as a blizzard bore down on the region all day, forcing the cancellation of flights, interrupting public transit and closing roads, government offices, universities and businesses. Whiteouts prompted police to urge the public to stay off the roads as plow operators undertook the frustrating task of clearing snow, only to have wind-whipped drifts quickly build back up. The storm that swept into Atlantic Canada hit Nova Scotia particularly hard, where retail outlets including liquor stores in Halifax, the Annapolis Valley and the South Shore were closed early. Numerous flight delays and cancellations were reported in Halifax, Charlottetown and Moncton, N.B. Post-secondary schools including Dalhousie University, St. Mary's University and l'Université du Moncton were shut down. There were reports of local flooding along Nova Scotia's Atlantic coast near Liverpool, N.S., because of higher-than-normal water levels and heavy, pounding surf. Ottawa Citizen, A2

Une éclosion du virus H1N1 fait 6 morts

Santé publique Ottawa a confirmé, hier, que deux personnes nonagénaires d'Ottawa sont mortes à la suite d'une grippe dans la capitale nationale depuis ces dernières semaines. Le virus de l'Influenza a fait une première victime peu de temps avant les Fêtes. Une seconde personne est décédée il y a quelques jours. Des examens plus approfondis devront être pratiqués afin de déterminer si la souche du virus est de type H1N1. Cinq personnes sont décédées en Alberta, dont deux à Edmonton et deux autres à Calgary, ont confirmé les autorités de la santé publique. La grippe y a fait 965 malades déclarés, parmi lesquels 270 ont dû être hospitalisés. A Toronto, un malade a succombé au virus H1N1, aussi appelé «grippe porcine». Deux autres personnes infectées par le virus pourraient également en être mortes mais ces cas font toujours l'objet d'une enquête. Les autorités sanitaires de la métropole ontarienne ont signalé un pourcentage de cas déclarés de H1N1 plus élevé cette année. Ainsi, 36% des 210 cas déclarés d'influenza étaient, en fait, des cas de grippe porcine. L'an dernier, on ne comptait que 3,0% de cas de cette grippe à la même période. Le Droit, 13; Montreal Gazette; Waterloo Region Record; Toronto Star; National Post; Daily Gleaner

Huge Scope of Lac-Mégantic cleanup comes into focus

As the crack of explosions broke the early-morning quiet and clouds of black smoke billowed above Lac-Mégantic on July 6, millions of litres of crude oil gushed along the ground. Some of the oil fuelled the raging fire that erupted after a 72-car train derailed, blazing through Lac-Mégantic and eventually making its way to the surface of the lake that gives the town its name. Some of the oil evaporated in the fires that burned for two days, creating a plume of smoke that spread east toward the U.S. border. And some of the oil - hundreds of thousands of litres of it - flooded the manholes around the crash site, overwhelming the town's sewer system. In the chaotic days after the accident, as emergency workers first searched for survivors and then, their remains, it wasn't clear what impact the derailment had on the environment. But six months after the accident, a more detailed picture is emerging about the oil carried in the derailed train, how and where it spilled, and the efforts made to try to stop it from causing widespread environmental damage in the town and nearby lake and river. Montreal Gazette, B1

Oil leak discovered at Hibernia

Hibernia has scaled back production and stopped off-loading to tankers after discovering a leak from a valve in its northern offshore off-loading system. About 10 litres of crude was spilled from the hose-end valve Dec. 18, according to a release from the Canada-Newfoundland and Labrador Offshore Petroleum Board, prompting Hibernia to isolate the valve. The sea surface in the area was monitored for five days. No oil sheens were reported, but the board says heavy seas prevented a remotely operated vehicle from assessing the spill. The Telegram, A6

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

CSE admits to 'incidentally' spying

After months of denying it spies on Canadians, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) now admits it may "incidentally" read or hear Canadians' communications. "The National Defence Act acknowledges that this may happen and provides for the minister of national defence to authorize this interception in specific circumstances," CSE said in a new posting on its website. "If a private communication is incidentally intercepted (e. g. a foreign individual we are targeting overseas is communicating with someone in Canada), CSE takes steps to protect the privacy of that information." CSE also admits it's allowed to help CSIS, the Mounties and Canada Border Services Agency "in a variety of circumstances -- including intercept operations against a Canadian or individuals in Canada." National security blogger Bill Robinson says that means CSE can use information gleaned from Canadians. London Free Press, B3 (Kingston Whig-Standard); Le Journal de Montréal

CSIS spying should be independently reviewed

An opinion piece states, "Months of surveillance-related leaks from U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden have fuelled an international debate over privacy, spying and Internet surveillance. The Canadian-related leaks - including disclosures regarding spying on the Brazilian government and the facilitation of spying at the G8 and G20 meetings hosted in Toronto in 2010 - have certainly inspired some domestic discussion. Ironically, the most important surveillance development did not involve Snowden at all. Late last year, Justice Richard Mosley, a federal court judge, issued a stinging rebuke to Canada's intelligence agencies (CSEC and CSIS) and the Justice Department, ruling that they misled the court when they applied for warrants to permit the interception of electronic communications. While the government has steadfastly defended its surveillance activities by maintaining that it operates within the law, Justice Mosley, a former official with the Justice Department who was involved with the creation of the Anti-Terrorism Act, found a particularly troubling example where this was not the case. Mosley's concern stems from warrants involving two individuals that were issued in 2009 permitting the interception of communications both in Canada and abroad using Canadian equipment. At the time, the Canadian intelligence agencies did not disclose that they might ask their foreign counterparts (namely the "five eyes" partners in the U.S., U.K., Australia, and New Zealand) to intercept the foreign communications. In June 2013, the CSEC Commissioner, who is responsible for reviewing CSEC activities, issued his annual report. It included a cryptic recommendation that the agency "provide the Federal Court of Canada with certain additional evidence about the nature and extent of the assistance CSEC may provide to CSIS." That recommendation caught Mosley's attention, who ordered CSEC and CSIS to appear in court to disclose if the recommendation was linked to the warrants he had issued and discuss whether the additional evidence might have had an impact on the decision to grant the warrants in the first place. It turns out that the additional evidence - which involved several warrants, including those issued by Mosley - was indeed the fact that CSEC was tasking foreign agencies to conduct interceptions on its behalf." Toronto Star, B4

Tide shifts on Snowden revelations

An opinion piece states, "Last May, when low-level U.S. security contractor Edward Snowden fled his home with four laptops containing a treasure trove of highly classified data, public opinion in America surged toward utter condemnation... Canadians learned that their blind faith in U.S. Internet behemoths -- Google, Apple, Microsoft, Facebook, etc. -- mean their e-mails and other data can be easily read and stored by security agencies, due to their ability to hack into those systems. We learned that Canada has been a willing partner of the U.S. National Security Agency, helping it set up covert spying operations around the world, including inside Canada. We learned that industrial espionage inside the computer and security systems of our competitors -- Brazil's mining industry, for example -- is commonplace. And if the NSA can hack German Chancellor Angela Merkel's cellphone, how much easier would it be to monitor the communications of Canadians, including those within our military, law enforcement, industrial and commercial sectors, to say nothing of the Prime Minister's Office. Despite all those revelations, the federal government's line has been fairly consistent. Last month, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird repeated his assertion that Snowden should "go back to the United States and face the consequences of his actions," given the country's "free and fair justice system." London Free Press, E4

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

 Un pyromane en fuite déporté

Un pyromane en fuite depuis quatre ans, après avoir purgé 12 mois de prison, a été épinglé par des agents frontaliers en novembre et expulsé du pays en décembre. L'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada (ASFC) a annoncé que Gazmend Dervishaj a été déporté le 18 décembre. Le Journal de Montréal, 26

 Smuggled Patek Philippe watch nets man court fine

A 26-year-old Vancouver man was fined $5,133.72 in Richmond provincial court after pleading guilty to evading duties following a trip to China last summer. En Ze Lei returned to Canada via the Vancouver International Airport on July 27 after a three-and-a-half month visit, according to Canada Border Services spokesperson Stefanie Wudel. Richmond Review

Ambassador Bridge traffic down 7%

An ongoing decline in Ontario's manufacturing sector has largely led to truck traffic dropping about seven per cent at the Ambassador Bridge this past year compared to the previous year, said the company's president on Friday. As of the end of November, there were 2.18 million trucks that crossed over the bridge in 2013 - a drop from 2.35 million over the same time period in 2012, according to statistics from the Public Border Operators Association. Truck traffic numbers at the Blue Water Bridge in Sarnia for 2013 as of the end of November are up four per cent compared to the year before - from 1.38 million to 1.43 million. Windsor Star, A2

Immigration minister forges ahead with reform

When Chris Alexander took over the immigration portfolio in a cabinet shuffle last summer, it was seen as a major vote of confidence in the rookie MP and a move by Stephen Harper to infuse some fresh young talent into cabinet. But maintaining a firm hand on the department hasn't been easy. The reforms to immigration and refugee policy have triggered not only criticism from advocacy groups and opposition politicians, but also a federal court challenge on health care cuts to refugees. In a year-end interview with the Star, Alexander ardently defended the cuts, repeating many of the arguments his predecessor used to invoke, saying the Canadian refugee system - before the government's changes - was full of "bogus claimants" and "fraudsters." Toronto Star, A8

Criminal ban dropped as 'rigid'

Labour and business stakeholders say they're baffled by the Conservative government's recent removal of provisions from its temporary foreign worker program that would have barred criminal employers from participating. In a notice on New Year's Day, the government said its original proposals aimed at employers convicted of human trafficking, sexually assaulting an employee or causing the death of a worker were "too rigid and cumbersome." And so it removed them from its crackdown on abusers of the program. Ottawa Citizen, A5; Winnipeg Free Press

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

Cryptolocker Ransomware Evolves to Spread on Its Own

The notorious Cryptolocker ransomware, which strongly encrypts victims' hard drives until a ransom is paid, has taken a turn for the worse — it's evolved from a Trojan into a worm. This means the uncrackable malware can now propagate itself, rather than relying on gullible humans to open infected email attachments or point their browsers at corrupted Web pages. Yahoo! News

Snapchat snaps back

Snapchat says it will be releasing an updated version of its app after information about 4.6 million users was released online on New Year's Eve. Canadian users in Manitoba and the territories had their usernames and passwords posted online after hackers wanted to expose flaws in the messaging app. On Wednesday, a website called SnapchatDB released 4.6 million phone numbers and usernames, but redacted the last two numbers in each phone number "to minimize spam and abuse." There are 7,242 numbers from area codes 867 and 204 -- users in Manitoba and all three territories -- on the list. The release happened a week after Australian security research group GibsonSec said user information was vulnerable to hackers. In a statement Thursday, Snapchat said hackers abused the "find friends" option of the app, of which users will now be able to opt out. The company said no photos were leaked. Calgary Sun, 16

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

 Policing costs too steep

A city councillor is proposing the city look at what it would cost for the RCMP to provide policing services in Saint John. Ward 4 Coun. David Merrithew has drafted a motion asking city manager Patrick Woods to write a report offering advice on the cost and process of obtaining a quote from the RCMP. If council approves Merrithew's idea, Woods would then bring the report back to council to make a decision on whether to ask for a price. Merrithew said he decided to push for a quote from the Mounties at the beginning of the year, after voting to approve a $148-million budget that included $1-million increases to both police and fire budgets. The increases are largely due to unavoidable wage and benefit increases likely to come out of the arbitration process. Telegraph-Journal, B1

 Man is accused of driving car at police

Several charges were laid yesterday against a man in connection with events relating to the shale gas protests in Kent County. Gregory Cook, 72, appeared in court and asked for an adjournment so he can seek Legal Aid. The judge set his case over until Feb. 12. Cook had been charged with dangerous driving, assault with a weapon and obstructing police, but those three charges were replaced by eight charges yesterday. He now faces four counts of assault with a weapon - a vehicle - relating to four different RCMP officers. The alleged offence took place at a police road block in Rexton on Sept. 29, around the time a van was moved in front of a compound on Route 134. The van blocked SWN Resources Canada trucks and equipment inside for nearly three weeks, preventing the company from exploring for shale gas in Kent County. Cook is also charged with obstructing three police officers and dangerous driving. No one was injured during the incident that led to the charges. Times & Transcript, A3

 The House: Inside the Nigel Wright-Mike Duffy deal

This week on The House, we go through the RCMP's Senate scandal court documents like you've never heard them before. We bring some of the most controversial and telling emails to life and go through the list of characters involved in the deal between Nigel Wright and Mike Duffy to repay Duffy's expenses. Radio-Canada Ottawa bureau chief Emmanuelle Latraverse and CBC senior political correspondent Terry Milewski join host Evan Solomon for the journey and give their analysis of what it all means. CBC News

 Police crack down on drug trade in battle against rising violent crime

With criticism over Surrey's murder rate reaching a crescendo after the beating death of a 53-year-old mother in Newton, Mayor Dianne Watts detailed Friday how police have targeted the drug trade on the advice of her special task force on violent crime. Newton and Whalley now have 49 more officers that have redeployed from other duties to crack down on the drug houses and drug dealers often linked to violent crime in the city, Watts said. In the past three weeks, eight search warrants have been executed at drug houses and 56 arrests have been made, while six vehicles were seized, Watts added. Surrey created headlines last month after a record 25 homicides were recorded in 2013, the last of which was the shocking beating death of Julie Paskall. Vancouver Sun, A4

 Woman's plight medical, not criminal – mom: N.S. protests planned as daughter's condition continues to lead to police action

Brenda Hardiman is taking her cause to the streets. The Bible Hill woman's daughter, 26-year-old Nichele Benn, has an organic brain disorder that leads to uncontrollable emotional outbursts. Benn lives in a rehabilitation centre in Lower Sackville where staff are instructed to call police when she has an outburst, a policy that's resulted in arrests and court dates. During an episode last month, Benn bit a staff member while she was being put back in her room. Once there, she threw several objects at another staff member. The ordeal resulted in charges of assault and assault with a weapon. Hardiman remains resolved to find a way to have her daughter's issues addressed without involving law enforcement. On Sunday, Benn will be fingerprinted at the Lower Sackville RCMP station, and as part of that, Hardiman and the group People First Nova Scotia are organizing processions in five communities to highlight the issue. Chronicle-Herald, A8

 Murder suspect still at large

A suspect in the murder of a 25-year-old man in Red Deer is still being sought by police. RCMP have had no luck in finding Adam William Lee Bird, also known as "Gwap," who is accused of killing Lloyd Robert Sarson, of no fixed address, on Jan. 1, 2013, in an alley in Eastview. Sarson died from gunshot wounds. Bird, who is from Manitoba, is believed to be associated with an organized crime group with ties in Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and British Columbia. Police are now offering a $5,000 reward for information leading to his arrest. Red Deer Advocate, A4; Edmonton Sun

 Standoff suspect faces 14 charges

A man arrested after a New Year's Eve standoff with the RCMP now faces 14 criminal charges. Kristopher Glenn Harris, 33, appeared in Moncton provincial court with defence lawyer Hazen Brien yesterday. He had been facing two charges, including discharging a firearm while being reckless regarding public safety and threatening to cause the death of police officers. Times & Transcript, A1

 Man, 31, slain in Abbotsford was leader of Red Scorpions

Police have confirmed that the man killed in an attack at an Abbotsford auto mall was Matthew Gordon Campbell, 31. Campbell was known to be the leader of the Red Scorpion gang. In a statement from the Integrated Homicide Investigation Team, Sgt. Adam MacIntosh said: "The male appeared to have suffered stab injuries and later died in hospital." Campbell, 31, was the victim of the attack just before 3:45 p.m. on Automall Drive. He was taken to hospital, where he died of his injuries. Times Colonist, A5

 Police remind public of Move-Over law

With severe winter weather making for challenging road conditions recently, the New Brunswick RCMP are once again reminding motorists of the Move-Over law. The Move-Over law came into effect a year ago this month and is intended to protect the emergency responders who provide help on our roadways. The law requires people to slow down and move over for emergency vehicles, including police cars, fire fighting vehicles and ambulances. Times & Transcript, A9

 Vol d'armes à feu à Oromocto

La GRC sollicite l'aide de la population dans une affaire de vol d'armes à feu dans une résidence d'Oromocto durant la période des Fêtes. Entre le 24 décembre et le 1er janvier, une ou des personnes se sont introduites par effraction dans une maison du chemin Miramichi, à Oromocto. On y a volé des bijoux, des appareils électroniques et six armes à feu, dont deux armes de poing. Selon les policiers, les armes étaient entreposées correctement et de façon sécuritaire. Le ou les voleurs se seraient donc enfuis avec un fusil de chasse Winchester de calibre 12 et un Ithaca de calibre 20. Une carabine Ithaca de calibre .22 et une Savage de calibre .308 ont aussi été volées. Les deux armes de poing sont de marque Para et de calibre .45. L'Acadie Nouvelle, 7

 Charges in shotgun attack

Mounties paint a horrifying picture of an attempted murder in Warner as they name a suspect still on the loose. RCMP allege the man who unloaded a shotgun into a home where two people were asleep and unaware was aiming at the bed and only narrowly missed his targets. Investigators from Milk River, Lethbridge and Calgary were brought in following the incident, which occurred in the early morning hours of Dec. 28. Nobody was hurt but police do not have the man they believe responsible in custody. Kenneth Wallage is wanted on two charges of attempted murder. Calgary Sun, 12

 Dettah, N.W.T. man charged after New Year's incident

A Dettah, N.W.T., man is facing an assault charge after an incident early on New Year's Day. Shortly before 6 a.m. on Jan. 1, Yellowknife RCMP were called to a residence in Dettah for a complaint involving firearms. The RCMP's Emergency Response Team responded and after several hours, the suspect surrendered to police. CBC News

 Lost Scouts found on Grey Mountain

A search and rescue team found two Washington state Boy Scouts lost on Red Mountain in the Kootenays in good health on Friday. RCMP say the two 16-year-olds were reported overdue by resort officials Thursday afternoon after they failed to return from a day of skiing. Rossland Search and Rescue volunteers located tracks they believed belonged to the pair on the back side of Grey Mountain, a new 405-hectare ski area that opened this season. Vancouver Sun, A6

 RCMP need help to find missing man

Red Deer RCMP are asking the public for help in locating a missing man. Lincoln Capel, 28, was last seen in downtown Red Deer. He has been missing for approximately 10 days, police say. Red Deer Advocate, A4

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

Khadr fills prison time with education

In his small prison cell, Omar Khadr pored over his Grade 11 algebra last fall, tackled his first Shakespearean play - King Lear - and researched an essay on nuclear disarmament. With no computer access at the maximum-security Edmonton Institution, he wrote his homework in longhand. The unusual student, held by the U.S. for more than 10 years in the notorious Guantanamo Bay military prison, scored high marks on his exams and is determined to get his high school diploma, says the team of professors from King's University College providing lessons twice a week at "the Max." In December, Khadr passed with honours two Grade 11 exams, mathematics and social studies, and will write an English exam before a transfer to the minimum-security Bowden Institution, expected any time. Calgary Herald, A9 (Edmonton Journal)

Calgary: Man appeals abuse conviction, status

A man found guilty of torturing his former roommate has appealed both his conviction and his dangerous offender designation. Dustin Paxton, 33, was declared a high risk to offend last month and given an indeterminate prison sentence. Court of Queen's Bench Justice Sheilah Martin declared Paxton a threat to public safety, adding he has shown indifference to his crimes. Chronicle-Herald, A12

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

 Chiefs urge shale gas talks

The Assembly of First Nations' Chiefs in New Brunswick is urging government-to-government talks to deal with resource development on lands within the traditional territories of aboriginal people. With relations still strained by last year's violent demonstrations in Kent County over shale gas exploration, there are calls from all sides for meaningful consultations to involve First Nations people in decisions about natural resource development. On Friday, the assembly said that previous meetings, often set up by the shale gas company SWN Resources Canada, are not sufficient and that a new approach is needed. Telegraph-Journal, A1

INQUEST INTO THE DEATH OF ASHLEY SMITH / ENQUÊTE SUR LA MORT D'ASHLEY SMITH

NIL

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

Telus loses court fight over Ottawa's wireless loophole

Telus Corp. lost a key legal battle with the federal government over its policies to stimulate more competition in the $20-billion wireless market. The Federal Court dismissed Telus's request for a judicial review of a government decision to limit the amount of "prime" spectrum that big carriers are allowed to buy in this month's auction of the 700 megahertz frequency. The Vancouver-based telco was also ordered to pay Ottawa the costs of pursuing its legal action, dealing a blow to the company's efforts to close what it claims is one of three "loopholes" in federal wireless policies. Justice Cecily Strickland's decision comes less than two weeks before the start of bidding in the 700 MHz auction, and follows months of acrimonious relations between Ottawa and the Big Three wireless carriers. The spectrum auction, which begins Jan. 14, is considered a defining event for the wireless industry because it will shape the competitive landscape for decades. Spectrum refers to the publicly owned radio waves that carriers use to provide cellphone service. This particular frequency is especially valuable because of its ability to travel long distances, penetrate buildings and carry wireless data to smartphone users. Globe and Mail, B1

INTERNATIONAL

Is sochi safe from terrorists?

Russian president Vladimir Putin has vowed to annihilate terrorists following twin attacks in Volgograd this week. "We will strongly and decisively continue the battle against terrorists until their total annihilation," he said in a New Year's Eve address. Bombers detonated suicide vests at Volgograd's main railway station on Sunday and on a packed commuter bus on Monday morning, killing 34, injuring more than 100 and raising fears over security for next month's Olympic Winter Games in Sochi. To protect the Games, the 6,000 athletes and the expected 140,000 visitors, Russian authorities are using drones, robots and a massive cyber surveillance system in an unprecedented security operation. The National Post's Michael Higgins analyzes the threats and the security for the XXII Olympic Winter Games. National Post, A12

Lebanon detainee believed tied to bombings

DNA tests confirmed that a man in Lebanese custody is the suspected leader of an al-Qaida-linked group that has claimed responsibility for bombings across the Middle East, the Lebanese army said Friday. In a brief statement, the military said the tests established the detainee's identity as Majid al-Majid, a Saudi citizen and the commander of the Abdullah Azzam Brigades. Al-Majid is on Saudi Arabia's list of 85 most-wanted individuals, and the U.S. State Department has designated the group he leads a foreign terrorist organization. Montreal Gazette, A20

U.S. OK'd Chinese F-35 parts

The Pentagon repeatedly waived laws banning Chinese-built components on U.S. weapons to keep the $392-billion Lockheed Martin F-35 fighter program on track in 2012 and 2013, even as U.S. officials were voicing concern about China's espionage and military buildup. According to Pentagon documents, chief U.S. arms buyer Frank Kendall let two F-35 suppliers, Northrop Grumman and Honeywell International, use Chinese magnets for the new jet's radar system, landing gear and other hardware. Without the waivers, both companies could have faced sanctions for violating U.S. law and the F-35 program could have faced further delays. The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, is examining three such cases involving the F-35, a next-generation fighter being developed for the U.S. and eight countries that helped fund its development: Britain, Canada, Australia, Italy, Norway, Turkey, Denmark and the Netherlands, the documents show. London Free Press, B1

NSA seeks to build quantum computer that could crack most types of encryption

In room-size metal boxes -secure against electromagnetic leaks, the National Security Agency is racing to build a computer that could break nearly every kind of encryption used to protect banking, medical, business and government records around the world. According to documents provided by former NSA contractor Edward Snowden, the effort to build "a cryptologically useful quantum computer" — a machine exponentially faster than classical computers — is part of a $79.7 million research program titled "Penetrating Hard Targets." Much of the work is hosted under classified contracts at a laboratory in College Park, Md. The development of a quantum computer has long been a goal of many in the scientific community, with revolutionary implications for fields such as medicine as well as for the NSA's code-breaking mission. With such technology, all current forms of public key encryption would be broken, including those used on many secure Web sites as well as the type used to protect state secrets. Washington Post

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
January 31, 2015 / le 31 janvier 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Feds take aim at terrorists - New anti-terrorism bill boosts pre-trial custody times, but cuts proof needed to arrest

Endorsing a terrorist attack would be made illegal under sweeping new legislation that also gives the government broad new detention powers. The Conservatives unveiled a bill Friday that would allow the government to jail someone for up to a week without charges, block suspected terrorists from boarding airplanes and "disrupt" possible security threats. The bill would also criminalize "advocacy or promotion of terrorism offences in general." Current laws give police the power to arrest people who call for a specific attack... The bill also redefines the mandate of CSIS, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. CSIS serves primarily as a spy agency that gathers intelligence on possible threats. The new bill would give the agency power to "disrupt" threats to security. The legislation does not spell out what actions CSIS could take but rather what it couldn't do - such as hurt or kill people. Officials said examples could include blocking financial transactions, banning a person from travelling, contacting a person to talk them out of a future attack or blocking communications between people. CSIS would have to have reasonable grounds to believe there was a threat to Canadian security before it could take action. The Security Intelligence Review Committee would annually examine how CSIS was using its threat disruption mandate and report to the public safety minister. Chronicle-Herald, A12

Terror bill a 'call for action' - New legislation gives security officials greatly expanded powers

Sweeping new anti-terrorism legislation introduced by the federal government Friday would make it illegal to promote or advocate terrorism acts, a crime punishable by up to five years in prison. It would allow security officials to block websites, and government agencies to share citizens' personal information for the purposes of battling terrorism. And it would include placing people on a no-fly list if they planned to travel abroad to join groups such as the Islamic State (also known as ISIS or ISIL). The legislation, titled the Anti-terrorism Act 2015, is the most dramatic package of new laws since the Anti-terrorism Act of 2001, passed in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks against the United States... Harper said the bill will help police and security agencies combat terrorism, but added it would be unfair to give the impression that it would prevent all attacks. "We will continue to do our best and we will continue to move forward with other measures as threats evolve." Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney said the killing of a soldier in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que., and the shootings on Oct. 22 in Ottawa, in which Cpl. Nathan Cirillo was killed, showed the government it needed to act. "It was and still is a call for action," Blaney said. "We then said we would not overreact, but we would not underreact." Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, B1; Leader-Post; Star-Phoenix; Ottawa Citizen; Windsor Star; Montreal Gazette; Calgary Herald; Edmonton Journal)

Worries over civil liberties - Critics question whether new anti-terror laws will come at the expense of privacy and free speech

Canada's new anti-terrorism legislation creates sweeping new powers for the nation's security services, but it's not clear there will be equally robust oversight to protect privacy, free speech or civil liberties. Missing from the act, for instance, is a sunset clause for any of its provisions, though the Jean Chrétien Liberals put such a proviso in their anti-terrorism bill introduced after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Nor is there a mandatory review by a certain date - though this may yet be added when the bill goes to a parliamentary committee for review. Some question whether solidifying national security will come at the expense of civil liberties. "Countries that are free are also safer countries. Civil rights and public safety go hand-in-hand," NDP foreign affairs critic Paul Dewar said Friday. The government argues that existing civilian oversight bodies - at the spy agency CSIS, the cyber-spy agency CSE, and the RCMP - are adequate. And the new law does require that the public safety minister regularly report to Parliament on how CSIS is using its new powers. Prime Minister Stephen Harper also said on Friday that the government has worked protections into the bill to prevent erosion of civil liberties in the name of security. Ottawa Citizen, A8 (National Post)

Highlights from the bill

The Anti-Terrorism Act, introduced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper at a community centre in Richmond Hill on Friday, contains sweeping changes. Here are the highlights: Spy games Until now, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), has been allowed only to collect and analyze information about threats to the country, and advise the government about appropriate responses. Now, CSIS will be allowed to "disrupt" those threats, which could include espionage, sabotage, terrorism and what the government calls "domestic subversion." That could include anything from disrupting websites and social media accounts to intercepting goods and weapons... Judges will also be able to require a person to surrender his or her passport, and impose extra reporting requirements or electronic monitoring. No-Fly list The legislation would expand the no-fly list to prevent Canadians from heading overseas to join such terrorist groups as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL). Introduced in 2007, the list has until now applied only to those suspected of being a threat to the airplane they were boarding. However, names on the list will have to be reviewed by the public safety minister every 90 days and the bill will give anyone denied transport the right within 60 days to write to the minister and ask to have their name removed. Postmedia News (National Post, A4)

Anti-terror bill could disrupt fine balance

An opinion piece states "This is not a government that has inspired confidence in its respect for the democratic institutions of this country. The introduction of its new antiterror legislation is a case in point - the whole process happened hundreds of miles from Parliament during Question Period; much of the media briefing took place without the legislation being made available to journalists. Does it deserve to be given the benefit of the doubt when it introduces a dramatic extension of the surveillance powers of the state? The security services are the last line in our defences. Whether handing them enhanced powers will strengthen our democracy, as the prime minister maintains, will depend entirely on how they are used... HIGHLIGHTS FROM THE BILL - No-Fly list - The legislation would expand the no-fly list to prevent Canadians from heading overseas to join such terrorist groups as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL). Introduced in 2007, the list has until now applied only to those suspected of being a threat to the airplane they were boarding. However, names on the list will have to be reviewed by the public safety minister every 90 days and the bill will give anyone denied transport the right within 60 days to write to the minister and ask to have their name removed.” Postmedia News (National Post, A4)

Pas de la bonne télé

Une pièce d'opinion dit « Il aurait été bien plus efficace dans cette lutte au terrorisme au Canada d'augmenter les budgets des diverses agences qui mènent des enquêtes sur le terrain. C'est d'ailleurs exactement ce qu'elles réclament. Le commissaire de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada, Bob Paulson, souhaitait justement cela, récemment: plus de ressources. Ce diagnostic est partagé par les corps policiers. Et les demandes sans cesse croissantes auprès d'agences comme le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité, ou le Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications. Mais approuver une hausse de budget ne fait pas de la bonne télévision. Les caméras ne s'y intéressent pas, personne n'applaudit en arrière-plan, le premier ministre ne s'aurole pas du voile du bon père de famille protecteur de ses ouailles. En plus qu'augmenter les budgets donnent des maux de tête. Le ministre des Finances vient de reporter la date du budget parce que les revenus du fédéral sont en chute à cause de l'effondrement du prix du baril de pétrole. Le bon surplus que M. Harper avait déjà promis aux familles canadiennes, à la veille des élections, il est à peu près disparu. À ses yeux, ce n'est absolument pas le temps d'autoriser des dépenses supplémentaires... dont les Canadiens ne verront pas des bénéfices à court terme. Le Canada compte d'ailleurs sur une vaste brochette de lois antiterroristes qui ont été adoptées après le 11^e septembre 2001. Il est ainsi particulièrement insignifiant d'entendre un ministre comme Steven Blaney de clamer, comme si la Terre avait été créée la veille, qu'«enfin le Canada a une loi antiterroriste». (Il a déjà celle de 2001, celle de 2002, celle de 2011, celles de 2013, celle de 2014.) » Le Droit, 18 (LaPresse.ca)

All parties campaigning and posturing

An opinion piece states “Between the lofty phrases about the crucial importance of security, Canadians deserved a warning: Your politicians are letting election campaigning get in the way. It wasn't just Stephen Harper unveiling security legislation at what looked like a political rally, and then, as the person most responsible for protecting Canadians' basic rights, blithely rejecting the suggestion that security measures must be balanced with civil liberties. There was also the Liberals, across the aisle in opposition, signalling even before they saw the legislation they'd pretty much vote for whatever the Conservatives proposed. Security, it seems, is a political winner, so that's presumably why Mr. Harper delivered this bill with chest-thumping, backed by a giant flag and introduced by two ministers, arguing that his Conservatives will take the necessary measures to confront jihadi terrorism, but other parties won't. Polls suggest most people want action, at home and abroad... THREE PILLARS OF PROTECTION: RCMP NATIONAL SECURITY CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS; CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE; COMMUNICATIONS SECURITY ESTABLISHMENT; Mission Domestic law enforcement Threat reporting Collecting "foreign intelligence"; International counterpart U.S. FBI U.K. "MI5" U.S. NSA; Primary 'Client(s)' The criminal justice system Ministry of Public Safety CSIS, PCO, DND, DFATD, RCMP.” Globe and Mail, A4

Criminalizing speech is a mistake - Letting terrorists speak shows we're not afraid of them, writes Tyler Dawson

An editorial states “The federal government is scared of wannabe terrorists, despite all the tough talk to the contrary. This week, the Prime Minister's Office released the recent iteration of 24 Seven, a look into Stephen Harper's week, and ran a few minutes of the prime minister speaking about how Canadians won't be cowed in the face of terror. That's been the line used by Western leaders ever since the Jan. 7 attacks on the offices of Charlie Hebdo, the French satirical magazine that saw its staff slaughtered by gunmen. On Jan. 10, Minister of Public Safety Steven Blaney was in Paris, and laid a wreath at the office of the dead cartoonists. Blaney, who was representing the Canadian government, said the attacks were an attack on freedom of expression. "We are resolved more than ever to stand up for those values that unite us," Blaney said. But, on Jan. 30, Harper stood in front of reporters, members of Parliament, and the public, and spoke about the government's new anti-terrorism legislation, a bill that diminishes one of those 'values that unite us,' namely, freedom of speech. ‘When you are engaged in activities that specifically promote or advocate terrorism activities, that is a serious criminal offence ... we do not tolerate this in this country and anyone who engages in those activities is going to face the full force of the law in the future,' Harper said. To ban support or advocacy for terrorism in general is to admit we're spooked." Ottawa Citizen, D9

Is segregation of prisoners torture or a 'necessary evil?'

Pressure is mounting on Canada's correctional service to stop isolating prisoners for long periods of time. Two lawsuits are challenging "administrative segregation" as unconstitutional. Several newspaper editorials have condemned the practice. The Correctional Service of Canada says it is looking to "reframe the thinking" of how segregation is used, but is scant on details. Douglas Quan of Postmedia News looks at why the practice is controversial and what alternatives might look like... Q. What is the government's response? A. In an emailed statement this week, Don Head, the commissioner of the correctional service, said the agency is developing an "enhanced model for segregation" to reduce the number and length of segregation placements, reframe the thinking about how segregation is used and strengthen oversight and decision-making. "The goal of the strategy is to reduce the reliance on segregation by creating better options and finding more viable alternatives for safe reintegration into the general population." Outside experts will be consulted and options presented to the public safety minister by June, he said. The statement was pretty much a rehash of what the agency said in December in its official response to recommendations stemming from the coroner's inquest into the high-profile death of Ashley Smith. Vancouver Sun, B2 (Star-Phoenix)

Robbery spurs call for bigger armoured truck crew

The union representing armoured truck workers said with six holdups in the span of a year in the Montreal region, it's time to seriously reconsider the wisdom of only having two people per truck. Two armoured truck employees and a janitor were tied up by armed intruders at a bank late Thursday, as they were handling money. The incident occurred at the RBC branch on Van Horne Ave. near Victoria Ave. about 10:50 p.m. The robbers surprised the building's janitor and tied him up. They then held up the two armoured truck employees and tied them up as well, Montreal Police Constable Jean-Pierre Brabant said. The armoured truck personnel were employees of Montreal-based private security giant GardaWorld. The union representing workers for that company says the firm is prioritizing profit over the security of its employees. "If they are doing it because it's cheaper to pay their insurance company than pay for an additional employee, they're on the wrong track," said Guy Vaillancourt, the vice-president of the Syndicat national de convoyeur(e)s de fonds. Vaillancourt said this is a national problem, and he would like to see Federal Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney enact legislation to govern the industry of private security firms to make it compulsory for security firms to have three-person crews. Montreal Gazette, A6; Journal de Montréal

Harsh spotlight shines on cabinet trio

An opinion piece states "If Stephen Harper were directing a Shakespearean play instead of a government, he would be looking at making it through opening night with the actors he initially cast as courtiers thrust at the last minute in the leading roles of Hamlet and Ophelia. The casting for the cabinet the prime minister designed at mid-mandate to take the Conservatives into next fall's campaign was based on a pre-election script that bears little resemblance to the one dictated by recent international and economic developments. As a result, the last sitting of the current Parliament finds the government's best performers confined to support or cameo roles in the House of Commons. The rising stars that the Conservatives would want to showcase in the lead-up to the fall election - in particular women - can do little more in question period than sit back and applaud on cue as some of their less communication-savvy colleagues struggle in front of the cameras. There are MPs who never shine more brightly in the House than when they are unrehearsed, and others whose political safety, along with that of their party, is best ensured when they are solidly anchored to preestablished lines of argument. Finance Minister Joe Oliver, his national defence colleague Rob Nicholson and Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney all fall in the latter category. Now, events have propelled the three of them in the harsh pre-election spotlight. That was not the scenario Harper and his strategists had in mind when Nicholson and Blaney were assigned their current portfolios in the summer of 2013." Toronto Star, A12

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Trois tempêtes en une semaine

Pas de répit pour les Néo-Brunswickois. Une troisième tempête hivernale en l'espace d'une semaine touchera la province au cours du week-end. Environnement Canada et l'Organisation des mesures d'urgence du Nouveau-Brunswick ont lancé vendredi des avertissements de tempête hivernale pour l'ensemble de la province. Environnement Canada prévoit des chutes de neige abondante dans le sud, le centre et l'est de la province et qualifie même de dangereuses les conditions hivernales prévues dans la région de Moncton et du Sud-Est du Nouveau-Brunswick. Jusqu'à 30 centimètres de neige sont prévus dans cette région, accompagnés de vents forts qui occasionneront probablement de la poudrière réduisant la visibilité... L'Organisation des mesures d'urgence du ministère de la Sécurité publique du Nouveau-Brunswick encourage les automobilistes à ne pas prendre la route jusqu'à ce que les conditions s'améliorent. L'Acadie Nouvelle, 4

Un deuxième cas de grippe aviaire confirmé en Colombie-Britannique – SANTÉ

Un homme de la Colombie-Britannique est officiellement devenu hier le deuxième Canadien à être déclaré positif au virus de la grippe aviaire H7N9, ont confirmé des responsables de la santé de la province. Son épouse avait été le premier cas confirmé. C'est le Laboratoire national de microbiologie de Winnipeg et le laboratoire provincial de la Colombie-Britannique qui ont confirmé le diagnostic. Le couple, qui n'est pas identifié, aurait contracté le virus lors d'un récent voyage en Chine. Les symptômes sont apparus après leur arrivée au Canada. Les deux personnes n'ont pas été hospitalisées et elles se remettent de leur maladie, a fait savoir l'Agence de la santé publique du Canada. L'Agence a indiqué que le risque pour les Canadiens de contracter le virus était très faible, puisqu'il ne se transmet pas facilement de personne à personne. Agence QMI (Journal de Montréal, 29); Presse canadienne (L'Acadie Nouvelle, 27)

Le vaccin contre la grippe a été inefficace cette année

Le vaccin administré au Canada cette année contre la grippe saisonnière a été inefficace. En fait, des données publiées vendredi révèlent que le taux d'efficacité de la campagne de vaccination a été de 0 % au Canada. Le vaccin n'a donc pas offert une protection assez importante pour réduire le nombre de consultations médicales. Ces résultats sont nettement inférieurs à ceux d'une étude américaine, publiés plus tôt ce mois-ci. L'étude américaine concluait que le vaccin avait réduit de 23 % les risques de contracter le virus et d'être assez malade pour consulter un médecin. Or, ce taux de réussite est déjà bien inférieur à celui habituellement atteint par un vaccin contre la grippe saisonnière, qui se situe entre 50 et 70 %. L'auteure de l'étude canadienne, la docteure Danuta Skowronski, explique que jusqu'ici cette année, la plupart des cas de grippe ont été causés par des virus de type H3N2 et que les vaccins protègent uniquement contre les souches B et H1N1 de l'influenza. Presse canadienne (L'Acadie Nouvelle, 3)

Quake may be linked to fracking - Regulator investigating Jan. 22 event

The Alberta Energy Regulator is investigating an earthquake near Fox Creek this month that may be linked to hydraulic fracturing. On Jan. 22, the AER confirmed a "seismic event" with a magnitude of 4.4 on the Richter scale about 33 kilometres west of Fox Creek, which is 260 km northwest of Edmonton. There were no surface impacts and no damage was reported, AER spokesman Peter Murchland said via email Friday. "Preliminary information indicates the event may be related to hydraulic fracturing operations in the area," Murchland said. "It is, however, impossible to state that it was not a naturally occurring event." Hydraulic fracturing involves injecting fluids at high pressure deep underground to cause fractures in rock formations, allowing oil and gas to flow through the cracks to the wellbore. The practice, commonly known as fracking, has been known to induce earthquakes. Edmonton Journal, A3

Quake readiness is serious business - Natural disasters: A megathrust temblor will come one day, and we in B.C. must be prepared

An opinion piece states "On Jan. 7, a magnitude-4.6 earthquake shook Vancouver Island, startling residents of the area but causing only minor damage. It was another reminder that B.C.'s coastline is part of a geological marvel, the Ring of Fire, a hotbed for seismic activity. But maybe the recent quake wasn't so insignificant after all. Last week, the Canadian media sounded the alarm on B.C.'s vulnerability to a much larger, damaging earthquake. Experts say that Vancouver Island has a one-in-10 chance of being hit with a megathrust earthquake in the next 50 years. Historically, megathrust quakes reach magnitudes of around nine on the Richter scale. The 2004 Indian Ocean earthquake and the 2011 quake that struck off Japan both fall in that category. It's hard to imagine this magnitude of quake occurring off the B.C. coast, but scientists confirm that it's just a matter of time. They just don't know precisely when, which makes it easy for the population at large to dismiss the odds and neglect to prepare. A lack of preparedness is occurring at several levels." Vancouver Sun, D4

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

* Jihadism 'an act of war'

Tough new anti-terror legislation in Canada would make it a crime to call for attacks and carves out larger roles for police and spies. The bill introduced by the Conservative government Friday would give spy agency Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) the ability to disrupt attacks by interfering with travel plans or communications, for example. In the past, CSIS has been limited to the collection of intelligence. The bill also would make it easier for police to make preventive arrests. "Jihadi terrorism as it is evolving is one of the most dangerous enemies our world has ever faced," Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who faces a general election in October, said at a news conference. "Violent jihadism is not a human right. It is an act of war." Responding to early critics, Harper said security and police agencies still would need judicial approval for preventive arrests or to disrupt potential attacks. "Canadians understand their freedom and their security go often hand in hand. They expect us to do both; we are doing both," he said. "We do not buy the argument that every time you protect Canadians, you somehow take away their liberties." QMI Agency (London Free Press, A1; Edmonton Sun; Ottawa Sun; Winnipeg Sun)

* Trying to deal with threats early on

Had it been in place earlier, the anti-terrorism legislation proposed on Friday might have prevented the attack that killed a soldier in Quebec last October. But it's unlikely it would have headed off the death of a soldier at the National War Memorial in Ottawa. The attacks on Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent on Oct. 20 in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, and on Cpl. Nathan Cirillo two days later in Ottawa, were among the reasons the government moved Friday to provide new tools and powers to security agencies, such as the ability to more easily detain potential terrorists, and the ability to hold them for longer periods of time in preventive detention. The man who killed Vincent in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Martin Rouleau-Couture, had been on the RCMP's radar over the summer when they noticed Facebook posts indicating he was becoming radicalized. Officials seized his passport, but didn't have grounds to charge him. Ottawa Citizen, A7

* Harper's next act: Give CSIS teeth - PM proposes dramatic boost to spy agency's powers in effort to defend against the 'great evil ... descending over our world'

Stephen Harper is proposing the most sweeping increase in power for Canadian security agencies since the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, including jail time for encouraging terrorism on the Internet, while playing down concerns over the impact on civil liberties. The new charge for advocating "the commission of terrorist offences in general" would carry penalties of up to five years in prison and is part of a package of anti-terror measures introduced Friday, which come as a response to the deadly attacks on soldiers last October that included a gunman storming Parliament. This Anti-Terrorism Act is igniting a national debate about the proper balance between freedom and security in Canada in the 21st century, including whether there is sufficient outside scrutiny of the law-enforcement agencies that are gaining new powers. The legislation would also grant Canada's spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the power to intervene and disrupt threats to national security, a major change from merely collecting intelligence and handing off the matter to the RCMP. Globe and Mail, A3

CSIS: A short history of Canada's spy agency - New law gives security service legal powers of enforcement

New powers for Canada's spy agency proposed in Friday's sweeping anti-terrorism bill would bring the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service closer to the disbanded law-enforcement agency it replaced three decades ago. At the moment, CSIS is a spy agency with no enforcement powers. When CSIS agents suspect criminal activity, they pass on their findings to the RCMP to investigate, and to lay charges if needed. The separation between spies and police came about in 1984, after a decade of nefarious activities by the Mounties, who had run a separate intelligence branch since 1936. Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, B3; Leader-Post; Calgary Herald)

Mesures déjà contestées - HARPER DÉPOSE SON PROJET DE LOI ANTITERRORISTE

Les nouvelles mesures antiterroristes du gouvernement Harper pourraient facilement dérapier, avertissent certains défenseurs des droits et libertés. «C'est épouvantable. Le projet de loi est en totale violation des droits fondamentaux», estime l'avocat criminaliste Patrick Davis sans mâcher ses mots. Et il n'est pas le seul. «Je suis d'accord sur le principe de vouloir protéger les citoyens avec des moyens efficaces, mais il ne faut pas que ça se fasse selon les caprices de l'agent», considère quant à lui Robert La Haye, un autre avocat criminaliste. Stephen Harper avait promis de renforcer les mesures de sécurité à la suite des attaques terroristes de Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu et d'Ottawa, en octobre dernier. Il a finalement déposé son projet de loi hier. «Ces mesures visent à cibler les actions qui menacent notre liberté, notre démocratie et nos traditions de tolérance», a indiqué M. Harper. Journal de Québec, 6 (Journal de Montréal)

Spy service to get stronger counter-terror powers

Canada's spy agency could soon have the power to derail terrorist plots - not just gather and analyze information about them - as the government moves to confront radical threats with an array of new legal tools. Legislation tabled Friday would allow the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to thwart a suspected extremist's travel plans, disrupt bank transactions and covertly meddle with jihadist websites. The plan to boost the spy service's ability to counter terrorism flows from a review of fatal attacks on two Canadian soldiers last October - incidents the government believes were fuelled by Islamic extremism. The Conservatives say the new powers are needed to help keep Canadians safe in an increasingly dangerous world. Canadian Press (Waterloo Region Record, A3; Hamilton Spectator)

Plus de mordant contre la terreur

Le gouvernement Harper a présenté hier son très attendu projet de loi antiterrorisme, qui élargit les pouvoirs des services de renseignement et accorde une longue liste de nouveaux outils aux services policiers et au gouvernement pour combattre le terrorisme. Le projet de loi C-51, un document de plus de 60 pages, donne entre autres au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) la possibilité d'agir lui-même pour contrer certaines menaces, plutôt que de devoir s'en remettre à d'autres organismes, comme la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. C-51 rend aussi plus facile l'imposition par les tribunaux de conditions à certains suspects, en plus de faire passer la détention préventive de trois à un maximum de sept jours afin de donner plus de temps aux autorités pour amasser des éléments de preuve pour pouvoir porter des accusations. Le Soleil, 11

Could new terror laws have helped to rein in these homegrown extremists?

The new anti-terrorism legislation introduced Friday by Prime Minister Stephen Harper responds to some of the newest trends in terrorism practices and propaganda practised by the likes of the Islamic State group in Syria and Iraq. But the new measures are also trying to fill gaps or weaknesses in Canadian laws that have been identified by spies and police on terrorism's front line. With the benefit of hindsight, here is how some of the proposed measures could have applied to recent Canadian cases of homegrown extremism. Toronto Star, A19

Tools to fight 'Jihadist terrorism'

Prime Minister Stephen Harper says tougher laws are needed to stop terrorist plots. Among the changes proposed in Bill C-51: Sweeping new powers for CSIS to take "measures" within Canada and abroad to disrupt terror threats. Expanding the no-fly list to anyone suspected of travelling abroad to engage in terror activities. Removing legal barriers that block information sharing among government agencies, such as immigration officials passing along concerns about a passport holder's travel plans. New Criminal Code provisions that would allow court orders to remove terrorist propaganda, including from the Internet. Changes to criminalize the promotion of terrorism. Toronto Star, A1

Davantage de pouvoirs au SCRS

Le gouvernement Harper a présenté hier son très attendu projet de loi antiterrorisme, qui élargit les pouvoirs des services de renseignement et accorde une longue liste de nouveaux outils aux services

policiers et au gouvernement pour combattre le terrorisme. Le projet de loi C-51, un document de plus de 60 pages, donne entre autres au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) la possibilité d'agir lui-même pour contrer certaines menaces, plutôt que de devoir s'en remettre à d'autres organismes, comme la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. C-51 rend aussi plus facile l'imposition par les tribunaux de conditions à certains suspects, en plus de faire passer la détention préventive de trois à un maximum de sept jours afin de donner plus de temps aux autorités pour amasser des éléments de preuve pour pouvoir porter des accusations. Le premier ministre Stephen Harper a fait l'annonce de ces nouvelles mesures lors d'une conférence de presse aux allures électorales en banlieue de Toronto, pendant que les parlementaires et journalistes obtenaient des séances d'information par des fonctionnaires à Ottawa. La Presse (La Tribune, 12; Le Droit; Le Quotidien; La Tribune; Le Droit)

Plus de pouvoirs au SCRS

Le projet de loi antiterroriste déposé hier donnera au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) davantage de pouvoirs pour contrer les projets de voyage de présumés extrémistes, interrompre des transactions bancaires et intervenir secrètement sur des sites Web radicaux. Pour élaborer ce projet de loi, les conservateurs se sont appuyés sur une révision interne des attaques qui ont coûté la vie à deux soldats canadiens, en octobre, deux événements que le gouvernement estime liés à l'extrémisme islamique. Comme prévu, la loi permettrait également à la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) d'obtenir plus facilement un engagement à ne pas troubler l'ordre public afin de restreindre les déplacements d'un suspect. Elle allonge aussi la période permise pour les arrestations préventives et la détention. Presse canadienne (La Voix de l'Est, 14; L'Acadie Nouvelle)

Intelligence oversight body gets new member

Ian Holloway, dean of law at the University of Calgary, has been named as a member of the Security Intelligence Review Committee. The committee oversees the work of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. In making the appointment, Prime Minister Stephen Harper says Holloway brings a wealth of legal experience to the job. Holloway served 26 years in the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Australian Navy before his academic career. He was born in Halifax and grew up in New Brunswick and holds degrees from Dalhousie University, the University of California at Berkeley and the Australian National University. Canadian Press (Cape Breton Post, A10)

Faire la promotion du terrorisme devient une infraction criminelle - La formulation "préconiser et fomenter", non définie, pourrait poser problème, selon un spécialiste en sécurité

Le projet de loi C-51 déposé vendredi à la Chambre des communes instaure un tout nouveau type de crime au Canada : celui d'encourager le terrorisme par la parole et les écrits. Des spécialistes en droit s'interrogent déjà sur les dérapages qui pourraient survenir. Sera passible de cinq ans de prison quiconque, " sciemment, par la communication de déclarations, préconise ou fomente la perpétration d'infractions de terrorisme en général [...] sachant que la communication entraînera la perpétration de l'une de ces infractions ou sans se soucier du fait que la communication puisse ou non entraîner la perpétration de l'une de ces infractions ". Mais comment sera interprété cet article ? Un jeune dans son sous-sol qui relayerait, sur sa page Facebook ou son fil Twitter, un lien vers la vidéo d'un apologiste du djihadisme serait-il automatiquement destiné à la prison ? Le premier ministre Stephen Harper n'a pas écarté cette possibilité. Le Devoir, A2

Spy service to get stronger anti terror powers

Newly tabled anti-terrorism legislation would give Canada's spy agency more power to thwart a suspected extremist's travel plans, disrupt bank transactions and covertly interfere with radical websites. The plan to boost the Canadian Security Intelligence Service's ability to counter terrorist threats flows from a review of fatal attacks on two Canadian soldiers last October - incidents the government believes were fuelled by Islamic extremism. CSIS would become an agency that actively tries to derail terror plots, not just one that collects and analyzes information about such plans. As expected, the bill would also make it easier for the RCMP to obtain a peace bond to restrict the movements of a suspect and it extends the period for preventative arrest and detention. In addition, the legislation would expand the no-fly regime to cover those travelling by air to take part in terrorist activities, whereas currently there must be an immediate risk to the plane. Canadian Press (Cape Breton Post, A10)

 FIVE FACTS ABOUT THE NEW ANTI-TERRORISM LEGISLATION

The legislation flows from an internal federal review following fatal attacks last October on two Canadian soldiers - incidents the government believes were fuelled by Islamic extremism. On Oct. 22, Michael Zehaf Bibeau shot Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, an honour guard at the National War Memorial, before rushing into Parliament's Centre Block. Zehaf Bibeau was quickly shot dead. Two days earlier, Martin Couture-Rouleau fatally rammed Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent with a car in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que. After a chase, police shot and killed the knife-wielding assailant. Existing law requires a fear that someone "will commit" a terrorism offence before police can obtain a peace bond - a legal tool that can mean jail unless a suspect abides by strict conditions, for instance, limits on where they go and with whom they associate. Expect a lower threshold that gives authorities more flexibility. Look for the Secure Air Travel Act, a substantial reworking of Canada's no-fly list regime. Under the program in place since June 2007, airlines rely on a list of individuals considered "an immediate threat to civil aviation" should they board an aircraft. The retooled system would deny a boarding pass to anyone deemed to be a national security threat, even if there is no explicit plan to attack a plane. Chronicle-Herald, A12

 Calgary jihadists' mom decries legislation

The Conservative government's anti-terror legislation is more political posturing than protective, the mother of a Calgary man killed fighting for an al-Qaida-linked group said Friday. The bill seems to score more political points than offering realistic curbs on recruiting by jihadist cells, Chris Boudreau said. "They've got an election year. They'll put everything in just to make themselves look good," Boudreau said. "It's an easy, quick fix to look like they're doing something." She said provisions clamping down on pro-terrorism propaganda appear ineffective in the face of an international Internet and will only "fuel the fire" of extremists while ignoring its roots and long-term solutions... But as for granting police more powers, Boudreau said CSIS is already using those it has to alienate Canadian families sharing her fate, who could be of help. "I've heard families complain about their approach -- it's destroying their credibility and instilling fear," said Boudreau, adding her approaches to the intelligence agency have been ignored. Edmonton Sun, 30 (Calgary Sun)

 Spy agency to become 'disruptive' influence

Canada's lead spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, will gain some real cloak-and-dagger clout under the Conservatives' proposed Anti-terrorism Act. The government's sweeping package of anti-terror measures tabled in the House of Commons Friday would, among other things, give the organization broad powers to "disrupt threats to the security of Canada," including terrorism, espionage, sabotage, foreign-influenced activities, and domestic subversion. Bill C-51 would amend the 31-year-old CSIS Act to authorize agents to secure warrants to enter "any place or open or obtain access to anything, or install, maintain or remove any thing." It would also authorize the service to "do any other thing that is reasonably necessary to take those measures." What's more, the law would compel individuals and organizations, from landlords to telecoms, to abide by any CSIS request for assistance in carrying out the so-called "disruption techniques." "This allows them to do some pretty concrete measures," said Christian Leuprecht, a national security expert at Kingston's Royal Military College and Queen's University. Ottawa Citizen, A8

 Identifying the new face of terror - 'Lone wolf' attacks more difficult to prevent than sophisticated plots in Canada, security experts say

There was no telling how or when he might hurt someone. In St-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Martin Couture-Rouleau - a 25-year-old radicalized convert to Islam - chose the morning of Monday, Oct. 20, to plow his gold-beige 2000 Nissan Altima into two Canadian Armed Forces members. Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent, 53, died of his injuries the next day. Two days later, another radicalized convert, 32-year-old Michael Zehaf-Bibeau, picked 9:32 a.m. to shoot and kill Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, 24, a sentry at Ottawa's National War Memorial, before storming Parliament Hill. Both men acted alone, without the formal backing of a terrorist organization. And both men were from Quebec. (Couture-Rouleau seemed to be as pure laine as they come.) By all appearances, the suicidal attacks were unrelated. As Canadians reeled from the events, our police forces were wondering what, if anything, they could have done to prevent the killings. Young, radicalized lone operators who veer toward violence have raised new challenges for security forces around the world... On Friday, the Harper government announced an anti-terrorism bill that would, among other things, give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service the power to intervene to disrupt terrorist activities. Since it was founded in 1984, CSIS has been a civilian agency that gathers intelligence, which it then hands off to the RCMP. But can such new measures, which also include increased powers to restrict the movements of suspected jihadists, actually stop a lone wolf hiding in plain sight? Montreal Gazette, B1

Law would give CSIS unnecessary authority

A column states "Stephen Harper's new anti-terror bill is tough, backward-looking and almost certainly unnecessary. Bill C-51 would allow a judge to impose up to a year of house arrest on someone who has neither been convicted nor charged with any crime. The judge could also require that the target wear an electronic bracelet. The only requirement in the bill, introduced Friday in the Commons, is that police produce satisfactory evidence this person "may" commit a terrorist offence. That's tough. Not as tough as the anti-terror laws of, say, Britain or North Korea. But in Canadian terms, tough. The bill would also authorize the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) to engage in illegal acts and so-called dirty tricks." Toronto Star, A19

Anti-Terror Blathering

An opinion piece states " There are many reasons to be appalled by the haphazard, overbearing and ill-defined provisions criminalizing the general promotion of terrorism that were presented by the federal Conservative government on Friday, but worst of all is the potential they have to actually increase the likelihood of radicalization and terrorism in Canada. Under the bill, those who encourage terrorist attacks (which are defined in many different ways) via signs, writing, audio or video recordings, or other visual representations could face up to five years in prison. The Conservatives haven't really explained the rationale yet, though it seems to come down to the assertion that, as Justice Minister Peter MacKay put it following the shootings here in Ottawa in October, projihadi media are 'poisoning young minds.'... And even if some minds do get "poisoned" to the point that they fire up some video editing software and make their own unique ISIL love letters - or even just share someone else's - is it worth it to send other potentially violent jihadis underground to snare a handful of disgruntled youngsters packing laptops? Don't you want these dopes pontificating on the Internet for law enforcement to see and track?" Ottawa Citizen, D9

Vast powers, scant scrutiny

An editorial states "Canadians have been rattled by the terror attacks on Parliament Hill and in Quebec, and by those in France and Australia. More than a few will give Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative government a conditional pass on the sweeping new anti-terror laws it has just introduced. Yet even supporters of tough measures may wonder just how radically we need to expand the security services' powers to keep the country safe from jihadist 'acts of war' and other terrorism. The new Anti-Terrorism Act 2015 goes very far indeed. And unlike the United States, Britain, France and other allies, Canada has no mechanism to let Parliament effectively scrutinize the activities of our increasingly powerful, ever-more-intrusive security services. With every new ratcheting-up of the terror laws, that absence of oversight is becoming increasingly hard to justify. Alex Neve of Amnesty International calls it a 'glaring and very troubling' gap." Toronto Star, IN6

 Liberté et sécurité

Une pièce d'opinion dit « Pour intensifier la lutte au terrorisme, le gouvernement Harper a déposé hier un projet de loi aux Communes. Celui-ci modifie notamment le mandat du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) et augmente considérablement ses pouvoirs. Celui-ci deviendra ainsi une véritable agence de renseignements avec des moyens d'intervention élargis. Est-ce que la sécurité sera pour autant relevée? Plusieurs observateurs en doutent. Le projet de loi a pour objectif de prévenir les attentats et de maîtriser ceux qui vantent les mérites du terrorisme. Il vise aussi à saboter les efforts de recrutement au Canada et à empêcher les sympathisants de quitter le pays... Tout n'est pas mauvais dans le projet de loi et quelques dispositions semblent justifiées. Pourtant, il va trop loin quand il fait du SCRS une véritable agence de renseignements. Ces créatures ont une forte propension à dépasser leurs limites à l'exemple de l'Agence nationale de la sécurité aux États-Unis. Il aura fallu un Edward Snowden pour dévoiler la réelle dimension du monstre. D'accord pour faire échec au terrorisme, mais en y consacrant d'abord l'argent et les effectifs nécessaires, évitant ainsi de restreindre les libertés individuelles. » La Tribune, 16

 C-51 - Harper vise large

Une pièce d'opinion « Le premier ministre Harper hausse de plusieurs crans sa lutte contre le terrorisme en territoire canadien. Forces de police et de renseignement obtiendront, avec le projet de loi C-51, de nouveaux pouvoirs. Trop ? Dans le débat à venir, le Parlement devra se demander si les droits et libertés n'en seront pas amoindris. Il est toujours difficile d'aborder la question des droits quand un gouvernement invoque la sécurité du pays pour justifier l'attribution de plus de pouvoirs aux forces de l'ordre. D'emblée, Stephen Harper récuse ici l'idée que ce projet de loi puisse menacer les droits des Canadiens. La menace à ses yeux vient du djihadisme, qui est 'l'ennemi le plus dangereux de notre monde'. A l'intention des députés d'opposition qui voudraient critiquer le projet de loi C-51, il rappelle que ce sont les djihadistes 'qui veulent nous enlever nos libertés'... Si sécurité et liberté vont de pair, comme le soutient Stephen Harper, tout est, par contre, affaire d'équilibre. Le projet de loi prévoit des mesures d'encadrement judiciaire des pouvoirs donnés à la GRC et au SCRS. Il faudra s'assurer qu'ils sont suffisants. Des mécanismes de contrôle parlementaires sont aussi nécessaires. La démocratie qu'on veut protéger exige une reddition de comptes publique. » Le Devoir, B4

 Terror bill needs work

An opinion piece states "The Islamic State threat is real. The caliphate's adherents have committed attacks on Canadian soil. Radicals have gone to join the fight and continue to call for more attacks here. We need to be firm. Poll data shows most Canadians agree. We agree with most of the new anti-terrorism legislation, Bill C-51, put forward Friday. The Secure Air Travel Act allows for the 'denial of transportation to a person' along with 'the screening of a person before they enter a sterile area of an airport or board an aircraft.' If this measure can be employed in a way that singles out the bad apples the authorities have been watching, rather than just making everyone including Grandma take their shoes off, we're good with that. As long as there is strong adversarial review -- which is what the opposition and the courts will provide -- it's less likely those empowered will go overboard. A no-fly list should be reserved for the worst of the lot. Not something used arbitrarily." Edmonton Sun, 14 (Ottawa Sun; Winnipeg Sun; Calgary Sun)

 Terror law raises crucial concerns - Freedom threat?: Bill increases power of CSIS

An opinion piece states "As the government tabled a sweeping new anti-terrorism bill in Parliament on Friday, Prime Minister Stephen Harper gave a strong speech in suburban Toronto, looking profoundly self-assured as he laid out the political case for the enormous change his government is making. We live in a dangerous new world and must deal with the urgent threat posed by 'violent jihadism,' Harper said, pointing to the two attacks of October as justification for these new powers. It seems wise to recall that we must take it on his word that they were, as they appear, planned terrorist attacks, since security officials have not reported on connections between the attackers and terror groups. Without access to the secret information that Harper and his officials have, it is difficult to assess the arguments for the necessity of these changes and impossible to counter them... All of this new spying is to be supervised only by the Security Intelligence Review Committee, since in 2012 the government got rid of the CSIS inspector general's office. It is hard to have much faith in SIRC, given that the government has not bothered to keep it fully staffed, and previously had an accused fraudster running it. The expansion of the Canadian secret national-security apparatus is inevitable. If Canadians are to have faith that these vast new powers are not abused by power-mad or incompetent spies, we must keep an eye on them. There is no good reason not to do so and it's worrying that this government doesn't see that." Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, B1; Ottawa Citizen; Windsor Star)

 Keeping Canada safe from terrorism

An editorial states "The new anti-terrorism legislation unveiled Friday will strike many Canadians as reasonable given the threat at hand: CSIS will have new powers to interrupt suspected terrorist threats, to monitor suspects and stop them from leaving the country. No-fly lists will be expanded to include those suspected of wanting to commit terrorism abroad. Criteria under which police can obtain a peace bond will be relaxed, and time limits on preventive arrests and detention will be lengthened. There will be a new focus on eradicating 'terrorist propaganda.' Some of these measures make some sense, at least in terms of their motivations. A country at war with ISIS should obviously be at pains to prevent its citizens from swelling their ranks... Ultimately, however, the legislation raises more questions than it answers - the most basic being, 'Why?' 'The plan to boost CSIS's ability to counter terrorist threats flows from a federal review of fatal attacks on two Canadian soldiers last October,' Postmedia News reports. We are assured the threat of similar attacks in future is significant. But in the case of the Parliament Hill attack, Canadians have not even been allowed to see the apparently revelatory videotaped manifesto the shooter left behind. They have not been allowed to see the CCTV footage of his attack on Centre Block. The threat to civil liberties may be minor, but that doesn't excuse the government from making a more compelling case for imposing it." National Post, A16

 Not all proposed security reforms guarantee Canadians' safety

An opinion piece states "The federal government promised a legislative response to the October attacks in Ottawa and Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que. What it tabled Friday is a selective overhaul of national security law. Some reforms seem sensible but others draw red or yellow lights. Privacy and freedom of expression appear to take significant hits, without assuring that Canadians will be safer. And the government continues to turn a blind eye to systemic failings in our national security accountability system. The new internal government information-sharing legislation blinks red. Critically, it paints national security broadly - including things like the 'economic and financial stability of Canada.' Much is left to be decided in regulations under the new act but once information is shared, it can be disclosed 'to any person, for any purpose,' open-textured language that makes any veteran of the Maher Arar saga cringe. Accountability is invoked in the preamble, but not established - a whole-of-government information-sharing regime is not matched by a renewed whole-of-government accountability mechanism. On the criminal side, the headline is a new offence of knowingly 'advocating or promoting' commission of 'terrorism offences in general' while knowing or being reckless about a terrorist offence that 'may be committed.' This is, at best, a "stale" yellow light - we simply do not know what these vaguely drafted offences means. The criminalization of advocating and promoting seems to go beyond the enormously expansive existing crimes relating to inciting and threatening, but it's unclear how far. We will find out after some lucky person says something that results in a prosecution. The law infringes on freedom of expression, but is it reasonable? Until then, speech will be chilled. We don't agree with extremist ranters, but chilling those rants won't make Canadians safer." Globe and Mail, A4

 Let's try to avoid pantomime in anti-terror debate

An opinion piece states "The braying from Parliament Hill over the government's antiterror plans is likely to obscure two inconvenient facts: All politicians want to prevent terrorist attacks on Canadian soil, and all politicians want to respect Canadians' civil liberties while tracking terrorists. Partisans are loathe to admit these facts because it hides the political truth: The opposition - and interest groups - will hammer the government's motive on the latter, while the government benches will challenge the opposition's motive over the former. And then, of course, there's reality; Canadians don't want pantomime, they want a measured and reasoned debate on terrorism - and how to prevent it. Canadians watched the carnage in Ottawa, Paris and Sydney. They've seen Canadian youth brandishing AK-47s. And they've heard the warnings from ISIL's unholy spokesmen that more attacks are on the way. They know we need to talk about terrorism. Why? Because Canada is at risk and we have 8-track terror legislation in what's become a streaming terror world." Ottawa Citizen, D1

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

 Wrongly accused, Metro man collects millions from Ottawa - In 2010, Steven de Jaray was charged with exporting electronics that could help terrorists. By the time the charges were dropped in 2011, he had lost his company and reputation

The federal government paid a financial settlement - reportedly one of the largest in Canadian history - to a former Vancouver businessman after accusing his Delta company of dealing in goods that could pose a threat to national security, and then abandoning the charges a year later. Steven de Jaray filed a civil lawsuit, claiming he lost millions in personal wealth after he was charged in 2010 with trying to export electronics that government officials said could be used in military weapons. De Jaray said the charges laid by the Canada Border Services Agency contributed to the collapse of his company and other business interests, before they were withdrawn in 2011. The government reached an out-of-court settlement with de Jaray in 2013, he said. But he is prohibited from revealing the amount paid to him from Ottawa's taxpayer-funded coffers. However, CTV's W5, in an investigative segment that airs tonight, reports that de Jaray received the second-highest government settlement in Canadian history, estimated to be around $10 million. Vancouver Sun, A6 (National Post; Montreal Gazette)

 Ils remplaçaient le tabac importé illégalement par du tabac moisi

Des trafiquants de tabac qui profitaient du transit de leur produit au Canada pour le remplacer par du tabac moisi ont été arrêtés et accusés hier de complot et de contrebande. Cinq individus et deux compagnies sont poursuivis pour avoir été impliqués dans ce vaste réseau de contrebande de tabac qui est parvenu à introduire au pays près de neuf millions de cigarettes et plus de 40 000 kg de tabac en vrac. « Le tabac était en provenance des États-Unis et la destination finale devait être Haïti, a indiqué l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada (ASFC) dans un communiqué. Or, pendant le transit au Canada, ils ont trafiqué le tabac pour exporter des marchandises de remplacement comme du tabac moisi et de la poussière de tabac ». Le produit qui avait été altéré était alors redirigé vers un entrepôt de Lachine afin d'être introduit en contrebande dans le marché canadien. Agence QMI (Journal de Montréal, 24)

 Alleged war criminal fights deportation - Ontario man's 20-year case continues as he appeals revocation of his citizenship

An elderly Kitchener-Waterloo developer facing deportation over his connection to a Nazi killing unit will appeal a recent Federal Court decision dismissing his application for a judicial review, his lawyer says. Helmut Oberlander, who is about 90, was seeking a review of a 2012 federal order-in-council stripping him of his citizenship. Oberlander and Ottawa have been in a legal battle over his status for 20 years, and the case could eventually make its way to the Supreme Court of Canada. His family says he has never been charged with any war crime by Ottawa and maintains he wasn't a Nazi. He is, however, on the 2014 Simon Wiesenthal Centre list of most-wanted Nazi war criminals. Toronto Star, A2

 U.S. citizen sentenced to time served on immigration charge

A U.S. citizen of Albanian descent pleaded guilty to an immigration charge Friday in Dartmouth provincial court. Bledar Alex Batska, 38, was arrested at Halifax Stanfield International Airport on Oct. 13 after arriving on an Oct. 13 flight from Iceland. Batska was charged with violating the Immigration Refugee Protection Act by helping an Albanian man on the same flight try to enter Canada illegally... Both lawyers said Batska likely will be ruled inadmissible for entry into Canada and deported to the United States. Chronicle-Herald, A9

 Man With No Name blamed for detention - IRB Ruling

A constitutional challenge by the Man With No Name to force his release from prison - where he has been kept for more than eight years because the government cannot be sure who he is - has been thwarted by his decades of lying and the government's continuing efforts to prove his identity. Canada's Immigration Refugee Board (IRB) rejected a broad challenge seeking to limit immigration detention in Canada to six months and dismissed claims; it also dismissed his argument his detention - with no end in sight - is "cruel and unusual treatment" and violates Canada's Charter of Rights Freedoms and international law. The Man With No Name now claims he is Michael Mvogo of Cameroon, but he was previously similarly adamant several other names were his true identity. Until Canada knows who he is and where he was born, the Canadian Border Services Agency (CBSA) cannot deport him. Until he can be deported, the government is unwilling to release him. As revealed by the National Post, his incarceration has lasted eight years. National Post, A11

 Border guards put brakes on man's deception to devalue vehicle

James W. MacMillan, 59, of Charlottetown has pleaded guilty to one count of making false or deceptive statements under the Customs Act. MacMillan was fined $2,000 as well as a victim surcharge of $600. He appeared in Woodstock provincial court on Jan. 28 after he was nabbed by the Canadian Border Services Agency. "When MacMillan arrived at the Woodstock border crossing on Aug. 8, he declared the purchase of a 1939 Ford Roadster for $32,778," said Tom Critchlow, director of enforcement and intelligence operations division for the Atlantic region. "He was referred to secondary inspection, where it was determined the actual value of the vehicle was $56,815." The Canadian Border Services Agency seized the Roadster, which was released back to MacMillan once he paid the $13,220 terms of release. Daily Gleaner, A7

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

 Hacking's history a window into cyber-crime

Say you want to burgle a house. You could walk in through the front door, but that would work only until the owner wised up and made sure it was locked. You might then acquire tools to pick the lock, or glass cutters to get in through a window. Heck, you could cut a hole in the roof or tunnel into the basement. If, instead of a house, you were burgling a computer to steal its contents or just to mess up its mind, each of these break-in schemes - "exploits" - would have to be tried a first time: a "zero day" in cyber-speak. About 12 million exploits, created largely by criminal hackers, are uncovered annually, affecting tens of millions of computers and, typically, the credit cards of their owners. Most of these exploits are copies or variations of malicious software - also known as malware - that once was a unique and very rare zero day. (It is estimated that one zero day is captured for every one million malicious files.) In Countdown to Zero Day, award-winning writer Kim Zetter brilliantly explains the short history and astonishing evolution of hacking, cyber-spying and malware and of the legions - yes, legions - of agencies and enterprises engaged full-time and worldwide to secure computers from cyber-invasions. Winnipeg Free Press, A1

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

Costs of June 4 shootings and aftermath still being discussed

New Brunswick's minister of public safety says the door is certainly still open for the province to help the Codiac Regional Policing Authority with extraordinary costs incurred during a shooting rampage and its aftermath in Moncton last June. Sheila Lagacé, a department spokeswoman, clarified the matter after media reports appeared this week suggesting otherwise. The murder of three RCMP members and wounding of two other Mounties in north end Moncton resulted in one of the largest police operations in Canadian history to capture the killer, investigate the crimes and police the tri-community with replacement officers temporarily while many local RCMP members were stood down for mandatory counselling and debriefings. Local constables Fabrice Gevaudan, Dave Ross and Douglas Larche were killed, and constables Darlene Goguen and Éric Dubois were wounded. Moncton resident Justin Bourque was given five life sentences with no chance of parole for 75 years for his crimes at the end of October. While the human costs are well known, the fiscal cost of the events of June and beyond are still being calculated. However, it's been estimated to be in the millions of dollars. By way of comparison, the costs of policing during several months of protest against natural gas exploration in Kent County in 2013 cost an estimated $9.5 million. Times and Transcript, A11

A hit to the heart - Despite his notorious life, Canadian Mob boss Vito Rizzuto wasn't prepared when his eldest son, Nick, met a violent end

In their new book, Business or Blood, veteran Toronto Star reporter Peter Edwards and author Antonio Nicaso focus on Vito Rizzuto, once Canada's most powerful Canadian Mafia boss. Edwards, who specializes in organized crime and justice issues, and Nicaso, an expert on organized crime, chronicle the events leading up to Rizzuto's imprisonment in Colorado in 2006 and the unravelling of his empire. Rizzuto was agonizingly far from his Montreal home when he learned of the murder. Violent death was a fact of life in his world, no more out of place than the slaughter of chickens and cattle on a farm. Murder had been necessary for Vito's family to rise to power in Montreal's underworld, and murder helped them expand that power and make money beyond his ancestors' wildest dreams. And murder - three, in fact, that Vito had a hand in 28 years earlier - explained why he was stuck in a prison cell in the dusty former cowboy boom town of Florence, Colo., about an hour and a half south of Denver. That said, no murder that the mobster had ordered, witnessed or committed in his 63 years of life readied him for what the prison chaplain had come to tell him: this time, the bullet-scarred corpse was that of his own eldest child, Nick Rizzuto Jr. Toronto Star, IN1

 Un proche des Hells Angels trouvé mort

Fidèle ami de l'ancien directeur général de la FTQ-Construction, Jocelyn Dupuis, et proche des Hells Angels, Ronald Beaulieu, alias Ronnie, a été trouvé mort dans son domicile de Blainville, hier en début d'après-midi. C'est un membre de la famille qui a contacté les policiers après avoir découvert le corps inanimé de Beaulieu, 59 ans, dans son lit. Les agents se sont rendus sur la rue Henri-Julien, près du boulevard Curé-Labelle, vers 12 h 30 et le décès a été constaté sur place. "Il s'agit d'une mort naturelle", a indiqué l'agent Stéphane Giguère de la police de Blainville. Agence QMI (Journal de Montréal, 15)

 Jurors walked through DNA evidence - RCMP BIOLOGIST TESTIFIES ABOUT DNA PROCEDURES

Jurors in the trial of an Innisfail financial advisor accused of killing a woman with a pipe bomb were walked through the DNA evidence in court on Friday. RCMP biologist Dr. Gregory Litzenberger testified about the scientific procedures used to identify profiles using mere parts of a nanogram (onemillionth of a gram) of DNA. An invisible sloughing of skin can be analyzed to determine its DNA profile and compare with other DNA samples taken during an investigation. A microscopic portion of DNA taken from a piece of paper at the scene of the explosion that killed Victoria Shachtay on Nov. 25, 2011 has been connected to Brian Malley. Malley, 57, of Innisfail is charged with first-degree murder and is on trial in Red Deer Court of Queen's Bench. Litzenberger said less than one nanogram of DNA was recovered from a piece of evidence including tape and a fragment of lined paper. Minute as that is, it was still enough to get an accurate result using RCMP standards. Red Deer Advocate, A3

 Springhill cops' fate uncertain - RCMP to take over April 1 as town dissolves

The countdown toward Springhill's dissolution is on, but members of the police service are still in the dark about what happens when the clock strikes zero. "It's before us, it's on the boards and we're out of here March 31," said Dean Ruddick, acting chief of the town police force. "We have a lot of people who are waiting patiently, meeting with the human resource people and trying to get things going from that end, but right now there has been no offer in place for any of them." Town council voted in March 2014 to dissolve the town and apply to the Nova Scotia Utility and Review Board for absorption into the Cumberland County municipality. After debates and hearings, the board ruled earlier this month that the town of 3,600 should be dissolved and become part of the Cumberland municipality as of April 1. Town council voted later in March 2014 to disband the police service, which had existed in some form since 1889. Contractually, the town had to give the police department 12 months notice before terminating services. The RCMP will take over policing in Springhill as of April 1, with eight members and an administrative assistant occupying the same space in the town hall building that the 23 full- and part-time town police staff work out of. Chronicle-Herald, A8

 Serial heist arrest in Grande Prairie

Alberta cops have nabbed the suspect in a string of bank robberies spanning three western provinces. The man was arrested by RCMP around 2:30 p.m. Friday at a Grande Prairie motel. An employee, who asked not to be identified, said the man had been staying at the motel for two nights. "He was actually a very nice fellow, very nice. You just don't know," the employee said. The man, of no fixed address, is a suspect in nine bank heists in B.C., Alberta and Saskatchewan since Dec. 1. RCMP are to release more details about the suspect, including his name and charges, on Monday. QMI Agency (Calgary Sun, 16)

 Mountie charged with assault in domestic incident

A Fort Saskatchewan Mountie is facing one count of assault. RCMP Const. Brendon Plamondon was charged Jan. 16 with one count of common assault after an on-duty incident on April 2, 2014. Insp. Gibson Glavin, with RCMP K-Division in Edmonton, said the incident in question involved a domestic complaint in Fort Saskatchewan. "It was a public complaint that the member was responding to that ended up bringing him in contact, ultimately, with the person (a female) that it's alleged that he assaulted," Glavin said. As a result of the charges, Plamondon has been suspended from duty with pay. "His suspension will remain until such time that there is an outcome for this criminal charge," Glavin said. "Ongoing, at the same time, will be an internal investigation into his actions." Plamondon is to make his first appearance on the matter in Fort Saskatchewan Provincial Court on Feb. 19th. Edmonton Sun, 23

 RCMP request city police probe incident

RCMP officials have asked the Saskatoon city police to investigate an incident in which a single shot was fired by a 56-year-old man who was later found dead at a rural home near Grandora on Wednesday. RCMP officers were at the rural property to execute a search warrant related to an ongoing investigation around 4:30 p.m. Wednesday when they saw smoke coming from the home, according to an RCMP news release issued Friday. Officers entered the house and a firearm was discharged by the lone male occupant, the release said, noting the gun was not an RCMP weapon. The officers were forced to leave the home due to excessive smoke. The gunshot "changed the course of the initial investigation," the release stated. "Immediately after the incident was reported to RCMP senior management, the RCMP requested the Saskatoon Police Service to conduct an independent, external investigation into the circumstances surrounding the search warrant and death of the 56-year-old male." Star-Phoenix, A8

 Fatal police shooting probed

The Independent Investigations Office of B.C. is investigating a fatal police shooting on Thursday evening in Castlegar. The RCMP says officers were responding to a driving complaint on Highway 3 in the city when a man was shot by officers during an attempted traffic stop. The man was taken to hospital in the West Kootenay community, but he did not survive his injuries. The IIO says a team of five investigators including a forensic specialist were on their way to Castlegar on Friday. The man's name and age have not yet been released. Vancouver Sun, A12

 Fort Saskatchewan Mountie charged with assault

A Fort Saskatchewan RCMP officer has been charged with assault in relation to an on-duty incident that occurred last year. The RCMP charged one of their own, Const. Brendon Plamondon, on Jan. 16 with one count of common assault. He is scheduled to make his first court appearance in Fort Saskatchewan on Feb. 19. Plamondon was responding to a noise complaint somewhere outdoors in the City of Fort Saskatchewan when the assault occurred on April 2, said RCMP spokesman Insp. Gibson Glavin Friday morning. The victim of the assault was a woman. "We were advised by the Crown on Jan. 5 of this year that there was sufficient evidence to support a charge of assault," he said. Glavin did not know how long Plamondon has been with the RCMP nor his age. Edmonton Journal, A6

 Shale gas protester accused media of lying

Tyson Peters knows he screwed up during the shale gas protests of 2013. He knows he shouldn't have punched a police officer in the face or seized more than a million dollar's worth of equipment from journalists. But at the time, he thought he was doing the right thing. He thought he was standing up for aboriginal people and the environment. "I thought we were just done, I thought my native people were done," said the 25-year-old Elsipogtog man in Moncton provincial court on Friday. "I heard so many lies, I thought what I was doing was right. Now look where I'm standing. I'm so sorry for the people I scared." Peters said he regrets the crimes he committed during his community's battle against shale gas exploration in New Brunswick. Times and Transcript, A3

 Fire this rogue cop

An opinion piece states "In the absence of clear reasons for his decision, it's impossible to welcome Superior Court Justice Brian O'Marra's lifting of a jail term imposed on a police officer who used excessive force against a G20 demonstrator. Toronto Const. Babak Andalib-Goortani was sentenced to 45 days behind bars in December 2013 after being convicted of assault with a weapon while arresting Adam Nobody as he protested at Queen's Park in June 2010. We hailed that sentence as a fair and appropriate sanction. And we still feel the same way. Andalib-Goortani was immediately granted bail in 2013, pending an appeal. And his appeal hearing concluded on Thursday with O'Marra upholding the earlier guilty verdict, but changing the punishment to a year of probation and 75 hours of community service. This seems overly lenient in light of Andalib-Goortani's offence. Video footage of the assault shows a group of police officers kicking and beating Nobody. Andalib-Goortani, the only one who was identified, struck Nobody several times with a baton even after the protester had been restrained... Whether he goes to jail or not, Andalib-Goortani has been found guilty of assaulting a citizen by two different judges. He doesn't belong in uniform." Toronto Star, IN6

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

Security systems fail during power outage - JOYCEVILLE INSTITUTION

Inmates and staff at the minimum-security portion of Joyceville Institution were left in the dark for six hours Thursday because a backup generator that normally supplies emergency power was not connected. On Friday morning, a correctional service officer, who spoke to the Whig-Standard on condition of anonymity, said none of the security systems at the prison that rely on electricity were working during the power failure. "None of the doors were alarmed, none of the windows were alarmed," he said. "Anybody could have walked away from that place and we would never have known about it."... The power outage was due to hydro crews replacing a damaged pole. About half of the affected customers had their power restored by midnight, but power did not come back to the remaining 1,300, including the two prisons, until 3 a.m. Friday. Robert Finucan, Ontario regional president for the union of Canadian Correctional officers, said he had not been informed of the power outage until the Whig-Standard contacted him for comment. Whig-Standard, A1

 Corrections Canada to hire community chaplains - Department plans to open 27 part-time positions working with former inmates

After three years of cuts, the Correctional Service of Canada says it is now looking for new community chaplains to work with former inmates. The department told the Star this week it will be hiring 27 part-time positions in 21 cities across Canada. The one-year contract positions have the option of being renewed until 2020. The surprise decision comes a week after the Star wrote about how federal government cuts to community chaplains resulted in the loss of dozens of part-time positions, with many chaplains opting to work for free so that they could continue helping parolees who needed guidance. In explaining the hires, CSC spokeswoman Sharon Pieris said in an email that chaplains contribute to "spiritual and religious growth and provide an essential link between the reintegrating offender and their community." The department, however, said it would end federal funding for a sex-offender rehabilitation program called Circles of Support and Accountability. CSC confirmed in an email that funding for that program ends March 2015. Toronto Star, A13

 Sentencing postponed for blast plotter

Much to his chagrin, the sentencing of a Calgary man who plotted a "cataclysmic" attack on the city's Veteran's Affairs offices was delayed Friday. Defence counsel Tonii Roulston said Glen Gieschen, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, had hoped his hearing would have proceeded. But Crown prosecutor Doug Simpson asked that the hearing be delayed, since a forensic psychiatric report ordered by the court had just arrived. Simpson told provincial court Judge Sean Dunnigan he needed time to review the assessment by Dr. Ken Hashman before determining his position on an appropriate sentence. "Mr. Gieschen's very anxious (to proceed) his family's present," Roulston told Dunnigan, before stating she wasn't opposed to the delay. Outside court, Roulston explained Gieschen was hoping to be sentenced so he could begin his term in a federal penitentiary, rather than being held at the Calgary Remand Centre. Calgary Sun, 16

 Quebec prison has one inmate

A halfway house that cost taxpayers $2.1 million and is in a remote part of Quebec currently holds just a single resident. The Kapatakan Gilles Jourdain facility in the lower north shore of Quebec, about 1,600 km northeast of Montreal, which cost $1.9 million to build, opened in March 2013. Since then, it has been home to only 12 residents total, despite having 20 beds available and an annual operating cost of $680,000. Eighteen of those beds are reserved for the provincial correctional services and two for federal prisoners. QMI Agency (Ottawa Sun, 9)

 Legere out of super-max prison

The co-author of two books on serial killer Allan Legere says Corrections Canada made a big mistake in transferring Allan Legere from a super-maximum-security special-handling unit to a regular maximum-security prison. "My reaction is shock," author, journalist and former Miramichi resident Rick MacLean said Thursday. "I can't believe it. His whole idea is that he wants to escape." Legere was convicted of killing five people in the Miramichi area in the 1980s. After being imprisoned at Renous for his first murder, he escaped in 1989 during a trip to a Moncton hospital for treatment for a feigned illness. While free he killed four more times during a spree that kept the province, particularly Miramichiers, on tenterhooks during a manhunt that lasted 201 days. MacLean says Legere, now 66, was recently transferred from the special-handling unit in Ste-Anne-des-Plaines, Que., to the Edmonton Institution, near the Alberta capital. Corrections Canada says it doesn't comment on specific prisoners because of privacy laws. It would not confirm that Legere has been transferred or comment on why he might be considered for a lower-security prison. Times and Transcript (Telegraph-Journal, A1)

 Khadr hopes to study at King's University - Prisoner plans to live with his lawyer, integrate into community, documents say

Omar Khadr will be offered a place at King's University as a mature student and he will receive help from several agencies and citizens to integrate into the community, according to documents filed in court Friday for a bail hearing. In his affidavit, Khadr, 28, sets out his hopes to stay in Edmonton, study at King's, join an interfaith community and play some pickup games of soccer in the neighbourhood if he is released on bail this spring. Khadr will live at the home of his lawyer Dennis Edney "as part of the family" - and will keep in touch with his mother and siblings in Scarborough, Ont., by phone, according to the documents. "I look forward to taking part in family activities and to helping out with chores and other household activities," says the Khadr affidavit. The King's offer letter is part of a community reintegration plan submitted by Khadr's Edmonton lawyers, Edney and Nate Whiting, in the application for bail March 24-25. Khadr is seeking release while he is appealing in U.S. courts five terrorism convictions set out in an October 2010 plea bargain at the contentious military commission in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Edmonton Journal, A7

Omar Khadr should be free on bail

An editorial states "The mere mention of the name Omar Khadr makes Canadians hot under the collar. A majority believe he is an irredeemable terrorist who should be left to rot in prison. A sizable minority see him as a child soldier, a minor who has been tortured and deprived of his right to justice in the 13 years since the battle in Afghanistan in which he threw a grenade that killed one U.S. soldier - a medic - and wounded another. He was 15 at the time, brainwashed by his western-hating family. Severely wounded, he was detained in Guantanamo Bay for 10 years before his transfer to an Alberta prison in 2012. Now 28, Khadr is back in the headlines with plans to seek bail pending disposition of his appeal in the U.S. against his controversial conviction for war crimes. Khadr pleaded guilty in 2010 to charges of murder in violation of the rules of war and was given another eight years, but later said pleading guilty was his only way out of Guantanamo, because he faced life in jail even if he was acquitted. The federal government has been criticized by the Supreme Court of Canada for contributing to Khadr's detention and treatment at Guantanamo that violated basic Canadian standards... Khadr is as entitled to justice as any other Canadian. But while our justice system will determine if he should be granted bail, common sense dictates public safety should remain the priority. He should be granted bail." Calgary Herald, A21

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

 National chief points to need to work together

This is the first in a four-part series on Canada's aboriginal people and issues. "Canada wasn't just founded by two nations, the French and English. First Nations opened their doors to our brothers and sisters when they came across the water." This is a pointed reminder from Perry Bellegarde, newly elected national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, that Canada's indigenous people want to be considered equal partners in the growth of this nation. They are the fastest growing segment of the Canadian population, and as Bellegarde says bluntly, "It makes sense to invest in them." Bellegarde was elected in December by chiefs from across Canada and represents the almost one million First Nations citizens in this country. He takes over at what is arguably a historic tipping point for aboriginal issues in Canada. Last year saw a landmark Supreme Court ruling on treaty rights, nationwide protests over development on aboriginal lands, outrage over the number of missing and murdered aboriginal women in this country, and a failed attempt to create a new First Nations education system. London Free Press, E2

 We have failed aboriginal women - B.C.'s healing-centre debacle is a too-common example of political ineptitude

An opinion piece states "Each week, it seems, another plea is made for a national inquiry into the hundreds of missing and murdered aboriginal women and girls in Canada. Only a thorough investigation into the root causes of this dreadful dilemma will provide policymakers with solutions, the thinking goes. Why do so many young aboriginal women end up on the streets of this country, making themselves vulnerable to predators? Who is responsible for the often appalling sense of self-worth that many of these teenaged girls possess - a self-esteem so low they believe life in an alleyway or rancid hotel room is somehow what they deserve? In British Columbia, the stories of how the provincial government and First Nations leadership have failed young aboriginal girls are unending. And if you want to understand some of the factors responsible for the missing-women phenomenon, you need look no further than the depressing tales of abuse and neglect exposed over the years by the province's Representative for Children and Youth, Mary Ellen Turpel-Lafond. In Friday's Globe and Mail, reporter Wendy Stueck revealed yet another example of government and native leadership failing young aboriginal women. In 2010, the B.C. government provided more than $5-million to help launch and fund a native healing and wellness centre in Chilliwack. It was a function of the province's mostly disastrous policy decision in 2001 to hand over more child-welfare authority and care to First Nations. In a recent report, Ms. Turpel-Lafond showed how nearly $66-million of government funding was sent to native child-welfare agencies over the course of a dozen years, with precious few children benefiting from a dollar of it." Globe and Mail, A8

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

Victoire pour les fonctionnaires

Les dirigeants des syndicats du secteur public fédéral ont salué hier comme une «grande victoire» le jugement de la Cour suprême du Canada qui a déclaré invalidant la loi empêchant les employés du secteur public de la Saskatchewan de faire la grève. Le jugement viendrait remettre en question la loi C-4 adoptée par le gouvernement conservateur et limitant le droit de grève des employés de la fonction publique fédérale. Selon la présidente de l'Institut professionnel de la fonction publique du Canada (IPFPC), Debi Daviau, le jugement rendu en faveur des fonctionnaires de la Saskatchewan vient remettre en question la loi C-4 adoptée par le gouvernement conservateur limitant le droit de grève des employés de la fonction publique fédérale. Le Droit, 22; Ottawa Citizen

OTHER / AUTRE

NIL

INTERNATIONAL

Weighty measures What Canada's allies are doing to combat terrorism

FRANCE - Last fall, the French government tightened its anti-terrorism legislation because of concerns about the growing number of nationals joining radical causes at home and abroad. Measures included: Banning travel for anyone believed to be travelling to join a terrorist group abroad.; Creating new offences and new punishments for terrorists believed to be acting alone.; Empowering authorities to block websites that "glorify terrorism" without the intervention of a judge... AUSTRALIA In September 2014, security agencies claimed to have foiled a plot by Islamic extremists to carry out executions in Sydney and Brisbane. The Australian government said it was an example of a growing threat to the country from Islamic radicals affiliated with the ongoing conflicts in Syria and Iraq. In response, a suite of new laws was introduced last fall, including the following: Making it a crime to advocate terrorism. Sentencing those who travel overseas to engage in hostile activities to life in prison. Making it a crime to travel to or stay in an area designated as being of "terrorist activity," with some exceptions for family visits and other legitimate travel. Canadian Press (Toronto Star, A18)

Gun seizures at airports set record

It seems Americans can't stop packing heat when packing for a trip. The U.S. Transportation Security Administration (TSA) seized a record 2,212 firearms from carry-on luggage last year, CNN reported.

That's an average of six guns a day, and a 22 per cent increase from the 1,813 seized in 2013. A full 83 per cent of the seized guns were loaded. Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport confiscated the most weapons, at 120, followed by Atlanta at 109 and Phoenix with 78. The TSA also found more than 1,400 gun parts, fake firearms, stun guns and other "dangerous objects" in carry-on bags, CNN said. Calgary Herald, E2

Keep calm and march on - Why we shouldn't overreact to violent extremism

An opinion piece states "In the more than three weeks that have passed since the murder of more than a dozen people in Paris - cartoonists, policemen, customers at a Jewish grocery store - a number of European countries have called for new countermeasures to fight terrorism. The French Prime Minister announced a whole raft of policies. The British want databases to monitor travel in and out of Europe. At emergency meetings, European officials have discussed what one British paper called a 'new era of travel surveillance.' But before any of these plans is adopted, it's important first to ask a different question: Did the Charlie Hebdo murders really represent something new?... Europeans need effective policing and counterintelligence. Perhaps they need more money or more staff, but the institutions to foster those things already exist. I recently heard a British security official recite a long list of terror plots that had been blocked. Belgian police foiled another one on Jan. 16. Occasionally, inevitably, officials will miss one. This isn't surprising, as the actions of extremists are, by definition, difficult to predict: The people who carry out these attacks are not only ideologues but also suicidal sociopaths. Nevertheless, the chances of being killed by a terrorist bomb remain less than the chances of being hit by a car while crossing the street. In the end, terrorism works only if it creates terror. An overreaction is precisely what the jihadis want. We should deny that to them by resuming ordinary life as soon as possible." National Post, A19

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca).*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
February 2, 2015 / le 2 février 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Tories rebuff calls for greater oversight of CSIS

Ottawa is rejecting calls for parliamentary oversight of the nation's spies, dismissing such increased scrutiny as "needless red tape." Conservatives on Sunday defended their controversial new anti-terrorism legislation, which has faced criticism for massively expanding the powers of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service without added public oversight. Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney argued the Security Intelligence Review Committee, a five-member body that investigates complaints against CSIS, is enough. "We can be very proud of what they are doing," he said about SIRC on CTV's Question Period. "Anything additional would be just duplication." The anti-terrorism legislation, which was unveiled Friday, would give CSIS the right to disrupt terrorist activity, such as by pulling suspected terrorists off planes or messing with their bank accounts. A judge would have to sign off on such actions ahead of time. The legislation would also make it easier to arrest people for promoting terrorism. Critics say there are not enough checks on these new powers. They are calling on the government to mandate direct scrutiny from the House of Commons by, for example, having a committee of MPs oversee CSIS. The Glove and Mail, A1

Stephen Harper's anti-terror bill has notable omissions

An editorial states... "Stephen Harper, in word and deed, has told Canadians that his war on terror is a never-ending race between a government which will become ever more intrusive in the name of protecting the population and terrorists who will forever be searching for new means of evading detection. Bad things will still happen, the prime minister tells us, nothing is foolproof and nothing will drop a bubble of protection over the Canadian population. All of this may be true, but limiting himself to a view that things will be always thus in our "war" with jihadist extremism means Harper's anti-terror law is strictly reactive, not proactive. This will likely be a political winner for the prime minister, but he chose to do nothing to reach out to those fearful of a step-by-step erosion of civil liberties, he chose not to take one simple step to make his case, he has decided to put his legislation in place in perpetuity and he has given short shrift to any effort to turn the tide against homegrown radicalization. Talk of dealing with root causes in our current political climate invites ridicule from the government, but Harper could have emphasized there were two prongs to his strategy. He chose not to. There is a program, under the watch of Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney, meant to combat radicalization roots at home and we are told that more money could be available for the program. But the government made no mention of that last Friday." Toronto Star, A6

Feds listening to concerns about terror bill

The Government of Canada is listening. Not just clandestinely for potential terror threats but it has also turned an ear to concerns expressed by Canadians about Friday's counter-terrorism Bill C-51 announcement. That said, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney told the Toronto Sun Sunday what he is hearing at the street level is different than what's in the media. "People are telling me it's about time," said Blaney. "They were saying, 'Why was some of this not already happening?'" He attended an event in his Lévis-Bellechasse riding Saturday where "150 people at the town hall were all applauding and shouting out 'Here, here.'" Blaney said "the mayor leaned over and whispered to me 'Did you hear that reaction?'" Blaney was buoyed by the reaction. Since Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced tough new measures to combat terrorists or another terror attack on Canadian soil, he has noticed the luke warm media response. However, Blaney says "people (are) saying, 'Do what you have got to do.'" Harper, as well as Justice Minister Peter MacKay and Associate Defence Minister Julian Fantino - who were also in Richmond Hill for the announcement - understand the worry about privacy and civil liberties. Thanks to sweeping new tools, authorities will be able to detain suspects without a charge or place people of interest on a no-fly list. There will also be more sharing of personal information between law enforcement agencies. QMI Agency (Ottawa Sun, Toronto Sun, Edmonton Sun)

La famille Turk rencontre un agent d'Immigration Canada, les enfants retournent à l'école

La situation de la famille pourrait s'améliorer avec une intervention du ministre canadien de l'Immigration, Chris Alexander. Dans une lettre envoyée à la ministre de l'Immigration, de la Diversité et de l'Inclusion du Québec, Kathleen Weil, la députée provinciale d'Iberville, Claire Samson lui demande d'intervenir auprès de son collègue au fédéral, afin que M. Alexander ordonne un sursis administratif dans le dossier. Maksuni Oerde, ami et interprète de la famille, demandera lui aussi un sursis à l'exécution de la décision, indique M. Ouellette, afin que la famille soit en mesure de faire des démarches d'aspect humanitaire. Autre chemin qui sera emprunté: les proches demanderont qu'un certificat de sélection du Québec soit attribué aux Turk. Les frères et soeurs de Kamber sont prêts à se porter garants de la petite famille et à offrir aux adultes un emploi dans l'un ou l'autre des restaurants familiaux. Selon le curé Ouellette, le maire de Rougemont, Alain Brière, souhaiterait rencontrer le ministre de la Sécurité publique Steven Blaney, qu'il a déjà rencontré dans un autre contexte il y a plusieurs mois. La Presse (La Voix de l'Est)

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

 Metro pounded by weekend storm

The final day of January put Metro Moncton to the test as the region was pounded by nature yet again. The second major winter storm to hit the Maritimes in less than a week dropped significant amounts of snow, blown around by gusting winds. By the time it moved out Saturday night (though those pesky winds stuck around) another 25 cm (9.8 inches) or so of the white stuff was left on the ground, on top of the 52 cm (20.5 inches) that fell during the 48-hour blizzard earlier this week. Now that there's another storm - this time a blizzard - hurtling its way towards us, Don Williams, a weekend supervisor at Moncton's public works garage, said there's just no time to haul some of the mass amounts of snow away before this afternoon. Telegraph-Journal, A3

 Blizzard to strike most of New Brunswick today

With only a day of recovery after Saturday's storm, New Brunswick is about to get hit with another one. A Monday blizzard warning was issued by Environment Canada yesterday afternoon for most of the province, with remaining regions being advised to watch the forecast for winter storm updates. The snow will begin in the southwest around noon today, spreading through the rest of the province in the afternoon. As with the past two storms last week, which together hammered some regions with 80 cm (31.5 inches) or more of snow, strong northeast winds will accompany the storm, making for blowing snow and whiteout conditions on Monday night. Total snowfall amounts of up to 40 cm (15.7 inches) are expected, particularly in the southern half of the province. The storm will die down early tomorrow morning. Times & Transcript, A4; Telegraph-Journal; Chronicle-Herald

 More nasty weather in store for province

Blizzard conditions will plague Islanders again this week. Environment Canada issued a winter storm warning in effect for overnight Monday going into Tuesday, with total snowfall amounts of 20 to 40 cm. The weather agency said it appears snow will develop over the province late in the day today and become heavy tonight. Strong winds will develop tonight, giving reduced visibilities in blowing snow. Prince County is expected to get the worst of the storm, with blizzard conditions forecasted to begin Monday night. A low-pressure system will approach the Maritimes today and cross eastern Nova Scotia on Tuesday. Snow will change to ice pellets and freezing rain across eastern counties overnight and may become rain by dawn Tuesday. Precipitation will change back to snow later Tuesday morning and taper to flurries later in the day as the low moves away. Public Safety Canada also encouraged individuals to make an emergency plan and have an emergency kit with drinking water, food, medicine, a first-aid kit and a flashlight. The Guardian, A3

 Toronto weather: Winter storm slams GTA, other parts of Ontario

A winter storm that started bringing snow and freezing temperatures to areas of Ontario including the Greater Toronto Area yesterday is making it difficult for commuters this morning. Environment Canada's Sunday storm warning remains in effect, and the federal weather agency warns that "in addition to the heavy snow, strong and gusty winds have reduced visibilities to 500 metres or less" on roads and highways. The snow battering the GTA is part of a larger system currently hovering over southern Ontario. The regions from Sarnia towards Hamilton could see the most snowfall, with about 25 to 35 centimetres total expected. Winds of up to 70 km/h are blowing in the Niagara Region, creating "near-blizzard conditions" along the lake shore and escarpment. In the GTA, snow is expected to fall until around noon, with a total of 15 to 20 centimetres in the forecast. That snow will be accompanied by freezing temperatures that could make it feel like -26 throughout the morning. CBC.ca; TheStar.com; Hamilton Spectator

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

 Taking passports will sow more fear, risk, woman warns

New federal legislation intended to crack down on homegrown jihadis will sow more fear and increase the risk of domestic terrorism, says a Calgary mother whose son was killed after joining extremist fighters abroad. "If you pull a passport away from somebody, then what?" asked Christianne Boudreau, whose son Damian Clairmont was killed while fighting for the Islamic State last year. "What kind of counselling and structure are you putting in place for them and the families involved? You're just going to leave the whole family hanging and trying to deal with it. It's going to create more problems here." The Conservatives' Bill C-51 will expand the role of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), giving it more police-like powers. The bill will also give police the ability to detain would-be jihadis for up to seven days. It also proposes to expand a no-fly list. Tabled Friday, the bill has raised eyebrows among civil liberties advocates, particularly for its attempts to criminalize terrorist propaganda; the measure would be similar to laws that restrict materials that support or advocate terrorism in France and the U.K. These newer measures present a far more aggressive tone than the one struck by local police agencies. Calgary has witnessed a spate of local young men leaving the country to join fighting abroad: the RCMP and the Calgary Police Service have tried to curb the trend by identifying those who may be at risk and encouraging them back into mainstream society by co-ordinating with local mosques and Muslim leaders. Postmedia (National Post, A5, Calgary Herald), Journal de Montreal

Terror bill concerns privacy commish

Privacy Commissioner Daniel Therrien says he is concerned that the government's new anti-terror bill does not respect the privacy rights of Canadians. Bill C-51 proposes to lower the threshold of what's required for police to make an arrest in a terror case. Previously an arrest could be made only if a terror act "will be" carried out, but C-51 would allow police to arrest a suspect if an attack "may be" about to happen. It would also broadly expand the powers of Canada's spy agency, CSIS, to "counter-message" or "disrupt" terrorist web-sites, Twitter accounts and the like. "This Act would seemingly allow departments and agencies to share the personal information of all individuals, including ordinary Canadians who may not be suspected of terrorist activities, for the purpose of detecting and identifying new security threats," Therrien said. "It is not clear that this would be a proportional measure that respects the privacy rights of Canadians." Therrien said Canadians want to be safe, but they also care profoundly about their privacy rights. "They also want government to be more transparent on the activities they undertake in the name of national security and they want to know why these are necessary," he said. QMI Agency (Kingston Whig-Standard, B1, London Free Press), The Globe and Mail, Winnipeg Free Press

Ham-fisted terrorism bill cries out for repair

An opinion piece states... "Glorification of terrorism, as explained by government officials who provided background briefings on the new anti-terrorism bill tabled in Parliament Friday, will specifically not be criminalized. Praising an act of terrorism shall be OK; encouraging others to commit such acts won't. So go ahead and glorify, as many Palestinians - for instance - did after the World Trade Center towers fell on 9/11. That's an expression of free speech that must be tolerated as a basic civil liberty. As - another for instance - is newspaper commentary that has spent the last 13-plus years arguing a moral equivalency between "one man's terrorism" and crimes of imperial might, or the tactical exploits unleashed by terrorists fighting an asymmetrical war against a conventional military. Polemical bollocks, of course, but, rightly, protected free speech. You should, and must, be able to babble mendaciously. Democracies secure the right to be profoundly wrong and provocative. There's no point in defending free speech only when one agrees with the content - a debate that gained added vigour in the aftermath of the Charlie Hebdo attack last months, though many a fine line was tippytoed by media executives who said one thing but did another." Toronto Star, A2

Parliament begins review of new national security legislation

An opinion piece states... "Parliament has begun its review of the new national security legislation tabled by the Government of Canada in an effort to curb the nefarious activities of lone-wolf terrorists, among other things. The usual debates on the efficacy and ethical conundrums of such legislation and the tools and tactics it allows law enforcement officers to utilize will likely emerge. There is often willingness from the general public to cede some civil liberties, including privacy, in periods of heightened security. Here in Canada, public safety and national security are again, top of mind. A recent poll by Abacus Data shows that 18 per cent of Canadians list public safety and terrorism as one of their top three issues. In March 2014, the poll showed only four per cent responding this way. As we enter another period of global instability, Western, liberal-democracies, must strive to reshape the security-civil liberties dichotomy. This is ever so relevant here in Canada as the memory of our Parliament and Canadian Forces members being attacked by assailants, motivated by the hateful propaganda produced by ISIS, is fresh. This is exacerbated by the recent attacks at the offices of Charlie Hebdo magazine in France. At the heart of solving the security-civil liberties dichotomy is technology. Unfortunately, much of the global skepticism in government and law enforcements' respect for civil liberties is perceived to be technologically-driven. However, the data unveiled by Snowden and Wikileaks is not an indictment of technology or technological capability." Hill Times

Baird: Terrorism is our 'great struggle'

Canada's foreign minister called terrorism "the great struggle of our generation" during a visit to Boston Saturday." And no nation is somehow immune to that," John Baird said at a press conference attended by John Kerry and Mexican Foreign Secretary Jose Antonio Meade." Sadly, this great city knows the impact of terrorism far too well, as does my hometown of Ottawa," Baird said, referring to the twin bombings at the finish line of the Boston Marathon on April 15, 2013 and the Oct. 22, 2014 attack on Parliament Hill. "I was truly grateful that John came up to Ottawa within days of the October attacks to show his solidarity with the Canadian people and to pay his respects. We all have to do what we can to stop the cancer of terrorism," Baird said. QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, 55, Winnipeg Sun, Edmonton Sun, Ottawa Sun, Calgary Sun, London Free Press)

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

Man fined for undervaluing classic car at border crossing

A 59-year-old Charlottetown man has been fined for lying about the value of a classic car that he declared at the border in Woodstock, Ont. A provincial court judge in Woodstock Wednesday fined James W. MacMillan $2,000 for making "false or deceptive statements" under the Customs Act. He was also ordered to pay a $600 victim surcharge. When MacMillan arrived at the Woodstock border crossing on Aug. 8, 2014, he declared the purchase of a 1939 Ford Roadster for $32,778. He was referred to secondary inspection where it was determined that the actual value of the vehicle was $56,815. The Canada Border Services Agency seized the roadster, which was released back to MacMillan once he paid the $13,220 terms of release. "People who undervalue vehicles in order to avoid paying taxes should be aware they can face severe penalties," says Tom Critchlow, CBSA's director of enforcement and intelligence operations division for the Atlantic region. Charlottetown Guardian, A3

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

 Cyber security 'has its own costs, namely reputation and liability'

The growing prevalence of cyber risk in the corporate world has breached the walls of Canada's boardrooms, with directors as likely to see their company's data as a ticking time bomb as much as an asset. With a single hack attack, a company can see its damage control costs spin out of control and its customer goodwill shattered. It could devastate company morale, put the company at risk of lawsuits and shear a company's stock price. More than 3,000 companies in the United States were victims of a cyber attack last year, including a litany of high profile corporate security breaches at Target Corp., Home Depot Inc., Sony Pictures Entertainment Inc. and Wall Street giant JPMorgan Chase Co., costing in total an estimated US$445-billion. Given the rising number of cyber violations, it's not surprising there have been numerous class-action lawsuits filed in the U.S. from stakeholders for breach of fiduciary duty, including a case against Sony over a hacking incident involved the alleged theft and release of social security numbers and other personal data, while electronic commerce giant eBay Inc. is facing a class-action suit launched in July 2014 by 125 million customers whose personal data was breached early last year. National Post

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

Saskatchewan RCMP investigating wrong-number call about snowmobile crash

Mounties and citizens are searching the trails around a northern Saskatchewan community after a woman got a wrong-number phone call from someone who claimed she crashed her snowmobile. RCMP say the caller told the woman on Saturday that she was trying to reach her grandmother, Katherine Pierce, to say she had run into a tree while riding with her sister about six or seven kilometres from Carrot River. The caller said her name was Cassandra, but there's no last name. She told the woman she was disoriented and couldn't remember her grandmother's phone number. The number she called from was blocked and police say they haven't been able to trace it. Staff Sgt. Chad McLeod says investigators have tried to find the grandmother but haven't had any success. "They've tried to find 'Katherine Pierce' in the Carrot River or Nipawin areas and there's nobody, and that just adds to the mystery," McLeod said. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, C4, National Post)

Simpson homicide probe 'advances'

Police were back in Fort Simpson last week hoping to dig up more clues as the year-old Billy Cholo murder investigation continues. Police said in a news release they were returning as the investigation into his murder "advances." Officers with the major crimes unit of the RCMP from Yellowknife came to the village for several days using an unmanned aerial vehicle, commonly called a drone, to revisit the scene from above where his remains were found. The officers also hoped to speak with witnesses to the crime. RCMP Const. Elenore Sturko said police know there are witnesses in the community who could come forward. An avid outdoorsman, the 45-year-old was reported missing in December 2013. Cholo's remains were found by an RCMP officer inside a gazebo beside the Fort Simpson health centre Jan. 9, 2014. Initially called a sudden death, police said after an autopsy that his death was a homicide, although they have not said what caused that determination or revealed how Cholo died. Late last year, after police appealed to the public for information about the case, Cholo's uncle Edward Cholo said there are people in the community who know what happened. "Following our last public appeal we received very helpful information," stated RCMP Cpl. Jason Hurley of the major crimes unit in a news release. NWT News/North

Pair injured in animal attack

A pipeline worker suffered non life-threatening injuries after being attacked by a cougar near Grande Prairie. The man was attacked at about 3 p.m. Friday in a forested area 90 kilometres south of Grande Prairie. A co-worker also sustained injuries when he rushed to help the man. The workers called 911, and RCMP arrived and shot the cougar near the scene of the attack. Alberta Justice spokesman Dan Laville said in an email Saturday that Fish and Wildlife officers are investigating the attack. They are using DNA analysis to confirm the cougar shot by RCMP is the same predator that attacked the worker. Photos posted Saturday to the Western Canadian Pipeliners Facebook page show the snowy area where the workers were attacked, with an RCMP truck on scene. Postmedia News (Calgary Herald, A10, Leader-Post, Edmonton Journal)

Baby rescued but mother dies in frigid B.C. river

The mayor of Courtenay says the town is reeling after a young mother and her baby were pulled from the frigid Puntledge River on Friday. "It is very upsetting and the community is in shock," Mayor Larry Jangula said Sunday. The 26-year-old woman died shortly after being pulled from the river. Her seven-month-old son remains in critical condition in B.C. Children's Hospital in Vancouver. He was airlifted to the hospital shortly after a dramatic rescue from the fast-moving Puntledge River. Mr. Jangula said the incident remains puzzling because they have not had any problems before with hikers slipping into the river in that spot. "That area is used a lot and there has never been a problem," he said. Comox Valley RCMP said the unidentified woman died shortly after being pulled from the mountain-fed river. "Our heartfelt sympathies go out to this family," RCMP Staff Sgt. Kevin Mazur said in a statement Saturday. "Based on the evidence and information we have gathered so far, there is no indication that any third party was involved in the pair entering the water," he said. RCMP have yet to determine how the young mother and her baby ended up in the river. Canadian Press (National Post, A6, The Province)

Pan Am Games costing you plenty

The budget presentation came late in the afternoon and the natives were indeed restless. The city's director of strategic planning and implementation for the 2015 Pan Am Games, Tobias Novogrodsky, gave a thorough rundown last Thursday to the budget committee of the capital and operating impact of the games on Toronto - costs which are hardly chump change. Seeing as all of the $92.8-million in operating expenses needed to plan, provide services and host parties and events during this summer's games are buried in the individual budgets of the nine city departments and agencies involved, I thought councillors would want to hear who is doing what... Let's start with Toronto Police Services, which have submitted a budget of $64.9-million, all covered by the province as we were reminded several times at budget committee last week (see note about One Taxpayer above). According to a report to the Jan. 21 Police Services Board meeting, the Toronto Police Service Pan Am Games Planning team is hard at work planning for the games' operational phase (June 24-Aug. 21) - to provide "consistent staffing at Athletes Village" and to ensure that "mobile squads" are available to respond quickly to "emerging situations." There will also be a Traffic Team that will ensure the 63 kilometres of Games Route Network (including the 33 kilometres of HOV lanes) under the TPS jurisdiction will be patrolled for enforcement and compliance, as well as enhanced response to clear the lanes, if necessary. Toronto Sun

Thanks for addressing downtown crime

An opinion piece states, "I want to say thank you to our mayor, RCMP and the powers that be at City Hall for addressing the crime in downtown Red Deer. There is an instant difference to be felt in a dangerous neighborhood. Today I saw two uniformed police officers (hats and all) on foot patrol in the alley behind the St. Luke's Church. Thank you so much to all involved ... maybe we can park our vehicles now and find them in the same condition we left them in overnight, or walk to the corner store without the risk of getting jumped, and worry about our children a little less. The tax increase is well spent - many of us would lose it in insurance deductibles otherwise. I know you hear the negatives before you receive positive feedback, but for what its worth: thank you!" Red Deer Advocate, A4

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

 Life terms without parole should stay relatively rare in Canada

An opinion piece states, "It's the federal Conservative government's mission to make sure Canada's worst offenders spend the rest of their lives in prison. Since Stephen Harper became Prime Minister in 2006, his government's tough on crime agenda has included the elimination of the 'faint hope clause,' which allowed people serving life sentences a chance to apply for early parole. It has also included the legislation allowing consecutive periods of parole ineligibility for multiple murderers. That was used on Mountie killer Justin Bourque, who pleaded guilty to three counts of first-degree murder. Before this legislation, Mr. Bourque would have received life with no chance at parole for 25 years. Instead, he received 25 years for each murder, totalling 75 years before he can apply for parole. Now the feds have another move coming up. Before the summer, legislation will be introduced, denying any chance of parole to the worst offenders. And all these changes are on top of the dangerous offender law, which allows a judge to incarcerate a person indefinitely if they meet certain criteria. Federal ministers have said the latest proposed legislation will be aimed at criminals who commit serious and violent crimes in a repetitive manner, such as multiple murderers or people who sexually abuse children. (...) Those who would argue life in prison with no chance of parole is cruel and unusual, no matter the crime, believe it's inhumane to take away a person's hope. As long as they have some hope, they have a reason to keep living." Times & Transcript, A9

Inmate dies

An elderly inmate died at the Dorchester Penitentiary on Thursday. Garnet Cole, 82, was serving a sentence of 12 years for sex crimes when he died at the institutional hospital, the prison announced in a news release on Friday. Cole was sentenced March 28, 2013, for rape, indecent assault, sexual assault and sexual interference with a girl under 14. The inmate's next of kin have been notified of his death. Times & Transcript, A3

 Notorious Grollier Hall sex offender gets full parole

A man who abused young boys in residential schools in Inuvik and Saskatchewan is out of prison after serving just 10 months of a three-year sentence. Paul Mary Leroux was sentenced for eight counts of indecent assault and two counts of gross indecency on Dec. 12, 2013. He committed the crimes against eight young boys, ranging in age from 11 to 15 years old, during his time as staff at the Beauval Indian Residential School in Saskatchewan, between 1959 and 1967. Leroux is known to many residential school survivors in the Northwest Territories. In 1998, he was convicted of three counts of indecent assault, attempted buggery (sodomy), attempted indecent assault and nine counts of gross indecency. He committed those crimes at Grollier Hall, Inuvik's notorious Catholic student residence, between 1967 and 1979, while working as a supervisor there. His victims were teens, aged 13 to 19. After serving only three years of a 10-year sentence in a federal penitentiary for his offences in Inuvik, Leroux was released on full parole before facing the Saskatchewan charges. Now 74, Leroux is out again. Patrick Storey, spokesperson for the Parole Board of Canada, confirmed Leroux was granted full parole on Dec. 30. He was previously granted day parole on Sept. 25, fewer than 10 months into his three-year prison sentence. Storey was unable to disclose where Leroux is currently serving his parole. Sahtu MLA Norman Yakeleya, who is also the former executive director of the Grollier Hall Healing Circle, says Leroux's early release raises questions about the justice system. NWT News/North

 Finding right balance on crime

Re: Still fighting shadows, Editorial Jan. 29 Jailing people like Messrs Bernardo, Pickton, Bourque and Olson indefinitely is hardly tough justice. Equating all serious offenders with these men is not sensible either. Jailing innocent accused for two years before trial wastes valuable jail space and is patently unjust. Jailing people for possession of drugs is likely a waste of taxpayers' money. Perhaps Canadians should decide how many jail cells it needs and then start taking whatever measures are necessary to reserve these valuable spaces for the most deserving offenders. Better treatment of mental disease, attention to the needs of aboriginal communities, ensuring prompt trials for all accused, and removing those convicted of drug possession from our jails would quickly leave us with a surplus of empty jail cells and unemployed jailers, at which time it might be worth considering tougher penalties for the relatively few truly malignant criminals among us. Toronto Star

 Prison supposed to be tough

A letter to the editor states, "Many of the same people who whine about tax increases want to use that money to make prisons less prison-like (Abusive, unrestricted segregation of inmates, Editorial, Jan. 26). Perhaps they forget why people are there in the first place. They are not the victims; before one winds up in a Canadian jail, there are usually many honest citizens who have been victimized. If a few inmates can't handle the rigours of being incarcerated, is it incumbent on society to divert tax dollars from other programs to make them more comfortable? Prison is for those who prey on others. Many would argue that the only beneficiaries of restorative-justice programs are the people paid to listen to inmates - who will say just about anything to help them get out earlier. People who are in prison do not need more high-priced social workers to listen to them. They need to be made aware that victimizing others is why they are there and that society won't tolerate that." Winnipeg Free Press, A8

 Enfin

Un article d'opinion déclare « Les jours défilent avec la constance du métronome, souvent conduits par la main de politiques grossières et ignorantes, sans scrupules, béates de leurs triomphes à courte vue et qui se juxtaposent tristement, selon des lignes serpentine, sur un horizon de déconvenues. Un grand portrait de nous est en train de se dessiner sans nous. Au quotidien, on ne le voit pas toujours bien. Il faut prendre le temps de se retourner, de regarder derrière, d'envisager les fragments dans la continuité de ce qui va à demain, pourquoi pas en commençant par observer cette semaine passée. (...) Cinquième tableau, présenté cette fois du côté de la rivière des Outaouais. Faute de la peine de mort, la prison à vie est désormais envisagée comme son supplétif. Qu'il existe déjà dans notre système des modulations pour établir des distinctions entre les tueurs en série, les délinquants dangereux et les criminels d'autres types, les conservateurs n'en ont que faire : ferme, la prison le sera pour tous. L'Université de Montréal et le King's College de Londres reconfirment pourtant que les psychopathes -- 20 % de la population carcérale -- ne réagissent pas aux punitions. Peu importe : pour soulager les poids qui pèsent sur le monde social, les populistes préfèrent les raisonnements légers. » Le Devoir, A3

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

How court 'silos' can prove fatal

A decade-long refusal to share information between family courts and criminal courts is putting domestic violence victims at risk, with deadly consequences. The two court systems operate as "separate silos," with different databases, filing cabinets and timelines, which has led to judges imposing contradictory court orders on families, say experts and the Domestic Violence Death Review Committee. Lack of communication between the two courts has been flagged to the government as a serious problem since as early as 2004, the Star has found. Julie Craven is one victim who was caught between the two judicial systems. She paid the ultimate price: the murder of her only child at the hands of her abusive ex-husband during a court-ordered visit. (...) Domestic violence victims like Craven are still getting "lost in a maze of uncoordinated court proceedings," said Dr. Peter Jaffe, of the University of Western Ontario's centre for research and education on violence against women. "The family court and the criminal court have to get their act together," Jaffe said. A spokesperson for Attorney General Madeleine Meilleur said she "respectfully declined" an interview with the Star to discuss this issue. Toronto Star, A1

 Toward a successful day for all Canadians

An opinion piece by retired judge Ted Hughes states, "There are reasons why aboriginal children are taken into the care of welfare agencies in grossly disproportionate numbers. That is a Canadawide trend.

In the past year in Manitoba, the percentage of children in care who are aboriginal has risen from 80 to 87 per cent. It's an alarming statistic. There are reasons why aboriginal women and girls are much more likely to experience violence than their non-aboriginal counterparts, why they are substantially overrepresented among the ranks of the missing and murdered across the country. There are reasons why aboriginal people are hugely overrepresented in our prison population. There are reasons why aboriginal people attain such lower rates of educational and employment achievement and why they lack opportunities for economic development. It's time that Canadians, including their political leaders, come to appreciate what those reasons are, what results flow from them and what would realistically help bring the scales into balance, in order to give aboriginal people an equal chance to participate and succeed in mainstream society. (...) A successful day will be one that takes significant steps toward the ultimate achievement goal of equality of opportunity. That will entail the formulation of a strategy to bring an end to the poverty, inadequate housing, deficiency of educational opportunity and lack of economic viability mentioned above. Only then will the overrepresentation of murdered and missing aboriginal women and girls and the violence they suffer be brought into balance. There is much at stake for all Canadians on Feb. 27. Globe and Mail, A11

* The needs of our First Nations

A letter to the editor states, "Re: "In the Far North, a daily struggle for sustenance" (Montreal Gazette, Jan. 24) Steve Rennie writes about the terrible conditions experienced by Inuit families. I feel distressed to see Canada's aboriginal community treated carelessly by the government. Canada is among the richest nations in the world, yet many people here struggle for food. Aboriginals were the first to own this land and their needs are being overlooked. Money is not going into the right pockets. According to the National Women's Associations of Canada, there have been more than 800 unresolved cases of missing or murdered aboriginal women since 1990. Why is action so slow to be taken? Why do so many still have unequal access to education and health care?" The Gazette, A9

* Breaking the silence

Panelists and audience members were brought to tears discussing missing and murdered indigenous women in the North at the Denendeh Health Symposium Jan. 29. "I lost my sister in 1987. She was murdered. She was only 16 years old," said Mabel Bohnet, sister of a murdered Behchoko woman. She then addressed the panel asking for support, not only for victims of violence, but those who are close to them. She went on to explain that her sister's face was unrecognizable due to the damage done by her attacker, and she was identified only by a birthmark. Two young couples found her body and, while they were happy and successful at the time, Bohnet said they went on to struggle with substance abuse, and instability in their lives. "What kind of help is out there for people like them?" she asked. With so many stories like Bohnet's and so many issues to explore in regards to violence against indigenous women, Terry Villeneuve is hopeful an upcoming national roundtable on missing and murdered indigenous women will finally see measurable results. "It's such a difficult issue, it's such an emotional issue and a lot of the time we feel that we're just talking to the walls; nobody is listening," said Villeneuve, who is chair of the Assembly of First Nation's Women's Council. "I'm happy something is going to be going on, that this event will take place instead of just silence from everybody," said Villeneuve. A national roundtable on the issue was originally proposed for Yellowknife, but due to logistical challenges will now be hosted in Ottawa on Feb. 27, Megan Holsapple, media liaison for the premier confirmed. NWT News/North

* It's harder out there for a pimp

Canada's new prostitution laws have not changed the way cops hunt pimps who force women, and girls, into the sex trade. But under the Protection of Communities and Exploited Persons Act -- controversial Bill C-36 -- those accused of human trafficking may face additional charges. "The old laws were somewhat outdated and needed to be addressed," said Durham Regional Police Sgt. Ron Kapuscinski. His Human Trafficking Unit made its first bust just over a week ago under Bill C-36 -- enacted in December -- but added that arrest could also have been made under the old laws. Kapuscinski explained most of the changes deal with policing those who choose to work in the sex trade as opposed to victims who are forced into prostitution. However, he said the new laws do enable cops to lay additional charges in some human trafficking cases, as his unit did with its first arrest under Bill C-36. In that case, a Toronto man allegedly forced a 16-year-old girl to perform sex acts for cash at southern Ontario motels. Toronto Sun, 3

 New option against sexual assault

Adult sexual assault victims who want to remain anonymous but still alert police now have a new option. The Anonymous Reporting Program came into effect Jan. 1 in Regina as a pilot project. "Maybe they would like someone to know or would like the police to know about something happening, but are reluctant to go forward and go through the whole process or have some fear about it," explained Pat Robinson, a counsellor with the Regina Sexual Assault Centre. "We're hoping that just having more choices can be really helpful in the healing process." She also hopes it encourages victims to seek help, including medical care and counselling, regardless of whether or not they want to pursue charges or anonymous reporting. "People not remaining isolated with it is my biggest hope." Regina's multi-agency Sexual Assault Response Team has been researching the idea and its need for the past few years. Under the program, a victim's report to the centre of a recent or historic sexual assault is assigned a number. The report can then be forwarded to the police with only the number and not a name. Leader-Post, A1

 Ottawa gangs and the rising number of shootings

This week, CBC Ottawa will look at several facets of gang activity in the city and the use of crime guns in our series, "Under the Gun." In 2014, there were 49 cases of shots fired in Ottawa - a record number in one year. That has pushed Ottawa Police Chief Charles Bordeleau and Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson to hold meetings to deal with the issue of guns and gangs in Ottawa. That includes additional staff in the Ottawa police's guns and gangs unit. Our four-part series looks at the cogs in the wheel of Ottawa's guns and gang problem, which you can see below. To join the conversation, please follow and tweet #UndertheGun on Twitter and visit the CBC Ottawa Facebook page. You can follow our reporters Stu Mills, Judy Trinh and Ashley Burke for more information as the week unfolds. We also want to hear from you. Tell us your story by email to cbcnewsottawa@cbc.ca. What's happening with Ottawa gangs? On Tuesday, Judy Trinh looks at what is behind the sharp rise in gunfire in 2014 and the connection to Ottawa gangs. Here, Staff-Sgt. Ken Bryden from the Ottawa police guns and gangs unit talks about the current gang situation. CBC News

 Crime maps provide important data

A letter to the editor states, "Re: Crime map proposal loses way, Advocate, Jan. 6, 2015, by Crystal Rhyno I find the above article not only timely, but also relevant in the light of an alarming increase in various forms of crime in Central Alberta. It would be desirable if city council could reconsider Coun. Buck Buchanan's proposal for the reasons cited below. Maps have been invaluable tools since antiquity, a graphical presentation of information over space and time. Furthermore, a crime map (like other thematic maps) is a means to an end, not an end in itself. On the one hand, these maps can simply present the distribution of a phenomenon for a unit area, like the student project on mapping crime in Red Deer submitted in my human geography class at Red Deer College in 2002, using a 3-D DEM technique that showed 'hot spots' and other features using GIS Mapping, basically a descriptive study. Crime maps can also facilitate longitudinal studies by identifying spatial patterns and trends over time. An example would be Kim Rossmo's study of missing women in Vancouver's East End, in the 1990s. As quite rightly pointed out by Bill Stuebing, crime maps can, in this instance, also help create a city crime index by recording reliable victimization data, both violent and non-violent; a database that provides insights into socio-economic factors, the propensity to commit crime, and also crime linkages/ patterns." Red Deer Advocate, A4

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

Government targets 14.7M public service sick days

Canada's public servants have socked away nearly 15 million days of unused sick leave, which would disappear under the Conservative government's plan to introduce a new short-term disability plan. That means the 195,330 people who are working today in the core public service - those for whom Treasury Board is the employer - have banked an average of 75 days, or 15 weeks, of sick leave to fall back on in the event of a prolonged illness. The size of the sick leave bank was released by Treasury Board in response to an order paper question from Ottawa South Liberal MP David McGuinty. The statistics show a stockpile of 14.7 million days is what remains after nearly 63,000 people left the core public service over the past six years because they had retired, resigned, were laid off, fired or died. (About 2,600 of those departures were public servants who went to separate agencies such as Canada Revenue Agency or Parks Canada, which are not part of the core public service.) The biggest departures came in the past two years, when more than 25,000 people left jobs in the core public service. The government has backfilled with some new hiring but, overall, the core public service has about 22,000 fewer positions now than it did at its peak in 2011, with 217,224. Public servants can't cash out their sick leave when they leave government, so those credits disappear and are wiped off the books. Ottawa Citizen, A1

 NDP pushing for changes to protect interns in federal workplaces

An NDP bill introduced last fall has breathed new life into debate on workplace protections for interns in Canada, with the Conservative government holding stakeholder meetings on the issue last week, and bill sponsor NDP MP Laurin Liu says she's hopeful the government will back her proposed legislative changes this spring. "I think they're [the government's] feeling the pressure," said Ms. Liu (Rivière-des-Mille-Îles, Que.) in an interview with The Hill Times last week. "We're getting these interns and these student associations around the table and I think it's a good thing that the government is seriously looking at this question. Whether they'll actually come through with concrete legislation is another question," she said. Ms. Liu tabled her private members' bill, C-636, dubbed the Intern Protection Act, in November. It's a revamped and more detailed version of a bill she introduced last summer. Hill Times

OTHER / AUTRE

A dangerous time for journalists

Egypt appears set to release Mohamed Fahmy, 40, the Egyptian-Canadian journalist who has been imprisoned for more than a year, convicted of falsifying news during civil unrest and having terrorist links to the Muslim Brotherhood. "His deportation is in its final stages. We are hopeful," said his fiancée, Marwa Omara. Paperwork that would allow Fahmy, the Al-Jazeera English bureau chief in Cairo, to be deported to Canada, possibly after renouncing his Egyptian citizenship, was being prepared Sunday, an Egyptian security official told the Reuters news agency. It follows the deportation to Australia of Fahmy's colleague and co-accused, Peter Greste, 49, who landed Sunday on Cyprus on the first leg of his journey home. Together with colleague Baher Mohamed, the men were arrested over their coverage of the violent crackdown on Islamist protests following the military overthrow of President Mohammed Morsi in 2013. Egyptian authorities accused them of providing a platform for Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood, now declared a terrorist organization. The three were also convicted for spreading false information, faking reports to show that the country was on the verge of civil war and for aiding the Brotherhood's goal of portraying Egypt as a failed state. They were all sentenced to seven years. Mohamed received an additional three years for possession of a spent bullet. Ottawa Citizen, C1 (National Post, Edmonton Journal, StarPhoenix, Leader-Post, Montreal Gazette, Calgary Herald, Windsor Star, The Province, Vancouver Sun); Globe and Mail; *AP (The Guardian, The Gazette, Edmonton Journal, Ottawa Citizen, Hamilton Spectator, Waterloo Region Record, Daily Gleaner), *Canadian Press (Cape Breton Post)

Day of peace, love, compassion

Canadian Muslims for Peace organized a gathering Saturday to bring together Kingstonians for a common cause--to spread peace, love and compassion. "We are here to express our solidarity for peace with our fellow Canadians," Mohammad Saleem, organizer of the Kingston gathering for Canadian Muslims for Peace and president of the Islamic Society of Kingston, told the Whig-Standard. "As well to show that Muslims in Canada stand for peace in our cities, in our country, and all over the world." The gathering at City Hall in -15 C weather was one of four that began at the exact same time. Others were hosted in Toronto, Ottawa and London, Ont. Kingston Whig-Standard, A2

IS defeat at Kobani inspires Kurds - Locals see victory as step closer to nationhood

While terrorists with the Islamic State try to take over the Middle East and behead kidnapped civilians from abroad, they're uniting Kurds who oppose them - in places such as Kobani and Winnipeg - where they're coming together to party and push for their own state. On Saturday night, the Kurdish Association of Manitoba celebrated victory in Kobani - the Syrian border city overrun by Islamic State fighters last fall that was taken back by Kurdish peshmerga earlier this month with the help of airstrikes by the U.S.-led coalition. Winnipeg Free Press, B1

 Otage décapité

La communauté internationale condamne avec véhémence l'exécution d'un deuxième otage japonais par le groupe armé État islamique. Une vidéo mise en ligne samedi semble démontrer que le groupe extrémiste a décapité le journaliste Kenji Goto. Le premier ministre japonais Shinzo Abe s'est dit scandalisé et indigné par cet acte de terrorisme qu'il a qualifié «d'immoral et haineux». Il a affirmé que son gouvernement avait tout mis en oeuvre pour tenter de faire libérer l'otage. Le premier ministre Abe a promis que le Japon ne céderait pas au terrorisme et continuerait d'acheminer de l'aide humanitaire aux pays qui combattent le groupe État islamique. Le premier ministre canadien Stephen Harper a aussi condamné cette nouvelle exécution, disant que les Canadiens étaient de tout coeur avec le Japon. Il a ajouté que le Canada continuerait de travailler avec les pays alliés pour éliminer l'État islamique. L'Acadie Nouvelle, 21

INTERNATIONAL

NIL

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca).*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
February 3, 2015 / le 3 février 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

 Terror bill sparks muted criticism

Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the federal Conservatives may be spoiling for a fight with their political opponents over new tough-on-terrorism legislation but, for the most part, New Democrats and Liberals remained muted Monday in their criticism of new anti-terror laws. Only Elizabeth May, the Green Party MP and leader, voiced serious concerns about Bill C-51, the anti-terrorism legislation unveiled Friday by Harper. "I have problems with the powers and the sweeping vague definitions," May said on Twitter. Among other things, the proposed law would give a new mandate to Canada's spy service, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), to "disrupt" terrorist activity in Canada using a broad range of powers if the spies get a judicial warrant. But the legislation does not provide any new oversight powers for the spy agency. Oversight of CSIS would continue to rest with the Security Intelligence Review Committee, a group of civilians appointed by the government of the day. New Democrats and Liberals want additional oversight of CSIS through a body made up of parliamentarians. (...)The Conservatives, though, didn't seem to want to accept the opposition's olive branch and were in attack mode. "Under the leadership of this government, we put forward the Combating Terrorism Act more than a year ago with no support from the NDP," Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney told the House of Commons. QMI Agency (The London Free Press, B1, Edmonton Sun, Toronto Sun, Winnipeg Sun, Ottawa Sun, Calgary Sun), Toronto Star

Ottawa to delay parole eligibility for dangerous killers

The federal government will delay parole eligibility for a decade or more beyond the current 25 years for some murderers, backing off a plan to make life truly mean life in prison by denying some convicted killers any hope of parole. The new plan would also require the justice minister to approve release on parole for some categories of first-degree murder, reintroducing a political element that was removed in the 1950s.

The change came after senior government officials become increasingly concerned about the constitutionality of sentencing people to life in prison without any prospect of release, and The Globe and Mail reported on the plans last week. A bill setting out the changes could be introduced in Parliament as early as this week, a source said. Political approval of a release would hark back to an era when parole for federal prisoners did not exist. From 1899 until the 1950s, the governor-general decided on the conditional release of prisoners on the recommendation of what today would be called the public safety minister. That ended with the creation of the Parole Board in 1959. The death penalty was mandatory for capital murder (now known as first-degree murder) until 1961. Life without parole is a common sentence in the United States, found in all states except Alaska; 40,000 prisoners, including some who committed their crimes before they turned 18, are serving it. But Canadian Justice Department lawyers advised Justice Minister Peter MacKay, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney and the cabinet that the courts would almost certainly rule life without hope of release unconstitutional, and pressed that case especially vigorously. "They must have pressed so hard because I know they press on every other issue, and rarely win the day," the source said, citing federal laws such as the one that toughened early parole rules in 2011 for non-violent first-time federal offenders. The Supreme Court of Canada unanimously struck down a part of that law because it applied retroactively. (...) There has been little, if any, public discussion of dangers posed by paroled first-degree murderers. The National Parole Board says it does not keep statistics on the number of murders they commit. Statistics Canada's justice branch also says it does not keep such data. Correctional Service Canada says its numbers are not readily available. Globe and Mail

Imam: Preventing radicalism key to fighting terrorism

Canadians must work harder to prevent young people from becoming radicalized instead of simply dealing with the aftermath, says an Ottawa imam. There is little talk of steering vulnerable people away from extremism, Zijad Delic told the Senate national security committee Monday. Instead, the focus is on trying to deradicalize them after the fact. Political leaders, social services, teachers and others need to "find ways of tackling" the lure of extremism, Delic said. Last fall, the RCMP said it had 63 active security investigations on 90 suspected extremists who intended to join fights abroad or who had returned to Canada. The federal government has since introduced two bills aimed at reinforcing or expanding the ability of Canadian security agencies to investigate and deter terrorist threats. Legislation tabled on Friday would give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service powers to actively disrupt threats, not just collect information about them. It would also make it easier for police to control the movements of terror suspects and to detain them longer without warrant. (...) In the House of Commons, Liberal MP Ralph Goodale noted key allies have robust parliamentary oversight of their intelligence services - something he said Canada needs. Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney said the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which reports to Parliament, keeps an eye on CSIS. The Canadian Press, (Times Colonist, A6, The Chronicle-Herald, National Post, Toronto Star, Ottawa Citizen), Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 5 front)

Tories' anti-terror bill undermines values it's meant to protect

An editorial states, "When a prime minister announces one of the most draconian anti-terrorism bills in his nation's history - and does this not in the national legislature, but at an election-type campaign stop in a riding his party hopes to hold in a looming election - Canadians should be worried about the democratic stability of the country. In introducing this new legislation, Prime Minister Stephen Harper again said that "we are at war with the Islamic State" - language U.S. President Barack Obama has explicitly warned against on the grounds that it will likely lead to overreaction. But overreaction, it seems, is exactly what Harper is hoping for. He appears to be trying to raise the level of fear in order to railroad through measures that will violate the very democratic values they are purportedly meant to protect. [...] It is well documented that CSIS watchdog SIRC, with its limited reporting function, has not been able to provide effective oversight of the powers that CSIS currently has, let alone the vastly expanded proposed powers. Add to that the additional reach the bill would give to other organizations such as the Canadian Border Security Agency, and the need for an overarching Parliamentary oversight body could hardly be starker. The UK and the U.S. both have such a body to watch over and rein in their respective security apparatuses." (...) This law is so bad one has to wonder about the true motives behind it. The fact that the prime minister and Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney have repeatedly (and bewilderingly) rejected calls to introduce an obviously needed guarantee of Parliamentary oversight of these new powers suggests a potential profoundly immoral political strategy. Did the government deliberately structure the proposed law to be unpalatable even to a largely sympathetic opposition? After all, that would allow the Tories to label their opponents "soft on terror" in the run-up to an election." Toronto Star

Four reasons Harper's new anti-terrorist legislation will alarm you

An opinion piece states... "We may not be sure yet how CSIS might use its new and expanded powers, but one thing is certain: if the government has its way, there will be no Parliamentary oversight commensurate with the new danger of abuse by the spy (now to become, in effect, the secret police) agency. The Minister of Public Security, Steven Blaney, says the existing body that keeps an eye on CSIS, the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), is all we need. Experts in the field are not convinced. SIRC only has three politically appointed members and a small staff. It may formally report to Parliament annually, but it operates under the direct supervision not of Parliament but of the Minister of Public Security. In the words of SIRC itself, "ministerial direction" guides its work. In other words, the Minister who is responsible for CSIS also directs the small and poorly resourced Committee that, very notionally, oversees and supervises CSIS's work. With that kind of institutional arrangement, taken together with the added powers the Harper government wants to give CSIS, we could say, to paraphrase Winston Churchill: "Some oversight; some supervision!" Rabble.ca

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

 Saint John declares state of emergency as snow buries Atlantic Canada

A state of emergency was declared in Saint John's southern peninsula early Tuesday as forecasters predicted blizzards, flash freezing and extreme cold across Atlantic Canada. Environment Canada says Saint John has been buried under more than 120 centimetres of snow in the past week, with the latest storm dumping 29 centimetres on the southern peninsula. Under Saint John's emergency declaration, parking is banned on streets in the region and any parked vehicles will be towed, at the owner's expense, as of noon today. The city says as streets are returned to a stable state, they will be removed from the declaration, and the public will be notified. The Trans-Canada Highway between Moncton and Nova Scotia has been closed, as have some roads along the coast in eastern New Brunswick. Canadian Press (GlobeandMail.com); CBC.ca

 Les tempêtes se succèdent

Une quatrième tempête en un peu plus d'une semaine déferle sur une bonne partie du Nouveau-Brunswick. La nouvelle bordée de neige doit laisser jusqu'à 30 centimètres de précipitations sur le nord-est et le sud de la province, durant la nuit de lundi à mardi. Les Néo-Brunswickois arrivent à peine à se relever des dernières tempêtes et à déblayer toute cette neige qu'Environnement Canada annonce que la quasi-totalité de la province sera frappée de plein fouet par un autre blizzard. Exceptions à la règle: le Nord-Ouest et le Restigouche, qui ont plutôt reçu un avis de froid extrême. L'Acadie Nouvelle, 2; Daily Gleaner

 Storm one for the record books

Windsor residents could be waiting until Wednesday before plows clear their streets of snow as public works crews continue their lengthy cleanup after a record-setting winter storm. Many commuters throughout Windsor and Essex County dug their way out of their driveways Monday after a blast of snow made many residential streets impassable. Sunday's snow storm didn't just wallop Windsor's streets, it also dented the city's pocket book. Cleaning up the 37 centimetres of white stuff will likely cost the city $500,000, from an allocated snow-removal budget of $2.8 million. Windsor Star, A1

 Toronto sees 500 collisions after storm drops 22 cm of snow

Five hundred collisions were reported on Toronto's roads and surrounding highways on Monday as the city shovelled its way out of a winter storm that touched down on Super Bowl Sunday. As of early Monday afternoon, the storm had dumped 22 centimetres of snow on Toronto and more than that in areas to the west and south of the city. Parts of southwestern Ontario saw between 30 and 40 centimetres of snow in many cases. CBC.ca

 Aftershocks reveal quake clues

Researchers recorded as many as 100 aftershocks after a 4.4-magnitude earthquake near Fox Creek, including one that measured 2.3 on the Richter scale. Preliminary analysis of the data indicates the Jan. 22 earthquake was caused by hydraulic fracturing, University of Calgary geophysicist David Eaton said Monday. Edmonton Journal, A6

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

 Top court embraces anti-terror laws

What politicians think about the new anti-terrorism law in an election year is almost completely irrelevant. Because, put simply, it is an election year. Stephen Harper and his Conservatives are competitive again, because their approach to the security file is closely aligned to what the electorate want. Polls taken in the past week suggest that up to 70% of Canadians support the international coalition fighting ISIS. Thomas Mulcair and his New Democrats oppose military action, much in the way the NDP have opposed many other past decisions to deploy Canadian troops. It is consistent with their values, and it is arguably popular with their core vote. Justin Trudeau and his Liberals, meanwhile, initially adopted the NDP position - opposing any combat role against ISIS. Having seen how unpopular that is with Canadians, Trudeau and his caucus are now in a quiet retreat. What does it all signify? Mostly, nothing. It's an election year. Our politicians are more preoccupied with the coming electoral battle in Canada than they are with the military battle currently underway in the Middle East. Political rhetoric is situational: nothing new there. But what of the Supreme Court, which almost certainly will be called upon to determine the constitutionality of the new anti-terror legislative measures? Will they side with the Conservatives, or with civil libertarians? A scan of some past high court rulings provides us with some hints about which way the Supremes might go. QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, Edmonton Sun, Calgary Sun, Winnipeg Sun, Ottawa Sun)

MacKay once backed spy oversight now rejected by Tories

One of the Conservative cabinet ministers responsible for Ottawa's new anti-terrorism legislation once advocated parliamentary oversight of Canada's spy agencies, which the government now rejects as unnecessary even as it expands the powers of this country's national security apparatus. Justice Minister Peter MacKay stood beside Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week when the government unveiled a bill that would give the Canadian Security Intelligence Service new authority to disrupt terror plots and lengthen the number of days individuals can be held on suspicion they may commit terror acts. As deputy leader of the Conservative Party in 2005, Mr. MacKay argued forcefully for giving MPs and senators a role in overseeing Canadian spies. "When you talk about a credible oversight body, I would suggest ... that a parliamentary body is going to have more credibility because of its independence and because of the fact that there is also parliamentary accountability that will be brought to bear," Mr. MacKay said in October of that year. "To that end, I suggest that it would also cause a little bit more diligence on the part of the security agents themselves, just knowing that this oversight body was in place." Asked to comment Monday, Mr. MacKay said circumstances have altered his opinion. "A great deal has changed since 2005 with respect to international security and the terrorism threat facing Canada. Parliament itself has become a target of terrorism," he stated. Globe and Mail, A1

 Anti-terrorism bill 'more about politics than public safety,' says civil liberties lawyer

Anti-terrorism legislation Prime Minister Stephen Harper unveiled last week gives the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service sweeping new powers that would allow the spy agency to use any undefined measure-other than the use of lethal force, perversion of justice or "violating the sexual integrity" of an individual-in a new role empowering it to disrupt national security threats, but one of Canada's most prominent civil liberties and human rights lawyers says it's "more about politics than public safety." The three limitations, along with the stipulation a judge's warrant would be required before CSIS agents could take measures that would violate Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are the only defined limits to CSIS operations under new provisions that expand its role from surveillance, security investigations and counter-espionage to a mandate to "disrupt" suspected terror plots in the planning stages, lawyer Paul Champ told The Hill Times. Mr. Champ pointed to a new section Bill C-51, the Anti-Terrorism Act, would add to the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service Act placed as an example of what he says are changes that give "sweeping" new powers to CSIS, and new criminal law powers to police agencies, as part of the government's response to two killings last October Mr. Harper (Calgary Southwest, Alta.) has branded as Jihadist attacks within Canada. As part of a package of beefed-up powers for CSIS, including lower evidence thresholds to obtain judicial warrants and detain suspects or enforce police control over the movement and freedom of suspects to prevent "likely" terrorism attempts, the bill would allow CSIS to take undefined "measures" to disrupt suspected terrorism plans if agents have "reasonable grounds to believe" that a "particular activity" constitutes a threat to Canada. Hill Times

 Anti-terror bill needs closer look

The most significant expansion in the surveillance powers of the Canadian state in recent years has crept in on cat's paws. The opposition parties, who found themselves offside from public opinion when they voted against the mission in Iraq, have been muted in their response to the anti-terror legislation brought in by the government last Friday. There have been no press releases and neither party led off on the issue when they had the opportunity to hold the government to account during Question Period on Monday. The Liberal party signalled its consent even before reading the draft legislation. Justin Trudeau, the Liberal leader, said he would be focused on oversights and safeguards Tom Mulcair, the NDP leader, has given the legislation a pass, despite saying rights have to be respected. Both parties appear to have been cowed by the Prime Minister's pre-emptive strike when the bill was released at a campaign-style event outside Toronto, where he dismissed questions about freedoms being surrendered, in favour of security considerations. National Post, A4, A8; Ottawa Citizen (Edmonton Journal, Windsor Star, The Star Phoenix, Vancouver Sun, Leader-Post, Toronto Star), Globe and Mail

 Security agencies need parliamentary oversight

An opinion piece re: "Canada needs to watch the watchers," Jan. 30. states "In asserting that 14 federal security agencies, including CSIS, are in need of greater oversight, Senator Colin Kenny has the right to be considered both expert and authoritative. I served from 1986-98 as assistant inspector general of CSIS within an independent agency reporting to the solicitor general on whether that "spy agency" was keeping the minister appropriately informed and observing applicable laws and policies. As the senator notes, this agency was recently abolished in favour of exclusive oversight by the Security Intelligence Review Committee. I can attest to the evident competence and lofty motivations of the CSIS personnel I knew, as well as those of their RCMP and CSEC colleagues. I could also describe the sort of misdeeds and mishaps that expert external review sometimes bring to light. Wait! No I can't do that - since I am bound by law and oath not to do so. I can, however, say that the time has come to establish some form of multiparty parliamentary oversight for the federal security community, as has already been done in allied countries. Equally, we need a professional system of expert independent oversight that covers all relevant agencies. Not that all abuses will be caught. But many will and many others will be deterred. I won't address the latest security legislation introduced by the government, which piles on edgy new powers. But I am alarmed at the possibility of terror-mongering in this pre-election period. Suffice it to say that this legislation provides even more reason for urgent reform of the oversight regime." Times Colonist, A11

 'We don't want the sheep'

An accused terrorist now on trial in Toronto allegedly questioned a jihadi plan to derail a Canadian passenger train, worried it might not be bloody enough to justify the work involved. Raed Jaser, one of two men charged in the alleged 2012 plot, instead hoped to assassinate Canadian leaders, prominent Jews or "Zionists," Crown attorney Croft Michaelson told the jury in his opening address Monday. Jaser, who came to Canada illegally as a teen in 1993, told an undercover FBI agent in 2012 that attacking a train would only result in the killing of "a few sheep," Michaelson said. Instead, Jaser allegedly wanted to hire a sniper - or learn to shoot a sniper rifle himself - to assassinate Canadian leaders. Jaser allegedly told the agent that, unlike in the United States, Canadian leaders are accessible "because they feel safe." "We don't want the sheep," Jaser allegedly told the agent. "We want the wolf. We can get the wolf, brother. We can get the wolf." Jaser is on trial with Chiheb Esseghaier, a former PhD student in Montreal originally from Tunisia. The two men are accused of planning a foreign-directed plot to derail a Via passenger train travelling between Toronto and New York. Postmedia, (The Gazette, A1), Toronto Star, A1; Canadian Press (Cape Breton Post, The Chronicle-Herald, The Globe and Mail, Acadie Nouvelle, The Guardian, The Record, Times & Transcript, Telegraph-Journal, Le Droit, Le Soleil, Red Deer Advocate, Times Colonist); QMI Agency (London Free Press, Edmonton Sun, Kingston Whig Standard, Toronto Sun, Calgary Sun)

 Crown says accused bombers guilty of terrorism activities

A B.C. couple who styled themselves as the sole members of "al-Qaida Canada" built pressure-cooker bombs and planted them on the grounds of the provincial legislature hours before Canada Day festivities, the Crown alleged Monday. The bombs did not explode but John Nuttall and Amanda Korody intended to kill and maim an untold number of victims on the morning of July 1, 2013, Crown counsel Peter Eccles said at the start of a lengthy terrorism trial. "Planting IEDs (improvised explosive devices) on the front lawn of the parliament building set to go off in the middle of Canada Day activities is a terrorist activity," Eccles told the jury hearing the case. Nuttall and Korody have pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiring to commit murder, conspiring to place explosives on behalf of a terrorist group, facilitating terrorist activity and possessing explosives on behalf of a terrorist group. The pair was arrested in July 2013 after an undercover operation that began months earlier, when an RCMP officer met Nuttall at a gas station near the man's home. Canadian Press (The Record, A5, Times Colonist, Times & Transcript, Telegraph-Journal, Toronto Star); Postmedia (The Star Phoenix, Leader-Post, The Province, Ottawa Citizen, Windsor Star); QMI Agency (Edmonton Sun, Toronto Sun, Ottawa Sun, Winnipeg Sun, London Free Press, Calgary Sun), National Post, A1, Globe and Mail

 Alleged terrorist befriended FBI agent, court hears

Accused terrorist Chiheb Esseghaier met a fellow Muslim on a flight from Houston to California because of a seating screw-up, his terrorist trial heard Monday. The fellow Muslim had lost his original seat and Esseghaier insisted they sit together for the June 2012 flight, court heard. "By the end of that week, we were quite close - he referred to me as his fourth brother," a witness testified. But the rich, radical Muslim who told Esseghaier he financially supported the Mujahideen, wasn't a real jihadist, but actually an undercover FBI agent. His identity is covered by a publication ban. There was no explanation given in court as to how the FBI agent ended up on a California-bound flight from Houston with Esseghaier, a Tunisian doctoral student from Montreal, who was heading to a west coast conference. The agent is now testifying as the critical Crown witness who compiled the terror case called Project Smooth against Esseghaier and Raed Jaser, who are accused of plotting to sabotage a Via train from New York to Toronto in 2012 to force Canadian and American troops out of Afghanistan. Esseghaier, 31, and Jaser, 37, are pleading not guilty to their terror charges. QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, Edmonton Sun, Calgary Sun) * National Post

 Mentally ill man who made threats released

A Quebec Court judge has agreed to release a St-Laurent man from a peace bond the Montreal police sought to have imposed on him after they alleged in November they had reason to fear he would commit a terrorist act. Judge Isabelle Rheault agreed on Friday to grant a motion, filed by defence lawyer Charles Montpetit, to have the peace bond filed against Ahmed Abou al Naja, 21, come to an end. Abou al Naja, a man with a history of mental illness, was released from custody while he awaits sentencing in two other cases in which he pleaded guilty last week to uttering threats on two different occasions - in October and November. Last week, he completed a 60-day prison term he received at the start of December for having violated a court order imposed in him in 2012. He returns to court for sentencing on March 4. Initially, the Montreal police sought to have the bond imposed because, they alleged, they had reason to believe Abou al Naja would commit a terrorist act. Recently, the Crown agreed to modify the request to a more standard one, alleging that police had reason to believe Abou al Naja posed a threat to cause harm to others. "They took out the terrorist reference because, in his case, it is more about a person who has (mental) health problems," Montpetit told the Montreal Gazette on Monday. Montreal Gazette, A7

Le maire de Montréal à Paris - Coderre propose un sommet sur le "vivre ensemble"

Alors qu'il a été reçu lundi par le président François Hollande comme un véritable chef d'État, le maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre, a annoncé qu'il organiserait, en juin dans la métropole, un sommet des grandes villes sur le "vivre ensemble". A la suite des attentats de Charlie Hebdo, Denis Coderre a convaincu son homologue parisienne, Anne Hidalgo, de participer à cet exercice de réflexion sur les mesures destinées à favoriser l'intégration et à combattre la radicalisation. Le sommet se tiendra dans le cadre de la Conférence de Montréal, qui regroupe déjà chaque année des décideurs du monde économique. "Je vais demander à plusieurs de mes collègues des grandes métropoles de venir à Montréal, dit-il. On pourra parler du vivre ensemble et de toute cette question d'intégration." Le maire de Montréal se défend bien de vouloir " créer des amalgames " ou " stigmatiser une communauté par rapport à l'autre ". Son objectif, dit-il, " c'est vraiment de travailler dans un contexte de résilience à ce qu'on puisse s'assurer du vivre ensemble ". Denis Coderre compte inviter à ce sommet les maires de plusieurs grandes villes européennes, comme Bruxelles, Berlin et Barcelone, mais aussi américaines, comme Boston et Chicago. Il y sera question, dit-il, de l'équilibre à créer " entre l'ouverture et la vigilance ". Le Devoir, A1; Canadian Press (Times Colonist, National Post)

Couillard applauds Montreal's move to block controversial imam's centre

The Premier of Quebec applauded a decision by Montreal authorities to deny an imam the right to open a community centre because of his past comments deemed homophobic, sexist, and against Canadian values. Premier Philippe Couillard said the issue of freedom of expression is a delicate one, but added that municipal authorities made the right call, invoking public safety and the risk of radicalization to justify intervening. "I am very pleased that the City of Montreal acted with the tools at their disposal," Couillard told reporters while attending a gathering of the aluminium industry Monday in the province's Saguenay region, north of Quebec City. City of Montreal officials said on the weekend they would not grant Hamza Chaoui an operating licence to open an Islamic centre in an east-end neighbourhood. IPolitics

Snowden urges caution over Ottawa's proposed security law

Edward Snowden, the fugitive American who leaked state secrets, wants Canadians to know that anti-terrorism laws are easy to pass but very hard to undo. "We saw on Friday the Prime Minister of Canada proposed a new law," Mr. Snowden told a teenaged Toronto audience via an Internet link on Monday night. He told the high school students that they should "always be extraordinarily cautious" and press for answers, whenever governments rely on "fear and panic" to set up powers that can be exercised in secret. On Friday, the Conservative government introduced legislation that would empower Canadian authorities to "disrupt" suspected terrorist threats and remove extremist posts from the Internet. At the same time, Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been resisting calls to step up scrutiny of Canada's spy agencies. Mr. Snowden was speaking to a crowd of more than 1,000 students at Toronto's Upper Canada College via a Google Hangouts link from his exile in Russia. The Globe and Mail, A6, * The Canadian Press (Times Colonist), * Postmedia (National Post, Ottawa Citizen, Calgary Herald, Edmonton Journal, Windsor Star, The Star Phoenix, Leader-Post, Vancouver Sun)

 Oct. 22 DND emails annoy NDP critics

The Official Opposition accused the Conservative government Monday of trying to score cheap political points over the attack on the National War Memorial and Parliament Hill last Oct. 22. The NDP's criticism came after the Citizen reported that, on the evening of Oct. 22, Lt.-Gen. John Vance described the day's events as "a strategic opportunity" to affirm the purpose of the Iraq mission. Vance heads Canada's military mission to Iraq to fight the Islamic State (ISIL). In emails with a communications official in the defence department, Vance discussed whether the military should be represented at a news conference the RCMP planned the day after the Ottawa attack, in which a ceremonial guard was killed and his attacker shot to death inside the Centre Block. Vance said the chief of defence staff, Gen. Tom Lawson, "indicated we should seek a strategic opportunity and this may be it." Monday, NDP MP Randall Garrison decried the email exchange, saying, "These are emotional times for all, but would the government agree that describing the events on Parliament Hill as a 'strategic opportunity' is regrettable?" James Bezan, parliamentary secretary to the defence minister, did not respond to the question, saying instead that ISIL extremists "were the ones who declared war on Canada and her allies." The NDP's Aline Michaud then asked, "Does the government think it's normal that, in the Langevin Block, the day of the attacks in Ottawa, they were thinking of scoring political points and justifying the war in Iraq instead of being totally devoted to the security of Canadians?" Bezan replied that the NDP "is opposed to protecting the innocent people of Iraq who have been brutalized and terrorized by ISIL." Postmedia (Ottawa Citizen)

Super espions canadiens - Le retour aux granges brûlées?

Le Canada reviendra-t-il à l'époque où les autorités policières volaient de la dynamite, dérobaient la liste de membres du Parti québécois (PQ) et faisaient brûler des granges ? Des spécialistes des lois antiterroristes commencent à le croire, à la vue des nouveaux pouvoirs confiés aux espions canadiens dans le projet de loi C-51. " Ce qu'ils font maintenant est plutôt scandaleux et épouvantable. Ils redonnent au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité [SCRS] un pouvoir que la Gendarmerie royale du Canada [GRC] a ", lance au téléphone Reg Whitaker. M. Whitaker, auteur du livre Secret Service : Political Policing in Canada (2012), a collaboré à deux commissions d'enquête sur des questions de sécurité nationale (Air India et Maher Arar). " Cela va bien au-delà de ce dont on a besoin et cela va presque certainement déboucher sur des scandales en bout de piste. " Des scandales, dit-il, comme ceux des années 1970. En 1981, la commission McDonald publie son rapport sur " certaines activités de la GRC et la connaissance qu'en avait le gouvernement ". Elle confirme que la branche de renseignement de la GRC, le Service de sécurité, a mené diverses activités illégales pour perturber les affaires de groupes jugés menaçants, en particulier les séparatistes québécois. La GRC a rédigé de faux communiqués de presse du FLQ. En 1972 et 1973, elle est entrée par effraction dans les locaux de l'Agence de presse libre du Québec, du Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques du Québec et de la Coopérative des déménagements du 1er mai pour y dérober des caisses de documents. La GRC a mis le feu à la grange Petit Québec libre pour y empêcher la tenue d'une rencontre entre des souverainistes et des membres des Black Panthers américains. Et elle a volé la liste de membres du PQ. Le Devoir, A1

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

Un père vit avec la menace d'être séparé de sa famille

Un père vit dans l'angoisse d'être déporté en Côte d'Ivoire. Un an et demi après avoir reçu l'avis de déportation, il redoute sans répit le moment où il sera séparé de sa femme et de ses trois enfants, nés au Québec. Abou Fofana est arrivé dans la Belle-Provence en 2008 à titre de réfugié. Peu de temps après, il est tombé amoureux de Geneviève Trottier. Le couple s'est marié en 2011 et a eu trois enfants. M me Trottier, était enceinte de sept mois en mai 2013 quand le couple a appris que la demande de statut permanent de M. Fofana était refusée. Initialement, l'homme devait être déporté le 20 juin 2013, mais les papiers nécessaires n'étaient pas prêts. Un an et demi plus tard, Abou Fofana réside toujours à Trois-Rivières, dans l'attente insoutenable de devoir partir. La situation devient intolérable pour sa conjointe Geneviève Trottier. "C'est sûr qu'il devra partir, mais on ne sait pas quand." Cette dernière peine à s'imaginer quitter le Québec pour l'Afrique avec son mari et ses trois enfants. Il s'agit d'une grosse décision, mais elle n'aura pas le choix si elle désire garder sa famille unie. "C'est là que c'est difficile pour mon couple. Mon mari ne comprend pas pourquoi je n'ai pas envie d'aller là-bas." Elle craint les conditions de vie dans ce pays. Journal de Montréal, 16 (Journal de Québec)

Menacés d'expulsion, ils se réfugient à l'église

Une famille s'est réfugiée dans une église le 23 janvier pour éviter d'être expulsée en Turquie, où elle est persécutée dit-elle. Elle espère un miracle qui lui permettra de demeurer au Québec. Kamber et Ceylan Turk, et leurs filles Sila et Helin, sont arrivés au Québec en 2012. Leur petite dernière, Derine, est née au Québec. Ils ont quitté leur pays parce qu'ils ne voulaient plus vivre dans la peur et la persécution. Faisant partie de la minorité kurde, que le pays tenterait d'assimiler, ils sont aussi des alévis, branche religieuse jugée progressiste. "Entre 1990 et 2000, 6000 villages kurdes ont été rasés en Turquie; 20 000 Kurdes ont été emprisonnés et on dénombre 17 000 disparus", expose Maksuni Oerdre, un ami de la famille. Il ajoute que depuis qu'un parti islamiste a pris le pouvoir (2002), il y a eu une radicalisation et un net recul des droits des femmes. D'ailleurs, si elle doit retourner dans son pays, Ceylan affirme que ce qui lui manquera le plus, ce sera la liberté. "Ici, je peux prendre la voiture et aller prendre un café toute seule si je le veux. En Turquie, ce serait absolument impossible pour une femme de faire cela." Le frère de Kamber et Orane, Fevzi Turk, vit au Québec depuis 15 ans. Il dit que lui, ses deux autres frères, sa soeur et sa mère ont tous obtenu un statut de réfugié au Canada. Il attribue le refus actuel au resserrement des règles de l'immigration de 2012. Journal de Montréal, 16 (Journal de Québec)

Obama's proposed budget fails to include funds for DRIC bridge

U.S. President Barack Obama's proposed $3.99 trillion budget for the upcoming fiscal year released Monday features increased spending, but still no money needed to pay for a customs plaza for the planned Detroit River bridge. One of the hurdles that could delay construction of the Detroit River International Crossing is the required $250 million needed for a U.S. customs plaza in Detroit. Canada is essentially paying all other costs for the $2.1 billion project that will link the downriver industrial communities of Brighton Beach and Delray. The new Canada-U.S. bridge is scheduled to open in 2020. "I am very disappointed that the president's budget allocates no funding for the (DRIC bridge) in Detroit," said Sen. Gary Peters (D-Detroit), a leader in the battle to keep the international crossing project on schedule. "This is a project that will create thousands of Michigan jobs, enhance trade with Canada - our closest trading partner - and transform Michigan into a transportation and logistics hub for trade, manufacturing and innovation." Canada's transportation minister Lisa Raitt has promised the bridge will open on schedule whether or not the Obama administration pitches in for the U.S. customs plaza. Windsor Star, A3

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

* Alleged 'spyware' disabled on computers

The software that Saanich Mayor Richard Atwell alleged was being used to spy on him has been disabled on municipal computers because it had "become a distraction," said the district's chief administrative officer Monday. Atwell told reporters last month that someone at the district was planning to use Spector 360 software to spy on him. The mayor's allegation prompted claims from district staff that the software was being used for security reasons and an ongoing review by Elizabeth Denham, B.C.'s information and privacy commissioner. Vancouver Sun, A2; Globe and Mail

* Cyberattaques: le site de PKP de retour en ligne

Le site Internet du candidat à la chefferie péquiste Pierre Karl Péladeau revenu en ligne, dimanche après-midi, après une éclipse provoquée par une cyberattaque. Pkp2015.quebec a été hors circuit pendant trois longues journées. Le Soleil, 8

* Cyber honey trap used in Syrian war

London Hackers posing as beautiful women stole a trove of detailed battle plans from rebel groups fighting the Syrian government, says a cybersecurity group. The cyber honey trap saw opposition fighters tricked into downloading spy programs on to laptops or smartphones when they believed they were sharing personal photographs, or looking for wives. A cache of military documents and sensitive Skype conversations were stolen over two months by the unidentified group of hackers. Daily Telegraph (National Post, A7)

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

Two people found dead in Brackley residence

The RCMP are investigating after two people were found dead in a home on Union Road in Brackley Monday. RCMP Sgt. Leanne Butler said there was no risk to the public and there wasn't a search for a suspect underway, but she couldn't provide many other details in the early stages of the investigation. "We treat every investigation as if it is suspicious until proved otherwise," she said. Officers from Queens District RCMP were called to the residence around noon. A male and a female were found dead inside. The RCMP forensic identification unit, the major crime section and other officers were at the scene all afternoon. Someone from the coroner's office was also on hand and Butler said officers were working with the coroner to determine causes of death. The home was an old-style farmhouse with a barn in the backyard. The Guardian, A1 ; Canadian Press (Chronicle Herald)

Shot officer back in his hometown

An RCMP officer shot at a traffic stop in Kamloops has been transferred back to a hospital in his hometown after treatment at a Vancouver facility. Forty-one-year-old Cpl. Jean-Rene Michaud was gunned down at a traffic stop in early December, sparking a manhunt for the shooter. Michaud's wife, Colleen, issued a statement last week saying her husband has shown courage and strength through many surgeries, countless complications with setbacks, and faces a long road to recovery. But she said the family was finally feeling confident that Michaud will overcome his substantial injuries. Kenneth Knutson is behind bars awaiting trial on various charges, including attempted murder. Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, A2, The Province); Canadian Press (Times Colonist); Globe and Mail

Suspect named in serial bank heists

The RCMP have identified a suspect in as many as nine bank robberies across Western Canada. Mounties say Shaun Christopher Cornish, who is 26, is formerly of Langley. He has been charged in three robberies committed in Alberta. Charges are pending in British Columbia and Saskatchewan. He is to appear in provincial court in Okotoks, Alta., on Feb. 6. Cornish was arrested on Friday at a motel in Grande Prairie, Alta. Police say no one was hurt in the takedown. The first robbery police recorded was Dec. 1 in Princeton. Eight days later, a man believed to be the same thief held up a Vernon financial institution. Between Dec. 19 and Jan. 28, the same suspect held up banks in High River, Alta., Swift Current, Sask., Lethbridge, Alta., Claresholm, Alta., and Merritt, Langley and Dawson Creek. Postmedia News (Vancouver Sun, A2); Canadian Press (Times Colonist); QMI Agency (Edmonton Sun, Calgary Sun)

Fugitive pair spotted in Doaktown, says RCMP man and a woman reported missing from an Ontario mental health facility and deemed dangerous by police have been spotted in Doaktown. According to an RCMP news release, Joseph Pepin, 39, and Cara Duval, 27, approached a local apartment owner on Main Street in Doaktown at approximately 3 p.m. on Saturday and attempted to rent an apartment. "The pair left the area before police arrived and were last seen heading northbound on Highway 8 ... They were driving an older-model, grey-coloured vehicle, similar to a Chrysler Intrepid, with a New Brunswick licence plate." Pepin and Duval, who also uses the name Donnelly, were reported missing from the North Bay Regional Health Centre in Ontario on Jan. 22, when they left the North Bay hospital's Mental Health and the Law program and didn't return after permitted off-unit privileges. North Bay Police advise the two may be dangerous and anyone who sees them is advised not to approach them, but should call 911 immediately, said the RCMP news release. Daily Gleaner (Telegraph-Journal)

Ex-Mountie awaits sentence in sexual assault case

A former Mountie will have to wait a bit longer to learn his sentence after his sexual assault conviction. Ambrose Gregory Wolfe, 60, pleaded guilty to sexual assault on Oct. 6, 2014, in Red Deer Court of Queen's Bench. He assaulted a woman while he was posted to the Rocky Mountain House RCMP detachment. The identity of the victim is covered by a court ordered publication ban protecting the identities of sexual assault victims. Although it is estimated that sentencing on the matter would only take one day, defence and Crown have been unable to find dates to appear before Justice Kirk Sisson, who is hearing another case. Wolfe's sentencing has been adjourned to the next arraignment date, March 2, in Red Deer Court of Queen's Bench. Red Deer Advocate

 Stats suggest violent crime is up

Violent crime in Surrey increased by seven per cent in 2014 compared to 2013 while property crimes rose by 22 per cent and the number of criminal code offences, all told, grew by 20 per cent. There were fewer homicides in Surrey last year, at 17, compared to 2013's record-breaking 25. The previous record was 21, in 2005. The latest Surrey RCMP statistics to be released reveal that in 2014 there were 10,085 criminal code offences recorded in the city, compared to 8,161 in 2013. Surrey RCMP Cpl. Bert Paquet said some of the increase in reported crime can be attributed to the Surrey RCMP's Observe and Report campaign which encourages residents to contact police when they see something suspicious happening. "We've seen a rise in calls," he said. Crimes that likely weren't being reported to police before, he added, "are now being reported due to our campaign." Broken down, there were 5,925 violent offences recorded in 2014 compared to 5,527 in 2013, 35,483 property crimes recorded in 2014 compared to 29,175 in 2013, and drug possession crimes - cocaine and marijuana - rose to 51,493 from 42,863, for an increase of 20 per cent. The Now

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

 One prison life that should not be secret

A letter to the editor states, "The federal government owes New Brunswickers a detailed explanation of why serial killer Allan Legere has been moved from a Special Handling Unit (SHU) in Quebec to a regular maximum security prison, reportedly near Edmonton, Alberta. The Correctional Service of Canada, citing the inmate's privacy rights, won't say anything about it. Surely public safety trumps an inmate's Charter rights in this case. If CSC officials are properly applying the law here someone, somewhere in government needs to tell us how this can be so if police are able to tell the public when a dangerous child predator has been released on parole. We don't suggest reopening the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but we don't see how exceptions can't be developed over time. Victims of crimes are for example entitled to attend the parole hearings of the inmates whose crimes affected them, even though the Charter protects privacy rights of those inmates too. The same measure could arguably be made available to crime victims in cases where CSC has made a highly significant internal change in security arrangements for an inmate as dangerous as this one. The victims in this instance could be considered the entire population of this province. On the other hand, if the law has been misinterpreted or overzealously applied by CSC a process review, including potential disciplinary measures, is due." Times & Transcript, A8

Public endangered with relaxed security for serial killer

A letter to the editor states, "To the Editor: I was surprised to learn that Allan Legere was recently transferred from a special handling unit (SHU) to a maximum security prison. As we all know, this notorious offender is a multiple murderer who terrorized the New Brunswick area for many weeks 25 years ago. This, after his escape while on an escorted medical pass from a maximum security setting. As a result, he has been held mostly in a SHU since that time until his most recent transfer, probably to Alberta. CSC has a primary mission to contribute to public safety and to value and respect the Canadian public. This transfer is not consistent with that mission as Allan Legere is an extremely violent high risk offender with a well established criminal record of hurting others. Based on his past, both in prison and in the community, this offender has shown over and over that he requires a very restrictive environment in order to ensure both public safety and the security of the institution. There are only a few inmates in Canada that require long-term incarceration in the most secure facility and Allan Legere is one of them." Times & Transcript, A9

Khadr should get bail

A letter to the editor states, "The mere mention of the name Omar Khadr makes Canadians hot under the collar. A majority believe he is an irredeemable terrorist who should be left to rot in prison. A sizable minority see him as a child soldier, a minor who has been tortured and deprived of his right to justice in the 13 years since the battle in Afghanistan in which he threw a grenade that killed one U.S. soldier - a medic - and wounded another. He was 15 at the time, brainwashed by his western-hating family. Severely wounded, he was detained in Guantanamo Bay for 10 years before his transfer to an Alberta prison in 2012. Now 28, Khadr is back in the headlines with plans to seek bail pending disposition of his appeal in the U.S. against his controversial conviction for war crimes. Khadr pleaded guilty in 2010 to charges of murder in violation of the rules of war and was given another eight years, but later said pleading guilty was his only way out of Guantanamo, because he faced life in jail even if he was acquitted. The federal government has been criticized by the Supreme Court of Canada for contributing to Khadr's detention and treatment at Guantanamo that violated basic Canadian standards. The Alberta Court of Appeal ruled the legal process to which Khadr was subjected has "been found to have violated both the Charter and international human rights law." Despite this, the public generally appears to support federal attempts to further deprive him of his liberty. His lawyers will argue he has been a model prisoner, is involved in his studies, would live with one of his lawyers while on bail and is not a threat to the public." Leader-Post, A6

 Free Khadr

A letter to the editor states, "Re: "Bail for Omar Khadr makes safety sense," Editorial, Jan. 31. Omar Khadr should never have been imprisoned in the U.S. or Canada. When he was captured in 2002 for purportedly throwing a grenade, he was 15 years old, a child soldier under international law and not eligible for imprisonment. Both the Supreme Court of Canada and the Alberta Court of Appeal have rendered decisions indicating that the Canadian government violated Khadr's humanitarian rights. When Khadr was brought to trial in the U.S., he was faced with a plea bargain: plead guilty and spend another eight years in jail or plead not guilty and spend another 40 years in jail. He pleaded guilty to avoid the longer sentence. Khadr should have been freed on bail long ago." Calgary Herald, B5

 Your rights, your remedies rely on fairness in law

An opinion piece states, "The idea that courts should provide effective remedies when rights are violated is as old as the common law. The Supreme Court's award of what today would be valued at over $250,000 to Jehovah's Witness Frank Roncarelli after then-Quebec premier Maurice Duplessis arbitrarily cancelled his liquor license was a landmark affirmation of the rule of law. (...) The ability of prisoners, often self-represented, to seek habeas corpus is important. Applications, even if frequently denied, can promote accountability. At the same time, unnecessary strip searches and prolonged periods in solitary cannot be stopped simply on a case-by-case basis. The B.C. Civil Liberties Association and the John Howard Society have recently brought a Charter challenge against federal legislation that places no limits on administrative segregation. Hopefully this litigation will build on growing awareness of the harms of prolonged isolation, including the suicides of Ashley Smith and Eddie Snowshoe. This lawsuit seeks legislative reforms such as limits on days spent in isolation and independent adjudication, already provided for disciplinary segregation. Even with statutory reforms, there is a need for reform of our increasingly overcrowded and violent prisons. Canada is not the U.S., but we should not be proud of some of our prisons, such as the notorious Baffin Correctional Centre in Iqaluit. Judicial supervision of prisons is a last resort remedy, but it must be viable if only to induce other reforms." Ottawa Citizen, C5

 Finding the right balance on crime

A letter to the editor states, "Re Still fighting shadows, Editorial Jan. 29 Jailing people like Messrs. Bernardo, Pickton, Bourque and Olson indefinitely is hardly tough justice. Equating all serious offenders with these men is not sensible either. Jailing innocent accused for two years before trial wastes valuable jail space and is patently unjust. Jailing people for possession of drugs is likely a waste of taxpayers' money. Perhaps Canadians should decide how many jail cells it needs and then start taking whatever measures are necessary to reserve these valuable spaces for the most deserving offenders. Better treatment of mental disease, attention to the needs of aboriginal communities, ensuring prompt trials for all accused, and removing those convicted of drug possession from our jails would quickly leave us with a surplus of empty jail cells and unemployed jailers, at which time it might be worth considering tougher penalties for the relatively few truly malignant criminals among us. Toronto Star, A10

 Gold-selling fraudster paroled

As 2006 neared its end, Michel Henri appeared to have it all. The wholesale gold jewelry dealer lived in a part of Town of Mount Royal where no one should be surprised to run into a powerful politician or the head of a major company while out for a stroll. He attended a fundraising gala for cancer research held in a posh ballroom at Le Windsor in downtown Montreal where he sipped drinks and dined on lamb with community and business leaders. Nine years later, the man who defrauded the federal and provincial governments out of at least $35 million over a two-year period was bankrupt when he was recently granted full parole on the 5½-year prison sentence he received in August 2012. Henri was arrested, in June 2007, as part of Projet Energie, a complicated investigation by Revenue Quebec and the Sûreté du Québec that would ultimately result in at least five people from Montreal's gold jewelry industry being sent to federal penitentiaries. A few others served time in provincial detention centres, or were ordered to pay staggering fines to avoid jail. The federal and provincial government placed nearly $250,000 in legal liens on Henri's house in T.M.R. (currently valued at $2 million) and by 2012 he lost his home. When Henri pleaded guilty on Feb. 9, 2012 - to fraud, filing false tax returns and committing a crime for the benefit of a criminal organization - his family was living in an apartment in Villeray. Until his arrest, Henri, 44, had managed to give the impression he was a successful and legitimate businessman. During one of his parole hearings, he said that while defrauding the government he managed to deceive everyone close to him, including his wife and immediate family. Montreal Gazette, A4

 Man slips away from halfway house

Vancouver police are asking for the public's help to locate a 30-year-old man wanted Canada-wide for being unlawfully at large. Marcus Wilfred Sheena has an extensive criminal history and has recently served time for assault with a weapon and assault causing bodily harm. On Feb. 1, Sheena failed to return to a Vancouver halfway house for his curfew, a breach of his release conditions. Castanet (2015-02-02)

 Mom upset by killer's early release

The mother of a Comox Valley teenager who was stabbed to death in 2011 is upset that her son's killer has been granted early release. James Denton, 19, was stabbed to death during an altercation after a day-long music festival at the Comox Valley Exhibition Grounds in Courtenay on July 23, 2011. A youth, who was 16 at the time and cannot be named under the Youth Criminal Justice Act, was convicted of second-degree murder in January 2013 and sentenced to four years in prison, followed by three years of supervision in the community. He was scheduled for release from custody in January 2017, but last week, the family learned a judge had approved an early release. The youth will now be under supervision at a halfway house in Greater Victoria. "It feels like a slap in the face," Denton's mother Brenda Denton told the Times Colonist on Monday. Times Colonist, A3

 Richard Dowrey, gay-bashing victim at Fountainhead Pub in 2009, dead

Richard Dowrey, the victim of a gay-bashing incident at a West End pub in 2009, died this weekend. In March 2009, Dowrey went to the Fountainhead Pub to celebrate his retirement. He was punched without warning and left with permanent, profound brain damage. The court ruled that he was targeted because of his sexual orientation. "He's never been the same person since the attack and never would be again," said Brian Wawryhsyn, a friend of Dowrey's. Wawryhsyn described Dowrey as a kind, carefree man who was always encouraging his friends. He loved boating and sports, the BC Lions in particular - he went to almost every game. After the attack, Dowrey lived in care facilities. Wawryhsyn visited him for several years, but he said Dowrey couldn't recognize any of his old friends and he never regained the use of his legs. Dowrey's attacker, Shawn Woodward, was convicted of aggravated assault in 2010 and sentenced to six years. He was released on parole in May 2013. CBC News

 La poursuite de «Colosse» revient à Québec

La poursuite de 35 millions $ déposée par Yves «Colosse» Plamondon contre la Procureure générale du Québec pourrait finalement être débattue à Québec, à la demande des parties poursuivies. La poursuite déposée en décembre dernier par l'homme qui a passé 28 ans derrière les barreaux revenait devant un juge de la Cour supérieure afin que les différentes parties s'entendent sur un échéancier. La Procureure générale du Québec a toutefois fait une demande de changement de district afin que le dossier présentement entendu à Montréal soit transféré à Québec. Cette demande a été prise en délibéré jusqu'au 19 février. «Colosse» Plamondon a été condamné à la prison à perpétuité en 1986 pour le meurtre de trois individus reliés au trafic de drogue. Pendant toutes ses années d'incarcération, l'accusé a toujours nié avoir commis les meurtres et un nouveau procès lui avait finalement été accordé. Journal de Québec, 8 (Journal de Montréal)

Other players in the gold game

Paul Henri, 39, Montreal: The brother of Michel Henri started serving a three-year sentence in Sept. 2012 but then saw the prison term increased to four years just five months later when he was unable to pay a $1.5-million fine levied in Projet Anergie. He was responsible for shipping and diluting the gold, as well as carrying out bank transactions. He was also the sole administrator of Avak-Or Distributions Inc., a company that supplied fake invoices for his brother's scheme. He was granted full parole in March 2014. Janek Cienki, 44, Laval: He worked as the account manager for Michel Henri's company from 2000 until the arrests in Projet Anergie were made in 2007. In June 2012, Cienki was sentenced to a four-year prison term for his role in the scheme. In June 2014, while residing at a halfway house and on day parole, he asked the Parole Board of Canada to ease one of the conditions of his release. He wanted to visit his pet, who had been looked after by the associate of a relative while he was behind bars. The person caring for the animal had a conviction for a minor offence that dated back to 1994 but, as part of his conditions, Cienki is not allowed to associate with people who have criminal records. The parole board ultimately determined that Cienki's request was reasonable. Patrice Reid, 49, Pierrefonds: Reid used his own jewelry company to pull off the very same scheme that Michel Henri did, only on a smaller scale - $5.6 million over the same two-year period. In Sept. 2012, he pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy and was later sentenced to a 30-month prison term. Reid was granted full parole in March 2014. Montreal Gazette, A4

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

AFN National Chief Perry Bellegarde urges aboriginal men to do their part to help end the pattern of deaths and disappearances of native women

The head of the Assembly of First Nations is imploring native men who have "lost their way" to help prevent the deaths and disappearances of aboriginal women - a tragic reality he says all Canadians must confront, no matter how uncomfortable. Aboriginal men must address deep-seated issues stemming from the Indian Residential School system, including addiction and cycles of violence, National Chief Perry Bellegarde told The Globe and Mail on Monday. "When they come out of that system, they're not healthy, they're not well, and they've lost their way," Mr. Bellegarde said, adding that men and their families need better access to wellness centres and treatment programs. "What is the role of men? They're supposed to be protectors, providers." Mr. Bellegarde, who was elected in December, assumed the helm at a time when Ottawa has come under intense pressure to launch a national inquiry into Canada's more than 1,181 murdered and missing aboriginal women - a probe Prime Minister Stephen Harper has dismissed as unnecessary. "I think there has to be dialogue so it's in everybody's face," said Mr. Bellegarde, who supports an inquiry. "Don't just skirt around it. The truth may hurt, but let's deal with it." Globe and Mail, A1

 B.C. missing women inquiry led to changes, but roots of violence remain

Violence against aboriginal women remains a problem that police and governments aren't addressing well enough, say women's advocates, two years after the B.C.'s missing women inquiry released 63 recommendations for major change. Commissioner Wally Oppal's inquiry into missing and murdered women slammed police for botching their investigations into serial killer Robert Pickton, who preyed on Vancouver sex workers from 1997 to 2002. The issue returned to the spotlight after the family of Stephanie Lane, whose partial remains were found on Pickton's farm, called for a new murder charge against the killer last week. Angela Marie MacDougall, executive director of Battered Women's Support Services, says that when it comes to addressing violence against aboriginal women, more lasting change is needed. "We need to see that change in an ongoing way. We need the political will. What we haven't seen is the systemic change that we would need to get at the roots of why we have this type of violence." CBC News (2015-02-02)

 Gutting gangs a numbers game

Crime Prevention Ottawa has come up with a "logical service model" to extract gangsters from the thug life, the agency's board heard Monday. Executive director Nancy Worsfold said CPO is going for a case management approach -- giving one-to-one support to primarily young men who are trying to get out of gangs. CPO wants the John Howard Society to be the lead agency for the exit strategy. The Ottawa Community Immigrant Services Organization would also be involved. Worsfold warned that the strategy won't rehabilitate the estimated 485 gangsters and associates overnight. It depends on the money available and how many gangsters are willing to turn their lives around. Ottawa Sun, 4, Ottawa Citizen, Radio-Canada

 Ottawa's gang violence result of power struggles over drug trade, rivalries

Ottawa police say the huge spike in shootings in Ottawa in 2014 points to a "mini arms race" among street gang members who are arming themselves with guns as they fight over drug territory. There were 49 shootings in Ottawa in 2014, compared to 30 in 2013 and 32 in 2012. Ottawa police say there are about 500 gang members and associates in Ottawa who earn money through the trafficking of illegal drugs, in particular selling crack cocaine. Acting Staff Sgt. Ken Bryden of the Ottawa police's guns and gangs unit said he doesn't have an estimate on how many illegal firearms there are in the capital, but police are averaging one gun seizure a week. "It would appear more guns are on our streets," Bryden said. Ballistics expert Sgt. Chris O'Brien, who tracks guns in the province of Ontario for Ottawa police, said guns are now seen as a necessary tool to compete in the drug trade. "For example, you have a neighbourhood with five drug dealers. If one of them gets a gun, all five of them will have to get a gun," he said. "If only one gets a gun, he becomes the power broker in the community. He is the person who has the weapon so he is more easily able to protect his turf... In order for everyone else to remain competitive they will have to arm themselves." CBC News

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

La libération de Mohamed Fahmy imminente

Alors que, d'après les autorités canadiennes, sa libération serait imminente, le journaliste canado-égyptien Mohamed Fahmy, emprisonné au Caire, aurait abandonné sa citoyenneté égyptienne depuis quelques semaines. M. Fahmy est emprisonné depuis décembre 2013 par les autorités égyptiennes qui l'accusent de donner son appui aux Frères musulmans, une organisation interdite en Égypte. L'homme a renoncé à sa citoyenneté après que des responsables égyptiens lui eurent signifié que c'était «la seule façon de s'en sortir», a rapporté le réseau CTV, hier. Rejoint par l'Agence QMI, un porte-parole du ministère des Affaires étrangères n'a toutefois pas confirmé cette information. QMI Agency (Le Journal de Québec, Le Journal de Montréal); Canadian Press (Calgary Herald, Chronicle Herald, Times Colonist, The Record, The Gazette, Ottawa Citizen, Leader-Post, The Province, Edmonton Journal, The Star Phoenix, Windsor Star, * The Guardian, Le Devoir), National Post, * Toronto Star Windsor Star, Edmonton Journal, StarPhoenix, Vancouver Sun, Leader-Post, Ottawa Citizen, Calgary Herald, The Province, Montreal Gazette, National Post), QMI Agency (London Free Press, Edmonton Sun), * The Guardian (UK), * Presse canadienne (Voix de l'Est, Le Soleil, Acadie nouvelle, Le Devoir), * Globe and Mail, * Associated Press (Cape Breton Post)

Saïd Jaziri tire les ficelles de l'étranger

Un imam controversé et interdit de territoire au Canada pour le reste de sa vie a toujours la mainmise sur sa mosquée montréalaise à partir de la Tunisie, a conclu la Cour supérieure dans un récent jugement. Le tribunal a par ailleurs confirmé que Saïd Jaziri avait légalement le droit de tenir les rênes de la Mosquée al-Qods, rue Bélanger. Il contrôlait aussi l'association qui gère le lieu de culte, reconnue comme un organisme de bienfaisance sur le plan fiscal. Ces actifs sont évalués à 2,5 millions de dollars. M. Jaziri s'était fait connaître il y a une dizaine d'années par ses déclarations homophobes et pour l'instauration de tribunaux religieux. Le Tunisien a été expulsé du Canada en 2007 pour avoir caché son passé criminel aux agents d'immigration et a été banni du territoire de façon permanente. Il dirige maintenant un parti islamiste qui milite pour l'intégration de la charia dans la Constitution tunisienne, selon les médias locaux. Or, «Saïd Jaziri continue de contrôler l'Association [coranique de Montréal] et la mosquée, comme tous les témoins entendus le confirment», a conclu la juge Claude Dallaire dans une décision étoffée rendue avant les Fêtes. «Il a pris, ou a demandé de prendre, tous les moyens disponibles pour ne pas perdre ce contrôle.» La Presse, A2 (Front)

 Le Nobel de la paix à Badawi?

Faisant déjà l'objet d'une mobilisation mondiale pour exiger sa libération, le blogueur saoudien Raïf Badawi se retrouve maintenant en nomination pour l'obtention du prix Nobel de la paix 2015. Pendant ce temps, tous les yeux sont tournés vers l'Arabie saoudite, qui a commencé en fin de semaine à libérer certains prisonniers, sans préciser le nombre total et l'identité de ceux qui seraient graciés. C'est un poids symbolique important qui s'ajoute aux pressions visant à faire libérer Raïf Badawi. Le blogueur de 31 ans, emprisonné et flagellé en Arabie saoudite pour avoir appelé ses concitoyens à réfléchir sur la place de la religion dans leur société, est désormais en lice pour l'obtention du prix Nobel de la paix. Raïf Badawi figure ainsi au côté d'Edward Snowden, du pape François et du médecin congolais Denis Mukwege, qui soigne les femmes victimes de violences sexuelles, pour ne nommer que ceux-là. La Presse (Le Quotidien, 25, La Tribune, Voix de l'Est)

INTERNATIONAL

NIL

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca.*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
February 7, 2015 / le 7 février 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Blaney says privacy rights won't be trampled in terror fight

The privacy rights of Canadians will be respected under new anti-terrorism legislation that would allow more information-sharing with the United States, says Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney. Blaney has been discussing security issues in London with U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson and ministerial counterparts from Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Blaney pointed out that the Conservative government's new bill would allow sharing of data from Canada's no-fly list with close allies. In an interview Friday, the minister said that doesn't mean handing U.S. officials the full list of people suspected of being a threat to the skies. "I made clear that, from a Canadian perspective, we have to first take into consideration the privacy of Canadians." Blaney said only information about high-risk travellers would be shared under a memorandum of understanding that conforms with Canadian privacy law. Blaney defended the government's efforts, saying in the interview the bill would allow CSIS to intervene at an early stage with people at risk of becoming radicalized through Internet propaganda. "But we agree, we need to keep working in that direction with more strategy, especially in the prevention aspect," Blaney added. Canadian Press (iPolitics, Red Deer Advocate)

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NIL

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

From Jmag to Jihad John: The radicalization of John Maguire

Ottawa's John Maguire understood that his enlistment as a foot soldier in the Islamic State would confound his friends, family and countrymen. So in his now infamous video, a six-minute screed in which he called upon Canadian Muslims to launch new attacks on their native soil, Maguire, 24, addressed his own unlikely radicalization. Released in early December, the video showed him in a shattered Syrian town, wrapped in a keffiyeh with a Kalashnikov rifle at his side. He spoke with strident conviction and careful enunciation. The RCMP this week announced terrorism-related charges against Maguire and the other alleged jihadist, Khadar Khalib, 23, a former Algonquin College student. Both men were charged in absentia. (Maguire was charged because the RCMP have no conclusive evidence that he's dead.) Ottawa Citizen, D1

Accused terrorists considered blowing up bridge, court hears

Two men accused in an alleged plot to derail a Via Rail train travelling from New York to Toronto wanted to establish a "network of like-minded brothers" to spread their message in Canada, their trial heard Friday. Raed Jaser and Chiheb Esseghaier face multiple terror-related charges in the alleged scheme that culminated in their arrest in April, 2013. Not-guilty pleas have been entered for both. Canadian Press (Globe and Mail, A8; Vancouver Sun, Red Deer Advocate, Edmonton Journal, National Post, Times-Colonist, Windsor Star); La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 21; L'Acadie Nouvelle); Toronto Star; QMI Agency (London Free Press, E2; Kingston Whig-Standard)

Jihad, love & dinner

Three years ago, on a flight from Houston to San Jose, an undercover U.S. agent posing as a wealthy Egyptian-American befriended a Montreal PhD student and suspected radical named Chiheb Esseghaier. Six months later, in September 2012, the two men - now close friends - drove from Montreal to Toronto to meet a third man, whom Mr. Esseghaier called "the Palestinian brother." Unbeknownst to Mr. Esseghaier, though, the agent from the Federal Bureau of Investigations was recording the entire time. In a Toronto courtroom this week, prosecutors played long excerpts from their conversation during the 5-½-hour drive to the jury in his terrorism trial (the "Palestinian brother," Raed Jaser, is also on trial). National Post, A9

Muslim student group at college faces scrutiny

The trial of alleged terrorist recruiter Awso Peshdary promises to turn a spotlight on the Algonquin College Muslim Students Association. Two of the three people charged this week with terrorism-related offences by the RCMP - Peshdary, 25, and Khader Khalib, 23 - are both former members of the association and took part in its events. One member of the association, who spoke the Citizen on the condition that his identify remain protected, said he was aware that several of the association's members were on a Canadian Security Intelligence Service "watch list" last year. Ottawa Citizen, A11

Few convictions under Britain's anti-terror laws

New laws to jail promoters of terrorism and seize or silence jihadi propaganda have stirred up controversy but led to few actual convictions in a country that served as one of the models for Prime Minister Stephen Harper's latest salvo against the Islamic State. In Britain, which criminalized the encouragement of terrorism in 2006, the culprits have included a Muslim bookseller who traded in extremist literature and whose business card regularly turned up in terrorism suspects' homes, a law student who argued videos of attacks on western troops in Iraq and Afghanistan showed defence against an invading force, not terror, and a street merchant who, the courts ruled, was "reckless" about the potential influence of videos that celebrated notable terrorists. But the most recent case closely resembles the threat Canada has set out to tackle with the flood of young Muslims drawn to the Islamic State, a brutal insurgent group that has taken control of wide swaths of Syria and Iraq. In that case, a young man from Wales who had been stopped on two prior occasions from travelling to Somalia and Turkey was later arrested for posting terrorist material to social media websites even while he was participating in a government sponsored deradicalization program. Toronto Star, A12

CSIS oversight body lacks resources, former member Bob Rae says

As the government's anti-terrorism bill is set to enhance the powers of the national spy agency, a former member of the independent body that watches over the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is concerned it is not equipped to provide sufficient oversight. Bob Rae — the former premier of Ontario and one-time interim leader of the Liberal Party — was for five years a member of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which keeps tabs on CSIS. In an interview airing Saturday on CBC Radio's The House, Rae told host Evan Solomon that although CSIS has a budget "well over a billion dollars," the agency meant to watch over it has scant resources in comparison. CBCNews.ca

Imam calls for inquiry into radicalization

A prominent Canadian imam has called on the federal government to launch a national inquiry into the radicalization of young Muslim men in this country. Imam Syed Soharwardy, founder of the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada, said he's concerned that impressionable young people are falling prey to shadowy recruiters selling a false interpretation of Islam. Ottawa Citizen, D2

Riding a knife's edge

When news broke that the Moroccan-born imam Hamza Chaoui was opening a Montreal centre to preach his fervent brand of Wahhabism to local youth, reaction was swift. From the Quebec legislature to Montreal city hall, politicians labelled him a danger and said he had to be stopped. "He's an agent of radicalization, period," Mayor Denis Coderre said this week. The east-end borough where Mr. Chaoui planned to open his Ashabeb Centre invoked zoning rules to block the project, as politicians brushed aside concerns about possible infringements on free speech and freedom of religion. On Thursday, the leader of Quebec's second opposition party, François Legault of the Coalition Avenir Québec, even called for a change to the provincial rights charter to prohibit religious preaching that contradicts "Quebec values." The latest attempt to counter religious fundamentalism in Quebec coincides with the introduction last week of federal anti-terrorism legislation inspired by the fatal attacks last October in Saint-Jeansur-Richelieu, Que., and Ottawa. Motivated by the same impulse as Quebec policy-makers, the federal Conservative government says it is protecting Canadians from violent jihadists. However, critics of the law warn the proposed protection carries a high cost in eroded civil liberties. National Post, A5

Back from the war

Dillon Hillier sat at the kitchen table in his family's stone farmhouse at the end of a long driveway. His mother poured coffee. His father fed the wood stove. Out the windows, the sun glared off snowy fields as clean and bright as a blank sheet of paper. A veteran of the Canadian Forces, Mr. Hillier landed in Iraq in November and fought alongside the Kurdish peshmerga, motivated to volunteer by the October attacks in Ontario and Quebec and the unseemly flow of radicalized Canadians into the ISIS ranks. He had intended on staying at least six months but on Jan. 27, his father Randy Hillier, a Progressive Conservative Ontario MPP, issued a statement saying his 26-year-old son had "returned safely home from the Middle East." In his first interview since returning to Canada, Mr. Hillier told the National Post his war had been cut short by U.S. military advisers, whom he said had pressured the Kurdish generals to stop allowing foreign volunteers to participate in the conflict. He also revealed that an ISIS sniper had almost terminated his mission sooner, missing him by inches, and that RCMP national security officers from Ottawa had visited him last week to ask, among other things, if he had come across any Canadian ISIS members. He flew back the way he'd come, through Doha and London. He was sure he was in for a grilling at Canadian customs at the airport in Toronto. He was upfront with the Canada Border Services Agency officer, admitting he had been in Iraq fighting with the peshmerga. But he said he was simply asked if he had any alcohol or tobacco to declare and waved through. He arrived home on Jan. 25. The next day, two RCMP officers from the Integrated National Security Enforcement Team came the farmhouse to question him. They said they were there to determine if any crimes had been committed. "I wanted them to know I wasn't with the PKK," he said. Since the PKK is on Canada's list of terrorist groups, those fighting with the group could face charges. But he had no role with the group and told the officers so. "They asked me if I had seen any Canadians on the other side," he said, meaning ISIS. He hadn't. "I don't think I really provided them with any useful information, just some insight." National Post, A6 (Vancouver Sun, Windsor Star, Edmonton Journal, Ottawa Citizen, Calgary Herald)

Local MPs promote anti-terrorism bill

Local MPs Rob Moore and Rodney Weston held a press conference Friday morning at the port to promote the new anti-terrorism legislation Prime Minister Stephen Harper proposed in Parliament last week. Canada is not immune to the threat of terrorism as demonstrated by attacks against soldiers last October in Ottawa and Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu in Quebec, Moore said. "These new measures will enhance information sharing for national security purposes and provide law enforcement and national security agencies with the tools they need to prevent, detect and respond to the threat of terrorism," Moore said. Telegraph-Journal, B4

* École islamique suspendue d'un cégep

Le collège rosemont suspend les activités d'une école islamique qui lui louait des classes la fin de semaine. notre bureau d'enquête vient d'informer la direction que l'école publiait des liens vers des textes intégristes sur son site internet. Il ne croit pas que l'établissement soit un incubateur à radicaux, mais il a néanmoins demandé à la GRC de venir former le personnel pour savoir y faire face. Le Journal de Montréal, 13

It's not a war. Here's how to win

An editorial states, "Terrorism is a weapon of the weak. It aims to maim and to kill, but above all it seeks to provoke a more powerful opponent. A madman with a gun on Parliament Hill, conspirators dreaming of blowing up a bridge, a lunatic turning a car into a weapon - these can take life, but they are not an existential threat to Canada. They cannot destroy democracy, the rule of law or our rights and freedoms. They cannot overthrow the Canadian government. By themselves, they cannot accomplish much beyond murder. To gain recruits, to advance their cause and to leave behind anything other than death, they need our help..." Globe and Mail, F9

Surveillance bill needs careful review

An opinion piece states, "The past 10 days have been a difficult time for Canadians concerned with privacy and civil liberties. Strike one came with new Edward Snowden revelations regarding Canada's role in the daily tracking of the Internet activities of millions. Strike two was the introduction of Bill C-51, the anti-terrorism legislation, which sparked concern from observers across the country. Strike three came with the response to those developments, with the government dismissing oversight mechanisms as "red tape" and the opposition parties choosing to focus on process rather than substance..." Toronto Star, B3

A spooky anti- terrorism bill

An opinion piece states, "Eight days ago, Prime Minister Stephen Harper introduced legislation to create a new Anti-Terrorism Act to an audience in Richmond Hill, Ont. A copy of the legislation was submitted to Parliament by FedEx. The proposed legislation represents the largest overhaul of Canada's security laws in more than a decade following the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. It will ratchet up the power of police and spy agencies and challenge civil liberties without new or enhanced parliamentary oversight to watch over the work of our security services..." Times & Transcript, A13

U.S. should stand up to online extremists

An opinion piece states, "The U.S.-led campaign to defeat the Islamic State (also known as ISIS or ISIL), al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations should not be limited to airstrikes in Iraq, targeted drone strikes in Pakistan and non-lethal military assistance to other countries battling Islamist insurgencies. Unless America and its allies engage fully in the battle of ideas, countering online Islamist propaganda and jihadi recruitment efforts, impressionable young people will continue to be drawn into cyber-jihad, becoming either cannon fodder for terrorist organizations overseas or lone wolf terrorists at home... Last week, the federal government introduced sweeping new national security measures to combat the growing threat of violent extremism and the radicalization of youth by terrorist recruiters. For example, the proposed legislation aims to "criminalize the advocacy or promotion of terrorism offences in general" and "counter terrorist recruitment by giving our courts the authority to order the removal of terrorist propaganda online." Those measures are necessary and welcome, but they are insufficient to stem the tide of hate on social media..." Kingston Whig-Standard, A6

* Should Target single out PM for failure?

An opinion piece states, "... As it happens, of the approximately 12 million forms distributed in the census prior to 2010, there were - wait for it - 166 complaints from the public. Fact is, MasterCard and Visa, the credit-rating agencies, the Canada Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and the international spy agencies with which CSIS shares data; and the telemarketer who tried last night to sell you a new set of windows already know plenty about you..." Toronto Star, B1

SAUDI CAMPUS CONCERNS

With the Algonquin College community already on edge following revelations of a homegrown terror network linked to a campus student group, faculty members have elevated concerns over a campus the school operates in a troubled region of Saudi Arabia. The Algonquin Jazan College of Excellence opened its doors to male-only students in 2013 near the city of Jazan, in the southern tip of Saudi Arabia near the border with Yemen, an area the U.S. State Department describes as being rife with terror, and one experts deem among the most dangerous regions on the planet. Ottawa Sun, 4

Questions that need answers

An opinion piece states, "This is one Ontario community college satellite campus where even our own premier would not be permitted to study. If Premier Kathleen Wynne wanted to attend Algonquin College's Saudi Arabia campus as a student she'd be out of luck. So much for the boast by Ontario Colleges of equal opportunity education. There are other concerns with this strange arrangement between the Ottawa community college and Saudi Arabia as QMI Agency's Aedan Helmer reports in his exclusive story. In light of the terror arrests and a jihadi recruitment network exposed at Algonquin College this week, there should be some questions answered. The RCMP and CSIS would only be doing their jobs to take a look at all aspects of this campus and who attends --especially since this school is in a region of Saudi Arabia the American government has warned citizens not to go near for safety reasons..." Ottawa Sun, 5

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

No point to plaza debate

Some of us are far too obsessed with who pays for the customs plaza on the U.S. side of the new bridge between Windsor and Detroit. How the Americans pay for it or when they pay for it is immaterial - although Canadians would have a right to be outraged if our tolls also help pay for the U.S. half of their highway infrastructure. But that's not likely. Windsor Star, A3

Foreign worker program needs more tweaking

The sweeping changes to the temporary foreign worker program in June 2014 were supposed to address the perception that foreign workers were taking jobs away from Canadians. The overhaul may prove effective for some regions of Canada, but it threatens to bring harm to Alberta businesses. Recognizing Alberta's circumstances, federal Employment Minister Jason Kenney says the program needs "a little tweak." As other problems become apparent, we expect further tweaks will be necessary. Calgary Herald, A23

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

NIL

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

 Police seek bail-hearing overhaul

The Edmonton Police Service, citing the recent murder of a St. Albert Mountie by a man on bail, demanded Friday that Justice Minister Jonathan Denis make sweeping changes to bail hearings. The department wants Crown prosecutors to take over bail hearings currently done by police officers. "We believe that conducting justice of the peace bail hearings is a function of the Crown," acting deputy chief

Deb Jolly said Friday. Her statement follows questions surrounding the short bail hearing of Shawn Rehn, who killed St. Albert RCMP Const. David Wynn in January. Edmonton Journal, A3; Edmonton Sun; Globe and Mail; Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, A3)

 Le NPD ne veut pas que le mandat soit confié à la GRC

Le NPD s'oppose farouchement à l'intention du gouvernement Harper de confier la sécurité de l'ensemble des édifices de la cité parlementaire à la GRC, soutenant que ce corps policier a été incapable de stopper le tireur fou Michael Zehaf Bibeau l'automne dernier, alors qu'il franchissait au pas de course le terrain de la colline avant de faire irruption dans le parlement. En réponse à cette attaque qui a ébranlé toute la classe politique canadienne, le gouvernement Harper a déposé hier une motion confirmant la fusion des services de sécurité de la Chambre des communes et du Sénat et proposant de placer ces gardes de sécurité sous le commandement de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC). La Presse, A14; Ottawa Citizen

 Gang squad charges two after year-long investigation

B.C.'s anti-gang agency says it has headed off a resurgence of the Independent Soldiers gang in Kelowna with two arrests for firearms-and drug-related offences. Vancouver Sun, A7

 Missing snowmobiler a hoax – RCMP

It was a search that sent RCMP scrambling. Two girls were missing after an apparent snowmobile accident near Carrot River. Police scoured the area. Locals went out on snowmobiles looking for them. Search and rescue crews flew the area for hours. Their valuable time and energy were wasted. It all turned out to be a giant hoax. "It is a relief that it is a hoax because now we know no one is out there," said Carrot River RCMP Sgt. Steven Smith. "It upsets us because of the emotions we have and the manpower we put it onto this." StarPhoenix, A4

 Dangerous animal report nears completion

As a court date approaches for the man arrested this week after a huge snake killed two young boys in Campbellton a year and a half ago, a special report with recommendations on dangerous and exotic animals is almost ready to be presented to the provincial cabinet. RCMP said in a press release Friday a 38-year-old Montreal man is scheduled to appear in Campbellton provincial court in April in connection with the boys' deaths. While the RCMP did not name the man in the release, Campbellton lawyer Leslie Matchim confirmed to Brunswick News it was his client, Jean-Claude Savoie, who had been arrested in the Montreal area on Thursday and later released that evening. He also confirmed his client would be appearing in Campbellton provincial court in April. Telegraph-Journal, A1; Canadian Press (Edmonton Journal, A10); La Presse Canadienne (Le Quotidien, 35); Agence QMI (Le Journal de Québec, 47)

 Five arrested in 2012 slaying

Mounties have arrested five people in the 2012 slaying of a 22-year-old man, after a lengthy probe involving hundreds of officers in B.C. and Alberta. Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, A8)

 Senior pulled from burning home

Sooke RCMP officers responding to a fire call ended up pulling an elderly man from a burning Govenlock Place home Friday morning. Const. Sean Heidman used a sledgehammer he had in his police vehicle to smash a slidingglass door to get to the man, who was lying on the kitchen floor. Times-Colonist, A3

 RCMP cleared of wrongdoing in arrest of Meat Cove woman

The province's independent Serious Incident Response Team (SIRT) has cleared the RCMP of any wrongdoing in the arrest last year of a 57-year-old Meat Cove woman who suffered a broken arm. Cape Breton Post, A3; Chronicle-Herald

 Who will provide Pan Am security?

Security for the 2015 Pan Am Games is being provided by a mélange of private and public forces which includes an OPP-led consortium of eight police services (including Hamilton) plus at least two private-sector companies. Here's who they are and what they'll be doing: Integrated Security Unit (ISU): The ISU is led by the Ontario Provincial Police and includes representation from the RCMP and local police from

Niagara, Hamilton, Halton, Peel, Toronto, York and Durham. Hamilton Police Superintendent of Investigative Services Dan Kinsella has been involved in the planning and preparation process for well over a year and has been working with the ISU full time since January. Hamilton Spectator, A6

 Hamilton Pan Am security costs still unknown

Ontario taxpayers will be spending about $10 million a day throughout the Pan Am Games to secure the sites, athletes and spectators - but how much of that will be spent in Hamilton has yet to be revealed, or even fully decided. Hamilton Spectator, A6

 Officer recalls evidence from scene of shooting

These days, Const. Kelly Manweiller works with the RCMP's Specialized Response Unit in Whitehorse, but in October 2011, her last name was McQuarrie and she was with the Major Crimes Unit. It was in that capacity that she travelled to Dawson on Oct. 22 of that year to take part in the investigation into the arrest and shooting of Mark McDiarmid. McDiarmid, then 32 years old, had been tracked to the North Fork Road off the Dempster Highway and captured after he had driven his truck over a spike belt and had to pull off the road on the Dempster. He was shot three times by RCMP Constables Jeff Nielsen and David Marentette when he allegedly ran at them brandishing a splitting maul after throwing a jar filled with an oily chemical substance at their SUV, designated 10 Alpha 1, in which they had pursued him. McDiarmid is on trial before a Yukon Supreme Court judge and jury facing seven charges - mischief in damaging a police vehicle, three counts of assaulting police officers, possessing a weapon for a dangerous purpose, and two counts of attempted murder. Whitehorse Daily Star, 9

 Yukoners attend Afghanistan Memorial Vigil in N.W.T.

Deputy Premier Elaine Taylor, Speaker David Laxton and a delegation of Yukoners visited Yellowknife Tuesday to attend a commemoration ceremony for the Afghanistan Memorial Vigil at the N.W.T. Legislative Assembly. They were joined by Commissioner Doug Phillips; Joe Mewett, the Royal Canadian Legion Branch 254 president and Afghanistan war veteran; and three Yukon RCMP members. They are: "M" Division commanding officer, Chief Supt. Peter Clark; "M" Division warrant officer, Staff Sgt. Major Doug Spencer; and Whitehorse detachment Const. Brian Harding, who served a tour of duty in Kandahar Province in 2008/09 as a member of Cameron Highlanders of Ottawa Regiment. Whitehorse Daily Star, 10

 Bus carrying children flips on slick highway in central Newfoundland

Several people including young children were recovering Friday after a bus slid off the icy Trans-Canada Highway and flipped onto its side near Grand Falls-Windsor in central Newfoundland. MacKenzie praised the co-operation of about 25 firefighters, medical responders, the RCMP and local search and rescue crews who helped comb nearby woods in case anyone had been thrown. A crane was used to make sure no one was trapped beneath the bus. Canadian Press (The Guardian), A6)

 Province, not Mounties, managing horse capture

The RCMP will not be holding the licences for an upcoming feral horse capture in the Ghost area, contrary to what was initially announced by the province. Instead, the roundup of 50 of the province's free-roaming horses will be managed by Alberta Environment and Sustainable Resource Development, said department spokesman Duncan MacDonnell on Friday. Calgary Herald, A13

Outlaws' threat created Saints

The StarPhoenix has conducted a series of interviews with a source who has extensive knowledge of the Project Forseti investigation, as well as the inner workings of the Saskatoon Hells Angels, Fallen Saints and other groups. One morning late last summer, more than a dozen members of the Hells Angels and Fallen Saints motorcycle clubs rode out of town together. Through a steady rain, they headed north on Highway 11. Their journey ended just before noon at the Prince Albert clubhouse of fellow bikers, the Saints and Sinners. Second, the Outlaws needed allies inside federal penitentiaries in Western Canada. The partnership ensured any convicted Outlaws' safety in prison ranges occupied by Deuce members. Although the majority of Hells Angels weren't personally involved in drug dealing, prostitution and illegal firearms, they all knew their power depended on controlling those who did, the source said. The bar owner and the Hells Angels began recruiting. Within a few weeks, several high profile criminals had agreed to start the new gang loyal to the Hells Angels. By the end of 2014, the Outlaws had finally been driven underground, and many left town, the source said. The Hells Angels, Fallen Saints and Terror Squad had achieved the dominance they craved. It wouldn't last long - the Project Forseti raids came just weeks later. So far, 16 people have been charged as a result of Project Forseti. The massive police raids targeted the Fallen Saints and Hells Angels and uncovered hundreds of firearms and more than $8 million worth of drugs. While several of the bikers who were arrested are now out on bail, police have confirmed they are considering criminal organization charges against some of those arrested in Project Forseti. StarPhoenix, A1

* Protecting the Hill

An editorial states, "It took an armed attack on Parliament Hill to prompt the change, but the heart of our democracy will soon be protected by a proper security force under unified command. The change was proposed this week and it comes not a moment too soon. The attack on Oct. 22 highlighted the heroism of security officials on the Hill (former sergeant-at-arms Kevin Vickers being only the most heralded). But it also exposed obvious weaknesses in the system meant to protect Parliament..." Toronto Star, IN6

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

* Risk to the public 'too high'

An extremely violent Edmonton man who committed a "horrific" knife attack on his wife was ordered locked up indefinitely as a dangerous offender on Friday. Dennis Anthony Aulotte, 46, was given the notorious designation following a lengthy hearing which began after he was convicted of the 2011 aggravated assault in 2012. Edmonton Sun, 20

* St. John's man still on the run

Andrew Dunn has been unlawfully at large since at least October, celebrating his 31st birthday while wanted by the police. The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary has issued a news release requesting help in locating Dunn, who is accused of breaching the conditions of his parole. Correctional Services Canada has put out a warrant for his arrest. The Telegram, A5

* Son's breaches cost dad $75K

The father of a convicted killer has been ordered to pay a huge portion of the surety he posted for his son. Dennis Tymchyshyn must pay the court $75,000 - three-quarters of the $100,000 he posted for his son. He had banked on the prospects of Corey Tymchyshyn staying out of trouble while awaiting his first-degree murder trial for the 2008 killing of Chad Davis only to have that blow up in his face. Corey Tymchyshyn was rearrested in 2012 while out on bail and was slapped with several charges, including assault, extortion and running a marijuana grow-op out of a city home. Crown and defence lawyers had presented evidence and arguments last September. Justice Sadie Bond of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench gave a written decision on the surety issue Thursday. In 2009, the elder Tymchyshyn posted a $100,000 surety so a judge would allow his son to be released on bail while awaiting trial for first-degree murder. Corey Tymchyshyn was found guilty in early 2014 of the killing of Davis and is serving a life sentence with no chance of parole for at least 25 years. He has filed an appeal. Winnipeg Free Press, A5

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

* B.C. to fund programs using forfeiture money

Premier Christy Clark says her government is diverting money from "the bad guys" to their victims as the province upgrades its strategy toward ending violence against women. The province will apportion $3 million in civil forfeiture funds this year to pay for a new Domestic Violence Unit in Surrey, local support services and an awareness campaign. Vancouver Sun, A5

* Langley MP seeks stiffer drunk-driving law

A Conservative MP from Langley wants impaired drivers convicted of causing death to be charged with vehicular homicide and given a mandatory sentence. Vancouver Sun, A4

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

Bell named chief justice of Court Martial Appeal Court

Justice Richard Bell is leaving the New Brunswick Court of Appeal to take up new duties in Ottawa. Bell has been appointed chief justice and judge of the Court Martial Appeal Court of Canada and a judge of the Federal Court of Canada. Meanwhile, the Federal Court of Canada hears disputes between provinces or between the federal government and the provinces, as well as patent law cases, and matters involving federal institutions such as the RCMP or Corrections Services of Canada. It is also the court that hears national security concerns, such as terrorism issues. Daily Gleaner, A5

INTERNATIONAL

Islamic State claims U.S. hostage killed

Islamic State extremists claimed that an American woman held hostage by the group was killed Friday in a Jordanian airstrike in northern Syria, but the government of Jordan dismissed the statement as "criminal propaganda" and the U.S. said it had not seen any evidence to corroborate the report. Globe and Mail, A17

Islamic State raising stakes with its propaganda

A video of a Jordanian pilot being burned to death was exceptional in its brutality, even for the Islamic State group, and also was a sign that the militants intend to raise the stakes in their propaganda efforts, experts say. It also offered confirmation to the belief that the airman was killed days or weeks before its release. The Associated Press (Times & Transcript, B5)

U.K. jihadi sentenced to 12 years in prison

A British jihadi who faked his death in an attempt to secretly return to England from Syria was sentenced Friday to 12 years in prison. Imran Khawaja, who joined a faction aligned with the Islamic State group and attended an extremist training camp in Syria for six months, had appeared in the group's online propaganda videos - including one in which he posed with a man's severed head. Toronto Star, A16

U.S. must resist 'overreach' abroad, Obama says

U.S. President Barack Obama, outlining a new national security blueprint for his last two years in office, warned against American "overreach" abroad Friday, even as he cast the U.S. as an indispensable force in combating global challenges including terrorism, climate change and cyber threats. The Associated Press (The Record, A7)

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
February 7, 2015 / le 7 février 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Blaney says privacy rights won't be trampled in terror fight

The privacy rights of Canadians will be respected under new anti-terrorism legislation that would allow more information-sharing with the United States, says Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney. Blaney has been discussing security issues in London with U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson and ministerial counterparts from Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Blaney pointed out that the Conservative government's new bill would allow sharing of data from Canada's no-fly list with close allies. In an interview Friday, the minister said that doesn't mean handing U.S. officials the full list of people suspected of being a threat to the skies. "I made clear that, from a Canadian perspective, we have to first take into consideration the privacy of Canadians." Blaney said only information about high-risk travellers would be shared under a memorandum of understanding that conforms with Canadian privacy law. Blaney defended the government's efforts, saying in the interview the bill would allow CSIS to intervene at an early stage with people at risk of becoming radicalized through Internet propaganda. "But we agree, we need to keep working in that direction with more strategy, especially in the prevention aspect," Blaney added. Canadian Press (iPolitics, Red Deer Advocate)

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NIL

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

From Jmag to Jihad John: The radicalization of John Maguire

Ottawa's John Maguire understood that his enlistment as a foot soldier in the Islamic State would confound his friends, family and countrymen. So in his now infamous video, a six-minute screed in which he called upon Canadian Muslims to launch new attacks on their native soil, Maguire, 24, addressed his own unlikely radicalization. Released in early December, the video showed him in a shattered Syrian town, wrapped in a keffiyeh with a Kalashnikov rifle at his side. He spoke with strident conviction and careful enunciation. The RCMP this week announced terrorism-related charges against Maguire and the other alleged jihadist, Khadar Khalib, 23, a former Algonquin College student. Both men were charged in absentia. (Maguire was charged because the RCMP have no conclusive evidence that he's dead.) Ottawa Citizen, D1

Accused terrorists considered blowing up bridge, court hears

Two men accused in an alleged plot to derail a Via Rail train travelling from New York to Toronto wanted to establish a "network of like-minded brothers" to spread their message in Canada, their trial heard Friday. Raed Jaser and Chiheb Esseghaier face multiple terror-related charges in the alleged scheme that culminated in their arrest in April, 2013. Not-guilty pleas have been entered for both. Canadian Press (Globe and Mail, A8; Vancouver Sun, Red Deer Advocate, Edmonton Journal, National Post, Times-Colonist, Windsor Star); La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 21; L'Acadie Nouvelle); Toronto Star; QMI Agency (London Free Press, E2; Kingston Whig-Standard)

Jihad, love & dinner

Three years ago, on a flight from Houston to San Jose, an undercover U.S. agent posing as a wealthy Egyptian-American befriended a Montreal PhD student and suspected radical named Chiheb Esseghaier. Six months later, in September 2012, the two men - now close friends - drove from Montreal to Toronto to meet a third man, whom Mr. Esseghaier called "the Palestinian brother." Unbeknownst to Mr. Esseghaier, though, the agent from the Federal Bureau of Investigations was recording the entire time. In a Toronto courtroom this week, prosecutors played long excerpts from their conversation during the 5-½-hour drive to the jury in his terrorism trial (the "Palestinian brother," Raed Jaser, is also on trial). National Post, A9

Muslim student group at college faces scrutiny

The trial of alleged terrorist recruiter Awso Peshdary promises to turn a spotlight on the Algonquin College Muslim Students Association. Two of the three people charged this week with terrorism-related offences by the RCMP - Peshdary, 25, and Khader Khalib, 23 - are both former members of the association and took part in its events. One member of the association, who spoke the Citizen on the condition that his identify remain protected, said he was aware that several of the association's members were on a Canadian Security Intelligence Service "watch list" last year. Ottawa Citizen, A11

Few convictions under Britain's anti-terror laws

New laws to jail promoters of terrorism and seize or silence jihadi propaganda have stirred up controversy but led to few actual convictions in a country that served as one of the models for Prime Minister Stephen Harper's latest salvo against the Islamic State. In Britain, which criminalized the encouragement of terrorism in 2006, the culprits have included a Muslim bookseller who traded in extremist literature and whose business card regularly turned up in terrorism suspects' homes, a law student who argued videos of attacks on western troops in Iraq and Afghanistan showed defence against an invading force, not terror, and a street merchant who, the courts ruled, was "reckless" about the potential influence of videos that celebrated notable terrorists. But the most recent case closely resembles the threat Canada has set out to tackle with the flood of young Muslims drawn to the Islamic State, a brutal insurgent group that has taken control of wide swaths of Syria and Iraq. In that case, a young man from Wales who had been stopped on two prior occasions from travelling to Somalia and Turkey was later arrested for posting terrorist material to social media websites even while he was participating in a government sponsored deradicalization program. Toronto Star, A12

CSIS oversight body lacks resources, former member Bob Rae says

As the government's anti-terrorism bill is set to enhance the powers of the national spy agency, a former member of the independent body that watches over the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is concerned it is not equipped to provide sufficient oversight. Bob Rae — the former premier of Ontario and one-time interim leader of the Liberal Party — was for five years a member of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which keeps tabs on CSIS. In an interview airing Saturday on CBC Radio's The House, Rae told host Evan Solomon that although CSIS has a budget "well over a billion dollars," the agency meant to watch over it has scant resources in comparison. CBCNews.ca

Imam calls for inquiry into radicalization

A prominent Canadian imam has called on the federal government to launch a national inquiry into the radicalization of young Muslim men in this country. Imam Syed Soharwardy, founder of the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada, said he's concerned that impressionable young people are falling prey to shadowy recruiters selling a false interpretation of Islam. Ottawa Citizen, D2

Riding a knife's edge

When news broke that the Moroccan-born imam Hamza Chaoui was opening a Montreal centre to preach his fervent brand of Wahhabism to local youth, reaction was swift. From the Quebec legislature to Montreal city hall, politicians labelled him a danger and said he had to be stopped. "He's an agent of radicalization, period," Mayor Denis Coderre said this week. The east-end borough where Mr. Chaoui planned to open his Ashabeb Centre invoked zoning rules to block the project, as politicians brushed aside concerns about possible infringements on free speech and freedom of religion. On Thursday, the leader of Quebec's second opposition party, François Legault of the Coalition Avenir Québec, even called for a change to the provincial rights charter to prohibit religious preaching that contradicts "Quebec values." The latest attempt to counter religious fundamentalism in Quebec coincides with the introduction last week of federal anti-terrorism legislation inspired by the fatal attacks last October in Saint-Jeansur-Richelieu, Que., and Ottawa. Motivated by the same impulse as Quebec policy-makers, the federal Conservative government says it is protecting Canadians from violent jihadists. However, critics of the law warn the proposed protection carries a high cost in eroded civil liberties. National Post, A5

Back from the war

Dillon Hillier sat at the kitchen table in his family's stone farmhouse at the end of a long driveway. His mother poured coffee. His father fed the wood stove. Out the windows, the sun glared off snowy fields as clean and bright as a blank sheet of paper. A veteran of the Canadian Forces, Mr. Hillier landed in Iraq in November and fought alongside the Kurdish peshmerga, motivated to volunteer by the October attacks in Ontario and Quebec and the unseemly flow of radicalized Canadians into the ISIS ranks. He had intended on staying at least six months but on Jan. 27, his father Randy Hillier, a Progressive Conservative Ontario MPP, issued a statement saying his 26-year-old son had "returned safely home from the Middle East." In his first interview since returning to Canada, Mr. Hillier told the National Post his war had been cut short by U.S. military advisers, whom he said had pressured the Kurdish generals to stop allowing foreign volunteers to participate in the conflict. He also revealed that an ISIS sniper had almost terminated his mission sooner, missing him by inches, and that RCMP national security officers from Ottawa had visited him last week to ask, among other things, if he had come across any Canadian ISIS members. He flew back the way he'd come, through Doha and London. He was sure he was in for a grilling at Canadian customs at the airport in Toronto. He was upfront with the Canada Border Services Agency officer, admitting he had been in Iraq fighting with the peshmerga. But he said he was simply asked if he had any alcohol or tobacco to declare and waved through. He arrived home on Jan. 25. The next day, two RCMP officers from the Integrated National Security Enforcement Team came the farmhouse to question him. They said they were there to determine if any crimes had been committed. "I wanted them to know I wasn't with the PKK," he said. Since the PKK is on Canada's list of terrorist groups, those fighting with the group could face charges. But he had no role with the group and told the officers so. "They asked me if I had seen any Canadians on the other side," he said, meaning ISIS. He hadn't. "I don't think I really provided them with any useful information, just some insight." National Post, A6 (Vancouver Sun, Windsor Star, Edmonton Journal, Ottawa Citizen, Calgary Herald)

Local MPs promote anti-terrorism bill

Local MPs Rob Moore and Rodney Weston held a press conference Friday morning at the port to promote the new anti-terrorism legislation Prime Minister Stephen Harper proposed in Parliament last week. Canada is not immune to the threat of terrorism as demonstrated by attacks against soldiers last October in Ottawa and Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu in Quebec, Moore said. "These new measures will enhance information sharing for national security purposes and provide law enforcement and national security agencies with the tools they need to prevent, detect and respond to the threat of terrorism," Moore said. Telegraph-Journal, B4

* École islamique suspendue d'un cégep

Le collège rosemont suspend les activités d'une école islamique qui lui louait des classes la fin de semaine. notre bureau d'enquête vient d'informer la direction que l'école publiait des liens vers des textes intégristes sur son site internet. Il ne croit pas que l'établissement soit un incubateur à radicaux, mais il a néanmoins demandé à la GRC de venir former le personnel pour savoir y faire face. Le Journal de Montréal, 13

It's not a war. Here's how to win

An editorial states, "Terrorism is a weapon of the weak. It aims to maim and to kill, but above all it seeks to provoke a more powerful opponent. A madman with a gun on Parliament Hill, conspirators dreaming of blowing up a bridge, a lunatic turning a car into a weapon - these can take life, but they are not an existential threat to Canada. They cannot destroy democracy, the rule of law or our rights and freedoms. They cannot overthrow the Canadian government. By themselves, they cannot accomplish much beyond murder. To gain recruits, to advance their cause and to leave behind anything other than death, they need our help..." Globe and Mail, F9

Surveillance bill needs careful review

An opinion piece states, "The past 10 days have been a difficult time for Canadians concerned with privacy and civil liberties. Strike one came with new Edward Snowden revelations regarding Canada's role in the daily tracking of the Internet activities of millions. Strike two was the introduction of Bill C-51, the anti-terrorism legislation, which sparked concern from observers across the country. Strike three came with the response to those developments, with the government dismissing oversight mechanisms as "red tape" and the opposition parties choosing to focus on process rather than substance..." Toronto Star, B3

A spooky anti- terrorism bill

An opinion piece states, "Eight days ago, Prime Minister Stephen Harper introduced legislation to create a new Anti-Terrorism Act to an audience in Richmond Hill, Ont. A copy of the legislation was submitted to Parliament by FedEx. The proposed legislation represents the largest overhaul of Canada's security laws in more than a decade following the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. It will ratchet up the power of police and spy agencies and challenge civil liberties without new or enhanced parliamentary oversight to watch over the work of our security services..." Times & Transcript, A13

U.S. should stand up to online extremists

An opinion piece states, "The U.S.-led campaign to defeat the Islamic State (also known as ISIS or ISIL), al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations should not be limited to airstrikes in Iraq, targeted drone strikes in Pakistan and non-lethal military assistance to other countries battling Islamist insurgencies. Unless America and its allies engage fully in the battle of ideas, countering online Islamist propaganda and jihadi recruitment efforts, impressionable young people will continue to be drawn into cyber-jihad, becoming either cannon fodder for terrorist organizations overseas or lone wolf terrorists at home... Last week, the federal government introduced sweeping new national security measures to combat the growing threat of violent extremism and the radicalization of youth by terrorist recruiters. For example, the proposed legislation aims to "criminalize the advocacy or promotion of terrorism offences in general" and "counter terrorist recruitment by giving our courts the authority to order the removal of terrorist propaganda online." Those measures are necessary and welcome, but they are insufficient to stem the tide of hate on social media..." Kingston Whig-Standard, A6

* Should Target single out PM for failure?

An opinion piece states, "... As it happens, of the approximately 12 million forms distributed in the census prior to 2010, there were - wait for it - 166 complaints from the public. Fact is, MasterCard and Visa, the credit-rating agencies, the Canada Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and the international spy agencies with which CSIS shares data; and the telemarketer who tried last night to sell you a new set of windows already know plenty about you..." Toronto Star, B1

SAUDI CAMPUS CONCERNS

With the Algonquin College community already on edge following revelations of a homegrown terror network linked to a campus student group, faculty members have elevated concerns over a campus the school operates in a troubled region of Saudi Arabia. The Algonquin Jazan College of Excellence opened its doors to male-only students in 2013 near the city of Jazan, in the southern tip of Saudi Arabia near the border with Yemen, an area the U.S. State Department describes as being rife with terror, and one experts deem among the most dangerous regions on the planet. Ottawa Sun, 4

Questions that need answers

An opinion piece states, "This is one Ontario community college satellite campus where even our own premier would not be permitted to study. If Premier Kathleen Wynne wanted to attend Algonquin College's Saudi Arabia campus as a student she'd be out of luck. So much for the boast by Ontario Colleges of equal opportunity education. There are other concerns with this strange arrangement between the Ottawa community college and Saudi Arabia as QMI Agency's Aedan Helmer reports in his exclusive story. In light of the terror arrests and a jihadi recruitment network exposed at Algonquin College this week, there should be some questions answered. The RCMP and CSIS would only be doing their jobs to take a look at all aspects of this campus and who attends --especially since this school is in a region of Saudi Arabia the American government has warned citizens not to go near for safety reasons..." Ottawa Sun, 5

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

No point to plaza debate

Some of us are far too obsessed with who pays for the customs plaza on the U.S. side of the new bridge between Windsor and Detroit. How the Americans pay for it or when they pay for it is immaterial - although Canadians would have a right to be outraged if our tolls also help pay for the U.S. half of their highway infrastructure. But that's not likely. Windsor Star, A3

Foreign worker program needs more tweaking

The sweeping changes to the temporary foreign worker program in June 2014 were supposed to address the perception that foreign workers were taking jobs away from Canadians. The overhaul may prove effective for some regions of Canada, but it threatens to bring harm to Alberta businesses. Recognizing Alberta's circumstances, federal Employment Minister Jason Kenney says the program needs "a little tweak." As other problems become apparent, we expect further tweaks will be necessary. Calgary Herald, A23

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

NIL

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

 Police seek bail-hearing overhaul

The Edmonton Police Service, citing the recent murder of a St. Albert Mountie by a man on bail, demanded Friday that Justice Minister Jonathan Denis make sweeping changes to bail hearings. The department wants Crown prosecutors to take over bail hearings currently done by police officers. "We believe that conducting justice of the peace bail hearings is a function of the Crown," acting deputy chief

Deb Jolly said Friday. Her statement follows questions surrounding the short bail hearing of Shawn Rehn, who killed St. Albert RCMP Const. David Wynn in January. Edmonton Journal, A3; Edmonton Sun; Globe and Mail; Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, A3)

 Le NPD ne veut pas que le mandat soit confié à la GRC

Le NPD s'oppose farouchement à l'intention du gouvernement Harper de confier la sécurité de l'ensemble des édifices de la cité parlementaire à la GRC, soutenant que ce corps policier a été incapable de stopper le tireur fou Michael Zehaf Bibeau l'automne dernier, alors qu'il franchissait au pas de course le terrain de la colline avant de faire irruption dans le parlement. En réponse à cette attaque qui a ébranlé toute la classe politique canadienne, le gouvernement Harper a déposé hier une motion confirmant la fusion des services de sécurité de la Chambre des communes et du Sénat et proposant de placer ces gardes de sécurité sous le commandement de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC). La Presse, A14; Ottawa Citizen

 Gang squad charges two after year-long investigation

B.C.'s anti-gang agency says it has headed off a resurgence of the Independent Soldiers gang in Kelowna with two arrests for firearms-and drug-related offences. Vancouver Sun, A7

 Missing snowmobiler a hoax – RCMP

It was a search that sent RCMP scrambling. Two girls were missing after an apparent snowmobile accident near Carrot River. Police scoured the area. Locals went out on snowmobiles looking for them. Search and rescue crews flew the area for hours. Their valuable time and energy were wasted. It all turned out to be a giant hoax. "It is a relief that it is a hoax because now we know no one is out there," said Carrot River RCMP Sgt. Steven Smith. "It upsets us because of the emotions we have and the manpower we put it onto this." StarPhoenix, A4

 Dangerous animal report nears completion

As a court date approaches for the man arrested this week after a huge snake killed two young boys in Campbellton a year and a half ago, a special report with recommendations on dangerous and exotic animals is almost ready to be presented to the provincial cabinet. RCMP said in a press release Friday a 38-year-old Montreal man is scheduled to appear in Campbellton provincial court in April in connection with the boys' deaths. While the RCMP did not name the man in the release, Campbellton lawyer Leslie Matchim confirmed to Brunswick News it was his client, Jean-Claude Savoie, who had been arrested in the Montreal area on Thursday and later released that evening. He also confirmed his client would be appearing in Campbellton provincial court in April. Telegraph-Journal, A1; Canadian Press (Edmonton Journal, A10); La Presse Canadienne (Le Quotidien, 35); Agence QMI (Le Journal de Québec, 47)

 Five arrested in 2012 slaying

Mounties have arrested five people in the 2012 slaying of a 22-year-old man, after a lengthy probe involving hundreds of officers in B.C. and Alberta. Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, A8)

 Senior pulled from burning home

Sooke RCMP officers responding to a fire call ended up pulling an elderly man from a burning Govenlock Place home Friday morning. Const. Sean Heidman used a sledgehammer he had in his police vehicle to smash a slidingglass door to get to the man, who was lying on the kitchen floor. Times-Colonist, A3

 RCMP cleared of wrongdoing in arrest of Meat Cove woman

The province's independent Serious Incident Response Team (SIRT) has cleared the RCMP of any wrongdoing in the arrest last year of a 57-year-old Meat Cove woman who suffered a broken arm. Cape Breton Post, A3; Chronicle-Herald

 Who will provide Pan Am security?

Security for the 2015 Pan Am Games is being provided by a mélange of private and public forces which includes an OPP-led consortium of eight police services (including Hamilton) plus at least two private-sector companies. Here's who they are and what they'll be doing: Integrated Security Unit (ISU): The ISU is led by the Ontario Provincial Police and includes representation from the RCMP and local police from

Niagara, Hamilton, Halton, Peel, Toronto, York and Durham. Hamilton Police Superintendent of Investigative Services Dan Kinsella has been involved in the planning and preparation process for well over a year and has been working with the ISU full time since January. Hamilton Spectator, A6

 Hamilton Pan Am security costs still unknown

Ontario taxpayers will be spending about $10 million a day throughout the Pan Am Games to secure the sites, athletes and spectators - but how much of that will be spent in Hamilton has yet to be revealed, or even fully decided. Hamilton Spectator, A6

 Officer recalls evidence from scene of shooting

These days, Const. Kelly Manweiller works with the RCMP's Specialized Response Unit in Whitehorse, but in October 2011, her last name was McQuarrie and she was with the Major Crimes Unit. It was in that capacity that she travelled to Dawson on Oct. 22 of that year to take part in the investigation into the arrest and shooting of Mark McDiarmid. McDiarmid, then 32 years old, had been tracked to the North Fork Road off the Dempster Highway and captured after he had driven his truck over a spike belt and had to pull off the road on the Dempster. He was shot three times by RCMP Constables Jeff Nielsen and David Marentette when he allegedly ran at them brandishing a splitting maul after throwing a jar filled with an oily chemical substance at their SUV, designated 10 Alpha 1, in which they had pursued him. McDiarmid is on trial before a Yukon Supreme Court judge and jury facing seven charges - mischief in damaging a police vehicle, three counts of assaulting police officers, possessing a weapon for a dangerous purpose, and two counts of attempted murder. Whitehorse Daily Star, 9

 Yukoners attend Afghanistan Memorial Vigil in N.W.T.

Deputy Premier Elaine Taylor, Speaker David Laxton and a delegation of Yukoners visited Yellowknife Tuesday to attend a commemoration ceremony for the Afghanistan Memorial Vigil at the N.W.T. Legislative Assembly. They were joined by Commissioner Doug Phillips; Joe Mewett, the Royal Canadian Legion Branch 254 president and Afghanistan war veteran; and three Yukon RCMP members. They are: "M" Division commanding officer, Chief Supt. Peter Clark; "M" Division warrant officer, Staff Sgt. Major Doug Spencer; and Whitehorse detachment Const. Brian Harding, who served a tour of duty in Kandahar Province in 2008/09 as a member of Cameron Highlanders of Ottawa Regiment. Whitehorse Daily Star, 10

 Bus carrying children flips on slick highway in central Newfoundland

Several people including young children were recovering Friday after a bus slid off the icy Trans-Canada Highway and flipped onto its side near Grand Falls-Windsor in central Newfoundland. MacKenzie praised the co-operation of about 25 firefighters, medical responders, the RCMP and local search and rescue crews who helped comb nearby woods in case anyone had been thrown. A crane was used to make sure no one was trapped beneath the bus. Canadian Press (The Guardian), A6)

 Province, not Mounties, managing horse capture

The RCMP will not be holding the licences for an upcoming feral horse capture in the Ghost area, contrary to what was initially announced by the province. Instead, the roundup of 50 of the province's free-roaming horses will be managed by Alberta Environment and Sustainable Resource Development, said department spokesman Duncan MacDonnell on Friday. Calgary Herald, A13

Outlaws' threat created Saints

The StarPhoenix has conducted a series of interviews with a source who has extensive knowledge of the Project Forseti investigation, as well as the inner workings of the Saskatoon Hells Angels, Fallen Saints and other groups. One morning late last summer, more than a dozen members of the Hells Angels and Fallen Saints motorcycle clubs rode out of town together. Through a steady rain, they headed north on Highway 11. Their journey ended just before noon at the Prince Albert clubhouse of fellow bikers, the Saints and Sinners. Second, the Outlaws needed allies inside federal penitentiaries in Western Canada. The partnership ensured any convicted Outlaws' safety in prison ranges occupied by Deuce members. Although the majority of Hells Angels weren't personally involved in drug dealing, prostitution and illegal firearms, they all knew their power depended on controlling those who did, the source said. The bar owner and the Hells Angels began recruiting. Within a few weeks, several high profile criminals had agreed to start the new gang loyal to the Hells Angels. By the end of 2014, the Outlaws had finally been driven underground, and many left town, the source said. The Hells Angels, Fallen Saints and Terror Squad had achieved the dominance they craved. It wouldn't last long - the Project Forseti raids came just weeks later. So far, 16 people have been charged as a result of Project Forseti. The massive police raids targeted the Fallen Saints and Hells Angels and uncovered hundreds of firearms and more than $8 million worth of drugs. While several of the bikers who were arrested are now out on bail, police have confirmed they are considering criminal organization charges against some of those arrested in Project Forseti. StarPhoenix, A1

* Protecting the Hill

An editorial states, "It took an armed attack on Parliament Hill to prompt the change, but the heart of our democracy will soon be protected by a proper security force under unified command. The change was proposed this week and it comes not a moment too soon. The attack on Oct. 22 highlighted the heroism of security officials on the Hill (former sergeant-at-arms Kevin Vickers being only the most heralded). But it also exposed obvious weaknesses in the system meant to protect Parliament..." Toronto Star, IN6

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

* Risk to the public 'too high'

An extremely violent Edmonton man who committed a "horrific" knife attack on his wife was ordered locked up indefinitely as a dangerous offender on Friday. Dennis Anthony Aulotte, 46, was given the notorious designation following a lengthy hearing which began after he was convicted of the 2011 aggravated assault in 2012. Edmonton Sun, 20

* St. John's man still on the run

Andrew Dunn has been unlawfully at large since at least October, celebrating his 31st birthday while wanted by the police. The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary has issued a news release requesting help in locating Dunn, who is accused of breaching the conditions of his parole. Correctional Services Canada has put out a warrant for his arrest. The Telegram, A5

* Son's breaches cost dad $75K

The father of a convicted killer has been ordered to pay a huge portion of the surety he posted for his son. Dennis Tymchyshyn must pay the court $75,000 - three-quarters of the $100,000 he posted for his son. He had banked on the prospects of Corey Tymchyshyn staying out of trouble while awaiting his first-degree murder trial for the 2008 killing of Chad Davis only to have that blow up in his face. Corey Tymchyshyn was rearrested in 2012 while out on bail and was slapped with several charges, including assault, extortion and running a marijuana grow-op out of a city home. Crown and defence lawyers had presented evidence and arguments last September. Justice Sadie Bond of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench gave a written decision on the surety issue Thursday. In 2009, the elder Tymchyshyn posted a $100,000 surety so a judge would allow his son to be released on bail while awaiting trial for first-degree murder. Corey Tymchyshyn was found guilty in early 2014 of the killing of Davis and is serving a life sentence with no chance of parole for at least 25 years. He has filed an appeal. Winnipeg Free Press, A5

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

* B.C. to fund programs using forfeiture money

Premier Christy Clark says her government is diverting money from "the bad guys" to their victims as the province upgrades its strategy toward ending violence against women. The province will apportion $3 million in civil forfeiture funds this year to pay for a new Domestic Violence Unit in Surrey, local support services and an awareness campaign. Vancouver Sun, A5

* Langley MP seeks stiffer drunk-driving law

A Conservative MP from Langley wants impaired drivers convicted of causing death to be charged with vehicular homicide and given a mandatory sentence. Vancouver Sun, A4

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

Bell named chief justice of Court Martial Appeal Court

Justice Richard Bell is leaving the New Brunswick Court of Appeal to take up new duties in Ottawa. Bell has been appointed chief justice and judge of the Court Martial Appeal Court of Canada and a judge of the Federal Court of Canada. Meanwhile, the Federal Court of Canada hears disputes between provinces or between the federal government and the provinces, as well as patent law cases, and matters involving federal institutions such as the RCMP or Corrections Services of Canada. It is also the court that hears national security concerns, such as terrorism issues. Daily Gleaner, A5

INTERNATIONAL

Islamic State claims U.S. hostage killed

Islamic State extremists claimed that an American woman held hostage by the group was killed Friday in a Jordanian airstrike in northern Syria, but the government of Jordan dismissed the statement as "criminal propaganda" and the U.S. said it had not seen any evidence to corroborate the report. Globe and Mail, A17

Islamic State raising stakes with its propaganda

A video of a Jordanian pilot being burned to death was exceptional in its brutality, even for the Islamic State group, and also was a sign that the militants intend to raise the stakes in their propaganda efforts, experts say. It also offered confirmation to the belief that the airman was killed days or weeks before its release. The Associated Press (Times & Transcript, B5)

U.K. jihadi sentenced to 12 years in prison

A British jihadi who faked his death in an attempt to secretly return to England from Syria was sentenced Friday to 12 years in prison. Imran Khawaja, who joined a faction aligned with the Islamic State group and attended an extremist training camp in Syria for six months, had appeared in the group's online propaganda videos - including one in which he posed with a man's severed head. Toronto Star, A16

U.S. must resist 'overreach' abroad, Obama says

U.S. President Barack Obama, outlining a new national security blueprint for his last two years in office, warned against American "overreach" abroad Friday, even as he cast the U.S. as an indispensable force in combating global challenges including terrorism, climate change and cyber threats. The Associated Press (The Record, A7)

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
February 21, 2015 / le 21 février 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Terrorisme: le ministre Steven Blaney est satisfait du sommet de Washington

Le ministre canadien de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, estime que le sommet international tenu cette semaine à la Maison-Blanche au sujet de la lutte contre l'extrémisme violent a permis de réaliser que tous les pays étaient sur la même longueur d'ondes quant à la façon de combattre le terrorisme. En entrevue à La Presse Canadienne, le ministre estime qu'il a pu bien expliquer le projet de loi C-51 qui vise à protéger les Canadiens contre la menace terroriste. Il affirme que le Canada est dans un "communauté d'intérêts" avec ses alliés dans ce dossier. Selon M. Blaney, il est "frappant" de constater que l'approche canadienne de lutte contre le terrorisme a "beaucoup de similarités" avec les autres pays. Le ministre estime que le Canada répond en tous points aux résolutions du conseil de sécurité des Nations unies, à l'effet que chaque pays membre doit poser des gestes concrets pour lutter contre le terrorisme et la radicalisation. Steven Blaney rappelle que le mouvement djihadiste international a déclaré la guerre au Canada et à ses alliés. C'est pourquoi, ajoute-t-il, le gouvernement canadien a présenté des mesures permettant de mieux protéger les Canadiens. La Presse Canadienne (Journal Métro)

Toronto imam calls for end to war of words

At a conference to combat radicalization held last week in Toronto, a prominent local imam called on the federal government to stop using language linking Islam to terror. "Lead by example, change the rhetoric, and stop saying these words. They hurt," said Dr. Hamid Slimi, former chairman of the Canadian Council of Imams and current chairman of the Muslim seminary, the Canadian Centre for Deen Studies. The plea, met with overwhelming applause, referred specifically to remarks made by Prime Minister Stephen Harper weeks before that characterized mosques as potential spaces of radicalization. Several days later, U.S. President Barack Obama, whose government has refused to use words such as "Islamic" or "jihad" to characterize violent extremism, found himself under fire for taking the opposite side of the semantic battle. While the commitment to combat extremism is undeniable on both sides of the border, the debate over just what language to use - and whether or not it contributes to the problem - is raging as fiercely as ever. Many Canadian Muslims are unnerved by the government's use of the language of Islam to describe terror and see it as stigmatizing. While Canadian government officials haven't shied away from using the term jihad - in a statement before the White House conference, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney said, "The international jihadist movement has declared war on Canada and its allies" - a 2012 report by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police questioned its use. "Terms like 'Islamic terrorism,' 'Islamist terrorism,' 'Jihadism' and 'Islamofascism' succeed only in conflating terrorism with mainstream Islam, thereby casting all Muslims as terrorists or potential terrorists," said the report, "Words make Worlds. However, the RCMP has never issued an official directive on the language. It said in a statement it has a 'bias-free' policy, but does not 'issue specific guidance about such language use.'" National Post, A14

Prime minister a no-show at Commons' anti-terror debate

Despite hailing new anti-terror legislation as fundamental to the fight against "the most dangerous enemies our world has ever faced," Prime Minister Stephen Harper did not attend either of two days of debate on the bill in the House of Commons this week. Bill C-51 is expected to head to committee Monday after the Conservative government voted to limit the hours allotted in the Commons on what Justice Minister Peter MacKay called an "important debate (over) ... extraordinary powers." The federal Liberals have said they will back the far-reaching legislation, which would expand the mandate and power of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, criminalize the promotion of terrorism, share Canadians' personal information more easily across government, make it simpler for police to arrest and detain individuals without charge as suspected national security threats, and other measures. A recent poll showed a strong majority of Canadians back the bill; most also want robust oversight of it. The Official Opposition, the NDP, has said it will fight the bill as overly broad and lacking any additional independent oversight to ensure the newly empowered federal police and spies operate within the law. Harper unveiled the contents of the bill at a Jan. 30 event in Richmond Hill, Ont. - far away from the House of Commons. He was flanked by senior ministers MacKay, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney and Julian Fantino, associate minister of National Defence. The bill was tabled in the House the same day. Ottawa Citizen, A9 (Leader-Post, StarPhoenix, Montreal Gazette, Windsor Star, Vancouver Sun)

Bulldozer sécuritaire

Un article d'opinion dit, « Le premier ministre Stephen Harper le répète partout. Ses solutions pour lutter contre le terrorisme sont les bonnes puisqu'elles ont l'appui de la population. Encore jeudi, un sondage de la firme Angus Reid nous apprenait que 82 % des Canadiens, tous âges, toutes régions et tous partis confondus, approuvaient le projet de loi antiterroriste (C-51). Conforté dans sa position, son gouvernement a mis le pied sur l'accélérateur pour muscler les pouvoirs des services secrets et policiers, pour forcer un changement des services de sécurité du parlement, pour modifier le mandat du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS). Il ne se contente pas de réagir vite, il bouscule. Mercredi, après seulement quatre discours sur le projet de loi C-51, il a annoncé qu'il limiterait le débat en deuxième lecture. Le vote aura lieu dès lundi après tout au plus une douzaine d'heures de discussions... Dans leur lettre commune publiée jeudi, quatre premiers ministres, d'anciens juges de la Cour suprême et d'autres Canadiens éminents pointent la lacune la plus flagrante : le manque de mécanisme de surveillance à la hauteur des nouveaux pouvoirs accordés aux services secrets et policiers... Les anciens juges Louise Arbour, Michel Bastarache, Ian Binnie, Claire L'Heureux-Dubé et John Major sont de la même trempe. Sans vouloir offenser personne, les ministres de la Sécurité publique et de la Justice, Steven Blaney et Peter MacKay, ne font pas le poids à côté de ces juristes. » Le Devoir, B2

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Les compagnies ferroviaires imputables

Ce sont les compagnies ferroviaires, et non les contribuables, qui devraient avoir à payer la note lors de tragiques accidents comme celui de Lac-Mégantic, estime la ministre fédérale des Transports, Lisa Raitt, qui a déposé hier un nouveau projet de loi sur la sécurité ferroviaire. L'Office des transports du Canada prescrira dorénavant des niveaux minimaux de couverture oscillant entre 25 millions $ et 1 milliard $, qui seront calculés en fonction du type et du volume des matières dangereuses se trouvant dans les convois. En cas d'accident, les entreprises ferroviaires devront verser le montant de la couverture d'assurance, que leur responsabilité ait été démontrée ou pas. Le projet de loi prévoit également la mise sur pied d'un fonds additionnel de compensation qui servira en cas d'accident ferroviaire mettant en cause du pétrole brut. Les transporteurs devront verser une redevance de 1,65 $ par tonne de pétrole brut transporté. Il vise également à donner au ministre fédéral des Transports le pouvoir d'ordonner aux compagnies de faire des changements à leur système de gestion de la sécurité, s'il l'estime nécessaire. Les compagnies de chemin de fer seraient aussi obligées de partager avec les municipalités qu'elles traversent les informations adéquates sur la sécurité. La Presse Canadienne (La Voix de l'Est, 15, Le Soleil, La Tribune, L'Acadie Nouvelle); Le Devoir (La Tribune); Le Journal de Québec (Le Journal de Montréal); Calgary Sun (Edmonton Sun, Kingston Whig-Standard, London Free Press, Toronto Sun); Canadian Press (The Guardian, Chronicle-Herald, Red Deer Advocate, Times Colonist); Montreal Gazette (Leader-Post, StarPhoenix, Ottawa Citizen); Calgary Herald; Globe and Mail

Pipeline emergency plan to remain secret

The head of Kinder Morgan says a full emergency response plan for the proposed $5.4-billion Trans Mountain pipeline expansion in British Columbia will remain hidden though a similar scheme has been made public in neighbouring Washington. Ian Anderson says the National Energy Board did not require the company to publicly disclose full details of its oil spill response plan for the Trans Mountain pipeline. He says regulation is different in the U.S., where the Department of Ecology has posted Kinder Morgan's emergency response plan online for the Washington section of the Trans Mountain pipeline. Anderson says the company will make its full plans available to municipalities, first responders and the B.C. government but the public has only been able to view a redacted version. He says Kinder Morgan has nothing to hide but there are legitimate national security and public safety reasons for not divulging the entire plan. Canadian Press (Chronicle-Herald, B5, Red Deer Advocate, Times Colonist, Vancouver Sun)

City prepping for more snow, rain

If you have the option, stay inside this weekend. It's going to get messy out there. According to Environment Canada Saturday and Sunday will bring a mixed bag of weather and it won't be pretty. On Saturday, Saint John can expect another five centimetres of snow, before it turns into rain Sunday. The City of Saint John is preparing for the bad roads and possible flooding. Tim O'Reilly, transportation and environment operations manager for the city, said crews have been clearing storm drains and getting equipment ready. Telegraph-Journal, B5; Cape Breton Post

 Stranded travellers deal with highway closure

The Trans-Canada Highway was closed at the Tantramar Marsh between Sackville and Amherst much of Friday because of blowing snow, and problems for Nova Scotia travellers were worse, as Highway 104 between the New Brunswick boundary all the way to Truro was closed about 4 p.m. The Nova Scotia RCMP said the earliest expected reopening of Highway 104 would be midnight. The New Brunswick RCMP tweeted at about 7:30 p.m. that the Trans-Canada Highway across the Tantramar Marsh was reopened to all traffic. Earlier in the day, traffic had backed up in both New Brunswick and Nova Scotia as hundreds of motorists waited for conditions to improve. Times & Transcript, A1

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

 Sécurité accrue dans les bureaux de circonscription de députés fédéraux

Radio-Canada a appris qu'à la suite de la fusillade survenue à Ottawa en octobre dernier, la Chambre des communes avait fortement encouragé les députés à renforcer la sécurité à leurs bureaux de circonscription. Si certains croient qu'il est important de l'accroître, d'autres jugent qu'il ne faut pas céder à la panique. Les 405 bureaux fédéraux de circonscription sont répartis aux quatre coins du pays et il n'y a pas deux situations identiques. Certains se trouvent dans des immeubles, d'autres ont pignon sur rue. Des députés y ont installé des systèmes d'alarme, alors que d'autres se limitent à la bonne vieille serrure. Mais, peu importe la situation, les députés ont été invités à réfléchir sur les mesures de sécurité prises pour protéger leurs bureaux. Une lettre a été envoyée à tous les députés, les encourageant fortement à faire installer un système de sécurité et un système d'interphone vidéo afin de voir les personnes qui se présentent à leur porte avant de les laisser entrer. La Chambre des communes propose d'assumer les coûts d'installation des systèmes de sécurité. Mais ce sont les bureaux des députés qui devront ensuite prendre en charge les frais mensuels. Radio-Canada.ca

Why a young Canadian from a military family turned to ISIS

There was terror and loathing across the country when bullets rang out on Parliament Hill last fall in an attack that killed an unarmed soldier and left the lone gunman dead. But one young Canadian following the incident on the radio while working on Oct. 22, 2014, was filled with a different emotion. "I was listening to it very carefully. In some ways I was pretty excited because there was retaliation. It was shortly after Canada announced it was sending F-18s over to Iraq. I saw that as direct retaliation for Canada's aggression against Muslims in another country." He called the attack "justified." This young man is Harun Abdurahman. It is not his real name, but rather an online alias he uses to express his support for the Islamic State, the designated terrorist group that controls wide swaths of Syria and Iraq. Toronto Star, A1

Nouveaux pouvoirs antiterroristes

Les nouveaux pouvoirs conférés aux espions canadiens par la loi antiterroriste ne seront pas aussi soumis à l'aval d'un juge que le laisse croire le gouvernement conservateur. Un mandat judiciaire sera requis du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) seulement si les méthodes qu'il entend employer sont illégales. Le projet de loi C-51 accorde un nouveau pouvoir au SCRS, celui de perturber une activité qui "constitue une menace envers la sécurité du Canada". Le SCRS pourrait par exemple entrer en contact avec un terroriste en herbe pour le détourner de cette voie ou encore perturber l'expédition de matériel chimique que convoiteraient peut-être des gens mal intentionnés. Les experts s'interrogent sur la nécessité d'étendre au SCRS ce pouvoir de perturbation que les corps de police ont déjà. La différence, soulignent-ils à gros traits, c'est que le travail policier débouche sur des accusations. Dans le cadre des procédures judiciaires qui s'ensuivent, ce travail policier est révélé au grand jour et peut être contesté par l'accusé. Ce n'est pas le cas avec le SCRS, qui n'a pas le mandat de faire enquête, encore moins de procéder à des arrestations. Cela fait craindre à plusieurs experts la transformation du SCRS en une sorte de police politique de l'ombre. Le Devoir, A3

La lutte au terrorisme passe avant les libertés

Alors que le débat se poursuit sur la nouvelle loi contre le terrorisme du gouvernement conservateur, 4 Canadiens sur 10 sont "prêts à renoncer aux libertés civiles pour combattre le terrorisme", selon un sondage de la firme Léger obtenu par l'Agence QMI. Il s'agit du résultat le plus élevé depuis mars 2012, lorsque Léger a posé la question pour le compte de l'Association d'études canadiennes. Le sondage Léger a été réalisé auprès de 1500 Canadiens du 9 au 11 février, plusieurs jours après le dépôt du projet de loi C-51 par le gouvernement Harper. Le projet de loi, qui a déjà obtenu l'appui du Parti libéral à Ottawa, permettrait de faciliter l'arrestation de personnes liées au terrorisme. La loi accorderait aussi plus de pouvoirs au Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) pour "interrompre" les sites web et les comptes des médias sociaux. Près de 40 % des Canadiens, 56 % chez les Albertains, sont prêts à renoncer aux libertés civiles si cela permet de stopper le terrorisme, selon le sondage Léger. Ils sont toutefois 48 % au pays à penser le contraire, dont 60 % de Québécois qui ne sont pas aussi chauds que les autres Canadiens à l'idée d'abandonner leurs libertés civiles. Le Journal de Montréal, 20; Edmonton Sun (Calgary Sun, London Free Press, Kingston Whig-Standard, Winnipeg Sun, Toronto Sun, Ottawa Sun, Calgary Sun)

 MacKay clarifies letter to the editor

Justice Minister Peter MacKay has not seen a video reportedly made by Parliament Hill shooter Michael Zehaf-Bibeau, despite writing a letter to the editor this week in which he said the Oct. 22 gunman's "own words" helped show that the attacker was a terrorist. In a Friday letter to the Citizen, MacKay wrote: "Last October's attack on Parliament by lone gunman Michael Zehaf-Bibeau, who had converted to Islam, was indeed a terrorist attack. His own words, evidence of his targeted attack on a soldier and on our Parliament Buildings, and the fact that ISIL also claimed responsibility, drives us to this inescapable conclusion." Soon after the attack, the RCMP said they had obtained a video the gunman filmed on "a device" they recovered that indicated his motives. That video has never been released, although some parliamentarians have requested that they be allowed to view it. The only other known publicly recorded words from Zehaf-Bibeau come from court hearings in Vancouver several years ago when he was sentenced for a robbery attempt. He said nothing in those hearings bearing on Islam or terrorism. A spokeswoman for the justice department said Friday that MacKay was simply referring to media reports of Zehaf-Bibeau's temperament and political beliefs in the letter. Ottawa Citizen, A9

SAFETY versus FREEDOM

An opinion piece states, "The country is divided over whether the Conservatives' anti-terror bill goes too far. The jury is still out. But a new poll suggests that even if it does, 40% of Canadians don't care. So long as it gets the job done. A Leger Marketing poll exclusive to QMI Agency put this statement to Canadians: "In order to curb terrorism in this country, I am ready to give up some civil liberties." It's quite a statement. One that 40% of respondents agree with, 50% disagree and 10% don't know. The takeaway isn't that the disagrees barely squeak out a win. It's that so many Canadians are OK with giving up their liberties. The only thing that softens it is that only a quarter of the 40% are in the "strongly agree" category. Breaking it down, the number rises to 43% for men, with women at 37%. Geographically, Quebecers are least willing to give up their freedoms at 31%, while more than half of Albertans (56%) trust the government. In terms of age, 55% of seniors agree, compared to just 29% of the 25-to 34-year-old crowd. The poll doesn't break it down by voter intention. But you can bet-- based on those age and location numbers--that Conservatives are more inclined to say yes." Edmonton Sun, 20 (Winnipeg Sun, London Free Press, Toronto Sun, Ottawa Sun, Calgary Sun)

Official voices of reason fight to be heard

As hundreds of political, religious and community leaders gathered in Washington this week to discuss how best to counter extremist propaganda, Abu Hurairah Britani was busy updating his Twitter profile photo. The photograph chosen by the self-described Islamic State martyr-in-waiting shows him with a goofy smile on his face, holding a jar of Nutella. It is in some ways a fitting image for someone whose Tweets veer from calls for widespread jihad to descriptions of his favourite milkshakes. This week, a program called Extreme Dialogue - designed to get students talking about the dangers of radicalization - was launched in Calgary. The program, which urges students to share the teaching materials on social media, is funded by Public Safety Canada. In the U.S., the State Department runs a social media effort called "Think Again, Turn Away," which aims to highlight the brutality and hypocrisy of terror groups. Originally, the program targeted all extremists, but in recent months, it has focused overwhelmingly on the Islamic State, as the group's influence and social media support appeared to skyrocket. Globe and Mail, A18

Si peu d'inquiétude m'inquiète

Un article d'opinion dit, « Des Québécois musulmans se disent inquiets par l'instrumentalisation politique dont ils font les frais. Avec le projet de loi C-51, qui veut nous faire croire qu'il faudrait désormais choisir entre liberté et sécurité, je pense que nous devrions tous, musulmans ou pas, être beaucoup plus inquiets. » La Presse, A3

Devil is in details of anti-terror bill

An opinion piece states, "The politics of Canada's new anti-terror bill are indeterminate. Polls suggest that voters like the Conservative government's hard line on terror. But will that mood hold until the election is called? And if it does, will voters cast their ballots solely on the basis of a party's approach to terrorism? No one knows the answer to these questions. My guess (and it is just that) is that the usual factors - pocketbook issues, desire for change and that indefinable thing called leadership - will be more important in a general election. Regardless of the politics around this issue, however, the real importance of the anti-terror bill lies in its contents. Does Bill C-51 go too far in its proposals to give security agencies expanded powers? Do we really yearn to return to the days when Canada's spies committed illegal acts in the name of national security? Do we want the government freely sharing all the information it has on us with not just every domestic security agency but with foreign ones as well? Finally, is any of this necessary? Are current laws insufficient? The evidence indicates they are not." Toronto Star, A10

Parliamentary oversight of CSIS is essential

An opinion piece states, "Why is Prime Minister Stephen Harper dead set against Parliamentary oversight of Canada's spy agency? New legislation gives CSIS a broader mandate and more powers, which most Canadians support. But most - almost 70 per cent - also support increased oversight. So do four former prime ministers, five former Supreme Court judges, seven former senior government ministers, three past members of the intelligence review committee, two former privacy watchdogs and a retired RCMP watchdog. But not Harper and his senior ministers. They insist the status quo is fine. That involves the security intelligence committee conducting several annual studies. That's not real-time oversight." Hamilton Spectator, A16

Canada's words risk alienating minorities

An opinion piece states, "The contrast has been noted between the language the Obama government uses to describe the target of its antiterrorism efforts ("violent extremism") and the language of the Harper government ("jihadism"). And indeed, the habit of each is consistent in this regard, such as to suggest it is in either case deliberate. What should be read into this apparent discrepancy in approaches, the one as scrupulous to avoid mentioning Islam in the context of terrorism as the other is to mention it? Is the Obama government, as its conservative critics charge, blind to the reality that al-Qaida, Islamic State - also known as ISIL or ISIS - and other terrorist groups are avowedly Islamic in inspiration and Islamist in their objectives? Is the Harper government, as its liberal critics charge, pandering to anti-Islamic sentiment? Both? Neither? There are, it would seem, three questions to be answered: what is in fact the relationship, if any, between Islam and terrorism? What do authorities believe is the relationship? And what do they say they believe?" Edmonton Journal, A21 (Windsor Star, Montreal Gazette, Ottawa Citizen, Montreal Gazette, National Post)

Politicians capitalizing on fear of terrorism

An opinion piece states, "On Feb. 10, the town council in Shawinigan, a Quebec city of 50,000 people in the woods north of Trois-Rivières, voted to reject a zoning application for a mosque. Before the vote, Mayor Michel Angers reminded councillors that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms forbids discrimination on the basis of religion, to no avail. Two days later, Prime Minister Stephen Harper was in Victoriaville, a city of 40,000 in the woods south of Trois-Rivières. Harper announced he will appeal a federal-court decision that found that Pakistani-Canadian Zunera Ishaq has the right to take her citizenship oath while wearing a niqab, a veil that some Muslim women wear as a sign of their faith... All of this tough talk about Muslims is unnecessary and will probably produce undesirable results, except, perhaps, for the desperate politicians trying to capitalize on the public's fear." Ottawa Citizen, A10 (Vancouver Sun, Windsor Star, StarPhoenix, Calgary Herald, Montreal Gazette, Leader-Post)

Not far along in fighting terrorism

An opinion piece states, "Four years ago the Arab Spring gave rise to hopes the old order of dictatorships was about to vanish from the Middle East where a new generation was eager for democracy. The Arab world was entering the modern age, courtesy of Twitter. Now the ferocious brutality of the Islamic State group in Iraq and Syria, al-Shabab in East Africa and Boko Haram in Nigeria has dashed those dreams with a fury that speaks of violence for its own sake. The question is: Why is this happening? This week, participants from more than 60 countries at the White House Summit on Countering Violent Extremism struggled to find an answer. But the only thing they really accomplished was to highlight the fact there doesn't appear to be one." Montreal Gazette, A21 (Windsor Star, Vancouver Sun, Leader-Post, Calgary Herald)

Why the NDP is challenging the anti-terror bill

An opinion piece states, "... On substance, there is no doubt that there is a contrary case to be made against C-51. More than a few politically unaligned security and civil liberties experts have argued against its broad definition of terrorism and its silence on an oversight mechanism as muscular as the new powers granted to the security services... But as counterintuitive as it may seem, opposing the bill is also less perilous politically for the NDP than supporting it." Telegraph-Journal, A13

Poor concept of risk rewards Harper Tories

An opinion piece states, "'Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to rise today in support of Bill C-51, the New Anti-Crime Act. Mr. Speaker, there are all kinds of murderous misfits out there who mean to do Canadians harm, and this government intends to stop them. They hate our way of life (in that we are alive) and mean to utter threats, murder, extort and assault us. Only by expanding our spies' secret powers (with a secret court's approval of course!), allowing for longer detention without charges, and criminalizing media content promoting crime 'in general' can we prevent these misfits from overrunning us." If the New Anti-Crime Act were actually a thing, I want to believe many Canadians would be taking a really close look at it. "Why exactly do we need this?" they might ask. "Falling crime rates suggest we're doing just fine with the current Criminal Code and justice system we have. Yes we can make improvements, but doesn't this go really far?" But Bill C-51 isn't called the New Anti-Crime Act, it's called the Anti-terrorism Act, and it's been promoted by the Conservative government as a necessary step to defend Canada from the "dark forces" of ISIL and the like, which seek "to harm us here in Canada - in our cities and in our neighbourhoods." Rather than treat crimes like, well, crimes, we've made them into fancy crimes, attaching tough-to-define motives which will allow us to stroke, as two of Canada's top law professors described it, a "blank cheque for Charter violations" against suspected terrorists (some of whom, gasp, might actually be innocent)." Ottawa Citizen, C7

Stop using fear as political policy

A letter to the editor states, "The big question I think Canadians deserve answers to is: Why is the Conservative Party afraid to add oversight to its anti-terror bill? It will not affect the terms of the bill. It will just give each and every Canadian the assurance that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service or the government will not be allowed to break Canadian laws and the terms of our Constitution." Ottawa Citizen, C6

Falling prey to a politics of fear

This is an edited excerpt from a letter written by American consumer advocate Ralph Nader to Stephen Harper: "Many Americans love Canada and the specific benefits that have come to our country from our northern neighbour's many achievements. Unfortunately, your latest proposed legislation - the new anti-terrorism act - is being described by leading Canadian civil liberties scholars as hazardous to Canadian democracy ..." Toronto Star, IN6

A radical approach: Keep them in school

An opinion piece states, "We want young men in our country to stop becoming Islamic extremists and killing people. That basic desire is now on everyone's mind, in almost every country. It is what led to U.S. President Barack Obama's summit this week on "Countering Violent Extremism," and it has led many countries, including Canada, to introduce new laws. It's a simple goal, involving a very small group of young men (violent extremists are almost all young and male), but one that tends to inspire misdirection, overreaction and wasted effort. There are basically three ways to respond to this problem." Globe and Mail, F2

Cult recruitment and radicalization

An opinion piece states, "Recent attacks by terrorists here and abroad have led some people to suggest that the process of radicalization is similar to cult recruitment. Some have stated that terrorist groups are cults. Whether or not they are, there is one striking similarity, and that is the violence that is perpetrated by some groups toward individuals and society." Montreal Gazette, B6

Bill C-51 repressive

A letter to the editor states, "U.S. president George W. Bush used 9/11 as the pretext to unleash a police state, and wars that have completely devastated and destabilized the Middle East and threaten world peace. These wars have cost hundreds of thousands of lives, and ultimately resulted in the murderous and dreadful ISIS organization. Using the same tactics at a time when Canadians are traumatized by recent terrorist events and have their guard down, our government is now attempting to pass Bill C-51, which will give CSIS unlimited powers to spy not only on suspected terrorists - capacity it already has - but on the opposition, unions, progressive organizations and whatever or whoever threatens Conservative hegemony." StarPhoenix, A12

Law need not be as indiscriminate as terrorist foes

An opinion piece states, "Would you have been at the mall on Valentine's Day? Or your daughter, mother or neighbour's nephew? I might have been. My son needed a new pair of winter boots and a visit to the mall was planned for that day. Makes you think... Whether you call the Halifax conspirators "terrorists" or "radicalized" or "murderous misfits," their plans - like the actions of shooters and beheaders - have produced a fear that manifests itself in our collective bones. Prime Minister Stephen Harper says that Islamist jihadists have declared war on anyone who values freedom, openness and tolerance. And for these reasons, Canada needs new instruments in its security toolbox to fight terrorism. So in this climate of fear, we are debating Bill C-51, the government's anti-terrorism bill, which significantly broadens state powers to act upon threats to Canadian interests... To me, Bill C-51 feels like a broad trawl that will allow the state to scoop up a lot of political bycatch, not just terrorists." Chronicle-Herald, F1

Lettre - Libertés sous surveillance

Une lettre à l'éditeur dit, « Le débat sur le projet de loi fédéral pour lutter contre le terrorisme (C-51) oppose les tenants de la sécurité aux défenseurs des libertés. Si cette loi est votée, elle confèrera des pouvoirs importants au SCRS qui deviendra le maître d'oeuvre pour contrer le terrorisme au Canada. Peut-on s'opposer à la vertu, surtout si celle-ci est apeurée par tous les événements récents ? Le contexte d'insécurité favorise donc les politiques de contrôle du gouvernement Harper. L'idéologie conservatrice repose sur le principe d'une main de fer dans un gant de fer. Tout ce qui peut contribuer à " encadrer " les différentes formes d'opposition au Canada est bien reçu par ce gouvernement dont le jupon dépasse à droite... » Le Devoir, B4

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

 Metro Vancouver Transit police end controversial agreement with CBSA

Metro Vancouver Transit Police will end its controversial agreement with Canada Border Services Agency after undocumented migrant Lucia Vega Jimenez hung herself in 2013. Previously, transit police would hold an undocumented migrant who the CBSA was interested in, if they found one evading fare. As of next week, transit police spokesperson Anne Drennan said it will continue to make arrests on outstanding warrants, but "police will who encounter undocumented migrants during the course of fare enforcement activities will leave any follow-up action to federal authorities." The decision comes after the transit police met with a group called "Transportation Not Deportation" that has been outspoken since Jimenez's suicide. She was arrested after being caught riding transit without paying and she later hanged herself while awaiting deportation to Mexico. Drennan said the transit police decided to change its policy after Jimenez's "tragic suicide brought things to a head." CBC.ca; Canadian Press (VancouverSun.com); News1130.com; GlobalNews.ca

Record 162 rifle magazines are seized

With the seizure of a record 162 military-grade rifle magazines, a false declaration regarding two puppies and turning away a man with a prior conviction for possessing an explosive device with intent to cause damage, January was an interesting month for border services in southern Saskatchewan. According to the Canadian Border Services Agency, on Jan. 18 at North Portal, officers stopped a man from Kentucky trying to enter Canada on his way to Alaska. At the border, the man declared five firearms and 15 oversized rifle magazines. One of the guns was an assault rifle not allowed in Canada. Upon closer inspection of the vehicle, officers found and seized 162 militarygrade magazines, including 147 that were prohibited. The man was fined $1,000 and denied entry into Canada. In an email, a CBSA spokeswoman said it was the largest single seizure of large capacity magazines in the Prairie Region. She explained that overcapacity magazines exceed five rounds for centrefire automatic or semi-automatic rifles or shotguns. Leader-Post, A3

 Un homme recherché arrêté près de Toronto

Un homme interdit de territoire au Canada et recherché pour grande criminalité a été arrêté il y a une semaine au terme d'une enquête de plus d'un an, a annoncé l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada, hier. Des agents de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada et de l'ASFC ont mis la main sur Kelvin Dwight Scott alors qu'il se trouvait dans une résidence d'Oshawa, à l'est de Toronto, le 12 février. "Il a été placé en détention et remis à la garde de la police régionale de Peel en vertu de mandats non exécutés", a indiqué l'ASFC dans un communiqué. L'homme était visé par un mandat d'arrestation pancanadien. Scott a été condamné auparavant pour introduction par effraction dans un dessein criminel, introduction par effraction et commission d'un acte criminel et trafic d'une substance contrôlée. Le Journal de Montréal, 40

 Police want scam suspect extradited

In the wake of the conviction of purported spiritual healer Mohammed Umar Ashrafi in England this week, his alleged victims in the GTA are anxious to see him face fraud charges in Canada. Peel police say the question of whether to extradite Ashrafi, who has been sought in connection with a series of elaborate scams, marked by fantastical tricks and claims of magical powers, in Mississauga and various U.S. cities, dating back to 1997, will be decided by the federal government. Toronto Star, GT6

 Trafic de pot dans des poches de hockey

Les détectives d'un petit comté du nord de la Virginie étaient incrédules. ils avaient peine à croire que la mafia russe avait infiltré leur région, avec un réseau sophistiqué de trafic de cannabis. C'est pourtant ce qu'affirmait un jeune revendeur de rue. Lors de son arrestation, en 2007, celui qui sera identifié comme étant C.J. Hall informe les policiers de Spotsylvania qu'il s'approvisionne auprès de la mafia russe et qu'il n'a pas payé sa dernière livraison. Le modus operandi du réseau était toujours le même. Les courriers conduisaient jusqu'à la frontière canado-américaine pour récupérer la drogue, cachée dans des grands sacs de hockey noirs identifiés selon la destination et le type de cannabis. Chaque sac contenait 50 lb de pot et les courriers transportaient généralement deux sacs par voiture. Ils étaient payés 100 $ par livre de pot transportée ou 1000 $ du voyage s'ils allaient récupérer de l'argent. Le Journal de Montréal, 38

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

 U.S., U.K. agencies accused of hacking

Rights organizations on Friday called for urgent steps to be taken to protect private calls and online communications after allegations that U.S. and British agencies hacked into the networks of a major SIM card maker. The World Wide Web Foundation, founded by web inventor Tim Berners-Lee, said the alleged hacking by the National Security Agency and its British counterpart, GCHQ, was "another worrying sign that these agencies think they are above the law." The claims of the hack into Netherlands-based company Gemalto came from documents given to journalists by whistleblower Edward Snowden. A story about the documents posted Thursday on the website The Intercept said the agencies hacked into Gemalto's networks to steal codes that allow both governments to seamlessly eavesdrop on mobile phones worldwide. In an email to The Associated Press on Friday, GCHQ said all of its work was legal and its "interception regime" fully complies with the European Convention on Human Rights. Associated Press (Waterloo Region Record, A7)

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

Child sexploitation knows no borders

Police officers from Newfoundland and Labrador are using the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to obtain information on social media accounts for their investigations, specifically in cases of alleged child luring, exploitation or child pornography. While Canadian police can seek warrants for required information from companies based within Canada, companies across the border are another matter. "Of course, a lot of this child exploitation stuff is going on online. And some of the obvious mediums that they patrol and look into are like the Kik Messenger, your Facebook, Chat Hour, various other social medias. Those social medias are based out of the U.S.," said RNC Const. Steve Curnew. "So when they're going to look for information, instead of having to go through the processes of getting warrants - because a lot of times once stuff goes outside of Canada we're no longer able to pursue it unless in partnership with another agency - so instead of going through the process of getting warrants in order to get information for these companies, what has been established between the U.S. and Canada is they will have a member of the Homeland Security within that (RCMP) National Child Exploitation Co-ordination Centre."

The national centre is based in Ottawa and is the clearinghouse for child exploitation investigations in and out of the country and between the provinces. It is responsible for validating international requests and disseminating investigative material to relevant jurisdictions. The Telegram, A2

 Taser: un policier coupable de parjure

Un agent de la GRC qui avait électrocuté un immigrant polonais à l'aéroport de Vancouver à l'aide d'un pistolet à décharge électrique en 2007 a été reconnu coupable de parjure par la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, vendredi. Le policier avait tiré plusieurs fois sur M. Dziekanski, lorsqu'il avait commencé à lancer des meubles dans l'aéroport international. L'homme ne parlait pas anglais. Les quatre agents qui étaient sur les lieux, dont le constable Millington, avaient été contraints à comparaître devant une commission d'enquête. Ils ont tous été accusés de parjure par la suite. Le policier de la GRC avait affirmé à la commission qu'il croyait que M. Dziekanski était resté debout après avoir reçu la première décharge électrique, ce qui l'aurait amené à tirer une deuxième fois. Toutefois, la vidéo de l'altercation démontre clairement que l'homme avait été projeté au sol après le premier tir. La Presse Canadienne (L'Acadie Nouvelle, 12, La Presse); Canadian Press (The Guardian, Red Deer Advocate, Chronicle-Herald, Hamilton Spectator, Waterloo Region Record, Toronto Star, Times Colonist, Vancouver Sun, Windsor Star, Montreal Gazette, StarPhoenix, Calgary Herald, Leader-Post, Globe and Mail, Ottawa Citizen); Calgary Sun

 Open letter to RCMP commissioner Bob Paulson on climate change and national security

A letter written by Tanker Free B.C. executive director Ben West states, "It may sound strange that I am writing to you requesting that you read a story in the Rolling Stone magazine, but this piece entitled "The Pentagon and Climate Change: How Deniers Put National Security at Risk" outlines issues that are very important to the safety and security of the people of Canada. This seems particularly relevant at the moment given the news this week of a controversial RCMP intelligence assessment report focused on the growing so-called "anti-petroleum" movement in Canada. I thought it may be useful to explore the reasons why so many of your fellow Canadians are taking these issues so seriously and explore how other national security agencies are tackling these issues." Straight.com

 No more criminal celebrities

The alleged Valentine's Day massacre plot in Halifax prompted a policy change for the Nova Scotia RCMP. For the first time in its history, the force announced major charges - conspiracy to commit murder - without naming the two people charged. "We do not wish to give these individuals further notoriety," said Sgt. Alain Le-Blanc. Any future statements about Lindsay Souvannarath, 23, and Randall Shepherd, 20, will be similarly anonymized, he said. That decision follows a Federal Court ruling this month that upheld a prison warden's decision to deny journalists an interview with Omar Khadr. Safety was the main concern, but as one warden put it: "The reduction of your public notoriety would be necessary as part of your rehabilitation process..." The implication of that ruling - that a prison warden can reduce, or an interview increase, the "notoriety" of the best known member of the most notorious family in Canada - may strain credulity. The Mounties' self-censorship likewise seems ultimately symbolic, given the wide publication of details about the case, most of which came from the police in the first place. But it is a common impulse, this urge to deny notoriety to criminals, to interrupt the pleasure we imagine they seek, or others might wish to give them. National Post, A3 (Windsor Star, StarPhoenix, Leader-Post)

 Amber Alert suspect facing murder charge

A charge of first-degree murder has been laid against a man arrested after the fatal shooting of a teenage boy and the abduction of his girlfriend in northern Saskatchewan. Police say Jonas Budd, 43, surrendered late Thursday evening in Sturgeon Landing, Sask., close to the Manitoba boundary. "At approximately 10:30 p.m., Budd was taken into custody without incident," said RCMP Sgt. Craig Cleary. Officers had maintained a perimeter around the home of Budd's brother for nearly a day. They had been communicating with Budd to try to bring about his surrender. Cleary says the Mounties had a strong presence at the site. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, A5, Cape Breton Post); Windsor Star (Montreal Gazette, Ottawa Citizen, Edmonton Journal); Leader-Post (StarPhoenix)

 RCMP closes file on probe into Redford's spending

Former premier Alison Redford won't face charges following an investigation into her use of government aircraft and spending, RCMP said Friday. Mounties said they have now closed the file and advised Redford and the Progressive Conservative government of the outcome. Redford, Alberta's 14th premier, resigned last March in the face of a caucus revolt and public outcry over her spending and use of government planes. The probe was launched last August after auditor general Merwan Saher described what he called "an aura of power" around the former premier that prevented staff and officials from questioning her actions. He said she had inappropriately used government resources and that her staff reserved seats on government flights for ghost passengers so she could fly alone. Saher alleged the premier and her office used government planes for personal and partisan benefit. In August, Redford's successor, Dave Hancock, referred the matter to the RCMP following an internal review. On Friday, Mounties said they reviewed the auditor general's report and conducted followup interviews during their investigation. "In the interest of thoroughness, the RCMP interviewed a wide range of individuals who provided us with information related to the auditor general's report," RCMP Assistant Commissioner Marlin Degrand said in a news release. "The file is now concluded." Edmonton Journal, A2 (Calgary Herald); Canadian Press (Ottawa Citizen, Chronicle-Herald, Red Deer Advocate, Toronto Star, Times Colonist); La Presse Canadienne (Le Devoir); London Free Press (Calgary Sun, Edmonton Sun); Globe and Mail

* 'Extraordinary actions' in a crisis

It was around Christmas 2011 when the first whiff of potential impropriety wafted up to the nerve centre at Canada's largest engineering and construction firm. The board of directors at multinational giant SNC-Lavalin Group Inc. were stunned to learn of claims that the company's then-CEO Pierre Duhaime, and possibly others in his senior management circle, may have misallocated funds to projects in far away places. For a board, the dreaded scent of wrongdoing is anathema - but particularly if it's the chief executive who is alleged to be involved in illicit activities. The early days of 2012 were a frenzied flurry of activity: an independent review by hired legal guns under the oversight of SNC's audit committee was promptly launched. In February, the Montreal-based firm publicly announced its internal investigation, and a month later, Mr. Duhaime was gone from the firm, as SNC released the results of its internal probe. National Post, FP1

* SNC-Lavalin accusée de fraude et de corruption - Il faut sauver la firme, dit Daoust

Le ministre de l'Économie, Jacques Daoust, s'est montré préoccupé quant à l'avenir de SNC-Lavalin, vendredi, au lendemain des accusations de corruption et de fraude déposées par la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC) contre l'entreprise. En marge d'une allocution devant l'Association des MBA du Québec, M. Daoust s'est de nouveau porté à la défense de la firme d'ingénierie -- qui conteste les accusations -- la qualifiant de "joyau" qu'il fallait préserver "à tout prix". Selon la GRC, SNC-Lavalin aurait versé 47,7 millions à des titulaires de charges publiques en Libye dans le but de les influencer. De plus, ses divisions construction et international auraient privé diverses organisations locales d'environ 129,8 millions. Trois autres individus -- les ex-hauts dirigeants Sami Abdallah Bebawi et Stéphane Roy, ainsi que l'avocat de M. Bebawi -- ont déjà été accusés par la GRC dans le cadre du projet Assistance, qui s'est amorcé en 2011. Le Devoir, C1; La Presse (Le Soleil, La Tribune); Canadian Press (Chronicle-Herald, Toronto Star, The Telegram, Times Colonist); La Presse Canadienne (Le Soleil, Le Droit); Le Journal de Montréal; Le Journal de Québec (Le Journal de Montréal); Globe and Mail

* Riverview man sentenced for threats against RCMP

David Earl Crawford was troubled the evening of June 9. The 19-year-old Riverview man was off his bipolar medication and highly agitated. His friend had just been arrested in the days following the June 4 shootings for comments he made about police. He also hadn't seen his son in several weeks. New Brunswick RCMP Assistant Commissioner Roger Brown was also dealing with a lot that evening. It was only five days after five of his officers were shot by Justin Bourque, three fatally. The entire force was in mourning and the community was in shock. On a joint recommendation from both sides, Lampert sentenced him to 60 days in jail, allowing him to serve the time on weekends. That will be followed by 12 months probation during which time he must seek assessments for mental health issues and addiction and must abstain from drugs and alcohol. He was also fined $300. Times & Transcript, A1

* Health Canada okays licence for Alberta pot grower

Canada's growing medical marijuana industry is taking root in Alberta. Health Canada has granted a licence to Aurora Cannabis Inc. to produce medical pot in Mountain View County north of Calgary. Aurora spokesman Marc Levy said the plants are to be grown at a $10.5-million, secure hightech facility that can produce up to 8,000 kilograms of marijuana a year. Sean Upton, a Health Canada spokesman, said licence applications are rigorously reviewed, including security measures at proposed sites. "The key personnel are then subject to a security clearance ... co-ordinated by RCMP," Mr. Upton wrote in an e-mail Friday. Globe and Mail, A8

 Man accused of making child porn

The New Brunswick RCMP's Internet child exploitation unit arrested and charged a 24-year-old Moncton man. Police said in a news release that the accused can't be named because of a court-ordered publication ban. Times & Transcript, A7; L'Acadie Nouvelle

 Two charged after police seize illegal tobacco

Two southeastern New Brunswick men face charges after a major contraband tobacco seizure during a traffic stop. Southeast District RCMP said in a news release that they disrupted a large shipment of illegal cigarettes and cigars following a traffic stop on Main Street in Shediac. On Wednesday, just before midnight, police seized more than 400 cartons of contraband cigarettes and cigars, as well as marijuana. A 43-year-old man from Shediac and a 45-year-old man from Grand Barachois were arrested and later released. They are scheduled to appear in Moncton provincial court in May and are expected to face charges under the Excise Act for possession of contraband tobacco. In the news release, the RCMP said buying contraband tobacco directly supports organized crime groups by funding their other illegal activities. Times & Transcript, A10

 Accused cross-examines RCMP officer

In his cross-examination of RCMP Const. Jordan McIntyre earlier this week, Mark McDiarmid questioned the officer about his actions and whereabouts at the time of the alleged offences for which McDiarmid is on trial before a Yukon Supreme Court jury. The accused is facing seven charges: mischief for damaging a police car, three counts of assaulting a police officer, one count of possessing a dangerous weapon, and two counts of attempted murder of a police officer. Whitehorse Daily Star, 9

 Violence wasn't random: RCMP

A female pedestrian was taken to Whitehorse General Hospital last night after she was shot at from a moving van near the Yukon Inn on Fourth Avenue. She was hit once, and is in stable condition at the hospital, according to an RCMP news release issued this morning. Further details on her injuries were not available from the hospital before press time this afternoon. Her name was not released. Whitehorse Daily Star, 10

 RCMP name man facing drug trafficking charges

RCMP have released the name of a Lower Sackville man charged with drug trafficking after a vehicle stop near Baddeck. Police say Carl Henry Morgan, 29, is scheduled to appear in Sydney provincial court Monday for a bail hearing. Morgan was arrested after RCMP stopped a pickup heading east on Highway 105 on Wednesday at about 5:30 p.m. due to a suspicion the driver was impaired. During the stop, the officer made observations that led to a drug investigation, police said. RCMP claim to have found a kilogram of cocaine and about five kilograms of marijuana in the vehicle, along with some cash. Chronicle-Herald, A7

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

 Board: Marriott to serve term

Brian James (B.J.) Marriott, a man identified in parole board documents as an active member of the Spryfield Mob Security Threat Group, has been ordered to remain in prison until the end of his 16-year, four-month sentence. On Feb. 10, the Parole Board of Canada confirmed Marriott's March 13, 2014, detention order because it says he is likely to commit an offence causing death or serious harm to another person if he's released before his sentence ends. The board's most recent decision is due, in part, to Marriott's repeated assaults on other inmates while behind bars. Chronicle-Herald, A5

 Allan Legere wrote to my family, but his privacy's protected

The letter is stuck inside a dog-eared copy of Terror, the 1990 book I co-wrote with Andre Veniot, then a TV reporter. "Hi Dear. How are you? I had such a nice time last summer. Seen your nice place. You are such a lovely wife and I just love that new baby. So quiet and bouncy. I know you spend a lot of time by yourself. "So I know you won't mind me visiting you next year. Untill then I'll say I'll see you agin." "Love Nick." The postmark was Renous, New Brunswick. The letter was from Allan Legere, the serial killer. He didn't sign his own name, of course. He preferred "Nick." Apparently, the man who could slaughter five men and women mostly women - in their homes is well read. Old Nick is one of the many names given to the Devil, along with Old Scratch. "It's Legere," said a police friend when I showed him the letter sent to my home address. "His girlfriend probably got it out for him. Do you want to file a complaint?" I shook my head. What was the point? After all, Legere was in a maximum-security prison, headed for trial for the four murders he'd committed after escaping from prison guards during a trip to a Moncton hospital... After he was convicted of all four murders and sentenced to life, Legere landed in a super-maximum prison in Quebec, a special handling unit. A prison within a prison for the worst of the worst. "Don't worry, he'll never get out of there," said a friend in the legal community. "No one will sign the papers to move him." Not true. Someone did sign the papers and late last month he was moved to a normal prison in Alberta. The Correctional Service of Canada didn't tell me that. That's not allowed. Privacy rights. Privacy rights? That's rich. A serial killer has privacy rights. The Guardian, A13

 Triple killer Jon Rallo now lives part-time with girlfriend

Triple killer Jon Rallo is living with his girlfriend in a seniors' apartment and seems to have given up hope of ever gaining full parole. Winnie Barnes has been dating the 72-year-old Rallo, one of Hamilton's most notorious murderers, for about seven years. She has recently moved into the apartment he took last June. He is allowed to live there four days each week. The other three days he lives in a Sudbury halfway house. The city where the apartment is located has been blacked out of Parole Board of Canada documents stemming from Rallo's latest review. Two board members did a "paper review" of Rallo's file on Feb. 9 (meaning it was not an in-person hearing) and decided to extend his parole status by another six months. Rallo's refusal to admit his guilt has been the single greatest reason why the parole board has not granted him full parole. The privilege has repeatedly been withheld from him even though he is considered a model prisoner, has been assessed as a "low risk for reoffending violently" and has been recommended for full parole four times by Correctional Services Canada. "The board has continued to have concerns with your stance of denial with the index offence as this suggests your risk factors are unknown and unaddressed," the board says in its decision. His denial stance also "continues to cause serious psychological harm to the victims' family." Waterloo Region Record (InsideHalton.com)

 Un autre Hells influent libéré d'office

La valse des libérations d'office se poursuit pour les Hells Angels québécois. Après la demi-douzaine d'ex-Nomads condamnés dans la foulée de l'opération Printemps 2001 et les quelques membres condamnés au terme de l'opération SharQc qui ont pu quitter le pénitencier depuis un an et demi, voilà qu'un autre motard influent sortira bientôt de sa cellule : David Rouleau, 50 ans, membre de la section de Sherbrooke et considéré par la police « comme occupant un rôle de leadership » au sein de l'organisation. Rouleau, qui a purgé les deux tiers d'une peine de dix ans et demi pour complot de meurtre, sera toutefois soumis à de sévères conditions jusqu'à la fin de sa sentence : assignation à une maison de transition, interdiction d'avoir des contacts avec tout individu ayant un dossier criminel ou lié à une organisation criminelle, interdiction de fréquenter les bars et obligation de divulguer sa situation financière. « Au cours de la présente sentence, vos intervenants estiment que vous n'avez démontré aucune remise en question et que vous n'avez effectué aucun effort afin de diminuer l'impact des facteurs contributifs à votre criminalité », écrit la Commission des libérations conditionnelles du Canada dans une décision rendue la semaine dernière. LaPresse.ca

 Inmate airlifted from Matsqui Institution following stabbing

The Matsqui medium-security prison in the Fraser Valley is in lockdown. An inmate was stabbed Friday evening, and the injuries were serious enough to require he be airlifted to a hospital. News1130.com

 Inmate not drug user

The latest man to die in the Barton Street jail was known for his loyalty and trademark slick style, loved ones say. Stephen (Ocean) Neeson, 44, who died in the jail Sunday morning of a suspected drug overdose, earned his nickname years ago. It was a reference to the movie "Oceans Eleven" for Neeson's history of bank robberies and fashion sense. In 2006, Neeson was stabbed in the neck in an attack by a fellow inmate while serving time in the Kingston Penitentiary. Court documents from his 2012 lawsuit against Correctional Service Canada (an action which was thrown out) provide insight into his status in prison. "Neeson was a leader among the (range) and broader prison population. He was someone who was both respected and feared," the judge writes in her decision. "CSC acknowledged that Mr. Neeson had never created problems within the institution, but was a member of the inmate committee, including its chair and someone who was well regarded by CSC staff." Hamilton Spectator, A5

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

Listen to families of missing and murdered women

An opinion piece states, "On Feb. 27, provincial and territorial governments and five National Aboriginal Organizations will meet in Ottawa for the National Roundtable on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls. A one-day national roundtable is an important first step in a series of steps that must be undertaken to build public awareness and implement action to combat our national tragedy... Since 2010, Public Safety Canada has administered a program enabling First Nation communities to develop community safety plans tailored to each community. A closer examination of these programs reveals only one completed plan (with no name) and no information on implementation. The federal government could be addressing family concerns by releasing more information on this existing program and providing continued and sufficient funding for the implementation of community safety plans." Ottawa Citizen, C8

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

Union rejects arbitration, CN plans lockout

Canadian National Railway said it will lock out 5,000 of its employees Monday night amid a deadlock in contract talks. The Montreal-based railway said the lockout of the 4,800 mechanical, intermodal and clerical workers represented by Unifor would begin at 11 p.m. Monday unless the union agreed to binding arbitration to settle contract differences. The union, which has announced plans to begin a strike vote next week after the failure of five months of talks, quickly rejected the company ultimatum but said it was prepared to negotiate this weekend. CN gave the union 72 hours notice of a lockout and moved to unilaterally impose terms of a new collective agreement Friday that included wage increases of two per cent. Canadian Press (Times Colonist, B4)

INTERNATIONAL

British cops to missing girls: Don't join ISIS

British police pleaded Friday for three teenage girls believed to be trying to join Islamic State to rethink their actions. The girls, Shamima Begum, 15, Kadiza Sultana, 16, and an unnamed 15-year-old, flew to Istanbul from London on Tuesday. Video footage showed the trio clearing security at Gatwick Airport. The girls are apparently friends with a fourth girl who travelled to Syria in December. A Metropolitan Police spokesman said there was a "good chance" the girls are still in Turkey. Ottawa Citizen, D2

Support for Iraq mission trumps Afghanistan war, poll says

Canada's military mission battling Islamic State militants in Iraq enjoys more public support than this country's costly engagement in the Afghanistan war ever did, veteran Ipsos Reid pollster Darrell Bricker says. The Harper government has broadly signalled that it wants to extend the six-month mission - which is supported by a parliamentary endorsement that runs out at the end of March - while insisting a decision has not been made. Mr. Bricker says judging from public opinion today, Canadians would support a longer fight against Islamic State jihadis. Ipsos Reid released a poll Feb. 14 that found 76 per cent of Canadians surveyed strongly backed or somewhat backed Canada's jet fighters participating in air strikes against Islamic State forces. That's up 12 percentage points from September. Globe and Mail, A8

What's next in the fight against ISIS

For seven months, a U.S.-led coalition, including Canada, has been flying air strikes against the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham in a bid to halt the terrorist group's advance. While the campaign has led to successes, such as driving ISIS from Kobani, it has not prevented the jihadists from extending their reach into Libya, where Egyptian Copts were beheaded last week. The National Post's Allison McNeely asked three experts to assess the state of the conflict and what may be coming next. Their discussions have been edited for space. National Post, A15

 Boko Haram kills 34 in villages in northeastern Nigeria

Suspected Boko Haram fighters killed at least 34 and injured several others in attacks on villages near Chibok and Konduga in Nigeria's northeastern Borno state earlier this week, residents and local officials said. The gunmen attacked the Tamsu-Shehuri village on Wednesday night where they killed more than 12 people, said a resident. Associated Press

 The Islamic State threatens to come to Rome; Italians respond with travel advice

In a recently released video that showed the killing of 21 Christians in Libya, all but one of them Egyptian, the Islamic State issued an ominous warning: "Today we are south of Rome," one masked militant said. "We will conquer Rome with Allah's permission." To make matters worse, Rita Katz, director of SITE Intelligence Group, pointed out that supporters of the Islamic State have begun using a hashtag to warn of their plan to reach "Rome." Exactly what "Rome" means to the Islamic State is unclear -- some experts say it may actually be a reference to the United States or Turkey, or even the West in general. But Italy is worried. Libya is just a short boat ride across the Mediterranean. Thousands of refugees already make this journey to Italian shores every year. What's to stop the Islamic State? As word of #We_Are_Coming_O_Rome spread across the Italian media, Rome residents took the opportunity to respond to the Islamic State. And they did so in an especially Roman way. With warnings about the traffic. WashingtonPost.com

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca)*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
March 14, 2015 / le 14 mars 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Canada quiet on alleged IS recruits link

The Canadian embassy in Jordan, where Stephen Harper posted the former head of his security detail as ambassador, is at the centre of new allegations linking Canada to a suspect arrested by Turkish authorities and accused of helping British schoolgirls join Islamic State militants in Syria. Mr. Harper appointed Bruno Saccomani, a former RCMP officer, instead of a career diplomat to the job of envoy to Jordan in 2013. His previous job was as head of the Prime Minister's Protection Detail. The Canadian government, meanwhile, remained silent Friday as Turkey's media published a second day of stories, citing anonymous Turkish security sources, that purport to sketch out Canada's connection to a man now being held by Ankara on suspicion of smuggling three London girls into Syria last month. The Canadian government, which has not categorically denied a link to the suspect and said only that he's not a Canadian citizen or CSIS employee, refused to address the latest reports from Turkey. "I have no further comments to add beyond [Thursday's] statement," Jean-Christophe de Le Rue, spokesman for Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney, said. Globe and Mail, A3; QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, 60; Kingston Whig-Standard, London Free Press, Calgary Sun, Ottawa Sun); Agence QMI (Le Journal de Montréal, 28); Postmedia News (Ottawa Citizen, A1; Vancouver Sun, Windsor Star, StarPhoenix, Leader-Post, National Post, Calgary Herald, Edmonton Journal); National Post; Toronto Star; Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, A11; Red Deer Advocate, Hamilton Spectator, The Record)

Projet de loi antiterroriste - Un pouvoir que seuls les espions canadiens auront

Le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, a soutenu cette semaine que le nouveau pouvoir de "perturbation" qu'accordera son projet de loi antiterroriste aux espions canadiens existe déjà dans plusieurs autres pays occidentaux. C-51 ne fera donc qu'arrimer le Canada à ses alliés. Or il n'en est rien. La plupart des pays cités par le ministre soutiennent que leurs services du renseignement intérieur n'ont pas de tels pouvoirs. Le Devoir, A2

Tories won't apologize for 'McCarthyesque' attacks

Conservative MPs ignored opposition demands Friday to apologize to some of Canada's leading environmentalists, civil liberty advocates and Muslims for remarks that appeared to insinuate critics were national security threats because they spoke out against the government's security legislation. Tory members on the Commons public safety committee launched strident questioning of three groups testifying this week against Bill C-51, which would radically change Canada's national security laws to combat terrorism and other security threats. A hint of how the government might handle some of its Bill C-51 critics at committee first came from Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney Tuesday. Leading testimony before the committee, he spoke out against members of the opposition and "so-called experts" who oppose the bill. Ottawa Citizen, A10 (Vancouver Sun, StarPhoenix, Leader-Post, Calgary Herald, The Gazette, Edmonton Journal)

Shed light on spy mystery

An editorial states, "No political leader likes to see his country's spies being outed. And Prime Minister Stephen Harper, a Conservative who embraces secrecy as a sturdy article of faith, is no exception. But there are times when silence is anything but golden, and this may be one of them... Predictably, Harper's instinctive reaction has been to throw a veil of secrecy over the affair. In Parliament this week Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney invoked "national security" and "operational matters" to dodge pointed questions from New Democrat deputy leader Megan Leslie. Straining for gravitas, he just managed to look shifty. Notably, he didn't deny any link between CSIS and the Syrian in question..." Toronto Star, IN6

C-51 - Dérapages politiques

Une pièce d'opinion déclare, « Plus le débat sur le projet de loi C-51 avance, plus les intentions du gouvernement de Stephen Harper transparaissent. Pour justifier ses mesures antiterroristes, il invite dans le débat d'étranges alliés, le plus inattendu étant Hitler. Tous les amalgames sont bons pour alimenter le sentiment d'insécurité des Canadiens. Les conservateurs de Stephen Harper ne font rien sans calculs politiques. Les mesures contenues dans ce projet de loi et la communication qu'ils en font depuis un mois correspondent à une stratégie réfléchie que la référence à deux événements permet de mieux comprendre... Pour justifier l'octroi de pouvoirs si abusifs en regard des droits et libertés, le gouvernement n'a aucune retenue. La semaine dernière, il a rendu publique la vidéo où Michael Zehaf-Bibeau justifie son attentat au parlement, question de raviver la tension vécue par les députés le 22 octobre avant qu'ils ne commencent l'étude du C-51 en comité parlementaire. En ouvrant mardi l'étude du projet de loi, le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, en rajoutait en invitant Hitler dans le débat. Évoquant la nécessité de pouvoirs pour combattre les propos haineux, il affirmait que " l'Holocauste n'a pas commencé dans les chambres à gaz, il a commencé avec des mots "... La façon dont le gouvernement conservateur mène ce débat sert le parti, mais pas le pays. A Steven Blaney, et à tous ses collègues, il faut rappeler que oui, il faut faire attention aux mots. Il est tellement facile de glisser dans la propagande et la démagogie. Il y a eu ces derniers jours beaucoup trop de dérapages. Il faut s'en inquiéter. » Le Devoir, B4

C-51 va-t-il trop loin?

Une pièce d'opinion déclare, « Le grand chef des Premières nations canadiennes, Perry Bellegarde craint qu'il serait trop facile de qualifier de terrorisme la défense de leurs droits, tant en matière de protection de l'environnement que des traités touchant à leurs droits territoriaux. Les Canadiens veulent que le gouvernement du Canada soit en mesure de déjouer des complots terroristes qui menaceraient la sécurité publique. Sur ce point, à peu près personne ne conteste cette responsabilité du gouvernement fédéral. Là où la dissension se manifeste c'est sur le plan des moyens à prendre pour y arriver. Comme on a pu le constater depuis quelques jours, les porte-parole du gouvernement sont prêts à dire à peu près n'importe quoi pour enfoncer leur message: le ministre de la Sécurité publique du Canada, Steven Blaney est allé jusqu'à comparer la menace terroriste qui nous guette à l'Holocauste. Ce faisant, il verse dans l'exagération. Le projet de loi C-51 n'est pas exempt d'exagération sur les moyens que le gouvernement fédéral veut se donner pour atteindre l'objectif légitime de contrer le terrorisme... »

L'Acadie-Nouvelle, 23

Tories adopt propaganda of hate, fear

A letter to the editor states, "As a Canadian-born Jew I am offended at Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney's use of the Holocaust to justify his government's draconian and vicious terror legislation, Bill C-51..." Toronto Star, IN7

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Chief upset by oil spill news delay

The chief of the Lubicon Lake First Nation says there are concerns that the band was not notified of an oil spill in one of their hunting and trapping areas until 11 days later. Bernard Ominayak says it is "critical" for Murphy Oil Company Ltd. to develop an integrated emergency response plan so band members can be alerted as soon as possible. Murphy Oil says up to 17,000 barrels of petroleum product spilled on March 1 at its Seal heavy oil site in northern Alberta. Vancouver Sun, C1

'We're definitely narrowing the scope of the disease'

As the World Health Organization reached a bleak milestone Thursday, with officials now estimating more than 10,000 people have died in the worst Ebola outbreak in history, New Brunswick's chief medical officer said progress is being made. Daily Gleaner, A1

Sussex gets its fill at flood conference

Keeping with its promise to keep town staff up to date on possible flood training and educational opportunities, the Town of Sussex sent its chief administrative officer to last week's Atlantic Flood Management conference in Truro, N.S. While some took an interest in what Sussex was doing, Hatcher says he was most impressed with what Newfoundland has been working on in regard to flooding. The most Eastern province has developed a rainfall intensity duration frequency curve. Basically, some engineers look at certain amounts of water needed for stormwater management designs. While many provinces and municipalities have a similar plan, Hatcher says a big downfall for most areas is that they monitor rainfalls from the past. Newfoundland is trying to predict and account for future rainfall amounts and how intense they will be. Telegraph-Journal, B9

New standards to set tank car manufacturing back on track

The tank-car industry is expecting a flood of new orders once the United States finalizes rules intended to reduce spills and explosions when oil trains derail. Washington is expected in May to harmonize its tank-car standards with those of Ottawa, which on Wednesday proposed new designs with thicker, ceramic-lined tanks, full-height shields at each end and improved protection over the valves. The new design is in response to the 2013 oil train derailment and explosions in Lac-Mégantic, Que., which killed 47 people and highlighted the dangers of moving an ever-increasing amount of oil in tank cars that were not designed for such service. The tank cars that exploded in Lac-Mégantic were known as DOT-111s, a model Ottawa has banned from crude oil service by May, 2017, unless they are made more crashworthy. Globe and Mail, B4

Safety on the rails

An editorial states, "No fewer than four derailed trains transporting oil in North America in recent weeks have ended up as fiery wrecks. Two of them, operated by Canadian National, were on a 40-kilometre stretch of track near the Northern Ontario village of Gogama. It's a relief that no one was hurt in these mishaps, which sent plumes of smoke into the air and dumped crude into waterways. But these latest crashes should serve as loud warning bells, signalling that work still needs to be done to improve safety..." The Gazette, B5

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

Un passeur syrien affirme avoir des liens avec le SCRS

Des allégations émanant de Turquie lient le Service du Canada du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) à un passeur d'origine syrienne qui a aidé récemment trois adolescentes britanniques à se joindre au groupe État islamique (EI). Une vidéo diffusée sur une chaîne de télévision locale montre le passeur en question en train de donner des instructions aux fugueuses dans une gare du sud du pays en prévision de leur passage en Syrie. Le passeur aurait également indiqué aux autorités qu'il travaillait pour les services de renseignement canadiens et se rendait régulièrement à l'ambassade du Canada en Jordanie pour relayer des informations colligées sur le terrain. L'ambassadeur en poste, Bruno Saccomani, est l'ancien garde du corps en chef du premier ministre Stephen Harper, qui avait suscité la polémique en lui attribuant ce titre en 2013. La secrétaire parlementaire du ministre de la Sécurité publique, Roxanne James, a indiqué hier à la Chambre des communes qu'Ottawa avait eu connaissance des comptes rendus médiatiques des derniers jours, mais qu'elle ne pouvait commenter des questions «opérationnelles» liées à la sécurité nationale. La Presse, A18 (Le Droit, La Voix de l'Est, Le Nouvelliste, Le Quotidien); Agence France-Presse (La Tribune, 22); Le Devoir

Une affaire de géopolitique

Tom Quiggin, un expert en sécurité et en renseignement, affirme que cette affaire d'espionnage opposant le Canada et la Turquie est peut être liée à des facteurs géopolitiques. "Le président turc, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, est manifestement un partisan des Frères musulmans", explique M. Quiggin. "Il n'est pas en faveur du bombardement de l'État islamique par les forces de la Coalition [incluant le Canada] et il est préoccupé par les efforts du Canada pour réduire le financement des groupes terroristes tels que le Hamas, qui ont des liens étroits avec les Frères musulmans", a dit M. Quiggin en entre-veu. Agence QMI (Le Journal de Montréal, 28)

Clark calls for balance on C-51 debate

B.C. Premier Christy Clark has entered the debate over the federal anti-terrorism bill, calling attention to the potential dangers of government overreach but stopping short of criticizing the legislation directly. Asked about Bill C-51 this week, the Premier said there is a need to balance the protection of personal freedoms with matters of national security. Bill C-51 - which would give Canada's spy agency sweeping powers, criminalize the promotion of terrorism and grant RCMP the power of preventative arrests - has come under fire since it was tabled five weeks ago. On Saturday, a nationwide "day of action" is planned in protest of the legislation, with events in every province. Globe and Mail, S3

Greenpeace leader critical of Canada

Kumi Naidoo, the executive director of Greenpeace and veteran of the anti-apartheid struggle in South Africa, was in British Columbia this week to attend a First Nations ceremony commemorating Greenpeace's 1971 voyage to stop a U.S. nuclear test. In an interview with the Montreal Gazette, he shared his thoughts on Canada's environmental record, federal anti-terrorism legislation Bill C-51, university fossil fuel divestment and more. Q: What's your take on Bill C-51? A: It worries me in the sense that it could have a chilling effect on young people, in particular, who are wanting to get involved. Government is telling them don't participate in peaceful protest. Young people everywhere - I think Canada is no different - are worried about the future and they feel that adult leadership is selling their future down the drain by not acting on climate. I think it (Bill C-51) is tough on terrorism but hard on democracy. The Gazette, A4

Protests against Bill C-51 to be staged across the province

It's certainly got people fired up. Bridgewater, Annapolis Royal, Sydney, Antigonish and Halifax will join over 40 other towns and cities across Canada hosting protests against the Conservatives' Bill C-51 on Saturday. Chronicle-Herald, A13

Harper gets distracted with niqab dispute

The Conservatives are hoping to win over voters with their tough talk on terror. But did Prime Minister Stephen Harper lose his way in a side skirmish over niqabs? "I think they've lost the plot, which was about fighting terror somewhere else and now they're in a discussion about dress code," said Bruce Anderson, chairman of Abacus Data. Terror, religion, culture and dress codes got meshed together in the debates this week on Parliament Hill. Buoyed by popular support for their anti-terror moves, he suspects that

Harper and the Conservatives decided to turn up the rhetoric, perhaps appealing to those Quebecers who had supported the Quebec charter, the controversial legislation that would have banned religious clothing in the provincial public service. Toronto Star, A13

ISIS tactics similar to pedophiles': TV special

Recruiters for the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham are attempting to lure Canadian girls - some as young as 13 - to travel abroad to marry them using tactics straight out of the playbooks of sex traffickers and pedophiles, according to a new documentary that will be broadcast this weekend. In Wives of ISIS, a documentary segment airing on the Global News investigative series 16x9 on Saturday, a producer poses as a young girl online, attracting the attention of an alleged ISIS recruiter. Approximately 550 women from western countries are living in ISIS-run territory, according to the Londonbased Institute for Strategic Dialogue. Approximately 10 to 15 of them are Canadian, Mr. Amarasingam estimates. Under Canadian law, underage girls lured for such purposes would be considered sex-trafficking victims. But there is no law in Canada against marrying a terrorist or any other criminal for that matter, the documentary points out. National Post, A6

Un septième Québécois aurait rejoint le groupe armé

Les autorités canadiennes ont perdu la trace d'un jeune Montréalais qui serait parti en Turquie, peut-être dans le but de se joindre au groupe armé État islamique (EI), a révélé Radio-Canada hier. Ce jeune Québécois aurait quitté le pays à la mi-janvier, en gros au même moment que les six autres personnes soupçonnées d'avoir grossi les rangs de l'EI au Moyen-Orient. Il aurait lui aussi fréquenté le Collège de Maisonneuve, à Montréal. Il aurait été en contact avec au moins l'un d'eux et aurait participé à des ateliers liés au Centre culturel islamique de l'est de Montréal, que dirige Adil Charkaoui. La Presse, A7; Le Devoir; Agence QMI (Le Journal de Montréal, 28)

Via terror suspect told police he was trying to deradicalize co-accused

One of two men on trial for allegedly plotting to kill scores of people by derailing a passenger train told an investigator he only pretended to go along with the idea in an attempt to deradicalize his co-accused. A transcript of a 4½-hour interview with an RCMP officer on the day he was arrested shows Raed Jaser repeatedly tried to cast his co-accused, Chiheb Esseghaier, as an extremist with a "disturbed" mind. Canadian Press (Times & Transcript, B3); La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 29)

«On se met en mode opération» dit la ministre

Parce qu'il n'y a «plus de temps à perdre», le Québec va développer sa coopération avec la France et la Belgique pour se donner rapidement des outils pour lutter contre la radicalisation. La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 23)

Lise Thériault réagit

Faute d'avoir «toutes les informations en main», la ministre de la Sécurité publique, Lise Thériault, a réagi avec prudence hier à la plainte portée contre un policier de la Sûreté du Québec qui aurait tenu des propos racistes à l'endroit d'un Québécois d'origine algérienne. La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 22)

Collecte auprès des fidèles

Inquiets des actes de vandalisme commis dans les derniers mois contre leur lieu de culte, les représentants de la Mosquée de la Capitale demandent une rencontre avec le directeur de la police de Québec afin de lui exprimer leur inquiétude. Dans l'intervalle, une collecte a été lancée chez les fidèles, hier, pour renforcer la sécurité. Le Soleil, 5

Privacy protection under threat by Bill C-51

An opinion piece states, "As witnesses line up to warn about the dangers associated with Bill C-51, Canada's anti-terrorism bill, it is increasingly clear that the proposed legislation is an unprecedented undermining of Canadian privacy protection. Much of the focus on the bill has related to oversight: the government implausibly claims that it increases oversight (it does not), the Liberals disappointingly say they support the bill but would like better oversight and much of the NDP criticism has also centred on oversight. Yet with respect to privacy and Bill C-51, lack of oversight is only a part of the problem. The privacy-related concerns stem from Bill C-51's Security of Canada Information Sharing Act (SCISA), a bill within the bill that goes further than sharing information related to terrorist activity. It does so in three steps..." Toronto Star, B2

Canadians should heed Edward Snowden's warning

An opinion piece states, "I suspect that history will one day be very kind to whistleblower Edward Snowden. Yesterday's traitor is gradually becoming tomorrow's patriot as he slowly unmaskes the "secret surveillance state" growing around us. In fact, there is already talk of him being able to return to the U.S. at some point. But it may be here in Canada where he will be owed a special debt. Just as Canadians appeared to be sleepwalking towards accepting a dangerous government-sponsored "anti-terrorism act" that would undermine human rights and the rule of law, the debate has appeared to turn in recent days. Government ministers are now more on the defensive. Critics of the proposed legislation are regaining their voice. And Snowden himself has intervened..." Toronto Star, WD3

Vote for us or the terrorists will get you

An opinion piece states, "First we had Canada's New Government. Then we had Strong and Stable Government. Now we have the Be Very Afraid Government. As even casual observers of the news will know, it's all fear, all the time in Ottawa these days. The political premise is slightly disturbing - that terror and crime can be tackled as another marketing challenge, complete with labels, postcard surveys, and mind-numbing repetition of slogans. The potential payoff, presumably, is the re-election of the Conservative "brand." ..." Toronto Star, IN2

Who will police Canada's spies?

An opinion piece states, "Last month, three teenage girls flew from London to Istanbul, en route to Raqqa, headquarters of Islamic State, also known as ISIL or ISIS, to begin new lives as "jihadi brides." Turkish intelligence says the man who smuggled them across the border was a Canadian agent, Mohammed al-Rashid, a Syrian dentist who fled to Jordan to escape the civil war. The Turks say after al-Rashid came to the attention of the Canadian embassy in Amman, the Canadians brought him to Canada, offered him the hope of citizenship and set him to work smuggling foreigners into the clutches of the homicidal maniacs of ISIS. By their count, al-Rashid has helped 140 Britons get to ISIS, all the while reporting to someone named "Matt" at the Canadian embassy, where the ambassador is Bruno Saccomani, former head of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's bodyguards. The Canadian government, of course, won't say whether any of this is true... The same government that put him in charge of SIRC is now seeking to massively expand the powers of our spies with Bill C-51, with no improved oversight. The law will give spies licence to engage in a wide variety of threat-disruption activities against any threat to Canada's security, requiring warrants only when they believe their activities would break the law..." National Post (Ottawa Citizen, A10)

Bill turns CSIS into secret police

An opinion piece states, "Bill C-51, fast-tracked concurrently through the House of Commons and a compliant Senate, is only now being understood by many people and groups. Unfortunately, the governed have views about potential problems with the Canada's new anti-terrorism bill that will never be heard in Parliament..." Winnipeg Free Press, A17

And the survey says... ? - Poorly designed politically biased surveys hurt democracy

An opinion piece states, "... Survey questions are everywhere these days, which is why I initially didn't think much of it Monday night when I saw a question in the corner of a flyer sent to my house by my Conservative member of Parliament, Lawrence Toet. But once I read the question, which asked constituents if they "agree... (that) we must take additional action to protect Canada from terrorism" or "disagree (because) terrorists are victims too." A box where you could fill in your name, address, phone number and email was also helpfully provided. I thought it would be a teachable moment to demonstrate just how loaded, self-serving and poorly crafted some survey questions can be... First of all, no one should be under any illusion that these types of survey questions are designed to actually measure what people in Elmwood-Transcona or anywhere else think about terrorism or Bill C-51, the proposed Anti-Terrorism Act just introduced by the Conservatives. If this was a sincere effort to engage community attitudes, Toet and his colleagues would publicly release the results and use them to justify their controversial anti-terror measures..." Winnipeg Free Press, A17

Blurred lines and fear tactics

An opinion piece states, "Xenophobia is an intense or irrational dislike or fear of people from other countries. Islam is the religious faith of Muslims. Islamophobia is an irrational fear of Islam and the Muslim people based on their links to Islamic extremists who use terrorism to advance their interests. Muslims are particularly vulnerable because they are a visible minority easily identified by religion and dress. Defining terrorism is more difficult. In Canada, section 83.01 of the Criminal Code defines terrorism as an act committed "in whole or in part for a political, religious or ideological purpose, objective or cause" with the intention of intimidating the public . . . with regard to its security, including its economic security." Activities recognized as criminal within this context include death and bodily harm with the use of violence; significant property damage and interference or disruption of essential services, facilities or systems. Following January's Charlie Hebdo massacre in Paris, Prime Minister Stephen Harper warned that the "international jihadist movement" had declared war on Canada. By the end of January, he was declaring war on the jihadists with his Anti-Terrorism Act. In early February, less than two weeks after the PM introduced Bill C-51, the RCMP received a tip that four people were plotting a Valentine's Day mass shooting in the Halifax Shopping Centre. Two people were subsequently charged with conspiracy to commit murder, not terrorism. The reason according to Justice Minister Peter McKay is that the conspiracy was not "culturally motivated." ... " Times & Transcript, A13

Une vraie menace

Une pièce d'opinion déclare, « La menace terroriste est devenue la justification passe-partout du gouvernement conservateur pour défendre les contours flous de la mission en Irak et dénigrer quiconque ose critiquer ses initiatives, en particulier le projet de loi antiterroriste C-51... » Le Devoir, B2

Tories' Bill C-51 is flawed legislation

A letter to the editor states, "In its haste to introduce C-51, the Conservative government has shown a wilful ignorance of very careful parliamentary work done in the past to establish a domestic security service appropriate to Canada and Canadians..." Ottawa Citizen, B6

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

 Crown's case looking thin in bid-rigging trial

On the face of it, the past couple of weeks should have been a great opportunity for the Crown in the long-running jury trial involving alleged bid rigging by 10 Ottawa defendants. Two key defendants - TPG Technology owner Don Powell and former Devon Group partner Ron Walker - elected to take the stand, thereby subjecting themselves to days of cross-examination by Crown lawyers. The cross-examination of Powell by crown prosecutor Denis Pilon concentrated on eight CBSA procurements, also from 2005, and the idea that TPG had conspired to send its most expensive consultants to government. Klobouk testified that he and other CBSA consultants were well aware the Agency wanted them back under new contracts, with the result that he was able to dictate terms to potential suppliers such as TPG Technology. "It was obvious we had the skills that the client (CBSA) wanted," Klobouk said. Ottawa Citizen, A4

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

Does that email look phishy?

The next phishing email you get could be from your boss. With high-profile security breaches on the rise, from Sony Pictures to Anthem, companies are on the defensive. And they want to make sure their employees are not a hack waiting to happen. Data show phishing emails are more and more common as entry points for hackers. Unwittingly clicking on a link in a scam email could unleash malware into a network or provide other access to cyberthieves. The Associated Press (StarPhoenix, F12)

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

Police question SFU prof who took photos near Kinder Morgan site

An SFU professor is wondering why police are investigating him for taking pictures near the Burnaby Mountain tank farm. Tim Takaro, a New Westminster resident and health sciences professor at SFU, was having lunch with his family earlier this week when his daughter's cellphone rang. The man on the other end of the line was looking for Takaro. "He identifies himself as the Burnaby RCMP and he asked me if I was involved in any incidents," Takaro said. "I didn't know anything he was talking about." Takaro's experience echoes that of New Westminster resident Lesslie Askin, a retired systems analyst who received a visit from the Integrated National Security Enforcement Team. Burnaby RCMP spokesman Staff Sgt. Major John Buis said he couldn't comment on any ongoing investigation. However, in general, if the RCMP receive a call about someone taking pictures of "critical infrastructure," police are required to do something, he explained. Burnaby Now (Vancouver Sun, A18)

 Mounties pull man from fume-filled garage

Two West Shore RCMP officers were injured Friday afternoon after rushing into a fume-filled Colwood garage to rescue a man. "Our officers did not think twice and risked their own life to save this male," said Const. Alex Berube, West Shore RCMP spokesman. He said the officers are expected to survive. Times-Colonist, A4

 RCMP presentations mark 40th anniversary of first female troop

The RCMP held a number of recruiting presentations for women in more than a dozen locations across Canada on March 7 to mark the 40th anniversary of the graduation of the first female troop and International Women's Day. The Guardian, C5

 Secret agent man - Protected witness wonders if big payday was worth hassle

He's a marked man, a "rat" within the criminal underworld who will spend the rest of his life looking over his shoulder worried about possible retribution. But longtime Hells Angels associate Jason Masniuk says he did the right thing in turning his back on his criminal brethren and taking a major payday by working for the police. Masniuk, 39, spoke exclusively to the Free Press this week from his new life under the witness protection plan, just a few months after concluding 15 months of dangerous undercover work with the Manitoba Integrated Organized Crime Task Force. Winnipeg Free Press, A6

 COP UNION ROCKED BY ALLEGATIONS

Senior executives with the Ontario Provincial Police Association (OPPA) were involved in fraudulent schemes to enrich themselves at the expense of the organization, a RCMP search warrant alleges. RCMP Sgt. Gordon Aristotle, in an Information to Obtain (ITO) released Friday, sought the records of OPPA president Jim Christie, vice-president Martin Bain and chief administration officer Karl Walsh, as well as those of lawyers Andrew MacKay, Klara Kozak and Noel Francis Chantiam. QMI Agency (Toronto Sun, 4); Globe and Mail; National Post; Toronto Star; Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, A9); La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 29)

 RCMP bust alleged trafficking ring

Two men are in custody and the search is on for a third following an extensive RCMP investigation into a suspected drug and weapons trafficking ring in Winnipeg. The arrests come as a result of Project Dare, a seven-month-long investigation that opened in September and focused on an alleged drug-trafficking group operating inside the city. Through two separate search warrants at residences in the downtown and North Kildonan areas, police seized approximately 1.5 kilograms of cocaine, more than 900 grams of ecstasy, 765 grams of methamphetamine and nearly one kilogram of marijuana. Officers also seized cash totalling approximately $100,000. Zack Rorie Zarichney, 23, and Chris Steven Karalash, 23, were arrested Thursday for their alleged involvement in the trafficking ring. Both Winnipeg men are facing numerous drug and weapons-related charges. One of the arrests was made at Stony Mountain Institution, RCMP said. Winnipeg Free Press, A7; Winnipeg Sun

 'I refuse to be a statistic'

Melissa Herman takes the usual precautions when she goes for an early-morning run along the Snye River. She wears a bright yellow shell and brings along her bounding dog, a highenergy mashup of husky and chocolate Lab named Charlie. But then she takes a further step, calling her brother and telling him when she's running and the route she'll take, so that someone knows where she is. It's not because Fort Mac is particularly unsafe, even in Ms. Herman's downtown neighbourhood next to the infamous Syncrude Towers. Running through Snye Park is no more dangerous than going for a jog through one of Toronto's leafy ravines. What troubles Ms. Herman, 28, is that, if she were actually to go missing or be murdered, she would be written off by the RCMP and by society as just another "highrisk" aboriginal woman. Globe and Mail, A4

 Le trafic de drogue qui rapporte gros

Même s'ils en empochent les lucratifs profits, les hauts dirigeants de "La Table" évitent de se mettre les mains directement dans le trafic de drogue, selon nos sources. "La Table" sert en quelque sorte de tour de contrôle du trafic, en donnant ou refusant de donner sa bénédiction aux trafiquants... et en percevant une intéressante quote-part du butin au passage. Si au début des années 2000, la commission était de 3 % à 7 %, elle est aujourd'hui modulée en fonction de la rentabilité des opérations. De plus, l'île de Montréal a été découpée en territoires, définissant clairement quels territoires sont contrôlés par la mafia ou les Hells Angels, par exemple, a appris notre Bureau d'enquête. Mais avec la création de "La Table", l'ordre semble être revenu dans l'organisation. "On pourrait dire que nous sommes dans une période d'accalmie", indique le commandant Daniel Dacunha, de la Division du crime organisé de la police de Montréal. Le Journal de Montréal, 4

 L'entraîneur a été sous enquête de la GRC

L'entraîneur de ski alpin accusé cette semaine d'agressions sexuelles sur des athlètes mineures aurait déjà fait l'objet d'une enquête par la GRC en 1998 sans que des accusations aient été déposées. "En février 1998, nous fumes avisés par une source que Bertrand Charest avait possiblement eu un contact inapproprié avec une membre de l'équipe, a indiqué l'organisme Canada Alpin par communiqué. Nous avons pleinement collaboré avec la GRC dans le cadre de l'enquête menée par cette dernière sur la plainte." Le Journal de Montréal, 14; La Presse; La Presse Canadienne (Le Nouvelliste, 35); Canadian Press (The Gazette, A8); Toronto Star

 Wife's concerns led to chemicals probe – RCMP

A judge has reserved a decision on bail until Tuesday for a Halifax man who has been accused of possessing dangerous chemicals and threatening police. Earlier Friday, an RCMP officer testified at the bail hearing for Christopher Phillips, saying the investigation began when his wife went to police on Jan. 19 and told them her husband's mental health was deteriorating and he was behaving strangely. Chronicle-Herald, A14; Canadian Press (National Post, A8); La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit, 7)

 Detectives threaten rebellion as unmarked vehicles grounded

The Ottawa Police Service has ordered that unmarked detectives' vehicles in some specialty units remain parked at the police station when shifts end, leading to a possible officer rebellion over investigations they say will be compromised. Officers in the guns and gangs, drugs, street crime and intelligence units have been allowed to take their unmarked police vehicles home, allowing quick responses to everything from off-duty calls, meetings with confidential informants or undercover investigations. In a move expected to be implemented by the end of the month to save approximately $300,000 annually in fuel costs, the service has ordered that 53 vehicles remain parked on police property when officers finish their shifts. If a situation emerges that requires immediate investigative response, officers in those units will have to make their way to the police station to pick up the vehicles. Time covering specific targets will decrease, as will the overall time police can devote to an investigation per day. Ottawa Citizen, A3

 Drug charges

Four Island men have been charged with multiple drug-related offences as a result of Project Lunge, a joint federal drug investigation. The investigation conducted between RCMP in P.E.I. and New Brunswick, as well as the RCMP Federal Investigations Unit, netted 1.6 kilograms of cocaine and 1,800 hydromorphone capsules. The street value of the drugs seized is estimated at well in excess of $300,000. The Guardian, A2

 Body of evidence

Long after the headlines are forgotten and memories fade, the evidence used to help solve Red Deer's crimes will stand. In some cases, the evidence is preserved indefinitely. Take for example a widely publicized case where a Red Deer woman was reported missing in January 1989. It was alleged that her husband killed and dismembered her in their bathtub before removing her body in a duffle bag. Blood and hair were recovered in the drain. The body was never found and the husband has since died. However, the smashed shower doors and other items from the apartment are wrapped and secured in the exhibit hall in the basement of the downtown Red Deer RCMP station. Brown is one of two exhibits custodians who are responsible for cataloguing, tracking and overseeing the evidence in the police storage system in Red Deer. Her colleague did not want her name used to protect her privacy. Police may have seized the 12,000 exhibits dating back to the 1980s during homicide cases, drug busts, traffic stops and other crimes. Hundreds of larger items, such as trucks, cars and bicycles, are stored off-site. Hazardous goods, including paint thinners and gasoline, are also stored on the police compound. Red Deer Advocate, A1

 Statistics regularly exaggerate gun use in crimes

An opinion piece states, "We are entering election 2015, and no doubt, some parties will try to exaggerate gun crimes. So let's get the facts straight. A quick look at the stats and you might think gun violence appears to be four times more frequent than it actually is..." Whitehorse Daily Star, 32

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

Reign of terror

Being a major player in a "reign of terror" on Calgary citizens will mean a minimum 25 years behind bars for gangster Nathan Zuccherato, a judge ruled Friday. Justice David Gates agreed with submissions by Crown and defence lawyers that despite committing multiple murders, Zuccherato's parole ineligibility could not exceed 25 years. Gates sentenced Zuccherato, 28, to three concurrent life sentences and said he could apply for release to the Parole Board of Canada in a quarter century from his arrest. Since the Calgary man has been in custody since 2009, he can seek full parole beginning in June, 2034, when he'll be 48. Calgary Sun, 3

 Man who assaulted mom with toddler present declared dangerous offender

A Penticton, B.C., man who admitted to sexually assaulting and confining a woman for 15 hours while her toddler was nearby has been declared a dangerous offender. Canadian Press (Red Deer Advocate, A8)

 Kidd sent to prison

The last words Robert (Robb) Kidd heard in the big second-floor court room of the Frontenac County Court House Friday weren't the judge's. Seconds after Superior Court Justice Jennifer Blishen departed the room, as the disgraced former fire department official was being removed from the prisoner's dock, the voice of a father in the spectator's gallery carried through the room. Justice Blishen, while recognizing that the National Parole Board may ultimately modify that aspect of her order, said Kidd's access is to be limited in accordance with the recommendation of psychologist Dr. Anthony Eccles, who conducted his psycho-sexual assessment. Eccles recommended that Kidd be forbidden from holding an Internet account, including a mobile phone plan, and that he be prohibited from living in a residence where any other individual has such an account. Kingston Whig-Standard, A1

A Navy rebuilt, at long last

An opinion piece states, "... Not as uplifting was the announcement of a government bill to amend the Criminal Code and provide for life imprisonment without parole for conviction of a category of heinous crimes: murders during sexual assault, kidnapping, acts of terrorism and the killing of police officers and prison guards. This is the latest in an eight-year sequence of Harper government legislation pandering to the most reactionary elements of the law and order-fixated public..." National Post, A18

Lifers law a new kind of Harper extremism

An editorial states, "Prime Minister Stephen Harper is selling his proposed "life means life" law, the details of which are to be made public this week, on the fear ticket - insisting he is correcting flaws in the Criminal Code that will spring those who commit heinous crimes from prison early, where they can walk unchecked on the streets and threaten the safety of ordinary Canadians..." Vancouver Sun, A19

 Prison à vie : summum de l'incompétence conservatrice

Une lettre déclare, « Le nouveau projet de loi C-53 qui veut que certains meurtriers meurent de vieillesse en prison est une preuve de l'incompétence des conservateurs en matière de justice. Au contraire d'assurer la sécurité des Canadiens, les criminels visés n'auront plus rien à perdre et, après le premier meurtre, auront acquis le droit de tuer n'importe qui, que ce soit un juge, un policier ou un gardien de prison. Plus aucune conséquence à tenter une évasion et, une fois évadé, on tue tout ce qui se met en travers du chemin... » Le Journal de Québec, 17

 Tough-sentence law will cause problems

Re: "'Life without parole' law riles critics," March 5.

A letter to the editor states, "Prime Minister Stephen Harper is proposing changes to the minimum sentences and the parole process. Those who have committed first-degree murder would be subject to life sentences with no parole for 35 years. While this law is indeed a politically motivated change, done in a desperate attempt to affirm the Conservatives' tough-on-crime stance, it carries deep implications for our legal system..." Times-Colonist, A13

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

'I felt a responsibility' to make film: Jacobs

Rather than wait for Prime Minister Stephen Harper to call an inquiry into Canada's 1,200 missing and murdered aboriginal women, Kawennáhere Devery Jacobs decided to make a movie. The Gazette, F7

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

Private email for government use discouraged in Canada

Canadian laws are intended to avoid situations like the controversy engulfing Hillary Clinton, the likely 2016 Democratic nominee for president now under fire for using private emails to conduct government business. Clinton's email use has been seen as a way to avoid creating a public record that can be accessed under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act. That would be a no-no for a senior Canadian public servant in Canada. Vancouver Sun, A14

OTHER / AUTRE

NATO disputes Tory claims of Russian 'buzzing'

The Conservative government has ratcheted up its war of words over Ukraine, with the parliamentary defence secretary claiming Russian warships confronted a Canadian frigate in the Black Sea. But NATO officials say no such thing happened. Ottawa Citizen, A9

INTERNATIONAL

Cyclone Pam slams Pacific isles

Winds from an extremely powerful cyclone that blew through the Pacific's Vanuatu archipelago were beginning to subside Saturday, revealing widespread destruction and unconfirmed reports of dozens of deaths. Communication systems in many of the hard-hit outer islands, about a quarter of the way from Australia to Hawaii, remained down. The Associated Press (The Record, A7)

 2 charged over links to Paris gunman after probe finds texts, DNA evidence

Two men with ties to one of the three gunmen who terrorized Paris were handed preliminary charges Friday, the Paris prosecutor said, describing hundreds of texts, regular meetings and DNA recovered from a stun gun among the belongings at a bloodied kosher supermarket. The Associated Press (Times & Transcript, B7); Agence France-Presse (La Tribune, 22)

 Mumbai terror suspect to be freed

A Pakistani court on Friday ordered the release of the main suspect in the 2008 Mumbai terror attacks by cancelling a government order under which he was detained for the past three months, a defence lawyer and prosecution said. The Associated Press (Vancouver Sun, B7)

 Police in Spain arrest 8 in jihadi swoop

Spanish police on Friday arrested eight suspected members of a jihadi terror cell that urged attacks to be carried out in Spain and selected people to fight for the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria, the Interior Ministry said. The Associated Press (The Record, A5)

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
April 25, 2015 / le 25 avril 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Ottawa to appeal Khadr bail ruling - Tories 'disappointed' as judge orders release of ex-Guantanamo detainee held since 2002

An Alberta judge has ordered Omar Khadr released on bail, giving the former Guantanamo detainee his first chance at freedom after nearly 13 years in custody. Just hours after Justice June Ross released her decision Friday, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney issued a statement saying Ottawa would appeal. "We are disappointed," Blaney wrote. "Our government will continue to work to combat the international jihadi movement, which has declared war on Canada and her allies." But Blaney's portrayal of Khadr as a dangerous terrorist is in stark contrast to what government lawyers said about the 28-year-old in court. There was no evidence presented at Khadr's March bail hearing to argue he posed a risk to society - a fact noted by Ross in her ruling Friday - nor did Department of Justice lawyers refute submissions about Khadr's exemplary behaviour in custody. "He has a 12 1/2-year track record as a model prisoner, and a release plan supported by educators, mental health professionals, and his lawyers," Ross wrote. "This is a circumstance where balancing a strong appeal and the public confidence in the administration of justice favour the same result." Khadr's longtime Canadian lawyer, Dennis Edney, along with his wife Patricia, have offered to have Khadr live with them and provide whatever supervision he may require. Toronto Star, A1; Canadian Press (Waterloo Region Record; Charlottetown Guardian; Chronicle-Herald; Cape Breton Post); Presse canadienne (La Tribune; Le Quotidien; L'Acadie nouvelle; Le Droit; La Voix de L'Est); La Presse; National Post (Windsor Star; Vancouver Sun; Star-Phoenix; Leader-Post; Montreal Gazette; Ottawa Citizen); Winnipeg Sun (London Free Press; Edmonton Sun; Calgary Sun; Kingston Whig-Standard); Edmonton Journal; Globe and Mail

L'homme de l'ombre

C'est un personnage-clé pour la sécurité nationale du Canada. En matière de terrorisme, de contre-espionnage, de menaces pour les «intérêts canadiens» dans le monde, c'est beaucoup à lui que le gouvernement s'en remet. Son budget vient d'augmenter substantiellement et le projet de loi C-51 va étendre considérablement ses pouvoirs, comme il le souhaitait. Certains l'admirent, certains s'en méfient. Mais dans l'ensemble, le public connaît peu Michel Coulombe, directeur du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS). Portrait d'un fidèle soldat. Un soldat de l'ombre. « Il n'aime pas les projecteurs. D'ailleurs, il ne va pas aimer ça, votre article. » Le ton est donné. Michel Juneau-Katsuya, ancien cadre du SCRS qui connaît le directeur actuel depuis des lustres, résume bien l'aura de secret qui entoure Michel Coulombe. Le SCRS est un univers opaque. Ses agents sont tenus à la plus grande discrétion. Ils ne peuvent parler de leur travail en dehors du bureau, même avec leur famille. Le service fait tout pour éviter que leurs noms soient dévoilés. Les noms des hauts dirigeants sont publics, mais ils s'expriment rarement à voix haute. M. Coulombe a d'ailleurs refusé d'accorder une entrevue dans le cadre de ce reportage. « Il incarne ces valeurs qui font la renommée de nos services de renseignement: discrétion et efficacité », affirme le ministre de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney. Le ministre est en contact étroit avec son chef espion: celui-ci a un statut de sous-ministre et lui fait rapport directement sur les questions de sécurité nationale. Sans intermédiaire. La Presse, A18

Gleeful Tory's giddiness reflects party mood

An opinion piece states "In one of his more exuberant moments in the role of Conservative cheerleader, Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney called Tuesday's pre-election budget his 'bestseller.' Listening to the Quebec minister on Montreal radio one could easily picture him clutching the budget to his chest as he spoke. It is even possible that he slept with the 300-page brick under his pillow. After all, it devotes an entire chapter to his public safety file. Over the years, Blaney's faith in Stephen Harper has been shown to border on religious and he has exhibited a zeal in defending the government's agenda that is second to none among cabinet members. Still, in this instance, the minister's giddiness reflects the mood of his government colleagues as they fast-forward to the upcoming campaign. Given a choice, it is a rare MP seeking re-election who would not prefer coming to a voter's doorstep bearing gifts." Chronicle-Herald, A15

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Minor quake ruffles B.C.'s north coast

Residents of British Columbia's north coast woke up in lightly swaying homes after a 6.1-magnitude earthquake hit the area Friday morning. The quake, which struck 167 kilometres southeast of the village of Queen Charlotte, was felt from Haida Gwaii and along the north coast, and towns in mainland B.C... The U.S. Geological Survey says the quake struck about 10 kilometres under the surface. There have been no reports of damage or injuries. Toronto Star, A11; Presse canadienne (L'Acadie nouvelle); Red Deer Advocate; Times-Colonist

Seismic shift in quake insurance might shock you

... It was a couple of years ago that earthquake policies went through a seismic shift, largely as a result of big payouts following major catastrophes around the globe. First, reinsurance companies - those that provide coverage to insurance companies wanting to limit their own exposure - adopted new earthquake modelling that drew attention to highrisk Victoria and Vancouver Island. So the cost of reinsurance went up, says Victoria insurance industry veteran Eric Hartley, the former owner of Bill Hartley Insurance Services. At the same time, events such as the 2011 earthquake that devastated Christchurch, New Zealand - a city that looked a lot like Victoria - prompted B.C. insurance regulators to stiffen the requirement that insurance companies buy enough reinsurance to cover all losses if the Big One hits. Combine those factors, and some companies are losing money selling earthquake policies, as the amount they collect in premiums is less than they pay for reinsurance. Times-Colonist, A1

Shake, rattle and roll in touring 'Quake Cottage' simulator

Most Lower Mainland residents fear what would happen if an earthquake should hit. But a simulation? Hey, that could be some fun. Lower Mainland municipalities are bringing in the Quake Cottage - a hydraulic "cottage" that rocks and shakes to simulate how it would feel to be in an earthquake of up to eight points on the magnitude scale. The Quake Cottage is touring the Lower Mainland as part of Emergency Preparedness Week, which runs from May 2 to 9. "We're trying to essentially communicate that we all have a responsibility to be prepared and people don't think about earthquakes because they don't happen that often but we do live in earthquake country," said Dorit Mason, director, North Shore Emergency Management. The Quake Cottage holds three people at a time for a three-minute demo. It is free to "ride" but participants will have to sign a waiver. Vancouver Sun, A19

Energy board will audit Kinder Morgan emergency response plans

The National Energy Board will conduct a comprehensive audit of emergency response and safety plans for energy pipeline giant Kinder Morgan. The audit will only focus on existing facilities and won't include the companies planned Trans Mountain pipeline expansion between Alberta and the British Columbia coast. Both Vancouver Mayor Gregor Robertson and B.C. Premier Christy Clark have called for Kinder Morgan's full emergency response plan for the Trans Mountain project to be made public. Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, B4; National Post)

Metro mayors grill federal officials - NEB head blasted for inadequate response

Metro Vancouver mayors grilled the National Energy Board Friday on how it would prevent future oil spills, saying the Canadian Coast Guard's "inadequate response" to the recent spill in English Bay put the city's economy, tourism and quality of life at risk. Mayors maintain the latest spill highlighted the need for a better emergency-response system across the region, noting it took the coast guard hours to respond after a sailor first reported seeing a sheen of oil in English Bay. North Vancouver District Mayor Richard Walton said "the level of response was far from what our local governments would anticipate." "I don't fault you for that, but my perception is you are vastly underfunded," Walton told National Energy Board chair Peter Watson and Canadian Coast Guard assistant commissioner Roger Girouard, following a presentation to the Metro mayors committee. The comments drew applause from the crowd of protesters in the gallery. Vancouver Sun, A8

Flood levels on St. John River may start to drop this weekend

Officials with the province's Emergency Measures Organization are mildly optimistic that water levels along the St. John River may start to fall a bit this weekend. Paul Bradley, a communications official with EMO and the Department of Public Safety, said conditions will probably be ideal with cool weather in the forecast. That will slow down the melt and not a lot of rain is expected, he said. Telegraph-Journal, A4

Third farm suspected of having bird flu - OXFORD COUNTY

The news for Southwestern Ontario poultry farmers just got a little bleaker, with bird flu -- a deadly virus that can quickly decimate flocks -- now suspected at a third farm in Oxford County. The animal health laboratory at the University of Guelph notified the Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) Thursday of a "presumptive H5 avian influenza" infection at a third farm in Oxford, one of the densest poultry-producing regions of the province. The CFIA has yet to comment on the spread of the outbreak to a third farm. London Free Press, A6

 KASHECHEWAN, ONT. - Flooding forces evacuations

Nearly 400 people in a Northern Ontario First Nation community had to leave their homes on Friday because of the threat of flooding. Kashechewan Chief Derek Stephen says evacuation flights will likely continue from the community until early next week. This is the fourth consecutive year the community on the western shore of James Bay has had to be evacuated. Residents are being taken to the northern Ontario communities of Kapuskasing, Smooth Rock Falls and Wawa. Stephen says all 1,900 residents will leave within the next few days. Canadian Press (Chronicle-Herald, A15)

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

Les deux jeunes passeront un autre week-end en prison - Terrorisme

Les deux cégépiens accusés de fabrication d'explosifs pour le compte d'une organisation terroriste passeront une autre fin de semaine en prison, le temps que leurs avocats analysent la preuve de la Couronne fédérale. "Nous avons reçu plus de preuves [hier] matin, et lundi, nous serons en mesure de déterminer le temps nécessaire pour la tenue d'une enquête sur remise en liberté", a expliqué à la Cour hier l'avocate de Mahdi El Jamali et Sabine Djermane. Les deux accusés d'à peine 18 ans devront donc encore attendre, eux qui sont détenus depuis 10 jours déjà. Ils sont accusés d'avoir tenté de quitter le pays dans le but de s'adonner à des activités terroristes, d'avoir eu des substances explosives, d'avoir tenté de faciliter une activité terroriste et, enfin, d'avoir commis un acte criminel au profit d'un groupe terroriste. Notons que ce sera à eux de prouver qu'ils méritent de quitter la prison en attendant leur procès, et non le contraire. Journal de Montréal, 12; Presse canadienne (Le Devoir)

Comment gérer la controverse

Comme dans pratiquement toutes les démocraties, les services de renseignement canadiens se sont attiré leur lot de critiques et de controverses, conséquences de la nature même de leurs activités et du secret qui les entoure. Voici comment le directeur navigue à travers certains des écueils qu'il rencontre sur son chemin. Des gens d'horizons aussi variés que le lanceur d'alerte américain Edward Snowden, des avocats de la défense, d'anciens juges de la Cour suprême et d'anciens premiers ministres ont déploré le manque de contrôle et de surveillance des services de renseignement canadiens. « Il a été démontré que d'importantes violations de droits de la personne peuvent être commises au nom de la sécurité nationale. Compte tenu du secret qui entoure les activités de sécurité nationale, des violations de droit peuvent ne pas être relevées et demeurer sans recours », déploraient récemment dans une lettre ouverte les anciens premiers ministres Chrétien, Martin, Clark et Turner. « Il y a eu des critiques et des recommandations sur notre façon de faire, mais on ne nous a jamais reproché d'avoir enfreint la loi », a assuré le directeur (du SCRS) devant un comité des Communes le mois dernier. Même avec l'élimination du poste d'inspecteur général du SCRS, l'un des chiens de garde internes de l'organisme, il croit que le Comité de surveillance des activités de renseignement de sécurité, le CSARS, fait un travail suffisant de critique et de contrôle au nom de la population. « A une certaine époque, c'était l'inspecteur général qui certifiait le rapport annuel du directeur présenté au ministre. Maintenant, c'est le CSARS. Si ma mémoire est bonne, tous ces rapports annuels indiquaient que nos activités étaient conformes [...] et qu'il n'y avait aucun abus de pouvoir de notre part », a-t-il déclaré dans un comité sénatorial. La Presse, A19

* De Poly à la police

Printemps 1980. Une petite bande de jeunes à l'aube de la vingtaine organisent une fête pour célébrer l'obtention de leur diplôme en génie physique. Un programme un peu à part à l'École polytechnique, celui des vrais de vrais passionnés de science pure. A force de bûcher pour résoudre problèmes et équations, ils sont devenus inséparables. Ce sont plutôt des « nerds ». Personne dans le groupe n'a l'air d'un futur agent secret. Surtout pas Michel Coulombe, le garçon aux cheveux longs qui boit sa bière assis par terre, appuyé au mur... La formation scientifique du directeur actuel du SCRS contraste aussi avec celle de ses prédécesseurs depuis 1984, qui avaient presque tous étudié en droit, en relations internationales, en économie et en sciences politiques. Mais il y avait d'ailleurs gagné des atouts, selon deux anciens proches collaborateurs. « Il apporte une attention particulière à la méthodologie; il a le souci d'être précis », remarque Ray Boisvert, un ancien directeur adjoint du SCRS. Il avait aussi une longueur d'avance pour maîtriser les gadgets technologiques et les outils de surveillance mis à la disposition des espions canadiens, souligne une ancienne directrice générale du SCRS pour la région du Québec, qui a accepté de parler à condition que son nom ne soit pas publié. « Il est très bon pour tous les trucs technologiques; il comprend comment ça marche. C'est utile. » La Presse, A19

* Le Canada doit se protéger de l'État islamique, selon Mulroney

L'ancien premier ministre Brian Mulroney appuie la stratégie du gouvernement Harper d'augmenter ses investissements dans l'armée, car il croit que l'État islamique est un "ennemi rare" pour le Canada. Rencontré cette semaine à Montréal pour discuter d'un prix qu'il recevra de l'Afrique du Sud (voir autre texte), M. Mulroney s'est avoué inquiet par la multiplication des actes terroristes à l'échelle planétaire. "Il [l'État islamique] est un ennemi rare pour le Canada. Plusieurs ont vu dernièrement ce pilote jordanien être brûlé vif. Ça prend quelqu'un sans âme pour poser un geste comme celui-là. Ils peuvent faire ça ici également. Il faut être vigilant et se préparer", affirme l'ex-politicien qui a été très actif sur le plan international dans les années 1980. Quant au renforcement du budget militaire et aux multiples investissements pour contrer l'État islamique en Syrie et en Irak, Brian Mulroney affirme qu'il est important que le gouvernement maintienne le cap dans "cette lutte féroce" contre le terrorisme. Journal de Montréal, 39 (Journal de Québec)

* Le mystère Adil Charkaoui

L'imam est un personnage hautement médiatisé. Cette semaine, l'on apprenait que Mahdi El Jameli, le jeune musulman radicalisé arrêté en compagnie de sa compagne Sabine Djaermane, fréquentait son établissement. Sur son compte Facebook, El Jameli louangeait un événement au titre évocateur de «Fuyez vers Allah» auquel il avait assisté en décembre dernier au centre communautaire de Charkaoui. Des étudiants disparus du Collège de Maisonneuve, soupçonnés d'être aujourd'hui en Syrie où ils auraient rejoint l'État islamique, un certain nombre fréquentaient le centre de l'imam. Ce dernier menace désormais de poursuivre quiconque publiera des textes l'associant à ces jeunes radicalisés. Adil Charkaoui connaît bien la Charte des droits et libertés qui lui est sans doute aussi précieuse que le Coran. Il ne craint guère d'utiliser le système judiciaire dont on sait qu'il n'est pas à la portée financière de tous ceux qui se sentent lésés au Canada. Il poursuit actuellement le gouvernement canadien pour plus de 26 millions $. Pour mémoire, rappelons que le parcours d'Adil Charkaoui comporte des zones d'ombre qui laissent parfois plusieurs. En 2003, Denis Coderre, alors ministre de l'Immigration, autorise l'émission d'un certificat de sécurité à l'encontre de Charkaoui. Plusieurs le soupçonnent d'être membre d'un groupe lié à Al-Qaïda. Arrêté, il sera incarcéré durant 21 mois. Remis en liberté en 2005, il doit se soumettre à plusieurs conditions, dont le port d'un bracelet électronique. Il recouvre sa pleine liberté et devient citoyen canadien en 2014. Journal de Québec, 18 (Journal de Montréal)

* Rona pumps budget

Edmonton-Spruce Grove MP Rona Ambrose says the 2015 federal budget could help offset new taxes and fees introduced in the Alberta PC provincial budget... The budget includes a $292.6-million investment over five years to the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the Canadian Border Services Agency that is earmarked to counter terror, though it includes no new money for foreign aid despite Canada lagging behind most developed countries and UN goals on aid. Edmonton Sun, 9

La surveillance, un mal «nécessaire»

Le terrorisme moderne rend inévitable la surveillance de masse. C'est le constat dressé par la ministre française de la Justice, au cours d'un entretien avec La Presse, à l'heure où la France, comme le Canada, projette d'élargir les pouvoirs de ses services de renseignement. «Dangereux», «liberticide», «scélérat»... Le projet de loi relatif au renseignement que veut faire adopter le gouvernement français s'attire des critiques de toutes parts, qui ne sont pas sans rappeler celles que suscite le projet de loi C-51 à Ottawa. Ce Patriot Act à la française, comme le surnomment certains détracteurs en référence à la loi antiterroriste américaine adoptée dans la foulée du 11-Septembre, prévoit élargir les pouvoirs des services de renseignement hexagonaux. «On est conscients que la surveillance est intrusive, on est conscients que la surveillance peut être massive, on est conscients qu'il peut y avoir des abus», reconnaît la ministre française de la Justice, Christiane Taubira, mais elle assure du même souffle que les mécanismes de contrôle prévus seront un efficace contrepoids. La Presse, A26

* Spending money on base security makes sense, ex-commander says

A recent announcement by the federal government that it intends to pump millions of dollars over the next four years into making Canadian military bases more secure is getting a thumbs-up from a former Gagetown commander. Ryan Jestin, a retired colonel who left the area in 2007, said there are three areas of security at Base Gagetown that should be focused on - further protecting the water facility it shares with Oromocto, its mess hall where there's always a huge congregation of people, and a new barracks. The latter is home, Jestin said, to 200 soldiers... During the delivery of the federal budget earlier this month, Finance Minister Joe Oliver announced the government's intention to spend $23 million over four years to upgrade security at Canada's military bases. No details were released. Canadian Forces officials have been struggling to find a security balance at its bases and facilities since an Oct. 22 incident that saw a reservist killed at the National War Memorial in Ottawa. The shooter later died in a gunfight in the Centre Block of Parliament. The shootings occurred days after two Canadian soldiers were run over in Quebec by a man with jihadist sympathies. One soldier died. Daily Gleaner, A7

Pourquoi de nouveaux pouvoirs?

Une pièce d'opinion dit « Pour combattre le terrorisme, faut-il vraiment donner autant de nouveaux pouvoirs à la police et, surtout, aux services de renseignement? Les arrestations qui se multiplient pourraient nous le faire croire. Il me semble au contraire qu'elles indiquent que les policiers ont déjà toute une panoplie de moyens juridiques à leur disposition... Depuis un mois, quatre jeunes Montréalais soupçonnés de terrorisme ont été arrêtés préventivement. Deux ont été emmenés devant le juge et soumis à diverses conditions, incluant un bracelet de surveillance GPS. Ils ne sont pourtant accusés d'aucun acte terroriste précis en ce moment. Deux autres, ce jeune couple qui voulait apparemment partir en Syrie, sont détenus depuis une semaine... Pour la première fois, les policiers ont utilisé un article introduit dans le Code criminel après les attentats du 11 septembre 2001, qui permet l'arrestation préventive de gens au sujet desquels on a des motifs de croire qu'ils se livreront à une activité terroriste... Les arrestations des dernières semaines et les départs à l'étranger de jeunes Montréalais radicalisés nous le montrent assez clairement: il existe une menace d'un nouveau type. J'attends toutefois du gouvernement un seul exemple concret qui justifie C-51, hormis la peur. » La Presse, A5

 Conrad Black - The pacifism of fools

An opinion pieces states "It is hard to avoid the sinking feeling that former NDP federal secretary and national campaign chairman Gerald Caplan was speaking for his party and its current leader, Thomas Mulcair, in the Globe and Mail on April 17. Caplan wrote that our only problem with Muslim terrorists is their objection to America's dispute with Saddam Hussein, after he seized Kuwait in 1990, was expelled from it, and defied 17 United Nations Security Council resolutions in support of the ceasefire at the end of the Gulf War. Caplan cited Osama bin Laden, entirely neutrally, when he denounced the 'hundreds of thousands of Iraqi children who died from lack of food and medicine due to American sanctions;' the founder of al Qaeda, he explained, 'resented the deployment of American forces throughout the Gulf states, particularly in his homeland, Saudi Arabia.' Caplan further claimed that 'Canadians were given the same reasons by Michel Zihaf-Bibeau, who murdered Corporal Nathan Cirillo at the War Memorial in Ottawa [that] his actions were spurred by Canada's military involvement in Afghanistan and Iraq.' Of course, that isn't the same thing at all... Apart from the fantastic exaggeration of the effect of international sanctions on Saddam Hussein, imposed by an almost unanimous United Nations for his violations of international law (hundreds of thousands of Iraqi children did not die, and food and medicine were largely exempted from the sanctions, which were porous anyway); and apart also from the Swiss cheese of inconsistencies created by Caplan's explication of the motives for these massacres of innocent people (as bin Laden acknowledged them to be), are we to understand the former NDP campaign chairman attaches some credence and approval to these motives?" National Post

 It's time Canada acted like a democracy

A letter to the editor states "Re: Spy watchdog may become supersized, April 23. Canadians need to clearly understand that there is a huge difference between review and oversight. It is not, as some would like them to believe, a simple matter of semantics. There is a reason why most democracies in the world today have oversight. It is because oversight protects the rights of citizens... Let me be clear and unequivocal: Canada needs oversight, not a super-sized Security Intelligence Review Committee. With all due respect to the work done by that agency, it is neither independent nor does it do anything else but report superficially on what CSIS has already done. It has had minimal impact on CSIS operationally, because frankly, CSIS considers SIRC an unnecessary tedious bureaucratic 'micro manager.' The SIRC report is sanitized and devoid of anything substantive. It certainly doesn't inform Parliament of anything significant. Canada needs to establish Parliamentary oversight. Canada needs to involve its elected representatives in national security, instead of leaving it up to an old-boys network who for the most part see themselves as above the law. Without oversight and with the spectre of Bills C-44 and C-51, Canada is heading for a period of shameful conduct on the part of its security agencies with nothing more than a super-sized paper tiger to purr harmlessly to Parliament - after the fact - about the mistakes and abuses that are sure to come. Canada is a democracy. It's time to act like one." Ottawa Citizen, C6

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

Mass strip search at border not a one-off - 'Similar logic' may have been used at other crossings, internal investigation finds

After a mass strip search of 48 American students in December 2011, the Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) found that "similar logic" may have been used to justify other mass searches at border crossings. An internal investigation into Chief Mark Pergunas' decision to strip search a bus tour of college and university students at the Thousand Islands border crossing violated agency policy and may have contravened the Charter of Rights. But while the incident was exceptional, it doesn't appear to have been a one-off. "A cursory search within (the Immigration Customs Enforcement System) revealed that it appears three regions may be applying similar logic in performing personal searches on more than one individual, based on one set of indicators," the investigation, released through access to information law, found. Toronto Star, A6

 Border officers could face Canadian justice

A U.S. border officer who commits an on-duty crime in Canada would generally face justice in an American court under a new binational agreement. But if the crime is murder, terrorism or sexual assault, a trial could take place in Canada, according to the agreement made public this week. The fine print of the deal sets out a complex regime for determining officer accountability on both sides of the border under the Canada-U.S. preclearance scheme, which expands the American customs presence on Canadian soil. Josh Paterson, executive director of the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, says the agreement's wording allays some concerns about criminal acts. However, the association has questions about how Canadians might seek redress for less serious infringements of their rights by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers. Canadian Press (Cape Breton Post, A12; St. John's Telegram; Times-Colonist; Ottawa Citizen)

 Renouveler son passeport d'urgence

Septembre 2012. Sophie Rouleau-Verville est assise dans la voiture avec son copain, en route vers l'aéroport Montréal-Trudeau, où elle doit prendre l'avion pour Barcelone. En route, elle ouvre pour la énième fois son passeport. C'est alors que son cœur fait trois tours : l'indispensable document de voyage est périmé... L'avion qu'elle devait prendre ce samedi soir là décolle sans elle. « Je suis super organisée dans la vie, assure-t-elle. Je ne me pardonnais pas cette erreur. J'étais persuadée que mon passeport était valide jusqu'en juillet 2013. » Celle qui croyait avoir pensé à tout des photocopies de passeport jusqu'à la trousse de premiers soins quittera finalement la métropole, pour aller rejoindre son conjoint, 24 heures plus tard. Sophie a réussi à obtenir rapidement un nouveau passeport grâce à un service accéléré de Passeport Canada. Car le cas de la jeune femme n'est pas exceptionnel. Il est fréquent que des voyageurs réalisent au moment de boucler leurs valises ou encore quelques jours avant le départ que leur passeport n'est plus valide. Dans ces situations, il est en général possible d'obtenir un nouveau passeport sans renoncer à son projet de voyage... Selon l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada (ASFC), on devrait vous laisser rentrer chez vous. « Les citoyens canadiens peuvent demeurer, entrer ou sortir de leur pays », précise Dominique McNeely, conseiller en communication à l'Agence. Le voyageur devra néanmoins fournir des pièces d'identité et répondre aux questions à l'agent des services frontaliers à son arrivée au pays. La Presse (La Voix de L'Est, W5)

 Fowl surprise at border crossing

A Winnipeg couple were shocked to have their poultry products confiscated at the Canadian border after spending a few days in North Dakota. Bert Skogan and his wife were on their way home when they stopped in Grand Forks and bought a couple of frozen turkey breasts and a bag of frozen chicken breasts for about $20. When they arrived at the border crossing, they were told the meat was a no-go under restrictions by the Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) — in place since April 14 to prevent the spread of avian influenza, commonly known as bird flu. The restriction came as a complete surprise to Skogan. "I figure that if it will prevent the spread of this disease, I have no problem with that whatsoever," Skogan said. "Where I do have a problem is that as a Canadian citizen, why is it that I didn't know anything about it? "To assume that people just automatically check for changes, they are mistaken. We don't. I don't think I'm alone in that, either." A spokesman with the Canada Border Services Agency said there is always room for improvement when getting the message out. "We're getting better. Obviously, when the ban on North Dakota came up, there wasn't a whole lot of awareness of it. But we've been doing some outreach," said Jason Evert, chief of operations for CBSA in Emerson. Winnipeg Free Press

 Canucks booted to face murder charges - SCOC orders pair sent back to U.S.

The Supreme Court of Canada has ordered the extradition of two Canadian men to face murder charges in New Hampshire, where they are accused of the gruesome killing of a lesbian couple 27 years ago. Charlene Ranstrom and Brenda Warner were stabbed to death in their apartment in Nashua, N.H., on Oct. 2, 1988. Anthony Barnaby, 47, faced three trials in 1989 and 1990, all of which ended in a hung jury. David Caplin, 53, was charged in 1990, but the case was dropped after his defence successfully filed motions to exclude some of the evidence against him. New Hampshire authorities reopened their investigation in 2010, and said advanced DNA testing, which was not available at the time of murders, linked Caplin to the crimes. The two Mi'kmaq men were arrested in Quebec in April 2011 and ordered removed in March 2012, but they have been pursuing a series of appeals since then. On Friday, the top court ruled their extradition could proceed. Postmedia Network (Ottawa Sun, 10)

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

 Need more things to worry about? Annual cybersecurity conference is the place to find them

A conference of Internet security experts is not for the faint of heart. Hallway chatter and keynote speeches are peppered with scary stories of increasingly sophisticated hackers siphoning off valuable personal and corporate data. In the words of one expert, the bad guys are outmanoeuvring those charged with keeping the wired world safe. This despite repeated vows from CEOs and government officials to tighten security after high-profile breaches at Sony Pictures, health insurer Anthem and retailers Target and Home Depot. The recent wave of corporate data breaches and cyberattacks provided plenty of fodder for a weeklong cybersecurity conference in San Francisco. Some 28,000 threat analysts, security vendors and corporate IT administrators gathered to talk about malicious software, spear-phishing and other attacks that can steal money or secrets from companies and consumers. Hamilton Spectator

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

RCMP arrests 15-year-old in relation to suspicious note

The RCMP in Grand Falls-Windsor arrested a 15-year-old male student in connection with a suspicious note discovered at Exploits Valley High Thursday. The police said their investigation confirmed the youth is the author of the note that raised alarm at the school. In a news release issued Friday afternoon, Staff Sgt. Boyd Merrill of the RCMP B Division headquarters said it has not been determined at this point what, if any, charges will be laid. He said police and justice officials are governed by the federal legislation for young offenders, which offers several alternatives through the justice system. St. John's Telegram

Sex offender faces 86 more charges - At least 23 alleged victims in case, cops say

A Windsor man previously convicted of luring and abducting an underage girl now faces 86 more charges related to online activities - and police say his list of alleged victims numbers almost two dozen. Daniel George Nickolson, 48, has been the subject of an investigation by the Windsor police Internet Child Exploitation (ICE) unit since May 2013. "To date, this is the largest number of Criminal Code charges that the ICE unit has ever laid in a single investigation," Windsor police spokesman Sgt. Matthew D'Asti said on Friday. The current charges against Nickolson include multiple counts of extortion, luring, accessing and possessing child pornography, making child pornography, arranging for sexual offences against a child, invitations to sexual touching, uttering threats, and more. Windsor Star, A1

Soldier's death resonates in Moncton - Youth spent learning survival in the woods made Doiron a natural for Canadian Special Operations Regiment's 'thinking warriors'

The Doirons live just north of Moncton, past a stream where locals fill up containers with spring water, in a semi-rural area that features more woodland than houses. It's in this forest that Andrew Doiron grew up, a scrawny kid who sometimes liked to wear camo gear as he played with friends, built bonfires and learned to shoot. Family members seemed destined to serve their country: Andrew longed to be in the Canadian

Forces, while his sister, Lindsay, went on to join the RCMP. For years, Andrew Doiron thought of being a paramedic in the military, according to his friends... His death on March 7 in a friendly fire accident, however, is shrouded in mystery: His parents are still restricting their public comments on the tragedy, and the government is conducting investigations that will not be fully released to the public... During last June's shooting rampage in Moncton, in which Justin Bourque killed three Mounties and scared an entire community, Sgt. Doiron looked after friends and family who were stuck at home in lockdown. Using his dry sense of humour and his knowledge of military tactics, he offered free advice on maintaining "situational awareness" at all times. "Take the fight to the threat. ... Don't freeze up," he said. A few days later, during the regimental funeral in which thousands of law-enforcement officials gathered in Moncton, Andrew Doiron walked in the same RCMP troop as his sister, who is now serving in the North. He wore his army uniform as he paraded alongside Mounties in their red serge. It was a clear break with protocol, according to an RCMP officer, but a fitting tribute to the fallen police officers. Globe and Mail, A4

 Beaming with pride - After 38 years on the job, Cam Croal is retiring from the RCMP but he has not lost his passion for policing

Cam Croal beams with pride when he speaks of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. And it's not about the many drugs busts he helped execute or criminals he put behind bars. Instead, the now-retired RCMP officer wants to talk about this country's national icon and give it the respect it deserves. "Policing is an honourable profession. It is a vital component of our community," said the 57-year-old Waterloo father of three. "I loved what I was doing. I still love policing. I could have done more, but intuitively it seemed time to go," said Croal, who retired from the Kitchener detachment as staff sergeant last week after 38 years as an officer. Waterloo Region Record, B1

 House arrest for woman who falsely claimed sister's fiancé was a terrorist - Judge calls hoax designed to end engagement 'amazingly stupid'

An Edmonton woman who told the Canadian Forces her sister's fiancé was a terrorist in an attempt to end their engagement will be under house arrest for six months. Hana Bedhiafi, 24, sobbed in court as provincial court Judge Elizabeth Johnson told her she wasn't going to jail. "You did a stunningly stupid thing, amazingly stupid and thoughtless," Johnson said. "The kinds of consequences that could flow from this behaviour are difficult to contemplate. However, I am convinced you would never do this again." In April 2014, Bedhiafi was "quite upset" with her older sister's marriage plans, Crown prosecutor Craig Krieger told court. While Bedhiafi and her family believed the engagement was a bad idea, the older sister was adamant about the man she wanted to marry. On April 14, the sisters texted each other all day. Bedhiafi wrote that she would do whatever possible to end the engagement. The next day, she sent an email and a Facebook message to Canadian Forces officials in Ontario that stated "her sister's fiancé was a member of a new terrorist group and was planning to blow up buildings in Edmonton," Krieger told court. "This fairly quickly got people's attention." More than 20 police units became involved, including the RCMP's Integrated National Security Enforcement Team, their bomb disposal unit and officers who could translate texts written in Arabic. Edmonton Journal, A2

 Police bust fraud ring that victimized hundreds

Police say they have busted a sophisticated, nimble crime ring that used Internet malware, impersonation, a master forger and a legion of drivers and runners to take over the identity of hundreds of victims and steal at least $2 million from them and their banks. Three of four possible key players are from Hamilton. "We feel we've hit the root of this organization," said OPP Chief Supt. Don Bell during a news conference Friday at Hamilton police headquarters. The joint forces investigation - dubbed Operation Springston - culminated this week in raids in Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto with 98 charges laid against 33 people; 14 were arrested and 19 are still being sought. Seven police services played a role in an investigation they described as "complex" and "far-reaching"... Recognizing the jurisdiction-hopping nature of the criminal network, investigators turned to the OPP for help. Eventually, the RCMP, the Canadian Banking Association and banking security representatives came on board. Waterloo Region Record, A3; Canadian Press (Times-Colonist)

 Faro RCMP building plans move forward

The Yukon government will spend more than $3.5 million this year to construct a new RCMP facility in Faro, subject to the legislature passing the 2015-16 fiscal year budget. The project is now in the design phase, with construction expected to begin this summer. "This new building is an important step forward for policing in the Faro region," Justice Minister Brad Cathers said Monday. "The project is being designed with the necessities for any detachment in mind so it can be adapted for other communities, which will result in substantial long-term savings as other RCMP facilities are replaced in the future." Plans for a new building were announced in 2014 after an operational review of the Yukon's police detachments concluded that Faro's 44-year-old facilities are in the greatest need of replacement. Whitehorse Daily Star, 11

 Morinville church vandalized, RCMP say possible hate crime

This Sunday will mark three weeks since a church in the heart of Morinville was vandalized -- "I love Satan" spray painted in blue on the side of the brick building, "I hate God" on the sidewalk. Words that, despite the spelling mistake, have shaken the small town north of Edmonton and have RCMP there still searching for suspects and answers in what they're characterizing as a potential hate crime. "It is a community crime as well as a crime against the church so it affects everybody," said RCMP Corp. Sheldon Robb speaking outside the St. Jean Baptiste Roman Catholic church, a towering historic structure on Morinville's main street. "It's very possible this may be hate crime motivated, it's very possible, we can't rule that out. We do have some leads we're following up on." RCMP said they've spoken to a potential eye witness and plan to speak to that person again, but so far that's all they've got. The same night the church was targeted, businesses in town were also sprayed with blue spray paint, the post office had a swastika drawn on its walls. RCMP believe all of the incidents are connected. CBC News

 Man arrested in human trafficking investigation may have more victims – police

A 22-year-old man is facing 19 charges related to a human trafficking investigation, and Toronto police believe there may be more victims. It's alleged that a 16-year-old girl was recruited and forced to become a sex trade worker, taken by a man to various hotels in the GTA, and held against her will for more than a month. The man threatened the teenage girl and her family to force her into the sex trade, say police. He also physically and sexually assaulted her, and forced her to lie about her age. Toronto Star

 Toronto man arrested at Pearson airport as part of child exploitation investigation

A Toronto man was arrested at Pearson airport as part of a child exploitation probe, and police believe there may be more victims. It's alleged that the man was communicating in a sexual nature with children online and had arranged to meet a child in person. Police say he had arranged to travel to meet the child. Toronto Star

 TISDALE, SASK. - Friend: Victim had just ended relationship

A friend of a woman killed with her three children in Saskatchewan says she had split with her boyfriend just before the attack. Amanda Henderson says she spoke with Latasha Gosling on Monday, and Gosling told her she had broken up with her boyfriend. Henderson says Gosling found out that Steve O'Shaughnessy had cheated on her with another woman. Mounties found the bodies of Gosling and her three children early Wednesday in their mobile home in the town of Tisdale, northeast of Saskatoon. O'Shaughnessy killed himself in a home in Prince Albert. Canadian Press (Chronicle-Herald, A15); Leader-Post

 Two face prostitution charges

Halifax Regional Police have arrested two suspects on human trafficking, child pornography and prostitution-related charges. Richard Hover Cooper, 25, and a 16-year-old Dartmouth boy were taken into custody following an investigation by the vice unit of the integrated criminal investigation division. Police searched two residences Thursday - one on Hastings Drive in Dartmouth and the other on Old Sambro Road in Halifax. Officers seized evidence and made the arrests. Both suspects appeared in court Friday. Cooper faces a total of 13 charges, including sexual assault, procuring underage prostitution and trafficking a person under the age of 18. The teenager faces 14 similar charges, including making child pornography and living off the avails of prostitution. Chronicle-Herald, A14

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

La peine de mort souhaitée - UNE PROCHE D'UNE DES VICTIMES DU PRÉDATEUR DE HANDICAPÉES ESTIME LA SENTENCE INSUFFISANTE

Le juge Jean Hudon de la Cour du Québec a accepté, hier, la suggestion commune de 10 ans de pénitencier pour Roger Toulouse, un homme d'entretien de Saguenay qui a agressé sexuellement quatre femmes lourdement handicapées mentales et collectionné des égo-portraits avec ses victimes. Toulouse devra aussi se soumettre au programme de délinquant à contrôler pendant une période supplémentaire de sept ans... Toulouse sera détenu ou contrôlé pendant un total de 17 ans avec obligation de suivre une multitude de programmes et thérapies recommandées par le Service correctionnel canadien qui sera relayé par la Commission nationale des libérations conditionnelles. Son ADN et ses coordonnées seront inscrits au Registre national des délinquants sexuels, accessible aux policiers. Journal de Québec, S2; Le Quotidien

Mom out in infant-remains case

A woman accused of hiding the remains of six infants in a Winnipeg storage locker was granted bail Friday. Andrea Giesbrecht, 41, was ordered to keep the peace, report any pregnancies to authorities, and live under the supervision of the Elizabeth Fry Society until her trial, tentatively set for next April. She will also have a strict curfew. Canadian Press (Times-Colonist, A7); Winnipeg Sun

'Gruesome, shocking' - Jury delivers guilty verdict in brutal stabbing death

A jury has convicted Treyvonne Willis of first-degree murder in the brutal stabbing death of 26-year-old Kaila Tran outside her St. Vital home. Jurors deliberated nearly two full days before reaching a guilty verdict late Friday afternoon... Judge Glenn Joyal called the killing "singularly gruesome and shocking" and rejected Willis's claim he had nowhere to turn. "No options, Mr. Willis?" Joyal said. "Really? What about the police?... You chose between a mere risk of death to you and your family and the certainty of death you imposed on Ms. Tran." Joyal sentenced Willis to mandatory life in prison. As his crime predated changes eliminating the so-called "faint hope clause," Willis will be able to apply for early release after serving 15 years of his sentence. Winnipeg Sun, 2

 Ashton Natomagan suspect in violent sexual assault

A high risk sex offender who now has two Canada-wide warrants out for his arrest is a suspect in a violent sexual assault that happened just north of downtown earlier this month. Ashton Natomagan is wanted on eight charges including assault with a weapon, robbery, sexual assault with threats to cause bodily harm and kidnapping... The Canada-wide warrant issued Friday is Natomagan's second. The first was issued after he failed to return to his Edmonton halfway house on March 3. Days earlier he had been released from the Grande Cache Institution after serving a five-year sentence for sexual assault causing bodily harm. At the time, police described Natomagan as dangerous and said he should not be approached. Parole documents obtained by CBC show that Natomagan has a history of sexually and physically assaulting children. In 2002, Natomagan brutally attacked a 10-year old girl while she was asleep, choking and raping her. Six years later, while "coming off of cocaine and alcohol" he physically and sexually assaulted a 16-year old girl, randomly on the street. When released from jail in early March he was put under a long term supervision order, lasting eight years.

A chronology of Khadr's legal odyssey

July 27, 2002: Two Afghan government soldiers are killed and several U.S. troops sustain injuries as coalition forces move in on Khadr's compound. Khadr throws a grenade that kills U.S. Sgt. 1st Class Christopher Speer. Khadr is injured in the mêlée.; October 2002: Khadr is transferred to Guantanamo Bay.; February 2003: Investigators from the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) interview Khadr at Guantanamo.; Aug. 10, 2005: A Federal Court judge says Canadian agencies, including CSIS, are violating Khadr's Charter rights by giving information gleaned in interviews to U.S. investigators... Sept. 29, 2012: A U.S. military airplane brings Khadr back to Canada. He is transferred to the Millhaven Institution near Kingston.; May 28, 2013: Khadr transferred to maximum security Edmonton Institution.; Oct. 18, 2013: Khadr is denied a transfer to a provincial jail.; Feb. 11, 2014: Khadr's lawyer confirms his client has been transferred to Bowden Institution, a medium-security prison near Innisfail, Alta.; May 22, 2014: Tabitha Speer and an American soldier blinded in the 2002 attack sue Khadr for about $45M.; March 26, 2015: Khadr asks for bail pending outcome of his appeal in the U.S. of his war crimes conviction.; April 24, 2015: Albert judge rules on Khadr's bail application. Canadian Press (Toronto Star, A4); Globe and Mail

'He is concerned about the badness of his past, but he wants to move forward'

Omar Khadr has witnessed a stream of soldiers, guards and lawyers during the nearly 13 years he has been in custody, but he's had little interaction with the public. Rudy Wiebe, an 80-year-old Mennonite prairie novelist, is one of the few to have sat down with the convicted al-Qaeda terrorist. While being held at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Mr. Khadr received a copy of Mr. Wiebe's first novel, Peace Shall Destroy Many, a story penned in 1962 that follows a young Mennonite man dealing with the conflict between his religion and military service during the Second World War. "He found the challenge of facing traditions as circumstances change to be illuminating," said Mr. Wiebe, winner of two Governor General's awards for fiction. "He told me in a letter that it was the most interesting book he'd read." After Mr. Khadr was transferred to an Edmonton prison, Mr. Wiebe first visited him in August, 2013, and has met with him four more times. Globe and Mail, A3

 Military interrogator and blinded soldier react to Khadr bail decision

A former soldier wounded in the battle that led to Khadr's capture believes he's still a threat. A former military interrogator says meeting Khadr taught him how to have compassion for the enemy. CBC News

Khadr now becomes a federal election issue

An opinion piece states "For Omar Khadr, it never ends. During most of his young life, he has been a pawn in someone else's political game. He still is. This time, the pawn-master is Prime Minister Stephen Harper, whose government announced Friday that it will appeal a judge's ruling to grant the 28-year-old Canadian bail while he appeals a 2010 U.S. conviction. Conservative Roxanne James, the government's designated spokesperson, said Ottawa opposes Khadr's release because he has been convicted of 'heinous crimes.' What she should have said is that, in the lead-up to this fall's election, the Conservatives hope to use Khadr as a political wedge issue. In Canada, passions run high when Khadr's name is raised. Some see him as a child soldier caught up in the dual madness of the Afghan War and America's Guantanamo Bay prison camp. Others view him as a terrorist and murderer who does not merit the Canadian citizenship with which he was born. He is, in short, a perfect political vehicle for a Conservative prime minister hoping to use crime and national security as defining elements in the election campaign." Toronto Star, A4

Free at last, almost

An editorial states "Whatever his misdeeds, Omar Khadr should have been freed years ago. But from the moment the young Canadian child soldier for Al Qaeda was captured by American troops in Afghanistan in 2002 at age 15, he has been denied justice, tortured, tried in a shabby military court and forsaken by his government. He has spent 13 years behind bars, twice the time he would have served as a young offender for first-degree murder under our laws. Now, at last, a Canadian court has thrown Khadr a scrap of redress. In a firm and welcome ruling, Alberta Justice June Ross has granted him bail, pending his appeal in the U.S. of war-crimes convictions before a widely discredited military tribunal. He could be out as early as May 5, once the terms of his release are set. But not if Prime Minister Stephen Harper's vindictive government has its way. It intends to appeal. Harper seems obtusely determined to see him serve out his full term, dragging things out for 18 months more until his statutory release date. Hasn't Canada been shamed enough by this travesty of justice? Isn't it past time we gave Khadr a chance to move on, and moved on ourselves? In her ruling Ross found that Khadr has a constitutional right to seek bail, he has a strong case for appealing his conviction and he poses no great risk to public safety." Toronto Star, IN6

Khadr's still a security threat

An editorial states "One way or the other, Omar Khadr, Canada's best-known terrorist, is getting out of a Canadian prison very soon. That could come as early as next month after Alberta Justice June Ross granted his bail application Friday -- its conditions have yet to be set -- pending the outcome of his appeal of his convictions in the U.S. for war crimes. War crimes he pleaded guilty to, including the killing of Sgt. 1st Class Christopher Speer, by tossing a grenade at him in a firefight in Afghanistan in 2002. But even if the bail process stalls because the feds are appealing Ross' decision, Khadr, who has been in custody since age 15 -- first in Guantanamo Bay, now in an Alberta prison as part of his plea deal -- doesn't have a long wait until he's out. That's because he's eligible for statutory release in October, 2016 after having served two-thirds of his sentence. The point is whenever Khadr is released he needs to be closely watched because he's an obvious security threat." Winnipeg Sun, 8

Give Omar Khadr his chance

An editorial states "One way or another, Omar Khadr will soon be a free man. On Friday, moments after judge J.M. Ross of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta granted the 28-year-old Toronto native bail from an Edmonton-area jail pending appeal of his war crimes conviction in the United States, the government announced - as predictably as day follows night - that it would appeal. Appeal or no appeal, though, Khadr is eligible for statutory release next year, and "evidence that he is a strong candidate for judicial interim release" went unchallenged by government lawyers before Judge Ross. The absolute latest date at which Khadr could still be incarcerated is Oct. 30, 2018. Yet all evidence suggests Ottawa will spare no expense in trying to delay it until then. It is time, instead, to finally throw in the towel. It is time to give Khadr his first shot at building a life in the country of his birth. And just as importantly, it is time to take stock of Canada's record on this file." National Post, A12

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

'Protecting the future' - Feds commit $5.25M for children who are victims of crime

On the final day of a lengthy stop in Winnipeg, Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced the federal government is committing more resources to help children who are victims of crime. The PM spoke to the federal government's intent to boost support for child advocacy centres at a roundtable meeting with victims' advocates at the Winakwa Community Centre on Friday morning... On the second-last day of Victims of Crime Awareness Week, Harper also noted that the Victims Bill of Rights Act recently received royal assent. The legislation seeks to ensure victims' rights are at the heart of the criminal justice system by giving victims of crime the right to information, protection, participation and, where possible, a right to restitution. Winnipeg Sun, 6

" Les victimes peuvent maintenant participer à part entière au système de justice " - LES ENTREVUES DU SAMEDI

Alors que la Charte canadienne des victimes d'actes criminels, aussi intitulée la loi 32, a obtenu la sanction royale cette semaine, notre Bureau parlementaire a rencontré le sénateur conservateur Pierre-hugues Boisvenu, qui en avait fait son cheval de bataille. Comment réagissez-vous à l'adoption de cette charte? C'est un gros morceau, car ça faisait 10 ans que je pouvais pour l'adoption d'une charte des droits des victimes. Alors, pour moi, c'est un résultat inespéré. Il reste quand même que, pour les victimes d'actes criminels, ce n'est pas la fin en soi. C'est le début, à mon avis, d'un processus légal. Dans quelle mesure cette charte est-elle achevée? C'est une clé qu'on donne aux victimes pour leur dire qu'elles peuvent maintenant participer à part entière au système de justice et qu'elles peuvent maintenant revendiquer ces droits-là. Et si ces droits-là ne sont pas respectés, elles peuvent se plaindre, et c'est à partir de ces plaintes qu'on va améliorer la charte. C'est une loi qui va pouvoir être améliorée et réévaluée tous les deux à cinq ans. Quels droits cette charte vient-elle accorder aux victimes et quand sera-t-elle opérationnelle? La nouvelle charte repose sur quatre grands principes: le droit d'être informé [...], le droit à la protection [...], le droit à la participation [...] et le droit à l'indemnisation. Journal de Montréal, 38 (Journal de Québec)

 Human trafficking not some far-off crime - It can be right on our doorstep, Burlington woman who was pimped out at 16 tells conference

Victims of human trafficking are often right under our noses. That is the message Colleen Allan of Burlington wanted to share at the Salvation Army's From Trauma to Triumph conference in Hamilton Friday. And she would know. Growing up on the west Mountain, Colleen became a victim of human trafficking before she reached the age of 18. "What I went through didn't even have a name at the time," said Colleen, noting today's growing awareness of human trafficking. "I've been given a second chance."

She grew up with an emotionally abusive mother and an alcoholic and often absent father. When the 16-year-old saw a modelling advertisement posted by a man she calls Carl, she saw it as a golden opportunity to build self-confidence. "He groomed me and got me to rely on him," Colleen said. After years of bullying exacerbated by an awkward childhood and an unstable home, she was left emotionally tethered to an abusive man who steadily increased her level of dependence on him. Soon he convinced her to move in with him, at which point he took over her finances, drugged her, raped her and eventually, she says, pimped her out to other men. By the time Colleen was 18, she was being flown as far as London, Amsterdam and Mexico to visit clients. Hamilton Spectator, A4

 Communities honour murdered aboriginal women

The territorial government is providing $37,000 to help Yukoners take part in activities to honour missing and murdered aboriginal women and provide support for their families. Through one of the supported projects, called Honouring Our Sisters, Yukoners have created 39 moccasin tops to complement the Walking With Our Sisters exhibition which opened at the Kwanlin Dün Cultural Centre on April 11. It will end Saturday. Whitehorse Daily Star, 11

 Rehtaeh Parsons' father has little faith in DND probe - Fears 'slap on the wrist' over attempted smear campaign

The father of Rehtaeh Parsons says he's not sure whether the individual who used Defence Department computers to try to post offensive comments online about his dead daughter will face any punishment. "You lose your faith after a while," said Glen Canning, who had served in the military. "It might be a slap on the wrist, which I think is unfortunate." The military police investigation into the use of the computers and the alleged involvement of a member of the Canadian Forces is now finished. It will be up to the military member's commanding officer to determine whether he faces any consequences. Ottawa lawyer Michel Drapeau, who specializes in military law, said the decision to turn the case over to the commanding officer, and refusal to provide any details to the public, indicates the individual might face only administrative action. "He may be talked to by the commanding officer and told not to do it again," said Drapeau. "But we'll never know." Parsons committed suicide in 2013. She killed herself after a student distributed a photo of Parsons, then 15, vomiting during a sexual act at a party in 2011. Her parents say she was subjected to intense bullying after the photo was circulated. Ottawa Citizen, D4

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

NIL

OTHER / AUTRE

NIL

INTERNATIONAL

Nepal earthquake: Hundreds die, many feared trapped

Hundreds of people are known to have died in a powerful earthquake that struck Nepal, with many more feared trapped under rubble, officials say. The quake measured 7.8 and struck an area between the capital Kathmandu and the city of Pokhara, the US Geological Survey said. Tremors were felt across the region, as far afield as Pakistan, Bangladesh and neighbouring India. A Nepali minister said there had been "massive damage" at the epicentre. "We need support from the various international agencies which are more knowledgeable and equipped to handle the kind of emergency we face now," said Information Minister Minendra Rijal. A national police spokesman told the BBC that 565 people had been killed across the country. Rescuers are digging through the rubble of collapsed buildings in Kathmandu trying to reach survivors. BBC News

Rogue bankers atop most wanted list - Government seek help to have suspects found, returned to China

From 'Lord Ringtone' to a banker accused of authorizing $1.6 billion US in illegal loans, China's list of most-wanted fugitives offers an illustrated guide to the Communist Party's breathtaking variety of official graft. The online rogue's gallery of 100 top overseas corruption suspects was released by Chinese authorities to pressure other governments to help track down and return them. The list includes Li Xiangdong, who is accused of taking bribes while running China Mobile Ltd.'s regional digital music and ringtone business in Sichuan and absconding to Canada... Canada, with 26 former officials, was the second-most popular destination for fugitives on the list, which was released by the Ministry of Public Security and the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, the Communist Party's graftbusting agency. New Zealand was third, with as many as 20. Bloomberg (Calgary Herald, C12)

 Statue of Liberty evacuated following bomb threat - Park Service says everyone is safe

The Statue of Liberty was evacuated as a precaution Friday after a bomb threat, forcing hundreds of tourists to be herded off the New York island. A caller made the threat late Friday morning, "stating they were going to blow up the Statue of Liberty," the National Park Service said in a statement. Federal police, including two canine units, investigated and the dogs found "an area of interest" in a locker area at the statue's base, the agency said. Law enforcement then decided to evacuate the island. Nothing harmful was found in the lockers, according to New York Police Department spokesman Steve David, but the bomb squad continued sweeping the area Friday afternoon as a precaution. Statue Cruises, which operates the ferries that carry tourists to the Statue of Liberty National Monument and Ellis Island, said officials found a suspicious package at Liberty Island. Associated Press (Cape Breton Post)

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à: [PS.PSPMediaCentre-
CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca](mailto:PS.PSPMediaCentre-CentredesmediasPSP.SP@ps-sp.gc.ca).*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
June 27, 2015 / le 27 juin 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Le ministre Blaney «dégoûté» par les attentats

Le ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, a condamné les différents attentats terroristes survenus dans le monde, hier, et appelé les Canadiens à faire preuve de prudence sans toutefois se laisser intimider. «Je suis choqué et dégoûté par la cruauté et la barbarie primaire dont font preuve ces terroristes-là. C'est absolument dégoûtant de voir les atrocités qu'ils sont prêts à commettre en étant sous l'emprise de leur idéologie extrémiste», a réagi le ministre. «La menace est sérieuse et réelle, et on doit demeurer vigilant», a-t-il ajouté sans dire si l'alerte de sécurité nationale avait été rehaussée au pays. «Je laisse le soin aux experts en matière de sécurité nationale d'évaluer la menace, et j'ai l'assurance bien sûr [...] que tous les dispositifs et les mesures sont pris pour ajuster le niveau de sécurité en fonction de la menace, et ça se fait de façon permanente», a-t-il indiqué. En pleine période estivale et à l'approche du 1er juillet, M. Blaney encourage d'ailleurs les gens à prendre part aux festivités de la fête du Canada. «J'ai l'intention de participer aux activités auxquelles je m'adonne le 1er juillet. On ne se laissera pas intimider, mais évidemment on ne doit pas prendre des risques qui ne sont pas nécessaires. Je parle surtout des gens qui sont à l'extérieur du pays», a-t-il dit. Le Journal de Québec, 30

Un des deux fugitifs abattu

Richard Matt, l'un des deux évadés de la prison de Dannemora recherchés depuis près de trois semaines, a été tué par un policier hier après-midi, dans le comté de Franklin, dans l'État de New York, ont confirmé les autorités. Même si Richard Matt a été abattu, les inquiétudes pour la sécurité publique ne se sont pas complètement dissipées puisque David Sweat, son complice, n'a toujours pas été re-

trouvé. L'homme pourrait cependant choisir le Canada comme prochaine destination. Pour sa part, la Gendarmerie royale du Canada n'a pas reçu de «menace» particulière en ce qui concerne ce secteur, mais elle demeure en communication constante avec les corps policiers concernés, a indiqué le gendarme Eriq Gasse. Même son de cloche du côté de la Sûreté du Québec, qui continue à recueillir les informations du public pour en-suite les transférer à la GRC. L'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada poursuit quant à elle ses contrôles aux frontières. Dans l'éventualité où Sweat se déplace toujours à pied, il n'aurait besoin que de quatre heures pour se rendre jusqu'à la frontière canadienne. Seulement 20 kilomètres séparent Malone de Beith, la municipalité québécoise la plus près de la frontière. Les autorités croient que le fugitif se déplace la nuit. «Le Canada ne sera pas un refuge pour les criminels violents et les terroristes», a indiqué Jean-Christophe de Le Rue, porte-parole du ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile, Steven Blaney. Agence QMI (Le Journal de Québec, 9; Le Journal de Montréal)

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Worries over fish, water supply and fires grow

Environmental concerns are rising along with the soaring temperatures in British Columbia, where a heat wave has generated worries about forest fires, water supplies and fish habitats. The warm, dry spring has also raised the alarm for forest fires. Fire crews are still battling major blazes near Pemberton, Norman Lake and Lytton, and the Prince George Fire Centre responded to 15 new fires that started on Thursday alone, all sparked by lightning. B.C.'s Wildfire Management Branch implemented a campfire ban across the Coastal Fire Centre for today at noon, excluding Haida Gwaii, northern Vancouver Island and the mainland's mid-coast. Canadian Press (Vancouver Sun, A3)

Wildfires force evacuations

Wildfires are forcing about 1,000 people from their homes in northern Saskatchewan. Steve Roberts, executive director of wildfire management for the province, said lightning strikes and hot, dry weather are making conditions volatile. He said a fire burning near three remote communities is of particular concern. "It is now over 500 hectares and it is posing a direct threat to Wadin Bay, Sucker River and English Bay, and we have recommended a full evacuation for those communities," Roberts said Friday. Canadian Press (Calgary Sun, 43)

Ten insurance companies sued for $20 million over 2013 flood claims

A High River-based not-for-profit housing management company is suing 10 insurance companies for $20 million for improperly denying claims on policies relating to damage from the devastating Alberta floods of 2013. Calgary Herald, A8

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

City IS supporter rearrested - 'Nothing more' than bail issue: lawyer

A Winnipeg man who admits he supports the Islamic State was rearrested Friday afternoon. Aaron Driver was taken into custody by police at his Charleswood home because of a complication with a surety that was a condition of his bail, his lawyer, Leonard Tailleux, told the Free Press. Winnipeg Free Press, B1

Snowden leaks eroding spy agency's advantage

Canada's electronic spy agency says leaks by former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden have "diminished the advantage" it enjoyed over terrorists and other targets, both in the short term and -- of more concern -- well into the future. In newly released briefing notes, the Communications Security Establishment says Snowden's disclosures about CSE's intelligence capabilities and those of its allies "have a cumulative detrimental effect" on its operations. The Ottawa-based CSE monitors foreign communications of intelligence interest to Canada, and exchanges a large amount of information with partner agencies in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Canadian Press (London Free Press, B3); La Presse Canadienne (L'Acadie-Nouvelle)

Les documents sur les jeunes radicalisés sous verrou

Le Collège de Maisonneuve refuse de divulguer des rapports et des courriels internes sur des cas d'étudiants radicalisés qui ont voulu quitter leurs études et leurs familles pour rejoindre l'État islamique. Notre Bureau d'enquête a déposé une demande auprès du cégep montréalais pour une série de documents internes du mois de mai en vertu de la Loi d'accès à l'information du Québec. Nous avons fait cette demande après que l'institution collégiale fut ébranlée à plusieurs reprises depuis février par une série de 11 départs et des tentatives de départs de ses étudiants qui désiraient quitter le Canada pour aller faire le djihad, selon les autorités. Le collège de Maisonneuve a aussi refusé de divulguer tout rapport sur les activités d'Adil Charkaoui sur le campus, disant que le document en entier contient "une opinion juridique", des "avis et des recommandations". Le Journal de Montréal, 10

Why using anonymous sources is sometimes necessary

An opinion piece states, "Last week, a reader in Toronto raised an important point about the use of anonymous sources in an article on what he called "allegations of improper influence of Chinese officials over Ontario Minister Michael Chan." In fact, many of you may see the phrase "sources say" in stories from time to time, and wonder what it actually means. Who are these sources and how do we know they are telling the truth? ... The story about Mr. Chan was unassailably in the public interest. He is a senior cabinet minister and the article involved questions of undue influence by a foreign state that had been raised by the head of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). Something so important requires a thorough investigation, not just an official response from the Premier, who called the concerns "baseless." Mr. Chan calls the stories and the concerns expressed by CSIS ludicrous and has demanded a retraction and apology. (China is Ontario's second-largest trading partner and, since the allegations first surfaced, he has been promoted to oversee the international trade portfolio.) ... I have received no complaints about the facts in The Globe's articles. While it would be helpful (although unlikely) to hear more from the head of CSIS on why they raised their concerns, readers will get a better understanding about CSIS in recent Globe commentary written by Charles Burton, associate professor of political science at Brock University and a former counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Beijing. "We know that there has been a high frequency of telephone calls between Mr. Chan and China's Consul-General in Toronto," he observed. "If the Government of Canada knows what they were talking about, it is withholding this information for security reasons. But it is unlikely that CSIS would have approached the Premier of Ontario with its concerns ... unless there was something that seriously concerned our people who monitor the activities of Chinese diplomats in Canada." ... " Globe and Mail, F8

Terrorists aren't all alike: expert - Mental illness wrongly cited

An opinion piece states, "If you were surprised initially someone such as Aaron Driver, who grew up in a Canadian military family and now lives in our midst, ended up becoming an outspoken supporter of the Islamic State, permit me to introduce an authority on the subject. Michael German is an expert in terrorist-group behaviour, a former counter-terrorism instructor at the FBI National Academy, former legal counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union and now a law school fellow. He's also the author of Thinking Like a Terrorist: Insights of a Former FBI Undercover Agent... And so it was that earlier this week I contacted German in his office at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University. I wanted to know: who are the Aaron Drivers of this world? What's the profile of these kids? "They're not all kids," German said... So what does that say about profiling terrorists. "There are no profiles." Basically, he believes, it's beyond explanation. "But what we have to be careful about is making sure we're talking about the violent extreme, rather than the ideology writ large. Because there are far more people who have those ideologies than commit violence." Which brought me to Aaron Driver, the 23-year-old online supporter of IS arrested earlier this month without criminal charges under Canada's anti-terrorism law and released with stringent bail conditions imposed because of his views. Unfortunately, German suggested, Canada appears to be following America's misguided footsteps. "Here in the United States we've seen this abuse of material support laws where it's not really targeting people who are supporting terrorism but rather people who are supporting political causes where there is a terrorism element to that conflict." German was reluctant to offer more insight about the Driver case because, being a former law enforcement officer himself, he knows the RCMP and CSIS know more about the case than the information he gets through the media..." Winnipeg Free Press, B1

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

* La police abat un prisonnier

L'un des deux meurtriers qui s'étaient évadés d'une prison du nord de l'État de New York il y a trois semaines a été abattu hier au cours d'un échange de coups de feu avec la police dans un secteur boisé situé à environ 50 kilomètres de la prison. Le second fugitif est toujours en fuite. Le sénateur Charles Schumer, qui a été informé par la patrouille frontalière et le Service des douanes américain, a déclaré que Richard Matt avait été atteint mortellement par un agent de la patrouille frontalière américaine originaire du Vermont. Des officiers parcourent en ce moment la zone où ils croient que David Sweat se cache, pas très loin d'où son complice a été tué. Les routes du secteur ont été bloquées. Le sénateur Schumer a affirmé que les forces de l'ordre ont été averties de leur position grâce à l'appel au 911 d'une femme qui a entendu quelqu'un frapper à sa porte tôt hier matin à Malone, qui est située à environ 50 kilomètres à l'ouest de l'établissement correctionnel Clinton. Quelque 1100 membres des forces de l'ordre sont mobilisés pour retrouver les meurtriers en cavale. Des agents de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada ont patrouillé les secteurs situés entre les postes frontaliers, selon un porte-parole de l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada, Dominique McNeely. Associated Press (La Voix de l'Est, 19); The Associated Press (The Gazette); AFP (La Tribune); * New York Times (Hamilton Spectator)

Stay out of Canada, eh!

With his partner shot dead and police right on his tail, escaped killer David Sweat may be trying harder than ever to get to Canada, but he certainly won't have an easy time of it. Richard Matt was killed by police Friday after a three-week manhunt for the escaped maximum-security prisoners. Sweat was still on the loose Friday. Earlier in the day, police said they believed the pair was headed toward Canada. Even if he's armed -- as police believed he might be -- Sweat will need all the luck he can get to cross the St. Lawrence River, if that's the route he chooses to take. The area is actually watched more than most due to its history of cigarette smuggling. Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, 22)

Canadian solar module makers call for duties

A band of small Canadian solar panel manufacturers is banking on an upcoming trade decision in hopes of surviving an onslaught of low-priced Chinese imports. The four Ontario companies say they hope a decision next week by Canada's International Trade Tribunal will uphold duties on imports they say are priced below the Chinese companies' actual cost of production. An investigation by Canada Border Services Agency alleged in early June that about half a dozen Chinese companies, and a China-based subsidiary of Canadian Solar International Inc., were benefiting to varying degrees from government subsidies - in contravention of World Trade Organization agreements. Canadian Solar International, a Nasdaq-listed company based in Guelph, Ont., declined to comment prior to a report from the trade tribunal, to be released by July 3, that will determine whether the CBSA can continue to charge provisional duties set in March. The law firm acting for most of the Chinese companies didn't respond to requests for comment. Canadian Press (National Post, FP4)

* Legally bought, but can they be legally carried?

The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary is advising the public that a type of card knife being sold online and in a retail store in this province is a prohibited weapon. The card knife - when the blade isn't open - simply looks like a credit card. After unfolding the small, sharp blade upwards and locking it into place, it becomes a knife with a metal blade and plastic hilt. What's even more confusing is that Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) considers such things to be multi-tool items and not weapons at all, despite actually qualifying as prohibited. The RNC says with those objects discretion is used when it comes to confiscation and instances of people carrying them would be looked at on a case-by-case basis. Police say if anybody has a prohibited weapon they'd like to turn over, they can call the RNC or RCMP, advise them that they wish to surrender it and they will collect it with no questions asked. The Telegram, A4

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

Cybersecurity fund boosted by a rise in data breaches

A new exchange-traded fund that taps into the cybersecurity market has skyrocketed to $1-billion (U.S.) in assets under management in just seven months. With the crafty ticker name HACK, the PureFunds ISE Cyber Security ETF mimics the ISE Cyber Security Index, which tracks the performance of companies actively engaged in providing services for cybersecurity and for which cybersecurity business activities are a key driver of their business model. The rise in data breaches among banks, large retailers and even government offices is creating a necessary investment into enhanced cybersecurity technology, says Andrew Chanin, CEO of PureFunds and portfolio manager of HACK. Globe and Mail, B11

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

* Victim was covered in blood from stab wounds, Mountie tells court

One of the first police officers on the scene of a stabbing on Westmorland Street last fall said the victim was a mess. "He was covered in blood, his face was covered in blood and his upper lip was sliced open," testified Codiac RCMP Const. Tom Graham in Moncton provincial court on Friday. "It was hard to see who this person was, there was so much blood." Graham said he got down on the ground and put pressure on the stab wounds, he got a better look at the man's face and recognized him as 43-year-old Allan Christopher Lee. The victim had been arrested for drug offences over the years, which is how Graham recognized him. "I held his hand, he was scared and said he didn't want to die," said the constable. Graham also testified that Lee pulled him close and told him David Hart is the one who stabbed him. Times & Transcript, A7

* Police association won't pursue complaint over misappropriation

The New Brunswick Police Association has opted not to file a complaint with the RCMP against a member of the Fredericton Police Force. Association president Dean Secord said on Friday that the matter has been handled internally and is now being dealt with under the Police Act. Daily Gleaner, A1

* Dozens of charges laid against four after big drug bust

More than eight litres of GHB, an odourless, colourless, tasteless liquid commonly called the "daterape drug" was seized from a northeast Edmonton home last week. The 8.5-litre seizure of gamma-Hydroxybutyric acid, or GHB, was the largest bust of that drug by the Alberta Law Enforcement Response Teams and resulted in the arrest of four people. A total of 44 charges were laid against the quartet, relating to drugs, guns, stolen property and breaches. ALERT Edmonton, a team of Alberta Sheriffs, Edmonton police and RCMP members, seized GHB, 47 grams of methamphetamine, illicit prescription pills, ammunition and $16,110 in cash from the home. Edmonton Journal, A12

* Mountie charged with stealing guns

A Manitoba Mountie is facing several criminal charges, including theft of guns from a detachment. RCMP allege Cpl. Jason Prettie of Dauphin was working in Minnedosa when two weapons were stolen in 2009. A spokeswoman says the rifle and shotgun were not police-issue and had been in RCMP custody. Red Deer Advocate, A5

* Source of bomb threat still up in the air

Royal Newfoundland Constabulary Const. Steve Curnew says there's a lot of leg work to be done after a major disruption at St. John's International Airport Thursday night due to a bomb threat. It was about 7 p.m. Thursday evening when police were notified of the bomb threat onboard Air Canada Flight 143 departing for Ottawa. "Just as it was about to pull away from the gate, one of the flight crew noticed and found a note that was located in the washroom onboard the flight," says Curnew. The discovery of that letter led to the immediate evacuation of the airplane and the shutdown of the airport. Chris Andrews of the band Shanneyganock was onboard the plane where the note was found, along with the rest of the band - they were on their way to Edmonton for a gig. "We knew it was something, because they never get you off a plane that fast," Andrews told The Telegram Friday morning from Toronto, from where the band was still hoping to make it their Edmonton gig. An explosive disposal unit and a bomb detecting dog from the RCMP searched the plane. Nothing suspicious was located. The Telegram, A3; The Telegram

* Disparus, mais jamais oubliés

Pas moins de 12 000 disparitions sont signalées chaque année au Québec. Une cinquantaine d'entre elles ne sont pas résolues. Ces affaires ne sont jamais fermées. Au contraire. Le Service des projets d'enquêtes spécialisées de la Sûreté du Québec, qui coordonne ces investigations à l'échelle provinciale, travaille avec acharnement pour dénouer l'impasse. Chaque année, 12 000 disparitions sont rapportées dans la province. Les premières heures sont cruciales. Les policiers et les enquêteurs du service de police où la disparition est signalée doivent agir rapidement. Les statistiques démontrent que dans 74 % des cas, une personne est localisée en moins de sept jours. Après 60 jours et une fois que toutes les pistes et techniques d'enquête ont été épuisées, la disparition est classée non résolue et transférée à l'équipe spécialisée. La photo du disparu est alors publiée sur le site de la SQ et de la Gendarmerie Royale du Canada. La Voix de l'Est, 2

 Man sentenced for making threats to former premier

Brian Derek Perry was back before the court again this week accused of threatening former Premier Tom Marshall, but this time he accepted responsibility. He pleaded guilty to a number of charges and was sentenced to five months house arrest. The 59-year-old Frenchman's Cove man has been charged with harassing and threatening a number of politicians over the years, including Marshall on a number of occasions. Perry's crusade against politicians dates back over a couple of decades when he claims he lost his nightclub business as a result of the allowance of unlicensed liquor sales he could not compete with. Facing new charges Friday, Perry pleaded guilty to harassing Marshall via telephone repeatedly since 2009. He did so despite a court order to not contact him, directly or indirectly. The Corner Brook RCMP received the latest complaint from Marshall Sunday. TC Media (The Telegram, A10)

 Shooting may be targeted

Police say two men in their 20s were taken to hospital after an overnight shooting in Surrey. Residents reported hearing gunshots in their neighbourhood at about 1 a.m. Friday, and RCMP arrived to find the two wounded men. Both victims are expected to survive. Officers say one of the men is known to police and the attack appears to have been targeted. Police are looking for three to four suspects who are all described as men in their early 20s. Investigators say the shooting has not been linked to more than a dozen others involving a gang turf war over drugs. Vancouver Sun, A5

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

 Dying Collins waits for 'compassionate' parole hearing

Correctional Service Canada (CSC) has sent the case of Peter Collins to the federal parole board for an early hearing to decide if he'll be released after 32 years in prison. It will be the sixth time he has stood before the parole board in the past seven years. Ottawa Citizen, C3

 Final Confession

In September 1984, after being found guilty of murdering a Nepean police officer in cold blood, Peter Collins refused to stand in court to be sentenced. "I don't want to," a defiant Collins told Judge Nicholson McRae, who imposed the automatic penalty of life in prison. The sentence meant Collins would not be eligible for parole until Oct. 14, 2008 - 25 years to the day after he confronted Nepean Police Const. David Utman in Bayshore Shopping Centre and shot him dead in front of a horrified lunch hour crowd. The 53-year-old, one of Canada's longest-serving prisoners, has been diagnosed with terminal bladder cancer. In January, after chemotherapy and radiation, he was told the cancer had spread to his abdominal wall, lungs and spine. His only treatment now is palliative. Supporters are lobbying for his compassionate release from Bath Institution, near Kingston, so that he can die among family and friends. Utman's relatives, however, are dead set against parole. "I think they should keep him there until he expires," Utman's brother, Stan, said in a phone interview from his home in Moose Jaw, Sask. The Bath Institution, west of Kingston, is a medium-security federal penitentiary on the windswept north shore of Lake Ontario. It has been Collins's home for the past 16 years. He lives in what's known as N-house: a communitystyle building with a shared kitchen. He has a key to his own cell and, when he's up to it, can cook his own meals. It's a far cry from the special handling unit at Millhaven Penitentiary where he spent the first three years of his sentence. Collins was placed in the high-security unit because of his escape history. His cell featured a bed and desk welded to one another and a window covered with two sheets of steel. Light seeped in through small, nickel-sized holes punched into the metal. Ottawa Citizen, C1

Brutal killer to be given day passes

It was a warm summer night when Debbie Timlock curled up in her bed, never realizing someone was out there, watching. As the 33-year-old murder victim slept, she didn't hear him knock over the plant as he crawled through the kitchen window. She didn't hear him open the kitchen drawer to pull out a butcher knife. She didn't hear him slowly padding down the hall to her bedroom. "At first, I wanted to scare the hell out of her," her killer, James Brown, told a court in one of his bids to get early parole. But as he walked toward her bedroom with knife in hand, he changed his mind. That was June 20, 1989. In 1992, after a lengthy trial, Brown was convicted by a jury of first-degree murder and sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole for 25 years. Now, at the age of 49, the Parole Board of Canada is preparing Brown -- a former bouncer with a long violent criminal record -- for his eventual release back into society with several unescorted passes from prison during the next year. Toronto Sun, 4

 Court of Appeal to rule on Mr. Big case

Citing a recent case by the Supreme Court of Canada focusing on "Mr. Big" police stings, legal counsel for George Mitchell Allgood urged the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal to order a new trial. While lawyers debated the issue, Allgood, now 51, sat quietly and took occasional notes inside a room at the Saskatchewan Penitentiary in Prince Albert where he is serving a life sentence with no parole eligibility for 25 years. Allgood - who appeared in court Friday by video link - was found guilty in January 2014 of first-degree murder in the fatal shooting of his son's mother Susan Reinhardt and the attempted murder of her partner, David Ristow. The incident occurred on July 15, 2006, at the Saskatoon home of Reinhardt and Ristow. The couple was shot through an open patio door in the bedroom while they slept, Queen's Bench Justice Grant Currie determined in finding Allgood guilty. On Friday, Allgood's legal team - Morris Bodnar and Scott Giroux - asked the province's highest court to overturn Currie's findings and send the case back to trial. Giroux referred to a number of inconsistencies between evidence heard at trial and statements made by Allgood to a member of the RCMP posing as a crime boss. But it was the fact that police had undertaken that type of operation - known as a "Mr. Big" sting - and that the resulting admissions by Allgood were allowed into evidence that the Saskatoon man's lawyers found most problematic, given new case law in the area. Leader-Post, A7

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

Siksika chief moved by apology

Chief Vincent Yellow Old Woman was proudly wearing his ceremonial headdress when he sat in the gallery at the legislature in Edmonton last week to hear Rachel Notley's NDP government offer an apology to Alberta's aboriginal people for the decades of physical, sexual and cultural abuse at residential schools. The government apologized last week for its past silence on the damage done by residential schools and added its voice to calls for a federal inquiry into missing and murdered indigenous women. As well, Notley noted the "devastating link" between the high number of missing and murdered aboriginal women and issues of poverty and domestic violence, adding her voice to national calls for an inquiry. Calgary Herald, A8

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

9 senior staffers take up new jobs

The senior ranks of the federal government are getting a shakeup as nine long-serving bureaucrats are set to take new positions in July. Linda Lizotte-MacPherson will become president of the Canada Border Services Agency, leaving her current post as president of the Canada School of Public Service. She fills the position left open by outgoing border services president Luc Portelance, who is retiring after 36 years in public service. John Ossowski, currently associate deputy minister of public safety, will become deputy commissioner of revenue. Gina Wilson, currently associate deputy minister of employment and social development, will replace Ossowski as associate deputy minister of public safety. Ottawa Citizen, A10

OTHER / AUTRE

* Extremism runs wild on the web

Once on the path to violent extremism, there is no end to what would-be terrorists can find online to solidify their beliefs. It's all just a few clicks away. While it remains unclear just how connected Friday's trio of terror attacks are to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, there is no arguing that the group has made it maddeningly simple for sympathizers worldwide to take up the extremists' cause. It takes about 30 seconds to create a Twitter account and connect to someone in Syria. And as one journalist in France found out, expressing an interest in ISIL on Facebook quickly leads to a flood of information as the service's algorithms suggest similar sites and friends with the same interests. A constant stream of beheadings and images of children with guns soon starts to seem normal. ISIL has put out a guide to travelling to the territory it controls, as well as information on how to be a jihadi in the West, complete with training on toy Nerf guns, making pressure-cooker bombs and stealing money from infidels. The Gazette (National Post, A4)

Still unclear if any Canadians among Tunisia victims

The Foreign Affairs department says its officials in Tunisia are trying to determine whether any Canadians are among the dozens killed in a fearsome terrorist attack. A gunman fired on sunbathers at a beach near two hotels in the Tunisian coastal resort city of Sousse. The department says 826 Canadians were known to be in Tunisia. Calgary Sun, 16; La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit)

INTERNATIONAL

Terrorists strike three locations

Called to arms by the leadership of the Sunni extremist group known as Islamic State, three lone terrorists struck Friday at sensitive first-time targets in Europe, North Africa and the Persian Gulf. They succeeded in killing more than 60 people - the majority of whom were Westerners - and raised new fears about the growing reach of jihadis. In Tunisia, a gunman unknown to police pulled a Kalashnikov from inside a beach umbrella and opened fire on sun-worshipping Europeans, killing at least 37, before he was killed by security forces. It was the deadliest assault on tourists in the Arab World since the 1997 attack at the ancient Egyptian site of Luxor, when terrorists killed 62 people. In France, a truck driver with suspected ties to Islamist extremists crashed his vehicle into an industrial chemical plant near Lyon, apparently hoping to trigger a large explosion. The decapitated body of the driver's boss was found at the scene, his head on a gate post, reportedly framed by Islamist banners. In Kuwait, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside a large Shia mosque during Friday noon prayers, killing at least 27 and wounding more than 200. The blast, in downtown Kuwait City, was just 30 kilometres from where 600 Canadian troops are based, conducting an air campaign against Islamic State forces in Iraq and Syria. Globe and Mail, A3; Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, 16); National Post; La Presse; La Presse; Toronto Star; * La Presse

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

Daily Media Summary / Revue de presse quotidienne
Public Safety Canada / Sécurité publique Canada
June 27, 2015 / le 27 juin 2015

The Daily Media Summary can also be accessed through Newsdesk / La Revue de presse quotidienne peut également être accédée via InfoMédia

MINISTER / MINISTRE

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

OTHER / AUTRE

INTERNATIONAL

MINISTER / MINISTRE

Le ministre Blaney «dégoûté» par les attentats

Le ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique, Steven Blaney, a condamné les différents attentats terroristes survenus dans le monde, hier, et appelé les Canadiens à faire preuve de prudence sans toutefois se laisser intimider. «Je suis choqué et dégoûté par la cruauté et la barbarie primaire dont font preuve ces terroristes-là. C'est absolument dégoûtant de voir les atrocités qu'ils sont prêts à commettre en étant sous l'emprise de leur idéologie extrémiste», a réagi le ministre. «La menace est sérieuse et réelle, et on doit demeurer vigilant», a-t-il ajouté sans dire si l'alerte de sécurité nationale avait été rehaussée au pays. «Je laisse le soin aux experts en matière de sécurité nationale d'évaluer la menace, et j'ai l'assurance bien sûr [...] que tous les dispositifs et les mesures sont pris pour ajuster le niveau de sécurité en fonction de la menace, et ça se fait de façon permanente», a-t-il indiqué. En pleine période estivale et à l'approche du 1^{er} juillet, M. Blaney encourage d'ailleurs les gens à prendre part aux festivités de la fête du Canada. «J'ai l'intention de participer aux activités auxquelles je m'adonne le 1^{er} juillet. On ne se laissera pas intimider, mais évidemment on ne doit pas prendre des risques qui ne sont pas nécessaires. Je parle surtout des gens qui sont à l'extérieur du pays», a-t-il dit. Le Journal de Québec, 30

Un des deux fugitifs abattu

Richard Matt, l'un des deux évadés de la prison de Dannemora recherchés depuis près de trois semaines, a été tué par un policier hier après-midi, dans le comté de Franklin, dans l'État de New York, ont confirmé les autorités. Même si Richard Matt a été abattu, les inquiétudes pour la sécurité publique ne se sont pas complètement dissipées puisque David Sweat, son complice, n'a toujours pas été re-

trouvé. L'homme pourrait cependant choisir le Canada comme prochaine destination. Pour sa part, la Gendarmerie royale du Canada n'a pas reçu de «menace» particulière en ce qui concerne ce secteur, mais elle demeure en communication constante avec les corps policiers concernés, a indiqué le gendarme Eriq Gasse. Même son de cloche du côté de la Sûreté du Québec, qui continue à recueillir les informations du public pour en-suite les transférer à la GRC. L'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada poursuit quant à elle ses contrôles aux frontières. Dans l'éventualité où Sweat se déplace toujours à pied, il n'aurait besoin que de quatre heures pour se rendre jusqu'à la frontière canadienne. Seulement 20 kilomètres séparent Malone de Beith, la municipalité québécoise la plus près de la frontière. Les autorités croient que le fugitif se déplace la nuit. «Le Canada ne sera pas un refuge pour les criminels violents et les terroristes», a indiqué Jean-Christophe de Le Rue, porte-parole du ministre fédéral de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile, Steven Blaney. Agence QMI (Le Journal de Québec, 9; Le Journal de Montréal)

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT / GESTION DES MESURES D'URGENCE

Worries over fish, water supply and fires grow

Environmental concerns are rising along with the soaring temperatures in British Columbia, where a heat wave has generated worries about forest fires, water supplies and fish habitats. The warm, dry spring has also raised the alarm for forest fires. Fire crews are still battling major blazes near Pemberton, Norman Lake and Lytton, and the Prince George Fire Centre responded to 15 new fires that started on Thursday alone, all sparked by lightning. B.C.'s Wildfire Management Branch implemented a campfire ban across the Coastal Fire Centre for today at noon, excluding Haida Gwaii, northern Vancouver Island and the mainland's mid-coast. Canadian Press (Vancouver Sun, A3)

Wildfires force evacuations

Wildfires are forcing about 1,000 people from their homes in northern Saskatchewan. Steve Roberts, executive director of wildfire management for the province, said lightning strikes and hot, dry weather are making conditions volatile. He said a fire burning near three remote communities is of particular concern. "It is now over 500 hectares and it is posing a direct threat to Wadin Bay, Sucker River and English Bay, and we have recommended a full evacuation for those communities," Roberts said Friday. Canadian Press (Calgary Sun, 43)

Ten insurance companies sued for $20 million over 2013 flood claims

A High River-based not-for-profit housing management company is suing 10 insurance companies for $20 million for improperly denying claims on policies relating to damage from the devastating Alberta floods of 2013. Calgary Herald, A8

NATIONAL SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ NATIONALE

City IS supporter rearrested - 'Nothing more' than bail issue: lawyer

A Winnipeg man who admits he supports the Islamic State was rearrested Friday afternoon. Aaron Driver was taken into custody by police at his Charleswood home because of a complication with a surety that was a condition of his bail, his lawyer, Leonard Tailleux, told the Free Press. Winnipeg Free Press, B1

Snowden leaks eroding spy agency's advantage

Canada's electronic spy agency says leaks by former U.S. intelligence contractor Edward Snowden have "diminished the advantage" it enjoyed over terrorists and other targets, both in the short term and -- of more concern -- well into the future. In newly released briefing notes, the Communications Security Establishment says Snowden's disclosures about CSE's intelligence capabilities and those of its allies "have a cumulative detrimental effect" on its operations. The Ottawa-based CSE monitors foreign communications of intelligence interest to Canada, and exchanges a large amount of information with partner agencies in the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand. Canadian Press (London Free Press, B3); La Presse Canadienne (L'Acadie-Nouvelle)

Les documents sur les jeunes radicalisés sous verrou

Le Collège de Maisonneuve refuse de divulguer des rapports et des courriels internes sur des cas d'étudiants radicalisés qui ont voulu quitter leurs études et leurs familles pour rejoindre l'État islamique. Notre Bureau d'enquête a déposé une demande auprès du cégep montréalais pour une série de documents internes du mois de mai en vertu de la Loi d'accès à l'information du Québec. Nous avons fait cette demande après que l'institution collégiale fut ébranlée à plusieurs reprises depuis février par une série de 11 départs et des tentatives de départs de ses étudiants qui désiraient quitter le Canada pour aller faire le djihad, selon les autorités. Le collège de Maisonneuve a aussi refusé de divulguer tout rapport sur les activités d'Adil Charkaoui sur le campus, disant que le document en entier contient "une opinion juridique", des "avis et des recommandations". Le Journal de Montréal, 10

Why using anonymous sources is sometimes necessary

An opinion piece states, "Last week, a reader in Toronto raised an important point about the use of anonymous sources in an article on what he called "allegations of improper influence of Chinese officials over Ontario Minister Michael Chan." In fact, many of you may see the phrase "sources say" in stories from time to time, and wonder what it actually means. Who are these sources and how do we know they are telling the truth? ... The story about Mr. Chan was unassailably in the public interest. He is a senior cabinet minister and the article involved questions of undue influence by a foreign state that had been raised by the head of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). Something so important requires a thorough investigation, not just an official response from the Premier, who called the concerns "baseless." Mr. Chan calls the stories and the concerns expressed by CSIS ludicrous and has demanded a retraction and apology. (China is Ontario's second-largest trading partner and, since the allegations first surfaced, he has been promoted to oversee the international trade portfolio.) ... I have received no complaints about the facts in The Globe's articles. While it would be helpful (although unlikely) to hear more from the head of CSIS on why they raised their concerns, readers will get a better understanding about CSIS in recent Globe commentary written by Charles Burton, associate professor of political science at Brock University and a former counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Beijing. "We know that there has been a high frequency of telephone calls between Mr. Chan and China's Consul-General in Toronto," he observed. "If the Government of Canada knows what they were talking about, it is withholding this information for security reasons. But it is unlikely that CSIS would have approached the Premier of Ontario with its concerns ... unless there was something that seriously concerned our people who monitor the activities of Chinese diplomats in Canada." ... " Globe and Mail, F8

Terrorists aren't all alike: expert - Mental illness wrongly cited

An opinion piece states, "If you were surprised initially someone such as Aaron Driver, who grew up in a Canadian military family and now lives in our midst, ended up becoming an outspoken supporter of the Islamic State, permit me to introduce an authority on the subject. Michael German is an expert in terrorist-group behaviour, a former counter-terrorism instructor at the FBI National Academy, former legal counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union and now a law school fellow. He's also the author of Thinking Like a Terrorist: Insights of a Former FBI Undercover Agent... And so it was that earlier this week I contacted German in his office at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University. I wanted to know: who are the Aaron Drivers of this world? What's the profile of these kids? "They're not all kids," German said... So what does that say about profiling terrorists. "There are no profiles." Basically, he believes, it's beyond explanation. "But what we have to be careful about is making sure we're talking about the violent extreme, rather than the ideology writ large. Because there are far more people who have those ideologies than commit violence." Which brought me to Aaron Driver, the 23-year-old online supporter of IS arrested earlier this month without criminal charges under Canada's anti-terrorism law and released with stringent bail conditions imposed because of his views. Unfortunately, German suggested, Canada appears to be following America's misguided footsteps. "Here in the United States we've seen this abuse of material support laws where it's not really targeting people who are supporting terrorism but rather people who are supporting political causes where there is a terrorism element to that conflict." German was reluctant to offer more insight about the Driver case because, being a former law enforcement officer himself, he knows the RCMP and CSIS know more about the case than the information he gets through the media..." Winnipeg Free Press, B1

BORDER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ FRONTALIÈRE

* La police abat un prisonnier

L'un des deux meurtriers qui s'étaient évadés d'une prison du nord de l'État de New York il y a trois semaines a été abattu hier au cours d'un échange de coups de feu avec la police dans un secteur boisé situé à environ 50 kilomètres de la prison. Le second fugitif est toujours en fuite. Le sénateur Charles Schumer, qui a été informé par la patrouille frontalière et le Service des douanes américain, a déclaré que Richard Matt avait été atteint mortellement par un agent de la patrouille frontalière américaine originaire du Vermont. Des officiers parcourent en ce moment la zone où ils croient que David Sweat se cache, pas très loin d'où son complice a été tué. Les routes du secteur ont été bloquées. Le sénateur Schumer a affirmé que les forces de l'ordre ont été averties de leur position grâce à l'appel au 911 d'une femme qui a entendu quelqu'un frapper à sa porte tôt hier matin à Malone, qui est située à environ 50 kilomètres à l'ouest de l'établissement correctionnel Clinton. Quelque 1100 membres des forces de l'ordre sont mobilisés pour retrouver les meurtriers en cavale. Des agents de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada ont patrouillé les secteurs situés entre les postes frontaliers, selon un porte-parole de l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada, Dominique McNeely. Associated Press (La Voix de l'Est, 19); The Associated Press (The Gazette); AFP (La Tribune); * New York Times (Hamilton Spectator)

Stay out of Canada, eh!

With his partner shot dead and police right on his tail, escaped killer David Sweat may be trying harder than ever to get to Canada, but he certainly won't have an easy time of it. Richard Matt was killed by police Friday after a three-week manhunt for the escaped maximum-security prisoners. Sweat was still on the loose Friday. Earlier in the day, police said they believed the pair was headed toward Canada. Even if he's armed -- as police believed he might be -- Sweat will need all the luck he can get to cross the St. Lawrence River, if that's the route he chooses to take. The area is actually watched more than most due to its history of cigarette smuggling. Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, 22)

Canadian solar module makers call for duties

A band of small Canadian solar panel manufacturers is banking on an upcoming trade decision in hopes of surviving an onslaught of low-priced Chinese imports. The four Ontario companies say they hope a decision next week by Canada's International Trade Tribunal will uphold duties on imports they say are priced below the Chinese companies' actual cost of production. An investigation by Canada Border Services Agency alleged in early June that about half a dozen Chinese companies, and a China-based subsidiary of Canadian Solar International Inc., were benefiting to varying degrees from government subsidies - in contravention of World Trade Organization agreements. Canadian Solar International, a Nasdaq-listed company based in Guelph, Ont., declined to comment prior to a report from the trade tribunal, to be released by July 3, that will determine whether the CBSA can continue to charge provisional duties set in March. The law firm acting for most of the Chinese companies didn't respond to requests for comment. Canadian Press (National Post, FP4)

* Legally bought, but can they be legally carried?

The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary is advising the public that a type of card knife being sold online and in a retail store in this province is a prohibited weapon. The card knife - when the blade isn't open - simply looks like a credit card. After unfolding the small, sharp blade upwards and locking it into place, it becomes a knife with a metal blade and plastic hilt. What's even more confusing is that Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) considers such things to be multi-tool items and not weapons at all, despite actually qualifying as prohibited. The RNC says with those objects discretion is used when it comes to confiscation and instances of people carrying them would be looked at on a case-by-case basis. Police say if anybody has a prohibited weapon they'd like to turn over, they can call the RNC or RCMP, advise them that they wish to surrender it and they will collect it with no questions asked. The Telegram, A4

CYBER SECURITY / SÉCURITÉ CYBERNÉTIQUE

Cybersecurity fund boosted by a rise in data breaches

A new exchange-traded fund that taps into the cybersecurity market has skyrocketed to $1-billion (U.S.) in assets under management in just seven months. With the crafty ticker name HACK, the PureFunds ISE Cyber Security ETF mimics the ISE Cyber Security Index, which tracks the performance of companies actively engaged in providing services for cybersecurity and for which cybersecurity business activities are a key driver of their business model. The rise in data breaches among banks, large retailers and even government offices is creating a necessary investment into enhanced cybersecurity technology, says Andrew Chanin, CEO of PureFunds and portfolio manager of HACK. Globe and Mail, B11

LAW ENFORCEMENT / APPLICATION DE LA LOI

* Victim was covered in blood from stab wounds, Mountie tells court

One of the first police officers on the scene of a stabbing on Westmorland Street last fall said the victim was a mess. "He was covered in blood, his face was covered in blood and his upper lip was sliced open," testified Codiac RCMP Const. Tom Graham in Moncton provincial court on Friday. "It was hard to see who this person was, there was so much blood." Graham said he got down on the ground and put pressure on the stab wounds, he got a better look at the man's face and recognized him as 43-year-old Allan Christopher Lee. The victim had been arrested for drug offences over the years, which is how Graham recognized him. "I held his hand, he was scared and said he didn't want to die," said the constable. Graham also testified that Lee pulled him close and told him David Hart is the one who stabbed him. Times & Transcript, A7

* Police association won't pursue complaint over misappropriation

The New Brunswick Police Association has opted not to file a complaint with the RCMP against a member of the Fredericton Police Force. Association president Dean Secord said on Friday that the matter has been handled internally and is now being dealt with under the Police Act. Daily Gleaner, A1

* Dozens of charges laid against four after big drug bust

More than eight litres of GHB, an odourless, colourless, tasteless liquid commonly called the "daterape drug" was seized from a northeast Edmonton home last week. The 8.5-litre seizure of gamma-Hydroxybutyric acid, or GHB, was the largest bust of that drug by the Alberta Law Enforcement Response Teams and resulted in the arrest of four people. A total of 44 charges were laid against the quartet, relating to drugs, guns, stolen property and breaches. ALERT Edmonton, a team of Alberta Sheriffs, Edmonton police and RCMP members, seized GHB, 47 grams of methamphetamine, illicit prescription pills, ammunition and $16,110 in cash from the home. Edmonton Journal, A12

* Mountie charged with stealing guns

A Manitoba Mountie is facing several criminal charges, including theft of guns from a detachment. RCMP allege Cpl. Jason Prettie of Dauphin was working in Minnedosa when two weapons were stolen in 2009. A spokeswoman says the rifle and shotgun were not police-issue and had been in RCMP custody. Red Deer Advocate, A5

* Source of bomb threat still up in the air

Royal Newfoundland Constabulary Const. Steve Curnew says there's a lot of leg work to be done after a major disruption at St. John's International Airport Thursday night due to a bomb threat. It was about 7 p.m. Thursday evening when police were notified of the bomb threat onboard Air Canada Flight 143 departing for Ottawa. "Just as it was about to pull away from the gate, one of the flight crew noticed and found a note that was located in the washroom onboard the flight," says Curnew. The discovery of that letter led to the immediate evacuation of the airplane and the shutdown of the airport. Chris Andrews of the band Shanneyganock was onboard the plane where the note was found, along with the rest of the band - they were on their way to Edmonton for a gig. "We knew it was something, because they never get you off a plane that fast," Andrews told The Telegram Friday morning from Toronto, from where the band was still hoping to make it their Edmonton gig. An explosive disposal unit and a bomb detecting dog from the RCMP searched the plane. Nothing suspicious was located. The Telegram, A3; The Telegram

* Disparus, mais jamais oubliés

Pas moins de 12 000 disparitions sont signalées chaque année au Québec. Une cinquantaine d'entre elles ne sont pas résolues. Ces affaires ne sont jamais fermées. Au contraire. Le Service des projets d'enquêtes spécialisées de la Sûreté du Québec, qui coordonne ces investigations à l'échelle provinciale, travaille avec acharnement pour dénouer l'impasse. Chaque année, 12 000 disparitions sont rapportées dans la province. Les premières heures sont cruciales. Les policiers et les enquêteurs du service de police où la disparition est signalée doivent agir rapidement. Les statistiques démontrent que dans 74 % des cas, une personne est localisée en moins de sept jours. Après 60 jours et une fois que toutes les pistes et techniques d'enquête ont été épuisées, la disparition est classée non résolue et transférée à l'équipe spécialisée. La photo du disparu est alors publiée sur le site de la SQ et de la Gendarmerie Royale du Canada. La Voix de l'Est, 2

 Man sentenced for making threats to former premier

Brian Derek Perry was back before the court again this week accused of threatening former Premier Tom Marshall, but this time he accepted responsibility. He pleaded guilty to a number of charges and was sentenced to five months house arrest. The 59-year-old Frenchman's Cove man has been charged with harassing and threatening a number of politicians over the years, including Marshall on a number of occasions. Perry's crusade against politicians dates back over a couple of decades when he claims he lost his nightclub business as a result of the allowance of unlicensed liquor sales he could not compete with. Facing new charges Friday, Perry pleaded guilty to harassing Marshall via telephone repeatedly since 2009. He did so despite a court order to not contact him, directly or indirectly. The Corner Brook RCMP received the latest complaint from Marshall Sunday. TC Media (The Telegram, A10)

 Shooting may be targeted

Police say two men in their 20s were taken to hospital after an overnight shooting in Surrey. Residents reported hearing gunshots in their neighbourhood at about 1 a.m. Friday, and RCMP arrived to find the two wounded men. Both victims are expected to survive. Officers say one of the men is known to police and the attack appears to have been targeted. Police are looking for three to four suspects who are all described as men in their early 20s. Investigators say the shooting has not been linked to more than a dozen others involving a gang turf war over drugs. Vancouver Sun, A5

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES / SERVICE CORRECTIONNEL

 Dying Collins waits for 'compassionate' parole hearing

Correctional Service Canada (CSC) has sent the case of Peter Collins to the federal parole board for an early hearing to decide if he'll be released after 32 years in prison. It will be the sixth time he has stood before the parole board in the past seven years. Ottawa Citizen, C3

 Final Confession

In September 1984, after being found guilty of murdering a Nepean police officer in cold blood, Peter Collins refused to stand in court to be sentenced. "I don't want to," a defiant Collins told Judge Nicholson McRae, who imposed the automatic penalty of life in prison. The sentence meant Collins would not be eligible for parole until Oct. 14, 2008 - 25 years to the day after he confronted Nepean Police Const. David Utman in Bayshore Shopping Centre and shot him dead in front of a horrified lunch hour crowd. The 53-year-old, one of Canada's longest-serving prisoners, has been diagnosed with terminal bladder cancer. In January, after chemotherapy and radiation, he was told the cancer had spread to his abdominal wall, lungs and spine. His only treatment now is palliative. Supporters are lobbying for his compassionate release from Bath Institution, near Kingston, so that he can die among family and friends. Utman's relatives, however, are dead set against parole. "I think they should keep him there until he expires," Utman's brother, Stan, said in a phone interview from his home in Moose Jaw, Sask. The Bath Institution, west of Kingston, is a medium-security federal penitentiary on the windswept north shore of Lake Ontario. It has been Collins's home for the past 16 years. He lives in what's known as N-house: a communitystyle building with a shared kitchen. He has a key to his own cell and, when he's up to it, can cook his own meals. It's a far cry from the special handling unit at Millhaven Penitentiary where he spent the first three years of his sentence. Collins was placed in the high-security unit because of his escape history. His cell featured a bed and desk welded to one another and a window covered with two sheets of steel. Light seeped in through small, nickel-sized holes punched into the metal. Ottawa Citizen, C1

Brutal killer to be given day passes

It was a warm summer night when Debbie Timlock curled up in her bed, never realizing someone was out there, watching. As the 33-year-old murder victim slept, she didn't hear him knock over the plant as he crawled through the kitchen window. She didn't hear him open the kitchen drawer to pull out a butcher knife. She didn't hear him slowly padding down the hall to her bedroom. "At first, I wanted to scare the hell out of her," her killer, James Brown, told a court in one of his bids to get early parole. But as he walked toward her bedroom with knife in hand, he changed his mind. That was June 20, 1989. In 1992, after a lengthy trial, Brown was convicted by a jury of first-degree murder and sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole for 25 years. Now, at the age of 49, the Parole Board of Canada is preparing Brown -- a former bouncer with a long violent criminal record -- for his eventual release back into society with several unescorted passes from prison during the next year. Toronto Sun, 4

 Court of Appeal to rule on Mr. Big case

Citing a recent case by the Supreme Court of Canada focusing on "Mr. Big" police stings, legal counsel for George Mitchell Allgood urged the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal to order a new trial. While lawyers debated the issue, Allgood, now 51, sat quietly and took occasional notes inside a room at the Saskatchewan Penitentiary in Prince Albert where he is serving a life sentence with no parole eligibility for 25 years. Allgood - who appeared in court Friday by video link - was found guilty in January 2014 of first-degree murder in the fatal shooting of his son's mother Susan Reinhardt and the attempted murder of her partner, David Ristow. The incident occurred on July 15, 2006, at the Saskatoon home of Reinhardt and Ristow. The couple was shot through an open patio door in the bedroom while they slept, Queen's Bench Justice Grant Currie determined in finding Allgood guilty. On Friday, Allgood's legal team - Morris Bodnar and Scott Giroux - asked the province's highest court to overturn Currie's findings and send the case back to trial. Giroux referred to a number of inconsistencies between evidence heard at trial and statements made by Allgood to a member of the RCMP posing as a crime boss. But it was the fact that police had undertaken that type of operation - known as a "Mr. Big" sting - and that the resulting admissions by Allgood were allowed into evidence that the Saskatoon man's lawyers found most problematic, given new case law in the area. Leader-Post, A7

COMMUNITY SAFETY & PARTNERSHIPS / SÉCURITÉ DE LA POPULATION ET PARTENARIATS

Siksika chief moved by apology

Chief Vincent Yellow Old Woman was proudly wearing his ceremonial headdress when he sat in the gallery at the legislature in Edmonton last week to hear Rachel Notley's NDP government offer an apology to Alberta's aboriginal people for the decades of physical, sexual and cultural abuse at residential schools. The government apologized last week for its past silence on the damage done by residential schools and added its voice to calls for a federal inquiry into missing and murdered indigenous women. As well, Notley noted the "devastating link" between the high number of missing and murdered aboriginal women and issues of poverty and domestic violence, adding her voice to national calls for an inquiry. Calgary Herald, A8

PUBLIC SERVICE / FONCTION PUBLIQUE

9 senior staffers take up new jobs

The senior ranks of the federal government are getting a shakeup as nine long-serving bureaucrats are set to take new positions in July. Linda Lizotte-MacPherson will become president of the Canada Border Services Agency, leaving her current post as president of the Canada School of Public Service. She fills the position left open by outgoing border services president Luc Portelance, who is retiring after 36 years in public service. John Ossowski, currently associate deputy minister of public safety, will become deputy commissioner of revenue. Gina Wilson, currently associate deputy minister of employment and social development, will replace Ossowski as associate deputy minister of public safety. Ottawa Citizen, A10

OTHER / AUTRE

* Extremism runs wild on the web

Once on the path to violent extremism, there is no end to what would-be terrorists can find online to solidify their beliefs. It's all just a few clicks away. While it remains unclear just how connected Friday's trio of terror attacks are to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, there is no arguing that the group has made it maddeningly simple for sympathizers worldwide to take up the extremists' cause. It takes about 30 seconds to create a Twitter account and connect to someone in Syria. And as one journalist in France found out, expressing an interest in ISIL on Facebook quickly leads to a flood of information as the service's algorithms suggest similar sites and friends with the same interests. A constant stream of beheadings and images of children with guns soon starts to seem normal. ISIL has put out a guide to travelling to the territory it controls, as well as information on how to be a jihadi in the West, complete with training on toy Nerf guns, making pressure-cooker bombs and stealing money from infidels. The Gazette (National Post, A4)

Still unclear if any Canadians among Tunisia victims

The Foreign Affairs department says its officials in Tunisia are trying to determine whether any Canadians are among the dozens killed in a fearsome terrorist attack. A gunman fired on sunbathers at a beach near two hotels in the Tunisian coastal resort city of Sousse. The department says 826 Canadians were known to be in Tunisia. Calgary Sun, 16; La Presse Canadienne (Le Droit)

INTERNATIONAL

Terrorists strike three locations

Called to arms by the leadership of the Sunni extremist group known as Islamic State, three lone terrorists struck Friday at sensitive first-time targets in Europe, North Africa and the Persian Gulf. They succeeded in killing more than 60 people - the majority of whom were Westerners - and raised new fears about the growing reach of jihadis. In Tunisia, a gunman unknown to police pulled a Kalashnikov from inside a beach umbrella and opened fire on sun-worshipping Europeans, killing at least 37, before he was killed by security forces. It was the deadliest assault on tourists in the Arab World since the 1997 attack at the ancient Egyptian site of Luxor, when terrorists killed 62 people. In France, a truck driver with suspected ties to Islamist extremists crashed his vehicle into an industrial chemical plant near Lyon, apparently hoping to trigger a large explosion. The decapitated body of the driver's boss was found at the scene, his head on a gate post, reportedly framed by Islamist banners. In Kuwait, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside a large Shia mosque during Friday noon prayers, killing at least 27 and wounding more than 200. The blast, in downtown Kuwait City, was just 30 kilometres from where 600 Canadian troops are based, conducting an air campaign against Islamic State forces in Iraq and Syria. Globe and Mail, A3; Postmedia Network (Calgary Sun, 16); National Post; La Presse; La Presse; Toronto Star; * La Presse

*Prepared by the Public Safety Portfolio Media Centre / Préparé par le Centre des médias du portefeuille
Sécurité publique. We can be reached at / Vous pouvez nous contacter à:
PSPMediaCentre/CentredesmediasPSP@ps-sp.gc.ca*

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Tuesday, January 19, 2016 • mardi le 19 janvier 2016

53 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. 'Troubling' Conservative torture policy up for review, Goodale says

Canadian Press, Jim Bronskill, 2016 01 19

Ottawa - The Trudeau Liberals will review controversial directives enacted by the Harper government that allow for the sharing of information even when it might lead to torture, says the public safety minister. The "troubling set of issues" raised by the foreign information-sharing policy "will be raised in the course of our consultations" on the overall national security direction of the new government, Ralph Goodale said in a recent interview with The Canadian Press. The news follows pressure from human-rights and privacy advocates to conduct a wide-ranging examination of security policies introduced by the Conservatives, whisked from office in the October election. The federal policy on foreign information-sharing has been roundly criticized for effectively condoning the torture of people in overseas prisons, contrary to international law and Canada's United Nations commitments. A four-page 2010 framework document, released under the Access to Information Act, says when there is a "substantial risk" that sending information to, or soliciting information from, a foreign agency would result in torture _ and it is unclear whether the risk can be managed through assurances or other means _ the matter should be referred to the responsible deputy minister or agency head. In deciding what to do, the agency head will consider factors including the threat to Canada's national security and the nature and imminence of the threat; the status of Canada's relationship with _ and the human rights record of _ the foreign agency; and the rationale for believing that sharing the information would lead to torture. Critics say when there is a serious risk of torture, there should be no sharing _ period. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the RCMP, the Canada Border Services Agency, National Defence and the Communications Security Establishment, Canada's electronic spy agency, are bound by the federal policy on sharing information with foreign agencies.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

2. Une nouvelle phase du terrorisme

Métro (Montréal), Roxane Léouzon, 2016 01 19

Ottawa - Sécurité. Ce n'est pas qu'une impression, on assiste à une multiplication des attentats terroristes dans le monde depuis les attentats de Paris. C'est ce qu'affirme l'expert en sécurité internationale et ancien agent du Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) Michel Juneau-Katsuya. Et ces attentats peuvent désormais avoir lieu n'importe où. «Sans parler d'une coordination des différents groupes terroristes, on peut parler d'un momentum, d'une fébrilité qu'État islamique a déclenché avec les attentats de Paris et celui sur un avion de ligne russe», a expliqué M. Juneau-Katsuya. Les propos de Bruno Charbonneau, directeur du Centre FrancoPaix, semblent appuyer cette analyse. «Al Qaida, État islamique et les autres groupes se nourrissent entre eux, s'inspirent de leurs stratégies, veulent faire parler d'eux», a considéré M. Charbonneau. M. Juneau-Katsuya estime que le terrorisme international est entré dans une nouvelle phase. La précédente était celle des «loups solitaires», qui menaient des attaques spontanées de faible amplitude. «Là, on assiste à des choses télécommandées et planifiées par des groupes d'assailants, à partir notamment de la Syrie. On attaque des sites touristiques parce que ce sont des endroits faciles et que les coups vont porter atteinte à l'économie nationale et à la stabilité du gouvernement en place», a jugé le spécialiste.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Canada

3. Alors qu'est célébrée la Journée Martin Luther King Crime haineux à Ottawa

Le Droit, Guillaume St-Pierre, 2016 01 19

Ottawa - Le Canada est une des plus belles terres d'accueil au monde, a-t-on claironné à l'occasion des célébrations de la Journée Martin Luther King, lundi, à l'hôtel de ville d'Ottawa. Mais il ne faut pas se mettre la tête dans le sable. Le racisme est encore bien présent dans nos communautés. Des graffitis haineux peints sur le mur d'un lieu de culte de l'Église unie à Ottawa, pas plus tard que la semaine dernière, en font foi. «Négro», «Tupac». Le révérend Dr Anthony Bailey a retrouvé son église salie de ces mots lourds de sens, le dimanche 10 janvier dernier. Encore sous le choc, l'homme de foi a brisé le silence que lui a imposé la police, lundi, sur ce qui ressemble à un crime à caractère racial «ciblé». «Je suis le seul révérend noir à Ottawa», laisse tomber M. Bailey, précisant que l'incident est une première pour lui et sa congrégation. C'est troublant, c'est bouleversant, c'est choquant.»

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. Burkina Faso attack shows need to boost information-gathering: Sajjan

Ottawa Citizen, Lee Berthiaume, 2016 01 19

St. Andrews, N.B. - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan says better intelligence capabilities, as well as co-operation with Canada's allies, are essential for preventing the types of terror attacks that have struck Burkina Faso and other parts of the world. Six Canadians were killed over the weekend when militants linked to al-Qaida stormed a hotel in Ouagadougou, the capital of Burkina Faso in West Africa. Days earlier, a Canadian was killed during an attack by Islamic State-inspired terrorists in Indonesia. Speaking on the sidelines of a three-day retreat between Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his cabinet ministers, Sajjan said Canada has "to get better at our intelligence capabilities in other parts of the world so that we have a better chance of preventing attacks like this from happening. "This only happens if we start working in greater co-operation with our intelligence partners," he added. "Which means not just the military, but also the police forces as well." Intelligence co-operation between Canada and its allies has been the subject of massive controversy in recent years, particularly after U.S. whistleblower Edward Snowden revealed that American and Canadian spy agencies have been running massive intelligence-gathering operations. The previous Conservative government also enacted controversial anti-terror legislation, Bill C-51, that increased the scope and powers of Canada's intelligence operations. The Liberals promised during the election to amend the law, but haven't said how. Instead, they have promised broad consultations first. Sajjan, who is responsible for the ultra-secret Communications Security Establishment, which is Canada's electronic spy agency, said "the safety of Canadians will always be paramount," but also that there "has to be a balance."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Canada's new man in D.C.;

Ottawa Citizen, Mark Kennedy, 2016 01 19

Ottawa - Most Canadians have never heard of David MacNaughton. Yet the veteran of business circles and political backrooms is about to become Canada's most important envoy on the world stage, as ambassador to the United States. Why did Prime Minister Justin Trudeau tap him for the job at a critical time in Canada-U.S. relations? It's simple: trust. MacNaughton was Ontario cochair of Trudeau's campaign in last fall's election. He has had a long, close relationship with Trudeau's two senior advisers: chief of staff Katie Telford and principal secretary Gerald Butts. All three worked in Dalton Mc-Guinty's Liberal government more than a decade ago, and Telford later worked in StrategyCorp, the Toronto-based government relations firm chaired by MacNaughton. This personal connection could give MacNaughton real influence as he lobbies the White House and U.S. lawmakers on Canada's behalf. Derek Burney, a former Canadian ambassador to the U.S., said Monday that MacNaughton is a solid choice for the job. "I think he'll be a great ambassador in Washington. He's a very smart political operator in the best sense of that description."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. Canada not invited to anti-ISIS coalition meeting in Paris

CBC News, Katharine Starr, 2016 01 19

Canada has not been invited to an anti-ISIS coalition meeting this week in Paris, CBC News has learned. Defence ministers from France, the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, Australia and the Netherlands will join U.S. Secretary of Defence Ashton Carter on Wednesday to discuss the future of the fight against the extremist group. Canada's Minister of Defence Harjit Sajjan did not receive an invitation, his office confirmed to CBC News Network's Power & Politics. In an interview with host Rosemary Barton, parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs Omar Alghabra called the meeting "spontaneous" and that "not being invited didn't come as a surprise." Alghabra said the group of seven countries meet regularly, independently of Canada, and the only thing different this time is that they are meeting at the ministerial level. In a speech last week at Fort Campbell in Kentucky, Carter said the six other nations invited to the Paris meeting are "playing a significant role" in the fight against ISIS. While Sajjan didn't receive an invitation to Wednesday's meeting, he will attend talks organized by Carter on the fringes of a NATO meeting of defence ministers in Brussels Feb 11, and that's the important, meeting said Alghabra.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

7. Canada shut out of coalition meeting

Globe and Mail, Robert Fife, 2016 01 19

Canada has been excluded from a high-level meeting of "significant contributors" to the U.S.-led coalition called to discuss stepping up the fight to defeat Islamic State militants. The meeting of defence ministers from the United States, Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Australia and the Netherlands is set for Wednesday in Paris. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan's office acknowledged he wasn't invited to Paris but denied Canada has lost its influence within the coalition. "It has nothing to do with our CF-18s. It has nothing to do with our contribution," said Renée Filiatrault, Mr. Sajjan's director of communications. "[U.S. Defense Secretary Ashton] Carter has already requested a meeting of coalition partners that coincide with NATO on Feb. 11 and we're focused on that." Canadian CF-18 fighter jets are still conducting bombing missions in Iraq and Syria, even as the new Liberal government decides how to honour Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's election pledge to end the combat mission.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

8. Canada signals openness to restoring Iran diplomatic ties

Islamic Republic News Agency, 2016 01 19

Tehran - Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau expressed an openness to restoring diplomatic ties with Iran, four years after Canada closed its embassy in Tehran, reports said. Such a move would be a reversal of the foreign policy set by the previous Tory administration, which had vowed to keep its sanctions regime against Iran after a preliminary deal on the Islamic republic's nuclear program in 2013. Trudeau said Iran had made 'significant movement towards respecting international expectations' regarding its nuclear program, Western media reported. 'That is something positive and I expect there will be (diplomatic) links now between Canada and Iran,' he said. 'We will certainly be discussing that further at a cabinet meeting in the coming weeks,' he added, according to the AFP report. Canada broke diplomatic ties with Iran in September 2012.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

9. Canadian man detained in UAE pleads not guilty to three terror related charges

Canadian Press, Paola Loriggio, 2016 01 19

Toronto - A Canadian man detained for more than a year in the United Arab Emirates has pleaded not guilty to three terror-related charges on the first day of his long-awaited trial. Salim Alaradi's lawyer says his client learned Monday he was charged with funding terrorist organizations, supporting terrorist organizations, and co-operating with terrorist organizations. Paul Champ says two specific groups _ the February 17 Brigades and the Libyan Dawn _ were named. Alaradi's family and lawyers had previously received no explanation from U.A.E. authorities for his continued detention and there have been allegations he has been tortured behind bars. Champ says neither he nor Alaradi's nephew were allowed to attend Monday's hearing at the State Security Chamber of the U.A.E. Federal Supreme Court. But the Champ says Canada's ambassador was able to observe, as were two U.S. diplomats, since Alaradi is being tried with two Americans. The case has been adjourned to Feb. 15, Champ said in an email. ``Despite our serious concerns with the fairness of this trial, and obviously the allegations of torture, we remain optimistic that Mr. Alaradi will be acquitted of all charges and allowed to leave the country," he told The Canadian Press.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. Chinese soldiers implicated in U.S. military hacking case

Globe and Mail, Colin Freeze, 2016 01 19

Toronto - Two Chinese government soldiers were part of a hacking conspiracy allegedly carried out by a Chinese resident of Canada to steal secrets relating to components of F-35s and other American warplanes, according to court-filed documents. Prosecution "books of record," recently released by a Vancouver court following a request from The Globe and Mail, make explicit Chinese military ties that were not publicly alleged when this rare cyberespionage prosecution was launched in 2014. The case centres on Su Bin, a 50-year-old Chinese aviation industry entrepreneur residing in Vancouver, and the two unnamed "co-conspirators" revealed to be Chinese soldiers. Despite their military connection, it remains unclear whether the alleged scheme was statesponsored, or whether the conspirators were essentially soldiers moonlighting to enrich themselves. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is considering a visit to China this spring to talk about free trade. In recent years, both U.S. President Barack Obama and former prime minister Stephen Harper have gone public with concerns about Chinese cyberespionage. While most countries spy, China is feared to be in a class of its own when it comes to using hackers to steal military and commercial secrets. Four years ago, now-retired American spymaster Keith Alexander claimed that cybercrime costs the United States hundreds of billions of dollars each year. In June, 2014, such fears were given a human face. That's when Canadian police arrested Mr. Su on a U.S. warrant that charged him with being part of an illegal hacking conspiracy. The ongoing extradition case against him relies on intercepted e-mail exchanges, in which Mr. Su allegedly helped to focus the hacking efforts of the two Chinese co-conspirators.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

11. Des djihadistes-clients Les auteurs de l'attentat auraient résidé à l'hôtel Splendid

Le Soleil, Normand Provencher, 2016 01 19

Ouagadougou - Les auteurs de l'attentat meurtrier qui a fait 30 morts, dont six citoyens de Québec, vendredi à Ouagadougou, auraient séjourné comme clients à l'hôtel Splendid dans les semaines précédant le raid. «À ce qu'on dit, les djihadistes auraient logé au moins un mois à l'hôtel Splendid. Ça leur aurait permis de peaufiner leur attaque», indique le rédacteur en chef du journal Le pays, Boundi Ouoba, joint lundi matin dans la capitale burkinabè. La police locale tentait toujours lundi d'établir l'origine et le nombre de djihadistes qui ont mené l'assaut contre l'hôtel Splendid, très prisé des Occidentaux, ainsi que le café Cappuccino. «Ils étaient au moins trois», mentionne M. Ouoba. L'attaque a été revendiquée par Al-Qaida au Maghreb islamique. «Pour le moment, les djihadistes n'ont pas été identifiés formellement. On ne sait pas s'ils ont pu compter sur des complices», mentionne M. Ouoba. Certains corps ont été brûlés dans l'incendie provoqué par les terroristes. Au total, ce sont 29 personnes de 18 nationalités différentes qui ont trouvé la mort vendredi. Le bilan est passé à 30 morts lundi, après le décès d'une femme parmi la trentaine de blessés.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

12. Does Trudeau have what it takes to end Ottawa's cult of secrecy?

iPolitics.ca, Jeff Sallot, 2016 01 19

Op-ed: It's an axiom of politics -- the longer a government is in power, the more it likes working in the shadows. It took about a nanosecond for Stephen Harper's government to go dark after coming to power in 2006. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's government arrived promising "sunny ways". We'll see. The Liberals' first big test will come in a month or so. That's when we'll learn how the Liberals will deal with a court case that began with Harper's Conservatives shamefully betraying Access to Information Commissioner Suzanne Legault four years ago. Legault was investigating a citizen's complaint that the RCMP had failed to disclose long-gun registry data as required by the Access to Information Act. The then-Tory justice minister, Vic Toews (now a Harper appointee to the bench in Manitoba) promised Legault the data would not be destroyed until the court case was resolved. But last year the Tories tried to do just that -- getting rid of the data and retroactively absolving themselves and the Mounties of any possible criminal charges. In an omnibus budget bill, the Tories slipped through legislation that amended the access law so that it didn't apply to gun registry data. Neat trick. Nevertheless, Legault fights on in the courts. She thinks the data may still be sitting on a few hard drives at RCMP offices. Note: Jeff Sallot is one of Canada's most experienced and respected political writers. A graduate of the Kent State University journalism school, he shared a Pulitzer Prize with colleagues at The Akron Beacon-Journal for his eyewitness coverage of the massacre of four Kent State students by the Ohio National Guard during an anti-war demonstration.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

13. Terrorism Deaths Rattle Canada

Wall Street Journal, Carolyn King, Paul Vieira, 2016 01 19

Ottawa - A school board in Quebec City was reeling Monday after six Canadians with close ties to the provincial capital's board were among those killed in terror attacks in Burkina Faso. The tragedy and the death of a Canadian in an attack in Jakarta last week have intensified a focus in Canada on how the government is dealing with terrorism. Since the fatal attacks in Paris in November, Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his Liberal government have faced intense pressure from opposition politicians to rethink their campaign pledge to remove six jet fighters from the U.S.-led mission in the Middle East against Islamic State. The government is prepared to do "everything we can" to fight terrorism, Mr. Trudeau said Monday, adding that his cabinet is drafting a new strategy to reassure Canadians and the country's allies of its commitment. "The fight against terrorism across the world is essential," said Mr. Trudeau. "We are looking at different ways of being engaged, in an effective way, to fight terrorism."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

14. Terrorism is a crime against the human race. Trudeau should say so.

iPolitics.ca, Tasha Kheiriddin, 2016 01 19

Op-ed: Last week, seven Canadians were killed in two separate terrorist attacks. In Jakarta, a Quebec man died in an attack on a hotel by ISIS. In an al Qaida-linked assault in Burkina Faso, six Quebecers were slaughtered as they sat in a café, where several of them were celebrating the end of a humanitarian mission. On the attack in Jakarta, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau had this to say: "Obviously, our hearts of Canada and Canadians go out to the people of Indonesia and the families and victims of these terrible attacks ... Global Affairs is working ... to follow up on those reports that a Canadian was involved." About the attacks in Burkina Faso, Trudeau said this:

"Yesterday we got some terrible news from Africa. Six of our fellow citizens were murdered in a brutal act of violent terrorism." Trudeau then called for a moment of silence for the victims, "in solidarity with their families." Not a peep about standing up to terrorists. Not a word about bringing the perpetrators to justice. Nothing about solidarity with our allies against the scourge of terrorism. Not even a mention of the need to be strong, as a nation, in the face of these awful acts. The same morning, Trudeau visited a mosque in Peterborough which had been firebombed following the Paris terrorist attacks last fall. Fortunately, no one was hurt or killed, but the building was destroyed and the community badly shaken by the crime. After praising the community and its officials for rallying and rebuilding, he said, "Know that as your government, we stand with you. We will continue to denounce senseless acts of discrimination and like you, we will work hard to make our communities kinder, more open, more inclusive places to call home." Note: Tasha Kheiriddin is a political writer and broadcaster who frequently comments in both English and French. After practising law and a stint in the government of Mike Harris, Tasha became the Ontario director of the Canadian Taxpayers Federation and co-wrote the 2005 bestseller, Rescuing Canada's Right: Blueprint for a Conservative Revolution.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

15. Top cop in B.C. terror case concerned about having experienced officers: court

Canadian Press, Gemma Karstens-Smith, 2016 01 19

Vancouver - The head of an RCMP team tasked with investigating a possible terror suspect has told a B.C. Supreme Court trial that he had concerns about entrapment and abuse of process near the start of a police sting. Emails read in court show Sgt. Bill Kalkat asked undercover officers how they planned to avoid potential legal issues months before John Nuttall and Amanda Korody were arrested for plotting to blow up the B.C. legislature in 2013. Nuttall and Korody were found guilty of terrorism charges last June, but the convictions have not been entered while defence lawyers argue that police entrapped their clients in a sting. Crown lawyer Peter Eccles asked Kalkat when he began thinking about entrapment and abuse of process as possible issues. "Late February, early March (of 2013)," Kalkat replied, adding that such issues are always a concern for investigators when a crime has not yet been committed. The senior officer also told court that he faced some challenges with the undercover team investigating Nuttall and trying to determine whether he posed a threat to public safety. An experienced officer was important for the case, Kalkat testified, adding he asked that someone who'd worked on similar national security investigations be assigned.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

16. Windsor man facing terrorism charges in Middle East

Windsor Star, Doug Schmidt, 2016 01 19

Windsor - A Windsor businessman, allegedly tortured while held for more than a year without charges in a Middle Eastern jail, found out Monday he's going to trial on terrorism-related charges. Salim Alaradi, a father of five, has been charged in the United Arab Emirates with three offences, for allegedly funding, supporting and co-operating with terrorist organizations. If found guilty, he faces "everything up to the death penalty," said Ottawa human rights lawyer Paul Champ. Alaradi pleaded not guilty to each charge. In a phone interview with the Star from Abu Dhabi, Champ, who was barred from attending the hearing, said Alaradi attempted to roll up his sleeves to show the court physical torture marks but was told by the presiding judge to wait until trial. Arrested in August 2014 in the UAE with nine others of Libyan background, Alaradi was only able to meet his local lawyer for the first time Monday in court. Canada's ambassador to the UAE was permitted to attend Monday's brief hearing inside the state security chamber of the Persian Gulf state's supreme court. Champ and Alaradi's family, which had launched an international campaign pushing for Alaradi to be freed, have praised Ottawa's recent efforts to focus attention on the case. Marwa Alaradi has not seen or spoken to her father in 285 days. The heartbroken teen has been fighting for his freedom since he was arbitrarily arrested last August in the UAE, where he has been detained and tortured. The trial starts in February. Champ, who was retained by the family last fall, said Alaradi has never been politically active let alone had any connections to terrorist activities.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

17. 'Teens' Who Hacked CIA Director Also Hit White House Official

Motherboard (Vice), Lorenzo Franceschi-Bicchierai, 2016 01 19

New York - The hacking group that has been targeting government officials since October, when it broke into the AOL email account of CIA Director John Brennan, has claimed yet another victim. This time, the victim is President Barack Obama's senior advisor on science and technology John Holdren, Motherboard has learned. One of the cybercriminals linked to the group that hacked Brennan broke into Holdren's home telephone and email account and set it so that all the calls would get forwarded to the Free Palestine Movement. This is exactly what happened to US Director of National Intelligence James Clapper last week. On Monday, one of the members of the hacking group, which is known as Crackas With Attitude, or CWA, sent me an email to tell me about his latest feat. "If you don't believe me you can call the home phone," he said, before sending me a phone number that belongs to Holdren, according to public records. When I called the number, the founder of the Free Palestine Movement Paul Larudee picked up the phone. Larudee said that the same person who called him last week to tell him that he would receive calls directed at Clapper called him again on Monday morning. Cracka told me on Monday that the group hacked several other government officials, including some the group never publicly bragged about. He mentioned Amy Hess, the FBI's executive assistant director for science and technology, White House Communications Director Jen Psaki, White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough, the Deputy Secretary of State Tony Blinken, and the White House Deputy National Security Advisor Avril Haines.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

18. Bugs in Wi-Fi Hookups Cripple Web Security

Wall Street Journal, Jennifer Valentino-DeVries, 2016 01 19

New York - In late 2014, a small Massachusetts software company got an ominous email: A computer-security researcher said a flaw in one of its programs put millions world-wide at risk of being hacked. Engineers at the company, Allegro Software Development Corp., analyzed the flaw in the program, which can help users access the controls of home Internet routers. They quickly realized something strange: They had fixed this bug nearly 10 years earlier. But it lived on, even in new devices. The reason: A component maker had included the 2002 version of Allegro's software with its chipset and hadn't updated it. Router makers used those chips in more than 10 million devices. The router makers said they didn't know a later version of Allegro's software fixed the bug. The router flaw highlights an enduring problem in computer security: Fixing bugs once they have been released into the world is sometimes difficult and often overlooked. The flaw's creator must develop a fix, or "patch." Then it often must alert millions of technically unsophisticated users, who have to install the patch. The chain can break at many points: Patches aren't distributed. Users aren't alerted or neglect to apply the patch. Hackers exploit any weak link.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

19. Super Bowl Security: Federal Officials Mull Whether Attack on Fiber Optic Systems Connected to 'Plot' Against Super Bowl

WRC TV Washington (NBC), Seth MacFarlane, 2016 01 18

Washington - As Super Bowl 50 approaches, government security officials are examining whether recent attacks on fiber optic systems in California could be connected to a "more complex plot" against the game. A series of unsolved incidents -- in which fiber optic cables in the Bay Area were deliberately severed -- is one of several risks detailed in an internal memo shared by the FBI and U.S. Department of Homeland Security intelligence analysts in the lead-up to Super Bowl 50 on Feb. 7. The memo, obtained by the News4 I-Team, says "the FBI and DHS have no information to indicate any specific, credible threats to or associated with Super Bowl 50 or related events." But it also details the attacks against the fiber optic systems, the threat of drones against the game and potential game-day attacks in crowded spaces just outside Levi's Stadium in Santa Clara, the host site of Super Bowl 50. The memo acknowledges lone wolf attackers "are of particular concern" to the game due to their ability to remain undetected before attacking. The severed fiber optic cables "raise] the concern individuals may be using these incidents to test and prod network durability in conjunction with a more complex plot," the memo said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

20. The ugly truth: Defeating the Islamic State will take decades

Washington Post, David Ignatius, 2016 01 19

Column from Tampa - There's a scary disconnect between the somber warnings you hear privately from military leaders about the war against the Islamic State and the glib debating points coming from Republican and Democratic politicians. Military leaders know that they are fighting a ruthless adversary that has adjusted and adapted its tactics as the United States and its partners have joined the fight over the past 18 months. The jihadists have lost about 25 percent of the territory they held in mid-2014, but they have devised innovative methods to compensate for their weakness. Some examples illustrate the agility of Islamic State commanders: They have used tunnels and other concealment tactics to hide their movements; they have developed super-size car bombs, packing explosives in bulldozers and other heavy equipment and sending them in waves against targets; they have deployed small drones for reconnaissance and may be preparing armed drones; they have used chemical weapons, such as chlorine and mustard gas, on the battlefield and may expand use of such unconventional weapons. U.S. commanders have learned how difficult it will be to create a Sunni force that can help clear and hold territory in Iraq and Syria that's now controlled by the Islamic State. Sunni tribal leaders mistrust the United States and doubt U.S. staying power. U.S. efforts to avoid casualties and resist "boots on the ground" reinforce the sense that the United States is pursuing a strategy of containment, not victory. The deeper lesson is that training a reliable military force that adheres to Western norms and standards is the work of a generation, not a few months. The U.S. desire for quick results is an exercise in frustration and disappointment. The sobering reality of this conflict that politicians - and the American public - seem least willing to face up to is that it will require a decades-long commitment.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

21. 'Hate crime is being inflamed': MPs debate banning Donald Trump from UK

The Guardian (London), Rowena Mason, 2016 01 19

London - Donald Trump was branded a racist demagogue, a buffoon and a "wazzock" in the British parliament as MPs debated whether to ban the Republican presidential candidate from coming to the UK. A series of MPs attacked Trump for his views on Muslims, women, disabled people, global warming and other issues in the three-hour discussion, with some suggesting he was inflaming hate crime against minorities. However, the majority of parliamentarians from both left and right dismissed the idea of banning the businessman and star of The Apprentice in the US, with one saying it would fuel his publicity machine and give him the "halo of victimhood". About 50 MPs out of 650 were present for the debate, which was triggered by a petition signed by more than half a million people. Any petition that attracts more than 100,000 signatories is considered by MPs to decide whether it is worthy of debate. James Brokenshire, a Home Office minister, speaking for the government, rejected the idea of a ban, while stressing he profoundly disagreed with Trump's comments about Muslims.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

22. GB: le service de renseignement MI5 élu meilleur employeur gay- friendly

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 01 19

Londres - Le MI5, le service de renseignement intérieur britannique, a été désigné mardi par une association LGBT comme le meilleur employeur de Grande-Bretagne pour le respect de la diversité sexuelle. Le service national de contre-espionnage et de sécurité intérieure est arrivé en tête du classement annuel établi par Stonewall, une association de défense des droits des personnes LGBT (lesbiennes, gays, bisexuelles et transsexuelles). Le MI5, qui s'était classé septième l'année dernière, s'impose devant plus de 400 autres employeurs britanniques. La diversité est "vitale" pour le MI5, "parce que nous dépendons des compétences des personnes les plus talentueuses, quelles qu'elles soient et où qu'elles se trouvent", a déclaré le directeur général du service, Andrew Parker.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

23. MI5 comes out top in Stonewall list of gay-friendly employers

The Guardian (London), Ewan MacAskill, 2016 01 19

London - MI5 has come top in Stonewall's top 100 employers' list, a remarkable trajectory for the British intelligence agency that only lifted its historic ban on gay people 25 years ago. More than 400 companies took part in the list compiled by the charity, which campaigns for the equality of lesbian, gay, bisexual and trans people across Britain. Lloyds Banking Group was second, with the National Assembly for Wales in third. A survey revealed that MI5 last year provided staff with quality employment policies, training, career development opportunities, and especially support for LGBT employees. Ruth Hunt, the Stonewall chief executive, said: "MI5 have made fantastic strides in creating an inclusive workplace. This is an amazing achievement and demonstrates just how seriously diversity and inclusion is taken."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

24. Terrorism Act incompatible with human rights, court rules in David Miranda case

The Guardian (London), Owen Bowcott, 2016 01 19

London - A key clause in the Terrorism Act 2000 is incompatible with the European convention on human rights, the master of the rolls, Lord Dyson, has declared as part of a court of appeal judgment. His judgment came in the case of a man detained at Heathrow airport for carrying files related to information obtained by the US whistleblower Edward Snowden. Dyson's decision will force government ministers to re-examine the act, which has now been found to be inconsistent with European law. Dyson said that the powers contained in schedule 7 of the Terrorism Act (2000) were flawed. Schedule 7 of the Act allows travellers to be questioned in order to find out whether they appear to be terrorists. They have no right to remain silent or receive legal advice, and they may be detained for up to nine hours. "The stop power, if used in respect of journalistic information or material is incompatible with article 10 [freedom of expression] of the [European convention on human rights] because it is not 'prescribed by law'," the master of the rolls said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

25. Australia not prepared for cyber war

ABC (Australia), Francis Keany, 2016 01 19

Canberra - A new report warns Australia is not adequately prepared for cyber war, with the nation "badly lagging" behind overseas counterparts and the Defence Force also at risk. Research by the Australian Centre for Cyber Security (ACCS) said Australian government and civilian organisations were well behind China and the United States, which have gone to great lengths to prepare themselves. The report released by Professor Greg Austin called for a "rapid catch-up in Australian capabilities for military security in the information age", warning Australia's response to the threats that have emerged in cyberspace has been "slow and fragmented". Another report by the ACCS has also warned the Australian Defence Force (ADF) has not done enough to test its ability to ward off cyber attacks against weapons systems. While Australia has relied on the United States for its security needs for the past 60 years, the report warned that support would be limited when it came to cyber warfare. This is despite Australia's involvement in the Five Eyes intelligence alliance. "The reliance by middle powers such as Australia on the United States for extended deterrence may not have as much impact in cyber space as for kinetic operations," Professor Austin said. He said while there was public debate about the future of Australia's naval, air and ground capabilities, there has been "no effort in public by the government to benchmark Australian national security needs in cyber space in the same way".

Return to Top / Haut de la page

26. Jihadi brother fled overseas

The Courier-Mail, Laura Banks and Mark Morri, 2016 01 19

Melbourne - The brother of teen terrorist Farhad Jabar, who shot and killed NSW police employee Curtis Cheng, fled Australia two weeks after the murder and is now being monitored by Australian security agencies. Farshad Jabar, 22, was known to both federal and state counter-terrorist agencies before his brother was shot dead after carrying out Mr Cheng's kerbside execution outside Parramatta Police Headquarters on October 2. Their sister, Shadi, 27, is now thought to be in Syria, having flown to Turkey just one day before her 15-year-old brother carried out the heinous terror attack. Farshad, who along with his siblings is an Iranian-born Iraqi-Kurd, contacted police on the afternoon of the shooting telling them he believed his brother was involved. "He (Farshad) was on the periphery of some individuals that were being monitored but not considered a real threat," an intelligence source said. In the aftermath of the attack, Farshad was interviewed several times about his alleged association with some known radicals, as well as his brother's contact with them. Police have not charged Farshad with any offence. While being questioned by police, Farshad told them that he, his wife and their young daughter were moving back to Iraq because of the media attention he and his family were getting. The young family left the country just days after the radicalised teen was buried in the Islamic section of Rookwood Cemetery.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

27. More force to fight ISIS

The Courier-Mail, Simon Benson and Tory Shepherd, 2016 01 19

Melbourne - Malcolm Turnbull will use a political address in Washington today to call for more boots on the ground in Syria and Iraq to defeat ISIS. They just won't be Australian boots. In a landmark national security speech to the Centre for Strategic and Independent Studies the PM will sharpen his language on terrorism, saying it was wrong to say ISIS had nothing to do with Islam. "We should not be so delicate as to say ISIL and its ilk have 'got nothing to do with Islam'," he will say in his address. "But equally we should not tag all Muslims or their religion with responsibility for the crimes of a tiny criminal minority. That is precisely what the extremists want us to do." An Australian warship with about 200 crew will join a French aircraft carrier that is in the Middle East for the fight against Islamic extremists. The new commitment came as Mr Turnbull arrived in the US to meet President Barack Obama, days after Mr Obama called for Australia and other partners to do more to counter ISIS. Mr Turnbull visited Iraq and Afghanistan on his way to the US and said Australia would not commit more troops to the war on ISIS.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Afghanistan • Pakistan

28. 10 killed in blast targeting security forces vehicle in Khyber

Pakistan Dawn, Ali Akbar, 2016 01 19

Peshawar - At least 10 people were killed and over 20 wounded when a bomb exploded near a security checkpost situated close to the Karkhano Market area here on Tuesday, rescue officials said. Most of the dead include personnel from the Khyber Khasadar Force, rescue sources said. Tehreek-i- Taliban Pakistan (TTP) Fazlullah group claimed responsibility for the attack. The blast, which targeted a vehicle of the Khasadar Force, also killed the Assistant Line Officer Nawabshah and president of the Tribal Union of Journalists Mehmoob Shah. "Although the exact nature of the blast is being ascertained, it appears to be a suicide attack," said political agent Khyber Agency Shahab Ali Shah. He said 10 people were confirmed to have died in the blast that targeted Khasadar personnel. The explosion occurred in Khyber Agency's Jamrud area, near Karkhano, said Capital City Police Officer (CCPO) Mubarak Zeb Khan. Karkhano is the gateway to Peshawar from the tribal belt.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

29. Intelligence agent gunned down by motorcyclists in Nimroz

Pajhwok Afghan News, Ramin, 2016 01 19

Zaranj - Unidentified gunmen have shot dead an agent of the intelligence service in southwestern Nimroz province, a security official said on Tuesday. The official, who wished to go unnamed, told Pajhwok Afghan News two motorcyclists opened fire on Mirajuddin late on Monday in the Shuhada Square of Zaranj, the provincial capital. Col. Abdul Hadi Aziz, the crime branch chief, confirmed the shooting and said the local spy network employee was on his way home when gunmen opened fire on him. The assailants managed to flee the scene, but police have launched a search for the killers. It was the third target killing incident in Zaranj in the past one week. (Full Report).

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

30. « Daech pousse AQMI à multiplier les attaques »

24 Heures (Suisse), Olivier Bot, 2016 01 19

Ouagadougou - L'attaque au Burkina Faso s'inscrit dans une lutte d'influence avec Daech. Entretien avec Lemine Ould M. Salem En s'attaquant à des expatriés à Ouagadougou, capitale du Burkina Faso, considéré comme le pays « sanctuaire du Sahel », Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique (AQMI), qui revendique l'attaque qui a fait 29 morts dont deux Valaisans, a fait la démonstration sanglante de sa force de frappe. Déjouant le déploiement militaire important de l'opération Barkhane de l'armée française avec les troupes des pays du G5 du Sahel (Mauritanie, Mali, Niger, Tchad et Burkina Faso), le groupe de Mokhtar Belmokhtar, Al-Mourabitoune, a renouvelé l'attaque commando du Radisson Blu de Bamako au Mali (22 morts). Lémine Ould M. Salem, correspondant au Sahel de 24 heures, est l'un des rares journalistes à avoir été en contact avec des combattants et des chefs djihadistes de la région. Il a réalisé un film intitulé Salafistes (sortie le 27 janvier) qui tente de comprendre la motivation de ce courant de l'islam fondamentaliste dont une branche est djihadiste. Entretien. Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique a revendiqué l'attaque de Ouagadougou, menée par le groupe de Mokhtar Belmokhtar. Il est désormais le chef d'AQMI? Depuis la mort d'Abou Zeid et l'opération Serval de l'armée française au Mali, c'est effectivement lui le chef d'AQMI. Ce sont des « retrouvailles », car il avait quitté AQMI en 2012, même si les liens n'étaient pas tout à fait rompus.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

31. Arrestation d'un Belge lié aux attentats de Paris

All Africa, Journaliste maison, 2016 01 18

Al-Mohammadiya, Maroc - Un Belge d'origine marocaine « lié directement » aux auteurs des attentats de Paris, a été arrêté la semaine dernière au Maroc, a annoncé ce lundi le ministère de l'Intérieur à Rabat. Identifié par ses seules initiales, « J.A », l'homme a été arrêté vendredi dans la ville d'al-Mohammadiya, près de Casablanca, a précisé le ministère dans un communiqué. Il est « lié directement à certains auteurs des attentats de Paris » qui ont fait le 13 novembre 130 morts et ont été revendiqués par le groupe Etat islamique (EI). Selon l'enquête, ce Belge s'est rendu en Syrie avec l'un des kamikazes qui s'est fait exploser dans la région de Saint-Denis près du Stade-de-France. Il a rejoint dans un premier temps le Front al-Nosra, la branche syrienne d'al-Qaïda, avant d'être enrôlé par les jihadistes de l'EI, a ajouté le ministère.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

32. Attaques terroristes à Ouaga - La réaction du N23 et la liste nominative des victimes

All Africa, Journaliste maison, 2016 01 18

Ouagadougou - La principale organisation de la société civile de la diaspora burkinabè le N23 (Mouvement du 23 novembre), dans une déclaration, a appelé, le 17 janvier, les membres de la diaspora burkinabè à travers le monde à se mobiliser. Le N23 demande à « toute la diaspora burkinabè et au peuple burkinabè vivant sur tout le territoire burkinabè de se mobiliser pour apporter la riposte appropriée afin de mettre hors d'état de nuire le terrorisme dans toutes ses formes ». Aussi, le coordonnateur général de cette organisation, Moumouni Pograwa, a-t-il demandé, au peuple Burkinabè de se dresser comme un seul homme contre le terrorisme. Et cela pour mettre fin à toute idée de déstabilisation du Burkina. « Aucune organisation terroriste ne doit affaiblir ou détruire les efforts de construction d'un Burkina Faso démocratique, paisible et prospère », a-t-il insisté. Après qu'il ait présenté les condoléances de son mouvement aux familles éplorées et un prompt rétablissement aux blessés. Il faut rappeler que c'est dans la nuit du 15 au 16 janvier que des terroristes ont perpétrés une attaque d'une rare violence contre l'Hôtel Splendid, et le café Capuccino. Revendiquée par l'organisation criminelle Al-Qaïda au maghreb islamique (Aqmi), cette attaque a fait une vingtaine de morts d'une dizaine de nationalité.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

33. Comment se finance le terrorisme au Sahel ? Emilio Ernesto Manfredi Chercheur et analyste politique

La Croix, François D'Alancon, 2016 01 19

Non identifié - Comment se finance le terrorisme au Sahel ? Emilio Ernesto Manfredi Chercheur et analyste politique, spécialiste du Sahel L'attaque djihadiste survenue à Ouagadougou vendredi et samedi (29 morts) a été revendiquée par Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi), qui l'a attribuée au groupe Al-Mourabitoune de Mokhtar Belmokhtar. Ce dernier groupe avait déjà revendiqué l'attentat du 20 novembre 2015 contre l'hôtel Radisson Blu de Bamako (20 morts). « Les groupes djihadistes se financent de plusieurs manières à travers leurs relations avec les communautés tribales et locales de la région, zone de transit des produits licites et illicites entre la Méditerranée et l'Afrique de l'Ouest. Les groupes djihadistes opèrent sur ces routes, bénéficiant parfois d'arrangements financiers avec des criminels locaux qui assurent la sécurité des convois. Les enlèvements sont une autre source de revenus. Une forme d'interconnexion existe entre groupes djihadistes, réseaux criminels, élites et institutions locales. Dans certains cas, les réseaux criminels impliqués dans le trafic de migrants bénéficient de la connivence et parfois de la coopération active des fonctionnaires et représentants de l'État.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

34. Somali General: Kenyans Were Warned of Al-Shabab Attack

Voice of America, Harun Maruf, 2016 01 18

Mogadishu - A Kenyan army unit reportedly decimated in an attack by al-Shabab militants last Friday had received warning of the assault, according to a Somali general. The commander of Somali troops in the Gedo region, General Abbas Ibrahim Gurey, tells VOA's Somali service that the unit's commander was given word of a possible attack hours before the first bullet was fired. "It was information we knew, the information was received, and they were ready for it," Gurey said in a telephone interview Sunday. The Gedo region's deputy governor has said the attack killed at least 40 Kenyan soldiers stationed at an African Union base in El-Adde, a town in southern Somalia, near the border with Kenya

Return to Top / Haut de la page

35. Un homme lié aux attentats de Paris arrêté à Mohammedia

La Nouvelle Tribune (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 01 18

Mohammedia, Maroc - Le bureau central des investigations judiciaires (BCIJ) relevant de la Direction Générale de la Surveillance du Territoire (DGST) a réussi à arrêter, vendredi dernier à Mohammedia, un ressortissant belge d'origine marocaine en relation directe avec certains auteurs des attentats terroristes perpétrés en novembre dernier à Paris. L'enquête en cours a révélé que le prévenu a voyagé en Syrie à partir de la Belgique en compagnie de l'un des kamikazes de Saint Denis (Paris) pour rejoindre, dans un premier temps, le « Front Al-Nosra » avant de rallier, par la suite, les rangs de l'organisation « Daech » où il a bénéficié d'entraînements militaires sur le maniement de différents types d'armes et sur les techniques de guérilla, avant d'être affecté sur l'un des fronts du conflit, indique un communiqué du ministère de l'Intérieur. Lors de son séjour en Syrie, le mis en cause avait noué des liens étroits avec des dirigeants de Daech, dont le cerveau des attentats de Paris, et qui avaient menacé de lancer des attaques terroristes contre la France et la Belgique, souligne le communiqué.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Asia • Asie

36. 'DSI must speed up probe into top monk'

The Nation, 2016 01 19

Ex-head of buddhist reform panel says doubt over sangha nominee needs to be resolved soon
THE senior abbot nominated to be the next Supreme Patriarch is facing a major challenge, under intense pressure from an probe by the Department of Special Investigation (DSI) into a luxury car at his temple. "This case could generate a real controversy. To ensure that the appointment of the Supreme Patriarch will be smooth, the DSI should clearly answer three questions that the public has in mind," Paiboon Nititawan, head of a Buddhist-reform panel of the now-defunct National Reform Council, said yesterday. He came forward to formally demand that the DSI urgently expedite its inquiry. The DSI must determine whether the Mercedes-Benz belonging to Somdej Phra Maharatchamangk-lachan (Chuang Varapunya), the 80-year-old abbot of Pak Nam Temple, was illegal and how the monk acquired it. "Also, the DSI must check whether the monk has violated any law," he said. Somdej Chuang is now the acting Supreme Patriarch. Last week, the senior monk won the endorsement of the Supreme Sangha Council to become the top Sangha head in Thailand.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

37. Agencies fear ISIS 'lone wolf' attack during Hollande visit

Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 01 19

New Delhi - The central security establishment feels the threat of a "lone wolf" attack by an Islamic State-inspired element is real, given the out it's appeal among net-savvy Indian youth. In fact, the runup to the Republic Day is seen as a crucial period when ISIS sympathisers may try to register their presence by indulging in a lone wolf strike anywhere in the country. "The fact that French President Francois Hollande is the chief guest for Republic Day parade this year, may encourage elements under IS influence to indulge in a one-off attack to attract global attention," said a source. Incidentally, Paris saw terror attacks by IS in November last year, leading Hollande to order retaliatory air strikes in ISIS territory. "If there are indeed hardened IS sympathizers in India, there is a good chance that they might try to protest against Hollande's visit by indulging in a lone wolf strike.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

38. IS shows new characteristics in Jakarta attacks: Analysis

Jakarta Post, 2016 01 19

The Jan. 14 terrorist attacks in Jakarta, for which the Islamic State (IS) group has claimed responsibility, echoed the pattern of the sieges that happened in Mumbai in 2008 and in Paris in November 2015: a coordinated assault by a team of suicide bombers and active shooters. It is already a globally known concept for inciting terror, but for Indonesia, which has been a target of terrorist bombings by al-Qaeda affiliates for more than a decade, this is a new form of attack introduced by IS on the country's soil. "Definitely, the Islamic State group's strategy is different from that of al-Qaeda, since their ideologies differ as well," terrorism expert Al-Chaidar told thejakartapost.com recently. Unlike al-Qaeda, whose previous attacks in Indonesia involved massive bombings, Indonesian IS affiliates had never specialized in bomb-making as they never had the chance to learn the skills, leading them to be only able to create small explosive devices, Al-Chaidar said. Some allies of al-Qaeda's regional leader who was killed in 2010, Noordin M. Top, who conducted military training in Aceh, North Sumatra, have refused to pass their bomb-making skills to IS affiliates in the region.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

39. N.Korean Hardliner to Helm Office Dealing with S.Korea

Chosun Ilbo, 2016 01 19

The elderly North Korean hardliner behind the sinking of a South Korean Navy corvette in 2010 has apparently been appointed to lead the Workers Party office dealing with cross-border affairs. The appointment of Kim Yong-chol (70), formerly head of the General Bureau of Reconnaissance, to helm the United Front Department, provides more fuel to speculation that military hardliners are gaining the upper hand in internal power struggles. Kim Yong-chol replaces Kim Yang-gon, who died in a mysterious car accident late last year, according to government sources here Monday. Born in Ryanggang Province in 1946, Kim Yong-chol graduated from Kim Il-sung Military Academy and rose to the position of chief of the General Bureau of Reconnaissance in February of 2009.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

40. Pak has taken no action against Masood Azhar, Jaish: Intelligence sources

Times of India, Bharti Jain, 2016 01 19

New Delhi - India doubts that Pakistan has taken action against anybody of any consequence in Jaish-e-Muhammed, the terror group which allegedly carried out the attack on the Pathankot airbase, a suspicion which may have a bearing on when the Modi government agrees to hold the foreign secretary-level dialogue. Sources in the intelligence establishment here told TOI that, contrary to claims in the Pakistani media, Maulana Masood Azhar, the India-hating chief of Jaish, has not been detained. In fact, information trickling in suggests that though three Jaish operatives were detained in Pakistan, it is not for any direct role in the Pathankot attack but because literature on Jaish was found in their possession. Indian intelligence officials now suspect that the news of Azhar being taken into custody could be more of a "misinformation".

Return to Top / Haut de la page

41. Security agencies outline plans to tackle threats

Straits Times, 2016 01 19

Singapore is boosting the capabilities of its security agencies to deal with a range of threats, from terrorism to cyber crime. The Singapore Armed Forces is developing know-how such as unmanned systems and robotics, and the police are installing cameras at HDB estates and public areas to deter criminal and terror activity. These broad plans to keep Singapore safe and secure were outlined by the Defence, Foreign Affairs and Home Affairs ministries yesterday, in addenda to President Tony Tan Keng Yam's address to Parliament. Speaking at the opening of Parliament last Friday, Dr Tan said Singapore can remain sovereign only if its people are able to determine their own fate. Deputy Prime Minister and Coordinating Minister for National Security Teo Chee Hean, who oversees the National Security Coordination Secretariat, said yesterday that strengthening social resilience is also crucial. "In the event of a crisis, it is not just the security agencies that will be called to respond. Our society as a whole will also be tested," he said. "We must ensure that we can bounce back from any incident, and emerge stronger and more united." Several other ministries will release their plans this week. MPs will then debate these policies when Parliament sits for a week from next Monday. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

42. Spy chief's role threatens hopes for Korea peace

London Times, Richard Lloyd Perry, 2016 01 19

Tokyo - Kim Jong Un, the North Korean leader, has placed a hardline spy chief in charge of relations with South Korea, in a setback for peace efforts on the peninsula. According to an intelligence report presented to South Korean MPs, Kim Yong Chol was appointed to the job after its previous occupant died in a car crash last month. As head of the general reconnaissance bureau, General Kim is held responsible by South Korea for acts of aggression that have brought the two sides close to war. In 2010 he ordered a submarine attack on a South Korean naval corvette, the Cheonan, which killed 46 sailors. General Kim, 70, was formerly a bodyguard of Kim Jong Un's father, Kim Jong Il. After several years moving up the bureau's hierarchy, he became its head in 2009, the year that other intelligence agencies were consolidated under its authority. Intelligence about General Kim's appointment was included in a report by the Yeouido Institute, a think tank affiliated with South Korea's ruling party, the contents of which were leaked to journalists in Seoul yesterday. (Full report).

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

43. SBU says IS supporters recruiting new members in Ukraine

UNIAN (Ukraine), Staff report, 2016 01 18

Kiev - "In Ukraine, there are separate groups of IS ideology supporters, who are engaged in propaganda among people they know and in the recruitment of new members, the relocation of recruited persons, including those from the Caucasus and Central Asia via Ukraine and Turkey to the Syrian-Iraqi zone for fighting for or against the ISIS. They also provide [recruits] with material and financial support, temporary accommodation and supply [them] with passports and travel documents," the SBU Security Service of Ukraine told Gordon. According to the SBU, the recruits include both immigrants from Muslim countries, permanently or temporarily residing in Ukraine, and Ukrainian citizens who do not belong to ethnic groups that practice Islam. "As of today, the SBU has identified 50 people from among residents of Crimea (Ukrainian citizens and foreigners residing in Crimean territory), who are involved in fighting in Syria and Iraq as part of the Islamic State, Al-Nusra Front and related organizations. In addition, the SBU revealed 63 IS supporters from among foreign nationals who have been brought to Turkey through our country," the security service reported. The SBU concludes that Ukraine is considered by IS agents mainly as a zone for supporting terrorists' activity in third countries. At the same time, the security agency does not rule out the possibility of IS terrorist attacks on Ukrainian-based representative offices, enterprises, institutions, organizations and individual citizens of the anti-terrorist coalition.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

44. 28 Iranians Had Charges Dropped Or Released Under Swap Deal with US

Fars News Agency, 2016 01 19

Tehran - While earlier reports said 7 Iranians were released from prison and 14 others had their charges dropped under a swap deal with the US that also included freedom of four Americans in the weekend, Iran's foreign ministry spokesman on Monday put the total number of the Iranians privileged by the deal at 28. "An overall number of 28 Iranians were freed or were relieved of judicial restrictions within the framework of the agreement," Hossein Jaber Ansari told reporters in his weekly press conference in Tehran on today. Yet, he said there are many court trials or cases involving Iranians in the US, and closing all of them under the deal was not possible. "We tried to include most of these cases in the framework of the recent deal, but we could strike an agreement" over just a number of them. 4 Iranian-American nationals who were held for various charges in Iran were freed under a prisoners swap deal on Saturday.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

45. Iran Vows to Continue Advancing Missile Program

Fars News Agency, 2016 01 19

Tehran - Iran reacted to the new US sanctions after implementation of the nuclear deal with vows to further make progress in its missile program. "As explicitly stated before, the Islamic Republic of Iran will respond to such propaganda and harassing measures with pursuing its legal missile program more seriously and enhancing its national defense and security capabilities," a statement by the foreign ministry said on Monday. It also underlined that allegations against Iran's defensive and deterrent missile program by the US which is the biggest seller of advanced weapons to the regional states, used against the Palestinian and Yemeni civilians, are not legally and morally legitimate. "Iran's missile program has not been designed for carrying nuclear weapons at all and therefore, it doesn't violate any international rule," the statement added.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

46. Journalist wanted to show positive image of oft-demonized Iran

Globe and Mail, Tu Thanh Ha, 2016 01 19

Jason Rezaian, the Washington Post foreign correspondent recently released from a jail in Iran, was enamoured with that country. Just two years ago, he and his wife, who is also a reporter, were optimistic about the future. It was early in the summer of 2014 and the two journalists were in a café in Darband, a leafy district where locals come to escape Tehran's heat. The couple were being interviewed by Anthony Bourdain, the host of the CNN travel show Parts Unknown. Mr. Rezaian explained how much he wanted to give readers a more nuanced portrayal of a country often demonized by American politicians and media. "When you walk down the streets, you see a different side of things. People are proud. The culture is vibrant. People have a lot to say." A dual U.S.-Iranian citizen, he missed some things about his native California - avocados, burritos - but embraced his complicated life in Iran, his late father's country of origin. "I love it and I hate it, you know," he told Mr. Bourdain. "It's home. It's become home." Six weeks later, Mr. Rezaian and his wife, Yeganeh Salehi, were arrested.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

47. 4 Libyan detainees in UAE charged with pro-Brotherhood links (Canada).

Middle East Eye, 2016 01 19

Abu Dhabi - The United Arab Emirates (UAE) has charged four Libyan detainees with supporting pro-Muslim Brotherhood Libyan organisations, a rights group said in a statement on Monday. All four of the Libyan nationals denied the charges brought against them during their trials on Monday, the International Campaign for Freedom in the UAE said. The cases were adjourned until 15 February 2015, the statement added. According to court documents, the four are charged with providing funds, vehicles, telecommunication devices, night vision goggles and bulletproof vests to two pro-Brotherhood organisations in Libya, the Emirati government-owned news site The National reported. One of the detained is Canadian citizen Salim Alaradi, a high-profile prisoner whom human rights groups have called on the UAE to release.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

48. Aden security chief escapes assassination attempt

Gulf News, Staff Report, 2016 01 19

Sana'a - A booby-trapped car struck the home of the security chief of Yemen's southern port city of Aden on Sunday, killing about eight people, a police official said. "A four-wheel-drive vehicle loaded with explosives struck the main gate of the residential building of Aden's security chief, Brigadier Shalal Ali Shayea, leaving eight people dead -- mostly bodyguards," a local police official said on condition of anonymity. Witnesses said that "a huge blast was heard near the house of Aden's security chief in Aden's neighbourhood of Tawahi and followed by exchange of heavy gunfire." A spokesman for Aden's local government said that "for the second time, Brigadier General Shalal Shayea survived a terrorist car bombing unharmed, but some soldiers were killed and others injured at the scene."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

49. Gunmen kill judge in Yemen's Aden

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 01 19

Aden - Gunmen on a motorbike on Monday shot dead a judge in Aden, in the latest attack in the city serving as the government's temporary base. The attackers opened fire at Abdulhadi Mohammed near his house in the Mansura district, killing the judge, a police official said, adding they managed to flee. There has been a growing number of attacks and assassinations in Aden, the government's temporary capital, by extremists targeting members of the security forces and government officials. Al Qaeda and the rival ISIL group both have a presence in the city, where extremists occupy government buildings and are seen patrolling several districts and intimidating civilians. Aden was rocked by months of fighting last year between pro-government forces and Shiite Houthi rebels who seized the capital Sanaa in September 2014 before expanding southwards.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

50. Russia plays key role in stability of the world, Qatar Emir tells Putin

The National (UAE), Staff Report, 2016 01 19

Moscow - President Vladimir Putin and the Emir of Qatar on Monday discussed the Syrian crisis, as global powers seek to push the warring sides towards the negotiating table. "Russia plays a main role when it comes to stability in the world," Sheikh Tamim bin Hamad Al Thani said at the start of the meeting at the Kremlin. "We very much want to develop relations with Russia and find a solution to a number of problems related to stability in some countries of our region," he added. Russian foreign minister Sergei Lavrov said both Moscow and Doha were expecting that, in accordance with a UN-backed plan, talks between the Syrian government and the opposition would begin "in the nearest future". Global powers are seeking to push the Syrian regime and opposition to the negotiating table in a bid to end the nearly five-year war that has cost the lives of 260,000 people.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Others • Autres

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

51. Detained Turkish reporters defiant over espionage claim

BBC News, Selin Girit, 2016 01 19

Istanbul - "We were kept in total isolation for 40 days. We were all alone in our prison cells. This punishment is the same a murderer of five people gets," writes Can Dunder, a prominent Turkish journalist currently behind bars in Istanbul. Mr Dunder, editor-in-chief of the opposition Cumhuriyet daily has been in pre-trial detention for almost two months now, along with his colleague Erdem Gul, the newspaper's Ankara bureau chief. In November, a court in Istanbul charged both journalists with espionage after their reports alleged Turkey's intelligence services were sending weapons and ammunition to Islamist rebels fighting the Syrian regime. Turkish security forces intercepted a convoy of lorries near the Syrian border in January 2014, and Cumhuriyet alleged these vehicles were linked to Turkey's MIT intelligence organisation. Alongside the newspaper report was video footage showing police discovering crates of weapons hidden beneath boxes of medicine. The government insisted that the lorries were not carrying weapons to the Islamist rebels as alleged, but bringing aid to Syria's Turkmen minority, a Turkic-speaking ethnic group.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

52. Sri Lankan tried in Germany for backing LTTE

Daily Mirror (Sri Lanka), 2016 01 19

A Sri Lankan-born man in Germany, charged with the membership of the LTTE which Germany considers a terrorist organization, went on trial on Monday, the AFP reported. The 53-year-old German national, identified only as Yogendran G. by the court, is accused of having raised funds from 2007- 2009 for the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) in and around the northern city of Hamburg. The LTTE committed a string of attacks against civilian targets and national infrastructure during the country's decades- long civil war that killed more than 100,000 people and ended in 2009 when government forces crushed the rebels. Prosecutors in the Hamburg court said the man raised more than 81,000 euros ($88,000) for combat and terrorist activities including suicide attacks by the LTTE in its campaign for a separate Tamil homeland in the South Asian country. The accused, who said he had been a German citizen since 2007, did not speak in his defence on the opening day of the trial, which was scheduled to run until March 7. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

53. Un proche d'Abaaoud arrêté

Le Soir (Belgique), Ludivine Ponciau avec M.B., 2016 01 19

Casablanca, Maroc - Terrorisme Gelel Attar était lié aux auteurs des attentats de Paris Le djihadiste belgo-marocain a été interpellé près de Casablanca. Il fait partie de la même « bande » de jeunes radicalisés que les terroristes qui ont péri à Saint-Denis. Les autorités marocaines ont procédé, le 15 janvier dernier dans la ville d'al-Mohammadiya (près de Casablanca), à l'interpellation d'un nouveau suspect dans le cadre des attentats de Paris. Le Belgo-Marocain Gelel (ou Jalal) Attar, âgé de 26 ans, serait, indiquait ce lundi le ministère de l'Intérieur à Rabat « lié directement à certains auteurs des attentats de Paris ». Le ministère qui ne précise toutefois pas s'il est soupçonné d'avoir activement pris part aux attaques qui ont fait 130 morts le 13 novembre dernier. Qui est Gelel Attar ? Ce Molenbeekois de 26 ans est un proche d'Abdelhamid Abaaoud et de Chakib Akrouh, les deux hommes qui ont trouvé la mort dans l'assaut de Saint-Denis le 18 novembre. Pour rappel, Abaaoud est à ce stade considéré comme le cerveau ou, du moins, l'un des logisticiens de l'attaque. Quant à Akrouh, il a été identifié la semaine dernière comme étant le kamikaze qui s'est fait exploser dans un appartement de Saint-Denis. On sait aujourd'hui qu'Abaaoud et Akrouh habitaient le même quartier et faisaient partie de la même « bande » de jeunes Molenbeekois radicalisés.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Monday, February 15, 2016 • lundi le 15 février 2016

44 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Canada

1. Abu Sayyaf bandits demand P1 billion for 3 foreigners, Filipina captives

Business Mirror, 2016 02 12

ABU Sayyaf bandits are demanding P1 billion for the release of three foreigners and the Filipino woman they kidnapped in September last year. Senior Supt. Roberto Fajardo, National Police Anti-Kidnapping Group (AKG) commander, said the victims were abducted on Samal Island, Davao del Norte. Norwegian Kjartan Sekkingstad and Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, and Hall's Filipino girlfriend Maritess Flor were still being held by the bandits in a still-undisclosed area in Sulu. They [victims] are still with the Abu Sayyaf. The problem is the Abu Sayyaf has no ideology and they are asking for money, which is very impossible, really, P1 billion; so that is the problem, Fajardo said during the anniversary of the AKG on Friday. Fajardo also disclosed that the leader of a kidnap-for-ransom group, who is already held at the maximum-security compound in the New Bilibid Prison, appeared to have not abandoned his criminal activity, as he was even involved in the negotiations of one incident. What is bad is, there was even a kidnapper who is negotiating, although he was already behind bars; he is at Bilibid, Fajardo said, refusing to identify the kidnap leader or even his group, or even the particular incident. We have a good coordination with the director of the Bilibid, but despite that, the kidnapers' operations inside the prison were continuing, he said. Fajardo said kidnapping cases in the country have already declined, principally because kidnap victims were already cooperating with authorities. He said that before, victims were afraid to seek the assistance of the police and even refuse to cooperate in the filing of their cases, thus, emboldening kidnap-for-ransom groups to keep on with their activity.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

2. Canadian businessman goes on trial in Abu Dhabi in terror case

Globe and Mail, Tu Thanh Ha, 2016 02 15

Column: After nearly a year and a half behind bars, a Canadian- Libyan businessman is scheduled to go to trial on Monday in Abu Dhabi, in a case that has been scrutinized by a United Nations human-rights panel because of allegations that he was arbitrarily detained and tortured. Salim Alaradi, a 48-year-old former Vancouver resident, has pleaded not guilty to three terror-related charges. His lawyer says the prosecution's case is based solely on confessions extracted under duress. Mr. Alaradi will be tried in first instance in the highest judicial echelon of the United Arab Emirates, the State Security Chamber of the Federal Supreme Court, which raises concerns that there will be limited public access and the verdict can't be appealed. The trial begins on the same day the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention is expected to release its opinion on the case of Mr. Alaradi and four other men. They were among 10 businessmen of Libyan ancestry taken into custody by plainclothes security officers around August and September, 2014.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

3. Liberals look to rejuvenate the PS

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 02 15

Ottawa - PM urged to recruit young people, professionals from other sectors. Knowing the talent pool of the public service will need to be renewed to push forward its agenda, the Liberal government is trying to figure out how to attract more young people to a sector where the average age of a new hire is pushing 40. The rising age of new recruits was flagged for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, who is also the minister of youth, as an "area in need of increased attention." According to Privy Council Office briefing documents, the average age of new hires has hit 37, and few young people are being hired. Once hired, however, people stay in the public service until they retire at about age 60. "Sustained efforts are needed to recruit young people and to attract highly skilled professionals from other sectors, especially those with the skill sets needed for the future work of the public service," the briefing documents say. The average age of entry into the public service has been creeping up, rather than decreasing, as more and more jobs require university degrees. A decade ago, the average age of a new hire was 36 - 35 for women and 36 for men. The public service is an older workforce compared with the private sector. It emerged out of the restraints of the Conservative era smaller and slightly older. Today, it is largely middle-aged, with more than 60 per cent of the employees between age 35 and 54, and the largest concentration huddled between age 40 and 54.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. Ottawa eyes fresh funding for UN group with alleged ties to Hamas

Globe and Mail, Shawn McCarthy, 2016 02 15

Ottawa - The federal Liberals are open to restoring funding for a controversial UN agency that works with Palestinians and was cut off by the former Conservative government over its alleged ties to Hamas, International Development Minister Marie-Claude Bibeau confirmed Sunday. The government has indicated it wants Canada to return to its role as an "honest broker" in the region while remaining closely allied with Israel. It is now reviewing whether to extend humanitarian funding for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which was established in 1950 to deal with Palestinian refugees and continues to work in Gaza, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. "The channel of communication is open," Ms. Bibeau said on CTV's Question Period with The Globe and Mail's Robert Fife, which aired Sunday. "We're discussing it; we're evaluating the situation. And a decision will be taken shortly." The Liberals are eyeing a plan to provide $15-million to the Palestinian relief agency, The Globe and Mail reported earlier this month. But B'nai Brith Canada, a leading Jewish lobby group, said Sunday that it strongly opposes the resumption of funding to UNRWA.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Trudeau's vision of military mission unfocused

Globe and Mail, Campbell Clark, 2016 02 15

Column: Justin Trudeau is remaking Canada's military in a Liberal image. But it remains an unfocused picture. If Canadians think he can bring back the past of Canadian peacekeeping, they have the wrong impression. On Wednesday, Mr. Trudeau's Liberals will open a debate in Parliament on the revamping of the military mission against Islamic State. And when United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon visited Ottawa Friday, Mr. Trudeau delivered a reminder that he has promised to revamp the overall mission of the military, and bring the Canadian Forces back to UN peacekeeping. Together, it presents an image of a military that will be less warrior and more peacekeeper, less bombing and more blue beret. But Mr. Trudeau's disjointed reasoning for withdrawing CF-18s from air strikes in Iraq and Syria makes it hard to tell what his view of the military's role really is. And reaching back to the iconic peacekeeping of the past presents an expectation that will clash with reality. "One of the problems is that peacekeeping is a lot more kinetic or violent than it used to be," said Stephen Saideman, a Carleton University professor and author of Adapting in the Dust: Lessons Learned from Canada's War in Afghanistan. Spoilers who seek to disrupt peacekeepers' missions have learned one way is to shoot at them. There's often not much peace to keep.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. UN praises anti-radicalization efforts

Montreal Gazette, Jesse Feith, 2016 02 15

Montreal - Montreal's centre for the prevention of radicalization leading to violence is a unique model cities around the world can learn from, United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said while visiting it Saturday morning. "We are living in a world of peril because of the spread of radicalization and extremism," Ban said alongside Mayor Denis Coderre before praising the work the centre has done. "I hope that with my experience here, and the lessons I will learn from the centre, we can more effectively and coherently counter terrorism and extremism." Ban, who was in Montreal as part of a three-day visit to Canada, noted the importance of the centre's preventive approach. "We have to address the root of this," he said. "We have to address the reasons why." Since opening last March, the centre has received 612 calls on its hotline, 144 of which were worrisome enough for the centre's social workers and psychologists to "directly intervene." Nine cases were handed to the Montreal police because of either a perceived danger for the person's own security or a danger to others. The centre's director, Herman Okomba-Debarice, said it's been receiving a steady flow of calls after experiencing a peak following November's attacks in Paris.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

7. Volontaires pour aller combattre l'état islamique

Journal de Montréal, Sarah-Maude Lefebvre, 2016 02 15

Ottawa - Il s'engage à presque 50 ans Des Québécois ont contacté l'armée canadienne après les attentats de Paris Éric Ladigue aura bientôt 50 ans et il est pourtant l'une des plus vertes recrues de l'armée canadienne. Le Français d'origine a tout laissé tomber pour défendre son nouveau pays, le Canada. Pourquoi avoir choisi de devenir militaire à l'aube de la cinquantaine ? Et pourquoi au Québec plutôt qu'en France ? J'ai pensé à l'armée toute ma vie. J'ai toujours été intéressé par la politique internationale, les conflits. Le Canada me permet d'intégrer l'armée à mon âge. Ce n'aurait pas été possible en France, où le recrutement cesse à 34 ans. Aussi, j'ai besoin quelque part de remercier le Canada de m'avoir accueilli, d'amener ma pièce à l'édifice pour qu'on aille de l'avant comme pays. J'ai obtenu ma citoyenneté canadienne l'an dernier. Trois jours après, je déposais mon dossier de candidature. J'étais très motivé.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

8. CIA director John Brennan

60 Minutes (CBS), Scott Pelley, 2016 02 14

Interview - The ISIS assault on Paris and the ISIS-inspired massacre in San Bernardino, California, share a disturbing fact, no one saw them coming. Today, the biggest terrorist threat to the United States is not like al Qaeda. ISIS is wealthy, agile, sophisticated online, and operates freely in a vast territory of its own. It prefers to be called the Islamic State. The U.S. government calls it ISIL. Reporters tend to call it ISIS for the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. But whatever the name, it has the manpower, means and ruthlessness to attack the U.S. The man who is supposed to stop that attack is John Brennan, the director of the CIA. And tonight, in a rare interview, we talk to Brennan about a world of trouble and we start with the most pressing danger. Scott Pelley: Is ISIS coming here? John Brennan: I think ISIL does want to eventually find it's, it's mark here. Scott Pelley: You're expecting an attack in the United States? John Brennan: I'm expecting them to try to put in place the operatives, the material or whatever else that they need to do or to incite people to carry out these attacks, clearly. So I believe that their attempts are inevitable. I don't think their successes necessarily are. Scott Pelley: Can you explain to the folks watching this interview why these people wanna kill us? How does attacking the United States further their interests? John Brennan: Yea, I think they're trying to provoke a clash between the West and the Muslim world, or the world that they are in as a way to gain more adherents. Because what they are claiming is that the United States is trying to take over their countries which is the furthest thing from the truth. Scott Pelley: What did you learn from Paris? John Brennan: That there is a lot that ISIL probably has underway that we don't have obviously full insight into. We knew the system was blinking red. We knew just in the days before that ISIL was trying to carry out something. But the individuals involved have been able to take advantage of the newly available means of communication that are--that are walled off, from law enforcement officials. Scott Pelley: You're talking about encrypted Internet communications. John Brennan: Yeah, I'm talking about the very sophisticated use of these technologies and communication systems.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

9. Former Miramar al-Qaida leader hid near U.S.-Mexico border, new documents show

Miami Herald, Alfonso Chardy, 2016 02 15

Miami - Adnan G. el Shukrijumah, an al-Qaida terrorist leader once based in South Florida, hid in northern Mexico with two other Arab militants in a border city across from Douglas, Arizona, in 2004, newly released State Department cables say. One of the cables noted that the information about Shukrijumah, killed in Pakistan in 2014, came from a trusted confidential source who had a relative involved in migrant smuggling. "An individual approached the Ciudad Juárez Consulate to provide information pertaining to suspect Arab extremists who have been smuggled through Mexico to the United States/Mexico border," according to a declassified cable from the U.S. consul in Ciudad Juárez to the secretary of state in September 2004. "Although not absolutely positive, one of the three is likely Adnan G. el Shukrijumah, alleged to be a Saudi Arabian terrorist cell leader thought to be in Mexico." Though sightings of Shukrijumah in Mexico had surfaced before, the 2004 cable is the first documentary evidence that American officials had information about the terror leader's alleged presence near the border. The cable said the Arabs were "being hidden" in Agua Prieta, a city in the Mexican state of Sonora located across from Douglas. The cables, obtained by Judicial Watch Inc., add new detail to the movements of Shukrijumah, who eluded capture or assassination until Pakistani soldiers killed him in December 2014 in a mountainous tribal area known as South Waziristan bordering Afghanistan.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. IRS crash was technical, not cyber

USA Today, Kevin McCoy, 2016 02 15

Washington - The computer outage that halted IRS tax return processing for more than a day resulted from not just one hardware failure but two, the tax agency says. An electrical voltage regulator on the computer server that handles tax returns for millions of Americans started to fail on Feb.3, Terence Milholland, the IRS' chief technology officer, testified at a Thursday hearing of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. As a technician worked to address the problem, a backup voltage regulator also failed, he said. Approximately 30 hours elapsed before the IRS was able to fix the regulators and resume normal service. Seeking to allay any fears that something more sinister might have been to blame, Milholland said, "This was, with absolute certainty, not a cyberattack. It was a failure of mechanical devices."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

11. Obama and Putin agree to facilitate Syrian aid

Washington Post, Karen DeYoung, 2016 02 15

Washington - President Obama and Russian President Vladimir Putin have agreed to intensify diplomatic and military cooperation to implement a cease-fire and the delivery of aid in Syria, the Kremlin said early Sunday. A statement from Putin's office said that Obama initiated a phone conversation. The White House, which said the call took place Saturday, did not mention increased U.S.-Russia cooperation but said Obama stressed the importance "of rapidly implementing humanitarian access to besieged areas." Obama also urged Putin to cease Russia's air campaign against "moderate opposition forces" in Syria, according to a White House statement released Sunday. The call came amid reports that at least one siege had been broken with the first delivery of humanitarian aid to the rebel-held Douma area, east of the Syrian capital of Damascus. Douma had been cut off by government troops since 2013. A United Nations spokesperson said from Geneva, where a task force is organizing aid under an agreement reached Friday in Munich, that the Douma delivery was a previously scheduled shipment by the Syrian Red Crescent. The spokesperson, Jessy M. Chahine, said that it would take at least 72 hours for the new assistance to reach a besieged area after approval has been given by whichever side is blocking access. Steffan de Mistura, the U.N. envoy for Syria who helped negotiate the agreement, had said that an "immediate" shipment of humanitarian assistance was expected over the weekend.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

12. U.S. presidential runner Rubio says N. Korea, China 'No. 1' threat to the U.S.

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 02 15

Washington - The No. 1 challenge the United States is facing right now is how to cope with threats posed by North Korea and China, Republican presidential runner Marco Rubio said. Rubio made the remark during a Republican presidential candidate debate Saturday night, putting the North Korean issue ahead of Middle Eastern problems and tensions with Russia. "I think there are three major threats that you want to immediately get on top of. No. 1 is, what are we doing in the Asia-Pacific region, where both North Korea and China pose threats to the national security of the United States," Rubio said. The No. 2 threat is the Middle Eastern problems, including the threat of the militant group Islamic State, and the third challenge is to rebuild and reinvigorate NATO in Central and Eastern Europe, where Russia is threatening the territory of multiple countries, Rubio said. Rubio is considered most active on North Korea issues among all U.S. presidential candidates. He has made a series of strong remarks on the communist nation since Pyongyang's fourth nuclear test followed by a long-range missile launch. The Florida senator co-sponsored a North Korea sanctions bill led by Sen. Cory Gardner (R-CO) last October. The legislation, which was later combined with a similar House bill, overwhelmingly passed the Senate and the House last week. Rubio has also called for relisting the North as a state sponsor of terrorism. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

13. Businessmen held in UAE were tortured into confessions, says UN report (Canada)

The Guardian (London), Owen Bowcott, 2016 02 15

London - Four businessmen who were arrested in the United Arab Emirates have been tortured into making confessions and could face the death penalty, according to a United Nations report and a legal opinion obtained by their British lawyer. The plight of the four men, who variously hold Libyan, American and Canadian citizenship, has been taken up by Labour's justice spokesman, Andy Slaughter, who is concerned about UK links to the Gulf state and previous complaints by Britons about being tortured in Dubai. The legal opinion by Geoffrey Robertson QC, a former UN judge, says the four businessmen - Salim Alaradi, who has Libyan and Canadian nationalities, Kamal and Mohamed Eldarrat, who have Libyan and US nationalities, and Issa al-Manna, a Libyan - have been wrongly accused of funding a terrorist organisation. They are due to go on trial in the secretive state security chamber court in Abu Dhabi on Monday. Alaradi was holidaying with his family at a beach hotel in Dubai when he was arrested last summer by the State Security Agency (SSA), according to Robertson's report. He was not permitted to notify his family or any lawyer of his arrest. "[Alaradi] was in secret detention - at an air force base, it is believed - [where] he claims he was tortured, a claim corroborated by serious bruising observed on his body, by similar claims by several of the men who were detained at the same time and have now been released, and by evidence of torture and ill-treatment in the UAE gathered by Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch," the report states.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

14. Revealed: UK keeps no record of citizens barred from boarding US flights

The Guardian (London), Aisha Gani, 2016 02 15

London - The Home Office has admitted it holds no record of British citizens barred from boarding transatlantic flights despite them being identified by US security officials as potential threats at UK airports. James Brokenshire, the immigration minister, confirmed that information regarding the numbers, religion and ethnicity of Britons prevented from travelling abroad was not retained by the government. The admission came after a question by Stella Creasy, the Labour MP, who raised the case of a British Muslim family of 11 who were barred by US authorities from flying from Gatwick to Los Angeles, where they had planned a Disneyland holiday. The Mahmood family had been granted travel authorisation through a pre-flight visa obtained online but were blocked when attempting to board their plane in December.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

15. Counter-terrorism courses surge in popularity

The Age, Liz Porter, 2016 02 15

Canberra - Terrorism is the defining issue of the early 21st century and it has now become an academic discipline with more than 5000 Australian students enrolled in anti-terrorism and cyber-security courses, writes Liz Porter. Back in 2009, Ellie Cumine wanted to study security and counter-terrorism but no Victorian university was offering such a course. So she enrolled, instead, in a Deakin University international relations degree, choosing majors in Middle Eastern studies and Arabic. Her fascination with counter-terrorism had begun on September 11, 2001. Then in year 10 at Bendigo's Creek St Christian College, she'd arrived at school to hear her classmates talking about terrorist attacks and planes flying into buildings. Before-school TV had been off limits in her home, and the young student thought her friends were talking about some bizarre new plot line on Neighbours. The process of learning about the catastrophic events in New York sparked an interest in world politics that flowered, two years later, when she spent time as a exchange student in Eastern Europe. She was already, she recalls, very much "a patriotic person". So, when it became time to think about a career, the idea of a counter-terrorism course beckoned. "I wanted to be able to work protecting the kind of life I was having," she says. Cumine, now 29, took a break from university after three years of juggling part-time and off-campus study with work. When she was ready to return, she was delighted to find that Swinburne University had begun an online bachelor of social science (security and counter-terrorism) course. According to Dr Julian Droogan, a lecturer on the course and a member of the NSW Premier's advisory council on countering violent extremism, government departments and representatives of airlines, banks, accountancy firms and other industry representatives told the undergraduate course designers what they were looking for in potential employees in their security areas - and what was missing in graduates of other courses. Intelligence, counter-terrorism and extremism are hot topics for giant accountancy firms, Droogan explains, because they do consultancy work for governments dealing with the whole range of modern security issues, including environmental problems, migration of refugees, warfare (conventional and unconventional), cyber security, terrorism and the economic effects of globalisation. Students, Droogan says, are attracted to these courses "not because they want to work for ASIO but because they want to grapple with the world as it is, not the world as it is presented in traditional international relations classes or traditional politics classes. They want to work in an area that is fluid and applied."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

16. New Zealand's new High Commissioner to Canada a Hamilton man

Stuff News, Libby Wilson, 2016 02 15

Wellington - Daniel Mellsop has been named New Zealand's next High Commissioner to Canada. He will be based in Ottawa and start late February 2016. And though Mellsop has lived in countries from the Netherlands to Korea he hasn't forgotten his Waikato links. "They gave me a Chiefs jersey as my farewell present [from my current role]," he said. Mellsop grew up in Hamilton East and attended Marian Catholic School and St John's College. During an AFS exchange to Russia he got the idea of diplomacy as a career, when he had dinner with the delegation of a visiting NZ trade minister in St Petersburg. "I was invited because I was one of only three Kiwis in town," he said. Chatting with the diplomats was a turning point and Mellsop returned to New Zealand to study Korean language and economics at the University of Waikato. Diplomacy won out over business because of the variety, he said. "It's not really a nine to five job but your day-to-day work activities are really quite fascinating." A High Commissioner is essentially an Ambassador, but the title is used between Commonwealth countries. "When you're the head of this High Commission, the embassy, overseas the buck stops with you but also you have got the opportunity to explore the areas you think are going to be of most value," Mellsop said. Tasks on his agenda will include business promotion, hosting an ANZAC Day ceremony, discussing Canada's role in the war against ISIS, and tourism or education promotion. The role also includes being High Commissioner to Jamaica, which Mellsop expects to visit about once or twice a year.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

17. Qld terror accused loses bail bid

Australian Associated Press, Alexandra Patrikios, 2016 02 15

Brisbane - An Islamic bookstore owner facing terrorism-related charges in Queensland has had a Supreme Court bail bid knocked back. Omar Succarieh is accused of fundraising for the Jabhat al-Nusra terror group in Syria, and arranging to send an alleged associate to join the fighting. Justice Jean Dalton denied him bail in the Brisbane Supreme Court on Monday after finding Succarieh's access to the prosecution's electronic evidence - largely telephone and surveillance recordings - had improved since he was provided with a laptop in prison. Justice Dalton noted the 32-year-old had the chance to use his laptop more than he was presently doing. Succarieh's lawyer Saul Holt had argued his client needed to be released so he could properly prepare for trial by going through thousands of hours of recordings. But this was hindered by an "element of randomness" in prison rules about where and when he could use his laptop, Mr Holt said, arguing the accused was prevented from bringing it to on-site meetings with his lawyer.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Afghanistan • Pakistan

18. Abdullah to Taliban: Stop using children as soldiers

Pajhwok Afghan News, Pajhwok Report, 2016 02 15

Kabul - Chief Executive Officer Dr. Abdullah Abdullahon Monday asked the Taliban to stop using children as soldiers in the ongoing conflict in the country. The national unity government was pursuing a zero-tolerance policy on child soldiers, he told a ceremony marking the 27th anniversary of the Soviet military withdrawal from Afghanistan. While asking the insurgent movement to join the peace process, the CEO reiterated: "We won't tolerate the use of children for military purposes." About the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan from 1979 to 1989, he said the repercussions of the war still continued to linger on. "We are suffering from the aftermath of the Soviet defeat in the form of widespread insecurity." Hailing the jihad against the Soviet troops as a great achievement of the entire Afghan nation, he suggested it would be wrong to ascribe that victory to a handful of individuals.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

19. Isis and the Taliban are brutally carving up modern 'Mafiastan'

The Independent (UK), Robert Fisk, 2016 02 15

Column - If anyone wants to understand the shame of Afghanistan - the yearly cull of civilians, the beheadings, the execution by single shots, the kidnapping of women - they have only to read the shocking UN report just published in Kabul. It is laced with fearful eyewitness descriptions of brutality. Isis features in its 87 pages with its usual depravity - in Afghanistan, of course, not in Iraq or Syria - and the report's statistics show clearly that, last year, there were more civilians killed or wounded in the country than in any year since 2009. In 2015 alone, 3,545 civilians were killed and 7,457 injured. Since 2009, the total civilian dead - not soldiers, militiamen or Taliban - comes to 21,323 dead. And this, remember, is the graveyard of empires into which we blithely trod after 9/11 on the basis that we would not "forget" Afghanistan again. We would see it through to the end. The Taliban, in the words of a Canadian commander, were "scumbags". Our soldiers would not die in vain. And it has come to this. The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (Unama) is a very professional institution. It has rigorously examined eyewitness testimonials and its new report contains harrowing quotations from victims of the country's war. In total, 62 per cent of civilian deaths and injuries were caused by "anti-government elements" and 17 per cent by "pro-government forces" - 14 per cent of these by the US-trained Afghan National Security Forces. Unama confirmed that Isis fighters forced the closure of 25 educational institutions in Deh Bala district, depriving 14,102 students - including 4,900 girls - of education and 341 teachers of work. Here, then, is Isis at work, just as it operates in Iraq and Syria.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

20. Join reconciliation process, Gen. Campbell tells Taliban

Pajhwok Afghan News, Javed Hamim Kakar, 2016 02 15

Kabul - Afghanistan is facing a threat from Taliban, not the Islamic State (Daesh), the outgoing commander of US and NATO troops said on Saturday. But Gen. John Campbell, confirming his retirement at the end of his 18-month assignment in the war-torn country, hoped Afghan security forces would be able to beat back the Taliban offensive. Addressing his last media briefing in Kabul, the Resolute Support commander asked the rebels to join the reconciliation process if they wanted to have a role in the Afghanistan's future. "The Taliban, not Daesh, pose the main danger to the (Afghan) government," remarked the four-star general, who is going to be replaced in early March by Lt. Gen. John Nicholson. The US had significantly stepped up air raids against Daesh fighters in Afghanistan, he said, adding the group had a tenuous presence in the landlocked country.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

21. Dans le nord, les jihadistes montrent qu'ils sont toujours là

All Africa, Journaliste maison, 2016 02 14

Tombouctou - Deux attaques ont été perpétrées le même jour au nord-est et au nord-ouest, l'une à Kidal et l'autre à Tombouctou. Toutes deux rapidement revendiquées par des groupes islamistes : Ansar Dine d'un côté, Aqmi de l'autre. Trois ans après l'intervention militaire française, la capacité opérationnelle des groupes jihadistes dans le nord du Mali, qui un moment avait faibli, en étonne aujourd'hui plus d'un. On les croyait anéantis, on les donnait déstabilisés pour longtemps, mais les jihadistes sont présents et très actifs. Il y a environ deux mois par exemple, au vu et au su de tout le monde, ils ont débarqué dans un convoi de véhicules à une rencontre communautaire dans la région de Tombouctou et très rapidement la rencontre s'est transformée en prêche jihadiste. Début janvier, les jihadistes armés et/ou leurs sous-traitants organisaient à Tombouctou le rapt d'une ressortissante suisse. Ils ont également multiplié les attaques contre les troupes étrangères et l'armée malienne à Kidal. Six casques bleus de l'ONU ont été tués ce vendredi. Le même jour, près de Tombouctou, ce sont trois militaires maliens qui ont perdu la vie dans une embuscade. Certains se demandent d'ailleurs si les deux opérations n'étaient pas coordonnées.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

22. Experts Call for Comprehensive Approach Against Al-Shabab

Voice of America, Harun Maruf, 2016 02 15

Washington - In recent days, al-Shabab fighters killed individuals accused of collaborating with the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) in the town of Marka after the international force withdrew. Al-Shabab posted pictures of the body of at least person labelled "collaborator" riddled with bullets. In September last year a local elder was abducted by al-Shabab in Awdhegla shortly after AMISOM and government troops pulled out. He has not been seen again. In June the same year when al-Shabab took over Leego, the town's chairman was apprehended and beheaded by militants. Sunil Suri, of the London-based NGO Saferworld, said the current approach to fighting al-Shabab has not benefited ordinary civilians. "A military approach is meant to provide security, but then security for who? When we think about the withdrawal of Marka a collaborator gets killed, that is not security for that person who helped AMISOM and the government structure of that town," he said. Suri said the AU mission has not been effective in terms of ensuring the Somali peoples' security needs are met. Instead, he argues, international security concerns are often prioritized.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

23. Tunis : La Libye sur le sentier de la guerre. La Tunisie n'a pas à craindre une attaque de Daech !

African Manager (Tunisie), Journaliste maison, 2016 02 14

Tripoli, Libye - Le compte à rebours a très vraisemblablement commencé pour l'intervention militaire en Libye. Il ne resterait plus que la demande qui doit être obligatoirement faite par le gouvernement d'union nationale qui doit être formé ce dimanche 14 février 2015, dernier jour du délai fixé à cette fin par le Parlement reconnu. Les membres du Conseil présidentiel libyen s'y attellent au moment où des responsables libyens annonçaient qu'ils étaient proches d'un consensus. La tendance actuelle n'est pas alors de temporiser vu la situation sécuritaire dans le pays qui fait face à la montée du groupe terroriste autoproclamé "Etat islamique" (EI/Daech). "Il n'y a plus de temps à perdre pour que ce gouvernement d'union nationale puisse prendre ses fonctions et s'installer à Tripoli en toute sécurité", a souligné le nouveau ministre français des Affaires étrangères, Jean-Marc Ayrault, à l'issue d'une réunion à Munich sur l'avenir de la Libye avec notamment ses homologues américain, allemand et italien. "Ce qui se passe à quelques centaines de kilomètres de l'Italie ne peut nous être égal en Allemagne et en Europe (...) et ça ne nous est certainement pas égal quand, à côté de l'Europe, les milices terroristes de l'EI prennent pied", a de son côté martelé le ministre allemand, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, dans un communiqué.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

24. Twitter suspends accounts of Colombia's ELN rebels

Colombia Reports, Staff report, 2016 02 15

Bogota - Social media platform Twitter has shut down the official account of Colombia's second largest rebel group, the ELN, just when the guerrillas were stepping up violence ahead of possible formal peace talks. The guerrillas used their accounts, @ELN_Colombia and @ELN_Ranpal, to disseminate political propaganda and updates on the preliminary talks with the Colombian government. However, over the past week, the ELN has been promoting an "armed strike," a shutdown of economic activity across Colombia. Violations of these imposed guerrilla shutdowns are commonly retaliated, for example by burning trucks or buses that refuse to adhere to the strike.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Asia • Asie

25. Beijing's Top Official in HK Calls Rioters 'Radical Separatists'

Reuters, 2016 02 15

Hong Kong - Beijing's top representative in Hong Kong has blamed radical separatists for riots that erupted in the Chinese-ruled city almost a week ago, the worst violence since pro-democracy protests paralyzed parts of the Asian financial center in 2014. More than sixty people have been arrested in connection with the violence, during which protesters hurled bricks at police and set fire to rubbish bins in Mong Kok, a tough, working-class neighborhood just across the harbor from the city's financial district. Thirty-seven people were charged on Thursday. The riots erupted when authorities tried to remove illegal street stalls set up for Lunar New Year celebrations. The actions of the "radical separatists" were "leaning towards terrorism", the South China Morning Post daily quoted Zhang Xiaoming, the head of Beijing's Liaison Office in Hong Kong, as saying. "We will not this very small number of radical separatists to destroy the most precious rule of law in Hong Kong," he told a spring festival in Hong Kong. Police fired two warning shots into the air during the violence, almost unheard of in the former British colony that reverted to Chinese rule in 1997 and is considered one of Asia's safest cities. More than 130 people were wounded in the clashes. At least one of those charged in connection with the trouble belongs to a group called Hong Kong Indigenous, one of a cluster of outspoken groups calling for greater Hong Kong autonomy and even independence from China, the group said. Hong Kong leader Leung Chun-ying, who attended the same reception as Zhang, echoed the Beijing official's comments, saying the rioters only represented a small minority in the city, the South China Morning Post reported.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

26. China Rules Out Joining Anti-Terrorism Coalitions, Says Helping Iraq

Reuters, 2016 02 15

Munich - China won't take part in any coalition fighting "terrorist groups" in the Middle East, but will do its fair share in its own way and is already helping Iraq, Foreign Minister Wang Yi said. China wants to develop deeper defence and anti-terrorism ties with the Arab world, including joint exercises, intelligence sharing and training, the government said in a policy document released last month. While relying on the region for oil supplies, China has tended to leave Middle Eastern diplomacy to the other permanent members of the UN Security Council - the United States, Britain, France and Russia. After a meeting of major powers in Munich aimed at breaking the deadlock on Syria, Wang Yi told Reuters in an interview that Beijing would not take part in international coalitions fighting against militants in the region. "There is a tradition in China's foreign policy. We do not join in state groups that have a military nature and this also applies to international counter-terrorism cooperation," he said speaking through an interpreter.

"It doesn't mean that China will not play its role in fighting terrorism. It has been, but in its own ways." In December, China passed a counter-terrorism law which allows its military to venture overseas on counter-terrorism operations, though experts have said China faces big practical and diplomatic problems if it ever wants to do this. Beijing has been trying to get more diplomatically involved, especially in Syria, recently hosting both its foreign minister and opposition officials.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

27. N.Korea 'Built Mock-Up of Seoul for Military Training'

Chosun Ilbo, 2016 02 15

North Korea may have built a mock-up of parts of Seoul near the Yongbyon nuclear facility for military training purposes, Radio Free Asia reported last Wednesday. The claim comes from Curtis Melvin of the U.S.- Korea Institute at Johns Hopkins University, who analyzed Google Earth satellite imagery of the site in North Pyongan Province. The site sits northwest of the Yongbyon nuclear facility and was built in just one month between September and October 2014, Melvin said, adding it is the biggest military training camp built since Kim Jong-un came to power in 2012. It consist of an area for small-scale tactical operations drills, a 400-m range for artillery practice and a virtual training ground for vehicles. The satellite images also show communications antennae and related structures. The training ground "appears to have been designed with a specific area in mind and could have been modeled on some part of Seoul," RFA said. But Melvin added he could identify no specific parts of Seoul that may have served as the model, prompting a military source here to dismiss the story as idle speculation.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

28. N. Korea's KN-08 ICBM has potential to hit much of U.S.: Pentagon report

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 02 15

Washington - North Korea's KN-08 intercontinental ballistic missile would be capable of hitting much of the United States if it is successfully designed and developed, a U.S. Defense Department report has shown. The report said, however, that the KN-08's reliability as a weapon would be low as it has not been tested yet. The report, titled "Military and Security Developments involving the Democratic People's Republic of Korea" was submitted to Congress on Friday. "If successfully designed and developed, the KN-08 likely would be capable of reaching much of the continental United States, assuming the missiles displayed are generally representative of missiles that will be fielded," the report said. "However, ICBMs are extremely complex systems that require multiple flight tests to identify and correct design or manufacturing defects. Without flight tests, the KN-08's current reliability as a weapon system would be low," it said. It also estimated the KN-08's range at more than 3,400 miles (5,440 kilometers). U.S. military commanders have repeatedly expressed serious concerns about the KN-08, saying the missile is harder to keep an eye on as it can be launched from mobile launchers. The Pentagon report also noted the North displayed the KN-08 on six road-mobile transporter-erector-launchers (TEL) during military parades in 2012 and 2013. Last October, the North also paraded four missiles on KN-08 TELs, and those missiles were noticeably different from those previously displayed, the report said. The report said that developing a space launch vehicle contributes heavily to Pyongyang's long-range ballistic missile development because the two vehicles have many shared technologies. "However, a space launch does not test a reentry vehicle (RV). Without an RV capable of surviving atmospheric reentry, North Korea cannot deliver a weapon to target from an ICBM," the report said. Meanwhile, South Korean government sources have said that the North has formed a new military unit to deploy the KN-08. The KN-08 Brigade is a subordinate unit of the Strategic Rocket Forces, which oversees all missile units in the North, the sources said. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

29. N. Korea hackers behind massive spam emails to S. Korea: police chief

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 02 15

Seoul - North Korean hackers sent massive amounts of spam emails to South Korean public organizations last month, South Korea's police chief said Monday, the latest in a series of cyberattacks against the South in recent years. "We are at a stage to be assured that it was committed by a North Korean hacking organization," said Kang Sin-myeong, commissioner-general of the National Police Agency, announcing the interim outcome of their probe into the case. The hackers allegedly sent emails disguised as being sent by either the presidential office or the foreign ministry related to North Korea's recent nuclear test. The Internet Protocol address -- the online equivalent of a street address or phone number -- used to send the spam emails was traced to China's northeastern province of Liaoning bordering North Korea. The network can be used wirelessly from North Korean territory, according to police. It is the same Internet network behind a cyberattack on South Korea's nuclear power operator in 2014, according to Kang. North Korea is suspected of orchestrating the attack, though it has denied the charges. Police said similar emails pretending to be from the presidential office or other government bodies have been sent from June 2015 to a total of 759 people. After probing into 460 of the recipients' occupations, police said 87.8 percent have jobs related to North Korea. "Looking at the probe results, there is a trace of an intentional and deliberate targeting process that cannot be deemed as a coincidence," Kang said. Police also said some words in the mails are used only in North Korea. Although South and North Koreans speak the same language, South Koreans do not understand some North Korean expressions. The police chief said no major damage to national security has been confirmed due to the attack.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

30. U.S., China in discussions over deployment of missile shield in S. Korea

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 02 15

Beijing - The United States and China have been in discussions about the possible deployment of an advanced American missile defense system in South Korea, a diplomatic source with knowledge of the matter said Monday. The discussions are aimed at seeking China's understanding that the deployment of the Terminal High Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) battery in South Korea is not aimed at undermining China's security interests, the source said on the condition of anonymity. While the U.S. is trying to explain technical details on why the

THAAD is not targeting China, the Chinese side has not actively listened to the explanation from the U.S. side, the source said. "The Chinese side has been opposed to the THAAD with incorrect information and the discussions are aimed at changing China's view about the issue," the source said. South Korea and the U.S. are poised to hold their first formal talks on the deployment of the THAAD battery after North Korea defiantly launched a long-range rocket following its fourth nuclear test last month. With North Korea continuing to develop its nuclear and missile arsenals, analysts in Seoul say South Korea has no choice but to adopt the THAAD battery, which would be deployed at a U.S. base in South Korea, home to about 28,500 American troops. China has long voiced opposition to the THAAD battery in South Korea, claiming the missile defense system may target mainland China. U.N. Security Council members remain divided over how to punish North Korea for its fourth nuclear test on Jan. 6, with China, one of five veto-wielding council members, reluctant to put crippling sanctions on North Korea. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

31. Putin winning new 'cold war' by default

National Post, Matthew Fisher, 2016 02 15

Column: The pending limited ceasefire in Syria agreed to last week by the Russian and American foreign ministers is a sorry example of how the West is always reacting to what Vladimir Putin is doing and is unwilling or unable to seize any strategic initiative itself. The temporary truce allows Russia to continue supporting the world's most notorious henchman of the moment, Bashar Assad, while limiting coalition military action to attacks against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL). As it talks peace with Washington, Moscow's warplanes have been tearing up Syria's second- largest city, Aleppo, with no apparent concern for the hundreds of thousands of Syrians who have not yet fled from there. As a consequence, international relief agencies report that everyone who is still in Aleppo is starving and that a fresh refugee crisis for western Europe is rapidly being created on Syria's border with Turkey. Other than common decency, there is no particular reason for Russia to be concerned. After taking in more than one million refugee/migrants in 2015, Germany received 91,000 more last month, while nearly 70,000 new asylum seekers arrived in Greece - a 40-fold increase from last January. Russia has not taken in any of these desperate people, nor is it planning to. But in demonstrating the same cold-blooded violence against civilians that it used to quell the Chechen insurrection, the Kremlin has happily fanned the divisions that have emerged in western Europe over caring for so many refugees, by creating conditions that will propel even more of them in that direction.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

32. Russian official urges OSCE to set up anti-terrorist Interpol

ITAR-TASS World Service, Staff report, 2016 02 15

Moscow - The OSCE Parliamentary Assembly's special representative on anti-terrorism, Russian MP Nikolay Kovalev has proposed to create an international anti-terrorist organization similar to the Interpol. A respective proposal has been sent to OSCE PA Speaker Ilkka Kanerva, OSCE PA Secretary-General Roberto Montella and the heads of national delegations ahead of the winter session of the organization due on February 25-26 in Vienna, Austria. The proposed organization could be tasked with "searching for terrorists and their accomplices, collecting and exchanging information, detecting and assisting a country-initiator in looking for a suspect or established criminal," Kovalev said in a letter obtained by TASS. The State Duma MP, who led Russia's Federal Security Service (FSB, former KGB) in late 1990s, has also urged the consideration of such topical issues as unifying anti-terrorist laws and drafting measures aimed at curbing the funding of terrorist organizations.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

33. Russie Le tsar et le patriarche

Le Monde, Isabelle Mandraud, 2016 02 15

Moscou - Les liaisons déjà étroites entre le Kremlin et le clergé russe orthodoxe n'ont cessé de se renforcer sous l'impulsion de Vladimir Poutine, qui utilise l'Eglise pour servir son projet " patriotique " Au milieu des uniformes vert bouteille, on ne voit que le koukoulion , cette coiffe - byzantine blanche qui tombe sur les -épaules du -patriarche de Moscou et de toutes les Russies. Son -détenteur, Cyrille Ier, est assis au premier rang dans la grande salle de conférences du ministère de la défense où Vladimir Poutine est venu discourir, ce 11 décembre 2015, de la nécessité de renforcer -l'arsenal nucléaire de l'armée russe et de sa détermination à " détruire immédiatement " quiconque menacerait ses forces militaires déployées en Syrie. Puis le - patriarche est allé visiter l'église dédiée à Serge de -Radonège, l'un des saints les plus populaires de Russie, inaugurée peu auparavant au sein de ce même -ministère. -Jamais depuis la chute de l'URSS la proximité de l'Eglise orthodoxe avec le pouvoir n'avait été aussi évidente. Pendant la sanglante guerre d'Ukraine, le patriarcat de Moscou a gardé le -silence. Puis en Syrie, elle a pleinement approuvé l'intervention militaire russe.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

34. Iran's air defense vows full advisory support for Syria

Tehran Times, Political Desk, 2016 02 15

Tehran - Iran's Air Defense commander affirmed on Sunday that the country will spare no effort to provide Syria with advisory assistance in the air defense field at the request of the Damascus government. Speaking to the Tasnim News Agency, Brigadier General Farzad Esmaili stressed that if asked by the Syrian government, Iran will vigorously offer advisory help to the Syrian forces in the air defense field, making a reference to Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyed Ali Khamenei's assertion that Tehran's support for the allies comes in the form of advisory help. As regards the speculations on Saudi Arabia's decision to deploy ground troops to Syria, the commander argued that any presence in Syria without coordination with the Damascus government will be doomed to failure. Iran, a close ally of Syria, has been supporting the legitimate Syrian government in the fight against terrorists.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

35. « Nous ne permettrons pas que le Liban devienne une "ferme" des pays du Golfe », affirme le Hezbollah

L'Orient-Le Jour, Journaliste maison, 2016 02 15

Beyrouth - « Il est du droit des Libanais de demander à Riyad de cesser d'armer les takfiristes », a affirmé cheikh Nabil Qaouk. Guerre en Syrie Le Hezbollah poursuit sa campagne contre le régime saoudien qu'il continue d'accuser de soutenir les rebelles en Syrie et de renforcer les forces « takfiristes ». Dans une allocution qu'il a prononcée hier lors d'une cérémonie dans le village de Rihane, dans l'Iqlim el-Touffah, le vice- président du conseil exécutif du Hezbollah, cheikh Nabil Qaouk, a estimé qu'il est « du droit des Libanais de demander au régime saoudien de cesser d'armer les bandes takfiristes en Syrie, dans la mesure où les armes saoudiennes aux mains de ces gens représentent une menace stratégique pour tous les Libanais ainsi qu'un danger réel pour la sécurité du pays ». Pour lui, « c'est la politique saoudienne dans son ensemble, dans la région et notamment en Syrie, qui est dangereuse pour le Liban ».

Return to Top / Haut de la page

36. Death sentence for Emiratis found guilty of fighting with ISIL

The National (UAE), Naser Al Remeithi, 2016 02 15

Abu Dhabi - The Federal Supreme Court has sentenced four Emiratis to death for travelling to Syria to fight for ISIL. Abdulaziz Saud Al Najjar, 25, Moath Abdulrahman Al Harethi, 22, Saud Abdulaziz Al Menhali, 18, and Ahmed Ali Al Naqbi, 29, were all sentenced in absentia. Three other Emiratis, a Bahraini, a Syrian and a Mauritanian received prison sentences of five to 10 years for their links to the terrorist organisation. One Emirati was acquitted. Emirati Fares Mohammed Al Ketbi, 19, was given five years for joining the terrorist group. He was 17 when he travelled to Syria and told the court that he regretted his decision and surrendered himself voluntarily. Mauritanian Omar Weld Salem Weld Omar, 22, was jailed for 10 years. He provided financial aid to an ISIL member Abu Dujana in Syria and also helped Al Ketbi, Al Harethi and Al Menhali travel to Syria. He promoted the ideals of ISIL and the Jabhat Al Nusra group, an affiliate of Al Qaeda.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

37. ISIS comes under mystery attacks

Now Lebanon, Albin Szakola & Ullin Hope, 2016 02 15

Beirut - Shadowy opponents of ISIS have conducted two attacks against the extremist group in Deir Ezzor, the latest in a series of mystery strikes targeting its members in eastern Syria, according to a pro- opposition outlet. The first attack occurred shortly after 4 a.m. Thursday, when unknown assailants rigged a ZiL armored vehicle with explosives and detonated it outside one of the group's bases in Deir Ezzor, a city where control is split between the jihadist organization and the Syrian regime. However, the blast only caused material damage, according to a report published Friday morning by All4Syria. On Thursday evening, the mystery assailants struck again, firing an RPG round at a patrol of ISIS's Hisbah religious police. "The operation was executed by masked persons riding a motorbike," All4Syrai reported. "They targeted the Hisbah vehicle near the Ghassan Abboud roundabout in central Deir Ezzor, destroying the minivan and killing a number of people."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

38. Major escalation in Syria ahead of planned cease-fire

Jerusalem Post, Michael Wilner, 2016 02 15

New York - Belligerents on both sides of Syria's civil war are positioning themselves for a major escalation of the conflict, including dual advances into the heartland of Islamic State, despite US efforts to broker a nationwide cessation of hostilities by the end of next week. Just one day after American and Russian officials negotiated the temporary cease-fire plan, foreign governments supporting rebel groups increased their shipments of ground-to-ground missiles to fighters in and around Aleppo, once Syria's largest city, currently nearly surrounded by Assad government forces. Any temporary cessation of hostilities or more formal ceasefire will not include Islamic State and the al-Qaida-linked Nusra Front. Saudi Arabia and Turkey confirmed they are preparing to invade Syria on the ground, ostensibly in support of the US-led coalition against Islamic State. And Turkish media stated the military had shelled regime positions in northwestern Syria on Saturday.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

39. New video reveals Gaza tunnels built by jihadi group

Jerusalem Post, Maayan Groisman, 2016 02 15

Jerusalem - The National Resistance Brigades, the military wing of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, has revealed a new tunnel built by its fighters underneath the Gaza-Israel border. A video released by the organization on Sunday presents some of the organization's fighters striding inside the tunnel carrying arms, and shows the improvised rockets the organization possesses. Speaking in the video, the National Resistance Brigades' spokesman, Abu Khaled, claimed that his organization is preparing for the next war with the Israeli enemy. According to Abu Khaled, the tunnel presented in the video was dug by the operatives of the group's tunnels' unit and will be used by the organization's fighters to commit terror attacks against Israel and kidnap Israeli soldiers in order to swap them for Palestinian prisoners.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

40. Saudi prisons try to redirect Jihadist hate

London Times, Catherine Philp, 2016 02 15

Riyadh - In 2014, fearing blowback from battle-hardened militants returning from Syria, Saudi Arabia issued a royal decree criminalising travel abroad to fight, with a minimum prison sentence of three years. Those arrested on their return are put through Saudi Arabia's deradicalisation programme, introduced after a string of bloody attacks by al-Qaeda beginning in 2003. Now it faces a new threat in the form of Islamic State, which began attacking the kingdom last year and has vowed further revenge for Saudi Arabia's role in the military coalition against it. The kingdom has struggled to dispel its reputation as an incubator and exporter of extremism. In 2013 the European Parliament declared that Wahhabism, the religious ideology underpinning the Saudi state, was the main source of global terrorism. The conservative creed has provided inspiration for violent radicals including al-Qaeda and Isis. In Saudi Arabia, however, it provides the basis for efforts to rehabilitate violent extremists and neuter the threat they may pose to the state.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Others • Autres

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

41. Bras de fer pour le contrôle des données des Européens

Le Figaro, Lucie Ronfaut, 2016 02 15

Non identifié - Le ciel leur est presque tombé sur la tête. Le 6 octobre, la Cour de justice de l'Union européenne a déclaré illégal le système dit « Safe Harbor », qui régissait les transferts de données entre les États-Unis et l'Europe. Au travers de cette invalidation, la justice européenne s'est attaquée à l'empire des grandes entreprises américaines du Web, qui hébergent souvent les données de leurs clients européens dans des centres situés aux États-Unis. Trop dangereux pour la Cour, qui a rappelé dans sa décision les révélations d'Edward Snowden sur la surveillance de la NSA. Comment garantir que les données stockées par Facebook, Google ou Microsoft ne soient pas de nouveaux espionnées par le gouvernement américain ? Même après la négociation d'un nouvel accord pour remplacer le Safe Harbor, appelé « Privacy Shield », la question demeure. La solution avancée par les géants du Web est simple : déménager leurs serveurs en dehors des États-Unis. Les plans de construction de data centers en Europe se multiplient.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

42. Le djihadisme est devenu un instrument de revanche sociale

Le Monde, Bernard Rougier, 2016 02 15

Opinion - Le terrorisme islamiste n'est plus seulement dirigé contre l'Occident. C'est aussi un outil de contrôle de l'islam et de contestation des élites nationales au Proche-Orient, selon le politologue Bernard Rougier. Avec la première intervention américaine en Afghanistan, le «djihadisme stratégique», porté par une organisation nomade, Al-Qaida, hébergée par les talibans mais dépourvue d'enracinement solide dans le tissu social local, disparaît progressivement. Cependant, la seconde intervention américaine dans le «Grand Moyen-Orient», l'occupation de l'Irak de 2003 à 2010, a facilité, quant à elle, l'expansion d'un nouveau phénomène terroriste, le

«djihadisme social». Ancré dans l'intimité anthropologique et politique de la société irakienne, il se montre viscéralement hostile aux élites en place. Abou Moussab Al-Zarkaoui, le chef d'Al-Qaida en Irak, tué en 2006, a été l'homme de cette métamorphose. La publicité donnée dans la dernière livraison de Dar Al-Islam, la revue francophone de l'organisation, au «testament» d'Abaaoud ainsi que les images de l'exécution de prisonniers syriens par les kamikazes du 13 novembre diffusées sur le réseau social Telegram illustrent l'importance de ce recyclage de volontaires étrangers pour les dirigeants djihadistes irakiens. Bernard Rougier est politologue, professeur des universités à Paris-III, coauteur de « L'Égypte en révolutions » (PUF, 2015)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

43. Le GIGN va se rapprocher du département de la Vienne

La Nouvelle République du Centre-Ouest, F. Bluteau, 2016 02 15

Joué-lès-Tours, France - Annoncée par le ministre de l'Intérieur, Bernard Cazeneuve, la création d'une antenne du GIGN à Joué-lès-Tours (Indre-et-Loire) sera bientôt effective. La nouvelle a surpris : aucune fuite n'avait filtré... Pourtant, en interne à la gendarmerie, l'hypothèse était en discussion. Une antenne du GIGN, appelée « peloton d'intervention interrégional de la gendarmerie » (PI2G), sera donc installée à Joué-lès-Tours. C'est la seule certitude pour l'instant. Car du côté des autorités locales, aucune information précise n'a été communiquée : « no comment » à la préfecture comme au groupement de gendarmerie d'Indre-et-Loire.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

44. Oops! German Intel Agents Suspected of Financing al-Qaeda

Sputnik (Russia), Staff report, 2016 02 15

Moscow - Two German domestic intelligence officers are suspected of having given money to al-Qaeda members to gain information on the extremist group, Berliner Morgenpost newspaper reported on Sunday. The investigation has built its case on evidence provided by Irfan Peci, an ethnic Bosnian and an informant for the domestic intelligence agency BfV, who once led the German branch of the so-called "The Global Islamist Media Front," a propaganda organization associated with al-Qaeda, Berliner Morgenpost wrote. In his book "The Jihadist: Terror made in Germany" published in 2015, Peci wrote that he had received 500 euros from his BfV handler, which he was to hand over to an important Islamist leader in order to build confidence and gain more information about al-Qaeda activities. According to Peci, he had earlier paid 300 euros to members of the so-called "German Taliban Mujahidin" group with the full knowledge of his BfV curator.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Thursday, February 18, 2016 • jeudi le 18 février 2016

56 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. Canada gets stricter on visa-free travel

Agence France-Presse, Staff Writer, 2016 02 18

Ottawa - Canada will tighten its rules on entering the country next month, adding a layer of security that will impact Europeans and others previously allowed to visit without a travel visa. Formerly visa-exempt foreign nationals, including those passing through on a stopover, will have to fill out an online Electronic Travel Authorization (eTA) in advance and pay a small administrative fee (Can$7), starting March 15. The measure is similar to one set up by the United States in 2008, and will affect people from more than 50 countries. Americans will be exempt. Anyone caught unaware of the new regulations can expect some leniency in the beginning, said Robert Orr, deputy minister for immigration. The eTA is meant to help authorities better screen travellers for admissibility, Orr told AFP. He noted that Canadian security and intelligence agencies already do so but "not in a systematic way". The United States, followed by Britain, France and China (whose citizens require a visa) are the top sources of tourists to Canada, according to government figures.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

2. Détention des migrants au Canada : l'ASFC sans surveillance

Radio-Canada - Nouvelles Ottawa-Gatineau (site web), Brigitte Bureau, 2016 02 17

Ottawa - Un sénateur d'allégeance libérale s'insurge contre le manque de surveillance indépendante de l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada (ASFC). L'organisme fédéral emprisonne, chaque année, plus de 4000 demandeurs d'asile ou demandeurs déboutés, dont des centaines d'enfants. Le sénateur Wilfred Moore réclame la création d'un poste d'inspecteur pour surveiller les activités de l'ASFC. Il veut ainsi honorer la mémoire d'une Mexicaine morte en détention au pays. Le sénateur Moore déplore qu'un organisme fédéral aussi puissant que l'Agence des services frontaliers du Canada ne soit soumis à aucune surveillance externe. D'autres organismes, comme la Gendarmerie royale du Canada (GRC), le Service canadien du renseignement de sécurité (SCRS) et le Centre de la sécurité des télécommunications (CST), doivent tous rendre des comptes à des commissaires indépendants, qui reçoivent aussi les plaintes du public à leur endroit. À l'heure actuelle, un demandeur d'asile qui voudrait porter plainte contre l'ASFC n'a aucun recours indépendant, comme l'explique Jenny Jeanes, d'Action Réfugiés Montréal. « La détention est gérée par l'Agence des services frontaliers et si une personne veut se plaindre de son traitement, des conditions de détention, toutes les plaintes vont aux agents frontaliers », note-t-elle. « Il n'y a pas du tout de système externe de plainte. »

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Canada

3. Canada's air mission against ISIS has ended, Sajjan tells Commons debate

CBC.CA, Staff Writer, 2016 02 18

Ottawa - Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan has told a House of Commons debate on the future of Canada's contribution to the U.S.-led mission against ISIS that Canada's CF-18 fighter jets have flown their last mission in Iraq and Syria. In announcing the changes to Canada's mission last week, the government said the CF-18 involvement in airstrikes would end by Feb. 22, but Sajjan told MPs Wednesday the CF-18s flew their last mission on Monday. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, interim Conservative Leader Rona Ambrose and NDP Leader Tom Mulcair delivered remarks Wednesday in the House as MPs debated the federal government's recently-announced changes to the mission to combat ISIS. Trudeau kicked off debate Wednesday afternoon by thanking the Canadian forces for their work in the mission to date. He paid tribute to Sgt. Andrew Doiron, the Canadian soldier killed in Iraq last March. Trudeau went on to tout his plan to replace CF-18 fighter jets with a bigger contingent of soldiers to train local forces. The Conservatives, who under Stephen Harper drafted the original mission to send Canadian fighter-bombers into battle, are condemning the changes as a step back from the fight. The NDP is asking for a clearer definition of the new effort, seeking to know if Canadian trainers will be in harm's way and urging the government to spell out an exit strategy. The government is stressing a broader approach, including more humanitarian aid and help for refugees. Trudeau says the training mission is the right role for Canada in the right place. "Our goal is to allow local forces to take the fight directly to ISIL, to reclaim their homes, land and future," he told the Commons. "We will be more significantly involved in counter-terrorism measures, improving chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear security in the region."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. Canadian jets carry out final air strikes against IS targets

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 02 18

Ottawa - Canada's fighter jets have conducted their last air strikes against Islamic State militants as the Trudeau government withdraws the aircraft to fulfill a campaign promise. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan made the announcement during a Commons debate on the changes the Liberals are making to Canada's contribution to the fight against Islamic State. He also warned Canadians on Wednesday night that the revised mission will be more dangerous. Mr. Sajjan said the CF-18 mission ended on Feb. 15. The last strikes by Canadian flights took place on Feb. 14, when two CFHornets struck an Islamic State "fighting position" near Fallujah in Iraq, the military said. Last week, the Liberals unveiled a refashioned commitment to the U.S.-led military campaign, one that includes a bigger and riskier training mission. The number of Canadian special-forces advisers will climb to 207 from 69 in the expanded military deployment. "Please keep in mind: This is a dangerous armed conflict, and this mission carries inherent risk to our men and women in uniform," Mr. Sajjan told the Commons on Wednesday during a debate on changes to the mission. "This mission will be riskier than air operations," Mr. Sajjan said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Canadian women become ISIL moms

National Post, Tristin Hopper, 2016 02 18

Ottawa - In their bid to raise "the next generation of mujahedeen," at least five Canadian women have conceived children with ISIL fighters, according to radicalization researcher Amarnath Amarasingam. "We think there's about 10 to 12 Canadian women who have gone to (ISIL-controlled territory in) Syria, of those, three have had children and two are currently pregnant," said Amarasingam. A post-doctoral fellow at Dalhousie University, Amarasingam has been conducting a detailed survey of Westerners who have left to become foreign jihadists. He's talked to recruits to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) via social media. He's interviewed fighters at the Syrian border. And, with the promise of strict anonymity, he has met with the Canadian families who harbour the terrible secret of having a son or daughters in the world's most notorious jihadist group. "There's a kind of trauma that many of these parents live with; they feel that they missed some kind of key sign," he said. "A lot have been unable to go to work. At least one father has descended into alcoholism." As Amarasingam explained, "it's not simply that their child has made a mistake," but they now have grandkids growing up in a war zone from which they likely may never emerge alive.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. Edward Snowden to speak to Vancouverites at Queen Elizabeth Theatre (CSE)

Vancity Buzz, Lauren Sundstrom, 2016 02 18

Vancouver - Controversial public figure Edward Snowden will speak at a Vancouver event via web-link on the power and perils of big data, according to Simon Fraser University. The event will be hosted by SFU's Public Square and will highlight the ways big data practices are evolving in regards to governments and corporations. "Snowden is a transformative figure in the field of big data," said Catherine Murray, Professor, Communication at Simon Fraser University in a release. "No other leak was of this scale, this importance to global and national security, and this revealing of the degree of challenges to privacy that big data may pose." Snowden is a former CIA employee who leaked classified information from the United States National Security Agency back in 2013, revealing numerous global surveillance programs. Snowden was granted asylum by the Russian government and he currently resides in Moscow. Snowden is a former CIA employee who leaked classified information from the United States National Security Agency back in 2013, revealing numerous global surveillance programs. Snowden was granted asylum by the Russian government and he currently resides in Moscow. In the past, Snowden has spoken directly to issues of Canadian privacy and security such as Bill C-51 and the Canadian Communications Security Establishment internet data surveillance project Levitation.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

7. How we can build a better public service

Ottawa Citizen, Scott Brison, 2016 02 18

The World Economic Forum recently brought together young leaders from around the world under its Global Shapers Community program to talk about the participation of millennials in government. I was part of that discussion, which reaffirmed how important it is for Canada to attract the best of this next generation to public service. This generation is among the most talented, educated and globally connected ever. While some of the experiences and expectations of these young people are unique to their cohort, they have much in common with Canadian workers of all ages and backgrounds: They are looking for a way to make a difference - be it at the local, national or global level. While young people can make a difference through an NGO or in the private sector, a same smart, talented, idealistic young person can change the world through public service, given the right tools. However, instead of bringing in more young Canadians to help address the challenges of an aging workforce, the average age of a new recruit has crept up. The federal public service must innovate to attract more young people. We need less rigid hierarchies, fewer layers of bureaucracy, more open and transparent decision-making, a culture of intelligent risktaking, more opportunity for continuous learning, and greater mobility in and out of government. We are making progress in creating the conditions that will foster innovation and calibrated risk and we will continue to encourage our employees to experiment and help build a corporate culture that is markedly different from any before - one that is not too constrained by how things were done in the past, but rather meets the needs and expectations of our talented youth today and in the future. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's gender-equal and diverse cabinet shows a real commitment to diversity. No one better represents this principle than Minister of Democratic Institutions Maryam Monsef, who came to Canada as an Afghani refugee. At 30, she provides an invaluable perspective to cabinet deliberations. Furthermore, our prime minister personally taking on ministerial responsibilities for youth demonstrates his attachment to the issue and forward-looking approach. (Note: Hon. Scott Brison is President of the Treasury Board.)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

8. Millennials and the PS

Ottawa Citizen, 2016 02 18

Editorial: The Treasury Board president wants to hire more millennials, pumping new blood into the public service and ushering in a "golden age." But it raises the rather large question: How? Scott Brison argues that hiring millennials is a twofold boon to the public service. First, the greying of the public service presents a longterm logistical problem. The average age of new hires is 37. Second, the government needs people to step up with new approaches as others retire. Millennials would bring in new skills and diverse values. Sounds reasonable. But what do young people actually want from their employer? According to numerous studies and surveys, millennials seek meaningful work, less hierarchy, fewer rules, flexible work schedules, support for risk-taking and so on. Many young people want to make a difference in the world. Brison says government is where people can really "move the needle." This can be done, he says, "if government gives them the tools to do that." Can he and the public service actually offer this? And if they can, should they? Government is cumbersome to reform. So far, there doesn't seem to be a clear plan to make the public service more millennial-friendly (which can't be a straightforward process). So Brison has a lot of work ahead. It means, fundamentally, making the government as attractive a place to work as tech startups or change-the-world NGOs. This is a tall order, especially when briefing documents suggest there are too many decision-making layers and a toxic work environment in the bureaucracy.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

9. PS workers' early exit on day of snowstorm 'surprised' OC Transpo

Ottawa Citizen, Matthew Pearson, 2016 02 18

Ottawa - The federal government didn't give the city a heads-up before sending thousands of public servants home from work early on Tuesday during the massive snowstorm that dumped more than 50 centimetres of snow and made the afternoon commute a nightmare, OC Transpo officials said Wednesday. John Manconi, general manager of transit services, said the city's emergency response department is normally told in advance when the federal government is planning a major shutdown. But that didn't happen. Instead, transit officials heard the news via Twitter just after 1 p.m. Hundreds of people soon converged at Transitway stations, some expecting express buses, but they didn't go into service for another few hours. "We were surprised by it. When we knew about it, we did what we could at that point," Manconi said. Had OC Transpo been given more warning, Manconi said the transit service would have advised public servants to stagger their departure times and would have put rush-hour express buses into service sooner. OC Transpo could have added extra buses in key spots to help disperse the crowds.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. Should government hire the best people or best bilingual people?

Ottawa Citizen, Randall Denley, 2016 02 18

OpEd: The federal government wants to hire thousands of millennials to rejuvenate the public service. This attempt to attract the best and brightest is laudable, but it's not going to happen as long as the government continues to regard bilingualism as a primary criterion for hiring and advancement. It's simply a matter of arithmetic. The number of Canadians who are proficient in both French and English is relatively small, at most 17.5 per cent of the population. Even that number is optimistic, since it's those who can carry on a conversation in both French and English, not the number who can meet the government's more demanding language standards. The government must make a choice. Does it want the best people or the best bilingual people? There are already enough reasons to shy away from federal employment. Government is perceived as slow-moving and rules- driven. Much has been written about poor public service morale. Add onerous language requirements on top of that, and it's easy to see why government faces a hiring challenge. Why would someone already successful in the private sector choose to master a new language just to work for the government? Most would agree that service for the public in both official languages is necessary. It is in the workplace that the system breaks down. In a designated bilingual area such as the National Capital Region, home to the largest number of public servants, workers have a right to be supervised in the language of their choice. In effect, that means if a group of 50 employees has even one person who insists on using French as the language of work, his bosses have to be bilingual to accommodate him. (Note: Randall Denley is an Ottawa commentator, novelist and former Ontario PC candidat)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

11. West and Russia should re-engage on economies, security, ambassador says

Ottawa Citizen, Jennifer Campbell, 2016 02 18

Analysis: Western sanctions against Russia in response to its expansion into Ukraine have had an effect on the country's economy, Russian Ambassador Alexander Darchiev admitted last week. But they haven't hurt nearly as much as the country's "systemic dependence on lavish natural resource revenues," a concept, the ambassador noted, that would not be alien to Canada. "With the drastic fall of oil and gas prices, as well as other export commodities, the Russian economy suffered a serious blow in 2015," he told diplomats, academics and students at the Norman Paterson School of International Affairs' Ambassadors Speakers' Series. He said some countries hoped sanctions would lead to a "cornering or isolating of Russia," something he called "mission impossible." Other countries hoped it would bring about a regime change. Instead, sanctions "had a backlash effect, hitting European producers who lost billions of euros, with some economic fallout experienced in, too." A silver lining of sanctions, he said, has been a "wake-up call to diversify by encouraging resourcefulness as opposed to over-reliance on resources." He noted that the current storm has been weathered rather well, with sectors such as agriculture seeing three per cent growth and industrial production up slightly. The finance and labour markets remain stable and the trade balance is positive, he said. (Note: Jennifer Campbell is editor of Diplomat magazine)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

12. Apple's risky bet on protecting a terrorist's iPhone

Washington Post, Todd C. Frankel, Jena McGregor, 2016 02 18

Washington - Johnny Hockin was unsure how he felt about Apple chief executive Tim Cook's very public rebuke Wednesday of the federal government's demand for help unlocking an iPhone left behind by an assailant in the terrorist attack in San Bernardino, Calif. Hockin, 32, owns an iPhone. But he is not a technologist or privacy advocate. He is a film producer living in Toronto. Yet his social-media feeds burned up with strong reactions to Cook's letter. Many people applauded Apple's defiant stance. The Twitter hashtag #StandWithApple took off. At the same time, presidential candidate Donald Trump was on Fox denouncing the company, wondering, "Who do they think they are?" And several police groups criticized Apple's position. Hockin watched it all unfold. "I have a lot of ambivalence," he said. "I agree with Tim Cook in general. I also think the feds have a point when they're looking to advance an investigation."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

13. Apple Unlocked iPhones for the Feds 70 Times Before

The Daily Beast, Shane Harris, 2016 02 18

Washington - Apple CEO Tim Cook declared on Wednesday that his company wouldn't comply with a government search warrant to unlock an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino killers, a significant escalation in a long-running debate between technology companies and the government over access to people's electronically-stored private information. But in a similar case in New York last year, Apple acknowledged that it could extract such data if it wanted to. And according to prosecutors in that case, Apple has unlocked phones for authorities at least 70 times since 2008. (Apple doesn't dispute this figure.) In other words, Apple's stance in the San Bernardino case may not be quite the principled defense that Cook claims it is. In fact, it may have as much to do with public relations as it does with warding off what Cook called "an unprecedented step which threatens the security of our customers." For its part, the government's public position isn't clear cut, either. U.S. officials insist that they cannot get past a security feature on the shooter's iPhone that locks out anyone who doesn't know its unique password-- which even Apple doesn't have. But in that New York case, a government attorney acknowledged that one U.S. law enforcement agency has already developed the technology to crack at least some iPhones, without the assistance from Apple that officials are demanding now.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

14. As Apple Resists, Encryption Fray Erupts in Battle

New York Times, Eric Lichtblau, Katie Benner, 2016 02 18

Washington - Last month, some of President Obama's top intelligence advisers met in Silicon Valley with Apple's chief, Timothy D. Cook, and other technology leaders in what seemed to be a public rapprochement in their long-running dispute over the encryption safeguards built into their devices. But behind the scenes, relations were tense, as lawyers for the Obama administration and Apple held closely guarded discussions for over two months about one particularly urgent case: The F.B.I. wanted Apple to help "unlock" an iPhone used by one of the two attackers who killed 14 people in San Bernardino, Calif., in December, but Apple was resisting. When the talks collapsed, a federal magistrate judge, at the Justice Department's request, ordered Apple to bypass security functions on the phone. The order set off a furious public battle on Wednesday between the Obama administration and one of the world's most valuable companies in a dispute with far-reaching legal implications. "This Apple case really goes right to the heart of the encryption issue," said Ira Rubinstein, a senior fellow at the New York University Information Law Institute, "and in some ways, this was a fight that was inevitable."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

15. CIA unveils 'roadmap' for workforce diversity

Federal News Radio, Merideth Sommers, 2016 02 18

Washington - The CIA this week released its Diversity and Inclusion Strategy, a three-point, three-year effort that officials said takes advantage of a "unique opportunity to weave diversity and inclusion deep into the fabric of our agency." The Diversity and Inclusion Strategy comes at a time when the agency is also working to stand up its Talent Center of Excellence and putting its modernization efforts into practice. CIA Director John Brennan said in a statement that diversity is important because in order to have "excellence in foreign intelligence" there must also be broad perspectives within the CIA. "Broad perspectives come from diversity in thought, ethnicities, backgrounds and experiences," Brennan said in a statement. "Embracing and leveraging diversity through an inclusive culture fosters innovation, new ideas and new insights which is at the heart of what we are charged to do and is what will drive mission success."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

16. Congress Is Wary of Chinese Deal for Chicago Stock Exchange (Canada)

Bloomberg View, Josh Rogin, 2016 02 18

Column - Dozens of members of Congress plan to ask the Obama administration to review the planned acquisition of the Chicago Stock Exchange by a Chinese firm, to assess whether it poses a national security risk or a risk to the companies traded on the exchange. The Chicago Stock Exchange announced this month that it would be sold to a consortium led by the Chongqing Casin Investment Group of China, a move that would inject needed resources into the exchange and give the Chinese firm a foothold in the $22 trillion U.S. equities marketplace. Chinese state media reported that the deal was meant to eventually bring more Chinese firms into the U.S. market and that U.S. technology could be used to open new exchanges in China, a potential win-win for both sides. But the exchange's CEO, John Kerin, has said that he doesn't know who owns Chongqing Casin and that the Chinese government may be a minority stakeholder, as it is in most large Chinese businesses. On Wednesday, a group of several dozen U.S. lawmakers plan to formally request that the Obama administration conduct a national security review of the deal through a process known as the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS. Dozens of deals involving China have undergone CFIUS investigation, and most were approved. The U.S. government approved a Chinese firm's acquisition of Smithfield Foods, the nation's largest pork producer, in 2013 despite Congressional objections. That same year, CFIUS approved the Chinese state-owned oil giant CNOOC's $15 billion purchase of Canadian energy behemoth Nexen Inc., which had assets in the U.S. In 2005, IBM was allowed to sell its PC business to Lenovo.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

17. Court weighs access to U.S. lethal-drone records

Washington Post, Ann E. Marimow, 2016 02 18

Washington - A federal appeals court Wednesday considered whether the U.S. government must disclose more details about its lethal-drone operations. The American Civil Liberties Union pressed for a fuller picture of the targeted-killing program, which the Obama administration has fought in court to keep secret. Jameel Jaffer, the ACLU's deputy legal director, told the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that government officials routinely disclose information about the strikes in places such as Yemen and Pakistan. "The drone strikes themselves are not secret. There are people overseas who witness them every day. If it's a secret at all," he said, "it's a secret to us." In the long-running Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, the civil liberties group has asked for statistics about the strikes, including the dates, locations and number of people killed, in addition to a dozen legal memos related to the operations. Justice Department lawyer Sharon Swingle, representing the CIA, drew a distinction between broad, general statements by officials and the type of "granular data" the ACLU has requested, which she said would "reveal very sensitive information."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

18. Encryption is vital to protect our rights in a digital world

Globe and Mail, Ann Cavoukian, 2016 02 18

Column: Apple CEO Tim Cook has taken a strong and principled stand to protect the privacy of Apple's customers and smartphone users everywhere. He is refusing to comply with the order of a California judge that Apple help the FBI break the encryption on the iPhone of one of the San Bernardino terrorists by building a back door. Apple is not opposing the order because it sympathizes with the terrorists, far from it - this was a terrible tragedy. Thus far, Apple has done everything it can to co-operate with law enforcement. This order, however, goes one step too far. It compels Apple to develop special software to disable the security features offered to iPhone owners that effectively wipe the phone's contents, including the stored decryption key, after 10 failed attempts. This would then allow the FBI to use "brute force" to break the encryption offered by iOS on which millions of consumers rely to protect the privacy and security of their information. Make no mistake: Building a back door into the San Bernardino iPhone to access encrypted data would build a back door into all iPhones of a similar model. The operating system software is essentially the same; thus, opening one iPhone to access personal data would open all others. And once the back door has been built, it would be available not only to the U.S. government, but foreign governments and criminal hackers around the world. Why? Because such a back door would be in great demand and the sources for it would grow geometrically. Encryption is a vital tool to protect our fundamental rights in a digital world. Millions of people benefit, in numerous ways, from the privacy and security offered by the iPhone and similar products. The U.S. government would be jeopardizing those benefits for the sake of hacking into one iPhone, which would no doubt lead to additional cases of hacking. Interestingly, governments love to use the "greater good" argument as justification for their actions. I submit that the greater good in this case would be served by not building a back door into the iPhone. This is yet another example of government overreach. If Apple is forced to do this, it will take its toll on innovation and prosperity, which will further erode our privacy and freedom. That is simply too high a price to pay. (Note: Ann Cavoukian is executive director of the Privacy and Big Data Institute - Where Big Data meets Big Privacy at Ryerson University in Toronto, and was information and privacy commissioner of Ontario from 1997 to 2014.)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

19. How a passcode has foiled the FBI

Los Angeles Times, Paresh Dave, 2016 02 18

Los Angeles - Four numbers hardly seem like a foolproof way to protect a smartphone. But that's likely what has stumped federal law enforcement, who have been unable to break into the iPhone 5C used by one of the San Bernardino shooters. That has led to a standoff between Apple and the FBI over the agency's right to access the device's contents -- and its power to compel Apple to help it do so. Password-protecting an iPhone seemed unnecessary in the early smartphone days, when most devices contained little more than contacts and music. But as smartphones evolved into powerful mini-computers storing troves of personal, location and financial data, the need to safeguard them has soared. Phones today are better protected than they've ever been. "You have to go out of your way to not have a passcode," said Eric Burger, director of the Georgetown University Center for Secure Communications. "We're much better off." The increased use of passwords may be keeping out hackers or jealous boyfriends, but now authorities are finding themselves locked out, too.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

20. Inside the FBI's encryption battle with Apple

The Guardian (London), Multiple reporters, 2016 02 18

Washington - For months, the FBI searched for a compelling case that would force Apple to weaken iPhone security - and then the San Bernardino shooting happened Two weeks ago, the Federal Bureau of Investigation called Apple's headquarters in Cupertino, California, with a jarring message: the agency wanted Apple to help them hack an iPhone. Apple refused. The request stepped up a level on 16 February when a federal magistrate ordered Apple to help the FBI unlock a single iPhone - the phone belonging to one of the killers in the December mass shooting in San Bernardino, California. Apple again refused. But this carefully planned legal battle has been months in the making, US officials and tech executives told the Guardian, as the government and Apple try to settle whether national security can dictate how Silicon Valley writes computer code. Both sides expect the ensuing legal battle to have far-reaching implications that will touch on encryption, law enforcement, digital privacy and a 225-year-old law from America's post-colonial days. "The law operates on precedent, so the fundamental question here isn't whether the FBI gets access to this particular phone," said Julian Sanchez, a surveillance law expert at the libertarian-leaning Cato Institute in Washington. "It's whether a catch-all law from 1789 can be used to effectively conscript technology companies into producing hacking tools and spyware for the government."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

21. Newer Phones Aren't Easy to Crack

Wall Street Journal, Jack Nicas, Robert McMillan, 2016 02 18

New York - The legal fight around the locked iPhone of one of the San Bernardino shooters highlights the growing role of encryption in digital life -- and the intensifying battle between tech companies and the government over the proper bounds of the technology. Encryption scrambles data so that it is unreadable until unlocked with a unique key. Apple Inc. and Alphabet Inc.'s Google thrust the issue into the spotlight in 2014, when they issued new versions of their software that automatically encrypted data stored on phones, such as contacts, photos and some text messages. Moreover, Apple and Google, which together power more than 90% of the world's smartphones, said they wouldn't be able to break the encryption codes themselves. Law-enforcement officials, led by Federal Bureau of Investigation Director James Comey, expressed alarm that encrypted phones could hamper criminal investigations. Such cases have been rare until now, because much of the data investigators seek can often be found elsewhere, such as call records maintained by telecom companies. In the case of alleged shooter Syed Rizwan Farook, however, federal investigators say they have no other options. They persuaded a federal judge Tuesday to order Apple to circumvent the security measures on Mr. Farook's iPhone 5C, hoping to learn more about his contacts and communications in the final weeks of his life. Depending on the password that Mr. Farook used, there could be more than two billion combinations, which could take a computer 5 1/2 years to try, Apple estimates. In a court filing, the Justice Department said it can't tell whether the auto-erase feature is enabled, "therefore trying repeated passcodes risks permanently denying all access to the contents."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

22. NSA chief: 'Paris would not have happened' without encrypted apps

Yahoo News, Michael Isikoff, 2016 02 18

Washington - National Security Agency Director Adm. Michael Rogers warns that encryption is making it "much more difficult" for the agency to intercept the communications of terrorist groups like the Islamic State, citing November's Paris attacks as a case where his agency was left in the dark because the perpetrators used new technologies to disguise their communications. In an exclusive interview with Yahoo News, Rogers confirmed speculation that began right after the attack: that "some of the communications" of the Paris terrorists "were encrypted," and, as a result, "we did not generate the insights ahead of time. Clearly, had we known, Paris would not have happened." Rogers' comments were made on Friday, just days before the FBI obtained a court order requiring Apple to provide a "backdoor" into the data on the iPhone of one of the shooters in the San Bernardino, Calif., terror attack in December -- an order the company is resisting. But his remarks are likely to fuel the debate over encryption that has sorely divided the U.S. intelligence and law enforcement community, on one side, and privacy advocates and U.S. technology companies. (A spokesman for the NSA had no comment today on the court order or on Apple's response.) Rogers has at times sought to steer a middle ground in this debate, acknowledging that encryption is "foundational to our future" and even saying recently that arguing about it "is a waste of time." In the Yahoo News interview, he frankly acknowledged, "I don't know the answer" to unencrypting devices and applications without addressing the concerns over privacy and competitiveness, calling for a national collaboration among industry and government officials to solve the problem. But he left little doubt about the impact encryption is having on his agency's mission. "Is it harder for us to generate the kind of knowledge that I would like against some of these targets? Yes," Rogers said. "Is that directly tied in part to changes they are making in their communications? Yes. Does encryption make it much more difficult for us to execute our mission. Yes."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

23. Obama Plans Visit to Cuba, as Talks on Expanding Trade Begin

New York Times, Julie Hirschfeld Davis, 2016 02 18

Washington - President Obama will travel to Cuba within weeks, a senior administration official said on Wednesday, making a historic visit as part of an effort to end more than a half-century of estrangement and forge normalized relations with a Cold War adversary. The administration will announce the trip -- the first by a sitting president in 88 years, when Calvin Coolidge visited -- on Thursday as top Commerce, Treasury and State Department officials are meeting privately with their Cuban counterparts in Washington for talks aimed at expanding business ties between the two nations. Opening the discussions on Wednesday, Penny Pritzker, the commerce secretary, called on the government of Cuba to open its economy to American business and investment, saying the Cubans must do more to help facilitate commerce after the thaw between the two nations.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

24. Tech Industry Response Is Muted in Clash on Unlocking iPhone

New York Times, Nick Wingfield, Mike Isaac, 2016 02 18

New York - After a federal court ordered Apple to help unlock an iPhone used by an attacker in a December mass shooting in San Bernardino, Calif., the company's chief executive, Timothy D. Cook, penned a passionate letter warning of far-reaching implications beyond the case. The response from other technology companies? A mix of carefully calibrated support and crickets. Late on Wednesday, Sundar Pichai, the chief executive of Google, said on Twitter that law enforcement demands to hack customer devices and data "could be a troubling precedent." Not long afterward, Reform Government Surveillance, a coalition formed by Apple, Google, Microsoft and Facebook, released a broad statement that did not mention the Apple case or Mr. Cook's letter but said technology companies should not be required to put "back doors" -- the equivalent of a tech entryway -- into their products. Asked about Apple's opposition to the court order, representatives of Microsoft, Twitter and Facebook declined to comment. A spokesman for Amazon, which is not in the coalition, also declined to comment. The range of reactions highlights the complicated set of factors influencing tech companies' responses to government demands for customer data in the era after revelations by Edward J. Snowden, the former intelligence contractor, of widespread government surveillance. Some companies may be keeping their heads low to avoid becoming targets during the raucous presidential campaign, while others may fear that being too vocal will jeopardize government sales and relationships with law enforcement, privacy experts said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

25. Vie privée Apple reçoit des appuis dans son bras de fer contre le FBI

Le Devoir, Fabien Deglise, 2016 02 18

San Bernardino, Californie - Ce serait une question de principes et de sécurité. La multinationale américaine Apple a décidé de tenir tête au FBI et refuse de lui donner les clefs de cryptage nécessaire afin d'accéder au contenu du iPhone d'un des meurtriers de la tuerie de San Bernardino, en Californie, en décembre dernier. Mercredi, le géant a reçu l'appui de l'importante Electronic Frontier Fondation. Pour Tim Cook, grand patron d'Apple, permettre une telle intrusion créerait un précédent qui mettrait en péril la sécurité et la protection de la vie privée de tous les propriétaires de iPhone 6. Il réclame d'ailleurs au passage un débat public sur le chiffrement des données personnelles qui selon lui, pour être efficace, doit se faire sans compromission. « Nous témoignons un grand respect aux professionnels du FBI et nous croyons que leurs intentions sont bonnes, explique Cook dans une lettre ouverte dévoilée mardi dans la foulée de l'ordre du tribunal reçu à ses bureaux. Or, ce que le gouvernement américain nous demande aujourd'hui de créer, et qui n'existe pas, nous le jugeons trop dangereux à faire : il nous demande de construire une porte dérobée pour lui permettre d'entrer dans nos iPhone. » Une porte qui, une fois ouverte, pourra être utilisée sur tous les appareils, par le gouvernement américain sur son territoire comme ailleurs sur la planète, mais également par des techniciens ou pirates moins bien intentionnés, dit-il.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

26. Gerry Adams says Sinn Fein government in Ireland inevitable

Reuters, Staff report, 2016 02 18

Kilkenny - Gerry Adams said that anger over Ireland's uneven recovery would hand his Sinn Fein party a breakthrough in elections this month, paving the way in coming years for an "inevitable" entry into government for the former political wing of the IRA. The nationalist group has already seen a near doubling of support since the last vote, according to opinion polls, leaving it jostling with centre-right Fianna Fail for the position of second largest party. Opposition to austerity measures imposed under Ireland's 2010 EU-IMF bailout had given way to anger at a recovery that helped the rich more than the poor, ushering in a new political era, Adams told Reuters in an interview on Wednesday. "People have been politicised, radicalised by policies of austerity. You see it in (British opposition leader) Jeremy Corbyn ... you see it in Portugal, you see it in Greece and you see it here in Ireland," he said. Adams said his party's past links to the Irish Republican Army (IRA) were not seen as a liability by voters. "Clearly Sinn Fein some time in the next decade is going to be in government. There is no doubt at all about that," he added during a campaign stop in the southeastern city of Kilkenny.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

27. Bishop seeks China missile confirmation

Australian Associated Press, Staff Writer, 2016 02 18

Canberra - Foreign Minister Julie Bishop says she wants to independently verify China has placed missiles on a South China Sea island before buying into the row about militarisation of the disputed territory. Ms Bishop, in Beijing for the annual foreign and strategic dialogue, said she had raised this in her discussions but Chinese officials had not conceded the missile reports were correct. She said she would discuss this with Australian intelligence and foreign policy experts when she returned home. "I am not going to buy into this until there has been verification that will satisfy Australia," she told Sky News. Ms Bishop said China's President Xi Jinping had declared in Washington that China did not intend to militarise the islands it claims in the South China Sea. So any act that could be seen as militarisation would raise concerns and tensions, she said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

28. Canada refugee progress outpaces Australia's

Australian Associated Press, Staff Writer, 2016 02 18

Canberra - Refugee Council of Australia chief executive Paul Power said the government was dragging its feet while the rest of the world acted on their promises to resettle Syrian and Iraqi refugees. Mr Dutton told reporters in Washington that biometric screening, enhanced security checks and database intelligence checks with countries such as the US, Canada and the UK are underway to ensure the bona fides of people. "We want to extend a hand of welcome to those people... who are in desperate need of a ... new life," he said. Canada's progress was a matter for that country, he said. (Full Report)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

29. George Brandis joins calls for Apple to comply with FBI request to unlock San Bernardino shooter's phone

ABC (Australia), Staff Writer, 2016 02 18

Canberra - Attorney-General George Brandis has joined calls for Apple to comply with an FBI request to unlock an iPhone used by one of the shooters in December's San Bernadino massacre. Apple's chief executive Tim Cook announcing the company would contest a court order to help the FBI break into a phone recovered from Syed Rizwan Farook, one of the San Bernardino shooters. The company was ordered to provide "reasonable technical assistance" to investigators seeking to unlock the data on Farook's iPhone 5C. Mr Cook argues the FBI's demand threatens the security of Apple's customers but he has already been criticised by a presidential candidate and New York's police chief for the taking the stance. The company's refusal to cooperate with the FBI has been criticised by a cast of characters including New York Police Commissioner Bill Bratton and presidential candidate Donald Trump who suggests unlocking the iPhone is "common sense".

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Afghanistan • Pakistan

30. Notorious Taliban commander held in Paktika

Pajhwok Afghan News, Pajhwok Report, 2016 02 18

Kabul - Security officials have arrested the Taliban notorious commander in woman dress in the Barmal district of southeastern Paktika province, the spy-service of the country said on Wednesday. A statement from the National Directorate of Security (NDS) said the detained Commander Hazrat Ali was the Taliban insurgency chief operator in the locality. One Kalashnikov and two hand grenades were recovered from Ali, the statement said. NDS released a video clip also in this regard. Taliban Spokesman Zabihullah Mujahid, however, rejected the claim saying no Taliban commander has been arrested in Barmal district of Paktika. (Full Report).

Return to Top / Haut de la page

31. Taliban Used Children as Soldiers, Group Says

New York Times, David Jolly, 2016 02 18

Kabul - Child soldiers recruited by the Taliban were used in the battle to overrun the northern city of Kunduz last year, a prominent human rights organization said on Wednesday. Human Rights Watch reported 13 cases of children recruited to fight for the Taliban in that battle. Its researchers found that the insurgents used Islamic religious schools in the area "to provide military training to children between the ages of 13 and 17, many of whom have been deployed in combat." Human Rights Watch said the Taliban begin indoctrinating children from as early as 6 years old. The United Nations has documented that children as young as 10 participated in the fighting in Kunduz, the capital of Kunduz Province. That northern city was captured in September by Taliban fighters; government forces, backed by United States air power, reclaimed the city days later. The cases of children found by Human Rights Watch to have fought for the Taliban in that battle included Malek, 14, from the Chahardara district of Kunduz, who was recruited by his teacher. His job was to carry rocket-propelled grenades in a Taliban unit. The insurgents rejected the Human Rights Watch report.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

32. Des jihadistes de Daech circulent entre le Maroc et l'Espagne en Burqa

La Relève (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 02 17

Rabat, Maroc - Des membres de la nébuleuse terroriste Daech se déplaceraient entre le Maroc et l'Espagne cachés sous des burqas et des niqabs, ce qui a incité les services des deux pays à redoubler d'efforts pour contrer leurs plans criminels, rapporte Assabah dans sa livraison de ce mardi 16 février 2016. Les sources citées par le journal pensent savoir que cette nouvelle manière de se dissimuler a permis à cette organisation terroriste de faire passer des centaines de guerriers en Europe en les mêlant aux réfugiés syriens, avant de recourir à la même entourloupe pour rentrer au Maroc, quand l'étau s'est resserré autour d'eux dans les pays d'accueil.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

33. KDF kills al Shabaab intel chief Mohammed Karatey linked to El Adde attack

The Star (Kenya), Staff report, 2016 02 18

Nairobi - Kenyan troops killed Mohammed Karatey aka Mahat Karatey who headed al Shabaab's intelligence wing in a major strike on Nadaris camp in Somalia last Monday. The Defence ministry said KDF soldiers under Amisom killed the commander, who was also the militant group's deputy commander, alongside 10 other mid-level commanders. "Karatey had gone to the camp to preside over the passing out of an estimated 80 Alamnyat recruits who had completed their training and were due for deployment," the ministry said. "It is confirmed that 42 recruits were also killed [in the attack between Buale and Sukow] while many others sustained injuries." The Alamnyat intelligence wing is made up of suicide bombers, assassins, explosives experts and information gatherers.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

34. Kenya 'kills' al-Shabab intelligence chief in Somalia

BBC News, Staff report, 2016 02 18

London - A Kenyan air strike has killed the intelligence chief of Somalia's militant Islamist group al-Shabab, an army statement has said. Mohammed Karatey and 10 other al-Shabab commanders were killed in the strike in southern Somalia on 8 February, it added. He played a key role in last month's deadly attack on a Kenyan military base in Somalia, the army said. Al-Shabab has not yet commented on the claim that Karatey has been killed.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

35. Plus de 100 nouveaux postes de surveillance installés

Liberté (Algérie), Farid Belgacem, 2016 02 17

Tiguentourine, Algérie - Tiguentourine, In-Amenas et Djanet : le niveau de vigilance relevé Le niveau de vigilance a été revu à la hausse aux frontières du Grand-Sud où la Gendarmerie nationale a installé plus de 100 nouveaux postes de surveillance sur le tracé frontalier algéro-libyen, allant d'Ouargla à Illizi jusqu'à Tamanrasset. La menace terroriste se fait de plus en plus sentir aux frontières du Grand-Sud algérien où la présence de groupes armés est signalée au quotidien, où de grosses saisies d'armes de guerre sont opérées et où il est noté l'émergence de nouvelles cellules dormantes de Daech. Le déplacement, dimanche et lundi dernier dans la région d'Illizi, du commandant de la Gendarmerie nationale, le général-major Menad Nouba, procède de l'urgence de déployer davantage de moyens humains et matériels pour anticiper la parade contre l'avancée des groupes armés vers les sites névralgiques de Tiguentourine, In-Amenas et Djanet. Ainsi, la bande frontalière algéro-libyenne, allant d'Ouargla à Illizi jusqu'à Tamanrasset, a été renforcée par plus de 100 nouveaux postes de surveillance. Ces postes, chargés de la sécurité des frontières, sont appuyés par des patrouilles de chasse, pédestres ou aériennes, des patrouilles de reconnaissance, des tireurs d'élite et des unités spéciales d'intervention chargées de la lutte antiterroriste.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

36. Terrorisme « Un allié sûr, crédible et respecté »

Le Soir (Belgique), B.L., 2016 02 18

Rabat - Le Maroc se dresse en partenaire majeur des Occidentaux dans la lutte antiterrorisme. Le terrorisme, ici, on connaît. Les années 2003 et 2011, notamment, ont été marquées par des attaques meurtrières. Il ne se passe guère de semaine sans que les autorités annoncent le démantèlement d'une cellule terroriste. Daesh l'admet, qui a menacé le royaume par vidéo en janvier. A Rabat, on n'est pas peu fier des remerciements de François Hollande adressés au roi pour l'« assistance efficace » dans l'enquête sur les attentats du 13 novembre à Paris. Le roi Philippe, à Bruxelles, avait aussi appelé Mohamed VI à l'époque. Le cas d'Abdelhamid Abaaoud, Belgo-Marocain abattu à Saint-Denis revient dans toutes les conversations. Abdelhak Khiame, patron de la police antiterroriste, avait indiqué au Figaro en janvier que son service avait permis de repérer la planque du terroriste. Mais le même journal admettait ce 4 février que la source des enquêteurs était une amie française de la cousine du terroriste. S'agissant de la torture, dont les services marocains sont régulièrement accusés par les organisations de défense des droits de l'homme, ledit Khiame bottait en touche dans l'hebdomadaire TelQuel le 21 septembre 2015 : «

Il y a peut-être eu quelques dérives, mais personnellement il n'y a eu aucun cas de torture dont j'ai été témoin ».

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Asia • Asie

37. Beijing defends South China Sea arms deployment

South China Morning Post, 2016 02 18

US, Taiwan officials say mainland has installed surface-to-air missiles on island in the Paracels. China says it's 'hype', but backs defence facilities Beijing has defended the deployment of armaments in the South China Sea after US and Taiwanese officials said it had installed surface-to-air missiles on a disputed island in the Paracel chain. Analysts said Beijing's move had been a long time coming and more military facilities would be mounted in the Paracels, where China considers its claims are less disputable than in other parts of the sea. Fox News first reported the missile deployment on Woody Island, also known as Yongxing in China, citing a US official, and the claim was backed by Taiwan's defence ministry yesterday. The defence ministry in Beijing described the reports as "hype", saying defence facilities on "relevant islands and reefs" had been in place for many years to safeguard territorial sovereignty. Foreign ministry spokesman Hong Lei (??) said any arms were for defence and were not part of a military build-up. Foreign Minister Wang Yi (??) said the news was "created" by Western media, who should instead focus on the civilian facilities China had been building. Fox News said satellite images indicated the Hongqi-9 air defence system had been set up on Woody Island, which is controlled by the mainland but claimed by Taiwan and Vietnam. The system has a range of 200km. Xu Guangyu (???) , a retired People's Liberation Army general, said the system could be found on many Chinese islands and there would be nothing abnormal about its presence on Woody Island, which houses the government of Sansha in Hainan (??). The news came as US President Barack Obama called for a halt to reclamation and militarisation in the sea as he concluded a summit of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (Asean). The summit issued a statement calling for a peaceful resolution of sovereignty disputes in the sea, but did not single out China. The United States has twice sent warships near to disputed islands held by China. The latest patrol took place last month in waters within 12 nautical miles of Triton Island, also in the Paracels. Jin Canrong, a professor of international relations at Renmin University in Beijing, said the missile system on Woody Island was a response to the Triton patrol.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

38. Chinese missile installation raises tension in region

Globe and Mail, Nathan Vanderklippe, 2016 02 18

Beijing - The United States has expressed "serious concern" after China deployed surface-to-air missiles on an island in the South China Sea, an escalation that further militarizes a region where significant tensions have already emerged between China and its neighbours. Officials in Taiwan and the United States on Wednesday said China has placed missile batteries on Woody Island, the largest in the Paracel island group roughly 300 kilometres southeast of China - an area that has been the focus of a renewed construction effort as Beijing places a heavier stamp on its claims in the South China Sea. Both Vietnam and Taiwan also claim the Paracels, islands that like the much more distant Spratly group - where Beijing has dredged the sea to create new land masses capable of supporting buildings and runways - are disputed territory inside a maritime expanse criss-crossed by vital shipping lanes that move some $5-trillion (U.S.) in world trade. The deployment of surface-to-air missiles marks a controversial expansion by China, adding to the small military base it operates on Woody Island, whose facilities include radar and a runway that has been used by fighter jets. China has controlled the Paracels since 1974, after a short naval battle with Vietnam. Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi played down the missile installation, saying Wednesday that "the limited and necessary self-defence facilities China has built on islands and reefs" are "consistent with the self-defence and self-preservation China is entitled to under international law."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

39. Chinese Missiles Underscore a Growing Conflict Risk

New York Times, Mark Landler, Michael Forsythe, 2016 02 18

Washington - China's deployment of surface-to-air missiles on a disputed island in the South China Sea, at the very moment that President Obama is trying to buttress American influence in the region, underscores the growing risk of conflict among the Chinese, their neighbors and the United States. A day after Mr. Obama gathered 10 leaders from Southeast Asian countries for a summit meeting in California, a United States official said the Pentagon had evidence that China had placed missile batteries on an island that is part of an archipelago claimed by Vietnam and Taiwan, as well as by China. At the meeting, Mr. Obama sent a warning to China, declaring that the United States would "continue to fly, sail and operate wherever international law allows" and that "we will support the right of all countries to do the same." He said he had discussed with the leaders the need to halt further reclamation and militarization of islands in the South China Sea. "What China is doing is worrisome because they're obviously increasing their capacity for surveillance and for sustaining a presence that is well beyond what they've had before," said Kenneth G. Lieberthal, a senior fellow and an expert on China at the Brookings Institution.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

40. North Korea preparing attacks vs South Korea--Seoul spy service

Associated Press, 2016 02 18

Seoul - South Korea's spy agency has told ruling party officials that North Korean leader Kim Jong Un recently ordered preparations for launching attacks on South Korea, in the latest sign of high tensions on the Korean peninsula after the North's recent nuclear test and missile launch. One official from the Saenuri Party who attended Thursday's closed-door briefing by the National Intelligence Service says Kim's spy agency has begun work to implement his order to "actively muster capabilities" to launch cyber and other attacks on South Korea. North Korea has a history of attacks against South Korea, but it is impossible to independently confirm what's really happening in the secretive North Korea. The Saenuri official refused to say whether the briefing discussed how the information has been obtained. He requested anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak to media on the briefing. The spy agency said the attacks could target anti-Pyongyang activists, defectors and government officials. The comments come a day after four of the most advanced U.S. fighter jets flew over South Korea in a clear show of force against North Korea amid a festering standoff over its nuclear and missile ambitions.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

41. US expects 'very serious' talks with China after missile reports

Reuters, 2016 02 18

Washington - U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said on Wednesday the United States expects to have "very serious" talks with China about militarization of the South China Sea after reports that Beijing deployed advanced surface-to-air missiles to a disputed island. Taiwan's Defense Ministry said the missile batteries had been set up on Woody Island in the Paracels chain, which has been under Chinese control for decades but also is claimed by Taiwan and Vietnam. A U.S. defense official also confirmed the "apparent deployment" of the missiles, first reported by Fox News. "There is every evidence, every day that there has been an increase of militarization of one kind or another," Kerry told reporters when asked about the reported deployment. "It's of serious concern. "We have had these conversations with the Chinese and I am confident that over the next days we will have further very serious conversation on this." The United States claims no territory in the South China Sea but has expressed serious concerns about how China's increasingly assertive pursuit of territorial claims there could affect the vital global trade routes that pass through it.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

42. 14 Detained Outside Moscow for Preparing Fake Passports for Daesh Militants

Sputnik (Russia), Staff report, 2016 02 18

Moscow - Fourteen individuals were detained outside Moscow for preparing fake passports for Daesh militants, whose activities are prohibited in numerous countries including Russia and the United States, the Russian Federal Security Service (FSB) said Thursday. The FSB and Interior Ministry were able to stop the international criminal group, which was not only preparing documents for those from Russia and other former Soviet republics to fight among the ranks of Daesh in Syria, but also for those returning to Russia to carry out terrorist and extremist acts, as well as illegal migration. "After collecting the needed base of evidence in the criminal case, ... a complex of operative military and investigation operations were carried out in the capital's region to suppress the activities of the group revealed by detaining 14 of its members 'red-handed,'" the FSB said in a statement.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

43. Intelligence Minister: Security forces bust tens of terrorist operations

Islamic Republic News Agency, 2016 02 18

Tehran - Minister of Intelligence Hojjatoleslam Seyed Mahmoud Alavi said on Wednesday that Iranian security forces have busted tens of terrorist operations. In the past two and a half year, tens of terrorist operations in various cities such as Tehran were discovered and busted instantly. He described the planned operations as bomb explosion and suicide bombing in metro stations, bazaar, Friday Prayer sermon in Tehran as well as Zahedan and Shiraz. Some 1,500 youths were to join terrorist groups who were advised by the personnel at the ministry to change their ideas, he said. Intelligence forces spare no efforts to restore calmness and security to the society, he said. Active and mass presence of people in the upcoming parliamentary elections as well as Assembly of Experts will demonstrate Iran's might and glory, Alavi said. (Full Report).

Return to Top / Haut de la page

44. Radioactive material stolen in Iraq raises security fears

Reuters, 2016 02 18

Baghdad - Iraq is searching for "highly dangerous" radioactive material stolen last year, according to an Environment Ministry document and seven security, environmental and provincial officials who fear it could be used as a weapon if acquired by Daesh (ISIS). The material, stored in a protective case the size of a laptop computer, went missing in November from a storage facility near the southern city of Basra belonging to U.S. oilfield services company Weatherford, the document obtained by Reuters showed and officials confirmed. A spokesman for Iraq's Environment Ministry said he could not discuss the issue, citing national security concerns. A Weatherford spokesman in Iraq declined to comment, and the company's Houston headquarters did not respond to repeated requests for comment. A U.S. official said the United States was aware of the missing material since November but it is still unclear whether it was misplaced or stolen.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

45. The Released Americans Were Kidnapped by Those Who Kidnapped the Qataris

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 02 18

Baghdad - While Iraqi and US sources yesterday confirmed the release of three Americans who were kidnapped in Iraq in January, the deputy of the Iraqi parliament's security and defence committee Hamid Al-Mutlaq told Asharq Al-Awsat that "known and armed militias that are affiliated with Iran kidnapped the three Americans in Baghdad". Al-Mutlaq added that "Tehran wanted to use the hostages to influence negotiations taking place between Washington and Tehran but the US government refused to bargain with Iran over the hostages." He continued by saying "I am sure that the Qataris who were kidnapped in Samawah were kidnapped by the same armed militias". An Iraqi National Intelligence Service (INIS) source who wished to remain anonymous told Asharq Al-Awsat in Baghdad yesterday that "the INIS gathered accurate information on the whereabouts of the three US citizens and identified the exact site of detention based on this information".

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

46. Moscow, Iranian Minister of Defense to Discuss an 8 Billion Dollar Arms Deal

Asharq Al-Awsat, Sami Amara, 2016 02 18

Tehran - In the prospect of intensifying military cooperation between Russia and Iran, Hossein Dehghan, Iranian Minister of Defense arrived to Moscow and instigated deliberations with his peer Sergey Shoygu. Dehghan is also expected to later meet Russian President Vladimir Putin. Moreover, the agreement on Russia delivering the S-300 (missile system) to Iran is in accord on execution, after the deal being previously put to rest, an approximate 10 years, due to the economic and military sanctions that were imposed on Iran. Dehghan visiting Russia aims to acquire artillery bulk worth a near 8 billion dollars in planes and military equipment. He will also be conferring several regional and international suits, like the Syrian crisis and the relationship with Gulf countries especially Saudi Arabia, Military-Technical Cooperation (MTC) sources reported. The list is the same one discussed with the Russian Ministry of Defense, the government, and Kremlin.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

47. Syrian national of YPG-links behind Ankara blast, says Turkish PM

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 02 18

Ankara - Turkish Prime Minister Ahmet Davutoglu has announced that a Syrian national with links to the People's Protection Units (YPG) was identified as the perpetrator of the attack in Ankara. The attacker received assistance from outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) militants in Turkey, the prime minister said. A Syrian national, identified as 1992-born Salih Necer, was behind the car bomb attack in Ankara on Feb. 17 that killed 28 people and wounded 61 others, Davutoglu said with "certainty." Necer was born in the Amuda province of northern Syria in 1992 and had links to the YPG, Davutoglu informed reporters. "A direct link between the attack and the YPG has been established," he said, adding that nine suspects were detained while the investigation continues. Davutoglu also explained that new detentions would take place, but declined to provide details regarding the upcoming operations.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

48. Why did Nasrallah focus on Israel when Hezbollah is busy in Syria?

Jerusalem Post, Ariel Ben Solomon, Yaakov Lappin, 2016 02 18

Jerusalem - Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah checked off all the boxes for harsh anti-Israel rhetoric during his speech, but his aim was to rally Shi'ite support behind him and even try to improve his group's drab image in the Sunni Arab world. He sought to embarrass Sunni Arab states by tying them to Israel because of their common goal in opposing Iran's aggressive goals in the region. And to hammer home the point that Hezbollah is the one standing up to Israel, not the Sunni Arabs, Nasrallah threatened on Tuesday night to hit large ammonia gas storage tanks in Haifa that he said would wreak damage and casualties equal to a nuclear attack. Environmental Protection Minister Avi Gabbay later said he had ordered the ammonia storage facility to be moved to the Negev.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Others • Autres

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

49. Ankara de nouveau frappée par un attentat

Le Figaro, Maurin Picard, 2016 02 18

Ankara - Cette attaque, la deuxième à frapper la capitale turque en quatre mois, a fait au moins 28 morts et 61 blessés. Turquie La violente explosion a frappé au coeur d'Ankara, dans un quartier stratégique, censé être surprotégé et nommé - à raison - « le quartier de l'État » (Devlet mahallesi). C'est là que sont situés, entre autres institutions, l'Assemblée nationale, de nombreux ministères et le siège de l'état-major des armées turques. Le bilan, toujours provisoire, faisait état mercredi soir de 28 morts et 61 blessés. L'explosion est survenue au passage de véhicules militaires, à proximité de logements occupés par des soldats et leurs familles. Elle s'est produite à 18 h 31, heure locale, au moment où ces militaires quittent le travail à bord de cars banalisés. L'identité des victimes - notamment la présence éventuelle de civils parmi les tués - n'était pas confirmée mercredi soir. Selon le vice-premier ministre et porte-parole du gouvernement, Numan Kurtulmus, un véhicule piégé est à l'origine de la déflagration. On ne sait pas avec certitude s'il s'agissait d'une attaque kamikaze, mais « il est évident qu'elle a été très bien planifiée », a commenté dans la soirée Numan Kurtulmus, affirmant « ne pas avoir, à cette heure, d'informations sur les auteurs ». L'attentat n'a pas encore été revendiqué.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

50. Attentats de Paris : des suspects espionnaient un responsable du nucléaire belge

Le Journal du Dimanche (JDD) avec l'Agence France-Presse, Thomas Liabot, 2016 02 18

Bruxelles - Les enquêteurs belges ont découvert que certains suspects des attentats de Paris s'intéressaient de près à un responsable du nucléaire belge. La mouvance djihadiste belge espionnait un "haut responsable du secteur nucléaire", selon une vidéo saisie par la justice fin novembre dans les effets personnels d'un homme inculpé à Bruxelles dans le cadre de l'enquête sur les attentats du 13 novembre à Paris. Le quotidien belge La Dernière Heure a révélé mercredi la découverte, lors d'une perquisition, d'une vidéo d'une dizaine d'heures tournée en cachette devant le domicile du "directeur du programme de recherche et de développement nucléaire belge". Les enquêteurs belges ont ensuite pu déterminer que ces images avaient été "captées au moyen d'une caméra cachée dans un bosquet sous de la paille et que celle-ci a été récupérée sur place par deux suspects, repartis à bord d'un véhicule tous feux éteints", poursuivait le journal. Les deux hommes n'ont pas été identifiés et la date des enregistrements - avant ou après les attentats de Paris - n'a pas pu être déterminée, selon la DH .

Return to Top / Haut de la page

51. Des kamikazes visaient nos centrales: pas de raison de renforcer la sécurité, selon Jambon

La Dernière Heure (Belgique), Julien Crepin, 2016 02 18

Bruxelles - Les kamikazes des attentats de Paris visaient nos centrales nucléaires ! La vidéo de surveillance d'un dirigeant belge du nucléaire a été retrouvée chez Mohamed Bakkali, inculpé dans les attentats de Paris. Nos révélations d'hier sur la surveillance par caméra d'un haut dirigeant du secteur nucléaire belge par les membres du groupe terroriste à l'origine des attentats de Paris ont été confirmées mercredi par le parquet fédéral. La vidéo avait été retrouvée au domicile de la conjointe d'un des inculpés dans l'enquête sur les attentats de Paris, Mohamed Bakkali. Cette vidéo a été retrouvée le 30 novembre dernier, soit deux semaines après les attentats, lors d'une perquisition chez la femme de Bakkali. Le matériel informatique a été découvert dans les affaires du suspect. Suite aux révélations de la DH, nous avons contacté le cabinet du ministre de l'Intérieur Jan Jambon (N-VA) pour savoir si la sécurité de nos centrales, potentielles cibles d'attentats, allait être renforcée. Et la réponse est inchangée par rapport à celle que le ministre avait formulée au parlementaire écolo Jean Marc Nollet. "Nous avons dit que la protection de certains endroits par des militaires requérait le niveau 3 de la menace. Le niveau 3 actuellement défini par l'Ocam concerne les grandes manifestations et les concentrations de personnes. Rien n'indique une menace spécifique sur les centrales nucléaires, ni à Doel, ni à Tihange. C'est pour cette raison que nous n'y prévoyons pas de support militaire", explique le ministre Jambon.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

52. French Muslims Say Emergency Powers Come at Too High a Cost

New York Times, Alissa J. Rubin, 2016 02 18

Paris - Depending on who is telling the story, Daoud Muradyan, a blind 21-year-old, is either a potential terrorist or a harmless immigrant who embodies everything that is wrong with France's broad new antiterrorism powers. Mr. Muradyan came under suspicion after having contact with a radical imam, the French authorities say. They also say that he recently traveled to a part of Brussels where several of the attackers in the Nov. 13 Paris assaults had lived, and that he had five cellphones and four USB memory sticks in his possession when the police raided his home in the southeastern city of Avignon. But Mr. Muradyan, who converted to Islam and moved to France from Armenia in 2007, says he just likes to buy electronics and travel a bit. "The policemen were very mean when they came in, very mean and scornful," he said, recounting the search of his home. "They broke everything." He is now one of hundreds of French Muslims who have been placed under house arrest under the state of emergency declared by President François Hollande after the Paris attacks by the Islamic State. He must tap his way to a police station three times a day to check in with the authorities. Muslim groups point to Mr. Muradyan's case as an example of government overreach as over the last year France has become a laboratory for balancing security concerns against civil liberties. At the very least, his case shows the quandary facing the authorities as they work to head off another terrorist attack, but risk further alienating France's Muslims.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

53. Loi sur le renseignement : des " boîtes noires " très complexes à mettre en place

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou et Damien Leloup, 2016 02 18

Paris - Ce dispositif-clé de la loi du 24 juillet 2015 fait face à des difficultés techniques de conception La loi sur le renseignement, adoptée en grande partie le 24 juillet 2015, promettait, pour répondre efficacement à la menace terroriste, la mise en place rapide de nouveaux outils techniques. Certains d'entre eux ne sont pourtant toujours pas opérationnels. Parmi ceux-ci les " boîtes noires " : ces dispositifs techniques d'interception automatique installés chez les opérateurs télécoms et les hébergeurs Internet et qui devaient permettre de repérer au sein du flux massif de données de communication circulant, notamment, dans les câbles optiques, ce que les spécialistes appellent " les signaux bas " . Ces données ou métadonnées (les informations d'un message qui ne sont pas son contenu : noms, numéros de téléphone ou encore adresses IP) doivent permettre d'identifier, par voie électronique, des comportements éventuellement suspects. Derrière cette typologie se cachent ce que les autorités appellent des " loups solitaires " ou descas de radicalisation isoléséchappant aux radars traditionnels des services de renseignement et aux techniques de surveillance classique. La loi sur le renseignement de juillet 2015 vise précisément cette technique dans son article L 851-3. Mais encore faut-il disposer de l'algorithme idoine -permettant d'effectuer le tri adéquat au sein des centres de données des opérateurs ou des - hébergeurs. Ce travail est toujours en cours. Gigantesque masse La direction technique de la Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE) est, parmi d'autres, associée à ce travail de conception. Ce n'est pas une surprise car c ' est vers la DGSE que sera dirigé le fruit de la collecte effectuée par ces " boîtes noires " , qui n'ont toujours pas vu le jour. Interrogées par Le Monde , les autorités gouvernementales chargées de contrôler les interceptions administratives ont confirmé que ces dispositifs " n'étaient pas encore opérationnels " .

Return to Top / Haut de la page

54. Responsable nucléaire espionné: la vidéo trouvée chez Mohamed Bakkali

Radio Télévision Belge Francophone, Justine Katz, 2016 02 18

Bruxelles - Selon nos informations, la vidéo qui visait à espionner un haut responsable nucléaire, a été retrouvée chez la femme de Mohamed Bakkali. Cet homme est le 6e inculpé dans l'enquête sur les attentats de Paris. Il a été arrêté le 26 novembre 2015, inculpé d'assassinats terroristes. La vidéo, elle, a été retrouvée seulement le 30 novembre, lors d'une perquisition au domicile de son épouse. On apprend que le matériel informatique se trouvait dans les affaires de Mohamed Bakkali. La vidéo est un enregistrement de plusieurs heures, qui suit les allées et venues d'un responsable du nucléaire en Belgique. C'est son domicile privé qui était espionné. Le parquet fédéral confirme l'information, mais ne souhaite pas donner plus de précisions. Selon nos informations, il travaillerait sur le site nucléaire de Mol. Les caméras de surveillance de la rue de son domicile ont permis aux enquêteurs d'apercevoir deux hommes qui s'activaient près de la caméra cachée. Mais la scène est filmée dans le noir et ne permet pas d'identifier les auteurs. Mohamed Bakkali, le logisticien Mohamed Bakkali est-il l'un d'entre eux ? A-t-il commandité la prise d'images ? Avec quelles intentions ? On l'ignore. Son avocat se refuse à tout commentaire. Mohamed Bakkali est un suspect qui semble jouer un rôle important dans la logistique des attentats de Paris.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

55. Turkey blames Syria's YPG group for Ankara blast

Al Jazeera, 2016 02 18

Ankara - Turkey's Prime Minister Ahmet Davutoglu has blamed Syria's PKK-linked YPG group for a blast in the capital Ankara that killed at least 28 people. The Turkish leader used the speech on Thursday to call on the country's allies to pick a side. Davutoglu blamed the suicide attack on a Syrian Kurd with links to the YPG, adding nine others linked to the attack were arrested after the bombing. The Turkish prime minister called on the US and other allies to end cooperation with the YPG in Syria and list it as a terrorist group. "We cannot continue to accept these dual standards, we are looking forward to a uniform stance against them (YPG)," Davutoglu said. "We call on all the countries to take a clear stance against those terrorist organisations...either stand by the side of Turkey as a state or take side with terrorists." Turkish jets carried out air strikes against PKK targets in northern Iraq shortly after the attack killing 70 of its members, the Turkish leader said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

56. Turkish military attacked in south-east as Syrian Kurds blamed for Ankara blast

The Guardian (London), Constanze Letsch, 2016 02 18

Istanbul - An explosion has hit a military convoy in Turkey's south-east, killing at least six people, as the government blamed a car bomb attack that killed 28 on Wednesday on a Kurdish militia based in Syria. On Thursday morning a bomb detonated by remote control hit security forces travelling in a military vehicle on a road linking Diyarbakir to the district of Lice. The military said six people died and one was seriously injured. Ahmet Davuto?lu, Turkey's prime minister, alleged that Wednesday's attack was perpetrated by a Syrian national with links to the Syrian-Kurdish People's Protection Units (YPG). The outlawed Kurdistan Workers' party (PKK) assisted with the attack, he added. "We collected intelligence all night," Davuto?lu told reporters in Ankara. "The perpetrators have been fully identified. The attack was carried out by YPG member Salih Nekar, who came in from Syria. Nine people were detained in connection to the attack." Davuto?lu said Turkish intelligence had established where the militants had crossed into Turkey and how their networks were organised.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Monday, February 29, 2016 • lundi le 29 février 2016

55 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. A First Nations man with a brain injury offered himself to ISIL on Twitter - just to test CSIS

National Post, Stewart Bell, 2016 02 29

Toronto - Two days after a terrorist killed a soldier at the National War Memorial and ran into the Parliament Buildings, Dwayne Boissoneau logged into Twitter to offer himself up to the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. "Hey brother, I'm ready to fight and support ISIS till death," Boissoneau, 30, wrote to a Canadian ISIL member in Syria who uses the alias Abu Turaab al-Kanadi. "I'm a Canadian and I'm sick of the face (fake) politics here." ISIL recruiters apparently believed they had found what they were looking for: a Canadian extremist willing to do what Michael Zehaf-Bibeau had done in Ottawa, a simple but headline-grabbing strike from within. They sent him a message on Twitter that said, "Who wants to do something to some top kaffirs (non-believers)?" They said they could get addresses. "Give me Canadian addresses," Boissoneau responded. "I will ensure something happens." The exchange was detected by the RCMP's Tactical Internet Operational Support Unit and Boissoneau was arrested for uttering a threat. But the judge who heard the case last month found he was not really a terrorist after all. According to the judge's decision, the man ISIL was trying to recruit is a low-to-average functioning First Nations man from Longlac, Ont., who suffers from a childhood brain injury and Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder, and who did not attend high school. The incident, which has gone unreported until now, shows how ISIL recruiters have been prowling social media, trying to goad Canadians and citizens of other Western countries into committing acts of terrorism close to home. Authorities believe that ISIL puts so much emphasis on efforts to incite extremist violence in the West that it has created a cell in Raqqa, Syria devoted to English-language radicalization. They also suspect that within that cell, a desk officer has been assigned specifically to radicalize Canadians. The Boissoneau case demonstrates how haphazardly the system works. ISIL is not choosy. It will work with anyone who says the right things online. Boissoneau had likely caught their attention by writing things like "Death 2 America" and "I kill infidels." His Twitter account shows he began posting extremistsounding messages in August 2014. On Oct. 13, he wrote: "God willing I will come and fight the cause." After he wrote to ISIL about joining, another user asked him, "wanna free ticket?" "YEA," he replied. Later, he added: "If I could afford it I'd be gone by now." Boissoneau was also exchanging Twitter messages with a British ISIL member named Reyaad Khan, who went by Abu Dujana and had also tried to incite attacks in Western countries until he was killed in a targeted drone strike last August. After Boissoneau's arrest, he told police he'd never actually met a terrorist in person and "wasn't that serious about going down there." He said he was going through a rough time and just wanted to "test the system" to find out if the Canadian Security Intelligence Service "can actually detect stuff like that." He acknowledged he had looked into the cost of plane tickets to Turkey, and that his sister said he was "curious about terrorism" but the judge said it appeared the real motive for was his online posts was to get a free plane ticket to Europe so he could visit his Hungarian girlfriend.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Canada

2. Adil Charkaoui arrested for assault: reports

Montreal Gazette, Jesse Feith, 2016 02 29

Montreal - According to media reports, controversial imam Adil Charkaoui was arrested Friday for assault after a recent altercation with a security guard at Collège de Maisonneuve. Montreal police would not confirm the arrest on Sunday. The college confirmed earlier this week that Charkaoui was playing soccer Sunday, Feb. 21, with a group of men in a gymnasium they had rented when a security guard asked them some questions. The men allegedly surrounded the guard, "bullied" him and Charkaoui "had physical contact with him." The guard called police, but no arrests were made at the time. Reports say Charkaoui was arrested Friday for the incident, but released under conditions and a promise to appear in court at a later date. On Saturday, Charkaoui reacted to the reports on social media. "The information that has just been published by La Presse is once again inaccurate, biased and sensationalist," he wrote on Facebook. "I am free in every sense of the word." Charkaoui found himself at the centre of a storm last year when he was linked to 19 young Quebecers who have travelled, or attempted to travel, abroad to conflict zones in the Middle East. Some had attended prayer sessions and activities at the Centre Communautaire Islamique de l'Est de Montréal where Charkaoui was the president of the board of directors. But that is where the association ends, Charkaoui told the Montreal Gazette last June. (Full report)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

3. A Neighborhood in Despair Transforms Into a Model of Inclusion

New York Times, Dan Levin, 2016 02 29

Toronto - Until not too long ago, the mention of Regent Park here in central Toronto brought to mind cockroaches and drug-fueled gang violence. It was an embarrassing stain on a progressive city that for decades had welcomed immigrants fleeing war, famine and poverty only to leave them trapped in an isolated collection of decrepit brick apartment blocks where crime and despair took root. Hard lessons have been learned, and today, an ambitious rejuvenation plan for the 69-acre neighborhood, with the aquatic center as its centerpiece and a ring of condos that are helping to pay for new subsidized and affordable rental housing, is disrupting entrenched notions of class, race and religion at a time when concerns about income inequality and immigration are growing in the West. As Canada accepts 25,000 Syrian refugees, the new Regent Park, thick with immigrants from Africa, Asia and the Caribbean, provides a blueprint for successful economic and cultural integration. Still, ghosts of the old Regent Park haunt the neighborhood, particularly in the public housing blocks that have yet to be demolished. Sally Beebee, 58, a Muslim immigrant from Sri Lanka, worries about using the stairwells in her building, where she says young men use and sell drugs. The risks are especially high for young Somali men and boys in Regent Park. Aside from the perils of drugs, which have led to the sometimes violent deaths of dozens of Somali-Canadians over the past decade, the authorities worry about the lure of Islamic extremism, particularly from terrorist groups like the Islamic State and the Shabab, the Somali branch of Al Qaeda. In 2014, a Somali-Canadian man was convicted of terrorism charges and sentenced to 10 years in prison for attempting to join the Shabab. Several Muslim-Canadians who attended a Toronto mosque disappeared in 2009 and are thought to have joined the terrorist organization, according to Canadian authorities.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. Federal pay system launches; Phoenix goes live in 34 departments - months late but on budget

Ottawa Citizen, Kathryn May, 2016 02 29

Ottawa - A new automated pay system the federal government is rolling out in departments will save millions in overpayments to Canada's public servants and speed up processing that has caused pay glitches and delays, say officials at Public Services and Procurement. The new off-the-shelf system, known as Phoenix, went live last week - four months later than planned - with the first round of 34 federal departments. The first paycheques issued using the new self-serve system will be March 9. The second round of 67 departments will follow in April. Phoenix is also the last of the two-stage "pay transformation" that the Conservatives initiated in 2009 when their government decided to put the pay centre in Miramichi, N.B., as a trade-off for jobs lost when it closed the longgun registry. Phoenix was to roll out in October and December, but those plans were delayed because the department wanted more time to prepare and test the system, said Brigitte Fortin, assistant deputy minister at Public Services and Procurement for accounting, banking and compensation. Despite the delays, she said the project won't exceed its $300-million budget. It is expected to save $70 million a year beginning this year. Fortin said the old technology of the existing 40-year-old system was fraught with "high risks" that contributed to errors and delays in the pay for the 300,000 public servants across the country.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Former Liberal minister calls for Ottawa to revisit Saudi arms deal

Globe and Mail, Steven Chase, 2016 02 29

Ottawa - Former Liberal justice minister Irwin Cotler, a leading international champion of human rights, says he believes the Canadian government should reconsider its controversial $15-billion deal to sell combat vehicles to Saudi Arabia. A law professor and human rights lawyer, Mr. Cotler has drawn acclaim for his work as counsel to prisoners of conscience worldwide, from South Africa's Nelson Mandela to Soviet-era dissident Natan Sharansky. "My position as a matter of general principle - that would apply to Saudi Arabia - is that we should not sell arms to a country that engages in a persistent pattern of human-rights violations," Mr. Cotler said in an interview. He said Canada should re-examine the Saudi deal because the Liberals have committed to joining the global Arms Trade Treaty, which places additional obligations on signatories in terms of transparency and scrutinizing weapons exports. "If we are going to do that, then I think we have to revisit this particular sale to Saudi Arabia." Mr. Cotler said Ottawa must also consider developments, including, as The Globe and Mail reported last week, that Canadian-made fighting vehicles appear to have become embroiled in the Saudi-led fight with Houthi forces in neighbouring Yemen. "There is evolving evidence that we're seeing in terms of Yemen that [The Globe and Mail has] reported on," he said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. Liberals drone shopping exercise sets stage for debate over lethal force

Canadian Press, Murray Brewster, 2016 02 29

Ottawa - The Trudeau government is quietly shopping for drones for the military and expects to see expressions of interest from the defence industry by mid-April. But the tire-kicking exercise is setting the stage for a potentially bruising policy debate over whether the remotely controlled aircraft should be armed and under what circumstances they would employ deadly force. The Royal Canadian Air Force has lobbied hard over the last few years for the capability to fire weapons from whatever drone is selected and has even written the assumption into mandatory requirements, according to a series of access to information records obtained by The Canadian Press. Under the heading "Lethality," the high-level requirements review _ dated June 5, 2013 _ explicitly states that whatever system is chosen, the RCAF expects the remotely piloted aircraft to be capable of "carrying and employing precision-guided munitions." A separate slide presentation, dated Dec. 12, 2013 and intended as an update for the project management office at National Defence, noted there would have to be support for a precision-strike capability, but anticipates "public concern." The Pentagon and CIA run drone programs which have been subject to increasing scrutiny and criticism, particularly in light of the dramatic rise in strikes over the last eight years and claims of civilian casualties. The intelligence agency's program of targeted assassination has been the most controversial, prompting the Obama Administration to pledge three years ago to create "clear guidelines, oversight and accountability" when it comes to decisions to employ lethal force.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

7. Mixed reaction to Canada plan to change citizenship law

Al Jazeera, Mohamed Hashem, 2016 02 29

Ottawa - The Canadian government's plan to repeal citizenship- revocation laws has been welcomed by civil liberty groups in the country. The revocation laws, which were part of Bill C-24, went into effect in May 2015 and strictly applied to dual nationals of Canada giving the government ability to strip dual citizens of their Canadian passport if convicted of "terrorism, high treason and spying offences". "We applaud the government for introducing these changes to restore equal citizenship in Canada. Bill C-24 was discriminatory and unconstitutional," said Laura Track, a counsel for the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA). John McCallum, Canada's immigration minister, has said the government proposes to repeal and change parts of the Citizenship Act, which was previously amended under the Conservative government led by Stephen Harper.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

8. Mounties work to ease fears on both sides of the Syrian refugee story

Canadian Press, Stephanie Levitz and Terry Pedwell, 2016 02 29

Ottawa - Syrian refugees have received little by way of a formal orientation to Canada before they've arrived. In their drive to get 25,000 people here in a matter of months, the Liberals put off the detailed customary pre-departure briefings for refugees and instead waited until they landed. But one agency decided it could not wait: the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Four Mounties were involved last month in an experimental community integration project in Jordan designed to help Syrian refugees and the police force itself. The unique police engagement strategy was developed to address two issues _ the concerns police officers in Canada have over security screening of refugees, and an ingrained mistrust of authorities by the refugees themselves. For RCMP Acting Sgt. Lina Dabit and her colleagues, speaking the same language was an immeasurable help in approaching the refugees they met in Jordan. Crayons and colouring books also helped break the ice with the children. "They weren't afraid of us because we did speak the language," Dabit said in describing the 20 to 30 daily encounters she and three of her colleagues had with Syrian families they met over a 10 day period in January.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

9. News outlet fights RCMP demand for information related to terror suspect

Canadian Press, Colin Perkel, 2016 02 29

Toronto - A Canadian media outlet squares off against the government Monday in a legal battle that pits media freedoms against the ability of police to investigate terrorism offences. Vice Media and its journalist Ben Makuch want Ontario Superior Court to quash an order that they hand over material related to their interviews with a suspected terrorist to the RCMP. "Courts should be wary of allowing the state to conscript journalists as investigative arms of the police," Vice and Makuch state in their factum. "If media outlets are permitted to become investigative arms of the police through the use of production orders, the media's important role and credibility will be undermined, as well as its ability to gather information." A year ago, Ontario court Judge Jack Nadelle ordered the online news outlet to hand over materials that Makuch used to produce three articles in 2014 about Farah Shirdon, of Calgary, including that he had left Canada to fight for Islamic State. The stories were based on conversations Makuch had with Shirdon via an online instant messaging app called Kik Messenger. Police said they needed the information to gather possible further evidence against the Canadian. Nadelle ordered Vice to turn over unedited copies of records of communications with Shirdon and any notes related to how they had communicated with him. The Toronto-born Shirdon, 22, a nephew of a former prime minister of Somalia, has made threats publicly against Canada and the U.S. In October 2014, Makuch cited Shirdon as saying from Iraq: "Canadians at home shall face the brunt of the retaliation. If you are in this crusader alliance against Islam and Muslims you shall see your streets filled with blood." Last September, RCMP charged Shirdon in absentia with several offences, including leaving Canada to participate in the activity of a terrorist group, taking part in the activity of a terrorist group, and threatening the U.S. and Canada.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. RCMP racked up $900,000 in overtime during undercover anti- terrorism operation

Canadian Press, Geordon Omand, 2016 02 29

Vancouver - The RCMP spent just over $900,000 in overtime pay over the course of a five-month undercover operation that led to the arrests of two terrorism suspects in British Columbia. Documents obtained by The Canadian Press through a freedom-of-information request show the Mounties paid at least 200 people, mostly police officers, $911,090.54 for overtime work during the investigation, which was code named Project Souvenir. The operation culminated in the arrests of common-law spouses John Nuttall and Amanda Korody on July 1, 2013. They were found guilty last summer of plotting to blow up the B.C. legislature on that Canada Day. Their convictions have not been entered while defence lawyers argue in B.C. Supreme Court that the couple were manipulated by police into planting homemade pressure-cooker bombs on the legislature grounds. Defence counsel has described Nuttall and Korody as poor, methadone-dependent former drug addicts, while the Crown has said they embraced a radicalized form of Islam and were ready to kill and maim innocent people. The court heard earlier that the operation involved more than 240 police officers, most of whom worked behind the scenes. Many were involved sporadically in the investigation. The bulk of the project's overtime expenses, $519,039.55, went to 100 constables involved in the case, while 30 corporals were paid $128,369.76 and 24 sergeants received $69,494.65. Records show the Vancouver Police Department was given $92,397, though it's unclear how that money was divided.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

11. 5 Klan members arrested at vicious Calif. brawl released

Associated Press, Staff report, 2016 02 29

Anaheim - Five Ku Klux Klan members who were arrested following a vicious brawl in Anaheim were released because evidence shows they acted in self-defense, police said. Seven people who remained in custody were seen beating, stomping and attacking the Klansmen with wooden posts, Sgt. Daron Wyatt said Sunday. A police statement said the clash, which erupted after six Klan members arrived at a park Saturday for a planned anti-immigration rally, was started by a larger group of 10 to 20 counter-protesters who had "the intent of perpetrating violence." Police said the Klansmen stabbed three counter-protesters with knives and the decorative end of a flag pole. "Regardless of an individual or groups' beliefs or ideologies, they are entitled to live without the fear of physical violence and have the right, under the law, to defend themselves when attacked," the statement said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

12. Apple-FBI battle renews push for encryption bill

Washington Post, Karoun Demirjian, 2016 02 29

Washington - The controversy over whether Apple should help federal investigators access the iPhone of one of the San Bernardino shooters is putting renewed urgency behind legislative efforts to settle the contentious issue of when tech companies should comply with government requests for help accessing their customers' secure information. FBI Director James B. Comey strongly hinted to lawmakers last week that it's time for Congress to begin a serious debate about encryption as Apple and the government battle it out in court with a California judge ruling recently that the tech giant should comply with investigators' demands. "Whatever the judge's decision is in California - I'm sure it will be appealed no matter how it ends up - will be instructive for other courts," Comey said Thursday during a House Intelligence Committee hearing. "But I do think the larger question is not going to be answered in the courts, and it shouldn't be, because it's really about who do we want to be and how do we want to govern ourselves." The heated atmosphere is focusing attention on the anticipated release of a bill being drafted by Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, the panel's top Democrat, that would compel companies to override encryption technology when presented with a warrant.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

13. Federal files leave questions about Marathon bomber, friend

Boston Globe, Maria Sacchetti, 2016 02 29

Boston - Tamerlan Tsarnaev passed the US citizenship test three months before he and his younger brother detonated two bombs at the Boston Marathon, according to federal immigration records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. His test results, with correct answers to questions about slavery, the Constitution, and the Louisiana Purchase, are in 651 pages of previously confidential files on the bomber and his friend Ibragim Todashev. Both men were killed in separate incidents after the April 15, 2013, bombings. The Department of Homeland Security provided redacted files to The Boston Globe after multiple requests spanning three years. Only 206 pages were released in their entirety, so it remains unclear why the government granted the friends legal residency and put them on the path toward US citizenship. But the records show that months before the bombings, Tsarnaev went to the John F. Kennedy Federal Building in Boston, swore his allegiance to the United States, and denied any links to terrorism. The records also show that Todashev told immigration officials he had left Massachusetts in September 2011, the same month he allegedly helped Tsarnaev kill three men in Waltham. Until now, the government had declined to release the files, citing ongoing criminal investigations. But the mystery stirred debate about why immigration officials granted Tsarnaev and Todashev refuge in the first place, and whether officials missed warning signs about their criminal activity as their cases progressed through US Citizenship and Immigration Services. On Sunday, the agency issued a statement saying the cases were processed correctly.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

14. Microsoft Shores Up Cybersecurity

Wall Street Journal, Jay Greene, 2016 02 29

Redmond - With a touch of a button on the wall outside Microsoft Corp.'s Cyber Defense Operations Center, opaque windows turn clear, offering visitors a glimpse of the high-tech bunker where the software giant's security engineers work to thwart hackers. The new facility is at the heart of Microsoft's campaign to rebuild its reputation for security at a time when the number of potential targets for cyberattacks -- from smartphones to corporate servers and Web services -- has exploded. The center isn't just a workspace; it's also a showcase. When the glass turns clear, clients can look on as engineers battle hackers from behind dual-screen workstations. Pillars around the room are hung with giant monitors listing the latest threats. The far wall bears the directives "protect," "detect," and "respond" in huge block letters. Microsoft has long been viewed as doing too little to protect its customers from cyberattacks. The company has said, however, that its customers need to feel safe running Windows, storing data in its OneDrive online data-storage facilities, basing operations on its Azure cloud-computing service, and using other Microsoft products. "Microsoft has been on the fringe of security for some time," said Duncan Brown, research director at IDC Research Inc. "Now, they are putting it at the center of operations."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

15. NSA deploys game-changer against U.S. enemies

WTOP Radio (Washington), J.J. Green, 2016 02 29

Washington - U.S. intelligence has hard proof that almost 1,000 foreign intelligence targets, including terrorists tracked by the U.S., have changed their communications methods because they were tipped off by Edward Snowden's leaks. Those targets, according to Rick Ledgett, deputy director of the National Security Agency, include a group of terrorists that were actively plotting to attack the U.S. In an exclusive interview with WTOP, Ledgett described as "significant" the continuing damage caused by the leaks. He also detailed a new program to recapture the advantage over U.S. adversaries. "The information that Snowden leaked caused immediate risk and long-term risk to the safety of Americans around the world, and our friends and allies," said Ledgett. High-level foreign intelligence targets of the U.S. government, that number "in the high hundreds," he said, have altered the way they communicate because of the Snowden leaks.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

16. Pentagon chief to appeal to Silicon Valley for help with cybersecurity

Los Angeles Times, W.J. Hennigan, 2016 02 29

Los Angeles - Defense Secretary Ashton Carter will visit a crucial front this week in the war the Pentagon considers its greatest potential threat: cyberspace. Carter will visit a Pentagon outpost in the heart of Silicon Valley, speak at a cybersecurity conference in San Francisco and go to Microsoft and Amazon headquarters in Seattle to highlight the risks of cyberattacks and the need for greater digital cooperation with the Pentagon. His visit to the West Coast -- his third in less than a year, more than he's made to Kabul or Baghdad -- marks the latest effort by the Obama administration to recruit telecommunications, social media and other technology companies as partners in national security operations despite deep suspicion in Silicon Valley about government surveillance. "One hand of the government is reaching out to the valley, while another is poking them in the eye," said Peter W. Singer, a fellow at the nonprofit New America Foundation in Washington and coauthor of the book "Cybersecurity and Cyberwar."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

17. Tech firms rally to Apple's side in fight over locked phone

Washington Post, Ellen Nakashima, 2016 02 29

Washington - More than 25 major technology firms, media organizations and civil liberties groups are filing briefs this week in support of Apple's effort to block the U.S. government from forcing the company to help unlock an iPhone used by one of the San Bernardino terrorists. Microsoft, Verizon, Facebook, Google, Amazon.com and Yahoo are among the tech and telecom giants preparing to file or join friend-of-the- court briefs, according to industry lawyers. Those involved say the swell of support is unparalleled, especially for a case at the magistrate judge level - the lowest level of the federal court system. The filings also indicate the level of anxiety among companies about the possibility of a legal precedent greatly expanding the limits of what the government can force a company to do in criminal and national security probes. Meanwhile, law enforcement groups and families of some of the 14 killed in the Dec. 2 attack in San Bernardino, Calif., are filing briefs in support of the government.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

18. Focus on Islamist terror plots overlooks threat from far right - report

The Guardian (London), Ben Quinn, Shiv Malik, 2016 02 29

London - The threat from far-right terrorists is being neglected by governments and law enforcement, according to the most extensive survey yet of "lone actors" in Europe. While Islamist plotters are given full attention, the authors of the 98-page report (authored by the Royal United Services Institute, Chatham House, the Institute for Strategic Dialogue and the University of Leiden in the Netherlands) warn that in comparison, individuals and small groups of rightwing extremists in the mould of Norway's Anders Breivik are in fact more lethal, almost as numerous, and much harder to detect by security services. Britain leads any other European country for the sheer number of attacks or plots over the past 15 years that have been planned by individuals or self-starting cells, according to the analysis conducted jointly by four research institutes. It also finds that almost half of rightwing attacks in Britain over recent years were partly motivated by the murder of Lee Rigby - a wave of violence that ranges from arson attacks through to bombings of Islamic centres.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

19. Online retail boom helping criminals smuggle guns into UK, says police chief

The Guardian (London), Vikram Dodd, 2016 02 29

London - Police trying to prevent terrorists from obtaining guns warn a rise in parcels being sent to Britain due to online shopping is helping criminals to camouflage firearms being smuggled into the country. Dave Thompson, chief constable of West Midlands police and the national lead for countering firearms, said there had been a surge in the number of guns circulating in the UK. In a Guardian interview, he said firearms were being reactivated overseas and then ordered for delivery into the UK. "Traditionally you'd have seen maybe six or seven years ago we'd be stopping people at Dover with 10 Baikals [a make of firearm] concealed in compartments in the car. That's become less of a feature. What's become more of a feature is weapons through the fast parcel system, individual items coming through." Thompson said guns and ammunition were still hard to acquire in the UK, and after the Paris attacks police had intensified their focus on stopping weapons being available for sale. But firearms are coming in from the US and Europe, with Germany causing special concerns, as well as Balkan countries. Once the weapons are smuggled into Britain, it is feared, they could fall into terrorist hands. "We can't safeguard ourselves by relying on criminals who might have access to firearms to have benign intent," Thompson said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

20. Snoopers' charter faces Tory revolt

London Times, Fiona Hamilton, 2016 02 29

London - The government has been accused of rushing through new legislation that will give the security services sweeping new surveillance powers over the internet. The Investigatory Powers Bill, known as the "snoopers charter", is expected to attract controversy when it is introduced to the Commons this week. A Tory backbench revolt is anticipated after parliamentary committees raised privacy concerns about the bill and warned that it contained excessive powers, such as the provision for spies to obtain bulk data of private information across a wide section of the public. There is also concern about communications companies being required to hold for 12 months internet connection records, which reveal which websites their customers visit, although not the content of their communications. A final vote on the 300-page bill is expected before the Easter recess, prompting claims yesterday that the Home Office was trying to rush it through.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

21. UK imams visit Iraq to counter Isis propaganda by learning of life under jihadists

The Independent (UK), Oliver Wright, 2016 02 29

London - A group of Sunni imams are to make the first-ever visit by British Muslim religious leaders to see at first hand the front line in the fight against Isis. The imams, representing mosques across the country, will travel to Iraq tomorrow for an eight-day fact-finding mission. They are expected to visit parts of the country previously under Isis control as well as meeting victims of the group, including from the Yazidi community. The hope is that the visit will help to counter Isis propaganda in this country by highlighting the Sunni resistance to Isis in Iraq and relaying back first-hand accounts of life under the extremists. If successful, the plan is to then bring Iraqi Sunni imams to the UK, to talk in mosques about the reality of life in Isis-controlled areas and to "deglamorise" the group and its appeal to young British Muslims. The trip is being paid for in part by trustees of the Imam Husayn Shrine in Karbala which Isis attempted to blow up earlier this year. The rest of the funding is coming from the Muslim community in the UK.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

22. Border agencies crack down on terror funding

Courier Mail, Staff Writer, 2016 02 28

Canberra - Almost half a million dollars in cash has been seized at Melbourne airport in three weeks amid suspicions of links to the financing of terror groups. A combined taskforce of Australian law enforcement officers detected more than $400,000 in undeclared excess currency at customs late last year and the seizure of items, including one crossbow and two electronic shock devices. Operation Kerlerap was part of increased effort from federal agencies, including the Australian Border Force's Counter-Terrorism Unit, which has linked organised crime and - terrorism through financial transactions or the supply of weapons.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

23. Send SAS to destroy ISIS, army told (Canada)

The Australian, Brendan Nicholson, 2016 02 28

Canberra - Australian special forces should be sent into Islamic State strongholds to find and destroy terrorists before they can launch their attacks, former army chief Peter Leahy says, in a call for a more direct confrontation with emerging threats. Professor Leahy, who led the army as a lieutenant general for six years during fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq, told The Australian the nation needed to rethink how it dealt with terrorism by adding a much sharper counter-terrorism strategy to its counter-insurgency efforts. "We've spent a lot of time in both Afghanistan and Iraq trying to build nice governments and we really have not had any success," he said. "The terrorists are still there." The more aggressive approach would see Australian special forces work with those from the US, Britain, France and others who have already established bases within striking range of potential targets, and with governments much closer to home. The strategy could use as mobile bases the navy's new landing ships, HMAS Canberra and HMAS Adelaide, together with unmanned surveillance aircraft to gather intelligence and to hit targets. Professor Leahy said the counter-terrorism strategy would complement the nation-building efforts involved in the counter-insurgency work that was already under way. Counter-insurgency involves fighting terrorists along with a strong focus on nation-building and training local armies to defend their own countries. A greater emphasis on counter-terrorism would mean finding and destroying terrorists in their bases. "Say you have a situation where Australian hostages are held in Papua New Guinea in the foothills of Lae. With the PNG government's permission you land in Lae, roll out your helicopters and you can hit a camp to recover an Australian, for example." Mr Hastie said Australia had to adapt and learn best practice from allies in the "Five Eyes" intelligence-sharing network -- the US, Britain, Canada and New Zealand -- who were already engaged in such operations.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

24. Spy fears may signal curtains for drone fun

The Australian, Paige Taylor, 2016 02 28

Canberra - For the past two weeks, the sci-fi buzz of a Blade Chroma drone has occupied and amused Tim Watson and his young sons. Brodie, 7, and five-year-old Matty have enjoyed chasing the new $2000 family toy at John Dunn Memorial Park near their home in Perth's southeast. The three are crazy about electronics and Brodie is allowed to fly the drone when his dad switches it to semi-automated "smart mode", which the manufacturer describes as "a simple and safe drone experience" for the beginner. "I've wanted something like this since I was about the boys' age," Mr Watson said. He and his sons enjoy their hobby mainly on weekends at a dedicated 24ha flying field 30km south of Perth. It is owned by the Kalamunda Aeronautical Model Society, where Mr Watson is an instructor. There, even hobbyists must undergo a competency test before they can pilot anything. The increasing popularity of drones is drawing enthusiasts to suburban parks across Australia and a growing number of councils are responding by moving to restrict or ban them.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Afghanistan • Pakistan

25. Claims that 'Nawaz took money from Bin Laden' resurface

Pakistan Dawn, Malik Asad, 2016 02 29

Islamabad - A new book has once again made the claim that Nawaz Sharif received money from Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden. The book, Khalid Khawaja: Shaheed-i-Aman, is authored by Shamama Khalid, the wife of former ISI operative Khalid Khawaja. "Chief of PML-N Mian Mohammad Nawaz Sharif received funding from Osama Bin Laden, founder of Al-Qaeda, to contest elections against Benazir Bhutto's led Pakistan People's Party (PPP) after the end of Zia regime," the book states. The book claims that Mr Sharif's pledge of introducing an Islamic system attracted Khawaja as well as Bin Laden. But even though the Al Qaeda head honcho funded Nawaz Sharif heavily, the latter backtracked from all his promises after coming into power. The book also carries a note from former ISI director general, retired Lt-Gen Hamid Gul, which also claims that Khawaja was very close to Nawaz Sharif for some time.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

26. US using ties to reduce India-Pakistan tensions

Pakistan Dawn, Anwar Iqbal, 2016 02 29

Washington - The United States maintains close ties with both Pakistan and India because they help reduce tensions between South Asia's two nuclear-armed neighbours, says US Secretary of State John Kerry. A transcript released on Sunday shows Secretary Kerry arguing in two recent congressional hearings that the US has been working "really hard" to advance a "rapprochement" between Islamabad and New Delhi. In one of the statements he indirectly confirmed media reports that the US had been quietly encouraging the two prime ministers to hold bilateral talks. "We encourage that. I think it's required to encourage both leaders to engage in the dialogue that they've engaged in," he said. "And needless to say, we don't want to do things that upset the balance. But we do believe that Pakistan is engaged legitimately in a very tough fight against identifiable terrorists in their country that threaten Pakistan," he argued.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

27. Boumerdès Un terroriste se rend aux services de sécurité

Liberté (Algérie), Madjid T, 2016 02 28

Cap Djenet - Un terroriste s'est rendu avec sa kalachnikov, avant-hier, aux services de sécurité de la commune de Cap Djenet, a-t-on appris de source locale. Âgé de 32 ans, le repent, surnommé Abou Siaf, originaire de Cap Djenet, avait rejoint les maquis islamistes de l'ex-GSPC en 2005. Il faisait partie de Katibat Othmane-Benou-Afane relevant de l'ex-GSPC dont le champ d'action s'étend de Dellys à Tizi Ouzou. Cette nouvelle reddition intervient une semaine après l'élimination de deux terroristes à Ammal.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

28. Kenya airports targets of al Shaabab attacks - KAA security head

The Star (Kenya), Staff report, 2016 02 29

Nairobi - Security has been beefed up in major airports following intelligence reports on Sunday evening of impending attacks by al Shabaab. Eleven militants have undergone training in Somalia and could carry out attacks early in March, said the Kenya Airports Authority head of security. "Domestic flights are the main targets. Operatives posing as passengers intend to blow themselves up during landing," Eric Kiraithe said. "Five operatives will target Jomo Kenyatta International Airport or Wilson Airport while the rest will focus on airports at the Coast region, among them Moi International Airport."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

29. L'Algérie arrête neuf Marocains soupçonnés de « vouloir rallier Daesh en Libye »

yabiladi.com (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 02 28

Alger - L'armée algérienne a procédé à l'arrestation de neuf Marocains soupçonnés de vouloir rejoindre Daesh en Libye, indique le ministère de la Défense dans un communiqué relayé par la presse locale. Les interpellés sont poursuivis par la justice pour « association de malfaiteurs », « aide, assistance et transport illégal d'étrangers », rapporte le quotidien El Watan. Une information qui suscite le doute puisque les présumés aspirants jihadistes ont emprunté un autocar, au vu et au su des autorités, reliant Alger à Hassi Messaoud, situé dans la wilaya de Ouargla dans le Sahara.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

30. Le Maroc a aidé plusieurs pays, dont les Etats-Unis et le Danemark, à déjouer des projets d'attentats

La Relève (Maroc), Journaliste maison, 2016 02 28

Rabat - Outre la France et l'Espagne, le Maroc a aidé plusieurs autres pays à déjouer des projets d'attentats dont les Etats-Unis et le Danemark, a révélé le Directeur du Bureau central d'investigations judiciaires (BCIJ), Abdelhak Khiame. "C'est grâce au travail de nos équipes que plusieurs projets d'attentats ont pu être déjoués dans le monde entier. Outre la France, nous avons également renseigné l'Italie, les Pays-Bas, le Danemark et même hors d'Europe, les Etats-Unis", a indiqué M. Khiame dans un entretien publié vendredi par "Maroc Hebdo". Le directeur du BCIJ a rappelé la précieuse coopération entre les services marocains et leurs homologues français et espagnols et ayant permis l'arrestation du cerveau présumé des attentats terroristes du 13 novembre dernier à Paris, ainsi que le démantèlement des cellules terroristes dans les villes de Nador et de Sebta. Qualifiant en revanche de "médiocre", voire d'"inexistante" la coopération au niveau du Maghreb, M. Khiame a mis en garde contre les périls frontaliers qui menacent la région. "L'Algérie refuse de coopérer avec nous. Pourtant les périls qui menacent aujourd'hui de frapper la région sont transfrontaliers, et il est important de collaborer. Il y a à mon avis tout un effort à faire au niveau interarabe, pas seulement au Maghreb", a-t-il dit.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

31. Somalia's al-Shabab claims Baidoa attack killing 30

BBC News, Staff report, 2016 02 29

London - Islamist militant group al-Shabab has said it carried out Sunday's attack in Somalia's southern city of Baidoa that killed at least 30 people. A car bomb exploded outside a restaurant as people were watching the English Premier League match between Manchester United and Arsenal. In a second explosion, a suicide bomber blew himself up at a busy junction. This is the fourth major al-Shabab attack in Somalia since the beginning of the year.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

32. Un pays coupé en deux par le terrorisme

Agence QMI, Marie-Christine Trottier, 2016 02 29

Yaoundé - Le sud du Cameroun se développe sous haute sécurité, alors que le nord peine à survivre Boko Haram sème la terreur au nord du Cameroun depuis un peu plus de deux ans. Des villages entiers ont été pillés et des attentats kamikazes frappent régulièrement les lieux publics, ce qui freine le développement du pays. «Les gens meurent chez eux, simplement parce que les routes sont fermées ou les couvre-feux les empêchent d'aller se faire soigner», explique Fadimatou, une commerçante du nord du pays qui a été forcée de migrer vers le sud à la suite d'un attentat suicide qui a ravagé le marché où elle se trouvait. Les raids et les enlèvements perpétrés par Boko Haram au nord du Cameroun se sont multipliés ces deux dernières années. On compte, depuis juillet, une cinquantaine d'attentats kamikazes dans cette région, ce qui a causé la fuite de milliers de familles. En mai 2014, le président du Cameroun, Paul Biya, a déclaré la guerre à Boko Haram et il s'est lancé dans une opération coûteuse, que le pays peine à assumer financièrement. «Toutes les dépenses que nous avons mises dans cette guerre, ce sont des dépenses dont nous avons besoin pour le développement de notre nation qui en a drôlement besoin. C'est une saignée de notre trésor public», de déplorer Issa Tchiroma Bakary, le ministre des Communications du Cameroun.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

33. Colombia: ELN rebels 'taking over Farc areas' ahead of peace deal

BBC News, Staff report, 2016 02 29

London - Colombia's indigenous agency (Onic) has expressed concern over the presence of fighters from the ELN, or National Liberation Army, in areas traditionally held by the Farc rebel group. The government and the Farc are expected to sign a historic peace accord on 23 March.

The head of the agency, Luis Fernando Arias, urged the authorities to investigate. He said the indigenous people fear the presence of the ELN on their land. Indigenous groups in many parts of the country have found ELN propaganda material in their areas, said Mr Arias.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Asia • Asie

34. China likely to tighten enforcement of U.N. sanctions on N. Korea: scholar

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 02 29

Beijing - China is likely to tighten its enforcement of U.N. sanctions against North Korea as the North's nuclear test and rocket launch this year appear to change a calculus of the Chinese Communist Party on how to solve the North Korean problem, according to a Chinese scholar on Monday. Last week's agreement by the United States and China on a draft U.N. resolution, which includes a ban on the supply of aviation fuel to North Korea, was evidence of the shift in Beijing's stance towards its only treaty ally Pyongyang, said Li Kaisheng, research fellow at the Institute of International Relations of Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences. Li made the remarks during an interview with Hong Kong-based Phoenix TV on Sunday. The United Nations is weighing over the draft resolution to punish North Korea for its Jan. 6 nuclear test and Feb. 7 launch of a long-range rocket, both of which violated previous U.N. resolutions. Winning China's cooperation is key to ensure the effectiveness of U.N. sanctions against North Korea because China accounts for nearly 90 percent of the North's foreign trade. Still, China is unlikely to put crippling sanctions on North Korea because a sudden collapse of the regime could spark a refugee crisis at its border and lead to a pro-U.S., democratic Korea on its doorstep, analysts say. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

35. China to prosecute two senior officials from Xinjiang over graft

Reuters, 2016 02 29

Beijing - China's ruling Communist Party has expelled two senior officials in the violence-prone far western region of Xinjiang for corruption and transferred them to prosecutors, an anti-graft watchdog said. China has jailed dozens of senior officials since President Xi Jinping launched a sweeping campaign against deep-seated graft after assuming office three years ago. In June, authorities announced an investigation over serious discipline violations, a euphemism for corruption, into Alimjan Maimaitiming, 56, a former secretary general in the government of Xinjiang, home to many of China's ethnic Muslim Uighurs. The violations were "extremely severe" and "gravely damaged party unity", the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) said on its website late on Sunday. The suspected crimes ranged from "forming cliques and factions" and opposing investigation to transferring criminal proceeds, destroying evidence, abusing his power and having improper sexual relations, the watchdog said in its statement. Alimjan Maimaitiming's official biography says he is from Cherchen, also known by its Chinese name of Qiemo, in the heavily Uighur deep south of Xinjiang. He was previously editor-in-chief of the official Xinjiang Daily.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

36. City to boost Xinjiang stability

China Daily, 2016 02 29

The city was officially established in Hotan prefecture on Feb 26 and is expected to play a strategic role in maintaining social stability in the region. Kunyu is the administrative headquarters of the 14th division of the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, founded more than 60 years ago, serves as a stabilizing force in Xinjiang, which faces the constant threat of terrorism. The corps is known for building large-scale modern agriculture enterprises and training local militia in desert and border areas. It is a provincial-level organization that handles all administrative and judicial affairs in areas under its administration. On Saturday, Sun Jinlong, 54, was appointed the corps' new Party chief. Previously, he was deputy Party head of Hunan province. Kunyu covers an area of more than 687 square kilometers. It is now the second-largest city in Hotan prefecture, after Hotan city, which is 78 km away. The State Council, China's highest executive body, approved the application to make Kunyu a county-level city on Jan 7, as part of efforts to implement the central government's decision to support the corps' development in southern Xinjiang. The corps is working on transforming the headquarters of its 14 divisions into cities so they can better contribute to local social stability and development. So far, the company has created nine new cities. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

37. Kaspersky warns of Black Energy as an emerging cyber threat

The Hindustan Times, 2016 02 29

New Delhi - In a recent press release, Kaspersky Lab has revealed an information-stealing malware program that causes cyberattack-induced disruption of their whole business process. More Than Espionage: The majority of targeted attacks hitting businesses nowadays are conducted with cyberespionage in mind, harvesting precious business secrets or confidential personal data. But from time to time attackers get up to something completely different - like sabotage. This mode of attack is especially alarming because IT departments tend to focus on data loss/leaks, leaving them unprepared for the cyberattack-induced disruption of their whole business process, involving many different systems. Sometimes even physical consequences can result - particularly if the targeted business makes extensive use of ICS/SCADA which can be reached (a dangerous design flaw!) through general purpose networks.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

38. N.Korean Spy Chief Says Pyongyang Not Scared of Sanctions

Chosun Ilbo, 2016 02 29

The head of North Korea's General Bureau of Reconnaissance has said that the regime will survive regardless of international sanctions. Kim Yong-chol, who has headed the bureau since 2009, also serves as head of the United Front Department, which deals with South Korea. The former CEO of North Korean carmaker Pyeonghwa Motors told the Chosun Ilbo on Sunday that

Kim Yong-chol told him North Korea "has not lived a single day without sanctions and will not die from them." Pyeonghwa is a joint venture car company between the two Koreas. Park Sang-kwon related the same comments on TV on Saturday. Park also said that Kim is unhappy that he is constantly being identified in the South Korean media as the mastermind of the sinking of the Navy corvette Cheonan, shelling of Yeonpyeong Island, cyber attacks and box mine attack in the demilitarized zone. "I monitor all South Korean media reports about me and they accuse me of all of the bad things. But I'm not capable of doing those things," he quoted Kim as saying. Kim also insisted that the North's latest nuclear test was only aimed at defending the isolated state against a U.S. threat, while North Korean leader Kim Jong-un intends to continue testing long-range rockets until the international community is convinced of their peaceful purpose. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

39. North Korea says detained U.S. student confesses to crimes against state(Canada)

Reuters, 2016 02 29

Seoul - An American student held in North Korea since early January was detained for trying to steal a propaganda slogan from his Pyongyang hotel and has confessed to "severe crimes" against the state, the North's official media said on Monday. North Korea has a long history of detaining foreigners, and has used detained U.S. citizens in the past to extract high-profile visits from the United States, with which it has no formal diplomatic relations. Otto Warmbier, 21, a student at the University of Virginia, was detained before boarding his flight to China over an unspecified incident at his hotel, his tour agency told Reuters in January. "I committed the crime of taking out a political slogan from the staff-only area of the Yanggakdo International Hotel," the North's KCNA news agency quoted Warmbier as telling foreign and domestic media in Pyongyang, the North Korean capital. Warmbier said an acquaintance who belonged to a church had offered him a used car worth $10,000 if he could present the church with the slogan as a "trophy" from North Korea, according to the agency. Roughly 6,000 Westerners visit the country annually, though the governments of the U.S. and Canada advise against it. Most are adventure-seekers curious about life behind the last sliver of the iron curtain, and ignore critics who say their dollars prop up a repressive regime.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

40. Student Held in North Korea Apologizes

New York Times, Choe Sang-Hun, 2016 02 29

Seoul - An American student detained in North Korea appeared in a government-arranged news conference in Pyongyang, the capital, on Monday, apologizing for what the country called an antistate crime: trying to steal a political banner. The student, Otto F. Warmbier, an undergraduate at the University of Virginia, was detained in North Korea in January while visiting the country on a tourist visa. While announcing his arrest, the state news media reported last month that Mr. Warmbier entered the country with the intent of "bringing down the foundation of its single-minded unity." "I made the worst mistake of my life," said Mr. Warmbier, sobbing and pleading for his release, according to video clips posted on Twitter by

Will Ripley, a CNN reporter who covered the news conference, held at the People's Palace of Culture in Pyongyang. Mr. Warmbier, 21, was accused of trying to steal a political banner hanging on the wall of the Yanggakdo International Hotel in Pyongyang, where he was staying, early on Jan. 1, CNN said. The charges against him said he was encouraged to commit the "hostile act" by a member of an Ohio church, a secretive university organization and the C.I.A. It remained unclear whether Mr. Warmbier was coerced to appear at the news conference and apologize. CNN said the student appeared to be reading from a statement.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

41. Chechnya's hardman says he is ready to step down

London Times, Tom Parfitt, 2016 02 29

Moscow - The Kremlin-backed leader of Chechnya has hinted that he is ready to leave his post if President Putin wants him to. Ramzan Kadyrov, a regional strongman with tens of thousands of paramilitaries at his command, told state television he would happily "say goodbye" and concentrate on his family and animals. The 39-year-old former separatist rebel has led Chechnya for almost a decade, during which several of his opponents have been shot dead, both inside Russia and abroad. On Saturday, thousands of Russians marched in Moscow to mark the first anniversary of the assassination of Boris Nemtsov, a critic of Mr Putin, who was shot four times in the back. A former officer in a Chechen military unit run by one of Mr Kadyrov's relatives is among five men charged with the murder.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

42. Bad day for Iran's hardliners as reformists sweep to election victory in Tehran and beyond

The Independent (UK), Kim Sengupta, 2016 02 29

Tehran - Landmark elections in Iran have resulted in sweeping gains for reformists and significant setbacks for hardliners, paving the way for pivotal changes for the country, both domestically and in its relations with the international community. The sheer scale of the advance made by the List of Hope, backing the government of Hassan Rouhani, unfolded as more than 90 per cent of the votes were counted in the crucial battleground of Tehran. It had taken every single parliamentary seat in the capital and was in overall lead over its rivals nationwide. The liberals also made unexpected progress in a second vote, which took place for the Assembly of Experts, a body traditionally dominated by hardliners and which appoints the Supreme Leader - the ultimate source of power in the Islamic Republic. Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the current holder of the office, is 76 and is said to be ailing, meaning a successor may have to be chosen during the Assembly's eight-year term. What made the reformists' triumph all the more remarkable was that the Guardian Council, which vets candidates, had refused to let thousands of them run; among them was Hassan Khomeini, grandson of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the founder of the Islamic Republic. But after rejecting initial calls from some to boycott the polls, the reformists mobilised and formed alliances with moderate conservatives who had become alarmed by the aggressive rhetoric of hardliners. The principalists, as the hardliners call themselves, saw many of their most senior leaders fall in a dramatic 24 hours, including, significantly, almost all the main opponents of President Rouhani's nuclear deal with the world powers.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

43. Iran Disbands Another Terror Cell

Fars News Agency, 2016 02 29

Tehran - Deputy Interior Minister for Security and Law Enforcement Affairs Hossein Zolfaqari said security forces disbanded another terrorist cell in Western Iran. "This morning two terrorists crossed the Western borders (in Soumar region). They were killed by border guards and security forces on the spot," Zolfaqari told reporters in Tehran Sunday night. He said several other terror plots were also foiled before and during the elections on Friday. In relevant remarks today, Commander of the Army's Western Zone Base General Manouchehr Kazzemi said security forces killed the two terrorists and confiscated their weapons, ammunitions and suicide belts. Intelligence Minister Seyed Mahmoud Alavi had announced on Sunday that security forces disbanded two terror cells plotting terrorist attacks ahead of the February 26 vote.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

44. Al Qaeda Rejects Truce, Calls for More Fighting in Syria

Asharq Al-Awsat, Staff Report, 2016 02 29

Beirut - The head of Syria's branch of al-Qaeda, one of its most powerful rebel groups, called for an escalation in fighting against the government and its allies on Saturday and urged opponents of President Bashar al-Assad to reject a ceasefire due to begin at midnight. The government and the opposition have agreed to take part in a U.S.-Russian "cessation of hostilities" accord that is due to begin at midnight (2200 GMT on Friday). Warring parties had been required to sign up by noon. Under the measure, which has not been signed by the Syrian warring parties themselves and is less binding than a formal ceasefire, the government and its enemies are expected to stop shooting so aid can reach civilians and peace talks begin. The truce excludes jihadist groups such as ISIS and the al-Qaeda-linked Nusra Front. The Damascus government and its Russian allies said they will not halt operations against those militants.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

45. Deputy intelligence chief killed as gunmen strike again in Aden

The National (UAE), Mohammed Al Qalisi, 2016 02 29

Aden - Gunmen killed Aden's deputy chief of intelligence on Friday in the latest assassination targeting high-ranking officials in Yemen's southern port city. Col Adham Mohammed Al Ga'ari, 40, who was also the leader of the Popular Committees civilian militia in neighbouring Abyan province, died on the spot in the attack near his home in Khour Maksar district at 2pm. "The armed men shot Al Ga'ari from a car using an American gun" before fleeing, a source in Aden's security services said. There was no claim of responsibility for the attack. Two of Al Ga'ari's three sons were in the car with him when he was killed but were unharmed. The older son, 12-year-old Mohammed, described the attack. Al Ga'ari took part in the military operation that was launched in 2011 to drive the Yemen-based branch of Al Qaeda - Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula - out of Abyan.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

46. G-20: Kingdom highlights tough measures against terror financing

Arab News, Staff Report, 2016 02 29

Shanghai - The Saudi banking sector is one of the best in the world, said Fahd bin Abdullah Al-Mubarak, governor of Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency. The Kingdom's tight measures against terrorist financing and money laundering crimes are also among the best in the world, said the governor. His remarks came as the G-20 finance ministers and central bank chiefs ended their meeting in Shanghai on Saturday. More needs to be done to combat "loopholes and deficiencies" in the world financial system as part of the fight against terrorism, the G-20 finance ministers said in their final communique. The G-20 officials also urged the Paris-based Financial Action Task Force (FATF) to "intensify its work on identifying, analyzing and tackling terrorist financing threats, the sources and methods of funding and the use of funds."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

47. Hezbollah defiant as Saudi Arabia squeezes tighter

Lebanon Daily Star, Hussein Dakroub, 2016 02 29

Beirut - Saudi Arabia Friday stepped up pressure on Lebanon, blacklisting four companies and three Lebanese men it accused of having links to Hezbollah, as the party remained defiant, refusing to apologize to the kingdom. "The kingdom will continue to fight the terrorist activities of the so-called Hezbollah with all available means. It will continue to clearly deal with global partners as no state or international organizations should overlook Hezbollah's militias and its extremist activities," the Saudi Interior Ministry said. Carried by the official Saudi Press Agency, the statement accused Hezbollah of "spreading chaos and instability, in addition to waging terror attacks and practicing criminal and illegal acts across the world." The statement came a week after Riyadh froze $4 billion in military aid to Lebanon over "hostile" stances linked to Hezbollah. The move is the latest escalatory action by Riyadh and its Gulf allies against Lebanon - with a focus on Hezbollah - over political disputes.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

48. No evidence linking accused to account supporting Muslim Brotherhood, UAE court hears

The National (UAE), Naser Al Remeithi, 2016 02 29

Abu Dhabi - There is no evidence to link a man accused of publishing support for the Muslim Brotherhood online with a Twitter account that praised the group, argued his lawyer. Emirati M M F, 43, is accused of used his personal Twitter account to show sympathy towards the group. Court documents shown to the Federal Supreme Court in Abu Dhabi state "he legitimised the work of the Muslim Brotherhood calling them peaceful, unarmed heroes and rallied on people to support them". "The sentiments that were found online do not represent my client's beliefs or reflect them as can be seen in the investigations," his lawyer said. The Twitter account had been inactive for a long time before M M F was arrested, his lawyer explained. "My client does not belong to any group or political ideology," his lawyer told the court.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Others • Autres

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

49. Attentats de Paris : arrestation d'un suspect en Algérie

Sud Ouest (site web) avec l'Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 02 29

Akbou Algérie - Ce ressortissant algérien est soupçonné "d'avoir eu des liens avec les attentats terroristes de Paris perpétrés en novembre dernier" et d'être un proche d'Abdelhamid Abaaoud Un Algérien résidant en Belgique soupçonné de liens avec les attaques jihadistes du 13 novembre à Paris a été arrêté mardi en Algérie. Le suspect a été placé en détention préventive à Akbou, dans le département de Béjaïa (250 km à l'est d'Alger), a précisé le parquet. Un détour par la Turquie et la Grèce Le suspect s'est livré de lui-même en répondant à une convocation du juge d'instruction du tribunal d'Akbou, a ajouté le parquet, sans dévoiler l'identité du suspect et son rôle présumé dans ces attentats. Selon le quotidien Le Soir d'Algérie, il s'agit de Zouhir Mehdaoui, âgé de 29 ans, qui a quitté l'Algérie en 2012 à destination de la Turquie.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

50. Belgique : une enquête sur Salah Abdeslam classée sans suite en juin

Le Jdd (site web), Thomas Liabot, 2016 02 29

Bruxelles - Entendu par la police belge après la fusillade de Verviers en janvier dernier, Salah Abdeslam n'avait pas été jugé dangereux par les services fédéraux. L'homme le plus recherché d'Europe a été entendu par la police il y a un an. Selon la RTBF, Salah Abdeslam avait attiré les soupçons des enquêteurs belges après la fusillade de Verviers en janvier 2015. Les frères Abdeslam n'apparaissaient alors dans aucune base de données des renseignements locaux et n'étaient pas liés au terrorisme. C'est la police locale qui, après avoir recueilli des informations à Molenbeek, avait eu vent de leur projet de quitter la Belgique pour la Syrie. Fiché comme candidat au djihad Entendu le 28 février 2015, Salah Abdeslam avait rassuré les enquêteurs sur ses intentions, reconnaissant simplement connaître Abdelhamid Abaaoud, un ancien ami de quartier. Une version assez crédible pour disparaître des radars. La police fédérale chargée de l'enquête par la suite va en effet décider de ne pas creuser cette piste. Les frères Abdeslam ne seront pas placés sous écoute ni surveillés, encore moins perquisitionnés.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

51. Cryptage/terrorisme: Yann Galut (PS) veut mettre Apple et Google à l'amende

Agence France-Presse, Journaliste maison, 2016 02 29

Paris - Le député PS Yann Galut dépose lundi un amendement pour contraindre les géants informatiques, notamment Apple et Google, à collaborer avec la justice et propose une amende de 1 million d'euros s'ils n'obtempèrent pas, ce qu'il explique dans un entretien au Parisien/Aujourd'hui en France. "Nous sommes confrontés à un vide juridique sur la question de chiffrement de données, qui bloque les enquêtes judiciaires", déplore le député du Cher, qui dépose un amendement sanctionnant d'une amende de 1MEUR ceux qui s'abstiendraient "de répondre dans les meilleurs délais à une réquisition de la justice". "Apple, Google, ces grands groupes extrêmement puissants ne peuvent être contraints que financièrement", justifie-t-il. Le député fustige "la totale mauvaise foi" d'Apple et Google qui mettent en avant la protection de la vie privée de leurs clients "alors qu'elles n'hésitent pas à faire une exploitation commerciale des données". En France, en 2015, huit téléphones sont restés inaccessibles à la police judiciaire dans des enquêtes pour terrorisme, souligne le quotidien. Les grands groupes technologiques comme Apple ou Google proposent de plus en plus de produits et applications inviolables, dont seul l'utilisateur détient la clef.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

52. Jean-Yves Le Drian, général « tête dure »

Les Echos, Anne Bauer avec Elsa Freyssenet, 2016 02 29

Paris - Au fil des crises, le grognard de la Hollande est devenu un pilier du gouvernement. La guerre contre le terrorisme et ses succès en matière de ventes d'armes ont donné au ministre une influence qui va bien au-delà de son portefeuille de la Défense. Matignon est à sa portée. Même s'il préfère la Bretagne. Le ton jusque-là animé est soudain devenu accablé. Jean-Yves Le Drian évoque la nuit du 13 novembre : seul en voiture de retour d'un meeting à Lorient, le président l'appelle pour lui demander son avis sur l'instauration de l'état d'urgence. « Oui, bien sûr » , répond-il. Sur un second téléphone, les informations tombent : il y a beaucoup de morts, on ne sait pas encore combien. Il n'ira pas à Rennes filant directement vers Paris dans la nuit... Dans sa voix, c'est comme l'entrée dans un long tunnel - « on a changé de monde » - dont personne n'est encore sorti. Depuis, il a oeuvré au renforcement de la présence militaire sur notre sol, au partage - enfin ! - des renseignements américains pour frapper en Syrie et a enchaîné les réunions internationales pour intensifier la lutte contre Daech. Mais trois mois et demi après les attentats de Paris, la France et son ministre de la Défense se heurtent toujours aux intérêts de la Russie de Poutine - « on ne va pas aller faire la guerre aux Russes » , soupire-t-on à l'hôtel de Brienne.

Dans l'imbroglio syrien, le ministre s'en tient à sa doctrine : « Il y a en Syrie une guerre civile attisée par Bachar Al Assad qui nécessite un règlement politique et il y a notre combat contre l'ennemi Daech qu'il faut frapper, cogner, éliminer. » C'est lui qui, dès septembre 2015, a convaincu François Hollande d'en finir avec la ligne Fabius (pas de frappes en Syrie qui pourraient aider Bachar Al Assad). L'enjeu dépasse sa seule personne, mais Jean-Yves Le Drian en sera comptable quand même si un nouvel attentat survenait. « Il y aura d'autres attaques, c'est une certitude », répète Manuel Valls. Le ministre le sait - « la menace est permanente » - mais fait un pas de côté sur la communication : « Moi, je ne fais pas dans l'anxiogène, mais je suis dans la vigilance permanente, je ne fais pas de déclaration particulière mais je mets des soldats partout, partout, partout. » Façon de revendiquer son verbe sobre et factuel. Manière aussi de suggérer qu'il ne craint pas de se démarquer du Premier ministre.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

53. L'enquête menée sur Abdeslam avant les attentats bientôt examinée

Le Soir (Belgique), P. Ma., 2016 02 29

Bruxelles - L'enquête menée sur Salah Abdeslam en 2015 a-t-elle été menée dans les formes? Le 7 mars, le Comité P se penchera à huis clos sur la manière dont les services de renseignement et la police ont alors travaillé. Au lendemain de l'assaut de Verviers, qui a débouché le 15 janvier 2015 sur la mort de deux djihadistes, Sofiane Amghar et Khalid Ben Larbi, les policiers molenbeekoïses, se sont intéressés aux Abdeslam. Salah et Ibrahim ont été auditionnés. S'étaient-ils radicalisés ? Comptaient-ils partir en Syrie pour se battre dans les rangs de l'Etat islamique, comme on le prétendait alors dans le quartier ? Auditionné le 28 février, Salah Abdeslam ne lâchera rien, sinon que lui et son frère connaissent Abdelhamid Abaaoud. Fatalement, puisqu'il s'agit d'un ancien copain du quartier. L'enquête est reprise aussitôt par la police fédérale, compétente en matière de terrorisme. Mais les choses s'arrêtent là. Les Abdeslam ne sont pas considérés comme dangereux. L'enquête n'ira pas plus loin. Ni écoutes téléphoniques ni perquisition. Le 20 mars, les noms de Salah et d'Ibrahim Abdeslam sont toutefois intégrés à la liste de l'Ocam (Office de coordination de la menace), qui reprend les personnes susceptibles d'aller en Syrie. Le 8 mai 2015, la police fédérale établit un procès-verbal où elle affirme que rien ne permet de confirmer les informations de la police locale. L'affaire est classée sans suite le 29 juin par le parquet fédéral. Il ne sera plus question de Salah Abdeslam avant le 13 novembre et les attentats de Paris. Depuis, l'auteur survivant des tueries parisiennes est en fuite. Il est l'un des suspects les plus recherchés d'Europe.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

54. Riots Break Out Along Greece's Border With Macedonia

New York Times, Liz Alderman, 2016 02 29

Unidentified placeline - Riots erupted on the Greek border with Macedonia on Monday, as angry refugees broke down a razor-wire fence separating the two countries with a battering ram after the Macedonian authorities sealed the frontier to prevent them from passing. The conflict surged as the Greek government warned that as many as 50,000 people could be trapped in the country within a month, and as aid groups cautioned that a humanitarian crisis was growing. On Sunday,

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany said that Greece could not be allowed to succumb to the migration crisis. "Do you seriously believe that all the euro states that last year fought all the way to keep Greece in the eurozone, and we were the strictest, can one year later allow Greece to, in a way, plunge into chaos?" she told the public broadcaster ARD.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

55. Surveillance des frères Kouachi : autopsie d'un échec

Le Monde, Soren Seelow, 2016 02 29

Paris - Si la DGSI ne manquait pas d'informations sur les tueurs de " Charlie Hebdo ", elle n'a pas su les analyser L'abondance des données collectées sur les frères Kouachi entre 2010 et 2013 confirme que ces deux " objectifs " ont fait l'objet d'un travail sérieux en raison de leur connexion établie avec " la mouvance terroriste " . La défaillance se situe ailleurs, dans l'analyse qui a été faite de ces informations. Après deux ans d'écoutes, la DCRI met un terme au suivi des frères Kouachi au motif qu'il n'a pas permis de " détecter d'éléments relatifs à la préparation d'une action violente " ni " de matérialiser des éléments permettant l'ouverture d'une enquête - judiciaire " . Ces deux arguments soulignent les limites du système français. La DGSI est une agence hybride, à la fois service de renseignement et de police judiciaire. L'arrêt de la surveillance des Kouachi au motif qu'elle n'a pas permis l'ouverture d'une enquête est révélateur de ce mélange des genres : la mission judiciaire de la DGSI a pris le pas sur le renseignement pur, la matérialisation d'une infraction sur l'interprétation des signaux faibles.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Monday, March 14, 2016 • lundi le 14 mars 2016

42 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. Why Trudeau's security policies will hurt us

Ottawa Sun, David Krayden, 2016 03 14

Column: It was a week of diplomatic effulgence for the star of the hit Canadian comedy-drama Justin In Charge. Prime Minister Trudeau took centre stage with U.S.-President Barack Obama in the very public bonding of like-minded liberals dedicated to the same deficit spending and war on climate change. As Trudeau traded quips with Obama after sharing haute cuisine, he achieved a rare kind of U.S. media exposure for a Canadian leader -- as uncommon as a total eclipse of the sun. This is foreign policy as practised by Trudeau -- one that is based on little but warm smiles and good intentions. Canadians seem unconcerned with this triumph of style over substance, or with the looming deficits spawned by spiralling government spending or the increasing uncertainty of Trudeau's intentions on the world stage, especially with regards to fighting ISIL. Despite his continuing honeymoon with Canadian voters, who apparently have grown even closer to Trudeau's undeniable telegenic image and personable ways, Trudeau is far from sitting pretty. Nowhere is he more vulnerable than with national security. Just as he intends to enshrine citizenship for Canadian terrorists, Trudeau has also indicated his desire to nullify or neuter the Conservative government's anti-terrorism legislation. Though Bill C-51 certainly raised some controversy, most reasonable Canadians knew that Stephen Harper did not design this law to lock up labour leaders or environmental activists but to meet the tough challenges of brutal terrorists who don't play by the democratic rule book. Since the legislation was passed in June 2015, there have been no concentration camps erected to imprison political dissidents but, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service has used the law more than 20 times to counter terrorist threats. CSIS director Michel Couombe offered that select piece of intelligence to the Senate committee on national security and defence. Couombe not only cited the efficacy of Bill C-51 but emphasized that the powers it offers are not "extraordinary," given that other democratic nations beset by terrorist threats possess the same legal options.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Canada

2. Collège de Maisonneuve - 400 000 $ pour lutter contre la radicalisation

Le Devoir, Fabien Deglise, 2016 03 14

Montréal - Québec espère que l'aide financière permettra d'assainir l'environnement de l'établissement Action. Réaction. Québec débloque 400 000 $ pour venir en aide au Collège de Maisonneuve de Montréal dans sa lutte contre la radicalisation de plusieurs de ses étudiants. L'annonce en a été faite dimanche matin par la ministre de l'Enseignement supérieur, Hélène David, en présence du maire de Montréal, Denis Coderre. L'enveloppe doit alimenter un " projet-pilote " et l'embauche d'une " personne-ressource ", le tout pour l'implantation " de mesures d'appui au vivre-ensemble ", a indiqué la ministre. L'octroi de cette aide financière fait suite à une rencontre de la ministre, le 29 février dernier, avec le personnel enseignant, les représentants des étudiants et la direction de l'établissement scolaire où plusieurs incidents liés à la montée d'une pensée radicale violente ont été recensés dans les dernières années. " Ces 400 000 $ vont permettre d'avoir une présence pour être témoin ou prévenir des situations, a indiqué Denis Coderre. C'est le chaînon manquant dans le processus visant à ramener un climat propice aux études. " Pour la directrice générale du collège, Malika Habel, c'est également une somme qui doit favoriser le rapprochement entre les personnes fréquentant le collège tout comme une meilleure compréhension de " ce qui se passe sur le terrain ", a-t-elle indiqué. Pas question toutefois d'un budget pour du " travail de bureau ", a dit Mme David. Cette somme doit permettre de " rétablir le dialogue " et " renouer des liens " concrètement au sein du collège, et ce, pour y rétablir un environnement consacré réellement à l'apprentissage, plus qu'à la violence et à la division.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

3. Dion says embassy safety top priority as government faces funding challenges

Canadian Press, Mike Blanchfield, 2016 03 14

Ottawa - When worry wakes Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion in the middle of the night, one topic is the main culprit: concern over the safety of Canada's diplomats abroad. His concern seems well-founded. Sunday's car bombing in the Turkish capital of Ankara, following a suicide bombing three weeks ago, left more than two dozen dead. Canada's embassy in its NATO ally is about six kilometres from the location of Sunday's attack. Government documents also reveal that the cost of keeping Canada's diplomats safe is rising faster than the government predicted. Terrorism, civil unrest, criminal gangs and natural disasters pose threats to Canadian diplomats, says a memo on security at foreign missions prepared for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau that was obtained under Access to Information. This past week, Dion's renamed department, Global Affairs Canada, said the government is continually assessing the threats faced at its embassies as it released its new Plans and Priorities report. "It's my top priority," Dion said in a recent interview. "There's nothing more important for me than that." Asked what he plans to do to fix the situation, the minister replied: "I have made that very clear, that I don't want to compromise the security of my people, and their families, by the way." The prime minister's briefing note says Canadian missions face "evolving risks at a time when security resources are diminishing." The foreign affairs department has used "one-time funding" to complete security upgrades "at high-threat missions." It has trained a group of new Security Program Managers that have been deployed at 30 high threat missions, the memo says.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. Funding to 'ease religious tensions'

Montreal Gazette, Staff reporter, 2016 03 14

Montreal - Quebec's Liberal government will spend $400,000 in an effort to ease religious tensions at Collège de Maisonneuve, after several high-profile incidents implicating the school's Muslim students. The money will go toward hiring staff to mediate conflicts, said Higher Education Minister Hélène David during a news conference at the Montreal CEGEP. The school's administration called upon the provincial government to act after an altercation last month between well-known Muslim leader Adil Charkaoui and a security guard at the CEGEP. Charkaoui was subsequently charged with assault. There have also been media reports about Muslim students falling prey to ISIS propaganda and, last year, the RCMP detained students Mahdi Jamali and Sabrine Djaermane over fears they might commit a terrorist act. During the press conference Sunday - as she sat next to Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre - David was careful to avoid the topic of radical Islam or use the word "de-radicalization" to describe the funding announcement. Instead, the minister called the money part of a plan for students to "live together" in harmony. This despite the fact that the provincial government announced a separate $500,000 initiative, earlier this month, to fund an anti-radicalization centre in Montreal.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Kidnapper of Irish priest, Australian slain

Philippine Star, 2016 03 14

Zamboanga City - Government security forces shot dead the leader of a criminal group tagged in the kidnapping of an Irish priest and an Australian during an operation in Naga, Zamboanga Sibugay yesterday. Waning Abdusalam was killed after he resisted arrest by a joint military and police team, according to Maj. Filemon Tan, spokesman for the military. "Abdusalam may have had links with the Abu Sayyaf bandit group, which is known for kidnapping foreigners and Christians," Tan said. Authorities said Abdusalam had been involved in the kidnapping of several people in Mindanao, including Filipinos as well as Irish missionary Fr. Michael Sinnott in 2009 and Australian Warren Rodwell in 2011. Sinnott was released after about a month with the help of a major Muslim rebel group. Rodwell spent 15 months in captivity and was freed after ransom was paid. The Abu Sayyaf was blamed for the Rodwell kidnapping. Joint elements of the Army's 102nd Brigade and the police moved to arrest Abdusalam in Barangay Singkilon at around 8 a.m. Earlier this month, suspected Abu Sayyaf militants holding two Canadians, a Norwegian and a Filipina issued a one-month deadline for millions of dollars in ransom to be paid. In a video posted on a local jihadist group's Facebook page, the victims warned they would be killed unless ransom is paid. Canadians John Ridsdel and Robert Hall, Norwegian Kjartan Sekkingstad and Filipina Marites Flor were seized from a resort on Samal Island in Davao del Norte late last year. The government has reiterated its no-ransom policy and police are continuing efforts to rescue the hostages.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. Mohawk-driven protest against Energy East gains national momentum

Montreal Gazette, Philip Authier, 2016 03 14

Montreal - The Mohawk nation is threatening to do everything legally in its power to block the Energy East pipeline project, calling it a threat to their way of life. Despite perceptions opposition to the project is harboured mainly by mayors in Quebec, a Mohawk-driven Canadian First Nations movement against the project is picking up steam in other parts of the country. Besides the official opposition of the Assembly of First Nations Quebec and Labrador representing 43 Quebec chiefs, the list against TransCanada's pipeline now includes the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs - who are fighting their own pipeline battle - and the Iroquois Caucus regrouping Mohawk nations in Quebec and Ontario. The level of anger in the First Nations and their complaint at having not been consulted is revealed in a bluntly worded six-page personal "nation-to-nation" style letter from Mohawk Kanesatake Grand Chief Serge "Otsi" Simon to Quebec Premier Philippe Couillard. Dated March 9, the letter was obtained this weekend by the Montreal Gazette. Opening a new front for TransCanada and politicians to deal with, the letter unabashedly tags the project to move 1.1-million barrels of crude oil a day from Alberta to refineries in Eastern Canada "risky and dangerous," to First Nations and a threat to their lands, waters and very survival. "Indeed an alliance of indigenous nations, from coast to coast, is being formed against all the pipeline, rail and tanker projects that would make possible the continued expansion of tar sands," Simon writes. "One thing for sure, we the Mohawks of Kanesatake will not be brushed aside any longer and we wish to press upon you that we reserve the right to take legal action if necessary to prevent the abuse of our inherent rights." Simon does not mention it in his letter but, a year ago, he told the Journal de Montréal that barricades against the pipeline were not excluded even though the preferred option remains dialogue.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

7. Ottawa's contract policies 'perverse' encourage industry gouging: leaked report

Canadian Press, Murray Brewster, 2016 03 14

Ottawa - A major independent study of federal government contract pricing and policies has warned that the current system provides "perverse incentives" for industry doing business with Ottawa to hike their costs, particularly in military equipment deals. The report written by the research firm PricewaterhouseCoopers - a copy of which was leaked to The Canadian Press - also says that both Public Services and Procurement and National Defence don't have the in-house staff and expertise to understand technical matters that contribute to higher project costs. The 32-page draft study, dated Nov. 17, 2015, was ordered by the former Conservative government, but delivered to the Trudeau Liberals, who promised in last fall's election to fix the broken procurement system to ensure the military gets the equipment it needs. The eye-popping cost of ships, planes, and tanks has been the subject of a political debate, notably over the F-35 stealth fighter, but also more recently with the navy's planned frigate replacements. Researchers at the multi-national audit firm were asked to examine how government policies, procedures and legislation contributed to the enormous price tags. One of the key findings was that the structure of the contracting regime "provides perverse incentives for industry to increase costs" - particularly in sole-source deals - and there is "limited expertise in government" to review industrial processes and validate the increases.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

8. Philippines Rejects Talks With Militants for Release of Captives

Reuters, 2016 03 14

Manila - The Philippines will not negotiate with Islamist militants demanding ransom within a month for the release of three foreign men and a Filipino woman kidnapped from a beach resort nearly six months ago, a military spokesman said on Friday (11/03). Army units pursuing the band of al Qaeda-linked Abu Sayyaf militants, who are holding the two Canadians, a Norwegian and the Filipino woman, are closing in on them, Brigadier-General Restituto Padilla said. "The policy on no negotiations with kidnapers includes no payment of ransom," Padilla told Reuters, dismissing the one-month deadline given by the militants as a ploy to relieve the military pressure they are facing. "We're getting closer to them, hence, they needed to expedite the demand for ransom in order for them to escape from the hands of the law, which is closely catching up." The four hostages were kidnapped from a beach resort on a southern island in September last year. They are believed to be held in the jungle on Jolo island, a stronghold of the Abu Sayyaf, who are known for bombs, beheadings and kidnappings. In a minute-and-half video clip posted on an Islamist-linked Facebook account on Thursday, the three foreigners appealed to their governments to meet the militants' demands, saying if not they faced execution. It was the third time the militants had released such video appeals from the captives.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

9. Poll backs dropping some visas

Globe and Mail, Ann Hui, 2016 03 14

Toronto - A majority of Canadians support the right - along with Australians, New Zealanders and Britons - of residents to have unrestricted travel between the countries without the need for visas, a new poll has found. According to the poll commissioned by the Britain-based Royal Commonwealth Society, 75 per cent of Canadians believe that residents of the four Commonwealth countries should have an arrangement similar to the European Union, which allows citizens to travel freely to live and work in member countries. The poll, conducted by Nanos Research, is part of the group's ongoing efforts to promote greater mobility between the countries. The results showed 82 per cent of New Zealanders, 70 per cent of Australians and 58 per cent of Britons also support the idea. The survey of 1,000 Canadians was conducted in late January. Tim Hewish, the society's policy director, said the group plans to lobby politicians in Ottawa in the coming months. "It's the responsibility of elected governments to respond to these types of responses from their citizens," he said. Currently, Canadians require a visa for all travel to New Zealand and Australia. Canadians visiting Britain for work or study, or on trips longer than six months, also require a visa. The four countries were selected out of the 53 Commonwealth nations because they share similar socioeconomic characteristics, Mr. Hewish said. "It is intended that this could apply to other Commonwealth countries with comparable economic characteristics over time," his statement said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. RCMP fight to keep lid on high-tech investigation tool

Globe and Mail, Staff reporters, 2016 03 14

Toronto and Montreal - Police in Canada are fighting to keep secret the specifics of advanced technology they've used to spy on mobile phones in a criminal investigation into organized crime. Court documents filed in the Quebec Court of Appeal show government lawyers have acknowledged that the RCMP used an extraordinary communications-interception technique involving "mobile device identifier" equipment. But the Crown will be fighting to keep details of the operation under wraps during a court hearing scheduled for March 30 in Montreal. Chris Parsons, a researcher with the Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto's Munk School, said this case "wouldn't be the first time [these devices] have been used - but it would be the first time [authorities] have been caught out in court." The public is bound to want to know more, Mr. Parsons said. "These are fundamentally devices of mass surveillance," he said. "Authorities using them will also be collecting information about law-abiding Canadians." Between 2010 and 2012, detectives in RCMP "Project Clemenza" used a high-tech device to eavesdrop on a group of reputed mafia members who were sending each other encrypted messages on BlackBerry phones. Police believed the suspects were out to settle scores during the power vacuum that had emerged after the jailing of mob boss Vito Rizzuto. On Nov. 24, 2011, a New Yorker named Salvatore (Sal the Ironworker) Montagna was shot dead on the outskirts of Montreal. Fearing more bloodletting was imminent, an RCMP-led team divulged its ongoing operation to local police, so they could make arrests in that gangland slaying. Defence lawyers suggest the machinery the RCMP used in the case works by mimicking a cellphone tower and can trick all mobile phones within a specific radius into giving up data to police.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

11. Why the Islamic State must be fought on four fronts

Globe and Mail, Stephanie Carvin, 2016 03 14

Op-ed: The Canadian debate about the fight against the Islamic State frequently involves the need to take a holistic approach - essentially a broad strategy that includes everything from training missions overseas to countering violent extremism programs at home. But is this the right way to look at the IS problem? It might be tempting for the new federal government to present its strategy as a "whole of government" approach, but treating Islamic State as a puzzle that can be addressed in a comprehensive way is problematic. IS is a complex, dynamic and multifaceted organization that has managed to defy efforts to eliminate it and transformed itself into arguably the most sophisticated counterterrorism challenge faced by the West. In fact, the Islamic State should be broken down into two components: a sophisticated leadership controlling operations in Iraq and Syria; and the rank and file that actively support it. The leadership, although extremist, has managed to learn and adapt in the face of years of counterterrorism pressure against it. Even if it is eventually removed (or contained) in Iraq and Syria, we can expect that the leadership will continue to exploit ungoverned and undergoverned places, including parts of North Africa and South Asia. Note: Stephanie Carvin is an assistant professor of international relations at the Norman Paterson School of International Affairs at Carleton University, and a former national security analyst with the federal government.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

12. CENTCOM Embroiled In Climate of Fear

The Daily Beast, Shane Harris, Nancy A. Youssef, 2016 03 14

Washington - Army Gen. Joseph Votel is expected to take over as the head of U.S. Central Command later this month, and he'll be leading the military campaign against ISIS at a troubled time for his own organization. In interviews, half a dozen current and former officials have described the environment at CENTCOM headquarters as "toxic" and "hostile" owing to a long-simmering dispute over whether political influence was brought to bear on intelligence analysts whose job is to objectively assess the strength of ISIS and the effects of the U.S.-led efforts to destroy the group. The subjects of the analysts' frustration are the the head of intelligence for CENTCOM, Maj. Gen. Steven Grove, and Gregory Ryckman, his civilian deputy. Some analysts have complained that they felt "bullied" into reaching conclusions favored by their bosses that weren't supported by facts, two individuals familiar with analysts' complaints told The Daily Beast. They say the written and verbal pressure created a climate at CENTCOM in which analysts felt they had to self-censor some of their reports. Ryckman, in turn, has complained that the protesting analysts have created a "hostile work environment," according to three individuals who are knowledgeable about working conditions at CENTCOM and asked not to be identified. U.S. officials said that Ryckman had not lodged any formal complaints with the Defense Department. But his perceived grievances with analysts have become a topic of conversation at the command. The result: Analysts are suspicious of their bosses, and bosses are suspicious of the analysts. It will fall to Votel to help repair those divides.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

13. In the Apple Case, a Debate Over Data Hits Home

New York Times, Multiple reporters, 2016 03 14

Washington - Three years ago, reeling from Edward J. Snowden's disclosure of the government's vast surveillance programs and uncertain how to respond, President Obama said he welcomed a vigorous public debate about the wrenching trade-offs between safeguarding personal privacy and tracking down potential terrorists. "It's healthy for our democracy," he told reporters at the time. "I think it's a sign of maturity." But the national debate touched off this winter by the confrontation between the Justice Department and Apple over smartphone security is not exactly the one Mr. Obama had in mind. Mr. Snowden's revelations produced modest changes and a heightened suspicion of the government's activities in cyberspace. Because the issue now centers on a device most Americans carry in their pockets, it is concrete and personal in a way that surveillance by the National Security Agency never was. The trade-offs seem particularly stark because they have been framed around a simple question: Should Apple help the F.B.I. hack into an iPhone used by a gunman in the massacre last December in San Bernardino, Calif.? "Discussing the case with my friends has become a touchy subject," said Matthew Montoya, 19, a computer science major at the University of Texas, El Paso. "We're a political bunch with views from all across the spectrum."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

14. Quiet Support for Saudis Entangles U.S. in Yemen

New York Times, Mark Mazzetti, Eric Schmitt, 2016 03 14

Washington - Adel al-Jubeir, Saudi Arabia's urbane, well-connected ambassador to Washington, arrived at the White House last March with the urgent hope of getting President Obama's support for a new war in the Middle East. Iran had moved into Saudi Arabia's backyard, Mr. Jubeir told Mr. Obama's senior advisers, and was aiding rebels in Yemen who had overrun the country's capital and were trying to set up ballistic missile sites in range of Saudi cities. Saudi Arabia and its Persian Gulf neighbors were poised to begin a campaign in support of Yemen's impotent government -- an offensive Mr. Jubeir said could be relatively swift. Two days of discussions in the West Wing followed, but there was little real debate. Among other reasons, the White House needed to placate the Saudis as the administration completed a nuclear deal with Iran, Saudi Arabia's archenemy. That fact alone eclipsed concerns among many of the president's advisers that the Saudi-led offensive would be long, bloody and indecisive. Mr. Obama soon gave his approval for the Pentagon to support the impending military campaign. A year later, the war has been a humanitarian disaster for Yemen and a study in the perils of the Obama administration's push to get Middle Eastern countries to take on bigger military roles in their neighborhood.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

15. Renseignement et forces spéciales, la recette antiterroriste d'Obama

Le Monde, Jacques Follorou, 2016 03 14

Washington - En Irak et en Syrie, en Somalie ou en Afghanistan, Washington préfère les opérations coup de poing clandestines aux troupes régulières. Depuis l'envoi des premiers renforts en Irak à l'occasion du " surge " de 2006, les Etats-Unis semblent toujours finir par s'en remettre aux mêmes moyens pour faire la guerre. Le Pentagone présente en effet l'association des forces spéciales et du renseignement comme la méthode miracle qui permettra en Syrie, comme en Irak à la fin des années 2000, de faire reculer l'organisation Etat islamique (EI). Depuis mai 2015, souvent dans le plus grand secret, ces soldats expérimentés effectuent des raids éclairs en zone ennemie et kidnappent des cibles de haut niveau. L'enjeu consiste à exploiter le plus vite possible les éléments trouvés sur place et les déclarations du prisonnier afin de lancer d'autres opérations. Jeudi 10 mars, le porte-parole du Pentagone, Peter Cook, a déclaré que la capture au cours de la semaine du 29 février par l'ETF (Expeditionary Targeting Force) - une unité de forces spéciales américaines basées dans le nord de l'Irak, au Kurdistan - d'un expert en armes chimiques de l'EI avait permis de " dégrader la capacité de l'EI à produire des armes chimiques " . Raid hélicoptère en Somalie Les bombardements ultérieurs, effectués à une date non précisée, auraient pu être réalisés grâce aux informations fournies par Souleimane Daoud al-Bakkar, alias Abou Daoud, présenté par M. Cook comme un " émir de l'EI pour la fabrication d'armes chimiques et traditionnelles " . Il a assuré que l'intéressé a été transféré aux autorités irakiennes, jeudi, après son interrogatoire. Si c'est la première fois que le Pentagone communique ainsi sur les opérations de l'ETF, qui vient d'être déployée en Irak, des opérations de ce type ont déjà été menées en Syrie. En mai 2015, les forces spéciales américaines ont tué, sur le sol syrien, Abou Sayyaf, considéré comme le grand argentier de l'EI. Lors de l'attaque, les soldats américains ont récupéré plusieurs téraoctets de données qui ont servi à d'autres opérations. John Allen, qui fut jusqu'au 23 octobre 2015 à la tête de la coalition contre l'EI, avait confirmé l'existence de cette stratégie fin novembre 2015 au Forum international d'Halifax sur la sécurité : " Pour faire reculer l'EI, il faut réduire au maximum le temps entre l'acquisition du renseignement et son utilisation opérationnelle. "

Return to Top / Haut de la page

16. The Encryption debate

60 Minutes, Lesley Stahl, 2016 03 13

The argument over encryption between Apple and the FBI reminds us that the world is facing a far more tech-savvy terror threat. While not that long ago al Qaeda often handled its communications by going back to the Stone Age relying on mules and couriers, the Islamic State, or ISIS, proved it can be done with just a push of a button using everyday tools of 21st century teenagers: the latest smartphones and messaging apps. The encryption debate centers around an iPhone found in San Bernardino, where 14 men and women were killed in a terror attack last December. But before that, there was the massacre in Paris. We went there to meet the city's chief prosecutor who is confronting some of the same issues. Francois Molins: The terrorists are able to communicate with total impunity. Lesley Stahl: Do you have phones in terrorist attacks that you have not been able to get into because of encryption? Francois Molins: Oui oui. With all these encryption software programs, we can't penetrate into certain conversations and we're dealing with this gigantic black hole, a dark zone where there are just so many dangerous things going on. Voiceover: As head of Europol, Rob Wainwright gathers and analyzes information from over 600 law enforcement agencies. He has set up a new counter terrorism center to better coordinate all the intelligence. Lesley Stahl: How much is encryption a problem generally in these investigations? Rob Wainwright: In most of them. I mean, across the tens of thousands of investigations that Europol is supporting every year on terrorism and serious crime, at least three quarters of them have encryption at the heart of the challenge that law enforcement face.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

17. Snooper's Charter: Tech companies will have to give police 'back- door' access to customers' data

The Independent (UK), Matt Broomfield, 2016 03 14

London - Internet service providers and technology companies will be forced to install "back-door" flaws into their products, so British police and security services can access them on demand. The move was announced in draft documents published in support of Theresa May's controversial Investigatory Powers Bill, announced in November 2015. Companies will also be banned from revealing whether they had been made to install "back-door" access routes, leaving customers unable to know whether their messages and search history are truly secure. And if the draft documents are approved and the Bill known as the "Snoopers' Charter" is passed in Parliament, the controversial measures will be partially paid for by British taxpayers.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

18. UK government faces questions over plans to send troops to Libya

The Guardian (London), Patrick Wintour, Chris Stephen, 2016 03 14

London - The UK parliament's foreign affairs select committee is to ask the government whether it intends to send as many as 1,000 non-combat troops to Libya in an attempt to train a Libyan army capable of driving out Islamic State from the country. Senior members of the committee were told in Tunis last week that the formation of a Libyan government of national unity (GNA), which was announced on Saturday, would pave the way this week for a European conference on military intervention including the UK defence secretary, Michael Fallon. Committee members were told that the Italians would provide 5,000 troops and the UK 1,000, with more troops probably provided by the French. The British government is becoming increasingly concerned that a military vacuum in Libya has allowed Isis to gain a foothold around the town of Sirte in Libya as well as to make military incursions inside Tunisia. But there is frustration on the committee at the evasive responses from the government over its plans for Libya.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Afghanistan • Pakistan

19. Hizb-e-Islami to join Afghan peace talks

The Express Tribune, Tahir Khan, 2016 03 14

Islamabad - Hizb-e-Islami Afghanistan (HIA), the second largest resistance movement in Afghanistan, led by former prime minister Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, has formally decided to join the peace talks with the Afghan government, the party said on Sunday. "Hizb-e-Islami has constituted a two-member team for the negotiation, which includes Qazi Hakim Hakim, head of HIA's central council and Ghairat Baheer, head of the political affairs," party sources told The Express Tribune. The announcement came days after the Taliban refused to take part in the quadrilateral dialogue process with the Afghan government, terming them "futile and misleading negotiations." In a statement, Taliban once again reiterated its policy that unless the occupation of Afghanistan is ended, black lists eliminated and innocent prisoners freed, talks will not bear any results. Diplomatic sources; however, insisted background efforts were still under way to contact the Taliban for persuading them to soften their stance about the talks.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

20. Africa targeted once more as rivalry between Islamic militants grows

The Guardian (London), Jason Burke, 2016 03 14

Analysis - This latest attack in Ivory Coast - claimed by al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) - will underline why Africa is increasingly spoken of as the "new front" in Islamist militancy. This may be exaggerated, but the threat is undoubtedly growing on the continent, and well beyond its Mediterranean coastline. Ivory Coast has thus become the latest link in a chain of violence-hit countries - from Nigeria, where the Islamic State affiliate Boko Haram is still a force despite recent government efforts, to Somalia, where al-Shabaab extremists appear resurgent. Other militant operations in the last year have targeted tourists and hotels in Tunisia, Turkey, Egypt and elsewhere. Many of these have been claimed by Isis or subsidiary groups. The rivalry between al-Qaida and Isis is one reason for the recent upsurge of violence. Both organisations want to claim north and, increasingly, western Africa as their own sphere of influence. The stakes are high. AQIM is currently the most tenacious and effective of al-Qaida's affiliates. If it fades definitively from the scene, so would its parent organisation. The pre-eminence of Isis would be unchallenged.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

21. Al-Qaeda gunmen target beach resort

London Times, Jerome Starkey, 2016 03 14

London - At least 16 people were killed and dozens injured when Al-Qaeda gunmen opened fire at a beach resort in the Ivory Coast yesterday. Wearing balaclavas and grenade belts, the attackers targeted three seafront hotels in Grand-Bassam, a colonial-era town about 25 miles west of Abidjan, the country's commercial capital. Fourteen civilians and two special forces soldiers were killed. Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, which is active across the desert regions of Mauritania, Mali and Niger, has claimed responsibility. The government said that the attackers had been killed. "Security and defence forces intervened immediately and were able to neutralise six terrorists," said Hamed Bakayoko, interior minister. "The clean-up operation is under way." He said that troops were carrying out "security sweeps" and urged residents to stay calm. France's foreign ministry said that at least one of its nationals was among the victims. Citizens from Germany, Burkina Faso, Mali and Cameroon were also hit, Mr Bakayoko added. An American embassy delegation was in Grand-Bassam on Sunday but the US embassy in Abidjan said that there was no evidence that American citizens had been targeted or harmed.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

22. Côte d'Ivoire/Terrorisme - Attaque à Grand-Bassam: la Côte d'Ivoire, cible des jihadistes

Radio France Internationale, Journaliste maison, 2016 03 14

Grand-Bassam, Côte d'Ivoire - Des assaillants lourdement armés, qualifiés de « terroristes » par le gouvernement, ont attaqué la station balnéaire de Grand-Bassam, à une quarantaine de kilomètres à l'est d'Abidjan, faisant 16 morts, dont 14 civils. Dès 2013, et la poussée de jihadistes dans le nord du Mali, les services ivoiriens redoutaient de voir la menace descendre jusqu'à Abidjan. En 2015, les choses se sont précisées avec les attaques de Misséni et Fakola, juste de l'autre côté de la frontière, côté Mali. S'en sont suivi des arrestations de jihadistes en territoire ivoirien et leur extradition. A l'époque, les soupçons se portent sur une unité de combattants d'Ansar Dine, une « katiba », voire sur des éléments peuls liés au Front de libération du Macina. Mais cette fois-ci, c'est Aqmi/Al-Mourabitoune qui a revendiqué l'attaque. Rien à voir avec les précédentes escarmouches. Il s'agit là de la première attaque de ce type en Côte d'Ivoire, avec un mode d'action qui rappelle celui utilisé lors de l'attaque du Radisson Blu de Bamako, puis celle du Splendid à Ouagadougou. Un mode d'action imparable ? La méthode a malheureusement fait ses preuves à Bamako et à Ouagadougou. Les jihadistes attaquent en commando, des groupes de 5 à 10 hommes, et s'en prennent à des cibles très faciles à atteindre : terrasses de cafés, halls d'hôtels, plages et restaurants, dans des lieux touristiques, des capitales ou des villes secondaires moins surveillées et défendues.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

23. Deux Casques bleus tués dans le nord du Mali par un des leurs

Jeune Afrique, Journaliste maison, 2016 03 13

Tessalit, Mali - Deux Casques bleus de l'ONU au Mali ont été tués samedi soir et un troisième été blessé par un de leurs camarades, a annoncé dimanche la Mission de l'ONU dans le pays (Minusma), moins de trois semaines après un incident similaire. « Hier (samedi) vers 19H00 (même heure GMT) un tragique incident s'est déroulé dans le camp de la Minusma à Tessalit, région de Kidal, lorsqu'un Casque bleu a tiré sur trois de ses collègues. Deux morts sont à déplorer, un autre a été légèrement blessé », selon un communiqué de la Minusma, qui ne précise pas leur nationalité. Le suspect a été arrêté, la sécurité dans le camp a été renforcée, une enquête permettra de déterminer les causes et circonstances exactes de l'incident, selon le texte. Le 25 février, deux Casques bleus tchadiens avaient été tués dans le camp de la force onusienne à Kidal au cours de ce que la Minusma avait qualifié de règlement de comptes entre individus.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

24. Ivory Coast resort site of deadly attack

Globe and Mail, Geoffrey York, 2016 03 14

In another major expansion of its sphere of operations, an affiliate of al-Qaeda has claimed responsibility for an attack that killed at least 14 civilians and two soldiers at a beach resort in Ivory Coast. The beach outside three hotels at the seaside town of GrandBassam was strewn with bodies after the assault by at least three gunmen, who reportedly shouted "Allahu Akbar" - an Arabic phrase meaning "God is greatest." The heavily armed gunmen, dressed in black and wearing balaclavas, attacked the beach around lunchtime on Sunday as its restaurants and bars were crowded with vacationers. Most of the victims appeared to be Ivory Coast citizens. Four Europeans, including a French man, were among those killed, officials said. Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), a radical Islamist militia whose traditional stronghold is northern Mali and the edges of the Sahara Desert, swiftly claimed responsibility for the attack. The attack was reportedly orchestrated by Mokhtar Belmokhtar, the notorious leader of an AQIM splinter group who held two Canadian diplomats hostage in northern Mali in 2008 and 2009. He is the subject of an RCMP arrest warrant for his role in the kidnapping. The group has its roots in the remote desert wastes of Algeria and Mali, but AQIM has dramatically escalated its operations in recent months, targeting cities to the south where it was never previously active. It killed 20 people in an assault last November on the luxury Radisson Blu hotel in Bamako, the capital of Mali, and then killed 30 at another hotel and restaurant in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso's capital, in January.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

25. La Côte d'Ivoire se savait menacée par al-Qaida

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 03 14

Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire - Les djihadistes d'al-Qaida au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi), ont revendiqué dimanche soir ce nouveau bain de sang. Après le Mali, le Burkina Faso, la Côte d'Ivoire est à son tour frappée par le terrorisme islamiste. Ce nouvel attentat ne surprend pas vraiment. Les services de renseignements, tant occidentaux que ouest-africains, avaient depuis plusieurs mois prévenu de ce risque. Les djihadistes d'Al-Qaida au Maghreb islamique (Aqmi), qui ont revendiqué dimanche soir ce nouveau bain de sang, n'avaient certes jamais vraiment directement menacé la Côte d'Ivoire. Mais le groupe, dont les bases se trouvent aujourd'hui entre le nord Mali et la Libye, avait clairement laissé entendre qu'il voulait s'en prendre à tous les régimes régionaux hostiles à son endroit et proches des occidentaux en général, et de la France en particulier. À ce titre, Dakar et Abidjan apparaissaient comme des cibles presque évidentes. L'attentat de dimanche obéit d'ailleurs aux "règles" édictées par ces djihadistes. Comme à Bamako et Ouagadougou, les tueurs s'en sont pris à des lieux fréquentés par la bourgeoisie locale, les expatriés ou les touristes: des hôtels, des terrasses, des plages. Le choix précis de ces cibles visent sans doute, aux yeux des dirigeants d'Aqmi, à légitimer leurs actions en s'en prenant avant tout à des "infidèles" pour épargner les croyants. Pour autant l'action d'Aqmi ne portera sans doute pas plus ces fruits en Côte d'Ivoire qu'elle ne l'a fait à Ouagadougou. Les Ivoiriens se montreront très certainement tout aussi choqués et navrés que les Burkinabés ou les Français après les massacres de janvier et de novembre dernier.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

26. Terrorisme : attaque sanglante sur une plage ivoirienne

Le Figaro, Tanguy Berthemet, 2016 03 14

Grand-Bassam, Côte d'Ivoire - Au moins seize personnes, dont un Français, ont été tuées dans une station balnéaire. Afrique de l'Ouest La Côte d'Ivoire a été la cible dimanche d'un attentat. Les circonstances du raid qui a touché Grand-Bassam, une station balnéaire située à une quarantaine de kilomètres d'Abidjan, demeuraient flous dans la soirée. Selon les premières informations, un commando d'au moins six hommes cagoulés et armés de fusils automatiques a ouvert le feu peu avant 13 heures aux environs d'un hôtel connu des lieux, l'Étoile du Sud. Abbas el-Roz, un ressortissant libanais interrogé par l'AFP, qui séjournait dans cet établissement, a raconté que l'un d'eux portait un fusil d'assaut kalachnikov et une ceinture de grenades. Deux hôtels voisins, le Koral Beach et l'Auberge Bassamoise, auraient aussi été touchés par les assaillants. En fin d'après-midi, le raid sanglant semblait terminé. « Six terroristes ont été neutralisés », a affirmé à l'AFP Hamed Bakayoko, le ministre de l'Intérieur.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

27. Tunisia faces serious challenge in becoming new front line against Islamic State

Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, 2016 03 14

Tunisia, the country that first propelled the popular uprisings in the Arab world five years ago when a frustrated street vendor set himself on fire, has become the latest front line in the war against Islamic State militants. Last week dozens of IS fighters launched a dawn attack on army and police posts in the coastal Tunisian town of Ben Gardane near the Libyan border. A total of 48 fighters from both sides were killed - along with seven civilians who included a 12-year-old girl - in a battle that lasted for hours. Most of the attackers were Tunisians, authorities said, and already were established as a well-trained IS unit inside the town. Last June, a Tunisian linked to Islamic State killed 38 people, mostly British tourists, at a beach resort of Sousse further north; an attack in March, 2015, left 22 dead at the Bardo museum in Tunis. The man responsible for the Sousse attack is believed to have been killed in the U.S. bombing last month of an IS training facility across the border in Libya. "Tunisia should expect further attacks," a report by the International Crisis Group said last week, citing the anarchic conditions in Libya that have left a political vacuum into which Islamic State has moved. This has become a serious challenge for Tunisia, the Arab country that has advanced furthest toward a peaceful democracy after its revolution in 2011.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Asia • Asie

28. 3.1 quake in N. Korea, South says not nuclear test

Agence France-Presse, 2016 03 14

Seoul - A minor 3.1 magnitude earthquake was detected in North Korea early Monday, South Korea's state weather agency said, adding that there was no indication it was related to a nuclear test. According to the Korea Meteorological Administration (KMA), the quake struck at 5:17 am (2017 GMT Sunday) near the southwestern North Korean city of Songlim. It was not believed to be the result of a nuclear test as the affected area was far from the North's Punggye-ri underground test site in the country's northeast. "It is a natural earthquake. We don't think it is another nuclear test. Nothing special has been detected," a KMA official told AFP. There were no immediate reports of any damage. The Korean peninsula is not an area of strong seismic activity, although minor earthquakes are quite common. Any moderate seismic shock usually sets off alarm bells, as it could be the first signal of a nuclear test. The first indication of the North's last test on January 6 was a 5.1 magnitude tremor at Punggye-ri that was detected by international seismic monitors. (full article)

Return to Top / Haut de la page

29. Pak hacker defaces Raipur AIIMS site, says all Indian government sites on target

Times of India, Rashmi Drolia, 2016 03 14

Raipur - Pakistani hackers on Saturday defaced the official website of AIIMS Raipur. While AIIMS administration wasn't aware about this till late in the evening, the site was patched till Sunday morning. The homepage of www.aiimsraipur.nic.in was hacked and displayed "Website stamped by Kashmiri Cheeta, Team: Pak Cyber Attackers. We are unbeatable. Mess with the Best, Die like the Rest." Posting the mirror link on his Facebook wall, the hacker whose handle name is Amir Muzaffar virtually known as 'Kashmiri Cheeta', confirmed that he had hacked the website. In an exclusive talk with TOI, the Pak hacker warned that "all government sites are on our target and we search sites with '.nic or .gov.in' keywords, and once we find a security lapse, you know what happens. Administrators of government websites are sloppy and rely blindly on white hat hackers whose job is to simply alert them about where the bugs are.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

30. US, South Korea Stage Assault Drill; North Threatens to Wipe out Enemies

Jakarta Globe, 2016 03 14

Pohang - US and South Korean troops staged a big amphibious landing exercise on Saturday (12/03), storming simulated North Korean beach defenses amid heightened tension and threats by the North to annihilate its enemies. The landing and assault drills on South Korea's east coast were part of eight weeks of joint exercises between the allies which the South has said are the largest ever. The North has denounced the exercises as "nuclear war moves" and threatened to respond with an all-out offensive. Tension on the Korean peninsula has been high since the North conducted its fourth nuclear test in January and followed that with a long-range rocket launch last month, triggering new UN sanctions. About 55 US marine aircraft and 30 US and South Korean ships, including the USS Bonhomme Richard and USS Boxer, which carry AV-8B Harrier attack jets and V-22 Osprey aircrafts, took part in the assault on beaches near Pohang city, the US navy said. "They will penetrate notional enemy beach defenses, establish a beach head, and rapidly transition forces and sustenance ashore," the US military based in South Korea said in a statement before the exercise. The North's military said it was prepared to counter the US and South Korean forces "with an ultra-precision blitzkrieg strike of the Korean style". "The revolutionary armed forces of the DPRK holding tightly the arms to annihilate the enemies with towering hatred for them are waiting for the dignified Supreme Command to issue an order to launch a preemptive strike of justice," it said in comments carried by the state KCNA news agency.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

31. Iran may still rely on N. Korea for missile materials: CRS report

Yonhap News Agency, 2016 03 14

Washington - Iran advanced its missile development with the help of North Korea, and the Middle Eastern nation may still rely on the communist nation for materials necessary for producing its ballistic missiles, a congressional report has said. The Congressional Research Service raised the suspicion in a recent report, noting that the intelligence community assessed until the latter 2000s that North Korean cooperation with Iran's ballistic missile program was ongoing and significant. "Iran has likely exceeded North Korea's ability to develop, test and build ballistic missiles. But Tehran may, to some extent, still rely on Pyongyang for certain materials for producing Iranian ballistic missiles, Iran's claims to the contrary notwithstanding," the report said. "For example, some observers argue that Iran may not be able to produce even its Scud B and Scud C equivalents -- Shahab-1 and Shahab-2, respectively -- without some foreign support for key materials or components," it said. Nevertheless, however, Director of National Intelligence (DNI) James Clapper stated during a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing in 2014 that Iran is not currently receiving assistance with its ICBM program. Clapper also said in February this year that there has "not been a great deal of interchange" between Iran and the North, it said. The report said Syria continues to rely on North Korean and Iranian assistance for its missile program, noting that Defense Intelligence Agency Director Michael Flynn testified in 2013 that Syria's liquid-propellant missile program -- Scud B, Scud C and Scud D missiles -- depends on "essential foreign equipment and assistance, primarily from North Korean entities." On suspected nuclear cooperation between Iran and North Korea, the report said that the official U.S. assessment has been that there is no such cooperation between the two countries, even though some press reports have pointed to alleged cases of nuclear cooperation, such as the possibility of Iranian officials witnessing North Korean nuclear tests. "U.S. officials have stated publicly that there is no nuclear cooperation between Iran and North Korea," the report said. "Knowledgeable current and former U.S. officials contacted by CRS said that they were unaware of official unclassified U.S. government evidence of nuclear cooperation between Iran and North Korea."

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

32. Bahrain facing cyber threats warns expert

Gulf Daily News, Sandeep Singh Grewal, 2016 03 14

Manama - It is just a matter of time before Bahrain is the target of a major cyber attack, a leading security expert has warned. Computer hackers from Iran and China have been targeting several organisations and government entities in the region for years, said independent consultant Tom Lockhart. "Bahrain has not faced any major cyber attack such as the one in 2012 on Saudi Aramco but eventually it will happen," Mr Lockhart told the GDN. In a matter of hours 35,000 computers at Aramco were partially wiped or totally destroyed, in a cyber attack dubbed "the world's biggest hack in history". Bahrain, along with Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, are prime targets for Iranian hackers seeking to disrupt business and steal classified data, said Mr Lockhart, who provides consultancy to independent British specialist security and risk management firm Le Beck International in Bahrain.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

33. Iran spies to appear in Riyadh court today

Saudi Gazette, Staff Report, 2016 03 14

Riyadh - The ring of 32 people accused of spying for Iran will appear before the Criminal Court in Riyadh again on Monday to listen to the confessions they have made during investigations and submit their written or verbal replies to the charges against them. The spies include 30 Saudis, an Iranian and an Afghan citizen. Makkah Arabic daily said on Sunday that the spies will appear before the court in groups of two each time. The court recessed its first session on Feb. 23 after giving each of the defendants a paper containing the charges against him. The judge in the case asked them to prepare their replies to the second round of the sessions beginning on Monday. He also asked them to assign lawyers or ask the court to do this for them. According to court sources, the attorney general asked for capital punishment for 25 of them. They said the punishment would be applied against them if their conspiracy against the Kingdom was proved beyond doubt.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

34. KSA no safe haven for terrorists

Arab News, Rodolfo C. Estimo Jr., 2016 03 14

Riyadh - Terrorists won't find a safe haven in the Kingdom and they will not be able to escape from the authorities, a spokesman of the Ministry of Interior (MoI) said, while calling them to surrender. "It's better for them to surrender before it's too late," Maj. Gen. Mansour Al-Turki, spokesman of the ministry, was quoted as saying by an online newspaper. The ministry spokesman praised the members of the security forces for their accomplishment that "resulted in the destruction of the terrorists who killed Sergeant Badr Rashidi." Al-Turki was referring to the killing of six terror suspects by security forces during an exchange of fire in Al-Mustajiddah village of El-Ghazala, 100 km south of Hail, on the Hail-Madinah road in the Reaalbikr region. The slain terror suspects were on the wanted list issued by the ministry and carried rewards of up to SR5 million.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

35. L'Arabie saoudite menace d'expulser les sympathisants du Hezbollah

L'Orient-Le Jour, Journaliste maison, 2016 03 14

Riyad - Riyad a de nouveau accentué la pression sur le parti de Hassan Nasrallah en menaçant de sanctionner tout Saoudien ou résident qui le soutiendrait, pendant que la formation chiite se déchaînait de nouveau contre le royaume wahhabite. L'Arabie saoudite s'est référée hier à la résolution des pays du Conseil de coopération du Golfe (CCG) classant le Hezbollah parmi les organisations terroristes pour faire accentuer la pression sur les Libanais installés sur son sol, en expliquant les retombées de cette résolution sur le plan pratique. Selon une source du ministère saoudien de l'Intérieur, citée par l'agence saoudienne ASP, « tout citoyen saoudien ou résident installé dans le royaume qui soutiendrait ou montrerait une allégeance quelconque à ce qu'on appelle le Hezbollah, ou encore qui ferait sa propagande, lèverait des fonds en sa faveur, communiquerait avec ses membres ou les accueillerait fera l'objet de sanctions sévères prévues par les règles et les instructions données, notamment celles qui sont liées aux crimes que sont le terrorisme et son financement ». Le ministère précise que « tout résident qui sera jugé coupable de l'un de ces actes sera immédiatement expulsé » du territoire saoudien. Il rappelle dans le menu détail les décisions prises à ce même sujet par les autorités saoudiennes, après l'adoption, par les pays du CCG, de la résolution considérant le Hezbollah comme étant un groupe terroriste.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

36. Saudi Arabia says will punish Hezbollah supporters

Lebanon Daily Star, Staff Report, 2016 03 14

Dubai - Saudi Arabia said Sunday it would punish anyone who belongs to Hezbollah, sympathizes with it, finances it or harbors its members. An Interior Ministry statement carried by the state news agency SPA said that Saudis and expatriates would be subjected to "severe penalties" under the kingdom's regulations and anti-terrorism laws. Foreigners would be deported, it said. The move comes after Gulf Arab countries declared Hezbollah a terrorist organization, raising the possibility of further sanctions against the group, which wields influence in Lebanon and fights alongside President Bashar Assad's forces in Syria. "Any citizen or resident who supports, shows membership in the so-called Hezbollah, sympathizes with it or promotes it, makes donations to it or communicates with it or harbors anyone belonging to it will be subject to the stiff punishments provided by the rules and orders, including the terrorism crimes and its financing," the statement said.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

37. Western Intelligence on the Coasts of Tripoli, With Neighboring Militias

Asharq Al-Awsat, Abdul Sattar Hatita, 2016 03 14

Tripoli - Capital city and largest city of Libya, Tripoli has become no short than a grazing land for militias, military arsenal, western intelligence agents, and some private security companies coming from countries like the U.S., Britain, France, and Italy. Security companies are managing to coexist together and are collecting data on developments. Doubts indicating the West soon intervening in Libya to fight ISIS, are rising. Starting March 13, Asharq Al-Awsat will launch a series of investigations in Tripoli, Libya. With all the spread militia and warlords, the Libyan largest city seems to have become the capital for terrorism. Based on documents, observations, and testimonies, a case of rage and confusion among warlords and anti-army leaderships was exposed. The off-board militants, leaders, groups and factions all fear a soon-coming international intervention. After convening, a number of groups and leaderships went as far as resorting to cooperate with ISIS.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Others • Autres

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

38. At least 37 killed in Ankara blast: Health minister

Hurriyet Daily News, Staff report, 2016 03 14

Ankara - At least 37 were killed while 125 wounded people were hospitalized after an explosion hit central Ankara on March 13, Health Minister Mehmet Müezzinoğlu has said in a press conference. A bomb-laden car caused the blast, Interior Minister Efkan Ala said at the same conference after a security meeting in Ankara. Thirty people were killed at the scene of the incident while four others died on their way to hospital, Müezzinoğlu said, adding that at least one of the 30 was one of the assailants. Ala said they would have more information about the perpetrators of the attack by March 14. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who was in Istanbul, was briefed by Ala about the blast on the phone, according to presidential sources. Erdogan condemned the attack in a written statement, adding that "Turkey has become a target of terror attacks due to the instabilities in the region." Turkey will continue its determined fight against terrorism, he said. "Terror attacks - which intend to target the integrity of Turkey, unity and solidarity of our people - do not diminish our will to fight against terror, but further boost it," he added. The Radio and Television Supreme Council (RTÜK) immediately declared a broadcasting ban on images of the scene and victims. The United States had warned its citizens in a March 11 statement over a potential terror attack in Ankara. In a statement after the attack, the embassy said the source of the information in the warning was Turkish authorities and that it was a routine procedure.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

39. Istanbul police detain terror suspects in counter-terror ops

Daily Sabah, Staff report, 2016 03 14

Istanbul - Counter-terrorism teams from the Istanbul Police Department have carried out simultaneous anti-terror operations in various districts throughout the city, including Gaziosmanpasa and detained a number of suspects, a day after a deadly terrorist attack hit the capital, killing at least 37 people and injuring 125 others. Police have reportedly raided the houses of terror suspects and detained them. The suspects were brought to a hospital for a health checkup, and were then transferred to Vatan Police Headquarter in Istanbul.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

40. Le FBI est dans notre poche,

Le Monde, Journaliste maison, 2016 03 14

Non identifié - et au fond de notre sac à main, ce n'est pas de la science-fiction. Depuis plusieurs semaines, le service de renseignements américain exige qu'Apple l'aide à déverrouiller un iPhone 5 ayant appartenu à un des terroristes de l'attaque de San Bernardino, en décembre 2015. Apple, soutenu par Google et Facebook et des dizaines de sociétés de la Silicon Valley, refuse, car créer un logiciel capable de contourner la sécurité d'un seul iPhone compromettrait la sécurité de tous les appareils possédant le même système d'exploitation. Ce serait une sorte de " cancer ", a même déclaré le patron d'Apple, Tim Cook. En France, plus de 95 % des 20 millions de smartphones vendus en 2015 fonctionnent grâce à un système d'exploitation américain : Android de Google (65 %), iOS d'Apple (21 %), Windows Phone de Microsoft (9 %). Si l'Etat américain réussissait à obtenir de ces entreprises des programmes de déblocage, il aurait potentiellement la main sur tous nos appareils. De nombreux pays exigeraient sans doute qu'Apple, Google et les autres leur livrent une copie de ces programmes pour leur propre usage - judiciaire ou extra-judiciaire. Déjà, des députés français rêvent d'infliger des amendes à Apple et à Google quand ils refusent d'aider la police. Si ces systèmes de déverrouillage commençaient à circuler, des hackers pourraient s'en emparer, ou s'en inspirer pour créer leurs propres outils... Autre inquiétude, nos smartphones envoient en continu des flux massifs de données personnelles dans le " cloud ", c'est-à-dire dans des centres situés le plus souvent aux Etats-Unis. Apple et Google affirment que ces données sont mieux protégées que par le passé, mais là encore, une intervention étatique pourrait tout remettre en question. Dès lors, pour se protéger, faut-il vivre crypté? Même si vous n'êtes surveillé ni par la NSA ni par la DGSE, le plus sage est sans doute de faire attention.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

41. Saudi-led coalition in Yemen regain control in Aden district

The National (UAE), Mohammed Al Qalisi, 2016 03 14

Aden - Yemeni forces backed by UAE troops and air strikes regained control of Aden's Al Mansoura district on Sunday after heavy overnight clashes with suspected Al Qaeda militants. At least 15 militants and two policeman were killed in the fighting, which broke out on Saturday afternoon when masked gunmen carrying the Al Qaeda flag attacked a police checkpoint in Al Mansoura. There were no civilian casualties. "The Emirates' warplanes supported the ground forces, who then advanced and took over the areas around the checkpoint after the extremists fled," said Abdulkader Al Amoudi, an aide to Yemen's defence minister. The UAE forces are in Yemen as part of a Saudi-led coalition supporting the internationally-recognised government against Houthi rebels who seized large areas of the country after overrunning the capital in September 2014.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

42. Un nouvel attentat meurtrier frappe Ankara

Le Figaro, Anne Andlauer, 2016 03 14

Ankara - Au moins 34 personnes ont été tuées dans un attentat-suicide à la voiture piégée dimanche soir en plein centre de la capitale turque. Turquie La violente explosion est survenue à proximité de la station de métro Kizilay, l'une des places les plus fréquentées de la capitale turque, vers 18h45 heure locale, au moment où des milliers d'Ankariotes profitaient des nombreux restaurants et centres commerciaux du quartier. La zone de l'attaque est également connue pour être le point de départ de nombreuses lignes de bus vers la métropole. Le ministre de l'Intérieur, Efkân Ala, a dénoncé un « attentat terroriste commis par un véhicule en mouvement chargé d'explosifs », visant des passagers à un arrêt de bus. Le dernier bilan officiel - provisoire - fait état de 34 morts, « dont un ou deux terroristes », a précisé le ministre de la Santé, Mehmet Müezzinoğlu. Cette attaque-suicide, non revendiquée dimanche soir, a également blessé 125 personnes, dont 19 grièvement. C'est le troisième attentat-suicide qui frappe la capitale turque en cinq mois. Le 10 octobre 2015, une attaque attribuée au groupe État islamique avait fait 103 victimes devant la gare d'Ankara. Le 17 février dernier, un attentat à la voiture piégée avait visé un convoi militaire, tuant 29 personnes dont neuf civils.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

CSIS Executive News Summary • Sommaire exécutif des nouvelles du SCRS

Monday, April 04, 2016 • lundi le 04 avril 2016

42 Document(s) / Article(s)

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

Canada

United States • États-Unis

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

Afghanistan, Pakistan

Africa • Afrique

Americas • Amériques

Asia • Asie

Eastern Europe • Europe de l'Est

Iran, Iraq • Iran, Irak

Middle East • Moyen-Orient

Others • Autres

Western Europe • Europe de l'Ouest

CSIS in the News • Le SCRS dans les nouvelles

1. Sharing info will help beat terror

Toronto Sun, 2016 04 04

Editorial: Information is vital currency in the war against terrorism. So too, is the willingness and ability of authorities to act on it. It came to light this past week that the FBI had warned Belgium about two of the men who carried out suicide bombing attacks that killed more than 30 people last month in Brussels. That fact evokes a sad and bloody history in the West, in which terror attacks have repeatedly come on the heels of failures in intelligence sharing. Such failures date back notably to the Sept. 11 terrorism attacks against the United States, as subsequent reviews and 2004's 9/11 Commission's report found. While this latest incident may or may not have been preventable, the fact remains that the sharing of intel in a timely and cooperative manner is the best tool at the disposal of the governments, police and spy agencies working to protect us from a very real threat. It is not just between allies that information should be shared. It must also be coordinated inside our own borders. There is a recent report that authorities are bridging divisions between the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and its counterpart, the Communications Security Establishment, which is not permitted itself to spy on Canadians. Their co-operation, including apparently through the CSE-CSIS Collaboration office, is obviously essential to our security safety network. They need to be working hand in glove. Critics have fairly questioned whether oversight is sufficient to monitor and review joint operations between CSIS and CSE. If there is a need for better oversight, let's have it. But let us not keep our right hand from working with our left as we fight off those who would harm our nation.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Canada

2. Canadian FM Voices Concern Over Escalation of Violence in Nagorno-Karabakh Sputnik News Service, 2016 04 04

Moscow--Canada firmly believes that there is no alternative to a peaceful, negotiated solution to this conflict, he underlined. "Canada is concerned by the recent escalation of violence between Armenian and Azerbaijani forces in Nagorno-Karabakh. We call on all sides to show restraint, immediately return to a true ceasefire, and actively resume dialogue within the framework of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Minsk Group," Stéphane Dion said in a statement. On Saturday, Armenia and Azerbaijan noted a sharp escalation of the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh, with both sides accusing each other of violating the ceasefire that has been in place since 1994.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

3. Cleared of Kanishka blast, not from blacklist Times of India, Yudhvir Rana, 2016 04 04

New Delhi - Vancouver-based Ripudaman Singh Malik, who was accused (and later acquitted) in the Kanishka bombing in 1985, has not yet received a communication from India about his name being removed from the so-called "blacklist", a secret list of names the Centre maintains of overseas Sikhs who are barred from entering India. The list contains names of people who were accused of being involved in or linked with terrorist activities during the '80s and '90s in Punjab. Talking to TOI over the phone from Vancouver on Sunday, Malik said he would be "very happy" to visit his homeland again, but was yet to get an official confirmation on the deletion of his name from the blacklist. "I was born there; of course, there is an attachment. I will especially like to visit and pay obeisance at the Golden Temple," he said in reply to a question on PRE his reaction if he was allowed to visit India. Apart from Malik, five members of his family were also mentioned in the blacklist. Following a letter from Punjab chief minister Parkash Singh Badal, their names were removed by the Centre. Malik was born in Lahore just six months before the Partition. After his family migrated to India, he spent his childhood in Ferozpur and later moved to Canada in 1972. "I remember the last time I had visited India in 1994 for my father's funeral," he said in an emotive note. Going down memory lane, Malik said he had many friends from all faiths in India, including Hindus, Christians and Sikhs, and said appreciated India's FUSION diversity.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

4. From therapists to imams to cops, Canada seeks many antidotes to terrorism

The Economist (Blog), 2016 04 03

Toronto--As several colleagues write in this week's print edition, Western democracies are in a bind over how to stop their citizens being seduced by violent ideologies. With terrorism threatening every capital city, the issue is bound to concern central governments and their security services. But the initiatives that work best are often grassroots ventures, undertaken in places which have seen acute problems--for example, local youngsters heading off to Syria. Canada exemplifies the type. Two places have blazed a trail in the field of counter-radicalisation. One is Montreal, the starting-point of a project that later extended across Quebec; the other is Calgary. Take the Francophone province first. The Centre for the Prevention of Radicalism Leading to Violence was set up by Montreal's mayor a year ago. This followed terrorist attacks in both Quebec and Ottawa in October 2014, and reports of several young Quebecers going to fight with Islamic State. Benjamin Ducol, the centre's research director, stresses that it is independent of the police, though it does tell the police if it sees a security threat.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

5. Ottawa's big IT project still struggling

Globe and Mail, Barrie Mckenna, 2016 04 04

It was a seductively simple idea. Take the maze of federal government databases, e-mail systems and computer networks, and put them under one departmental roof. More than 60 e-mail systems would become one, 500plus databases would be merged into seven, and thousands of tech workers from dozens of departments would go to work for a single agency, Shared Services Canada. The two Conservative ministers in charge at the time - former public works minister Rona Ambrose (now interim Conservative leader) and treasury board president Tony Clement - were bursting with optimism when they announced the project five years ago. They promised the consolidation would save piles of money (up to $400-million a year), wipe out duplication and enhance cybersecurity. "This is a whole new way of doing business for the government," Mr. Clement vowed. Not so much. It's turned into an old and very familiar story of how Ottawa works. Years and billions of dollars later, virtually none of the wondrous benefits have come to pass. And in last week's budget, the new Liberal government quietly gave Shared Services a $384-million infusion over two years to its roughly $1.9-billion annual budget - apparently, to keep creaky old government computer systems from crashing. The agency will get another $75-million to strengthen security. But this isn't just an inside-Ottawa tale of serial bungling. There are disturbing real-world consequences of the government's failure to fix chronic information technology (IT) problems. Websites periodically crash and go offline, sometimes for days, because of continuing database problems. A 2014 cyberattack by Chinese hackers on the National Research Council's network paralyzed much of its research work for nearly a year. Also in 2014, emergency workers in Saskatchewan lost voice communications for nearly an hour owing to a mix-up between Shared Services and the RCMP.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

6. Silence, coeurs et lapins à Maisonneuve

Le Devoir, Marco Bélair-Cirino, 2016 04 04

Montreal--Le collège de Maisonneuve n'a pas attendu l'aide financière du gouvernement du Québec pour déployer différentes mesures -- parfois originales -- pour apaiser les tensions. Le collège de Maisonneuve n'a toujours pas obtenu l'aide financière de 400 000 $ promise il y a plus de trois semaines par la ministre de l'Enseignement supérieur, Hélène David, afin d'"implanter des mesures d'appui au vivre-ensemble", après la répétition d'actes d'incivilité, notamment dans la bibliothèque. "Nous n'avons pas encore reçu les 400 000 dollars", a confirmé la porte-parole du cégep, Line Légaré, au cours du week-end. "Mais ça ne saurait tarder", a-t-elle ajouté, à moins de deux mois de la fin de la session hiver 2016. La subvention exceptionnelle permettra à la direction du collège de Maisonneuve de faire l'embauche de "personnes-ressources qui travailleront auprès du personnel et des étudiants [afin de] maintenir un climat qui favorise l'apprentissage", avait mentionné la ministre David. Le départ de cinq élèves en janvier 2015 pour grossir les rangs du groupe armé État islamique (EI) en Syrie et en Irak, ainsi que l'arrestation de deux autres, Sabrine Djaermane et Mahdi el Jamali -- qui avait reçu les enseignements du prédicateur Adil Charkaoui -- pour fabrication et possession d'explosifs, ont détérioré le climat à l'intérieur de l'établissement d'enseignement.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United States • États-Unis

7. Hackers find soft spot in hospitals

Washington Post, Carolyn Y. Johnson and Matt Zapposky, 2016 04 03

Washington--The cyberattack on MedStar Health - one of the biggest health-care systems in the Washington region - is a foreboding sign that an industry racing to digitize patient records and services faces a new kind of security threat that it is ill-prepared to handle, security experts and hospital officials say. For years, hospitals and the health-care industry have focused on keeping patient data from falling into the wrong hands. But the recent attacks on MedStar's network and other hospitals across the country highlight an even more frightening downside of security breaches: As hospitals have become dependent on electronic systems to coordinate care, communicate critical health data and avoid medication errors, patients' well-being may also be at stake when hackers strike. Ransomware is not new, but cybersecurity experts and FBI data say its use is on the rise. Hospitals, of course, are not the only institutions facing such attacks. In nine months in 2014, the FBI received 1,838 complaints about ransomware, and it estimates that victims lost more than $23.7 million. The next year, the bureau received 2,453 complaints, and victims lost $24.1 million. The FBI does not condone the paying of ransoms, but its agents acknowledge that businesses are often left with a tough choice.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

8. Intel Analysts: We Were Forced Out for Telling the Truth About Obama's ISIS War Daily Beast, Shane Harris and Nancy Youssef, 2016 04 04

Washington--Two senior intelligence analysts at U.S. Central Command say the military has forced them out of their jobs because of their skeptical reporting on U.S.-backed rebel groups in Syria, three sources with knowledge of their claim told The Daily Beast. It's the first known instance of possible reprisals against CENTCOM personnel after analysts accused their bosses of manipulating intelligence reports about the U.S.-led campaign against ISIS in order to paint a rosier picture of progress in the war. One of the analysts alleging reprisals is the top analyst in charge of Syria issues at CENTCOM. He and a colleague doubted rebels' capabilities and their commitment to U.S. objectives in the region. The analysts have been effectively sidelined from their positions and will no longer be working at CENTCOM, according to two individuals familiar with the dispute, and who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

United Kingdom • Royaume-Uni

9. British traitor Kim Philby shown in East German spy training film London Evening Standard, Joseph Watts, 2016 04 04

London--Never-before-seen footage of one of Britain's most notorious spies, Kim Philby, explaining how he stole files, sabotaged operations and escaped to Russia, was unveiled today. The film, recovered by the BBC, shows the ex-MI6 officer giving intricate details of his recruitment by Russia's KGB while at Cambridge University and his rise through Britain's intelligence service. The film was made in 1981 as Philby gave a lecture to agents in the East German Stasi intelligence service after he had fled the West in 1963. Philby tells the Stasi agents he was recruited before joining MI6 as a "long-term" project and then spent years working his way into the service.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

10. Google removes Taliban propaganda app from its stores after it was used to spread hate speech

The Sun (UK), Fionn Hargreaves, 2016 04 04

London--AN app developed by the Taliban has been taken down from Google's Play Store for breaking the tech giant's rules on hate speech. The hate-filled app, "Pashto Afghan News - alemarah" ran news and videos from the extremist group. Pashto is one of the two official languages of Afghanistan and Alemarah is the name of the Taliban's propaganda arm. US group SITE Intel, who monitor jihadist activity online, discovered the app on Friday. It was taken down on Saturday. The app is thought to have been removed for inciting hate speech.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

11. Man arrested at Gatwick airport over Syria-related offences

Press Association, 2016 04 04

London--Counter-terrorism officers have arrested a man at Gatwick airport on suspicion of Syria-related offences. The 24-year-old was detained before boarding a flight, West Midlands police said. A woman aged 20 has also been arrested at an address in west London. The pair were being held at a police station in the West Midlands while searches were carried out at two addresses in Birmingham.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

12. Nuclear police say working until 68 is a security risk

London Times, John Simpson, 2016 04 04

London--Armed officers guarding Britain's nuclear assets are taking the government to the High Court over plans to make them work to 68, despite the police retirement age being 60. The police federation for the Civil Nuclear Constabulary has been granted a judicial review against the intention to make more than 1,500 trained firearms officers work longer. The force recently agreed to provide back-up officers in the event of a terror attack, with the military standing in to protect nuclear reactors and power stations.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

13. SAS's first openly gay recruit

Daily Mail (UK), 2016 04 04

London--THE SAS has recruited its first openly gay soldier in its 75-year history, it was reported yesterday. Described as a 'top bloke and a brilliant soldier', he was said to be a 27-year-old sergeant veteran of Iraq and Afghanistan. He joined the Army at 18 and is now training to be a sniper. Away from the military, the soldier, who cannot be named for security reasons, lives with his male partner in Herefordshire. According to the Daily Star Sunday, the soldier, originally from the North of England, was formerly in the Guards regiment. A defence source told the newspaper that the soldier, who is said to be a mountaineering expert, did not 'make a big deal' about being gay.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Australia, New Zealand • Australie, Nouvelle-Zélande

14. Dutton denies children in detention 'deception'

The Australian, Rachel Baxendale, 2016 04 04

Sydney - The office of Immigration Minister Peter Dutton has disputed claims by refugee advocates, left-wing media and the Greens that 10 children remain at Sydney's Villawood detention centre, as the government celebrates the number of children in detention reaching zero for the first time in almost a decade. The number peaked at 2000 under Labor, having risen from zero when Kevin Rudd took office from John Howard in 2007. About 50 children remain in detention on Nauru. The Guardian yesterday reported the status of 10 children was on Friday changed from "held detention" to "community detention", but that they effectively remained behind bars, prompting Greens senator Sarah Hanson-Young to accuse Mr Dutton of deception. A spokeswoman for Mr Dutton confirmed the status of a number of children in Villawood had changed, but said that as of Friday, the children were living with family in townhouses adjacent to the detention centre where they were free to come and go during the day, and were no longer supervised by guards or behind locked gates. The Australian understands a significant number of the children are from families where the father has received a negative ASIO assessment and remains in detention, and it is therefore considered in their interests to remain close to Villawood. It is understood they must seek permission from a caseworker to have overnight visitors or stay elsewhere overnight, as is the case for anyone else in community detention.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

15. Security threat grounds air strike

The Australian, Greg R. Brown, 2016 04 04

Sydney - Plans by Border Force workers to conduct rolling strikes at Australia's major airports were dramatically shelved last night after the federal government revealed there was an "intolerable" threat to national security. The Fair Work Commission granted an urgent order to suspend the nationwide work stoppages after a senior Border Force official gave evidence that the risk profile facing the nation had escalated in recent days. Government lawyer Tom Howe QC told the commission the risk profile had risen from "tolerable" to "intolerable" in the past week. The Australian understands the risks relate to "persons of interest" connected to possible terrorism and drug smuggling at air and sea ports. Mr Howe warned there was a greater chance the "persons of interest" could enter Australia because of reduced "capacity" to screen for possible threats. "Events at the very end of last week took the risk profile from tolerable to intolerable," he told the commission yesterday. "Diminished capacity at this point in time represents a different profile to last week." Border Force officers check passports and question and search travellers coming into and leaving Australia. Officers also search baggage, aircraft and vessels, and patrol the tarmac, wharf and baggage-handling areas to detect and deter criminal activity.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Afghanistan • Pakistan

16. Intelligence operatives detain 7 kidnappers including a woman

Pajhwok Afghan News, 2016 04 04

Herat City-- At least seven kidnappers, including a woman, have been detained in western Herat province, the governor's office said Monday. A statement from the governor's house said the gang was busted by the National Directorate of Security (NDS) personnel.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Africa • Afrique

17. Démantèlement ?une nouvelle cellule "terroriste" au Maroc [Pan African News Agency

Panapresse, 2016 04 03

Rabat--Le ministère marocain de l'Intérieur a annoncé, dimanche, dans un communiqué le démantèlement d'une nouvelle cellule "terroriste" affiliée à Daesh en Libye. Selon la même source, le démantèlement de cette cellule "terroriste" a été faite les 1er et 2 avril dans les villes de Marrakech et Samara. La cellule est composée de deux éléments chargés de financer et de coordonner avec l'organisation Daesh en Libye, a ajouté le ministère.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

18. Le Nigeria met la main sur le chef d'Ansaru, groupe islamiste proche de Boko Haram

Agence France-Presse, 2016 04 03

Kano, Nigeria--Le groupe islamiste nigérian Ansaru, dissident de Boko Haram et lié à Al-Qaïda au Maghreb islamiste (Aqmi), a subi cette semaine une lourde perte, avec l'arrestation par l'armée nigériane de son chef, Khalid al-Barnawi, l'un des "terroristes" les plus recherchés par les Etats-Unis. "Les agents de sécurité ont effectué vendredi une avancée dans la lutte contre le terrorisme en arrêtant Khalid al-Barnawi, le chef du groupe terroriste Ansaru à Lokoja", capitale de l'État de Kogi (centre), a annoncé dimanche le porte-parole de l'armée nigériane Rabe Abubakar. Al- Barnawi, 47 ans, de son vrai nom Usman Umar Abubakar, "était en haut de la liste des terroristes que nous recherchons", a précisé à l'AFP le porte- parole militaire.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

Americas • Amériques

There are no stories today. / Il n'y a pas d'histoires aujourd'hui.

Asia • Asie

19. Army conducts artillery exercise along east coast amid N. Korean threats

Yonhap English News, Staff reporter, 2016 04 04

Seoul - South Korea's Army conducted a live-fire artillery exercise along the east coast on Monday amid continuous threats of attacks and missile and artillery launches by North Korea. The large-scale naval firing drill along the East Sea mobilized artillery units belonging to the three Army corps stationed along the eastern front of the inter-Korean border, according to the military. The drill simulated an artillery counter-attack against a supposed North Korean naval provocation, the Army noted. About 20 artillery weapons were mobilized in the one-day drill, including the K-9 Thunder self-propelled howitzer and the 130 millimeter multiple launch rocket system, the Army said. Counter-artillery radar and unmanned aerial vehicles were also brought in for the exercise, along with naval warships.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

20. Boosting anti-terror features of buildings: Govt reviews security guidelines

Straits Times, Staff reporters, 2016 04 04

Amid a heightened alert against the threat of a terror attack here, the Government is reviewing security guidelines for building owners, the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) has revealed. An MHA spokesman said it has been working with key agencies - including the police, Singapore Civil Defence Force, Building and Construction Authority and Urban Redevelopment Authority - to update current guidelines. These will be brought in line with existing regulatory standards. The ministry is also looking to offer greater clarity in the technical specifications of security measures, such as vehicle barriers, closed-circuit television (CCTV) systems and glass facade standards. "We expect to complete the review by the end of this year," the spokesman told The Straits Times. The ministry said last month that the threat of a terrorist attack in Singapore was at its highest level in decades and that it could pass laws that may require building owners to adopt stringent security measures. But the ministry did not give a definite timeframe. The current guidelines, which are not compulsory, were published in 2005 and updated in 2010. Called Guidelines for Enhancing Building Security in Singapore, the 138-page document sets out security measures such as using an anti-ramming perimeter line or blast-resistant structural materials.

Return to Top / Haut de la page

21. Gunmen kidnap Malaysian ship crew in Abu Sayyaf area

Agence France-Presse, Staff reporter, 2016 04 04

